PREFACE.

THIS series of reports, known as the Federal Cases, is a comprehensive compilation of the decisions of the United States Circuit and District Courts which have been rendered from the organization of the Government in 1789 to the first publication of the Federal Reporter in 1880. It constitutes, in conjunction with the Federal Reporter, a complete and consecutive series of reports, beginning with the first organization of the courts reported and continuing down to the last decision rendered.

Origin of the Enterprise.

In 1880 the Federal Reporter was established for the purpose of reporting the decisions of the United States Circuit and District Courts. It included all cases heard after January 1, 1880, and has become a repository of all current Federal decisions. This function has been performed so satisfactorily that within a few years it came to be recognized as the official Reporter of the Federal Courts.

The Federal Reporter had started in "in the midst of things." Nothing else was possible, since there had to be a beginning. What lay back of 1880 was partly to be found scattered through the different series of Circuit and District Court Reports, none of which had ever been exhaustive, and many of which had long been out of print. Sometimes cases which attracted attention at the time had appeared in current periodicals. Sometimes they were published with the early State Reports, or in different series of Selected Cases. Some opinions found a place in several contemporaneous series, and some were never printed at all. This period has been aptly called by Judge HAMMOND "The Dark Continent of American Jurisprudence."

After the Federal Reporter was fairly established, its publishers were frequently urged by Judges and practitioners in the United States Courts to gather up and republish the decisions of earlier date, so as to make the record of American Federal adjudications exhaustive. An annotated reprint would be more valuable than the original set, even at the same price; yet it could be made much cheaper. Theoretically, the plan was an admirable one, but the practical difficulties in the way of obtaining the earlier Federal cases, scattered as they were, made it seem at first impracticable. But the requests for the work were so frequent that the publishers were finally led to issue an experimental circular, and canvass the field to see whether there were really sufficient demand to make the formidable undertaking commercially feasible. The results of this inquiry were so satisfactory that the plans of the publication were at once elaborated, and no time was lost in beginning the collection of cases and material. This involved great labor and expense,—greater even than had been anticipated,—and it has now only been accomplished after five years of busy preparation.

The publishers and the editors have studied the peculiar conditions of the problem of how best to make this great mass of heterogeneous material available for the use of the Bench and Bar. They have worked out a method of treatment of these cases which seems specially adapted to bring the scattered reports together into a complete and consecutive series, to be their final repository.

Sources of Material.

It is the purpose of Federal Cases to cover, with the Federal Reporter and the United States Supreme Court Reports, the whole body of the law as it has been administered by the Federal courts. The successful accomplishment of this end requires not only the republication, entire, of all of the old Circuit and District Court Reports, but also all Federal cases which can be brought to light by an exhaustive examination of the United States Supreme Court Reports, the law periodicals, state reports, text books, and other works likely to contain such cases, and an unremitting search for all accessible decisions whether to be found in pamphlets, in any of the great libraries, in the hands of individuals, or in the records of the courts. In this way several thousand decisions have been discovered which are not to be found in what is generally regarded as a complete Federal library. Prominent among these unpublished decisions might be mentioned the opinions of Judge BETTS in the Southern District of New York, which are on file in the office of the clerk of the court, in a series of manuscript books in the handwriting of the judge. These manuscript books are in two series, denominated for convenience, Circuit Court MS. and District Court MS., respectively. There are also a great many valuable cases largely from the same district, but some from other districts, which were collected by Judge BETTS from newspapers and similar publications and preserved in the form of a scrap-book. A similar scrap-book collection of cases has been found in the office of the clerk for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Attention is called to the large number of new admiralty decisions, including many of the most important of those of Judge BETTS, and the cases received from the Southern District of Florida, which for many years were preserved in manuscript in what is locally known as the Admiralty Records, comprising some twelve large volumes of recorded cases, containing the decisions of Judges WEBB, MARVIN, BOYNTON, and MCKINNEY upon different questions of admiralty law. Many of these cases have been cited in recent decisions from that district and also in Judge MARVIN'S work on Wreck and Salvage. Most of them are of great importance, but comparatively few have ever been published. The unpublished decisions of Hon. JAMES W. LOCKE secured, through the courtesy of the judge, are mostly in admiralty, as are also many of those contained in the collections of the opinions of the late Judge HOFFMAN, in the California district, known as "Hoffman's Opinions" and "Hoffman's Decisions," respectively, and published by permission of Judge HOFFMAN.

The case law relating to patents is enriched by many new decisions particularly in the Southern District of New York, and the Districts of Massachusetts and Connecticut. In the District of Columbia, MacArthur's Patent Cases includes all appeals from the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents after the period covered by Cranch's Circuit Court Reports, from the year 1841 to 1859. From 1859 to the establishment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in 1863, a large number of patent cases were decided which were to have made the second volume of MacArthur's Patent Cases, but which has never appeared. Many of these decisions have been cited in Law's Patent Digest and elsewhere. They are enrolled in manuscript form, and are on file in the United States Patent Office. These opinions have all been copied and duly reported under their proper titles.

In addition to these special collections of cases, inquiry of the clerks of all of the Federal courts for unreported decisions has produced a large number of important opinions, as has also an exhaustive search of the files of the newspapers published during and prior to the late war, such, for instance, as the New York Daily Times and Niles' Weekly Register. It has been the constant aim to preserve everything of importance, and no effort has been spared to make the reports of these cases full and complete in every respect.

Arrangement.

The most difficult problem in the publication of the Federal Cases, was to find a satisfactory method of arranging the decisions. Investigation and experiment showed that it was impracticable to arrange them chronologically,—or by Circuits and Districts, or by the original reports. The great object to be attained was to so arrange the cases that the reader can readily find any case, no matter how or where it may be cited. The publishers believe they have accomplished this purpose in the Federal Cases.

The cases in this series are reported in the alphabetical order of their titles. This alphabetical arrangement is rendered necessary by the fact that the same case is frequently found reported in two or more reports, and also because the material for this compilation has been derived from a great variety of sources. It is also the best possible arrangement from a practical point of view in a compilation of this description. It applies to the cases in a series of reports the order and method always applied to a digest or an encyclopædia, and thereby greatly facilitates the discovery of the case wanted. An examination of any volume of this series will fully demonstrate the practical utility of this arrangement. Where there are two or more titles, the case is reported under that title which comes first in alphabetical order, and the other titles are printed in the series in their regular alphabetical order, with proper references to the title under which the case is reported. Where there are two or more cases of the same title, the cases are printed in the alphabetical order of the names of the respective reporters. (See, in illustration, The Alabama, Case No. 123, and The America, Case No. 279.) An elaborate system of cross-references has been devised, the title of every case appearing (in the form of a cross-reference) alphabetically under the name of each of the parties, and in many cases, where the names are spelled differently, under each different form of spelling, thus enabling the reader to turn to the case at once. The cases have also been numbered consecutively throughout the series. These numbers have been introduced for the purpose of furnishing a more specific and ready reference to a given case when such case is cited in the text or referred to in a cross-reference. (See, in illustration, references already given and cross-references under Adams, page 157.) By this method of numbering the cases can be referred to specifically, in advance of their publication, saving the necessity of referring to the old reports which are superseded by the Federal Cases. When the entire series shall have been completed, every reference to every case embraced within the series will have the specific case-number citation,—a great aid in referring back and forth from one volume to another, which could not be secured in any other way.

Every effort has been made to render this duplex arrangement of the cases as effective as possible. Among other details the letters and numbers included in each volume are stamped on the back of the book. Each subscriber is also furnished with a printed table giving in alphabetical and numerical order the title of each case published in the series; also a table setting out in alphabetical order the original reports of the United States Circuit and District Courts, and giving in regular sequence the volume and page of each case found in such reports with a parallel reference to the number of such case in this series. A brief examination of these tables will demonstrate their value and utility.

Style of Reporting and Annotating.

The Federal Cases is essentially a verbatim reprint of the decisions; the cases with comparatively few exceptions being reprinted exactly as they appear in the original reports, headnotes, statement, and opinion, and all original matter supplied by the editors being indicated by the use of brackets. In the preparation of the cases for publication, the fact soon developed that the great majority of them had been published in more than one place, and in very many instances some one of these several reports of the same case is much more complete than any of the others, while one of the incomplete reports may contain important matter not to be found in the best report of the same case. It has been the intention to make the Federal Cases a verbatim reprint of all the reports of all the cases; and in doing this, the best report of each case has been selected and indicated by being placed first among the references immediately following the title of the case itself. All matter from all other reports of that case, not included in the report adopted, is inserted in its proper place, inclosed in brackets, with a footnote stating the source from which it was secured; giving the reader the benefit of a careful comparison of every published report of all of the decisions. That this is a matter of considerable importance is evidenced by the fact that in some instances several paragraphs are added to the opinion of the court in this way, or important matter incorporated in the statement necessary to a clear understanding of the decision. (See, in illustration, In re Alexander, Case No. 161.) It should be understood that all matter inclosed in brackets is the result of the editorial treatment of the cases, unless there is a footnote explaining its source.

A page to page examination of all the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Federal Reporter, and all cases included within this series, has been made for citations of the Circuit and District Court cases. These citations have all been carefully edited, and placed under the appropriate paragraphs of the syllabus of the cited case, stating in each instance whether in fact that case is cited, distinguished, followed, or overruled, as the case may be, in any later decision. In this way, each case gives the references to every place in which it has been subsequently referred to by any Federal court in any manner. Where a case is cited to a proposition not contained in the syllabus, such additional point will be stated briefly. Additional citations of authorities are also given with the more important cases; and where a case was afterwards taken to the Supreme Court, a reference is made to the opinion of the Supreme Court bearing directly upon the points involved in the case as reported below. This reference is appended as a note. Copious notes are also prepared showing subsequent changes in the law involved in any particular case where necessary. (See, in illustration, Adams v. The Sophia, Case No. 65, and Adams v. Burks, Case No. 50.)

The page to page examination of the reports produced a large list of cases cited which were apparently unreported. Special investigation has been made of every one of these unreported cases. A large number of them have been found, but in other instances the fact has developed that the court records have either been lost or destroyed, through the burning of a courthouse, or some other calamity, so that the case cannot be obtained, or for some reason the opinion, if one was written, is not now on file. Where these unreported cases have been obtained, they will be published in full. If they have not been found, a statement of the circumstances will be given, and such statement of the points decided as can be gleaned from the records and the various digests and text-books in which they were mentioned. (See, in illustration, The Alfred, Case No. 189.) In fine, it is the purpose to make this series exhaustive so far as the title of every Federal case anywhere cited or referred to is concerned, so that the reader may feel sure of either finding each case reported herein or of getting all the information about it that can be obtained anywhere.

Special acknowledgment should be made of the interest shown in the work by the Judges, many of them revising their own opinions in proof.

Special Matter in Book I.

The first volume of the series contains the following important tables:

1. A chronological table of the several circuits showing their geographical limits under the various acts of congress from 1789 to the present time. This table will aid in determining the circuit, of which any state was a part, at any given time.

2 and 3. A list of the judges arranged chronologically under their respective circuits and districts. A list of the judges arranged alphabetically without regard to their respective circuits and districts. The lists of Federal judges have been the result of a great deal of careful research and investigation. It is somewhat strange that no reliable list of Federal judges has ever been published. Fragmentary lists and memoranda, of the judges' names for a particular district for a short period of time have appeared in various reports, but no complete list with any pretense to reliability has ever been prepared, so far as known. This list has been made up from a careful examination of the lists of names in all of the periodicals and reports. It has been checked carefully with the records in the departments at Washington, and also with the various biographical works and local histories. The aim has been to make this list complete, and as accurate as possible. In doing this, extended inquiry has been made of all the judges and clerks of the various courts and many other persons likely to possess information on the subject. The result obtained is what is believed to be the most reliable roll of Federal judges to be found anywhere. Special acknowledgments are due to many of the living judges for the great assistance they have rendered in this matter.

4. A table of the United States Circuit and District Court Reports arranged by circuits and districts.

5. A table of the reports, periodicals, and text-books examined for the United States Circuit and District Court cases therein reported and cited. The very extensive character of this latter table will afford an idea of the great care and extent of the inquiries necessary to gather in all of the decisions in the Federal courts.

In presenting this series to the public, the publishers desire to express their obligation to the owners of the reports from which cases have been reprinted, and to the members of the Bench and Bar throughout the whole country who have so effectively aided in the development of these reports.

Reorganized by Act Feb. 13, 1801, (2 Stat. 90.) as first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth circuits. No complete record can be found of the allotment of the justices to the several circuits, under Act April 13, 1792, (1 Stat. 253, § 3,) which provided that at each session the supreme court shall assign to the justices, respectively, "the circuits which they are to attend at the ensuing sessions of the circuit courts." The justices of the supreme court did not sit in the circuit courts from February 13, 1801, (2 Stat. 90.) until April 29, 1802, (2 Stat. 156.)

² The words "circuit justice" are used throughout the Federal Cases "to designate the justice of the supreme court who is allotted to any circuit," (Rev. St. 605;) though they do not appear to have had any such contemporaneous use prior to the enactment of that section.

300.) Reorganized by Act March 3, 1881, (21 Stat. 507.)

³⁷ Organized by Act Sept. 24, 1789, (1 Stat. 73.)

³⁸ The district of Potomac, including a portion of the states of Maryland and Virginia, was organized by Act Feb. 13, 1801, § 21, (2 Stat. 96,) and the district court, by that act, was to be held by the district judge for the district of Maryland. After the District of Columbia was erected, it was provided by Act March 3, 1801, § 7, (2 Stat. 124,) that the chief judge of the circuit court for the District of Columbia should hold the district court for the district of Potomac. The district of Potomac was abolished by Act March 8, 1802, (2 Stat. 132, c. 8,) taking effect July 1, 1802.

Case No. 1.

The AALESUND.

[9 Ben. 203.]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1877.

DAMAGES TO PERSON—RIGHT OF ACTION—STEVEDORE.

1. In an action in rem to recover of the ship damages sustained by a stevedore, engaged in discharging cargo, who was thrown down and seriously injured by the breaking of the span-rope that sustained the tackle of slings he had rigged, which rope the master of the bark had rigged expecting to discharge the cargo himself: Held, that the putting up an imperfect span-rope was not such a failure of duty on the part of the master in the furnishing of the ship as would give a right of action against her.

[2. Cited in The Rheola, 7 Fed. Rep. 783, to the point that the owner of a defective article is not liable for an injury caused thereby to a mere stranger, unless the article was imminently dangerous.]

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.

Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is to recover damages for injuries received by the libellant on board a Norwegian bark when lying in navigable water at one of the piers in New York, discharging her cargo. The libellant at the time he was injured was engaged in the work of discharging the cargo, and was actually on board the vessel. His duties were to stand at the hatch and as the cargo came up from the hold in the slings to prevent it from catching on the hatch. While thus engaged the span-rope broke, whereby the libellant was precipitated against the combings of the hatch and sustained injury, to recover for which he brings this action against the vessel. It is not disputed that the libellant, while employed as above described, received a serious injury, nor is it denied that the immediate cause of the accident was the breaking of the span-rope while being used to hoist two bags of coffee from the hold of the ship. The evidence shows that the span-rope had been rigged by the master of the vessel when he supposed that he was to discharge the cargo himself by his own crew. Subsequently he determined to employ a stevedore, and a contract was made with one Lloyd to discharge the cargo for so much, paid him by the ship. The libellant was employed by Lloyd, and was acting under his directions. It is usual even when a stevedore is employed to discharge a vessel for the vessel to furnish the span-rope; and when Lloyd was employed he used the span-rope found to have been already put up by the master as above stated, changing its position to correspond with a change in the location of the bark. The libellant himself assisted in rigging the tackle to the span-rope, and had full opportunity to know the condition of the rope so far as was disclosed by external appearance. He made no complaints in respect to the rope, and never objected to using it. The rope was originally a good rope, and was of sufficient size. If it was defective, such defect would not be apparent without a close examination of the condition of the fibre. It had been used four years as a sheet, and upon a test made since the accident the weight of 1183 pounds was hoisted by it without breaking.

On the part of the defence it is contended that the span-rope was not imperfect, and that the accident was caused by the libellant's own negligence in permitting the bags in the slings to catch under the hatch as the horse was hoisting them up. At the time of the accident two bags of coffee were in the slings. It is also contended that as a matter of law there can be no recovery in this action, whether the rope was sound or defective.

I am of the opinion that upon the law of the case the libellant cannot recover in this action, and therefore I do not consider the question of fact, but treat the case as if it were proved that the master of this vessel put up for the purpose of discharging his cargo a span-rope of insufficient strength for that purpose. I also assume for the purposes of this case that the ship would be charged with any damages arising from the neglect of the master in a matter appertaining to the business of the ship, and such I consider the discharging of her cargo to be. In order to charge the ship, at least as much must be proved as would be necessary to make out a cause of action against the master in personam.

It is plain that the right to recover in this action does not arise out of contract. There is evidence that by the contract between the ship and Lloyd, who was employed to discharge the cargo, the ship was to furnish the span-rope, and that a span-rope is part of the tackle, apparel and furniture of a merchant-ship. But there was no privity of contract between the ship and the libellant. The libellant was employed by Lloyd, and was working under his exclusive direction and control. This point is conceded in behalf of the libellant, but it is said the action is in delicto. The fault of the master in the furnishing of the ship resulting in damages is the ground of the proceeding against the ship. The question is, then, whether putting up an imperfect span-rope is such a violation of the duty owing to any who might use the rope in the way the libellant used it as to give a right of action for injuries caused by the imperfect condition of the rope. I am of the opinion that there was no such violation of duty. Injury to a person bearing off the rope attached to the span-rope would not necessarily follow from the breaking of the rope, and the master cannot be held to have put up the rope with the reasonable expectation that such a result would follow if it broke.

None of the cases to which I have been referred appear to justify such a holding. On the other hand, the case of Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co., [1 Thomp. & C. 452,]² cited in Wharton on Negligence, [1st Ed.] § 441, appears to be on all fours with this, and its principle is fatal to the claim of the libellants. See, also, Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 351. Again, it is proved and not disputed that the libellant himself saw the span-rope; that he rigged the block to it, and had as full an opportunity to judge of its efficiency as the master had. It is true that the master knew what the libellant did not know—that the rope had been used for a sheet during four years; but four years' use would not necessarily destroy the rope nor make it too weak for the use to which it was put. The effect of such a use would be different in different cases, and its effect on this rope would necessarily be determined by the appearance and condition of the rope itself. As to that the libellant was as well informed as the master, and, having gone to work with the rope without objection or complaint, he cannot now say that the accident was the result of the master's neglect rather than his own. The libel must be dismissed with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—CHOICE OF ASSIGNEE.

Where, at the first meeting of a bankrupt's creditors, but one creditor appeared, and he proved his debt, and elected as assignee a person who was present, and it appeared that this person was a stranger to the creditor, and had informed him of the meeting, and solicited the creditor's vote for himself as assignee: Held, that the election of an assignee made under such circumstances could not be sanctioned.

In bankruptcy.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case the register, in transmitting to the court the result of the first meeting of creditors, certifies to the court, that, at such meeting, one creditor who had proved his debt appeared; that only one debt was proved; that the register inquired of such creditor if he desired to elect an assignee; that such creditor replied that he would elect Mr. C. D., who was present; that, as Mr. C. D. had been elected in six out of the last ten cases before the register, the register thought it right to make inquiries of the creditor concerning the choice, and elicited from him the statement, that Mr. C. D. was a stranger to him, and called at his place of business on the day preceding, with one of the notices to creditors, which was the first he had heard of the meeting, and called his attention to the notice, and solicited of him that he would prove his debt and elect Mr. C. D. as the assignee of the bankrupt, and, after consultation, it was agreed that he should attend the meeting of creditors and swear to his claim and vote for Mr. C. D. as assignee; and that this statement was made in the presence of Mr. C. D., who remarked that, if he had not so called upon the creditor, the creditor would never have known of the meeting. The register remarks, that he saw nothing in the conduct of Mr. C. D. in any way disingenuous, but that, on the other hand, Mr. C. D. was understood by the register to claim that it was not improper thus to procure himself to be elected. The register states that he certifies the case to the court, that it may be fully advised of the facts of the case, in passing upon the question of the approval or disapproval of the assignee so elected, only suggesting the inquiry whether it would be a wholesome proceeding, if adopted and approved by this court.

In addition to the facts stated in the certificate above mentioned, I have been addressed on the subject by Mr. C. D. himself, who states that he proposes to make a regular business of seeking out creditors of bankrupts and soliciting them to prove their debts and vote for him as assignee, with a view to such pecuniary emoluments as may legitimately belong to the position. He is very frank on the subject, and states that he had no idea there was anything improper in what he had done or proposed doing, and that, if the court thought there was, he would at once desist. I have before me now, unapproved as yet, the election of the same Mr. C. D. as assignee, in another case, at an earlier date, before the same register. I have also before me, unapproved as yet, his election as assignee in three other cases before three other and different registers. So far as appears from these cases, his election was made in each of them by a single creditor.

To knowingly sanction the election of an assignee made under circumstances such as those above stated would be to open the door to abuses whose character can be well conjectured. A free election, proceeding from the real choice of the creditors, is one thing. An election persuaded by the impertunity of the proposed assignee, exercised upon indifferent creditors, is another thing. The elections are disapproved in all of the cases above-mentioned.

BANKRUPTCY—POWER OF REGISTER—COMPELLING CONVEYANCE BY BANKRUPT.

[A register has no power, on motion of the assignee and creditors in bankruptcy, to order the bankrupt to execute deeds releasing an interest held at the time of filing his petition.]

[In bankruptcy. Certificate to district judge by register of question arising in proceedings.]

[Statement by Charles Hamlin, Register:]

Upon the examination of said bankrupt in behalf of said creditors, the assignee being present, the following question was proposed to said bankrupt, viz.: "Referring to the conveyance requested by the assignee, please state whether you are now willing to execute them." The bankrupt answered: "Upon consulting with my counsel, present, I decline signing the deeds, unless otherwise directed by the court." The deeds referred to are release deeds of an interest of the bankrupt, which he had at the time of filing his petition in bankruptcy in Penobscot county, in this district. The counsel of said creditors and assignee then moved before me, that I order the bankrupt to execute said deeds.

Mr. Crosby, for creditors, and Judge Humphrey, assignee, spoke to the point that the execution of the deeds by the bankrupt would enable the assignee to sell the property at better terms, he thereby having the title to the same as it appeared of record.

McCrillis & Varney, for bankrupt, spoke to the point that all of the bankrupt's title to the property was now vested absolutely in the assignee, by the assignment under section 14, and that the "instruments, deeds, and writings" named in general clause 59, (Rice's Manual,) section 14, of bankrupt act, contemplate real property situate beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or beyond the limits of the United States.

Opinion by Register.

I decided that I had no power to make the order requested, being of the opinion that the application should be made to the judge of this court. I did not pass upon the question of the right of the assignee as to whether or not, under sections 14, 15, and 26, the bankrupt ought or not to execute the conveyances. And the said parties requested that the same should be certified to the judge, for his opinion thereon.

FOX, District Judge. Decision approved.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—DISCHARGE—PARTIES.

[In bankruptcy. Warren C. Abbe filed a petition that the late copartnership of which he was a member be declared bankrupt; that the petitioner be declared bankrupt, and discharged from all his debts, partnership as well as individual. The register was of the opinion that the first request should be denied and the other granted. Heard on the certification of the register. Opinion of the register concurred in.]

BY THE REGISTER. I, Whitfield S. Johnson, one of the registers of the said court, do certify that in the above case certain questions arose, which are hereby certified to the court for its opinion thereon. The bankrupt has filed his petition and schedules in a different form from that hitherto uniformly adopted in this district. He first petitions, using the form prescribed for partnership petitions, (form two.) In this petition he sets himself out as a member of "a copartnership lately composed of himself and one Henry C. Read, of the city of Philadelphia, state of Pennsylvania." The petition then proceeds in the usual form for partners, alleging inability to pay debts, &c., and closes by praying that the said firm may be declared bankrupts, &c. It also contains the allegation that Abbe has been unable to get his "late co-partner, Henry C. Read, to join in this petition." The petition is signed and sworn to by Warren C. Abbe, alone. To this petition is attached a schedule showing debts to the amount of two thousand four hundred and fifty-six dollars, all of which are stated to have been "contracted as co-partner with Henry C. Read, of the late firm of Read & Abbe." The schedules show that there are no partnership assets. Then follows an individual petition, (form one,) with schedules of individual debts and assets. These disclose but one individual debt, and that small in amount, and no individual assets, except such as are exempt from the operation of the act.

The papers altogether, then, form substantially a petition: 1st. To have the late firm of Read & Abbe declared bankrupt. 2d. To have Warren C. Abbe declared bankrupt. 3d. To have Warren C. Abbe decreed (upon full surrender, &c.) a certificate of discharge from all his debts, both individually and as a member of the former firm of Read & Abbe. On the case coming to me on order of reference, I doubted my power to make such adjudication as is prayed for by the papers, and also as to whether I should certify the papers to be "correct in form." The practice in my district has hitherto invariably been for one who was formerly a member of a copartnership to file an individual petition, (form one,) and annex thereto a schedule of his debts, both individual and copartnership, stating opposite each debt, in its appropriate place in the schedules, "whether contracted as co-partner, &c., or not." Under this practice a large number who owed joint and separate debts have been granted certificates of discharge; and the practice was accepted without question as the correct one, until the decision of Blatchford, J., in Re Little, [Case No. 8,390,] was announced. In this decision the ground was taken that, before partnership debts could be discharged, it was necessary to have the firm declared bankrupt, and that this could only be done by each partner joining voluntarily, or by being brought in by notice, under general order number eighteen. Since that decision, I understand the practice in that district to have been modified so as to conform to it, but I am not aware of any other district in which it has been followed in practice. Aware of this decision, and, wishing to have the matter definitely settled, the attorney for the bankrupt in this case drew the papers in the form indicated, that this question might be raised and disposed of in this district. It is within my knowledge that there are a number of cases undisposed of in this district, in which the question as to the effect of a discharge upon an individual petition, upon partnership debts, becomes of great importance. I do not think I have the power to declare the firm of Read & Abbe bankrupts. The papers show that the firm was dissolved before the filing of the petition by Abbe. No act of bankruptcy is alleged or proved against Read. The petition is signed by Abbe alone. Read has not joined in it, and it is alleged that his consent cannot be obtained. He has had no notice of these proceedings. An order might be granted to give such notice to Read, and ordering him, were sufficient acts alleged, to show cause why the firm should not be declared bankrupts, but I do not think it necessary. The only object of Abbe in asking that the firm be declared bankrupts, is alleged to be that the partnership debts may be discharged as to him. He does not care whether Read is discharged from them or not. All he seeks is, that his own discharge if obtained, may discharge all the debts, both joint and separate, for which he is now liable. This, I think, would be the effect of a discharge obtained upon his petition, without reference to Read. My opinion is, if the present papers are regarded as a petition of Abbe's alone, and I adjudicate him bankrupt and not the firm, that his discharge would cover all debts both joint and separate. I have, therefore, refused to grant the first prayer of the papers, and have held that it was not necessary to take any steps as to Read. It is true that Judge Blatchford's decision cited above holds, or seems to hold, differently; but, with all deference to his honor's learning and ability, I am inclined to doubt its correctness.

It must be evident that if, in order for one partner to rid himself of partnership debts, it is necessary for him to bring in all the other partners, a large number of partnership debts must remain undischarged. In many cases it would be impossible to find the other partners, or, if found, to procure their assent, or to prove acts of bankruptcy sufficient to sustain a petition as against them. I think it also evident, from the wording of the act, that such was not the intention of congress. Section thirty-three expressly provides that "no discharge granted under this act shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint-contractor, endorser, surety, or otherwise," implying that one partner may be discharged from joint debts, though the other is not. Neither does it seem that the act was so construed by the judges of the United States supreme court, who framed the general orders in bankruptcy and the forms of proceeding under the act. Among the particulars they require to be stated with regard to each debt in schedule A 3, is "whether contracted as co-partner, or joint-contractor, with any other person, and, if so, with whom," implying that partnership and individual debts may be set out in the same schedule attached to the same petition, the value of each debt being specified. It was early settled in England that a certificate upon a separate commission discharged both joint and separate debts. See Horsey's Case, 3 P. Wms. 23. I have not been able to find any decision reversing this early settlement of the law, but there are several confirming it. See Eden, Bankr. 396; Owen, Bankr. 297; Tucker v. Oxley, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 37; 2 Abb. N. Y. Dig. 479. But since this case was filed another case has arisen in the southern district of New York, (see In re Frear, [Case No. 5,074,]) in which Mr. Register Fitch discusses substantially the same questions and arrives at the same conclusions I have, which conclusions seem to be approved or, at least, not dissented from by Judge Blatchford.

I am of the opinion, therefore, first. That I have no power to adjudicate the firm of Read & Abbe, bankrupts. Second. That it is unnecessary to allow the papers to be amended or affidavits filed on which to issue an order to bring Read in on notice under general order number eighteen. Third. That Warren C. Abbe should be adjudicated a bankrupt, that creditors, both partnership and individual, may prove their debts under such proceedings, and that his discharge will be a bar to partnership as well as individual debts. If the court should hold these opinions correct, I will, therefore, regard the papers simply as the petition of Warren C. Abbe to be discharged from all his debts; both joint and separate, and proceed in all respects the same as has hitherto been done in other cases. All which is respectfully certified to the honorable court for its opinion thereon.

W. S. Johnson, Register.

James Buchanan, for petitioner.

FIELD, District Judge.—I concur with the register in the opinion that where a member of a late co-partnership files his individual petition, under the bankrupt act, and inserts in his schedules debts contracted by said co-partnership, and there are no partnership assets to be administered, he will be entitled to be discharged from all his debts, individual as well as co-partnership, and that it is not necessary to make the other partners parties to the proceedings, or to have them brought in under general order number eighteen.

I have examined the two cases referred to before Judge Blatchford, and I am not sure that there is any conflict between them. In the case of In re Little, [Case No. 3,390,] the petition was filed by a member of an existing partnership, the schedule of debts showed that a large portion of the debts were co-partnership debts, and the inventory of assets showed that part of the assets was co-partnership property. The judge, therefore, considered the petition as, in fact, a petition to have the firm declared bankrupt on the petition of one of its partners. The application was to amend the petition by joining Dana, the other partner, with him in the proceedings; and the court, very properly, allowed the amendment to be made. It is true in giving his opinion the judge said, that until the other partner, Dana, was brought in, Little could not be discharged from the debts of the firm, because the theory and intent of section thirty-six of the act and of general orders numbers sixteen and eighteen, are, that the creditors of a firm should be required to meet but once, and that all questions in regard to the bankruptcy of the firm, and the administration of the assets of the firm, were to be determined in one bankruptcy forum. Now it is very evident that this reasoning would not apply to a case where the inventory did not include any assets of the firm, and where there were no assets of the firm to be administered.

In the other case referred to, that of In re Frear, [Case No. 5,074,] the petitioner filed his individual petition, praying that he might be discharged from all his debts, provable under the bankrupt act. The schedules annexed to the petition showed that the petitioner was also a member of a late co-partnership which was dissolved some time before the filing of the petition, and that a large number of the debts were co-partnership debts. The question before the register, was whether a co-partnership debt could be proved. The register held that it could, and that the petitioner would be entitled to a discharge from all his debts, co-partnership as well as individual. Now, if the judge had thought that the register was wrong in this view of the case, he would certainly have said so. But he does not say so. All he says is: "The debt in question is provable, whether there are any assets of the co-partnership or not. If there are any such assets, they must be administered according to the provisions of section thirty-six of the act, and so must the assets of the separate estate of the bankrupt." From all which I infer the opinion of the judge to be that, when there are no assets of a co-partnership to be administered, a member of a late co-partnership may, upon his individual petition, be discharged from all his debts, co-partnership as well as individual. In this opinion I concur, and this is as far as it is necessary for me to go in order to dispose of the present case.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REISSUE—NEW MATTER.

2. The purposes and scope of reissues considered.

[In equity. Bill by Horatio H. Abbe and others, trading as the Gong Bell Manufacturing Company, against Jonathan C. Clark and others to restrain the infringement of patent No. 150,933. Decree for an injunction and an account.]

J. C. Clayton, for complainants.
W. E. Simonds, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity to restrain the defendants from the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent which were granted to the plaintiffs, as assignees of Elijah C. Barton, on September 14th, 1875. The original patent was dated May 19th, 1874. The invention is a child's toy, and, as shown in the drawings attached to the patent, is a pair of wheels connected by an axle, in combination with two open-mouthed or gong-shaped bells mounted upon the axle and between the wheels, so as to revolve therewith, and to be caused to ring whenever the wheels are rotated. A tongue or draft-bar is also connected with the wheels, so as to allow the wheels and bells to be rotated independently of the draft-bar. The three claims of the reissue are: "1. The combination with the connected wheels A A, of one or more bells, arranged between, and connected to, said wheels, so as to revolve simultaneously therewith, and to ring when so revolving. 2. The combination of the loosely-connected tongue or draft-bar P with the wheels A --, and intermediately arranged revolving bell or bells. 3. The combination of the following elements: The wheels A A, a pair of open-mouthed or gong-shaped bells, C C, provided with striking mechanism, and an axle or cross-rod, B, connecting the said wheels."

The defendants manufacture and sell two toys. The first consists of a pair of wheels connected with each other by a drum or large hollow axle. Sleigh-bells are attached to the inside of the drum or axle, between the wheels, by elastic or rigid connections, which bells revolve simultaneously with the wheels, and ring when revolving. The second toy consists of a pair of wheels connected with each other by bent metallic rims or axles, and attached to one wheel, and encircled by the rims, is a sleigh-bell, which revolves with the wheels, and rings as it revolves. In each device a bell is so connected with the axle and wheels as to allow the wheels to revolve independently of the bell. The defendants deny the novelty of the patented invention, and also deny infringement.

The record shows that prior to the date of plaintiffs' original patent, the following inventions were known in the art: First, the toy of Joseph Deuell, invented in 1865, and patented May 26th, 1874, which consists of a ring made of a piece or pieces of leather, or some similar material, with one or more bells attached to the inner periphery of the ring. Second, the Crawford and Hervey patent, dated November 19th, 1867; the Charles C. Johnson patent of March 23d, 1869; the English patent of William Robert Blake, filed April 20th, 1869; and the Rivera Ward patent of December 27th, 1870. All these devices are children's trundling-hoops, to which are attached in various ways, either upon the inside of the hoops, or upon the spokes, bells, which ring as the hoop is trundled. Third, the George W. Brown patent of June 25th, 1872, which consists of a pair of connected wheels of different diameters. It has a bell which rings by the jolting of the vehicle, but has no bell connected with the wheels so as to revolve simultaneously therewith. Fourth, the bell of William H. Nichols, patented August 27th, 1872, which is a call bell composed of two open-mouthed gong-bells which revolve upon a fixed horizontal shaft. No one of these articles has the characteristic features of the plaintiffs' device, but are widely removed from their toy. The evidence in regard to the pre-existing devices shows that Barton's invention consisted in the combination of two connected wheels, with a bell or bells arranged between, and upon the axle of the wheels, which bells are connected with the wheels so as to revolve therewith, and to ring when revolving, the arrangement of wheels and bells being substantially as described. The load of bells is put between the connected wheels, and the bells revolve with the revolving wheels. He had apparently no predecessor in this combination.

It cannot be earnestly denied that the defendants' toys infringe the terms of the first and second claims of the reissue, if the plaintiffs are entitled to the described combination of connected wheels with a bell or bells of any shape. But it is insisted that in the original patent the invention was limited to gong-shaped bells, and that the first and second claims of the reissue are void unless the bell or bells which are therein mentioned are also thus limited. It is true that the plaintiffs' original specification and drawings describe gong-bells, and that the claim of the original patent was for a combination of wheels with a pair of open-mouthed or gong-shaped bells, etc. There is no difference between the drawings of the patents, and no substantial difference in the descriptive portion of the two specifications.

The purpose of a surrender and reissue is not to introduce new features, ingredients or devices, but to render effectual the actual invention for which the original patent should have been granted (Collar Co. v. Van Dusen, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 530;) but the actual invention is to be shown, suggested, or substantially indicated in the original specification, drawings or models, and the scope or effect of the invention is not to be enlarged so as to include what was not so shown, suggested or indicated. An inspection of the drawings and specification in this case clearly suggests that the shape of the bells was not an essential feature of the invention, but that their shape or form could be greatly modified, while the essential characteristics of the invention were unaltered. A moderate degree of mechanical skill could substitute a sleigh-bell or an ordinary open-mouthed bell for a gong-bell. The actual invention was indicated by the device as shown in the patent; but it was so claimed that any one might take advantage of and have the benefit of the original thought by a substitution of one form of bell for another. In order to protect inventors who have taken patents which are inoperative by reason of such inadvertence, the statute has provided for a surrender and reissue. The strong tendency of recent decisions has properly been to restrict the reissue to the precise thing which the patentee invented, and which he had shown or had indicated in the specification or drawings, and not permit patentees to expand their claims and take in whatever improvements subsequent inventors have made. But in this case the invention manifestly had a wider scope than was claimed in the original patent. It follows that the first and second claims have been infringed. Let a decree be entered for an injunction, and an account.

Case No. 6.

ABBE v. ROOD.

[6 McLean, 106.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June, 1854.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RATIFICATION—WITNESSES —CREDIBILITY.

1. When an agent exceeds his powers in the adjustment of a controversy, his principals, in a reasonable time, after a knowledge of it, should repudiate it. If this be not done, the principals may become bound.

[Cited in Feild v. Farrington, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 148.]

2. If an agent entered into an arrangement notifying the debtor that he would submit it to the creditor for his ratification, unless he shall ratify it, there is no binding obligation.

3. When witnesses contradict each other in a material fact, a jury will consider which of the witnesses, from the circumstances connected with the transaction, would be most likely to know and recollect the facts.

4. A witness who swears that a certain thing was said or done, is entitled to greater weight than a witness who said he did not hear the remark or witness the act. The one is positive, the other negative; and both may be true, on the supposition that the first witness swears truly.

[At law. Action by Abbe & Colt against Rood & Rood on two promissory notes. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.]

Mr. Lathrop, for plaintiffs.

Vandyke & Grey, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought on two promissory notes. The signatures on both notes were erased, and they were offered in evidence without proof of their execution, as by the pleading they were not denied. But the court held that the notes could not be read without accounting for the erasures. A witness was called, who stated that the notes were sent to him as also the account, as counsel, for collection. Being unwell, he sent the notes to Mather & Taft, counsel at Niles. At that time, the signatures to the notes were not erased. On this evidence, the notes and the account were again offered in evidence. The account was receipted, and, as before stated, the signatures of the notes were erased. But the court refused to admit them, because it was not shown under what circumstances the signatures were erased, and the receipt of the account given. A deposition was then read, showing that a settlement was made, and that the defendants agreed to pay fifty cents on the dollar; that on this agreement being entered into, the signatures on the notes were erased and the account was receipted. The agent, Smith, alleged, that the counsel at Niles, never having been so instructed, had no power, as counsel, to compromise on the payment of a part of the debt. And this is undoubtedly the true view. Counsel may refer suit to arbitrators, but they have no power to discharge the debt on the payment of a part of it, unless specially authorized. Smith, the agent, was dissatisfied with the compromise, as the payment of the notes of the defendants was not secured. He proposed to take one half the debt on certain payments, and to retain these notes until half of their amount was paid. The defendants refused to sign the agreement. This suit was then brought.

Mr. Smith, agent of the plaintiffs, was called as a witness, he being contradicted by another witness. Objection being made, the court said the witness might be examined as to any matter of explanation; but that he could not be called to re-affirm what at first he stated. The counsel for the plaintiffs contended that the defendants knew that Smith acted as agent, and must have known that if he went beyond his authority he could not bind his principal, and that the acceptance of a security for a less sum would not discharge a debt for a larger amount. This principle is undoubted, unless the agent acts under a special authority.—[Fitch v. Sutton,] 5 East, 230; [Down v. Hatcher,] 10 Adol. & E. 121. A payment of a part, and an acquittance under seal in full satisfaction of the whole is sufficient, as the deed amounts to an acquittance. Accord and satisfaction cannot be pleaded unless executed. As an accord there must be an acceptance. [Woodruff v. Dobbins,] 7 Blackf. 582.

The court instructed the jury, that if the principal have knowledge of the agent's acts and do not repudiate them in a reasonable time, they will stand. If the contract be repudiated, the parties must be placed in the condition in which they stood before it was entered into; the notes given on the compromise should have been returned.

Where an agent does an unauthorized act, as the compromise of a debt, and the acts of compromise are known to the principal, who makes no objection, this acquiescence will bind him. Story, Ag. § 255. This presumption of the acquiescence of the principal does not arise, unless it be shown that he had full knowledge of the transaction. It is laid down in many authorities, that money or notes for a less sum discharges the debt, if received in payment. [Cumber v. Wane,] 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 607, 618, 630; [Sibree v. Tripp,] 15 Mees. & W. 22-31, it was held, that negotiable notes may be pleaded in payment, when given in payment of a larger amount.

The original agreement of compromise was as follows:—Whereas, H. W. Rood & Co., of Niles, Michigan, being indebted to Messrs. Gilbert, Prentiss & Tuttle, of New York, in the sum of $1245,57; and they are also indebted to Messrs. Abbe & Colt of said city, in the sum of $1263,54; and also to the late firm of Colgate, Abbott & Co., in the sum of $2111,56; and, whereas, the said Roods being unable to pay the sum in full, I have agreed in behalf of said firm to settle and compromise said debts, for fifty cents on the dollar, twenty per cent. thereof, N. P. Stuart agrees to pay in cash, for which I have taken his note, payable in thirty days, at the Michigan State Bank of Detroit, with interest; and the balance of thirty per cent. said Roods are to give other notes in equal parts payable in one, two and three years, with interest. If said twenty per cent. be paid, and they give their notes for the balance as above, then I agree to deliver up to them the notes for the said sums above specified, and the fifty per cent. to be in full therefor. Dated at Toledo, Nov. 10th, 1852, signed by E. J. Smith, who put also the other signatures to the agreement, all in his hand writing.

The notes were forwarded to Mather & Taft, lawyers of Niles, for collection, and they made the above arrangement, which Smith repudiated, having given them, as he alleges, no authority to make. The notes taken by Mather & Taft were returned to them by Smith. Mr. Smith states, that when he entered into this writing he informed the debtors that he was not authorized to make it; but that he would enter into it, and see whether his principals would sanction it. Mr. Stuart, witness called by the defendants, stated that he heard no reservation made by Smith, as to any want of authority; and that he was present when the arrangement was made. As these witnesses contradict each other, gentlemen, you are to judge of their credibility. And in doing this, they being respectable persons, you will consider who had the best opportunity of knowing what transpired at the time of the supposed compromise. And in this view it must be admitted, that Smith had a better opportunity of knowing and consequently of recollecting the facts which transpired. He was the agent of the principals, and he entered into the compromise; and he swears that he informed the parties that he was not authorized to make it, but would submit it to his principals for their approval. This condition was not heard by Mr. Stuart. The statement of the one witness is, that a fact did transpire, and of the other, that he did not hear the condition stated. The one is positive, the other negative. Now, where the witnesses are equally respectable, and one swears positively to a fact, and the other negatively, that he did not hear the condition, the weight of evidence will be with the one who affirms the fact, as his statement may be true and the statement of the other also; for though the condition was spoken of, the other witness may not have heard it.

On the supposition that the statement of Smith be true, and the jury should so find, then their enquiry will be, did the principals repudiate the agreement of their agent, within a reasonable time after they came to a full knowledge of it.

The jury will first inquire whether the agreement set up in defense was made by competent authority. The agent who made it says he had no such authority. The paper purporting to contain the agreement is all in the hand writing of Smith, and he received Stuart's check for $940 as part performance of the agreement. This check was payable some thirty days or more after its date. Under this paper, it is presumed that Mather and Taft made the arrangement or compromise with the defendants. This paper did not authorize these counsel to make the adjustment. But Smith offered to confirm the compromise, if the defendants would consent that the original notes should remain in his hands. When first informed of the compromise, Smith objected to it, returned the new notes given and the agreement. Upon the whole, gentlemen, if you shall find that Smith was not authorized to make the compromise, as he has sworn, and also that his principals were dissatisfied with it, and that this fact was made known to the defendants, it will be your duty to find for the plaintiff on the original causes of action, and assess their damages accordingly. The jury found for the plaintiffs—for the original notes and interest—and also on the accounts. As the plaintiffs recovered on the original ground of action, and not under the compromise, the money paid by Stuart in part performance of the compromise, should be returned to him, by Smith, the agent, unless it shall be made to appear, that the money so paid is the money of the defendants. And the court orders that no execution shall be issued on the judgment, until said sum of money shall be returned to Stuart, or satisfactory proof adduced that it is the money of the defendants; and if so shown, it should be entered as a credit on the judgment.

Case No. 7.

ABBETT v. ZUSI.

[5 Ban. & A. 38; 3 N. J. Law J. 47.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Dec. 20, 1879.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—LICENSE—CONDITIONAL ASSIGNMENT—BREACH OF CONDITION—CAVEAT EMPTOR.

1. An assignment of certain patents having been granted with a condition therein that, if default were made in payment of any of the instalments of the consideration money therefor, thereupon the assignment should become null and void, and default having been made, and a re-assignment taken, (previous to which, however, the assignee had granted a license to a third party to use the patents,) held, that a license granted under such circumstances was no defence to a charge of infringement by the use of the patents, because the assignee could give no better title than he himself had and the licensee ought to have inquired into the assignee's right to grant such license.

2. The maxim "caveat emptor" applied, under the facts in this case.

[In equity. Bill by Leon Abbett against Edward Zusi to enjoin infringement of letters patent, and for an accounting. Injunction granted.]

A. Q. Keasbey & Sons, for complainants.
B. C. Potts, for defendant.

NIXON, District Judge. The bill is filed for the infringement of certain letters patent, and for an injunction and an account. The answer admits the validity of the patents, and the use of the same by the defendant, but claims the right under a license granted to him by one Henry Sauerbier, who was the grantee of Flora B. Cabell, one of the owners thereof. It appears by the evidence, that on the 7th day of March, 1876, Flora B. Cabell, claiming to own the one-fourth part of the patents in controversy, for the consideration of $10,000, executed a writing conveying to said Sauerbier, all her right and interest therein; the assignment containing a condition, nevertheless, that the same should be null and void if the grantee failed to pay within ten days after their falling due, any one of nineteen promissory notes for $500 each, which the grantee of the patents had given, in addition to $500 in cash, as the consideration of the conveyance.

After the payment of two or three of the notes first maturing, the grantee allowed the remaining notes to go to protest. Steps being taken to vacate the transfer on account of said default in payment, Sauerbier, on the 15th of August, 1878, reassigned his interest in the patents to Mrs. Cabell, with covenant in writing that he was the owner of the same, and had not made any other assignment thereof. It appears, however, that previous to the said reassignment, to wit, on the 7th of January, 1878, he had granted a license to the defendant to use the patents in the manufacture of fluting machines, for the period of four years from that date, for the consideration of $4,000, and the question presented is whether a license under such circumstances is a defence to the infringement. I think that it is not. It would seem to be a proposition which required no argument, that the defendant derived from the grantor, Sauerbier, no better title than the latter had at the time of the transfer. But the notes that Sauerbier had given for the patents had remained under protest and unpaid for more than a year, and his right of ownership expressly depended upon their payment. The maxim "caveat emptor" applied, and if the defendant did not deem it worth his while, when he took the license, to inquire into the right of Sauerbier to grant it, he should not now complain if he comes to loss by his want of such ordinary diligence and care in the purchase.

The case of Woodworth v. Weed, [Case No. 18,022,] seems applicable. There a license had been given to use a patented machine, for which the licensee executed and delivered five promissory notes, payable at different times, with an agreement in writing, that if any one of the notes should become due and unpaid, the license should be void. Judge Nelson held, that from the terms of such an agreement, the license was forfeited the moment one of the notes became due and unpaid, and that the grantor might treat the rights of the grantee as forfeited, and, at once, apply for an injunction against any further use of the machine. It is not quite clear, under the facts of the case, that the complainants are entitled to an account, but their right to an injunction is without question, and it is accordingly ordered, with costs.

ABBEY v. The ROBERT L. STEVENS.

District Court, D. New York. Sept., 1861.

TOWAGE CONTRACT—BREACH OF—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—NEGLIGENCE OF TUG—LIABILITY AS CARRIER—PRACTICE—COSTS.

1. A tug which tows vessels for hire is not to be regarded subject to the liabilities of a common carrier or insurer.

2. Where a tug on the Hudson river, having charge of a tow consisting of several vessels, has at night left off one of her tow near a public dock, and after doing so the officers of the tug hail to those on the other vessels in tow to know their situation, and they respond "All right, go ahead," if the tug does so in the usual manner, bearing herself diligently off into the river, and getting the whole body of the tow gradually under motion, and in doing this one of the stern tier of boats, as it was dragged along in face of the dock, either because its distance off the shore had been misapprehended by the persons conducting them, when the order was passed for the tug to proceed, or that sufficient alacrity or skill was not exercised in controlling their course, or in some other way, and thereby the barge was broken by the occurrence, so that she was shortly after found leaking, and in consequence of the injury filled with water and sunk, the tug is not legally responsible for that loss.

3. It is the duty of the tug to stop on notice of the distress of the barge, and ascertain its actual condition, and apply all means in their power for her rescue or relief.

4. In a case for damages for a breach of towage contract on the Hudson river, whereby a barge was lost between parties residents of the state of New York, the admiralty have not jurisdiction.

5. Where a point is reserved for further argument and consideration after a trial and decree in the case, it must be upon the pleadings and proofs as they stood on the original hearing.

6. Where a libel is dismissed for want of jurisdiction, no costs are allowable in the final decree to the successful party.

7. The want of jurisdiction presents a total want of power to give costs.

In admiralty. The libellants were owners of the barge Norway, employed in freighting coal upon the Hudson river. The steamboat was used as a tug in towing freighting vessels for hire up and down the river, between Port Ewen at the mouth of Rondout creek and Albany. On the 11th of November, 1856, the barge Norway, laden with coal on freight, was taken in tow by the tug at Port Ewen, under a contract to tow her for hire to Albany. The tow, on its passage up the river when completed, consisted of eight boats loaded with coal, two attached side by side on the larboard bow of the tug, and two on her starboard bow, of the latter of which the Norway was the outside one, lashed and secured to the one intervening between her and the tug. The remaining four coal barges were lashed together side by side, and secured by two hawser lines each about fifty fathoms long, passing from the starboard and larboard quarters of the tug to the larboard sterns of the extreme larboard boat, and the one placed second from the extreme starboard boat, to the latter of which, after the tow was arranged in that manner, a small sloop was taken up and attached by a tow line of about one hundred feet in length to the stern of the last mentioned boat. There was evidence that some of the masters of this tier of boats on towage by the hawser lines, objected to the sloop being subsequently tailed on astern of them, as she in that position would impede the steerage of those boats. Upon the whole evidence, however, it appeared the masters of those boats, when they engaged their towage and took their places astern, were aware that the sloop was to be added to the tail of the line, and that the objections to her being brought into that position rested with the master of the particular boat to which the sloop was to be attached. The boats were also aware, when they were taken in tow, that another freight barge was to be taken up on the passage, at or near Tivoli, to complete the full tow for Albany. When the tug arrived at the former place, she stopped, and another small boat was tailed by a line to the stern of the outside barge, which was lashed to the starboard bows of the tug, and then the rear barges were halled from the tug to know if all was ready behind. The answer was made from those barges that "all was right, go ahead;" upon which reply the tug was put in motion, and after she and the barges attached to her side had safely passed the landing place, the starboard barge of those in tail, and which was owned by the libellants, struck against a dock or pier at the head of it, and was so injured thereby that shortly after she sunk, and with her cargo of coal became a total loss.

E. C. Benedict, for libellants.
D. McMahon, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. The point in contestation arising out of the facts in this case is, whether there was negligence or want of proper prudence and care in the management of the tug in coming to at Tivoli, and getting again under way with the tow which caused the injury received by the barge Norway. The tug is not to be regarded subject to the liabilities of a common carrier or insurer. (See authorities.)² The tug itself was lying off from the dock a distance reasonably sufficient to secure a free course in following her lead, unless some impediment out of view of her master and pilot, or difficulty in the condition or bearing of the boats in the tow astern prevented their rendering the usual aid in their own steerage or keeping their proper line in the track of the tug. The master, before putting the tug in motion, called out to those boats to know their situation, and was informed by them they were ready, and he was directed to go ahead. This he did in the usual manner, bearing the steamer diligently off into the river, and getting the whole body of the tow gradually under motion. The stern tier of boats, as it was dragged along in face of the dock, either because its distance off the shore had been misapprehended by the persons conducting them when the order was passed for the tug to proceed, or that sufficient alacrity or skill was not exercised in controlling their course, or the action of the sloop dragging astern of them, was crowded so far in that the starboard side of the Norway pressed or struck against a pier, and was so broken by the occurrence that she was shortly after found leaking, and in consequence of the injury filled with water, and together with her cargo of coal became a total loss.

In my judgment, the tug is not legally responsible for that loss. (See authorities.)² I think, however, it was plainly the duty of the master and pilot of the tug to have stopped the steamer on notice of the distress of the barge, and ascertained its actual condition, and applied all means in their power for her rescue or relief. This was a portion of the reasonable diligence due from the tug to the bailment entrusted to her charge, and if the barge was cut adrift from the tow in its sinking condition, and then abandoned by her, the steamer should be declared liable for the whole damages sustained by the libellants. So also, if after the disaster to the barge was made known to the master or pilot of the tug, they ordered the barge to hold on and continue with the tow, without examination of her peril or means of sustaining it, and she had been lost in following that direction, the steamer would be properly chargeable with the whole loss, as one resulting from mismanagement and carelessness in conducting the tow, unless clear proof was made that the course taken was a reasonable and proper one upon a fair consideration of the perils of the barge and the means at command for her relief. The apparent weight of the evidence is, that the barge was cut loose by persons on board of her, against the positive commands of the master of the tug, to adhere to the tow. The evidence for the claimants is also strong that the barge was safe in charge of the tug, and could have been taken to Bristol, or landed safely on the middle grounds, if that order had been obeyed. There is pointed testimony on the part of the libellants in contradiction of this representation of the case, and it does not appear to me this branch of the subject was examined with sufficient fulness to enable the court to determine satisfactorily where the truth and right between the parties in this particular lies.

I shall hold in this cause that the tug is not responsible for the original collision of the barge in tow, against the dock or pier at Tivoli; and the libel thus far is to be considered dismissed; but that the libellants are entitled to the further hearing upon the question whether the master and pilot of the tug were guilty of negligence or want of proper attention and precaution in respect to the relief or saving of the barge Norway, after they were notified she was injured and in a sinking condition, either previous to or after she was cut adrift from the tow. Order accordingly.

Subsequently, the libellants insisted that on such a re-argument they were entitled to introduce additional proofs and make new allegations. This question of practice was discussed before the court by the same counsel, and the following decision was made thereon:

BETTS, District Judge. A question is raised and submitted to the court in this case, as a sequent to the decision in the cause on the original hearing, (February term, 1858,) whether a point, reserved therein for further argument and consideration, is to be brought before the court upon the pleadings and proofs as they then stood, or if the parties are allowed to produce additional testimony or allegations. On consideration of this proposition, it is held by the court, that the further proceedings are to be restricted to a re-argument of the matters pertaining to this point as they stood on the original hearing.

On the re-argument, it was insisted on by counsel for claimants that the court had no jurisdiction. The court so held, and dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction. The libellants moved that the discontinuance be without costs. The claimants insisted upon costs.

BETTS, District Judge. This was an action for damages incurred by the libellants for alleged negligence and misconduct of the steamer and her crew, in towing a barge and her cargo, owned by the libellants, on the Hudson river, by means of which culpable conduct on the part of the steamer, the barge and her lading were both injured and became a total loss. The steamboat was employed exclusively on the Hudson river as a tug, in towing for hire vessels and other water borne craft, from one port or place to others on that river, and had undertaken to transport the barge and her cargo in question, by towage, from a place on the Hudson river, near Kingston, to Albany; and on the passage up the river, the barge, which was secured to the stern of the tug by a hawser, was, in her towage, hauled against the face of a wharf situate at Tivoli, and so damaged thereby that shortly after passing the wharf the barge sunk, and with her lading was lost. On the hearing upon the merits, in February term, 1858, the court decided that the injury was not owing to the fault of the tug, and, as to that branch of the case, the libel must be dismissed; but the point has not been fully discussed upon the proofs, whether there was a guilty remissness or wrongful action on the part of the tug in not affording relief to the wounded barge after it was made known to the tug that the tow was in a sinking condition, and was in need of and had called for assistance; and leave was accorded the libellants to move the court for further hearing in the cause upon that point. No proceeding has been since moved in the case, until the present term, on the part of the libellants, and leave is now asked in their behalf that they may have an order dismissing the cause without costs, because the subject matter of the suit is not within the jurisdiction of the court. The counsel for the claimants oppose that application, and on their side move that the cause be dismissed, with full costs, upon the state of facts before the court.

I do not consider the libellants entitled to any affirmative order on their motion. The court must necessarily remain passive as to their standing in the case, until they attempt some positive action therein prejudicial to the rights of the claimants. The actor in a suit has authority to abandon his suit at his discretion or advance in it until impeded by counter action on the part of his adversary, and accordingly the libellants in this case require no aid from the court to enable them to withdraw or discontinue the prosecution pending in their favor. Their notice to the claimants, that such measure is contemplated, enables the latter to interpose and seek a mandate from the court, that if the act be performed and the libellants discontinue their action, they be ordered to pay all taxable costs which have been incurred therein on the part of the claimants. This motion is made, and the court is asked to adjudge the libellants, on taking an order for the dismissal of the cause for want of jurisdiction over it by the court, bound to pay claimants' costs therein.

On looking into the subject, I am satisfied, if the cause is treated as dismissed because not within the jurisdiction of the court, the claimants are not entitled to the order asked for, because the whole matter including costs with the gist of the action, is out of the cognizance of the court. There is no inconsiderable diversity of practice and decision in various state courts, upon the point whether it be competent for the court, when the cause pending therein is dismissed for want of jurisdiction over it, to adjudge costs against the party whose case is so disposed of. It is not important to collate the various opinions found in the books upon the subjects, for, however the rule may be in the state tribunals, it is found to be so definitely determined in the federal courts, after a slight wavering and hesitancy, that it cannot be longer regarded as an open question. The first case in which the point came up formally for consideration, was in February term, 1806. Winchester v. Jackson, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 515. The cause was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The prevailing party moved for costs. The clerk certified that it had not been the practice in such cases to give costs. But the court directed that the cause be dismissed with costs. No reasons were assigned for the judgment.

In February term, 1807, (Montalet v. Murray, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 47,) the point was reconsidered, and in the first instance the preceding rule was followed, but on the closing of the term the court directed the clerk "that when a judgment is reversed for want of jurisdiction, it must be without costs." In December term, 1824, (McIver v. Wattles, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 650,) the question was again moved, and Ch. Justice Marshall said "that in all cases where the case is dismissed for want of jurisdiction no costs are allowed." In the standing rule of the supreme court, (No. 45,) adopted in 1838, (1 How. [42 U. S.] Appendix 36,) that principle is again recognized in withholding costs in all cases where the dismissal of a cause shall be for want of jurisdiction. In December term, 1850, (Strader v. Graham, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 82,) the cause was dismissed without costs by the supreme court, for want of jurisdiction; and in December term, 1855, Mr. Crittenden moved the court to amend that judgment, and to give judgment for the defendant for costs. The court denied the motion, saying "that this court can not give a judgment for costs in a case dismissed for want of jurisdiction." Mr. Justice Woodbury looked pretty largely into the cases touching this topic, without being able to work out any satisfactory harmony in the practices of the various judicatures respecting the granting or refusal of costs where the case the court was dealing with, was one not within its jurisdiction. It is clear, however, he regards it no longer a point depending in the United States courts of law or equity, on consideration of equities or demerits in the parties or causes of action. His general statement of the result of his examinations seems based upon the principle that the rule in the federal court is determinate and inflexible. Notwithstanding (he says) then, the equities in favor of costs where a party has been put to expense in a case dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and notwithstanding the broader discretion in courts over costs in chancery than at common law, there is a defect of power to adjudicate or award costs to either side, where there is no power to adjudicate on the merits, and where the case is dismissed on account of the want of any such power. The case is not dismissed for the want of equity or merits, but falls for want of any authority over it, and hence over its incidents also. It is "coram non judge." Burnham v. Rangeley, [Case No. 2,177;] Hathaway v. Roach, [Id. 6,213.] This case stands in that predicament, and the application of the claimants for an award of costs against the libellants, the cause being dismissed for want of jurisdiction, must be denied. Libel dismissed for want of jurisdiction, but without costs.

Case No. 9.

ABBOT v. AMERICAN HARD RUBBER CO.

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April, 1861.

EQUITY—NECESSARY PARTIES—DISMISSAL.

1. A circuit court of the United States will not proceed to a final decree, in a suit in equity, in the absence of a party whose interests are to be affected thereby.

[Cited in New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co. v. Trotter, 18 Fed. Rep. 330.]

2. Where a bill against a corporation alleged that certain directors of the corporation were about to make a fraudulent sale of all the property of the corporation to P., and prayed an injunction to restrain the corporation from consummating the sale, but P. was not made a party to the bill: Held, on demurrer, that P. was not a necessary party.

3. A circuit court of the United States will always dispense with a merely formal party, where he is beyond the reach of process; and, where a person is beyond the reach of process, it will dismiss a bill, on the ground of its inability to proceed, only when it discovers that the presence of the person is indispensable, and that no relief can be given which does not necessarily involve his rights.

[In equity. Bill by Gorham D. Abbot against The American Hard Rubber Company for an injunction.]

This was a demurrer to a bill in equity. The bill alleged that the defendants were a corporation established by the laws of Connecticut, and located at Bethany, in that state; that the plaintiff was a director and a large stockholder therein; that the capital stock of the corporation was three hundred thousand dollars; that its property, consisting of various assets, amounted to not less than that sum; that certain members of the board of directors, on or about the 9th of November, 1860, met in the city of New York, and entered into certain fraudulent arrangements with one Conrad Poppenhusen and one Christian Konig, of said city, by which they agreed to sell and dispose of all the property of the corporation to said Poppenhusen and Konig, or to one of them, for the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars; that said directors so engaged in this fraudulent arrangement were not a majority or legal quorum of said board of directors; that, if the arrangement should be carried out, the plaintiff would suffer great pecuniary loss and his stock would be sacrificed; and that the corporation, unless restrained by injunction, would carry out and perfect the aforesaid unlawful and fraudulent arrangement. The prayer was for an injunction, to prevent the corporation from ratifying and giving legal and practical effect to such inchoate fraudulent arrangement of some of the directors, and for the appointment of a receiver. The demurrer rested on the objection, that Poppenhusen and Konig were not made parties to the bill, and that the facts set up in the bill showed that their interests under the alleged fraudulent arrangement were directly involved in the controversy, and must be affected by any decree of the court therein.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The argument urged in this case is, that, by the disclosures of the bill, Poppenhusen and Konig are seen to be indispensable parties thereto, as their rights must be necessarily affected by a decree; and that, inasmuch as a circuit court is not enabled, either by any act of congress, or any rule of practice, to make a decree in the absence of an indispensable party, whereby his interests can be affected, the bill should be dismissed. The cases of Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130, and Colron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 113, are cited in support of this view. These cases support the general proposition, that a circuit court will not proceed to a final decree in the absence of a party whose interests are to be affected thereby. But, are Poppenhusen and Konig such indispensable parties?

Although the bill is not drawn with that fullness or precision of statement which might be desirable, yet, it is evident that it proceeds upon the theory, that the directors who are negotiating with Poppenhusen and Konig have no power or authority to confer upon the latter any right, title or interest whatever, and, in point of fact, have conferred none, as against the rubber company, and that, in order to give effect to this inchoate fraud, the corporation must and will, itself, act, and, by its ratification or adoption of the fraudulent arrangement, inflict upon the plaintiff, through his stock, the injury he seeks to avoid. It is against this prospective injury that the plaintiff seeks protection. The bill is not brought to rescind any contract, or to take from Poppenhusen and Konig any right which they have, but to restrain the defendants from conferring any title or interest or right upon them, by giving effect to the fraudulent scheme. By what the bill alleges to have already been done, it does not appear that Poppenhusen and Konig, or either of them, have derived from the defendants any rights or interests which a court of law or of equity would enforce or protect. All that has yet been done, is merely preliminary to the consummation of the fraud. A decree enjoining the defendants from adopting the acts of their unauthorized agents, the directors concerned, would not affect any right or interest vested in these absent parties, so far as I can discover from the facts alleged in the bill and admitted by the demurrer. It is asked, whether, if Poppenhusen and Konig were to be found within the state of Connecticut, they ought not to be made parties? I hardly think this inquiry involves a true test. There may be, in a single proceeding in chancery, three classes of parties—formal parties, necessary parties, and indispensable parties. In a case where all these parties were within the jurisdiction and subject to the process of the court, it might be necessary that they should all be brought in. But the circuit courts of the United States will always dispense with merely formal parties, where they are beyond the reach of process. This is believed to be in accordance with the general practice of courts of chancery. Russell v. Clark's Ex'rs, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 69, 98; Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130; Joy v. Wirtz, [Case No. 7,554.] And, even where parties come under the denomination of necessary parties, and where, if they were within the reach of process, the court would insist on their being brought in, before it would proceed to make a final decree, yet, a circuit court, where the party is beyond the reach of its process, will dismiss the bill, on the ground of its inability to proceed, only when it discovers that the presence of the party is indispensable, and that no relief can be given which does not necessarily involve his rights.

I think that a bill of this kind ought not to be dismissed, until the court is quite certain that it cannot, under the settled rules, grant the relief asked for; and, if I had any doubt on the question raised upon this bill, I should still be inclined to overrule this demurrer, inasmuch as the objection can be made available in any future stage of the cause. If it should at any time appear that Poppenhusen and Konig, or either of them, or any other person, have interests vested in them which must necessarily be affected by the decree, then none can be passed, and the bill will have to be dismissed. The demurrer is overruled.

2. A motion to dissolve such injunction should not be granted, unless facts are shown, making such action just toward the creditors.
3. The withholding of books of account by a party in interest works a prejudice to his cause.

In bankruptcy. Motion to dissolve an injunction, granted, pending involuntary proceedings, restraining the debtor and Roscoe L. Bowers from conveying or disposing of certain property claimed to have been conveyed and disposed of by the debtor in fraud of the bankrupt act. The petitioning creditors objected, and the cause was submitted upon affidavits filed by both parties. The opinion is not printed in full. Some parts of it, dealing with facts, are omitted on account of their great length and particularity of circumstance.

FOX, District Judge. A petition has been presented by Wm. M. Price et als., creditors of Wm. F. Abbott, praying that he may be adjudged a bankrupt; at the same time application was made for an injunction, to restrain the debtor and one Roscoe L. Bowers, who was charged with aiding the bankrupt in a fraudulent sale, concealment, and removal of his property, from removing, disposing, or interfering with the property, until the further order of the court. Upon the affidavit of one Lothrop, the injunction was ordered. The present motion is in behalf of Bowers to dissolve the injunction, and is sustained by his own affidavit as well as that of Abbott, and is approved by the affidavit of Mr. Eastman, a solicitor for the creditors. The injunction was granted under the provisions of the 4th sec. of the bankrupt act, which authorizes the court, upon commencement of involuntary proceedings, "to restrain the debtor and any other person, from making any transfer or disposition of any part of the debtor's property, not excepted by this act from the operation thereof, and from any interference therewith." Some discussion was had at the bar as to the operation and extent of the provision, and whether it was applicable to property once belonging to the debtor, but of which it was claimed he had made a transfer in violation of the provisions of the bankrupt act. In my view, the provision is applicable to all property, which under the act would vest in the assignee, and which it would be his duty to claim for the benefit of the estate; not only that in the actual possession of the debtor at the commencement of bankrupt proceedings, and to which his title is indisputable, but to all other estate of which he has made any fraudulent transfer or concealment; and on the court being satisfied by prima facie proof that the property has been thus fraudulently transferred or concealed, the parties should be enjoined and restrained from any interference with it until the determination of the question of bankruptcy. On the affidavit of Lothrop a prima facie case was presented which justified the injunction as ordered by the court.

From the affidavits, it appears that Abbott has been for some years a cigar maker in Saco, pretty extensively engaged in the business, and as he states, without keeping proper books of account, so as to be fully informed as to his standing and condition.

Abbott says that in January last he engaged Bowers to straighten out his affairs and keep his books; and for this purpose, an account of stock was taken and a new set of books opened by Bowers. Both swear that they believed Abbott was solvent. Bowers purchased from Abbott all the cigars he manufactured from April 10th, to Sept. 24th, 1869. The whole amount sold by Abbott in 1869 being 932 M. Besides the sale of the cigars, Bowers claims that be tween May 13th, and Aug. 25th, Abbott assigned to him $10,073.44 of stock and pipes, on which he advanced $12,075.75. Abbott failed on or about Sept. 28th, owing $35,000, $25,115 of which was for stock and fixtures purchased since May 13th. His assets consisted of $500 of stock under attachment, and stock and fixtures sold Bowers Sept. 28th for $1,526, and notes amounting to $6,000 or $8,000, of not much value.

The fairness and good faith of all these transactions between Bowers and Abbott are set forth repeatedly in the strongest language in their respective affidavits, and these averments have not escaped the attention of the court. A critical examination of Bowers' dealings with Abbott, so far as they have seen proper to explain and develop them by their affidavits, does not satisfy me that it would be just towards the creditors to remove and dissolve the injunction. Much more light might and should have been thrown on their dealings, and a more complete and satisfactory exposure of them could have been presented; but they have seen fit to deal in general denials and assertions, without going into a fair exhibit of the accounts, and purchases, and cost of the property thus acquired by Bowers. If I am in error then in any of my calculations or facts, it is rather owing to the darkness and uncertainty with which they have seen fit to obscure their dealings, than to any failure of investigation on my part, as I have twice carefully read over their affidavits in order to be fully conversant with their contents. The books of Abbott which are in the handwriting of Bowers, and wholly kept by him, have not been produced at the hearing, but although called for by the creditors' attorney, have been kept back, Bowers contenting himself by stating in his supplemental affidavit that nothing appears therein inconsistent with his statements. Under the circumstances, it would have been altogether more satisfactory for the court to have ascertained this fact by a personal examination of the books, rather than from the statement of a party in interest whose relations are such with the debtor, that no doubt can be entertained that the books would have been present, if it had been thought for the interest of Bowers that they should have been produced. From their non-production under the circumstances, I cannot but conclude, that in some way they would have afforded evidence detrimental to these parties, and that for reason satisfactory to themselves they have seen fit to withhold them from the court. I think that matters should remain as they now are until an investigation can be had by an assignee.

Motion overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1854.²

ESTATES—EXECUTORY DEVISE—FEE SIMPLE CONDITIONAL ESTATE TAIL—DEFINITE FAILURE OF ISSUE.

1. A devise, "if either of my sons, John and Jacob, should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first decease, shall accrue to the other survivor and his heirs;" held to provide for a definite failure of issue, and that each son took an estate in fee-simple conditional, and not an estate tail.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The rules by which an executory devise of a fee-simple conditional, and a devise of a fee-tail, are to be determined, examined.

[At law. Real action by James A. Abbott and Hannah K. Abbott, his wife, demandants, against the Essex Company, tenants, to recover a parcel of land.] Both parties claimed under the will of John Kittredge. The demandants claimed that the will of John Kittredge created estates tail in equal moieties in each of his two sons John and Jacob, with cross remainders in fee-simple. The tenants claimed under Jacob Kittredge, to whom in his lifetime his brother had conveyed all his title; and they maintained that each of the two sons took a fee-simple, and that by way of executory devise, the share of that son, who should first die without issue, was devised over to the other. The will was as follows:

"In the name of God, amen. I, John Kittredge, of Andover, in the county of Essex and province of the Massachusetts Bay, in New England, surgeon, being, through Divine goodness, favored with the due exercise of my understanding, have great cause, and accordingly I return thanks to Almighty God therefor; but being exercised with such bodily indisposition as gives me reason to think that my continuance in life is but short, I have, therefore, thought proper to discharge my mind of all worldly concerns, as far as possible, to the end that I may spend the remainder of my days in preparation for futurity; for which purpose I make this my last will and testament, whereby I dispose of my worldly goods and estate as followeth, namely:—

"Imp's. I give to Sarah, my well-beloved wife, the one third of all my lands and buildings in Andover aforesaid, and the one third of all my household goods and furniture, to be for her use and improvement, so long as she remains my widow.

"Item. I give to my son, Benjamin Kittredge, of Tewksbury, in the county of Middlesex, the sum of twenty shillings, lawful money, and the reason I give him no more is, that I have given him his portion out of my estate some time before.

"Item. I give to my son, Thomas Kittredge, all the land I own lying in a place known by the name of Ox Common, in said Andover, which, with what I have given him, my said son Thomas, completes his full proportion of my estate.

"Item. I give to my two sons, namely, John and Jacob Kittredge, all my lands and buildings in Andover aforesaid (excepting the land I gave to my son Thomas aforesaid), which buildings consist of dwelling-houses, barns, corn-house, grist-mill, and cider-mill, all of every denomination; also, all my live-stock of cattle, horses, sheep, and swine, and all my husbandry utensils of every denomination, and all my tools that may be useful for tending the mills aforesaid, and also all my bonds and notes of hand and book accounts, together with what money I may leave at my decease; and my wearing apparel, I give the same to my said sons, John and Jacob Kittredge, to be equally divided between them; and in consideration of what I have given my said sons John and Jacob Kittredge, the executor of this testament (hereinafter named) is hereby ordered to see that all my just debts and funeral charges, together with all the legacies in this will mentioned, be paid out of that part of my estate I have given to my two sons, John and Jacob Kittredge, to whom I give each one bed and bedding.

"Item. It is my will, that if either of my said sons, namely, John and Jacob Kittredge, should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first decease shall accrue to the other survivor and his heirs.

"Item. I give to my granddaughter, Molly White (daughter of Aaron White, of Medway, in the county of Suffolk, the sum of fourteen pounds five shillings and two pence, lawful money; and the reason I give her no more is, I gave my daughter (mother of the said Molly White) at her marriage, as much as would make her, the said grandchild, with what I have now bequeathed, equal to my other daughters, which sum is to be paid her at the age of twenty-one years; but if she should see fit to marry before she arrives to that age, the same to be paid her at her marriage.

"Item. I give to my granddaughter, Sarah Dwinell, the sum of sixty pounds, lawful money, to be paid in the following manner, namely, twenty pounds to be paid her as soon as she arrives to the age of twenty-one years; but if she should see fit to marry before the age of twenty-one years, the same sum of twenty pounds to be paid her and the remainder to be paid in three years after she arrives to the age of twenty-one, with lawful interest for the same till paid; and I also order her, the said Sarah Dwinell, to be maintained out of that part of my estate I give to my sons, John and Jacob Kittredg, until she arrives to the age of eighteen years.

"Item. I give to my daughter, Elizabeth Kittredg, the sum of fifty-three pounds, six shillings and eight pence, lawful money, of which sum thirteen pounds, six shillings and eight pence is to be paid her at my decease, and the remainder to be paid her in four years after, with lawful interest for the same till paid.

"Item. I give to my daughter, Hannah Kittredg, the sum of sixty pounds, lawful money, twenty pounds to be paid her when she arrives to the age of twenty-two years (except she should marry before she arrives to the age of twenty-two years), then the said twenty pounds to be paid her, and the remainder to be paid in three years after, with interest for the same till paid. I also give her my best bed and furniture.

"Item. I give to my daughter, Susanna Kittredg, the sum of sixty pounds, lawful money, twenty pounds to be paid her when she arrives to the age of eighteen years, and the remainder in five years after, with interest for the same till paid.

"Item. I give to my three daughters, namely, Elizabeth, Hannah, and Susanna Kittredg, the remainder of my household goods and furniture (excepting wet and dry cash), and also the one third which I gave Sarah, my aforesaid wife, or what of the same may remain at her decease or marriage; all of which is to be equally divided amongst them, my abovesaid daughters. I also give to them, my said daughters, the privilege of living in my house for so long as they shall live a single life, and the liberty of keeping a cow and one swine on the produce of my land I have given to my two sons, John and Jacob Kittredg.

"Item. It is my will, that if either of my daughters or granddaughters aforesaid should die and leave no lawful issue, then, what I have given to either of them, should be equally divided amongst my surviving daughters or their heirs.

"Item. I give to my said sons, John and Jacob Kittredg, my wet and dry cash, and also my pew in the North Meetinghouse in Andover, aforesaid, to be equally divided between them, they to allow my aforesaid wife and daughters to sit in said pew as long as they live unmarried. And if there is any of my estate that I have not disposed of in this will, either real, personal, or mixed, of what name or nature soever, I give the same to my aforesaid sons John and Jacob Kittredg.

"Lastly. I do hereby constitute and appoint my aforesaid son, John Kittredg, the sole executor of this my last will and testament, allowing this and no other to be so.

"In witness whereof, I, the said John Kittredg, have hereunto set my hand and seal, this twentieth day of September, Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, and the fifteenth year of His Majesty's reign. John Kittredg."

It was admitted by the parties, that said testator died in the year 1775; that his will was duly proved August 5, 1776; that his two sons, John Kittredg and Jacob Kittredg, survived him; that said John Kittredg died in the year 1826, never having been married; that said Jacob Kittredg died in the lifetime of his brother John, on July 15, 1807, leaving the following children, namely, John Kittredg, his oldest child, who died without ever having had issue, on the tenth of January, 1823; Jacob Kittredg, his next oldest child, who died December 18, 1831, having had issue one child, who is the demandant, Hannah Kittredg Abbott; Thomas W. Kittredg, his next child, who is now alive; Hannah Kittredg, his next child, who died, intestate, on the 28th October, 1815, never having had issue; George W. Kittredg, his next child, who died July 4, 1836, intestate, having had issue one child, Jacob Kittredg, who is now alive, and William H. Kittredg, his last child, who died, intestate, on the 1st of October, 1849, never having had issue. The marriage of the demandants was also admitted, and that the surviving son of Jacob Kittredg, the devisee named in said will, and also his surviving grandchild, had before the commencement of the suit, released and conveyed to demandants all their interest and title in the demanded premises. [Judgment for defendant. Affirmed, by supreme court, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 202.]

Bartlett, for demandant.

C. G. Loring and Merwin, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The question presented for the decision of the court is, whether John and Jacob Kittredg took estates tail under the will of their father, John Kittredg. The devise to them is in the following words:—

"I give to my sons, namely, John and Jacob Kittredg, all my lands and buildings in Andover aforesaid, (excepting the land I gave to my son Thomas aforesaid,) which buildings consist of dwellings, houses, barns, corn-house, grist-mill, and cider-mill, all of every denomination; also all my live-stock of cattle, horses, sheep, and swine, and all my husbandry utensils of every denomination, and all my tools that may be useful for tending the mills aforesaid; and also all my bonds and notes of hand and book accounts, together with what money I may have at my decease, and my wearing apparel. I give the same to my said sons to be equally divided between them; and in consideration of what I have given my said sons, John and Jacob Kittredge, the executor of this testament (hereinafter named) is hereby ordered to see that all my just debts and funeral charges, together with all the legacies in this will mentioned, be paid out of that part of my estate I have given my two sons, John and Jacob Kittredge, to whom I give each one bed and bedding.

"Item. It is my will that if either of my said sons, namely, John or Jacob Kittredge, should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first decease shall accrue to the other survivor and his heirs."

Independent of the last clause, by which the estate is given over, I am of opinion that the sons would have taken an absolute estate in fee-simple. 1. Because one of the devisees, John Kittredge, is made executor of the will, and is required to see that all the testator's debts and legacies be paid, out of that part of the testator's estate devised to himself and his brother Jacob. This is a charge on John, personally, in respect of the estate given to him, as was held in Doe v. Snelling, 5 East, 87; Lithgow v. Kavenagh, 9 Mass. 161; Wait v. Belding, 24 Pick. 129. The distinction is between a charge to be paid out of rents and profits only, and a charge to be paid by the devisee at all events out of the estate in his hands. In the last case, the devisee takes a fee, though, undoubtedly, it may be cut down to an estate tail by words showing that intent. Slater v. Slater, 5 Term R. 335. As this would give a fee-simple to John, and as the intent of the testator is clear, to have the two take the same estate, the estate of Jacob would necessarily be held to be a fee simple also. See Lord Ellenborough, in Roe v. Daw, 3 Maule & S. 518. 2. Among the legacies given by the will is, the maintenance of Sarah Dwinel, until she should arrive at the age of eighteen years, "out of that part of my estate I give my sons John and Jacob Kittredge." If only life estates were given to John and Jacob, both might die before the legatee became of that age, and thus the clearly expressed intention of the testator be defeated. 3. The testator directs his debts and legacies to be paid "out of that part of my estate I have given to my two sons, John and Jacob Kittredge." It is held in Massachusetts, in conformity with many decisions elsewhere, that if the testator had a fee, a devise of his estate carries a fee. The word "estate" if not controlled by some other language of the will, being construed to designate the quantity of interest, and not merely the corpus of the subject of devise. Godfrey v. Humphrey, 18 Pick. 537.

Now, though this use of the word "estate" occurs only in the clause charging the debts and legacies, and not in that employed to make the gift, yet the intent of the testator may as well appear in the former, as in the latter clause. Indeed, all those cases, in which it has been held, that a charge upon the devisee of a gross sum, or of debts and legacies, implies a gift of more than a life-estate, are authorities to show that the testator's intent to give a fee may be found in such a clause. And if it may be inferred from the duty created by such a clause, why not also from the language employed in creating that duty; provided that language is sufficient to show, that the testator understood that he had given an estate in fee to his sons? If a devise, which, by its terms, would carry only an estate for life, is followed even in another part of the will, by language which shows the testator believed he had given a fee, a fee will pass, because the intent of the testator is to govern, and that intent is to be collected from the whole of the will.

This testator, in referring to what he had given to his two sons, calls it "that part of my estate." There are many cases in which it has been held, that the word estate is to be construed to refer to the testator's interest in the land devised, although coupled with other words which could refer only to the particular land, the subject of the devise. Thus, "my estate consisting of thirty acres of land, situate in the parish of A—," "my estate in the occupation of B—," carry a fee; 2 Pow. Dev. 413. Here the words "estate situate," &c., mean not only the land, but the interest of the testator therein; so in the case at bar, "that part of my estate" means, not only the particular tracts of land before described, but the interest of the testator in those tracts of land. The question is, whether he intended to devise to each son an estate tail general, with cross remainders in fee, or a fee-simple conditional, with an executory devise over; and this depends on the intent of the testator to provide for a definite or indefinite failure of issue.

If the first taker was to have a fee-simple, and the estate is given over on a definite failure of issue, that is to say, in this case, a failure at the decease of the first taker, then the limitation over may take effect as an executory devise, because the contingency is determinable within those reasonable limits established by law to prevent perpetuities. This has been the law since the case of Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590.

I know of no question which is involved in so much doubt, and has been the subject of so many conflicting decisions as this one concerning the definite or indefinite failure of issue. It has been deemed expedient in England, and in several of the United States, to remove these distressing doubts and difficulties by legislation. In Massachusetts there is no statute on the subject; and this question in the case at bar must be decided according to the rules of interpretation, which make part of the common law of the state. If I can find in the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the state, any settled rule of construction applicable to this will, and capable of determining whether this testator has provided for a definite or indefinite failure of issue, it is my duty, as it certainly would be my pleasure, to follow and apply it. In Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 153, and Waring v. Jackson, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 570, cases which went to the supreme court from the state of New York, that court declined to review the decisions on this subject, because it was found there was a settled rule in the state of New York. My first duty, therefore, is to ascertain whether the law of Massachusetts is settled.

The case of Parker v. Parker, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 134, was cited as controlling the case at bar. I do not think it can be so considered. I think that case was determined upon two points. 1. That by the true construction of the whole will taken together, the sons took no more than an estate tail. 2. That the rule in Purefroy v. Rogers, required the estate limited over, to take effect by way of contingent remainder. It is true, that the rule settled in Purefroy v. Rogers, 2 Saund. 388, has been often recognized in this country, and especially in Massachusetts. Hawley v. Northampton, 8 Mass. 3; Nightingale v. Burrell, 15 Pick. 110; Parker v. Parker, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 134. That rule as laid down by Lord Hale is, that "where a contingency is limited to depend on an estate of freehold, which is capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed to be an executory devise, but a contingent remainder only, and not otherwise." But this rule does not operate until it is ascertained what the particular estate is, and that it is capable of supporting a contingent remainder.

I do not understand it to be a rule of construction, to be used in determining what particular estate the testator intended to devise, but a rule of law which determines the kind of estate which must be deemed to be limited over after the particular estate intended to be devised has been ascertained. And, therefore, I have not allowed it to have any weight in this case. The difficulty which I find in assenting to this decision of Parker v. Parker, arises from two considerations. The first is, that the limitation over is clearly upon a definite failure of issue, because the first taker must not only die without issue, but he must die before he arrives at the age of twenty-one. If he survives the age of twenty-one years, the estate is not to go over, although the next day he should die without issue. In that event, the estate is to go to his heirs general, for he leaves no heirs of his body, and the estate is not to go over; it must therefore go to his heirs general, if he has more than a life-estate; and accordingly it has been decided in many cases, that if the limitation over be upon the contingency of dying under age and without issue, the first taker has a conditional fee-simple and not an estate tail.

Mr. Justice Story so held in Lippett v. Hopkins, [Case No. 3380,] where the older authorities are all cited; and more recently the same rule is laid down and acted on in Glover v. Monckton, 3 Bing. 13; Doe v. Johnson, 16 Eng. Law & Eq. 550; Barnitz v. Casey, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 456, and also in Ray v. Enslin, 2 Mass. 554, and Richardson v. Noyes, Id. 56. This distinction between a definite or indefinite failure of issue, was not adverted to by either the counsel or the court in Parker v. Parker. It is not easy to reconcile this decision with that of Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56; but if there is any discrepancy, it touches the question, what estate was intended to be given to the first taker.

As I am satisfied, that under this will the sons were intended to have a fee; and as the provisions of this will are substantially different from those in the case of Parker v. Parker, so far as respects the estate of the first taker, I do not consider that case can apply to this one. In Hawley v. Northampton, 8 Mass. 41, Mr. Chief Justice Parsons says: "Now it seems to be settled, that a devise to one and his heirs, and if he die without issue, or without leaving issue, then to another, creates an estate tail in the first devisee with a remainder over, when the limitation over can take effect as a remainder, unless there are other words to control this construction." This rule, with its qualification, being in conformity with the earlier cases in Massachusetts, and with the whole current of decisions in England, and with very numerous decisions elsewhere, I consider to be the law of Massachusetts, and that the difficult inquiry in this case arises under the qualification of the rule; and is, whether there are in this will words sufficient to render inapplicable this rule of construction.

Before adverting to some of the most important cases on this subject, I think it may be said with truth, that the American courts, while they have recognized the rule, have shown a strong disposition to lay hold on pretty slight expressions in the will to defeat its operation; a tendency which has been effectually sanctioned, not only in several states in this country, but in England, by legislation which abolishes the rule altogether. A review of the American cases on this subject would occupy too much space. I will refer to some of the most important. Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns.

382; Wilkes v. Lion, 2 Cow. 333; [Patterson v. Ellis,] 11 Wend. 259; [Cutter v. Doughty,] 23 Wend. 513; Saund. Ch. 456; [Den v. Schenck, 8 N. J. Law.,] 3 Halst. 29; [Morgan v. Morgan,] 5 Day, 517; [Couch v. Gorham,] 1 Conn. 36; [Rapp v. Rapp, 6 Pa. St.] 6 Barr, 45; [Johnson v. Currin, 10 Pa. St.] 10 Barr, 498; [Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 153; [Hall v. Chaffee,] 14 N. H. 215,] opinion of Parker, C. J.; and the supreme court of Massachusetts in Ide v. Ide, 5 Mass. 500, and Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56, have evinced a like tendency. In Ide v. Ide, the devise was, to the testator's son and his heirs; but if he should die and have no lawful heirs, what estate he shall leave to be equally divided between I. and N. This was held to import a definite failure of issue, by reason of the words, what estate "he shall leave." In Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56, the devise was to three sons, not expressly in fee; and if either or any of them should die without children, the survivor or survivors to take; this was held to give a fee-simple, defeasible on the first taker's dying without issue, living at his decease.

Let us now turn to this will to see whether the testator intended to give the share of each son over, if he should die without issue living at his decease, or upon an indefinite failure of issue. His words are, that if either of my said sons should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first decease, shall accrue to the other survivor and his heirs. The words "without any lawful heirs of his own," cannot be construed literally, because the contingency provided for, is the survivorship of one who would necessarily be a collateral heir; heirs of his own must, therefore, be construed to mean lineal heirs of his own. Lewis, Perp. 311; 2 Jarm. Wills, 238.

The question is, whether this failure of lineal heirs was to be on the decease of the first taker, or at any time afterwards. I am of opinion that it was a definite and not an indefinite failure of issue which was thus provided for, and for the following reasons:—First. There can be no doubt that a fee-simple and not a fee-tail is devised over. The devise is to "the other survivor and his heirs;" yet, this is called the share of him who may first decease. If the word "share" is construed to mean the quantity of interest in the particular land which was devised to him who may first decease, it would follow, that, inasmuch as a fee is given over from the first taker, a fee was devised to the first taker; such a deduction is but the converse of the reasoning by which a fee is held to pass under a devise of the testator's estate. That reasoning is, that the word estate means the interest of the testator, and as he had a fee-simple, a fee-simple is given. Here a fee-simple is given over, and it is designated as the share of the first taker; if that means the estate or quantity of interest of the first taker, the testator has, in effect, described it as a fee-simple, by giving it over as such. I do not perceive any good reason why the word "share" may not be thus interpreted. In Pettywood v. Cook, Cro. Eliz. 52, where there was a devise in fee to three persons, in severalty, and if either of the devisees should die without issue, the survivors should enjoy "totam illam partem," it was held only a life-estate was given by those words; but Willes, Ch. J., in Moone v. Heaseman, Willes, 143, says, he should have decided otherwise, as does Lord Ellenborough, in Bebb v. Penoyre, 11 East, 162, who was inclined to the opinion, that the words "my half part," would carry the interest of the deviser. In Denn v. Balderston, Cowp. 257, there seems to have been no doubt felt that the words "their property and share in the premises," would carry the whole estate; and the use of the phrase, "share and share alike," is habitual among conveyancers to designate an equal division of the subject, both as to quantity of estate as well as the corpus or thing devised. So in Paris v. Miller, 5 Maule & S. 408, the words being "my share of the Bastile and other estates," it was held that the word "share" denoted the interest in the thing devised. Without undertaking to say that a devise over of a fee, by the name and description of the share of A. B., necessarily imports that A. B. took a fee, I think it has a tendency to show such was the understanding of the testator, which may or may not be sufficient, according to the particular phraseology of the will in question.

Second. This gift to the two sons includes personal as well as real estate. The assumption, that the testator intended to limit over personal estate, consisting of tools and utensils, bonds and other choses in action, and cattle and horses, in the event of an indefinite failure of issue, is very violent; a similar state of facts in Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56, led Mr. Justice Sedgwick to declare that such a supposition was absurd. I am aware that there is considerable weight of authority in favor of the position that this difficulty is to be got over by holding, that two different limitations were intended; that as to realty the testator intended an indefinite, and as to the personalty a definite failure of issue. This resort seems to be countenanced by Parsons, Ch. J., in Hawley v. Northampton, 8 Mass. 39. He refers to some of the authorities which support it; others are: [Sheffield v. Lord Orrery,] 3 Atk. 288; [Crooke v. De Vandes,] 9 Ves. 203; [Ryder v. Gower,] 6 Brown Parl. Cas. 309; [Den v. Shenton,] 2 Chitty, 662; [Mazyck v. Vanderhorst,] Bailey, Eq. 48. But I apprehend that the number as well as the weight of the authorities is the other way. [Addlington v. Cann,] 3 Atk. 147; [Morgan v. Surman,] 1 Taunt. 289; [Campbell v. Harding,] 2 Russ. & M. 300, denying the distinction between real and personal estate, as do Lord Hardwicke, [Beauclerk v. Dormer,] 2 Atk. 314; Lord Thurlow, [Newman v. Newman,] 1 Brown, Ch. 188; [Everest v. Gell,] 1 Ves. Jr. 286; Lord Alvanley, [Rawlins v. Goldfrap,] 5 Ves. 440; Lord Loughborough, [Chandless v. Price,] 3 Ves. 99; Sir William Grant, [Barlow v. Salter,] 17 Ves. 479; Lord Kenyon, [Porter v. Bradley,] 3 Term R. 143; [Roe v. Jeffery,] 7 Term R. 595; the court of king's bench, [Dansey v. Griffiths,] 4 Maule & S. 62; and the supreme court of North Carolina, [Den v. Zollicoffer,] 3 Dev. & B. 438. I would speak with proper reserve concerning what has produced this distressing conflict of opinion and decision; but it seems to me to be going too far to attribute to a testator an intention to make distinct and different limitations, when he has signified no such intention; but on the contrary has given over both species of property by the same words, as forming one subject, and to be affected by only one contingency.

Third. The particular language of this clause, in this will, in my judgment, points strongly to a definite failure of issue. The testator makes no attempt to continue the whole property in the issue; for whether the estate of the first taker be held to be a fee-simple or a fee-tail, he has clearly limited over, a fee; and it is not probable that his intent was, that in the event of both moieties being united in the survivor, he should hold one half in tail, and the other half in fee. The use of the words "other survivor," in this clause, taken in connection with the words "first decease," are also entitled to much weight. I am aware that there are many decisions that the word "survivor" means simply "other," and does not import a definite failure of issue. See Chancellor Kent's opinion in Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 418; Doe v. Wainwright, 5 Term R. 427; Cole v. Sewell, 2 Con. & L. 344. But there are weighty authorities the other way, particularly in the state of New York. See Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 153, and the New York cases cited above.

In this will the limitation over is not simply to the survivor, but to "the other survivor." To construe "survivor" here to mean simply "other," would deprive it of all force. It is to be observed, too, that it is only the share of him "who may first decease" which is given over. These words certainly add to the strength of the word survivor. That word naturally imports the one who shall be alive at the decease of the other. Here, then, the testator in describing the subject of the devise over, has called it the share of him who may first decease; and in describing the one who is to take, has used a word which indicates that he is to be alive when the estate goes over. It seems to me that the natural construction is, and the real meaning of this testator was, that if one of these sons should die without issue in the lifetime of the other, the other was to have the whole. If this contingency should not happen, the testator desired to make no further provision on the subject.

To declare this or any other construction of this clause to be free from doubt, or in entire harmony with all the authorities, would prove nothing but want of reflection or examination. All I can venture to affirm is, that after deliberate and attentive consideration of the will, and of the rules of construction which seem to me applicable to it, the best opinion I have been able to form is, that by way of executory devise, the share of the son first dying without issue in the lifetime of the other, was to go over to that survivor, and that, subject to this contingency, each took a fee-simple.

[NOTE. The demandants sued out a writ of error from the supreme court. Mr. Justice Grier, speaking for the court, held: "There are no words of inheritance in this first clause of the devise to John and Jacob; but such words are not absolutely necessary in a will to the gift of a fee. The subject of this devise is described as 'that part of my estate.' The word 'estate,' or 'that part of my estate,' has always been construed to describe, not only the land devised, but the whole interest of the testator in the subject of the devise. * * * Moreover, the legacy given for the maintenance of Sarah Devinney, 'to be paid out of that part of my estate given to John and Jacob,' would be defeated by their death, before she arrived at the age of 18, if the devise to them was of a life estate only. The intention of the testator must be drawn from the whole context of his will. * * * We are of opinion that John and Jacob each took a fee in their respective 'share' or moiety of the estate devised to them. It remains to consider the effect of the second clause of the will, which is in these words: 'It is my will that, if either of my said sons * * * should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first decease shall accrue to the other survivor and his heirs.' Viewing this clause free from the confusion of mind produced by the numerous conflicting decisions of courts, and untrammelled by artificial rules of construction, we think that no two minds could differ as to the clear intention of the testator. By 'lawful heirs of their own' he evidently meant lineal descendants or issue. The contingency contemplated is as definite as language can make it." The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. Abbott v. Essex Co., 18 How. (59 U. S.) 202.]

The following opinion [reprinted from 17 Law Rep. 616, note] of the late Hon. Jeremiah Mason, given in the year 1833, will be read with interest in connection with the foregoing decision:

OPINION. I have considered the question proposed on the devise of the will of John Kittridge to his sons, John and Jacob, viz:--1st. What kind of estate did John and Jacob take by the will? 2d. Was it an estate tail? 3d. If so, could either John or Jacob so dispose of it as to bar the heirs in tail? 4th. If an estate tail was given, does Jacob's part go to the daughter of Jacob, the son of Jacob the devisee, or to Thomas, the oldest son of Jacob the devisee, now surviving?

The first clause of the devise giving the real estate with certain personal estate to the two sons, John and Jacob, without any limitation, and charged with the payment of debts and legacies, would create a fee simple by implication, were not this implication repelled by the next clause. Such construction arises from the presumption that the testator intended a benefit to the devisees; which, if a life estate only was given, might fail or be defeated by their death, before the rents or income had equaled the amount of the charges. But a life estate cannot be thus enlarged to a fee simple by construction against the manifest intention of the testator. It is sufficiently apparent, from the subsequent clause, that such was not the intent of the testator in this case. Besides a fee tail cannot by such charge alone be converted into a fee simple. It has been held that such implication does not apply to a devise of a fee tail.

The second clause, I think, gives the two sons, John and Jacob, a fee tail general in their respective moieties, with cross remainders in fee simple. It is obvious the dying without any lawful heirs, as used in this clause, must mean heirs of the body, as neither of the brothers could die without collateral heirs, while the other or his issue survived. The giving of the share of him who may first decease to the survivor and his heirs, must be construed to mean the share of the one so dying without issue. After giving each son a fee tail, it would be absurd to suppose the testator intended that the share of the one who should happen to decease first should go to the survivor in case the deceased son left issue. Jacob, it is stated, died first in 1806, leaving issue, John, Jacob, Thomas, and other children, having by deed of bargain and sale, dated 19th September, 1789, conveyed all that was devised to him to his brother John, to hold in fee simple. John, the devisee, died in 1826, never having had issue, and by his will devised all his estate to a sister and niece. John Kittridge, the oldest son of Jacob, the devisee, died in 1822, without issue. Jacob Kittridge, the next eldest son, died in 1831, leaving issue, one daughter. Thomas Kittridge, the next oldest son, is still living. It was easy for John and Jacob, the devisees, to have destroyed the entailment by a common recovery, but it is supposed no recovery was suffered, as none is stated. By a statute of this state, (1791, c. 60,) a deed duly witnessed and for good, or valuable consideration and bona fide, destroys the entailment and bars the heir in tail. But the deed from Jacob to John was dated in 1787, before the passing of that statute, and therefore cannot have such effect. The deed was valid to pass the estate during the life of Jacob, and no longer; operating by force of the statute of uses, it created no discontinuance. On his death in 1806, the moiety given him in tail went to his eldest son John. On the death of John, the son, in 1822, without issue, it came to Jacob, the next eldest son, and on his death in 1831 it came to his daughter, she being his only child. In case I am right in the opinion that the devise created cross remainders in fee simple on the death of John in 1826 without issue, the heirs of Jacob were entitled to his moiety.

ABBOTT v. McCARTNEY.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1871.

JUDICIAL SALE—GIVING CREDIT—CONVERSION.

A wagon and other articles, the property of an express company, then in possession of a stable-keeper, attached on mesne process in a suit against the company, were bought at sheriff's sale made under statute of Massachusetts, by the attaching creditors, under an agreement with the sheriff that credit should be given for the articles they might purchase at the sale until the decision of the suit in which the attachment was made. After the sale, the officer and the auctioneer instructed the stable-keeper not to deliver any articles sold, except on production of a receipt for the purchase-money, signed by the auctioneer. Before payment for the wagon, and while it was still in the stable-keeper's possession, and without the knowledge of the purchasers, it was distrained and sold by a United States collector of internal revenue, after notice to the express company, for non-payment of taxes due from the company. Held, that the right of property in the wagon vested by the sale in the purchasers, and that they could maintain trespass de bonis asportatis against the collector for its conversion.

[See Corfield v. Coryell, Case No. 3,230.]

At law. Action of trespass de bonis asportatis for a wagon; heard by the court on an agreed statement of facts. The plaintiffs, on the twentieth day of November, 1868, on a writ in their favor against the New England Express Company, caused a wagon and other goods, then the property of the express company, to be attached by a deputy-sheriff. Under the statute of Massachusetts authorizing the sale of property attached on mesne process, the deputy-sheriff employed an auctioneer to sell the property attached, including this wagon. The auction was held Dec. 9, 1868, on the premises of one Johnson, a stable-keeper, where the wagon then was. Many articles belonging to the express company were sold, and the wagon in question was struck off to the agent of the plaintiffs. There was an agreement between the plaintiffs and the deputy-sheriff that they need not pay for what they purchased at the sale until the suit should be decided. They did not pay for the wagon until Jan. 6, 1869, when they gave the deputy-sheriff a due bill for it and other articles purchased by them at the sale. After the sale, the stable-keeper was instructed by the deputy-sheriff and the auctioneer not to deliver any of the articles that had not already been taken away, unless the purchaser should bring a receipt from the auctioneer showing that the articles had been paid for. Among the articles left was this wagon. Nov. 13, 1868, the New England Express Company made their monthly return of receipts during the month of October preceding to the assistant-assessor, showing a tax due from the company for the month of October, amounting to $291.12. Thereafter, on Nov. 20, 1868, a notice that the tax had been assessed, and must be paid on or before the last week-day of November, was sent by the defendant, United States collector of internal revenue, to the New England Express Company. On the third day of December, the tax not having been paid, another notice was sent to the express company by the defendant, that if the same were not paid within ten days, with a penalty of five per cent additional, it would be collected by distraint and sale of property; and accordingly on Dec. 19, 1868, the defendant distrained the wagon in question for said taxes. The wagon was then still on the premises of Johnson, not having been removed by the plaintiffs. On the same day, the defendant left at the office of the express company a notice bearing that date, addressed to E. B. Taft, of Boston, signed by the defendant, as collector, of distraint of two wagons stated to belong to the express company, for non-payment of taxes due from the company, and that unless the taxes and penalty, with expenses of distraint, were paid before ten o'clock, A. M., of Jan. 2, 1869, the property would be sold by public auction on that day; and the wagon was accordingly so sold.

It was admitted that the taxes were legally assessed against the express company; and that the proceedings of the defendant, except as to notice of distraint and sale, and the proceedings of the state officer, were regular and according to law. No other notice or document of any sort relating to the distraint and sale was left with any one, but publication was duly made. One E. A. Taft was, at the time, auditor of the express company. There was no other person by the name of Taft at that time connected with or employed by the company. The plaintiffs knew nothing of the distraint of the wagon, or of the amount of the tax, or of the time or place of sale, until after their payment for the wagon.

John C. Ropes and Francis W. Hurd, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. It is contended on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff upon the facts in this case is not entitled to maintain an action of trespass de bonis asportatis. So far as the form of action is concerned, the principle of law contended for by the defendant is undoubtedly correct.

The general principle of law is, that, in order to sustain an action of trover, or trespass de bonis asportatis, the plaintiff must have had, at the time of the alleged taking or conversion, either possession or a right to the immediate possession of the goods; such a right as to be entitled to reduce the goods to possession when he pleased to do so. Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 941; Smith v. Milles, 1 Term R. 475, 480; Ward v. Macauley, 4 Term R. 489; Putnam v. Wyley, 8 Johns. 432; Muggridge v. Eveleth, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 233. Defendant contends that plaintiffs had not either property, possession, or the right to immediate possession, at the time of the alleged taking. He claims that the property of the express company had not been divested, and did not pass to the plaintiffs, for the reasons that the sale to them was on credit, and that there was no actual delivery of the property. He contends, further, that the possession of Johnson was not the possession of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs had not the right to possession until they paid the price, the officer having a special property in the goods until paid for. The case of Prouty v. French, 2 Pick. 586, is relied upon to show that no property passed by a sale upon credit made by an officer. The case of Prouty v. French was the case of a conditional sale on credit on execution. There a speedy sale was indispensable, and the proceeds were needed for the immediate satisfaction of the execution on which the sale had been made. The sale in this case was regulated by an entirely different statute, which provides for a sale on mesne process whenever the parties consent in writing, or whenever the property attached on mesne process may be liable to perish, waste, or greatly depreciate in value by keeping, or cannot be kept without great and disproportionate expense. The object is to hold the goods or the proceeds, in some form or other, till judgment shall be rendered. In reference to such a sale, the supreme court of Massachusetts (Morton, J.) say, in Crocker v. Baker, 18 Pick. 407, 412: "We do not perceive that the credit given by the officer forms any objection to the validity of the sale. The goods would not sell for less on a credit than they would for cash. The officer might, and probably would, make himself responsible for the price. But neither debtors nor creditors would be liable to suffer. Nor does the statute, expressly or by implication, prohibit this mode of sale."

The proceedings of the officer being legal, the property vested in the purchasers. There was an agreement between the sheriff and the plaintiffs that they should have credit on their purchases until the suit was decided. Where goods are sold, and nothing is said as to the time of delivery or the time of payment, and every thing the seller has to do with them is complete, the property vests in the buyer, so as to subject him to the risk of any accident which may happen to the goods, and the seller is liable to deliver them whenever demanded, upon payment of the price; but the buyer has no right to have possession of the goods till he pays the price. If goods are sold upon credit, and nothing is agreed upon as to the time of delivering the goods, the vendee is immediately entitled to the possession, and the right of possession and the right of property vest at once in him; but his right of possession is not absolute; it is liable to be defeated if he becomes insolvent before he obtains possession. Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 941. After the sale, the purchaser on credit was immediately entitled to the possession, and his right was not divested by the general instructions given by the officer and the auctioneer to the stable-keeper, after the sale, not to deliver the articles sold to the purchasers until they should bring a receipt from the auctioneer showing they had been paid for. Abbott, the purchaser, had, under his agreement for credit, a right of immediate possession against the officer, subject only to be divested by the insolvency of the purchaser and a stoppage in transitu by the vendor. Consequently, he had the same right as against the stable-keeper, who was but the servant of the officer or auctioneer, as he was not a party to the instructions given to the stable-keeper, and does not appear to have assented to them.

After the sale, the express company was neither the owner nor the possessor of the property sold. The ownership was in the purchaser, and the possession was in the stable-keeper, as the agent of the officer or the auctioneer or the plaintiffs, certainly not as the agent of the express company. The notice, therefore, of the sale by the collector of internal revenue not having been given as required by law to the owner or possessor of the property, was insufficient, and the collector, at the time of the sale having no paramount lien on the property sold, must be considered as a trespasser. After the sale on execution, the sheriff became accountable for the proceeds of the sale. Any surplus of funds in his hands, beyond what might be required to satisfy the execution issued in the suit on which the property was attached and sold, would be liable to a subsequent attachment; but the mere fact that there was no actual delivery to the purchaser would not let in another creditor to a priority of title. The case of Lanfear v. Sumner, 17 Mass. 110, has no application to a case of this kind.

Case No. 13.

ABBOTT v. POWELL.

[6 Sawy. 91.]¹

District Court, D. California. Nov. 11, 1879.

JUNIOR MORTGAGEE—HOMESTEAD.

Where a mortgage was made on two pieces of real estate, and a subsequent mortgage was made on one of them, and thereafter a homestead was declared in respect of the land not embraced in the second mortgage, held, that the equitable right of the junior mortgagee to compel the first mortgagee to resort, in the first instance, to the property on which he had exclusive claim, could not be taken away or impaired by a declaration of homestead, by either husband or wife, on the property exclusively mortgaged to the first mortgagee.

O. P. Evans, for plaintiff.

J. W. Winans, for defendant.

A. N. Drown, for Clay Street Savings & Loan Society.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. I have carefully examined all the authorities furnished me by the learned counsel for the defendant. I am unable to perceive that any of them are decisive of, or even discuss the principal point made in, the case at bar. It is not disputed, that as a general rule, where a creditor has a claim on two funds, on one of which another person has also a claim, and such other person will be prejudiced by allowing the creditor to satisfy his debt out of the fund subject to both claims, equity will compel the creditor to resort in the first instance to the fund to which he alone has a claim, if it can be done without injustice to him or to the common debtor. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 560-633. But this equity, it has been held, exists only in favor of junior mortgagees and other incumbrancers, and the application of the rule has been refused when asked for by a mortgagor. Thus, in Massachusetts, where a mortgage embraced homestead property, and also property not impressed with that character, an application that the latter should be first sold, and the homestead exempted if the other property was sufficient to satisfy the mortgage, was refused by the judge, and the decision sustained by the supreme court. Searle v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 19.

In this case, Gray, C. J., observes: "The power of a court of chancery to compel a mortgagee to resort, in the first instance, to one of several estates mortgaged, is exercised only for the protection of the equities of different creditors or incumbrancers, or of sureties, and not for the benefit of the mortgagor. As against him, the mortgagee has the right to enforce the contract between them, according to its terms, and is not obliged to elect between different remedies or securities." In Wisconsin, the rule of equity was applied in favor of judgment creditors of the mortgagor, as against the mortgagee of the homestead, and the latter was compelled to foreclose his mortgage on the homestead, before being admitted to share with the other creditors in the proceeds of the remainder of the mortgagee's estate. White v. Polleys, 20 Wis. 503. But this rule was subsequently altered by statute. Laws Wis. 1870, c. 133, § 1. So, in another case in the same state, where a mortgage embraced a homestead and a business lot, and the homestead had been sold to satisfy the mortgage debt, the court refused to set aside the sale so that the business lot might be sold first, it appearing that there were creditors of the mortgagor who had judgment liens on the business lot, which were not liens on the homestead. [Jones v. Dow,] 18 Wis. 241. It is unnecessary, however, to cite from the authorities. I have mentioned these merely to show the diversity of opinion which has prevailed as to the rights of the owners of homesteads as against mortgagees. In this state, it appears to be settled, that a mortgagee of lands not included in a homestead, can not compel a prior mortgagee, whose mortgage includes those lands and also the homestead, to resort to the latter before selling the lands mortgaged to the junior mortgagee. McLaughlin v. Hart, 46 Cal. 630.

It has also been held that the wife may, after a judgment against her husband has become a lien on the home property, file a declaration of homestead upon it, and acquire such an interest in it that she can compel the sheriff to exhaust the husband's individual property before subjecting it to sale. Bartholomew v. Hook, 23 Cal. 277. But neither of these cases contains the slightest intimation that where a person has made a mortgage on two pieces of property, and afterwards makes a second mortgage on one of them, the equitable right of the junior mortgagee to compel the first mortgagee to resort in the first instance to the property on which he has an exclusive claim, can be taken away or impaired by a declaration of homestead, by either husband or wife, on the property exclusively mortgaged to the first mortgagee. I have been referred to no case which hints at so inequitable a rule. The junior mortgagee, when accepting the security of a second mortgage, had a right to repose upon the protection afforded him by the familiar rule of equity, and to act upon the assurance that the first incumbrancer would be compelled to resort to the property on which he had an exclusive claim, before coming on the property covered by the second mortgage, and that no act of the mortgagor could deprive him of the right to compel him to do so.

If the mortgagor or his wife, by merely making a declaration, of homestead, could thus impair or destroy the security of the junior mortgagee, why might he not effect the same result by making a grant of the property exclusively embraced in the first mortgage?

The declaration of homestead may be likened to a grant to himself and wife, for it operates an exemption of the property from the claims of his general creditors; and yet it will not be disputed that where the whole of an estate is mortgaged, and the mortgagor makes subsequent mortgages or sales of specific parcels of it, the subsequent incumbrancers have the right to compel the general mortgagee to satisfy his debt by selling in the inverse order of the sales or mortgages by the owner. Raun v. Reynolds, 11 Cal. 20; Cheever v. Fair, 5 Cal. 337. Any other rule would be injurious to the mortgagor himself. For after mortgaging his property for, it might be, an insignificant part of its value, he would be unable to sell or incumber any separate parcel of it. For the purchaser or incumbrancer would have no assurance that his parcel might not be first taken to satisfy the general mortgage.

The interests, then, of both owners and incumbrancers of land require that the equitable rule under consideration should be rigidly adhered to in all cases justly admitting of its application, and with such certainty as to permit reliance upon it as a vested right incidental to and inseparable from the rights created by the mortgage. I can conceive no reason, of justice or policy, why this right, which confessedly existed as between the first and second mortgagees, and which grew out of the contracts of the mortgagor himself, should be destroyed or impaired by the filing by the latter or his wife, of a declaration of homestead.

It is urged that the mortgagee in this case has lost the right to demand the application of the rule, because he had other securities on which he has released his lien, and the proceeds of which, when sold by the mortgagor, have been applied in part only, to the payment of the mortgage debt. And this result it is urged, would ensue even if no homestead had been declared on the property. But this relinquishment by the mortgagee of a portion of the security, its sale, and the application of the proceeds, were done not only with the assent of the mortgagor, but must have been done by him, for he alone could make a title to the purchaser. The proceeds were applied no doubt in accordance with the agreement made when the mortgagee consented to waive his lien. The mortgagor cannot be now heard to object to a transaction assented to and effected by himself. There are no junior incumbrances on the property which it is now asked shall be first sold. These, if they existed, might very possibly invoke the equitable rule under consideration, and demand that the whole proceeds of the property on which the mortgagee has an exclusive lien should be applied in payment of his debt before he can compel the mortgagor prior to himself to sell first the property which is also mortgaged to them. The only subsequent incumbrance on the property covered by either mortgage is that created by the declaration of homestead. The rights acquired under that declaration have already been considered.

It is objected that the first security given was in the form of a deed of trust, which vested the legal title in trustees, and which is, in some respects, distinguishable from a mortgage in the ordinary form. This is true; but I do not see what effect it can have on the rights of the second mortgagee. The trust deed was intended as a security; no right is claimed under it, except to sell the property and execute the trust by paying the debt. The trustees submit to the direction of the court as to the mode of selling. They do not deny that they are bound by the same equitable rules which would be enforced against an ordinary mortgagee. The fact that the legal estate is in them, does not emancipate them from those rules, any more than an ordinary mortgagee would be released from their operation in those states where a mortgage is held, as at common law, to pass the legal title.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the application of the assignee should be granted.

Case No. 14.

The ABBY.

[1 Mason, 360.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1818.

CUSTOMS LAWS—FORFEITURE OF VESSEL—SEIZURE —ABANDONMENT—JURISDICTION—WAIVER.

1. When the seizure is made within the limits of a judicial district, the district court of that district has exclusive original cognizance thereof. And if brought into another district, the court will remit the property to the proper district. But the cognizance of seizures on the high seas belongs to any district court, into which the property is brought.

[See, also, The Merino, 9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 391.]

2. If a seizure be abandoned, no jurisdiction attaches to any court unless there be a new seizure. But to constitute such an abandonment, there must be an unequivocal act of dereliction. If after a seizure of a ship, the master agrees to navigate her into port under the direction of the seizer, and then to give her again into the possession of the seizer, this is no abandonment, although in consequence of such agreement the seizer's crew are withdrawn from the ship.

3. A party, who means to except to the jurisdiction of the court, in a case of seizure, must plead to that jurisdiction. If he files a claim and plea to the merits, on which the parties are at issue, it is a waiver of any exception to the jurisdiction. On such claim and plea, no question as to the place of seizure is before the court.

In admiralty. Information of seizure against the sloop Abby. 1st. For being engaged in a trade other than that for which she was licensed (i. e. the coasting trade) against the 32d section of the coasting act of the 18th of February, 1793, c. 8. [1 Stat. 316.] 2dly. For unloading goods without a permit, against the 50th section of the revenue collection act [Bioren & D. Laws, c. 128; 1 Stat. 655, c. 22] of the 2d of March, 1799. [Condemned.]

[As stated below by the court, the material facts in this case are the same as those disclosed in the case of The Betsey, Case No. 1,365. In the Betsey Case the libel charged that on the 10th day of September, 1817, a certain ship or vessel, whose name was as yet unknown, laden with a cargo, consisting of various articles of goods, wares, and merchandise, "of foreign growth and manufacture, which were liable to the payment of duties on importation into the United States," the said vessel being then and there bound to the United States from a foreign port, did arrive within four leagues of a district of the United States; and that, after her arrival as aforesaid, on the same day, and before the said ship had come to the proper place for the discharge of her cargo, or any part thereof, a part of the cargo of the said vessel, to wit, 42 pipes of rum, a quantity of logwood, and various other articles, were, without any unavoidable accident, necessity, or distress of weather, unladen out of said vessel, and, being so unladen, were afterwards, on the same day, without any unavoidable accident, necessity, or distress of weather, on the high seas, and "within four leagues of a collection district of the United States," put and received forthwith into the said schooner Betsey, contrary to the form of the statute, etc.]

[The evidence in the Betsey Case showed that the unknown vessel was a Spanish ship, not originally bound for the United States, but captured by a privateer under the flag of the government of Buenos Ayres. She came to an anchor in Huzzy's sound, within a district of the United States. Her prize master was a citizen of the United States, belonging to Portland, and the unloading was with the assent of the prize master, in concert with some inhabitants of Portland, after her departure from the port, where she had anchored for the obvious purpose of having the cargo imported into the United States, and yet avoiding the expense of alien duties. The court said there was no doubt, under the circumstances, that her destination after capture was really for the United States; and that her arrival off Portland was voluntary, and with an intent, per fas aut nefas, to dispose of the cargo in the United States.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The material facts in this case are the same as those disclosed to the court in the case of The Betsey, [Case No. 1,365.] The Abby acted in the character of a salvor, until after the arrival of the Spanish ship, now known to be the Industria, in Huzzy's sound; when, having ascertained from the proper authority, that the alien duties and alien tonnage would be payable by the ship and cargo if libeled for salvage, the master of the Abby seems to have relinquished his claim, and to have co-operated with the Betsey in another enterprise. I say co-operated, for the Betsey and the Abby were lying together in Huzzy's sound, when the Spanish ship went out to sea in the night; and in the morning, the Betsey was discovered alongside of the ship receiving her cargo on board, and the Abby was in company. It is true, that the Abby had but a very small quantity of the cargo on board; but she had a great part of the sails, rigging, anchors, and cables of the ship. I believe only one barrel of sugar was found on board; but as this is unaccounted for in any other manner, I must presume, that it was taken from the ship. The ship must, on her arrival in Huzzy's sound, be deemed to have been, to all intents and purposes, in the possession and charge of the master of the Abby and his co-salvors. Her departure in the night, and under the circumstances of this case, was in manifest violation of the provisions of the 29th and 30th sections of the revenue collection act of 1799, [Bioren & D. Laws, c. 128; 1 Stat. 648, c. 22.] There is no reason to suppose, that the master of the Abby was not perfectly consulant of, and a party to, that transaction; and the court must wink very hard, if it did not perceive, that the meeting of the Betsey and Abby with the ship was not accidental, but in pursuance of previous concert. The question then comes to this, whether the Abby was at this time engaged in a trade, for which she was licensed. It is immaterial, whether she had on board one bag or one hundred bags of sugar received from the ship. She was licensed solely for the coasting trade; and if she was then employed in assisting in the unloading of the cargo of the ship, within four leagues of our coast, it was a violation of our laws, and without the protection of her license. The evidence certainly does not lay a sufficient foundation for the court to exonerate her from this imputation. There is a possibility of her innocence; but the conduct of her master has been so extraordinary, and there is such a cloud of suspicion hanging over her, that no court, proceeding with proper caution, can pronounce her to be guiltless. Without, therefore, adverting to the evidence as to the second count, on which I do not feel myself called to pronounce, my judgment is, that the Abby is forfeited for having been engaged in an illegal traffic. On the facts, therefore, the decree of the district court ought to be affirmed.

It is, however, objected, that the seizure in this case was actually made in the port of Portland, within the judicial cognizance of the district court of Maine, and therefore, that the jurisdiction of the district court of Massachusetts has not attached. I accede to the position, that the court below had no cognizance of the cause, if the seizure, on which this libel is founded, was in the port of Portland; for the judicial act of 1789, c. 20, § 9, [1 Stat. 76,] gives exclusive jurisdiction to the district court of such district. Concurrent jurisdiction exists in the district courts of other districts, only where the seizure is on the high seas. But the objection here fails in point of fact. The seizure was first made about five miles off Cape Elizabeth, and was therefore on the high seas; since all waters below the line of low-water mark on the sea coast are comprehended within that description; and when the tide flows, the waters to high-water mark also are properly the high seas.² This is not denied by the claimant's counsel; but it is said, that the seizure so made was formally abandoned, and a new seizure afterwards was made in Portland harbour. It is true, that the Abby after the seizure was permitted to go into Portland harbour, navigated by her own crew, the seizer's crew having been removed by the commander of the revenue cutter. But under what circumstances was this done? There were appearances of an approaching storm; and it was thought best by all parties, that the Abby should proceed to Portland harbour for shelter. The revenue cutter was not manned with an extraordinary complement of men. The master of the Abby voluntarily offered to conduct his vessel into Portland, without the presence of the seizer's crew; and agreed there to redeliver her again to the seizer. This offer was accepted; and the seizer's crew was upon the faith of it withdrawn. Upon her arrival at Portland, the Abby was faithfully delivered to the seizer without any delay or objection. I agree, that if there was an absolute abandonment of the seizure, a new seizure might have become necessary. But to constitute such an abandonment, there must be an intention coupled with an unequivocal act of dereliction. There is no pretence of such an intention; and looking to all the circumstances, there is as little pretence to suggest, that there was any such act. It is like the case of a capture en prize. It is not necessary, that a prize crew should be put on board to navigate the ship; the capture still continues complete, although the ship be navigated by her original crew, if there be an agreement to this effect, between the captors and the captured. It is quite another question, whether the original crew are bound to navigate her; but if they do consent, they are not at liberty afterwards to change the character of that act, by setting it up as an abandonment of the rights of prize. The evidence of an abandonment of a seizure ought to be extremely strong to justify a court in coming to such a conclusion. The presumption of such an intention is here repelled by the whole current of the testimony, as well as by the subsequent conduct of the seizing officer in repossessing himself of the Abby, and immediately instituting proceedings to ascertain and enforce the forfeiture.

The question has been thus considered by the consent of the parties, as if the question of jurisdiction were open upon the record. But in strictness, no such question is properly before the court. If the party meant to except to the jurisdiction, he should have filed a declinatory allegation, in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction. But here he has applied to the court for, and obtained a delivery of, the property on bail; and the very stipulation of bail admits the jurisdiction of the court. He has regularly filed a plea, claiming the property and traversing the allegations of forfeiture in the libel. Upon the pleadings in the cause, the only question put in issue by the parties is forfeiture or not; and the court cannot travel beyond the defence asserted by the claimants. The question then of jurisdiction, not having been put in issue, cannot be properly in proof before the court; for the proof must be according to the allegations; and no party can be called upon to establish, what is not drawn into controversy by the allegations. Nor is this a mere matter of form; but a substantial and important doctrine, regulating the essential rights of parties. If a plea to the jurisdiction had been taken in the court below, no delivery on bail would have taken place, until the jurisdiction had been affirmatively settled. If the court below felt itself ousted of jurisdiction, it would have remitted the cause and the property to the district court of Maine. But after a delivery on bail, how is that possible? The party gets possession of the property, without a trial, from the possession of a tribunal, whose jurisdiction he admits as competent to bail the property; and as soon as it is withdrawn from the grasp of the court, denies its power to institute any inquiry into the question of forfeiture. It cannot be admitted, that any party can first affirm the jurisdiction, by taking the property on bail, and then turn round and deny the same jurisdiction, when the court can no longer administer effectual relief to the interests of other persons. The party is estopped by his own acts from such a proceeding. A plea to the merits is an admission, that the jurisdiction of the court is well founded; and a decree on those merits cannot afterwards be arrested, unless the defect of jurisdiction be apparent on the face of the record. Whatever is not controverted is presumed to be admitted.

Condemned.

SHIPPING — TITLE TO VESSEL WHILE BUILDING — LIEN OF MATERIAL MEN — WAIVER.

[1. A vessel building under a contract whereby one payment is to be made when she is framed, and the rest when completed, is, until finished and delivered, the property of the builder, and may be subject to the lien given by St. Mass. 1848, c. 290, to one furnishing materials for her construction.]

[2. Materials were sold to a builder at work upon several ships, without any attempt to discover on which ship they were used. The material man's books charged the builder personally, without reference to any of the vessels, and showed no appropriation of payments to any items distinguishing them, and credit was given which might extend beyond the time to which the lien for such materials allowed by St. Mass. 1848, c. 290, was limited by that statute. Held, that the material man had no lien, having shown no intention to hold the owner personally.]

[In admiralty. Libel by C. F. Gardiner and others against the Abby Whitman, J. H. Pearson, and others, and George Cannon, assignee, claimants for materials furnished. Dismissed.]

This was a libel against the Abby Whitman, for materials alleged to have been used in her construction, under the Massachusetts statute, entitled an "Act establishing a lien upon ships and vessels in certain cases," St. 1848, c. 290. The claimants contending that under the circumstances of the case no lien existed, even if the materials were so used, a hearing was had to determine this point. The claimants contended that the vessel was built by A. B. for other persons, under a contract with them, by which payments were to be made during her construction, one when she was framed, and the balance on her completion. That the whole amount due by the contract was paid by them to B., on delivery of the vessel, without notice of the libellants' claim, and that the vessel under these circumstances became, at least on the payment made when she was framed, the property of the persons for whom she was built, on the authority of Clarke v. Spence, 4 Adol. & E. 448, and other cases; and that if so, or even if there was no such change in the property of the vessel, still there was no lien, under the case of Smith v. Eastern Railroad, [Case No. 13,039.] They also claimed that the materials in question were supplied on the exclusive personal credit of the builder, and that therefore no lien arose; that there was a credit given by the libellants to him for four months, except as to one item, which was claimed to have been paid, and that a credit for such time showed an intention not to rely upon the lien, as it might extend beyond the period to which the lien was limited by the statute; and further, that by applying certain payments acknowledged to have been made by the builder, and receipted for on account, in the order of the debts, and allowing the four months credit claimed, nothing would be due at the date of the libel.

The same builder was constructing other vessels, at or about the same time, in the same yard, and materials furnished by the libellants were employed in such other vessels.

C. B. Goodrich, for Pearson and others.
Geo. S. Hale, for Cannon.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, said that so far as the question of property in the vessel was concerned, she was, and remained, until completion and delivery to the purchaser, the property of the builder; that one material element upon which the English decisions rested, he thought, was wanting here, viz.: the fixing any payment or payments at a specific period in her construction; but if that were otherwise, still the authority of those cases had not been recognized, and the law would probably be otherwise held here; and that this case did not come within that of the Eastern Railroad, [Case No. 13,039.] As to the lien claimed on the vessel, however, he was of opinion that it did not exist, because the evidence and circumstances in the case showed an intention on the part of the libellants to rely upon the personal credit of the builder and not upon the vessel. This appeared in the first place from the libellants' own books, in which all the charges were made against the builder personally, without any reference to, or mention of any of the vessels which he was building; again, the materials appeared to have been taken from the libellants' yard by a teamster employed by the builder, and transferred to his ship-yard, while no exertions appeared to have been made by them to ascertain for what purpose these materials were to be used, as would naturally have been the case if they intended to claim a lien upon the vessels in whose construction they were employed, the right to a lien depending upon their being actually used in the construction of some vessel; and if they looked to any vessel, they ought to have known in which their materials were used, or to which they were hauled, and would naturally have made inquiries at the time; but no inquiries were made, so far as appeared, and no charge to any vessel.

Thirdly, when payments were made by B., the builder, as they were from time to time, to the amount of $2,500, there was no appropriation by the libellants on their books, or receipts, to any items to distinguish their claim upon the different vessels, as would be proper, if they intended to claim liens upon them, for it would be material to know which was paid for, and which not.

The fourth circumstance bearing upon this matter was the alleged credit of four months. In itself, that was the most material, but it was mentioned last because there was more doubt as to the fact.

His honor reviewed the evidence upon this point, and expressed his opinion that it showed a course of conduct by the libellants, inconsistent with the intention to claim a lien, even if it did not, and he seemed to consider that the weight of the testimony was that it did, show such a credit. He was of opinion that the payments made must be applied to the account generally, and not as the plaintiff had claimed and offered evidence to show that they should be, to other items than those specified in his libel. And he came to the conclusion, upon the whole, that no lien existed, because upon all the evidence, not relying upon any of the considerations mentioned, alone, it appeared to be the libellants' intention to waive it, and rely upon the builder personally. The matter of the four months credit he had considered only as bearing upon the general question of a personal credit, because it was not alleged in the claimants' answers as a substantive ground of defence, although conclusive, when properly alleged and proved, if that credit would certainly extend beyond the time limited by statute, and more or less strong in proportion to the probability that it would extend beyond that time, the weight to be given to it in this case, depending on its force as evidence of an intention not to rely upon a lien. Libel dismissed, with costs for claimants.

SHIPPING—PASSENGERS—LIABILITY IN REM—CHARTER-PARTY.

1. A charter-party, sounding wholly in covenant, contained agreements on the part of the owner that the vessel was fit for the voyage,—that she should take in a cargo to be furnished by the charterer, reserving her cabin and room for her crew, water, provisions, &c.,—that the privilege of putting on board steerage passengers should belong solely to the charterer, and that if the ship should be unable to carry cargo and passengers to the stipulated amount, there should be a reduction of freight. On the part of the charterer, it was agreed that he should furnish the cargo—should pay a stipulated freight and demurrage in case of delay in loading, &c. Held, that this charter-party, construed under the presumption of law against a change of ownership, and in the light of the acts of the parties under it, was but an affreightment for the voyage, and not a letting of the entire ship, so as to constitute the charterer owner for the voyage.

2. Ships carrying passengers for hire stand upon the same footing in respect to their responsibility in rem for the performance of the passage contract, with those carrying merchandise on freight.

[Cited in Marshall v. Bazin, Case No. 9,125.]

3. Ships carrying passengers for hire are liable in rem for wrongful acts of the master in his capacity as such; but not, it seems, for acts of mere personal private malice or ill-will.

[Cited in Pendleton v. Kinsley, Case No. 10,922.]

4. Where a passenger is put on short allowance by the master, the latter will not be presumed to have acted from personal malice; and if such short allowance be a violation of the passage contract, the ship will be held liable unless it is shown that the master's conduct was malicious and wrongful.

[5. Cited in Donahoe v. Kettell, Case No. 3,980, and Richardson v. Winsor, Id. 11,795, as authority for holding that, if the due attainment of the object sought by the charter-party requires that vessel be absolutely under the control of the charterer, then the services of the master and crew pass as merely accessory to the principal subject-matter of the contract.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, by Peter McDonald, prosecuting for himself and on behalf of his wife and minor children, against the ship Aberfoyle, to recover damages for breach of a contract for the passage of libellant and his family. [The decree rendered herein was affirmed by the circuit court in The Aberfoyle, Case No. 17.]

Samuel R. Graves, owner of the vessel,

filed a claim and answer. The cause came on for a hearing upon the merits, and was heard upon an agreed statement of facts, instead of on pleadings and proofs. The facts as stipulated were substantially as follows:—The claimant, Samuel R. Graves, was, during December, 1846, and thereafter, the owner of the Aberfoyle. December 9, 1846, he executed a charter-party of the vessel to one William Quayle, of Liverpool, by which it was mutually agreed, amongst other things, that the vessel should take on board a cargo of general goods and merchandise, together with a full legal complement of steerage passengers, their luggage, water, provisions, fuel, &c.; that being so loaded she should proceed to New York; that the cargo should not exceed what she could reasonably stow and carry over and above her cabin and necessary room for her crew, water, tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture; that the charterer should load the vessel as aforesaid, and should pay freight to the owner, £485; that the privilege of putting on board steerage passengers should belong solely to the charterer; the entire of the between decks, if required, being reserved for the accommodation of such passengers; that the ship-owner should be satisfied for the payment of head-money. The charter-party contained no provision as to who should man and navigate the ship. After the making of this charter-party, but before the sailing of the vessel, William Quayle let to J. W. Shaw & Co., of Liverpool, the privilege of furnishing all the steerage passengers to be taken by the vessel on her voyage.

December 15, 1846, the libellant made a contract with J. W. Shaw & Co. for the passage of himself and family in the vessel to New York, for which he paid £22, in advance. By the terms of the passengers' contract ticket, executed by J. W. Shaw & Co. to the libellant, they agreed to provide the libellant and the members of his family with a steerage passage to New York, including space for luggage, head-money, &c., and to furnish them with water and provisions, as follows: seven pounds of bread, biscuit, flour, oat-meal or rice, &c., at least twice a week, and three quarts of water per day for each adult. December 29, 1846, the vessel sailed with the libellant and his family on board, and carrying, also, about one hundred and sixty other passengers. For the first twenty-five days of the voyage three quarts of water and one pound of bread were given to each passenger daily, including the libellant and his family. At that time the passengers were put upon an allowance of two quarts of water per day, which continued three weeks; from that time only one quart of water a day was allowed them, which continued until March 9, 1847, at which time the vessel arrived in New York, making the length of her voyage sixty-nine days. For the last ten days before the ship arrived in port, the passengers were put upon an allowance of half a pound of bread a day; and during the voyage there was great suffering by all the passengers, including the libellant and his family, for want of bread and water. The day before the sailing of the vessel, Wilson, her master, was taken sick, and one Thomas Jones was, by the owner, appointed master, and had command of the vessel during her voyage.

The claim of the libel was to recover $500 damages.

William M. Allen, for libellant.

I. Upon the facts shown, the owner is liable to the libellant. 1. The charter-party is most clearly a charter of affreightment, sounding in covenant. In order to charge the charterer as owner for the voyage, he must have the exclusive possession, command, and navigation of the ship. Abb. Shipp. 365, notes 1, 2; [Gracie v. Palmer,] 3 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 605; [Chandler v. Belden,] 18 Johns. 157; [Clarkson v. Edes,] 4 Cow. 470; 3 Kent, [Comm., 5th Ed.] 220; [Pickman v. Woods,] 6 Pick. 248; [Hooe v. Groverman,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 214. The whole instrument must be taken and construed together, in order to determine its effect. [Clarkson v. Edes,] 4 Cow. 470; [The Volunteer, Case No. 16,991.] Here Quayle is described as merchant and freighter. There appears to be reserved the cabin of the vessel, and necessary room for her crew, water, tackle, apparel, provisions and furniture. If she is detained more than twelve working days by the charterer, he is to pay demurrage. He is to pay freight to the owner, £485; and the ship-owner is to be satisfied for payment of head-money for passengers. Moreover, the charter-party does not declare who shall man and navigate the ship. And it is a general rule that the owner is bound, notwithstanding a charter-party, to put the vessel in a suitable condition to perform her voyage, and to keep her in that condition during the voyage, and to victual and man her for the destined navigation, unless there is a contrary stipulation in the charter-party, or the nature and object of the charter-party devolve that duty upon the charterer. Abb. Shipp. 323, note 1, and authorities there cited. This being the fact, it is submitted, that the case of Parish v. Crawford, 2 Strange, 1251, cited in Abbott on Shipping, 55, and subsequent cases, show the owner in this case to be liable. 2. The putting the libellants on short allowance was not only a breach of the contract, but it was a direct violation of the statute law of England, where the contract was made. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 117, § 6. It was done by the master, who was under the direction of the owner. The common law of England and of this country, except so far as it has been altered by statute, follows the civil law, and holds the owners responsible for the acts of the master without distinction or limitation. The Rebecca, [Case No. 11,619.] The owner has a remedy against the master. 3. The case of Chamberlain v. Chandler, [Id. 2,575,] shows, "that the contract for passengers is not for mere ship-room and personal existence on board, but for reasonable food, comforts, necessaries, and kindness; that in respect to females, it proceeds yet further, and includes an implied stipulation against obscenity, immodesty, or any wanton disregard of their feelings; and that a course of conduct, oppressive and malicious in these particulars, is no less punishable in courts of justice than personal assaults. And they come within Admiralty cognizance. 4. The owner must be liable both upon the consideration of the benefit arising from the ship, which is the equitable motive, and also, as having the direction of the persons who navigate the vessel. Though he did not receive the freight which the passengers paid for their passage, yet he had the benefit of that freight in general, and thus had that equitable motive which renders him liable. The transactions between the owner and Quayle and Shaw & Co. consisted merely in giving them power to put goods and passengers on board. Again, Shaw & Co., in procuring passengers for the ship, acted in the capacity of agents for the owner, inasmuch as the ship was to furnish provisions and water, and not Shaw & Co. The owner was undoubtedly aware that such was the contract, and such the law where the contract was made, and he assumed the obligations thereby devolving upon him, in receiving the passengers on board and undertaking to convey them to New York. 5. It is conceded that the contract with the libellants to furnish them water and provisions was violated, and that they suffered greatly in consequence. There can be no wrong without a remedy. Now what is the remedy of the libellants? Not against the captain, because he is not liable upon the contracts made by the owner. If not against the captain, it must be against the owner.

II. The libellants may proceed in rem. 1. It is an elementary principle, that there is no remedy without the means of enforcing it. How, then, are remedies on contracts enforced in this State? Is it not through the property of the delinquent? And can it make any material difference with him out of what portion of his property the claim is satisfied? It is conceded that the owner lives in Liverpool, in England; and to say that the libellants must return to Liverpool and prosecute a personal action, would be a denial of right. I take it to be law that when a tort, or any other action for which the owner is liable in Admiralty, has been committed, a proceeding in rem will be sustained. The Rebecca, [Case No. 11,619.] 2. The condition of the owner is not made worse by rendering the ship liable. It is immaterial to him whether the satisfaction for the injury is made from the ship or from his other property. But it is not a matter of equal indifference to the libellant, whether he is allowed or not to look to the ship for reparation, as this is not only his best, but will sometimes be found to be his only security.

III. This suit is sustainable upon the general principles upon which rest the decisions made in the following cases. Le Caux v. Eden, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 594; St. Amand v. Lizardi, 4 La. 243; Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473; Dean v. Angus, [Case No. 3,702.]

R. Emmett, for the claimant.

I. The libel states this to be a cause of ill-treatment and short allowance in water and provisions, civil and maritime. The ill-treatment, if any, consists in the short allowance; none other is alleged. Short allowance of provisions, whether from failure of the owner to put them on board, or from the captain's wrongfully withholding them, does not make a cause maritime, though the failure to provide a passage, or the necessary accommodation on board to a passenger, might be of that character. A passage in a vessel does not, in law or by custom, imply the furnishing of provisions. Passengers frequently provide themselves, and this is a matter of personal contract dehors the maritime engagement, which can embrace the passage only.

II. The libel alleges an agreement under which the libellant and his family embarked as passengers, and by which a certain allowance of water and provisions was to be furnished to them; but as it avers no breach of contract by the owner, or any other party, and does not even state with whom such agreement was made, it is not a proceeding ex contractu.

III. The gravamen of the libel is, that the master withheld from and refused to furnish the water and provisions to the libellants, whereby they suffered great want, &c., and for which they claim damages. The charge of withholding implies that the water and provisions so withheld were actually on board, but wrongfully withheld. The proceeding in this case is, therefore, for an alleged tort by the master.

IV. If courts of admiralty have jurisdiction over torts committed by a master of a vessel against a passenger, such jurisdiction is in personam, not in rem. De Lovio v. Boit, [Case No. 3,776;] Chamberlain v. Chandler, [Id. 2,575.] The torts of the master cannot hypothecate the ship, nor produce any lien on it. 2 Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 143.

V. This cause, on the face of the libel, presents an action of damage. In actions of damage, the process must necessarily be against the person. 2 Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 347.

VI. Torts cognizable in admiralty are governed by the principles of the common law, and the remedy must be against the person who committed the tort.

VII. All claims in rem, not founded on actual contracts of hypothecation, rest on the following principles: That a service has been rendered in rem, as in the case of mariners' wages, salvage, bottomry, freight; or, that an injury has been received ab re, as in case of collision of vessels at sea. These principles entirely exclude proceedings in rem for torts. 2 Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 142, 143, 396, 397.

VIII. Though Admiralty may have jurisdiction of a contract with a passenger for his mere passage as a maritime cause, it can only be in personam, whether such contract be made by the owner himself or by the captain as his agent, because it does not come within any principle of a lien in rem, either of hypothecation, service to the ship, or legal liability imposed on or incurred by it.

IX. The facts of this case, as agreed upon in the written statement submitted to the court, show: 1. That if any fraud was committed on the passengers by not furnishing the vessel with a sufficient quantity of water and provisions, (which, however true it might be, is neither alleged in the libel nor shown,) the owner of the vessel, who now claims her, was no party to it. He made no contract whatever with the passengers, and had no control over any such contract or its performance by those with whom the passengers made it. 2. That the master was innocent of any connection with such a fraud, as it appears that he was only appointed the day before the vessel sailed, in consequence of the sudden sickness of her regular master. Also, that in reducing the allowance of water and provisions, the master could be guilty of no tort in a legal sense, however much the libellants may have suffered, because that course was pursued by him under circumstances of peril and necessity, for the preservation of all, including the libellants, and was, therefore, under the circumstances, a meritorious duty on his part. In any view of this case, therefore, either as founded on tort or contract, the libel should be dismissed, and the vessel restored to the claimant, and costs awarded to him.

BETTS, District Judge. The contract proved in this case between the owner of the vessel and the charterer was a contract of affreightment for the voyage, and did not amount to such a letting of the entire ship as to constitute the charterer owner for the voyage. The rule of construction of a charter-party, in this respect, is stated by Mr. Abbott to be as follows: "When, by the terms of the charter-party, the master and mariners are to continue subject to the orders of the ship-owner, he retaining through them the possession, management, and control of the vessel, it is to be considered as a contract to carry the freighter's goods; but where the merchant engages to pay a stipulated price to the ship-owner for the use of his ship, by the month or year,—takes it and them into his service,—receiving the freight actually earned by it to his own use, the master and mariners becoming subject to his orders, and the general management and control of them and of the vessel being given up to him,—it is a demise of the vessel with her crew for the voyage, or the term specified; the charterer becomes owner pro hac vice, entitled to the rights and subject to the responsibilities which attach to that character." Abb. Shipp. 47-52, and notes. The case of Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 39, drew in question the construction in this respect of a charter-party of the following nature: One M'Dougal, the general owner of the brig Betsy, let her to the plaintiff by a charter-party of affreightment, excepting and reserving her cabin for the use of the master and mate, and for accommodation of passengers, as therein mentioned, and so much room in the hold as might be necessary for the mariners, and storage of water, wood, provisions, and cables, for a voyage from New York to Nantes; and M'Dougal, by the same instrument, covenanted to man, victual, and navigate the brig at his own charge during the voyage, and to receive on board and carry any shipment of goods made by the plaintiff. The passengers on board of the brig were to be at the joint expense of the parties, and the passage-money was to be equally divided between them. It was held, upon these facts, that M'Dougal remained the owner for the voyage, upon the general principle that, where the general owner retains the possession, command, and navigation of the ship, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight for the voyage, the charter-party is considered as a mere affreightment sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership. Citing Hooe v. Groverman, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 214. And this conclusion, that the owner of the vessel, notwithstanding the charter, remained her owner for the voyage, was derived in part from the fact that he retained the exclusive possession, command, and management of the vessel, and that she was navigated at his expense during the voyage,—and apart from the circumstance that the whole charter-party, except the introductory clause, "hath granted and to freight let," was one sounding merely in covenant.

In the case of The Schooner Volunteer, [Case No. 16,991,] the same principles were applied to a case quite analogous to the present. The charter-party there, after naming the parties, proceeded to state that the owner, for the consideration thereafter mentioned, "has letten to freight the whole of the said schooner, with appurtenances to her belonging, except the cabin, which is reserved for the use of the master, and what room is necessary under deck for provisions, wood, water, and cables," for a voyage specified. It further set forth covenants on the part of the owner and charterers respectively, among which were these:—that the owner should pay all and every charge of victualling and manning the schooner, during the voyage, and should furnish the schooner victualled and manned; and that the charterers should bear all other charges, and should pay a specified freight. It was held that, upon the construction of this instrument, the general owner remained unquestionably the owner for the voyage. Mr. Justice Story remarked: "The vessel was equipped and manned and victualled by him, and at his expense, during the voyage; and he covenanted to take on board such goods during the voyage as the charterers should think proper. The whole arrangements on his part, in these respects, sound merely in covenant. It is true, that in another part of the instrument it is said, that he has 'letten to freight,' which may seem to import a present demise or grant, (and not a mere covenant,) of the whole schooner for the voyage. But this language is qualified by what succeeds. And the whole schooner is not let; for there is an express exception of the cabin, and certain portions of other room under deck. If the whole schooner, then, was not granted during the voyage on freight, how is it possible to contend that the libellant did not still remain owner for the voyage? The master was his master, appointed by him, and responsible to him; the crew were hired and paid by him; and the victualling and manning were at his expense. He also retained the exclusive possession of a part of the vessel for the voyage, and the control and navigation of her during the voyage. Taking, then, the whole instrument together, it seems wholly inconsistent with the manifest intent of the parties that the charterer should be owner for the voyage." In a later case, also decided by Mr. Justice Story, (Certain Logs of Mahogany, [Case No. 2,559,]) which arose upon a charter-party substantially analogous, as to all points important to the present discussion, to that drawn in question in The Volunteer, that learned jurist, commenting on a discrepancy between the English and American cases, thus restated the American rule: "If the absolute owner does not retain the possession, command, and control of the navigation of the ship during the voyage, and the master is deemed his agent, acting under his instructions for the voyage, though authorized and required to fulfil the terms of the charter-party, the absolute owner must, under such circumstances, be still deemed owner for the voyage, and be liable as such to all persons who do not contract personally and exclusively with the charterer, by a sub-contract with the latter, knowing his rights and character under the charter-party." And it was further held in the same case, that wherever, upon comparing the various clauses of a charter-party, it remains doubtful whether the charterer was intended to have the sole possession and control of the vessel during the voyage, or to be constituted owner for the voyage, then the general owner must be deemed such; for his rights and authorities over the voyage must continue, unless displaced by some clear and determinate transfer of them. Bearing in mind this presumption against any transfer of the ship to the charterer for the voyage, I proceed, in the light of the foregoing adjudications, to consider what construction is to be placed upon the charter-party proved in this case; and, at the outset, two distinctions may be noticed between the present case and those already cited. In each of the three cases just mentioned, stress was laid in the decision upon the circumstance that the charter-party was, for the most part, one sounding in covenant; but this was adverted to with the qualification that there were also clauses of a contrary import. There is no such cause of embarrassment in the terms of the instrument now before the court. That instrument is one which rests entirely and unequivocally in covenant alone. It contains no words of grant or demise whatsoever. It commences, not by stating that the owner hath "let to freight" the vessel chartered, but by saying that "it is this day mutually agreed" that the ship shall take on board the cargo to be furnished by the charterer; and the remaining clauses of the instrument are not only clearly in the nature of mutual and reciprocal agreements, but are technically so expressed.

The second distinction between the present case and those which have been cited is, that the charter-party now before the court contains no express provision binding the owner to man and navigate the ship during the voyage; a clause which was inserted in each of the charter-parties in the cases referred to. It was contended upon the argument, that the absence of this provision was immaterial, inasmuch as, by a general rule of law, it was said, the owner is bound, notwithstanding a charter-party, to put the vessel in a suitable condition to perform her voyage, and to keep her in that condition during the voyage; and to victual and man her for the destined navigation, unless there is a contrary stipulation in the charter-party, or the nature and object of the charter-party devolve that duty upon the charterer. This rule was stated by counsel on the authority of a note to Abbott on Shipping, (Story & Perkins's Ed. 323.) The cases cited in that note probably support it so far as concerns the obligation of the owner to put her and keep her in suitable condition to perform the voyage. One only of those cases, however, (Goodridge v. Lord, 10 Mass. 483,) bears upon the question of the obligation to man the ship; and that case, so far from sustaining the rule contended for, holds directly the reverse. In that case, the owners of the vessel brought suit against the charterers to recover moneys in part paid in settlement of seamen's wages, for which they had libelled the ship. There was, in that case, in the charter-party, a stipulation binding the charterers to pay the charges of victualling and manning the vessel; but the court remarked that an action would, under the circumstances, lie for the owners against the charterers to recover the amount paid, even without an express stipulation in the charter-party, or any proof that the charterers were to victual and man the ship; "for that would be the effect of the contract of charter-party, unless it appeared, by the instrument itself, that a different arrangement was intended." The absence of any provision in the agreement of charter-party requiring the owner to man and navigate the ship is, therefore, a circumstance not without weight, as an indication that the intention of the parties was to vest in the charterer the ownership of the vessel for the voyage. It is not conclusive upon the question of intention, however. That intention is to be inferred, not from a single clause of the instrument or a single fact in the case, but from the whole tenor of the charter-party throughout, construed in the light of all the facts proved, which may be admissible as explaining the intent and meaning of the contract. The Volunteer, [Case No. 16,991;] Certain Logs of Mahogany, [Id. 2,559.]

The question upon the point now under discussion may, therefore, be stated thus: Does this charter-party, read connectedly and as a whole, and with a proper reference to the circumstances under which it was executed, so clearly show an intent to vest in the charterer the ownership for the voyage, that the presumption of law in favor of the continuance of the general ownership is overcome? I think it clear that this question must be answered in the negative. The charter-party, as already noticed, sounds wholly in covenant. It describes Graves, the claimant, as "owner," and Quayle, the charterer, as "merchant and freighter." It identifies the vessel in part by the words "whereof Wilson is master;" Wilson being the master appointed by Graves before the chartering, and being, as is shown, in fact continued in that appointment until the day before the vessel sailed, when, in consequence of his sickness, a substitute was placed in command. The instrument contains agreements on the part of the owner that the vessel is tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage; that she shall take on board a cargo to be furnished by the charterer, not exceeding what she can carry over and above her cabin and necessary room for her crew, water, tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture; that the privilege of putting on board steerage passengers shall belong solely to the charterer, the entire of the between decks, if required, being reserved for such passengers; and that if the ship shall be unable to carry cargo and passengers to the stipulated amount, there shall be a proportionate reduction in the hire of the vessel. And on the part of the charterer it is agreed that he shall furnish such a cargo as is contemplated; that he shall pay freight, £485, and demurrage, if more than twelve days are occupied in loading; and that the between-decks shall be calked, &c., at his expense. These provisions clearly indicate, upon the whole, the intention of the parties to retain in the owner the general ownership of the vessel, and to secure to the charterer only rights in the nature of affreightment. This construction is also confirmed by the conduct of the parties under the agreement. The facts are far from countervailing the presumption that no change of ownership was made. The remaining questions in the case are, therefore, to be considered on the basis of the general owner remaining owner for the voyage.

Ships carrying passengers on hire stand on the same footing of responsibility, in that respect, with those carrying merchandise on freight,—passage-money and freight being, in legal acceptance, equivalents. The liability of the vessel in specie, upon a contract of affreightment, is not varied by the circumstance that the contemplated subjects of transportation are passengers, instead of merchandise. A passage contract is, in respect to the vessel's liability, only a species of affreightment, in which the passengers constitute the cargo, and the passage-money answers to the freight. This principle was fully discussed in the late case of The Zenobia, [Case No. 18,209,] in this court, in which the views of the court, upon this subject, were stated at large. The vessel is also liable in rem for merchandise laden on board by the charterers, (The Rebecca, [Id. 11,619;] Abb. Shipp. 47, 52,*) as well as upon contracts by the master or the agents of the owners in relation thereto. She is therefore liable in rem upon a contract to carry passengers, equally whether that contract is made with a charterer, or with the master or owners, when the charter-party does not operate to render the charterer owner for the voyage; because, in that case, the charterer acts in the capacity of agent of the owner. She is liable for the conduct of the master as master during the voyage; and for any ill treatment of the passengers by the master, in his capacity as such, a remedy may be had against the vessel herself. She may, indeed, not be liable for mere acts of personal malice or ill-will on the part of the master, not arising out of or connected with the exercise of his duties as master, though for such acts there is clearly a personal remedy against the master himself. Chamberlain v. Chandler, [Case No. 2,575.] If, therefore, it were made to appear that the treatment complained of in this case was prompted by personal malice and ill-will on the part of the master,—if the withholding of provisions and water had been a tortious act on the part of the master, springing from personal spite and vindictiveness, and disconnected from any such circumstance, as a general lack of provisions on board, for which the owners might be responsible,—there would be ground for doubt whether the libellant was entitled to any other remedy than an action in personam against the master himself. But such conduct on the part of the master is not to be presumed. In this case, the answer does not aver that the ship had sufficient supplies; and there being no proof of that fact, the implication is, that she did not have them to serve out.

It was contended, on behalf of the claimant, that the contract to furnish provisions was not a maritime contract, but a mere matter of personal agreement, independent of the contract for passage, and that it therefore could not be enforced against the ship. There may, undoubtedly, be a contract for passage, in which the passenger undertakes to carry his own store of provisions. Where, however, the contract is not of this description, but the maintenance of the passenger, during the voyage, is undertaken, as well as the transportation of his person, the ship is as much bound to supply wholesome and necessary provision and water, as to provide safe shelter and lodging. There is no ground laid in the case for vindictive or punitive damages against the owner or ship. The agents of the owner pro hac vice, did not fulfil the implied obligation of the ship, and thus relieve her from performing it in this respect, and for that cause there was no ground for compelling the libellants to pay passage-money; and the libellants having paid it, are, because of such violation of the obligation by the ship, entitled to recover it back, the consideration on which it was advanced having failed.

Decree accordingly, with costs.

2. The vessel, as well as her owner, is responsible for a breach of a contract with a passenger in respect to his passage, and for the damage resulting therefrom.

[Approved in The Pacific, Case No. 10,643. Cited in Marshall v. Bazin, Id. 9,125; The City of Brussels, Id. 2,745.]

In admiralty. Peter McDonald and others filed a libel in rem, in the district court, against the ship Aberfoyle, alleging that they were not furnished with provisions and water on their passage from Liverpool to New York in that vessel, as they should have been according to the terms of a contract entered into by them with the agent of the owner. After a decree by the court below in favor of the libellants, [The Aberfoyle, Case No. 16,] the claimant appealed to this court. [Affirmed.]

Richard S. Emmet, for appellant.
William M. Allen, for respondents.

THE COURT held that a vessel carrying passengers for hire stands on the same footing of responsibility as one carrying merchandise, the passage money in the former case being the equivalent for the freight in the latter; that the vessel, as well as her owner, is responsible for a breach of a contract with a passenger in respect to his passage and for the damage resulting therefrom; that the owner is clearly liable; and that, in analogy to the principles which make the vessel liable for a breach of a contract of affreightment of merchandise, she should also be held liable for a breach of a passenger contract.

Decree affirmed.

CUSTOMS LAWS—PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The fourth section of the act of 1820, c. 122, [3 Stat. 604,] referring to the act of 1818, [Story's Laws, c. 65; 3 Stat. 433, c. 70,] and that referring again to the revenue acts of the United States, as to the mode of suing for, and recovering, penalties and forfeitures &c., does not, by implication, adopt the seventy-first section of the collection act of 1799, [Bioren & D. Laws, c. 128; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22,] as to the onus probandi being thrown on the claimant, on seizures under the act.

In admiralty. Information or libel of seizure for importing into Boston, from the province of New Brunswick, certain coal, which was not truly goods or merchandise of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said province, contrary to the act of 15 May, 1820, c. 122, § 3, [3 Stat. 604.] At the trial, the principal inquiry was, whether the coal was the produce of the province of New Brunswick; and the evidence on both sides was so contradictory, that the question, on whom the burden of proof rested, became the turning point of the cause.

Blake, for the United States, contended, that the burden of proof rested on the claimant, the act of 1820, c. 122, having in effect adopted the provision of act 1799, § 71, [Bioren & D. Laws, c. 128; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22.]

Bliss, for the claimant, argued e contra, that the act of 1820, did not, by its reference, adopt the seventy-first section of the act of 1799, and therefore the cause must be decided by the general principles of the law of evidence.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The evidence in this case is so very uncertain, and in some respects so contradictory, that the question, whether the burthen of proof rests on the claimant to establish the origin of the coal, becomes in fact the turning point of the cause. The seventy-first section of the collection act of second of March, 1799, [Bioren & D. Laws, c. 128; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22,] declares that "in actions, suits, or informations to be brought, where any seizure shall be made pursuant to this act, if the property be claimed by any person, in every such case the onus probandi shall be upon such claimant; but the onus probandi shall lie on the claimant, only where probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court before whom the prosecution is had." The act of 15th of May, 1820, c. 122, [3 Stat. 604,] under which the present prosecution is instituted, declares, "that all penalties and forfeitures, incurred under this act, shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, and the same may be mitigated, or remitted, in the manner and according to the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary." The act referred to is the act of 18th of April, 1818, [Story's Laws, c. 65; 3 Stat. 433, c. 70, § 4,] which declares, "that penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, and may be mitigated or remitted, in the manner and according to the provisions of the revenue laws of the United States." The act of 1799, c. 128, is certainly a revenue act within the meaning of this clause; and no one denies, that here there was probable cause of seizure; and therefore the true question, arising on the act of 1820, is, whether it adopts, by reference and intentment, the provision of the seventy-first section of the act of 1799, c. 128. If there were no other provisions in this act applicable to the subject matter, it might be difficult to satisfy the exigency of the language in any other manner. But the eighty-ninth section of the act of 1799 provides, in the fullest manner, for the mode of suing for, and recovering, penalties and forfeitures under the act; and, in like manner, the 91st section provides for the distribution of, and accounting for, such penalties and forfeitures. The act of 1797 [Bioren & D. c. 67; 1 Stat. 506, c. 13] provides for the mode of remitting and mitigating such penalties and forfeitures. So that, independently of the 71st section of the act of 1799, the references in the acts of 1818 and 1820 are completely satisfied in their terms, viz., as to the mode of suing for, recovering, distributing, accounting for, mitigating, and remitting penalties and forfeitures.

After bestowing considerable attention to the subject, my mind has at last arrived at the conclusion, that under such circumstances the 71st section ought not to be construed to be adopted by implication. The mode of suing for and recovering penalties and forfeitures does not necessarily include any rules as to the adoption or rejection of evidence, or as to the onus probandi. There is some hardship in extending a rule of this nature beyond the general principles, on which the law of evidence is founded. It may, nay it often must, have the effect of superinducing a forfeiture. The present case exemplifies the justice of this remark. Feeling, therefore, a strong impression, that the court ought not to change the rules of evidence, as to the burthen of proof, without a clear expression of the legislative intention, and perceiving in the present case no such expression, I believe, that my duty is best performed by adhering to the doctrine of the common law. I shall therefore acquit the property seized, upon the ground, that the onus probandi is on the government, and that the evidence leaves the point of the origin of the coal in a state too uncertain and equivocal to found any decree of condemnation.

ABORN et al. v. MASON.

[14 Blatchf. 405.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 23, 1878.

BAILMENT—RIGHTS OF THE BAILOR—CONVERSION BY BAILEE—TENDER—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

A. delivered wool and yarn to O., to be made into cloth, at a specified cost, to be paid by A. The wool and yarn and the goods were to be continuously the property of A. O. began the manufacture of goods from the materials. Thereafter, the property came into the possession of M., as the assignee in bankruptcy of O. At that time, it was in the condition of dyed wool, mixed with shoddy, and woollen yarns in the various stages of manufacture into cloth, and was of small market value, and not salable. A. demanded from M. the specific wool and yarn delivered to O., and the yarns in process of manufacture, and offered to pay all charges on them, if informed of the amount. M. completed the manufacture of the goods, and expended $300 in finishing them, and sold them for $3,193 50. A. sued M. in trover, for the conversion of the wool and yarns and goods: Held, that it was not necessary for A. to prove an actual tender of an amount sufficient to cover the value of the work and materials supplied by O., but that the offer made to pay the charges was sufficient. Held, also, that A. was entitled to recover the avails of the goods, less the cost of the materials furnished by O. and by M., and the expense of manufacture.

[At law. Action of trover and conversion by Robert W. Aborn and others against John W. Mason, assignee in bankruptcy of Louis H. Oberhofer. Heard on motion for new trial. Motion denied.]

Michael W. Divine and Aaron P. Whitehead, for plaintiffs.

John E. Parsons, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. On or about May 6th, 1871, the plaintiffs were the owners of a quantity of superfine wool and of inferior wool and of double and twist yarn upon spools, of the value of $1,737 69, and delivered the same to Louis H. Oberhofer, a woollen manufacturer of Canterbury, Connecticut, to be manufactured by him into cassimeres, at an estimated cost of twenty-one cents per yard, to be paid by the plaintiffs. The wool and the yarn, and the goods which were to be manufactured therefrom, were to be continuously the property of the plaintiffs. It was supposed that this wool would make about 5,000 yards of cloth. Oberhofer received the materials in his factory, and commenced the manufacture of goods therefrom. About May 25th, 1871, all the property in the possession of Oberhofer was attached and remained under attachment, or in the possession of the United States marshal, by virtue of a warrant in bankruptcy, until about August 31st, 1871, when the property came into the possession of the defendant, who had been theretofore duly appointed assignee in bankruptcy of Oberhofer's estate. On this date, there was upon the premises neither wool in bags nor cotton yarn upon spools, but the goods which had been sent by the plaintiffs were upon the machinery of the factory, in the form of dyed wool mixed with shoddy, or of woolen yarns in the various stages of manufacture into cloth. The market value of this woolen yarn and wool in process of manufacture was small, as the materials were in such a condition that they were not salable. The assignee estimated, that the unfinished goods were not worth over $100, and would scarcely bring that sum, if he should attempt to sell them in their unfinished state. Another witness estimated the value at from $300 to $500. A few days after September 14th, 1871, the assignee obtained authority from the district court to complete the manufacture of these goods by the purchase of the necessary additional material, and the employment of the necessary labor. On September 15th, 1871, the plaintiffs made a written demand upon the defendant for the delivery to them of the specific bales of wool and spools of cotton yarn which they had delivered to Oberhofer, and offered to pay all charges, expenses and liens which the bankrupt, or the defendant, as assignee, had upon said merchandise, and, as they were ignorant of the amount of such charges and liens, asked to be informed of the amount, that they might tender and pay it. There was also some testimony to the effect that, at the same time, one of the plaintiffs verbally informed the defendant of the fact that the wool and yarn were in process of manufacture, and notified him that they were seeking not only the wool existing in specie, but wool and yarns in process of manufacture. Testimony was also given by the defendant, to show that the plaintiffs were insisting, until the commencement of the suit, that their wool was in the factory in its original form, and was easily distinguishable. The defendant did not comply with the demand, but completed the manufacture of the unfinished goods, at an expense of $800. The goods were finished about the middle of October, 1871. All the goods which were thus manufactured, and the goods which Oberhofer had finished from other wool, were sold for the defendant, who received the sum of $3,193 50, therefor.

The plaintiffs brought an action of trover, on December 9th, 1871, against the defendant, for the conversion of the wool and cotton yarns which they had delivered to Oberhofer. The declaration was subsequently amended, so as to allege the conversion of "certain yarns, and goods made from said wools and said double and twist yarn, one or both." Upon the trial of the case to the jury, they were instructed, that, the property having come rightfully into the possession of the assignee, the demand upon him should have been in such terms as to apprise him of what he was claimed to be wrongfully detaining from the plaintiffs, and he should have been informed in such manner as to enable him to understand the kind of property which was demanded; and that, if the written demand was the only demand which was made, or notice which was given to the assignee, the plaintiffs could not recover. The jury were also instructed, that if, in addition to the written demand, the assignee was informed by the plaintiffs, that they were seeking to obtain from him, and that they demanded of him, the woolen yarns and wool, in the various stages of manufacture, which Oberhofer had been manufacturing for them under his contract, then, if the assignee, after such notice and demand, completed the manufacture, and sold the manufactured goods, he would be liable, provided such goods were made from their yarn.

Two questions of fact were submitted to the jury: 1st. Was such a demand made by the plaintiffs? 2d. Were the goods which were in process of manufacture in the mill of Oberhofer, at the time of the appointment of the assignee, the property of the plaintiffs? If both these questions of fact were found for the plaintiffs, the jury were instructed, upon the question of damages, that the circumstances of the case were peculiar, and that, in the ascertainment of damages, they should deduct from the avails of the manufactured goods the entire cost of the materials furnished by the assignee or by Oberhofer, and the expense and cost of manufacture. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, for $2,367 49.

Upon a motion for a new trial, the defendants insist, (1.) that the demand of the plaintiffs was limited to wool and cotton yarn; and that, upon such a demand, the defendant, having come rightfully into the possession of the property, cannot be found to be a wrong-doer, for a conversion of property which did not correspond with the demand, and which he did not know was claimed by the plaintiffs. The jury were instructed in accordance with the principle of law which is claimed by the defendant, but they found, as matter of fact, that the plaintiffs verbally demanded of the defendant woolen yarns which were in process of manufacture. The jury evidently believed that the defendant was apprised by the plaintiffs of the exact property which they claimed he was wrongfully detaining from them.

(2.) It is claimed, that, for the value of the work and materials which were supplied by Oberhofer, the defendant, as his assignee, had a lien, at the time of the demand, upon the property of the plaintiffs; that it was incumbent upon them to make an actual tender of an amount sufficient to cover this lien; and that an offer to pay, or a readiness to pay, did not comply with the necessity of an actual tender of money. Oberhofer had agreed with the plaintiffs to manufacture their wool into cassimeres.

They had agreed to pay him a stipulated price for the labor and the materials which he should furnish. His duty was to deliver the manufactured goods, and their duty was to pay the price of manufacture. These obligations were mutual and concurrent. The payment of the cost of manufacture, and the delivery of the goods, were concomitant acts. In the case of mutual and concurrent promises, "the word 'tender,' as used in such a connection, does not mean the same kind of offer as when it is used with reference to the payment or offer to pay an ordinary debt due in money, where the money is offered to a creditor who is entitled to receive it, and nothing further remains to be done, but the transaction is completed and ended; but it only means a readiness and willingness, accompanied with an ability on the part of one of the parties, to do the acts which the agreement requires him to perform, provided the other will concurrently do the things which he is required by it to do, and a notice by the former to the latter of such readiness. Such readiness, ability and notice are sufficient evidence of, and indeed constitute and imply, an offer or tender, in the sense in which those terms are used in reference to the kind of agreements which we are now considering." Smith v. Lewis, 26 Conn. 110; Adams v. Clark, 9 Cush. 215; Tate v. Meek, 8 Taunt. 280.

The defendant next insists, that the liability of the defendant was limited to the value of the property in its condition at the time of the conversion, and that the uncontradicted testimony showed that such value did not exceed $500. The general rule of the common law, in regard to title by accession, is, that whatever alteration of form has taken place in personal property, the owner is entitled to such property in its state of improvement, unless the identity of the original materials has been destroyed, or unless the thing has been annexed to and made part of some other thing which is the principal, or its nature has been changed from personal to real property; "but, if the thing itself, by such operation, was changed into a different species, as by making wine, oil, or bread out of another's grapes, olives or wheat, it belonged to the new operator, who was only to make satisfaction to the former proprietor for the materials which he had so converted." 2 Bl. Comm. 404; 2 Kent, Comm. 364; Silsbury v. McCoon, 6 Hill, 425; Woodruff & Beach Iron Works v. Adams, 37 Conn. 233.

In this case, the property, at the time of the conversion, consisted of woolen yarn and wool in the various stages of manufacture into cloth. The property was, in fact, unfinished woolen cassimeres, and was described to be such by the assignee, in his testimony before the district court, upon his application for leave to complete the manufacture. By the labor and materials which were furnished, unfinished goods became finished. The species of the property was not changed, and the identity of the materials, as they existed at the time of the conversion, was not lost.

It has frequently been held, that the person whose property has been tortiously taken, is entitled to the enhanced value, until it has been so changed as to alter the title, or to destroy the identity of the property. Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 348; Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168; Brown v. Sax, 7 Cow. 95; Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 505. But courts have not been satisfied with a rigid rule, which would invariably permit a plaintiff to recover the enhanced value, without any deduction for the labor and expenses which, in the absence of fraud, have been bestowed upon such property by the defendant, and have not enforced the rule to its full extent. Wood v. Morewood, 3 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 440; Hilton v. Woods, L. R., 4 Eq. 433; Benjamin v. Benjamin, 15 Conn. 347; Silsbury v. McCoon, 4 Denio, 332. Instances can easily be imagined where a rigid enforcement of the rule would work hardship; and, in this case, the plaintiffs did not ask the court to charge that they were entitled to the enhanced value of the manufactured goods, without reference to the expenses of manufacture.

The rule which was given to the jury was adopted in the case of Morgan v. Powell, 3 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 278, an action of trespass for digging coals in the plaintiff's mine. The court determined that the value of the plaintiff's coals was the sale price at the pit's mouth, after deducting the expenses of carrying the coals from the place in the mine where they were dug, to the mouth. Under the circumstances of this case, the allowance for the defendant's labor and expenses was eminently just. Wool had been delivered to be manufactured into cloth. It was in a partial state of manufacture when the assignee took possession, labor, skill and materials having been expended upon it by the bankrupt. At this time the materials were in such a condition that they had very little salable value; and, in order to make the property a merchantable article of value, more materials must be purchased, labor must be employed, and time must be expended. The deduction is fully justified by the decisions which have been cited. The motion for a new trial is denied.

BANKRUPTCY—PRESENTATION OF PETITION—

BETTS, District Judge. The court decided that a petition need not be presented to the court simultaneously with its attestation; and its being sworn to, nine days before presented, afforded no bar to it. The decree of bankruptcy retroacts to the time of the application, and if property is acquired by a bankrupt, intermediate the verification and offering of his petition, it would pass to the assignee. That written objections to the sufficiency of the papers, with others to the merits, will not authorize a delay of reference to a commissioner, upon those involving an inquiry into facts, unless there is a plain probable cause for making the legal points. The court will be careful that such a method of procedure, shall not avail to purposes of procrastination merely. The court accordingly refused granting an order now to refer the objections to a commissioner, because of the long delay and laches of the creditors in not pursuing them, and the case being regularly on the docket for a final order, directed a decree of bankruptcy to be entered.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—REVENUE LAWS—ACT
MARCH 2, 1833.

1. Where a defendant sued in a state court, applied to this court by petition, praying for the removal of the suit to this court, under the 3d section of the act of March 2d, 1833, (4 Stat. 633,) on the ground that the suit was for acts done by him under the revenue laws of the United States, and obtained a certiorari from this court to the state court, to certify the proceedings on file in that court, and the clerk of the state court returned that there were no proceedings on file in his office in the suit, and the defendant's attorney then entered a rule in this court for the plaintiff to declare in twenty days, and notice of the rule was served on the plaintiff's attorneys, who admitted service of it, but failed to declare, and a judgment as in case of nonsuit was then entered against the plaintiff: Held, that such judgment was regular.

2. The admission by the plaintiff's attorney, of service of the rule to declare, waived any informality attending the removal of the cause to this court.

3. All that the statute requires is, that it shall appear, from the petition, that the defendant was sued on account of acts done by him under the revenue laws of the United States. It does not require a statement of the cause of action or the kind of process.

4. The writs of certiorari and habeas corpus provided for by the statute are neither of them required for the removal of the cause to this court.

[See note at end of case.]

[5. Cited in Fisk v. Union Pac. R. Co., Case No. 4,827, to the proposition that the writ of certiorari is merely a mode of notifying the state court, and that, in the absence of certified copies of the proceedings from the state court, the same may be supplied by affidavit.]

[At law. On motion to set aside the judgment. Denied.]

This was an action against the collector of the port of New York. It was originally commenced in the superior court of the city of New York. On the 10th of April, 1858, the defendant presented a petition to this court, which was filed with the clerk, setting forth that he was, prior to the commencement of the suit, collector of the customs for the port and district of New York, that a suit had been commenced against him by the plaintiffs in the superior court of the city of New York, for and on account of acts done by him under the revenue laws of the United States, and as such collector, and that no trial had been had in the cause, and praying that, in pursuance of the 3d section of the act of congress of March 2d, 1833, (4 Stat. 633,) the suit might be removed from the superior court, and be entered on the docket of this court, and be thereafter proceeded with as a cause originally commenced in this court. The petition was duly verified by the defendant, by affidavit, and was duly certified to by an attorney and counsellor, as required by said act, and the suit was thereupon entered on the docket of this court. On the 19th of June, 1858, a rule was entered by the defendant, in the common rule book, in the office of the clerk of this court, requiring the plaintiffs to declare within twenty days after service of notice of such rule, or be non-prossed. On the same day, a written notice of the entry of such rule was served on the attorneys for the plaintiffs, and they admitted in writing service of such notice. The plaintiffs not having declared, the defendant entered a judgment as in case of nonsuit against the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs now moved to set aside such judgment for irregularity.

Welcome R. Beebe, for plaintiffs.
James F. Dwight, Asst. Dist. Atty, for defendant.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. The power to remove into this court a suit which has been commenced in a state court, against any officer of the United States, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority or title set up or claimed by such officer, under such laws, is contained in the 3d section of the act of congress of March 2, 1833, (4 Stat. 633.) That section provides as follows: "That, in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any state, against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority or title set up or claimed by such officer, or other person, under any such law of the United States, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit or prosecution, at any time before trial, upon a petition to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant shall have been served with process, setting forth the nature of said suit or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, together with a certificate, signed by an attorney or counsellor at law of some court of record of the state in which such suit shall have been commenced, or of the United States, setting forth, that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and has carefully inquired into all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true, which petition, affidavit and certificate shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, and, if not, to the clerk thereof, at his office, and shall be filed in said office, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of said court, if the suit were commenced in the court below by summons, to issue a writ of certiorari to the state court, requiring said court to send to the said circuit court the record and proceedings in said cause; or, if it were commenced by capias, he shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, a duplicate of which said writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the state court, or left at his office, by the marshal of the district or his deputy, or some person duly authorized thereto; and, thereupon, it shall be the duty of the said state court to stay all further proceedings in such cause, and the said suit or prosecution, upon delivery of such process, or leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial or judgment therein, in the state court, shall be wholly null and void. And, if the defendant in any such suit be in actual custody on mesne process therein, it shall be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus cum causa, to take the body of the defendant into his custody, to be dealt with in the said cause according to the rules of law, and the order of the circuit court, or of any judge thereof in vacation. And all attachments made, and all bail and other security given upon such suit or prosecution, shall be and continue in like force and effect as if the same suit or prosecution had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the state court. And if, upon the removal of any such suit or prosecution, it shall be made to appear to the said circuit court, that no copy of the record and proceedings therein, in the state court, can be obtained, it shall be lawful for said circuit court to allow and require the plaintiff to proceed de novo and to file a declaration of his cause of action, and the parties may thereupon proceed as in actions originally brought in said circuit court, and, on failure of so proceeding, judgment of non pros. may be rendered against the plaintiff, with costs for the defendant."

The act of congress provides that the petition for the removal of a suit commenced in a state court, shall be to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant shall have been served with process. It is now urged by the plaintiffs, that the suit was not lawfully removed to this court, for the reason that it nowhere appears in the petition of the defendant where he was served with process; and that, for aught that appears, he might have been served with process somewhere in the northern district of New York, in which case the petition should be to the circuit court of the United States in and for that district. It would not be a very violent presumption, to presume that the process for a suit in the superior court of the city of New York, was served in the district where the defendant dwelt, which is in the southern district of New York. But it is not necessary to dispose of this technical question by a resort to any such presumption; for, by the course which the plaintiffs have adopted in reference to this suit, since it was entered on the docket of this court, to be proceeded with as a cause originally commenced in this court, they have waived this technical question, even if they could once have taken advantage of it. The attorneys for the plaintiffs, by the written admission which they gave, of service of notice of the entry of the rule to declare, admitted the cause to be regularly in this court. They treated it as having been regularly removed. They waived any informality attending its removal. It is now too late for them to urge the informality upon which they rely. If they had wished to rely upon the informality which they now present, they should have brought it to the attention of the court, before, by their act, they admitted the cause to be regularly in this court.

It is claimed, also, that it should appear, from the petition for a removal, what the particular cause of action was. All that is required by the law is, that it should appear, from the petition, that the defendant was sued for and on account of acts done by him under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof. This expressly appears by the petition. It is also claimed, that the particular kind of writ or process should be stated. This the law does not require.

The cause can be removed from the state court without the aid of the certiorari or the habeas corpus mentioned in the act. Neither of them is required to remove the cause. They are issued by the clerk, and are intended to bring up the record and other proceedings from the state court, and to notify the state court that the cause has been removed, so that no further proceedings may be had in the state court. The cause is first removed, and then, after it has been removed, the certiorari or the habeas corpus issues, for the above-named purposes.

In the present case, after the cause had been removed, the certiorari was issued by the clerk of this court. To it the clerk of the superior court made a return, that there were no proceedings on file in the cause in his office. It then became the duty of this court to require the plaintiffs to proceed de novo, and to file a declaration of their cause of action; and thereupon the law made it the duty of the parties to proceed as in actions originally brought in this court. In actions originally brought in this court, it is the duty of the plaintiffs to file their declaration in pursuance of the rules. In this case, the plaintiffs were required to file their declaration in pursuance of the rules. For failing to file their declaration, a judgment as in case of nonsuit was entered.

It is insisted by the plaintiffs, that the certiorari should be served on the clerk of the superior court by leaving with him a duplicate of the same, and that a service by copy will not answer the requirements of the law. By the return of the marshal it appears that the certiorari was served on the clerk of the superior court by leaving with him a duplicate of the same.

With this view of the subject, the motion to set aside the judgment must be denied.

[NOTE. The recent case of State v. Sullivan, 50 Fed. Rep. 593, gave rise to a conflict of opinion and jurisdiction between the circuit court for the western district of North Carolina and the supreme court of the state as to the construction of the statute providing for the removal of prosecutions against revenue officers. Rev. St. § 643. The petition in this case was duly verified by oath, and by the certificate of counsel, as required by the act. The circuit court was not in session, and the petition was presented to the deputy clerk of that court, who filed it in his office, and thereupon entered the case on the docket. The defendant not being in custody, no writ of habeas corpus cum causa was issued, but the deputy issued a writ of certiorari, which was directed, not to the state court or any officer thereof, but to the United States marshal, commanding him to make known the facts recited. The marshal served the writ by leaving with the clerk of the state court a duplicate copy. The state court, however, refused to surrender jurisdiction, and, against the defendant's protest and exception, a trial was had, and he was convicted. He thereupon took an appeal to the state supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed, (14 S. B. Rep. 796;) that court holding that the proper writ for the case was habeas corpus cum causa, and that the state court was not bound to take notice of the writ actually issued and served; that the law required the clerk to approve the petition before filing it, and that this act was judicial, and not ministerial, in its nature, and therefore must be performed by the clerk himself, and not by his deputy; that the fact of the clerk's approval, as well as the fact that the petition had been filed and the cause entered on the docket, must appear on the face of the writ issued to the state court; that the writ must state in substance the ground of the authority of the federal court; and that because of these omissions the writ in this case was void, and did not deprive the state court of jurisdiction. Thereafter a motion was made in the federal court to proceed with the trial, and on the question of jurisdiction two opinions were delivered by Dick, J., one before and one after the opinion of the state supreme court was called to his attention. In these opinions he held substantially the contrary of all the propositions maintained in the state court, basing his decision on the proposition that the removal is effected, and complete jurisdiction acquired, immediately upon the filing of a proper petition in the clerk's office of the federal court, and that the subsequent issuance of the writ of certiorari or habeas corpus cum causa is but the use of auxiliary process and the performance of a ministerial duty, and concluding therefrom that any defects in the writ were mere irregularities, which should have been disregarded by the state court.]

stipulation for her appraised value. Held, that the marshal was not entitled to a commission on such appraised value under section 829 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty.

J. E. Kennedy, for marshal.
E. L. Owen, for claimant.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is an appeal from taxation of the marshal's costs. The suit was for damages caused by violation of charter party, and the amount of damages claimed was \$25,000. The vessel was seized by the marshal under the monition and has been released on stipulation for her value being appraised at \$3,000. The marshal claims that he is entitled to a commission on the valuation of the vessel under Rev. St. § 829, which gives the marshal "when the debt or claim in admiralty is settled by the parties without a sale of the property," a commission of one per cent on the first five hundred dollars of the claim or decree, and one-half of one per cent on "the excess of any sum thereof over \$500.00," "provided that when the value of the property is less than the claim, such commission shall be allowed only on the appraised value thereof." It is urged on behalf of the marshal that the design of the statute was to give the marshal a commission for his responsibility in attaching and holding the property, in all cases where there is a sale $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the first \$500, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on the excess, as expressly provided in another part of the fee bill, and in all other cases, that is, where the parties make such disposition of the case that there is or can be no sale by him, one per cent on the first \$500, and one-half of one per cent on the excess. It is argued that the marshal's compensation cannot have been intended to be dependent on the result of the suit; that this would be against public policy, committing the marshal in all cases to the interest of the libellant, and this argument is urged as a reason for the construction contended for. But I think it is clear that what the statute had in view was a final disposition of the cause by agreement of the parties, whereby the suit should be withdrawn or a decree entered without a sale of the property, and does not refer to a case where the vessel is bonded by the claimant without any settlement of the debt or claim. The words of the statute cannot even by a forced construction have the meaning claimed for them in behalf of the marshal. Nor is there any force in the supposed reason of public policy urged in support of his claim. Whatever mischiefs may arise, from having the marshal interested in the result of suits in admiralty, undoubtedly exist under the fee bill as it is, independently of this particular provision. If the marshal attaches a vessel and holds her in custody till the cause is heard, as he may do and often does, and the libel is dismissed, the marshal has no commission under the fee bill. This consideration of public policy, therefore, cannot have been regarded as one so controlling that the language of the fee bill must be forced to conform to it. It was thought, however, reasonable in providing for the marshal's fees to secure him some comparatively small commission where the parties, by agreement, settle the claim without proceeding to a sale. There is nothing to show that the design was to extend this provision beyond the case thus clearly provided for. If it be true that the risk and responsibility of the marshal is the same, where the vessel is bonded and the suit goes on, as where the claim is settled by the parties and the vessel released, it is true, also, that he has the same or greater risk and responsibility when the vessel is attached and held during the whole pendency of the suit, and the libel is finally dismissed, yet he has no commission. Fee bills are not arranged on a system of giving in every possible case an exact equivalent for service rendered. They are in their adjustment of fees extremely artificial, but designed, in the long run, to give the officer a fair compensation. In this case the marshal may hereafter become entitled to his commission if the claim is ever settled or a decree entered, but till that time he is entitled to nothing. The City of Washington, [Case No. 2,772.]

Taxation affirmed.

[NOTE. In The Norma, Case No. 1,626, the district court for Louisiana held that, where a settlement is made before a final or interlocutory decree is rendered, the marshal is not entitled to his commissions. This case was, however, denied by the same court in The Clintonia, 11 Fed. Rep. 740, by holding that the marshal is entitled to his commissions, although the property was released on stipulation, the claim compromised, and suit withdrawn, before a final decree was rendered. the services were rendered. The warrant of arrest was issued and placed in the hands of the late Marshal Fitch, after his term of office had expired. The vessel, however, was arrested by him, and the owners thereupon gave the stipulation required by the rules to pay any decree that might be rendered against her, and she was thereupon released.

Exceptions were filed to the libel upon the following grounds: (1) That the vessel had never been legally seized, and the stipulation was therefore void. (2) That the service set up in the libel was not maritime in its nature.

Willey & Carey, for libellant.
C. W. Palmer, for claimant.

WILLSON, District Judge. It is too late now to move the dismissal of the libel. The giving of a voluntary bond by the owner is a waiver of any defect in the service of the process. He should have moved the discharge of the vessel before giving the bond. For the purpose of hearing motions the court is always open. The averments in the libel are sufficient, and the service is maritime.

Exceptions overruled.

SHIPPING—AFFREIGHTMENT—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. 2. Nor could the broker, if he acted simply as agent, in making the contract, maintain such action in his own name.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court by Francis D. Fowler and another, against the ship A. Cheesebrough, to recover damages for the breach of a contract of affreightment. After a decree in that court dismissing the libel, the libellants appealed to this court. [Affirmed.]

Charles Donohue, for claimant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libel in this case was filed for a breach of a contract of affreightment of a quantity of lumber, from New York to San Francisco, in the fall of 1852; and seeks to recover the difference between the price contracted for with the owner of the ship, and the price the libellants were obliged to pay to another vessel for the transportation, after the master of the A. Cheesebrough had refused to receive the cargo. The contract price was $33 per thousand feet, superficial measure. The price paid to the owner of the other vessel was $50 per thousand—freight, in the mean time, having risen greatly, for the transportation of lumber to San Francisco, in consequence of the great fire at the city of Sacramento. The court below dismissed the libel, on the ground that the libellants had no interest in the suit, or in the subject matter in controversy. The libellants' firm was engaged in the commission and brokerage business connected with ships and shipping, and acted as agents of Ford, the owner of the lumber, in making the contract of affreightment with the agent of the A. Cheesebrough. They had no interest, therefore, in the subject matter of the suit, according to this view, and it should have been brought in the name of Ford, the principal.

It is insisted, however, that the contract was made in their names; that this is averred in the libel, and is not denied in the answer; and that the suit may, therefore, be maintained in their names, for the benefit of their principal. Admitting this to be so, still, I think, it would not help the libellants. They refused to ship the lumber in their own names, and be responsible for the freight; but insisted that it should be shipped in the name of Ford, the owner. This was one of the grounds of dispute between the parties, and one which arose early, as testified to by a witness for the libellants, and arose, also, in connection with the objection that the lumber was of an inferior quality, and might not be a sufficient security for the freight. It was supposed, on the argument, that this was not one of the objections to the receiving of the lumber on board of the ship, in the correspondence that took place between the parties, and in which each sought to put the other in fault. But I think this is a mistake. The shipment in the names of the libellants was there insisted upon, as well as the inferiority of the article.

The position of the libellants is somewhat singular. They insist, that the contract was in their own names, and not as agents, for the purpose of maintaining the suit for an alleged breach of it; but that they had a right to ship the lumber in the name of their principal, and thus avoid any personal responsibility, as it respects the payment of the freight.

In either aspect of the case, I think that the decree of the court below is right. If they acted simply as agents, then they have no interest in the subject matter of the suit, and cannot maintain it. If the contract was made in their own names, and not as agents, then their refusal to ship in their own names, and their insisting upon the use of the name of Ford, their principal, furnishes a sufficient excuse for the conduct of the owner of the vessel. He had a right to reject the tender of the lumber at the ship's side. The decree of the court below is affirmed.

COLLISION — BETWEEN STEAMER AND VESSEL AT ANCHOR—SPEED OF STEAMER—LOOKOUT—NARROW PASSAGE.

1. The sloop Transport, owned by the libellant, [Samuel Acker,] was anchored in the night-time, near the mouth of Newark bay, and about one hundred and fifty yards from the Staten Island shore. The Rainbow, proceeding from Amboy to New York on a flood tide, with several barges in tow, came in collision with the sloop at about three o'clock, A. M., the 18th of Aug. 1850, and caused serious injuries to her. The evidence was conflicting as to the exact position of the sloop, and also as to the fact of her having a light suspended conspicuously, and burning at the time; although, on these points, the direct and positive evidence from the sloop must outweigh the negative evidence from the steamer. The master and pilot were in the wheel-house of the steamer, directing her navigation, and two men were on the deck, but no one was stationed forward as a look-out. The sky was clear above, and it was moonlight, but there was a haze or fog on the water, preventing the pilot of the steamer seeing the sloop until within about one hundred feet of her. He then endeavored to avoid her by stopping and backing his engine. The steamer was running about six knots by the land, close in to the right bank of the sound, and ported her helm to go inside of the sloop. Held, that the steamer was guilty of three faults in her navigation: First, in keeping up so great a speed in that narrow passage, as to be unable to stop and get out of the way of a vessel at anchor, when first in sight of her; second, by attempting to go inshore of her, there being a safe passage outside; and third, especially in running without a look-out stationed on the deck and forward part of the boat. Decree, that the steamer be condemned in the damages sustained by the sloop, and an order of reference to ascertain those damages.

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITIES—ADVANCES—
FRAUDULENT NATIONALITY.

1. Where a libel was filed against a vessel to recover advances made in a foreign port, on the request of her master, for the purpose of paying off a bottomry bond, and on the return of the process no owner appeared for her, but a mortgagee appeared, and, on his consent, the vessel was sold under a venditioni exponas, and the proceeds paid into court, and thereupon the mortgagee filed a claim and answer, not only joining issue with the allegations of the libel, but setting up his claim as mortgagee, and praying that his claim be paid out of the proceeds, which were insufficient to satisfy both claims.

2. And where, on the proofs, it appeared that the vessel, though nominally a British vessel and owned by a British subject, was really the property of American citizens residing in New York, who thus sailed her under false colors, and with a fraudulent nationality, and, while they were so using her, agreed with the respondent for a loan of the security on their personal obligation and a mortgage on the vessel, to be executed by the fictitious owner, and the latter accordingly executed to the respondent the mortgage under which alone he claimed the proceeds: Held, That the proceeding had been made one to effect the proper distribution of the proceeds of a vessel, already condemned and sold at the suit of the libellant, and it was, therefore, subject to the considerations which control courts of admiralty in the distribution of money in the registry.

6. The claim of the mortgagee, therefore, must be rejected, and as the facts were sufficient to sustain the libellant's claim against the fund, his claim, therefore, must be paid.

In admiralty. This was originally an ordinary suit in rem, brought to recover of the bark Acme the amount of certain advances made by the firm of M. A. Herrera & Co., of Havana. In the first instance, the libellants filed their libel against the vessel, upon which process was issued, under which the vessel was taken into custody by the marshal. Upon the return of the process, no owner appeared to defend, and default was entered against all persons, except George H. Millington, of Manchester, England, but residing in New York, who appeared by his proctor, and obtained time to file a claim and answer as mortgagee of the vessel. No stipulation for value was, however, given, but, on the contrary, by the consent of the mortgagee, upon the motion of the libellants, a venditioni exponas was then issued in the cause, directing the marshal to sell the vessel, and pay the proceeds into the registry, to abide the further order of the court. The vessel was accordingly sold, and thereupon Millington filed a claim, averring that he was entitled to the proceeds; and, on the same day, he also filed a pleading, designated as a claim and answer, in which he not only joined issue upon the averments of the libel of Herrera, but also set up his own claim to the proceeds as based upon an outstanding mortgage upon the vessel; insisting that by virtue of such mortgage he had a lien upon the vessel superior and prior to the claim of Herrera, and praying not only that the claim of Herrera be rejected, but also that his own claim be paid out of the proceeds of the vessel now in court. The facts in relation to Millington's mortgage were shown to be as follows. The bark Acme was built in Baltimore, Md., in 1855. At some time thereafter she was transferred—whether nominally or not did not appear—to one John Patterson, described as “of Inverness, Scotland, but now residing in the city of Brooklyn, state of New York.” In January, 1866, she, by purchase, became the property of persons residing and doing business in New York, who were not British subjects, and who, in the absence of other proof, the court held must be presumed to be American citizens. These persons, in order to avoid the navigation laws, and to retain for the vessel the British flag, to which, as the property of American citizens, she was no longer legally entitled, caused the title of the vessel to be placed in the name of one Henry James Creighton, described as “of Halifax, Nova Scotia, but now residing in the city of New York,” and who had, in fact, no interest in the vessel, nor any possession thereof; and thereafter, although in reality owned and possessed by American citizens, controlled by them alone, and used for their sole benefit, the vessel, up to her seizure by the marshal, sailed under false colors, with a fraudulent nationality. While so sailing, the present respondent agreed with the real American owners of the vessel to loan to them the sum of $12,000 on the security of their personal obligation, and a mortgage upon the vessel, to be executed by the fictitious owner, and, accordingly, in accordance with the forms of the British laws, Creighton then, without interest in or possession of the vessel, executed a mortgage upon her to secure the amount so loaned by Millington, which mortgage was received by Millington with the knowledge that the mortgagor did not own the vessel, but simply held the title for the purpose of giving to her a false nationality. Millington never had taken any possession of the vessel.

The proceeds of the vessel were not sufficient for the payment of the libellant's claim and the respondent's mortgage in full. [Decree for libellants. Affirmed in The Acme, Case No. 28.]

C. Donohue and Benedict & Benedict, for libellants.

C. M. Da Costa, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The mode of procedure here adopted has made this, in effect, the ordinary case of a controversy between two competing claimants of a fund in court. The position of the respondent before the court is not that of an ordinary claimant of a vessel, who prays no affirmative relief, and simply asks the release of his vessel from custody. Here the vessel has, by the consent of the respondent, been sold upon the demand of the libellants, by the order of the court, and by his claim and answer the respondent requires the court to determine at the same time the respective rights and priorities of these two competing claimants to the fund. I see no objections to this method of procedure, when consented to by a claimant. It gives to the claimant the advantage of protecting himself by the purchase of the vessel, and, at the same time, sheltering the proceeds, by means of the default entered in behalf of the libellants, from any other liens which may be outstanding; but, at the same time, it transforms the proceedings from an action against a vessel looking toward her condemnation and sale, to a proceeding to effect a proper distribution of the proceeds of a vessel already condemned and sold at the suit of the first libellant. As such, they are subject to the considerations which control courts of admiralty in the distribution of money in the registry. There is, then, before the court a fund insufficient to satisfy the two demands which are now presented and the court is called upon to determine the validity and priority of each of these demands as against the other. On the part of the mortgagee, while it is not denied that the libellants, Herrera & Co., made the advances for which they sue, and that they were made to relieve the necessities of the vessel in a foreign port, it is contended that the evidence shows that the advance was made upon the personal credit of the owners exclusively, and that, accordingly, no lien was created upon the vessel; which being the case, the fund, it is insisted, should be distributed in satisfaction of the mortgagee's claim. On the other hand, the libellants, Herrera & Co., insist that the credit of the vessel was relied on when they made their advances, and that they then acquired a valid lien upon the vessel under the maritime law, which entitled them to payment out of the fund, or, if it be considered that upon the evidence no lien was created, which could have been enforced against the vessel herself, still, they insist that in a proceeding to distribute a fund in the registry, the court must regard equity, and award the fund to them, for the reason that their advances were in fact for the benefit of the mortgagee, having been made to pay off a bottomry bond, which, if not thus paid, would have absorbed the whole vessel to the exclusion of the mortgage. And lastly, it is contended that the claim of the respondent rests upon an illegal title, made under circumstances which require the court to disregard it, as founded upon a transaction prohibited by law and contrary to public policy.⁵

The transaction disclosed by the evidence, as it regards the title and character of this vessel, was a clear fraud upon the navigation laws of the nation whose flag was thus assumed. By the law of England, the use of the British flag and national character upon vessels owned by other than British subjects, is unlawful, and subjects the vessel to forfeiture. Were this case, then, before the English admiralty, the claim of the mortgagee would be rejected as founded upon a sham title, created in violation of law; and the question is presented, whether it is not the duty of this court to apply the same rule. In determining this question, it should be remarked that it is raised in a court of admiralty, and courts of admiralty are in some sense international courts, charged with the duty of declaring the law applicable to ships and in force upon the sea, which, being the common highway of the nations, requires harmonious rules and laws recognized as such by all. These courts are often impelled to take notice of the rules and regulations which are applied in admiralty courts of other nations. They sometimes even enforce the decrees of such courts. They are courts before which the principles of comity may be invoked with peculiar propriety, and where those principles should be applied with increasing liberality, as year by year the nations are drawn closer to each other by the ties of commerce and of trade. And the nature of the transaction in question, and the effect which such transactions, if upheld, must have upon the mode of use of that most peculiar species of property, the ships, seem to require of a court of admiralty in a case like this to accord effect to the laws of England, in contravention of which the title to this vessel was held. For this is not the case of the assumption of a neutral flag in time of war to cover property as against an enemy, nor yet is it a case of the violation of a revenue law of a foreign nation. The law of England violated in this case has no relation to the revenue, its only object is to prevent the privileges and protections, afforded to the property of British subjects in ships, from being claimed by vessels not entitled thereto. And it is a law which can well be noticed, and, on proper occasions, enforced by the courts of other nations, for the reason that the aid of those courts is necessary to its efficacy, inasmuch as the ship may never visit the ports of the nation whose flag she has fraudulently assumed. Indeed, being owned and controlled elsewhere, it is to be presumed that she will not visit ports where forfeiture awaits her.

Furthermore, the United States have an interest in enforcing this law as well as England, for it is of importance to all maritime powers that the national character borne by a ship should be her true character. And the offence is one which may be perpetrated against every maritime power by citizens of every other such power, and in regard to which the United States may at any time be placed in a position to desire reciprocity of decision for their own protection.

Such being the character of the transaction in question, and the proceeding here being one in regard to a fund, brought into the registry by the consent of the respondent, and the other facts of the case being such that substantial justice, as between the only claimants of the fund, will thus be rather promoted than otherwise, I am of the opinion that it is the duty of this court, upon principles of comity, in this case to apply the rule which would be applied in the English admiralty, and refuse to recognize a claim to the fund, based upon a sham title, created in fraud of the navigation laws of England, for the purpose of giving to this ship a false nationality.

Of this conclusion the respondent can the less complain, because his mortgage, upon which not only his claim upon the fund, but his standing in court, depends, is drawn in the form prescribed by the merchants' shipping act of England. It contains no word of conveyance other than the word "mortgage," nor any power of possession or sale.

but expressly refers to the merchants' shipping act as the source of the rights intended to be conferred by it. It is a statutory mortgage, apparently dependent for its efficacy upon a statutory power of sale. The respondent, then, invoking the laws of England in support of his claim, cannot well object to the application of any portion of those laws to his demand.

But the transaction here disclosed, and upon which the claim of the respondent rests, may well be considered, in a case like the present, as contrary to public policy, and so not to be upheld under our own laws. If it be not by any statute made a crime against the United States to assume and use a false nationality for a ship owned by American citizens (and I cannot find that it is), still such an act is clearly contrary to the spirit and policy of the registry and navigation laws of the United States. These laws have for their object the encouragement of American navigation and American shipbuilding, to the exclusion of foreign navigation and foreign ownership. And they everywhere look to the disclosure by citizens of the United States, owning in ships, of their ownership therein. To permit an evasion of the duties thus imposed through the device of a nominal title held by a foreigner resident here, would afford plain encouragement to disregard the law. The transaction, moreover, is not without features of fraud upon the public. For the ship is a common carrier, supposed by the public to have and be entitled to the national character which she bears; but, bearing a false flag, she may involve innocent shippers, passengers, or seamen, in difficult and complicated questions, which may be precipitated upon them at any time in foreign ports or at home; as, for instance, in regard to the liability to search, the jurisdiction of the consul of the nation whose flag has been falsely assumed, the rights and remedies of the seamen, and the jurisdiction of our courts in relation thereto, the applicability of the limited liability acts, and acts for preventing collisions, and other similar questions. And lastly, by reason of the peculiarity of property in ships and the legal formalities and restrictions imposed upon its use by our laws, a fictitious title, like the one in question, makes necessary false reports by the master at the custom house, by means of which officers of the revenue may be misled. It has the effect to conceal property which the law intends should be disclosed, and may thus operate as a fraud against creditors. It requires false declarations from the nominal owner and others, as in the present case, where the mortgagor acknowledged himself indebted to the respondent in the considerable sum of $12,000, when, in fact, he owed him nothing, and declared himself to be the owner of the vessel, when he had no possession or ownership thereof, nor any sort of interest therein, as both he and the mortgagor then knew. It is a sham, created to avoid disabilities imposed by law, which places all parties connected therewith in a false relation toward the government, the community, and each other, and should, therefore, in a case like the present, be held to be against the policy of the law, and insufficient as a basis of a claim upon the fund, as against the other claimant thereof. Upon these considerations, and without expressing any opinion upon the other questions argued before me, I reject the claim of the mortgagee. There being, then, no other claim to the fund, except that of the libellant, the conceded facts are sufficient to support it, and the fund will be distributed in satisfaction thereof, so far as it may be sufficient therefor. *

Case No. 28.

The ACME.

[7 Blatchf. 366.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June 18, 1870.*

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITIES—ADVANCES.

1. Where B., not specifically shown to be an American citizen, but a merchant doing business in New York, purchased a British vessel, and caused the title to her to be taken in the name of C., a British subject, residing in New York, and C., having no beneficial interest in the vessel, executed, at the request of B., a mortgage on her to M., to secure a loan of money made by M. to B., and the vessel and the mortgage were registered at Nassau, a British port: Held, that, in a suit in rem, in admiralty, brought at New York, by H., against the vessel, to recover for advances made by him in Havana, on the credit of the vessel, subsequently to the making of the loan by M., neither C. nor B. making any objection, M. was entitled to have his claim under the mortgage allowed out of the proceeds of the vessel, after the payment of the advances made by H., and that enquiry into the legality of the transactions between C., B. and M., on grounds of public policy, was irrelevant.

2. On the facts of this case, H. was held to have a lien on the vessel for his advances, on the ground that they were made on the credit of the vessel and of B., and a lien prior to the lien of the mortgage to M.

3. Where an advance is made to relieve a vessel in a straightened condition in a foreign port, the presumption is that such advance is made on the credit of the vessel. This is especially true where the party making the advance has not had such business relations with either master or owners as to render it probable that large sums would be advanced upon credit without security.

4. Where the question to be determined is, whether credit for an advance was given to the owner of a vessel or to the vessel herself, the transaction is to be viewed differently from the case of an advance made by A. to B., on a request by C. to A. to make the advance, on the account of C. In the former case, the testimony of the party making the advance, as to his intent, in making it, in respect to giving credit, may be considered, while, in the latter case, it is not to be considered.

5. The fact that the party making an advance draws a draft therefor on the owner of the vessel, does not necessarily deprive him of his lien on the vessel.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem to recover the amount of advances made by M. A. Herrera & Co. to the master of the bark Acme; George H. Millington, a mortgagee thereof, appearing as claimant. The mortgagee's claim was rejected by the district court, and a decree entered for the libellants. (Case No. 27.) The claimant appeals. Decree sustaining the lien of both libellants and claimant.]

Robert D. Benedict and Charles Donohue, for libellants.

Charles M. Da Costa, for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The case made by the libellants is by no means free from doubt. They assert a lien upon the barque Acme, for advances made in Havana, for the discharge of a bottomry bond payable within three days after her arrival, and for certain supplies furnished at that port. The actual or beneficial owners of the barque were Messrs. Baetjer & De Vertu, of the city of New York. The necessity for the advances, and that the master and owners had no other credit in Havana, and that the advances were actually made, is entirely clear upon the evidence, and is, in truth, not questioned by the counsel for the claimant.

The only claimant and only party appearing in the suit is a mortgagee of the vessel, claiming under a mortgage executed and delivered by the party holding the legal title to the vessel, to secure a loan made to Baetjer & De Vertu long before these advances by the libellants were made. By consent of the libellants and the claimant, the barque was sold by the marshal, and the proceeds were brought into court, and the suit proceeded for the determination of the claims of the libellants and the claimant, as between themselves. Upon the ground that the claimant has no title, by virtue of his mortgage, which the court ought to recognize, his claim was wholly excluded in the district court, and he was even denied the surplus of the proceeds after satisfaction of the alleged lien of the libellants. The claimant being thus excluded, and all others having, of course, been defaulted, a decree was made in favor of the libellants, for the amount of their claim thus standing uncontested, without an examination and decision of the question whether the facts proved establish a lien or not. The Acme, [Case No. 27.]

The proof is, that the barque was a British vessel, and that, being such British vessel, Messrs. Baetjer & De Vertu purchased her, and caused the title to be transferred, by bill of sale, to Henry James Creighton, a British subject, a merchant, described as of Halifax, Nova Scotia, but then residing in New York, and the claimant's mortgage was executed by the latter. Creighton had no beneficial interest in the vessel, but consented to take the title, and afterwards to execute the mortgage, on the request of Baetjer & De Vertu. The vessel was registered at Nassau, in the British island of New Providence, and there the mortgage was also registered. The vessel was built in Baltimore, and by what course of proceedings she had ceased to be an American vessel prior to her purchase by Baetjer & De Vertu, the proofs do not show, further than that she was owned by one Patterson, and that it is testified she was a British vessel when so purchased. Whether Baetjer & De Vertu are or are not American citizens is not specifically proved. That question is left to inference warranted by the fact that they are merchants doing business in New York and New Orleans.

If I were prepared to say that, under these circumstances, the mortgagee could have no standing in court as against any one and that his mortgage is a nullity. I must affirm the decree made below, upon that sole ground. But I am not satisfied that, as against the mortgagor, or against Baetjer & De Vertu, at whose request he made the advance and received the mortgage, he is not entitled to the benefit of his mortgage; and certainly, in a suit in which he sets up his mortgage and claims such benefit, and in which neither the mortgagor nor the beneficial owners appear or make any objection, his claim should be allowed. If no one who has any title to the vessel or any lien thereupon objects to his title, it is not the duty of the court to enquire whether, under the laws of England, a mortgage would be sustained where the title was in a British subject having no beneficial interest therein, or whether it is against the policy of our laws to entertain a claim made under a mortgage given in that condition of the title. If all persons having any title, legal or beneficial, make default, setting up no adverse claim founded in illegality or otherwise, and no party having a lien on the barque assails the title of the mortgagee, it would seem that his mortgage should warrant his claim. This would, most clearly be true, if such mortgage is good as against the mortgagor and the beneficial owners; for, in such case, he stands in court rightfully contesting the alleged lien of any other party.

It is not claimed on the part of the mortgagee, that, if the libellants, by their advances, obtained a lien upon the barque, such lien is to be postponed to his mortgage, nor is it denied that such lien, duly existing, has priority over all the owners and parties interested in the vessel, whether mortgagee, holder of the legal title, or beneficial owners. Without, therefore, discussing the ground upon which the decision was placed below, I prefer to enquire whether the libellants have such a lien. And this question confessedly depends upon the answer to another—Was the credit given by the libellants to the vessel, or was the advance made on the credit of Baetjer & De Vertu?

The determination of this question does not depend upon any principles or rules of law peculiar to the law maritime or to courts of admiralty. It is purely a question of fact. There are cases which hold that, where advances are necessary and are made, still no lien is thereby created, because the advances are made on the credit of the master or of the owners, and other cases which hold that a lien is created because such advances are made upon the credit of the vessel. What circumstances, viewed as matter of evidence, warrant the inference that the advance was made not in reliance upon the vessel but on the responsibility of the master or owners, and, on the other hand, what circumstances indicate the converse, is often the subject of discussion, but the matter of fact to be determined is, to whom the credit was given; and, on the ascertainment of that fact, the question of lien or no lien is at once solved.

It must be conceded, that the history of the advance now in question is such, that a finding either way upon this question of fact could not be regarded as without evidence. Indeed, as above already intimated, I regard it as very doubtful. But I regard it as a just presumption, where an advance is made to relieve a vessel in a straitened condition in a foreign port, that such advance is made on the credit of the vessel. This is especially true where it appears that the parties making such advance have not had such business relations with either master or owners as to render it probable that large sums would be advanced upon credit without security.

On the 15th of June, 1866, Baetjer & De Vertu wrote to the libellants, apprising them that they had requested the master of the Acme, then about to arrive in Havana, to consign her to them, stating, among other things, that the master had signed a bottomry bond in Antwerp, payable in Havana, and adding: "Please pay the same for our account, at best possible rates of exchange, use the freight money for this purpose, and draw on us, either at New York, or on our New Orleans house, for the balance, at usual sight, which draft will be promptly protected. If it suits you better, we can make you a remittance from here, to cover the deficit, either in a banker's draft on Paris, or in Havana money. It will depend on the rate of exchange at which the bottomry bond will be payable with you, which way is the most advantageous for us." To this letter the libellants replied, on the 30th of June: "We beg to acknowledge rec't of your valued favor of 15th inst., the contents of which are attentively noted. The business of the Acme will receive our best attention as soon as she arrives." On the 13th of July, the Acme arrived at Havana, and, according to the testimony of one of the libellants, the master, on her arrival, called upon the libellants and requested them to take up the bottomry bond, "for account of the vessel and owners, within three days, so as to avoid all unnecessary expenses." The libellants paid the bond, and made some further advances for expenses of discharging, ship's stores, procuring cargo for New York, clearing, pilotage, &c., and collected the freight due on cargo to Havana, &c.

On the 14th of July, the libellants advised Baetjer & De Vertu of the arrival of the vessel, and said: "With respect to our reimbursement, we think the best way will be for us to draw on you." On the 25th of July, they wrote to Baetjer & De Vertu, stating that they had paid the principal and premium of the bond, leaving a question of commissions unsettled, and that, by the next opportunity, they should value on them for the approximate amount which would be due. On the 28th of July, they again wrote, advising Baetjer & De Vertu that they had drawn for $7500, at 60 days, the "approximate amount of your indebtedness to us for paying bottomry bond for Acme, which we place to your credit at 26 per cent., at in., $5550, craving your entries to agree." The draft arrived and was accepted by Baetjer & De Vertu. On the 8th of September, the cargo of the Acme having been procured, the libellants wrote, advising Baetjer & De Vertu that she had left for New York, adding: "We now enclose disbursements acct. of said vessel, amounting to $887.06, and extract of acct. closed by our draft, at 60 days, for $1145.35, which please protect, and we hope will prove correct." The accounts enclosed were an account headed: "Disbursements of Brit. Bk. Acme, Capt. D. A. Wenke," which contained items for sundry expenses of discharging, port charges, advances for ship stores, &c., &c., $887.06; and an account headed: "Dr. Messrs. Baetjer & De Vertu, in account current with M. A. Herrera & Co., Cr.," in which account were charged all their advances for the payment of the bottomry bond, ship's disbursements, commissions, &c., and in which were credited the inward freights received in Havana, and the two drafts above-mentioned, showing an exact balance of the debits and credits. On or about the 14th of September, the second draft arrived and was presented. Acceptance of it was declined on the ground that Baetjer & De Vertu had then failed. Neither draft has been paid.

Upon the face of the actual transaction thus disclosed, the indication is very strong that it was the intention of the libellants to give a personal credit to Baetjer & De Vertu, and that they did so in fact, without any reliance upon the vessel, or any expectation or thought of acquiring a lien thereon. But these indications are not conclusive in any such sense as precludes explanation. Nothing has been done in reliance thereon which should prevent proof of the actual intent of the libellants in the transaction. The request of the firm of Baetjer & De Vertu that the libellants would pay the bond for their account, and the assurance of the libellants, in reply, that the business of the Acme would receive their best attention when she should arrive, were not inconsistent with an advance with all the security which a lien on the vessel for reimbursement would furnish. The libellants were, therefore, in a situation to be governed by circumstances appearing on the arrival of the vessel; and it is testified that the master then proposed an advance for account of the vessel and owners. The libellants testify, that, in making the advance, they considered the responsibility of the vessel a sufficient security, and that she was bound for advances made under the circumstances above stated, and that it was not their intention to give credit personally to Baetjer & De Vertu. Their testimony states, with some particularity, their conviction, when they made the advances, that the vessel was liable therefor and their reliance thereon. They explain the manner in which the account was kept as due to press of business, and their unsuspecting confidence that no question of the liability of the vessel could arise.

I cannot say that, if there was any other ground for doubting the sincerity or veracity of these libellants, their explanation of the accounts would be very satisfactory; and yet it is easy to see that the account may have been kept and rendered in the name of Baetjer & De Vertu without any thought that they were thereby indicating an intent to rely upon them solely and waive a lien to which they were entitled if the advance was in fact made according to the request of the master and in reliance on the vessel itself. In judging of this, it is to be remembered, that they regarded Baetjer & De Vertu as the owners; and the case is, therefore, not like an advance made to a third person upon the request of that firm to make it on their account, followed by a charge in account to them, which would be so conclusive in favor of such third person, that he was neither expected nor bound to reimburse them, that, in the absence of proof of his own consent to be either primarily or secondarily liable, no declaration by the libellants of their intentions to look to him would be of any avail. Here, the parties requesting the advance being themselves owners, it is in harmony with the transaction to say, that the libellants were expected and intended to make the advance with all the incidental rights which appertain to advances made in a foreign port to relieve the pressing necessities of a vessel, when the master has no other means, by his own credit or that of the owners, to procure aid.

The mere fact that bills of exchange were drawn for the reimbursement of the libellants does not deprive them of their lien. This is true upon principles often adjudged at common law as well as in admiralty. Here, there is no such presumption as would arise if the responsibility of a third person had been given for the advance. The reimbursement must have been made in some mode, even though the lien upon the vessel was the libellants' reliance. Why should it not have been by paying their drafts drawn on the owners? See The Barque Chusan, [Case No. 2,717,] and cases there cited; The James Guy, [Id. 7,195,] affirmed 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 758. Nor has the form of the account rendered been deemed conclusive. See The St. Catherine, 3 Hagg. Adm. 250. The case of The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129, is instructive in its bearing on the principles involved in this branch of the case; but it leaves the question whether, in fact, the advances were made on the credit of the vessel, as a question of fact, to be determined upon all the evidence.

My conclusion is not reached without great doubt. Nevertheless, upon all the proofs, I cannot resist a conviction here, that the master of the vessel and the libellants both of them regarded the loan as made upon the credit of the vessel and her owners. In giving weight to the oral testimony of the libellants, I am not violating the rule that written contracts cannot be altered or varied by parol evidence. The writings here have not necessarily the legal effect to bind the libellants to look to Baetjer & De Vertu. If that was their necessary operation, the rule would, no doubt, apply. But they may have appropriate meaning and effect consistently with the creation and continuance of the lien which the libellants assert.

If the doubts I feel were greater than they are, I should have great satisfaction, nevertheless, in the undeniable fact, that it is due to the advances made by the libellants that anything is saved to the claimant as mortgagee; and, if the case were to be disposed of upon those ideas of what is fair between the former and the latter which the ordinary mind deems equity, the libellants should be first paid.

The decree should award payment to the libellants of the amount due to them, as ascertained and awarded in the district court, with their costs in that court, and payment of the residue of the proceeds of sale to the claimant, without costs to either party on the appeal to this court.

Case No. 29.The ACORN.

[2 Abb. U. S. 434;¹ 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 113; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 413; 5 Amer. Law Rev. 563.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. June Term, 1870.

FORFEITURE—REGISTRY OF VESSELS — RECORD OF NATURALIZATION.

1. The act of April 25, 1866, (14 Stat. 40,)—directing the secretary of the treasury to issue enrollment and license to certain vessels therein named,—is mandatory in its terms; and an oath, in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the act of December 31, 1792, (1 Stat. 287,) to obtain enrollment and license under the former act, is unnecessary.

2. An oath thus made to procure enrollment is extra-judicial, and of no effect; and though the oath was false, the provisions of law declaring a forfeiture in such cases have no application.

3. Where, in a libel for forfeiture for alleged violation of the registry laws, the claimant is charged with not being the owner of the vessel, and all the evidence relating to the ownership is introduced by the government, which tends to prove rather than disprove such ownership on the part of the claimant, such evidence must be taken as a whole; and the claimant need not introduce evidence upon the subject, to establish his ownership.

4. In a libel for such cause, where the claimant is charged with not being a citizen of the United States at the time of the enrollment, and, in order to refute such charge, he introduces in evidence an exemplified copy of the record of his naturalization under the United States laws in a court of competent jurisdiction, he need not also prove the preliminary proceedings necessary to give the naturalizing court jurisdiction.

[Cited in Re Coleman, Case No. 2,980.]

5. The order of a court of competent jurisdiction, admitting an alien to citizenship, is in the nature of a judgment, and, in the absence of fraud, is conclusive as to the question of the requisite length of residence of the naturalized citizen in the United States.

[Cited in McDermott v. Copeland, 9 Fed. Rep. 537; Charles Green's Sons v. Salas, 31 Fed. Rep. 108.]

6. The distinction between cases in which judgments may and those in which they may not be impeached collaterally, may be stated thus: They may be impeached by facts involving fraud or collusion, but which were not before the court or involved in the issue or matter upon which the judgment was rendered. They may not be impeached for any facts, whether involving fraud or collusion or not, or even perjury, which were necessarily before the court and passed upon.

In admiralty. Hearing on a libel of information. This was a libel of information and seizure for forfeiture for alleged violation of the registry laws. The libel alleged as cause for forfeiture, that the oath taken by David Muir, the claimant, to obtain enrollment and license of the bark, was false in the following particulars:

1. That at the time of taking the oath the said David Muir was not a citizen of the United States, as in said oath alleged. 2.

That he was not the true and only owner of the vessel. 3. That there were subjects of a foreign prince or State, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, interested in the vessel, or in the profits or issues thereof.

The libel in the second article also alleged the fraudulent use of an enrollment and license for the bark, to which she was not entitled.

The claim, answer, and exceptions of David Muir, 1st, alleged his ownership of the vessel; 2nd, excepted to the jurisdiction of the court; but as this ground of defense was abandoned at the hearing as untenable, no notice was taken of it by the court; 3rd, admitted that claimant took the oath as alleged in the libel, but denied its falsity, and alleged the truth of the statements contained in it; 4th, denied the fraudulent use of an enrollment and license, as alleged in the second article of the libel; also contested the forfeiture, and claimed costs. The proofs taken, and the facts of the case, sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

A. Russell, for the United States.

Newberry, Pond & Brown, for claimant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. By an act of congress approved April 25, 1866, (14 Stat. 40,) the secretary of the treasury was directed to issue an American enrollment and license to the bark Acorn, among a large number of other vessels named in said act, and accordingly the bark was enrolled and licensed at Chicago, July 11, 1866. The enrollment purports on its face to be in pursuance of the act of April 25, 1866, and also of the general acts of congress providing for the enrollment and license of ships or vessels, and for the regulation of the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States.

The forfeiture is claimed in this case under section 4 of the act of December 31, 1792, (1 Stat. 287,) the provisions of which, as to forfeiture, have been held by the supreme court, in the case of The Mohawk, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 566, to apply to enrolled and licensed as well as to registered vessels. It is contended, however, on behalf of the claimant, that the act of April 25, 1866, directing the secretary of the treasury to issue an enrollment and license, is mandatory, and that under it section 4 of the act of 1792 has no application; that the questions of citizenship of the owner and the ownership of the vessel do not arise, and that no oath could be lawfully required as a preliminary requisite, as required by said section 4, and that therefore the oath which was made to procure the enrollment, as alleged, was extra-judicial, and no forfeiture could be claimed, even if the same was false.

First, then, as to the effect of the act of April 25, 1866. It is true, as claimed, that the act is mandatory in its terms. The language is: "The secretary of the treasury is hereby directed to issue American registers, . . . or enrollment and license, to the following named vessels, that is to say;" and then follows a long list of vessels, including the said bark Acorn. No conditions are imposed, and no preliminary steps are prescribed by the act. The attention of the court is challenged to the fact that in other acts of congress, for a like purpose, conditions are imposed, and preliminary steps are prescribed, as an evidence that in this instance congress intended the enrollment and license to issue absolutely and immediately.

Looking at these acts alone, the court would have no doubt that the construction claimed is the correct one. But in view of the general laws of congress upon the subject of registry, enrollment, and license, and of the objects and purposes to be accomplished thereby, viz: to build up and foster a commerce purely American, and to protect the revenue, serious doubts were suggested, and the court felt it an imperative duty to seek for some other construction of the act than that contended for, and more in keeping with the object and purpose of the registry laws. Thirty-one vessels in all are covered by the act, and it is difficult to conceive that congress could have intended so important and dangerous an innovation upon its established system as it would be to give the act the effect suggested, and the court would not do so, only as it might feel compelled to, by force of the clear and unmistakable meaning of the words of the act.

As my brother, Judge Withey, of the western district, has a case before him, U. S. v. The Advance, [Case No. 14,425,] precisely like this one, and was therefore directly interested in a correct decision of the questions of law arising in this case, I suggested to him my doubts upon this question, and after consultation with him, and mature deliberation, I see no escape from the conclusion that the act, by its own force, admits the vessels named in it to registry, or enrollment and license, peremptorily, and without any prerequisites or conditions whatever. After turning the question over and over, and viewing it on all sides and in all aspects, I have found myself unable to come to any other conclusion at all satisfactory to myself, without the necessity of interpolating into the act words of material import, which of course the court cannot do.

The act is mandatory in its terms. "The secretary of the treasury is hereby directed to issue American registers, . . . or enrollment and license." &c. Now, in order to hold that the requisites and conditions prescribed by the general laws must exist and be complied with before the secretary of the treasury can be called upon to obey the mandate, it is necessary to interpolate an entirely new element into the act; because the act is absolute, unconditional, and immediate in its operation and effect, and to hold as above indicated, would make it conditional and contingent, and would postpone its operation until other acts, not mentioned or referred to in terms or by necessary implication, have been complied with. Foreign vessels cannot be registered or enrolled and licensed under the general laws, but there can be no doubt that congress has the power, by special act, to nationalize such vessels, and confer upon them all the rights of registry, and enrollment and license, independent of the general laws. In the case of The Acorn, and of all the other thirty-one vessels named in the act of 1866, except three which are described as "Canadian built," no reason whatever is assigned, or can be deduced from its language or recitals, why the act was necessary, or why it was passed. We may presume that it was to cure or remove some disability or disabilities under which the respective vessels labored, and on account of which they could not be registered, or enrolled and licensed under the general laws. But if we are to resort to presumptions, we must presume that all disabilities were intended to be cured or removed, where none are specified. The act is plain, direct, positive, and peremptory in its language. There is no ambiguity in its provisions, nor room for construction. It is not based upon any requisite, qualification, or condition, or upon any want of them, relating to the vessel, its owner, master, or persons interested, at least so far as The Acorn is concerned, but is independent and regardless of all requisites, qualifications, or conditions. It is a simple command to an officer of the government to do a certain thing. Now, to say that he need not do the thing commanded, or only in case certain requisites and conditions exist and are complied with, among which is the oath to obtain enrollment and license here in question, is clearly to interpolate into the act what is not there in terms, and what cannot be inferred from the language used, by any fair or satisfactory construction of it. I hold, therefore, that no oath to obtain enrollment and license was necessary in this case, and hence that the oath which was made, and upon the alleged falsity of which a forfeiture is predicated, was extra-judicial, void, and of no effect. The provisions of law, therefore, declaring a forfeiture in such cases, have no application to this case. In this view of the first branch of the case, a consideration of the remaining points is unnecessary to its disposition. But in view of the importance of the questions involved, and in order to show that, regardless of the conclusions arrived at upon the first point, the result must have been the same, a consideration of the remaining points may not be unprofitable.

2. The second point involved, regards the ownership of the vessel. In cases of this sort the burden of proving that the ownership of the vessel and the persons interested in her are not as stated in the oath, is upon the United States. It was contended, however, that it is only necessary, in the first instance, for the United States to show probable cause, or a reasonable suspicion, and then the burden of proof changes. Without stopping now to inquire into the soundness of this position, we will proceed at once to examine the evidence upon this point.

The testimony of Austin A. Smith, and that of John S. Clark, taken by commission in Canada, on behalf of the United States, comprises all the proof in the case upon the question of ownership. Smith testifies that for three years previous to July 1, 1867, he was book-keeper and clerk, and a part of that time was employed by Muir Brothers, at Port Dalhousie, in Canada; that the business of the Muir Brothers, when he was in their employ, was ship-builders, ship-owners, and ship-chandlers. The witness then proceeds as follows: "Previous to the transfer of the vessels to Bryce Muir, one of the brothers, they owned the barks Alexander, Acorn, Advance, and Niagara, and the schooners Arctic, Ayr, and Asia. I do not recollect the date of the transfer, but believe it was somewhere during the year 1866. I was acquainted with the bark Acorn, and the Muir Brothers owned her up to the time of the transfer mentioned in last answer. Up to the said transfer all of the parties in the firm of Muir Brothers, consisting of Alexander Muir, Bryce Muir, William Muir, David Muir, and Archibald Muir, were interested in the profits of the said bark, and that they were solely so interested. The said partners, up to the time of the transfer to Bryce Muir, were equally interested in the said bark Acorn, and from the date of the said transfer, the said Bryce Muir was solely interested up to the time of another transfer thereof to David Muir; after the last transfer the said David Muir was solely interested. The Muir Brothers, before the transfer to Bryce Muir, were the owners of, and kept the books of the accounts of the said bark, and Bryce Muir afterwards up to the time of the transfer to David Muir, and after the transfer last mentioned, the said David Muir. The said firm had nothing to do with the profits after the said first transfer."

Clark testifies that he is a collector of canal tolls, (for what canal or where is not stated,) and then proceeds as follows: "During the year 1866, David Muir was the owner of the bark Acorn. I do not know who was or were interested in her profits in the said year. I never received any information from David Muir on the subject. My knowledge as to his ownership is derived from the fact that the said bark in passing through the canal that year was reported to me, and entered on my books as owned by the said David Muir."

This comprises all the proofs made or offered on either side as to the ownership of the vessel, and as to the persons interested in her profits. On this proof, it is contended, on behalf of the United States, that, having shown that the vessel once belonged in part to other owners, it is incumbent on the claimant to show that, at the time he made the oath for enrollment, the interest of the other owners had been sold and duly transferred to him; that the bills of sale, or other conveyance, by which the same was transferred, should have been produced, and that their nonproduction raises a presumption against the claimant's title, and that the statements of the witnesses, above quoted, as to transfer to and ownership by David Muir, are not competent to prove such transfers and ownership. Such would, undoubtedly, be the rule as applied to evidence offered by the claimant to prove his title after a case had been made against him, making such proof necessary. But it must be borne in mind that all the testimony there is in this case in regard to a transfer from the other former part-owners to Bryce Muir, and from him to David Muir, the claimant, is produced on behalf of the United States, and although it is somewhat indefinite as to time, it is as definite, direct, and positive, as the other portions of the same testimony tending to prove that other persons were once interested in the vessel. It is a part of the case for the government, as made by its proofs, and it cannot be rejected by any known rule of law. The testimony upon the subject of ownership, as above recited, must be taken as a whole, and being so taken, if it proves anything, it proves that David Muir was the sole owner, and was solely interested. To say the least of it, it fails to make out such a case as makes it incumbent upon the claimant to make any proof upon the question of ownership.

Therefore, the allegations of the libel that said David Muir, at the time of making the oath for enrollment "was not the true and only owner of the vessel," and that "there were subjects of a foreign prince or state, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise interested in the said bark," &c., are not sustained.

3. As to the citizenship of the claimant David Muir. For the purpose of sustaining the allegation of the libel that David Muir was not a citizen of the United States, as alleged in his oath for enrollment, testimony was introduced on behalf of the United States, tending to show that for several years previous to the year 1866 (the year in which the vessel was enrolled), the said David Muir had resided in Canada, and was assessed and paid taxes there, and that he was registered as a voter there as late as the year 1863. To meet the case thus made against him, the said David Muir introduced in evidence an exemplified copy of the record of his naturalization, under the laws of the United States, in the superior court of the city of Chicago, being a court of competent jurisdiction, January 27, 1866. This record was offered and admitted in evidence without objection, but on the final argument, counsel for the United States took the following exception to its sufficiency: That the preliminary proceedings necessary to give the naturalizing court jurisdiction, viz.: the petition, declaration of intention, and oath of allegiance, are not proven. It is recited in the record that such proceedings were had, but it is contended that such recitals are not evidence, but that the proceedings themselves should have been proven. It is doubtful whether this objection does not come too late, but even if in time, the weight of authority is decidedly against the position that such preliminary proceedings must be proven, and I see no reason for holding otherwise in this case. See Ritchie v. Putnam, 13 Wend. 524-526; Stark v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 420.

It is contended also on the part of the United States, that inasmuch as the order of naturalization could be made only on proof of continued residence in the United States for five years immediately preceding, it must in this case, in view of the evidence on behalf of the United States, above mentioned, have been made upon false testimony as to the fact of such residence. This presents the question—Is the order admitting an alien to citizenship conclusive as to the question of the requisite length of residence in the United States, or is that question open to inquiry collaterally? The proceeding to obtain naturalization is clearly a judicial one. A hearing is required to be had in open court, and the right can be conferred only by the judgment of the court, and upon satisfactory proof. It, therefore, has all the elements of a judgment. That it has the character and attributes of a judgment, and is equally conclusive, the authorities are entirely uniform. See Spratt v. Spratt, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 393, 407; McCarthy v. Marsh, 5 N. Y. 263, 279, 284, and authorities cited; In re An Allen, 7 Hill, (N. Y.) 137, 138; In re Clark, 18 Barb. 444; Ritchie v. Putnam, 13 Wend. 524-526.

The question of the requisite length of residence of the applicant is a question of fact, and, as appears by the record, was directly before the court and acted upon. Proofs were taken, and the court made a decision upon them. This court is now asked to decide that the superior court of the city of Chicago, before which the naturalization proceedings were had, erred in deciding as it did, or, in other words, that the fact in question is not as there found. It does not appear what the particular proofs or statements of the witnesses before the naturaliz-ing court were, but, whatever they were, they were satisfactory to that court. Neither does it appear by the proofs in this court that the testimony here adduced to show that the fact of residence was not as there found, was or was not before that court. But concede, as was probably the case, that it was not, then it comes here in the nature of newly discovered evidence, and this court is asked to allow it to impeach the naturalization, and as to a fact, too, which was directly before and acted upon by the naturalizing court. This is contrary to all precedent and all authority. To allow it would tend to unsettle the sanctity of the final adjudication of judicial tribunals, and render them of no more binding or conclusive effect than a simple contract. The question here is, not whether the particular evidence here adduced was or was not before the naturalizing court, but was the fact which this evidence is intended to prove or disprove before that court. The proofs in this case do not raise the question of fraud or collusion in the naturalization proceedings, but simply the question of fact as to the requisite length of residence of the claimant in the United States, before he was admitted to citizenship. Many authorities may be found (although they are by no means uniform), holding that a judgment may be impeached for fraud or collusion; but the court has not been referred to a single case, neither can one be found, in which it has been held that a judgment may be impeached for any matter which was necessarily before the court and involved in the decision, as the fact of residence was in the case under consideration. On the contrary, the authorities are uniform, that a judgment cannot be impeached for any such matter.

The distinction between cases in which judgments may and those in which they may not be impeached collaterally, as derived from the authorities, and founded in common sense, may be stated thus: They may be impeached by facts involving fraud or collusion, but which were not before the court or involved in the issue or matter upon which the judgment was rendered. They may not be impeached for any facts, whether involving fraud or collusion or not, or even perjury, which were necessarily before the court and passed upon.

See McCarthy v. Marsh, 5 N. Y. 284; Mason v. Messenger, 17 Iowa, 261, 272; White v. Merritt, 7 N. Y. 352, 355; Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 489; Parkhurst v. Sumner, 23 Vt. 538; Lewis v. Rogers, 16 Pa. St. 18, 21; Warburton v. Aken, [Case No. 17,143;] Demerit v. Lyford, 7 Fost. (N. H.) 541, 546-549; Dilling v. Murray, 6 Ind. 324; Peck v. Woodbridge, 3 Day, 30, 36; Homer v. Fish, 1 Pick. 435, 439-441; Smith v. Lewis, 3 Johns. 157, 168; Smith v. Lowry, 1 Johns. Ch. 322-324.

It was objected on the argument on behalf of the United States, that the record shows that the oath of the applicant was allowed to prove his residence, contrary to the express provision of the naturalization laws, and that the record is therefore a nullity. The record states as follows: "And it appearing to the satisfaction of the court, as well from the oath of the said applicant as from the testimony of Charles Old and Jesse Coe," and then follows a statement of all the prerequisites to naturalization, viz.: residence, good moral character, attachment to the principles of the constitution, &c. The oath of the applicant is prohibited by the act only as to his residence. By implication, therefore, such oath may be allowed to prove any of the prerequisites other than that of residence; and this court will, in support of the validity of this record, refer such oath to such prerequisites only as could be lawfully proven by it, and will presume that the finding of the court, as to the residence of the applicant, was based upon the other testimony mentioned in the record, and not upon the oath of the applicant. It is a well-settled rule that when a record, or other writing, admits of two constructions, one of which will give it force and validity, and the other of which will render it a nullity, the court will adopt the former. I hold, therefore, that the objection is not tenable.

It was suggested by the learned counsel for the United States that naturalization proceedings, as usually conducted, are virtually ex-parte, and with but little, if any, circumsppection or attention on the part of the court before which they are had, and that the court is liable to be imposed upon by false testimony and otherwise; and that, therefore, the rule ought to be more liberal in allowing them to be impeached than in the case of ordinary judgments. There is undoubtedly some force in the suggestion, but a little reflection will show that the inconvenience and hardship which would inevitably result to individuals from its adoption, would be vastly greater than the slight inconvenience resulting occasionally to the government by adhering to the strict rule.

The government favors naturalization; and, owing to the liberality of its laws upon that subject, is no doubt liable to occasional imposition; but if every naturalized citizen must always be prepared with his proofs to maintain the grounds upon which he obtained his papers, in all courts and places in which they may be brought in question, the boon of citizenship which is so liberally bestowed would be barely worth possessing. No proof was adduced to sustain the second article of the libel, other than what has been already considered. The libel must be dismissed.

[From 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 113:] I am authorized by Judge Withey, of the western district, before whom the case of The Advance [Case No. 14,425] is pending, to state that he concurs with me in the above result.

Case No. 30.

The ACORN.

The SPEEDWELL.

[21 Law Rep. 99.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1857.

SALVAGE—COLLISION—EXERTION OF CREW TO AVOID.

Successful exertions by the crew of one vessel to avoid an impending collision with another cannot be considered salvage services rendered to the latter.

In admiralty.

G. G. Thomas, for libellants.

J. A. Abbott, for the Acorn.

W. G. Russel, for the Speedwell.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. These are libels for salvage service alleged to have been rendered to vessels detained in the ice in the manner stated in the preceding [following] case of The John Perkins, [Case No. 10,252.] The libellants were two of the crew of the steamer Acorn, and remained on board some hours after the rest of the steamer's company had gone on shore. They allege that while they were so remaining on board, the schooner Speedwell, whose officers and crew had also gone on shore, was forced by the action of the sea towards the steamer's stern; that they put out fenders, whose effect was to lessen the force of the shock when the two vessels came in collision, and also to cause the schooner to slide round the stern of the steamer and go clear, without doing any damage to either vessel. I do not deem it necessary to make an extended statement of the facts alleged and denied, or of the deductions proper to be made from the proofs. I am of opinion that the cases must be governed by the same principles already announced in the case of The John Perkins. I find no facts sufficient to distinguish these cases from that case. I consider that while the libellants remained on board the steamer they were not absolved from their contract, and were under an obligation to do all they allege was done for its safety; that they must be deemed to have acted for its preservation, and cannot claim as salvors of the other vessel, because they interposed to relieve both from the effects of a collision which occurred without fault. I desire to be understood as not intending to express any doubt of the gallantry and merit of the services rendered by these libellants. If not prevented by a rule of law, I should agree readily to the compensation awarded by the court below to be paid by the steamer. But in my judgment this is a matter which must be left to the discretion of the owners and underwriters, who, it is to be expected, will not be unmindful of any just claims which these men may have, upon their liberality.

These cases involve questions of great interest and importance, and it would have been highly satisfactory to me if they had been open to an appeal; especially as I find myself unable to concur in opinion with the very learned judge by whom these cases were decided in the court below. I have therefore considered them with great attention; and upon the points of law involved in them, they have been twice argued by counsel, from whom I have derived valuable assistance.

The decrees of the district court must be reversed and the libels dismissed, without costs.

Case No. 31.

ACOSTA et al. v. The HALCYON.¹

District Court, S. D. Florida. Sept. 1877.

SALVAGE—SEVERAL SALVORS—PRIORITY OF ARRIVAL.

[Under wrecking rule 4 in salvage cases prescribed by the district court of Florida, requiring that licensed wrecking vessels shall be admitted to assist at the wreck in the order in which they arrive, a vessel is deemed to have "arrived" when she is in reasonable hailing distance, ready to receive and obey orders; and a subsequent change in the position, by standing off and on, although she might be further from the wreck than another vessel just arriving, will not forfeit her right.]

In admiralty. Petition of Thomas Blake for a distributive portion of salvage.

LOCKE, District Judge. This is a petition under the fourth wrecking rule of this court, which requires that licensed wrecking vessels shall be admitted to assist at the wreck in the order in which the vessels themselves arrive. This rule was made for the purpose of preventing the practice at one time in vogue of several masters of vessels going to wrecks in large boats, forming consortships among themselves, in behalf of their vessels and crews, and excluding all who came afterwards, without regard to the whereabouts of their vessels. This case comes under this rule, and depends upon a construction of the language used as well as questions of facts. The petition alleges that the schooner "Wallace Blackford" arrived at the bark Halcyon before the schooner "Mary Matilda," which had been admitted to the consort; this the answer denies. It appears that the Mary Matilda was approaching the Halcyon considerably in advance of the Blackford, although in rather a different direction, she being on the outside of the reef, while the Blackford was on the inside; that her master and a part of her crew left her in a boat, and pulled on board the Halcyon, where they were permitted to go to work some half or three quarters of an hour before either vessel arrived; that the Mary Matilda was in the vicinity of the bark, had communicated with her, and received orders to come alongside, but was standing off from her shortly before the arrival of the Blackford, but that they both came to anchor within three or four minutes of each other, the Mary Matilda somewhat nearer the bark than the Blackford. As to the exact moment at which the two vessels came to anchor the witnesses do not agree; some of them state that the Blackford anchored from three to five minutes first, while one who appears to have been the best situated to observe both vessels is very positive that, although the Blackford hauled down her jib first, the Mary Matilda let go her anchor first. If the question depended upon the moment of anchoring, the evidence would be unsatisfactory and far from conclusive; but in my opinion it does not depend upon that, but upon the time of arrival. The crew of the Mary Matilda, leaving her, and coming on board in a boat, can have no effect or influence in the question, for they gained thereby no rights as against the Blackford, provided that it is considered that she arrived first; nor does their having left their vessel prove that she was not ahead of the Blackford at the time of her arrival.

The arrival of a vessel does not necessarily imply anchoring, nor is it necessary that a vessel should be at anchor before she can be considered as having arrived, as the first anchoring might be at a much greater distance from a given point than the other at that time, or indeed the other not anchoring might be alongside the wreck. There is no exact distance from a wreck at a point within which a vessel must have reached before she can be considered as having arrived. There are no actual bounds within which a vessel must come, and no arbitrary distance can be determined in feet, yards, or fathoms, which might not very soon be proven unreasonable and inexpedient. Were it a boat coming to a vessel where she is accustomed to lie alongside, or a vessel coming to a dock where she is to be made fast, the term might be more easy of construction; but that is not the usual position of vessels at sea, nor would it be safe or reasonable to demand or require it. What construction, then, can be reasonably placed upon the term "arrived?" What were the needs of the rule? What want did it supply? What is the practical importance of having a vessel arrive before her services can be accepted? The former practice oftentimes, in theory, if not in fact, admitted vessels still so far absent as to be unable to render any service to property in distress, while others ready, willing, and able, on account of being present, to assist, were excluded, while the peril to the property was continuing or increasing, and it was to this point that such a rule is directed. All that an actual presence demands is that the vessel shall be sufficiently near to render assistance at a moment's notice,—receive and obey orders; to be within a communicating or reasonable hailing distance. When she is within such distance it is all that can practically be demanded, and it seems to me reasonable to consider that the rule has been complied with. I know of no fairer construction that can be placed upon the term "arrive," or better rule to accept or establish in regard to the distance of a vessel than that she must be within such a distance that orders may be readily and easily given and understood, so as to be acted upon, and so that she can obey them by coming alongside or rendering assistance in any other way without delay; or, in other words, she must be, wherever the circumstances will permit, within a reasonable hailing distance. When she has once reached such a point, a changing of her position by standing off and on, although she might be further from the wreck than another vessel just arriving, will not forfeit her right.

The question, then, in this case is, had the Mary Matilda arrived at or within a reasonable hailing distance of the bark before the Wallace Blackford? The testimony of Capt. Blake that before he came to anchor he saw her standing away from the bark; of Mr. Fagan, also, that she was standing off, and was about as far off as the Blackford; of Albury that she was within hailing distance, luffed up when he sent a boat for the other men, and with orders for her to come alongside; of Parks, in charge, that when word was brought to come up on the port side he didn't anchor, but stood off to come round,—unexplained, show that the Mary Matilda was standing off from the bark when the Blackford was coming up; that she had been within hailing distance, and had received orders to come alongside, and therefore had not come to anchor; that she had arrived at the bark, under a reasonable construction of that term, before the Wallace Blackford, and the petitioner has not sustained the allegations of his petition to the contrary, namely, that the Wallace Blackford arrived at the bark before the Mary Matilda. The burden of proof having been upon him to show this, and he having failed, the petition must be dismissed; each party having his own costs.

Case No. 32.

ACOSTA et al. v. The HALCYON
District Court, S. D. Florida. Sept. 1877.
SALVAGE—AGENCY.

[A salvor agent for the property cannot be allowed salvage, but, where he acts bona fide, may have agent's commission.]

[Published by permission from the MS. of Hon. James W. Locke, District Judge.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Manuel Acosta and others against the bark Halcyon and cargo for salvage. Decree for libelants.]

LOCKE, District Judge. This bark, laden with a miscellaneous cargo, bound from New York to New Orleans, went ashore on Looe Key, an exposed and dangerous shoal, about twenty miles from this port, on the morning of the seventeenth of July last, at about high water. She was boarded in the morning by libellant Acosta in the pilot boat Telegram, although at the time of his boarding her both Acosta and the master say that they considered the bark in great danger, and, as Acosta says, in his testimony, "both came to the conclusion that she would bilge." Acosta tendered the services of his vessel and crew to the master for him to come to Key West to make arrangements about storing his cargo, if any might be saved. This the master accepted, and left libellant Acosta to do what he could towards saving the property. Other vessels arrived in a short time, when the libellants commenced discharging cargo, consisting of bundles of cotton ties, and continued so doing until they had taken out some over three thousand, weighing in the aggregate about eighty six tons. When the tide was up that night, at about twelve or one o'clock, a heavy anchor having been carried out during the day, the bark was hove off, anchored, and the next day brought into this port. The reef upon which the vessel lay was of sharp coral rock, and was one of the most exposed and dangerous ones on the coast. While ashore she labored and ground on the bottom until the forward part of the keel had been nearly cut away, and the garboard streak and several planks badly worn and chafed. The salvors were engaged in the service of discharging and floating the ship about twelve hours, and worked with force and energy and all the skill and ability which the case demanded, or gave an opportunity to exhibit. The weather was good during the time, so calm in fact that the Telegram in which the master came to Key West, although having a fair wind, was from twelve o'clock noon, until after sunset in coming the distance, about twenty miles; although there was quite a swell of the sea coming in which increased her risk somewhat. The work was successfully accomplished, but there are some matters which cannot consistently be passed without comment. The vessel struck at about half-past twelve in the morning, at high water. About six the master sounded, and found fourteen feet of water, she drawing sixteen and a half when afloat. At half past twelve the next morning she was hove off.

These facts, taken together, show conclusively that, instead of its being a falling tide or even full tide when the master wrecker first boarded her, it lacked some over two hours of high water. Under these circumstances it would be presumed that an active energetic salvor, with a sufficient vessel at his command and others near at hand, if anxious to rescue the property from the peril it was in and float the vessel from the bottom, would have endeavored to get out an anchor at once, and, if possible, float the vessel at the first high tide. But in this case it was assumed the vessel would bilge, and the procuring a safe place for storing the cargo was deemed of more importance than prompt action in her behalf. It is alleged that the vessel was in imminent peril, and that she was so considered by both master and master wrecker; as Acosta says, "He (referring to the master) and I both came to the conclusion that she would bilge." What may have been the opinion of a person at a particular time is better indicated by his conduct and acts at that time than by subsequent declarations or explanations.

I am not here to criticize the conduct of the master, only so far as it is influenced by or connected with that of the salvors; but is it to be presumed that a master whose ship was in such peril as this ship is alleged to have been in would abandon her, taking with him the only vessel present of sufficient size to render any assistance, and leave the property entrusted to his charge in the care of a stranger, while he came to a port to secure a place to store his cargo, when by enquiry he could have ascertained that ample storage could easily be secured at a moment's notice, should the result demand it? Judging therefore, from the conduct of both master and master wrecker, we must conclude that the danger to the property was by no means considered so immediate as has been represented. Upon a careful examination of the testimony, this coming to Key West may be partially, if not satisfactorily explained. Capt. Acosta says, "The master didn't ask to come down." "I asked him what would be done with the cargo, and told him about the merchants at Key West." Again, "The master did not ask for the Telegram to come to Key West." In view of this testimony it can but be concluded that he, although the master wrecker, was more anxious to secure a consignment for his owner than to rescue the property from the distress in which it was placed; and to this end was willing to sacrifice the services of a large and efficient vessel, and permit the property to remain in its perilous condition. Under these circumstances, had the vessel bilged before the high tide at which she was floated, it would have been considered such a neglect of prompt and energetic action as would have forfeited any salvage earned by the parties guilty of such laches.

The favorable circumstances of the case have, however, rendered such a severe decision unnecessary; but the facts certainly detract from the merits of the service. With this exception the service was well performed, and the vessel relieved from a considerable degree of danger. The master could not have relieved her without making a jettison of certainly as much, and probably considerably more cargo than was taken out by the salvors, and incurring the risk of longer delay which might have caused her loss. The vessel was so damaged that she has been discharged, repaired, and the cargo subjected to large expenses in the shape of labor, and wharfage and storage, which diminish the fund from which the salvage is to be paid, and will therefore diminish any salvage in that proportion. Were there no other questions connected with this case, a salvage of fifteen per cent. would under the circumstances not be unreasonable. But other matters demand our attention. F. J. Moreno, Esq., the resident agent of underwriters, has by petition, under the fifth rule of practice of this court, come in as amicus curiae, and alleges that the master of this bark has consigned his vessel and cargo to Messrs. A. F. & C. Tift, as agent, to assist him in transacting his business, they at the same time being interested in the salvage, and libellants of said vessel and cargo, and therefore prays that any salvage they might otherwise earn be refused them or diminished.

In answer to this petition it is not denied that the facts are as stated; but it is urged that a forfeiture of salvage should not follow unless fraud is alleged and proven. These pleadings, the petition and answer, are somewhat informal, the parties having appeared and submitted the matter without argument, in person, all members of the bar being otherwise engaged or unable to appear in the suit, but they are sufficient to bring the question before the court. No issue is joined, but the answer must be taken in the nature of a demurrer, or exception, to the petition. The records of the court show that A. F. & C. Tift were the owners of the Cora, Telegram, and Elida, and they do not deny the fact of agency.

The question is, whether a party interested in the salvage can legally become consignee of vessel and cargo, and thereby agent of the owners; and if he accepts such trust, what effect such accepting will have upon his claim as salvor against the property. Perhaps a brief expression of my opinion upon this question would be sufficient; but it having been undecided heretofore in this court, and as far as I can find, elsewhere, it demands an examination of the character of the question and the legal principles which determine it. When a master whose vessel has been assisted on this coast arrives in port, he is generally a stranger to the people, and, in some degree, ignorant of the new duties and responsibilities that devolve upon him through the disaster. He needs both advice and assistance. His ship is attached upon a claim of salvage, and he requires the help of some one to enable him to properly protect the property. He is unacquainted with the proctors of the court where he is called upon to answer, and needs information to guide him in his selection. Under these circumstances he is authorized to employ some person to aid him by his advice and give him general assistance. This person so employed is not a consignee within the general meaning of the word, but an agent for general purposes for the time being; not an agent of the master only, but of the owners of the property, whoever and wherever they may be; and the relations between him and the property and its owners are influenced and controlled by the general principles of law upon the subject of agency. What these principles are has been so fully declared that no mistake can be made. Judge Marvin in an elaborate opinion upon the question of agents, their compensation, &c., in the cases of The Marathon, [Case No. 9,058,] and Scotsman, [Id. 12,515,] in this court, reviewed the subject so fully as to assist materially in deciding this point. He says: "To entitle a person to act as agent, he must have no interest in conflict with the interest of the owners of the property." "That the agent must have no interest hostile to the interests of his principal is a general principle of law. This rule is founded upon the plain and obvious consideration that the principal bargains, in the employment, for the exercise of the disinterested skill, diligence, and zeal of the agent, for his exclusive benefit." Story, Ag. §§ 210-217. "The same person cannot be agent of two contracting parties in the same transaction where their interests are in conflict, still less can he act as such where he has a personal interest in the matter adverse to that of one of the parties." Florance v. Adams, 2 Rob. (La.) 556. After citing numerous authorities, Judge Marvin says in the opinion referred to: "The law in my opinion is clear that a person entitled to a share or portion in the salvage has an interest in conflict with the interest of the owners of the property which legally disqualifies him from acting as the master's agent. If he conceal this interest from the master, such concealment the law pronounces to be a fraud; if he make it known, then the master, in the language of the supreme court, "knowingly betrays the interests of his owners." However efficient, impartial, or honest the agent may be, the law steps in and prohibits his assuming a position where his duty and interest are in conflict. Chancellor Kent says: "An agent, acting as such, cannot take upon himself an incompatible duty. He cannot have an adverse interest or employment." 2 Kent, Comm. 618; 4 Kent, Comm. 438. It is true that, in the opinion of Judge Marvin before cited, the only remedy for the wrong stated is that "a person thus having an interest in the salvage cannot earn commissions." But that opinion was entirely upon the question of costs, expenses, and commissions. The question of salvage was not before him. Neither of the cases under his consideration were cases of this character, and his decision cannot be accepted therefore as conclusive upon the point under examination. But it cannot be doubted what would have been his decision had the question arisen, as is plainly intimated by such positive language as the following. He says: "If he conceal his interests the law presumes a fraud, and if he makes it known the master knowingly betrays the interests of his owners." And in his work on Wrecks and Salvage (section 94) he adds to the statement that "he can earn no commissions," and, if a salvor, "he may forfeit his salvage." In the well known case of Houseman v. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40, the only fraud charged appeared to have been presumed from the fact that Houseman, while interested in the salvage, became an agent.

The master had a right to settle his salvage by arbitration or agreement if he considered time and expense could be saved thereby, if he did it fairly and honestly; and the question of amount of salvage, when submitted to arbitration, did not necessarily establish or even raise the presumption of fraud, but was a question of judgment, and would at the most but entail a diminution. The decision of the court plainly declares that placing the business of assisting in defending a claim for salvage in the hands of a party himself interested in "pushing it to the highest possible amount" was a fraud, and tainted the entire proceeds of the service. Judging from the language of the court in that case, there is no question in my mind what its decision would have been had the question of Houseman's interests and his peculiar relation with the property been before it unconnected with other suspicious circumstances. It is nowhere alleged that Houseman did anything improper in the matter further than accepting the agency. It is not alleged that he attempted or endeavored in any way to prevent the master's coming to Key West, or that he used any influence either in naming the arbitrators or in inducing a high rate of salvage. The question seems to have turned entirely on the presumption of fraud on account of the position occupied by him, and that the court deemed sufficient. It is not alleged that the arbitrators were either interested in the result or dishonest, nor could any court not knowing the testimony before them, or the manner in which the case was presented, declare that they had not acted in good faith.

The question of amount of salvage to be given under different circumstances is a delicate and difficult one; varying much with the condition of the case, and influenced greatly oftentimes by what might appear under other circumstances to be trivial matters. Very seldom is the value of the cargo taken out of a vessel a limit to a salvage compensation. A slight difference in describing the course or force of the wind, or in giving the depth of water, the character of the bottom, or the time or height of the tide, the direction of a current, or the position of an anchor, make a vessel appear to have been exposed to great danger or in comparative safety; or show that the conduct of the salvors was praiseworthy and entitled to liberal reward, or that it was improper, fraudulent, and liable to censure, instead of compensation. Under a false or misstated showing of a case, an able and honest court, as well as a board of arbitrators, may be misled, and decree an exorbitant and unjust salvage. Upon this account, if on no other, the law does, and should demand and require, not only apparent good faith, but disinterested zeal, in all parties pretending in any way to represent the absent owners of the property.

This of all classes of agency should be treated with the strictest construction of law, and the positive prohibitions against any one's occupying inconsistent, incompatible, and illegal positions should be enforced. Agents of this class are appointed ex necessitate rei. The owners of the property are forced by disaster into entrusting their interests to strangers whom they are unable to meet personally, whose characters they are unacquainted with, and of whose peculiar connections or relations with the property through the same disaster they are uninformed and unaware. Certainly no proctor of this or any other court would be permitted to defend a suit in which he had a direct interest as plaintiff or libellant. And if such a position was accepted and acted upon unknown to the court, would any court, when informed of his peculiar relations to the property, give judgment in his favor as against the parties he had been representing and pretending to defend in their absence? But the relation of an agent or consignee in such a case as this is fully as confidential as that of an attorney or proctor, and if there is any difference, he stands in a more delicate position. He is the master's adviser in all things, his opinions are constantly sought and listened to, and his opportunities for influence far greater than those of a proctor or attorney. The master is under the advice and influence of the agent from the time of his arrival in port; while frequently the proctor is not seen or consulted for weeks, and then but perhaps for a short time, on special occasions and technical points. In reality the proctor is recommended and employed by the agent, and therefore is more or less directly under his influence and control.

The ease with which a plausible, agreeable and affable agent may, if so disposed, imperceptibly and without fear of detection, through constant association, satisfy a master, that the rescue of his vessel was most meritorious, that the danger in which he was placed was imminent, and that the peril was most certainly impending, so that he can listen to a highly colored and exaggerated statement of the facts of the case without perceiving their unfair character, or even upon the witness stand himself, give unintentionally a coloring to the circumstances of the disaster prejudicial to the interests of the property he represents, plainly declares that justice should interpose and protect property and absent owners from the influence of those whose interests are opposed to them. The education, life, and experience of a mariner fit him rather to combat successfully the danger of the elements than to resist the subtle influence of designing associates. The esprit de localite, the public sentiment of this community, is so strong in behalf of the salvors as against wrecked property, that the master stands especially in need of a disinterested agent. The fact that the property, from the commencement of the suit, is within the legal custody and control of the court, can in no way change or affect the confidential relations existing between the master and his agent, or the duties due from the agent to the owners of the property. The court never assumes to instruct or advise the master about defending a salvage suit, or interfere in those duties which belong particularly to the agent. The question is not whether in this case, the special consignee has not acted in good faith towards the property, and even sacrificed his own interests for its benefits and its behalf. Such questions the law does not permit to be raised, but at once declares positively against accepting the position he occupies. No matter how well I may be satisfied of the personal integrity of the parties, salvors and agents in this case, the position in which they have placed themselves compels me to accept the presumption of law under which they rest and the positive prohibition enforced by its principles. It is unnecessary to consider the matter further to decide that the principle of the law is too well established and determined to admit a doubt that a person having an interest in the salvage is legally disqualified from accepting an agency, and not only disqualified, but prohibited; and the law presumes bad faith towards the owners of the property from one accepting and holding such relation.

A positive presumption of the law admits no contradiction, and no application of equitable doctrine is requisite to establish it. In view of such a legal principle, what is the remedy? Wherever the question of commissions only has been raised, the courts have unhesitatingly declared that no commissions can be earned; because ordinarily commissions constitute the entire gain, profit or compensation of an agent. Does not the law go further and declare that all gain, profit or compensation, in any shape or form, earned by one occupying prohibited relations to property, shall be forfeited? That one can take nothing by his own wrong? If the prayer were that all compensation to the agent in the shape of wharfage and storage as well as commissions should be refused, it would demand serious attention. The remedy must be co-equal with the wrong, and as nearly as possible sufficient to prevent it, or the law ceases to be remedial, and becomes a dead letter. The question now is how shall such a relation as is alleged and not denied, affect the question of salvage? Is the cutting off commissions a sufficient remedy, and would such a rule suffice to enforce the legal prohibition? The question of salvage is the great question pending, and on account of which the inconsistent and incompatible relations exist. A dishonest agent might willingly sacrifice what commissions might be coming to him, or indeed in many cases any compensation whatever for the privilege of influencing the question of salvage. Rules of law are established to prevent and control the acts of men interested as it were against themselves; and if they ever affect strictly honest and upright men, it is because such honest men are in positions which could be taken advantage of by dishonest ones to the injury of others without fear of detection. If the rule of presumption of fraud touches any man who would not be guilty thereof, it is only because he occupies a relation towards others in which one of less integrity might perpetrate fraud with impunity, or could be detected only with difficulty. Where there is a positive prohibition against a person's occupying inconsistent and incompatible relations, the law presumes bad faith in one who accepts such relations, and it is unnecessary to allege or prove such bad faith to subject him to legal consequences. Bad faith is only presumed where one has placed himself in a position where misconduct is most difficult to prove.

Salvage is a gratuity beyond a quantum meruit, above a compensation pro opere et labore, a tax upon commerce for the benefit of commerce, to encourage meritorious action, and requires and demands entire good faith towards the property during the entire connection with it. The law exacts "entire good faith" in every one connected with the service, and declares that a salvor, in order to entitle himself to a compensation, must come into court with clean hands. No one violating a well-established principle or rule of law can, in justice, then, demand its interposition to award him a gratuity for honest and meritorious service. "The compensation to be awarded presupposes entire good faith, meritorious service, complete restoration, and incorruptible vigilance on the part of the salvors." Salvage is declared to be a gratuity given in the interest of commerce. May it not be reasonably declared that it would be rather for the interest of commerce that salvage should be constantly denied or refused, than that property should be placed for the purposes of defense of such a claim in the hands of those whose interest it is to increase the salvage to the highest amount? The amount of interest in the salvage of one at the same time acting as agent is the true measure of the conflict between interest and duty. By abandoning a claim for salvage at the acceptance of a consignment, no inconsistent relations are assumed; but no abandonment of the entire compensation to be earned by an agent could qualify a salvor for such position. This, being the true measure of the conflict between interest and duty, should indicate the remedy.

In the case of The Prairie Bird, [Case No. 11,365,] the question of the influence of a salvor's interest upon agency commissions was raised and briefly considered. The question of forfeiture or refusal of salvage was not raised, and although briefly considered, was not so ruled upon as to establish a precedent. The facts and circumstances in that case differed so materially from those in this that there could be no similarity of questions raised. In that case the consignment was made and the agency established before any salvage service was rendered. The agents used what means were within their power to save the property entrusted to their keeping, and thereby became entitled to a compensation. Also in The City of Houston, [Id. 2,755,] the permanent agents sent their vessels to assist the property of their principals, which was in distress from a disaster subsequent to the establishment of their agency. In neither of these cases was there any impediment in the way at the time of accepting the agency which either disqualified the party from accepting it or argued bad faith in so doing. In each of those cases the agents became salvors, if so it might be considered, or earned a meritorious agency at least, but in this case the salvors became agents. In an opinion in that case the following language was used: "There seem to be three classes of connections or relations existing between property and salvors acting as agents that may more or less affect the service rendered. First. Where the relations of principal and agent antedated the disaster, and related entirely to different matters than the saving of property, or assisting in defending a salvage cause. Second. Where the salvor has been appointed as an agent for the special purpose of saving property. And, third, where the relation of agent is accepted subsequent to the salvage service, and a part of the duties of the agency consists in advising and assisting in defending the suit.

There is no inconsistency in an agent assisting the property of his principal when in distress; but there is a palpable and declared inconsistency in a party who has a salvage claim against the property becoming an agent when a part of his duty as such agent is to assist in defending the property against that very claim. There is an impropriety of conduct which, not being considered gross or willful, does not demand an entire forfeiture of salvage, but still may reduce the compensation to a quantum meruit.

A compensation pro opere et labore or quantum meruit, being determined by fixed and established limits, and not liable to vary with exaggerated statements of the case or interested influence, may frequently be given where a salvage reward would be unquestionably refused. This being the first time to my knowledge that the settlement of this question has been directly required, and it not having been alleged or shown that the conduct of the parties in this case has been in absence of the presumption of law dishonest or unfair, I shall consider this as one of that class of cases which permits a quantum meruit, and while I cannot award what can be considered a salvage compensation, will decree what may be considered a liberal compensation for the actual services rendered.

I consider that the prohibition against a person interested in a claim for salvage, accepting and occupying at the same time the position of agent, is positive, and its enforcement mandatory upon me; that one voluntarily accepting and acting in that forbidden position does it in opposition to the declared principle of the law, and forfeits any rights that he might otherwise have against the property; that if he continues to act as agent, and claim any portion of the compensation resulting from such occupation, he may reasonably be presumed to have voluntarily abandoned his rights in a claim for salvage. The law presumes bad faith towards property by his assuming to do for it that which his interests prevent him from doing fully, and such presumption of bad faith brings with it its legal consequences. A salvor accepting such relations to the property can receive nothing more than a quantum meruit for any services rendered, under the most liberal construction of his rights, and a more strict one might entirely forfeit any claim. In this case I consider five hundred ($500) dollars a liberal compensation to be decreed for the services of the "Telegram," "Cora," and "Elida." Decree will follow accordingly. Although I shall at no time shrink from enforcing the principles of the law as understood by me, let the effect be what it may, yet it is much more satisfactory to feel that such enforcement works neither hardship nor injustice to those in interest. In this case I consider that from the combined salvage and agent's service Messrs. A. F. & C. Tift are amply and fully compensated for all services rendered the vessel, although salvage has been refused. This refusal of a salvage compensation to the owners of the "Telegram," "Cora," and "Elida" can in no way affect the other salvors either by increasing the other vessels' portions or diminishing the shares of the crews of those vessels, as no bad faith can be presumed to attach to the crew on account of the conduct of their owners.

There are still other questions which arise in the consideration of this question, among which is that of agents' commissions in the present condition of this case. Having decided, as I have, that a party accepting an agency under the circumstances is presumed to have abandoned those antagonistic interests in his claim for salvage which disqualify him from acting in such capacity, and, if not, has forfeited any rights he has under such claim, and being satisfied that the question of salvage is the true measure of the conflict between interest and duty, which, if once disposed of, leaves no objection to an agent acting and receiving full compensation for such services, I will allow the usual agency commissions. There may appear reasons for refusing commissions in this case, as all of the time he has been acting as agent he has at the same time been prosecuting a suit against the property in his charge, and has not been able as such agent to do his whole duty, but when it is once determined that under such circumstances no salvage can be earned the interest of the agent ceases at once.

In this case, although the question has not been raised, argued or considered, so as to give any decision herein the value of a precedent, the salvage having been refused, and the interest of the agent thereby disposed of, full commissions will be approved and allowed. The circumstances of a case might be such, and the relations of agent and salvor so different, as in the case of The Prairie Bird and The City of Houston, where compensation in the character of salvage is given, that in justice commissions should be denied; where there is a bona fide interest of the agent that conflicts with his duty, and yet there has been no bad faith or presumption of it in accepting the relations, and the interest is determined and decreed in the shape or character of salvage, no commissions can be earned, but in cases of this class I do not consider the law requires the enforcement of such a rule. Wherever a vessel is repaired in this port, the carpenters' bills, &c., form a proportionately large amount of the expenses upon which the consignee is entitled to his commissions; but in order for him to earn this it is necessary that he should have such a supervising interest in the contracting of the bills and keeping the time of the employees as would enable him of his own knowledge to certify to the correctness of the accounts and the necessity for the charges. It is not assumed but what a master carpenter may be as honest, trustworthy and capable as the consignee, but the consignee is the party to whom the court or absent owners look to prove and explain all such charges as well as others; they assume the responsibilities, receive the commissions, and will be expected to be able to furnish time books and substantiate any charges made for repairs, as well as in other division of expenditures.

Case No. 33.

The ACTIVE.

District Court, D. Oregon. March 12, 1866.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES—LIBEL—EXCEPTIONS.

1. In a suit for forfeiture of a vessel under section 50 of the collection act (1 Stat. 665), it is not necessary to allege or prove that the goods unladen were of foreign growth or manufacture, but simply that they were brought in such vessel from a foreign port or place.

2. An allegation in a libel that goods were unladen from a vessel within the collection district of Oregon, is equivalent to an allegation that they were unladen within the United States; it being judicially known that such district is a part of the territory and within the limits of the United States.

3. In such suit, an allegation that the goods unladen were worth $5,000, without saying at what place, port or district, is not sufficient; but it is not necessary to allege that the unloading was at a port; any place or district within the United States is sufficient.

4. An exception, that a libel does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of suit or forfeiture is too general; it should state in what particular the facts are insufficient.

5. Section 50 of the act aforesaid does not apply to an unloading of goods brought from a foreign port, within the limits of the United States, but unladen before the vessel has arrived at any port or place within a collection district; such a case falls within section 27 of said act.

[In admiralty. Libel to enforce forfeiture of vessel. Dismissed.]

Joseph N. Dolph, for libellant.
David Logan, for claimant.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought against the steamship Active, to enforce an alleged forfeiture thereof for a violation of section 50 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 665). The libel was filed October 26, 1865, and alleges that the vessel was seized by the collector of customs on that day at Portland, for the cause following: That on or about October 1, aforesaid, the Active cleared from the foreign port of Victoria for the port of Portland, in the district of Oregon, "and on said voyage was laden with and imported and brought from the said foreign port of Victoria into the United States, as part of her cargo," goods, etc., of the value at said district of $5,000; and that after the arrival of the Active on said voyage, so laden as aforesaid, within the limits of the collection district of Oregon, to wit: the Columbia river, below the port of Astoria, on October 3, aforesaid, a part of the cargo of said vessel, of the value of $5,000, "was unladen and delivered out of said steamship before she had come to the proper place to discharge her cargo, or any part thereof," or had been authorized to unlade the same by a permit from the proper officer. On December 4, the claimant—the California Steam Navigation Company—filed exceptions to the libel for insufficiency, and upon the questions raised upon these, the case has been argued and submitted. The exceptions to the libel are five in number. All but the first one are merely technical, being founded upon the alleged insufficiency of the language of the libel to completely and absolutely express, what is apparently thereby intended.

The second exception is to the effect that the libel does not allege that the goods, etc., "were brought from any foreign port or place." The language of section 50 of the collection act, is "goods, etc., brought in any ship or vessel, from any foreign port or place." The language of the libel is—"On said voyage was laden with and imported and brought from said foreign port of Victoria," etc. Omit the words "laden with and imported," and this allegation of the libel is not only in effect the same as the language of the statute, but is actually identical with it. The addition of these words does not change the sense or force of the phrase or clause, "brought from said foreign port," but only strengthens and makes it more explicit. It is not necessary to allege that the goods are of foreign growth or manufacture, or that they should be so in fact. It is sufficient if it appears that the vessel brought the goods from a foreign port, and even, whether she first took them on in such port, is, I think, immaterial. The primary objection [object] of this and other sections of the act is to prevent frauds upon the revenue, rather than to punish persons for committing them; and to accomplish this, many acts, indifferent in themselves, but which, if permitted, might be made the means of committing, or facilitating the commission of such frauds, are prohibited under penalties. A vessel arriving in the United States from a foreign port, may have dutiable goods on board, and, therefore, she is not allowed to unlade any part of her cargo, without a permit from the proper officer of the customs. This exception is disallowed.

The third exception makes the objection, that the libel does not allege that the "goods, etc., were unladen or delivered within the United States." Admitting that the libel does not contain this specific allegation, as it properly should, it contains its legal equivalent. It is alleged that the illegal unloading and delivery took place "within the limits of the collection district of Oregon, on the Columbia river, below the port of Astoria." Of whatever is established by law the court takes judicial notice, and the same need not be shown by either pleading or proof. The "collection district of Oregon" is established by act of congress, and includes the state of Oregon, which is a part of the territory, and within the limits of the United States. The allegation of the libel is therefore equivalent to a specific averment, that the unloading and delivery took place within the limits of the United States. This exception is disallowed.

The fourth exception is, that the libel does not allege that the "goods, etc., were of the value of $400 at the port or district where landed." This exception is based upon the provision in section 50, which forfeits the vessel in case the goods unladen are of the value of $400, according to the highest market price of the same, "at the port or district where landed." The libel does allege that the goods brought from the foreign port on the voyage in question, were of the value of $5,000 "at the district of Oregon," while the value of the goods illegally unladen in the district, is alleged to be worth $5,000, but without stating at what port, place or district. These allegations concerning the value of the goods do not directly, nor by necessary implication, amount to an averment as to the value of the goods unladen "at the port or district where landed." Admitting that the goods brought from the foreign port were of the value alleged, at the district of Oregon, it does not follow that the goods unladen were of such value at such district, because it is not alleged that all the goods brought into the district were unladen in it, nor can it be so presumed. The allegation, then, as to the value of the goods unladen is not helped by the one as to the goods brought, and must stand by itself; and standing alone it states the value generally and at no particular place. It may be said, however, that this general averment of value includes the particular one, that the goods unladen were of the value of $400 at the district of Oregon, and is therefore sufficient to admit the proof of the fact on the trial, or support a decree of condemnation if uncontroverted by the claimant. But this conclusion seems to be open to the objection, that of two constructions, the least natural and most favorable one to the pleader is adopted, or that an allegation which only argumentatively or by inference states the fact as to the value of the goods unladen at the port or district where unladen, is held to be equivalent to a direct and ex-PLICIT averment to that effect. With these suggestions this exception is passed over.

The fifth exception is, that the libel does not allege that the "goods, etc., were landed at any port or district within the United States." That the libel does sufficiently state that the goods were landed at a district within the United States, is shown in the opinion on the third exception. But admitting that it appeared from the libel that the Active arrived within the limits of the United States, counsel for the claimant maintains that the allegation concerning the unloading of the goods does not show a delivery in contemplation of law from the vessel. The language of the act is—"shall be unladen or delivered"—and the allegation of the libel is equally explicit and comprehensive—"were unladen and delivered out of said steamship." Nothing plainer or more certain than this is necessary. It is true that the libel does not allege that the goods were unladen at any port within the United States or elsewhere. But it is not necessary that it should. It is sufficient if it appear that the unloading was at any place or district within the United States.

The first exception is the mere general objection—"that said libel does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or forfeiture." As a matter of form this exception is not well taken. It is a general objection, like a general demurrer at law, that the facts stated in the libel are not sufficient to cause a forfeiture. The libellant is not informed by the exception in what the insufficiency consists—what fact is lacking—and must wait until the hearing, to learn from the argument what the particular objection is, without any opportunity in the meantime to confess it, if well taken, or to meet it on the hearing by argument and authority. But for the purposes of this case, the exception may be considered sufficiently explicit. No objection has been made to it by the libellant. Besides, I remember that when this cause was before me for some purpose, I intimated to counsel for the claimant that this form of exception would be deemed sufficient. Upon this suggestion, hurriedly and inconsiderately made, the exception was doubtless drawn. Since then I have examined the elementary books on the subject, and I find the rule to be that an exception must state with reasonable certainty, the particular fact, matter, thing or omission relied on, as the case may be. With this rule reason and convenience concur. Upon the argument of this exception, counsel for the claimant made the point, that the unloading described in the libel falls within section 27 of the collection act, (1 Stat. 648,) and not within section 50 thereof. Section 27 provides for a case where goods are unladen after the vessel has arrived within the limits of a collection district of the United States, or within four leagues of the coast thereof, and before she shall come to the proper place for the discharge of her cargo or some portion thereof, and be there duly authorized by the proper officers of the customs to unlade the same. The punishment prescribed for a violation of this section is a forfeiture of the goods so unladen, and a penalty of $1,000 against the master and the mate of the vessel; but the vessel itself is not forfeited.

The facts stated in the libel bring the case exactly within the terms of section 27; and the same may be said as to section 50, which provides, "That no goods, etc., brought in any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, shall be unladen or delivered from such ship or vessel, within the United States, but in open day, * * * except by special license, * * * nor at any time without a permit * * * for such unloading or delivery." The punishment prescribed for a violation of this section includes the forfeiture of the vessel "when the goods at the port or district where landed are of the value of $400." Did congress intend that section 50 should be cumulative, or only to apply to the subject after the vessel had arrived at a port? Ought the two sections be construed so that the first one should apply exclusively to all illegal unloadings prior to the vessel's arriving at a port, and the second one exclusively thereafter. The case turns upon the determination of this question. If section 50 is to have effect according to the natural meaning of its terms, then it overlaps section 27, and covers all cases of illegal unloading within the United States, and therefore the Active would be subject to forfeiture. But, if this section is to be restrained by construction, to an unloading which takes place after a vessel arrives at some port, upon the presumption that congress did not intend it to be cumulative and thus impose additional and different punishments for the same offence, then this case comes within section 27 alone, and the Active is not subject to forfeiture for the illegal unloading complained of.

Of the authorities cited on the argument only one is directly in point, and that is The Hunter, [Case No. 15,428.] In that case the libel alleged that the vessel "being bound from a foreign port to the United States, after her arrival within the limits of the United States, and before she had come to the proper place for the discharge of her cargo or any portion thereof, and before she was authorized to do so by the proper officer of the customs, did unlade six puncheons of distilled spirits, which were landed at a place within the jurisdiction of the court, without a permit," etc. In the district court, the facts being found to be as alleged, sentence of condemnation passed against the vessel. On appeal to the circuit court the decree was reversed, on the ground that the case fell within section 27, and that while it was also within the letter of section 50, it did not come within the purpose or intention of such section. Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court, and in the course of it he says: "Does section 50 meet the case laid in the libel, or refer to a vessel after her arrival at her port of discharge? The words are certainly general and broad enough, because it is stated that The Hunter had arrived within the United States. But ought not the law to be so restrained in its construction as to apply only to vessels in port? If it be not restrained, then there are two sections of the same law, on the same subject, giving double penalties for the same offence, viz: $1,000 under section 27, and $400 under section 50. The legislature may certainly do this if they please, but it is very improbable that such should be their intention. The law is then open to construction. The whole of this law previous to section 30, relates to vessels before their arrival in port, and it is clear that section 27 applies to them only in that situation. Section 30 considers them as arrived, and from that to section 49, the act regulates the conduct of the master, and the officers of the government, as to the steps preliminary to the last act to be done, viz: the permit to land the cargo. Section 49 states that the duties being paid or secured, the proper officer is authorized to grant a permit to land the cargo, which had before been reported or entered. Immediately after, and in its proper place, follows section 50, inflicting a penalty on the master and a forfeiture of the goods unladed without such permit or special license. Now, this permit cannot be granted unless a vessel has arrived at her port, nor until the previous steps required by law have been taken. * * * Section 50, then, which constitutes the crime of landing without a permit, must necessarily be confined to a landing after the vessel has reached her port of discharge, because to obtain a permit she must be in port." The case of The Hunter [Case No. 15,428] is the only direct adjudication of this question that I am aware of, and the opinion of the court contains all that can be urged in support of the defence of the claimant in this case.

Some expressions in the opinion of Mr. Justice Story in The Industry, [Case No. 7,028,] decided in 1812,—six years after The Hunter,—are in conflict with the construction given to section 50 in that case. The case was this—The Industry being bound from Havana to New York, put in to the port of Edgartown, in Martha's Vineyard, in the district of Mass. While lying there, goods exceeding $400 in value were unladen in the night from the vessel, without a permit, and put on board the brig Hannah, then lying at the same port and bound to Boston. The Industry was seized and libeled as forfeited under section 50. In the district court a decree of condemnation passed, from which an appeal was taken to the circuit court where the sentence of condemnation was affirmed. The material difference in the facts in the case of The Industry and the one before the court is this: In the latter the illegal unloading took place after the vessel had come within the limits of the United States, but before she had arrived at any port therein, while in the former such unloading took place after the arrival of the vessel at a port within the United States, although not her port of destination and discharge. The question before the court was, should section 50 be so construed as to apply to an unloading at any port within the United States, or only at such port as might appear to be the port of ultimate destination and discharge. The court held that the case was within the terms and purview of section 50—that such section covered all cases of illegal unloading at any port within the United States, whether such port was the port of final destination and discharge or not. On the argument, it appears to have been maintained on behalf of The Industry, that the case fell within section 27, and therefore it ought not to be held to come within section 50, because that would be construing the act so as to inflict double and different punishments for the same offence. In noticing this argument, Mr. Justice Story assumes for the sake of the argument, that his conclusion was equivalent to deciding that in some cases at least, sections 27 and 50 were cumulative—applied to the same act—but denies that such conclusion ought not to be maintained for that reason alone. He says: "Nor is it sufficient to authorize a court to extract a case from the express prohibitions of one section of an act that already the same offence is punished by a different penalty in another section. If the wording of both sections clearly embrace the same case, which is to be held nugatory? I know of no principle of law that would enable me to reject either. If, therefore, it should be proved that section 50 might embrace some cases (for clearly it cannot reach all) within the prohibitions of section 27, I am not aware how I would get over the express language. I should be obliged to hold the forfeitures cumulative in such cases, unless the legislature had enabled me, by direct or constructive exceptions, to escape from such a conclusion." But how far, if at all, these sections are cumulative, the court did not expressly decide. The decision of the case turned rather upon the question whether the word "port" in section 50 should be construed to include any port within the United States at which an illegal unloading might take place, although the same was not the port of final destination or discharge. The court in The Industry not only maintains what the court in The Hunter admits, that the legislature may impose cumulative penalties upon the same act or offense, but goes farther, and, as I think, correctly, and asserts that a court is not authorized to presume that cumulative penalties were not intended by the legislature against the express words of the statute to that effect.

If, upon a consideration of the act, it satisfactorily appeared that both these sections necessarily applied to an illegal unloading within the United States, before arriving at the port of discharge and obtaining a permit, as in this case, it would be the duty of the court to enforce the law as it found it, without seeking to lengthen or shorten it by an arbitrary construction, founded upon fanciful conjectures as to what the legislature may have intended, or reasons of public policy or ideas of abstract justice. As has been shown, section 50, by its terms, expressly includes this case, which is also provided for in section 27, and the act contains no "direct exception," limiting or qualifying the force or effect of these terms. In the reason of the thing, is there to be found what in the case of The Industry the court denominated a "constructive exception" to the apparent intention of congress to make these sections cumulative? The arguments drawn from matters extraneous to the words of the statute, for and against this exception—such as public policy, the object intended to be accomplished, the impropriety of double punishments, and the like are pretty evenly balanced. The object of these and other sections of the act is to prevent frauds upon the revenue. The remedy should be broad enough to meet all cases within the mischief intended to be guarded against. Now, it is manifest, that by fixing a certain point in the voyage—as a port—where the force of section 27 is to absolutely terminate, and that of 50 only to begin, it will sometimes be so difficult to determine under which of these sections an illegal unloading should be punished, that no punishment whatever would be inflicted. When a vessel has reached a port and where she is just without it, as a matter of fact, is not always susceptible of certain proof. Astoria is near twelve miles from the bar of the Columbia river, but how far the port extends from the wharf or usual anchorage abreast of the village, is uncertain. Indeed, it may be said that as section 27 first applies to a vessel arriving within the limits of the United States, it does not cease to apply until she is not only in fact in a port, but also at the proper place for the discharge of her cargo, and has a permit so to do. The language of the section appears to be such in effect. But if section 50 does not apply until this point in the progress of the vessel is reached, then there is nothing left for it to apply to, for there is no prohibition against unloading after a permit for that purpose, unless it be in the night season, for which a special license is necessary. If these sections are to be construed as not cumulative, which is to be allowed to operate according to the ordinary signification of its terms, and which is to be restrained or shortened so as to apply only to the cases not covered by the other?

The only consideration in favor of giving to section 27 the unrestrained operation, is the fact that in the nature of things it first applies to the subject—meeting the vessel as it does four leagues beyond the coast. But by its terms it follows the vessel until she has reached a port of discharge and obtained a permit to land her cargo. After this, as has been shown, there is practically nothing left for section 50 to apply to, and unless section 27 be restrained in some degree, the former is construed out of the statute. It follows that section 27 must be confined to cases of illegal unloading occurring between the shore line and a point four leagues at sea, or that these two sections overlap between such line and the port of discharge, or that section 50 does not apply at all—is excluded by section 27.

The matter standing thus I feel constrained to follow the authority of The Hunter, which is the only direct adjudication upon the question within my knowledge. That case was in all respects parallel to this—an illegal unloading within the limits of the United States, and before arrival at any port within such limits; and the court decided that it fell within the provisions of section 27 and not 50. The expressions of opinion in the later cases referred to,—The Industry, [Case No. 7,028;] The Betsey, [Id. 1,365;] The Harmony, [Id. 6,081.]—I think are against the soundness of that decision. But these cases were not similar to this upon the facts, and do not expressly decide the question here involved. Such expressions must be considered as only the dicta of the learned judges, made in the course of argument, and therefore not authoritative and binding precedents.

Decree, that the libel be dismissed; and an order that a certificate of reasonable cause of seizure be allowed. The facts being insufficient to cause a forfeiture according to the decision of the court this order is not granted on account of reasonable cause in fact, but the seizure being within the letter of the act, it is a case wherein a certificate ought to be granted on account of the doubt in the law. U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 311; The Friendship, [Case No. 5,125.]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1846.

MARITIME LIENS—SUPPLES—WAIVER—PROMISSORY NOTE.

1. The mere giving of a promissory note by the debtor for supplies furnished a ship, is no satisfaction of the debt, nor is accepting it a waiver of the lien the creditor may have had therefor.

[Cited in The Bird of Paradise v. Heyneman, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 561; The Eclipse, Case No. 4,268; The Napoleon, Id. 10,011. Questioned in Harris v. The Kensington, Id. 6,122.]

[See Sutton v. The Albatross, Case No. 13,645; Moore v. Newbury, Id. 9,772.]

2. Nor will the principle be varied, although the credit was given to the agent, or his note taken for the debt, unless it be proved that the principal had settled with the agent, and his rights would thereby be prejudiced.

[Cited in The Napoleon, Case No. 10,011.]

3. A ship built in the United States for alien residents abroad, becomes their property without any documentary title. It passes like any other chattel.

4. The right of lien for supplies against a foreign vessel rests on the maritime law, and is not affected by local legislation.

5. The departure of such vessel from the state before her arrest does not bar the lien or remedy upon it in admiralty.

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel to recover for supplies furnished. Decree for libellant.]

A. Nash, for libellant.

H. Nicoll, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. This was a suit in rem to recover the sum of $156.98, for supplies furnished the schooner before her departure from this port. She was built in this city, in the year 1845, for and on account of the claimants, who are allens, resident in South America. She was never documented as an American bottom, and was cleared and went to sea as the property of the claimants. Owing to some disaster, she shortly after returned to this port and was arrested by the libellant on this demand. The libellant, a provision dealer, sold to Rodriguez, the agent of the vessel, and for her use, provisions for her contemplated voyage, and had them stowed on board. He accepted the promissory note of Rodriguez for the amount, $156.98, and gave a receipt for the note as payment of his bill for beef and pork supplied the Active. The proctor of the libellant produced the note in court, and offered it to the proctor of the claimants to be cancelled, and has left it in court for that purpose. Rodriguez had dealt on his own account with the libellant previously, and was in good credit; but immediately after giving this note, he absconded, and was found to be insolvent.

The mere giving of a promissory note by the debtor for an existing debt is no satisfaction of the debt. [Hughes v. Wheeler.] 8 Cow. 77; The Chusan, [Case No. 2,717;] Story, Prom. Notes, §§ 104, 404. Nor is it more so if given by an agent, unless the principal proves he subsequently settled with his agent, and was damaged by allowing the amount of the note as cash paid by him. Story, Ag. § 434. No such evidence is given in this case. Upon these principles it is clear the debt remains valid and subsisting against the principals, notwithstanding the absolute credit given their agent, in this instance, also the ship's husband.

Nor do I conceive that taking a promissory note was a waiver of the lien the libellant originally had on the vessel for those supplies as against the claimants, whatever might be the effect of that act in respect to third parties bona fide acquiring rights or interests in the vessel. Whilst the note remained in circulation, or outstanding, it operated as a suspension of the lien; but on its surrender, or the offer to surrender it, the libellant was remitted to his original privilege, and could proceed in rem against the vessel, unless barred because of her domestic character. The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324; Andrews v. Wall, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 568; The Chusan, [Case No. 2,717.]

It is argued that the schooner being built in this state is necessarily subject to the local law as a domestic vessel, and that she cannot acquire the character of a foreign bottom, until documented conformably to the laws of the United States, or of the domicile of her foreign owners. I apprehend the law is otherwise. The property in a vessel under our laws is acquired and disposed of the same as any other chattel, (3 Kent, Comm. 130,) and there is no evidence that the law of the owners' domicile is different, if that fact could vary the rights and remedies of the parties. To give her the privileges and benefits of our navigation laws, she must be documented pursuant to the provisions of those laws. The absence of such documents does not prove her to be a domestic vessel; on the contrary, it subjects her to be treated as a foreign one under our revenue laws, and, by parity of reason, in all other respects. That she left the state before the demand was preferred against her, does not accordingly bar the rights of the libellant to this remedy in rem in Admiralty, because the Court takes cognizance of the demand under the marine law, and not by force of the State statute.

I shall, therefore, pronounce in favor of the libellant for $156.98, with interest from November 28, 1845, the date of the note, and his costs to be taxed; the note to be delivered to the claimants, or cancelled at their election.

[NOTE. Waiver of the lien must be by express agreement, otherwise libel in rem can be maintained, on the surrender of the note. The Eclipse, Case No. 4,268; The Nestor, Id. 10,126; The Gate City, Id. 5,267. But not where the note is outstanding, and it does not appear that it has not been negotiated. Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 611.]

Case No. 35.

The ACTIVE.

[1 Paine, 247.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April, 1809.²

REGISTRY OF VESSELS—LICENSE—FORFEITURE—EMBARGO.

1. A vessel licensed for the cod-fishery under the 32d section of the act for enrolling and licensing vessels, during the embargo laws took on board a quantity of goods without inspection at a wharf in New London, to transport about five miles to Mystic river, in the same district, but was seized when a mile and a half on her way. Holden, that although she had not violated any of the provisions of the embargo laws, she was forfeited for being employed in another trade than that for which she was licensed.

[See note at end of case.]

2. It seems, that no penalty was intended to be inflicted by the 2d section of the additional embargo law of the 25th of April, 1808, [2 Stat. 499,] for loading a vessel without inspection, but that the penalty for leaving the district without a clearance, which could be obtained only on inspection, was thought by the legislature to be alone a sufficient sanction to secure an inspection.

3. It seems, that the penalties there mentioned were intended to apply to the inspecting officers.

[In admiralty. On appeal from district court. Libel to enforce a forfeiture for violation of the act of January 9, 1808, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,'" (2 Stat. 453;) and also for violating section 32 of the act of February 18, 1793, for enrolling and licensing vessels, (1 Stat. 316.) The district court condemned both vessel and cargo. Affirmed. This decree was affirmed by the supreme court, in 7 Cranch, (11 U. S.) 100.]

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, District Judge. About the facts which produced this prosecution, there is little or no controversy. It appears that the sloop Active, being regularly licensed to carry on the cod-fishery, and owned by Henry Billinger and William A. Morgan, who now appear as claimants of the vessel, on the 5th of July last, while lying at a wharf in the port of New-London, took on board the articles mentioned in the libel, for the purpose of transporting them to Mystic river in Groton, in the same district, about five miles from said wharf. That Gates, who claims the principal part of the cargo, never was an owner, master, or mariner of said sloop. That the cargo was put on board without the knowledge, and not under the inspection of any of the revenue officers of the district of New-London. And that the vessel, being then on her way to Mystic river, was seized about one mile and a half below the town, by a boat belonging to a revenue cutter.

The first objection taken to this proceeding of the sloop Active, and urged as a cause of condemnation, is the manner in which the cargo was put on board, which it is insisted ought to have been done under the inspection of a revenue officer. This, it is thought, is rendered necessary by the 2d section of the supplementary embargo law, passed 25th April, 1808, [2 Stat. 430.] taken in connexion with the 27th and 50th sections of the collection law. By the first, no vessel of this description could, during the continuance of certain acts, receive a clearance, (which had been considered necessary by the preceding section,) unless the lading were made under the inspection of the proper revenue officers, subject to the same regulations and penalties as are provided by law for the inspection of goods imported into the United States.

If the legislature by this clause, intended to subject a vessel and cargo to forfeiture for the omission of a regular inspection previous to her lading, it must be allowed that they have not been very happy in the choice of their expressions. If there be any ambiguity in a penal act, and consequently considerable doubt whether a forfeiture has accrued, it will always be a very good reason to acquit the property. It cannot be the duty of a court, by nice discriminations and constructions, to bring within the operation of a penal statute any case which is not very obviously within the plain provisions of it. The court, so far from being of this opinion, is inclined to think that the only purpose for which an inspection was to be undergone, was to entitle the vessel to a clearance, without which, she could not depart from any district of the United States, without subjecting herself to forfeiture, which was a sufficient security for the observance of that ceremony.

On looking into the sections of the collection law which have been referred to, the court does not perceive one word said of inspection, or any penalty imposed for not submitting to one. The one inflicts a penalty for landing goods without proper authority; and the other for landing them at night, or without a permit. All the clauses of the act which relate to inspection, are directory to the public officers; and should a collector neglect to put an inspector on board, or grant a permit to land without that formality, whatever penalties he might incur himself, neither goods or vessel would be forfeited. As no forfeiture, therefore, arises from the mere circumstance of goods which are imported not having been inspected previous to their landing, how can this court undertake to say, without some more explicit declaration, that the bare putting them on board without such ceremony, shall work a confiscation of them? Besides, she was still within the district, and might have applied for a clearance, when it would have been the collector's duty to have the lading inspected. But if he had granted a clearance without that form, it can hardly be supposed that his negligence or omission would have occasioned a forfeiture. The only way in which this section of the embargo law can be understood, and which is also its grammatical construction, is that the officers of the revenue, in performing the inspection, are to be subject to the penalties, &c. there referred to.

It would be highly gratifying to the court, to obviate with as much facility and as much satisfaction to itself, the other ground which is stated in the libel as a cause of condemnation, which is that this vessel has been employed in a trade other than that for which she was licensed. The 32d section of the act for enrolling and licensing vessels is very express on this point. [1 Stat. 316.] If any licensed ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, she and the cargo found on board of her are forfeited. If the act which has been under consideration were liable to the charge of ambiguity, there appears no room for any uncertainty here. But to avoid the force of terms so plain, and which seem to admit of but one meaning, it is insisted, that here was no employment of the Active in any trade; and that if there was, it was not such trade as the legislature contemplated.

As to the fact of employment, it appears that the Active was stopped in her passage from New-London to Mystic river; and she was taken in the very act of transporting goods from the one place to the other, or in other words of trading between those two places. And whether a freight was to be had or not, made no difference, because it is the employment of her that way that constituted the illegality of the transaction. If then this was the kind of trade that was prohibited to her, one single act in violation of the prohibition, and whether she had reached her destined port or not, is sufficient to produce a forfeiture. Being actually employed or engaged in a trade for which she was not licensed, while she was going to Mystic river, there could be no necessity to wait until the voyage was ended.

But this cannot be the trade intended to be interdicted. It is only foreign trade, or such whereby the revenues of the United States may be defrauded. This is said with some plausibility, and it was supposed on the argument that such were the terms of the license, and of the condition of the bond given to obtain it. But on looking at the license and the law, it will be found that the first, besides declaring that the Active shall not be employed in any trade whereby the public revenue shall be defrauded, contains also a declaration that the owner had sworn that she should not be employed in any other way than is therein specified. The condition of the bond likewise contains a security against both these violations. It is true that the 33d section has a provision in favour of a bona fide importer of goods on which the duties have been secured, but this is only an exemption in the particular case from the operation of the preceding section which takes in the whole cargo, and is no proof that no other than foreign trade was intended. It seems to be the policy of the legislature to confine every vessel within its proper sphere; but whatever may have been the intention here, the language is too plain to indulge any latitude of construction; and when that be the case, a court should resist, which it is always easy to do, those inclinations to liberality of construction which often border on legislation, and which are too apt to arise from the supposed hardship of the case. This may be one of that description, but from the impression made, I feel it my duty, after mature consideration, and for the reasons stated, to affirm the sentence of the district court.

[NOTE. This cause was carried to the supreme court,—7 Cranch, (11 U. S.) 100,—which held that there was no forfeiture under the embargo acts because the vessel was seized in port, and a departure from port without a clearance was necessary to consummate the offense; that the vessel and a portion of her cargo were forfeited under section 32 of the registry law, 1 Stat. 316, but that the remaining portion of the cargo, which was shown to belong to one Gates, was excepted from the forfeiture, as coming under the provision of section 33, which declares “that in all cases where the whole or any part of the lading or cargo on board any ship or vessel shall belong bona fide to any person or persons other than the master, owner, or mariners of such ship or vessel, and upon which the duties shall have been previously paid or secured, according to law, shall be exempted from any forfeiture under this act, anything therein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.”]

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1862.
PRIZE — EXAMINATION OF MASTER AND CREW AS WITNESSES—SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

1. The rule of the prize law is, that the master and some of the crew of the prize vessel must be brought in to be examined as witnesses to the facts attending the seizure.

2. The rule will be dispensed with in a case where there is no physical means of complying with it on the part of the captors.

3. Where the personal production of the ship's company is satisfactorily excused, the court will suspend proceedings in the cause, or admit secondary evidence.

4. In this case none of the ship's company being produced as witnesses, and there not being sufficient evidence to condemn the vessel under the practice of the English prize court, the court allowed the libellants time, not exceeding a year and a day from the institution of the suit, to produce proof that the vessel was arrested in fact and was lawful prize of war, and that the more direct testimony usually produced to that end was not legally at command of the libellants.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel, with her lading, was captured in Pamlico river, [sound] North Carolina, March 6, 1862, by the United States steamer Ceres, and was remitted to this port for adjudication, and was here libelled by the libellants as prize of war. The attachment issued on the libel was served on the vessel June 17, 1862, and was returned as ground for the proclamation in court July 8 thereafter, and no person appearing thereon, judgment by default was entered against the vessel and her lading.

The general practice of the prize court requires, in cases of vessels seized, that the master and others of his crew on board at the time of the capture shall be brought in with the vessel, to be examined as witnesses to the facts attending the seizure. Wheat. Mar. Capt. 280. So vigorously in its terms is this doctrine laid down in the books, that it is denounced as fatal to the enforcement of the arrest by the court if the captors fail to produce in the prize court those members of the captured vessel. The Dame Catharine de Workeem, 1 Hay. & M. 244; Introduction Godol. Adm. Jur. 25, 26; The Henrick and Maria, 4 C. Rob. [Adm.] 47.

The ordinary rule in prize cases is, that, in the first instance, the evidence shall be drawn from the claimants. The Haabet, 6 C. Rob. [Adm.] 58, note. The requirement must, however, be subject to the necessities of the case; and it is only imperative that this rule of proof be fulfilled when there is physical means of complying with it on the part of the captors.

Commodore Rowan, who remitted the prize to the charge of the court, advised the court by letter that no persons present at the capture were sent with the vessel because she sank after her capture, and those persons were no longer present to be forwarded. The evidence is not made clear or precise as to the facts which transpired. It is stated, in the papers coming before the court with the vessel, that she was driven from her anchorage after her capture, and was sunk in North Carolina waters, and that the vessel's company were thus separated from her.

There is no full testimony as to these intimations, nor as to what circumstances have, in fact, kept the crew away; but the distance to the place is so considerable as to excuse some delay in collecting explanatory proofs if the law demands them in this condition of the case. If the ship's company are destroyed in battle on the capture, or abandon the vessel and escape, or other reasonable cause prevents or excuses their personal production by the captors as witnesses in court, then, unquestionably, it is within the competency of the court to suspend proceedings in the cause, or admit secondary evidence, provided a delictum is charged which justified the arrest of the vessel. The papers brought in as belonging to the vessel indicate that she was documented by Confederate authority in a blockaded port for another blockaded port, and was thus palpably enemy property; and no doubt the American prize rules, strictly carried out in practice, excuse further proof, after a regular default in court and adequate evidence given aliunde of actual capture made. No claimant has intervened for the vessel or cargo, and evidence sufficient to authorize her condemnation, under the practice of the English prize court, not having been laid before this court, a respite of sentence in the case may be made, to enable the libellants to offer further proofs showing that the vessel was arrested in fact, and was, at the time of her capture, lawful prize of war, the more direct testimony usually produced to that end not being legally at command of the libellants. A final decree in the cause will, accordingly, be deferred to such convenient period as may be asked for by the district attorney, not exceeding a year and a day from the time of the institution of this suit, to enable the libellants to produce further proofs as to the facts upon which they seek the condemnation and forfeiture demanded by the libel.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Cargo condemned, on further proof, for a violation of blockade by the vessel.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured early in March, 1862, in Pamlico sound, North Carolina, by the United States gunboat Ceres, and were brought to this port and here libelled as prize, June 17, 1862, and on return of the monition and notice, no one appearing to defend the property seized, the case was submitted to the court for decision. On examination it was found that no legal proof was furnished of the capture of the vessel and of the cause of it; and on motion of the United States attorney, July 18, 1862, a year and a day were allowed to the captors to bring in further proofs.

On such proofs being taken and submitted to the court, it is made to appear that the vessel and cargo were seized in Pamlico sound, and belonged to residents within enemy territory; that after the capture the vessel and cargo were sunk at Hatteras inlet in a gale of wind, and were subsequently raised by pilots and brought by them to this port for the captors; and that the crew found on board at the time of the capture had left the prize, and have not been brought into this port for examination. No defense having been interposed, and it appearing satisfactorily to the court, on the evidence of witnesses present at the seizure, that the vessel and cargo were enemy property, it is ordered that a decree of condemnation for that cause be entered in the suit.

Order accordingly.

[In admiralty. Libel by William Reynolds and others against the ship Ada for wages. Decree for libellants.]

This was a libel for wages, and was heard on the following statement of facts, agreed by the parties:

'The libellants shipped on board the barque at Liverpool, according to the shipping articles, which are to be exhibited to the judge at the hearing. From Liverpool the ship came to the port of Savannah, where she arrived about the 20th of May. She lay there about ten days, and discharged her cargo. She then ran in ballast to Calais, Maine, where she arrived about the 20th of June. She discharged ballast immediately, and in the course of three or four weeks began to fit up on her present voyage. The libellants asked their discharge of the master several times after they ascertained the destination of the ship. The first time was about three weeks prior to the commencement of their proceedings before the magistrate. They also, through their proctor, F. A. Pike, made a demand, about a week before commencement of proceedings, upon the master for their discharge, and for their wages. In asking for a discharge, the reason given was, that they did not wish to go to California, two of the men (Reynolds and Clanahan) stating in addition that they wished to go back to Liverpool as their clothes were there. The crew was not furnished with lime-juice on their passage from Savannah to Calais, although they asked it of the steward, who said there was none for them. No complaint was made to the master on this account. The ship is now loaded for California, and has engaged fifteen or twenty passengers for that destination, but intends going to St. Andrews, in the province of New Brunswick, first, for the purpose of clearing out for San Francisco. The first mate was discharged in Savannah; the second mate was discharged in Calais about the 10th of August. Reynolds was absent three times from the vessel without leave; the first time, he was gone about an hour during dinner; second time, absent from eleven o'clock till evening; the third time, was absent about thirty-six hours to Eastport, to see the British consul about this matter. Hughes was absent with Reynolds from eleven o'clock till evening, and again at the time Reynolds went to Eastport. Clanahan was absent the same as Hughes. Miller was absent with the others from eleven till evening, and again about two hours. After each of the above times the men returned to the vessel and went to work as usual. The vessel had been coppered and an extra passenger-house built upon deck, and two of the men had asked their discharge, before any of the above absences. They remained on board the ship doing duty as usual, until the day of trial before the magistrate, when they refused to go on board, and have not since been on board.

'The respondent claims a forfeiture, of the several libellants, for absence without leave from the vessel as aforesaid, under the provision of the shipping articles as follows:

William Reynolds, three times absent,	£6.
Hugh Clanahan, twice "	£4.
Robert Hughes, " "	£4.
John Miller, " "	£4.

The accounts annexed against the libellants are correct, except that they claim that the charge against each of them for amounts paid in Savannah for fines, for breach of the peace, should be deducted; for this reason, after the master paid the fines, three men and two boys left the ship, and, on account of his being short handed, these men refused to get the ship under way and go to sea, and to induce them to do so the captain promised to remit those charges, and the men came with the vessel, short handed, to Calais.'

WARE, District Judge. This is a suit on a foreign contract, in which all the parties are foreigners, and is to be governed by the laws of the country where it was made, and to which the parties belong. The libellants proceeding on their lien against the ship herself, and that being within the jurisdiction of this court, whatever scruples may be entertained by courts of admiralty in other countries, there is no doubt according to the decisions of our courts, and in my opinion there is none on general principles, that this court, notwithstanding the alienage of the parties, may take cognizance of the case, and enforce the lien, if by law the libellants are entitled to it. Conk. Pr. Adm., pp. 24-37. The Jerusalem, [Case No. 7,293;] The Bee, [Id. 1,219.] In suits in rem, the locus rei sitae necessarily gives the jurisdiction, because it is only in the courts of that country that a jus in re can be directly enforced, though in foreign contracts the law of the place, where the contract was made, furnishes the rule of decision. The libellants shipped at Liverpool, April 4th, 1849, for a voyage, which is described in the shipping articles to be from the port of Liverpool 'to Savannah, and any other port or ports in the United States of America, and any port or ports in British North America, and any port or ports in the West India Islands, at the discretion of the master, or consignees, as freight or cargo may offer, and back to her final port of discharge, of Great Britain and Ireland; term of time on the voyage not to exceed twelve months. The vessel's complement of officers, seamen, and apprentices, eleven in number, and any over or above the number of said complement to be considered as extra hands.' The vessel performed her voyage to Savannah, and having discharged her cargo there, went in ballast to Calais. There the libellants, having learned that the master was preparing for a voyage to San Francisco, in California, refused to go on that voyage, and demanded their discharge and wages. Four and a half of the twelve months, to which the time of service was limited, had then expired.

The master contends that the refusal of the libellants to proceed on that voyage was a breach of their duty, by which they have forfeited all right to the wages they had earned for their past services. The libellants, on the other hand, say that this new voyage to California was a deviation from that originally contemplated and for which they engaged themselves, and amounted to a breach and dissolution of the contract, and released them from its obligations; that they might, therefore, well demand their discharge, and to be paid their wages, for the time they had served.

The right of the libellants to their discharge, and to be paid their wages, has been ably vindicated by their counsel on several grounds; but they may perhaps all substantially be resolved into one, at least in the view that I take of the case, it will be necessary for me to consider only one, and that is this, admitting, what is denied by the counsel, that San Francisco is properly a port of the United States, not having been made such by any laws, whether it can in any just sense be deemed to be one of the ports contemplated by this contract. Every contract is morally binding on the parties in the sense in which it is understood by them at the time when it is made; and it is to the same extent, and no further, binding on them in law, when this sense can be clearly ascertained. 'Whatever,' says Paley, 'is expected on one side, and is known to be so expected on the other, is to be deemed a part or condition of the contract.' Moral Philosophy, bk. 3, pt. 1, c. 6. This proposition I hold to be as sound in law as it is in morals. All the rules for the interpretation of contracts have for their object to ascertain what this common understanding of the parties is, and when it is discovered, the law comes forward and applies itself to their mutual and common intention, and holds the parties bound by their agreement thus far and no farther. It is commonly said that the intention of the parties is to be collected from the words in which the contract is expressed. This, as a general proposition, is perfectly true; but it is not universally true that we are to look at the words alone. The greatest of the Roman jurisconsults has told us that, In conventionibus contrahentium voluntatem, potius quam verba, spectari placuit. Dig. 50, 16, 219; Papinianus, Lib. 2, Responsorum. It is the intention that is sought. The language may be ambiguous and susceptible of two interpretations; or it may have a popular sense, in local usage, or in its application to the subject-matter of the particular contract, more or less comprehensive than the words naturally import when taken by themselves. In these cases we are obliged to look beyond the words. Now I think that the case before us is one to which the latter distinction may apply. Within the words of the description of this voyage, the master might carry his crew to any port in British North America. But the British possessions extend across the whole breadth of the continent, and without going beyond the literal sense of the language of the contract, he might carry them on a voyage to the extreme north-west coast. Can it be imagined that the owners, when they prepared this shipping paper to be read to the crew, supposed, unless some verbal explanations were given at the time, that the men would understand that they were binding themselves to go a voyage to the mouth of the Columbia river, or to Vancouver's island, if the master chose to carry them there. The description would naturally suggest to them a voyage to those ports which were familiar to the commerce of their country, and which were frequently and ordinarily visited for the purposes of trade, and in the popular and usual sense, they would suggest nothing more. That is, it would be taken to be a voyage in which the vessel might visit any of the American or British ports on the eastern shore of the continent. This is the interpretation that I should have given to the contract, if the description of the voyage had terminated with merely naming the ports which might be visited, in the order in which they stand in the shipping articles. They would, without some further explanations were given, suggest to the seamen a voyage embracing the ports on the eastern shore of the continent and nothing more. It was justly urged, by the counsel for the libellants, that, if there is a fair and reasonable doubt as to the true meaning of the articles, the seamen are on every principle entitled to claim a construction favorable to themselves. It is the owners who give the description of the voyage, and on general principles applying to all contracts, if the language is ambiguous or uncertain in its meaning, the construction shall be against the party who uses it, because he is bound to express himself clearly, and this principle applies with all its force to contracts between owners, who are always men conversant in business and shrewd and watchful in looking to their own interests, and seamen, who are proverbially careless, improvident, and ignorant. The disparity in the condition of the parties imposes on the court the duty to take care that the improvidence of seamen is not entrapped, by the superior watchfulness and sagacity of owners, into engagements that they did not intend to make.

In the present case, this construction of the contract is forfeited by another clause in the articles, which appears to me to be entirely decisive. It is the limitation of time. The whole period of the service was not to exceed twelve months. The first port the vessel was to make was Savannah, and if a voyage around Cape Horn to the north-western coast of the continent had been contemplated, it is incredible that the time should have been limited to twelve months. The decisions of the high court of admiralty in England, referred to in the argument, though not in cases precisely parallel in their facts with those of the present case, bear considerable analogy to them, and from the tone and language in which they were pronounced, I cannot entertain a doubt that an English court would hold, that the voyage to San Francisco was such a deviation from the voyage contemplated by the shipping articles, as to discharge the seamen from their contract; that the voyage was broken up as to them, and that they are entitled to their wages. The Countess of Harcourt, 1 Hag. [Adm.] 248. The Minerva, Id. 347. The George Home, Id. 370. The Cambridge, 2 Hag. [Adm.] 243. If wages are decreed, the master contends that there are equitable deductions to be made from the amount due; in the first place, certain sums which he paid for the libellants in Savannah, for fines imposed on them by the local authorities of that place, for breaches of the peace. The payment of these sums is admitted, and it is not denied that they constitute an equitable set-off against their wages, unless the claim of the master has, for a valid consideration, been released, and in my opinion it has. When the vessel was ready to be got under way to leave Savannah, she was found to be short-handed, three of the men, and two of the boys having deserted. The vessel's complement was eleven hands, including the officers, so that she had but barely more than half her complement left. In this state of things, the crew refused to proceed on the voyage, and to induce them to forego their determination, the master promised to release this claim against them. I should not be inclined to hold the master bound by this engagement, if it had been extorted from him under the pressure of necessity, without any reasonable or colorable pretext. But this can hardly be considered as a mere wanton refusal to do their duty, on the part of the crew. Whether, on the requirement of the master, they might have been bound to proceed on the voyage, with half a crew, being then in a port where additional hands might be obtained, I do not think it necessary to decide. By going with half their complement of men, they subjected themselves to do double duty, and if the weather should prove boisterous, to increased danger, and at the same time relieved the owners from the expense of nearly half the ordinary crew. My opinion is that their consent thus to proceed on the voyage, under the circumstances, was a sufficient consideration to uphold this release. The master also claims a deduction of the amount of certain forfeitures, alleged to have been incurred by the libellants. These, if any have been actually incurred, arise under St. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, § 7, (Sept. 5, 1844), not for desertion, as they seem to be considered by the master, but for temporary absence without leave. This statute provides that a seaman shall forfeit, for every willful absence from the ship, without leave, or refusal to do his duty, two days' pay, and for every twenty-four hours' absence six days' pay, or, at the option of the master, the expenses necessarily incurred in hiring a substitute; provided always, that no forfeiture shall be incurred, unless the fact of the seaman's absence, or neglect, or refusal to do his duty shall be entered on the ship's log-book. These absences were for short periods, the longest but half a day, except one of thirty-six hours for the purpose of consulting the British consul on the subject of this deviation from the original voyage. This was a very proper and prudent act on their part, and could in no sense be called a willful absence. But, with respect to all of them, there is this fatal defect in the evidence. It is not mentioned, in the agreed statement of facts, that the absences were noted in the ship's log. The admission of the absences, in the statement of facts, is not sufficient to cure this defect. This entry is not required merely as a medium of proof, but for the purpose of showing that it was regarded, at the time, as a criminal act on the part of the seamen, and to prevent the master, on any subsequent difficulty with the seamen, from bringing forward past absences, and creating forfeitures, when, at the time, they were considered, if not entirely venial, as not deserving to be punished by statute forfeitures. Decree for libellants.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 20, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PATENTABILITY—HYDROMETERS.

[On appeal from the refusal of the commissioner of patents to grant a patent for an hydrometer consisting of a metal stem, in combination with a vulcanized rubber or gutta-percha bulb, it was shown that hydrometers made wholly of metal or wholly of rubber were well known, but that in the former the bulb was necessarily made so thin that a blow or fall would indent it, and destroy the utility of the instrument, while in the latter the stem could not be graduated with the necessary accuracy and minuteness, owing to its color and substance. It was further shown that appellant's device was free from each of these defects, and also that it was less subject to corrosion by acids than the metal hydrometers. Held, that this device is a new and useful invention, and therefore patentable.]

Appeal [by James Adams] from the decision of the commissioner of patents refusing to grant him letters patent for his improvement in hydrometers. [Reversed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. He states his claim thus: "What I claim as my invention and desire to secure by letters patent is the construction of a hydrometer or other instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids substantially as herein described by combining with its bulb and lower part made of hard vulcanized India rubber, gutta-percha or any other analogous substances, a graduated upper-stem made of metal." The specification states the nature of the invention to be one which consists in the construction of a hydrometer or other instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids with its bulb and lower part of hard vulcanized India-rubber, gutta-percha or analogous substances, and its stem of silver or other metal, by which construction, the instrument is made to possess advantages over one made wholly of metal, or one made wholly of India-rubber or gutta-percha, inasmuch as the bulb is less liable to have its form changed by being carelessly laid or thrown down or let fall, than the metal bulb, and the stem is capable of finer and more accurate graduation and less liable to have its graduation defaced, and less liable to be bent than the India-rubber or gutta-percha stem. On the 8th of October, 1860, the commissioner adopted for his decision the report of the examiners, dated the 6th of the same month, which is in substance as follows: "It is admitted upon all sides that hydrometers have been made entire of metal and gutta-percha; indeed they have been made of glass and of ivory or bone. This applicant has made one part of metal and part of gutta-percha, the stem upon which the scale is placed being of silver, or other metal, and the bulb of gutta-percha; in other words, he takes a metal hydrometer, and in place of its bulb substitutes one made of gutta-percha. By doing this his bulb effects nothing more than has been done by the gutta-percha bulb when connected with a gutta-percha stem, and his metal stem effects nothing more than has been done when a metal stem has been connected with a metal-bulb. Viewed then in this light there is no invention involved in this application. Suppose an application should be made for a gutta-percha stem and a metal bulb—shall a patent be granted for that? This application is but the converse of that, so to speak; we do not think that this interchange of material clothes the application with anything which can be regarded as patentable. We must therefore recommend its final rejection, which was accordingly done by the commissioner."

From this decision as before stated, Adams appealed, and filed three reasons of appeal.

The first is: Because every requisite of the statute was complied with, and all these conditions, to entitle him to claim his right to a patent.

Second. Because commissioner fails to show or even assert that the invention (the combination claimed) is not sufficiently useful and important as required, &c.; whereas it appears fully, clearly, and incontestably from the specification and the evidence in the case that the applicant by his combination of an India-rubber bulb with a metal stem, produces a better and more perfect instrument than is attainable by making it all of India-rubber or all metal and that such varied elements have never before been combined in a hydrometer.

Third. In asserting that the applicant's invention is a mere interchange of material, devoid of new or improved results, and while failing to show that a hydrometer ever before had been made combining an India-rubber bulb with a metal stem to be the converse of the former, inasmuch as the first named combination obviates defects which the last named would possess in a larger degree than is incidental even to hydrometers as heretofore made of one and the same material.

The commissioner's report in reply to the foregoing reasons is as follows: The claim of the appellant was to the combination of a metallic graduated stem with a bulb of gutta-percha vulcanized rubber or any other analogous substance for a hydrometer or other instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids. This the office regarded as but a double use of a familiar combination. The metallic stem is necessary for extremely nice graduation and is perfectly familiar when united to a metallic bulb, but such could not be used under all circumstances with economy, as with acids, for example, nor could the combined one claimed be safely relied on under the same circumstances. It is familiar also to make the whole instrument of the rubber, but in this the stem is not susceptible of the nice graduation. The commissioner says: "I am still * * * of opinion that the applicant has effected no patentable invention in taking a familiar stem and a familiar bulb and uniting them in one hydrometer. He has effected no new result thereby, nor any improvement in the instrument. Like the metallic pen and rubber handle with which I write, his instrument constitutes but another example of a combination of metal and rubber that, in the absence of any new result, constitutes but a double use. These are the only remarks I desire to submit in addition to those of the office decision of the 8th of October last."

Accompanying the foregoing proceedings were sundry testimonials of practical mechanics, consisting of a mathematical instrument maker having charge of the United States hydrometers, a member of the analytical and consulting chemists, two other mathematical instrument makers, an ex state inspector of domestic liquors, New York, and of other respectable skillful mechanics. The instrument is spoken of as an important novelty that will be a valuable acquisition to distillers, inasmuch as it combines the advantages of both the rubber and silver hydrometers without their defects. This feature all intelligent inspectors of distilled spirits will soon discover. And as an essential improvement, these, together with the decision, reasons of appeal, report of the commissioner, and all the original papers and vouchers according to previous notice given of the time and place of hearing, were duly laid before me by the commissioner. The appellant appeared by his attorney, and filed his written argument and submitted the case.

The present is a claim presented for a combination of parts of two well known machines or instruments by which the defects existing in each of said machines are entirely avoided, and by which a more useful and perfect instrument is made. The office rejected it upon the ground of a double use of a familiar combination. The two referred to are one entirely of silver, the other wholly of the rubber; none is shown like the present one, with a metal stem and a rubber bulb. In point of form then the proposed change must be admitted to be new. Is it substantial and useful? If it is, then there is invention; otherwise not. In order to understand its nature it will be stated that it is essential to the perfection of the hydrometer that when left to float freely in the liquid, and for the displacement of a bulk of that liquid which shall be just equal in weight to the entire instrument and rendered accurately, it must stand perfectly vertical. The defects alleged to exist in the instruments alluded to in the report are as to the entire metal instrument. Its bulb, in order to be of the proper weight and to avoid too much expense, must be made very thin. Therefore, a fall, a slight blow, or other accident will cause an indentation that will destroy its accuracy; the effect thus produced would destroy the essential requisite just before stated. Besides, as stated by the commissioner in his report relating to the metal instrument, it is admitted that "such bulb could not be used under all circumstances with economy, as with acids, for example." If he could have been satisfied that the combined one could, it is probable this opinion would have been different.

As to the other, the hard rubber. Its color renders it difficult to distinguish the marks indicated upon its graduated scale. If painted white, when employed even for testing the strength of alcoholic liquid, the incisions which have been painted white soon become filled with substances of another color, and when used as a saccharometer there will be evident additional causes which will obscure the white color, and render the whole so nearly of one hue as to prevent the degrees upon the scale from being easily read. Besides, the degrees cannot be marked in white with the same nice accuracy with which they are cut upon the stem, whereas in a silver instrument the marking of the scale can not only be made with the greatest accuracy, but use will render them even more legible. With respect to this also the commissioner admits that, where the whole instrument is of hard rubber, "the stem is not susceptible of the nice graduation." This must therefore be admitted to be important. Again, the hard rubber instrument when immersed in hot liquids, the stem is liable to spring or bend, which, of course, would render the instrument defective; and, again, hard rubber, being a non-conductor, is liable to be materially affected by electric influences.

It is contended that the great desideratum to obtain an instrument which will unite the advantages of each of those before mentioned, and avoid the objections to both, has been effected by the appellant's improved instrument.

In forming my opinion in this case, I have been desirous duly to appreciate the argument which has led the commissioner to the conclusion to which he has been brought. After allowing it all the strength it can claim, drawn from the source which I suppose it has been I feel bound to yield to the preponderating weight of a practical knowledge from skillful mechanics and others who have tried the instruments, and from persons accustomed to the use of instruments of that kind, and who speak of this instrument in the most decisive and strong language as accomplishing the purpose and end claimed for the improvement by the appellant, and under such circumstances, I think the case referred to by the office does not apply.

There is therefore error in the decision of the commissioner, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled, and it is ordered and directed that patent issue as prayed.

APPLICATION FOR EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT.

Where an application was made to a register verbally, by a creditor who had proved his debt, for an order for the examination of the bankrupt, and was not supported by petition or affidavit, and the register held that the application was insufficient: Held, That such application ought to have been made on petition or affidavit, duly verified, showing good cause for the granting of the order.

In bankruptcy.

BY THE REGISTER. In the course of the proceeding in this cause before me, at the chambers of this court, the following question arose in relation to the way and manner in which application should be made for an order requiring the bankrupt to appear before this court under section 26 of the bankrupt act. The question is pertinent to the proceedings, and its decision will settle the practice in this and other judicial districts. The petitioner has been duly adjudicated a bankrupt. Henry N. Morgan, of the late firm of Shook & Morgan, has duly proved his claim against the estate. T. D. & G. R. Pelton, as attorneys for Henry N. Morgan, apply, under section 26 of the bankrupt act, verbally for an order compelling the attendance of the bankrupt at the chambers of this court before me, and also for the usual subpoena requiring the petitioner to appear at the same time and place to be examined as a witness in these proceedings under section 26 of the bankrupt act. The creditor having duly proven his claim has a standing in court, and both the order and subpoena when applied for in due form should be granted upon proper cause shown. This proceeding in bankruptcy is a suit in the district court of the United States, and must be governed by the rules and practice of the United States and state courts, by the bankrupt law, the general orders, and the rules, orders and regulations in bankruptcy. Since the act of congress July 16th, 1862, it is generally the practice of the United States circuit and district courts, to follow the rules of the respective state courts in regard to form and manner of practice, as well as all questions of evidence and examination of witnesses. There is much diversity of opinion among the registers, as well as the legal profession, as to the way and manner of applying for an order and subpoena for the examination of the bankrupt; some claim that a mere verbal request to the register is a full compliance with section 26 of the bankrupt act; others say that a petition duly verified is sufficient, while the more experienced lawyers, those most familiar with the practice in the United States courts, and the late court of chancery of this state, are of the opinion that the application should be in the nature of a motion, founded upon an affidavit giving some good and sufficient reason why the order should be granted and subpoena issued, setting forth grounds for the application similar to those set forth in the petition and affidavits in special proceedings under the statutes of this state, and that such an application is properly termed "an ex parte motion for an order."

After a full and careful examination of the practice of the courts and in similar statutory proceedings in this state, the United States and in England, I fully concur with the latter view, and am of the opinion that the verbal application of the creditor, unsupported by either a duly verified petition, or affidavit showing sufficient cause for the granting of the order, is insufficient, and does not entitle the creditor to the order asked for. The counsel for the creditor then asked to have the question certified to your honor, which I herewith set forth, and the reasons and authorities upon which I have formed my opinion are most respectfully submitted to your honor. The theory of the law is that when the petitioner files his petition, &c., he, by the operation of the law, surrenders into court his effects, and also virtually his person, thereby giving the court jurisdiction of both. It is absolutely necessary to the proper administration of the bankrupt law that the court should have the jurisdiction of the person of the petitioner so far as is necessary to the proper administration of the law; such jurisdiction is merely nominal. As soon as an adjudication of bankruptcy is had, the bankrupt is at liberty to commence business on his own account, and if he afterwards obtains his discharge, all his earnings or profits since such adjudication are his. No restraint whatever is placed on the bankrupt, but until he is discharged he is at all times subject to the order of the court.

Upon the proper application of a creditor who has proved his claim, a chamber order is issued, requiring the bankrupt to appear on a certain day, also a subpoena requiring the bankrupt to appear and to be examined as a witness; both of these "process" are issued by the court, signed by its clerk under the seal thereof. Various enactments have, from time to time, been passed in this state, in relation of parties in actions and special proceedings as witnesses. In 1818, an act was passed authorizing the examination of the plaintiff as a witness, &c. In 1820, an act was passed making plaintiffs competent as witnesses, &c. In 1835, an act was passed whereby, the plaintiff was entitled to examine the defendant as a witness, and the defendant was also entitled to the testimony of a co-defendant as a witness. In 1847, an act was passed authorizing parties in civil suits, at their election, to obtain the testimony of the adverse party. Chapter 462, p. 630, Laws 1857. Sections one and three of said act are as follows: "Any party in any civil suit or proceeding, either in law or equity, had before any court or officer, may require any adverse party, whether complainant, plaintiff, petitioner or defendant, or any one of said adverse party, any and every person who is beneficially interested in said suit and proceedings, though not nominally a party, to give testimony under oath in such suit or proceeding, and such adverse party may be examined orally, or under a commission, in the same manner as persons not parties to such suit or proceedings, and who are competent witnesses therein, and such parties may be subpoenaed and his attendance as a witness compelled or he may be examined by a commission, or conditionally, or his testimony perpetuated in the same manner as any competent witness."

Section 3: "Any party in any suit or proceeding, as aforesaid, shall be required, to entitle him to examine the adverse party as a witness in any suit or proceeding, to summon such adverse party to attend the trial or hearing in such suit or proceeding, to give testimony therein in the same manner as the attendance of witnesses in ordinary cases."

In 1849, the Code of Procedure was enacted. By section 292, a judgment debtor could be examined in the same manner as any other witness, by that act.

Section 27 of insolvent laws of this state, commonly called the "Two Third Act," provides, "that the insolvent may be examined on oath at the instance of any creditor, touching his estate or debts, or any matter stated in his schedule." Section 26 of the bankrupt act, is as follows: "The court may, on the application of the assignee in bankruptcy, or of any creditor or without any application, at all times require the bankrupt, upon reasonable notice to attend and submit to an examination, on oath, upon all matters relating to the disposal or condition of his property, to his trade and dealings with others, and his accounts concerning the same, to all debts due to or claimed from him, and to all other matters concerning his property and estate, and the due settlement thereof, according to law."

It is plain to be seen that section 26 of the bankrupt law, was compiled from the legislative enactments of this state, of 1818, 1820, 1835, 1847, from section 27 of the insolvent laws, from section 292 and other sections of the Code, from section 4 of the act of congress of 1841, Gen. St. Mass. c. 118, § 66, and of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, § 17. Consequently, the same rules as to the bringing of the parties to an action or proceeding into court, in order to procure his or their testimony, which has heretofore been adopted, should now be followed by this court, in order to bring the bankrupt before it for his examination as a witness, at the instance of a creditor. The words of section 26 of the act, are as follows: "The court may," &c., (not must,) thus leaving the granting or refusing of the order in the sound discretion of the court. [Blanchard v. Young,] 11 Cush. 341. Such discretion should be carefully exercised. The granting of such orders is not by any means "as a matter of course;" but only to be done in a proper case, on application of a creditor, and when good cause is shown why such order should be granted. Cause should be shown in the same manner as would be required upon the granting of any chamber order in any judicial proceedings in court.

I hold that such an order should be granted upon the creditor showing any of the facts set forth in section 26 of the act. The application of the creditor, under section 26 of the bankrupt act, for an order requiring the bankrupt to attend and submit to an examination under oath, upon all matters, &c., is analogous and similar to the proceedings authorized by section 22 of the act of voluntary assignments known as the two-third act, and other laws of the state of New York; also similar to the proceedings allowed by sections 292, 388, 369, 390 and including 397. By this proceeding, the creditor seeks to obtain facts sufficient by the examination of the bankrupt to enable him (the creditor) to prepare the specification, as authorized by section 44 of the bankrupt act, to oppose the petitioner's discharge in bankruptcy, and also to discover property and effects of the petitioner, which the petitioner owns, but which he has not set forth in his schedules of assets attached to his petition. The register has jurisdiction of the cause and also of the person of the bankrupt, and has the authority to grant the order in this case, the same as the district judge would have; and in granting the order must be governed by the rules and practice of this court, and by the practice of the courts of record of this state. In granting these orders an apparent necessity for the examination of the bankrupt should be shown, (2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1497, 962; [Nieury v. O'Hara,] 1 Barb. 484; [Moore v. McIntosh,] 18 Wend. 529) similar to the practice under section 292 of the Code. The creditor applying should set forth in his petition verified, or affidavit, some particulars of the discovery he seeks to make, or some fact he thinks he can establish in order that the court may judge whether there is any probable cause for granting the order. [U. S. v. Buchanan,] 8 How. [49 U. S.] 92. Section 26 of the bankrupt law gives the right to any creditor who has proved his claim to have an order for an examination of the bankrupt. This order is designed to accomplish all the purposes of a bill of discovery, including the examination of the bankrupt himself, and should, in a proper case, be allowed by the court. 1 Monnell, Pr. 515; [Ex parte Christy,] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 303; [Erwin v. Dundas,] 4 How. [45 U. S.] 60; [Carpenter v. Insurance Co.,] Id. 190; Poll. Prod. Doc. pp. 14, 22, 46; [Stanten v. Insurance Co.,] 2 Sandf. 662; [Moore v. Pentz,] Id. 664. The right, upon a proper cause shown, in granting such orders is given by section 26 of the bankrupt act, and is also in the inherent powers of the court to exercise an equitable jurisdiction over its suitors as well as the subject matter of the action in proceedings before it. [People v. Oneida,] 18 Wend. 652; [Swift v. Collins,] 1 Denio, 659; [Pangburn v. Ramsay,] 11 Johns. 140; 1 Graham, Pr. (3d Ed.) 671-675. Such an order is not an "intermediate order," it is a "proceeding in the cause," neither can it be reviewed on appeal from the district to the circuit court. The granting of the order is in the discretion of the court, and gives summary control over the bankrupt. [Fort v. Bard,] 1 N. Y. 43; [Dunlop v. Edwards,] 3 N. Y. 344; [Rowley v. Van Benthuysen,] 16 Wend. 369.

The order becomes an imperative mandate, and must be obeyed unless set aside on motion or stayed by order of the court. Disobedience to such an order is a contempt of the court, "and for neglect or refusal to obey such order, the court may issue a warrant directed to the marshal, commanding him to arrest the person disobeying such order, and bring him forthwith before the court," such bankrupt may then be committed and punished as for a contempt of court. The commitment and punishment are in the nature of criminal proceedings, (Tayl. Bankr. 80,) and when a court commits a party for contempt, their adjudication upon the matter is a conviction—operates the same as, and is in effect, a judgment, and the warrant for their commitment becomes by operation of law an execution. The command contained in the warrant, the marshal must execute. With the execution of the warrant for commitment, the power of the court ceases, it has become an offence against the United States. The president alone, can by article 2, § 2, subd. 1, of the constitution of the United States, pardon or relieve the person convicted of the contempt.—See opinion of Blatchford, J., in the case of Goodyear v. Mullee, [Case No. 5,578,] district court, southern district of New York; also, Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 38, 43; also, 3 Op. Attys. Gen. 622. I consider it absolutely necessary that the rules and practice of this court in regard to the manner of issuing orders for the examination of bankrupts and witnesses therein, should be clearly set forth; and, in order to do so, I have carefully examined the bankrupt act, the general orders, and the rules and orders, and general regulations in bankruptcy, the rules and practice of this court upon the granting of any chamber order in any judicial proceedings; also, the practice of the state courts in special proceedings, and in special cases, such as habeas corpus, certiorari, mandamus and prohibition in proceedings as for contempt to enforce civil remedies, and also in other proceedings commenced by the issuing of either a writ, warrant, or process of the court, which by law are required to be issued, and find that they now and for years have been founded upon "papers" such as a petition, or complaint duly verified, or upon affidavit.

If an order or process of the court is founded upon a complaint, petition or affidavit, such complaint, petition or affidavit should be duly verified, as an order or proceeding in a cause founded upon an affidavit, petition or complaint not verified would be void, and may be treated as a nullity. [Laimbeer v. Allen,] 2 Sandf. 648. See the forms of petitions and affidavits in the courts of England and in the United States. Gray, Pr. (N. Y.) 106, 518; 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 260; 1 Burrill, Pr. 45, 453; [Jackson v. Stiles,] 3 Caines, 128; [Haff v. Spicer,] Id. 190; [Jackson v. Virgil,] 3 Johns. 540; [Field v. Goodman,] 3 Wend. 310; [People v. Stryker,] 24 Barb. 649; [Laimbeer v. Allen,] 2 Sandf. 648; 2 Rev. St. p. 569, § 25.

The direction or requirement by the court that the petitioner "do attend and be examined," &c., is "an order," by the law of the state of New York. Code, § 401. By the uniform practice of all the courts in this state, such "ex parte applications" or "non-enumerated motions," are only granted upon duly verified affidavits or petitions, which affidavits or petitions, as well as the order, become part of the proceedings in the cause, and are usually served with the order. It is the practice of the United States district courts to follow the rules of the state courts, when there is no rule of the district court upon the subject. The same proceedings should be had as are now authorized in the courts in respect to the manner of compelling the attendance of witnesses on examination before an examiner or commissioner of any of the courts of the United States, or before a judge at chambers of a witness, de bene esse, or upon the examination of a debtor under the state law in supplementary proceedings under section 292, Code. To obtain an order for the examination in any of the cases above cited, on affidavit or petition duly verified setting forth facts sufficient to authorize the issuing of an order for the examination of the party or witness, an affidavit or sworn petition is necessary. It has invariably been the practice of our state courts, in relation to the examination of a witness, de bene esse, to require an affidavit, and the same practice prevailed in regard to the examination of insolvents under the law of this state. The Two Third Act; Madd. Ch. Pr. 155; [Luling v. Stanton,] 2 Hilt. 539. After a careful perusal of the different English and American laws, and of proceedings in statutory or special proceedings, and the decisions of the courts, both state and national thereon, from all of which section 26 of the bankrupt law was compiled, I am irresistibly forced to the conclusion that the proceedings provided for by section 26 of the bankrupt law "are proceedings in the action," and must be taken in strict conformity with the rules and practice of this court, especially so as disobedience to the order is a contempt of the court and is to be punished accordingly. Proceedings for contempt in the courts of this state are provided for. Title 13, c. 8, pt. 3, p. 534, Rev. St. They are always proceedings in the case, entitled in the action and are used as a part of the machinery of the court to aid in enforcing its orders. All process in proceedings for contempt, either by attachment or commitment, are founded upon affidavit. Pitt v. Davison, 34 How. Pr. 355, and cases there cited. In Re Carpenter, [Case No. 2,427,] now pending before me, certain creditors, by Mr. Sawyer, their counsel, made a motion for the usual order and subpoena, under section 26 of the act, for the examination of the wife of the petitioner. The motion was founded upon an affidavit. The counsel for the petitioner claimed that the affidavit upon which no motion was made was insufficient, and I held that the affidavit was sufficient, "both in form and substance," and granted the order. I learn that the petitioner made a motion at chambers, before your honor, to set aside the order, &c., on the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit upon which I granted the order, and that your honor held that the affidavit was sufficient and denied the motion.

I have regarded this decision as a special term decision that an affidavit setting forth facts sufficient to found such an order, &c., upon, was the proper way of proceeding, and have followed it accordingly. First, I hold that the creditor of the bankrupt in this, in order to avail himself of the provisions of section 26 of the act, must apply to the register (court) upon affidavit, or petition duly verified, showing some good and sufficient reason why the order should be granted, also summons issued, and that a mere verbal request is not sufficient, not being in accordance with the rules and practice of this court. Second. That upon such reason being shown, the register (court) should, as a matter of course, grant the order &c.

John Fitch, Register.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The creditor in the present case, to obtain an order according to form number forty-five, for the examination of the bankrupt under section 26 of the act, must apply for such order by petition or affidavit duly verified, and show good cause for the granting of the order.

BANKRUPTCY—PROTECTION OF BANKRUPT—EXAMINATION BY CREDITORS.

The fact that one creditor of a bankrupt has examined him under the 26th section of the bankruptcy act is no reason for withholding the same privilege from another creditor. But the register must regulate such examination so as to protect the bankrupt from annoyance, and oppression, and mere delay.

[Cited in Re Vogel, Case No. 16,984; In re Frizelle, Id. 5,132; In re Bellis, Id. 1,276.]

In bankruptcy. In this case an examination of the bankrupt, [Julius L. Adams,] at the instance of one creditor, under the 26th section of the bankruptcy act, had been concluded. Another creditor obtained an order for a similar examination, on the return of which order the bankrupt objected to being examined, claiming that, after one examination had been concluded, the other creditors were estopped from examining him further. The register held that they were not so estopped.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Every creditor has a right, under section 26, to examine the bankrupt on oath as to the matters specified in that section. Such examination enures to the benefit of all creditors. But the fact that one creditor has examined the bankrupt is no reason for withholding the privilege from another creditor. Yet the register must, in the exercise of a sound discretion, so regulate the time, and manner, and course of the examinations, as to protect the bankrupt from annoyance and oppression and mere delay, while at the same time full and fair opportunity is allowed to the creditors to inquire as to the matters specified in the 26th section.

A return of the marshal that he had "sent written or printed notices to the creditors named on the schedules, and herewith returned, which schedules were made up by him on the best information he could obtain in respect thereto, after diligent search," is sufficient.

In bankruptcy. The marshal, as messenger in this case, made return to the warrant, that he had "sent written or printed notices to the creditors named on the schedules, and herewith returned, which schedules were made up by him on the best information he could obtain in respect thereto." At the meeting of creditors, one of them objected to the return, as being insufficient, in the absence of any statement that the bankrupt had not delivered to the marshal a schedule of his creditors, or had refused to deliver such schedule, or that any proceedings had been taken ineffectually to compel him to deliver such schedule, and in the absence of any statement showing the sources of the marshal's information. The register certified the question to the court, with his opinion that the return was sufficient.

In bankruptcy. On the application of the assignee in bankruptcy in this case, a summons was issued to an attorney to appear as a witness. He appeared before the register on the 16th of March, 1872, and was sworn in these words: "I do solemnly swear that I will make true answer to all such questions as may be proposed to me respecting all the property of the said James M. Adams, the bankrupt above named, and all dealings and transactions relating thereto, and will make a full disclosure of all that has been done with the said property, to the best of my knowledge, information and belief; and that I will make true answers to all questions which may be put to me relating to the disposal or condition of the said property of the said bankrupt, to his trade and dealings with others, and his accounts concerning the same, to all debts due to or claimed from him, and to all other matters concerning his property and estate, and the due settlement thereof according to law, reserving my right to refuse to answer any question in regard to such matters on the ground of privilege as the attorney and counsel of said Adams, which I may not be able to answer except in consequence of my retainer as such attorney and counsel, and from information derived from my client as such." The examination was adjourned till the 18th of March, when the witness appeared. The assignee refused to proceed with the examination of the witness under the oath which he had taken. The witness then proposed to take an oath in the following form: "I, being duly sworn in regard to the matters now pending before the said register, say, &c." To this the assignee objected. The register certified the question to the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The proper form of oath is the first, without the reservation added to it. The assignee was right in declining to proceed with the examination of the witness under the oath administered March 16th, 1872, and in objecting to the witness being sworn in the form proposed by the witness.

[NOTE. The attorney of a bankrupt cannot refuse to be sworn, on the ground of privilege, nor can he object till some question is asked which invades such privilege. In re Woodward, Case No. 17,999. For instances in which certain questions were held to be proper, see In re Aspinwall, Id. 501.]

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

[A debtor, carrying on business through agents in the country at large, made, in January, several conveyances to his wife, and, in the following May, filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy. He was insolvent at the time of the transfers to his wife, but claimed that he did not know it, as he had not then settled with his agents. Held, considering his duty to know the state of his affairs, the short time that elapsed between the conveyances and the filing of the petition, the great improbability of his story, and the fact that he and his wife had not attempted to repair the error, that he was not entitled to a discharge.]

[In bankruptcy. Application by Reuben A. Adams, a bankrupt, for discharge from his debts. Denied.]

E. Avery, for the bankrupt.
J. D. Ball, for the creditors.

LOWELL, District Judge. The proceedings in bankruptcy were begun by the voluntary petition of the debtor, May 19, 1868. In January of that year, he conveyed two parcels of land at Provincetown, and a fractional share in three several schooners, to his wife, Caroline M. Adams. The bankrupt has carried on for many years a rather peculiar kind of business, which he called a general auction and commission business, and which consisted of buying goods at wholesale and sending them to various country towns, large and small, to be disposed of by his travelling agents by auction. He usually called in his accounts and made an examination of the state of his affairs in January of each year; but he swears he did not do so in the year of his failure until the report of his insolvency had been spread abroad, and his creditors had become alarmed and attached his property, which was in the month of May, and that when he then called upon his agents for their returns, he found to his surprise that his creditors were right, and that he was deeply insolvent. He explains the transfers to his wife by saying that she owned a large estate which he had tried and intended to keep separate from his own, and that by some mistake this property was put into his name, though in equity and justice it was always hers. The time chosen for the conveyances he accounts for by its being January, which he says is settling time, and that he wanted to know how he stood, as he was about to change the nature of his business.

The evidence shows that in 1855, Adams settled upon his wife all his interest in his father's estate, and there is nothing to impeach this transaction, which was done under the advice of counsel. But the indenture of trust contained a power to Adams and his wife to revoke the uses, which they did in the following year; and since that time the title of the wife must depend upon the general law of Massachusetts regulating the property of married women. Some of the shares of bank stock, and perhaps other evidences of property, have always remained in Mrs. Adams' name, and I do not see that the present creditors of her husband can lay any claim to these, it not appearing that the transfer was illegal or fraudulent when it was made. But it is otherwise with the property conveyed by the husband to the wife in January, 1868. Whatever may have been the supposed equitable right of the wife to this property as against her husband, there is nothing, so far as appears, to mark it as hers, or even to show that any specific money or estate of hers had been used to buy it. There was no trust, express or implied, impressed upon it, and it was part of his apparent capital. The transfers, therefore, must be examined upon their merits as gifts from the husband to the wife at that time, and the case has very properly been so argued on both sides. As such they cannot be sustained. In arriving at this conclusion it is not necessary to inquire into any doubtful or contested points of law. Granting that a bona fide settlement upon a wife will be upheld, excepting when the husband is actually insolvent at the time—which is a good deal more than has ever been decided in Massachusetts—still it is clear that Adams was insolvent when these transfers were made. This is not denied. But it may be said that he was not aware of his situation, and therefore ought not to suffer by a refusal of his certificate, though the assignee should be entitled, upon the facts as they now appear, to avoid the transaction, as a technical fraud upon the creditors. If the bankrupt and his wife had surrendered this property as soon as the mistake was discovered, the case would stand very differently; but as he has not done so, nor made any attempt to repair his error, I find it the more difficult to believe that it was a mere mistake. His conduct since his admitted insolvency, and the character of his answers to the interrogations propounded to him in his examination, the great improbability of his story, the short time before his actual failure, all go to show that the conveyance was made after, and not before his suspicions of his solvency had been aroused. There cannot be a doubt that he has committed a fraud on the act, and that he ought to have known the state of his affairs, and he has failed to show to my satisfaction that he did not know it. Whether, if he had persuaded me that he simply made the deeds without inquiry, or even with good reason to suppose himself solvent, he could still be discharged, unless he made restitution, I need not decide; nor need I inquire whether he kept proper books of account, nor whether the loss of his books is chargeable to him, because upon the main and most important part of the case I decide that the discharge must be refused.

[At law. Action of assumpsit by Charles F. Adams and others against George Bancroft, collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown, for money had and received.] The parties agreed upon the following statement of facts:—"The plaintiffs, in November last, imported a quantity of silk gloves from France. The defendant, who is collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown, in this district, refused to permit them to be entered free of duty, and required the plaintiffs to pay thereon a duty of twenty-three and a half per centum ad valorem. The plaintiffs protested against this claim as not authorized by law; but as they could not otherwise obtain possession of their property, they paid to the collector the sum of two hundred and ninety dollars, being the amount of duties claimed by him on the said merchandise, at the same time requesting him not to pay over that money to the United States, as they intended to commence an action against him to recover it back." [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

The cause was argued by Smith, in the absence of the district attorney, for the collector, and by C. P. Curtis, for the plaintiffs.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is an amicable action to ascertain, whether by the tariff act of 1833, chapter 54, [4 Stat. 630, c. 55, § 4,] French silk gloves are free of duty upon importation. By the 4th section of that act, it is among other things enacted, that there shall be admitted to entry free from duty, "worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted, manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk." That these silk gloves came from France, and of course from a place this side of the Cape of Good Hope, is admitted; and that they are manufactures of silk is perfectly clear, so that they seem to fall within the descriptive words of the section, and as such are free of duty. Unless there be some other section in the act of 1833, or in some other act, which qualifies or modifies this general exemption, there would seem to be an end of the matter. But it is contended on behalf of the United States, that such a qualification or modification results by implication of law from the provisions of the tariff act of 1832, chapter 224, [4 Stat. 583, c. 227.] The argument is in substance this, that in the second paragraph of the second section of the act of 1832, mitts and gloves are made subject to a specific duty of twenty-five per centum, and silk gloves fall within this description; and that the fifteenth paragraph of the same act, which lays a duty "on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, ten per centum ad valorem, and all other manufactures of silk, or of which silk is a component part, five per centum ad valorem, except sewing silk, which shall be forty per centum ad valorem," was intended to cover other manufactures of silk, excluding silk gloves; and that the act of 1833 repealed the duty only on manufactures of silk, which are within the fifteenth paragraph.

It appears to me, that the argument is not well founded upon the true construction of the act of 1832. The second paragraph of the second section of that act appears to me to refer entirely to goods composed wholly, or in part of wool. It lays a duty "on all milled and fulled cloths of which wool shall be the only material, &c., five per centum ad valorem, on worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted, ten per centum ad valorem, on woolen yarn four cents per lb., and fifty per centum ad valorem, on worsted, twenty per centum ad valorem, on mitts, gloves, bindings, blankets, hosiery, and carpets and carpeting, twenty-five per centum (with certain exceptions, not necessary to be named), on flannels, bockings, and baizes, sixteen cents the square yard, and upon merino shawls made of wool, all other manufactures of wool, or of which wool is the component part, and on ready made clothing, fifty per centum ad valorem." Now, construing this clause according to the ordinary rules of interpretation of statutes of this sort, it seems to me difficult to maintain that any other articles were within the scope of the paragraph, than those, which are wholly of wool, or of which wool is a component part. Every other article, except mitts, gloves, and bindings, would certainly fall within that predicament. Mitts, gloves, and bindings, may be of that material; and the closing words, "all other manufactures of wool, or of which wool is a component part," afford a very strong presumption that this must have been the intent of the legislature, as they grammatically, as well as logically, mean "other" than the preceding enumerated articles.

One of the best settled rules of interpretation of laws of this sort is, that the articles, grouped together, are to be deemed to be of a kindred nature, and of kindred materials, unless there is something in the context which repels that inference. Noscitur a sociis, is a well founded maxim, applicable to revenue, as well as to penal laws. But the fifteenth paragraph of the same act still more fully demonstrates that this must have been the intent of the legislature. That paragraph declares the duty "on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component part, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, ten per centum ad valorem, and on all other manufactures of silk, or of which silk is a component part, five per centum ad valorem, except sewing silk, which shall be forty per centum ad valorem." Now, this paragraph plainly in its terms includes all manufactures of silk, except sewing silk. Upon what ground, then, can the court say, that all manufactures of silk are not to be deemed included in the sense of that statute, when they fall within the terms? Certainly it is incumbent upon those, who insist upon any exception, to establish, that it unequivocally exists. It is not sufficient to show, that it might possibly exist inconsistently [consistently] with the words. It must be shown positively to exist. If the legislature had intended to except silk gloves, the exception ought to have been found in the paragraph. "sewing silk" is excepted; and in such a case the exception of one thing is equivalent to an affirmation of the exclusion of all other manufactures of silk in the same paragraph. Exceptio probat regulam de rebus non exceptis. Besides, if the second paragraph is to be construed as including silk gloves, under the denomination of mitts and gloves, it becomes repugnant to the generality of the fifteenth paragraph. If, on the other hand, it be construed to apply only to mitts and gloves, of which wool is a component part, then the paragraphs are in perfect harmony with each other. In this way, all the language used has its fit and due application and meaning; and it is certainly the duty of courts of justice to give such an interpretation to every statute, as, if possible, will make all its provisions consistent with each other. I may add in this connection, that laws imposing duties are never construed beyond the natural import of the language; and duties are never imposed upon the citizens upon doubtful interpretations; for every duty imposes a burthen on the public at large, and is construed strictly, and must be made out in a clear and determinate manner from the language of the statute.

But even supposing, that the act of 1832 would admit of the interpretation contended for, so as to include silk gloves under the denomination of "mitts and gloves" in the second paragraph, still it would by no means follow, that the act would not be repealed by the act of 1833. The fourth section of this act declares, that "worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted" shall be free of duty; thus directly repealing the duty on the very articles contained in the second paragraph of the second section of the act of 1832, above cited. Then follow the words "manufactures of silk or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk," which are also declared free of duty. Now, these words plainly, in their natural and obvious meaning, repeal all duties on manufactures of silk, except sewing silk. How, then, can the court say, that other exceptions shall be ingrafted on the words of the act? If silk gloves are still to pay duty, what manufactures of silk are not to pay a duty? No exception is made by the legislature, but of sewing silk. What ground is there for the court to create other exceptions? How can the court say, that it was not the policy of the legislature to repeal the duty on silk gloves, as well as on other manufactures of silk? The act makes no such exceptions, and implies none. I profess myself utterly unable to comprehend what authority the court have to insert a positive exception into the language of the act, not necessary to its sense, or to its declarations.

My judgment is, that "silk gloves" are by the act of 1833 free of duty, and, consequently, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover back the duties paid by them.

I wish only to add, that this action, being between citizens of the same state, would not have been within the jurisdiction of this court from the character of the parties. It is, however, brought within the jurisdiction of the court in virtue of the second section of the act of the second of March, 1833, chapter 56, which extends the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States "to all cases in law and equity arising under the revenue laws, for which other provisions are not already made by law." I have not thought it necessary, therefore, to examine into the form of the declaration, because the statement of facts, agreed to by the parties, clearly brings the case within the statute.

[2 Woodb. & M. 233; 10 Law Rep. 69; 17 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 79.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1846.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS — CONSIDERATION—CONSENT OF CREDITORS — TRUSTEE PROCESS.

1. If the creditors of a failing debtor meet and agree to take an assignment of all his property towards paying the debts of all, and to have him continue responsible for any balance; and this is carried into effect by taking such assignment and possession of the property; it is valid against one of the creditors, who was not present, and brings a trustee process against the agent of the creditors, who has charge of the property.

2. The consideration is good, on account of the trust or contract, and the presumed assent of those creditors not expressly dissenting. But here it was clearly good, as the creditors actually assenting had claims exceeding in value all the property assigned.

3. A conveyance to a portion of one's creditors for a full consideration is valid at common law, and a fortiori, a conveyance to all of them.

4. Such a conveyance, the debtor agreeing still to be liable for the balance, is better for them than the insolvent law, and cannot be considered a fraud upon it. The insolvent laws have repealed the prior act in Massachusetts as to preferring creditors, but do not abrogate all conveyances like this at common law.

5. The present creditor can now come in and obtain his pro rata share of the property assigned for the benefit of all, or can, for the usual reasons, have the case put into insolvency under the statute, and the property thus distributed. But the proceedings already had are valid till this is done.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit [by Franklin Adams and others] against [Joseph F.] Blodgett, the principal, for $945.75, money had and on an account annexed. The principal was defaulted. One of the defendants, summoned in as a trustee, viz., F. Wells, denied having any goods or credits of Blodgett in his hands, and was discharged. The other, O. Libby, disclosed the following general facts in his answer to the interrogatories put by the plaintiff. Joseph F. Blodgett, the principal, failed in business, in the latter part of March, 1846, and a meeting of a large portion of his creditors was held, and several others not present agreed to follow the course which those present should agree on. They finally and mutually contracted, that J. Blodgett should give up to his creditors all his property and credit; and what of his debts these did not pay, he stipulated in writing to discharge at some future time. He further agreed, that his brother, H. Blodgett, to whom had been sold his goods and other interests in Robbinston, Maine, should surrender them and the amount collected on them, upon restoring to him the note executed therefor. It was further stipulated, that some one of the creditors, in behalf of all, should go to Robbinston and take possession of the property and effects of Blodgett there, and O. Libby was selected for that purpose. On the 2d of April, 1846, Blodgett gave to Libby a written order to have the charge of all his property, books, and notes, "at R. and elsewhere," and to dispose of them "for the benefit of all his creditors." Libby went accordingly and took possession of them, H. Blodgett conveying or assigning to him in writing all he had received, and taking back from Libby his note given therefor to J. F. Blodgett. O. Libby disclosed next, that he had collected from this property about $350 in potatoes. He further stated, that in September last, and since this suit was instituted, Libby and his partner agreed with J. F. Blodgett to release their debt to him, if his other creditors would do the same for $30, but the arrangement had not been completed.

The amount of the claims of those creditors, present or represented in March, 1846, was testified to be greater than all, which O. Libby had collected from the accounts and the value of the other property which he received. In answer to additional interrogatories, Libby says that he has collected, beside the potatoes, since the suit,.....$350.00 for sale of goods in the store,..... 217.47 from wood, &c..... 160.00

and has a sled worth $10, and barrels empty, 1400 in number.

On this disclosure, the plaintiff moved to charge Libby for the whole sum of $727.47.

P. W. Chandler, for plaintiff.
Brown, for Libby.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The proceeding in this case, so far as regards Libby, the garnishee, is an equitable one. The form of the process is not a capias against the body, or an attachment of his property; but is a mere subpoena as in chancery to appear and answer. The plea, when appearing, is not one as at common law, but an answer to interrogatories, and usually verified by his oath only, and his liability is not put to the jury except in peculiar cases, but tried by the court. If charged, also, it is on principles rather of equity than law, as it is on the ground that he holds something in trust for the debtor, and something which, on the principles applicable to trustees, he ought not to retain from the creditors of the cestui que trust; something, in short, which, ex aequo et bono, the special statute governing those proceedings considers that a creditor should be allowed to draw out of his hands. 2 Bac. Abr. "Customs of London," H; Evans v. Eaton, [Case No. 4,559;] [Wells v. Banister,] 4 Mass. 514; [Whiting v. Earle,] 3 Pick. 201; [White v. Jenkins,] 16 Mass. 62. The chief or leading question then here is, whether Libby holds any such property of Blodgett—property which he ought in justice as well as law to surrender entirely to this plaintiff, as one of the creditors of Blodgett? I am very readily conscious of many cases somewhat like this, where property ought to be thus surrendered or accounted for to one creditor. Such are several of those cited at the bar for the plaintiff, and chiefly resting on some fact, that the prevailing party then was prior in time in making his attachment; or the other party in possession had been guilty of fraud.

In an analysis of the principles involved in those cases, I apprehend they will all be found to contain some important elements which do not exist here, and which rendered it illegal or inequitable, there to let the property remain in the hands of the respondent. Thus if the plaintiff made his attachment before the conveyance was completed, the rule, prior tempore, potior jure, well applies at common law. [Keech v. Hall,] 1 Doug. 21; [Dearle v. Hall,] 3 Russ. 20. So, where a debtor in falling circumstances, conveys property to a third person, or a creditor, for an inadequate consideration, there, whether the proceeding is by attachment of the property, or by a trustee process, the conveyance is held to operate as an injury or fraud on other creditors, as it lets the property go to a stranger, or a single creditor, without an adequate consideration. It prevents the other creditors from getting as much from the property of the debtor as ought to be got from it, and thus defrauds them; and hence the conveyance is considered void. See cases of this character. Kimball v. Fenner, 12 N. H. 248; Everett v. Read, 3 N. H. 55.

Again, if a debtor, when failing, assigns his property to a portion of his creditors, to the exclusion entirely of others, who will not come in and release him, either for a share in that property, or for some reduced percentage on their claims, it has been held, that such a conveyance ought not in justice to stand, as it attempts to force other creditors to compound or relinquish a part of their honest claims, on the penalty of losing the whole. Jewett v. Barnard, 6 Greenl.

383; Halsey v. Fairbanks, [Case No. 5,964;] [Copeland v. Weld,] 8 Greenl. 411; 2 Kent, Comm. 420; Bradford v. Tappan, 11 Pick. 78; Brewer v. Pitkin, Id. 298. But if such a conveyance was to a part of one's creditors, as a mere preference of them on account of the favored character of their claims, and for an adequate consideration, it would not at common law be void. There a man may honestly pay any one of his creditors in full, in the usual course of business, though he has not enough left to pay all. [Russell v. Woodward,] 10 Pick. 408; [Brooks v. Marbury,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 78; Halsey v. Fairbanks, [Case No. 5,964;] Haven v. Richardson, 5 N. H. 113. But then he must sell or convey for its fair value, and no secret trust must exist to the injury of others, or to the special benefit of the debtor. [Coburn v. Pickering,] 3 N. H. 415; [Russell v. Woodward,] 10 Pick. 412. So if the creditors have not in truth assented to the assignment, in sufficient numbers and value to cover the property assigned, it has been held in this state that the consideration may be deemed inadequate and void as to the creditors who have not assented, though good as to those assenting. Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 408; [Bradford v. Tappan,] 11 Pick. 78; [Brewer v. Pitkin,] Id. 298; [Ward v. Lamson,] 6 Pick. 358. In the first of these cases, also, the debtor was left in possession of the property, which is always a badge or evidence, slight or otherwise, of fraud. Clark v. Morse, 10 N. H. 236; Deshon v. The Medora, [Case No. 3,820;] Coburn v. Pickering, 3 N. H. 415; [Griffin v. Bixby,] 12 N. H. 454; [Bartlett v. Williams,] 1 Pick. 238. So any evidence of a secret trust or confidence tends to vitiate the deed. [Widgery v. Haskell,] 5 Mass. 144; [Paul v. Crooker,] 8 N. H. 288. It has been held, likewise, that if a surplus exist, after satisfying the creditors assenting, or those for whom the property was conveyed, it can undoubtedly be reached by a trustee process. [Bradford v. Tappan,] 11 Pick. 78; [Borden v. Sunner,] 4 Pick. 265; [Andrews v. Ludlow,] 5 Pick. 28; [Widgery v. Haskell,] 5 Mass. 144; Jewett v. Barnard, 6 Greenl. 385; [Com. v. Green,] 17 Mass. 552; 2 Kent, Comm. 420; Leeds v. Sayward, 6 N. H. 83. The assent of preferred creditors will usually be presumed, (Copeland v. Weld, 8 Greenl. 411; [Brooks v. Marbury, 24 U. S.] 11 Wheat. 78;) while that of others, it is said, must generally be expressed, (Id., [Russell v. Woodward,] 10 Pick. 408; [Jewett v. Barnard,] 6 Greenl. 384.) But where the assignment confers on them as great or greater security and privileges as going into insolvency would, (e. g., conveys all the property of the debtor for all, and asks no release of the balance, as here,) it seems highly equitable and useful to presume the assent of creditors not present, and not afterwards dissenting. Copeland v. Weld, 8 Greenl.

414; Halsey v. Fairbanks, [Case No. 5,964.] See, also, [Marbury v. Brooks,] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 556, 578; [Brooks v. Marbury,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 78. It will not be necessary, however, to give a decisive opinion on this presumption under the circumstances in this case, as the creditors actually assenting here had more due to them than all the value of the property.

The present case will be found essentially unlike any of those which have been declared to be void. It is to be decided on the disclosure alone as if true; and though the transaction, as there represented, was rather inartificial in form, and some parts of it without the writings usually resorted to on such occasions; yet it is a very natural arrangement, to be honestly made between creditors and a debtor on his failure, and is in parts of it reduced to writing, and is throughout consistent with the peculiar situation of these parties. It seems to be conceded, that the debtor failed at Boston or Somerville in this state; that most of his property was in a remote part of Maine, and had been conveyed to a brother, and the note of the latter taken therefor; that the creditors had no remedy but to attach the property conveyed in Maine to the brother, as if conveyed in fraud of the creditors of the vendor; or sue the brother as trustee, and thus attempt to charge him on account of fraud, or some other defect in the proceedings; or take an assignment of the note against the brother, if J. F. Blodgett was willing to make it, and collect something on that towards satisfying their demands. Under these circumstances, there seemed to be no object nor benefit to the creditors as a whole in resorting to attachments or trustee actions to try the validity of the title, at some expense and risk, when J. F. Blodgett, the debtor, was willing to convey to them the note taken for the property in Maine, and agree, as far as he could effect it, that his brother should hand over to them the property and its proceeds on their returning to him the note; and that they might sell the property for the benefit of all his creditors, and he stand accountable to pay the balance of their debts at some future time. While the creditors as a whole could have no possible motive not to accede to this proposition, it indicates on the part of the debtor, (whatever suspicion might otherwise have rested on his conveyance to his brother,) a willingness to have all his property of any description go to the benefit of his creditors, and of all his creditors rather than a few, and to pay them any remaining balance, if able, at any future period. This was perfectly fair. Pickstock v. Lyster, 3 Maule & S. 371; Halsey v. Fairbanks, [Case No. 5,964.]

to all, whether present or absent. What possible ground, then, is there in this arrangement with the creditors for imputing, so far as regards that, either a fraudulent design in the debtor, or a fraudulent injury to any creditor? The debtor relinquishes every thing, and renews his promise for the balance not then paid, and the creditors get every thing, and without conditions or restrictions. See further, in respect to this, [Holbird v. Anderson,] 5 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 235; [Estwick v. Caillaud,] Id. 420; [Meux v. Howell,] 4 East, 1; [King v. Watson,] 3 Price, 6. The debtor, it is admitted, may prefer at common law a part. Then why not treat all equally, when it is fairer? Again, the possession of the property was at once changed to the agent of the creditors, and without proving or presuming the assent of absent creditors, enough, as before stated, and particularly disclosed in the answer, were present here to equal by their debts the whole amount of property. These are facts shown with distinctness and not impugned, and which vary this case essentially from others which have been cited. Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 412; [Stevens v. Bell,] 6 Mass. 342; Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. 144. The old objection against these conveyances in trust, that no way existed to enforce them, there being no court of chancery in Massachusetts, is now entirely overcome by the extended chancery powers since vested in her courts of law, as well as overcome here by such powers existing fully in this court. [Copeland v. Weld,] 8 Greenl. 414; [Brown v. Minturn, Case No. 2,021,] [Scribner v. Hickok,] 4 Johns. Ch. 531. See, also, Foster v. Saco Manuf'g Co., 12 Pick. 451, 454, in point as to the present case.

It is questionable whether, looking at the matter in equity rather than at law exclusively, as was the practice here for some time, there is not always consideration enough to support the conveyance in the trustees undertaking to sell and distribute the proceeds. Halsey v. Fairbanks, [Case No. 5,964.] But that need not be decided here; for on the principles settled in the old cases in this state, this conveyance, as before shown, was on ample consideration. Indeed, it was pursuing almost the precise course pointed out by law under the present insolvent system, instead of doing something to thwart or defeat it. It secured, in addition to what that does, the debtor's future liability, and saved all the legal costs of going through the forms of that system. The last circumstance was probably a strong inducement for the parties here, who defend where the estate was small and the debtor willing to surrender every thing, to make this arrangement voluntarily, and save cost and expense to all concerned. Nor was the insolvent system needed to be resorted to, with a view to avoid under it any sale to third persons, as might be proper for that purpose, in some cases, [Foster v. Saco Manuf'g Co.,] 12 Pick. 453-455; [Penniman v. Cole,] 3 Metc. [Mass.] 496, 500. For here the third persons were willing to relinquish the sales previously made, and did relinquish them on request, and on the return of the note given for the consideration. But while this course was so manifestly beneficial to the creditors as a whole, paying them pro rata, equally, and applying to their debts all the proceeds of the debtor's property, without cost or expense of the insolvent system, and under the management and sales of one of their own number; and while they, as a whole, could have no interest in treating this proceeding as illegal or fraudulent, and could not so treat it, so far as they acquiesced or engaged in it, those creditors, not present, or not represented at the meeting in March 1846, like the plaintiff, were not obliged to sanction it. They might at their pleasure, attach the property in Maine, or trustee the brother, or even the respondent, one of the creditors, after receiving the property from the brother for the whole creditors. They might thus attempt to rip up all the proceedings for fraud or other defect, and if successful, secure the whole of their debts, instead of taking a pro rata share; though they might be liable, before judgment is entered up, and possibly after, if before any levy or seizure of property, to have the debtor put into insolvency by some other creditor, and their special lien thus dissolved, and that same general distribution compelled, which is now voluntarily going on.

It is not a little singular, as an illustration of the real character of the present suit, and of the transaction it seeks to avoid, that the suit, if successful, may end in a proceeding of insolvency as to Blodgett's estate, which would distribute it precisely as is now doing, except with an amount reduced by costs instead of any addition or advantage; and that the present plaintiff would not then realize so much on his debt as now, by the deduction of his proportional amount of cost, nor would he then have any remedy left, as now, for the balance. There can be no surer or better test, perhaps, of the propriety of not withdrawing this property from the respondent, than that it is now in his hands, accomplishing more to fulfil the social and moral purposes of the laws, than it would if withdrawn. Nor is the arrangement doing this in the teeth of any statute, or any provision of the common law. The statute in this Commonwealth, passed in 1836, prohibiting conveyances to creditors, was to prevent a conveyance to preferred creditors or a favored few. That is not this case; and besides, that statute is repealed by the insolvent act of 1838. Carter v. Sibley, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 298. Nor does that insolvent act in terms prohibit any such conveyance as this; nor can it be implied from the fact, that the two courses are exactly the same. They differ materially and unfavorably to the debtor. This trust dispenses with several forms and considerable expense, and holds the debtor still liable for the balance. Whereas that course releases the debtor from liability for the balance, and subjects him to go through with the statutory course, in order to entitle himself to be released. Nor are the two courses inconsistent and incompatible any more than identical. Nor is one mode imperatively a substitute for the other. The present mode is more favorable to the creditors, and hence is not presumed to be forbidden by the other. The debtor or the creditors may prefer either to the other, and if they do so unitedly, or if the debtor and most of the creditors do, neither the insolvent statutes, nor any public policy in it seem violated, or require a forced construction to abrogate this trust.

The insolvent statute of 1838 was held to repeal the assignment statute of 1836, because it substituted one statutory system for another statutory system, alike in substance, but different in form. Carter v. Sibley, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 298. But here, the act of 1838 does not repeal the present trust by an implication of this kind, because it is not a trust made under the act of 1836, and differs in some particulars in substance from both of those statutes. Nor is there any principle of the common law opposed to this conveyance. Had it been made honestly and for an adequate consideration, even to a part only of the creditors, it would have been valid at common law. (See cases before.) And nobody ever doubted at common law that a conveyance to all one's creditors to secure their honest debts, if they assented, or if there was sufficient consideration, was valid. [Carter v. Sibley,] 4 Metc. [Mass.] 300, semb.; [Russell v. Woodward,] 10 Pick. 412; Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. 342. It is the very design and wish of the law, that the property should all go to them. This is also the refinement of the modern bankrupt or insolvent system to have it go equally as here. In aiding this, you aid justice rather than defeat it. You benefit rather than injure the creditors as a whole. You are guilty of no fraud, either in fact or law, as to all or any portion of them. Certainly not in fact, when all the property is placed in the hands of all, or of a part for all; and certainly not in law, where none are excluded, and none required on any terms whatever, to execute releases or accept as final payment less than all their claims.

Under this analysis of the subject, no fraud whatever seems to exist between the parties, whatever may have been contemplated originally between the two brothers. How that may have been is not material here, as their contract must be considered either as rescinded, or the property sold by the brother to the creditors themselves, towards the payment honestly of all their debts, and for the original consideration, the note, so as to purge away any fraud that might have been once contemplated against others. It is now held in trust for all, and hence the old sale injures or defrauds none. Nor is it any objection to the present agreement between the creditors and J. F. Blodgett, that it was not all put in writing. It is clearly proved, part by parol and part by writing, and is not required to be shown by writing, either by the statute of frauds or any common law principle. The consideration for it is, also, as full and good as the consideration of the original debts of the several creditors, and the validity and amount of the debts of each is to be settled in the same way, as in all cases of assignments and trusts. If not done by the debtor and each creditor under the inspection of the agent or trustee, so as to be satisfactory, it may be tested in a suit like this, and the trustee, on motion, be allowed to defend for the debtor. So the whole administration of the trust can be revised by a bill in chancery, if any debtor chooses. Nor is there any difficulty as to the creditors not present, and who do not choose to come in and take their dividend with the rest. They are left, like the present creditor in this action, to a suit against the original debtor, and may seize any property they can find unassigned, or subsequently acquired, or his body, if liable. They stand like creditors, who do not choose to prove their debts under a bankrupt commission, and may resort elsewhere to any remedy or property which exists. But in this case, as no dividend has yet been awarded, the plaintiff could probably claim one out of the property, finding it has been legally assigned to pay him as well as the rest, so far as it goes, after deducting all reasonable costs and expenses.

I see no objection to a continuance of this action, to see what the dividend to each creditor applying is, and how the trustee conducts, and to put further interrogatories, if his behavior should require it. But he cannot be charged with the whole property, or enough to pay the plaintiff's debt, on the disclosure as it now stands; though in due time he may be liable to account for a pro rata share to the plain..., if desiring it. All which need be said now definitely on that, or the costs in this suit is, that the defendant, summoned as trustee, cannot be charged in the manner and to the extent claimed, and seems entitled to his cost. But it may become proper for him, at some ensuing term, to pay over to the plaintiff his proportionate share under the conveyance; or if the principal is forced by his creditors to go into insolvency under the statute of 1838, the trustee may be liable to account and deliver over what he holds to the statutory assignees. [Insurance Co. v. Chandler,]

16 Mass. 275; [Borden v. Sumner,] 4 Pick. 265. How that may be, can probably be settled by the next term; as also what the share of the plaintiff may be, if the estate is settled finally under the present conveyance. Let the case, therefore, stand continued, if the plaintiff desires it, before any formal judgment is entered.

ADAMS v. BOSTON, H. & E. R. CO.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1870.*

BANKRUPTCY—"BUSINESS CORPORATION"—ACT OF 1867—RAILROAD COMPANIES.

A railroad corporation is a "business" corporation, within the meaning of the thirty-seventh section of the bankrupt act of 1867.

[Cited in Alabama & C. R. Co. v. Jones, Case No. 126; In re California Pac. R. Co., Id. 2,315; Winter v. Iowa, M. & N. P. Ry. Co., Id. 17,890; In re Oregon, B. P. & F. Co., Id. 10,560; New Orleans, S. F. & L. R. Co. v. Delamore, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1011, 114 U. S. 501.]

In bankruptcy. Motion to dismiss a petition in bankruptcy filed against the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Company, for want of jurisdiction. [Overruled.]

[Enoch G. Sweatt, another creditor, afterwards presented a petition for review to the circuit court, which petition was denied. Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 13,684.]

B. R. Curtis and B. F. Brooks, for the motion.

B. F. Butler, C. S. Bradley, W. G. Russell, and T. K. Lothrop, for petitioner.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This is a motion to dismiss the petition in this case, upon the ground that railroad corporations are not included within the provisions of the thirty-seventh section of the bankrupt act, and not subject to the process provided by the act, and that therefore this court has no jurisdiction in bankruptcy to entertain this petition.

The first ground of objection to the jurisdiction of the court is, that a railroad corporation is a public corporation, created for a public purpose, and bound to the state for the performance of a public duty. The thirty-seventh section of the bankrupt act provides as follows: "The provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed, business or commercial corporations and joint-stock companies." Section 58 enacts: "The word 'person' shall also include corporations." Section 58 is not, however, to be construed as applying the word "person" to include any other corporations as subject to the provisions of the act than those described in the thirty-seventh section. Public corporations, created for municipal or political purposes, and such private corporations as are ecclesiastical, or eleemosynary, or established for the advancement of learning, are clearly not made subject to the provisions of the act. Private corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay. Lay corporations are divided into civil and eleemosynary. Civil corporations are created for an infinite variety of purposes; such as affording facilities for obtaining loans of money, the making of canals, turnpike roads, and the like. The words of the thirty-seventh section, "moneyed, business or commercial corporations," would seem to have been intended to embrace all those classes of corporations that deal in or with money or property in the transactions of money business or commerce for pecuniary gain, and not for religious, charitable, or educational purposes. Accordingly, district courts of the United States in various districts have treated manufacturing, mining, and similar corporations, and in one circuit at least, railway corporations, as subject to be dealt with under the provisions of the bankrupt act. But it is contended that the public purposes for which railways are created, and the public duties they are bound to perform, make them public corporations; and therefore such a construction should be given to the words of the statute as would exclude them from its operation. In the popular meaning of the term, nearly every corporation is public, inasmuch as they are created for the public benefit. But if the whole interest does not belong to the government, or if the corporation is not created for the administration of political or municipal power, the corporation is private. "Strictly speaking," says Mr. Justice Story, in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 669, "public corporations are such only as are founded by the government for public purposes, where the whole interests belong also to the government. If, therefore, the foundation be private, though under the charter of the government, the corporation is private, however extensive the uses may be to which it is devoted, either by the bounty of the founder or the nature and objects of the institution. . . . A bank whose stock is owned by private persons is a private corporation, although it is erected by the government, and its objects and operations partake of a public nature. The same doctrine may be affirmed of insurance, canal, bridge, and turnpike companies. In all these cases the uses may, in a certain sense, be called public; but the corporations are private, as much so, indeed, as if the franchises were vested in a single person."

The case of Treadwell v. Salisbury Manuf'g Co., 7 Gray, 393, 404, cited as an authority in support of the position that this is a public corporation, is not, in fact, in conflict with the opinion of Mr. Justice Story just quoted. In the learned opinion of Judge Bigelow, in that case, he does refer to "corporations established for objects quasi public, such as railway, canal, and turnpike corporations;" but he does not describe them as public corporations, but only as corporations established for objects quasi public. Neither upon principle nor authority can this corporation be properly classed among public corporations, or on that ground exempted from the operation of the bankrupt act. It is further contended, however, that the legislature of Massachusetts, in creating this corporation, has subjected it to certain duties and liabilities; that these liabilities are not transmissible, that these duties cannot be delegated, that the corporation cannot divest itself of the power it has of performing those duties; "that it is a Massachusetts corporation, a creature of the laws of Massachusetts, placed under the supervision of the authorities and the courts of Massachusetts, and liable to perform certain duties which, by the laws of Massachusetts, cannot be performed by any person to whom its property may be transferred or its franchises delegated." The force of this argument, which seems to apply solely to Massachusetts corporations, and to claim the application to Massachusetts railroad corporations of a special exception from the operation of the bankrupt act, independent of and distinct from any rule which may apply to railway corporations existing under the laws of other states, is somewhat impaired by the fact that the duties of this corporation have been delegated, and are now delegated, by the action of the supreme court of Massachusetts, to a board of receivers; that by the action of the same distinguished tribunal this corporation has been and now is in fact divested of the power of performing its public duties, and that it is not now, by reason of the action in the premises of the highest judicial tribunal in the commonwealth, in the possession or exercise of its franchises, so far as those franchises confer upon it the power to build, operate, and control the railroad. And we look in vain into the legislation of Massachusetts for any indication of public policy to exclude the property of railroad corporations, or such of their franchises as are in their nature assignable and transmissible, from the liability to be taken by due process of law and applied to the payment of corporate debts.

East Boston Freight R. Co. v. Hubbard, 10 Allen, 459, note, is a case where the Grand Junction Railroad and Depot Company became insolvent, and George W. Gordon, a creditor, recovered judgment; and the sheriff levied his execution upon the franchise, and sold the same, with all the rights and privileges so far as related to the receiving of tolls for the term of ninety-nine years. The title of the purchaser at the sheriff's sale was upheld by the court. A corporation, created for the purpose of constructing, owning, and managing a railroad, cannot, it is true, make any alienation of its general franchise to be a corporation, or its subordinate franchises to manage and carry on its corporate business, without distinct legislative authority. Such is the law in England. Winch v. Birkenhead R. Co., 13 Eng. Law & Eq. 506; South Yorkshire Ry. Co. v. Great Northern R. Co., 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 513; Shrewsbury & B. Ry. Co. v. London & N. W. Canal Co., 21 Eng. Law & Eq. 319; and in Massachusetts, Hendee v. Pinkerton, 14 Allen, 381; Richardson v. Sibley, 11 Allen, 65; Com. v. Smith, 10 Allen, 455. This distinct legislative authority for the alienation of the assignable and transmissible franchises of railroads to carry on their business of managing a railroad and taking tolls has been freely accorded in Massachusetts; and the public policy of the commonwealth embodied in its legislation allows a creditor to sell these franchises on execution, and permits the corporations, within prescribed limits, to alienate them for the payment of debts or the security of creditors. Gen. St. Mass. c. 63, § 120 et seq.; Id. c. 68, §§ 25, 26.

It is contended that the authority given in the Massachusetts statute to attach and levy on "the franchise of a turnpike or other corporation authorized to take tolls" does not include railroad corporations; that the words "authorized to take tolls" are only applicable to turnpike, canal, lock, and bridge corporations, and not to railroads. An examination, however, of the legislation of Massachusetts will show that "an authority to take tolls" is given as one of the franchises of railroad corporations, and that similar words of description of such a franchise are found in all the general and special laws relating to such corporations. Similar words are also used as apt words of description in the judicial decisions of Massachusetts and other states, and in the decisions of the courts of the United States. Section 112, c. 63, Gen. St. of Massachusetts, relating to railroad corporations, provides, "Each corporation may establish, for its sole benefit, a toll upon all passengers and property conveyed or transported on its road." This form of expression is found in all the early railroad charters in this country; and has been continued in use, so far as we are able to discover, to the present time. Section 5 of the act to establish the Boston and Lowell Railroad corporation enacts "that a toll be and hereby is granted and established, for the sole benefit of said corporation, upon all passengers and property of all descriptions which may be conveyed or transported upon said road." The same right to take toll is conferred in the charter of the Boston and Providence Railroad, and continued in use in the charters granted to other railroads until embodied in the general legislation respecting railroad corporations; after which the charters of many railroad corporations, and among others of those whose franchises have been since transferred to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Company, contained provisions conferring upon them the rights and subjecting them to the liabilities provided in the thirty-ninth and forty-fourth chapters of the Revised Statutes. Section 83, c. 39, Rev. St. 1836, provides, "Every such corporation may establish, for their sole benefit, a toll upon all passengers and property," &c. If, therefore, the questions had not been previously decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts, whose decision this court would adopt on a question of the construction of a statute of the state, we should have no hesitation in deciding that railroad corporations were subject to the provisions of the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth sections of the sixty-eighth chapter of the General Statutes of Massachusetts, as "corporations authorized to take tolls." The supreme court of the state has so considered the law in the cases before cited. But it is not believed that the question, whether railroad corporations are subject to be dealt with under the provisions of the bankrupt act, is one the solution of which is dependent upon the special provisions of the statutes of the several states regulating the transfer of the corporate property or franchises, or the mode of applying them to the payment of the corporate debts.

The grant of constitutional power to congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States is general in its terms and unlimited. It was not doubted, at the argument on this motion, that it applied as well to corporations as to natural persons. The only question which can arise is, whether congress has, by appropriate legislation in the exercise of its powers conferred by the constitution, rendered railroad corporations subject to the provisions of the act. As the system of bankruptcy is to be uniform throughout the United States, the solution of this question must depend upon the construction of the terms of the act itself, and not upon the particular legislation of the several states. "The provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed, business or commercial corporations." To attempt to limit the word "business" in this clause of the statute, so as merely to be synonymous with "trading," would deprive it of any meaning beyond that included in the other words "moneyed and commercial." A trading corporation is a commercial corporation. The word "business" has a broader meaning as applied to corporations. Harris v. Amery, L. R. 1 C. P. 154. A railroad corporation is chartered to conduct the business of a common carrier of passengers and merchandise. Is there any principle of public policy which would require that the plain provisions of the statute should receive such a judicial construction as would exclude this class of corporations?

We have already seen that the public policy of the state in which this corporation exists allows the alienation of the franchises and property of railroad corporations for the payment of their debts. The inconveniences attending such alienations are obvious. But as the argument ab inconvenienti has not been sufficiently strong to prevent the state from allowing these franchises to be sold, and the proceeds of the sale applied in payment of the debts of the first attaching creditors, it certainly does not apply with greater force to a statute providing for the more equitable division of the proceeds among all the creditors. The franchise which authorizes a number of persons to be incorporated and subsist as a body politic, with power to maintain perpetual succession, is not alienable or transferable without direct and positive legislative authority. This is the franchise to be a corporation. It is the life of the corporation. Coupled with the grant of this franchise of corporate existence are the grants to the corporation of those franchises to carry on the corporate "business;" which are grants of valuable privileges, and which, in the case of most private corporations, may be transmitted (as the history of this corporation shows they have been transmitted repeatedly) from one corporation to another, or to individuals, without great detriment to any public objects for which they were created. This distinction between those franchises of a corporation which are inalienable without a positive provision of law, and those possessing nothing in their nature inconsistent with their being transferred or assigned, has never been more clearly defined than in the learned opinion of Mr. Justice Curtis, in the case of Hall v. Sullivan R. Co., [Case No. 5,948.] "The franchise to be a corporation is therefore not a subject of sale and transfer, unless the law, by some positive provision, has made it so, and pointed out the modes by which such sale and transfer may be effected. But the franchises to build, own, and manage a railroad, and to take tolls thereon, are not necessary corporate rights: they are capable of existing in and being enjoyed by natural persons, and there is nothing in their nature inconsistent with their being assignable."

The grantee of the franchises of a corporation to operate a railroad can acquire no greater rights than the corporation itself has by the terms of the charter. The purchaser must take his title subject to all the conditions of the original grant, and subject to all duties and liabilities to the state, the public, and individuals, none of whose rights can be impaired by the transfer. It does not appear to us that there are any such inherent difficulties in the way of the sale and transfer of the property and franchises of a railroad, subject to these conditions and limitations, as would require us to give such a construction to the statute as would exclude the corporations from the operation of that clause of the bankrupt act, a literal construction of which clearly renders them liable to be dealt with under its provisions.

Motion to dismiss the petition overruled.

Case No. 48.

ADAMS et al. v. BRADLEY et al.

[5 Sawy. 217.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. Aug., 1878.

STATES AND STATE OFFICERS — ACTION AGAINST STATE—RES JUDICATA.

1. A state cannot be sued in its courts without its consent.

[Cited in Spring Valley Waterworks v. Bartlett, 16 Fed. Rep. 622, and in State v. Columbus & X. R. Co., 48 Fed. Rep. 628. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Tennessee, 101 U. S. 339.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. The appearance of the district attorney, or the attorney-general of the state, on behalf of the state, without express authority of law, does not give jurisdiction over the state as defendant in the action.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Comp. Laws Nev. § 2778, does not authorize the attorney-general to so appear for the state generally in an action against its officers in their individual capacity, as to make it a party to the action, and conclude it by the judgment.

4. Treadway sued Slingerland, in his individual capacity, to recover possession of lands upon which the Nevada state prison is situated. Slingerland, who was at the time lieutenant-governor of the state and ex officio warden of the state prison, set up as a defense title in the state, and that he was in possession under the state as warden of the state prison, and not otherwise. R. M. Clarke, who was then attorney-general of the state, appeared as attorney for the defendant without using his official designation in the signature to the pleadings. Treadway recovered judgment. In a subsequent action by the successors in interest of Treadway against the governor, warden—the successor in office to Slingerland—and other officers of the state, to recover the same land: Held, that the judgment in said case of Treadway v. Slingerland did not conclude the state or affect its title.

[At law. Action to recover possession of land, tried by the court upon submission of facts agreed on. Judgment for defendants.]

This is an action brought against L. R. Bradley, governor, James D. Minor, secretary of state, and John R. Kittrell, attorney general of the state of Nevada, constituting the board of state prison commissioners, and Milton R. Elstner and P. C. Hyman, wardens of the state prison, to recover possession of the lands upon which the state prison of Nevada is situated. In 1870, one A. D. Treadway brought an action in a state court against J. B. Slingerland, in his individual capacity, to recover the same land. The complaint was in the usual form where one citizen brings an action against another to recover land, alleging title in the plaintiff, and an unlawful eviction and detention by defendant. Slingerland answered denying the title of plaintiff and ouster by defendant. He then set up as a separate affirmative defense title in the state of Nevada; that the premises were possessed and occupied by the state of Nevada as a state prison; that the defendant was warden of the state prison, and that he was residing upon the premises, and in charge, with other officers, under the authority of the laws of Nevada as such warden, and not otherwise. The answer was signed, "Robt. M. Clarke, defendant's attorney," without any official designation. Slingerland was in fact, at that time, lieutenant-governor of the state, and ex officio warden of the state prison, and in immediate charge of the premises as such; and Robert M. Clarke was attorney-general of the state. The court found the legal title to the premises to be in the plaintiff, and that the state had the equitable title; but rejected the state's equitable title on the ground that it had not been pleaded as a defense; and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the premises. In the course of the proceedings Clarke filed a brief on behalf of the defendant, signed, "Robt. M. Clarke, attorney-general, for defendant." This is the only instance in which he used his official designation. Subsequent to the rendition of said judgment, and before the commencement of the present action, the title of Treadway became, by proper conveyances, vested in the plaintiffs, Adams et al., and Slingerland and his co-state officers went out of office, and the defendants in this case succeeded to the several offices named in the title. Upon the trial of the case the plaintiffs, to show title, offered in evidence the judgment-roll in said case of Treadway v. Slingerland, relying upon it to show that the question of title is res adjudicata. The defendants objected on the ground that the suit was between private parties, to which the state was not, and could not be made a party; that the defendants hold under the state, and are not in privity with Slingerland; and that the state's title is in no way affected by that judgment. After full argument the circuit judge sustained the objection, the district judge dissenting, and the testimony was thereupon rejected under the statute—the opinion of the presiding judge for the time being prevailing. As the district judge had, on a previous occasion, ruled differently, the plaintiff's counsel had relied upon this judgment-roll as conclusive, and were not prepared to try the case on their original title. Upon their application upon the ground of surprise, a juror was allowed to be withdrawn, and the case continued. At the present term, a jury having been waived, the cause was submitted to the court upon stipulated facts, embracing simply the said judgment-roll, and other facts necessary to make it applicable—the plaintiffs concluding to rely upon it without putting in and re-litigating their original title. The question, therefore, is precisely the same as that upon the former trial as to the effect of the said proceedings and judgment in the case of Treadway v. Slingerland. Section 2778 of the Compiled Laws of Nevada provides that, "whenever the governor shall direct, or in the opinion of the attorney-general, to protect and secure the interests of the state, it is necessary that a suit be commenced or defended in any court, it is hereby made the duty of the attorney-general to commence such action or make such defense."

R. S. Mesick, for plaintiffs.

J. R. Kittrell and R. M. Clarke, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. After a careful review of the question, with deference to the opinion of the district judge, I am compelled to say that I am still satisfied with the conclusion reached and announced at the former trial. The oral decision then delivered was taken down by a shorthand reporter, and as it sufficiently presents my views upon the point, I shall adopt it without re-writing. It is as follows:

"With reference to the admissibility of this record, the only question in my mind is, whether the judgment in that case can, under any circumstances, be binding upon the state of Nevada. If not binding upon the state of Nevada, it can have no relevancy to the issues in this case. It is a well-settled principle that the state cannot be sued in its own courts without its express consent given by law. Upon that question there is no conflict in the authorities. The Davis, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 19; The Siren, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 153, 154. But the exact point which arises in this case has never been determined by any court that I am aware of. That is to say, it has never been decided that, if an officer of the government is a trespasser, and is sued in his individual character for the trespass, and a judgment rendered against him, although the state may be affected by such judgment, it is concluded by the adjudication. There is no decision to which my attention has been called, or so far as I am aware, determining the effect of such a judgment as against the state—whether it adjudges or conclusively determines its rights.

"If the state can be bound by the judgment against Slingerland, it must necessarily have been substantially and in fact, though not in form, a party to the action. And yet it cannot be sued without its express assent given by law. And where the state cannot be sued, the decisions are to the effect that the fact of its having been sued, and the state's attorney having in fact appeared, does not change the phase of the question at all. It has been decided in at least two cases by the supreme court of the United States, that the appearance by the United States attorney, without authority, does not give jurisdiction over the United States. In the case of the U. S. v. McLemore, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 286, an action was brought in relation to certain moneys, and 'the district attorney of the United States answered the bill, and the matter of payments was referred to a master, who reported a balance against the United States after paying the judgment. On this report the district judge, holding the circuit court, decreed a perpetual injunction, and that the United States should pay the costs. The supreme court held that there was no jurisdiction of this case in the circuit court, as the government is not liable to be sued except with its own consent, given by law. Nor can a decree or judgment be entered against the government for costs.'

"So that notwithstanding the fact that the attorney of the United States appeared without making the objection in the court below, and the case went to judgment, the judgment was held to be void for the want of jurisdiction. That decision is affirmed in the case of Hill v. U. S., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 386. In that case a bill was filed on the equity side of the court by Hill and the other complainants against the United States, to enjoin a judgment obtained against the complainants by the United States. The United States attorney at first answered fully to the merits, thus appearing and giving the court all the jurisdiction that could be given by a voluntary appearance. A motion was afterwards made by the United States attorney to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill as to the United States, for want of jurisdiction as to them. In the decision of this case the supreme court says:

"The question here propounded, without any necessity for recurrence to particular examples, would seem to meet its solution in the regular and best-settled principles of public law. No maxim is thought to be better established or more universally assented to than that which ordains that a sovereign cannot, ex delicto, be amenable to its own creatures or agents employed under its own authority for the fulfillment merely of its own legitimate ends. A departure from this maxim can be sustained only upon the grounds of permission on the part of the sovereign or the government, expressly declared, and an attempt to overrule or to impair it on a foundation independently of such permission must involve an inconsistency and confusion, both in theory and practice, subversive of regular order or power. * * * Without dilating upon the propriety or necessity of the principle here stated, or seeking to multiply examples of its enforcement, we content ourselves with referring to a single and recent case in this court, which appears to cover the one now before us in all its features. We allude to the case of U. S. v. McLemore, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 286, where it is broadly laid down as the law, that a circuit court cannot entertain a bill on the equity side of the court, praying that the United States may be perpetually enjoined from proceeding upon a judgment obtained by them, as the government is not liable to be sued, except by its own consent given by law.'

"Unless consent is given by the law in a suit against the state or government the court under these decisions has no jurisdiction, and the fact that the state's attorney appears voluntarily to contest it does not give the court jurisdiction where it was before without jurisdiction. The supreme court in these cases declares the judgments to be void for want of jurisdiction, notwithstanding the fact that the attorney of the government assumed to appear for it. It is held by other authorities that the officer may be sued in his individual capacity. The case of Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738, affords as good an illustration as any other upon this point. There the treasurer was sued and an injunction applied for restraining the defendant from disposing of the money seized by him on behalf of the state. Pending the action there was a change in the treasurer. Counsel were evidently aware of the effect of this change upon the case, because a supplemental bill was filed making the successor in office a party in order to bind him, thus recognizing the principle that he would not have been bound by a judgment against his predecessor.

"But in that case the money had not been mingled with the funds of the state. It had been kept separate in bags by the former treasurer, was transmitted by him in that manner to, and was kept separate by, his successor. They were sued individually, and it was held that the action could be maintained. Now, undoubtedly, if a judgment had been recovered against the treasurer he would have been personally responsible for that money; he had committed a breach of the law, the statute under which he acted having been declared unconstitutional. He would have been personally responsible for the trespass. But the court sustained this bill for an injunction, on the ground that the money was kept separate in his control, and could be identified as the specific money seized. It is said in the decision that it might have been reached by an action of detinue. The identical money could be reached in the hands of these parties. If the money had been mingled with the money of the state, and had so lost its identity, there is nothing in the decision to indicate what the effect of the judgment against the treasurer would have been upon the rights of the state. At all events there is nothing to indicate that the judgment against these parties would have been a bar in an action by the state, if the state had afterwards sued the bank for the amount of the tax. Of course, if the state had afterwards sued the bank for the money, the adjudication upon the law would have been authority upon the law of the case. But the facts, I apprehend, would have been open to re-examination. There was a question of fact discussed in the case as to whether the testimony was sufficient to show that the money went into the hands of the second treasurer, and the court held that it was. But there is nothing to indicate that the matter would have been res adjudicata in an action by the state against the bank. In this case, if the state cannot be sued, as it cannot be, I do not see how it is possible that a judgment against one of its officers sued in his individual capacity can be conclusive upon the rights of the state, even though the state happens to be interested in the subject-matter of the action, and the attorney-general, in consequence of that interest, appears for the officer, and assumes to defend him as his individual attorney or otherwise. The court still fails to get jurisdiction of the state. Where the officer is sued in his individual capacity, and the state cannot be made a party, I do not see upon what principle a judgment against the officer can be binding upon the state as a matter adjudicated between the state and the plaintiff. A matter can be res adjudicata only between the parties to the action and their privies. The case read by counsel for plaintiff from 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] giving a synopsis of what was determined in Osborn v. U. S. Bank, it seems to me indicates that there could be no valid judgment against the state. It is said by the court: 'In deciding who are parties to the suit, the court will not look beyond the record. Making a state officer a party does not make the state a party, although her laws may have prompted his action, and the state may stand behind him as the real party in interest. A state can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put into that relation to the case.' Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 220.

"If in an action against a state officer in his individual capacity for a trespass committed under color of his office, the state cannot be considered a party for the purpose of defending an action on the ground that the state cannot be sued, it seems absurd to hold that the state is, nevertheless, a party for the purpose of having its rights conclusively determined by the judgment rendered.

"The case of landlord and tenant cited does not seem to me to be in point, because there the landlord is liable to be sued without his consent. If he appears and defends the suit, it is his own act. He, substantially and voluntarily, becomes a party to the suit, and the court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the party, by his voluntary assumption of the defense, is bound by the result. The state cannot be made a party at all, without its consent, and the assumed appearance of the district attorney or attorney-general, without express authority of law, does not constitute a consent. I do not think the provision in the statute of Nevada, in regard to the duties of the attorney-general, touches the question. It might be the duty of the attorney-general to appear and make the objection that the state cannot be sued, and even to conduct the defense for the benefit of the state. But it is a general law, such as exists in most if not all the states defining the duties of the attorney-general, to appear and defend the interests of the state in those cases where the state may be rightfully sued. And it may be desirable that he should appear and defend officers of the state, or even others where the interests of the state may be affected, although the decision against the parties to an action might not be an adjudication conclusive upon the rights of the state. It may be a short, easy, and, if successful, convenient way of protecting the state interest, and, as such, a proper course for him to pursue. However this may be, it is clear that this section of the statute does not in terms, or by any reasonable implication authorize private parties to sue the state; and we have seen from the authorities cited, that where there is no authority of law for suing the state, an assumed authority of an attorney of the state to appear does not confer jurisdiction over the state. A fortiori, his assuming to appear unofficially for the defendants in defense of actions brought against private parties in their individual capacities who happens to be officers of the state, and to which the state is not and cannot be made a party, cannot confer jurisdiction to conclusively determine the rights of the state as against the state. If such could be the effect of the judgment, it must be on the ground that the state can indirectly in substance and fact be made a party, when the law forbids her being made a party in form; and her rights may be determined in a case over which she has no control, for the defendants must have authority to control their own defenses, even if the defense is conducted by the attorney of the state.

"Under the view I take of the case, this is not an adjudication binding upon the state, and as the state is not concluded, I do not see how the present officers can be in privity with the prior warden, or how the state can be in privity with him. They 'took nothing from him and the state got nothing from him. The rights of the state upon which the defendants rely depend upon its own title, not derived from Slingerland, the former warden. In my judgment the record is of no effect and inadmissible. If plaintiffs have a title they ought to recover their land. The point which they make is that the state is estopped from showing that they have not any title. They will be permitted to show their title, if they have any. I will say to counsel that my associate, the district judge, does not concur in the views I have expressed. There is a division of opinion between us. But as the law now stands, the opinion of the presiding judge prevails for the time being."

The very elaborate opinion in Lee v. Kaufman, recently decided by Judge Hughes, cited by plaintiffs' counsel on the present trial, only goes to the question of jurisdiction over actions against officers, and does not in my judgment touch the question of the effect of this judgment. [Case No. 8,191.] For the purpose of this decision, I assume that the court had jurisdiction of the action against Slingerland individually, without discussing the point or formally deciding it.

There must be a judgment for the defendants, with costs, and it is so ordered.

Case No. 49.

ADAMS v. BURKE et al.

[3 Sawy. 415.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 20, 1875.

PUBLIC LANDS — GRANT IN PRAESENTI — OREGON DONATION ACT — ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. The donation act is a grant in praesenti to the settler thereunder, subject to the conditions of residence and cultivation required by the act; and until such conditions are performed the estate granted is defeasible, but when performed it becomes indefeasible.

1FED.CAS.—7

2. Upon the receipt and acceptance by the commissioner of the register and receiver's certificate, the right of a settler to a patent is perfect; but such patent does not pass the estate, that having been done by the act, and is only record evidence furnished by the government for the security of the donee, of the settlement and performance of the conditions annexed to the grant, and the partition of the same, where the settler is married, between himself and wife.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Upon the death of a settler or his wife intestate, after compliance with the act and before patent issues, the estate of the intestate vests as directed by the act in the survivor and children or heirs of the decedent, but, quere? Do the persons in whom it vests take a new title from the government or only succeed under the act to the title of the intestate?

4. To render a possession adverse it must be hostile in its origin and hostile in its continuance.

5. The party through whom the defendants derive whatever interest they possess in this case went into possession asserting that the title was in the United States, and the defendants during their possession, commenced a suit in one of the state courts to compel a transfer to them of the legal title to the premises from the heirs of one Lownsdale, to whom a patent of the United States had been issued, and through whom the plaintiff traces his title, asserting in a verified complaint that the legal title was in such heirs and had been acquired by them by alleged settlement of their ancestor and the patent of the United States, and setting forth sundry acts and agreements by which it was contended that the heirs were bound to hold the title in trust for the defendants, and asking a decree that the heirs be declared trustees for their benefit; Held, that the complaint in that action, being verified, was an admission that the defendants did not hold the premises by a claim of title hostile to the title of the plaintiff, but with a recognition of that title in another, and an assertion of an equitable right to have that title transferred to them, and that there was therefore no such adverse possession by them as was contemplated by the statute.

At law. Action to recover land, tried by the court without a jury. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

E. C. Bronaugh, for plaintiff.

Charles B. Upton and W. T. Trimble, for defendants.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. Two actions of ejectment were brought by the plaintiff, each for a portion of the demanded premises, against the tenants in possession. The landlords having appeared in both, the actions have been consolidated. The premises constitute the west half of lot four of block eighteen in the city of Portland. The plaintiff deraigns title to them from the children and grandchildren of Daniel H. Lownsdale, who had in September, 1852, by previous settlement upon land which includes the premises, and continued residence thereon, and cultivation, acquired a right to a patent of the United States under the act of congress of September 29, 1850, [9 Stat. 496,] known as the "Donation Act." The defendants controvert the claim of title by the plaintiff, and assert an adverse possession of twenty years under claim and color of title, in bar of the action.

By the fourth section of the donation act a grant of land was made to every white settler or occupant of the public lands in Oregon above the age of eighteen years, who was a citizen of the United States, or had made a declaration according to law of his intention to become a citizen, or should make such declaration on or before the first day of December, 1851, and who was at the time a resident of the territory, or might become a resident on or before the first day of December, 1850, and who should reside upon and cultivate the land for four consecutive years and otherwise conform to the provisions of the act. The grant was of 320 acres of land if the settler or occupant was a single man, but if a married man, or if a married man, or if he should become a married man within a year from the first of December, 1850, then the grant was of 640 acres, one-half to himself and the other half to his wife to be held by her in her own right. The surveyor-general of the United States was required to designate the part of the land thus granted inuring to the husband and the part inuring to the wife, and enter the same on the records of his office; and the act declares that in all cases where such married persons complied with the provisions of the act so as to entitle them to the grant, whether under the preceding provisional government or subsequently, and either should die before the patent issued, the survivor and children or heirs of the deceased should be entitled to his or her share or interest in equal proportions, except where the deceased should otherwise have disposed of the same by will.

At the time of the passage of this act, Daniel H. Lownsdale was of the class of persons designated who were entitled to the benefit of its provisions; he was a settler in Oregon, and had been for years, and he was a citizen of the United States; and he was either a married man or became so within a year from the first of December, 1850. He had settled upon land now covering a large portion of the city of Portland, and he at once became a claimant under the act dating the commencement of his settlement on the twenty-second of September, 1848. This settlement was followed by his continued residence and cultivation up to September 22, 1852, the period of four years prescribed by the act. Due proof of this residence and cultivation was made to the surveyor-general and by him the land was assigned to the husband and wife in equal proportions, the east half to the husband, and the west half to the wife. The premises in controversy lie within the portion assigned to the husband.

In October, 1860, a patent certificate was issued in favor of Lownsdale and wife by the register and receiver of the land office in Oregon, in the usual form, and containing recitals of the claim asserted by Lownsdale of a donation right, and that proof had been made of the commencement of the settlement, and of the subsequent continued residence and cultivation required by the act. The certificate, accompanied by evidence of the facts recited, was forwarded to the commissioner of the general land office at Washington in order that a patent might issue thereon, if no valid objection was made to it. No objection, so far as we are informed, was made to the certificate, or to the sufficiency of the accompanying evidence, and in June, 1865, a patent of the United States was issued to Lownsdale and wife, in terms granting to them the property claimed, the east half to Lownsdale and the west half to his wife. Both husband and wife died intestate, before the patent issued; the wife in April, 1854; the husband in May, 1862.

Where, as in the present case, there had been a previous settlement, the act of congress vested the title in the settler immediately upon its passage. The act is a grant in praesenti; its language is, that there "shall be and hereby is granted" to the settler or occupant, language which imports an immediate transfer of the interest of the grantor, not a promise to transfer that interest at a future period. But it is a grant subject to the conditions of continued residence and cultivation of four years from the settlement: if these conditions had not already been performed on the passage of the act they were to be performed subsequently. Until performed, the estate granted was defeasible; when performed, the estate became indefeasible.

When the certificate of the register and receiver was received by the commissioner, and accepted by him as satisfactory, the right of Lownsdale and of his wife to a patent was perfected. The estate as already observed passed by the act; the patent which the United States subsequently issued was record evidence on the part of the government, furnished for the security and protection of the donees or their successors in interest, of the settlement of Lownsdale and of the performance of the conditions annexed to the grant, and of the due assignment to him and to his wife of their respective portions; but it had no other or greater operation upon the title. "In the legislation of congress," said the supreme court in a recent case, "a patent has a double operation. It is a conveyance by the government when the government has any interest to convey, but where it is issued upon the confirmation of a claim of a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record, of the existence of that title, or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation. The instrument is not the less efficacious as a record of previously existing rights, because it also embodies words of release or transfer from the government." Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 529.

Upon the death of the wife in 1854, intestate, she not having previously transferred her interest, her portion of the land—that is, the west half—vested under the act of congress in the surviving husband and her children in equal shares. No patent had then issued, and the act declares who shall in such case succeed to the estate of the deceased. Upon the death of the husband intestate, he not having previously disposed of his interest, his portion of the land—that is, the east half—vested in his children, under the act, in equal shares. The estate took this course by the express direction of the act.

But whether the children thus took a new title from the government, or only succeeded under the statute to such title as the wife in the one instance, and the husband in the other, had acquired, is one of the questions controverted in the case. The plaintiff contends that the children took a new title as donees under the statute on the death of their father, in May, 1862; and if this be the case, there can of course be no adverse possession sufficiently prolonged to bar the action. The statute requires such possession to be continued for twenty years. The defendants contend that the children only succeeded to the estate of the deceased, and that an adverse possession commenced against him whilst living can be tacked on to the subsequent adverse holding, so as to make the statutory period of twenty years. It is not important for the decision of the present case which view of this question be correct. As the district judge and myself have differed in opinion, in another case, upon the question whether a conveyance by a donation claimant after he had acquired by his settlement, residence, and cultivation, a right to a patent and, before the patent was issued passes the estate (a decision of which would determine the question here involved), and that case will be certified to the supreme court, I refrain from expressing an opinion upon the point raised here. This case, as already said, can be determined without passing upon that point.

The defendants show a continuous possession of the premises, open and notorious, since 1851, but that possession has not been, in my judgment, during this period, or for twenty years, adverse to the title of the plaintiff. To render a possession adverse it must be hostile in its origin, and hostile in its continuance. The entry upon the premises must be made, and the possession must be accompanied with the claim of title against the whole world. In other words, the occupant must assert ownership in himself. An entry by permission of another, or, with an admission of another's title, will not set the statute running, and the recognition of another's title after the statute has commenced running, at any time within the twenty years, no matter for how brief a period, will destroy the continuity of the hostile possession, and avoid the bar of the statute.

In the present case Pettygrove, the party through whom the defendants derive whatever interest they possess, went into possession not claiming title in himself, but asserting, as was the fact, that the title was in the United States; and neither he nor his grantees have at any time since pretended that the fact was otherwise, or that they have ever acquired that title. On the contrary, the defendants, one of whom, Burke, has occupied the premises by himself or tenants for the greater part of the last twenty years, instituted legal proceedings as late as January, 1871, in one of the state courts to compel a transfer to them of the legal title to the premises from the heirs of Daniel H. Lownsdale, asserting in the complaint in the case verified by the oath of Burke, that such legal title was in the heirs, and had been acquired by their ancestor, Daniel H. Lownsdale, by the proceedings taken upon his alleged settlement and the patent of the United States; and setting forth sundry acts and agreements by which they contended that the heirs were bound to hold the title in trust for them, and asking a decree that the heirs might be declared trustees for their benefit.

That complaint is an admission of the highest character—a sworn statement—that the defendants did not hold the premises by a claim of title hostile to the title of the plaintiff, but with a recognition of that title, and an assertion of some equitable right to have that title transferred to them. It is too plain for argument that there was here no such adverse possession of the premises as is contemplated by the statute. If the defendants have any equities which should control the legal title, they must seek to enforce them in some appropriate form. The state court, it would seem, did not think they had any. Be that as it may, a possession with a claim of an equitable right to another's legal title to the premises, is not a possession adverse to the existence of that title; but a possession with a continued recognition of its validity.

A general finding must be had for the plaintiff, and judgment entered thereon for the possession of the premises, with costs.

[NOTE. In Hall v. Russell, 101 U. S. 503, it was held that, under section 4 of the donation act, "there was no grant of the land to a settler until he had qualified himself to take as grantee by completing his four years of residence and cultivation, and performing such other acts in the meantime as the statute required in order to protect his claim and keep it alive. Down to that time he was an authorized settler on the public lands, but not a grantee. His rights in the land were statutory only, and cannot be extended beyond the just interpretation of the language congress has used to make known its will."]

In equity.

Bill in equity [by James Adams against Alpheus Burks] for an injunction to restrain alleged infringement of letters-patent [No. 38,713] for an improvement in coffin lids granted James S. Merrill and George W. Horner, May 26, 1863, and for an account. The defendant filed a plea to the whole bill. The pleadings and facts are stated in the opinion.

E. H. Pierce, for complainant. L. S. Dabney, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, District Judge. The complainant in this case is the assignee of a territorial right, for the towns of Natick and Sherborn in Massachusetts, in the patent issued to Merrill & Horner, for a new and useful improvement in coffin lids. The defendant is charged in the bill with an infringement of the complainant's rights under the patent, in the town of Natick. The defendant by plea sets out in defence that Merrill & Horner have assigned to Lockhart & Seelye of Cambridge, all their right, title, and interest in the invention secured by the letters-patent, for, to, and in a circle whose radius is ten miles, having the city of Boston as its centre. (Such a circle would not, upon any construction of the terms of the grant, include the towns of Natick and Sherborn.) Defendant's plea further sets out that he is an undertaker, and that in his business as an undertaker he has used and sold no coffins containing the invention secured by the letters-patent, except such coffins containing said invention as have been manufactured by Lockhart & Seelye, within a circle whose radius is ten miles, having the city of Boston as its centre, and sold within said circle by said Lockhart & Seelye, without condition or restriction. The case is set down for hearing on bill and plea; the facts in the case for the purposes of this hearing being admitted, and not in controversy.

The only question presented in the case is this: Does the purchase of a patented article, lawfully manufactured and sold without restriction or condition within his territory, by the territorial assignee of a patent right, convey to the purchaser the right to use or sell the article in another territory for which another person has taken an assignment of the same patent? When a patented product passes lawfully into the hands of a purchaser without condition or restriction, it is no longer within the monopoly or under the protection of the patent act, but outside of it. Chaffee v. Boston Belting Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 217; Bloomer v. Millinger, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 350; Alken v. Manchester Print Works, [Case No. 113.] In Goodyear v. Beverly Rubber Co., Id. 5,557, Mr. Justice Clifford, commenting upon the cases of Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 549, and Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, says: "Both of those cases affirm the rule, that when the patented machine rightfully passes to the hands of a purchaser from the patentee, or from any other person by him authorized to convey it, the machine is no longer within the limits of the monopoly, and is no longer under the peculiar protection granted to patented rights." It is clear that by such a sale the purchaser acquires an absolute title to the manufactured product which is the subject of a patent, and may deal with it in the same manner as if dealing with any other kind of property. He may use it, repair it, improve upon it, or sell it. Subsequent purchasers acquire the same rights as the seller had, and may do with the article, or its materials, whatever the first purchaser could have lawfully done if he had not parted with the title. Undoubtedly, the assignee or licensee of the right to make and vend the patented product is bound by his contract, and cannot exceed it.

In this case, the assignee of the territorial right for Boston and its vicinity was fully authorized to make the patented article and sell it in the market. When, therefore, he sold the patented coffins, the royalty upon them was paid, and the purchaser took the property discharged of the peculiar privileges secured by the patent. If this were not so, the purchaser of a manufactured patent article of wearing apparel might be liable for the use of the patented article in every town and city through which he might travel, in which there might be an assignee of a district [distinct] territorial right, although he had purchased it of one having a lawful right to make and sell it, so as to convey an absolute and unrestricted title. Defendant's plea adjudged good.

[NOTE. On complainant's appeal, this decree was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It seems to us that although the right of Lockhart & Seelye to manufacture, to sell, and to use these coffin lids was limited to the circle of ten miles around Boston, that a purchaser from them of a single coffin acquired the right to use that coffin for the purpose for which all coffins are used; that, so far as the use of it was concerned, the patentee had received his consideration, and it was no longer within the monopoly of the patent. * * * The right to manufacture, the right to sell, and the right to use, are each substantive rights, and may be granted or conferred separately by the patentee. But, in the essential nature of things, when the patentee, or the person having his rights, sells a machine or instrument whose sole value is in its use, he receives the consideration for its use, and he parts with the right to restrict that use. The article, in the language of the court, passes without the limit of the monopoly, (Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How.—55 U. S.—549; Mitchell v. Hawley, 16 Wall.—83 U. S.—544:) that is to say, the patentee or his assignee having in the act of sale received all the royalty or consideration which he claims for the use of his invention in that particular machine or instrument, it is open to the use of the purchaser without further restriction on account of the monopoly of the patentees. If this principle be sound as to a machine or instrument whose use may be continued for a number of years, and may extend beyond the existence of the patent, as limited at the time of the sale, and into the period of a renewal or extension, it must be much more applicable to an instrument or product of a patented manufacture which perishes in the first use of it, or which, by that first use, becomes incapable of further use, and of no further value. Such is the case with the coffin lids of appellant's patent. A careful examination of the plea satisfies us that the defendant, who, as an undertaker, purchased each of these coffins, and used it in burying the body which he was employed to bury, acquired the right to this use of it, freed from any claim of the patentee, though purchased within the ten-mile circle, and used without it." Mr. Justice Bradley filed a dissenting opinion, taking the ground that the right of the territorial assignees "consisted of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the improved coffin lid within the limited territory described, but did not include any right to make, use, or vend the same outside of those limits. As the assigned right to make the lids was a restricted right limited to the territory, so the assigned right to use them was a restricted right limited in the same manner. Each right is conveyed by precisely the same language." Adams v. Burks, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 453.

[In Hatch v. Adams, 22 Fed. Rep. 434, the issue was as to the right of a purchaser of a patent bed bottom from the territorial assignee of the patentee to sell the bed bottom, in the "course of trade," outside the territory granted to such assignee. The complainant, in seeking to enjoin such sales, contended that, although the sale of a patented article "for use in the ordinary affairs of life" withdrew it from the monopoly of the patent, the sale of the right to "sell the article" was a conveyance of a portion of the franchise. In disposing of the case, Judge McKennan distinguished Adams v. Burks, Case No. 50, remarking that, although Judge Shepley's opinion in that case is "broad enough to cover the right to sell, as well as the right to use, a patented article outside of a restricted locality, only the latter right was involved in the case, and what was said by the learned judge touching the right to sell was clearly obiter; and, when the case reached the supreme court, that court expressly treated the right to manufacture and sell and the right to use a patented article as distinct substantive rights, and decided the law only as it related to the exercise of the latter right."

[In McKay v. Wooster, Case No. 8,847, it appeared that the assignee of the territory east of the Rocky mountains, for the manufacture and sale of a patented case for the transportation of eggs, sold cases to dealers in Iowa, who filled them with eggs, and shipped to the Pacific coast, where the eggs were sold, and the cases disposed of for what they would bring. The assignee of the Pacific coast territory sought to restrain this alleged infringement of his rights, but the bill was dismissed by Judge Sawyer, who held that the sale of the case by the territorial assignee removed it from the monopoly of the patent, and that the purchaser or those claiming under him could use it until worn out. This decision was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court, at the October term, 1873, but no opinion was filed.

[Another aspect of the question arose in Hobbie v. Jennison, 40 Fed. Rep. 887, where the assignee of the right to manufacture and sell a patented steam pipe for the state of Michigan sold a quantity of the pipe to a Detroit firm, knowing that it was to be resold and used in territory belonging to another. In considering the case, Mr. Justice Brown, at that time district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, said that he was strongly inclined to hold that one who sells a patented article for the "purpose of or knowing that it will be resold * * * in territory belonging to another is equally amenable to suit as if the sale were made in such other territory," as in line with the cases which hold that where a party makes one or more elements of a patented combination, with the intent that they shall be used in the completed combination, he is liable as an infringer; but upon the authority of Adams v. Burks, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 453, affirming Case No. 50, which involved the right of the assignee "to sell the patented article, to be used outside of such limited district," and which, the learned justice remarked, seemed not to be distinguishable from the present case, it was held that the sale of the pipe within the vendor's territory carried the right to use it within territory owned by another, "notwithstanding the knowledge of both parties that a use outside of the territory is intended." From the report of the case, the question as to whether or not the resale of the pipe by the Detroit firm was a "sale," and in the "usual course of trade," as distinguished from the use, does not seem to have been presented. This case was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court, on the ground that the sale of the pipe was completed at Bay City, within the state of Michigan. Hobbie v. Jennison, 40 Fed. Rep. 887; s. c. 149 U. S. 355, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 879.]

Case No. 51.

ADAMS v. DE COOK et al.

[McAll. 253.]¹

Circuit Court, D. California. Jan. Term, 1858.*
COURTS—PROBATE JURISDICTION—WILL BEFORE PROBATE—EVIDENCE.

1. In England, the validity of a will of real estate is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical [common-law] courts. Such is the rule in such of the states of the Union where the distinction between wills of realty and personalty prevails.

2. Under the probate laws of California, no such distinction exists.

3. General rule, that a party cannot give in evidence and claim title under an unprobated will in the ordinary judicial tribunals, cannot be applied to this case, upon the ground, "lex non cogit ad impossibilia."

4. The act of the legislature of this state in relation to probate of wills, has been declared, by the supreme court of this state, not to apply to a will executed in California prior to the passing of the act.

5. There is reason to believe that in the most remote provinces of the Spanish government, there was some interposition of judicial authority necessary to authenticate the execution of a will, although there may have been no special tribunal like the probate court.

6. The will before probate is not a nullity, is the foundation of title; and under the circumstances of this case evidence may be received to prove the execution of it.

[Cited in Brooks v. McComb, 38 Fed. Rep. 320.]

[7. A custom authorizing the execution of wills in the presence of two witnesses, existing in California under the Mexican government, and prevailing for such time and so uniform and notorious that the assent of the authorities might fairly be presumed, operated as a repeal of the previously existing law requiring three witnesses.]

[8. Where an attesting witness and the testator were ignorant of the language in which the will was written, so that neither could understand the disposition of property made by it, and no interpretation of it was made to them, such witness cannot be considered competent.]

[9. Declarations of a testator which are merely general, and may comport with the existence of any will other than that in controversy, are not competent to prove the execution of such disputed will.]

[10. A codicil, executed in California while it was under the Mexican government, was attested by one R. as "syndic." The office of syndic was merely ministerial, and conferred no authority to authenticate the codicil. Held, that such official description might be disregarded, and R. be considered as one of the witnesses.]

At law. This was an action of ejectment. The plaintiff having closed, the defendant offered as the foundation of his title a document purporting to be the will of Ellab Grimes, who died on the 7th day of November, 1848, and proffered to prove the execution of the same. This document and the proof offered were objected to, on the ground that it had not been proved as a will before any judicial tribunal or functionary, and being unprobated it and the evidence offered to sustain it were inadmissible as evidence.

Hall McAllister and E. M. Gould, for plaintiff.

Crockett & Crittenden, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. In England the validity of a will of real estate is a question exclusively for the adjudication of the common-law courts; and such is the case in some of the states of the Union, where the distinction exists which prevails in that country between the probate of wills of real estate and personalty. In this state, where the general power of proving all wills is vested in a special jurisdiction known as the probate court, the jurisdiction of that tribunal is as conclusive in regard to the probate of wills of real and personal estate, as is that of the ecclesiastical courts in England in relation to wills of personalty. If, therefore, there had been a probate of this document as a will by the appropriate tribunal in this state, such action if final would have been conclusive. As a general rule, a party cannot give in evidence and claim title under an unprobated will in the ordinary courts; and under that rule, this document must be rejected as evidence. But under the peculiar circumstances of this case, that rule cannot be applied, and we must resort to the maxim, "Lex non cogit ad impossibilia." It is true this document never has been admitted to probate, and under the rulings of the supreme court of this state it could not be. Professing on its face to be a will, if executed it was so prior to the passing of the act of the legislature regulating the probate of wills; and the supreme court of this state have decided, that the statute does not apply to wills executed prior to its passing.

"Not only (they say) does the statute fail to require wills executed before its passage to be probated; but on examination of the different sections of it, we are forced to the conclusion that this was not a causis ommissis, and that the legislature actually intended to exclude them from the operation of the statute, leaving their validity to rest upon the laws under which they were made." This exposition of the statute by the highest judicial tribunal in this state, is conclusive on the point.

The next inquiry is, whether the fact that the document offered to be proved, has never been probated under the Mexican law, which existed at the time when it was made, invalidates it to such an extent as to deprive defendants of the right now to prove its execution before this court?

The supreme court in this state, in the case of Castro v. Castro, 6 Cal. 158, say: "It does not appear that there ever was a court of probate in this country; and from what we have been able to gather from our limited sources of information on this subject, such a proceeding was unknown to the laws and customs of California." If, by these expressions, the court intend to convey simply the idea that no such special tribunal as a court of probate existed in California, as would exclude the jurisdiction of another tribunal, in relation to wills, we concur in their conclusion. But there is reason to believe that, in the most remote provinces under the Spanish government, there was some interposition of judicial authority necessary to secure, in an authentic form, the proper execution of wills.

In the case of Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal. 488, in the supreme court of this state, where the validity of a will was sustained, it had been dictated by the testator, and the act was stated to have been done in the presence of the judge, and the whole signed by that functionary, who certified he was present and gives faith he knew the testator, who, to appearance, was of sound mind, and, in testimony thereof, he signed the document. As early as 1792, in Louisiana, we find a will proved before an alcalde, after the death of the testator; proof of execution was made to the alcalde, who made a decree which was in effect a probate of the will. The supreme court of the United States so treated it. They say: "That question is closed by the decree of the alcalde; that decree declares the will to be valid and subsisting, and decrees its execution. We are obliged to treat this decree as the judicial order of a court of competent jurisdiction. In fact, it was the only judicial authority in the province of Louisiana, except the governor." Fouvergne v. City of New Orleans, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 471. Now, it is an historical fact, that there were alcaldes and justices of the peace in California. The paper offered in evidence alludes to their existence, and to the absence of two alcaldes at the time of its execution, as a reason for their non-attendance. We think that, although there may have been no probate court, or special tribunal, analogous to that known to us, still, that neither in California, nor in any country where the civil law obtained, there was not some connection between the judicial authority and the execution of wills.

This will being unprobated under the laws of this state, for the reasons heretofore stated, and not having been proved before any judicial authority under the Mexican law existing at the time it was executed, the inquiry is, how is it to be considered by this court? The only reason assigned for the repudiation of all jurisdiction of the probate of wills, by the ordinary tribunals of justice is, that exclusive jurisdiction over them is given to the probate courts by statute. We are unable to detect in the civil jurisprudence the delegation of exclusive jurisdiction over the probate of wills, to one tribunal, to the exclusion of all others; nor can we find any time within which the will is invalidated if not proved. There is a requisition under the Mexican law, that a publication of a will shall be made by a representation to a judge, within one month after the date of the testator's death. But suppose this requisition to be applicable to both kinds of wills known to the Mexican law, "secret and open," the failure to prove the will does not avoid it under that law. The provision of the law requiring the publication within a limited time, seems to have for its object to stimulate the executor to prompt action in the proof of the will; for the only penalty prescribed, is the forfeiture of the legacy or bequest left to him by the will, and in case there be none, he is liable for the damages incurred by his neglect.

What, under the common law, is the position of a party claiming under an unprobated will? It certainly conveys an interest to him, which he should be permitted to vindicate.

In Ex parte Fuller, [Case No. 5,147,] the learned judge asks, in referring to the Revised Statutes of Maine, "Do they make any alteration in the operation of the common law, as to probate of wills?" The 25th section of one of the statutes of Maine declared: "No will shall be effectual to pass real or personal estate, unless it shall have been proved and allowed in the probate court; and the probate of such will shall be conclusive as to the due execution thereof."

Judge Story comments upon that legislation: "The argument is (he says) that under this clause the will is a mere nullity before probate, that the probate gives it life and effect from that time, and not retroactively. It appears to me that this section is merely affirmative of the law as it antecedently stood." "The will before probate is in no just juridical sense a nullity." "The will must still be the foundation of the whole title,—inchoate and imperfect if you please, until its validity is ascertained by the probate,—but still, a will and not a nullity." "The probate ascertains nothing but the original validity of the will as such. The act of the testator gives it life, his death consummated the title derivatively from himself; and the probate only ascertains that the instrument in fact is what it purports on its face to be. It might as well be said, that a will of real estate at the common law, is a nullity until a jury has ascertained its validity, whereas the verdict ascertains only the fact that the title under the will is perfect; because it was executed by a competent testator, and therefore took effect by relation from the death of the testator."

The foundation, then, of a title in the devisee is the will; the probate of it is but the authentic means which the law provides for the ascertainment of the facts which prove its validity. Under our law, the exclusive power is given to a special jurisdiction to perpetuate those facts, whose final action is conclusive on all other tribunals. This statutory reason for the exclusive jurisdiction of the probate court operates to so great extent that in the case of Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 645, it is said, "that in cases of fraud, equity has a concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law; but in regard to a will charged to have been obtained by fraud, this rule does not hold. It may be difficult to assign any very satisfactory reason for this exception; that exclusive jurisdiction over the probate of wills is vested in another tribunal, is the only one that can be given." That the will is the foundation of the whole title of the devisee—that the will is in no just judicial sense a nullity—that its existence is owing to the living act, and the death, of the testator—that the acts of legislation which provide for their probate, are acts not of creation but merely of evidence,—are not to be doubted. This document could not, nor can be, admitted to probate in this state under our law; it cannot be proved by any Mexican functionary in this state, for none such exists.

The complainant, therefore, is remediless unless proof of the execution of this document, now offered, is admitted. He should have that right. In the case of Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. [Va.] 195, 198, 199, a kindred point was discussed. That court, after deciding that the act of the legislature of Virginia had vested in the probate court of that state jurisdiction generally over the probate of wills of real and personal estate, and made its action conclusive proof of their validity, say—

"But it does not follow from the fact that it was necessary either to the validity of the will of a real or personal estate, or that no other proof was admissible as to a will of lands."

"Nor does the recognition of an authority to compel the production of the will, or the direction that the original will shall remain amongst the records, lead to the inference, that a probate was necessary to the validity of a will of lands."

Again, they say: "The various acts on the subject being made only to provide a tribunal for granting probates in this country as a substitute for the ecclesiastical courts in England, a probate was not necessary here but for the purpose for which it was necessary there, to wit, to enable the executor to sue; and that for all other purposes without probate in England the will was valid; and so the acts of the legislature, making the probate of the will conclusive as to lands, but without requiring such probate as a prerequisite to the validity of the will as to lands, left it, if not proved, to the court of probate, to have the same effect as if the acts had not been passed; that is, that the effect given to the probate of the will, which was given for the benefit of those claiming under it, no longer existed. If the effect of the acts of the legislature was to declare the will invalid if not proved in a court of probate, then those acts, in many cases, would have been prejudicial to those claiming under the will."

"The only effect of the probate is to afford one mode of proof that the will is genuine; but the mode of proof allowable before these statutes, is not abolished by them,—that is, by evidence on the trial. If a will had been offered for probate and rejected, this might be used thereafter as the decision of a competent tribunal, and would condemn it forever." If it be admitted that the law which prevailed in California when the will offered in evidence was executed, prescribed a proceeding for the proof of wills, such proof could constitute no more than a probate under our law would; unless some law of Mexico had declared them void without such proof, of the existence of which this court is not apprised.

After the fullest consideration the court has been able to give this question, it is [has] arrived at the conclusion, that the evidence offered is admissible, and that the complainant may submit, under the instructions of the court, the evidence on which he relies to prove the execution of the document offered as the will of Eliab Grimes.

The evidence objected to having been submitted to the jury, which, with the other testimony, occupied several days, the following instructions were given to the jury:

1. A will executed under the Mexican government, as the one in controversy was, in the presence of only two witnesses, was invalid; but under the decision of the supreme court of this state, desirous to conform to the decisions of the highest state court in relation to the law which regulates the transfer of real estate within the limits of the state, I instruct you, if you shall be satisfied from the testimony that a usage or custom had prevailed in California uninterruptedly for the space of ten years, so uniform and notorious that it may fairly be presumed to have received the tacit consent of the country, which authorized the execution of wills in the presence of two witnesses only, the clear proof of the existence of such usage will operate a repeal of the previous existing law, and two witnesses will be sufficient. If such proof has not been afforded, and if three competent witnesses have not attested the codicil "C," given in evidence in this case, it is a nullity.

2. The witnesses (whether two or three) must be competent. Should you be satisfied from the proofs that the said codicil "C" was written in Spanish, that any of the attesting witnesses was ignorant of that language, that he could neither read nor speak it, that the testator was unacquainted with it, and could not understand it when read, or that neither he nor one of them could understand the disposition of the property made by the will, and no sworn interpretation of the will was made to them, then I instruct you that such witness or witnesses cannot be considered as competent.

3. The signature of each and every witness, and of the testator, must be satisfactorily established. The proof of one or any number less than the whole, will only prove that, so far as each of them is concerned, it is well executed; but will not tend to establish the document as a will.

4. In relation to the verbal declarations of the testator, they cannot be considered as competent to prove the execution of the will. They are general declarations, the truth of which comport with the existence of any will other than that in controversy. These declarations, made under the circumstances, are proof simply of the existence of a will.

5. If the signature of each and every witness of the number sufficient be proved, and the signature of the testator, then I instruct you the satisfactory proofs of those facts afford evidence from which you may presume a due execution of the codicil ("C"), in the absence of what you may deem counteracting testimony.

6. That this presumption is sometimes termed "an intendment," at others "an inference," it is in fact only "prima-facie" proof, and exists only so long as there is no evidence to counteract it. If, therefore, it has been proved to your satisfaction that the codicil ("C") was written in the Spanish language, that on its face it professes to be executed before Mexican functionaries, which it was not, that one or more of the witnesses did not "speak" or "read" the Spanish language, that the testator was equally ignorant of it, that no other proof than the legal presumption to which I have alluded has been given to show a communication of the contents of the will had been made between the testator and the witnesses,—then I instruct you, if these facts have been proved, they must be duly considered by you; and if, in view of all the other testimony, they counteract the presumption arising out of the proof of the signatures of the testator and witnesses,—in that case, the legal presumption will be rebutted. To conclude, if the facts in this case induce you to believe, that if the attesting witnesses were alive and present, they could not testify to the dictation or nuncupation of his will by the testator to the witnesses, or that it was read in his and their presence, and understood by them,—then I instruct you, the proof made at this trial of the signatures to the document ("C") cannot establish it as the last will of Ellab Grimes. On the contrary, if the facts of the case do not thus influence you, the presumption to which I have alluded must control your action.

7. The codicil ("C") is attested by one Robert T. Ridley, as syndic; such office under the Mexican government, being a mere ministerial office without judicial functions, gave him no authority to authenticate the codicil. His act as an official act was void; but he signed with the declared intention to testify to the contents of the will; and his official prefix may be disregarded, and he considered as one of the witnesses.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants.

[NOTE. This case was heard in the supreme court on writ of error, and the judgment was affirmed, Mr. Justice Campbell delivering the opinion. It was held that the admission of evidence showing a custom in early California as to the manner of making wills was proper, for the reason that the acts of individuals in accordance with such custom were legitimate, if it was so prevailing and notorious that, according to the principles of Spanish jurisprudence in force in California at the time, the assent of the authorities to such custom could be presumed. The will was held valid, although it did not show on its face that the witnesses were present during the whole time of its execution, and heard and understood the dispositions it contained, since the observance of necessary formalities might be shown by testimony dehors the instrument. Adams v. Norris, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 353.]

Case No. 52.

ADAMS v. DOUGLAS COUNTY.

ADAMS v. BEACH.

[McCahon, 235; 1 Kan. 627.]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. May Term, 1868.

CIRCUIT COURTS — JURISDICTION — INJUNCTION — RAILWAY AID BONDS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — CORPORATIONS.

[1. A circuit court cannot take jurisdiction, on the ground of diverse citizenship, of suits by a nonresident taxpayer to enjoin county officers from issuing county bonds, and from levying a tax to pay the coupons thereof, unless the bill shows that the tax to be paid by complainant, or his liability, determined by the ratio of his taxable property to all the taxable property in the county, exceeds $500.]

[2. Allegations in such suit that complainant sues "on behalf of all others similarly situated and interested, to wit, all persons owning property subject to taxation in said county," do not show an amount in dispute sufficient to give the circuit court jurisdiction, as the amount of the interests of the parties so associated is not alleged; and, if the interests of such other persons be admissible on the question, residents, who could not be associated as complainants, must of necessity be included.]

[Cited in King v. Wilson, Case No. 7,810.]

[3. An issue of county bonds in aid of a railroad was authorized by a vote of the people, in the manner prescribed by law, with a condition that the railroad track should be completed and in full operation by a certain date, and that the road should run to Lawrence. The track was completed, but not equipped with turntables, water tanks, etc., by the date fixed, and came within only a quarter of a mile of Lawrence. Held, on application to enjoin the issue of the bonds and a tax levy to pay the first coupons, that there had been a substantial performance.]

[4. A nonresident taxpayer cannot maintain a suit to enjoin the issue of coupon bonds, and a tax levy to pay the coupons, unless he has some interest other than that common to the whole community.]

[5. A temporary injunction may be dissolved before the respondent answers when he is not charged with any particular knowledge of the facts alleged, and when the complainant's legal right is doubtful, and the continuance of the injunction unnecessary for his protection, and injurious to respondent.]

[6. Under the judiciary act of 1789, (1 Stat. 34,) as amended by 2 Stat. 418, authorizing district and circuit judges to grant injunctions in vacation, they have power to dissolve injunctions in vacation.]

[7. A temporary injunction granted in the unavoidable absence of the respondents, with the intention of hearing the whole case as if no injunction had been allowed, should be dissolved, even in vacation, as soon as lack of jurisdiction appears.]

[8. Const. Kan. art. 12, § 1, provides that corporations shall be created only by general laws. [In equity. Bills by Phineas Adams to enjoin the county commissioners of Douglas county from issuing certain bonds, and Melancthon S. Beach, the county treasurer, and other county officers, from levying a tax to pay the coupons first due. On motions to dissolve temporary injunctions. Granted.]

DELAHAY, District Judge. These two suits concern, substantially, the same subject-matter. The first is instituted for the purpose of enjoining the county of Douglas, through its corporate authorities, from issuing certain bonds to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars, to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad; the second is to enjoin the treasurer, and other officers of the county, from the collection of a tax imposed by the commissioners, for the payment of the coupon due January 1, 1869, upon a bond for three hundred thousand dollars already issued, and from the application of the proceeds of such tax to the liquidation of the coupon. The facts in brief are, that the question of issuing bonds to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars to this company was submitted, by an order of the board of county commissioners, to the voters of the county, by virtue of an act of the legislature of the state as far back as the 8th day of February, 1867.

The terms and conditions upon which the issuance of the bonds was to be made are expressly stated in the submission, as follows: "Shall the county of Douglas subscribe three hundred thousand dollars, in full paid stock, to the capital stock of the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company, and issue bonds of the county therefor, in bonds payable thirty years after date, bearing interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date of delivery, to be issued to said company when twenty-four miles of said railroad track shall be completed and in full operation from Lawrence, Douglas county, via Baldwin City: provided, that no greater amount of bonds shall be issued than the amount of stock issued by the railroad company to the county of Douglas.

"2 The conditions of the above is with the express understanding and agreement, that the said company shall relinquish all claim to the bonds for subscription of stock heretofore voted to said company, to wit, on the 12th day of September, 1865." The vote was taken with this result: Two thousand one hundred and seventy for the proposition, and four hundred and twenty-four against, a majority of little less than five-sixths of the entire vote.

The board of commissioners, by resolution, on the 15th day of April, 1868, reciting the above submission, the vote and the result, declared that, the company having complied with all the requirements, stock to the amount mentioned should be subscribed, and the bonds issued. Since this time, a series of suits in the state courts, some of which (though by no means pertinently) were recited in the second bill, have been instituted for the purpose of restraining, by injunction, the said board from issuing these bonds and thus subscribing to the capital stock of the company. Now, for the first time, the same species of litigation is proposed in the federal courts. Phineas Adams, a non-resident of the state of Kansas, and a resident of the state of New Hampshire, as the complainant, has filed, on the equity side of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, the several bills mentioned, for the purpose of obtaining an injunction as already stated.

It will be seen, from this review of the facts, that the cases affect very large pecuniary interests, and the nature of the work, the early completion of which may much depend upon the aid contributed by the subscription for its stock, shows that the interests other than those merely pecuniary must be even greater. Not to introduce into this opinion the ordinary speculations as to the advantages to arise to the state, and especially to that region through which the proposed road will pass, it will suffice to call attention to the vote of the people of Douglas county, in illustration of their own estimate of these advantages. But in a country where railroad intercommunication commands so large a share of public interest, and elicits such immense outlays of capital, I might feel myself justified in enlarging upon this subject, were it not that, holding the scales of justice, and performing the duties of her minister, I am not allowed to be swayed from her dictates by any consideration of the character of one or the other of the litigants in her courts. The complainant is entitled, small though his interest may be in comparison to that appertaining to the other parties in this proceeding, to have that interest protected, provided he brings himself within the class of persons and exhibits an interest over which this court has jurisdiction. The respondents have moved for a dissolution of the injunctions which had been temporarily issued in the two cases, and insist, as grounds for their motion, from the showing of the bill and the papers filed in the cases: First. That this court has no jurisdiction. Second. That there are not such equities disclosed as entitle the complainants to a continuation of this relief. These propositions will be disposed of in their order.

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is prescribed by law, that of the circuit court included. Its jurisdiction is derived from the nature of the subject in controversy in some cases, and in others from the character of the parties, and in some from the union of those several elements. The latter is the case in the present instance. It must appear in the bill that the complainant is a non-resident of the state, to enable him to invoke the aid of this court, otherwise he is remitted for redress to the courts of the state. In addition to this, it must appear in the bill that there is in controversy, or in jeopardy by the action of the respondents, whom he desires to restrain, an amount exceeding five hundred dollars. Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, § 11, [1 Stat. 78.] The non-residence of the complainant sufficiently appears, and the respondents make no point to the contrary. Whether the bill shows more than the sum of five hundred dollars to be involved in the proceeding is another question. The respondents say, as one of their grounds of motion, that it does not. The complainant insists that it does. If, in any proper sense, the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, the amount of bonds the issue of which is asked to be enjoined, may be said to be in controversy, then of course, in the first case, no question can exist. There is a sense in which this amount may be said to be in controversy. But is it a sense which will determine the question in favor of the complainant? To be in controversy certainly can not, properly, be understood in any other sense than as being in an attitude to be decided in favor of, or against, the party who asks the interference of the court. While that amount is really the subject of which the court is asked to adjudicate, it is not the amount which the complainant claims that he is in jeopardy of losing by the respondents unless they are restrained.

We do not see how any other test of jurisdiction can be maintained, than that when more than five hundred dollars are required as the basis of jurisdiction, it must mean an amount exceeding five hundred dollars which the plaintiff is liable to lose or gain by the result of the suit. It could never have been intended by the act of congress, that because a subject matter may have been involved in the proceeding, worth more than five hundred dollars, therefore any non-resident may have brought his suit in the circuit court, even although his own interest may have been a very small amount of the item of property. The result of such a doctrine would be, or might be, to throng these courts with proceedings in which a mere trifle might be claimed by the complainant, simply because that trifle comprised a part—a small part—of some large interest. A single stockholder in a banking or any other corporation, to the amount of fifty dollars, might thus gain in the circuit court a foothold for litigation, merely because the capital stock of the company was a million. Thus all the safeguards, whether of protection of the courts against the annoyance of numerous petty litigations, or of parties against being burdened with the more inconvenient and expensive proceedings of courts of the United States, would be effectually destroyed. We understand the act of congress to mean, not that the party must litigate in reference to something worth more than five hundred dollars, but that he must bring into court, to be adjudicated by it, an interest exceeding five hundred dollars in something, which interest he shall claim to have as against his adversary, or, in case of injunction, which interest his adversary is about to put in jeopardy by his action, against which he invokes the protection of the courts. This doctrine, besides being well established by the course of decisions in the supreme court, (see [Green v. Lister,] 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 229; [Gordon v. Longest,] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 97; [Childress v. Emory,] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 642,) was recognized at a recent term of the circuit court for this district, Judge Miller presiding, when, in the case of Jewett v. Treasurer of Leavenworth County, [Case No. 7,312,] the suit was dismissed because it did not appear that, in a proceeding to enjoin the treasurer, the complainant's tax exceeded five hundred dollars. Now, by this test, we think it is clear that in neither of the cases does the complainant show himself to be entitled to a status here. In the first case, there is no allegation whatever as to any particular amount of interest he may have to be jeopardized by the issuing of the bonds; the allegation in this respect being simply that he is the owner of real estate liable to be taxed. In the second, he alleges that the amount in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars. This is not the phraseology of the statute; "matter in dispute," not amount in controversy, is the language. But while this language may mean something very different from that used in the statute, let us suppose it to be of synonymous import. Is the difficulty thereby avoided? Shall the question of jurisdiction be settled by the assertion of the complainant? We think not. Certainly it cannot be so settled when, as in this case, the showing of the bill is, that the bonds are proposed to be issued by a county to a corporation, and his interest can, upon the face of the bill, arise only from the fact of being as a taxable person subject to a liability, unless by further showing that he has an amount of property, of such a ratio to the whole property of the county as would raise his liability to more than five hundred dollars. But suppose that his right to sue were apparent from the bill, by the exhibition of an interest fully large enough to confer jurisdiction, or suppose the views hitherto expressed to be unsound, and that jurisdiction may arise simply upon the magnitude of the subject of litigation, without reference to that of his interest in the subject, still, upon authority, it is not only necessary that he should be competent to maintain this suit, but it is equally necessary that all other parties complainants should be so competent. "When the jurisdiction of the circuit court depends on the character of the parties, and such party consists of a number of individuals, every one must be competent to sue in the courts of the United States, or jurisdiction cannot be entertained." Wood v. Arredondo, [Case No. 17,148;] Mandeville v. Cookenderfer, [Id. 9,009.] Now the complainant sues as well for himself, he alleges, "as on behalf of all others similarly situated and interested," and claims that, if not himself sufficiently interested to make the amount exceeding five hundred dollars the basis of jurisdiction, he, along with the large number similarly situated, would certainly so be. This, however, he does not allege as a fact, and while we may admit the presumption to be a strong one, we cannot concede it, even if free from objection, to be sufficient to create the necessary "amount in dispute." But the attempt is open to several serious difficulties. The first is, whether a complainant may thus, without some special authority thereto, associate other parties with him; a second question is, whether, if allowed so to do, there is really any other party until he comes in, under the privilege accorded him, and is duly made a party. But a third, and yet more grave difficulty is, that this introduction of others, if admissible, is absolutely fatal to the status of the complainant. It would not be so, but might aid him, if he had stopped with the allegation as a moment ago herein incorporated, but this he does not do, but after claiming to sue, in the language quoted, for others as well as himself, he adds, "to wit, all persons owning property subject to taxation in said county," not all non-resident persons, but all persons. Of course, therefore, he sues alike for non-residents like himself and for residents. The authority a moment since alluded to requires all the complainants to be competent to sue, "or jurisdiction cannot be entertained." All persons liable to taxation must, of necessity, include residents who cannot be associated with him as complainants. Being so associated with him, all lose their right to the redress they ask. Thus, besides that there is not an affirmative showing of an amount in dispute sufficient to confer jurisdiction, there is no statement of facts from which this interest in him, making such amount in dispute, may be inferred. If this be true of the first case, how much more true is it of the other, when the object is to enjoin the collection of a tax of twenty-one thousand dollars, to pay the first coupon due upon a bond for three hundred thousand dollars heretofore issued. Evidence before me at the hearing tends to show that his interests, tested by his liability for taxes, does [do] not exceed five dollars. Not having in either case presented such an amount in dispute, this court has no jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed.

This view disposes of the case, and here this opinion might very well close, yet I do not think that I ought to leave the case without some review of the second proposition of the respondent, that the bill does not disclose such a case of merit as would justify this court in granting the relief prayed. The legislature of the state of Kansas, in 1865, passed a law authorizing the counties, in the way therein pointed out, to subscribe stock for the purpose of advancing the public improvements of the class in question. Under that law, the board of commissioners of Douglas county submitted to the legal voters of that county the proposition, whether the sum of three hundred thousand dollars should be paid to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad, for which stock to this amount should be issued by the company to the county. A very large majority, as has already been said, was cast in favor of the proposition. Who are legal voters is defined by our constitution and laws. The complainant, by his showing in the bill as a groundwork of being admitted to prosecute the suit in this court, was not a legal voter. The constitution and laws of no state in this union confer the right of suffrage upon property, any more than do those of this state.

The law, therefore, and constitution of Kansas, have not given to the complainant in these suits any say whatever upon this question. In so far, this law may be unconstitutional. I do not propose to say that it is. I do not think that it is, but I have not reviewed, and do not propose to decide that question. I will remark only in passing that the law is certainly not so, as being against the constitution of the state. If there be any qualification of voters unconstitutional, it is that both the constitution and the law are so, as being in conflict with the constitution of the United States. The affirmative of this proposition would be so comprehensive as to affect the constitution and laws of every state in the union. These constitutional and legal questions may well suggest the inquiry, whether the complainant in this suit can have anything to do with the subject of these bills. He was not allowed, as a non-resident, to vote upon the question of authorizing the issuing of the bonds. Can he come into the courts of the United States, under any circumstances, claiming to exercise any control over this subject? With never so large an interest, the complainant might find himself embarrassed by this peculiar state of things. It is not made necessary by any presentation of the point to decide this question, and I shall, therefore, not do more than observe that, if to recognize such a barrier to his enforcement of a claim here should be said to present an exception to the rule that there is no wrong without a remedy, all that need be said in reply is, that the public policy of every state must, and does, sometimes give rise to similar anomalous conditions.

At all events, it may be safely said that, to lay a foundation of right in a case of this description, there should be distinct allegations, either of fraudulent collusion against complainant's interest or clear departure from the line of imposed duty. There are no such allegations in either of these bills.

Every one owning land in a state holds it subject to the constitution and laws of the state. Not willing so to hold it he may sell, or, preferring to hold it and not satisfied to be denied any privilege of citizenship in regard to it, he may relieve himself of the disability by becoming a citizen. But a few observations are due in reference to the allegations of the bill, relied upon particularly to show merits. They are, that, at a meeting alleged to be informal, certain values, consisting of other bonds and moneys, and stocks of other companies, were issued without sufficient consideration, and to give a controlling influence against the interests of Douglas county; that the road was not constructed and equipped, by reason of the want of turn tables, water tanks, etc., by the 1st of January, 1868, as by the terms of the submission of the question to the people it was provided it should be. It is supposed the court will take judicial notice of the necessity of these, as equipments of the road. It may be well questioned, on the contrary, whether a provision of water tanks, turn tables, etc., the want of which is alleged in proof of noncompliance by the company with the terms of the submission, was necessary to constitute a compliance. The language of the submission is, that the "railroad track shall be completed, and in full operation." While it is true that a railroad is, in one sense, incomplete without these appendages, in a more limited sense it is not so. Certainly a railroad track may be complete, literally, without any one of these, while it is not complete only when we make railroad track to mean something more than it literally does. But besides this, may not the requirement have been thus restricted, for the reason that it was not intended to exact more of the company than simply to construct the railroad track, literally, by that time, leaving those appendages necessary for its absolute completion, in a more extended sense, to follow, as of course they must to make it practically useful and valuable? Besides, time is not necessarily of the essence of an agreement, and particularly in proceedings in equity. The most that could be claimed is, that the board of commissioners might, or if it be preferred ought, to have forborne the issuing of the bonds, and submitted the question again to vote. But they are entrusted with the management of the interests of the county, and have a right to the exercise of a fair and honest discretion, and, if, in the exercise of this, they do what a fair man under the same circumstances might do, I can not see any just cause of complaint. The charge of an undue motive in issuing the values above mentioned is not sustained. Motive may be inferred and judged from circumstances, but is not very well capable of direct proof; a mere assertion, or even an assertion sustained by affidavit amounts generally to no more than an opinion. But the same remarks may be made in reference to this as to the last matter, that the board of commissioners, being constituted by the law the guardians of the interests of the county, were the proper judges of the fairness of the transactions of the company, or they might, indeed, well think that, the county having voted in favor of the bonds and subscription, they had but the simple duty to perform to issue them. It is further alleged that, it being a part of the terms of the submission that the road should run to Lawrence, the company failed to comply, because the road only came within a quarter of a mile of that city. It is a very nice adherence to words to deny that this is a compliance with the requirement. "Qui hærit in litera, hærit in cortice." It would have been little, if any, more to exact that it should have come to the center of the city. A few hundred yards more or less, in a question of termination of a railroad, can not present, generally, a very grave doubt as to whether or not similar terms have been complied with. The intervention of a river, or other great natural impediment, between the terminus as made and such as a literal compliance with the language would have made, might present such a doubt. But nothing of that kind exists in this case. Whether the company owns the intervening space or proposes to acquire the title to it is not of importance.

There remain two other questions, to which some reference should be made before dismissing the second point of inquiry. First. May any and every individual non-resident tax payer institute such a proceeding against the corporate authorities of a county? While on the one hand, individual rights are entitled to protection, on the other, great public interests ought not lightly to be subjected to delay and annoyance. Whether any principle can be stated, that would be capable of application without possible hardship, may be doubted; to deny all redress to individuals in such cases would be apt, sometimes, to result in injustice. To recognize the right of every one to arraign public servants of the description under consideration is full of inconvenience and danger. High authorities have held that, unless the individual has some interest other than that which is common to the whole community, he can not maintain a proceeding in such cases. Doolittle v. Supervisors of Broome County, 18 N. Y. 155, and Roosevelt v. Draper, 23 N. Y. 318, are leading cases in a large class in support of this doctrine; and the following are a few, of many, by which they are sustained: [O'Brien v. Norwich & W. R. Co.] 17 Conn. 372; [Smith v. City of Boston.] 7 Cush. 254; [Mayor, etc., of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co.] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 91; [Hale v. Cushman.] 6 Metc. [Mass.] 425; [Pratt v.

Bacon.] 10 Pick. 123; 3 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1768-1770. With this doctrine I am much inclined to concur, as far more reasonable and just than that which would recognize every one, in a community of common interest, as entitled to arrest the onward progress of great public concerns. It may be that legislative wisdom might well direct itself to this subject, and, while amply protecting personal rights, provide more fully than now seems to be done the proper safeguards against ill advised invocations of judicial protection.

As a ground of equity interference, not only well established by authority but expressly provided by statute, for the government of the courts of the United States, redress rests upon the want of adequate remedy without it. "Suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, where plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law. Act Cong. 1789, ch. 20, § 16, [1 Stat. 82.]

While the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is independent of the local law, and therefore no objection to their jurisdiction may arise from the fact of a remedy under the local law, as decided in Gordon v. Hobart, [Case No. 5,609;] 3 Cranch, C. C. 267, [Mandeville v. Cookenderfer.] Id. 9,009;] yet, if such redress may be had at law in the courts of the United States, the equity jurisdiction now invoked plainly can not be entertained. Why may not such redress be had in these courts? There can be little doubt that, either in resistance of an unjust exaction or by proceedings to correct an evil suffered, redress at law might be successfully sought. This suggests another inquiry, which might well be somewhat elaborately considered, were the other propositions differently decided; that is, how far the equitable remedy by injunction is dependent upon the irreparability of the threatened wrong, and whether, judged by this standard, these suits are maintainable. But in the views I have taken this inquiry is rendered unnecessary. I will but ask, is there any evil, not to say irreparable, to be inflicted by the proceedings proposed to be enjoined, or on the contrary, are they not, however regarded by the complainant, of the highest advantage to him? If, indeed, some additional tax be the result, is it not likely to redound in a largely increased value of his property? Assuredly those to whom the proposition was submitted, and by whose votes it was determined, expect to reap large advantages from the outlay. It is inevitable that the complainant shall enjoy these as largely as others. In such a case he can not claim to be injured, had he a right to the position of complainant. The courtesy and ability with which the views of the learned counsel for the complainant have been presented will not permit me to close without noticing some of the leading authorities relied upon by him upon some other points. He objects to the dissolution in these cases that no injunction can be dissolved until the coming in of the answers of the respondents, and in support refers to 3 Abb. Nat. Dig. p. 45, §§ 255, 256. [Read v. Consequa, Case No. 11,606; Robinson v. Cathcart, Id. 11,946.] That these authorities present this as the general rule is true, but the rule is not without exceptions. While it is recognized as the usual course, in injunction cases, that all parties shall answer, it is added, in a case of high authority, "But that rule may be dispensed with under peculiar circumstances, as when the party not answering is not charged in the bill with any particular knowledge of the facts alleged." Ashe v. Hale, 5 Ired. Eq. 55. There is no such allegation in the bills under consideration. Again, injunction was dissolved, the plaintiff's legal title being doubtful, and the continuance of the injunction being unnecessary for the protection of complainant and injurious to defendants. [Shrewsbury & B. Ry. Co. v. London & N. W. Ry. Co.,] 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 122. The doubtfulness of plaintiff's title in that case is fully met by the lack of complainant's legal status in this, while the want of necessity of protection to himself, and the injury to respondents, are quite as glaring here as they could have been there. Another qualification of the rule is, that "it is applicable only to an injunction properly issued." [Mallett v. Weybossett Bank,] 1 Barb. 217.

It is objected again, that dissolution can not be made in vacation. Brightly, Dig. p. 256, § 5. The power in injunctions, as conferred upon the judges of the district courts, is peculiar and ample. It is as follows: "The judges of the district courts of the United States shall have as full power to grant writs of injunction, to operate within their respective districts, in all cases which may come before the circuit courts within their respective districts, as is now exercised by any of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, under the same rules, regulations and restrictions as are provided by the several acts of congress establishing the judiciary of the United States, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: provided, that the same shall not, unless so ordered by the circuit court, continue longer than to the circuit court next ensuing; nor shall an injunction be issued by a district judge in any case where a party has had a reasonable time to apply to the circuit court for the writ." 2 Stat. 418.

This, it will be seen, confers upon the judges of the district courts, not the courts themselves, the same power as have the judges of the supreme court. The power of these latter is derived from the judiciary act, (1 Stat. 34.) "Writs of ne exeat and of injunction may be granted by any judge of the supreme court, in cases where they might be granted by the supreme, or a circuit court." Whence it follows, that the judges of the district courts, to the extent of their territorial jurisdiction, have in these matters the full power of the supreme and circuit courts. This carries as well, in vacation, the power to dissolve as to grant, the former being incident to the latter. The act of the 23d August, 1842, (5 Brightly, Dig. p. 257, § 6, [5 Stat. 517, § 5,] is amply confirmatory: "And it shall be competent for any judge of the court, upon reasonable notice to the parties, in the clerk's office or at chambers, and in vacation as well as in term, to make, direct, and award all such process, commissions, and interlocutory orders, rules and other proceedings, whenever the same are not grantable of course, according to the rules and practice of the court." But besides this view of the law of the question, the attitude of these cases is such as, itself, to make an exception to the rules ordinarily governing the dissolutions of injunctions, whether it respect the doing so without answer or the exercise of the power in the vacation. When applied for, a time was fixed for a hearing. The respondents were hindered by circumstances not under their control from attending, and the hearing was adjourned to Thursday, December 17, 1868. In the meantime the injunction was granted, temporarily, but it was not intended that the respondents should thereby be placed in any worse, or the complainants in any better situation, but, on the contrary, it was understood that the whole cases were to be heard as if no injunctions had been allowed. Under such circumstances, I cannot hesitate to treat them as of themselves exceptional, and not properly to be circumscribed by what, under other circumstances, might be not a too rigid rule, but, in addition to all this, is it not abundantly clear that, if the views expressed as to the question of jurisdiction are sound, a dissolution ought to be allowed? I understand the doctrine to not need to be sustained by accumulating authorities, that so soon, at whatever stage of a cause, as a want of jurisdiction shall be disclosed, the further entertainment thereof shall cease.

The complainant's counsel insists further that the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company has no corporate existence, and relies upon article 12, § 1, Const. Kan.: "The legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers; corporations may be created under general laws, but all such general laws may be amended or repealed." This company was incorporated under a territorial law of 1858, before the adoption of the constitution. Under the fourth section of the schedule that law was undoubtedly continued in force. It was amended by act of 1864, and it is claimed that, under the decision of the supreme court of the state of Kansas, in the case of the City of Atchison v. Bartholow, 4 Kan. 124, the last named act is unconstitutional. That the provision first cited is to be construed as denying to the legislature the power to regulate and control franchises theretofore granted, is a doctrine to which I cannot assent. To regulate and control are essentially different from creating. The direct consequence of such a construction would be that, however pernicious privileges before granted might be found in their exercise, no remedy in legislative control would exist. I may safely, therefore, assume, without presenting the differences of the two cases and particularly analyzing the opinion of the supreme court, that they did not intend their decision to reach to the extent claimed, but based it upon the fact that, in that case, the law reviewed by them created corporate power. Nor, for the same reason, do I deem it necessary to indicate some very material differences between an incorporate company and a municipal organization known as a city.

Complainant's counsel refers to several authorities to sustain the right of the complainant to seek redress as he here does, the most prominent of which are Smith v. Swormstedt, 21 Curt. Dec. 141, and Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331. The first was an application for a division of a common property of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the complainants averring that the bill was brought by authority and under the direction of the general and annexed conferences of the church south, which had been erected into a separate ecclesiastical organization under an ordinance of a general conference and the subsequent action of certain annual conferences. That the supreme court recognized the complainants as competent parties in such a proceeding does not furnish support to the complainant in this suit. The case in 18 How. [59 U. S.] does not seem to me to be any more influential in this direction.

This opinion has already grown too long to permit me to feel at liberty to more particularly review the last mentioned or other authorities cited in opposition to the conclusions I have reached. The injunctions heretofore issued in these causes are dissolved, with costs.

NOTE, [from original report.] An injunction may be granted to enjoin the illegal levy of any tax charge or assessment, or the collection of any illegal tax charge or assessment, or any proceeding to enforce the same; and any number of persons whose property is affected by a tax or assessment so levied, may unite in the petition filed to obtain such injunction. *Dass. Case No. 53.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1848.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—UTILITY—APPLICATION—ABANDONMENT.

1. Extensive use is evidence of utility.
2. Two structures are "substantially" the same when they are of the same material, if material is important; of the same thickness, if thickness is important, or of the same form, when form contributes to the result.
3. The "invention" is the conception of the idea, not its final development. The law does not mean, by invention, maturity.
[Cited in National Filtering Oil Co. v. Arctic Oil Co., Case No. 10,042.]
4. Where an inventor perseveres in his application for a patent, from first to last, although he may file several successive applications, some of which are withdrawn, his patent can not be defeated, unless upon proof of public use, or sale, for two years before his application.
[Cited in Blandy v. Griffith, Case No. 1,529; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, Id. 5,603; Wickersham v. Singer, Id. 17,610.]
5. The use of a safe, made by one man for himself, and kept by him in his counting-room, or cellar, is a private and not a public use.
6. A patentee may, from patriotism, generosity, despair, or other cause, abandon his patent and invention to the public.
[Cited in Zinsser v. Kremer, 39 Fed. Rep. 114.]
7. Patentees are not bound by their opinions upon legal questions relating to their patents.
[Cited in Bevin v. East Hampton Bell Co., Case No. 1,379.]

8. Fitzgerald claimed "the application of plaster of Paris, in the construction of all iron safes, in the manner above described." Held: That this was a claim for double safes, with a filling of plaster of Paris, three inches thick, poured, in a liquid state, between the double sides of the safe, including the doors, and could only be anticipated by proof of the prior use of a similar combination.

[Distinguished in Bevin v. East Hampton Bell Co., Case No. 1,379.]

In equity. This was an action on the case, [Adams & Hammond against Edwards & Holman,] tried before Mr. Justice Woodbury and a jury, for the infringement of letters patent [No. 3,117,] granted to Daniel Fitzgerald, June 1, 1843, and conveyed by mesne assignments, to plaintiffs. The nature of the invention consisted in interposing plaster of Paris between the inner and outer chests of fire-proof iron safes, after the manner described in the specification.

S. P. Staples and B. R. Curtis, for plaintiffs.

R. Choate and Dana & Jewell, for defendants.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, charged the jury as follows:

The plaintiffs sue on a patent, which was taken out June 1, 1843, by Daniel Fitzgerald, and assigned to the plaintiffs in that year. Discriminate that, if you please, from every other patent (as many have, on the trial, been mentioned), in order to understand the case thoroughly—a patent issued in 1843, and assigned to plaintiffs, by Benj. G. Wilder, who obtained it from Enos Wilder, who obtained it from Fitzgerald. Now, that patent being so obtained, and assigned to the plaintiffs, no person has a right to use what is described in it, without their permission. They say, that they did not give any permission to the defendants to use it; but that the defendants did use it from 1843 to 1847, and the claim they lay before you is for damages for this use. In order to understand what is in controversy, you will start with the fact, that a patent was taken out in June, 1843.

The next point is, that the defendants have manufactured, used, and sold safes, similar to those described in this patent, for three or four years. That is not in controversy. It is proved by several witnesses, and is not in dispute. Now, that, gentlemen, in point of law, would entitle the plaintiffs to recover for the damages they have sustained, prima facie. They bring here a public document, or grant, made correctly in point of law. Patents are not now issued indiscriminately; and, on the face, it is good, if there is nothing shown against it, and a prima facie case cannot be made out against it. The case becomes narrowed down very much, by the defense, which rests on two great points. These are—First, that notwithstanding the defendants have used this invention, yet, for various reasons, they had a right to use it. And secondly, even though they had not a right to use it, under the law, yet they used it under such circumstances that there should not be any damages given. These defenses you must look into.

Had the defendants a right to use this patent? For if they had, they should not be held responsible; if they had not, they should. Now, gentlemen, as a general principle of law, although a patent thus obtained and thus offered in evidence, as I have said, is prima facie evidence for the plaintiff to recover; yet it is competent for the defendant to show he has a right to use the invention, and he may sustain his defense on various points. He may show that he had a license to use from the party who obtained the patent, and in such a form that he had a right to use the invention. He may show that he has purchased the right—that is, supposing the patent is good; or he may show something to prove that the patent is not good—as by showing that some other person is the inventor, and not the patentee; or by showing that the thing patented had been in public use for two years before the patent was applied for; or by showing that it had been on sale for two years before, with his consent; or by proving that, from patriotism, generosity, or in despair, or from some other cause, he had abandoned it, so that the other party has a right to use it, and any one may take it up, as a sort of waif, or derelict property. And I mention these points, because they are all relied on for the defense; and being relied on, you must start with the principle of law, that the defendant should, on these, make out his defense, just as you originally started with the principle that the plaintiff must make out his position, or a prima facie case, against the defendants. If the defendants impugn the testimony which the plaintiffs offer, as to the legality or correctness of the patent, you must see how the scale preponderates.

The first argument to prove that this patent is bad, is, because it is for a matter not considered patentable. Now, gentlemen, in order to judge of that, we must first inquire what it is for. I shall instruct you, as a matter of law, that such things are patentable as the discoverer undertakes to apply, in combination, or separately, so as to produce new and beneficial results. We must make some broad and general distinctions of that kind. It need not be a new material. It need not be an entire new machine. It need not be, wholly or throughout, a new application. But when it is a combination, as it is here, it must bring some new feature into the combination, and produce new and beneficial results. And if it does that, it is of no matter how slight is the change. If there is a novelty in the application and in the machine, and if it produces new and valuable results, it is patentable, whether the combination is new, or an important part only, is new. There must be something new in relation to it, and it must produce better results than what were produced before. And when you get novelty in parts or in combination, and novelty in results, and beneficial results, you get what the constitution and laws were enacted to protect: that is, something newly invented, which benefits mankind. It must not be a frivolous object, like the invention of an improvement in making playing-cards, which has been driven out of court because the object was bad.

But in this case the object was laudable—to insure safety to the most valuable articles of property. It was patentable, then, if new and useful.

Next, then, did it produce new and beneficial results? It must have some superior advantages over that which existed before, or it could not produce such results, as to have resisted severe fires, such as consumed former safes, and their contents, without injuring these. Now, gentlemen, in testing what is a new combination, as I have said, you may not have a new material, but you must have something different, in form or system, from what was used before, and so different as to cause new and better results. Now, as I understand it, safes have long existed before; and such as are called double safes. There had long been some opening between the chests, at some times to be occupied by air, and at other times by substances of various kinds, supposed to be non-conductors—some without and some with the application of such substances to the doors. But what Fitzgerald claims to be new, if I understand it, is, not the use of plaster of Paris to repel fire entirely, in some modes and in some articles, but that it had not been used before in combination with these double chests, applied to both doors and sides, to the thickness with which he used it, in the liquid state, for the purpose of repelling fire. He says, in the patent, it may be used, dry or liquid; but what he expressly relies upon and describes in detail, is the liquid state, and of a certain thickness. As you will see, this has an important bearing upon the result. He uses it for the doors, too, as well as the sides. This patent, then, requires that the safe shall be constructed, under his invention, so as to leave a space of two or three inches—a wider space than has been generally employed before. The preparation shall not be put on merely as a wash, or nailed on like a sheet of mica, or zinc, but it shall be poured in, in a liquid state, to that thickness. I have the impression that this pouring in, in a liquid state, in accordance with the answer to a question which I put to a scientific gentleman on the stand, is a peculiarity in filling all the holes and cracks better, which is essential. For, those acquainted with fires, and their operation upon safes, are aware that one great danger of burning up papers, is in consequence of the external heated air, not flame, being communicated through some small fissures of joints; and that one great means of preventing fire from destroying the contents of the safe, is by reducing the preparation to the liquid form, and pouring it in as a thin paste, so as to be more sure of filling the smallest spaces between the two chests. There may be some advantages from the moisture which comes out during the melting, which may serve to protect the safe from the fire. But it strikes my mind that this result has been brought about, under this invention, not only by using plaster of Paris—which is a good non-conductor, and imbibes, after it is calcined, much water—but by using it in this liquid state, so as to fill up all the crevices; and by having it so very thick, two or three inches, as Fitzgerald had it, instead of (as in the safes which existed before, which you have seen described, and some of which you have seen here) having a mere coat of plaster, half an inch thick. You will at once see, from your experience, that a coat of two or three inches of matter, thus non-combustible, will resist the progress of a fire much better than a mere wash, or a mere coating of half an inch, or a quarter of an inch. However that may be, he claims it of a certain thickness. He describes the moist state, particularly, for its use, and he applies it to the doors as well as to the other parts. If the doors are not secured, as well as the other parts, it renders the contents quite unsafe. It is, therefore, this new combination of plaster, for this purpose, in this thickness, in the moist state, and applied all around, to the doors as well as to the other parts, which seems to constitute the gist of this discovery—producing such different results as have been shown here—of resisting the largest fires. It could hardly be justifiable, I think, for the court to say that it is not patentable, for want either of importance, apparent novelty, or usefulness. I shall soon, however, suggest something more, for and against its novelty, when considering the special testimony against it under that aspect. I may have said enough as to what is meant by a patent being useful. It must not be frivolous or unimportant. I hardly need dwell upon this. It is a question of fact, as to what is useful, after instructing you, as a question of law, that the patent must be useful. And a jury will have no great difficulty about that. If they find the invention introduced extensively into use, they will conclude that it is useful; for the people will not throw away old articles when old ones are as useful as new, and particularly when they are for the protection of such valuable articles as papers and money. The utility comes home, therefore, to everybody, if the extensive use is made out.

Passing by these you come to the next important part of the defense, and the evidence in relation to which has occupied the greater portion of the trial, and that is: was the improvement, as I have described it to you, made originally by Fitzgerald, or by some other person? This is the special defense, just referred to, against the novelty of this patent. Was there such a machine of the description contained in his specification—was there such a machine invented, or matured, before he did it? If there was, the law says, and says properly, that he cannot succeed, because the world then had the benefit—if it pleased. Another person was entitled to protection on account of it, and to aid the invention it was not necessary to issue this patent. But, in order to test this point, the prior invention must have existed before, with these qualities, with this combination, with this description, substantially. And I do not say, as one of my brethren upon the bench has said, that there is no definite signification to the word "substantial." When we say a thing is substantially the same, we mean it is the same in all important particulars. It must be of the same material, when the material is important; it must be of the same thickness, when thickness is important; it must be applied in the same way, condition, and extent, to the doors as well as the sides, when either of these circumstances makes an essential difference. If some other machine had all this, as in Fitzgerald's, then it was substantially the same. It is not a matter of moment to make the chest, itself, of one substance, or another, if there is no difference in the period at which they melt, and if they are alike impenetrable to heated air. It may be made of tin, or iron, or brass. It is of no consequence whether it is in form a square or a parallelogram, or whether there is a small mixture with the plaster, which neither vitiates nor improves it. But it must be the same in power to resist heat and exclude heated air, and then, in this particular, it is substantially the same. Change of form is not material, when the form does not contribute toward the new result. When it does, the forms must be alike in all important particulars. As other inventions must have been not only substantially like this, but prior in time, in order to vitiate it, it will be necessary for you to find when Fitzgerald invented this, in order to determine whether he, or others, invented it first. The law means, by invention, not maturity. It must be the idea struck out, the brilliant thought obtained, the great improvement in embryo. He must have that; but if he has that, he may be years improving it—maturing it. It may require half a life. But in that time he must have devoted himself to it as much as circumstances would allow. But the period when he strikes out the plan which he afterward patents, that is the time of the invention—that is the time when the discovery occurs.

Now, it is contended, on the part of the respondents, that there were discoveries, like this, even earlier than in 1830. But in 1830, some of their witnesses say, and others in 1831 and 1832, there were clear discoveries of the use of plaster in this way, and before Fitzgerald started this idea, which he afterward matured and patented. Now, gentlemen, fixing the time of Fitzgerald's invention, you will see whether there were any of that description or not. The plaintiffs contend that this time was in 1830, and they give you the whole history of it, from various sources; among others, from the patentee upon the stand. What led him to the discovery—the experiments he made—the progress in his own mind, and what disabled him—the want of means—from maturing his idea, has been detailed to you. But his attempts continued after making the discovery. By various experiments on the power of plaster, in this way—applied in this form, put on moist, by balls, more in the form of plaster than of paste—he found that it would stand fire better than anything else. And in this, one of his brothers unites with him, and the testimony shows that he thought early of using it with a safe. He certainly, in 1831, not only made these experiments, but made them with a small box; and he speaks of thinking then that he would get a patent as soon as he could get some person who would assist him. Another brother unites in testifying as to what took place in 1831, and Mr. Loring unites with them in the same. In 1832, he tried it with larger boxes, or safes, with the idea of safes in his mind. And Post, the son—the witness of that name who testified upon the stand—confirms what has been said by others, as to what took place at his father's at that time. The invention was exhibited at the office or house of his father, in New York, in 1832; to Ireland and Yerrick, in 1833. These last testify, with regard to the facts then occurring, of Fitzgerald desiring aid, and wanting to get it, to obtain a patent. In 1834, Mr. Kelsey testifies to experiments, and also in 1835. He says that he made experiments in 1836; and, especially, early in 1836, after the great fire, he went on more extensively in tests, and tried to get persons to unite with him. Mr. Sherwood united with him on that occasion, and did make experiments, which he has detailed here, under oath, with great clearness. The question is then presented, on this evidence, did he strike out this idea, which he afterward got patented, as early as 1831, and did he follow it up to 1836, till maturity, and follow it up, too, in various ways, and with reasonable diligence, considering his means? If you believe that he did, then the question will recur, whether there was any thing earlier of this kind, and to this extent, by others. The first thing that is offered to prove this, is the Conner safe. And here you come, at once, to the thickness of the material used.

You will see its thickness in that safe here before you, and can judge whether it is as well calculated to confer security against fire; and you will next go to the door of it, and see if the door was at all secured against fire; and if neither of these securities existed, as in Fitzgerald's, you will determine whether this would be all the improvement which Fitzgerald accomplished by thickening the material threefold, and applying it to the doors as well as to the sides. But there is another objection to it. It was not made until October, 1830, and Fitzgerald made his experiments previously in that year; in fact, some witnesses say that it was not complete until 1831 or 1832. Passing from these to the French safes—nobody swears that they were here before 1832; some do not swear that the French safes were in this country before 1833 or 1834. The evidence proves them to look ten years old at that time. Although, according to the appearance of them, they may have been made some years before, were they, in fact, so made, or only much exposed at sea? And were they the same in substance? This is the important inquiry on the point now under consideration. It is very important, under another head, to consider whether their previous use occurred abroad or in this country.

Looking at the similitude, or difference: Were not the nails driven through them—through the plaster and all? Again, as to the substance between the chests: Was it plaster? And was it as thick as this? And were the doors secured like this? All these are considerations which affect the question at issue, and must be made reasonably clear and certain. And that is the reason why you are to decide what Fitzgerald's invention was: for others cannot compete with it, unless they were substantially like it.

I then suggest to you, the safe of Marr, in England. That was not in existence in 1834. And, gentlemen, is there any evidence that Marr's was used with plaster? That was spoken of, in the specification, with feathers and cotton, and almost every non-conductor in existence. If he placed no more reliance upon it than upon feathers and cotton, it would hardly be an invention like this. But it is for you to say whether it was the same, and whether it was used with plaster, liquid or powdered, or ever used with plaster at all. That is a question for you to decide, which I leave entirely in your hands. I do not know of any other safes which, it was contended, interfered with Fitzgerald's, till you come down to where I stop in the examination—to 1836. And then, if you believe he made an application for this patent, which was not afterward abandoned, no other invention would deprive him of priority, made after 1836, or within the two previous years. But if he had made an invention which he abandoned utterly, and did not try to get a patent for, after it was once rejected, and did not resume the attempt after the first trial, by a new application, then his priority, by the first application, fails, and you must look to other applications which were duly followed up, and to other inventions, within two years of them. What did he do, under these circumstances? For there must be an invention by others before his application—there must be a discovery by some other person, before he applied—in order to destroy his originality. You have in evidence, how he did apply in 1836, and what his specifications were. And then you have in evidence—how his first application was rejected in 1836 or 1837, and why it was rejected; how he renewed it again in 1837; how he applied, also, for the desk safe, and succeeded in 1838; and how, after a second rejection of the present claim, he applied again a third time, and how he failed; how it was continued in 1839, and was amended and kept up, till he, finally, by an appeal, obtained his patent in 1834, [1843.]

The great question is, whether he made an application in 1836, by a specification which was afterward substantially embodied in his patent of 1843; and whether he ever meant to abandon it, after his original application? I instruct you, in point of law, with reference to the rejection, that the proof of abandonment of his application would depend upon two circumstances: whether he meant to give it up—to give all up, with regard to it—or whether, being needy, he gave up, during a short time, for want of funds. You would not trip up a man of genius, who had made a discovery, in consequence of a want of means to prosecute his labors to their final consummation, if you thought he intended to persevere. And even if the application was withdrawn—if he kept it up in his own mind, and meant to keep it up before the patent office, if you think he did not intend to abandon it, and did not, but merely suspended operations till he could get means, then all the other inventions would apply only to two years before 1836. But if he did not then reasonably persevere, nor then mean to, they would apply to two years before 1839, when he had his specification corrected, and persisted in, till he obtained the patent.

I now proceed to the next branch of the defense; it is one admissible by law, and often a very important one to the community; and that is, that Fitzgerald—although his invention was original, and important, and valuable, and applied for in 1836, and persisted in till 1843, and not meant to be abandoned during that time—yet allowed it to be in public use without taking a patent, or without applying for one, for two years before 1836. Now, gentlemen, you will perceive that the law, as to this, depends upon two questions: What is a public use? and, What is two years before the application? If you consider the application of 1836 as never having been abandoned, except for a few months, not renewed from want of means to assist in prosecuting his claim, then the public use must be for two years before 1836. But if you suppose that application was abandoned, then the public use must be two years before it was renewed, so as to avail under the principles already laid down. A "public use" is this: Public use is opposed to private use. If a man has an invention, and uses it privately, and nobody knows of it, then the use of it can not debar another person from inventing or patenting it. What is the evidence of a public use, as opposed to a private use? It need not be a general use by the community; but it must be an open use, however, so that the structure and modus operandi are apparent. But, gentlemen, one evidence of a public use is the manufacture of an article, publicly and openly, for sale; not universally, but still.

publicly—not by one person alone, and for his own private use, but the manufacture of it publicly—the offering of it for sale publicly. If a machine had been offered for sale, or had been manufactured, or had been used by various persons publicly, two years before Fitzgerald applied, his patent would fail. You can easily see the reason for it. A man is not to lie by, and let the public—several persons—use his invention without objection. He is not to lie by, and let persons manufacture the article for sale as if not to be patented; because he thus misleads them. He is not to lie by, and let them be sold in public stores. But, gentlemen, there must be a public use for two years, and a use, too, of the same machine in all essential particulars. Now, was there any use of such a machine before 1836, similar in substance, as to the material parts and arrangements? Or, if you will fix upon some later period than 1836, for the commencement of his valid application, was any other machine in use two years before that later period? The law of 1839, in respect to two years, was passed after the first application. But I instruct you that the law of 1839 applies, on all trials since, to previous cases as well as to subsequent cases. The law has come in, and given two years' use and sale to the inventor, without being barred so as to prevent experiments and trials of machines, to improve them. What next are the previous public uses relied on? The only ones which have any bearing upon this question are the Conner and French safes, which have been already considered partially. Was the use public in these cases, is one chief ingredient under this head. Was such a safe as Conner's used by the community? Was it actually sold in the stores? If there is evidence of it, you will refer to it. But if one man, alone, kept it—made it for himself, kept it in his counting-room, or in his cellar, it would be a private use. And the French safes—as to the use of them, you will judge whether there was any evidence that they were used in this country, or made in this country, or sold in this country—if they were like this in all essentials—which is another question for you to decide.

The defense to which I shall next advert is, that if Fitzgerald allowed these safes to be on sale for two years before his first application, the patent is invalid. There is justice in that. He thus would virtually extend the term for the patent. But, did Fitzgerald give permission to any others than himself or his agents, to use them; or were they on sale in the market before he made his first application? What is the evidence on that subject? If there be none, or none satisfactory, it can not operate against this patent.

There is one other defense, and that is, that this invention was described in books before the discovery of Fitzgerald. I think this must, by the act of congress, be before the "discovery," and not before the application. One of the acts of 1836 speaks of the description in books as being necessarily before the discovery, and the use or sale before the application. As to the description in books, it says, in express terms, that it must be before the "discovery." If I am not wrong, there are books referring to Marr's patents, though that is clearly after this invention or discovery, and referring to the use of plaster as a non-conductor. But do they describe this invention of Fitzgerald's in all its material combinations? If they do not, they are no bar to the validity of this invention. Not to delay any further upon these things, I would say, finally, that if Fitzgerald succeeds in overcoming all this, yet if he, or the plaintiffs under him, abandon this invention to the public, from patriotism, generosity, or any other cause, then they should not trip up any person for using it afterward; for a parent does not often abandon his own child. An inventor does not abandon the fruits of his genius, except from some great cause. Was there any great cause which induced Fitzgerald or Wilder to abandon this invention? Have they acted as though they intended to hold on to it; or, have they, in fact, held on, to get the benefits of it; or have they utterly given it up and abandoned it?

Something has been said as to the opinions of the plaintiffs concerning the validity of their patent. I would state to you, as a question of law, that the plaintiffs are barred by any admissions of facts made by them, unless they were made under a mistake—unless they show that they were entrapped into a confession, or labored under some gross error concerning the facts. But opinions given with regard to the law by parties do not hold them in this way. Suppose a person thinks he is not entitled to a legacy; it makes no difference with the law. Many persons come here with great confidence about the legality or illegality of certain questions; it often turns out that they were very much mistaken. But when a party states a fact, and he does not show that he is under a mistake, we hold him to it; otherwise, the opposite party is deceived, or misled.

The final question upon which I wish to say a few words, is the question of damages. On the one side is the demand that you shall give nominal damages, and on the other that you shall give full damages. And it is perfectly competent for you to give nominal damages only, if you think that the plaintiffs have not been injured, or if you think that the plaintiffs have acted in such a manner that the defendants have been misled. On the other hand, gentlemen, if the defendants have not been misled, but meant to get the use of this safe without paying any thing for it, it would be a circumstance to induce the jury to give full damages, but not vindictive damages. And I sometimes instruct a jury to give damages, not only to pay for the injury, but, besides the taxable cost of the suit, to remunerate the plaintiff for the extra counsel fees, and necessary incidental expenses in undertaking it. If the defendants are not inventors, and have not bought of inventors, it is one of those cases where larger damages ought to be given. But if they have been misled by the plaintiffs, it is a case for smaller damages.

In relation to the additional points which have been submitted for instruction, by the defendants, it has been said that the claim in 1839 and 1843 does not extend to the degree of thickness which was laid down by me, as embraced in the patent of 1843. On that point I would instruct you that he says, at the close, in these words: "I claim the application of plaster of Paris in the construction of all iron safes, in the manner above described, or in any other manner substantially the same." What he says, "above described," as to thickness, is this. He describes a "space between the inner and outer safe of about three inches, which space may be varied a little, but should be the same all around and in every direction." I would instruct you, in point of law, that the reference is to that—to three inches. I had supposed it was only two or two and a half inches; but it is still thicker. He describes it as liquid, too, and then says it may be in that or some other way. The words are these: "I then take plaster of Paris, or gypsum, and having boiled it, or baked it in an oven, and calcined it, and reduced it to a powder, I mix it with water till it is about the consistency of cream, or thin paste, so fluid that it may readily be poured into the space left as above to receive it." He does not say that he wishes to use it in this way, merely. He describes the process which he actually performs as the liquid one. As to the doors, he says: "The inner and outer doors are prepared in the same way." And, "where one door is used, it should be made in the same manner, leaving a like space between the inner and outer crust, or face of the door; and, for a like purpose, should be fitted to the chest, or safe, with great accuracy." Also, "the sides and openings of the doors are to be neatly finished, as in other chests." The question of law is, that when he refers to the "manner above described, he refers to the thickness; to the liquid paste, especially; and to the filling of the doors, as well as the rest of the chest." As to the application of 1836, the request says that this claim was not there in substance. We must compare this application, and see. In 1836, he used water, but it was with a plaster, rather than a paste; and he says: "Within this, is a coat of a peculiar plaster (to be hereinafter described), one inch and a half in thickness; next within this, is a lining, of any kind of wood, about three-fourths of an inch thick; next another coating of the plaster, two inches thick; the whole is then lined with wood, covered with sheet-iron, upon which the shelves and apartments are fixed. These various proportions may be varied, to suit the size of the chest, and other circumstances; more or less of the plaster being used, according to the liability of the chest to be subjected to a very great heat, in case of fire." He says that the thickness is a very important ingredient, and that it is important, when the situation is such that the fire is likely to be a large one. Here is gypsum—and water with it, so as to form a plaster—two inches thick in one place, and one and a half inches in another.

It is also said, that if the specification of Marr describes this material, it is sufficient, even if he had made, as he swears, no practical machine with plaster. In his testimony, he says, twice, that he never did make one with plaster. If he describes gypsum, he must describe its use in this way. But he says nothing of its being used as a plaster, or of its being poured in as a paste, and nothing of the thickness.

It is also said that, if Fitzgerald was inactive for three years before 1836, it would imply that he had given up the invention. But you will judge, from the evidence, whether in 1835, 1834, and 1833, he did not make direct experiments, and apply to persons for aid.

Another word as to Matthews. He did not use the word "plaster" at all, and says nothing of thickness. He speaks of "soap-stone, Roman cement, alum or glue." I should hold them to be different from plaster, though they might be non-conductors; and that a patent for them did not cover one for plaster of Paris, to be used in the peculiar form and extent described by Fitzgerald.

You will retire, gentlemen, and settle the facts in dispute, and then apply them to the points in controversy, under the principles of law, as explained by the court.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PATENTABILITY—NOVELTY.

Letters patent, No. 50,591, granted to John H. Irwin, October 24th, 1865, for a lantern, the top or dome of which is hinged to the guard on one side, in such manner that it can be closed firmly to the guard, by the operation of a hinge, and a catch on the side opposite the hinge, so that, when the top or dome is lifted or thrown back on the hinge, the globe can be removed from the guard, held valid.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity. [Bill by J. McGregor Adams against the Illinois Manufacturing Company for an accounting, and an injunction restraining the further infringement of patent No. 50,591. Decree for complainant.]

Coburn & Thacher, for complainant.
West & Bond, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a bill for injunction and account. Complainant is admitted to be the owner of two letters patent issued by the United States to J. H. Irwin, the first, No. 47,551, dated May 2d, 1865, and the other, No. 50,591, dated October 24th, 1865, for improvements in lanterns. The defense is want of novelty in the complainant's patents. It is admitted that defendant has made, and is making, lanterns in all respects like those described in the specifications and drawings of Irwin's patent, No. 50,591. If that patent is valid, complainant must have a decree in this suit. The leading feature of this patent is the construction of a loose-globe lantern, so arranged that the globe can be readily removed and replaced, and, at the same time, have the metallic parts of the frame permanently attached together so as to make a basket in which the globe will be held or retained, even if the catch holding the top or dome to the frame of the lantern is unfastened. This is obtained by hinging the top or dome to the guard, on one side, so that it can be closed firmly to the guard by the operation of a hinge and a catch on the side opposite the hinge, so that, when the top or dome is lifted or thrown back on the hinge, the globe can be removed from the guard. The conveniences of this arrangement are obvious. It makes a lantern simple in construction, with few complications, easily cleaned, and, perhaps, less liable to accidents than any other form of lantern which has been devised.

It is admitted that loose-globe lanterns had been made, long prior to that made by Irwin, in the form described in his patent. The idea of so constructing the lantern that the globe was simply held in place by the guard, and could be readily removed, was not new when Irwin entered the field; but I am satisfied that the Irwin patent can be sustained so far as its particular device is concerned. It is evidently useful, and by its application a very useful lantern is obtained. The loose-globe lanterns which had been made prior to that of Irwin's, as shown in the proof, are: First, Westlake, where the arrangement was such that you are obliged to remove the oil-pot, then the top, and then remove the guard from the globe. Second, Max Miller. By this the parts of the lantern can be separated by means of springs and catches, so that finally the globe can be taken out through the top of the guard. Third, Waters's lantern. This is separated. Fourth, Evans, English lantern. Fifth, Chappell, English patent. Sixth, Butterfield. Guard-clasps around lantern should be called a removable guard. Seventh, Morley. Eighth, Colburn. All these devices have some provision by which the parts of the lantern can be, to a greater or less extent, separated, but they can, none of them, I think, be said to suggest the specific mode by which Irwin made his globe removable, and preserved the connection of the parts of his frame. The patent may be sustained as a special device, and, as defendant infringes that device, the complainant must have a decree.

ADAMS v. The ISLAND CITY.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1859.

SALVAGE—CONTRACT—COMPENSATION—PLEADING.

1. In order to bar a claim for salvage there must be a distinct agreement proved between the parties for a given sum, to be paid whether the property be lost or not. It is quite immaterial whether the salvors accidentally fall in with the wreck and volunteer their services, or are called upon by the owners or persons interested to aid in saving it.

[Cited in The Louisa Jane. Case No. 8,532; Baker v. Hemenway, Id. 770; and in Chapman v. The Greenpoint, 38 Fed. Rep. 671.]

2. The mere fact that a libellant alleges his claim to be "in a cause of contract civil and maritime, and for extra services rendered" to the vessel libelled and her crew, will not prevent such claim from being regarded as one for salvage, if it appears, from the general scope of the several allegations of which the libel is composed, that such is in reality the character of the claim.

3. Where three sets of salvors at different times rendered services to a vessel during a continuous peril, each was held entitled to compensation, although the separate service of either would not alone have saved the vessel in distress.

[Cited in The Mayflower v. The Sabine, 101 U. S. 387.]

4. Where three sets of salvors contributed in rescuing a vessel from peril, which vessel with her cargo was valued at $70,000, the joint value of the several vessels engaged being $131,000, and the whole time employed some fifteen days, the amount of salvage decreed to all the salvors was $13,000, of which sum $5,200 was decreed to the libellants in this case, it appearing that their vessel was worth $85,000, and that she was employed some thirteen days in the service.

[In admiralty. Libel for salvage. Decree for libellants.]

This was a suit in admiralty, in a cause of contract civil and maritime, and of extra services rendered by the steamer R. B. Forbes to the bark Island City and her crew; and was removed into this court pursuant to the act of the 3d of March, 1821, on the certificate of the district judge that he was so concerned in interest as to render it improper for him, in his opinion, to hear the cause. The bark Island City left Galveston on the 10th of December, 1856, laden with cotton and hides, and bound on a voyage to Boston. She made Cape Cod on the 18th of January, 1857, in a snow-storm, when the master, finding that he could not get by the cape, kept off, and ran into the Vineyard sound, and, at four o'clock in the afternoon, anchored within six miles of Bass river. At ten o'clock in the evening, finding that his ground-tackle would not hold, he cut away the masts, and at daylight next morning found himself near the Horse Shoe. One anchor was gone; but the master supposed the other was still attached to its cable. On the morning of the 19th the gale began to diminish, and the bark remained without material change till the evening of the 21st, when she was hailed by the schooner Kensington. The Kensington was requested to tow the bark into Hyannis, when it was discovered that the bark's other anchor was gone. The bark was taken in tow by the schooner, and they proceeded about three miles toward the harbor of Hyannis; then, at eleven o'clock, bent another anchor to the chain, and came to anchor, on account of there being no wind. At one o'clock, on the morning of the 22d, finding it was commencing to snow, and the wind increasing, they got up the anchor, and proceeded about eight miles toward the harbor; but at four o'clock were obliged to anchor again, on account of the ice and the severity of the weather. At seven o'clock they again got up the anchor, when the bark drifted astern and the hawser parted, and efforts to again make fast proved fruitless. At eight o'clock the bark came to anchor in four and a half fathoms of water, with a hundred fathoms of chain out; and the schooner left her, with an agreement to telegraph to her owners in Boston, and to return. The despatch was sent; but the schooner was unable to return, on account of the ice and severe weather. Upon receipt of the intelligence contained in the despatch the owners of the bark sent the steamer R. B. Forbes to her relief; and on the 23d of January she was found where she had been left by the schooner. The steamer took the bark in tow, and proceeded toward Hyannis till about dark, when both vessels came to anchor about a mile outside of the harbor. At daylight the next day, finding it impracticable to get into Hyannis, on account of the ice, it was decided to go to Provincetown to procure a supply of provisions and coal. After having towed the bark about nine miles toward Provincetown it was found the steamer could make no headway against the tide and ice, and both vessels came to anchor. Six hours later the anchors were got up, and the steamer, with the bark in tow, started to make the east channel, and towed all night. Monday morning, the 26th of January, at six o'clock, both vessels grounded on Great Point, in the northerly part of Nantucket, and there remained about two hours, till the tide rose, when they floated off, and the steamer again commenced towing the bark. In consequence of the quantity of ice, but little progress was made; and it was finally concluded that there was not sufficient coal on board the steamer to enable her to get the bark to Provincetown. The bark was anchored, and the crew went on board the steamer, which proceeded to Provincetown to procure a supply of provisions and coal, intending to return the following morning. On reaching Provincetown it was found that no supply of suitable coal could be obtained until the following Friday, when a quantity arrived from Boston. As soon as the coal was placed on board, the steamer started for the bark, and reached the place where she had been anchored about eight o'clock on Saturday, but found that she was gone. Saturday was spent in search of the bark, and on Sunday she was found at Hyannis, in possession of the officers and crew of the steamer Westernport, who claimed salvage compensation for bringing her into Hyannis; and who alleged that the Westernport, on the 30th of January, while on a voyage from New York to Boston, discovered the bark, dismasted and apparently deserted, whereupon she changed her course and bore down for the bark, which was, after great difficulty, boarded and found abandoned,—having out an anchor weighing only eight hundred pounds, the chain not fastened on board, nearly all paid out and constantly rendering around the windlass; that, after twenty-four hours' labor and exposure, the bark was brought safely into the harbor of Hyannis; they also alleged that the steamer was in peril by coming in contact with the bark. On Tuesday, the 3d of February, the master of the Forbes, having received intelligence that the owners of the bark had given bond to pay such legal claim, if any, as the Westernport might justly have demanded, took possession of the bark, and arrived with her in Boston harbor, February 6th. Libels were filed by the owners of the R. B. Forbes, by those who were on board the schooner Kensington, and the owners of the steamer Westernport.

[The owners of the Westernport appealed to the supreme court from a decree forfeiting their interest in the salvage for misconduct, and that decree was affirmed.]

The assistance rendered to the bark is to be regarded as an entire one, and as such constitutes a salvage service. The assistance rendered by the Kensington, taken by itself alone, did not constitute a salvage service. It must be successful, and by it the vessel assisted must be taken from danger to safety. The India, 1 W. Rob. 408; The Dodge Healy, [Case No. 2,849;] *Hand v. B. R. Curtis and William Dehon, for claimants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. All the evidence tends to show that the peril was continuous from the first moment, when the schooner went to the relief of the bark, down to the time when the steamer Westernport anchored her in the port of Hyannis, in a condition so crippled and disabled by the disaster she had encountered that the service of the other steamer was indispensable to get her into Boston, where she was bound. She was in very great peril when relieved by the schooner, and was by her placed in a position of far less exposure. Those on board the schooner were prevented from doing more by the violence of the storm, and from returning to complete the service, by causes beyond their control. They rendered important service in changing her position, and in transmitting intelligence to her owners, and in giving them the opportunity of sending forward more efficient aid. Valuable services were also rendered to the bark by the steamer R. B. Forbes, in placing her in a position of still greater safety, where, if her only remaining anchor had been of sufficient weight, there is much probability she might have ridden out the storm, till the steamer with her own crew had returned. Her exposure, however, was still very considerable, considering the state of the weather, on account of the well-established fact that the anchor was not of sufficient weight. Two of her anchors had previously been lost, and the one remaining was the stream anchor, weighing but eight hundred pounds, which, in view of the size of the vessel and her lading, was clearly insufficient to justify the conclusion that the bark was out of danger in the rough weather which followed. Floating ice still remained in the Sound, and for a considerable portion of time there was a heavy sea. Under those circumstances she was certainly liable to have drifted away, during the gale of the succeeding night. While these considerations lead necessarily to the conclusion that the Westernport rendered valuable service to the bark, it by no means follows that the bark was derelict, as is contended by the counsel for that steamer. On the contrary, it appears that the steamer R. B. Forbes left the bark where the steamer found her, with the intention of returning, and the same remark applies to the crew of the bark, and it is not perceived, from the evidence, that the officers and crew of the steamer omitted any precaution in their power to take to leave the vessel in a safe position, or that they were guilty of any negligence in their efforts to return. Their right to salvage compensation is resisted by the counsel of the Westernport upon two grounds, which may as well be considered at the present time as in any other stage of the controversy.

It is said, in the first place, that the service was rendered under contract with the owners of the bark, and therefore was not a salvage service. Intelligence was communicated to the owners of the bark, by the master of the schooner on his return to Hyannis, that the bark was still in peril, and needed assistance. He performed that service at the request of the master of the bark, and the result was that her owners immediately telegraphed to Provincetown, where the steamer was then lying, requesting her master to go to the relief of the bark, and in pursuance of that request he went, and found her where she had been left by the schooner. No contract of any kind was made between the parties, except what may be implied from that request, which created no more obligation upon those on board the steamer to undertake the service than a signal of distress from the bark would have created, if it had been seen from the shore. They were at perfect liberty to go or to decline to go, as they saw fit, and if they had refused, either from interest or choice, the owners of the bark would have no right of action on account of the refusal. Such a service is entitled to be rewarded under the conditions and according to the measure of the maritime law; as the claim stands upon the request of the master of the steamer to go to the assistance of the bark, a compliance with that request, and the performance of a service which is salvage in its incidents and nature. All the cases show that the relief of property from an impending peril of the sea, by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligations to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property from such peril, constitutes a case of salvage; and where the compensation is not fixed by such a contract as a court of admiralty will enforce, it is to be adjusted according to those liberal rules which form a part of the maritime law. In order to bar a claim for salvage, there must be a distinct agreement proved between the parties for a given sum. It is quite immaterial whether the salvors accidentally fall in with the wreck and volunteer their services, or are called upon by the owners or persons interested to aid in saving it. It is the place where the property is situated, and the circumstances of exposure and peril, which determine the question whether or not the case is one of salvage; and it has been determined that, to bar a claim of this description, it is necessary to allege and prove that a binding contract was made to pay for the service at all events, whether the property be lost or not. The Versailles, [Case No. 16,924;] The William Lushington, 7 Notes of Cas. 361; The Centurion, [Case No. 2,554;] The H. B. Foster, [Id. 6,290;] The Independence, [Id. 7,014.]

Another objection to the right of the steamer R. B. Forbes to recover salvage compensation arises from the pleadings. It is insisted that the libellant does not make any such claim in the libel. That view of the libel is derived chiefly from the fact that it is alleged to be in a cause of contract civil and maritime, and of extra services rendered to the bark and her crew. Standing alone, that clause would furnish some support to this argument. Such, however, is not the fact, and the character of the claim set forth in the libel must be determined by the general scope of the several allegations of which it is composed. What is meant by contract and extra service is clearly and fully explained by the libellant, in the first and second articles of the libel, and also in the last. He alleges, in the first article, that the steamer was at Provincetown on the 23d of January, 1857, and that her master on that day received a letter from the owners of the bark, stating that she was adrift near the light-boat, off Hyannis, and requesting him to go with the steamer to her aid. In the second and succeeding articles, to the fourteenth inclusive, he states the nature and character of the service rendered, and it will be sufficient to say that the statements of the pleadings conform substantially to the proofs of the case, as they are exhibited in the record. After describing the service, the libellant alleges that, by reason of the perils incurred, and the great importance, nature, and value of the service, the owners of the steamer are entitled to, and reasonably ought to have, and do claim, an extra liberal compensation by way of reward therefor, commensurate with the service, its duration and risk. These allegations are sufficient in point of law, and constitute a proper legal foundation for the claim set up by the libellant at the hearing. That claim is warranted by the pleadings, and is fully sustained by the testimony. Every suggestion that the suit is collusive is sufficiently answered by the fact that the proposition does not find any support in the evidence. It was based chiefly upon the assumption, that some one or more of the underwriters upon the bark owned some interest in the stock of the company to which the steamer belonged. Suppose it were so, it could not avail as a defence in this suit, as it would only show a partial and contingent interest in the property saved, which could not have the effect to disqualify the owners of the steamer, as a corporation, from performing a salvage service, and claiming therefor a salvage compensation. Whether it would or would not be otherwise in a case where the owners of the stock in the steamer and the insurers were the same, or substantially the same in interest, it is not necessary to decide, as there is no satisfactory proof to sustain that view of the present case. The Pickwick, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 636. All the evidence shows that the bark was dismasted on the 18th of January, 1857, and that she remained in peril more or less imminent, until she was finally carried into the port of Hyannis by the steamer Westernport, and anchored near the wharf. It was a continuous peril; and as each of these vessels rendered valuable service to the bark, and contributed to her relief and safety, each is entitled to salvage compensation. According to the testimony, the Kensington was a schooner of one hundred and eighty-one tons' burden. She was worth about six thousand dollars, and her cargo on board, together with freight and outfits, were worth about twenty-five hundred dollars; making in all some eight thousand five hundred dollars. Her exposure was very considerable, and the service was entirely voluntary. She had nine men on board, and was employed in the service some twenty-four hours. Thirteen days were spent by the steamer R. B. Forbes, from the time she started on the enterprise up to the time she arrived with the bark at her place of destination. Some portion, however, of the time was virtually lost, while she was lying in the respective harbors of Provincetown and Hyannis, waiting for coal, or for the completion of the arrangements by which she gained possession of the bark. She is valued at eighty-five thousand dollars, and is usually employed in towing vessels on the coast, and it appears that the demand for towing at that time was very great. All the facts necessary to be considered in this connection, in the case of the Westernport, have already been stated, and need not be repeated. Considering the nature and duration of the service by the several parties, and the value of the property saved, together with the value of the property employed in the several undertakings, and the danger to which the whole was exposed, and the energy and perseverance displayed in saving the bark, her cargo and crew, it is believed that the property saved ought justly to pay a salvage compensation of thirteen thousand dollars, as the entire amount to all concerned. Of that sum five thousand two hundred dollars are decreed to the libellants in this case. Should any question arise as to its apportionment among the owners, officers, and crew, the parties will be heard when the case comes up for a final decree.

[NOTE. Originally there were three libels filed against the bark Island City and her cargo.—one by the owners, officers, and crew of the steamer R. B. Forbes; the second by the owners, officers, and crew of the schooner Kensington; and the third by the owners, officers, and crew of the steamer Westernport. Of the $13,000 allowed by the circuit court for all the services of the salvors, $5,200 was allotted to the R. B. Forbes, $3,300 to the Kensington, and $4,500 to the Westernport; but the court held that all that part of the compensation which would otherwise have belonged to the officers and crew of the Westernport was forfeited by their misconduct, and from that decree they appealed to the supreme court. In considering that appeal, Mr. Justice Grier remarked that, although no appeals had been taken in the other cases, the decisions might be collaterally challenged in the appeal of the Westernport, "in so far as they affect the rights of the libellant, if his vessel was entitled to the whole, and has received but one third," of the salvage. After reviewing the testimony, the supreme court concurred in the opinion of the circuit judge "that the bark was not abandoned after the salvage service commenced; that it was one continuous peril from which the bark was rescued, and that each of the several salvors contributed to the final result. The amount allowed for the salvage service was liberal, and the apportionment of it among the several salvors just and proper." The decree appealed from was affirmed. Cromwell v. The Island City, 1 Black, (66 U. S.) 121.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REVERSING MOTION TO PRODUCE DIFFERENT RESULT—SLIGHT CHANGE IN COMBINATION TO PRODUCE SAME RESULT—TECHNICAL DEFECT IN DESCRIPTION.

1. The complainant's invention consisted in reversing the motion of the beater-bars for regulating the feed in a corn-sheller, and by this change produced a result which had not before been attained: Held, that the invention was patentable.

2. The courts should not defeat a patent for a mere technical defect in description, if it clearly appears what the inventor has described and claimed as his invention.

3. A change of location of a part, in combination, where there is no new function performed by the changed member in its new location, will not evade a patent. Nor will the fact that the part changed works better in the location where the defendant puts it, than where complainant put it, if it does the same work, but only in degree better, make any difference. The result is the same.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a bill in equity for an alleged infringement of letters patent of the United States issued to Henry A. Adams, dated October 15th, 1872, for an "improvement in corn-shellers," and prays an account of damages, and injunction.

The complainant's improvement consists in the arrangement of a winged shaft, or "beater-shaft," so geared as to revolve rapidly in the throat of the corn-sheller, for the purpose of driving the ears of corn into the machine. In his specifications his device is described as follows: "This invention relates to an improvement in a corn-sheller patented by Augustus Adams, as described in his letters patent No. 54,659, dated May 15th, 1866. In said patented corn-sheller a winged shaft is placed above the opening in the sheller, and is worked oppositely to the direction of the entering corn in such manner that the said wings strike the upper ear if two ears attempt to enter the throat at once, and throw said upper ear back into position to descend properly, but I have discovered that the ear so thrown back retards the feed, inasmuch as the following ears are likely to override the ears so thrown back, and the difficulty is thus continued. In the present invention, I propose to overcome this objection by forcing all the ears, as they approach the throat, to pass rapidly out of the way into the sheller, by means presently specified. And to this end I arrange a shaft above the throat with a series of wings, wheels or projections, to revolve in the same direction as the entering corn, so as to force the corn rapidly forward into the sheller, which is capable of shelling all the corn that can be forced through the throat. By this means I avoid any chance of clogging the feed under ordinary circumstances." His detailed description of his device is as follows: "H is a shaft, which may be surrounded by the hood R. This shaft carries the beaters or wings P, arranged to revolve in the direction of the arrows (that is, the direction of the feed) shown at Fig. 1 of the drawing. Space enough is left between the revolving wings and the bottom of the throats B to allow of a single ear, as at n, to pass freely beneath without contact, but sufficiently near to strike an overriding ear, as at m, and force it, and other ears in contact therewith, or in the road thereof, ahead rapidly into the sheller, clearing the passage for the corn following." His first claim is as follows: "The combination, with a corn-sheller, of a series of wings, wheels, or projections, so arranged on a shaft as to revolve in the same direction the corn is running, and so placed relative to the throats as to force into the machine all misplaced or hesitating ears, substantially as specified."

It may be premised that the device in question is applicable to a power-sheller only, and is intended to operate in connection with the endless apron or other feeding device, whereby the ears of corn are brought to the throat of the sheller, and the object was to keep the throat of the machine from clogging by forcing the ears into the throat of the machine, instead of allowing them to pile up or override each other at that point. The object was to secure an operative automatic feed, which, without the care of an attendant, would keep the stream of ears of corn steadily and uniformly running into the sheller, instead of permitting it to pile up or choke in the throat.

Augustus Adams had two devices in his machine prior to complainant's invention, intended to accomplish the same purpose. The first were the small picker-wheels, running in the same plane with the shelling-disks, and intended to catch and carry forward the ears as they fell into the throat. The second was a winged shaft, or beater-bar, over the throat of the sheller, so arranged as to revolve in a direction contrary to the direction of the stream of ears of corn, and drive back the overriding ears as they approached the throat. This device was found to do but little toward securing the desired result, as the ears thrust or knocked back only got in the way of others, and the machine was, therefore, still liable to clog, so as to make the feed irregular, and require frequent attention from an attendant. At this stage of the art the complainant entered the field, and although he only reversed the motion of the Augustus Adams beater-bars, yet the evidence shows he produced, by this comparatively trifling change, a result, so far as the automatic feed of a corn-sheller was concerned, which had not been attained before.

The defence, first, denies the novelty of the invention; second, denies the infringement. Upon the question of novelty, evidence has been put into the record of a large number of devices for feeding or regulating the feed of corn-shellers, threshing-machines, straw-cutters, planing-machines, carding-machines, etc. But I do not find in any of them anything which seems to anticipate the complainant's machine. The device of Augustus Adams in form of construction is almost precisely like that of complainant's, except that it revolves in a contrary direction. But when at rest, and without the gearing by which the motion is secured, the two devices would strike the eye as substantially alike. Defendant also insists that the first claim of complainant's patent is anticipated by the picker-wheels, as they are called, in Augustus Adams' patent; because complainant's claim is for "a series of wings, wheels, or projections, so arranged on a shaft as to revolve in the same direction the corn is running." * * * And it is argued that the claim to use "wheels" on the shaft, necessarily involves the use of wheels revolving over the throat of the sheller, as the picker-wheels revolve in the throat. It may be admitted that the terms used are somewhat unfortunate, and may tend to confuse, but the court should never defeat a patent for a mere technical defect, if it clearly appears what the inventor has described, and claimed as his invention. It seems to me the word wheels is used in this claim as a synonym for disks. The idea of the person who drew the claim, it appears to me, was that the wings or beaters might have disks on each side to help in thrusting the corn forward when they were used. I think, also, the court might, if necessary to save the patent, reject this word as surplusage, although I do not think it necessary to do so in this case, as the patentee in his specification evidently intends to suggest that some kind of wheels or disks may be fixed upon the shaft to act with the beaters; but this is more in the nature of a suggestion than a specific device by which he is bound to construct his machine.

The principle that it is the duty of the court to uphold and sustain the patent, instead of seeking for reasons to overthrow it, is fully sustained. Turrill v. Michigan Southern R. Co., 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 491; Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 788; Klein v. Russell, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 433; Burden v. Corning, [Case No. 2,143.] I do not, therefore, find the complainant's invention anticipated by the picker-wheels of Augustus Adams, nor does it seem to me the first claim of the patent should be held void for the use of the word "wheels."

As to the infringement: The proof shows that defendant makes and sells a machine—complainant's Exhibit C—with a beater-bar revolving at the entrance to the throat of the machine, so as to strike the ears of corn on the under side instead of the top, and so force them into the sheller. And it is claimed by defendant that the function performed by its beater-bar is different from that performed by complainant's. Defendant calls its beater-bar a device for forcing the feed, while complainant's is only a regulator or device for disposing of the misplaced or overriding ears. The models of both complainant's and defendant's shellers show that the ears of corn are brought forward nearly above the throat of the sheller upon an endless apron, and from that dropped or slid down a sharp, almost perpendicular incline, into the throat of the shelling apparatus. It may, I think, be therefore said, that no device for forcing the feed is required in either machine, but what both need is a regulator to prevent the ears from overriding each other and choking up the throat; and it is very plain to me that the defendant's beaters, under the stream of ears of corn, perform the same office, and no other that is performed by complainant's. A change of location of a part, in a combination where there is no new function performed by the changed member in its new location, will not evade a patent. In the case of Potter v. Schenck, before his honor, Judge Drummond, [Case No. 11,337,] an infringement was alleged of the Wilson patent for a sewing-machine feed. By the defendant's device in that case the feed was secured by the pressure of teeth operating upon the top instead of the under side of the cloth, and in reference to this change of mode in effecting the result, the learned judge said: "The question is, whether this is a substantial variation in all or any of its particulars, from the invention of Wilson as described in his specifications of 1856. I have already stated that it is not, and, as it seems to me, on this ground, viz.: that when a mechanic has the leading idea which is developed in Wilson's patent, once thoroughly understood and fixed in his mind, he can carry out that idea in a variety of forms, simply by the exercise of mechanical ingenuity. Here was a great leading principle in the feed of the machine, devised and invented by Wilson. He, to be sure, describes the particular manner in which he carries out that idea; but once get that in the mind and it is clear that you can carry it out in a variety of forms. This is, it may be said, an ingenious variation or difference by which the idea of Wilson is carried out." "The shoe or main part of the feeding apparatus, is not placed beneath the plate upon which the cloth rests, but is on the top of the plate, or, as was contended and I think with a good deal of force, by the counsel for complainants, instead of being placed as Wilson describes it, it was merely reversed. It is clear that that does not change the principle of the invention, and it is clear, too, as already stated, that a mechanic once having the idea in his mind could apply it by adopting a great variety of forms and devices, and this among others."

Nor will the fact that the beater does its work even better in the location where defendant puts it than where complainant puts it, if it does the same work, but only in degree better, make any difference. The result is still the same. The ears are urged into this sheller by the blows they get from these revolving wings, whether they receive them on the top or bottom. And it can make no difference, it seems to me, that defendant's beaters may strike every ear, while complainant's strike only the overriding ones, because, when the stream is running evenly, no blows are needed on either side, and when one ear comes along with another on top of it, it makes no difference whether the under one or upper one is first driven forward into the sheller, so long as that is the function of the beater; whether it strikes the top or bottom, the result is the same, and secured by substantially the same mechanism. Both these machines force the feed by driving the corn into the sheller and preventing clogging, and both of them regulate it. It, therefore, seems to me that neither of the points made in the answer is sufficient to defeat the patent; that, as the proof in this case stands, the patent is for a novel and useful invention, and that the defendant by its machine infringes the patent.

Case No. 57.
ADAMS v. JONES.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 527;¹ 2 Pittsb. R. 73; 7 Pittsb. Leg. J. 170; Merv. Pat. Inv. 660.]
 Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 17, 1859.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—APPLICATION—ABANDONMENT—NOVELTY.

1. By the application filed in the patent office, the inventor makes a full disclosure of his invention, and gives public notice of his claim for a patent. It is conclusive evidence that he does not intend to abandon his invention to the public.

[Cited in Blandy v. Griffith, Case No. 1,529; McMillin v. Barclay, Id. 8,902; Bevin v. East Hampton Bell Co., Id. 1,379; Johnsen v. Fassmen, Id. 7,365; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, Id. 5,603; Colgate v. W. U. Tel. Co., Id. 2,995.]

2. A man might justly be treated as having abandoned his application if it be not prosecuted with reasonable diligence. But involuntary delays—the mistakes of public officers, or the delays of courts—not caused by the laches of the applicant, should not work a forfeiture of his rights.

[Cited in Blandy v. Griffith, Case No. 1,529; McMillin v. Barclay, Id. 8,902; Bevin v. East Hampton Bell Co., Id. 1,379; Johnsen v. Fassmen, Id. 7,365; Consolidated Fruit-Jar Co. v. Wright, Id. 3,135; Weston v. White, Id. 17,459; Woodbury Planing-Mach. Co. v. Keith, 101 U. S. 485, 17 O. G. 1033; Butler v. Shaw, 21 Fed. Rep. 327.]

3. If an inventor claims two distinct improvements in one machine, he may apply for them jointly, and have a single patent for both. If he has made a mistake as to one of the improvements claimed, but is clearly entitled to a patent as to the other, he cannot be justly said to have abandoned either during a litigation as to his right to both.

4. It is only when some person, by labor and perseverance, has been successful in perfecting some valuable manufacture, by ingenious improvements, or labor-saving devices, that his patent is sought to be annulled, by digging up some useless, rusty, forgotten contrivances of unsuccessful experiments.

[Cited in Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Julien Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 128.]

5. Patterson's patent for a concave, beveled keeper, is an immaterial variation of Adams' patent, worthless as an improvement, and palpably got up as a cover, and to give color to an invasion of the rights of the latter.

6. The novelty of Adams' patent for "improved keeper for right and left-hand door-locks" examined and affirmed.

[7. Cited in Goodyear Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, Case No. 5,603, to the point that if a party choose to withdraw his application for a patent, and pay the forfeit, intending at the time of such withdrawal to file a new petition, and he accordingly does so, the two petitions are to be considered as parts of the same transaction, and both as constituting one continuous application, within the meaning of the law.]

In equity. This was a bill in equity [by Calvin Adams against J. Hervey Jones, Alexander M. Wallingford, and another] for an injunction and account, founded upon the alleged violation and infringement of letters patent [No. 16,676,] for an "improved keeper for right and left-hand door-lock," granted to complainant February 24, 1857.

The claim of the patent was as follows:

"The use of a beveled keeper such as described, when employed in connection with a double-faced lock, having a blunt bolt, so that the lock may be used on a right or left-hand door, without changing any of its parts, as set forth."

Shaler & Co., Bakewell & Cushing, and E. M. Stanton, for complainant.

Stowe & Hampton, Geo. P. Hamilton, and George Gifford, for defendants.

Before GRIER, Circuit Justice, and McCANDLESS, District Judge.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The complainant has a patent dated February 24, 1857, for an "improved keeper for right and left-hand door-locks." It purports to be an improvement in the manufacture of an article now known under the appellation of "Janus-faced door-locks." That species of lock was invented and patented by Sherwood. But in order to accommodate it to either a right or left-hand door, it was necessary to open it, so as to change the beveled side of the bolt. When this was done by a careless or inexperienced workman, the internal works of the lock were liable to become displaced. The object of complainant's invention is to obviate this difficulty. It is accomplished by making the bolt blunt, with rounded edges, and making a keeper, whose lip is an inclined plane the whole length of the keeper, so that the lock is available for either a right or left-hand door, without opening it to change the bolt, as the keeper may be turned with either side up, and catch the bolt. This is, undoubtedly, a valuable improvement in the manufacture of "Janus-faced door-locks," as it simplifies and cheapens the article. Drop-catch keepers had before used a slightly inclined plane on the lip of the keeper, but it could be used only for such a door as they were especially made for.

The original application for a patent for this invention was made by Adams, in 1850. In that application the invention (now patented) is clearly and distinctly set forth and claimed. But the applicant claimed also to be the inventor of other improvements. The commissioner of patents refused to grant him a patent for anything. An appeal was taken to the circuit court, and not decided by that court until 1856, when the decision of the commissioner was affirmed. Notwithstanding this, the original application was not withdrawn, and the applicant continued to insist upon his right to a patent for so much of the improvements claimed as was clearly his invention. A new commissioner of patents having the sagacity to see that the applicant had made a valuable invention, which had been overlooked by his predecessor, and rejected because the application had included other improvements of which the applicant was not the original inventor, very properly granted the patent now before us, as a valuable improvement in the manufacture of that species of locks called "Janus-faced."

The respondents, in their answer, allege three several grounds of defense.

1. They contend that the patent is void because the improvement therein claimed had been put in public use more than two years prior to the date of the patent.

2. That respondents do not infringe, but act under a patent granted to one Patterson in 1857.

3. That the improvement claimed is not new.

1st. As to the first point of defense. The testimony shows that the complainant made and sold locks with this improvement, more than two years before his patent, but after his original application filed in 1850. By this application, Adams fully disclosed to the public his invention, and gave notice of his intention to demand a patent. He ought not to lose his rights because of the want of perspicacity of the first commissioner. The delay in the decision of the appeal was not in consequence of any laches of complainants, but of the inability of the aged chief justice to attend to the business of his office. The reasons why courts have declared patents to be void, because the inventor had suffered his invention to be used by the public, before his application for a patent, are well stated in the case of Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 1: "If an inventor should be permitted to hold back, from the knowledge of the public, the secrets of his invention; if he should for a long period of years retain the monopoly, and make and sell his invention publicly, and thus gather the whole profits of it, relying upon his superior skill and knowledge of the structure; and then, and then only, when the danger of competition should force him to procure the exclusive right, he should be allowed to take out a patent, and thus exclude the public from any further use than what should be derived under it during his fourteen years; it would materially retard the progress of science and the useful arts, and give a premium to those who should be least prompt to communicate their discoveries."

By the act of March 3, 1839, this abandonment to the public must have existed more than two years prior to the "application" for a patent. By the application filed in the patent office, the inventor makes a full disclosure of his invention, and gives public notice of his claim for a patent. It is conclusive evidence that the inventor does not intend to abandon it to the public. The delay afterward interposed, either by the mistakes of the public officers, or the delays of courts, where gross laches can not be imputed to the applicant, can not affect his right. The statute forfeits the right of an inventor to a patent only where the invention has been in public use more than two years before the application. A man might justly be treated as having abandoned his application if it be not prosecuted with reasonable diligence. But involuntary delays, not caused by the laches of the applicant, should not work a forfeiture of his rights. In this case, the complainant did not commence the manufacture of his improved lock till some time after his application was on file. The delay was not in consequence of his laches; and, within a reasonable time after the decision of the court as to the extent of his invention, a patent was granted for that portion of it to which he was clearly entitled. Here is no abandonment, either by the letter, or spirit of the statute, but a continual claim amid difficulties arising either from the obtuseness of officers, or accidental but unavoidable delays of public tribunals. If an inventor claims two distinct improvements in one machine, he may apply for them jointly, and have a single patent for both. If he has made a mistake as to one of the improvements claimed, but is clearly entitled to a patent as to the other, he can not be justly said to have abandoned either during a litigation as to his right to both.

2d. As to the question of infringement.

We have had ocular demonstration, by an examination of the defendant's admitted manufactures, that they palpably infringe the invention patented to complainant. When we have the things before our eyes (oculis subjecta fidelibus) we want no opinions of mechanics or experts, and give no further reason for our opinion than that "we've seen and surely ought to know." If the patent to Patterson be good for anything (being only a change of the device invented by complainant, for the worse,) it is only for an improvement on his invention. It must have been granted on that supposition. The locks exhibited show a substantial identity with Adams' invention, with a palpable attempt to make a colorable variation. It is plain also that this patent or Patterson, for an immaterial variation, is worthless as an improvement, and palpably got up as a cover, and to give color to this invasion of complainant's rights. To clearly vindicate this conclusion of the court, it would be necessary to have the things before us, and to give a viva voce explanation. For the present we can only say such is our undoubted conviction from careful personal examination of the things themselves.

3d. The defense of want of novelty is wholly unsuccessful. The spring bolt brought from Birmingham, clearly shows that the device invented by Adams to improve Janus-faced locks, had never entered into the conception of the maker of it. As the bolt was only partially beveled, he had somewhat inclined the lip of the catch to make it slide with more ease. Everything which we have said with regard to the New York gate-locks, got up to defeat the Sherwood patent, applies with double force to the rusty sample brought to our notice from Birmingham. In both cases, the defense amounts to no more than this—that the persons who made these supposed originals came so near the patented device or machine that they might have discovered it if they had only thought of it, or could have anticipated that, at some future day, it could be converted to some useful, practical purpose, for simplifying, cheapening and improving an important article of our manufacture. It is only when some person, by labor and perseverance, has been successful in perfecting some valuable manufacture, by ingenious improvements, and labor-saving devices, that their patents are sought to be annulled by digging up some useless, rusty, forgotten contrivances of unsuccessful experimenters. Let a decree be entered for complainant according to the prayer of the bill.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1823.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—ACT OF MARCH 1, 1823.

A justice of the peace, under the act of congress for extending the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, has not jurisdiction of suits against administrators.

[Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

At law. Adams brought suit, by a warrant of arrest, against Kincaid, administrator of McPhail, for services rendered by the plaintiff to McPhail in his lifetime. The account was proved and passed by the orphans' court. The warrant was returnable on the 13th of August, 1823, before Mr. Moulder, a justice of the peace, who adjourned the cause for consideration to the 18th, and again to the 20th, when "after a full hearing," he rendered judgment for the defendant, for costs, $1.16.

Upon the appeal Mr. Dunlop, for appellee, contended that a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction in suits against administrators.

Mr. Wallach, for appellant, referred to the new act of congress of the 1st March, 1823, (3 Stat. 743,) extending the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the recovery of debts in the District of Columbia, by which it is enacted, "that from and after the 1st day of June next," (1823,) "in all cases where the real debt and damages do not exceed the sum of $50, exclusive of costs, it shall and may be lawful for any one justice of the peace of each respective county in the District of Columbia, wherein the debtor doth reside, to try, hear, and determine the matter in controversy, between the creditor and debtor, their executors and administrators, and upon full hearing of the allegations and evidences of both parties, to give judgment according to the laws existing in the said District of Columbia, and the equity and right of the matter, in the same manner, and under the same rules and regulations, to all intents and purposes, as such justices of the peace are now authorized and empowered to do when the debt and damages do not exceed the sum of $20, exclusive of costs."

THE COURT, (THRUSTON, Judge, absent,) was at first inclined to the opinion, that the justice of the peace had jurisdiction under the new act; but, after further consideration, affirmed the judgment, with costs.

ADAMS v. LAWRENCE CO.

WOODS v. SAME.

[7 Pittsb. Leg. J. 145; 2 Pittsb. R. 60.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 17, 1859.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—MUNICIPAL AID—COUNTY BONDS—BONA FIDE HOLDERS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. The act of assembly of 9th July, 1853, section 7, authorizing certain counties to subscribe to the capital stock of the North-Western Railway Company, which provides that the counties may "make payments on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by said company and the proper county," confers, by such provision, full authority upon the county to issue coupon bonds in payment of such subscription.

2. All doubts as to this being the proper construction of the said section dispelled by the following considerations: 1st, Because the legislature themselves have so construed it, the proviso to the said section being "that whenever bonds of the respective counties are given in payment of subscriptions, the same shall not be sold by said railroad company at less than par value," &c., which shows that the legislature took it for granted that the issue of bonds was intended to be included in the brief but comprehensive expression of the "manner in which payment may be made." 2d, All parties concerned have treated this as the true construction, and have acted under it accordingly. 3d, The matter has been before the supreme court of the state, (S Casey, [32 Pa. St.] 144,) and it does not there appear that the county ought to have the bonds enjoined as made without authority. The decree there is based on the doctrine that these bonds are binding on the county in the hands of bona fide holders.

3. The said bonds, so issued, in the hands of bona fide holders, who have obtained them at their market value, are not affected by the proviso of the act, "that whenever bonds of the respective counties are given in payment of subscriptions, the same shall not be sold by said railroad company at less than par value."

Geo. P. Hamilton and W. O. Leslie, for plaintiffs.

R. B. McCombs and Lewis Taylor, for defendant.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. These cases were tried together at the last term of this court in May. The plaintiffs sued as holders of coupons of interest due on certain bonds issued by Lawrence county, the defendant. There was not much dispute as to the facts on the trial. The two great questions involved were: First, Had the commissioners of Lawrence county legal authority to issue the bonds given in evidence; and, Second, If they had, how far the fact that the bonds were disposed of for less than their par value should affect the plaintiffs' right to recover. In order that the court might have time for a more careful consideration of the questions, the jury were requested to bring in a special verdict, subject to the opinion of the court on these questions.

The execution of the bonds and coupons not being disputed, the jury returned a verdict finding the disputed facts, and assessing damages under three conditions, subject to the opinion of the court.

First. They find that the bonds were disposed of by the railroad company, at twenty-five per cent. less than their par value, and if the court shall be of opinion that the commissioners of Lawrence county had authority, under the act of 9th July, 1853, and the recommendation of the grand jury, as given in evidence, to issue the bonds, and that the plaintiff has a right to recover the whole amount of the coupons declared on, notwithstanding the fact, as above stated, then they find a verdict of $1,958 60.

Second. But if the court should be of opinion that plaintiff can recover only in the same ratio that the bonds were sold—for less than their par value—then the court to enter a verdict and judgment for $1,468 95.

Third. But if the court shall be of opinion that by reason of the sale of said bonds for less than their par value, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything, they will enter a verdict for defendant.

First. The question as to authority is one of great importance, as it affects not only a large number of bonds, issued by the county defendant, but the counties of Beaver and Butler, which are in the same category. The act of assembly, referred to in the verdict, of 9th July, 1853, is that which provides for "incorporating the Northwestern Railroad Company." The third section enacts that the company shall have a right to construct a railroad from some point on the Pennsylvania or Allegheny Portage Railroad, west of Johnstown, by way of Butler, to the Pennsylvania and Ohio state line, to some point on the western boundary of Lawrence county, &c. The seventh section, which alone confers any power on counties to subscribe for stock in this railroad, is as follows:

"Section 7.—That the counties, through parts of which said railroad may pass, shall be, and they are hereby severally authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of said railroad company, and to make payments on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by said company and the proper county. Provided, that the amount of subscription by any county shall not exceed ten per cent. of the assessed valuation thereof; and that before any such subscription is made, the amount thereof shall be fixed and determined by one grand jury of the proper county, and approved by the same; upon the report of such grand jury being filed, the county commissioners may carry the same into effect by making, in the name of the county, the subscription so directed by the said grand jury: Provided, that whenever bonds of the respective counties are given in payment of subscriptions, the same shall not be sold by said railroad company at less than par value, and no bonds shall be in less amount than one hundred dollars, and such bonds shall not be subject to taxation until the clear profits of said railroad shall amount to six per cent. upon the cost thereof, and that all subscriptions made or to be made in the name of any county, shall be held and deemed valid, if made by a majority of the commissioners of the respective counties."

The presentment of the grand jury is as follows: "The grand inquest of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, did, on the 21st of May, 1853, make the following resolution: "Resolved, That the commissioners of the county of Lawrence, state of Pennsylvania, be and are hereby recommended to subscribe stock to the North Western Railroad to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, agreeably to the act of assembly incorporating said North Western Railroad Company, and to issue bonds for the payment of said stock, making the conditions such as will best promote the interest of said railroad company and the county of Lawrence."

1. As to the authority to the officers of the county to make subscription to the stock of the railroad and issue the bonds now in question. The constitutional authority of the legislature of Pennsylvania, at the time this act was passed, to delegate to the county, or its officers, the powers necessary to legal execution and binding force of such securities, is no longer an open question. Does this act of assembly, on a fair construction of its terms, confer such an authority on the commissioners of Lawrence county?

First. It is not disputed that Lawrence county comes within the description of the act. It is one "of the counties through parts of which the said railroad may pass."

Second. This county, represented by its officers, "the commissioners or a majority of them," is authorized "to subscribe to the capital stock and make payment on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by said company and the proper county."

That this very general, indefinite, but comprehensive language of the act will include the power as exercised by the commissioners in this case, and that it is intended to do so, I have no doubt. No man ever expected or supposed that any county would become a stockholder in any other way than by borrowing money; their credit was all they could contribute. This would be done only by the issue of some sort of securities, well known in the money market. It was in this "manner" alone that any person supposed that these county corporations could "make payment." The form of coupon bonds was undoubtedly the best for all concerned, as this would give the bonds a higher value in the money market than any other.

It has been contended with much force, that in a legislative body, whose statutes are more usually obscured by a multiplication of words than by indefinite brevity, it cannot be presumed that so great and dangerous and corrupting a power was intended to be delegated in such vague language. It was easy to say, that the commissioners should have authority to pledge the credit of the county by the issue of bonds with coupons for the payment of interest half yearly, if the legislature so intended. That the power "to make payment on such terms and in such manner" may be satisfied, in many ways, without such an expansive construction as has been given to it. Besides it cannot be presumed that the extent of authority granted to the county commissioners, or the mode of its execution, would, by any prudent legislature be conferred on them at the discretion of a private corporation. That here was an attempt to delegate legislative power to them, if they may dictate the "manner" in which such a vague and dangerous power may be exercised. I must confess that when this question was first ventilated these and other arguments of defendant's counsel had caused much doubt in my mind, inasmuch that the court offered to certify a division of opinion in order to have the matter fully settled at Washington. And, perhaps, if the case before me were a bill to enjoin the commissioners from issuing these bonds, I might have come to a different conclusion, but after consultation with my colleague, and more mature consideration, the doubts at first entertained have been dispelled.

First. Because a legislative construction has been given of this same section showing that they did intend to authorize the issue of bonds in the name of the county. Modern legislation can seldom be understood without carefully noting the provisos. Instead of exceptions the provisos often contain the very pith and marrow of the statute, which without it would be unintelligible or absurd. Here the proviso clearly shows that the legislature took it for granted that the issue of bonds was intended to be included in the comprehensive, but brief and costive expression of the "manner" in which payment may be made.

Second. All parties concerned have treated this as the true construction, and have acted under it accordingly. The bonds have been issued, without a whisper of dissent as to the power of the commissioners to make them, and this sharp construction is not demanded till the convenience of total repudiation has been discovered. But the court will not now repudiate their own practical construction of the law, to enable them to repudiate the obligations made under it.

Third. This matter has been before the supreme court of the state. (See [County of Lawrence v. North-Western R. Co.] 8 Casey, [32 Pa. St.] 144.) In that case it does not appear that the county ought to have these bonds enjoined, because made without legal authority. The ground alleged in the bill, and proven to the satisfaction of the court, was the gross fraud practiced by the officers and first subscribers of stock to that company. The decree in that case is based upon the doctrine that these bonds are binding on the county in the hands of bona fide holders. That point seems to have been conceded both by court and counsel. Else why decree that the company should pay to the county the par value of the bonds and interest due, if they do not surrender them?

The objection that the grand jury have not "fixed and determined" the amount to be subscribed, but only "recommended," is a verbal criticism, which might well have been urged on a bill to restrain the action of the commissioners. If acts of assembly are drawn in such a careless slip shod style, how can we expect accuracy of expression in the report of a grand jury. They no doubt intended it as a literal compliance with the statute—it was accepted and acted upon as such. In such a case a court ought not to be astute in verbal criticism to release parties from their contracts, after their faith has been pledged for the redemption of these securities and value received for them.

II. The bonds having been executed by the commissioners according to the powers conferred on them, and delivered to the railroad company in payment of stock, who have paid them to contractors, who have again passed them to laborers and other bona fide holders, for their market value, how are they affected by the last proviso, of the act, "that whenever bonds of the respective counties are given in payment of subscriptions, the same shall not be sold by said railroad company, at less than par value." On the trial, the fact that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder of these bonds, was not put in issue, and is assumed in the special verdict, which "finds the bonds that were disposed of by the railroad company, at twenty-five per cent. less than the par value." This is a duty imposed on the railroad company, the original payer of the bonds. The company receives them at their par value for stock in the road, which is presumed to be a complete equivalent. But if the bonds, which are received as cash, are not of that value, it would be a fraud on the other stockholders, who paid in money or its equivalent, if the county could pay for a hundred dollars of stock in a depreciated currency worth only seventy-five dollars. Besides, the bonds being made negotiable security, payable to bearer, the county would have to pay their bond and interest, whether that bond purchased a hundred dollars worth of work or materials, or only fifty. This is no condition precedent, which affects the covenants on the bonds. It assumes that the bonds have been issued and given in payment of stock, and imposes this prohibition as a restraint upon both the county and the railroad. The county should not subscribe unless they are sure that the state of the money market is such that their securities will be worth par—nor should the railroad accept subscriptions to be paid in such securities, unless they were equivalent to the cash paid by other stockholders. Now, if these bonds were expected to be mere common bonds, not negotiable, but passing only as an equitable interest to the assignee, this proviso of the act would have been unnecessary, as the county might have set up this as a defense against the company and their assignees. It would not effect a forfeiture of the bond, but the county might well plead that it would pay no more to the company than it had contributed to the stock by its bond. It is apparent, also, that the imposition of this duty upon the railroad is founded on the fact that the bonds given to them would be negotiable securities, to be put into the market as a sort of currency, and binding the obligor to pay the bearer according to the exigency of the bond. The proviso evidently assumes that fact, and is founded on that hypothesis. The recitals of the bonds are to show the power of the commissioners or agents of the county to bind it by subscriptions for stock, and pledging the faith of the county by such public securities. If the power has been legally executed, the bearer to whom the county has contracted to pay has no concern with intermediate holders. Whether the commissioners and the company may (one or both) have been guilty of fraud in issuing these securities, the bearer or bona fide holder need not inquire. If the corporation has wronged the county in this transaction, it does not concern the holder of the bond. He has a right to presume that both parties have acted honestly, and according to duties prescribed to them by the act. The bearer of the bond who has purchased it in market for its market value, has a right to say to the county: You have put forth your bonds in the shape of a negotiable security payable to bearer; you have covenanted to pay me certain sums at certain times; you have delivered these securities or sold them for certain stock; you have your consideration; I have your bond. If the railroad has cheated you, see you to it. It is no concern of mine. "It is not so written in the bond." It appears by the report of the case above cited, that these bonds were fraudulently obtained by the officers of the railroad company, and that the company was ordered to deliver up all the bonds in their possession, and to pay the par value of all the bonds put in circulation by them. Why has the county asked for such a decree, and why should the court have made such a decree, unless upon the admitted principle that the county were bound to pay such of these securities as were put in circulation according to the exigency of their contract? That, though technically bonds, yet by the custom of the country they were negotiable securities, and the county, by the letter and spirit of their contract, were bound to pay the bearer the whole amount. The face of the bond gave notice to every one who received it, on what legal authority it purported to be executed. A purchaser was bound to inquire whether the bonds were executed by persons having authority to pledge the faith of the county. Their delivery may be presumed from the fact that they are found in the market; whether the agents of the county or the railroad had been guilty of fraud or folly in the course of their transaction, were facts of which the face of his bond did not put the holder on the inquiry, and the knowledge of which would not affect his legal right to recover. The county cannot make a speculation out of the folly or fraud of their agents, as they certainly would if they recover the amount of their bonds from the company, and themselves refuse to pay them to the legal holder. They cannot allege in one court, as foundation for a decree, that they are bound to pay the bonds, and deny it, when sued on the bonds in another. The court are of opinion, therefore, that, according to the conditions of the special verdict, the plaintiff has a right to judgment for the sum of $1,958 60, and so order.

Case No. 60.

ADAMS v. LEWIS.

[5 Sawy. 229;¹ 10 Chi. Leg. News, 403.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 28, 1878.

COURTS—PROBATE JURISDICTION.

1. In ascertaining the jurisdiction "pertaining to probate courts," under section 12, art. 7, of the constitution of Oregon, it is proper and necessary to consider what matters pertained to such jurisdiction under the laws of the territory at and before the adoption of the constitution, and it appearing that by such laws the probate courts of the territory had power to authorize and require an administrator to specifically perform a contract of his intestate for the sale and conveyance of real estate, such a matter is presumed to be within the jurisdiction of the county court sitting as a court of probate under the constitution.

2. The power of the legislature over the succession and conveyance of lands being unlimited, it may provide that a court of probate shall have jurisdiction to require an administrator to convey land in pursuance of the contract of his intestate.

[At law. Motion for new trial. Denied.]

This was a motion for a new trial in an action to recover the possession of the south half of lot 1, in block 16, in the city of Portland. The trial was had before the district judge and a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the defendant. The defendant claimed under a deed made by the administrator of D. H. Lowndale, the donee of the United States, and the immediate ancestor of the plaintiff's grantors, executed in pursuance of an order of the county court of Multnomah county, sitting as a court of probate, in February, 1863. Upon the trial, the record of the county court and the administrator's deed, being offered in evidence by the defendant, [it] was objected to by plaintiff on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, because chapter 7 of the act of December 14, 1853, respecting executors, etc., under which the order and deed purport to have been made, was invalid from the beginning as being unauthorized by section 9 of the organic act of August 14, 1848, (9 Stat. 326,) or had become inoperative by the adoption of the constitution. The district judge overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence, saying: "The determination of this question hinges, I suppose, upon the construction to be given to section 12, of article 7, of the constitution of the state of Oregon, which reads as follows: 'The county court shall have the jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts and boards of county commissioners, and such other powers and duties, and such civil jurisdiction, not exceeding the amount of value of five hundred dollars, and such criminal jurisdiction, not extending to death or imprisonment in the penitentiary, as may be prescribed by law.' In my judgment, the construction of this section, suggested by counsel for plaintiff, is correct; that is to say, the words, 'as may be provided by law,' do not relate to the grant of jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts and boards of county commissioners; that these are granted absolutely, and that in addition thereto, 'such other powers and duties,' such civil jurisdiction not being defined, except that the value shall not be over five hundred dollars, and such criminal jurisdiction not being defined, except that it shall not extend to death or imprisonment in the penitentiary, as may be prescribed by law; but the two subjects, jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts and boards of county commissioners, are granted absolutely. Of course, that does not take away the power of the legislature over the subject of probate proceedings, and proceedings before boards of county commissioners, but it does not limit its power probably in this respect, so that it cannot transfer this jurisdiction or diminish it, cannot take it away, but it certainly has power to regulate the exercise of it. The legislative power extends to all rightful subjects of legislation. The legislature, then, may regulate the exercise of this jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts and boards of county commissioners, in county courts, and it may be that in the regulation of it, may suppress, so to speak, or leave in abeyance, for the time being, the exercise of some power which probate courts may have exercised heretofore.

Then the question returns, what is "the jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts?" By section 7 of article 18 of the constitution it is provided that all laws in force in the territory of Oregon when this constitution takes effect, and consistent therewith, shall continue in force until altered or repealed. So that the statute of December 14, 1853, as it was passed before this constitution was adopted, was one of the laws of the territory of Oregon, continued in force by it, if not inconsistent therewith. If it is inconsistent with this constitution, why of course the constitution displaces it, and it is no longer a law, whatever it may have been before. It may be admitted, then, that the question of what is the jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts includes this question as well as the other, because if the jurisdiction provided for in chapter 7 of the act of December 14, 1853, is part of the jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts, then the constitution is not inconsistent with that law, but consistent with it.

As counsel for plaintiff has well said, it is a pretty difficult question definitely to decide, what is a matter properly pertaining to probate jurisdiction in the United States. It must be answered, I think, in each state separately and somewhat historically. There is a kind of tradition that runs along with the various changes of government by means of which the phrases and terms of the constitutions and laws of one era are interpreted and explained according to the sense in which they have been used in another, or prior one. The rule is that unless the contrary appears, such phrases and terms are supposed to be used in the latter time in that sense in which they were used aforetime. That is what I understand to be the historical mode of determining what the phrase "probate jurisdiction," as used in the constitution, includes. We must ascertain the sense in which it was used in this state at the time of the formation and adoption of the constitution, and to do this it is only necessary to inquire what jurisdiction did probate courts have, at that time, in this state, as a matter of fact?

At common law, of course, there was no such probate jurisdiction. The power to grant letters testamentary where the deceased left a will, and to grant letters of administration where he died intestate, was vested in the ordinary, the bishop of the diocese. If the bishop did not exercise it in person it was done by the surrogate, a substitute, who stood in his place. But this jurisdiction only pertained to the granting of letters of administration, or testamentary. Originally, I believe, the personalty was given by the king as parens patriae to the ordinary, in trust, and was applied in saying masses for the benefit of the soul of the deceased, or to some other pious or charitable use. At common law the real estate was not affected in any way by the proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts. The proof of wills and granting of letters testamentary, or of administration, did not affect the land in any way, and taking that standard of what may be called probate jurisdiction, of course this is not a probate matter or anything like it. But the law has changed a great deal since that time, in regard to this matter, particularly in the United States.

I think this word "probate," "judge of probates" and "probate matters," comes to us from Massachusetts—comes from New England—that is my impression about it. And I think, there, from the beginning, very much larger power was given to the persons exercising that jurisdiction, than belonged to the ordinary, and particularly in the matter of dealing with the land of the deceased. It is very evident, according to the case read from [Luchterhand v. Sears,] 108 Mass. 552, that there was a statute there providing for specific performance of contracts for the conveyance of land, by order of the judge of probate. I cannot say what the form or manner of proceeding was, but that was the end to be attained.

Chapter 7 of the act of December 14, 1853, (Code [Statutes] 1855, p. 338,) is taken from the act upon the same subject, passed September 29, 1853, [1849,] (Code [Gen. Laws] 1851, p. 133,) with the omission of some very wholesome provisions concerning notice to the administrator, and the rights of infants, absentees, etc. [The court then read the provisions of the act of 1849, relating to the authority of the probate court to order a specific performance by the administrator of a written contract by the deceased to convey land, and compared them with those of 1853.]

Section 6 of the act of September 3, 1849, "An act to establish a probate court, and define its powers and duties," (Code 1851, p. 211,) is the prototype of section 6 of the same title, passed December 15, 1853, (Code 1855, p. 312, [339,]) relating to the jurisdiction of the probate judge. The statutes of 1849 are the earliest legislation upon the subject of judges or courts of probate, and their jurisdiction and powers in this state. The origin of the probate jurisdiction, so far as Oregon is concerned, is found in these statutes of 1849 and 1853, the latter of which are substantial copies of the former.

At the formation and adoption of the constitution, what then was understood from the prior and existing legislation of the country to be the "jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts?" Did it include the power to order specific performance of a contract relating to land by the administrator? Certainly it did. There does not seem to have been any doubt or dispute about it. This power was always included in the powers of the judges of probate.

But it is said by counsel for plaintiff that this power could not have been conferred upon the probate court by the territorial legislature, because it was not a power pertaining to probate courts, and that therefore the statute never was valid.

Section 9 of the organic act of August 14, 1878, [1848,] (9 Stat. 326,) vested the judicial power of the territory in supreme, district, and "probate courts," with jurisdiction as limited by law. Now, if the power to order an administrator to convey land in pursuance of the contract of his intestate, could not be conferred upon the probate court of the territory, because a matter not pertaining to a probate court, then the suggestion has force. But that only brings the inquiry around to where it was before, what are probate powers or matters?

Originally a debt due from the deceased could not be paid out of his land, because the administrator or executor had no power over the realty. If it was a simple contract debt, and the personal property was not sufficient to pay it, it was lost; but if it was evidenced by a writing obligatory, an instrument under seal, then the doctrine came to be that it followed the land so far that you could sue the heir or devisee, and enforce payment to the value of the land received from the devisor or ancestor. Afterwards, in this country, the matter of making such payments, and subjecting the land to the debts of the deceased, came to be a recognized head of probate jurisdiction. That fact seems to be admitted by the plaintiff's counsel, that the probate court has authority to order the sale of lands to pay the debts of the deceased. But at one time that was not so. Now, is there any real distinction in principle between that and ordering the administrator to specifically perform any contract in relation to land?

A man dies under obligation to pay a debt to A. B., and has no personal property out of which the debt may be satisfied, and the law provides that the probate court may order the administrator to sell the lands of the deceased, and pay the debt with the proceeds, and thus take away the title of the heir. But suppose the deceased was under a valid contract to convey the same land to A. B. If the contract is not performed, the estate is liable for the loss which A. B. may sustain by reason of the non-performance. To prevent circuity of action, and settle the matter directly and simply, the court is authorized to direct a specific performance of the contract by the administrator. The deed made by the administrator conveys the title, which would otherwise have been conveyed by him to satisfy the debt, in damages for non-performance.

It seems to me there is no difference in principle between these two proceedings. It may be said that vesting jurisdiction of this kind in unlearned county courts, to be exercised without process or notice to the parties interested except the publication of a notice in a newspaper, may prove a convenient method of robbing infant heirs of their lands. So I am inclined to think, and for that reason, in preparing the Code of 1862, I intentionally omitted to provide for the specific performance of contracts relating to land in the county courts, but left the power to be exercised by the circuit court, where it properly belongs, as a recognized head of equity jurisdiction. But it is difficult to see on what ground you can limit the power of the legislature in this respect. Its power over the succession and conveyance of land is unlimited. Suppose it should provide that the administrator should perform the contracts of the intestate, in relation to lands, without the interference of any court, would not a conveyance in such a case, by the administrator, at least in pursuance of a valid contract, pass the title as against the heir? I can conceive of no reason why it would not. Then, if the law should provide that the administrator should only act upon the order of the county or any other court, it is difficult to see how the conveyance would be impaired by this additional precaution in favor of the heir. It is only by virtue of the law that the real property of a deceased person descends to certain persons called his heirs. I suppose the legislature might provide that the property should vest in an administrator absolutely; that it should belong to him with the same power of use and alienation as the deceased had until the liabilities and obligations of the deceased were satisfied and complied with.

In my judgment, then, the making of the order at the term of the county court of March, 1863, in pursuance of which the deed from Lownsdale, administrator, to Simon, was executed, was made by the county court of Multnomah county in the exercise of "the jurisdiction pertaining to probate courts" as that phrase was used and understood in this state when the constitution was framed and adopted. This being so, the provisions of the act of 1853, under which these proceedings took place in 1863, were then in force, because being consistent with the constitution they were adopted and continued in force by it until repealed by the Code of 1862, which did not go into operation until June 1, 1863. Even if the territorial legislature had not the power, strictly speaking, to confer this authority on the probate court under the organic act, still, the act having been passed by the territorial legislature and treated and considered as a valid law until the formation of the constitution, I am of the opinion that it was adopted by that instrument and became a law of the state from the time the constitution went into operation.

The fact that the grantors of the plaintiff, the then infant heirs of D. H. Lownsdale, had only constructive notice of the proceeding under which Simon, the grantor of the defendant, obtained his deed, may be a good reason why the order should be open to attack, collaterally, for fraud or mistake. But at all events the order and deed are, prima facie, valid, and further than that it is not necessary to decide.

There was evidence given by the defendant to show that she, and those under whom she claimed, had been in the open and adverse possession of the premises since 1848.

The court instructed the jury that the defendant was the owner of the premises by virtue of the conveyance from Lownsdale's administrator and the subsequent mesne conveyances, but that the possession of D. Simon, under whom the defendant claimed, was not adverse to the title of Lownsdale, as was shown by his application under oath for a conveyance of that title at the February term, 1863, of the county court, citing Adams v. Burke, [Case No. 49;] and that therefore their general verdict must be for the defendant, with a special finding that the defendant had not by herself nor those under whom she claims been in the continuous possession of the premises adversely to the plaintiff and those under whom he claims for more than twenty years before the commencement of this action. Verdict accordingly.

Benton Killin and H. Y. Thompson, for plaintiff.

William H. Effinger and W. F. Trimble, for defendant.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and DEADY, District Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The ruling of the district judge, both upon the admission of the evidence and in the instruction given to the jury, was correct, and for the reasons given by him. The motion for a new trial is denied.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—NOVELTY—OLD CONTRIVANCES—NEW OBJECTS.

1. Letters patent No. 111,798, granted to Thomas Adams, February 14th, 1871, for an improvement in chewing gum, held void for want of novelty.

2. The question of what constitutes sufficient novelty, discussed.

In equity.

Francis Forbes, for complainant.

M. T. Newbold, for defendant.

NIXON, District Judge. The bill was filed, in this case, by the complainant, for an injunction and an account, against the defendant, for the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 111,798, dated February 14th, 1871, for "improvement in chewing gum." The inventor, in his specifications, says that his invention consists in a method of preparing the natural product, known as chicky, to produce a chewing gum. This chicky is a vegetable gum, imported into this country from Mexico, the color of which varies from a dark cream to a brownish or earthy color. His method of preparation consists in taking the crude chicky of commerce and subjecting it to the action of hot water. In other words, he washes the gum, taken in its natural state, in hot water, in order to remove from it all coloring matter and impurities, and the product, to wit, the washed gum, is the new article of manufacture. His claim is, "the chewing gum prepared from the material and in the manner specified, as a new article of manufacture." Even if it should be conceded that the phraseology of the claim includes the process as well as the product, it remains a serious question whether the invention has, in itself, any patentable quality. The patent act (Rev. St. § 4886,) authorizes a patent to be issued to any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof. The alleged invention must be both useful and new. How will the present stand this test?

1. In regard to its usefulness. The law charges the court with the duty of determining whether inventions are frivolous or insignificant, and I was strongly inclined, at the hearing, to apply to the case the maxim, De minimis non curatur, and dismiss it without further consideration. But that, perhaps, would have been going too far, especially as want of utility was set up as a defence in the answer, and no evidence was afterward offered tending to impeach the patent on that ground. Prima facie every patent is good, and I cannot say that it appears upon the face of the letters patent and specifications in this case, that the invention is frivolous or useless, or hurtful to the morals or health of society. Chewing gum may have its use, in the social economy, as a substitute for a greater evil or folly. The degree of utility is not a question. The law only requires that it shall be capable of some use, and that the use is not prohibited by sound morals or public policy. Curt. Pat. § 106.

2. In regard to the other requisite quality of patentable inventions, to wit, their novelty, that also is denied in the answer, and testimony has been taken tending to exhibit its lack of it. It is shown that the gum chicky is obtained from the juice of a tree, belonging, in botany, to the genus Achras sapata, which grows in the West Indies, Mexico, and South America. The product is a gum resin, and has the general properties of and belongs to the same class of resins as caoutchouc and gutta percha. It may be remarked, in passing, that the consul-general of Mexico was produced as a witness for the defendant, and he states, that in Mexico, the vulgar name of the tree from which it is taken is Chico Zapote; whence, doubtless, the name chicky is derived. He further testifies that the product is known to everybody there, and is commonly used as a chewing gum, being sold in the country stores in shape of grotesque figures. As some importance seems to have been attached to this fact, upon the argument, it may be said that such foreign prior public use was not brought home to the knowledge of the patentee before the date of the patent, and hence cannot be used in this case against its validity. The prior use which invalidates a patent, under our law, is a use within the United States, which, as yet, does not embrace Mexico. The subjection of india rubber and gutta percha to the action of hot water, for the purpose of cleansing, is an old and well-known process. Mr. Joslin, a superintendent of rubber works in Jersey City, fully describes the method of washing the crude articles, as pursued by him since he commenced business in 1844, and says that the same process has been used by all the rubber establishments that have come under his observation. It is the same method substantially as that described by the patentee in the specifications of his patent. To take a process so generally known as this in its application to india rubber and gutta percha, and apply it to the gum chicky, is not invention; and the result obtained, to wit, a gum more free from soluble matter and impurities than the chicky, in its crude state, is nothing new; it comes within the forbidden application of old contrivances to new objects. The case is not distinguishable from Howe v. Abbott, [Case No. 6,766,] in which the attempt was made to sustain the novelty of a patent for the process of curling palm leaf for mattresses, it appearing at the same time that hair had long been prepared by the same means for the same purpose. Mr. Justice Story, in holding it to be a double use of an old process, said: "It is precisely the same, as if a coffee-mill were now, for the first time, used to grind corn. The application of an old process to manufacture an article, to which it had never before been applied, is not a patentable invention. There must be some new process, or some new machinery used, to produce the result. If the old spinning machine to spin flax were now first applied to spin cotton, no man could hold a new patent to spin cotton in that mode; much less the right to spin cotton in all modes, although he had invented none. As, therefore, Smith" (the patentee) "has invented no new process or machinery, but has only applied to palm leaf the old process, and the old machinery used to curl hair, it does not strike me that the patent is maintainable. He, who produces an old result by a new mode or process, is entitled to a patent for that mode or process. But he cannot have a patent for a result merely, without using some new mode or process to produce it."

It is not claimed that chewing gum in itself is new. Every one familiar with the habits of school children knows to the contrary. It is conceded that long before the patentee attempted to convert the crude gum chicky into an article cleanly enough for the mouth of man, by washing out some of its impurities, chewing gum made from the spruce gum, paraffine, and other natural productions, was for sale upon the market. It is shown that the product of the same class or family of the vegetable kingdom had been washed and cleansed in the same manner, years before. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to find any novelty in the invention as set forth and described in the patent. If the letters patent could be sustained, there would be no doubt about the infringement. The defendant, instead of using hot water for moistening and washing the crude article, has applied steam, with the subsequent application of cold water. Such a palpable attempt at evasion, not having even the merit of originality, would not for a moment be tolerated by the court, if we could see the way clear to uphold the patent; but not being able to do so, the complainant's bill must be dismissed, with costs.

[In bankruptcy. Action by E. M. Adams against George T. Meyers, as assignee of E. T. Warren. Judgment for defendant.]

John Catlin, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a controversy submitted to the court upon an agreed case pursuant to chapter 2, tit. 14, of the Code. Code Or. 202. From the case stated it appears:

I. That on March 10, 1870, said Warren filed his petition in bankruptcy in this court, and that on March 14 he was duly adjudged a bankrupt, and that afterwards the defendant was appointed assignee of said bankrupt. That in September, 1869, the plaintiff delivered to said Warren 221 bushels of merchantable wheat, for which the latter gave his receipt as follows: "McMinnville, Or., Sept. 22, 1869. Commercial Mills. Received of E. M. Adams 13,260 lbs. wheat, equal to 221 bushels. (Signed) E. T. Warren, Frank." That said Warren received said wheat as a warehouseman and put it in a granery then owned by him and situate near his grist mill aforesaid, and with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff intermixed and confused the same with a large quantity of other wheat, not the property of the plaintiff, and that prior to said March 10, said Warren allowed all the wheat to be removed from said granary, but that none of said wheat was ever returned to plaintiff, nor did he ever receive any satisfaction therefor, except for 11,⁰⁰ bushels.

II. That the defendant, as assignee aforesaid, became possessed of several hundred bushels of wheat stored in bulk in another granary near the mill aforesaid, which, on May 3, he sold at public auction, the plaintiff then and there protesting against the sale of so much of said wheat as would be equal in quantity to the number of bushels stored by him with Warren as aforesaid, and that at the time of said sale said wheat was worth sixty cents per bushel in coin. Upon this statement of facts, which is to be deemed a special verdict, (Code Or. 203) the plaintiff claims that the defendant is liable to him in the sum of $126.12 damages for the conversion of the wheat delivered as aforesaid, and not returned or accounted for. On the other hand the defendant denies that he is liable to the plaintiff in any sum. The case was submitted without argument, and I am not therefore specially advised as to the particular questions of law which the parties to the controversy deem involved in it and necessary to its determination. It is also understood from a remark of counsel for the defendant, that there are other controversies existing between the defendant and other persons growing out of the deposit of wheat with Warren under similar circumstances, and that this is intended or expected to be a test case. For these reasons I will consider whatever questions of law that appear to arise upon the facts. And first, as to the character in which the defendant is liable, if at all. In the title of the case stated, he is described as assignee of Warren, from which it may be implied that the plaintiff seeks to charge him in his character or relation of assignee, and not personally or absolutely. But the defendant is not liable to be sued as assignee until the supposed creditor has proved his debt, and that proof has been rejected by the district judge. Bankrupt Act, § 24. In the latter case the creditor may bring an action against the assignee as such in the circuit court to establish his claim, but in either event the creditor only receives his pro rata of the bankrupt's estate. Besides, the facts stated show that the defendant, if liable to the plaintiff at all, is liable personally, and not as assignee. The gravamen of the complaint is, that the defendant sold and disposed of wheat in the north granary which the plaintiff claimed to be in some sort his property, and thereby wrongfully converted the same to his own use, to the damage of the plaintiff the sum claimed. The estate of the bankrupt is not answerable for the tortious acts of the defendant because he is the assignee thereof, or professed to be acting as assignee in the matter complained of.

The law arising upon the facts stated concerning the deposit of wheat is well settled. The plaintiff's wheat having been mixed and confused with that in Warren's possession, with the mutual consent of the parties, the plaintiff became tenant in common with Warren of the bulk of grain produced by the mixture, and his interest therein was in proportion to the number of bushels deposited by him. Practically the result would be the same in this case if the wheat had been mixed without the plaintiff's consent, because, being presumed to be of equal value, the plaintiff would not be injured if he received the number of bushels of wheat deposited by him, although not the specific grains so deposited. Willard v. Rice, 11 Metc. [Mass.] 495; 2 Bl. Comm. 405; 2 Kent, Comm. 364; Hart v. Ten Eyck, 2 Johns. Ch. 108; Story, Bailm. § 40. But it appears that Warren removed, or allowed to be removed, all the grain in this granary before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. Particularly what became of it does not appear. Probably it was manufactured into flour and disposed of by Warren long before the filing of the petition. But the inquiry is not material, so long as there is no evidence to show that it is the identical grain sold by the defendant contrary to the protest of the plaintiff. Upon this point the case stated is silent and no inference in favor of the plaintiff can be made from the facts set forth. This being so, the plaintiff, so far as appears, had no interest in the specific grain disposed of by the defendant. His only interest was that of a general creditor of the estate. It must be presumed from the facts stated that the plaintiff's grain was converted by Warren to his own use. If so he thereby became liable to the plaintiff for its value. This liability is a claim against the estate and provable as a debt in bankruptcy.

In conclusion, it is sufficient to say, that the defendant did not personally incur any liability to the plaintiff by the sale of the wheat in question, because the plaintiff does not appear to have had any specific interest or property in it. The claim of the plaintiff is for damages in money for the value of wheat deposited with the bankrupt, and by him converted to his own use and not accounted for. Such a claim is a debt or demand provable against the bankrupt's estate, and for which the assignee, as such, cannot be sued, except the same be rejected by the district judge, on objections by the assignee, as prescribed in section 23 of the Bankrupt Act. Let judgment be entered, that the plaintiff take nothing upon the case stated and that the defendant recover his costs, and expenses to be taxed.

[NOTE. Should the warehouseman sell a portion of the wheat, each original owner is entitled to claim his pro rata share; and should he buy other wheat, and mix it with the remaining portion, the title to such additional wheat would pass to the original owners. Rahilly v. Wilson, Case No. 11,531.]

APPRENTICE—ASSUMPSIT.

Assumpsit lies by the apprentice against his master who takes the apprentice under an order of the court to bind him out, [and fails to comply with the terms of such order,] although no indentures are executed.

At law. Assumpsit for not teaching the plaintiff the trade of a silversmith, and to read and write, according to promise.

The corporation court of Alexandria had ordered the overseers of the poor to bind out the plaintiff to defendant.

THE COURT instructed the jury, that the defendant having taken the boy under the order of the court, although there was no indenture, the law raises an implied promise on the part of the defendant to comply with the terms of that order.

J. R. Ingersoll, for libellants.

D. P. Brown, for respondent.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. Two libels are filed in this case; one on behalf of Samuel Adams, the mate of the brig; and the other on behalf of Asa Combs and others, seamen; both claiming wages for the libellants as mariners on board of the brig, on her late voyage from St. Thomas to Rum Key, and from thence to Philadelphia. This vessel sailed from St. Thomas on the 19th November last, arrived safely at Rum Key, and, after some detention there, proceeded on her voyage to Philadelphia; but on the 4th of February was wrecked near the capes of Delaware. The vessel and cargo were lost; but some of the rigging and spars were saved, and brought within this district, and have been libelled and attached to answer the claims of the libellants. The seamen have set forth their claims in their libel; and the mate has preferred his separately. They present different questions for the consideration and decision of the court, and will be separately examined. I shall first take up that of the seamen. It is objected to these libellants, in limine, that their libel presents no case for them; that, taking the facts, they state to be true, they do not show a right of recovery; or rather that it is apparent, on their own statement, that they are not entitled to the prayer of their petition; that is, to their wages on the voyage described.

The proceedings of a court of admiralty are not rigidly bound in the trammels of form; but, in every court, there must be some rules adhered to in the administration of the law, without which it would be a chaos of uncertainty and confusion. One of the most obvious and indispensable of these is, that the plaintiff shall exhibit such a case to the court, as entitles him, if true, to the judgment of the court. This can hardly be called matter of form; it is rather the substance on which the subsequent proceedings are to rest. How can a defendant answer a plaintiff who alleges nothing which charges him with any liability? Why shall he admit, or deny, or disprove a narration of facts, which when admitted or proved gives no cause of action against him; and which therefore need not be denied? Whatever case a libellant may have on his evidence, or in the truth of the transaction, he must also present a good one in his libel of complaint, and in his petition for redress, otherwise, should the relief asked be granted, the record of the court will not justify its decree; a plaintiff will obtain a judgment showing no right to it; and a defendant fall under the condemnation of the law, who has done no wrong. If such proceedings are taken, for revision, to a higher tribunal, which would have only the record for its guide and knowledge of the case, and could know nothing of the evidence, what could be done, but to reverse a decree to which the party shows he has no title?

These principles cannot be questioned; they are supported by common sense, as well as by the authority of legal adjudications. We must test by them the libel of Asa Combs and others, with a disposition to support it, if it can be done without injury to more important matters.

The libel sets forth, that the libellants, on the 20th November, 1828, at the port of St. Thomas, shipped on board the brig Sophia, as mariners, to perform a voyage from the said port of St. Thomas to Rum Key, and thence to Philadelphia; and thence back to St. Thomas, for certain wages. They further state, that they proceeded on said voyage, and continued doing their duty faithfully on board of said brig, until she was lost, without any fault of the petitioners, near cape Henlopen in the state of Delaware. They then state the amount of wages claimed, and pray that they may obtain relief in the premises, and such decree against the proceeds of the tackle, apparel and furniture, and other avails of the said brig within the jurisdiction of this court, as the court shall deem requisite.

In this libel we have an averment that the voyage, for which the wages are claimed, began at St. Thomas; that it was thence to proceed to Rum Key; thence to Philadelphia, and back to St. Thomas; and that before the arrival of the brig at Philadelphia, she, together with her cargo and freight, was lost. On such a case, what is the sentence of the law? Clearly and undeniably that the wages of the seamen are lost with the freight, which is said to be the mother of those wages. This is the general, undisputed rule of the law. There is, however, an exception to this rule, founded on an obvious and just commercial policy. It is this; that when any part of the vessel or cargo is saved by the meritorious exertions of the crew, in the hour of distress and peril, they shall receive their wages out of the property thus preserved. On this principle a new claim for wages is given by the law, although that which was founded on the original contract between the ship owners and the mariners, is annulled and lost by the loss of the freight. The claim therefore presented to the court, in such a case, must lay its foundation on the facts which give it birth and existence, and by which only it can be sustained; and not on a contract which is utterly defunct and extinguished. The mariner cannot come here and say; I demand the payment of my wages by virtue of my shipping contract, and, at the same time, set forth a fact or state of things, which has destroyed and avoided that contract and every right and claim under it. He should raise and assert his new claim on the allegation of the facts, by which it is created and supported; to wit, that notwithstanding the freight of the vessel has been lost, yet that, by his exertions and services a part of the property has been saved, for which and from which he asks his reward. It should be observed, that to entitle the seaman to a resuscitation of his lost wages, two circumstances must concur, to wit, the saving of the property, which is the fund to which he is to look for payment; and that its preservation was owing to his services and exertions. The libel before us makes no allegation of either of these circumstances, but places the claim of the libellants on their original shipping contract, and their having faithfully performed their duty "until the brig was lost." But the duty and service, for which only they can maintain their claim, should have been performed after that unfortunate event, in rescuing the rigging and spars from the wreck. So as to the saving of this property; it is not directly alleged that any thing was saved, but it is merely incidentally alluded to in the prayer of the petition, by which the payment of wages is asked for, from the proceeds of the tackle, apparel and furniture of the brig. This is not such an averment or allegation as the defendant could have denied or taken issue upon. If, however, this were to be taken as a sufficient allegation of the preservation of a part of the property, where is it said or intimated that it was preserved by the meritorious exertions and services of the libellants? To say that they faithfully performed their duty until the vessel was lost, is far from presenting the ground, either directly or by necessary inference, on which alone this claim can be supported.

I wish to have it understood, that, in this case, the libel expressly states the loss of the vessel on her voyage; and then does not go on to aver or set out the facts, by virtue of which wages become due, and may be recovered notwithstanding such loss. The case would have had a different shape, if the libel had preferred a general demand of wages, earned on that voyage, in the usual form, omitting every thing of the accident to the brig. In such a case the defendant would have opposed the demand, by answering that the vessel, cargo, and freight were lost before the termination of the voyage by shipwreck. This course of pleading would have brought the whole matter into the view of the court on the allegations and testimony of the parties. I mention this because I do not deem it to be indispensable, that in case of wreck, the libellants should set out the salvage and their services; although it is the usual and certainly the best manner of bringing up the case; but that where a seaman does state the wreck of the vessel in his libel, he must go on to set out such circumstances, as will, notwithstanding this loss, entitle him to his wages. In other words he must not show a case, on which he is not entitled to the relief he prays for; he must not demand his wages on his original contract while he shows that such contract is destroyed, and can give him no right of recovery.

It is my opinion that these libellants cannot have the judgment of this court on the case they have presented; and this libel must be dismissed. I regret to send a party out of court on anything but the clear merits of the case; and I have not been wanting in my endeavors to avoid it here. Whether, on the settlement of the accounts of these men, anything would be due to them, it is unnecessary now to inquire; so also as to the charges made against them for neglect and misconduct.

I proceed to the case of Samuel Adams, the mate of the brig Sophia, in this disastrous voyage. His libel sets out the contract for wages, for the voyage; and alleges, generally, the faithful performance of his duty. He proceeds: "And your libellant further showeth that the said brig, on her passage to the said port of Philadelphia, was cast away in the night time near cape Henlopen, in the state of Delaware, and that without any fault or negligence whatsoever of your libellant; and your libellant further showeth, that nearly every thing belonging to the vessel was saved and preserved, and her tackle, apparel and furniture brought within the jurisdiction of this honourable court through the exertions of your libellant." Here then is exhibited to the court a full and complete legal right to wages, if the allegations of the libellant are supported by the testimony. How has it happened that, in these libels, filed by the same counsel, on the same facts, there has occurred the difference, that exists between this for the mate, and that presented for the crew of the brig? It is the more unaccountable, too, as the libel for the mate was amended by some suggestions from the court, to prevent difficulties and exceptions to its form; and was filed with the clerk, two or three weeks before that of the men. Why the same form was not pursued; why so essential a departure from it was made, it is impossible for me to say.

To defeat the claim of the mate, some attempts have been made to show great negligence of duty in the course of the voyage; and, what is more important, that the very disaster by which all was lost, was owing to his culpable inattention in not casting the lead, when it was his watch on deck, and they were known to be on the coast. The mate assuredly does not stand before the court as a very vigilant or meritorious officer. He has no strong claims to consideration and reward out of the savings of this wreck. He has exhibited no extraordinary exertions or skill in the work of preservation, to reward which the law revokes its doom upon his contract for wages. But, on the other hand, the situation of the property did not call for extraordinary skill and daring; and he does not seem to have been wanting in any thing that was required of him by the captain, or by the emergency. The charges against him of gross neglect, antecedent to the loss of the brig, are not sufficiently sustained by the proof. I shall therefore decree that Samuel Adams be paid, out of the property attached by the process of this court, or its proceeds, the wages due to him at the time of the wreck.

Decree. That Samuel Adams, mate, recover his wages out of the property saved, or its proceeds from the 19th November, 1828, to the 4th February, 1829, the time of the loss of the vessel, deducting sixteen dollars and seventy-five cents paid to him; and that the libel of Asa Combs and the other libellants be dismissed.

[NOTE. Act June 7, 1872, (now Rev. St. § 4525,) provides that a seaman's right to wages shall not be dependent upon the earning of freight by the vessel, except that, in case of wreck or loss, proof that the seaman has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the vessel, cargo, or stores shall bar his claim.

[In The Massasoit, Case No. 9,260, Sprague, J., held that, in case of shipwreck, the seamen are entitled to wages if by their exertions remnants of the vessel to the amount of such wages are saved, although no freight is earned; also where the owner appears with another force for the salvage of the vessel, and does not desire the assistance of the seamen, although they are willing to render it. They may in such a case recover their wages in a suit in rem against the vessel.]

Case No. 66.

ADAMS v. STOREY.

[1 Paine, 79; 6 Hall, Law J. 474.]

Circuit Court, D. New York. April Term, 1817.

BANKRUPTCY—STATE AND NATIONAL LAWS—CONSTITUTIONALITY—CONSTRUCTION—LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS.

1. The act of the state of New-York of the 3d of April, 1811, is an insolvent and not a bankrupt law.

2. Distinction between insolvent and bankrupt laws.—Derived from England, where it has been long established. Those laws defined.

3. If the act in question, however, had been a bankrupt law, it would not have been void as repugnant to the constitution of the United States.

4. Presumption in favor of the constitutionality of state laws.

5. The existence of a power in the states to pass bankrupt laws, not incompatible with the powers delegated to congress for that purpose. The exercise of the powers of the latter would, however, suspend the powers of the former.

6. Importance of bankrupt laws to the larger commercial states, and probability that they intended to retain the right of making their own until congress could adopt an uniform system. Difficulties attending the adoption of such system.

7. Whether a general bankrupt law, including any classes besides traders, would be within the powers granted by the constitution to congress? Quere.

8. The constitutional provision that "no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," does not apply to insolvent laws.

9. Difficulty attending the application of this provision.

10. Rules of constitutional construction.

11. History of the evils which led to the adoption of this and the like restraining provisions. Insolvent laws were not among those evils; on the contrary, they were esteemed beneficial.

12. Inference from the uninterrupted practice of some of the states in favor of the constitutionality of such laws.

13. Presumption that contracting parties, being aware of this practice, make their contracts with reference to it.

14. The retrospective operation of insolvent laws does not bring them within the constitutional provision.

15. Chronological account of the insolvent laws of New-York. No distinction in any of them between existing and future contracts.

16. The rule lex loci contractus does not apply to cases of discharge under insolvent laws.

[Cited in Cook v. Moffat, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 316.]

17. Meaning of this rule. Mischievous tendency of some dicta and decisions arising out of it, proceeding on a mistake in applying it as well to the remedy as to the construction and validity of the contract. Remarks on Smith v. Buchanan, [1 East, 11,] and other cases

18. Expediency and justice of insolvent laws.

19. The defendant made to the plaintiffs at Boston, Massachusetts, while they all resided there, several promissory notes, and afterwards removed to New-York, where he was discharged under the insolvent law of that state, of the 3d of April, 1811, which was passed after the making of the notes. Held that his discharge was a good bar to the action.

[20. Cited in Cooper Manuf'g Co. v. Ferguson, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 741, 113 U. S. 727, to the point that contemporary interpretation of a constitutional provision by a legislative enactment is entitled to great weight.]

At law.

J. D. Sedgwick and R. Sedgwick, for plaintiffs.

T. A. Emmet and J. D. Fay, for defendant.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and VAN NESS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. This is an action brought on several promissory notes, made or endorsed by the defendant, then residing in Boston, to the plaintiffs, who were then and are yet residents of the same place. The notes are also made payable in Boston, and were dated prior to the passing of the insolvent law hereinafter mentioned. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and on the trial offered in evidence, pursuant to a notice given for that purpose, a discharge by the recorder of the city of New-York, dated the 13th of November, 1811, which was granted in virtue of an act of the legislature of the state of New-York, entitled "An act for the benefit of insolvent debtors and their creditors," passed the 3d of April of the same year. To the reading of this discharge the plaintiffs objected—but it was admitted. A verdict, however, was taken by consent, for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on a case to be made by the parties. If the discharge was improperly admitted, judgment is to be entered on the verdict as it now stands; but if the discharge shall be thought a good bar to the action, the present verdict is to be set aside, and a verdict and judgment thereon entered for the defendant. The defendant, at the time of obtaining his discharge, resided and yet resides in the city of New-York. Few questions have ever been agitated in any court of the United States, since the formation of the federal government, of more extensive consequence, or of more delicacy than those which are now to be decided. When the binding force of an act of the legislature of any state is drawn into question for its supposed repugnancy to the federal constitution, although no court can entertain any doubt of its right to pronounce it invalid, yet it is no more than becoming to proceed with caution, and with more than ordinary deliberation. Presumptions will ever exist in favour of the law, for it will not readily be supposed that any state legislature, who are as much bound by the constitution, and are under the same solemn sanctions as the judges of those courts, to regard it, have either mistaken its meaning, or knowingly transcended their own powers. If, then, by any fair and reasonable interpretation, where the case is at all doubtful, the law can be reconciled with the constitution, it ought to be done, and a contrary course pursued only, where the incompatibility is so great as to render it extremely difficult to give the latter effect, without violating some provision of the former.

The plaintiff's counsel, in support of the verdict, say, that the discharge which was given in evidence can be no bar to the action. They contend that the statute of New-York, under which it was obtained, is a bankrupt law, and as such, is void for its repugnancy to the constitution of the United States; and this position is supported by the broad assertion that every law which discharges the person and property, as well future as in possession of the debtor, is a bankrupt law. But to this definition the court does not assent; for this would be to confound at once almost all the distinctions between these laws, which have been known and recognized in England, from which country we borrow the term, from the first introduction of the system there, in the reign of Henry the Eighth, down to the present time; distinctions which must have been familiar to many of the members of the convention that made the constitution. It is not because these laws may, in some respects, produce the same effects, that they are not to be distinguished from each other. In England the bankrupt system has been confined exclusively to traders, and the creditors of traders; whereas the insolvent laws of this country embrace every class of debtors. It is of no importance whether the debt has been contracted in the way of trade or not, for a person to come within the purview of an insolvent law. So exclusively have bankrupt laws operated on traders, that it may well be doubted, whether an act of congress subjecting to such a law every description of persons within the United States, would comport with the spirit of the powers vested in them in relation to this subject.

But it is not only in the persons, who are the objects of these laws, that a difference exists, but their general and most important provisions are essentially dissimilar. Under a bankrupt law, the debtor is at once, by operation of law, as soon as he has committed an act of bankruptcy, divested of all his property, which is transferred to assignees in trust for his creditors. All dispositions by the bankrupt himself after this are void; an insolvent, on the contrary, retains the management of his own estate, however he may misbehave towards his creditors at large, and it is rarely, unless on his own application, vested in others. It is of no importance how many acts he may commit, which, under a bankrupt system, would enable his creditors to take from him the control of his property; they can seldom act upon him compulsively under the provisions of an insolvent law, if he be obstinate or dishonest, until he has given what preferences he thinks proper, and is become so poor as to be scarcely worth pursuing. Under the one system the creditors are actors, and under the other the debtor himself originates the proceedings; and if, as is sometimes the case, his creditors may do it, even then his consent is generally indispensable under the provisions of an insolvent system. Other differences, in almost every stage of proceeding, might easily be pointed out, but they are so familiar to the profession, that a bare inspection of the act under which this discharge was obtained, will leave no doubt on the mind of any one to which class it belongs. "The title proclaims it to be an act for the benefit of insolvent debtors and their creditors." The first section gives power to the insolvent himself, who is imprisoned on any civil process issuing under the authority of this state, to present his petition to a proper officer, praying that his estate may be assigned and he discharged from his debts. The residue of the act is principally made up of directions as to the proceedings which are to be observed after the presenting of such petition, until the final discharge of the debtor, all of which differ greatly from the proceedings which take place on the issuing of a commission of bankruptcy. The fourth section declares, that such "discharge shall extend to all debts due from him at the time of the assignment, or contracted for before that time, though payable afterwards." If this be not an insolvent law, the court is at a loss to say to what act this appellation can apply. The opinion which has been expressed on this point would seem to preclude the necessity of inquiring how far this law interferes with the authority given to congress to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies;" but as the view which has been taken of the act of this state may be thought incorrect, the court has no objection to consider it, as though it were a bankrupt law. The power to pass laws of this character, it is said, is exclusively vested in congress, and whether they exercise it or not, no state can have a bankrupt law of its own. As a consolidation of the different states into one national sovereignty was neither erected nor intended to be effected by the constitution, it has always been conceded that the state governments retained so much of the power, which they before had, as was not by that instrument exclusively delegated to the United States. It is now indeed one of the amendments to the constitution, that the powers not granted to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people. It is agreed that such exclusive alienation of state sovereignty can only exist in three cases; where, by its terms, it is so, or where a power is conferred on the federal government, and the states are prohibited from exercising a similar authority, or where an authority is granted to the former, to which the exercise of a like power on the part of the different states would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant. It is not pretended that the grant of the power under consideration is exclusive in its terms, or that there is an express prohibition on the states from exercising a like authority; but it is supposed that such exercise would be so totally inconsistent with the one granted to the government of the Union as to be necessarily comprehended in the third class of exclusive delegation. If it be really so, that the passing of a bankrupt law by a state, to operate, as it necessarily must, within its own limits, be absolutely incompatible with the power vested in congress, it would be conceded at once, that such an act would amount to a violation of the constitution of the United States and be void. Let us see whether the counsel have succeeded in establishing this position.

It must be allowed by all, that at the time of making the constitution, each state had a right to pass insolvent and bankrupt laws. As it was desirable, in a country so extensive as the United States, and every part of which was more or less commercial, that the laws relating to bankrupts should be uniform, so also it was an object of great importance that none of the larger commercial states should at any time be without some code on this subject. A system of the first kind, that is, one which should be uniform throughout the Union, could not well be brought about but by delegating the power of rendering it so to congress. Great difficulties however would lay in the way of a statute, whose provisions should pervade the United States; and as these must have been foreseen, the states might be willing and desirous of retaining the right of passing laws of this nature, until congress could agree on a general plan. Nor can the court perceive any contradiction, absurdity, or repugnancy in these several powers existing at the same time in the general and in the state governments; in such subordination, however, that the exercise of the authority vested in the former should, for the time, suspend all exercise of the power which resided in the latter, and operate as a repeal of any laws which might have been previously passed by the several states. It is an uniform rule which congress are to prescribe. But if they furnish none, how is it an interference for each state to legislate for itself? Neither the terms nor spirit of the instrument are thus disturbed. It seems designedly to have been left optional with the general government to exercise this power, that if the embarrassments which lay in their way were insurmountable or very great, they might omit to do it, and thus leave the states to take care of themselves. If it had been intended immediately to divest the states of all power on this subject, and to compel congress to act, the terms the terms of the article would have been much more imperative than we find them, and probably it would have been accompanied with a prohibition on the states. No writer on this part of the constitution has gone further than to say that the power of naturalization is exclusive; because, if congress have a right to ordain a general rule, the states can have no right to prescribe a distinct rule. This construction is supposed to follow, not from any inconsistency there would be in each state passing a naturalization act for itself, if congress did not bring into action the power delegated to them, but from the inconvenience to which it might subject some of the states, by imposing upon them as citizens, obnoxious foreigners, who might become naturalized in another state, without any previous residence, or without any regard to character, by the mere formality of taking an oath of allegiance.

If the argument ab inconvenienti applies to the case of naturalization, it has no bearing on that of bankruptcy; for, in this case, each state would be legislating principally for its own citizens, and other states could not be injured by any system it might adopt. But this construction, even in the case of naturalization, where the argument in favor of an exclusive power is much stronger than in that of bankruptcy, has not only been strongly controverted, but is opposed by a judicial decision entitled to no little respect. It is the case of Collet v. Collet. [Case No. 3,001,] in the circuit court of Pennsylvania, in which the three judges, one of whom had been a member of the federal convention, decided, after solemn argument, that the several states still enjoy a concurrent right with congress on this subject, "which, however, cannot, they say, be so exercised as to contravene any rule which congress in their wisdom may establish." The most strenuous advocates for the exclusive exercise of every unqualified power granted to the general government, seem not unwilling to admit the several states to a participation of such power, if it can be exerted consistently with, or without derogating from the express grant to congress. It has not been shown how a bankrupt act, passed by a particular state, can interfere with the exercise of a power residing elsewhere, to promulgate a uniform law for all the states. If similar powers had been granted to the government of the Union, respecting the descent of real estates, the recording of deeds, or the celebration of marriages, will it be said that the several states must have remained without any laws to govern the transmission of landed property, or that no deed could be acknowledged or recorded, nor a valid marriage solemnized, although congress might for years omit to prescribe rules on these subjects? The object of this grant could have been no other than to place somewhere a power to correct the mischiefs which might arise from the different states passing on the same subject, not only dissimilar laws, but such as might be unequal in their operation on the citizens of other states. This end of the grant will be sufficiently and effectually attained, if, when the evil arises, congress bring into action the authority vested in them. From them only can a uniform system emanate; but systems, greatly varying, it is true, all of which, however, may be salutary, may be established without any derogation from or interference with a right residing elsewhere, to introduce uniformity on the same subject. Nay, from these very provisions, however discordant, might be selected materials for the one which it was committed to the general government to form. Neither can the passing of such laws by the states be regarded as a resumption of power by them, in which case, it is said, they should produce an express grant of it. This argument proceeds on the presumption of a previous relinquishment on the part of the states of all right to interfere in this matter, and is thus taking for granted what is the whole question in controversy; for, unless such transfer has been made, which is not admitted, no reassignment of it by the general government can be necessary.

No court of the United States will be suspected of feeling any disposition to countenance encroachments by the state legislature on the legitimate authority of the government of the Union; but in cases of doubt, and where the limits of separation are not very distinctly marked, and especially where the powers exercised leave in full force and unimpaired those given to the general government, the tranquillity and harmony of the Union will be better preserved by allowing to the states a reasonable share of legislation on the subject in dispute, than by strenuously insisting on a total exclusion. Congress themselves must have entertained an opinion, that the different states have this right in the present case; for on no other principle can we account for their leaving the United States so long without a uniform system of bankruptcy. Great and pressing as the call for such a system has been, the obstacles in the way of one that shall be uniform, and in that shape agreeable to all the states, continue to be so numerous, that but little hope is now indulged that any will be soon adopted; but great and serious as these difficulties may be, it would almost be the duty of congress to disregard them, if there existed no where else a power to correct the mischiefs which must necessarily be felt in many of the states from the non-user of this authority. The inference which has been drawn at the bar from this silence or inaction of congress, does not appear correct. It is considered as equivalent to an expression on their part of their sense against the wisdom and policy of all bankrupt laws, and that none ought to exist any where. Keeping in view the power which congress have, on this subject, it is more natural to interpret such silence into a declaration of their opinion of the inexpediency at present of any uniform system, and that the several states still retain the power which has been contended for, and can therefore take care of themselves. This would not be so great an imputation on their wisdom, as to suppose they can entertain an opinion in opposition to the sense of the whole world, that in a commercial state, such laws are mischievous or unnecessary. The opinion of the court, therefore, is, that this law, if a bankrupt law, would not on that account be void.

Another constitutional objection is made to the defense which is set up in this cause. The law under which this discharge was obtained, having passed subsequent to the date of the notes on which the action is brought, is supposed to "impair the obligation of contracts," and therefore to be void, either in the whole, or so far as it may extend to debts incurred previous to the passage of it.

There is not, perhaps, in the constitution any article of more ambiguous import, or which has occasioned, and will continue to occasion, more discussion and disagreement, than the one under which the present difficulty arises, or the application of which to the cases which occur, will be attended with more perplexity and embarrassment. Laws may be passed which so palpably trespass on this article as to leave no doubt on the mind of any man; others again will be of so questionable a character as to render it not very easy to form a satisfactory opinion concerning them. All the other restraints on the separate members of the confederacy, contained in this section of the constitution are conceived in terms so clear and intelligible, that rarely will any hesitation exist as to what will amount to violations of them; but to decide whether a law impairs the obligation of a contract, will generally be a task of some intricacy, and it will not be surprising if, in the discharge of it, great diversity of opinion should arise. This has been treated as a very plain case by both parties. By the plaintiffs we are told that it is the clearest case of a law impairing the obligation of contracts that can well be imagined; while the defendant contends that it is quite as certain that insolvent laws were never intended to be embraced by this provision of the constitution. The latter is the opinion of the court; but instead of regarding it, with the defendant's counsel, as a question of little or no difficulty, the court has not come to this conclusion, but after much hesitation, owing not only to its intrinsic difficulty, but because it is well known that the most respectable opinions to the contrary have been expressed elsewhere. The court will proceed to assign its reasons for the judgment which it has formed.

To arrive at the true meaning of any article of doubtful import in the constitution, a better mode cannot be adopted than the course which is generally pursued for the interpretation and understanding of ordinary remedial statutes: that is, to recur to the situation and history of the country at the time; to its contemporaneous exposition, if it has received any; and to the general understanding of the community, especially if such understanding shall have been long acquiesced in by all the states and all the courts of the Union. Keeping in view these rules, let us inquire what were the kind of laws to which this prohibition was principally designed to extend. There can be no doubt that by it was intended to be corrected some, if not all, of the evils which had crept into the system of legislation of many of the states, and had excited a considerable alarm for the security of private rights. In many parts of the Union all confidence in public faith was extinguished. This had been occasioned by frequent interferences on the part of some of the legislatures in matters which were not believed to fall within their ordinary and legitimate sphere of action. By recurring to the history of the times, and the reasons assigned by the friends of the constitution for the insertion of this article, much useful information will be obtained, and we shall be at no loss to discover to what species of laws it was then thought that the interdiction was principally supposed to extend.

During a long and arduous struggle for independence, much individual misery and distress were unavoidably produced. Driven from their homes, and cut off in many cases, from their ordinary pursuits, the resources of many were either exhausted, or so much impaired, as to induce the legislature, on various occasions, to listen to the pressing calls which were made upon them to devise some mode for their relief. Various expedients were accordingly resorted to, and the practice of interfering between creditor and debtor became so very extensive and so inconsiderate, as in many instances to place the former entirely at the mercy of the latter, and that too under laws which were apparently introduced with no other view than that of affording to the debtor a temporary relief from the pressure occasioned by the then situation of the country. Bills of credit, and paper money were issued, and by legislative sanction were substituted for gold and silver in the discharge of debts. Creditors in some places, were liable, without any adverse proceeding on their part, to be cited by their debtors, and to have the sums due to them tendered in a currency whose depreciation at the time produced the most glaring injustice. On their refusal to submit to this mockery of justice, the public securities, which had been thus offered, might be deposited with some public officer, and the creditor was for ever barred from any recovery. In other cases payments were authorized to be made by instalments. In some states the interest which had accrued during the war, or a part of it, was remitted, while elsewhere not only a paper currency of no value, but almost every species of property, was made a legal tender, and no stipulation however solemn, to pay in the precious metals, afforded any security to the creditor. The courts of justice in many of the states had been closed altogether, and the creditor thus withheld, at least for a time, from every appeal to the laws of his country, while his debtor might be squandering the property out of which his demand ought to have been satisfied. Geographical limits had also been resorted to, for the purpose of introducing the most odious discriminations between creditors themselves. For those who resided within the British lines, and those who were without those precincts, distinct remedies were prescribed, and the scales of justice so unequally graduated, that while the latter might recover the whole of their demands, the former, if they sued, were compelled to receive public certificates of one description or other, of so little value, as scarcely to indemnify them for the costs of suit which they were obliged to pay. Very great liberties had also been taken with British creditors, many of whom complained, and too justly, of the impediments which continued to be thrown in their way, even after the return of peace. These frequent interpositions in private concerns, during a period of great public and private suffering, and for many of which the condition of the country and the great object at stake, might seem to offer some apology, became so common, so intolerable, and so inveterate, in many places, that it became no easy matter, even after the restoration of peace, and the acquisition of our independence, to lay them aside. There will, therefore, be found in the statute books of several of the states, after the termination of the war, many provisions of the same meddling and obnoxious character, which either changed the nature of contracts, or suspended the payment of them, or authorized it in a way contrary to the plain engagement and meaning of the parties.

By laws of this description, which had become too dangerous and oppressive to be any longer borne, very extensive and great uneasiness was produced, and against them was raised a corresponding and almost universal expression of indignation and regret. Accordingly, to all the objections made against the prohibition, on the part of the states, to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts, we find the friends of the constitution every where, and again and again, urging the necessity of it, in order to put an end to the evils which had flown from acts of the kind which have been mentioned, and which had, after the Revolution, been extended by designing and influential men, to many other cases, so as to increase, instead of diminishing, the alarm which had been excited. To such acts we find them constantly ascribing the decay of commerce, the ruin of public credit, and the almost entire extinction of confidence between individuals, and pressing with vehemence the adoption of this article as one of vital importance, and as the only guard and preventive against the promulgation by future legislatures of similar acts in derogation of private rights, however great the emergency might be deemed. But on no one occasion do we hear of any complaints against the power of passing insolvent laws. This practice had not arisen out of the calamities of war; it was brought with the first American colonists from the mother country; it was adopted, in one form or other, by all the British colonies in North America, without an exception that has been discovered as to any one which now composes a part of the United States. It must have originated, wherever we find the practice of it, and perhaps it is not hazarding too much to say, that it is universal, not only from a conviction that the encouragement of trade required it, and so are the recitals to many of the acts; but from those indelible principles which are implanted in the breast of every man, and which proclaim, in a language not to be misunderstood, that in every country where imprisonment for debt is allowed, there must and ought to reside a power somewhere of compelling creditors to abandon their hold of the body of a debtor, who shall fairly, and under such restrictions as the law may provide, make a complete surrender of his property, to be divided amongst those whose debts some unexpected turn of fortune has rendered him unable to pay. In such cases, his future acquisitions, although here there may exist some diversity of opinion, should also be his own, or he will be restored to his freedom and family, not only without property, but without credit, and in many cases with such a heavy load of unextinguished debt, and so many liens on his future acquisitions as must stifle every exertion to make any. His freedom, in such cases, will be a mockery, nor will such a state of servitude to his creditors often prove of any service to them; for, sinking under a burden from which he sees no prospect of relieving himself, his ambition and efforts will be limited to the gaining of a bare maintenance for himself and family, knowing that neither he nor they can ever be benefitted by any surplus.

But whatever considerations may have first called into practice a power of this kind, it is sufficient for our present purpose, that we find it in use in perhaps every state of the Union, under some modification or other at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and that the laws passed on this subject very generally, if not universally, provided not only for future cases of insolvency, but for those which existed at the time. If this be so, and that it was so to a very great extent is not denied, it must have been known to the friends of the constitution, who exerted themselves in favour of its adoption; and yet no arguments drawn from that source are to be found in the debates of any of the conventions, in favour of the prohibition. Nor is it recollected, that those who were hostile to its adoption, ever objected to this feature of it, because of its liability to such construction; and yet such objections would have been heard from more quarters than one. If it had then been thought susceptible of the interpretation which the court is now expected to apply to it. It may also be observed, that if it had been thought necessary at that time of day to tie up the hands of future legislators in relation to this matter, it would have been more natural to have committed to congress a power of establishing a uniform system of insolvency as well as of bankruptcy, or to have transferred to the general government an unqualified and express power in the premises; for it cannot be credited that a people who had been so long accustomed to laws of this kind, would have consented to deprive the state legislatures of the power of passing them, without at the same time delegating to that of the Union some control over the same subject. Dissatisfaction may have existed and been expressed at the abuses which were committed under the sanction of such laws, for not more effectually protecting creditors against the frauds of their debtors, and such dissatisfaction is often heard at the present day; but never was the right or propriety of an interference in this way called in question.

To the practice of the states antecedent to and at the epoch of the adoption of the constitution, and to the silence on this head of those whose attention was directly called to this article, may be added the uninterrupted and undisputed usage of all or most of the states from that day down to the present time. Yet after the lapse of near thirty years, during which time scarcely a chasm or intermission is to be discovered in the usage of the state where the court is now holding, it is called upon to pronounce all its insolvent laws, so far at least as they operate on past debts, and all discharges under them of such debts, as repugnant to the constitution, and therefore void. Without adverting to the serious consequences of such a decision, with which the court has nothing to do, how, it may be asked, is the uniform practice which has been mentioned to be accounted for, but from a general and universal understanding that such practice was no departure from any of the obligations which one state had contracted with the others? Can we believe, that before time was allowed to organize the general government, and while the instrument of its formation was undergoing the examination and criticism of able and industrious adversaries, any state could have passed laws of this character, not only without animadversion, but execute them without any objection from a numerous class of citizens who are in general not the most inattentive to, or ignorant of, their rights? Would not a clamour on the part of creditors have been heard from one extremity of the Union to the other, against such an usurpation of power, if it had been viewed in that light? And if the legislatures of the several states could not have been brought back to a sense of duty by remonstrances against the exercise of such a right, would not applications have been made to the courts of justice, to arrest by their decisions the progress of such gross and frequent violations of the constitution?

But not only have these laws been passed without a constitutional difficulty being ever suggested by any member of the legislature, at the time, but frequently as they must have been, brought to the notice of the courts of the different states, and sometimes of the federal judiciary. It is not until very recently that the present objection has been heard of. Congress too, in the only bankrupt law which they ever passed, introduced a provision, that it should not "repeal or annul the laws of any state, then in force, or which might thereafter be enacted for the relief of insolvent debtors;" many, if not all of which then in force, will, on examination, be found to be retrospective. Either then, these laws are not within the prohibition, or if they are, and the terms of it are so obscure as to have hitherto eluded the research of so many who must have had an interest in its discovery, it is the very case in which a court ought to rely for its true sense on a general practice which has been so long submitted to.

It has been said that a practical construction is of no importance when a question arises on public acts of so important and solemn a nature as a written compact between several independent states. The instrument, it is said, should speak for itself. But if there be anything in this remark, a decision of the supreme court of the United States, on the effect of a practice in fixing the meaning of the constitution, would not permit the court to listen to it. In the case referred to, a usage of only ten or twelve years, and which had once been interrupted by an act of congress, was deemed to settle a question, in which was involved the very independence of an important and co-ordinate member of the federal government, and that too in opposition to what, many will think, as probably did the judges themselves who decided it, the plain and obvious letter and spirit of the constitution. But, aside from this contemporaneous and universal expression of public and private sentiment on this subject, the court is not very certain that it would have regarded a law of this nature, if the question were of earlier date, as "impairing the obligation of contracts." This objection goes only to such of these laws as affect antecedent contracts. It may very safely be assumed, that most, if not all of the insolvent laws of this country, fall within this description, and an interposition by the legislature in this way seems absolutely necessary, if not inevitable, wherever imprisonment for debt is allowed. Such laws cannot therefore be regarded as contrary to the first principles of the social compact, or opposed to those sound and wholesome rules of legislation which were intended to be preserved pure and inviolate by those who made the constitution. A power to pass such laws necessarily results from the antecedent state of things, and from the existence of a system, which, if left to itself, without occasional controls on the part of the legislature, would produce permanent individual distress and ruin, and to an extent, highly injurious, not only to the state itself, but to the very parties, who might, in the moment of passion or disappointment, resort to it as a means of coercion. This attribute of sovereignty, for as such it is regarded by the court, it was better that the states should retain, than to have relinquished it to the federal government. By the former it would be exercised within a less extended sphere, and of course with not so much danger of injury to the parties concerned, as if the same duty had been performed by the congress of the United States. If then the passing of laws affecting in this way, past as well as future debts, has been in use within this state ever since its independence, and for many years while a colony, and if such practice has not only been acquiesced in, but was absolutely necessary, may it not be fairly presumed that every contract within this state, or to be enforced here, is made under a full knowledge of such practice, which must now be deemed a perfect right; and that this being known and understood by both parties at the time, the creditor has no right to complain if his debtor shall one day be liberated by virtue of an insolvent law which may be in force at the time of the contract, or which may be afterwards passed; not from the obligation or payment of the debt; but from personal confinement, on condition of making payment as far as he is able?

The court has proceeded on a belief, that most, if not all, of the states had been in the habit of extending their insolvent laws to all debts without any regard to the time of contracting them. Time has not been afforded during a very busy term to examine the statutes of the different states, even if they had been within reach of the court, to see if there were any exceptions. There may be some difference in these laws, as to the mode of proceeding, and in the effect of a discharge obtained under them. In some cases, the debtor is alone the actor in obtaining it; in others, a part of his creditors unite with him; by some again the person only is exonerated, either from all his creditors, or from those who have sued him. By others, all future acquisitions as well as the body are placed out of the reach of the creditors; but the principle on which they proceed is the same in all, that is, a right in the legislature to relieve insolvent debtors from imprisonment by some general law. The degree of interference is of no importance as it affects this question. Every kind of interference, however limited in degree, must, on the principle on which the plaintiffs rely, be a violation of the constitution. If these laws had been of the odious character which is now attached to them, is it not probable that at least some one state would have checked the further enacting of them by an article in the bill of rights prefixed to its constitution? No such limitation however is to be found, nor any expression bearing on the subject.

Referring those who may wish to pursue the inquiry for the laws of the other states on this subject to their several statute books, the court will only notice some of those which have been passed by the colony and by the state of New-York. In 1755 a general act for the relief of insolvent debtors was passed. In May, 1761, another passed requiring the assent of three-fourths of the creditors in value, which expired in 1770. From that time until 1784 no general system was in force, but many acts were occasionally passed for the relief of individuals. In 1784 a general system was again adopted similar to the one which had expired in 1770. In 1788, another general insolvent law passed. This was revived in 1801. In April, 1811, the law passed, under which the present discharge alone to petition, without the concurrence of any creditor. In 1812, the last law was repealed, and the consent of three-fourths of the creditors again required. In 1813, the system now in force was adopted which requires the co-operation of two-thirds, instead of three-fourths, of the creditors. By not one of these laws are debts previously contracted, excepted from its operation. Let it also be remembered, that frequently as the attention of the council of revision of this state, composed of the governor, chancellor, and judges of the supreme court, has been called to this subject, this objection has never occurred to them, watchful and able as they ever have been to discover and check every aberration in the legislature from a correct and constitutional course of duty.

But if it be on account of their relation back, that insolvent laws are regarded as impairing the obligation of contracts, bankrupt laws are liable to the same objection; and such was the character of the only one which congress ever passed. Now, although there be no constitutional restraint in terms, on that body, from passing laws interfering with private contracts, it is not to be presumed they would, knowingly, give their sanction to any act of this kind. Nor, even in passing a bankrupt law, would they have done it in a form liable to so serious an imputation, if they had believed they were impairing the obligation of contracts, especially as that power might have been exercised free from every objection of this nature. This is some proof that laws of this description are not regarded by congress as any violation of contracts, merely on account of their retrospective influence.—The contract in truth remains in full force, while payment thereof by the policy and humanity of most civilized nations must, in case of misfortune, be sought for out of the estate of the debtor, who, as well as his future property, is, in general, released.

After all that has been said, the court considers this question as one of considerable difficulty, and regrets that it has not yet received a decision at Washington, which would produce uniformity of judgment; at least in the courts of the United States.

But if these constitutional objections are removed, it is alleged, that the contract being made and being payable in Boston, cannot be affected by any discharge obtained under the laws of the state of New-York. Under this head of argument the court has been reminded of a rule, which, it is presumed, when properly understood, will be acknowledged by every one; that is, that the lex loci contractus must be resorted to, in order to ascertain the meaning of every agreement made abroad. This does not proceed from mere comity or courtesy towards other nations, but from the immutable principles of justice, which would be violated by applying to a foreign contract, when deciding on its obligation and effect, any other law than that of the place where it was made—for how palpably unjust would it be for this court to pronounce void, a bond executed at Canton and payable there, because by it should be reserved a greater interest, which might be lawful there, than seven per cent. per annum, which would render it usurious in this state? This is the meaning of the rule, and it is a salutary and just one. But out of it have arisen some dicta, which are ripening very fast into decisions of the most mischievous tendency, and between which and the rule itself it is difficult to perceive any connection. It has been said that, as the nature and validity of a contract must be settled by the law of the place where it was made, so, also, it cannot be affected by any discharge of the debtor under the bankrupt or insolvent laws of the place where he resides, or of the country to which he belongs; or in other words, that a contract, made in a foreign state, and with a view to its code, can only be discharged pursuant to, that is, as the rule is now applied, under the bankrupt laws of such state.—Accordingly, suits have recently been maintained against bankrupts and insolvents, whenever they have been arrested by process out of the court of any other state than the one in which they became so. Thus a citizen of Pennsylvania has not been permitted to sue in New-York a debtor who may reside, and have been liberated under a law of the latter state; but if he can be found in Massachusetts, or elsewhere, his certificate, it is said, will be of no avail, provided the contract were made in Philadelphia, or elsewhere in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania. This is not exactly the case here, but as these decisions are supposed to have a considerable bearing on it, the court will be expected to express an opinion on them. It has no hesitation in saying, that it considers them as forming part of a class of cases, which, it will one day be lamented should ever have found their way into the commercial code of this country. They appear to proceed on a misapprehension of the rights of independent nations; but principally on a mistake in applying the lex loci contractus, as well to the remedy, as to the construction and validity of the agreement, contrary to all the adjudged cases on this head. They maintain that a debtor can never, under any circumstances, be discharged against the will of his foreign creditors, if his contracts with them be made where they reside, and with a view to the laws of their country, by any proceedings under the insolvent laws of the state of which the debtor is a member, but only by a certificate obtained pursuant to the bankrupt system, if any such there be, of the several countries in which his creditors may happen to reside. If the rule be not laid down precisely in these terms, such are its import and effect, and such, or something like it, is the practice which is very fast introducing itself, under the sanction of it. If this be so, how is an American merchant, who may be indebted in several countries abroad, in case of misfortune, ever to get disentangled from his debts? No proceedings under the bankrupt laws of the United States, if there be any, nor in conformity with the insolvent provisions of his own state, can do him any good. If he remains in his own country, trusting to the validity of such proceedings, perpetual imprisonment must be his doom, if his foreign creditors shall be as unrelenting as this rule is well calculated to render them; for no power there, it is said, can relieve him against this class of demands, but upon full payment of them, without a violation of the contract made abroad, or a disregard of the comity, due from one nation to another. According to this doctrine, he has no alternative left, but that of going to the different countries where he may be indebted, and there submitting to the proceedings established for the relief of unfortunate traders. And yet it is not perceived how his foreign creditors will be gainers by exposing him to, so great a hardship; for if he shall commence his career of insolvency, as he naturally will do, in his own state, the assignment of his estate made there, will leave nothing for the creditors abroad, it being admitted, that by it the whole of his property, wherever it may be, will pass. In like manner, a debtor who shall fail, and have creditors of this description in different parts of the Union, will have to make a tour of the United States before he can commence business again, in order to seek relief under the insolvent system of each state. It is not more reasonable to suppose, as the case most undoubtedly is, that every contract, wherever made, must proceed on an expectation, that the parties shall perform it according to the terms, if they are able, but if there shall be an inability in either to fulfil his part of the agreement, that then the other party shall be placed on as good, but not on a better footing, as to any remedy which he may seek for its breach or non-performance, as those who may reside in the country of the debtor? This, in case of insolvency, I should regard as a performance of the contract, secundum legem loci contractus, unless it were shown, that some different stipulation in the event of insolvency had been entered into, which is not pretended, and probably never did form a part of any contract, where no specific security was taken; and if it did, would hardly be enforced to the prejudice of other creditors.

If a remedy against the person of an insolvent debtor be allowed to his creditors abroad, which is denied to a domestic creditor, what is it but to give the former a preference over the latter, which neither justice will sanction, nor the lex loci in any case expect? On this subject I had an opportunity of expressing an opinion many years ago, in one of the cases which has now been cited. To that opinion I adhere, and shall adhere until a different rule shall be presented by a tribunal which has a right to control and direct the judgment of this court. I then stated, that a surrender of all the bankrupt's effects, under the laws of the state in which he permanently resided, ought to operate as a discharge from his creditors in every part of the world; and will now add, without any regard to the court or country in which the action against him may be prosecuting. Whatever fault may be found with this opinion, I am mistaken if it will not be found to conform with the sentiments and practice of commercial men, and to be for the benefit of trade, that it should be so. Merchants generally believe, that if their debtors abroad, no matter how the debt was contracted, or when payable, be regularly discharged by the bankrupt, or any other law of the state in which they reside, and his estate be divided among all his creditors, they are exonerated every where. The rule so often cited from Huberus and Casaregis, has no application to such a case. When the latter speaks of contracts territorial and extraterritorial, it is most manifest that he means nothing more, than that a contract made in one country is not to be construed by the laws of another. Now the difficulty is, to find out what the lex loci contractus has to do with the case of a future insolvency, or how the law of one country can differ from that of another in this respect. It is presumed to be law every where, that a man is to pay according to his contract; but if he be unable to pay any where, what then has the lex loci to do with the case? Is it part of that law, or is it any part of the contract, express or implied, that no government upon earth shall be allowed to interfere for his protection in case of misfortune and insolvency; or if it does, that such protection shall not extend beyond the limits of the state in which he lives, and not even there, as is contended in this case? Is it not for the advantage of foreign creditors, and will it not comport better with the interest of all parties, that when an insolvency occurs, they shall be placed on an equal footing with domestic creditors? It may be ruinous to the debtor, but of what advantage will it be to his absent creditor, to have him consigned to a prison during life, without any right to a participation on his part, in the property in the hand of assignees; for it has not yet been pretended, although this might as well be proved by the lex loci, that the creditor abroad has a right to a dividend of his estate, and to the body of the debtor in the bargain. If care be not taken, the great solicitude which has recently been discovered for creditors in other countries, will produce decisions, if such have not already been made, which, in case of bankruptcy, will do them more harm than good. The truth is, all that amity, good faith, the contract of the parties, and the lex loci, if it has anything to do with the question can require, is, that their interests and rights shall not be postponed, or in other words, that they shall be as well taken care of as those of other creditors. Yet the court of king's bench, in Smith v. Buchanan, [1 East, 11,] went on the sole ground of the lex loci, when it decreed on the inefficacy of a discharge in Maryland against the claim of a British creditor. "It is impossible," says Lord Kenyon, "that a contract made in one country is to be governed by the laws of another." It is also remarked in this case, that it might as well be contended, that if the state of Maryland had enacted that no debts due from its own subjects, to the subjects of England, should be paid, the English creditor would be bound by it. A law of this kind would not have been enforced by any court of this country; but between the iniquity and injustice of such a statute, and one which placed the British on a level with the American creditor, this court perceives no resemblance; while the one is calculated to excite the just indignation of any man, the other is well entitled to universal approbation. If, in all its provisions, it did not resemble the bankrupt laws of England, its effect in producing an equal division of the insolvent's estate was the same. It ought not to pass unnoticed that at the very moment of rendering this judgment, the court admits that an assignment under the act of Maryland, would vest the property of the bankrupt, wherever it might be, in his assignees. If so, it would seem to follow, that the debtor himself ought to be discharged; for, if the law takes from him, and against his consent, his property every where, and secures it even from the pursuit of a foreign creditor, why should it not be allowed to offer a protection equally extensive to his person? Or, why should he be placed in the very awkward situation of being liable to imprisonment abroad, when, in that very country, he may have more than property enough to satisfy the demands of his foreign creditor, but which has been placed out of his reach by an assignment previously made under the laws of his own state? And it may here be remarked, that the universal effect which is given to such assignments is not among the least of the advantages which foreign creditors derive from the bankrupt or insolvent laws of the country where their debtors reside. It prevents the creditors near him, and who will be first apprized of his misfortunes, and of the nature and situation of his property, from laying attachments on many parts of it, to the prejudice of those at a distance. This case will be dismissed with only one other observation. The merchants of the United States have never supposed that they can proceed in their own courts against British bankrupts, if found here, merely because the debt may have been contracted and payable on this side of the Atlantic; they receive and are satisfied with the dividend made in England; but if they shall hereafter make the attempt and succeed, it is to be hoped that the court which shall sustain so novel a pretension, will have more courtesy than to compare the bankrupt laws of England, which are perhaps as perfect as such a system can well be, with an act of parliament, which should prohibit to American citizens the recovery of their just demands against British subjects. In the case of Van Raugh v. Van Arsdain, [3 Caines, 154,] in the supreme court of this state, we are only told that the question had been decided ten years before, but what the case referred to was, or on what ground the decision was placed, does not appear. In Smith v. Smith, [2 Johns. 235,] however, the court refers to the decision in 1 East, and assigns the same reason that is there given, and which has already been remarked on.

But this court is desired and expected to advance one step beyond all the decisions which have yet been made on this subject. Hitherto, an unfortunate debtor, even if he had heard of the few cases which have been mentioned, might think himself safe if he would confine himself within the limits of his own state. He might confidently expect protection against the pursuit of every creditor without regard to his place of residence, or to the spot where the contract was to be performed. But even this security from imprisonment is now desired to be withdrawn from him, and this course of conduct is pressed on the court, not on the footing of a series of adjudged cases from which there might be no escape; for none such are produced; not because it will accord with the general sense of the commercial world; for that, it is believed is directly opposed to it. Not because of any odious discriminations which are found in the insolvent laws of this state, between territorial, or extra-territorial creditors; for they are placed on a perfect equality. Not because the interests of commerce will be advanced by it; for in such a state of things, none but men of the most enterprising character will dare to engage in it. Nor yet because other countries practise on this rule; for nothing resembling it is pretended to be in use in any other part of the globe. Nor is it to be believed that the court of King's bench itself, notwithstanding the solitary case which has been produced as to a discharge abroad, would disregard a plea of bankruptcy by a British debtor, against the claim of any foreign creditor, whatever might be the place of contract or of payment.

The court having already expressed its opinion on the inapplicability of the lex loci contractus to all cases of this kind, will only add, that this rule has performed its office, when a construction is given to the contract according to such law; but in case of inability to pay, a new state of things occurs, the only proper rule to govern which is, that care be taken to enforce an equal and fair distribution of an estate, under the laws of the country in which the debtor has his residence.

Insolvent laws have been harshly and not very correctly compared by the plaintiff's counsel, to laws authorizing the payment of a debt with one cent in the dollar, and in a way and at a time different from the agreement of the parties. They do no such thing; they afford a sanction to no injustice; they violate no law human or divine; they leave the obligation of parties in full force; they create no inability, nor interfere between one who is able to pay, and his creditors; but when such inability intervenes, they step in and take care, or at least such is their object, that a complete surrender of the debtor's estate shall be made for the benefit of all his creditors; and when this is done, they compel the latter to observe towards him that mercy and forbearance which, in similar circumstances, they would wish and expect to have extended to themselves.

It seemed to be admitted on the argument, that if foreign creditors had been named in this act, they would have been barred. The court thinks them as much bound by the general and comprehensive terms of this act, as if they had been specially designated. Enough has already been done in their favor, without clothing them with a prerogative not yet heard of; that of being exempt from every law, unless particularly named. Nor is this the ground on which these decisions go. It is, that a state has no right to pass laws to discharge its insolvent subjects from debts due abroad. But if the court has erred in the principles which it has adopted, or in the application of them to foreign creditors in general, the plaintiffs have no right to complain; for when a citizen of Massachusetts, where they reside, is imprisoned, at the suit of a citizen of this or any other state, he can, under the laws of that commonwealth, obtain his discharge, as to his person at least, without the creditor's consent; and such discharge is regarded, as it ought to be, as binding on all the courts of that state.

Sitting, therefore, in the state which passed the insolvent act in question, and to which no constitutional objection appears, this court is not sensible that it departs from a single adjudged case in England, or in this state, when it decides on the universal validity of a discharge obtained under it.

Upon the whole, this court is of opinion, that the act of the 3d of April, 1811, is an insolvent, and not a bankrupt law—that, if it be of the latter description, the several states have a right to pass bankrupt laws for themselves, until congress shall establish a uniform system on the subject—that an insolvent act extending to past, as well as future debts, is not a law "impairing the obligation of contracts," within the meaning of the constitution—and that a federal court, sitting within this state, is bound to support a discharge under such law, against the claim of a foreign creditor, although the debt due to him may have been contracted (and made payable at the place of residence.)

The present verdict must, therefore, be set aside, and a verdict and judgment entered for the defendant.

NOTE, [from original report.] Since the question of the constitutionality of the state insolvent laws has been raised, the supreme court of the U. S. has settled the following principles, which are, of course, the law of the land. In Sturges v. Crowninshield, which was decided at the February term, 1819, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 122, the court held, that until the power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies be exercised by congress, the states are not forbidden to pass a bankrupt law, provided it contains no principle which violates the 10th section of the first article of the constitution of the United States—That insolvent laws which discharge the person of the debtor, but leave his obligation to pay in full force, are not repugnant to the 10th section—And that a discharge of a debtor under the act of the state of New-York, of the 3d of April, 1811, from a contract made in New-York before the passage of the law, the creditor then residing in Massachusetts, and not having proceeded to execution against the body of his debtor in New-York, was void by the 10th section. In M'Millan v. M'Neill, Id. 209, the debt was contracted in 1813, in South Carolina, the debtor and creditor both residing there, and the discharge was obtained in Louisiana, whither the debtor had removed, in 1815, under a law of the state, passed in 1808. The court held, that "this case was not distinguishable from that of Sturges v. Crowninshield; and that the circumstance of the state law, under which the debt was attempted to be discharged, having been passed before the debt was contracted, made no difference in the application of the principle." It will be observed, that the court do not notice the circumstance that the contract was made in South Carolina, where the parties then resided. In Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Pennsylvania v. Smith, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 131, the court held, that a discharge obtained in Pennsylvania in September, 1812, under an act of that state, passed the 13th of March of the same year, from a contract made in Pennsylvania in 1811, the contracting parties at all those times being residents of that state, was void. The case of a discharge under the law of a state, where the contract was made within the state, between residents of the state, and after the passage of the law, has not yet been decided. Such a case is, however, pending, and has been argued, and is held under advisement and for a further argument at the next term.

ADAMS v. WEST ROXBURY.

[1 Hask. 576.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1875.

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

1. A master failing to use due care and prudence, either in furnishing his servant a suitable kind or quality of explosive for blasting, is guilty of negligence.

2. In determining such care and prudence, it may be considered how far such kind of explosives was in general use and ordinarily considered safe and proper for the purpose, and how far the particular brand or manufacture of the explosives furnished was generally considered a safe article by those using it.

3. It would be want of care and prudence for the master to furnish an explosive of inferior quality on account of its cheapness, if such article from its inferior quality is more dangerous to use than an explosive of good quality. The more dangerous the instrument, the more care is required in providing it.

4. A master, by furnishing an explosive known to him to be dangerous and unsafe for the use to which it is to be put, is guilty of negligence.

5. A superintendent of the streets of a city or town, having authority to employ servants for the municipality to work upon the roads under his direction, bears the relation of vice principal to such servants, and negligence upon his part becomes the negligence of his principal.

6. A servant cannot recover for injuries sustained in the employment of his master, unless they were occasioned by the negligence or want of due and proper care and prudence of the latter.

At law. Action of tort, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in the service of the defendant town, from the unaccountable discharge of an explosive furnished for use in blasting. The case was tried upon the general issue and the defendant had a verdict in its favor, whereupon the plaintiff moved for a new trial for misdirection of the court. [Motion overruled.]

Benj. F. Butler, for plaintiff.

R. M. Morse, Jr., for defendant.

FOX, District Judge. The plaintiff claims to recover damages in this action for personal injuries of a very serious nature, sustained by him from an explosion of certain electrical exploders which had been obtained by the defendant's agents, to be used in blasting with dualin. There is but little controversy as to the material facts. Clement Herschell was one of the superintendents of streets in West Roxbury, in the year 1873, and had the charge of the work of preparing stone to be used in repairing roads. In behalf of the town, he employed in this business various persons, and among others the plaintiff, an engineer, to run the engine to drive the machinery for crushing the stone, which was first blasted from the ledge. On the afternoon of February 3, Herschell directed the foreman to procure at Neponset some dualin, together with fifty exploders to be used in the blasting. They were obtained by him and brought to the place in a paper box that evening, and put in a chest with the dualin; there being some powder in the chest, the plaintiff put the box which contained the exploders on a shelf in the engine room. They remained there until the next morning, when they were examined by the foreman, and finding that the wires were shorter than he wanted, he, concluding to return them, put them back into the paper box, and while tying the string around it, holding the box between his knees, an explosion occurred, and thereby the plaintiff, who was standing in front of the foreman, was injured. The sight of one of his eyes is nearly destroyed, and he also sustained other damages, and for these injuries, this action was brought, and was tried before me at the last fall term; a verdict was rendered for the defendant, which the plaintiff now moves may be set aside, for alleged erroneous rulings and instructions to the jury.

The principal question in the cause is, what obligations and liabilities did the defendants assume towards the plaintiff in providing materials for the business, he being in their employment at the time as an engineer in charge of the engine, which drove the machinery for crushing the stone after it was blasted from the ledge? The instructions given to the jury declared that it was a matter of care and prudence in providing safe and proper materials, and whether there was any negligence in that behalf, and that the defendants were not to be held responsible for absolute certainty as to their safety. The language of the instructions is as follows: "The defendants were bound to use reasonable care and precaution to procure safe and proper material for the use of their servants, and if from want of such care and precaution, the plaintiff has sustained injury, the defendants are accountable; but if they exercised such care in the selection and procurement of material, they do not become insurers of the safety of their servants from injury in using such material. In determining the question of due care, the jury will first determine, whether, under the circumstances, it was proper care and precaution to use electrical exploders in blasting at the time and place contemplated. This involves the propriety of the use of the article for blasting. In deciding upon this point the jury will determine to what extent these exploders had come into general use at that time, and how far by the persons engaged in the business of blasting they were ordinarily considered a safe and proper article to be used for this purpose. Was it negligence and want of due care to use electrical exploders in blasting, or were they proper, fit articles to be so employed? If the jury find that they were generally and ordinarily considered a safe and proper article to be used in blasting, and that there was no negligence or want of due care on the part of the city in their use, then the city was bound to take due care to obtain that kind of exploders which were safe and properly made, and they would have no right to purchase those which were more dangerous and liable to explode, because they could obtain them somewhat cheaper. The more dangerous the instrument employed, the more care should be taken to obtain as safe an article as possible properly manufactured. The jury therefore will determine whether these exploders, Brown's, were, by the persons accustomed to use exploders and by those engaged in blasting, generally deemed to be a good, safe article of the kind used and manufactured, and as safe as any which could with care be obtained in the market. The jury will also determine what Herschell's opinion and knowledge was of the nature and character of these exploders, because if they should find that he deemed them unsafe and improper to be used, then it would be negligence and want of due care on his part to provide such material for their use. The negligence of Herschell in this respect, would be the negligence of the town, for which it would be chargeable." "If the jury find that the defendants were justified in obtaining for the use of their workmen Brown's exploders, and that those procured were in all respects apparently safe and properly manufactured, but that by reason of some secret unknown defect in one or more of them, which was not discoverable by the most careful examination, they exploded without any known cause, the defendant would not be accountable for the damage occasioned by said explosion. It would be as between these parties a simple accident, for the consequences of which the defendant would not be accountable to the plaintiff. If the jury find it was negligence and want of care on the part of the defendant, either to use electrical exploders at all, or to have procured in the manner they did this particular kind of exploder, the manufacture of Brown, then the defendants are accountable to the plaintiff for the damage occasioned by such negligence. But if on the contrary the jury think there was no want of ordinary care and prudence in procuring in the manner they did, for the use of their workmen, this particular manufacture of exploder, then the plaintiff would fail to establish negligence on the part of the defendants, and he cannot sustain his action."

These instructions held the defendants chargeable with the knowledge of Herschell as to the safety of these exploders, and that if he was guilty of any negligence in relation to them, the defendants would be accountable therefor; that their liability depended entirely on whether due care and precaution had been used in the selection and use of the exploders; that the plaintiff could only sustain his action by establishing more or less negligence on the part of the defendant. These instructions are found, on an examination of the authorities, to have their entire support; not one has been met with, in any way in conflict with them.

It is hardly necessary to refer to any of them, and a few only will be presented. Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 5; Wright v. New York Cent. R. Co., 25 N. Y. 566; Patterson v. Wallace, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 748; Tarrant v. Webb, 18 C. B. 801; Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp., 10 Allen, 238. In which last case it is held that a master is bound to use ordinary care in providing structures and engines, and is liable to any of his servants for his negligence in this regard.

In Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co., 110 Mass. 255, the instruction was: "A corporation is required to use due care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities, for the performance of the work or duty which it requires of its servants, and is liable for damages occasioned by neglect or omission to fulfill this obligation, whether it arises from its own want of care, or that of its agents intrusted with that duty. * * * The obligation of a corporation, so far as respects those in its employment, does not extend beyond the use of ordinary care and diligence. By ordinary care and diligence is meant, such as men of ordinary sense, prudence and capacity, under like circumstances take, in the conduct and management of their own affairs. This varies according to circumstances as the risk is greater or less, and must be measured by the character and risks and exposures of the business." These instructions were sustained by the full court.

In Wonder v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 32 Md. 417, it is decided that "all that can be required of the master and for the neglect of which he is responsible to the servant is, that he shall use due and reasonable diligence in providing safe and sound machinery. * * * The master is not liable to his servant for any injury occasioned by a defect of machinery furnished to the latter to operate, unless he was negligent in providing such machinery, or if he knew of the defect, in omitting to warn the servant of its existence."

The same rule is applicable to the selection of servants as to providing of proper materials and instruments, and in Baulec v. New York & H. R. Co., [59 N. Y. 359, December, 1874.] it was held, "that when reasonable precautions and efforts are used to procure safe and skillful servants, and without fault one is employed through whose incompetency damage occurs to a fellow servant, the master is not liable."

The following instruction was requested by plaintiff, but was refused by the court, viz.: "That if the agent of the town in the course of blasting stone for the use of the town, for which he was employed, procured electric exploders, which were in fact dangerous to be used, but the safety or propriety of using the particular kind of which could not be determined by any inspection whatever, so as to be known whether they were dangerous or proper to be used or not, and the plaintiff whilst in the proper discharge of his duty using due care was injured by said exploders, the town was liable to him for the damage caused thereby." In the view of the court, this instruction would impose on the master the responsibility of absolute safety, and render him the guarantor in that respect of the dangerous implements furnished by him to his servants to be used in their employment, in the labor for which they were engaged, and wholly ignores all questions of negligence and due care in the selection of such implement. It would hold the master accountable if the exploders were in fact imperfect and dangerous, although by the greatest care, it would have been impossible to discover that they were defective and dangerous; and this is but another form in fact of stating the proposition, that if by the most careful scrutiny, the defective exploders could not have been detected, if the defendant saw fit to obtain exploders, and one proves dangerous and injures one of the servants, the master is to be held accountable for the consequences.

In this proposition is entirely wanting the great elements which the jury were by the instructions called upon to find established before they could exonerate the defendants, viz. that it was not negligence and want of care to use electrical exploders in blasting, and that there was not any want of care in obtaining for this purpose the Brown exploders. If these elements should be incorporated into the instructions, it would then substantially affirm as the rule of law in such a case, that although the master was entirely justified in procuring and using Brown's exploders, still if a single one should prove defective and cause an injury to one of the servants, although by the extremest care and diligence the defect could not be discovered, the master would be accountable for injuries occasioned by such defects.

Negligence or want of care is not affirmed by this rule as a necessary element to create the master's liability; and when these are wanting, it is clear, from all the authorities, a liability to indemnify the servant does not exist, if he sustains an injury.

The argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff is, that because the exploders proved unsafe, although this could not be determined by the most careful scrutiny, the risk in such case should be borne by the master; but a master's accountability in such a case is not changed by the increase of risk, or the dangerous character of the instruments employed. The degree of care demanded in one case, may be very much greater than in the other, and the more dangerous the article in question, the greater should be the care and precaution; or as the jury were instructed, the more dangerous the instrument employed, the more care should be taken to obtain as safe an article as practicable, properly manufactured.

The use of exploders in blasting, not being as the jury have found, negligence per se, and the town having procured exploders, which at that time, by persons accustomed to their use, and by those who were engaged in blasting, were generally deemed to be a good safe article of the kind used and manufactured, and as safe as any, which with care could be procured in the market, and there being no defect discoverable by the greatest scrutiny, what higher degree of care could be required of the master? What test should be applied to discover this secret defect? It would seem that none could be suggested, which would not involve the discharge of the exploder, and thereby cause its entire destruction. These exploders were a part of a box taken from the depository at Neponset, and there is no evidence to show that any of those left in the box at Neponset ever proved defective, and the probability is, that in the present case, a single bad one caused the explosion of all the others, so that nearly the entire quantity might have been destroyed in testing them, without discovering the one which caused the mischief. No reasonable test could therefore have been applied, which with any certainty could have discovered that any of them were defective.

If a master should procure a box of percussion caps from a well known respectable manufacturer, which were by the community at large, generally considered safe and free from danger, would it be expected of him that he should use up a large portion of the contents of the box in testing them before he put them in the hands of his servants for use? Could he not well rely on the standing and reputation of the maker of the article for his putting on the market a safe and proper cap, and if on careful inspection they were apparently all right, and no defect could be discoverable, should he be deemed guilty of negligence, if under such circumstances he procured and used them in his business?

It is difficult to discover any distinction between that and the present case, excepting, perhaps, it may be said that exploders were not so well known, and were of a more dangerous nature; but this as before stated only requires of the master greater care, and does not render him a guarantor of perfect safety in its use by his servants.

It is claimed that Herschell, the agent of the town, was well aware of the danger attending these exploders, and should therefore have advised the plaintiff of their being liable to explode without any apparent cause; but the plaintiff substantially admitted that he was aware of their character, as he testified that he had seen them used in blasting, and that the night before he was injured, he removed the box of exploders from the powder chest to a shelf in the engine room. The jury were instructed, "that the negligence of Herschell in not procuring a suitable article would be negligence on the part of the town, for which it would be chargeable; that they should determine Herschell's means of knowledge as to their safety, because if he deemed them unsafe, it would be negligence and want of due care to provide such material for the use of the workmen. It is a matter for you to determine, taking all of Herschell's statements, and what you find to have been his previous knowledge on this point, whether you can fairly charge him with negligence in having procured this kind of exploder." No other instruction was requested on this branch of the case, and if counsel had desired any more specific, it should have been prayed for at the close of the charge. Whatever knowledge Herschell had as to their being dangerous was distinctly declared to be the knowledge of the town for the purposes of this trial, and if Herschell was not justified in their use, then the town was accountable and must answer for his negligence. In none of the authorities cited by the learned counsel is anything to be found in conflict with the rulings at the trial.

In Cayzer v. Taylor, 10 Gray, 274, the instruction given to the jury was that the implied contract between a master and servant is, that the master will use such care as a prudent and careful man in the same business would use in the selection and use of engines and appurtenances belonging thereto. If the defendant used an unfit engine and apparatus, and such use arose from want of ordinary care in the employer, and by reason of this want of care the injury was incurred, then the defendant would be responsible. This ruling was in strict conformity with that made in the present case and was sustained by the supreme court of Massachusetts.

In Spelman v. Fisher Iron Co., 56 Barb. 155, the court says: "Personal negligence is the gist of the action, and the master is liable where he knew or ought to have known of the defect which occasioned the injury."

In Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co., 110 Mass. 259, the language is: "The jury must have found that the defendant corporation did not exercise ordinary care and diligence in supplying and maintaining an engine safe to be used."

In Noyes v. Smith, 28 Vt. 64, it is said "that it is the duty of the master to exercise care and prudence, that those in his employment be not exposed to unreasonable risks and dangers;" and this principle is sustained by the court in Connolly v. Poillon, 41 Barb. 367.

In McGatrick v. Wason, 4 Ohio St. 566, it is said "that if the defect in the machinery could have been cured by the use of ordinary care then the master is liable." It is very clear that in all these cases the various courts recognize the same principles of law as were here given to the jury, viz., that the defendants were bound to use reasonable care and precaution to procure safe and proper materials for the use of their servants, and if from want of such care the servant was injured the master would be liable.

The requested instruction derives no support from either of those decisions, but the rather declares the law to be entirely different, and would hold that if the absolute safety of the articles furnished cannot be determined by the most careful inspection, and in their use they should prove dangerous and injure the servant, the master would be accountable therefor; that by their use he becomes an insurer of the servant's safety against the danger, although it is impossible to discover the defect in the article which is of the same character and description, and from the same manufacturer as those commonly made use of in the employment for which the servant is engaged. Such a liability is far in excess of that, which only requires due care and diligence to be shown to exonerate the master if injury ensues to the servant, and although in the present case a very serious injury has been sustained by the plaintiff, the court is not satisfied that any error occurred at the trial which entitles him to have his cause again presented to a jury. Motion overruled. Judgment on the verdict.

ADAMS v. WHITE.

[2 Pittsb. R. 21; 7 Pittsb. Leg. J. 41; 16 Leg. Int. 293.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Aug. 20, 1859.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — ACTION ON NOTE — DEFENSES—PLEADING—DILATORY PLEAS—JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURT.

1. Matters which appertain solely to the jurisdiction of a court, or to the disabilities of a suitor, should never be blended with questions, which enter essentially into the subject matter of the controversy.

2. In dilatory pleas the greatest precision is required.

3. A plea to the jurisdiction concludes to the cognizance of the court, by praying judgment if the court will take cognizance of the suit, or of the plea (declaration) aforesaid.

4. Plea to the jurisdiction must be signed by the defendant in person, and not by attorney.

5. The affidavit accompanying the plea must be positive, and not "as he believes."

6. The plea must be put in within four days of the term, to which the declaration is filed, counting both days inclusive.

7. Filing plea in bar is a waiver of the plea in abatement.

8. A literal copy of the note, omitting the endorsement, which is averred in the declaration, is a compliance with the 71st rule of the United States district court.

9. In his affidavit of defense, the defendant must state "fully and particularly," the nature and amount of his set off.

10. To put plaintiff on proof of consideration of negotiable paper, it must be shown that it was obtained, or put in circulation, by fraud or undue means.

11. When the citizenship of the parties gives jurisdiction, and the legal right to sue is in the plaintiff, the court will not inquire into the residence of those who have an equitable interest in the claim.

12. He who has the legal right may sue at law in the federal courts, without reference to the citizenship of those who may have the equitable interest.

[At law. Action by Samuel Adams against A. M. White on a promissory note.]

The facts of this case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court. It came up on a plea to the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, and on a rule to show cause why judgment should not be entered for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. As the case involved important questions relating to the jurisdiction and practice of the courts of the United States, the court directed a re-argument, and it was re-argued on the 13th inst. [Plea overruled. Rule absolute. Judgment for plaintiff.]

C. B. Smith, for plaintiff.

John M. Kirkpatrick, for defendant.

MCANDLESS, District Judge. Plaintiff sues upon a note dated 26th October, 1858, at four months, for $2,055 97-100 drawn by defendant, payable "to the order of myself," and endorsed by him. An affidavit of claim and copy of note omitting the endorsement, were filed with the precipe; and before the return day of the writ a narr. was filed, reciting the note, and averring the endorsement to plaintiff. Defendant's counsel interposes a plea to the jurisdiction, and an affidavit of defence. We must dispose of this plea before considering the argument upon the affidavit. Before the court can proceed to entertain any question on the merits, it must know that it possesses proper jurisdiction over the parties. It is plain that the question as to the citizenship of the parties must be preliminary in its nature, and the exception must be taken by way of a plea. Dodge v. Perkins, [Case No. 3,954;] [Smith v. Kernochen,] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 198.

1. Then as to the point of jurisdiction. The plea filed in this case is bad both in substance and form. It does not deny plaintiff is a citizen of the state of Virginia, but alleges that the note on which this suit is brought, is the property of John M'Vay, a citizen of Pennsylvania, who is not entitled to sue in the courts of the United States. That is a question of title, and is matter in bar, and not in abatement. It has been received as a canon of pleading, that matters which appertain solely to the jurisdiction of a court, or to the disabilities of a suitor should never be blended with questions which enter essentially into the subject matter of the controversy; and that all defences involving inquiries into that subject matter imply, nay admit, the competency of the parties to institute such inquiries, and the authority of the court to adjudicate upon them. Hence it is, that pleas to the jurisdiction, or in abatement are deemed inconsistent with those which appertain to the merits of a cause: they are tried upon different views, as to the relations of the parties, and result in different conclusions. [Sheppard v. Graves,] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 505; Gould, [Pl.] 221.

As to the form of the plea. In dilatory pleas the greatest precision is required. [Evans v. Prosser,] 3 Term R. 186. This plea has no conclusion—it prays no judgment. The language of the pleader's last sentence is "therefore he pleads that this suit may abate, at the proper costs and charges of Samuel Adams, plaintiff above named," a person by the way, the defendant alleges is a myth, and has no substantive existence. A plea to the jurisdiction concludes to the cognizance of the court by praying judgment, if the court will take cognizance of the suit, or in more technical language of the plea (declaration) aforesaid. Gould, [Pl.] 238. The present plea is by attorney. A plea to the jurisdiction must be signed by the defendant in person. For, if signed by an attorney who is an officer of the court, he is supposed to have signed it by leave of the court, and the asking of leave is a tacit admission of the jurisdiction. Bac. Abr. "Abatement," A; "Pleas," E. 2. Again, the affidavit, which is a necessary adjunct to all pleas in abatement, must, in a plea to the jurisdiction, be positive, and not "as he believes." This is fatal to this plea.

The rules of courts of law with regard to dilatory pleas are very stringent, and require them to be put in within four days after the term to which the declaration is filed, counting both days inclusive. They require also, that the affidavit of the truth of the plea be positive and not according to the belief of the defendant. In the practice of these courts also, a dilatory plea, not filed in time, or subsequently authenticated, may be treated as a nullity, and the party making it defaulted for want of a plea. Grier, J. [Ewing v. Blight,] 1 Phila. 576.

Aside from all this, the defendant has filed a plea in bar. This is a waiver of his plea in abatement. [Potter v. McCoy,] 2 Casey, [26 Pa. St.] 462. It is a rule of pleading without an exception, that objections to the jurisdiction of the court, or the incompetency of the parties, are matters pleadable in abatement only; and that if, after such matters relied on, a defence be interposed in bar, and going to the merits of the controversy, the grounds alleged in abatement become thereby immaterial, and are waived. [Sheppard v. Graves,] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 510.

2. As to the affidavit of defence. It is alleged in the affidavit, and was contended with ability on the argument, that the copy of the note filed was not a literal transcript, required by the rules of court. But the defendant has not informed us in what the difference consists. If it be the omission of the endorsement, that is supplied by the averment in the declaration.

The defendant claims that he has a set off, but it is not against the demand of the plaintiff, but John M'Vay, and we are not advised of its nature or amount. In the affidavit he states that the amount of set off "he does not exactly know," and hence is unable exactly to designate the same. If John M'Vay were the plaintiff here, this would be insufficient, and is less sufficient when suit is brought by an innocent holder. Under the rule he must state his defence "fully and particularly." The burden of the affidavit is that John M'Vay is the real plaintiff, and that the name of Adams is used to sue in this court. The plaintiff is the holder of a note which is negotiable; and to put him on proof of consideration, it must be shown that it was obtained or put into circulation by fraud, or undue means. Some fact must be alleged from which we can reasonably infer that the note came into the hands of the holder by fraud, or without consideration. [Brown v. Street,] 6 Watts & S. 222. There is nothing here but a vague allegation. When defendant drew this note payable to the order of himself, and endorsed it, he converted it into negotiable paper, payable to bearer, untrammelled in its circulation, subject at maturity to suit in the hands of any holder, and exempt from impertinent inquiry, from any quarter, as to the consideration. After he endorsed it, it passed by delivery; and the plaintiff had the same right to sue upon it in his own name, as if it had been made payable to bearer. He alleges that he is a citizen of Virginia, and consequently the circuit court of the United States has jurisdiction. [Bonnafée v. Williams,] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 574.

When the citizenship of the parties gives jurisdiction, and the legal right to sue is in the plaintiff, the court will not inquire into the residence of those who may have an equitable interest in the claim. They are not necessary parties on the record. A person having the legal right may sue at law in the federal courts, without reference to the citizenship of those who may have the equitable interest. [Irvine v. Lowry,] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 298. The opinion of the court is with the plaintiff on both points submitted. The plea to the jurisdiction is overruled. The rule to show cause is made absolute, and judgment for the plaintiff; sum to be ascertained by the clerk.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1817.

ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS—PERSONAL LIABILITY ON PROMISE—DECLARATION.

A declaration upon a promise made by the defendant as administrator must aver assets, in order to charge him personally de bonis propriis.

At law. The declaration charged that the defendant, administrator of Charles Little, made his promissory note to Thomas Peake, and thereby as administrator of the said Charles Little, promised to settle with him for sundry taxes and clerk's notes due from the late Charles Little for himself individually, and as executor and administrator of others, to the amount of $47.74; which note the said Thomas Peake assigned to the plaintiff, of which the defendant had notice; by means whereof, and by force of the statute, the defendant became liable to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of money in the said note specified, according to the tenor and effect thereof and of the said assignment, and being so liable, the defendant, in consideration thereof, promised the plaintiff to pay him the said sum of money. Nevertheless, the defendant, although often requested, has not paid, &c. To this declaration there was a general demurrer and joinder.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, cited Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowp. 289, and Atkins v. Hill, Id. 284.

Mr. Fitzhugh, contra, cited Morris v. Lee, 2 Ld. Raym. 1396, and Grant v. Vaughan, 3 Burrows, 1516.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the declaration was bad for the want of an averment of assets; inasmuch as the promise was made by the defendant as administrator, and the declaration sought to charge him personally de bonis propriis.

Case No. 70.

ADAMS v. WILBUR.

[2 Sum. 266.]²

Circuit Court, Rhode Island. Nov. 1835.

WILLS—OMISSION TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

The statute of wills of Rhode Island of 1798, § 6, provided, "that any child, &c. not having a legacy given him in the will of his father or mother, shall have a proportion of the estate of his parents assigned unto him, as though such parent had died intestate." This section was repealed in 1803. Held, that a will, made in 1801, while the foregoing provision was in force, where the testator died in 1804, after it had been repealed, was not affected by it, but was fully operative to pass a good title to the devisee.

At law. Ejectment for lands in Newport, Rhode Island. [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

The parties agreed to a special statement of facts, as follows: Silas G. Huddy being seized of the demanded premises in fee by his last will and testament, dated, made and duly executed on the seventh day of December, A. D. 1801, and after his decease duly proved, and approved by the court of probate, devised the same premises in fee to his wife, Elizabeth Huddy, he, the said testator, then having no issue. That the said Silas and Elizabeth had a child born on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1802, which child died in infancy, before the said testator. On the 22d day of April, A. D. 1804, said Silas G. and his said wife Elizabeth, had another child born, named Silas G. Huddy, Jun., who survived both the testator and his said wife, and died July 8, A. D. 1818, in the fifteenth year of his age, intestate, and without issue. That Silas G. Huddy, senior, the testator, died at sea in the month of August, A. D. 1804. That said Elizabeth Huddy, widow and devisee of said Silas G. Huddy, senior, by her last will and testament, dated, made and duly executed on the 20th day of August, A. D. 1809, and after her decease duly proved and approved, devised the use and improvement of the premises to her mother, Ann Bently, until her (the testatrix's) son, the said Silas G., should be twenty-one years old, and then to her said son in fee; and if her said mother should die before her son arrived at that age, then to the said son in fee, and if said son should die without issue of his body, then to her said mother in fee. And afterwards, in the year 1809, said Elizabeth died, her said mother and son both surviving. The said Ann Bently, the mother, died in the year 1812, and the said Silas G. Huddy, the son, died July 8th, A. D. 1818, as before stated. That said Elizabeth Huddy had two sisters, one of whom, named Abigail Adams, now deceased, was the mother of the plaintiffs, who are the only surviving children of said Abigail, and are next of kin to the said Silas J. Huddy, Jr., of the blood of his mother, the said Elizabeth. If, upon this statement of facts, it shall be the opinion of the court that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, then it is agreed that judgment shall be entered for them, the plaintiffs; otherwise, for the defendant.

The cause was argued by Hazard for plaintiffs, and by Turner and Pearce for the tenant.

Hazard. By the agreed statement of facts, upon which the parties have put this case, it appears that the defendant does not set up any adverse title, but leaves the plaintiffs to make out their title, to the demanded premises. And as to this, it is agreed, that the premises were vested in fee in Silas G. Huddy, Jr., and came to him by devise from his mother, Elizabeth Huddy, and that said Silas died seized of the premises, July 8th, 1818, intestate, under age, and without issue, leaving the same to his heirs at law. It is also agreed, that the plaintiffs are next of kin to the said Silas G. Huddy, Jr., of the blood of said Elizabeth Huddy, his mother, and devisor.

The title of the plaintiffs depends upon the Rhode Island statute of 1798, (Dig. 1798, p. 237,) "directing the descent of intestate estates," &c.; by the 1st section of which statute, it is provided, that if such right, title and interest to such real estate, came by descent, gift, or devise from the parent or other kindred of the intestate, and such intestate die without issue, the same shall vest in and be divided equally amongst the next of kin to the intestate, and those who legally represent them, if any of them be dead, of the blood of the person from whom such right, title, or interest came or descended. This is the title under which the plaintiffs claim. This title is good, unless defeated by the provision contained in the 6th section of the Rhode Island statute of wills of 1798. It is unnecessary to consider what application that provision might have (if still in force) to the present case, since all that part of the said 6th section was repealed by an act of the legislature, passed expressly and solely for that purpose, June 4, 1803, (more than a year before the death of S. G. Huddy, senior, and fourteen months before the birth of his son), entitled, "An act to repeal part of the 6th section of the act, entitled, 'An act prescribing the manner of devising lands, tenements and hereditaments, and of disposing of personal estate by will.'" This repealing act is contained in the "Supplement to the Digest of the Laws in 1798," and remained in full force until the last revision of the laws in 1822, when the general acts relating to devises and wills were revised, and the act now and ever since in force was passed.

The question now presented to the court we conceive to be this, did the statute of 1803, repealing in part the statute of 1798, under which the will was made in 1801, while the statute of 1798 was in full force, and unrepealed, so far act retrospectively as to change the legal destination of real estate under that will? In order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover in this action, it is incumbent on them successfully to maintain the affirmative of this question; their case depends entirely on their so doing. Yet the argument is rather implied than expressed, and as it is supported and enforced by no authorities introduced, if available it must be considered as depending upon the application of general principles of law, independent of authorities. Every will, in a certain sense, is inchoate and imperfect, until the death of the testator; but it is so considered only in reference to the estate that will or will not pass by it; and not at all in reference to the law by which it shall be construed, controlled and governed. The preparation and the legal execution of a will, are the acts of the party—the testator himself. When every ceremony and requisite on his part has been performed, the instrument is perfect and complete, so far as human agency and human law are concerned; and the only remaining act necessary to its full and complete consummation, is the act of God alone, the death of the testator. This is the only sense, and utmost extent, in which a will, duly executed according to the requirements of law, as the law stands at the time of its execution, ever has been, or can be considered as inchoate. We are not aware of any legal principle, under which a different rule has been applied, in this respect, to wills, than is applied to deeds, bonds, mortgages, or any other contracts or writings, whether under seal or not; in relation to all which we deem the rule to be, that effect shall be given to them, according to the law, as it stood at the time of their execution. Upon the ground taken by the plaintiffs, the act of June 4, 1803, would, in this case be entirely retrospective; and although we shall not contend, that the legislature may not pass, and have not passed retrospective laws, in contradistinction to ex post facto laws, yet we feel warranted by authorities in saying, that if such was the intention of the legislature, at the time the act was passed, it must have been clearly expressed in the act itself; and cannot be legally presumed. Now does the act of June 4, 1803, contain any expression giving it a retroactive operation on wills, that had been then already made? The language and the intention are evidently prospective, and can be considered as applicable to such wills only as should thereafter be made; and not to those that had been already executed. In Gillmore v. Shooter, 2 Mod. 310, the court said, in giving judgment for the plaintiff: "It could not be presumed, that the act had a retrospect to take away an action to which the plaintiff was then entitled; for if a will had been made before the 24th of June, and the testator had died afterwards, yet the will had been good, though it had not been in pursuance of the statute." The same case is cited in Couch v. Jeffries, 4 Burrows, 2461, and is also reported in 2 Show. 16, 2 Lev. 227, 1 Vent. 330, and T. Jones, 108. The law had been such in Rhode Island ever since the passage of 12 Wm. III. c. 7. The legislature of Rhode Island, in the same year passed an act, on the 30th day of April, 1700, entitled "An act for putting in force the laws of England, in all cases where no particular law of this colony hath provided a remedy," providing as follows: "That in all actions, matters, causes and things whatsoever, where no particular law of this colony is made to decide and determine the same, that then, and in all such cases the laws of England shall be put in force, to issue, determine and decide the same; any usage, custom or law to the contrary notwithstanding." Dig. R. I. Laws 1744, p. 28. The act here recited, adopted the English statute of 12 Wm. III. c. 7, as the law of Rhode Island, and it continued in force until the revision of 1798, when the statute of this state was passed, copied from that which had been passed in Massachusetts in 1784; and although both the statutes of Massachusetts and Rhode Island omit the preamble to the section in the English statute, yet it was decided, [Terry v. Foster,] 1 Mass. 150, that it was entitled to consideration under a new statute in pari materia. The testator then, in this case, when, on the 7th December, 1801, he made his will, may be fairly presumed to have known what the law then was, and probably acted under the advice of counsel; if so, he must have been aware, that our statute not only amply secured and provided for children subsequently born, who were, technically speaking, posthumous, but also for all such as might be born after the will was made, and before his own death. To give the will, therefore, at this time a different construction, or rather a different effect, would be to destroy the presumed intent of the testator, and would prove both inconvenient and unjust. See Whitman v. Haggood, 10 Mass. 437; Inhabitants of Somerset v. Inhabitants of Dighton, 12 Mass. 333; Church v. Crocker, 3 Mass. 17; Inhabitants of Medford v. Learned, 16 Mass. 215; Wild v. Brewer, 2 Mass. 570; Bigelow, Dig. p. 741, arts. 14, 15; The Saunders, [Case No. 12,372.]

The argument for the defendant might be illustrated by a great variety of examples; one or two only shall be mentioned. Suppose a will had been made before the statute was passed, requiring its execution and publication before three witnesses, and it had been witnessed by two witnesses only, and the testator had not died until after the enactment of the statute; would it be argued in such a case, that the will was void? Again, the legislature of Rhode Island have recently passed an act, requiring all bills of sale that are intended for security, and to operate as mortgages, to be recorded in the same way that deeds of real estate are; suppose such a bill of sale had been executed prior to the passing of that law, and that the term of payment did not expire by the condition of the deed, until after it became a law, it is not supposed, that if such bill of sale were not recorded, that therefore it would be void against attaching creditors, or others.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and PITMAN, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. The testator (Silas G. Huddy) made his will in 1801, having then no issue; and thereby devised the premises in fee to his wife. He afterwards died, in August, 1804, leaving his wife, and a son, who was born in April, 1804; and who afterwards died, in July, 1818, intestate, and without issue. The wife died in 1809; and the plaintiffs claim, as heirs of the son, ex parte materna; and the defendant claims, as heir of the son, ex parte paterna.

The statute of wills of Rhode Island, of 1798, in the sixth section, provides, "That every child, or children, or their legal representatives, in the case of their death, not having a legacy given him, her, or them, in the will of their father or mother, shall have a proportion of the estate of their parents assigned unto him, her, or them, as though such parent had died intestate;" with a proviso, not important to be mentioned in the present case. This section was in force at the time, when the testator's will was made, in 1801; but, at the time of his death, in 1804, it had been repealed (act of 4th June, 1803). If it had been in force at the time of the testator's death, it is admitted, that the plaintiffs would have no title to the estate; as it would have vested in the son by descent, ex parte paterna, in virtue of the section. The real question, therefore, between the parties, is, whether in the intermediate repeal defeated the title, which the son would otherwise have taken. Our opinion is, that it did. The will was good and operative to all intents and purposes to pass the whole of the premises to the wife, subject only to be defeated by any title, which might accrue to the son under the section above quoted. The will was ambulatory during the life of the testator; and no title could accrue to the son until the death of the testator. If the son had died during the life-time of the testator, without issue, it is clear, that the will would have had precisely the same effect, as if he had never been born. To give the son then any title in the estate, two things must have concurred; first, that he should have survived the testator; and, secondly, that at the time of the death of the latter, there should have been some law in force, which should confer a title on him. He is to take, not by the bounty of the testator, but by the operation of law. Now, at the time when, if ever, this title was to accrue, there was no act in force, which conferred any such title upon him. It had been repealed; and the repeal put an end to the possibility of his acquiring any title under it. The argument of the defendant's counsel seems to rest mainly on the foundation, that an inchoate title was created in the son by the execution of the will, which ought not to be defeated by relation by the subsequent repeal. But we take the law to be, that no inchoate title vested at all by the execution of the will; and that the son's title, if any, must first accrue on the death of the testator. Having said thus much upon the point, it appears to me, that there is no farther room for argument upon it.

Our judgment is, that the defendant is [plaintiffs are] entitled to recover the premises sued for.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem for wages by Adams against the steamer Wyoming, (H. B. Crosset, claimant.) Counter petition by mortgagee. Libel dismissed. Decree for mortgagee.]

Flavel McGee, for libellant.

A. V. Schenck, for claimant.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a libel in rem for wages. On the 27th of February, 1878, H. B. Crosset, being the owner of the steamship Wyoming, entered into a written agreement with the libellant whereby the latter, for the period of three years and upwards, to wit, from 1st of March, 1878, to the 16th of June, 1881, was to command and run the said steamboat on a route between New Brunswick and New York, as captain, for the salary of one hundred dollars per month and three per cent. of her gross earnings represented by the monthly collection for passengers and freights. The owner reserved to himself the privilege of terminating the engagement whenever the libellant failed to perform his duties as captain to his satisfaction upon paying to him such apportionate sum as may have accrued up to the date of notice. The libellant claims in the libel that he was not the master of the boat. He styles himself "late seaman," and says that he had no control over the moneys received for freight or passengers, but that the same was solely in the charge of the boat's clerk; that his duties were only those of commander of the vessel, except when occasion required that he should temporarily perform the duties of pilot.

The question as to who is the master of the vessel is ordinarily determined by the registry or enrollment and license. The laws of the United States require that the owner shall make oath who is master and that he is a citizen of the United States, or where the latter is in the district he shall make such oath himself. They also require that the master shall join with the owner in the execution of a bond for various purposes enumerated in the act, before a registry or enrollment of the vessel shall take place. The proof in the case is that the libellant in all these necessary papers, appears as the master of the boat. He, as well as the owner, swears to the fact, and hence they are estopped from coming into court to deny that he sustained any such relation to the vessel. The matter was fully discussed in The Dubuque, [Case No. 4,110,] and the court there held "that so long as the person in whose name as master the vessel is recorded, continues to be master by the registry he is such to all intents and purposes in the eye of the law." But independent of the registry, which concludes the parties, the master is the one to whom the owner entrusts the navigation and discipline of the vessel, and the evidence shows that the libellant occupied this position. It is true that the clerks of the boat generally received the fares for passengers, and collected the freights for merchandise, and paid over the daily receipts to the owner. No such arrangement was set forth in the agreement in which the captain was engaged, and it was doubtless made to divide labor and responsibility. It does not appear but that the libellant might not, if he had desired, have had the receipts under his control. The clerk, Sheppard, expressly testifies that he would have paid any bill or handed over any amount of money that the captain ordered him to pay or hand over. I must, therefore, conclude that the libellant was the master, and the law determines that as such he has no lien upon the boat or the proceeds of sale in the registry for the payment of his wages. The libel must be dismissed. But it does not thence follow that he is not entitled to be paid his claim, or petition, from the surplus and remnants. The admiralty court, although not technically a court of law or of equity, is a court of justice, and distributes surplus amongst claimants ac-ording to the rules which govern all these courts when their aid is invoked in the distribution of funds under their control. The master, although having no lien, but having a maritime claim, which he can enforce in the admiralty, in a suit in personam, may be paid from the surplus as against the owner of the vessel. The Stephen Allen, [Case No. 13,361.] In the present case, however, the money is claimed by the mortgagee. Sarah S. Crosset, the wife of the owner, has filed her petition claiming the balance of the proceeds of sale as due to her upon a mortgage assigned to and held by her against the said boat and upon which there is yet due upwards of two thousand dollars. This raises a different question, to wit, whether in the distribution of surplus and remnants the master is entitled to be paid his wages against the claims of a bona fide mortgagee. It was alluded to and waived as not involved in the case by Judge Betts in The Stephen Allen, supra, and so far as I know has never received distinct adjudication.

It is well settled in the admiralty that the mortgage of a vessel is not a maritime transaction, and hence the admiralty courts have always declined to take jurisdiction to enforce the payment of a mortgage. Bogart v. The John Jay, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 402; Hurry v. The John and Alice, [Case No. 6,923.] But although this is so, a mortgagee is nevertheless allowed to file a petition in the case of remnants and surplus in the registry and to have his mortgage paid as against the owner; but in such cases the satisfaction of the mortgage is postponed to the claims of a privileged creditor having a maritime lien. Schuchardt v. Babbidge, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 239; Remnants in Court, [Case No. 11,697;] Thomas v. The Kosciusko, [Id. 13,901.] It is also conceded that whilst the master has a lien upon the freight for his wages, he has none upon the vessel. He is expected to look to the personal responsibility of the owner. His claim for wages, however, is one of admiralty jurisdiction and he can maintain a suit in personam for the amount due. Willard v. Dorr, [Case No. 17,679.] And it is for this reason that he is permitted to come in by petition and obtain payment of his wages and for advances as against the owner from the surplus moneys in court arising from the sale of the vessel. Gardner v. The New Jersey, [Case No. 5,233;] Zane v. The President, [Id. 18,201;] The Santa Anna, [Id. 12,325.] I say as against the owner, but not necessarily against the mortgagee. There may be cases where the master has an equity to be paid, equal if not superior to the equity of the mortgagee. But this is not one of them. The mortgage has been of long standing, was given in 1871, was duly recorded, and the master rendered the service with full [notice of the] rights of the mortgagee. The law required him to take notice of them. It does not seem equitable that he should allow his wages, payable monthly, to accumulate when he had within his reach the means of securing payment, and then claim their payment above and against the mortgage. Besides, if it be admitted that the equities of the parties are equal, the mortgagee is older and first in time and hence stronger in right. The case falls within the principle of The Grace Greenwood, [Case No. 5,652,] where Judge Drummond, in the distribution of proceeds, postponed material men to mortgagees, upon the ground that the mortgages were recorded before the date of furnishing the materials and supplies. If those in interest desire to contest the truth or validity of the petitioner's mortgage, leave will be given to do so. If no steps are taken to this end, within ten days after notice to the owner and master, an order may be entered that the clerk pay the residue of the proceeds of the sale of the steamboat, to the petitioner, on account of her mortgage. No costs are allowed to the claimant Crosset against the libellant. If Mrs. Crosset had intervened and answered as mortgagee, it would have been different.

Case No. 72.

ADAMS & W. MANUF'G CO. v. ST. LOUIS WIRE-GOODS CO.

[3 Ban. & A. 77: 12 O. G. 940; Fent. Pat. 31.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Sept., 1877.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INFRINGEMENT — KNOWN PROCESS — PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION — AFFIDAVIT.

1. The improvement in sieves for which letters patent No. 106,597 were granted to Robert J. Mann, August 23, 1870, and of which the complainant is the owner, being construed by the court to consist in a combination of the hoop and sieve cloth, when the edge of the sieve cloth is clasped in the hoop and there fastened by swaging: Held, that the patent is not infringed by making a wire sieve connected with the rim, which is fastened by what is known as double-seaming, inasmuch as double-seaming is a mode of fastening known long before the date of the patent.

2. On a motion for a preliminary injunction, the court may consider certain matters independent of the affidavits, such as general principles supposed to be known to every one of ordinary intelligence.

3. The design patent No. 4637, granted to Robert J. Mann, February 7th, 1871, for a flaring rim for sieves, whereby they will nest together, possesses no novelty, even if it were a design which would properly come within the patent law.

In equity. This bill was brought to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 106,597, dated August 23d, 1870, for improvement in sieves, and letters patent No. 4,637, dated February 7th, 1871, for design for sieves, both granted to Robert J. Mann.

Coburn & Thacher, for complainant.
S. S. Boyd, for defendant.

[Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

TREAT, District Judge.² I have received a note from counsel for plaintiff, in which they desire the result of the action of the court to be certified to them. I have not had time to write an opinion in this matter. But as this case has been presented in a hurried way, as the court was very much occupied at the time, and as it will come up hereafter on its merits, I will merely state the conclusions so far as this motion is concerned. The claim in the patent is for: "The combination of the hoop A and sieve-cloth C when the edge of the sieve-cloth is clasped within the hoop and thus fastened by swaging, substantially as and for the purpose specified and shown."

Without going into an elaborate disquisition with regard to these matters, it must suffice that this patent has been twice established as a valid and subsisting patent, and for the purposes of this motion must be so treated by this court. Thereupon, only one inquiry is presented: Is the sieve, as used by defendant, an infringement thereon? If we go through the mechanical combination involved in their use by the defendant, and into the mechanical combination for which the plaintiff, as assignee, has a patent, we will find, according to the claims of the patent, the essential element is, that the sieve is placed into proper position with regard to the hoops, and swaged, which results in tightening the sieve below, and produces this convenient effect in the form indicated, whereby the rim remains, so that the plaintiff's sieve, thus produced, may effect results which sieves of this character are intended to produce. Now, plaintiff does not claim, and cannot claim, that the wire sieve is, simply in connection with the rim, patentable, because both of those things existed anterior to his patent. What, then, is his patent? It is that, in connection with a metallic rim, he produces a curve by swaging, which works out the results here shown. On the other hand, defendant takes the wire sieve, which is not new at all, connected with the rim, which is fastened by what is known in the mechanical arts as "double-seaming." There is nothing new in double-seaming. It is a mode known long before this patent as one for fastening not only lid-heads of cans, etc., but for a variety of other purposes. Hence, for the purposes of the present motion, it is only necessary for this court to determine first, that the essential element in plaintiff's patent is a combination of a hoop with a sieve-cloth, whereby the edge of the sieve-cloth is clasped within the hoop, and fastened by swaging. Now, the connection of a sieve-cloth with the hoop, in itself, is not his patent, unless the swaging follows. And he had no patent except for the combination. It is a combination patent. Swaging is the important element in determining this patent. What is swaging? It is a mechanical device whereby compression is produced in a variety of forms other than a plane surface, whether it be curved, hexagonal or otherwise. The essential element and advantage of the patent of the plaintiff is, that by swaging he fastens his sieve to the rim by a swaging process, which tightens the sieve itself, and thereby necessarily produces the rim below, so that the sieve itself does not rest on a line with that rim. Thus, if it were brought over externally with regard to it, the sieve would rest on the rim, but, by being swaged in the mode here indicated, not only produces the rim but tightens the sieve-head by but one operation, and, so far as the swaging is concerned, produces the required result.

The defendant simply resorts to an old and well-known mode of double-seaming, which is entirely distinct and different from plaintiff's mode. Double-seaming is simply double-bending a metallic material so that the wire of the sieve passes through one hoop with another over it, and thus, by fastening the sieve together, retains its position without swaging at all. There is nothing new in the double-seaming process as a mode of fastening. You may fasten a preserve or any other can by the double-seaming process, which is entirely simple in itself—old and well known to every housewife and every mechanic. But swaging is an entirely different matter. It is the producing of a given form and given result by the use of what are known as "swaging tools," which tools produce from the two parts any form that you desire produced. Thus a straight impression, parallel, as two hooks, produced by compression, is no swaging at all. By swaging you may make them take any desired form. If you wish to produce a curved form, and one tool is pressed convex against a concave surface, the material between will take the curved form. There is nothing new at all or strange in placing two things parallel with each other, and with sufficient application of force squeezing them together. There is nothing new in that. It is as old as the use of two parallel forces. But, by the use of swaging, you may give any form you desire, consequent upon the use of swaging-tools. This patent, then, is for the use of a swaging-tool, in the manner described in the claim, which accomplishes the result therein stated.

The defendant uses no swaging-tool, but resorts to the old and well-known mode of double-seaming. This is the essential element on which this bill is founded.

The second element is for a design patent. But, before passing on that, I will remark that, looking at the affidavits filed by the plaintiff and defendant with regard to the alleged infringement of the combination patent, if the matter rested solely on the affidavits, the weight of testimony would be entirely against the plaintiff. But there are certain matters, as the supreme court of the United States has decided, consonant with right reason, which the court can always consider independent of affidavits—such general principles as are supposed to be known to every one of ordinary intelligence. Now, every one of ordinary observation and intelligence has known for a long period of time what double-seaming is, and, though he may not have known the name, he may or may not have known what swaging is. The testimony before the court shows what swaging is, and in the light of these matters the court determines that it is an essential element to plaintiff's patent, that swaging should be used in connection with his hoop and tightening process.

The second matter involved in his bill is what is called a "design patent," concerning which there are one or more affidavits presented. This is the question to be considered first. What is a design patent? Complainant insists that he is assignee of the design patent, whereby through flaring—a conical section—these sieves may be nested. Without going into the discussion whether this is, within the meaning of the patent law, a design patent, which is extremely doubtful, it must suffice to say that, in the light of the affidavits and common experience, the alleged design is nothing new. And even if it fell within the meaning of the patent law, as a patentable design, there is no novelty in it. Putting one thing in another, and making it a little flaring instead of rectangular, is an old matter.

Third. Plaintiff claims that this defendant has infringed his trade-mark. He says that his product is called a "metallic sieve," and puts it on the market as "Mann's metallic sieve." This is his trade-mark. Defendant's sieve bears the name of this corporation—"The St. Louis Wire Goods Company." Defendant sends its product on the market under its specific brand. So far as any pretence exists here that the trade-mark exists in the words "metallic sieve," disconnected from the words "Mann's metallic sieve," there can be no foundation for an injunction. The metallic sieve is nothing new. It is well-known. But if this defendant had designated his sieve "Mann's metallic sieve," he would have infringed his trade-mark. He stamps on the metallic sieve his own name, thus indicating that it is his own manufacture, and consequently he does not fall within any rule known to trade-marks. [See note to Alleghany Fertilizer Co. v. Woodside, Case No. 20.] This matter has been thrust upon me in the midst of other business, and I have not had time to write an opinion; but it is immaterial in this stage of the inquiry. I treat the patent as valid, and I treat as an essential element of that patent the swaging process whereby plaintiff's result is produced. As defendant's result is obtained by other than the swaging process, there is no infringement.

The defendant's product is produced by double-seaming, which is entirely distinct and separate from swaging, and known long before this patent was issued. As to the designed patent, it is doubtful whether it falls within the purview of the patent law. If it does it has no novelty. As to plaintiff's trade-mark, it is not used by defendant, and hence the motion for provisional injunction is refused.

Case No. 73.

ADAMS EXP. CO. v. DAVISON et al.

[3 Balt. Law Trans. (1870) No. 7.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia.

EQUITY—PARTIES—PLEADING—INJUNCTION—RES JUDICATA.

[In equity. Bill by the Adams Express Company against Joseph Davison, the Washington, Alexandria & Georgetown Railroad Company, Oscar A. Stevens, and W. Jackson Phelps.]

CHASE, Circuit Justice, delivered opinion of court.

Upon a careful consideration of the pleadings, proofs and arguments in this case, we have reached the following conclusions:

(1) Adams Express Co. was not a party to the suit of Davison vs. The Washington, Alexandria & Georgetown R. R. Co. and others, in the circuit court of Alexandria Co., and, therefore, is not bound by any decree or order made in that cause.

(2) It is not necessary, in the case, to pass definitely upon the question, whether the lease made by the Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown R. R. Co. to Stevens & Phelps on the 5th day of May, 1866, was valid, or, for want of authority not valid, as a lease.

(3) The contracts of the Adams Express Co. with the Washington, Alexandria & Georgetown R. R. Co. and with Stevens & Phelps, representing that company, and in actual charge of the railroad with its consent, viz. the contracts of February 1st, 1866, and June 18th, 1866, were valid contracts, and under them the Adams Express Co. is equitably entitled to compensation for the rent or use of the rolling stock, including locomotive engines placed upon the road by it, and to the surrender of the property in good order, or to payment for its cost or present value with rent, or reasonable compensation for use, and also to reimbursement for moneys advanced for repairs made upon the engines of the railroad company used upon the road, and for repairs of the road; and, on the other hand, the Adams Express Company is bound to pay to the city of Washington such amount as may be ascertained to be due from the railroad company, not exceeding $60,000, and fulfill the other stipulations of the contract on its part.

(4) The contract of September 16, 1868, was between S. M. Shoemaker, on the one part, and Stevens and Phelps and Lathrop, receiver, on the other part, and there is sufficient proof that in making it Shoemaker was acting in behalf of the Adams Express Company.

(5) It is not shown by the contracts or other proof that the Washington, Alexandria & Georgetown R. R. Co. is bound to pay any expenses incurred by the Adams Express Co., or Stevens and Phelps for attorney or counsel fees in litigation, concerning the road or rolling stock or for services of Shoemaker as trustee.

(6) At the time the original injunction was allowed in this cause, Marbury was not in possession of the railroad as receiver appointed by circuit court of Alexandria county, and the Adams Express Co., not being a party to or bound by the proceeding in which Marbury was appointed, was not defeated of its right to seek relief by its suit in the court. It is therefore ordered the injunction heretofore allowed be continued, with leave to complainant to amend the bill making S. M. Shoemaker a party defendant, and that the cause be referred to Andrew Jameison, who is hereby appointed a master in chancery for this purpose, who is directed to examine the depositions and documents already taken or filed in the cause, and to take further depositions, if necessary, upon such reasonable notice to all parties to this suit as he may think necessary to give them due opportunity to attend and to report: (1) What engines or other rolling stock have been placed upon the road by the Adams Express Company at the instance of the Washington, Alexandria & Georgetown R. R. Co. or of Stevens & Phelps as its lessees or agents, the original cost, the present condition, and present value of that property, and the amount of rent accrued or of fair compensation for use. (2) The sums which have been paid and the sums which remain due to the Adams Express Company for the use or rental of engines, cars, or other rolling stock employed upon such road, and separately the sums paid or due to S. M. Shoemaker under his contract with Stevens and Phelps and Lathrop, receiver. (3) The sums paid by the Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown R. R. Co., if any, on account for purchase of such engines, cars, or other rolling stock from the express company. (4) The sums advanced by the Adams Express Company for the repair of the road or other use of the railroad company under their contracts not included under previous heads. (5) The sums paid by the Adams Express Company in satisfaction of the claim of the city of Washington, or in payment of interest on the bonded debt of the company or for sinking fund. (6) In making the foregoing statements, the master will exclude all charges for counsel or attorneys' fees, and for services of Shoemaker as trustee, but he may, if either party desire, make a separate statement of such charges, and report such facts relating thereto as may appear to him useful to a correct understanding of the rights of the parties.

And said master is directed, further, to state a general account between the Express Co. and R. R. Co., showing at one view balances, if any, due to the former upon the several suppositions already stated, and to accompany such account with a sufficient statement of his reasons for his conclusions, and to file his report with the clerk of the court within ——— days. And for the coming in of said master's report, and for further order, this cause is continued.

ADAMSON v. DEDRICK.

[2 O. G. 523.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 17, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—VALIDITY.

Patent of Charles H. Dedrick, "Improvement in the Manufacture of Soles and Heels of Boots and Shoes from Hides," adjudged invalid.

In equity.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge.

This was a suit in equity, brought by William Adamson against Charles H. Dedrick, under the provisions of section 58 of the patent act of 1870, for the purpose of setting aside certain letters patent [No. 127,964] granted to the defendant June 18, 1872, and alleged in the bill to be for the same invention as the patent granted to complainant January 31, 1865. The invention, as set forth in defendant's patent, had for its object the economizing of time, labor, and material in the manufacture of the soles and heels of boots and shoes, and it consisted in cutting from the raw hide pieces approximately of the form required and applying the tanning process to these pieces alone. There was thus saved the additional time, labor, and material that otherwise would have been required in tanning the "waste pieces;" the cuttings, being in the condition of raw-hide, and not of tanned leather, were valuable for glue and other purposes, and it was claimed that the soles and heels produced were of better quality. The complainant's patent was for precisely the same invention, except that he did not limit himself in the application of this process to the manufacture of boots and shoes; his claim being for:

Cutting from raw or untanned hides or skins, or parts of the same, pieces of the size or about the size and form required for useful articles of tanned leather, and tanning the said pieces after they had been thus cut from the raw or untanned hides, as and for the purpose herein set forth.

The bill was filed on the 24th day of July, 1872, and the writ of subpoena issued thereupon was duly served upon the defendant; but the defendant failed to enter an appearance, and thereupon, viz., on the 17th day of October, 1872, the court, upon motion of C. Howson, Esq., counsel for complainant, granted a decree declaring said patent of De-drick wholly invalid, inoperative, and void.

ADDERLY v. AMERICAN MUT. INS. CO. OF BALTIMORE.

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov., 1847.

MARINE INSURANCE—SEAWORTHINESS—NECESSITY TO REPAIR LEAK.

1. In order to entitle the plaintiff to recover for a loss on a policy of insurance on his vessel, she must, at the time the policy attached, have been seaworthy for such a voyage as she was engaged in at the time of the disaster, and have been lost by reason of one of the perils insured against in the policy.

2. She is presumed to have been seaworthy at that time, unless the contrary is proved by the testimony; and the burden of proof of unseaworthiness is on the defendant.

3. If there was a leak in the vessel, at the time of sailing on the voyage insured for, of such a nature, that a prudent and discreet master, of competent skill and judgment, would have deemed it necessary to examine and repair the leak, before proceeding on the voyage, and the disaster was occasioned by his omission to do so, and would not otherwise have happened, there can be no recovery for the loss.

[Cited in The Titania, 19 Fed. Rep. 106. and in Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 546, 124 U. S. 405.

4. But if the character of the leak were such, that a master of competent skill and judgment might reasonably have supposed that she was seaworthy for the voyage in which she was then engaged, notwithstanding the leak, and on that account, omitted to examine and repair, then such omission to examine and repair will be no bar to the recovery.

In admiralty. This action was instituted on the 31st October, 1846. The plaintiff was a British subject, residing at Nassau, the owner of the brig Victoria; and he brought this action against the American Mutual Inurance Company of Baltimore, upon a policy of insurance effected on said vessel, which was lost on the voyage insured for. The defence taken was unseaworthiness at the time of the insurance; and negligence on the part of the master or owner, after the voyage had commenced. The facts of the case do not appear, except in the following prayers, on the part of the plaintiff and defendant, and the court's instructions to the jury.

Plaintiff's Prayers.

1. That the question of seaworthiness, or unseaworthiness, is a question for the jury; and that the presumption is that the brig was seaworthy, till the contrary is proved.

2. That the burden of proof of unseaworthiness is upon the defendant.

3. That in determining whether the vessel was seaworthy or not the jury are to regard the whole evidence; and that part of the evidence bearing on said question, consists of the reports made to the said defendant and other underwriters in Baltimore, by their agent, Captain Clackner, and the fact of the receipt of the premium on the policy, after the defendant had been made acquainted with the particulars of the disaster which had happened to the brig, as the same were set forth in the papers delivered to them by the plaintiff's agent.

4. That although a leak may have been sprung on the second day after leaving Long Island, and continued for the time stated in the evidence; yet, that if on the third day, being the day of the brig's touching at Nassau, and some time before reaching there, the leak stopped, and the vessel did not spring a leak for between three and four days after leaving Nassau, and the leak was then caused by stress of heavy weather and high seas, then that there was no negligence on the part of the master or owner, in not causing said vessel to be carried into Nassau for examination and repairs.

Defendant's Prayers.

1. The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury that, before the plaintiff can recover in this case for the loss of the brig mentioned in the policy sued on, the jury must find that, at the commencement of the risk, the brig was tight, staunch, strong and well found for a voyage from Long Island to New Orleans, by way of Nassau, with a cargo of salt; and that neither her construction nor the materials of which she was built, were such as to render her unfit to encounter the ordinary sea-perils of such a voyage.

2. The defendant further prays the court to instruct the jury that, if they find from the evidence, that upon the first day after leaving Long Island, with her cargo of salt, the said brig began to leak, so that it was necessary to pump her every half-hour, and that she continued to leak until her arrival at Key West, where she was condemned as utterly unseaworthy, by the report of the surveyors, given in evidence, and that she commenced leaking in this manner in moderate weather, without any apparent cause, or extraordinary accident, to which the leaking could be ascribed, and that the leak continued for four or five days before the brig encountered any heavy weather or high seas at all, there is a strong presumption that the brig was unseaworthy when she sailed from Long Island; and in the absence of any proof, on the part of the plaintiff, of any sea-peril occurring to the brig, between the time the risk commenced and when she began to leak, sufficient to produce the leak, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

3. The defendant further asks the court to instruct the jury that, if they find the facts stated in the preceding prayer, and further find that the said brig, upon the second day after leaving Long Island, being in a condition to need repairs, and after she had been for a day leaking so badly that it was found necessary to pump her every half-hour, arrived off Nassau, her home port, where she could have been fully repaired, and where the master went ashore at 10 P. M. of one day, and returned at 10 A. M. on the following day, after having communicated with the owners and received his instructions to proceed upon the voyage to New Orleans—under all these circumstances there was negligence on the part of the master or owner, in not having the brig examined and repaired at Nassau, and the defendant is not liable for any subsequent loss or damages to said vessel, which was produced or increased by such negligence.

R. Johnson and J. M. Campbell, for plaintiff.

Brown & Brune, for defendant.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. 1. In order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, the vessel must have been seaworthy at the time the policy attached; that is to say, seaworthy for such a voyage as she was engaged in at the time of the disaster; and have been lost by reason of one of the perils insured against in the policy.

2. But she is presumed to have been seaworthy at that time, unless the jury find the contrary is proved by the testimony; and the burden of the proof of unseaworthiness is on the defendant.

3. If, when the vessel touched at Nassau, the leak, mentioned in the testimony, was such, that a prudent and discreet master, of competent skill and judgment, would have deemed it necessary to examine and repair the leak before proceeding on the voyage, and the jury find that the disaster was occasioned by his omission to do so, and would not otherwise have happened, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

4. But if the jury find that, from the character of the leak, a master of competent skill and judgment might reasonably have supposed that she was seaworthy for the voyage in which she was then engaged, notwithstanding the leak, and on that account omitted to examine and repair, then such omission to examine or repair the vessel at Nassau, is no bar to the recovery of the plaintiff.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Case No. 76.

In re ADDISON.

[3 Hughes, 430.]¹

District Court, E. D. Virginia. April Term, 1874.

DISTRICT COURT—JURISDICTION IN BANKRUPTCY—LIQUIDATION OF LIENS — DISCRETION OF COURT — POWER OF REGISTER.

1. The bankrupt court has exclusive jurisdiction to liquidate the liens upon a bankrupt's real estate; but whether it will exercise this jurisdiction in any case is a matter for its own discretion, and this discretion must be exercised by the court itself, and cannot be delegated to or assumed by the register.

2. It is irregular to undertake to sell real estate free from incumbrances until all liens and their priorities are fully ascertained.

In bankruptcy. The case as shown by the record is as follows: John Addison, Jr., the present bankrupt, by the partition of his father's real estate, became the owner of a tract of land situated in Northampton county, Virginia. Under the decree of partition liens were retained for owelty of partition in favor of the estate of Edward V. Addison for \$895, Bettie E. Fisher for \$198.33 $\frac{1}{2}$, and William R. Fisher for \$420, upon the tract called Grapeland, which was assigned and set apart to him. In January, 1866, the said Addison conveyed to Mrs. E. A. Turner, by mortgage deed, this tract of land, subject to the aforesaid liens for owelty of partition, to secure a loan of \$4530.86, with interest thereon at the rate of six per centum per annum. In 1872 Mrs. Turner brought her suit on the chancery side of the circuit court of Northampton county for a foreclosure of her mortgage and a sale of the mortgaged premises. In 1873, before a sale could be had under decree of the state court, Addison took the benefit of the bankrupt act, and thereupon all proceedings in the suit instituted in the state court were suspended. Edward D. Pitts, one of the petitioners, was appointed assignee of said bankrupt, and upon his petition an order of sale of the said tract of land was made by the district court of the United States at Norfolk. In August, 1873, the land was sold by the said assignee and purchased by Mrs. Turner at the price of \$5300. The sale was reported by the assignee to the register and approved by him, and he proceeded to ascertain the liens and their priorities upon the fund, in the hands of the assignee, arising from the sale. Upon the coming in of the register's report, ascertaining the liens and their priorities upon the said fund, Mrs. Turner excepted to the same upon the following grounds: 1st. Because out of the fund arising from the mortgaged subject, E. P. Pitts, a creditor, was allowed the sum of \$125.90, with interest, and the said sum given priority over her debt secured by mortgage. 2d. Because John Addison, Jr., the bankrupt, was allowed \$525.39 with interest, out of the said fund, and the said sum given priority over her debt secured as aforesaid; and 3d. Because T. C. Walston, assignee in bankruptcy of John Addison, Sr., was allowed the sum of \$184.77, with interest, out of the sale of the land on which she held a mortgage. The court sustained each and all of these exceptions, and directed the assignee to pay: 1st. The liens for owelty of partition; and, 2d. The balance of the money in his hands from the sale of the said tract of land over to Mrs. E. A. Turner. E. D. Pitts, the assignee in bankruptcy, and Walston, assignee in bankruptcy of John Addison, Sr., did not ask the action of the court below to be reviewed. But E. P. Pitts, the creditor, petitioned for a review. The claim of this petitioner was a judgment obtained in the circuit court of Northampton county in November, 1872, by John Addison, Jr. (now bankrupt), against W. R. Fisher, and assigned by Addison before his bankruptcy to E. P. Pitts. At the time of the assignment of this judgment by Addison to Pitts, Addison was largely more indebted to Fisher than the amount of the judgment recovered against Fisher and assigned to Pitts. Upon this judgment thus assigned, Pitts caused an execution of fieri facias to issue against the goods and chattels of Fisher. Fisher enjoined in the state court the collection of this judgment for \$125.90, and upon a hearing of the case the injunction was perpetuated and the judgment of \$125.90 was, by the decree of the said circuit court, directed to be applied as a payment pro tanto upon the amount due Fisher by Addison, as an equitable set-off. See Wayland v. Tucker, 4 Grat. 267. That court held that Pitts was substituted to the rights of Addison by the assignment of the judgment, and took the judgment subject to be set off against Fisher's unsatisfied lien for owelty of partition, and to be extinguished by that lien. It was so ordered by a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, and the subject was res adjudicata. But the register in bankruptcy overruled this adjudication of the circuit court, and allowed this judgment, which had been thus satisfied, priority over Mrs. Turner's debt, and directed the assignee to pay it a second time out of the money in the custody of the court. Upon exception, the district court reversed the register.

Upon this ruling of the district court, E. P. Pitts, the creditor, appealed to the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, which affirmed the decree of the district court.

The following was the decision of the district court, rendered by HUGGLES, District Judge:

This bankrupt's farm, in Northampton county, worth some $6000, was incumbered by undisputed owelty and mortgage liens to the amount of about $9000. The register, B. B. Foster, ordered the land to be sold free of incumbrances, before any previous ascertainment of liens and their priorities. The sale was made by the assignee, E. D. Pitts, and duly reported. The register confirmed the sale. The register then drew up a report of the liens upon the land, and of their priorities. Exceptions were taken to this report by the mortgagee and principal lienor, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Turner. On these exceptions the case comes for the first time before this court since the order of reference. These proceedings seem to require an announcement of the principles which will govern the court in dealing with real estate incumbered by liens equal to, or exceeding its value, where the probability is small of the bankrupt's estate having any interest in a surplus, or equity of redemption.

Since Judge Story's decision in the Case of Christy, reported in 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292, the very language of which is embodied in the jurisdictional clauses of the general bankrupt act of 1867, no doubt has been entertained of the power of a bankruptcy court of the United States to control the entire estate of the bankrupt, both contingent and actual, whether it be not or be the subject of litigation in other courts, and in whatever stage of litigation. Whether, therefore, a bankrupt court will exercise its jurisdiction over such part of the bankrupt's estate as may be the subject of litigation in other courts, or be covered by liens equal to or exceeding its value is not a question of power and right, but only of discretion.

For obvious reasons the bankrupt court must reserve to itself, in every case, the decision of the question whether or not it will exercise this discretion. And, therefore, no assignee of a bankrupt can have power to sell real estate, which is subject to liens, free of incumbrances, without a special order of court. The register has no power to confer such authority. It can come only from the court itself. The exercise of this authority involves considerations of great delicacy, inasmuch as it often produces a conflict of jurisdiction with other courts. The idea is not to be tolerated that any but the court itself may assume to exercise a discretion so important and so responsible. This discretion, reposed by law in the bankrupt court, cannot be delegated by it, either by general rule or special order, to either the assignee or the register; much less can the discretion be assumed by either of those officers. Rule 38, of the series of rules adopted by this court on the 21st day of September, 1869, cannot logically, and must not in fact be construed to delegate such a discretion; nor does the order (form No. 4) or reference to the register intrust to that officer the exercise of such a discretion.

In the exercise, itself, of this often delicate discretion, this court will not interfere with trustees or local courts in their proceedings to subject real estate to unquestioned liens, where there is little probability of a surplus or of an equity of redemption resulting to the bankrupt's estate; but the court will content itself with requiring the assignee to become party to suits or to trustee's sales. Where there is nothing to be sold that is likely to be available to the assignee, any action of this court for the liquidation and settlement of such liens and for the sale of property subject to them, would cause a useless expense both to the lienors and the bankrupt's estate, producing nothing. Interference of this unavailing character, besides being futile of any good to the bankrupt's estate, would unnecessarily take away from the persons really interested in the land the right of having their liens adjudicated by the courts of the counties where they reside and where the property subject to the lien lies—a right which is not lightly to be disregarded.

I am, therefore, free to say, that if this matter of the Grapeland farm, or John Addison, Jr., bankrupt, had come before me in its inception, I should not have interfered with the proceedings of the circuit court of Northampton county, looking to a foreclosure of the mortgage of Mrs. E. A. Turner, and to a settlement and discharge of the owelty and mortgage liens resting upon that farm, it being confessedly worth less than $6000, and those liens amounting to $9000. There was plainly no possibility of a resulting surplus or equity of redemption to the bankrupt's estate; no possibility of any tangible interest having passed, under the operation of the 14th section of the bankrupt law, to the assignee. But finding the case here, as I do, under these circumstances, and those who would have a right to complain of its having been brought here being willing now to acquiesce in the action of this court, I will give to the matters before me such adjudication as seems proper.

I am to pass upon the exceptions which have been taken by the mortgage creditor, Mrs. E. A. Turner, to the report and orders of the register of the 11th and 14th of October, 1873.

1st. Her first exception is to the register's allowance of the claim of $125.90 to E. P. Pitts in the form of a judgment in favor of John Addison, Jr. (now bankrupt), v. W. R. Fisher, one of the owelty lienors, which was assigned to Pitts before the bankruptcy. It is conceded that as against Fisher this judgment is extinguished, it having been subject to the right of set-off which Fisher had against Addison for an owelty lien of $420 on the Grapeland farm; a court of competent jurisdiction having decreed that it should be applied as a credit upon that owelty debt due Fisher. This decree of the local court was rendered on the principle that the equity of Fisher was superior to that of Pitts. But it is claimed that Pitts was substituted somehow to the rights of Fisher, and stands in Fisher's shoes as a lienor, to the extent of his judgment, against Addison's land, which he had mortgaged to this exceptant. It is not shown how this substitution has taken place. Pitts has no other rights than Addison himself could have had if the judgment had not been assigned. By the transfer he was simply substituted to the rights of Addison. He took the judgment subject to its liability to be set off against Fisher's owelty claim, and to be annulled and extinguished as a part of that lien. It was thus annulled by decree of the local court. As a lien it is res adjudicata. Pitts's recourse is against Addison, or his estate, of which he is only a general creditor. His equity is for compensation out of that estate. Mrs. Turner's equity as to her debt is for payment out of the estate generally, and out of the mortgage subject especially, after the unpaid owelty liens have been paid. Pitts is only a general creditor. Mrs. Turner is a general and a lien creditor, and her equity is superior to that of Pitts. The exception to this allowance out of the mortgage fund must therefore be sustained, and the allowance disapproved.

2d. This mortgagee's second exception must be sustained upon a somewhat similar ground. The bankrupt, John Addison, Jr., was a devisee of Joseph W. Addison before the partition which gave Grapeland to John in his own right and as Joseph's devisee, subject to owelty liens, and also, as to Joseph's interest, subject to the general debts of this devisor. Shortly after the partition, and after coming into possession of Grapeland, he mortgaged the farm for a debt to Mrs. Turner, conveying all his right, title, and interest, individually and as devisee, to her with general warranty. By transactions which need not be recited, John Addison, Jr., himself, afterwards and before his bankruptcy, became the holder of a debt against Joseph's estate, for which the register now allows him $525.39. This debt was also allowed on some undefined doctrine of substitution. By taking in this debt of Joseph Addison and becoming himself its owner, John's mortgage deed became operative against it in his own hands. Mrs. Turner's equity against it as his property, under his own mortgage deed, is certainly superior to any equity he may have against her; and the register's allowance of this $525.39 to Addison, as an exemption, cannot be approved.

3d. The mortgagee's third exception is to the register's allowance of $184.77 to Thomas C. Walston, assignee in bankruptcy of John Addison, Senior's, estate, as a general creditor of Joseph Addison, deceased, devisor of John Addison, Jr. As a claim in prejudice of Mrs. Turner's mortgage lien, the allowance cannot stand. John Addison, Jr., took Joseph's interest in Grapeland as devisee as early as the fall of 1865; and he mortgaged his whole interest to Mrs. Turner in 1866 by recorded deed. As late as November 4th, 1873, the clerk of the county and circuit courts of Northampton county certified that there had been no qualification on the estate of Joseph Addison, deceased, and no fiduciary accounts; that no classified account of debts was ever returned to the clerk's office of either of the courts, and that no suits were brought or were pending in said courts for the settlement of the estate. The bona fides of the mortgage deed is not questioned, and section 5, c. 127, p. 934, of the Code of Virginia, provided that the bona fide conveyance by a devisee of real estate shall be good against creditors of the estate in cases where, at the time of such conveyance, no suit shall have been commenced for the administration of assets, nor any reports have been filed of the debts and demands of those entitled. The representative of Addison, Senior, therefore, claiming upon a debt of the deceased deviser, chargeable against his devisee, cannot make good his claim against the mortgagee of Grapeland, an innocent purchaser, without notice, and he ranks only as a general creditor of this bankrupt. The allowance to Walston is disapproved.

EQUITY—PLEADING—ANSWER—VERIFICATION.

An answer in chancery is not sufficiently authenticated unless the authority of the justice of the peace, before whom it was sworn, be sufficiently shown.

[In equity.] Injunction. Motion to dissolve. It was objected that the answer does not appear to be sworn, &c., there being no certificate but that of the justice himself, that he was a justice of the peace for Prince George's county, in Maryland, at the time he administered the oath. This court has never gone so far as to admit an answer sworn and certified in this manner. In England, the answer is taken by commission.

THE COURT refused to consider the answer as sufficiently certified, and refused to dissolve the injunction. The court cited the cases of Wright v. West, [Case No. 18,102,] and Lloyd v. The ADELE.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1867.

PRACTICE—PRIORITIES—STATE LIENS.

1. Where several libels were filed against a ship by material men, and the vessel was sold, and application was made to the court to decree payment out of the proceeds, the last libel filed being to enforce a lien given by the law of the state of New York: Held, that the court had no jurisdiction to enforce the state lien.

2. The other decrees should be paid in the order in which the libels were filed, each decree being paid with its costs until the fund was exhausted.

[Cited in The Arcturus, 18 Fed. Rep. 744, and in The Lady Boone, 21 Fed. Rep. 733.]

In admiralty. Several libels were filed by material men claiming liens against the ship Adele. The vessel was sold without opposition, and the proceeds paid into court, and the several libellants, having had the reports of the commissioner as to their several amounts confirmed by the court, applied to the court to decree payment out of the funds. The libel last filed was by Charles Wall and others for supplies, but they claimed a priority in payment over all the others. [Libel dismissed.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. Decrees in favor of the material men, on their several libels, according to the amounts found due on confirmation of the commissioner's reports in the several cases, are to be entered and satisfied, out of the funds in the registry of the court arising out of the sale of the ship, in the order in which the libels were filed. The amount of each decree, together with the costs, in the above named order, is first to be paid, until the fund is exhausted. The claim of priority set up by the libellants, Charles Wall and others, is disallowed. The libel in this latter case seeks to enforce the lien given by the local law of the state of New York, and not to enforce the lien given by the general maritime law. Since the alteration of the twelfth rule of the supreme court of the United States, these local liens cannot be enforced by proceedings in rem in this court, although the language of the rule, as modified, refers only to domestic ships. The object of that court in the alteration was to relieve the courts of the United States from the "necessity of examining and expounding the varying lien laws of the state, and of carrying them into execution." The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 530. This libel avers no lien, except that under the state law, but expressly avers that the libellants filed specifications and items of the articles furnished in the county clerk's office in the county of New York, under the state law, and that the claim thereby became a lien. As I understand the law, the process in rem cannot be used in this court for the enforcement of such a local lien, and, therefore, this court is without jurisdiction. Let a decree be entered, dismissing this case of Charles Wall and others, without costs.

The ADELIA.

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1874.

TOWAGE—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. A contract for towage requires from the tug that degree of care and skill which prudent navigators usually employ.

2. When towage is voluntarily attempted in dangerous and perilous places, the tug must exercise skill and care commensurate with the perils it assumes to encounter.

3. The burden rests upon the libellant, who seeks damages from negligent towage service, to prove that the injury resulted from the fault of the tug.

In admiralty. Libel in rem for damages sustained from negligent and improper towage service. Defense that the injury resulted from inevitable accident. The cause was heard on libel, claim, answer and proof. [Decree for libellants.]

A. A. Strout and John C. Dodge, for libellants.

Wm. L. Putnam, for claimants.

FOX, District Judge. This steam tug is proceeded against by the owners of the schooner Harry L. Whitten of Quincy, to recover the damages sustained by said schooner being forced upon the rocks on the eastern shore of the Kennebec river above Gardner, when the tug was attempting to wind her preparatory to towing her to sea. The injury took place in the forenoon of May 26, 1873. The H. L. Whitten is a new three masted vessel of 481 tons, and had taken on board a full cargo of ice at the Knickerbocker loading pier at Farmingdale. On the morning in question, she was winded by her master and crew with warps and the force of the current while at this pier, and without the aid of a tug, and then dropped down river 400 to 500 yards and came to anchor.

The Adelia is a powerful tug of greater steam capacity than any other then employed on the river, surpassed at that time by one only on the Penobscot, all other tow boats in this state being much inferior to her; the claimants, the Knickerbocker Towage Co., control the towage business on this river, and they had at that time contracted for a more powerful tug, and it has since been completed, and is now employed in the business upon the river and at sea. The loading wharf of the ice company is on the western shore, is built upon a shoal in three blocks or piers of logs, is about 250 feet wide on the river, and extends from the bank into the river about 300 feet at the upper corner and nearly to the channel, where there was at this time about fourteen feet at low water, the freshet which had increased the depth about four feet at its height, having fallen about one half on May 26. The current of the river as it passed by the upper corner of the loading pier run at the rate of four to five knots, and set strongly towards the eastern shore, forming an eddy in front of the piers, which was of a triangular form about 100 feet in width at its base, which was a short distance below the lowest pier. From these piers there was a depth of about fourteen feet, for a width of 300 feet. On the eastern shore, 500 to 600 feet below the lower pier, a shoal extends about half way across the river with large rocks upon it. The center of the current passed near the outer point of this shoal, and then turned towards the west shore. In this condition of things the master of the Adelia, with the tide about two hours flood, made fast with the usual lines to the starboard side of the schooner, and after her anchor was free, took the entire control of both vessels, being at his wheel, with the master of the schooner at her helm. Steam was put on, the vessels were taken slowly up river, just below the pier they swung off somewhat into the eddy, the object being to place the stern of the schooner in the eddy, there to be retained by the tug, whilst the bows by the force of the current would be swung round, so that the vessel could be properly guided by the tow ahead. In the present case it unfortunately happened that the stern of the vessel was not held and retained in the eddy, but she was taken out bodily into the current, and was set by the force of the current at the same time down river, and over towards the eastern shore, forcibly striking upon the rocks on the shoal, and with such violence as to do great damage to her keel and garboard, causing her to fill with water and sink on the western shore, where she was towed by the tug. She was subsequently taken into the Portland dry dock, and there repaired at considerable expense, for the recovery of which this libel is instituted.

"It must be conceded that an engagement to tow does not impose either an obligation to insure or the liability of common carriers. The burden is always upon him, who alleges the breach of such a contract, to show either that there has been no attempt at performance, or that there has been negligence or unskillfulness to his injury in the performance. The contract requires no more than that he who undertakes to tow shall carry out his undertaking with that degree of caution and skill, which prudent navigators usually employ in similar services; but there may be cases in which the result is a safe criterion by which to judge of the character of the act which has caused it." The Webb, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 414.

In The Syracuse, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 171, the court says: "It (the law) does require on the part of those persons engaged in her management (a towboat,) the exercise of reasonable care, caution, and maritime skill, and if these are neglected and disaster occurs, the towing boat must be visited with the consequences."

In Transportation Co. v. Downer, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 134, the language is: "A presumption of negligence from the simple occurrence of an accident seldom arises, except when the accident proceeds from an act of such a character that when due care is taken in its performance, no injury ordinarily ensues from it in similar cases, or where it is caused by the mismanagement or misconstruction of a thing over which the defendant has immediate control, and for the management or construction of which he is responsible."

Guided by these authorities, does the evidence in the present case establish negligence or want of care on the part of the master of the tug, it being admitted that the master and those on board the schooner in no way contributed to the disaster? It is said that the place chosen for winding this vessel was dangerous and unsafe, and that it might have been safely accomplished at the anchorage. The testimony shows that on some occasions vessels had been winded near where this vessel was at anchor, but that the most usual practice had been to take them up into the eddy, and avail themselves of the two counteracting forces, that of the eddy to hold and the current to wind the vessel, and that this had in every instance been successful; but none of these vessels were so large as the Whitten; that the place selected was much more dangerous than that near the anchorage the court cannot doubt, as the current was much stronger, and the shoal and rocks necessarily endangered the safety of the vessel, if she became beyond the control of the tug; but the advantages from the eddy and current combined greatly contributed to the ease and speed with which the winding could be accomplished, whilst at the other place there was no eddy to profit by, and the winding could only be done by the tug moving to and fro in a narrow space, though somewhat wider than at the piers. It is said that there would be danger from a collision with the bridge at Gardner, if for any cause the tug did not wind the schooner at the first attempt; but this objection does not appear to the court of any great weight, considering the distance more than a half mile, which the bridge was below the anchorage. The court has little doubt that the anchorage was the safest place for this object, and that the main reason why it was not there attempted was, that ordinarily the winding was much sooner accomplished in the other position, and without the trouble attending the backward and forward movements of the tug, which were requisite in still water to wind the vessel successfully.

Under the circumstances the court does not discover that want of proper care on the part of the master of the tug in attempting to wind the schooner at the place he did, which should subject the tug to liability for this disaster. The master of the tug well knew all the dangers which attended this locality, which were neither few nor small. He knew the current there was more violent than at the anchorage, that the width of river for his movements did not exceed 300 feet, with the current setting strongly to the easterly shore as well as downward, that the shoal with the rocks thereon projected nearly half the width of the river and into the current, and that if the tow should become unmanageable and escape the control of the tug, she must be taken down broadside by the current and thrown upon the shoal and rocks, inevitably subjecting her to damage; that in order to prevent this, it was absolutely requisite that the tow should be held back, and not presented broadside to the current, and to accomplish it, that the stern and larger portion of the hull of the vessel must not be allowed to pass out of the eddy, but must without fail be held therein, as when the tow was beyond the eddy the tug was powerless to govern her, either by preventing her shooting on towards the eastern shore, or swinging her bow down river so that she could pass down with the current. Knowing as the master must all these dangers, and if he did not know them then he was not qualified for his position, and having without consultation with the master of the schooner chosen to make the attempt to wind her in that locality, in the opinion of the court, a much higher degree of care, skill, and attention was demanded of him, than if he had undertaken the same movement under circumstances free from danger. If the place selected had been deep, broad, open, still water, free from rocks and shoals, it is clear that the master would not have been expected to exercise the same carefulness and attention and good judgment as to the speed and management of his tug, and in holding the tow always under instant control, as he would when there was great and immediate danger, with strong forces to contend with, which if not properly met involved the destruction of the property under his charge. In the one case, the consequences attending his neglect would not ordinarily result in loss or damage to any great extent; the tow by reason of too great speed might run nearer the shore, or from want of proper control might run ashore upon soft bottom, but no injury would probably be sustained thereby; whilst in the other position, with rocks and shoals and rapids to encounter, if the tow was not entirely in control of the tug, by running a space of not more than fifty feet from the intended course, she might subject the tow to immediate peril and disaster.

The tug is only chargeable with reasonably proper skill and care; but in the opinion of the court, these are relative terms, and must be understood to be such as are reasonable and proper, and demanded by the peculiar circumstances and emergencies of the case. The master admits that everything depended on availing himself of the eddy; that his motive in attempting to wind the vessel at this place was wholly the combined forces resulting from the eddy by retaining the stern, whilst the current swung round the bow, and that if he lost the eddy and run out of it, his tug was powerless to save the vessel. He admits that he failed to accomplish his intended purpose; and in the opinion of the court the circumstances attending the disaster are such as to require of him a reasonable and satisfactory explanation of the cause and occasion, and why the result in the present case was so very different from what had been previously the case.

The master of the tug testifies: "After they started ahead I gave the speed bell as was my practice; I steamed ahead for the Knickerbocker wharf, and when within 300 feet of the lower pier slowed down and let her range up toward the pier; the vessels' headway nearly stopped, and finding I was not going to reach out just as I wanted, I touched her up with the slow bell that she might range further up; ranged out by the lower pier and everything looked well in my judgment for a good swing; could not ask for anything better than it looked at that time. The tide took the vessel, and as soon as her bow ranged into the main current, gave the engineer the bell to back her and back her strong. The tide took her and we ranged off from that pier sidewise to the current until we went down onto the shoal and rocks, when she swung round and I shoved her onto the other shore.

I went up as high as I did because I wanted the stern of the schooner to come right up to the lower pier, with her quarter just as near as I could have it, in order to get the advantage of the eddy. I wanted the eddy to take the stern while the current took the bow, which enables her to turn on her keel." He states: "When within 300 feet of the pier the engine was stopped entirely; when I touched her up she was about up to the pier; I think it was between her bow and fore-rigging. She was not going fast enough to suit me, gave her only eight to twelve revolutions and then stopped her." To the inquiry, what in your opinion occasioned the accident? the master answers: "The current was very strong, the vessel large, and I got deceived; we fell off and I lost my eddy." The master further states: "After I brought the vessel nearly to a standstill, I gave her a few turns ahead, and when I stopped the engine I waited for her to reach the main tide; her bow then was not within fifty or seventy-five feet of it; she was working up and out; in my opinion two more backward revolutions of the propeller would have saved her going onto the rock. Just as soon as I saw her bow strike the main tide I went back strong; when I first apprehended trouble she was in the current; the schooner did not stop dead at any time, she was ranging ahead a very little, not over a quarter of a knot; they had some little steerage way on the tow."

The account given by the engineer of the orders received by him from the master, respecting the handling of his engine, substantially agree with the master's statements, and they are in most respects corroborated by the testimony of Cox, who was a passenger on the tug. He states: "The schooner's bow swung out by the pier and commenced swinging into the river all the time. She went ahead very slowly, not running one half a knot per hour, went 5,070 feet from the lower corner of the pier, was perhaps two-thirds her length from the pier when she began to feel the current sensibly. When she struck the current, she was almost at a standstill, as far as moving ahead was concerned, but she moved down river quite rapidly at the time she struck the main current; heard bell to stop engine before we got up to pier, and she slackened her speed; next signal was one bell to go ahead. This was before her bow struck the current; next signal was three or four seconds after, to back and commenced backing violently." Cox further states: "The captain of the tug remarked, as the bow shot out past the pier 'it won't do to back her here, I shall have her stern in onto the rocks,' and then he immediately rung his bell to go ahead and she started ahead under the impulse of the movement. When he made this remark he was in the eddy, not entirely out by the pier. When he started her ahead, she went from two to three knots, about two. She seemed to accelerate her speed a little when she struck the current."

The testimony in behalf of the libellants represents the movements of the tug as essentially different in many respects. The master of the schooner says: "They shoved her off at an angle with the stream; they stopped steam on the boat until about seventy-five feet from the lower pier, the schooner then going ahead about two knots, forcing her ahead angling with the river; as she struck the current that set down, her bow took that and swung her off, and as she struck the tide, she started ahead faster than she was going, and gained speed; as she struck the current she fell off, directly across the river, drifted down with it abreast to the current, and when she got over on the other side of the channel, the captain rung for the boat to go astern. We were then fifty to seventy-five feet from the rocks; after she got down further, he rung for more speed to back her stronger, but she drifted down and in a very few seconds touched the rocks; did not go within seventy-five feet of lower pier; after she got square across the river, she did not turn any at all, but drifted bodily with the current; should judge she was within seventy-five feet of the rocks before any signal to back was given. If they had stopped the vessel still before she struck the current, they would have had a better command of her. When she struck the current she was going about two knots per hour, but as soon as she struck it, she gained headway; when her bow struck the current, her stern was in the tide current and all clear of the eddy." This latter statement he reiterates in cross-examination, saying: "I speak of what I saw; I think the first order of bell to stop was given near the pier, just before we struck the current; as near as I recollect, the next order was to back her, only about a minute after; heard no order to go ahead."

The mate says he should think they were about 100 feet from the place where they struck when they commenced to back.

Mr. Marshall who was on the shore near the place where the schooner anchored, and who was looking at the vessel says: "The schooner passed into the current, and when the tide struck her, she went right across the river, did not seem to turn any, went down river and struck on the rocks. Previous to this season don't remember of seeing a vessel taken up there and shot out the way this one was; they always winded them at the wharf, or between the pier and the anchorage in the eddy. In attempting to wind the schooner they went up past the eddy."

The libellants have also produced three witnesses who had for many years been well acquainted with the river at this locality, and with the usual course of handling vessels in the current and eddy. These men were all on the deck of the Stine, a schooner then loading at the wharf, and their attention was called by her movements to the course taken by the tug in the present instance. One of them, Millbridge, says: "The schooner's jibboom came up to the end of the Stine, and when it was lapping over our stern, she was about seventy-five feet outside the Stine; she struck the current and appeared to be sagging fast towards the eastern shore, this attracted my attention through fear of trouble. When they struck the current the stern of the tug could be seen by me and there was no ripple to show that she was backing or turning. When she struck out into the current the motion was very rapid, quickened very much."

Derry says: "I could see the stern of the tug when she was half the distance across, and did not see the propeller working or any ripple in the water; the schooner came up rapidly and shot out into the current. The jibboom came up by the quarter of the Stine and her bow was then touching the eddy; when she was at the highest point, should judge half her length was in the current or nearly so, and her flying jibboom might have been up as high as the Stine's main rigging."

Peacock says: "I could see no indications that the tug was backing; she was about two eighths across the river."

The court has more than once read over all the evidence for the purpose of satisfying itself as to the cause of the disaster, and without referring in detail to the evidence of the various witnesses, the conclusion at which it has arrived is, that the master of the tug when he began to move forward with the schooner in tow did not intend to go above the lower pier to accomplish the winding of her. It is shown by Marshall's testimony, that it had been the practice previously to make the attempt below this pier, the eddy being there of the greatest width, and the current not being as strong as it was toward the upper end of the pier. When the tug had reached the place where the master originally intended to wind her, he found he would fail to accomplish his purpose, as is quite evident from Cox's statement that the master said "it won't do to back here, I shall have her stern in on to the rocks." and he immediately rung to go ahead. The tow then was under way, and without doubt would have reached the current, if the master had not put on more steam; he did however, for a longer or shorter time, run with greater speed, and instead of striking the current squarely, he ranged up altogether beyond what had been customary, as is manifest from the testimony of the three men from the Stine, whose attention was attracted to the course of these vessels from apprehension of peril. The bow of the schooner was not placed in the current until she had run up so far that the eddy had become very narrow, probably not one half of its greatest width at its base, and as the master of the schooner says, her stern was in the current at the same time with her bow, by which the court understands that she went up near the eastern edge of the eddy, so that the greater portion of the hull would be, by the contraction of the eddy, exposed almost at the same instant to the force of the current, as the vessel ranged ahead. There is considerable discrepancy in the testimony as to the precise time when the tug began to back; those on the tug asserted that it was when she struck the eddy, whilst the master of the schooner and others on that side say it was not till within about seventy-five feet of the rocks; be this as it may, the result shows that the attempt was not made until it was futile, without effect, and should have been made sooner to have been successful.

In the opinion of the court, when the master of the tug found he could not safely wind the schooner below the pier, and that he must go further up, instead of putting on steam and running with more speed across and up the eddy, he should have remembered that by so doing, he was losing a large portion of the advantages from the eddy which were so necessary to accomplish his purpose, and he should, without fail, have retained the larger portion of the schooner's hull wholly within the eddy to aid him, instead of allowing her to pass without it and become exposed broadside to the current, in which position the master knew he could not control her movements, and that she would be subjected to imminent peril and disaster. In these respects the court finds there was a want of care and caution on the part of the tug, proportionate to the dangers to which the master by his conduct was subjecting the Whitten, and that for these reasons, the libellants are entitled to hold the tug accountable for damages sustained. Decree for libellants.

ADJUSTABLE WINDOW-SCREEN CO. v.
 BOUGHTON.

[1 Ban. & A. 327; 10 Phila. 251; 31 Leg.
 Int. 254.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 12, 1874.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REISSUE—CLAIM.

The reissued patent, granted to complainant, as assignee of Abner B. Magown, for an adjustable window-screen, held to be invalid, by reason of the claim being too broad, and comprehending the invention patented to Lewis S. Thompson, February 24, 1863, [No. 52,726.]

In equity.

[Bill by the Adjustable Window-Screen Company against John W. Boughton for the infringement of the reissue of patent No. 52,726. Bill dismissed.]

George E. Buckley, for complainant.
 Leonard Myers, for defendant.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The complainant's bill is founded upon letters patent, reissued to it, as assignee of Abner B. Magown, for an adjustable window screen. "The nature of the said invention consists of an adjustable window screen, composed of two or more frames, each frame being covered with wire or other gauze, and sliding within guides, attached to either or both of the frames, being so constructed that each screen, when completed, can be immediately adjusted to windows of various widths, without altering the screen, viz., without adding to, or deducting anything from, it." The novel merit of this screen consists in its adjustability to windows of various widths, after the gauze is attached to it. This is the only essential difference between it and the mosquito frame, patented by Lewis S. Thompson, on the 24th February, 1863, three years before the date of Magown's patent. Thompson's frame must first be fitted to the opening intended to be covered, and a netting, of suitable width, then attached to it. In Magown's, however, this separate adjustment of the frame and the netting is avoided, by its being composed of two frames covered with gauze, held together by a metallic guide, and, by sliding them in or out laterally, it may be fitted to the width of any opening. But the adaptability of both screens, to the purpose for which they are to be used, is due to the adjustability of thin frames. The frames must be, and are, capable of extension and contraction to fit them to openings of varying widths. This capability, therefore, is a fundamental condition of both inventions.

Now, Thompson was the first inventor of an adjustable frame for a window screen, and, I think, the frame forming the basis of Magown's invention, cannot be distinguished from it, in the principle of its construction, or the modes of its operation. Obviously, similar mechanical appliances—metallic clips or guides—are used, in both, to secure the same results, and they are alike adapted to the openings to which they are to be applied, by extending or contracting them in the guides. It is true, that Magown's screen is composed of two separate frames, but this is only a formal difference. Their conjunction is indispensable to the completeness of the screen, and, when united in the guides, they are adjusted in the same mode in which Thompson's frame is. Nor does this form of construction, secure a different, or more effective mode of adjustment of the frame. Its evident and only object, is, to effect the adjustability of the netting, so that, by its attachment to separate frames, sliding past each other, in the same guide, it is adaptable to any opening to which the combined frame is fitted. In this respect, it is an improvement upon Thompson's invention; but the use of the latter, is indispensable to its efficiency, and is the essential basis of it. By properly limiting his application, Magown might have been entitled to a patent for this improvement, but he could not appropriate what he did not invent. Under cover of securing his own invention, he cannot expand his claim to embrace the invention of another. The consequence of such an attempt, is to imperil his title to the product of his own mechanical skill. The reissued patent claims a window screen, the only apparent difference between which, and Thompson's, aside from the improvement referred to, is in its being composed of two separate frames. This, as before stated, is a formal and not a substantial difference. It is broad enough to comprehend Thompson's prior invention, and, upon such a footing, it cannot be sustained. The bill must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—REMOVAL OF ASSIGNEE—JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURT.

The removal of an assignee in bankruptcy by the district court, for a "cause which in its judgment renders such removal necessary or expedient," is not such a case or question as can be reviewed by the circuit court.

[Cited in Re Beck, 31 Fed. Rep. 555.]

In bankruptcy. Petition of review under sec. 2, bankrupt act.² [Dismissed.]

¹Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

²[Section 2 (14 Stat. 518) provides that the circuit courts "shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act; and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case in a court of equity."] Lehman Durr & Co. and other creditors of the bankrupt estate of Isaac Adler & Brothers, on the 17th of August, 1874, filed their petition in the district court, praying for the removal of P. H. Pitts and C. C. Carr, assignees of the bankrupt estate. The grounds upon which the removal was asked were that the assignees were squandering, mismanaging and illegally disposing of the assets of the bankrupts. The assignees answered, denying generally and specifically the averments of the petition, and the matter was referred to Joseph W. Burke, Esq., register, to take testimony and report his opinion upon the law and facts. On the 2d of September, 1874, Mr. Burke made his report, in which he found that the specific charges alleging particular acts of maladministration, collusion and fraud, were not sustained by the weight of evidence. He reported, however, that the assignees had disposed of and sold at private sale for $10,850, a large stock of goods valued at $22,000, without an order of court, and that no account was kept of the articles sold, the purchasers of the same, or of the amount for which such articles were sold. He also reported that the real property belonging to the bankrupt estate was subject to two mortgages, the amount due on which was about equal to the value of the property, and that the assignees, without any authority from the court, surrendered this real estate to the junior mortgagee, on condition that she would pay off the senior mortgage, and release all claim to the remainder that might be due on her mortgage after exhausting the security. These findings of the register seemed to be abundantly supported by the evidence. In fact, they were not disputed. It appeared from the evidence, very clearly, that in selling the stock of goods at private sale without an order of court, the assignees acted under the advice of their counsel; but the evidence does not clearly show that they were advised by their counsel not to keep an account of the articles sold, the persons to whom they were sold, and the amount received for each article. Nor did it appear that the transfer of the real estate to the second mortgagee was made by advice of counsel. Upon the coming in of the report of Mr. Burke, the court, upon consideration of the evidence, the report of the register and arguments of counsel, ordered that the assignees be removed. To review and reverse this action of the district court was the purpose of the petition of review.

H. A. Herbert, for petitioners.

S. F. Rice and J. Q. Smith, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. It is insisted by counsel for defendants that this court has no jurisdiction of the question presented, and this point necessarily first demands attention. Section 14 of the bankrupt act (Rev. St. § 5039) provides "that the court, after due notice and hearing, may remove an assignee for any cause which, in the judgment of the court, renders such removal necessary or expedient." It further provides that "at a meeting called by order of the court in its discretion for the purpose, or which shall be called upon the application of a majority of the creditors in number and value, the creditors may, with the consent of the court, remove any assignee by such a vote as is herein provided for the choice of assignees."

This section places the removal of an assignee entirely within the discretion of the district court, either acting alone or in connection with a meeting of the creditors. Can it be reasonably claimed that the action of the court in removing an assignee, or in consenting to a removal by a vote of the creditors is such a case or question as may be reviewed by virtue of the provisions of the second section of the act?

The court may remove "for any cause which, in its judgment, renders such removal necessary or expedient." It is the judgment of the district court touching the necessity or expediency of the removal that decides the question of removal, not the judgment of the circuit court. The only question is this: Was the removal necessary or expedient in the judgment of the district court? This is settled conclusively by the record and is not open to dispute or review. If this court could review the decision of the district court removing an assignee, it could also review the discretion of the district court in calling a meeting of creditors to pass upon the question of removal, and could review the consent of the district court to a removal made by a meeting of the creditors. The discretion lodged with the district court to remove an assignee is just as broad as the discretion to appoint an assignee under certain circumstances.

The 13th section of the bankrupt act (Rev. St. § 5034) declares: "If no choice is made by the creditors at said meeting, the judge, or if there be no opposing interest, the register, shall appoint one or more assignees." So that if the creditors fail to elect, and there is an opposing interest, the judge is authorized to appoint assignees. This power to appoint under the 13th section is no more clearly confided to the discretion of the judge than the power to remove under the 18th section. Can it be claimed for a moment that the appointment of assignees by the judge, made by virtue of the 13th section, could be reviewed by the circuit court. Suppose a creditor, or all the creditors, should think that the assignee appointed by the judge was an improper one, would the circuit court review the appointment? Clearly not, because the power and responsibility of the appointment is lodged under the circumstances where the district court has power to appoint at all, with the district court and not with the circuit court or with the creditors. If the circuit court cannot review an appointment of an assignee made by the district court, neither can it review the removal of an assignee made by the same court. For both the power of appointment in the contingency mentioned and the power of removal is lodged in the discretion of that court.

These views are sustained by the decision of Mr. Justice Miller in the case of Woods v. Buckewell, [Case No. 17,991.]

I am of opinion, therefore, that the question presented by the petition of review is not a question which this court has the power to review; that in the appointment and removal of assignees, the discretion is lodged with the district court, and that discretion cannot be questioned by the circuit court or the judges thereof. It follows that the petition of review must be dismissed.

ADLER v. NEWCOMB.

[16 Int. Rev. Rec. 142, 174; 2 Dill. 45.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Sept. Term, 1872.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—SUIT ON MARSHAL'S BOND—PLEADING.

1. The federal courts have jurisdiction in suits by individuals upon a marshal's bond, even where all the parties to the suit are citizens of the same state,—the reason being that the act of congress of April 10, 1806, which gives the right to a party injured by breach of the bond to sue thereon in his own name, puts such party in the place of the United States, and does not take from the federal courts the jurisdiction they had before the act was passed, when suit had to be brought in the name of the United States.

[Cited in Pierson v. Philips, 36 Fed. Rep. 837.]

2. In suits upon a marshal's bond, the petition should ask for judgment for the damages sustained, and not for the whole penalty of the bond.

[Cited in Hagood v. Blythe, 37 Fed. Rep. 251.]

[See U. S. v. Davidson, Case No. 14,921.]

At law. Plaintiff sued Carman A. Newcomb, United States marshal for the eastern district of Missouri, and the sureties upon his official bond. The alleged breach of the bond was, that plaintiff being the legal owner and possessor of two cases of merchandise of the value of $1,000, the defendant Newcomb, acting as United States marshal, and under color of that office, seized and took possession of said cases wrongfully and without leave. Plaintiff prayed judgment for the amount of the bond ($20,000,) and also prayed the court to assess the damages by him sustained.

Defendant demurred to the petition, upon the ground chiefly that the court had no jurisdiction, the plaintiff and the defendants being all citizens and residents of Missouri, and the controversy being thus between citizens of the same state, a federal court could have no jurisdiction. The act of congress of April 10th, 1806, (2 Stat. 372,) gives the right to any person injured by the breach of the condition of a marshal's bond, to institute a suit thereon, in the name and for the sole use of such person; but gives no direction as to the forum in which such suit shall be brought. Defendants therefore contended that there being no express jurisdiction conferred by that act on federal courts, neither was there any implied jurisdiction thereby conferred on them; that the plain design of the act was to remedy the difficulty that had previously been experienced by the parties in having to bring suit in the name of the United States; and that in no act of congress was any jurisdiction conferred on the federal courts such as would cover a case like the present where the suit was between citizens of the same state.

Plaintiff contended that as the law stood before the act of 1806, suits brought on marshal's bonds could only be brought by the United States or in the name of the United States to the use of the party injured, and such suits were then properly brought in the federal courts, and that the act of 1806 simply conferred on the party injured a right to sue in his own name, but did not take away the jurisdiction vested in the federal courts before the act was passed. Plaintiff further contended that the case was one arising under the laws of the United States, and therefore within the scope of section 2 of article 3 of the constitution of the United States, which provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the laws of the United States, and cited the decision of Judge Drummond in United States v. Davidson, [Case No. 14,921,] in which it is laid down that the United States courts have jurisdiction in all cases of marshal's bonds, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties.

Nathan Frank, for plaintiff.
Dryden & Dryden, for defendant.

TREAT, District Judge, held that, while the act of 1806 allowed a party injured by breach of the condition of marshal's bond to be substituted in the place of the United States and to bring suit in his own name, it was not intended thereby to take from the federal courts the jurisdiction they previously had over such cases. The act did not change the jurisdiction, but simply conferred upon an injured party the right to sue in his own name instead of in the name of the United States to his use, and in legal intendment the federal courts had now the same jurisdiction over such cases as they had before the act was passed; and therefore in the present case the court had jurisdiction, notwithstanding the fact that the suit was between citizens of the same state.

On the argument upon the demurrers a point was raised as to the mode of pleading, and on this point the court held that the position [petition] was defective, in this: that it asked judgment for the whole penalty of the bond instead of asking only for the damages sustained, since by section 3 of the act of 1806 (2 Stat. 372) it is provided that after any judgment rendered on the bond of a marshal, such bond shall remain as a security for future breaches until the whole of the penalty shall have been recovered. Upon this ground the demurrer was sustained, and leave given to plaintiff to amend.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by the Merchants' Steam Navigation Company against the Admiral (the Eastern Steamboat Company, claimants) for damages sustained in a collision. Libel dismissed, with costs.]

C. P. Curtis, Jr., for libelants.
Henry C. Hutchins, for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, gave his opinion in this case, from which the facts sufficiently appear, in substance as follows:—

This is a libel filed by the Merchants' Steam Navigation Company—owners of the Steamer Eastern State—for damages sustained by that vessel, in a collision with the steamer Admiral. The collision occurred October 7th, 1852, and this libel was filed July 1st, 1854, a period of more than twenty months, during all of which time the Admiral was plying twice a week between this port and St. John, and there were agents of the Eastern State here. The libelants, therefore, have had a period of twenty months to assert their lien and have not done so. It may be that if third persons had not become interested in the Admiral this libel might be maintained, although I am not prepared to say that I should hold that the lien still remained upon the vessel if there had been no change of ownership. If the boat still remained the property of her former owners it would perhaps be a matter of no concern to them whether they were sued in personam or whether the boat was seized. If the delay operated to prejudice them in any way, I am not certain that the lien ought not to be held to have been lost. This case differs from the ordinary cases of liens. This is a lien for a tort. Generally liens are sought to be enforced for debts.

At common law liens are lost with the possession of the property. This is not so in admiralty. From the necessities of commerce these liens are upheld without reference to the possession—vessels are frequently away from their owners, and their masters without credit, and unless this extraordinary security was given great loss and inconvenience would often be sustained. These liens are secret. There is no place where inquiry may be made and their existence and extent be ascertained. The whole tendency of legislation has been that the world should know the incumbrances on property. Such was the object of the act of congress passed in 1850, requiring the registration of bills of sale and mortgages of vessels. Such is the policy of the law in reference to the title to real estate. The rule adopted in courts of admiralty, is to allow the continuance of the lien until a reasonable opportunity is given to enforce it. If a party neglects to avail himself of it, third persons are not to be prejudiced by his delay. What is a reasonable time is left by the law to be determined by the circumstances of each case. In case of a lien for repairs or materials furnished, a proposed purchaser may, perhaps, by inquiry, ascertain the extent of the lien, but in case of a lien for collision, this is impossible. It may be doubtful whether there is any claim, and if there be any, the amount cannot be ascertained. If a party were allowed to lie by, for such a length of time, and afterwards assert his lien, it would deprive the owner of the opportunity of selling his vessel, or at least cast a shade upon the title, and thus injure the value. Another difficulty growing out of this delay, is the loss of evidence. It is well known that in cases of collision, there is a great deal of contradictory testimony, that of sailors and others, who are often difficult to be found at the end of so long a period. One party might secure this testimony, and the other could not. One might wait till the witnesses of the other were dispersed, and then file his libel. It is said that the transfer in this case is colorable. There is no evidence of it. The case must be decided upon the testimony before me. There is a bill of sale—an acknowledgment of the receipt of the consideration, and a delivery of the vessel, and the bill of sale was duly recorded. This makes a good title to the claimants. It is said all the former owners of the Admiral were stockholders in the claimants' company, and thus the corporation is affected with knowledge of this lien. It does not appear that they owned in the company in the same proportion as before, and if it did it would make no difference, because there were other stockholders in the company who took stock in ignorance of the claim, and they ought to be protected. The former owners became merely stockholders in the new company, and their knowledge does not affect the corporation with knowledge. The difficulty is, that as this is a process in rem, and the boat the property of the corporation, there is no process to reach the interests of the former owners without affecting the interests of others who purchased innocently.

The boat is now owned by a corporation and not by individuals. The persons owning do not own as before any part or right in the boat, but they own stock in the company. It is said by the libelants that they gave notice of the claim to the agent of the Admiral here. This notice, (though denied) if given, was given within three days after the collision. But the notice was only of a claim, and not whether the claim would be made in personam or in rem. But what is of more importance, it was given to the agent of the former owners, and not to the agent of the claimants. And the notice which is stated by a Mr. —, of Bangor, is not satisfactory. How does he know the notice was given? He does not say he gave it, but that Mr. Clark, the attorney, gave it. He does not say how he knew this notice was given, and I do not consider this proper proof of notice. But if it were given, it was after the purchase of the boat, and then what could the claimants do? They did all they could in sending the vessel within the jurisdiction, and thus gave the libelants an opportunity to assert their lien, and the libelants have not proceeded to assert their claim for all this time. I doubt if Nichols was the proper party to be notified. He was not the general agent of the corporation. If any notice could avail, it, at least, should have been given to some person who was authorized to receive and act upon it, or whose duty it was to communicate it to the corporation. A notice to a stockholder or to a party who afterwards becomes an officer of the corporation is not notice to the corporation, because the notice was not given to a party whose duty it was to notify the corporation. The fact, that a party receiving the notice afterwards becomes an officer in the company, will not make it obligatory upon him to give that notice before received to the company. It is said that another suit was pending between the former owners of the Admiral and the libelants, and that this was notice of the claim, but that libel and suit was between other parties. It is farther said that it was proper for the libelants to await the issue of that suit before filing this libel, and so avoid litigation. There was a matter of personal convenience to the libelants and for their own protection, and to save themselves expense, but a delay for such purpose must not be allowed to work an injury to others. For these reasons this libel must be dismissed with costs.

PRIZE—BLOCKADE—FALSE CLEARANCE.

1. Where a vessel sailed from Liverpool, England, for the port of Savannah, then blockaded by the United States, as a rebel port, with orders to seek the blockading squadron (if the blockade was found to exist), and procure an indorsement on her register that she had been warned off, and then to proceed to St. John's, New Brunswick, but with a clearance on board expressing St. John's as the sole port of destination, it was held (the vessel having been captured off Savannah,) that she was confiscable for a violation of the blockade of that port.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Semble, that the president's proclamation of the 19th of April, 1861, announcing that he had set on foot a blockade of the ports within the state of Georgia and other states, does not entitle a vessel, which has full knowledge of the establishment of the blockade before she enters upon her voyage, to a warning by one of the blockading vessels, or an endorsement of a warning upon her register, when taken in the act of entering one of the blockading ports.

In admiralty. This was a libel in prize, filed by the United States against the ship "Admiral," her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods, wares and merchandise laden thereon; and came here on appeal of her claimants, British subjects, from the district court condemning her.

The facts appearing from the evidence in preparatorio, and the ship's papers, were as follows: 1. That the said vessel was of English ownership, and the property of the claimants. 2. That she cleared from Liverpool in September, 1861, with a cargo of salt and coal; the whole being of British growth, and loaded and owned by British subjects. 3. That the clearance at Liverpool expresses St. John's, New Brunswick, as the sole destination of the vessel. 4. That the real destination of the vessel at the time of her clearance, was to Savannah, Georgia. This fact appeared from a letter of instructions from the owners of the ship to the master, dated Liverpool, 12th September, 1861, in which they say as follows: "We hope you will have good start of channel, and thus make a good passage out. The enclosed charter with Messrs. W. & R. Wright, will show you the nature of the voyage. These gentlemen, like many others, hold the opinion that this unfortunate contest cannot last long, it being so obviously the interest of both parties to bring it to a close. 'Tis being so, and they being very wishful to have cargo of pitch pine from Savannah to St. John's, so soon as the port is opened again, for their new ship, 'St. John's River,' is our great reason for their making it a condition in taking the ship, that she should go off Savannah, so that if possible they might have the very first shipment of timber. Of course, in calling off, you will endeavor to meet the blockading ship (if the blockade is found to exist still,) and then get the officer in command to endorse on your register that the ship has been warned off. This will be all that is necessary for us as owners of the ship, to justify your departure for St. John's, and there consigning the ship to Messrs. W. & R. Wright, to whom, in the meantime, we will write respecting you. You will distinctly understand, therefore, that you run no risk whatever with the ship, but rather endeavor to satisfy yourself as to blockade, and then find out the man-of-war, report yourself and get the register endorsed. You will no doubt speak some vessels when approaching the American coast, so as to ascertain exactly the state of matters, and be guided thereby in such way as not to infringe the blockade regulation. Hoping in good time to hear from you."

It also appeared from the answer of the master to one of the interrogatories in preparatorio. He says: "The captured vessel sailed on her present voyage from Liverpool, England. She cleared for St. John's, with orders to go to Savannah, seek the blockading squadron, if any there was, uncertain whether the blockade still existed, and if so, then proceed to St. John's."

7. The following is an extract from the claim filed by the master: "When I was about thirty miles off Tybee Island, under the British flag, and standing towards the land off the port of Savannah, and without any knowledge whether a blockade existed, or whether it had been raised, and while I was looking for a blockading vessel, or some other vessel, of which I might inquire whether a blockade existed, I was hailed and boarded by an officer from the United States Steamer 'Alabama.'"

8. The log showed that at the time of the capture the vessel was preparing to enter the port of Savannah.

Ashton, for the United States.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. I agree with Chief Justice Tindal, in Medeiros v. Hill, 5 Bing. 231, "that the mere act of sailing to a port which is blockaded at the time the voyage is commenced, is not an offence against the law of nations, where there is no premeditated intention of breaking the blockade." Consequently, if, in the present case, the Admiral had taken out a clearance for Savannah, with the expectation that the blockade might be removed before her arrival, with instructions to make inquiry as to its continuance, at New York or Halifax, or other neutral port; and after having made such inquiry, had made no further endeavor to approach or enter the blockaded port, her seizure and condemnation as prize, could not have been justified. But she presents a very different case. She was off Tybee Island, sailing for the blockaded port. She had made no inquiry on the way; had no reason to believe the blockade to be raised; and when arrested in her attempt to enter, she exhibits a clearance for St. John's, New Brunswick, a port she may be said to have passed, and a letter of instructions from the owners, to call off the harbor of Savannah, to "endeavor to meet the blockading ship, and get the officer in command to endorse the register," etc., but to make no attempt to run the blockade. The clearance is the proper document to exhibit and disclose the intention of a ship. The clearance in this case may not properly come within the category of "simulated papers." But it does not disclose the whole truth. The suppression of a most important part, makes the whole false. It may be true, that in times of general peace, a clearance exhibiting the ultimate destination of a vessel, without disclosing an alternative one, may have sometimes been used by merchants to subserve some private purpose. But in times of war, when such omissions may be used to blindfold belligerents, as to the true nature of a ship's intended voyage, and to elude a blockade, the concealment of the truth must be considered as prima facie evidence of a fraudulent intention.

The Admiral, with a full knowledge that her destined port is blockaded, takes a clearance for St. John's, and is found a thousand miles from the proper course to such port, and in the act of entering the blockaded port. And when thus arrested, for the first time inquires whether the blockade has been raised. A vessel which has full knowledge of the existence of a blockade, before she enters on her voyage, has no right to claim a warning or endorsement, when taken in the act of attempting to enter. It would be an absurd construction of the president's proclamation, to require a notice to be given to those who already had knowledge. A notification is for those only who have sailed without a knowledge of the blockade, and get their first information of it, from the blockading vessels. Now the primary destination of this vessel is to a blockading port. If the owners had reason to expect that possibly the blockade might be raised before the arrival of their vessel, and thus a profit be made, by their ability to take the first advantage of it, their clearance, in the exercise of good faith, should have made admission of the true primary destination of the vessel. If the truth had appeared on the face of this document, and if the master had been instructed to inquire at some intermediate port, and to proceed no farther, in case he found the blockade still to exist, the owners might justly claim, that their conduct showed "no premeditated intention of breaking the blockade." But when arrested in the attempt to enter a port known to be blockaded, with a false clearance, it is too late to produce the bill of lading or letter of instructions to prove innocency of intention. In such cases intentions can be judged only by acts. The true construction of this proceeding may be thus translated: "Enter the blockaded port if you can, without danger; if you are arrested by a blockading vessel, inform the captor that you were not instructed to run the blockade, but had merely called for information, and would be pleased to have your register endorsed, with leave to proceed elsewhere." If so transparent a contrivance could be received as evidence of a want of any "premeditated intention to break the blockade," the important right of blockade would be but a brutum fulmen, in the hands of a belligerent. "It would" (says Lord Stowell), "amount in practice to a universal license to attempt to enter, and being prevented, to claim the liberty of going elsewhere." In the cases where the stringency of the general rule established by this judge (but overruled in Medeiros v. Hill) had been by him relaxed as to American vessels in certain circumstances, the clearances were taken contingently, but directly for the blockaded port, in the expectation of a relaxation of the blockade, with instruction to inquire as to the fact at a British or neutral port. The clearance exhibits the whole truth, and the place of inquiry their good faith. In these most material facts this case differs from them. Decree affirmed.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, this decree was affirmed. It there appeared that, if the blockade be not raised, the vessel was to proceed to St. Johns, N. B., and deliver her cargo. The stipulated freight was 30 shillings per ton if the cargo should be landed at Savannah, and 15 shillings per ton if landed at St. Johns. The court, by Mr. Justice Clifford, held that the proofs warranted the conclusion that the vessel sailed for a blockaded port with the intention of violating the blockade regulations, and that previous warning is not necessary in such a case, nor is it necessary that any warning should have been previously indorsed on her register. Mere sailing for a blockaded port is not an offense; but where the vessel has a knowledge of the blockade, and sails for the blockaded port with the intention of violating the regulations, she is clearly liable to capture. The Admiral, 3 Wall. The ADOLPH.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1851.

SALVAGE—PAYMENT OF PROCEEDS INTO REGISTRY —AUTHORITY OF FOREIGN CONSUL.

A foreign consul has authority to petition the court to order the marshal to pay into the registry proceeds of a sale of property libelled for salvage, in which the citizens or subjects of his country are interested, they being absent, and having no other legal representative in the United States.

[Cited in The Conserva, 38 Fed. Rep. 434.]

In admiralty. A suit for the salvage of the said vessel and cargo having come into this court by appeal, salvage was decreed to the libellants, at the November term, 1839, and the residue of the proceeds of the saved property, after payment of the salvage, was, by the decree, directed to be retained in the registry of the court, to be paid to the owners of the property saved, or their lawful representatives. When the proceeds of the sale were brought into court by the then marshal, who is no longer in office, one promissory note, given by a purchaser, remained unpaid. The marshal caused a suit to be brought thereon, and collected the contents upon an execution; but, instead of bringing the money into the registry of the court, accounted, as he alleges, with the salvors out of court, and retained the balance to reimburse himself for sundry payments, and for his own services. In July last, F. Gouraud, representing himself to be vice-consul of France for this district, and also attorney in fact of the representative of the owners of the said vessel, filed a petition in this court, praying that the late marshal might be ordered to bring the amount so collected by him into the registry of the court. The authority of M. Gouraud to prefer this petition was denied. He produced his exequatur, which bears date on the 29th day of October, 1851. He also exhibited a power of attorney, executed before two notaries at Nantz, by a person who states, in the power, that he was appointed by the tribunal of commerce of the city of Nantz, settling agent of the old commercial house formerly established at Nantz, under the style of James Francis's Brothers, who were the owners of the Adolph; this power purports to authorize M. Gouraud to collect any money arising from the sale of the said vessel.

J. S. Pitman, for petitioner.

Mr. Jenckes, for respondent.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and PITMAN, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The duty of the marshal to pay this money into the registry of the court, as soon as he had received it, is clear. He had no power to adjust the account with the salvors, or pay them, or retain anything for his own services; these are all matters to be passed on by the court; and under its direction, and only by its authority, can any payments be made or allowances had. It may be added, that it is the duty of the court to see that its officer does pay into the registry money which he has collected for that purpose; and although the court cannot have the necessary information to act upon its own motion, it certainly ought not to be very rigid in its requisitions of authority, when a suggestion that its officer is in fault in this respect is made. We deem it sufficient for this particular purpose, that M. Gouraud is the vice consul of France; and that French citizens are interested in these proceeds.² It is true, he had not received his exequatur when he filed this petition; and if this were a suit instituted by him, and depending on his official character when brought, it must fail. But we do not consider the proceeding at all analogous to a suit, or even to a petition for the execution of a decree. It is rather in the nature of a suggestion, made in writing to the court, that one of its officers has not discharged his official duty; and, although the person making such suggestion may not have had any official or personal connection with the subject when first made, if he has now, when the matter is actually presented to the court, sufficient authority to make it, the court feel bound to listen, and allow it to have effect. Upon this suggestion and representation, we find, by the answer of the late marshal, that he did receive this money on account of the proceeds of the sale of a part of the salvage property; and, although we have no doubt he thought himself justified in retaining it, and did not intend to depart from his duty, he must be now required to pay it into the registry of the court.

Order.

That Burrington Anthony, lately marshal of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, forthwith pay into the registry of this court, in the cause wherein Caleb Williams and others were libellants against the ship Adolph and cargo, the moneys received by him on account of two certain promissory notes, given by one Edward Dexter, the purchaser of part of the property libelled in the said cause; and all claims of the said Anthony, for any just allowances on account of the said moneys, or otherwise in the said cause, be referred to Francis E. Hoppin, Esq., to report thereon to the court. And all parties in interest, or their legal representatives, may appear before the said assessor, and be heard in the premises. And all further questions are reserved until the coming in of the said report.

Entered by order of the court.

Case No. 87.

The A. D. PATCHIN.

[1 Blatchf. 414.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct., 1849.

SALVAGE—UNDER CONTRACT—NONJOINER OF ALL OF THE SALVORS.

1. Where a vessel was stranded, and salvage services were rendered by another vessel in relieving her, in pursuance of a written contract between the owner of the latter and the agent of the master of the former, which stipulated the per diem compensation for the services: Held, that the district court had jurisdiction of a libel in rem for the salvage services, notwithstanding the written agreement.

[Cited in The Circassian, Case No. 2,723; The Silver Spray's Boilers, Id. 12,857; The Williams, Id. 17,710; Pope v. The Sapphire, Id. 11,276. Followed in The Louisa Jane, Id. 8,532.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. The contract was not necessarily binding upon the vessel in peril, or upon her owner, and it would be the duty of the court to disregard it, and to award compensation according to the principles of admiralty in salvage cases, if any advantage was taken by the libellant in the agreement.

[Cited in The Independence, Case No. 7,014; Bowley v. Goddard, Id. 1,736; The J. G. Paint, Id. 7,318; Harley v. Railroad Iron, Id. 6,068; The Williams, Id. 17,710; Chap- man v. The Greenpoint, 38 Fed. Rep. 672; The G. W. Jones, 48 Fed. Rep. 926.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. The rate fixed by the contract is looked at in determining the amount proper to be awarded for the salvage services, and would be disregarded if disproportionate or unreasonable, or if extorted through the pressure of impending calamity.

[Cited in Bowley v. Goddard, Case No. 1,736; The J. G. Paint, Id. 7,318; Chapman v. The Greenpoint, 38 Fed Rep. 672; The G. W. Jones, 48 Fed. Rep. 926; Brooks v. The Adirondack, 2 Fed. Rep. 393.]

[See note at end of case.]

4. The admiralty jurisdiction, in salvage cases, is as essential to the protection of the vessel subject to salvage, as it is to the indemnity of the salvor, and can scarcely be ousted by any agreement for rendering the services.

[See Williams v. The Jenny Lind, Case No. 17,723.]

5. Although all the suitors for salvage ought to join in the suit against the property saved, yet the non-joinder of the crew of the salvor vessel, in a suit by the master and owner, is no objection to the maintenance of the suit, in a case where the crew were exposed to no extraordinary hardships or personal danger.

In admiralty. A libel in rem was filed, in the district court, by Charles L. Gager, owner and master of the steamboat Albany, against the steamboat A. D. Patchin, to recover for salvage services rendered to that vessel by the Albany, under the following circumstances. The Patchin was aground upon a ledge of rocks at Racine Point, Wisconsin, and a contract in writing was entered into between the libellant in person and one Higby, who professed to act as agent for one Harry Whittaker, the master and sole owner of the Patchin. The contract was as follows: "This article of agreement made this 13th day of June, 1848, between the steamer Albany, and the steamer Patchin, Capt. H. Whittaker, in which Capt. Gager of the steamer Albany agrees to do all he can do to assist said Patchin, now on the rocks at Racine Point, Wisconsin, and to stay with her until discharged by said Capt. Whittaker, and said Albany is to be paid four hundred and fifty dollars per day, and time to commence four o'clock to-day. Said Albany to have the privilege to make harbor in case of storm. Milwaukee, June 13, 1848. H. Whittaker, per L. J. Higby, Agent." The agreement was made at Milwaukee, a few miles from where the Patchin lay, and was assented to by the claimant, on its being soon afterwards made known to him. He resided in Buffalo, N. Y. It did not appear that the libellant had any knowledge, at the time the contract was made, that Whittaker had any interest in the Patchin as owner. The Patchin was in no danger of immediate destruction when the contract was made; the weather was fair and calm; a large number of persons were already engaged in endeavoring to get her off the rocks; steamers were frequently passing near to the spot where she lay; the terms of the agreement were deliberately settled; and, in order to determine the just measure of compensation, the books of the Albany were resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining her ordinary earnings, and the amount to be paid was fixed accordingly. The vessels were both of them of large value. The Albany transferred her passengers, of which she had a large number on board when the contract was made, to another steamer, and refunded to them their passage money. She was then constantly employed during four successive days and nights in rendering assistance to the Patchin, not altogether without danger to herself from hidden rocks, and, during a portion of the time, in strenuous efforts, subjecting her to heavy strains, to jerk or drag the Patchin from the rocks. The crew of the Albany were engaged in assisting the Patchin, but did not join as libellants in the suit. The decree of the district court was in favor of the libellants.

The opinion of CONKLING, District Judge, was as follows:

"One of the objections urged against the libellant's right to maintain this action is, that the services for which he claims compensation, having been performed in pursuance of an express agreement between the parties, and for a stipulated compensation, this is not a case of salvage, but a case of contract of which the court has no jurisdiction. In support of this objection, the counsel for the claimant relies upon a similar case of The Mulgrave, 2 Hagg. [Adm.] 77, in which Lord Stowell pronounced against the action on this ground, observing that it was not a case of salvage but one of contract, and that he could not entertain the question. Lord Stowell did not, of course, intend to say that he could entertain no action arising ex contractu, but only, that the case before him' not being a case of salvage, he could not entertain it as a case of that character, and not being a case falling within either of the descriptions of contracts embraced within the jurisdiction of the court, he could not entertain it as such. It is well known that the only contracts upon which, at the date of this decision, original suits were in fact entertained in the English high court of admiralty were those for seamen's wages and bottomry bonds, although it has always been conceded that the jurisdiction of the court extended to all such contracts as were made on the high seas and were to be there executed. But, by a long series of American decisions, terminating with that of New-Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, the principle is now firmly established, that the jurisdiction of the American courts of admiralty does not depend on the decisions of the English common law courts relative to the jurisdiction of the high court of admiralty in England, but that all contracts in their nature strictly maritime, are cognizable in the admiralty. Such, certainly, is the character of this contract; and if the suit had been in personam, the jurisdiction of the court would have been unquestionable.

"But, whether the contract created a lien on the Patchin, and may, therefore, also be enforced in a suit in rem, is another question not devoid of difficulty. That a suit in the admiralty for salvage may be maintained in either form, has never been doubted, and this right is, moreover, expressly recognized and declared by one of the late rules prescribed by the supreme court. Rule 19, Conk. Adm. 790. If, therefore, the salvor's title to remuneration in ordinary cases may be considered as founded in implied contract, it might with great apparent force and propriety be insisted, that the remedial right of the salvor could not in any degree be impaired by an express contract entered into beforehand for the mere purpose of fixing the amount of compensation, without any express or clearly implied intention of waiving the right to prosecute in either of the accustomed forms. But, suits for salvage have generally been considered—though I confess it has always appeared to me with somewhat questionable propriety—as cases rather of tort than of contract. It would not necessarily follow, therefore, because the maritime law gives a lien in favor of the salvor in a case strictly of salvage, that it also confers one for services of the like nature rendered in pursuance of a contract. But it is a general principle of the maritime law, that from contracts made by the master which bind the owner, as all authorized contracts entered into by him on account of his ship do, unless otherwise expressly provided, there results an implied hypothecation of the ship. The master, undoubtedly, has authority to hire the services of others, when necessary for the preservation of his vessel, and I imagine that such a contract, subject to the revisory power of the court, would constitute a lien on the vessel.

"It happens, however, in the present instance, that the master was also the sole owner of the vessel to which assistance was rendered; and it is insisted that on this account he incurred no other than a personal responsibility. Admitting the general principle thus asserted it becomes necessary, nevertheless, to inquire whether the present is a case to which it is properly applicable. The contract was originally entered into between the libellant in person and Lewis J. Higby, professing to act as agent for the claimant. It was made at the place where it bears date, a few miles from the place where the Patchin lay, and, on being soon afterwards made known to the claimant, was assented to by him. His residence was in Buffalo, in the state of New-York. The claimant, it will be observed, is described simply as the captain of the Patchin, and there is no allegation in the pleadings, nor any evidence, that the libellant had any knowledge of his proprietary interest in the vessel. In the case of The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, it was held that although, for materials or supplies furnished in a home port, no implied lien in general attaches to the ship, the reasonable presumption being that they were furnished on the credit of the owner, yet if a vessel comes into her home port in a foreign guise, and obtains supplies, this principle is applicable to the case, and a lien in favor of material men arises. "The question," says the court, "then arises, on what does the privilege of material men depend? On the state of facts, or on their belief of facts?" The answer given by the court is, that it depends on the latter. De non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio. Applying the principle decided in the St. Jago de Cuba to the present case, it would follow that the contract ought to be treated as having been made with the master as such, unless the libellant was bound to show affirmatively his ignorance of the fact that the claimant was also the owner of the Patchin. But, considering that the contract was made at a place remote from the owner's residence, and that the claimant is described in it only as master, and considering also that his ownership is now set up by him for the purpose of exempting his vessel by way of exception from the general rule, I am of opinion that the onus probandi lies upon him to show the libellant's knowledge of such ownership.

"In discussing this point, I have thus far conceded that if the libellant had known that the claimant was the owner, and had contracted with him as such, no lien would have resulted from the contract. But, I infer that the late Mr. Justice Story entertained a different view of the law, and that he supposed it to be in this respect immaterial whether the contract was made with the master or owner. In The Emulous, [Case No. 4,480,] which was a suit in rem, the vessel was owned in Boston, and, having struck on a rock within the waters of that state, one of the sets of salvors contracted to tow her into port for a specific sum agreed upon. The contract, it is true, was made with the master of the schooner, though, as already observed, in the state to which she belonged. But the learned judge, in a formal exposition of what he understood to be the law applicable to cases of that nature, seems not to have recognized any distinction between contracts of this description entered into by the master, and those made by the owner in person. His language is as follows: "The court has been asked, upon this occasion, to lay down some clear and definite rule, as to what shall be deemed salvage service, and what shall be deemed a mere common contract for labor and services. I take it to be very clear, that wherever the service has been rendered in saving property on the sea, or wrecked on the coast of the sea, the service is, in the sense of the maritime law, a salvage service. If it has been rendered under circumstances which establish that the parties have voluntarily, and without any controlling necessity on the side of the proprietors of the property saved, or their agents, entered into a contract for a fixed compensation, or upon the ordinary terms of a compensation for labor and services quantum meruerunt; in either case, it does not alter the nature of the service, as a salvage service, but only fixes the rule by which the court is to be governed in awarding the compensation. It is still a salvage contract, and a salvage compensation. It is true, that contracts made for salvage services are not ordinarily held obligatory by the court of admiralty upon the persons whose property is saved, unless the court can clearly see that no advantage is taken of the parties' situation, and that the rate of compensation is just and reasonable. The doctrine is founded upon principles of public policy, as well as upon just views of moral obligation. No system of jurisprudence, purporting to be founded upon moral or religious, or even rational principles, could tolerate for a moment the doctrine, that a salvor might avail himself of the calamities of others to force upon them a contract, unjust, oppressive, and exorbitant; that he might turn the price of safety into the price of ruin; that he might turn an act, demanded by Christian and public duty, into a traffic of profit, which would outrage human feelings, and disgrace human justice.' In The Centurion, [Case No. 2,554,] the learned judge of the district of Maine cites the case of The Emulous, as in his judgment containing a just exposition of the law of salvage. It is quite 'immaterial,' he observes, 'whether the salvors accidentally fall in with the wreck and volunteer their services, or are called upon by the owners or persons interested in the wreck to aid in saving it. It is the place where the property is situated, and the circumstances of exposure and peril in which it is found, that determine the question whether it is a case of salvage or not.' But in a later case, that of Bearse v. 340 Pigs of Copper, [Case No. 1,193,] which arose in the district of Massachusetts, and was finally decided on appeal in the circuit court, the objection was distinctly taken, that the services having been performed in pursuance of an express contract, no action in rem could be maintained therefor. The contract was made in that case not by the master, but by the proprietors in person of the property saved; but this circumstance does not seem to have been considered of any importance even by the counsel for the claimants. The objection was that the service, though of a nature which would otherwise have been a salvage service, having been performed by contract, no right accrued from it to the libellants to proceed against the property.

The district judge held, that as the respondents had denied in their answer, that any contract subsisted between them and the libellants, at the time the property was recovered, which also appeared upon the evidence, the libel was rightly brought against the property, whether the principle contended for by the respondents was correct or not.' The conclusion of Mr. Justice Story on the appeal also was, that the particular services in question were not embraced within the contract set up by the claimants, under which other salvage services had been previously performed by the libellants. But, he adverts to the question only as one bearing upon the amount of remuneration to be awarded, and seems not to have considered it as at all affecting the right of the libellant to maintain his action in rem. He refers also, with apparent approbation, to his observations above cited in the case of The Emulous. The just inference, therefore, appears to be that he considered all services, which, if rendered voluntarily would be salvage services, as not the less so because rendered in pursuance of an agreement for that purpose; and as entitling the salvor to the like remedies, whether rendered in the one form or the other. If the salvor, especially after the performance of the service, should take a bond or receive a bill of exchange or a negotiable promissory note in payment, it may be conceded that his remedy would be limited to a personal action on the security so taken. But there does not appear to be any solid reason for denying to the salvor a lien on the property saved, merely because the salvage service was performed at the request either of the master or the owner, and under a promise of remuneration, especially as a court of admiralty possesses an unquestionable power to shield the owners of property saved, against extortionate exactions, by reducing an exorbitant reward promised under the pressure of alarm or distress. My opinion, therefore, is that this objection is invalid.

"It was insisted, also, by the counsel for the claimant, that the persons composing the crew of the Albany ought to have been parties to the suit. When, as is commonly the case, salvage is claimed by the crew, as well as by the master and owners of the salvor vessel, and a suit is to be instituted in the admiralty therefor, it is certainly proper that all should join in such suit; and in a case where the salvage service was highly meritorious, as where it required exhausting labor, or was attended by great danger, if the master should designedly institute a suit in behalf of himself, or of himself and his owner alone, in the hope that, through the ignorance of the crew, he might secure a large reward to himself at their expense, he would expose himself to just censure; and there may be cases in which it would be the duty of the court to enquire into the reason of the non-joinder of the seamen, and to see that their rights were maintained, unless they chose voluntarily to relinquish them. But, in the present case, the crew of the salvor vessel were exposed to no extraordinary hardships or personal danger. Their services were rendered chiefly on board of their own steamer, and were substantially such as they had contracted to perform; and they probably, and perhaps very properly, deemed their stipulated wages a sufficient compensation therefor. If they had thought otherwise, it may be supposed that they would have applied to the court for redress, and it is a mistake to suppose that the right of the libellant as owner and master of the Albany, to prosecute his suit, is prejudiced by their non-joinder in the action.

"With respect to the amount of remuneration to be awarded, there are no circumstances attending the case, which demand the jealous scrutiny of the court into the reasonableness of the stipulated reward. There was scarcely room for the indulgence of a spirit of rapacity by the libellant, and there is no evidence to show that he was actuated by any such spirit. I cannot say that the stipulated sum of $450 a day is an exorbitant or even an unreasonable compensation for the sacrifices and services of the Albany, and I am satisfied that the duty of the court will be best performed by simply enforcing the voluntary agreement of the parties. I accordingly award to the libellant the sum of $1,800."

The claimant appealed to this court.

William H. Seward, for the claimant.

The service was not a salvage service. 1. It was not voluntary, but was rendered in pursuance of a pre-existing contract for a fixed rate of compensation. The Neptune, 1 Hagg. It was not efficient, nor was the Patchin in impending danger of shipwreck. 3 Kent, Comm. (4th Ed.) 245; Marsh, Ins. 488; Emerigon, Traite des Ass. p. 400. 3. The libellant could have recovered against Whittaker personally on the contract, even if the Patchin had been totally lost. 4. The provision in the contract, that the Albany might make harbor in case of storm, is inconsistent with the idea of a salvage service.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I am of opinion, according to the authorities referred to by the counsel for the libellant, and by the court below, that the district court had jurisdiction of the case, notwithstanding the special agreement in respect to the compensation to be received for the service. That contract was not necessarily binding upon the vessel in peril, or upon her owner, and it would have been the duty of the court to have disregarded it altogether, and to have awarded a rate of compensation according to the principles of admiralty in salvage cases, if any advantage had been taken by the libellant in fixing the rate in the agreement. The rate thus fixed is looked at in determining the amount proper to be awarded for the salvage service; but would be disregarded, if disproportionate and unreasonable, or if extorted through the pressure of impending calamity. Under these circumstances, any agreement that might be entered into could hardly be regarded as ousting the admiralty jurisdiction. That jurisdiction is as essential to the proper protection and security of the vessel subject to salvage, as it is to the indemnity of the salvor.

I concur with the court below, that the amount agreed upon affords but a reasonable compensation for the assistance rendered by the vessel and crew of the libellant, and that the service was essentially and strictly a salvage service.

Decree affirmed.

ADRIAN et al. v. The LIVE YANKEE.

[33 Hunt, Mer. Mag. (1855) 703.]

District Court, D. California.

SHIPPING—INJURIES TO GOODS—SWEAT—NEGLIGENCE.

[In an action against a vessel for damages to the cargo caused by moisture in the hold of the vessel, usually called "sweat," where it appears that the goods were stowed in the usual and proper manner, it will not be held negligence in the carrier to have failed to adopt a certain system of ventilation, the utility and efficacy of which as a preventive of a "sweat" is a matter of doubt and dispute.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Adrian and Story against the vessel Live Yankee on a contract of affreightment. Libel dismissed.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This was a libel on a contract of affreightment. The goods were shipped under the usual bill of lading, but on delivery were found to be saturated with moisture, and much damaged. It was proved that the goods were stowed in the usual and proper manner, but on the top of the between-decks cargo, and immediately under the upper deck, and that the damage was caused by moisture in the hold of the vessel, or what is usually called "sweat." On the general principle by which this cause must be determined this court has already expressed its opinion. In the case of Levy v. The Caroline, [Case No. 8,301.] it was considered that the carrier is not liable for damage arising from sweat, unless he is proved to have been guilty of negligence. That so far as relates to damage from this cause, all goods transported on voyages like that from the eastern states to this port must be considered perishable, or liable to injury, and the general rules with regard to perishable goods must be applied to them. That where damage is attributable to the intrinsic perishability of goods, the carrier is not liable, unless it appear that he has neglected to take proper care of them. These principles must, I think, govern this case. In the case of Camoys v. Scurr, 19 Car. & P. 383, which was an action against a carrier for damage to goods arising from their bad stowage, it was held that, if on the whole it be left in doubt what the cause of the injury was, or if it may as well be attributable to "perils of the sea" as to negligence, the plaintiff cannot recover. Lord Denman said, in summing up, that "the jury were to see clearly that the defendants were guilty of negligence, before they could find a verdict against them." Ang. Carr. § 212. In Cariss v. Johnson, in the New York superior court, 1848, Judge Oakley said: "I do not consider that common carriers are in all cases responsible for not delivering property in a sound state. They are not warrantors that the property shall remain safe and sound. They are only warrantors for its safe delivery, and their further responsibility depends upon whether they use due care and diligence in carrying the property, or negligence can be proved against them by any omission to do what prudent men should do under such circumstances." Undoubtedly, when goods are given to a carrier in a sound state, and are damaged when delivered, the presumption of law is that it was by his negligence. But if he can show a peril of the sea sufficient to account for the injury, or a natural cause, such as the leakage, evaporation, or fermentation of liquids, or the rotting or decay of fruits, &c., the burden of proof will then be on the plaintiff to show actual negligence or defective means. If, in such a case, the proof leaves it doubtful what the cause of the injury was, or "unless the jury," in the words of Lord Denman, "see clearly that the defendants have been guilty of negligence," the plaintiff cannot recover. The degree of diligence to which, in respect of perishable goods, carriers are bound, is stated by Judge Oakley in the case already cited. Their responsibility depends upon whether they use due care and diligence in carrying the property; or negligence can be proved against them by any omission to do what prudent men should do under such circumstances.

In the case at bar, the injury is shown to have arisen from sweat or moisture collected in the hold during the voyage. It appears that sweat is incidental to all voyages around the Horn; that, in a greater or less degree, it almost invariably occurs; that it is a cause of damage well known to both shippers and ship owners, and that as yet no certain means have been devised to prevent it; that it is caused by the great variations in temperature necessarily occurring on such voyages; that it depends, in a great degree, upon the nature of the cargo, and is affected by other circumstances, the nature and operation of which are not clearly explained. It appears, therefore, that damage by sweat arises from natural causes independent of the agency of man, and that it is to be likened to the damage by fermentation, evaporation, spontaneous combustion, &c., which are all more or less owing to the heat or other conditions under which cargo is carried in ships, but for losses by which the carrier is not liable, unless negligence can be proved. The negligence attributable to the carrier in this case is alleged to consist in his not having provided sufficient ventilation for his ship. So far as his means extended, the master is shown to have used all diligence in ventilating the cargo. The hatches were frequently taken off, and everything was done which during a voyage could be done to preserve it. The ship was provided with one large ventilator, going down to the hold, and communicating with the between-decks by airholes. She seems, in the opinion of some of the witnesses at least, to have been as well ventilated as ships ordinarily are; but her means of ventilation were inferior to those usually provided in clipper ships—the latter being generally furnished with one or two pairs of ventilators of Emerson's construction.

It is contended that the carrier was negligent in not having had more ventilators, or a system of ventilation such as that recently adopted in most clipper ships. The carrier in this case undoubtedly supposed that the ventilation provided by him was sufficient to secure all the good effects which may attend ventilation. The question is, has he been guilty of negligence in not having adopted a more thorough system? On the part of the claimants it is contended that the only preventive of sweat which has been suggested, is of extremely uncertain efficacy; that sweat frequently occurs in well ventilated ships, and that sometimes no traces of it are observed in the least ventilated vessels; that it depends more upon the nature of the cargo than upon any other circumstance; but that it is affected by causes the nature and mode of preventing the operation of which are not ascertained. In support of these allegations they have called many witnesses of the highest respectability, and possessed of the largest opportunities for observation. Some of them have not hesitated to declare that they considered the ventilation of ships, as commonly practiced, of no use whatever, or positively injurious.

On the other hand, the libelants have attempted to show by the testimony of an equal number of witnesses, that the sweating of ships can be, and is, prevented by the use of a thorough system of ventilation; that such a system has been generally adopted in the clipper ships of recent construction, and that its efficacy has been proved by the condition of the cargoes of several ships now or recently in port. They further showed that ventilation is required by Lloyd's agents in China, in ships taking cargoes of tea and silks, to prevent the effects of steam. It was suggested, however, that the steam thus intended to be prevented was a dry and noxious exhalation, impairing the flavor of teas and injuring the fabrics of silks, but was wholly distinct from sweat, which is condensed moisture collected on the lower side of the deck. This point, however, was not clearly established. Had the libelant in this case clearly established the general recognition of the fact that a particular system of ventilation will prevent damage by sweat, that that system is universally adopted and is usually effectual, he might claim that the master in omitting to adopt it had shown a want of ordinary diligence and care. But although he has shown that the clipper ships which frequent this port are usually ventilated in some way more or less thorough, he is met by the fact that cargoes are frequently damaged in the best ventilated ships, and by the testimony of numerous witnesses, who express their disbelief in the efficacy of any system of ventilation whatever. Before the court can say that the omission of any particular means of preventing this damage is negligence in the master, it must be satisfied that those means are generally recognized as effectual. Does, then, the testimony establish this fact?

Whether or not ventilation is of any service, seems to be a mere matter of opinion, nor is it possible for the court, on the evidence, to come to any certain conclusion, whether the advocates or opponents of ventilation are in the right. The whole subject seems involved in doubt and obscurity, and the systems of ventilation that have been resorted to appear to have been adopted as experiments or attempts to remove the evil, rather than as a certain and ascertained means of preventing it.

It has been urged with great force by the advocate of the libelants that it is the duty of the court to exact from the carrier the employment of the latest inventions, and to demand that he keep pace with the last improvements in mechanical art; that by so doing the court will cherish, promote, and stimulate the application of science to the useful arts, and contribute to their growth and improvement. But the difficulty in this case is that it does not clearly appear that ventilation is an improvement. On the contrary, several witnesses, whose great experience entitles their opinions to much credit, affirm that in their own ships, and for their own cargoes, they would not adopt any system of ventilation whatever. Emerson's ventilators, the employment of which was most strongly insisted on by the advocate of the libelants, have been in use for the last five or six years. If they had been found so effectual a remedy as to justify the court in pronouncing the carrier who fails to adopt them guilty of negligence, is it credible that so many and so respectable persons connected with shipping would be found to disbelieve in that and all other systems of ventilation? The testimony brought to show a prevailing usage in this port, that the shipper bears a loss by sweat, though it failed to establish a usage in the legal sense of the term, proved this at least: that the general opinion of persons connected with commerce, shippers and ship owners, is that the ship is not liable. Surely such an opinion would not prevail if there were any well-known, usually-adopted, and generally-recognized means of preventing sweat. And yet the court must find such to be the fact before it can declare this vessel to be liable. If it should be determined in this case that every vessel which is not provided with a ventilating apparatus is liable, the principle would include many ships which have avoided injuring their cargoes, though wholly unprovided with ventilation. In the case of The Thomas Watson, [Case No. 13,933.] for example, the rule would operate with peculiar hardship. That vessel, it appears, has made five voyages to this port, and has never damaged a single package, and yet she is not ventilated at all. Surely her owners are justified in assuming that ventilation in her case would be no improvement. If then, on her next voyage, some of her cargo is injured by sweat, her master would be held liable for negligence, under the principle the court is asked to adopt. With what propriety can the court call upon her owners to adopt a system which experience of their own ship has proved to be unnecessary, if not injurious; and how can it make a similar exaction of any of the numerous witnesses of intelligence and experience who profess their disbelief in the efficacy of all systems of ventilation? It may be said that ventilation may not be requisite in vessels of the size of the Thomas Watson, while in clipper ships to omit it would be improper. But this, after all, is but an opinion opposed by many of the most experienced witnesses, and affording no solid basis for the judgment of a court. Besides, in the uncertainty and obscurity in which this subject is involved, how can the court discriminate between vessels of various sizes? When is a vessel large enough to require ventilation? When is she small enough to dispense with it? Even the witnesses for the libelants, who are the strongest advocates for ventilation, confess that damage by sweat is of constant and daily occurrence; that few ships arrive whose cargoes are not more or less injured by it, and that a still more thorough system of ventilation is required. Could this be so if there did exist, as claimed by the libelants, any generally known and usually adopted remedy? If the ship owner is guilty of negligence in this case, for having failed to adopt a generally-recognized remedy for sweat, it should appear that cargoes can be, and usually are, protected by it—and yet the reverse is the fact. How can this remedy be said to be generally recognized as such when it fails so often as to leave the question as yet undetermined whether it is of any use whatever?

It is urged that the ship owners in this case have themselves recognized the expediency of ventilation by introducing it into their own ships, but that the means adopted by them were incomplete and insufficient. But the fact that they have tried what they no doubt considered a sufficient system of ventilation, at least shows that they were not reckless or indifferent on the subject, and the question still recurs—Are there any well-known and generally-recognized means of preventing this kind of damage which they have been guilty of negligence in omitting to use? If there had been any such, it is but fair to suppose they would have been adopted in the ship which the libelants in their letter to the master pronounce "a noble specimen of the merchant marine." It is to be observed that in the very letter in which the libelants announce their intention to test the question of the ship's liability for damage by sweat, they make no complaint of insufficient ventilation, or suggest the use of more efficient means to that end. But they propose "the idea of experimenting upon the prevention of sweat by ceiling the between-decks overhead." They thus seem themselves to admit that no certain or established means of preventing this damage exist, and the remedy is suggested merely as an experiment.

On the whole, I consider that under the evidence in this case it does not appear that the damage has occurred from causes originating in the agency of man; nor that it could, like damage by rats, injuries by worms, etc., have been prevented by proper care; that the injury has arisen from natural causes, the effect of which the court cannot affirm the carrier could or ought to have guarded against; that it is not to be likened to the case of some unknown and internal defect in the particular vehicle of conveyance, for which the carrier is liable, but it is a risk to which every shipper knows his goods are liable, and which he also knows there are no ascertained and established means of preventing; that he is as competent as the carrier to determine which of the various modes of preventing it are most likely to insure the desired result; and that in shipping in this vessel he assumed the risk of her system of ventilation, as he would have assumed the risk of damage without any ventilation whatever had he shipped his goods in the Thomas Watson—and that, inasmuch as he knew the dangers to which his goods would be exposed, he might, had he chosen, have protected them by packing them in a different manner. But while I feel called upon so to determine in this case and with the present imperfect knowledge of this subject, it is not to be inferred that the same decision will always hereafter be made. On the contrary, if it should hereafter appear that science has suggested, or experience has shown, a remedy or preventive of damage from this source, which shall be generally recognized and adopted, it will be negligence in the carrier to omit its use. But as at present it cannot be said with any certainty that such a remedy has been discovered, I cannot find the carrier guilty of negligence in having failed to resort to one that has been suggested and used to some extent, but the utility or efficacy of which is still a matter of discussion and dispute.

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1877.²

COLLISION IN THE IRISH CHANNEL.—STEAMER AND SAILING VESSEL.—IDENTITY OF STEAMER—OPPOSITE COURSES.—CONFUSION OF PURPOSE.—LIGHTS.—STEAMER'S DUTY.

1. The American ship H. Q., with all hands, was sunk at night in the Irish channel, by a collision, as alleged, with the British steamer A. The steamer averred that the ship was either sunk by a collision with some other vessel than the steamer, or was wrecked, and that her loss was not caused by any collision with the steamer. The evidence seemed to be, that the steamer was proceeding down the channel, heading from W. $\frac{1}{4}$ N. to W. $\frac{1}{2}$ N., and going about 12 knots an hour, and the ship was heading about E. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S., with the wind from about S. W., and sailing from 8 to 9 knots an hour. The steamer made the ship's green light about 2 points on the starboard bow. The steamer kept her course for some 4 minutes, until the ship's green light was some $3\frac{1}{2}$ points on the starboard bow, when the ship shut in her green light and showed her red light; whereupon the steamer ported and slowed. The ship then showed her green light again; whereupon the steamer stopped and backed and had got sternway at the time of the collision. Before the collision, the ship made another change, and showed her red light; and the steamer struck the port bow of the ship: Held, that the loss of the ship was caused by a collision with this steamer.

2. That, under the circumstances, it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the ship, and it was the correlative duty of the ship to allow the steamer to keep out of her way, and not to embarrass the steamer in performing such duty.

3. That it was proper for the steamer to keep on her course as long as the ship's green light was visible, and that, when the ship showed her red light, the steamer's duty of avoiding the ship did not cease, and she discharged that duty a second time by porting and slowing.

4. That it was reasonable and proper, under the circumstances, for the officer in charge of the steamer, when he saw a movement in the approaching vessel, indicated by the shutting in of the green and the showing of the red light, to take this as evidence of her intention to throw herself across his onward path.

5. That, it appearing that the officer in charge of the steamer was a good seaman, of capacity, watchful, thoughtful, and deliberate, much must be left to the judgment of such a man, charged with the safety of a large steamer, and of the lives of those on board, as to which one of two or more methods he will adopt in a given exigency, if it is not shown that the one he adopted was such as to indicate that there was no fair exercise of reasonable judgment in concluding to adopt it.

6. That, when the ship again showed her green light, and the danger of collision was apparent and imminent, it was the highest duty of the steamer to stop and back, rather than go ahead and starboard; that, if it be conceded that the stopping and backing was an error of judgment, it was not a fault.

7. That it was impossible that the changes by the ship from green to red and from red to green could have been caused by the yawing of the ship.

8. That the ship was in fault in her movements in presence of what she could and should have seen was a steamer; that, for what ensued after the ship exhibited her green light a second time, the steamer was not responsible; and that the libel must be dismissed.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by the owners of the Harvest Queen against the Adriatic. Libel dismissed; also dismissed upon appeal to the circuit court. The Adriatic, Case No. 91. Decree of circuit court affirmed, upon appeal to the supreme court in Marshall v. The Adriatic, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355, 107 U. S. 512.]

Thomas B. Stillman and Henry J. Scudder, for libellants.

Everett P. Wheeler and Joseph H. Choate, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 30th of December, 1875, the ship Harvest Queen, an American vessel, belonging to the libellants, with a cargo on board, also belonging to them, set sail from the harbor of Queenstown, in Ireland, for Liverpool, in England. The steamer Adriatic, a British vessel, sailed from Liverpool to New York, on the same day, and proceeded down the Irish channel. The libel alleges, that, when the ship was distant about fifty miles from her place of departure, and was proceeding up the Irish channel, the wind blowing a stiff breeze from about southwest, and the weather being clear starlight, she was run into by the steamer, at about 3 o'clock A. M., on the 31st of December, the steamer striking the ship on her port bow, with such violence as to cause her, with her cargo, to sink in a very short time after the collision; that by said collision the ship was totally lost, and her master and officers and all hands on board of her were lost; that prior to and at the time of the collision the general course of the ship was up, and the general course of the steamer was down, the Irish channel, and their courses crossed but slightly, if at all; and that the collision was caused by the negligence and improper conduct of those on board of the steamer, in not having a good and sufficient lookout, in running at too great a rate of speed, in not keeping out of the way of the ship, and in not stopping and backing in time to avoid the collision. The libellants claim to recover against the steamer, as damages sustained by the collision, the sum of $225,000.

The answer of the steamer avers that the ship was either sunk by a collision with some other vessel than the steamer, in the Irish channel, on or about the 31st of December, or was wrecked on or about that day in said channel, and that her loss was caused thereby and not by any collision with the steamer. Without discussing in detail the evidence on the subject, it is sufficient to say, that it leaves no doubt in the mind that the steamer, at or about the time and place charged, came into collision with the ship Harvest Queen, belonging to the libellants, in such manner and with such results as to cause the sinking and loss of the ship and of her cargo and of every person on board of her.

The material question in the case, to be determined on the evidence, is as to whether the steamer was in fault. The vessels were sailing on nearly opposite courses. The steamer was heading from west one-quarter north to west one-half north. The ship was heading about east by south half south. They were thus drawing on to the courses of each other from one point to one point and a quarter. The ship was sailing at the rate of from 8 to 9 knots an hour and the steamer at the rate of about 12 knots. The steamer made the green light of the ship at about 2 points on the starboard bow of the steamer. The red light of the ship was not then visible to the steamer. The white and green lights of the steamer, and not her red light, ought then to have been visible to the ship, and undoubtedly were, and it was her duty to heed them. Under the circumstances thus existing, it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the ship, and it was the correlative duty of the ship to allow the steamer to keep out of her way, and not to embarrass or hamper the steamer in performing such duty. The position was one of safety. The green lights of the two vessels, and only those, were exposed to each other. There was no exposing of green to red. Under this condition of things, the steamer kept on her course, neither porting nor starboarding, nor slowing, nor stopping, nor reversing. It was proper for her to so keep on her course. She had a right to presume that, in the presence of her exposed green light, the ship would continue to expose her green light and that only. There was no obligation on the steamer then to starboard, because the vessels were at such a distance apart, probably 2 miles, that, if both kept their courses, the ship was certain to pass clear, on the starboard hand of the steamer. She would draw more and more on the starboard bow of the steamer. And such was the fact. The ship's green light opened more to the starboard of the steamer until it got to be some 3½ points on the starboard bow of the steamer. This was a position of safety. The ship would not reach the path of the steamer until she was astern of the steamer. At this juncture, and some four minutes after the ship's green light had first been seen by the steamer, the ship shut in her green light and exposed her red light. All the time before that she had exposed her green light, and that alone, steadily, with no glimpse of her red light. Here, then, arose an exigency. Here was danger. The first officer of the steamer, Mr. Bence, was on her bridge, watching the green light off his starboard bow. He had charge of the steamer at the time and was responsible for her navigation. He had seen the green light for four minutes and had seen it thus open more on his starboard bow. He could not tell to what species of craft it belonged, whether to a fore and aft vessel which could sail within five points of the wind, or to a square-rigged vessel which could not sail nearer to the wind than from six to seven points. He saw a movement in the approaching vessel, indicated by the change in her lights, which it was reasonable and proper for him, under the circumstances, to take as evidence of her intention to throw herself across his onward path. He was called upon suddenly and in an exigency to determine whether he would do anything, and, if something, what. He could, as to the course of his vessel, do one of three things—either let it remain as it was, or starboard, or port. He ported. The libellants insist that he erred in porting; that, if he had not ported, there would have been no collision; that he ought to have starboarded, or, at least, have kept on the same course; that, if he had even kept his course, there would have been no collision, as the ship could not have reached his path ahead of him; and that, if he had starboarded, he would certainly have sailed away from all danger. It is easy to criticize and to be wise after the event. Mr. Bence seems to have been a good seaman, of experience and capacity, watchful, thoughtful and deliberate. Much must be left to the judgment of such a man, charged with the safety of a large steamer and of the lives of those on board, as to which one of two or more methods he will adopt in a given exigency, if it is not shown that the one he adopted was such as to indicate that there was no fair exercise of reasonable judgment in concluding to adopt it. By determining to port and throw the head of the steamer to starboard, Mr. Bence took a course which would certainly, if the approaching vessel continued to display only her red light, very soon bring the vessels on parallel courses, with their red lights exposed to each other. That was safety. To take that course was prudent, and, at the distance apart the two vessels were, it would have been successful, if the ship had continued to expose only her red light. The steamer's duty of avoiding the ship did not cease because the ship shut in her green light and exposed her red light. It continued in the altered circumstances. As the exigency was sudden and unforeseen, and as the vessels were nearing each other rapidly, promptness of decision and action on the part of the steamer was necessary. Even if the ship had continued to expose only her red light, the steamer might, it may be conceded, have passed her in safety by going on at the same speed as before, without starboarding or with starboarding. But I think it quite clear, that, if the ship had continued to expose only her red light, the steamer would, having ported, have equally avoided a collision with the ship, especially as, on the weight of the evidence, the steamer's engines were slowed at the time her helm was ported. The steamer adopted this manoeuvre of porting and slowing deliberately and wisely. There was no apparent necessity, at that time, that she should stop and reverse her engines. She discharged her duty of avoiding the ship, by proper movements, for the second time. She did this, although the ship was in fault in her movements in the presence of what she could and should have seen was a steamer. These movements of the steamer had been made, and she was swinging to starboard under her port helm, when the ship shut in her red light and exposed only her green light. Seeing this confusion of purpose in the ship, the engines of the steamer were stopped and reversed at full speed. This was proper. There was nothing else for the steamer to do. The ship had twice turned from a course and position in reference to which the steamer had acted, and acted in a way which would have given safety to the ship. Whatever followed the ship had brought upon herself. For what ensued after the ship exhibited her green light the second time, the steamer was not responsible. Before the collision, the ship made another change, and shut in her green light, and showed only her red light.

A strenuous effort was made on the part of the libellants to induce the belief that the changes by the ship from green to red and from red back to green were produced by the yawing of the ship in the following sea and with the free wind. But it is impossible to believe this, for, the green light was visible at first, alone, for four minutes continuously, with no glimpse of the red light, and the green light opened from two points on the starboard bow of the steamer to three and a half points on the same bow, before the red light appeared. The effects of yawing would have been sooner observed.

It is earnestly contended, for the libellants, that the red light of the ship, because of which the steamer ported, was in sight for only one minute, and that, when the green light of the ship again appeared, the steamer should have kept going ahead and should have starboarded. The ship was a third time, and in a third position, imposing on the steamer the duty of avoiding her, after the steamer had twice assumed and discharged that duty. The distance between the vessels was diminishing fast, and with this erratic vessel nearly ahead, and the danger of collision apparent and imminent, it was the highest duty of the steamer to stop and reverse her engines. She did so, and her engines were reversed at full speed, and, on the evidence, she had got sternway on at the time of the collision. If it were to be conceded that the stopping and reversing was an error of judgment, it could not be held to have been a fault, occurring as it did after what had previously happened, but would be regarded as an error which the libellants could not make a ground of complaint. But it is not to be admitted that it was an error of judgment.

Although the court is asked to condemn the movements of the steamer, no testimony of any expert in seamanship or in navigation is advanced to show that such movements were faulty or unwise or imprudent or unintelligent. The case of the libellants seems to rest on the proposition, that it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the ship, and that it is not established that the ship changed her course. But the steamer could act only in view of what she saw, and what she had a right reasonably to infer from what she saw. Her movements were taken with a reasonable certainty that they would give safety to both vessels. She exercised the highest degree of diligence imposed by the law, in her efforts to avoid the ship. She exercised that diligence discreetly throughout to the end, in all the emergencies which the vacillating movements of the ship threw upon her.

The libel is dismissed, with costs.

CARRIERS—LIABILITY FOR LOSS AND INJURY—EVIDENCE.

A bill of lading for coir yarn in bales, shipped by a steamer from Liverpool to New York, receipted for the bales as "in good order and well conditioned," and described them as "in transit" from another steamer. They were, apparently, in good external order. The voyage was ten days. The bales, when discharged, appeared to have been, at some time, wet with sea water. The yarn inside was damp to the touch, discolored, and unfit for use to make fine goods. The bales were properly stowed, and nothing appeared as to how they could have been damaged on the steamer. There was no evidence as to the condition of the bales when shipped. On a libel, in admiralty, against the steamer, to recover for the damage: Held, that the libellant could not recover, because he had not shown that the goods were damaged while on board of the steamer.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. This was an appeal by the libellants from a decree of the district court, in a suit in rem, in admiralty, dismissing the libel. The following facts were found by this court: "On the 20th of October, 1875, two hundred and fifty bales of coir yarn were shipped on the steamship Adriatic, consigned to the libellants, in New York. Coir yarn is the fibre of the cocoanut husk, made into strands of yarn, and put up in hanks. The hanks are put in bales, compressed, covered with burlap wrappers, and wound around with iron hoops from end to end. Coir yarn is used for making mats. The bill of lading signed by the agent of the ship at Liverpool, receipted for the bales, in the usual form, as 'shipped in good order and well conditioned.' The goods were described as 'two hundred and fifty bales coir yarn, in transit from steamer Macedonia,' and were to be delivered 'in like good order and well conditioned.' The bill of lading also contained this clause: 'Weight, contents, quality, condition, quantity and value unknown, and ship owner not accountable for the same.' At the time of the shipment, the bales were, apparently, in good external order and condition. The ship sailed from Liverpool October 20th, and arrived in New York October 30th, making her voyage in about ten days. When the bales were landed in New York, one hundred were found to have been wet at some time with sea water. The wrappers were somewhat stained and discolored, and the hoops rusty. On cutting the wrappers and examining the yarn, it was found to be damp. It was not wet enough to drip, but the dampness was perceptible to the touch. It was, to some extent, discolored and unfit for the manufacture of fine goods, to which it was, on account of its quality, originally adapted. The bales were landed upon a dry and covered dock. The bales were all well and properly stowed in the lower hold of the ship. No other goods came out of the vessel wet. There was no appearance of a leak, and the hatches were all in good order and well secured, so as to be impervious to sea water, when the ship arrived. There was no evidence as to the condition of the bales when shipped, other than that which was contained in the bill of lading. It was not shown how long they had been 'in transit' when the shipment was made. Neither was it shown from what place the original consignment was made, nor whether the bales had been specially exposed to sea water, either while on the voyage from Liverpool to New York, or before. There was nothing in the appearance of the yarn to indicate that the wetting might not have occurred before the delivery to the Adriatic."

Francis Howland, for libellants.
C. E. Souther, for claimant.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The receipt in the bill of lading is an admission that the goods were, when received, in apparent good order, but it is not conclusive as to their actual condition. It makes a prima facie case against the ship, and gives the libellants a right to recover, unless this case is overcome by the evidence. The burden of the admission rests upon the ship, until it is shown that the condition and appearance of the goods at the time of their discharge are consistent with the actual existence, in the packages, of the cause of the damage when the shipment was made, without discovery by the ship's agents, acting in good faith, and with ordinary care, while taking the cargo on board. There is, here, no question of estoppel. The bill of lading has not been assigned, and it does not appear that any advances have been made on the faith of it. The parties and their rights are precisely the same as they were when the receipt was signed. The evidence is, as I think, sufficient to shift the burden of proof from the ship to the libellants. The goods were received while "in transit," and from another ship. They might have been exposed to sea water while on their way to Liverpool, and still the damage such as not necessarily to attract attention as the transfer was made from ship to ship. It was only about ten days from the time of the shipment in Liverpool to the discharge in New York. When the bales were discharged, there was no appearance of recent exposure. The wrappers were discolored and the yarn was damp. No water dripped from any of the packages, and no attempt seems to have been made to ascertain whether any could be brought out by pressure. Certainly, it is to be presumed that such an attempt would have been made, if the indications were such as to make it reasonable. No other goods were wet, and there was no appearance of any leak in the ship. There was no water to be seen in the hold where the goods were stowed, and none of the other cargo appears to have been damp, even. Under these circumstances, it seems to me clear, that the libellants, before they can recover, must prove that their yarn was actually free from wet or dampness when it went on board. The damaged appearance of the yarn when it came out, is a circumstance to be taken into consideration in their favor, but it is not, of itself, sufficient, in my opinion, to overcome the effect of the other facts, which are clearly established by the evidence. The judgment of the district court was right, and a decree may be prepared, dismissing the libel.

[NOTE. In a suit against a common carrier, the libellant makes a prima facie case by producing the receipt of the carrier: "Received in good order." But these words do not constitute an agreement; they are a mere admission, and may be explained or contradicted by the carrier. The Pacific, Case No. 12,644: The Howard, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 231. In case of loss, the presumption of law is that it was occasioned by the act or default of the carrier; and the burden of proof is upon him to show that it arose from a cause existing before his receipt of the goods, and for which he is not responsible. Nelson v. Woodruff, 1 Black, (66 U. S.) 156.]

COLLISION — BETWEEN STEAM AND SAILING VESSELS—CHANGE OF COURSE.

1. A steamer collided with a sailing ship in the night, having changed her course and stopped and backed her engine, in an endeavor to avoid the collision. It appeared that, if the steamer had kept her course and speed, and the ship had done what she in fact did do, there would have been no collision. But, as the steamer had skilful officers, who exercised good judgment, in view of the appearances of, and changes in, the ship's lights, it was held that the steamer was not in fault.

2. The ship sank with all on board, and the steamer was held not to have been in fault for her conduct after the collision, in respect to getting out her boats and proceeding on her voyage.

[3. Cited in The Westover, 2 Fed. Rep. 93, to the proposition that if there is any uncertainty as to the lights or course of a sailing vessel, an approaching steamer must, if necessary, slacken her speed, stop or back and neither proceed nor change her course till the course of the sailing vessel is ascertained.]

This was a libel in rem, in admiralty, filed in the district court, to recover damages for a collision. That court dismissed the libel, [The Adriatic, Case No. 89] and the claimant appealed to this court. [Libel dismissed. Decree of circuit court subsequently affirmed by supreme court in Marshall v. The Adriatic, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355, 107 U. S. 512.]

This court found the following facts: "During the forenoon of December 30th, 1875, the ship Harvest Queen, on a voyage from San Francisco, touched at Queenstown, Ireland, for orders. She was 187 feet long, 42.6 broad, 28.6 deep, and of 1,626 tons burthen, American measurement. She had on board 1,750 tons of grain, in bulk. Both vessel and cargo were owned by the libellants. Her jib-boom was 31.6 feet long and 16.5 inches in diameter. The bowsprit extended from the stem forward 33.6 feet, and from its heel to the stem was 12 feet. The size of the stem was 32x33½ inches. On top of the bow and over the bowsprit was a breasthook of oak, about twenty feet long and sixteen inches thick, extending each way from the stem about ten feet. A stick of timber from 28 to 32 inches square was required to make it. It was firmly bolted to the knightheads. Above this was the forecastle rail. Having received orders to go to Liverpool, the ship was towed out of the harbor by a tug, and left, about half-past eight in the evening, four or five miles southeast of Roche's Point, headed on her voyage. The wind at the time was blowing a fresh breeze from the southwest. The tide was ebb and running to the westward. The usual route for vessels bound from Queenstown to Liverpool was past Tuskar Light, off the southeastern extremity of Ireland. The proper course for a sailing vessel, from the point where the Harvest Queen was left, would be east by south, but, to make that course, under the circumstances of wind and sea which prevailed that night, it would be necessary to steer somewhat more to the southward. The Harvest Queen could not sail closer to the wind than seven points, and, with the wind as it then was, she was capable of making eight or nine knots an hour. The Adriatic was an iron steamer, running regularly between Liverpool and New York, in the White Star line. She was 450 feet long, 42 broad and 30 or 32 deep, with no bowsprit and a very sharp bow. She left Liverpool, on one of her regular voyages, at noon of December 30th, 1875, and was in all respects tight, staunch and strong, and properly officered, manned and equipped. She passed Tuskar Light a quarter of an hour after midnight, and the Saltees or Coningbeg Lightship, four or five miles away, at 1.55 A. M. of the 31st. The captain, after passing the Lightship, put her upon a course west $\frac{1}{4}$ north, which was somewhat further away from the Irish coast than usual, as he was not to stop at Queenstown. At 2.15 A. M. he went into the chart room and lay down on a sofa, without taking off his clothes. He had been on duty all the time after leaving Liverpool, and, when he went away, gave orders to be called at four o'clock, or sooner, if any vessels were seen. The chart room adjoins and opens out of the wheel house. The first officer was then on watch. He stood on the bridge, and most of the time on the starboard side. Three seamen were on the lookout, two stationed one on each side of the No. 3 house, and the other on the port side of the bridge. The third officer was on the saloon deck, where he could pass orders from the bridge to the wheel. One of the quartermasters was at the wheel, and another in the wheel house with him. The forward deck was roofed, and, from its shape was called the turtle back, or whale back. No. 3 house was just abaft this turtle back. It was 130 feet from the stem, and both the turtle back and the saloon deck were reached from it by bridges. The spray dashed over the turtle back, so that the lookouts could not have seen ahead at all times, if they had been stationed there. For this reason they were put on the house. The bridge was one hundred and seventy-five feet from the stem. At 2.35 A. M., the first officer, from his place on the bridge, and looking through a night glass, saw a green light about two points on his starboard bow. It was so far away that it could not be seen with the naked eye. The steamer was then about fifty-two miles to the eastward of Roche's Point, and fifteen miles south-southeast of the Hook Tower Light. Both Coningbeg and the Hook Tower Lights could be seen from where she was. The wind was from southwest to south-southwest, blowing a fresh gale, and with a force indicated by the figures 7 or 8 on the Beaufort scale. The night was dark on the water, but the sky was clear, with detached clouds. The sea was high and running strong from the southward. The steamer was going about twelve knots an hour, which was as fast as she could be driven under the existing conditions of wind and sea. She had all her regulation lights in their proper places and brightly burning. None of her sails were set, and she was propelled exclusively by steam. When the first officer discovered the green light, he had no means of telling what kind of a sailing vessel it was on, or what her exact course was. He did not change his course, but called the third officer to the bridge, who also looked at the light through the glass. Not long afterwards a light, bearing in about the same direction, was seen by the starboard lookout on the No. 3 house. He sent the other lookout stationed with him on the house, to give two strokes of the bell placed on the turtle back for signal purposes. This was promptly done, and signified that there was a light ahead off the starboard bow. It gave no indication of the color of the light. At 2.39 A. M. the green light, which had broadened to three and a half points on the starboard bow, or, possibly, something less, changed to red. The first officer thereupon ordered the wheel to port, and telegraphed the engineer to 'stand by,' following this, at once, with a further order, to 'slow.' All these orders were promptly obeyed, and, under the influence of her port helm, the steamer swung slowly to starboard. About a minute afterwards, the red light changed to green. By this time the bow of the steamer had gone off about a point to starboard, and was swinging more and more in that direction, under the continued port helm. As soon as the green light reappeared the first officer gave an order to stop the engine, and then, as soon as it could be done, to back at full speed. These orders were all obeyed, and the engine got under reverse motion at or about 2.41. No change of the wheel was then made, but the first officer directed that the captain be called, and this was done. The captain, when he was called, came out of the chart room into the wheel house, and, as he passed to the deck on the starboard side, noticed, by the indicator, that the wheel was to port. When he got on deck, the engine was under reverse motion, and this he detected. Looking ahead, he saw a green light not very far away, about two points off the starboard bow. Then green and red lights appeared together, and then the red alone. Without any consultation with the first officer, he gave the order from the deck 'hard a-starboard,' and went on the bridge. This order was obeyed. In going astern the effect of a starboard helm is the same as that of a port helm when going ahead; it swings the bow to starboard. Very soon after the captain got on the bridge the Harvest Queen appeared through the darkness. She was apparently under as much sail as she could carry and headed for the Adriatic. Before anything further could be done on the steamer to avoid a collision, the jib-boom of the Harvest Queen ran over the turtle back and was in some way broken so that it fell down over the side of the steamer. The Adriatic's engines were at the time backing at full speed, and, if the vessel herself was not actually under sternway, she was not going ahead much, if any. She kept on backing, and, when the vessels got separated, as they soon did, a part of the ship's outer jib and its blocks and rigging were found on the turtle back and hanging over the port rail. The fish davits were made of round iron six and a quarter inches through where they leave the turtle back, and bent upwards like a bow. At the time of the collision, they were ranged forward along the side of the vessel. The anchor stocks were of iron — inches through. There were light iron guard rails around the turtle back. After the collision the port fish davit was found bent downwards towards the deck seventeen inches, or thereabouts, the port anchor stock broken and hanging by the lashings, and the guard rails on both sides bent, and some of the stanchions broken. The paint on the bow was somewhat chafed and scratched, but not very much. The first fish davit was thirty-seven feet from the stem, and the bent and broken rails about twenty-eight feet. The broken anchor stock was a short distance forward of the fish davit. No other injury was done to the Adriatic. The shock of the collision was scarcely perceptible abaft the foremast. There was no hail from the Harvest Queen, but, just after the collision, the first officer of the Adriatic hailed her once from the turtle back. No answer was heard. The Adriatic continued backing until 2.53 A. M., when her engines were stopped. After the vessels separated, the Harvest Queen passed across the bow of the steamer from port to starboard. Her masts appeared to be all standing and the sails upon them set, but, in some way, she was injured by the collision, so that she sank not long afterwards, with all on board, and became a total loss. Nothing has since been heard of her or any of her crew. When last seen she was apparently half a mile away from the steamer, and showing her green light four or five points off the starboard bow. Immediately after the vessels got separated, orders were given on the Adriatic to clear away the boats, and the men at once set to work to do so, but, the Harvest Queen still keeping in sight, the order was countermanded, for the moment. The Adriatic then steamed slowly toward the Harvest Queen, until she became lost to view. About the time she disappeared cries for help were heard in the water off in the direction of where she was last seen. The orders to lower the boats were then promptly repeated, and two boats put out. Some confusion occurred in getting the boats away, as the crews had not been assigned to them, the steamer having only just left port. There was no unreasonable delay, however. The boats were put in command of the second and fourth officers, and rowed in the direction of where the voices came from, and where the ship was last seen. They remained out from half an hour to an hour, when they were recalled by a signal from the steamer. Nothing was found except a piece of timber supposed at the time to be a part of the broken jib-boom, and a piece of rope. At 4.30 A. M., the Adriatic again started on her voyage. The movements of the engine, after it was stopped at 2.53, were thus recorded in the engineer's log: '2.54 A. M., ahead slow; 3.00, stop; 3.15, astern slow; 3.16, stop; 3.23, astern slow; 3.26, stop; 3.45, ahead slow; 4.00, stop; 4.09, astern slow; 4.11, stop; 4.15, astern slow; 4.16, stop; 4.26, ahead slow; 4.30, full speed.' When the green light was first seen from the Adriatic, it is not probable that the Harvest Queen was where she could see the Coningbeg Lightship. She must have been just then coming within the range of that light, which is placed some miles outside of the land. It is at the southeastern extremity of a series of dangerous rocks extending out a considerable distance from the land, known as the Saltees Rocks. On the 12th of January, 1876, a piece of the port side of the breasthook of the Harvest Queen, seven feet and ten inches long, and a piece of the starboard forecaskle rail, extending from the cathead forward to the towing chock, were found cast ashore about a mile and a half west of Carnsore Point, which is on the coast of Ireland about midway between Tuskar and Coningbeg. Near the same place were also found a small piece of the name board of the Harvest Queen, and part of an oar, with her name on it. No other parts of the wreck have ever been found. The place at which these articles were found was where the wreckage would naturally have drifted, if the Harvest Queen went down in the neighborhood of where the collision occurred. The breasthook was broken square off, apparently about eighteen inches or two feet from the stem. The piece found was torn from the frame to which it had been bolted. In such a manner as to leave the bolts standing in the original position, only a few being bent, and none drawn out. The name board was of light pine, not more than two or three feet long, and a foot wide."

Thomas E. Stillman, for libellant.

Everett P. Wheeler and Joseph H. Choate, for claimant.

WAITE, Circuit Justice.⁴ Many of the facts disputed below have not been questioned here. The claimant does not deny that the vessels actually collided, or that the Harvest Queen sank with all on board, in consequence of injuries received in the collision. The libellants also concede, that, if the Adriatic was not in fact going astern when the collision took place, she was making little or no headway. These questions are, therefore, out of the way, and the controversy about the facts is reduced to the color of the light first seen by the Adriatic; its distance; the time it appeared; the changes in color and bearing; and the movements of the Adriatic.

It would not be easy to solve all these questions satisfactorily, if the evidence was considered only in its parts. Taking it as a whole, however, I have had no great difficulty in reaching the conclusions stated in the finding of facts. The recollection of witnesses as to time, distances and bearings, cannot be relied on, in all cases, with implicit confidence. It is, at best, but the impression of what the judgment of the witness was about a matter of which no special note was made at the time. In but few instances is it claimed that the time was actually taken from a time keeper, or the bearing by a compass. It is easy to see that such impressions would be more or less influenced by what afterwards happened.

1. As to the time. All agree that no one saw the light until after five bells, or half past two. It was seen by the first and second officers on the bridge before it was by the lookouts. The officers put the time at 2.35, so recording it in the log, and I see no reason to doubt the accuracy of their estimate or recollection. No witness directly contradicts them, and they are strongly supported by what is known to have taken place afterwards. At any rate, they cannot be far from the truth.

The engineer's log shows that the engine was first stopped, after backing, at 2.53. This was after the collision. It is the duty of the engineer, or his assistant, to make a record of every change in the movement of the engine, and the time when it occurred. Entries are made, at the very time the changes take place, with chalk, on a blackboard kept near at hand for that purpose, and the time is taken from a clock hung where it can conveniently be seen from the place where the engineer stands when working the engine. If the assistant attends to this duty, his place is at the blackboard immediately behind the engineer. From these entries the log is afterwards written up. Such being the duty of the engineer, it is to be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that the log contains a true statement of the time when the engine was stopped.

Upon this evidence, I have found that the light was first seen at 2.35, and that the engine was stopped after the collision, while backing, at 2.53. Consequently, eighteen minutes elapsed between the first discovery of the light and the time when it was deemed safe, after the collision, to stop backing the Adriatic, and go slowly ahead to see what was necessary to be done to save life or property.

2. As to the distance. The regulations require colored lights to be of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, in a clear atmosphere, from the deck of a ship, and with the naked eye, at least two miles. This light was first seen from the bridge of a large steamer and with a glass. The sea was high and the vessels consequently unsteady. Under such circumstances, it has seemed to me that the addition of half a mile or a mile to the regulation distance, on account of the glass and the height of the place of observation, was, probably, enough. This would make the distance of the light, when first seen, two miles and a half or three miles. The estimate of Hamilton, the lookout, that it was three or four miles off when he first saw it, must be wrong, for it can hardly be believed that he could see such a light that distance, on such a night, and keep it in view, with the naked eye, standing, as he did, on deck, some feet below the bridge. Everything goes to show that the actual distance could not have been more than three miles and that it was probably less.

3. As to the color. The first and third officers both say distinctly it was green, and the lookout on the bridge thinks that was the color. All agree it first appeared off the starboard bow. The vessels would naturally be on nearly opposite courses. The Adriatic was going from, and the Harvest Queen to, Liverpool. The Adriatic, being a steamer, undoubtedly took the shortest practical route to Coningbeg. The Harvest Queen, having the wind free and being able to go substantially where she chose, would be likely to shape her course so as to sail as near as she could conveniently over the course of the Adriatic between Coningbeg and Liverpool. At Coningbeg the Adriatic was set upon a course a little to the southward of that the Harvest Queen would take in coming up from Queenstown. This would naturally place the Harvest Queen, before she reached Coningbeg, to the northward, which would be on the starboard of the Adriatic and expose her green light, unless she was heading outside of and across the Adriatic's course. The evidence that the red light was first seen is not of a character to inspire the fullest confidence, and falls far short of satisfying me that the first and third officers, corroborated, as they are, by other undisputed facts, are mistaken. These officers had the means of knowing, and it was their special duty to know, what the facts really were. Their conduct was consistent with what they say they saw, and the scrap log, written up by the third officer, and afterwards transferred by the first officer, with such corrections as he thought necessary, to the official log, agrees with their testimony. These logs are the official record of what they saw. The light was either green or red. Whether the one or the other could alone be determined by the eye, and the impressions made at the time would be likely to continue, no matter what happened afterwards. If the logs are not correct, it is because they were intentionally falsified, a thing certainly not to be presumed.

That a red light was seen at some time before the collision is not disputed, and I entertain no doubt that it first appeared after the green.

4. As to the bearing. The log states, that, when first seen, the light bore about two points on the starboard bow, and, when it changed from green to red, about three and a half points. This was the estimate of both the first and third officers. No memorandum was made of it until the scrap log was written up, between four and five o'clock in the morning. In the mean time the collision had occurred, and the attention of all had been directed for more than an hour and a half to a search for the other colliding vessel, and to the saving of life and property. From the other circumstances in the case, I am strongly inclined to think the officers have put the bearing further to the starboard than it really was, but still there is nothing which shows satisfactorily what, if any, change should be made in their estimates, and their record in this particular must be accepted as true.

5. As to the movements of the Adriatic, and, in this connection, as to where the collision occurred and when the changes in her movements were made. There can be no doubt that the steamer ran for some time after seeing the light without changing her course or speed. The first order was to port, and that was followed immediately by orders to "stand by" and "slow." These last were given, according to the engineer's log, at 2.39. The correctness of this entry was disputed on the argument, but I see no reason to doubt it. The chief engineer was alone at the engine when the orders came. The assistant got to his post as soon as he could after he heard the telegraph bell, and remained until the watch was changed. In the absence of the assistant it was the duty of the engineer to make the necessary memorandum on the blackboard. The presumption is that what ought to have been done was done, and I have found nothing in the case to indicate that this officer was negligent in anything. His record should show the actual time, as given by the clock, when the change was made, and I am satisfied it does.

This being the case, it follows that the Adriatic kept her course at full speed four minutes after the light first appeared. The vessels, during that time, must have been lessening the distance between them at a combined speed of full twenty miles an hour, or about a mile and a third in the four minutes. At 2.39, therefore, they were probably not more than a mile and a half apart. The engine was then slowed, and, before the collision, the speed of the steamer ahead was run down from twelve miles an hour to nothing, if she had not actually acquired sternway. Her average speed from the time she slowed until her headway was entirely overcome was half what it was before, or say six miles an hour. During the same time the average combined speed of the two vessels was fourteen or fifteen miles an hour; and if, at 2.39, they were a mile and a half apart, it would take them six minutes, and, probably, a little more, to get together. The Adriatic stopped backing at 2.53. She was then supposed to be about half a mile from the place of collision. Her maximum speed in backing did not exceed seven miles an hour. Her average speed in getting up to this maximum, after she had stopped going ahead, would, consequently, be three miles and a half an hour, if there were no obstructions in the way. But, we know that, in addition to getting up her own sternway, she had to separate herself from the Harvest Queen almost entirely by the use of her own power, since the effect of the wind was to keep the two vessels together until they got free of each other. I think it fair to assume, therefore, that the steamer continued backing seven or eight minutes after the collision. In this time she would have gone about half a mile. In view of these facts I have had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion, that the wheel of the Adriatic was ported at 2.39, and that the collision occurred from 2.45 to 2.47.

The first officer says, that, when the green light appeared the second time, he telegraphed to "stop," and followed this order, as soon as possible, with another, to back at full speed. The engineer's log shows that the order to stop came at 2.40, and the one to back at 2.41. Time in seconds is not put on the log, and from entries of this kind it may fairly be inferred that one order followed close on the other.

Some discussion was had at the bar, in this connection, as to the time the captain was called, and how soon he came on deck, but to my mind these questions are unimportant, so far as this branch of the case is concerned.

It only remains to consider, under this head, what changes were made in the course of the Adriatic. At 2.39 the wheel was ported, and at the same time the engine was slowed. At 2.40 the engine was stopped, and at 2.41 put at full speed, under the reverse motion. The steamer could not, therefore, have run more than two minutes under her port helm before her screw began to turn backwards. In two minutes, at her full speed of twelve miles an hour, she would not have gone but two-fifths of a mile, and, under the "slow," it is not probable she made much, if any, more than a quarter of a mile. The estimate of the witnesses is, that, when the orders to stop and go astern were given she had not swung more than a point or a point and a half. This being so, her departure from her original course could not then have been very great, and, when the screw was reversed, the rudder had but little effect until sternway was acquired. Under these circumstances, I cannot think, that, when the collision took place, the steamer had gone more than two or three points off her course. Very little dependence can be put on the recollection of the officers or men as to the exact heading of their vessel. They were in a position which made it more important to look at the way they were to get out of the danger that threatened them, than to the exact angle of their course.

Without more as to the particular facts, I proceed to the consideration of what seems to me to be the real controversy in the case; and that is, whether, as a matter of law, the Adriatic was in fault for porting, stopping, or backing, or for starboarding on the order of the captain, when he came on deck. There is now no doubt, that, if she kept her course and speed, and the Harvest Queen had done what she in fact did do, there would have been no collision. It was a mistake, therefore, to change, but every mistake is not necessarily a fault, in admiralty. The law requires that those in charge of the navigation of vessels like the Adriatic should possess a very high degree of nautical skill. They are charged with the important duty of directing the movements of the powerful machinery placed under their control, so as not unnecessarily to endanger life or property, either on board or not on board. For this purpose they are required to exercise good judgment. They need not be infallible. It is enough if they do what others, having the requisite skill, and placed in a like situation, would ordinarily have done.

The conduct of those on the Adriatic must be considered in connection with the facts as they successively presented themselves at the time. And, first in order was the green light, seen a point and a half or two points on the starboard bow, two miles and a half or three miles away, and to the leeward. The wind was from the southward and westward, accompanied by a driving sea from the same direction. So long as that light alone was in view in that quarter, it was safe for the steamer to keep her course and speed, and no one could complain if she did. The highest skill would not be likely to suggest anything different. Next, the green light was changed to red, and thus the green of the steamer exposed to the red of another vessel not a very great way off. At this time nothing but a light was seen. Neither the ship nor her sails had appeared. It was only known for a certainty that a red light was on the water, well off the starboard bow of the steamer, between her and a dangerous lee shore, and that it was probably carried on some kind of a sailing vessel, as no white light accompanied the red. What course the vessel was steering could not then be told with exactness. It was under such circumstances that the first officer was called on to decide whether he would attempt to cross in front of the light at full speed without porting, or whether he would port and slow, or do either alone.

I am aware that it is not every case of meeting port to starboard that will justify a port wheel, to put port to port. The rule is for one vessel not to cross the bow of another at a dangerous proximity, and it is just as wrong to knowingly do this by porting as it is by starboarding. Here, however, there was uncertainty. A light only was seen. It might be on a vessel beating down the channel, or on one coming up. The vessel might be one that could sail close to the wind, or another that was obliged to keep more away. On a steamer going at the rate of twelve miles an hour against or across the wind, it is not always easy to tell the exact direction from which the wind is blowing. Practice will undoubtedly enable some to make estimates that will approximate the truth, but it will not always do to venture on nice calculations, without more accurate observation than can generally be made under such circumstances.

The appearance of the red light in the place of the green indicated clearly that the vessel on which it was displayed occupied a different position towards the steamer from what she did before, and that in some way the courses of the two vessels were changed, so that they crossed ahead of where the steamer then was. How far ahead was uncertain. Under these circumstances it was that the officer in command deemed it prudent to put his wheel to port, so as to bring his red light opposite the same light of the approaching vessel, and, as there was doubt, to bring his vessel under better control in case of an emergency, by reducing her speed. It is now probable, that, if the ship could have been seen, and her exact position made out, neither of these things would have been done, but the question here is not what, with the knowledge we now have, ought to have been done, but what, with the facts as they then appeared, ordinary prudence would suggest. It needs no argument to show, that a speed of twelve miles an hour, with a vessel weighing, as the Adriatic did, 3,000 tons, would, under some circumstances, be dangerous. The natural impulse of a skilful navigator, if in doubt as to what was before him, would be to reduce this speed, so as to get his ship under better control while the uncertainty continued. So, to, a red light exposed to a green is more likely to be unsafe than red to red; and, where reasonable doubt exists as to the relative position of the two vessels, instinctively, almost, those in command endeavor to bring the two red lights together, as the appropriate way of avoiding all danger.

It has, however, been argued with much force, that, if the red light was first seen a mile and a half away, three points and a half over the starboard bow, the Adriatic ought to have known, that, with the wind as it was, she would cross the course of the approaching vessel long before there could be any danger of collision, and that to attempt to pass otherwise was a clear fault. I have very great doubt whether, when the red light appeared, it was as far over the bow as seems now to be supposed, but, be that as it may, the exact position of the ship could not be seen; and I do not think such a mistake as may have been made ought, under the circumstances, to be visited with the consequences of a legal fault. The change of the green light to red was calculated to induce the belief that the ship on which it was carried had changed her course, and I am by no means satisfied, from the evidence, that she did not do so. As the case stands, it now seems to me probable, that, if the steamer had kept her course, with that light in view, there would have been no collision. Soon, however, the red light went out and the green again appeared, still without ship or sails in sight to aid in determining what ought to be done. This added to the original uncertainty, and clearly made a case apparently for the application of the rule which requires a steamer in doubt to get away from apprehended danger. To go ahead would look like approaching the peril, while to back would seem to be withdrawing from it. A change of helm at that time was not specially important, because, before it could be made of any practical use, the screw would be under its reverse motion, and then the rudder could have but little effect until the momentum was overcome and sternway obtained. When that was done, the port wheel would have the same effect on the swing of the bow as a change to starboard would have in going ahead. If the witnesses are to be believed, the course of the ship appeared to be unsteady, and, that being so, it is hard to say that backing away from her was a fault. In the darkness which then prevailed that would seem to be the safest thing that could be done.

Complaint is made of the captain, because, after coming on deck, he ordered the wheel to starboard, without consulting the first officer. The captain says he gave the order when he saw the red light change to green, and when, as he supposed, the steamer was under sternway. I am satisfied, however, that the forward motion had not been overcome. The engine was working astern and throwing the "white water" forward, but the steamer herself was still going ahead. If she had been going astern the order would have been right, for the starboard wheel, in backing, would bring the bow to starboard, and thus assist in putting the vessels on parallel courses, with their green lights opposite each other. As long as she was going ahead slowly it made but little difference which way the rudder was, since the backward movement of the screw prevented the operation of the rudder to any considerable extent. The order, therefore, could not have contributed to the collision and did no harm.

It is again insisted, that the Adriatic was in fault for delay in getting out her boats, and for not waiting until daylight before starting on her voyage. The order to clear away the boats all agree was given with promptness, and I cannot find that there was any culpable delay in getting them out. Before they could be lowered, the steamer was half a mile away from the place of collision and from the ship. It was, certainly, good judgment to wait until the steamer could be got nearer before putting the boats in the water, and it is not seriously contended, that, when the order was given the second time, it was not obeyed with all the promptness that ought to have been expected. The engineer's log, the correctness of which I do not doubt, shows conclusively that the steamer was lying by and moving cautiously about in the vicinity of where the accident occurred for much more than an hour. The gale was all the time increasing, and the lee shore not far away was dangerous. The official report of the weather shows that the next morning at eight o'clock the wind was blowing a strong gale at Tuskar, the nearest signal station. The ship must have gone down before morning, and, probably, while the steamer was lying by. If the ship's boats had been got out, there can hardly be a doubt they would have reached the steamer, lighted as she was from the mast-head. If they were not out, it is probable there was nothing left on the surface of the water to save, after the voices which had been heard were lost; and this must have been considerably more than an hour before the steamer left. In the meantime the steamer's boats had been out for nearly an hour, and diligent in their efforts to do all that could be done. While, therefore, it would have been more satisfactory if the steamer had staid by longer, I cannot say she was in fault for not doing so. The probability is that nothing more could have been done if she had held on, and she owed her first duty to those she had on board.

Complaint is also made of the unsatisfactory account of the collision given in the logs, of the painting over of the scratches on the bow in New York, and of the reticence of officers of the steamer on her arrival. All these furnish just cause for criticism, but I cannot say they overcome the effect of the other facts which to my mind have been satisfactorily established in spite of them.

My attention has also been called to some supposed discrepancies in the cases made by the logs, the answers, and the testimony given on the defense. I have failed to find any such substantial differences as to cast suspicion on the testimony. The difficulty with me has been not so much as to the facts, as to the duty of the Adriatic in connection with the facts I have found.

The case has been presented in the most satisfactory manner on both sides. Nothing has apparently been left undone by counsel or parties that they could do, to aid me in the determination of the facts or of the law; and, after the careful consideration which such laborious preparation deserves, I have been unable to reach any other conclusion than that the fault of the Adriatic has not been shown. A steamer is not justified in coming into collision with any other vessel, if it is possible to avoid it, that is to say, if it can be avoided by the use of such means as those having the requisite skill would ordinarily employ for that purpose under like circumstances. I cannot but think the officers of this steamer have brought their justification within the fair operation of this rule. Much of what was done at the time of this disastrous collision will never be known. It is impossible to tell with certainty how the vessels came together. The ship came and went in a comparatively short time, and necessarily in the midst of great excitement. Almost every witness has his own peculiar theory. Hardly any two of the large number of diagrams in the record, representing what the observers think they saw, agree in the material points, and it would be a useless task to attempt now to ascertain just how the damage was done. It seems almost incredible that so large, and apparently so strong, a ship could be broken into and sunk in so short a time, without inflicting serious injury on the Adriatic. As it was, the iron plating was hardly touched. Not a single indentation has been found which can fairly be attributed to an actual contact with the hull of the ship. The scratches on the paint must have been very slight, and it is by no means certain, from the testimony, that any were found on the stem or the starboard side of the bow. There is certainly no satisfactory evidence showing that the sharp bow of the Adriatic went any considerable distance inside the hull of the ship. As the Adriatic was stopped, or nearly so, it is evident that the blow which caused the loss must somehow have come from the Harvest Queen herself. It is a very remarkable fact, under the circumstances which are known to have existed, that no hail was heard from the deck of the ship before or after the collision. This seems entirely inconsistent with the idea that she could have had her proper complement of men standing watch and attending to their duties at the time. Confessedly, a considerable time elapsed between the collision and the final disappearance of the ship, enough, certainly, to have given an opportunity to lower away her boats, if her crew had been at their posts. But it is not my intention to look for the faults of the ship. I place the decision entirely on the ground, that, upon the case as it stands, the steamer is free from blame.

A decree may be prepared dismissing the libel, with costs in both courts.

[NOTE. This case was appealed to the supreme court, in which, after a motion to strike from the transcript certain depositions and testimony had been heard and denied,—a new rule on the subject, however, being promulgated, (103 U. S. 730.)—a hearing was had on the merits on the finding of facts above reported. In affirming the decree of the circuit court, Mr. Justice Field said: "When a steamer is approaching another vessel, and there is danger of collision from continuing the rate of speed at which she is going, it is the duty of her captain to slacken her speed, and, if necessary, to reverse her engines, and move her backwards. Such is the express language of rule 21 adopted by congress for the prevention of collisions on water, which is as follows: 'Every steam vessel, when approaching another vessel, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse; and every steam vessel shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed.' Rev. St. § 4233. * * * The rule is for a sailing vessel meeting a steamer to keep her course while the steamer takes the necessary measures to avoid collision. * * * Though the rule should not be observed when circumstances are such that it is apparent its observance must occasion a collision, while a departure from it will prevent one, yet it must be a strong case which puts the sailing vessel in the wrong for obeying the rule." *Marshall v. District Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 29, 1864.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—CONDEMNATION.

Vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel, and the cargo and lading on board of her, were captured at sea, September 10, 1864, by the United States war vessel Santiago de Cuba, Captain O. S. Glisson, of the navy, commanding, and were sent into this port for adjudication September 16, 1864. On the same day a libel was filed in court against the said prize by United States attorney, and process of attachment and monition, returnable on the 27th of September following, was issued from the court to the marshal, and was, by the marshal, returned in court on the aforesaid return day, duly served; whereupon public proclamation was made, in open court, of such service and return, in due form and order of law, and no appearance or claim being interposed or offered thereupon in behalf of the aforesaid prize, or any person interested therein, judgment of condemnation and forfeiture thereof to the United States was, on motion of the United States attorney, then and there made and ordered, in open court, in due course of law.

The vessel, when seized, had on board a certificate of British registry, issued at the customhouse in Dublin, September 26, 1862, to Joseph Royce and others, of the county and city of Dublin, merchants, as joint owners, under the name of the Lord Clyde, British-built, at Greenock, Renfrew county, Scotland. A certificate was indorsed on the registry by the register, at the custom-house, Greenock, May 21, 1864, that Joannes Wyllie had that day been appointed master of the ship, in place of John Stephen Byrne. No shipping papers, crew list, charter-party, manifest, log-book, instructions, or other papers relating to the course or destination of the ship, on the voyage upon which she was seized, were found on board of her when she was arrested, or were put in evidence with the proofs in preparatorio.

Joannes Wyllie, master, Thomas Carter, purser, and Charles Harris, second engineer, were examined by the prize commissioners in preparatorio, on the 17th and 19th of September, 1864.

The witnesses all concur in stating that they were present on the ship at the time of her capture at about 7 o'clock in the evening of September 10, 1864, at sea, outside of Wilmington, North Carolina, for running the blockade of that port. The witnesses were all subjects of the Queen of Great Britain. The master testifies that the vessel was owned by Pour, Low & Co. of Wilmington, North Carolina, who appointed him to the command of her and delivered her to him in Wilmington; that the vessel's name, when built, was the Lord Clyde, but was afterwards changed to the A. D. Vance; that, when arrested, she had on board a cargo of cotton and turpentine; that it was taken on board in August, 1864; that the vessel sailed last from Bermuda to Wilmington, and thence back from Wilmington, September 9, 1864, for Bermuda; that she had been running between Nassau, Bermuda, and Wilmington, ever since he had been connected with her, for fully twelve months, and had carried the same kind of cargoes; that he believes some papers were thrown overboard from the ship while she was being chased and attempting to escape capture; that all the ship's company knew, while they were following the trade spoken of, that Wilmington was under blockade by the vessels of the United States; that the vessel had repeatedly entered and departed from Wilmington while that port was under blockade, while he was on board of her; that the cargo captured was of the growth and manufacture of the Confederate States, but he does not know that it was of North Carolina; and that, when this vessel was chased by the United States war ship she put on all the steam she could carry, and endeavored to escape capture. There is no contradiction made by the other witnesses of the material facts stated in the testimony of the master. Upon the facts proved, the evidence is clear and satisfactory that the vessel seized and the cargo laden on board of her were guilty of a wilful violation of the blockade of the port of Wilmington, North Carolina, as charged in the libel; that the condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel, tackle, and cargo is adjudged accordingly.

ADVANCE, The, (UNITED STATES v.)

Case No. 93.

The ADVENTURE.

[1 Brock. 235.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1812.*
NON-INTERCOURSE ACT—PRIZE—RIGHTS OF CAPTORS—SALVAGE.

The Adventure, a British ship, with a cargo of British goods and merchandise, was captured by a French frigate on the high seas, pending a war between France and Great Britain, and was given by the commander of the French frigate, to the captain and crew of an American vessel which had been previously, on the high seas, captured, plundered, and burnt, by the same frigate, and who were detained on board of the French frigate, when the Adventure was captured. The American sailors brought the ship and her cargo into the port of Norfolk, in the state of Virginia, while the laws interdicting all commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States were in force, which declared it unlawful to import into the United States, goods, wares, and merchandise, of British growth and manufacture, "from any foreign port or place, whatever," and prohibited their introduction under pain of forfeiture and other severe penalties. Held: That this was no infraction of the non-intercourse laws, the ocean, which is the great highway of nations, not being a foreign "port or place" within the meaning of those laws. To constitute a violation of the law, the British goods, &c., must have been brought from some port or place within the dominions of some foreign potentate or power.

[See The Astrea, 1 Wheat. (14 U. S.) 125; Rowe v. Brig and Cargo, Case No. 12,093.]

[In admiralty. Libel for salvage. Claim of forfeiture on behalf of United States. Decree of forfeiture by district court (decree nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible) reversed, and ship and cargo adjudged to libellants. Decree of circuit court for libellants reversed, on a different ground, by supreme court in The Adventure, 8 Cranch, (12 U. S.) 221.]

Appeal from the district court of Norfolk. The libellants filed their libel in the district court of Norfolk, in admiralty, praying that the ship Adventure and her cargo should be condemned and sold for their benefit, or that if it should appear that the same, or any part thereof, ought to be restored to any person or persons, as the former owner or owners thereof, then that the same might be restored upon the payment of such salvage as by law ought to be paid for them. The attorney for the United States also filed a claim on behalf of the United States, claiming the ship and her cargo as forfeited to the United States, the Adventure being a ship, owned by British subjects, and having brought into the port of Norfolk a cargo composed of goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain, in contravention of the act interdicting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

The counsel for the libellants and the United States agreed [upon] the following case as the one arising under the evidence in this cause. The libellants in this cause were the master, supercargo, mates, mariners, and cook, of and belonging to, an American brig, called the Three Friends, which brig, navigated by the libellants, sailed from the port of Salem, in the state of Massachusetts, on the 11th day of October, 1811, laden with a valuable cargo, and bound on a voyage from thence to the port of Pernambuco, and to any other port or ports on the coast of Brazil. The Three Friends and her cargo, at the time of her sailing from Salem, were the property of Pickering Dodge, a citizen of Massachusetts. The brig proceeded on her destined voyage until the 14th day of November, 1811, when, having arrived in latitude 7° 58' north, and longitude 25° west, of Greenwich, on the high seas, she was fallen in with and captured by a French frigate, called the Medusa, which frigate was accompanied by another French frigate called the Nymph. The crews of these two frigates, by command of their commodore, removed the libellants from the Three Friends on board of the Medusa, and then burnt and destroyed the brig and her cargo. After this event, the libellants were kept and detained on board of the Medusa until the 21st of November, 1811, when, in latitude 21° 20' north, and longitude 32° 20' west, from Greenwich, on the high seas, the Medusa fell in with and captured the ship Adventure, which is libelled in this cause. The French captors took, and made prisoners of war, of all the crew of the Adventure, took away such part of her cargo as they wished, and all her papers, and on the following day the commander of the Medusa made an unqualified donation to the libellants, at their request, of the ship Adventure, with the residue of her cargo. The libellants, after receiving the ship, proceeded in her for some port of the United States, and although too few in number to be equal to the task of navigating properly so large a ship, yet, after sustaining great labor, damage, and fatigue, and after a long and tempestuous voyage of 71 days, they at length arrived in the port of Norfolk, in Virginia, on the 1st of February, 1812. The Adventure, at the time of her capture by the Medusa, was a British ship, furnished with letters of marque and reprisal, armed with twelve guns, and navigated by seventeen seamen, and, together with her cargo, belonged to some British merchants residing in Liverpool, whose names are unknown, and was then bound on a voyage from Liverpool to the British island of St. Christophers, in the West Indies. At the period of the capture, open war existed between France and Great Britain, and the cargo of the Adventure, which was brought into the United States, consisted entirely of articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain.

The district court decreed, "that the said ship, Adventure, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo, brought in the said vessel, into the port of Norfolk, within the district of Virginia, be forfeited for entering a port of the United States in violation of the act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," and of the act supplementary thereto:" and from this decree the libellants appealed to this court. [Reversed by supreme court, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch,) 221.]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The only question made at the bar in this case is:—Are the ship Adventure and her cargo forfeited to the United States, as having contravened the act interdicting commercial intercourse between this country and Great Britain? Act March 1, 1809; 2 Story, Laws U. S. 1114–1120, [2 Stat. 528.] The Adventure was a British ship, captured by the Medusa, a French frigate; and presented to the libellants, who were the master, supercargo, and mariners, of the American brig Three Friends, which brig, with her cargo, had been previously captured and burnt by the same frigate. The Adventure was navigated into the port of Norfolk, and there libelled by the sailors to whom she had been given. The United States filed their claim to the vessel and cargo as forfeited.

The clause of the law supposed to be infringed, is in these words:—"Nor shall it be lawful to import into the United States, or the territories thereof, from any foreign port or place whatever, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, being of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland," &c. Section 4. The United States contend, that the Adventure and her cargo have incurred the penalties of this act. The libellants, that the case is not within the act. In argument, the impropriety of inquiring in this place into the policy of the law, and the legal principle that penal laws should be construed strictly, have both been made the subjects of animadversion. On these observations I will only say, what has been often before said in substance from this place, that the wisdom or folly of any particular system, is for the consideration of the legislature, not of the court; and when the policy of the law is mentioned by a judge, I always understand him to use the term in reference to the object of the legislature, and to the means by which that object is to be effected, as disclosed in the words they have employed.

The maxim, that penal laws are to be construed strictly, has never been understood, by me at least, to imply, that the intention of the legislature, as manifested by their words, is to be overruled; but that in cases where the intention is not distinctly perceived, where, without violence to the words or apparent meaning of the act, it may be construed to embrace or exclude a particular case, where the mind balances and hesitates between the two constructions, the more restricted construction ought to prevail; especially in cases where the act to be punished is in itself indifferent, and is rendered culpable only by positive law. In such a case, to enlarge the meaning of words, would be to extend the law to cases to which the legislature had not extended it, and to punish, not by the authority of the legislature, but of the judge. The counsel for the United States contend, that this case is within the plain letter of the law; and, to prove their position, have gone into a critical analysis of the sentence.

Although the disquisition is a dry one, and the arguments may appear nice, perhaps trivial, such as ought not to determine a question of property, it is deemed, by the court, to be one which is required by the character of the case. This part of the inquiry seems to turn on the meaning of the words "foreign place," as they stand in the act of congress. For the goods must be imported from a "foreign port or place," to come within the description of the law. The counsel for the claimants take these words in their most enlarged sense, and suppose that any place on land or water, within or without the dominion of any foreign power, is a "foreign port or place," within the meaning of the act. It is worthy of remark, that this broad construction refuses to the words under consideration, any operation whatever. Expunge them, and the ambiguity of the sentence is removed. It means all that is required. This will be perceived, by reading the sentence without them, "Nor shall it be lawful," &c. If the act was drawn on reflection: if the legislature weighed the words they employed, it must have been perceived, that the words "from any foreign port or place whatever," could have no other operation, than to limit the broad meaning which the sentence without them would necessarily require. They were not wanting to exclude cases of goods, brought from one American port to another, because such an importation is not an importation into the United States. The words in question, then, operate restrictively, or they operate not at all. Unquestionably, redundancy in language, especially in legislative acts, is often seen; and, therefore, it would not be admissible to overrule the intention of the legislature, rather than pronounce a member of a sentence entirely useless. But in a case, where the intention is involved in absolute uncertainty, the rule of construction which would give some effect to every part of the sentence is not to be entirely disregarded; especially, if, as in this sentence, the words appear to have had some importance attached to them by the legislature. It may also be noticed, that the same words are used frequently in the same section,—always denoting some place within the dominion of a foreign potentate. In all these cases, the word "place" is, in terms, limited to some spot within the territory of a foreign nation. This may aid in showing, that the place, in the mind of the legislature, was some place, not in air, or in water, but within the power and jurisdiction of a foreign state, which was capable of being resorted to, for the purposes of commerce. So, subsequently, in the same sentence, the words are used in the same restricted sense.

It certainly does not weigh much, yet it is something in determining the sense of an ambiguous phrase, that the word "place," throughout the law, is coupled with the word "port," or the word "country," by the disjunctive conjunction "or;" and a "port," or a "country," is necessarily within the limits of some state, or capable of being within those limits. This association would seem to indicate, that the word "place," also, is used in relation to a foreign territory; and is introduced, because, otherwise, the law might be evaded, by taking in a cargo at some place, not established as a port. But what weighs more than either or all of these arguments, is this: The broad navigable ocean, which is emphatically and truly termed the great highway of nations, cannot, in strict propriety of language, be denominated "a foreign place." The words are said to be used to denote any place, not belonging to the United States. But the sea is the common property of all nations. It belongs equally to all. None can appropriate it exclusively to themselves; nor is it "foreign," to any.

If, then, the legislature designed to prohibit the importation of goods, acquired as was the cargo of the Adventure, they would either not have introduced the words foreign "port or place" into their law, or they would have added other words adapted to such intention. It cannot be believed, that the legislature would have designated, by the term "foreign," a place in which the United States claim equality of dominion with other sovereigns. If this case comes within the act, the American sailors who have availed themselves of this fortunate occasion, as they deemed it, to return to their country, will be liable to a penalty of treble the value of the goods on board the vessel. Section 5. Could any court, or ought any court, to strain the meaning of words, in order to give such a judgment?

It is contended that the word "import" is co-extensive with the words "bring in." I am not prepared to controvert, or absolutely to admit, this proposition. But let it for the present be conceded. It will be perceived, that the argument which has been used allows that broad meaning to the word "import," and is founded on the meaning of the words "foreign port or place." But let us see how far we are unavoidably carried by establishing this construction of the word "import." Suppose the captain of the Medusa, instead of giving the Adventure to the American sailors, had brought her, with her cargo, into an American port, as a prize. would the penalties of the law have been incurred? Are gentlemen prepared to give this construction to the act? If they are not, the exception of such a case must be supported, either by the technical meaning of the word "import," or by allowing to the words "foreign place" the meaning which the court has given to them.

I will not put the case of a prize brought in by an American cruiser, because the war, and the consequent measures of government, may be considered as so far repealing the act of congress. But it is said, that if goods may be introduced as they have been, the law would become a dead letter, and the French flag would cover a prohibited trade, under the pretext of capturing British vessels and bestowing them on American sailors. This fraud presupposes a combination between the cruiser under the French flag, the British vessels to be captured, and the owners of those American vessels and cargoes, which must be previously destroyed, in order to furnish a case for the gift of a British vessel and cargo. This machinery would be too expensive to render the fraud so profitable as to be worth pursuing. In addition to the certain loss of the American vessels and cargoes there would be danger of detection, in which case the penalties of the law would be incurred. But if, notwithstanding these safeguards, the mischief should grow to a size worthy of attention, the legislature can at any time furnish the correction, by expressing its will on that subject.

I cannot admit, that this importation is opposed more to the spirit and intention, than it is to the letter of the law. If I look either into the act itself, or into the contemporaneous history of my country, I am informed, that the object of the legislature was, by refusing the American market to British manufactures, to affect the manufactures, and through them the government. Therefore, the importation of British manufactures, not only from Britain, but from any foreign port or place whatever, was prohibited: for such foreign port or place might be made the medium through which the trade should be carried on. But bona fide belligerent captures cannot be made the medium of such a trade. Nor would the admission of goods, so captured, into the United States, benefit or relieve the British manufacturer or nation.

I think the case not within the act, and, therefore, that the sentence ought to be reversed and the subject condemned, and adjudged to the libellants.

NOTE, [from original report.] From the decree which was pronounced by the circuit court in this case, in conformity with the above opinion, the United States appealed to the supreme court, and that court reversed the decree of the circuit court. It will be perceived from the following analysis of the opinion of the supreme court, that the opinion of the chief justice, as far as it went, is entirely supported by it: but that the decree was reversed upon a new and distinct ground which was not touched in the circuit court. The supreme court said, that the most natural mode of acquiring a definite idea of the rights of the libellants in the subject-matter, would be, to follow it through the successive changes of circumstances by which the nature and extent of the rights of the parties were affected, viz.: the capture, the donation, the arrival in the United States, and the state of war.

1st. The capture. As between the belligerents, the capture produced a complete divestiture of property. It left nothing in the original British owner, but a mere scintilla juris, the spes recuperandi.

2d. The donation. Upon the donation, however absolute the right of the captor, or unqualified the gift, the donee could acquire no more than what was consistent with his neutral character to take. He could be in no better situation than a prize master navigating the prize, in pursuance of orders from his commander.

3d. The arrival in the United States. The vessel remained liable to British capture on the whole voyage, and on her arrival in a neutral territory, the donee sunk into a mere bailee for the British claimant, with those rights over the thing in possession, which the civil law gave for care and labor bestowed upon it. By the importation of the vessel, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, no forfeiture attached under the non-intercourse laws. The ship was the plank in the shipwreck: the tabula in naufragio; and it came within the description of property cast casually on our shores. To have carried the vessel infra prae-sidia of the enemy, unless forced by necessity to do so, would have been an unneutral act.

But by bringing her into a neutral port, where the original right of the captured would revive, and might be asserted, the libellants did an act exclusively resulting to the benefit of the British claimant. The libellants, therefore, were entitled to salvage: and in the absence of any express rule for ascertaining the amount, and under the circumstances of this case, they should be allowed, in different proportions which were ascertained by the court, one half of the amount of sales of the cargo, viz.: $8,000.

4th. The war. As war between the United States and Great Britain intervened, the British claimant could not interpose his claim for the residue, flagrante bello. But as the property was found here, at the declaration of war, it must stand on the footing of other British property similarly situated, and might be claimed, after the termination of the war, unless previously confiscated by legislative enactments.

The supreme court therefore decreed and ordered that the decree of the circuit court be reversed, that the costs and charges be paid out of the proceeds of sale; that one half of the balance be adjudged to the libellants, and that the balance be deposited in the Bank of Virginia, to remain subject to the future order of the court. After the termination of the war, the original British owners of the Adventure and her cargo preferred their claim, duly authenticated, in the circuit court, and the balance remaining to the credit of this cause in the Bank of Virginia was paid to them. District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1862.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—APPRAISEMENT BY NAVAL SURVEY—APPROPRIATION TO GOVERNMENT—PRIZE PROCEEDINGS.

1. Where a vessel captured as prize is appraised by a naval survey, and appropriated to the use of the United States, and her papers and crew are, with the appraisal, sent to this court, proceedings against her in prize are regular, although she is not brought before the court.

2. Vessel condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel, with her lading, was captured December 1, 1861, in Mississippi sound, off the coast of Mississippi, by the United States ship-of-war New London, and taken to Ship Island, where, on appraisal by a naval survey, she was appropriated by the United States flag officer at that port to the military use of the United States, as necessary for that service. The appraisal, with the papers, the master, and part of the crew of the vessel, were sent to this port, and she was here libelled in this suit, March 3, 1862.

The vessel belonged to her master, John Fallon, an Englishman, but a citizen of Louisiana, who has resided in New Orleans since 1857, but is not a married man. He regards Long Island, New York, as his real home. The vessel sailed from New Orleans a blockaded port, under the rebel flag; and with a fishing license from the Confederate States, and was seized with these evidences upon her. She was engaged in fishing, and had no cargo on board when arrested, except the fish intended for sale on her return to New Orleans. The capture was about sixty miles east of New Orleans, and the master knew of the war, and that the Southern ports were under blockade when he went out. The vessel had, in May previously, been warned, off Pensacola, of the blockade of the southern ports, and the master knew that New Orleans was blockaded when he went out of that port. The register and license under which the vessel was sailing when captured were issued under the rebel or Confederate States' authority.

Upon these facts, the vessel and her equipments were enemy property, and had also been used to evade the blockade of the port of New Orleans, in her egress therefrom, on the adventure upon which she was seized. The proceedings against the property as prize are regular, without its being brought before the court, (Proceeds of Prizes of War, [Case No. 11,440,]) being in conformity with the mode of procedure in admiralty in seizures for forfeitures under the revenue laws. Prize Rule, No. 24; Dist. Ct. Adm. Rule, No. 184; Sup. Ct. Adm. Rule, No. 39.

Judgment of condemnation and forfeiture will be entered, accordingly, with costs; and the appraised value of the vessel be paid into court, in satisfaction thereof.

[In admiralty. Libel for wages. Dismissed.]

BEE, District Judge. This is a suit instituted for seamen's wages, and to obtain a discharge, on account of the captain's having ill treated them. The crew consisted of eleven persons, two of whom are cabin boys. The rest are joined in this application. The question for me is whether these men have suffered such ill treatment as will justify me in ordering their discharge, and payment of their wages.

A master of a vessel is authorized by law to correct his seamen moderately. In this instance it has been proved that the captain, at different times during the voyage, struck three of the libellants with his fist; these were the boatswain, the cook, and a seaman named Hanson. It seems that after being eleven weeks at sea, they were restricted to an allowance of water of a bottle per man; and this caused discontent. The boatswain, going at the head of the crew to demand more, was ordered off the quarter deck. On his refusing to comply, a scuffle ensued, and the captain struck him once or twice with his fist. For the same cause he struck Hanson, and threatened to shoot him, if he did not go away; he ordered his pistol to be brought up, but this was not done. The cook was also struck once by the captain, with his fist, for having unnecessarily consumed the wood.

There is evidence of the captain's having a pistol on deck twice; once, when he loaded it to shoot a dog that had bit him; and at another time to intimidate the crew; but in the last instance there is no proof that it was loaded. The captain, indeed, swears expressly that it was not; and his answer must be admitted because there are not two witnesses to contradict it. From this evidence, I do not see sufficient cause to entitle these three men to their discharge: 1st, because no unlawful weapon was used; 2dly, because there was provocation enough to justify blows with the fist. The rest of the crew have shown no claim whatever to their discharge. It is true that the captain was frequently intoxicated during the voyage; but there is no proof of his having struck one of the others. It appears that their allowance of water was increased, and that they had their brandy daily.

This is the case of a neutral vessel, the crew of which are bound by their articles to return to Hamburg, before they are entitled to receive their wages; and the 12th of those articles stipulates that every thing not specified therein shall be regulated according to the marine law of Hamburg for regulating the conduct of officers and seamen aboard vessels belonging to that place.

Let the suit be dismissed with costs.

1. [Cited in Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 48 Fed. Rep. 361.]

[At law. On demurrer to petition. Demurrer sustained.]

The plaintiff insured the personal property of one Myron H. Balcom, situate adjoining the defendant's railway, for $1,900. Within the lifetime of the policy, property covered by it to the value of $2,214 was destroyed by the carelessness of the defendant's servants in the use of its locomotive engine. The insurance company paid Balcom, in full satisfaction for all claim under his policy, $1,050, and received from him a written instrument reciting the foregoing facts, and assigning to it all his right to recover on account of said loss against the railroad company, reserving all rights in excess of the $1,050. The petition, which is in the name of the insurance company, sets forth the foregoing facts, and asks a judgment against the railroad company for the $1,050. The defendant demurs, because the cause of action is not assignable, either by operation of law or by act of the parties, and because the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain an action in its own name.

Lucien Eaton, for plaintiff.
James Carr, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The property destroyed exceeded in value the amount insured, and the rule of law has been long settled that the insurance company, on the payment of the loss, cannot sue the wrongdoer who occasioned it in its own name. The suit, though for the use of the insurer, must be in the name of the person whose property was destroyed. The wrongful act was single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability. If one insurer may sue, then, if there are a dozen, each may sue, and if the aggregate amount of all the policies falls short of the actual loss, the owner could sue for the balance. This is not permitted, and so it was held nearly a hundred years ago, in a case whose authority has been recognized ever since, both in Great Britain and in this country. London Assur. Co. v. Sainsbury, 3 Doug. 245, 1783, in which the exchequer chamber unanimously affirmed the judgment of the king's bench for the defendant; Rockingham Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Bosher, 39 Me. 253, and cases cited; Hart v. Western R. Corp., 13 Metc. [Mass.] 99, where the subject is fully gone into by Chief Justice Shaw; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 25 Conn. 265, 278; Peoria, M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Frost, 37 Ill. 333; Fland. Ins. pp. 360, 481, 591. But it is insisted that the provision of the Missouri statute, that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, though it declares that the provision shall not authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of contract, (Gen. St. 1865, p. 651, § 2.) changes the rule. However it might be if the amount paid by the insurer to the assured had equaled or exceeded the value of the property, and the assured had made a full assignment, it is plain that this case falls within all the reasons of the rule itself, as expounded by Buller and Mansfield in the case in Douglas above cited, and which is the foundation of the law on this subject. The demurrer to the petition is sustained.

Judgment accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] Leave was given the plaintiff to amend and make Balcom plaintiff on the record, but as the latter, as well as the defendant, was a citizen of Missouri, no amendment, so as to give the court jurisdiction, was practicable, and the plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—ABUSE OF POWERS BY AGENT—RATIFICATION BY PRINCIPAL—PLEADING.

1. An action being brought against the defendant, charging him with an abuse of his powers, as agent of the plaintiff, [an insurance company,] it is essential that he should be alleged to have acted as agent of the company.

2. Unless he was authorized to act as agent of the company, he could not bind it; and any ratification of the contract would relieve the defendant from an alleged abuse of his powers.

3. If the plaintiff ratified what the defendant had done, and which did not bind the company, except by such ratification, the defendant is not chargeable with any remissness of duty.

[At law. On demurrer to declaration. Demurrer sustained as to three counts, and overruled as to the fourth.]

Mr. Henderson, for plaintiff.

Mr. Crawford, for defendant.

THE COURT. This action was brought on a policy of insurance against defendant for having exceeded his powers, &c., by which plaintiff was injured. The declaration contained four counts. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the declaration.

To the first count it was objected, on demurrer, that plaintiff alleges no authority to the agent to make the insurance; and on this it is argued that the plaintiff could not be liable on the policy until a ratification of it was proved; and, if there were a ratification, the plaintiff would be estopped to charge the defendant, as the validity of the policy depended not on the original contract, but on the subsequent ratification of it by the plaintiff. The declaration, it is said, does not state the case of an agent who has a general authority, but acts in violation of his private instructions in not taking good security for the payment of the premium, and in the insurance of Kentucky flatboats. If, while the agent is exercising general powers, he has private instructions, the agent could bind the company, but would be liable to it for any abuse of his power; but, in the first count it is alleged he had no power at all. By reason of this defect, the ground for a recovery is not laid, and consequently the demurrer is sustained as to this count.

The second count is also subject to exception, as the allegation of the defendant's agency is not made, which was essential to establish his liability. If he be not authorized to act, the policy is not binding on the plaintiff, and a ratification of the policy by the company would relieve the defendant from responsibility, and remove from the plaintiff all ground of complaint.

The same objection applies to the third count as is above stated to the first.

In regard to the fourth count, it appears there is a sufficient allegation of the agency, as it is stated that defendant, while acting as agent for the company, received large sums for insuring, which he has failed to account for or pay over to the plaintiff. If, under such circumstances, he has received money on account of the plaintiff, he is bound in good conscience to pay it over. This count, the court think, is sustainable, and as to it the demurrer is overruled; but it is sustained as to the first, second, and third counts. The court will give leave to amend the declaration generally.

COLLISION—BETWEEN SAILING VESSELS—LOOKOUT.

Cross libels for damage done on the first day of August, 1868, in the harbor of Boston, at about four o'clock in the afternoon. The weather was fine, with a five or six knot breeze. The brig Alice was sailing down the harbor on her voyage to Surinam, and the schooner A. G. Brooks was coming up on a coasting voyage from a port in Maine to Boston. The collision occurred in the Narrows, between Galloupe's island and Lovell's island. On the part of the brig, the allegations in the record were that she was close-hauled on the starboard tack, and her pilot saw the schooner coming towards him with a free wind, on the port tack; that the brig kept her course until it became apparent that the schooner would not clear her, and then her helm was put to port, but too late to prevent the collision. On the other side, it was pleaded that the schooner was beating up to the town, and when near Galloupe's island, came about from the starboard to the port tack in the regular course of navigation, and that before she could gather full headway again was struck by the brig; that she had the right of way both because she was close-hauled and because she was in stays, and that she had no duty to perform and did nothing.

J. C. Dodge, for the schooner.

H. C. Hutchins and A. S. Wheeler, for the brig.

LOWELL, District Judge. I have endeavored to find out the truth from the very conflicting evidence given in, and will now state my conclusions. The preponderance of the evidence seems to me to show that the schooner was beating, and was close-hauled on the starboard tack not long before the collision, and when in that position was seen about three points on the lee bow of the brig, and from one-third to one-quarter of a mile distant. At this time the brig had come round Nix's Mate, and braced up her yards on the same tack. When the vessels were thus situated the pilot of the brig and her master appear to have thought that the schooner was bound out on nearly the same course with themselves, though they must probably have seen that she was lying nearer the wind than they were. Whether this circumstance should have warned them of the probability of her tacking I cannot say; but they observed that she did tack, and they say they observed it immediately on its taking place, and that it was made off the west end of Lovell's island, on the extreme leeward side of the channel; and that the distance of the vessels and their relative position was such that it was more prudent for the brig to keep close to the weather side of the channel, although this would bring her across the bows of the schooner, rather than to attempt to pass under her stern, which might result in cutting her in two; that they accordingly brought the brig close to the wind, and kept her to the weather side of the channel, and, finding that notwithstanding this precaution there was still danger, they put their helm hard aport, and brought her in stays; and yet the collision occurred, though it was not very severe.

If it is true that the schooner tacked in a narrow channel when so near the brig that it was not possible to avoid her, or when it was so doubtful which course would best avoid her, that a skillful pilot acting with coolness was deceived, and in good faith and with reasonable skill chose one which resulted ill, it would be impossible to hold the schooner blameless, unless her going about was absolutely necessary to avoid the shore or some other danger. It would not then be a question who was free and who close-hauled, but why such a tack was made at that time and place. And on the other hand if it should be apparent that the schooner went in stays at a proper time and place, giving room enough and ample opportunity to avoid her, and had not got fully around on her new tack when she was struck, the question would still be not whether or no the brig was close-hauled, but why a vessel under command failed to clear a vessel which was, comparatively speaking, unmanageable.

Upon the whole evidence I am not able to say that the schooner was wrong in tacking. The libel against her, which was made soon after the occurrence, does not allege it; but says she was sailing up the Narrows with a free wind. This fact, I confess, has a good deal of weight with me as showing the opinion formed at that time; and it would seem that at a third or a quarter of a mile distant the brig might, have gone astern of the schooner if it was her duty to clear her. Some experts have testified that this would be impossible; but when they afterwards give the distance in lengths of the brig it seems contradictory of their first opinion; for they give three or four lengths as being necessary for her to fall off three points, and this is less than a third of a mile. And when we add the distance that the schooner would go, which is said in testimony to have been in fact the whole width of the channel, there would seem to be no doubt that she must have cleared her, if she had starboarded as soon as she might have done. The pilot of the brig allowed what he considered to be ample room for the schooner to go about in, and she took more; and so they came together by the head. If he had undertaken to run under her stern no such nice calculation would have been necessary. I cannot but believe that either the position of the schooner, or her speed, or the course she intended to take, were misunderstood on board the brig. Nor can I doubt that the duty of making way was on that vessel. She had braced up her yards on rounding Nix's Mate; but upon the preponderance of the evidence she was not as near the wind as the schooner was, nor as near as she could go; but whether so or not, the schooner was tacking so near her that it became her duty to avoid the probable danger, because it would arise and be imminent before the new course had been fully defined, and before the schooner could go to port or starboard as the case might require. In other words, it seems to me that the case presents the second of the predicaments which I above supposed; that is, of a vessel fully manageable and one not wholly under command. There is some reason to suppose that a lookout on the brig's deck, forward, might have called attention to the schooner earlier. Certain it is that the men were all forward, and were busy with one of the anchors, and in fact gave no report about the schooner, and although the master and pilot say they observed the tack as soon as it was made, yet that is a point on which they might easily be mistaken. It reconciles a good many of the contradictions to suppose that when they first saw that the schooner had tacked, it was too late to do anything except to port helm; but that if they had seen her a little sooner, and starboarded, they would have gone clear. This not only reconciles some contradictions, but reconciles the result with the acknowledged skill of the professional pilot who had charge of the brig's helm. And this general view of the obligations of the parties tallies entirely with the acts of both. The evidence is clear that the brig kept her course, so far as she did keep it, not because the pilot thought he had the right of way, but because he thought there was ample room for the schooner to go about, and that he in fact did not keep his course entirely but gave a little more room to the schooner by bringing his ship still nearer the wind than she already was. In my experience, I have found nearly as many collisions (though perhaps not the most serious) to result from slight miscalculations on the part of skillful men, as from the blunders of novices. To justify a close run in cases of this kind it is necessary to reckon on the performance of both vessels, and this is where, I suppose, the mistake is sometimes made. At all events it seems to me that the duty was on the brig, and that she has failed to perform it. The very fact of want of a lookout is evidence against her until it is shown that no harm came of the neglect.

Interlocutory decree for the libellants in the first cause; libel in behalf of the brig dismissed.

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1862.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—ENEMY PROPERTY.

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were libelled on the 6th of June last, and an attachment was issued, returnable on the 1st of July instant, and was returned on that day. The vessel and cargo were captured on the Atlantic ocean, two hundred miles from Cape Hatteras, and off the coast of South Carolina, by a merchant steamer, on the 27th of May, 1862, and were sent into this port for adjudication. The vessel and cargo were owned by residents in Wilmington, North Carolina. The schooner sailed out of Wilmington for Nassau, N. P., under the Confederate flag, and had no other on board. She left the mouth of Cape Fear river for Nassau, N. P., with a cargo of cotton and turpentine, to avoid the vessels blockading the port of Wilmington, and was to return to the same port. The master and all the persons on board knew of the blockade of the port of Wilmington when the voyage commenced. The register and shipping articles, and the other ship's papers, show that the vessel was documented as an enemy vessel, and the testimony of the master and mate proves her evasion of the blockade, well knowing its existence.

Upon proofs, the vessel and cargo are clearly subject to condemnation and forfeiture, both as enemy property and for being sailed from a blockaded port with intent to violate the blockade. Decree accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1838.

APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

1. A libel was filed in the district court, by a seaman, against the master of a vessel, to recover a balance of $30.95, claimed to be due for wages; and also damages for an assault committed upon the libellant by the master, without claiming any particular amount of damages: the libel was dismissed by the district court, and in the circuit court, to which the case was taken by appeal, a motion was made to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the record did not show that the sum in controversy amounted to $50: a motion was thereupon made by the appellant, to amend his libel, by inserting that he had sustained damages, by the assault, to the amount of $300: one of the witnesses had proved that he would not have run the risk of the blow given to the libellant for $100: Held, that the amendment asked for could not be made; that the circuit court had no authority to review the decree of the district court, unless the sum in controversy amounted to $50; and that the court could not permit an amendment to be made, the object of which was to change the record so as to give the court jurisdiction, in a case where, according to the record before them, they had none.

2. If the case showed that the appeal was legally before the court, then, having jurisdiction over it, the court could permit the pleadings to be so amended as to enable it to do justice between the parties; but it cannot acquire jurisdiction, by altering the record which has come to it from the district court.

3. The deposition of the witness does not show the amount of damages claimed by the libellant; and it is the claim of the libellant, and the answer of the respondent, denying the claim, that make the controversy, and ascertain the amount in dispute.

4. Where property is in dispute, and the value of it is not averred, and does not appear in the record, parol testimony has been received in the supreme court, upon appeal, to show its value, and to show the jurisdiction of the court.

5. And so too, as to the value of an office, where the right to the office is the matter in controversy.

6. But where the controversy relates merely to the amount of money which one party is entitled to recover from the other, the record must show the amount in dispute, in order to give jurisdiction to the appellate court.

7. In all cases in the supreme court, where the appeal is dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the court gives no costs; and that being the rule in the supreme court, it is proper that the circuit court should adopt the same rule in analogous cases.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Robert Agnew against Hezekiah Dorman, master of the schooner Octavia, for wages and damages. From the decree of the district court dismissing the libel, libellant appealed. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal, and libellant moves to amend the libel. Appeal dismissed.]

This was a libel filed in the district court for the Maryland district, by a seaman against the master of the schooner Octavia, to recover a balance of $30.95, which the libellant alleged to be due to him for wages, and also to recover damages for an assault and battery committed on him by the master. He did not, in the libel, claim any particular amount of damages for the assault, but prayed the court to give him heavy damages for it against the master. The respondent in the district court, in his answer, objected to the libel, upon the ground that the claim for wages and the claim for damages for the assault and battery could not be united together in the same libel, and prayed that the same might be dismissed. The respondent, after taking this objection, proceeded in his answer to deny that anything was due to the libellant for wages, and insisted that the blow he gave him was justified by his improper and disobedient conduct. Testimony was taken in the district court, and at the hearing the court dismissed the libel, on the ground that the claim for wages and for damages for an assault and battery could not be united in the same suit. The libellant appealed to the circuit court, and the appellee now moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that there was nothing in the record to show that the value in controversy amounted to $50, and that the circuit court, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the appeal; the balance for wages claimed being only $30.95, and no particular sum being claimed as damages for the assault and battery. The counsel for the appellant thereupon moved to amend his libel, by inserting an averment that the libellant had sustained damages by the assault and battery, to the value of $300; the averment was objected to by the counsel for the appellee.

N. Williams, for appellant, cited [The Marianna Flora,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 1; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 211.

J. Glenn, for appellee, cited Jenks v. Lewis, [Case No. 7,279.]

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The amendment cannot be made. If the court had jurisdiction of the case, that is, if enough appeared in the record to show that the circuit court had a right to review the decision of the district court in this case, there is no doubt the court would have the power to allow any amendment necessary to bring the justice of the case fairly and fully to trial. But this court has no authority, by law, to review the decree of the district court, unless the matter in controversy amounts to $50; the record does not show that it amounts to this sum; and the object of the amendment is to change the record, in order to give the court jurisdiction in a case where, according to the record before them, they have not jurisdiction; the court think this cannot be done. If the case showed that the appeal was legal in this court, then having jurisdiction over it, the court could permit the pleadings to be so amended, as to enable the court to do justice between the parties; but we cannot acquire jurisdiction by altering the record which has come to us from the district court.

Mr. Williams then suggested that one of the witnesses whose deposition was contained in the record, stated that he saw the assault and battery, and that he would not have run the risk of the blow given to the libellant for $100.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The deposition of the witness does not show the amount of damages claimed by the libellant, and it is the claim of the libellant, and the answer of the respondent denying the claim, that make the controversy, and ascertain the amount in dispute. Where property is in dispute, and the value of it is not averred, and does not appear in the record, parol testimony has been received in the supreme court, upon appeal, to show its value, and to show the jurisdiction of the court; and so too, as to the value of an office, where the right to the office is the matter in controversy. But where the controversy relates merely to the amount of money which one party is entitled to recover from the other, the record must show the amount in dispute, in order to give jurisdiction to the appellate court; and the amount in dispute is shown by the claim made by one, and the denial made by the other. The damages might in fact have amounted to $100, and yet, if the libellant claimed but $10, as his damages, $10 would be all that was in controversy.

The circuit court dismissed the appeal, for want of jurisdiction, without costs; saying, that in all cases in the supreme court, where the appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the court gave no costs, and as that was the rule in the supreme court, it was proper that the circuit court should adopt the same rule in analogous cases.

AGUIRRE v. MAXWELL.

[3 Blatchf. 140.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1853.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TONNAGE DUTY ON FOREIGN VESSELS—DUTIES ON EXPORTS.

1. The provision of the constitution of the United States, (article 1, § 9,) that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state," does not apply to the imposition of taxes on foreign vessels.

2. The act of June 30th, 1834, (4 Stat. 741.) concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels, is constitutional.

3. The method of determining the amount of such tonnage duty is wholly within the discretion of congress.

This cause was brought into this court by certiorari, from the supreme court of New York. It was an action [by Peter A. Aguirre and others] against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an excess of duty. The plaintiffs, in November, 1851, exported to Cuba a cargo of domestic produce, in a Spanish brig, of 147 63-95 tons burthen. The collector imposed $363 13 extra tonnage duty, which was paid by the plaintiffs under a protest in writing against the charge, "because, under the constitution and laws of the United States, such exactions are illegal."

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The duty in this case was levied under the act concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels, approved June 30, 1834, (4 Stat. 741.) The first section enacts "that from and after the first day of March next, Spanish vessels coming from the island of Cuba or Porto Rico, either directly or after touching at any port or place, shall pay, in the ports of the United States, such further tonnage duty, in addition to the tonnage duty which may be payable under any other law, as shall be equivalent to the amount of discriminating duty that would have been imposed on the cargoes imported in the said vessels respectively, if the same had been exported from the port of Havana in American bottoms." The second section provides "that, before any such vessel shall be permitted to clear out or depart from a port of the United States, with a cargo which shall be directly or indirectly destined to either of the said islands, the said vessel shall pay such further tonnage duty as shall be equivalent to the amount of discriminating duty that would be payable for the time being upon the cargo, if imported into the port of Havana in an American bottom."

It is not questioned that this vessel came within the terms of that statute, nor that the amount of duty charged was correct, if there was authority of law to justify its being levied. The provision of the constitution, (article 1, § 9,) that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state," does not apply to the imposition of taxes on foreign vessels. It is within the discretion of congress to totally inhibit the import or export trade in foreign vessels to or from our ports, or to grant them the privilege of bringing in or carrying out cargoes on such conditions and under such restrictions as may be regarded most beneficial to the United States. Congress has never revoked the legislation of 1834 in this respect. On the contrary, the act of August 3, 1846, (9 Stat. 50,) reaffirms the discrimination in relation to vessels coming from Cuba to Porto Rico. As the power exists, to impose the duty on vessels, the method of determining the amount, whether to be measured by the rate of taxation the cargo would be subjected to, if coming from Cuba or Porto Rico, or by the value of the ship or cargo, in gross or on a ratio estimated, as with domestic vessels, by the capacity of the vessel alone, is at the discretion of congress.

We think there is no foundation in law for the exception taken to the levy of the tonnage duty in this case. Judgment for defendant.

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 21, 1874.

POLICE POWER — EXCLUSION OF FOREIGNERS — TREATY WITH CHINA OF JULY 28, 1868 — FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT — CONFLICT OF STATE STATUTE WITH ACT OF CONGRESS.

1. The police power of the state may be exercised by precautionary measures against the increase of crime or pauperism, or the spread of infectious diseases from persons coming from other countries. The state may entirely exclude convicts, lepers and persons afflicted with incurable disease; may refuse admission to paupers, idiots and lunatics and others, who from physical causes are likely to become a charge upon the public until security is afforded that they will not become such a charge; and may isolate the temporarily diseased until the danger of contagion is gone.

2. The extent of the power of the state to exclude a foreigner from its territory is limited by the right of self-defense. Whatever outside of the legitimate exercise of this right affects the intercourse of foreigners with our people, their immigration to this country and residence therein, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the general government, and is not subject to state control or interference.

3. The sixth article of the treaty between the United States and China, adopted on the twenty-eighth of July, 1868, provides that Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and as the general government has not seen fit to attach any limitation to the ingress into the United States of subjects of those nations, none can be applied [by a state] to the subjects of China.

4. The fourteenth amendment to the constitution declares that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws: Reid, that this equality of protection implies not only equal accessibility to the courts for the prevention or redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of rights, but equal exemption with others of the same class from all charges and burdens of every kind. Within these limits the power of the state exists, as it did previously to the adoption of the amendment, over all matters of internal police.

[Cited in Re Tiburcio Parrott, 1 Fed. Rep. 511; The Railroad Tax Case, 13 Fed. Rep. 773; In re Lee Sing, 43 Fed. Rep. 362.]

5. On the thirty-first of May, 1870, congress passed an act declaring that "no tax or charge shall be imposed or enforced by any state upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country which is not equally imposed or enforced upon every person immigrating to such state from any foreign country, and any law of any state in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void." Held, 1. That the term charge, as here used, means any onerous condition, and includes a condition which makes the right of an immigrant, arriving in the ports of the state, to land within the state depend upon the execution of a bond by a third party, not under his control, and whom he cannot constrain by any legal proceedings; and, 2. That the statute of California, which prohibits foreign immigrants of certain classes, arriving in the state of California by vessel, from landing until a bond shall have been given by the master, owner or consignee of the vessel that they will not become a public charge, and imposes no condition upon immigrants of the same class entering the state in any other way, is in conflict with the act of congress.

Application for discharge on writ of habeas corpus. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

T. I. Bergin and Leander Quint, for petitioner.

Thos. P. Ryan, Dist. Atty. of City and County of San Francisco, and M. M. Estee, contra.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The petitioner alleges that she is illegally restrained of her liberty by the coroner of the city and county of San Francisco, and asks to be discharged from such restraint. The facts of the case, as detailed in the proceedings before us, are briefly as follows: The petitioner is a subject of the empire of China, and came to the port of San Francisco as a passenger on board of the American steamship Japan, owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and under the command as master, of J. H. Freeman. On the arrival of the steamship at this port, which was on the twenty-fourth of August last, she was boarded by the commissioner of immigration of California, who proceeded, under the provisions of a statute of the state, to examine into the character of the petitioner and other alien passengers. Upon such examination, the commissioner found, and so declared, that the petitioner and twenty-one other persons, also subjects of the Empire of China, arriving as passengers by the same steamship, were lewd and debauched women. He thereupon prohibited the master of the steamship from landing the women, unless he or the owner or consignee of the vessel gave the bonds required by the statute. Neither of the parties designated would consent to give the required bonds, and the women were consequently detained by the master on board of the steamship. They thereupon applied for a writ of habeas corpus to a district court of the state to inquire into the cause of their detention, alleging in their petition its illegality, on the ground that the statute, under which they were held, was in contravention of the treaty between the United States and the Empire of China, and in conflict with the constitution of the United States, and denying, also, that they were either lewd or debauched women. The district court granted the application, and heard the petitioners, and after the hearing, remanded them back to the charge of the master of the steamship, holding that the statute of California was neither in violation of the treaty nor the constitution, and that the evidence presented justified the finding of the commissioner, that the petitioners were lewd and debauched women. The petitioners thereupon applied to the chief justice of the state for another writ of habeas corpus, alleging the illegality of their restraint on grounds similar to those taken in the petition to the district court, and also alleging that they were, since the order of the district court remanding them to the custody of the master of the steamship, about to be forcibly returned to China against their will and consent. They therefore prayed that with the writ of habeas corpus a warrant might issue to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco to take them into his custody. The chief justice granted the writ, returnable before the supreme court of the state, and at the same time issued a warrant commanding the coroner of the city and county to take the parties into his custody and bring them before the court.

Under this warrant the parties were taken into the custody of the coroner, and in his custody they still remain. The supreme court sustained the ruling of the district court, and denied the application of the parties to be discharged, holding that the statute of the state, under which they were detained, was valid and binding under the treaty between the United States and China and the Constitution of the United States, and that the evidence justified the finding of the commissioner of immigration as to the character of the women. It therefore made an order directing that the coroner return the parties to the master or owner or consignee of the steamship Japan, on board of the steamship, and requiring such master, owner, or consignee to retain the parties on board of the steamship until she should leave this port, and then to carry them beyond the state. The order further provided, that in case the steamship Japan was not in the port of San Francisco, the coroner should retain the parties in his possession until the arrival in port of the steamship, and then enforce the order returning the parties to the vessel, or retain the parties until the further direction of the court. The petitioner is one of the women thus held by the coroner, and she now invokes the aid of this court to be released from her restraint, alleging, as in the other applications, that the restraint is illegal, that the statute which is supposed to authorize it is in contravention of the treaty with China and the constitution of the United States, and averring that she is not within either of the classes designated in the statute. It further appears, from the special traverse to the return of the coroner, and it is admitted by counsel, that since the judgment of the supreme court, the steamship Japan has sailed from the port of San Francisco, and will not probably return under three months, and that Freeman has been discharged from the service of the steamship company, and is no longer master of the Japan. The decision of the district court, and of the supreme court of the state, although entitled to great respect and consideration from the acknowledged ability and learning of their judges, is not binding upon this court. The petitioner being an alien, and a subject of a country having treaty relations with the government of the United States, has a right to invoke the aid of the federal tribunals for her protection, when her rights, guaranteed by the treaty, or the constitution, or any law of congress, are in any respect invaded; and is, of course, entitled to a hearing upon any allegation in proper form that her rights are thus invaded.

I proceed, therefore, to the consideration of the questions presented, notwithstanding the adjudications of the state tribunals.

The statute of the state, under which the petitioner was restrained of her liberty on board of the steamship, is found in the provisions of chapter I, tit. 7, of the Political Code, as amended by the last legislature. These provisions require the master of a vessel arriving at any port of this state, bringing passengers from any place out of the state, within twenty-four hours after its arrival, to make a written report under oath to the commissioner of immigration at such port, stating, among other things, the name, place of birth, last residence, age and occupation of all passengers who are not citizens, and whether any of the passengers thus reported "are lunatic, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled or infirm, and not accompanied by any relatives able to support them, or are lewd or abandoned women." Then follow the special provisions which have given rise to the present proceeding. They are contained in section 2952 of the Code as amended. They require the commissioner of immigration "to satisfy himself whether or not any passenger who shall arrive in this state by vessels from any foreign port or place (who is not a citizen of the United States) is lunatic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled or infirm, and is not accompanied by relatives who are able and willing to support him, or is likely to become permanently a public charge, or has been a pauper in any other country, or is, from sickness or disease, existing either at the time of sailing from the port of departure, or at the time of his arrival in this state, a public charge, or likely to become so, or is a convicted criminal, or a lewd or debauched woman;" and then declare that "no person who shall belong to either class, or who possesses any of the infirmities or vices specified herein, shall be permitted to land in this state, unless the master, owner or consignee of said vessel shall give a joint and several bond to the people of the state of California, in the penal sum of five hundred dollars, in gold coin of the United States, conditioned to indemnify and save harmless every county, city and county, town and city of this state, against all costs and expenses which may be by them necessarily incurred for the relief, support, medical care, or any expense whatever, resulting from the infirmities or vices herein referred to, of the persons named in said bonds, within two years from the date of said bonds; * * * and if the master, owner, or consignee of said vessel shall fail or refuse to execute the bond herein required to be executed, they are required to retain such persons on board of said vessel until said vessel shall leave the port, and then convey said passengers from this state; and if said master, owner or consignee shall fail or refuse to perform the duty and service last herein enjoined, or shall permit said passengers to escape from said vessel and land in this state, they shall forfeit to the state the sum of five hundred dollars, in gold coin of the United States, for each passenger so escaped, to be recovered by suit at law."

The provisions of this section are of a very extraordinary character. They make no distinction between the deaf, the dumb, the blind, the crippled and the infirm, who are poor and dependent, and those who are able to support themselves and are in possession of wealth and all its appliances. If they are not accompanied by relatives, both able and willing to support them, they are prohibited from landing within the state, unless a specified bond is given, not by them or such competent sureties as they may obtain, but by the owner, master or consignee of the vessel. Neither do the provisions of the statute make any distinction between a present pauper, and one who has been a pauper, but has ceased to be such. If the immigrant has ever been within that unfortunate class, notwithstanding he may have at the time ample means at his command, he must obtain the designated bond or be excluded from the state. They subject also to the same condition, and possible exclusion, the passenger whose sickness or disease has been contracted on the passage, as well as the passenger who was sick or diseased on his departure from the foreign port. It matters not that the sickness may have been produced by exertions for the safety of the ship or passengers, or by attentions to their wants or health. If he is likely on his arrival to become a public charge, he must obtain the bond designated, or be denied a landing within the state. Nor does the statute make any distinction between the criminal convicted for a misdemeanor, or a felony, or for an offense malum in se, or one political in its character. The condemned patriot, escaping from his prison and fleeing to our shores, stands under the law upon the same footing with the common felon who is a fugitive from justice. Nor is there any difference made between the woman whose lewdness consists in private and unlawful indulgence, and the woman who publicly prostitutes her person for hire, or between the woman debauched by intemperance in food or drink, or debauched by the loss of her chastity.

A statute thus sweeping in its terms, confounding by general designation persons widely variant in character, is not entitled to any very high commendation. If it can be sustained as the exercise of the police power of the state as to any persons brought within any of the classes designated, it must be sustained as to all the persons of such class. That is to say, if it can be sustained when applied to the infirm who is poor and dependent, when unaccompanied by his relatives, able and willing to support him, it must be sustained when applied to the infirm who is surrounded by wealth and its attendants, if he is thus unaccompanied. If it can be sustained when applied to a woman whose debauchery consists in the prostitution of her person, it must be sustained when applied to a woman whose debauchery consists in her intemperance in food and drink; and even when applied to the repentant Magdalen who has once yielded to temptation and lost her virtue. The commissioner of immigration is not empowered to make any distinction between persons of the same class; and there is nothing on the face of the act which indicates that the legislature intended that any distinction should be made.

It is undoubtedly true that the police power of the state extends to all matters relating to the internal government of the state, and the administration of its laws, which have not been surrendered to the general government, and embraces regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace and safety of society. Under this power all sorts of restrictions and burdens may be imposed, having for their object the advancement of the welfare of the people of the state, and when these are not in conflict with established principles, or any constitutional prohibition, their validity cannot be questioned.

It is equally true that the police power of the state may be exercised by precautionary measures against the increase of crime or pauperism, or the spread of infectious diseases from persons coming from other countries; that the state may entirely exclude convicts, lepers and persons afflicted with incurable disease; may refuse admission to paupers, idiots, lunatics and others, who from physical causes are likely to become a charge upon the public until security is afforded that they will not become such a charge; and may isolate the temporarily diseased until the danger of contagion is gone. The legality of precautionary measures of this kind has never been doubted. The right of the state in this respect has its foundation, as observed by Mr. Justice Grier in The Passenger Cases, [7 How. (48 U. S.) 462,] in the sacred law of self-defense, which no power granted to congress can restrain or annul.

But the extent of the power of the state to exclude a foreigner from its territory is limited by the right in which it has its origin, the right of self-defense. Whatever outside of the legitimate exercise of this right affects the intercourse of foreigners with our people, their immigration to this country and residence therein, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the general government, and is not subject to state control or interference. To that government the treaty-making power is confided; also, the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, which includes intercourse with them as well as traffic; also the power to prescribe the conditions of migration or importation of persons, and rules of naturalization; whilst the states are forbidden to enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation with other nations.

I am aware that the right of the state to exclude from its limits any persons whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens has been asserted by eminent judges of the supreme court of the United States. Mr. Chief Justice Taney maintained the existence of this right in his dissenting opinion in The Passenger Cases, and asserted that the power had been recognized in previous decisions of the court. The language of the opinion in the case of City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 141, would seem to sustain this doctrine. But neither in The Passenger Cases nor in the case of City of New York v. Miln, did the decision of the court require any consideration of the power of exclusion, which the state possessed; and all that was said by the eminent judges in those cases upon that subject was argumentative and not necessary and authoritative.²

But independent of this consideration, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that much which was formerly said upon the power of the state in this respect, grew out of the necessity which the southern states, in which the institution of slavery existed, felt of excluding free negroes from their limits. As

In some states negroes were citizens, the right to exclude them from the slave states could only be maintained by the assertion of a power to exclude all persons whom they might deem dangerous or injurious to their interests. But at this day no such power would be asserted, or if asserted, allowed, in any federal court. And the most serious consequences affecting the relations of the nation with other countries might, and undoubtedly would, follow from any attempt at its exercise. Its maintenance would enable any state to involve the nation in war, however disposed to peace the people at large might be.

Where the evil apprehended by the state from the ingress of foreigners is that such foreigners will disregard the laws of the state, and thus be injurious to its peace, the remedy lies in the more vigorous enforcement of the laws, not in the exclusion of the parties. Gambling is considered by most states to be injurious to the morals of their people, and is made a public offense. It would hardly be considered as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the states to prevent a foreigner who had been a gambler in his own country from landing in ours. If, after landing, he pursues his former occupation, fine him, and, if he persists in it, imprison him, and the evil will be remedied. In some states the manufacture and sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors are forbidden and punished as a misdemeanor. If the foreigner coming to our shores is a manufacturer or dealer in such liquors, it would be deemed an illegitimate exercise of the police power to exclude him, on account of his calling, from the state. The remedy against any apprehended manufacture and sale would lie in such case in the enforcement of the penal laws of the state. So if lewd women, or lewd men, even if the latter be of that baser sort, who, when Paul preached at Thessalonica, set all the city in an uproar (Acts xvii, verse 5), land on our shores, the remedy against any subsequent lewd conduct on their part must be found in good laws or good municipal regulations and a vigorous police. It is evident that if the possible violation of the laws of the state by an immigrant, or the supposed immorality of his past life or profession, where that immorality has not already resulted in a conviction for a felony, is to determine his right to land and to reside in the state, or to pass through into other and interior states, a door will be opened to all sorts of oppression. The doctrine now asserted by counsel for the commissioner of immigration, if maintained, would certainly be invoked, and at no distant day, when other parties, besides low and despised Chinese women, are the subjects of its application, and would then be seen to be a grievous departure from principle.

I am aware of the very general feeling prevailing in this state against the Chinese, and in opposition to the extension of any encouragement to their immigration hither. It is felt that the dissimilarity in physical characteristics, in language, in manners, religion and habits, will always prevent any possible assimilation of them with our people. Admitting that there is ground for this feeling, it does not justify any legislation for their exclusion, which might not be adopted against the inhabitants of the most favored nations of the Caucasian race, and of Christian faith. If their further immigration is to be stopped, recourse must be had to the federal government, where the whole power over this subject lies. The state cannot exclude them arbitrarily, nor accomplish the same end by attributing to them a possible violation of its municipal laws. It is certainly desirable that all lewdness, especially when it takes the form of prostitution, should be suppressed, and that the most stringent measures to accomplish that end should be adopted. But I have little respect for that discriminating virtue which is shocked when a frail child of China is landed on our shores, and yet allows the bedizened and painted harlot of other countries to parade our streets and open her hells in broad day, without molestation and without censure. By the fifth article of the treaty between the United States and China, adopted on the twenty-eighth of July, 1868,³ the United States and the emperor of China recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and immigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to another, for purposes of curiosity or trade, or as permanent residents. The sixth article declares that citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and, reciprocally, that Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

The only limitation upon the free ingress into the United States and egress from them of subjects of China is the limitation which is applied to citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and as the general government has not seen fit to attach any limitation to the ingress of subjects of those nations, none can be applied to the subjects of China. And the power of exclusion by the state, as we have already said, extends only to convicts, lepers and persons incurably diseased, and to paupers and persons who, from physical causes, are likely to become a public charge. The detention of the petitioner is therefore unlawful under the treaty.

But there is another view of this case equally conclusive for the discharge of the petitioner, which is founded upon the legislation of congress since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. That amendment in its first section designates who are citizens of the United States, and then declares that no state shall make or enforce any law which abridges their privileges and immunities. It also enacts that no state shall deprive "any person" (dropping the distinctive designation of citizens) of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. The great fundamental rights of all citizens are thus secured against any state deprivation, and all persons, whether native or foreign, high or low, are, whilst within the jurisdiction of the United States, entitled to the equal protection of the laws. Discriminating and partial legislation, favoring particular persons, or against particular persons of the same class, is now prohibited. Equality of privilege is the constitutional right of all citizens, and equality of protection is the constitutional right of all persons. And equality of protection implies not only equal accessibility to the courts for the prevention or redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of rights, but equal exemption with others of the same class from all charges and burdens of every kind. Within these limits the power of the state exists, as it did previously to the adoption of the amendment, over all matters of internal police. And within these limits the act of congress of May 31, 1870, restricts the action of the state with respect to foreigners immigrating to our country. "No tax or charge," says the act, "shall be imposed or enforced by any state upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country which is not equally imposed or enforced upon every person immigrating to such state from any other foreign country, and any law of any state in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void." 16 Stat. 144.

jects already within the United States to go and come of their own free will and accord, with "all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation."]

By the term "charge," as here used, is meant any onerous condition, it being the evident intention of the act to prevent any such condition from being imposed upon any person immigrating to the country which is not equally imposed upon all other immigrants, at least upon all others of the same class. It was passed under and accords with the spirit of the fourteenth amendment. A condition which makes the right of the immigrant to land depend upon the execution of a bond by a third party, not under his control, and whom he cannot constrain by any legal proceedings, and whose execution of the bond can only be obtained upon such terms as he may exact, is as onerous as any charge which can well be imposed, and must, if valid, generally lead, as in the present case, to the exclusion of the immigrant.

The statute of California which we have been considering imposes this onerous condition upon persons of particular classes on their arrival in the ports of the state by vessel, but leaves all other foreigners of the same classes entering the state in any other way, by land from the British possessions or Mexico, or over the plains by railway, exempt from any charge. The statute is therefore in direct conflict with the act of congress.

It follows, from the views thus expressed, that the petitioner must be discharged from further restraint of her liberty; and it is so ordered.

NOTE, [from original report.] The only point involved and decided in the case of City of New York v. Min, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102, was the constitutional power of the state of New York to compel the master of a vessel with passengers, arriving at her ports, from any country out of the United States, or from any other state of the United States, to report in writing, on oath, to the state authorities, under a prescribed penalty, the name, place of birth, and last legal settlement, age and occupation of every person brought as a passenger in the vessel. This the supreme court held that the state, in virtue of her general police powers, had the constitutional right to do. In the course of the opinions of Mr. Justice Barbour and Mr. Justice Thompson, general language is used indicating a power in the state to exclude persons from her limits whom she might deem dangerous to the material or moral welfare of the state, but the language was wholly unnecessary to the decision of the only point then in judgment before the court. The facts of the two cases known as The Passenger Cases, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 283, were briefly these: One of the cases (Smith v. Turner) went to the supreme court on a writ of error from the court of errors of New York. The other case (Norris v. City of Boston) went to the supreme court of the United States from the supreme court of Massachusetts. The New York case arose substantially upon these facts: A statute of that state authorized the health commissioner to demand and receive, and in case of neglect or refusal to pay, to sue for and recover of and from the master of every vessel arriving in the port of New York from a foreign port, for himself and each cabin passenger, one dollar and fifty cents, and from the master of each coasting vessel for each person on board twenty-five cents; but coasting vessels from New Jersey, Connecticut and Rhode Island, were only required to pay for one voyage in each month. The moneys thus collected were denominated in the statute hospital moneys, and the master was authorized to sue and recover from each passenger the amount paid on his account. To the failure on the part of the master to pay within twenty-four hours after arrival of the vessel, was attached a penalty of one hundred dollars. All moneys collected from this source, in excess of the amount necessary to defray the hospital expenses, were to be paid over to the treasurer of the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents, in the city of New York. Upon this statute, Smith, the master of the British ship Henry Bliss, was sued for $295. He demurred to the complaint, on the ground that so much of the statute as authorized a recovery was repugnant to the constitution of the United States. The demurrer was overruled in the state courts, and electing to stand upon his demurrer, the case was taken to the supreme court of the United States where the point was thus sharply presented to the court for decision. That tribunal, after the most exhaustive and elaborate arguments upon the question, decided that the act of the legislature of New York, in the particular case under consideration, was repugnant to the constitution of the United States, and void, and accordingly reversed the judgment of the court of errors of New York.

In the case of Norris v. City of Boston, the facts were substantially as follows: Norris, an inhabitant of St. Johns, in the province of New Brunswick, Kingdom of Great Britain, was master of a vessel belonging to the port of St. Johns; he arrived with nineteen alien passengers at the port of Boston. Prior to landing, he was compelled to pay, under a law of Massachusetts, to the city of Boston, two dollars for each passenger. The statute of Massachusetts authorized the municipal authorities to appoint examiners, whose duty it was to examine the condition of all passengers on board of any vessel arriving in port. If, upon such examination, there were found among said passengers "any lunatic, idiot, maimed, aged or infirm person," incompetent, in the opinion of the examining officer, to maintain himself, or who had been a pauper in another country, the passenger was not permitted to land, until the master, owner, consignee or agent of the vessel gave to the city a bond in the sum of one thousand dollars, with sufficient sureties, that such lunatic or indigent passenger would not become a city, town or state charge within ten years from the date of the bond, and for all alien passengers, other than those already specified, the master was required to pay two dollars for each passenger before they could land. Appropriate penalties were contained in the statute to secure compliance with its terms. Norris paid the two dollars for each passenger, as prescribed by the statute, under protest, landed his passengers, and thereupon instituted suit for the recovery of the money he had thus been compelled to pay. In the state courts judgment passed in favor of the defendant, when the case was taken to the supreme court of the United States upon a writ of error, where the judgment was reversed; that court holding the statute of Massachusetts, under which payment of the money was compelled, was unconstitutional and void. In the opinions of the justices in these celebrated cases, language is also used as in the case in 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] expressive of the right of the state, in exercise of its police power, to exclude persons from her limits; but from the statement of the cases, it is obvious that no such question was before the court.

Mr. Justice Wayne, one of the judges composing the majority of the court which decided the Passenger Cases, sums up the conclusions of the court, as follows (7 How. [48 U. S.] 412):

1. That the acts of New York and Massachusetts imposing a tax upon passengers, either foreigners or citizens, coming into the ports in those states, either in foreign vessels or vessels of the United States, from foreign nations or from ports in the United States, are unconstitutional and void, being in their nature regulations of commerce contrary to the grant in the constitution to congress of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

2. That the states of this Union cannot constitutionally tax the commerce of the United States for the purpose of paying any expense incident to the execution of their police laws; and that the commerce of the United States includes an intercourse of persons, as well as the importation of merchandises.

3. That the acts of Massachusetts and New York in question in these cases, conflict with treaty stipulations existing between the United States and Great Britain, permitting the inhabitants of the two countries "freely and securely to come, with their ships and cargoes, to all places, ports, and rivers in the territories of each country to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of said territories, respectively; also, to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce, and generally the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject, always, to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively;" and that said laws are therefore unconstitutional and void.

4. That the congress of the United States having by sundry acts, passed at different times, admitted foreigners into the United States with their personal luggage and tools of trade, free from all duty or imposts, the acts of Massachusetts and New York imposing any tax upon foreigners or immigrants for any purpose whatever, whilst the vessel is in transitu to her port of destination, though said vessel may have arrived within the jurisdictional limits of either of the states of Massachusetts or New York, and before the passengers have been landed, are in violation of said acts of congress, and therefore unconstitutional and void.

5. That the acts of Massachusetts and New York so far as they impose any obligation upon the owners or consignees of vessels, or upon the captains of vessels or freighters of the same, arriving in the ports of the United States within the said states, to pay any tax or duty of any kind whatever, or to be in any way responsible for the same, for passengers arriving in the United States or coming from a port in the United States, are unconstitutional and void; being contrary to the constitutional grant to congress of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and to the legislation of congress under the said power, by which the United States have been laid off into collection districts, and ports of entry established within the same, and commercial regulations prescribed, under which vessels, their cargoes and passengers, are to be admitted into the ports of the United States, as well from abroad as from other ports of the United States. That the act of New York now in question, so far as it imposes a tax upon passengers arriving in vessels from other ports in the United States, is properly in this case before this court for construction, and that the said tax is unconstitutional and void. That the ninth section of the first article of the constitution includes within it the migration of other persons, as well as the importation of slaves, and in terms recognizes that other persons as well as slaves may be the subjects of importation and commerce.

6. That the fifth clause of the ninth section of the first article of the constitution, which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another state; nor shall vessels bound to or from one state be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another," is a limitation upon the power of congress to regulate commerce for the purpose of producing entire commercial equality within the United States, and also a prohibition upon the states to destroy such equality by any legislation prescribing a condition upon which vessels bound from one state shall enter the ports of another state.

7. That the acts of Massachusetts and New York, so far as they impose a tax upon passengers, are unconstitutional and void, because each of them so far conflicts with the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, which enjoins that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; because the constitutional uniformity enjoined in respect to duties and imposts is as real and obligatory upon the states, in the absence of all legislation by congress, as if the uniformity had been made by the legislation of congress; and that such constitutional uniformity is interfered with and destroyed by any state imposing any tax upon the intercourse of persons from state to state, or from foreign countries to the United States.

8. That the power in congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states includes navigation upon the high seas, and in the bays, harbors, lakes, and navigable waters within the United States, and that any tax by a state in any way affecting the right of navigation, or subjecting the exercise of the right to a condition, is contrary to the aforesaid grant.

9. That the states of this Union may, in the exercise of their police powers, pass quarantine and health laws, interdicting vessels coming from foreign ports, or ports within the United States, from landing passengers and goods, prescribe the places and time for vessels to quarantine, and impose penalties upon persons for violating the same; and that such laws, though affecting commerce in its transit, are not regulations of commerce prescribing terms upon which merchandise and persons shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, but precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports to which they are bound, and that the states may, in the exercise of such police power, without any violation of the power in congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel, and from the passengers on board of her, such fees as will pay to the state the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS—PREFERENCES.

A payment by the maker of a promissory note to an indorser, the maker knowing his insolvency at the time, and the indorser receiving such payment, having reasonable cause to believe the maker to be insolvent, is a fraudulent preference of such indorser within the meaning of section 35 of the bankrupt act; and the assignee in bankruptcy may sue for and recover the amount so paid, for the benefit of all the creditors.

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Daniel Ahl, Jr., and Alexander Buchman, assignees of Sugarman & Frank, against Samuel Thorner, to recover money paid in fraud of the bankrupt act. Decree for plaintiffs.]

Moulton, Bateman & Johnson, for plaintiffs.

Long & Hoeffler, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is a petition in chancery, prosecuted by said Ahl and Buchman, as assignees in bankruptcy, to recover from the defendant, Thorner, the sum of $4,990, which they allege to have been paid by said Sugarman & Frank to Thorner, in fraud of the bankrupt law of the United States. The material facts involved may be comprehensively stated as follows: In July, 1867, the said Sugarman & Frank were doing business in Memphis, in the state of Tennessee, as partners. Some time during that month, at the request of Sugarman, the said Thorner, residing at Cincinnati, and the brother-in-law of said Sugarman, and then a member of the firm of Heidelberg, Seasongood & Co., indorsed the promissory note of Sugarman & Frank for $5,000, payable to the order of Thorner ninety days after date. This note was discounted by Espy, Heidelberg & Co., bankers at Cincinnati. Not being paid at maturity, on October 21, 1867, a renewed note for the same sum, at ninety days, was given by Sugarman & Frank, and indorsed by Thorner. This note, by its terms, would have been due January 23, 1868. On the 16th of that month the defendant Thorner received from Sugarman & Frank bills or drafts on a house in New York for $5,300, with instructions to apply them to the note held by Espy, Heidelbach & Co. These bills or drafts were accepted by said bankers in payment of said note, and the note was taken up and canceled. The difference between the proceeds of the drafts or bills remitted to Thorner, and the sum due on Sugarman & Frank's note, was paid by direction of Sugarman to his wife, then living at Cincinnati. The bill sets forth that on May 11, 1868, a petition was filed in this court by certain creditors of the said Sugarman & Frank, alleging various acts of bankruptcy by them, and praying that they might be adjudged bankrupts. And on the 21st of September, in the year last named, the firm, and the individual members of the firm, were decreed to be bankrupts, and the said Ahl & Buchman were duly appointed and qualified as their assignees. They allege in their bill that at the time Sugarman & Frank remitted to Thorner the drafts to pay the note for $5,000 held by Espy, Heidelbach & Co., they were insolvent, and that Thorner had just cause to believe them to be insolvent, and that, therefore, the payment of the note was an unlawful preference to Thorner, and illegal and void as in violation of the bankrupt act. And the assignees allege a right to recover from Thorner the sum so paid, to be applied to the claims of the firm creditors of Sugarman & Frank.

Before referring to the evidence, and with a view to a more intelligent application of the law to the facts, it may be well to notice briefly the provisions of section 35 of the bankrupt act, so far as they apply to the transactions in question. That section declares: "That if any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor, or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, . . . makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, . . . the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such . . . payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property or the value thereof, from the person so receiving it, or so to be benefited thereby." The section then provides, that if any person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, shall make any payment or transfer of property to a person having reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such payment, transfer, etc., is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee, or prevent the same from being distributed under the act, or in any way to impede, impair, delay, or defeat the operation of the act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property or the value as assets of the bankrupt.

In deciding whether the transaction involved is within the prohibitions of section 35, and therefore void, the following inquiries necessarily arise: 1. Was the firm of Sugarman & Frank insolvent, or acting in contemplation of insolvency in the payment of their note, on which Thorner was liable as indorser? 2. Was the note paid with a view to a preference to Thorner over other creditors of Sugarman & Frank? 3. Had Thorner reasonable cause to believe that Sugarman & Frank were insolvent? 4. Was Thorner under such a liability as indorser for the firm, as that the payment of the note inured to his benefit within the meaning of said section of the bankrupt act?

I. As to the insolvency of the firm of Sugarman & Frank, on January 16, 1868, when Thorner paid their note to Espy, Heidelbach & Co., with the proceeds of the drafts remitted to him by Sugarman & Frank, there is no room for doubt. The evidence proves conclusively that in December, 1867, the firm was unable to meet its liabilities. There were large debts owing to Cincinnati houses, which were past due and unprovided for. The debts of the firm then were in excess of $100,000, and their assets and means of payment, according to the estimate of witnesses well acquainted with their affairs, would not pay more than twenty-five or thirty cents on the dollar. It is in evidence, by Seasongood, a witness in the case, that in December, 1867, Sugarman admitted to him that the firm were unable to pay their debts. The same witness states that he considered the firm insolvent in the spring of 1867.

II. The second inquiry is, whether Sugarman & Frank, in paying the note to Espy, Heidelbach & Co., on which Thorner was indorser, intended a preference to him, within the meaning of section 35 of the bankrupt act. This is a question of intention, which can only be determined by a reference to the facts connected with the transaction. And here the familiar principle, that every man intends what he knows must be the necessary result of his acts, applies. Sugarman & Frank must have known the firm was hopelessly insolvent when the note in question was paid. It is impossible, therefore, not to infer that in paying this note they were virtually preferring Thorner to other creditors. The effect of the payment clearly was to withdraw so much from the assets of the firm, which should have been applied to the equal benefit of all its creditors. This was clearly in conflict with the policy and the requirements of the bankrupt law. Thorner, as their indorser, had no privilege or immunity superior to those of the general creditors.

III. The next inquiry is whether Thorner had reasonable cause to believe Sugarman & Frank were insolvent at the time the note was paid. On this point the evidence is clear and conclusive. Thorner was apprised of the fact that the claim of Seasongood, Heidelbach & Co., of which he was then a member, against Sugarman & Frank for upward of $6,000, was entered in the books of the former firm to the account of profit and loss, with the consent and knowledge of Thorner. It is also in evidence that one of the firm of Seasongood, Heidelbach & Co. offered to sell the claim of that firm on Sugarman & Frank to Thorner at fifty cents on the dollar, which Thorner declined. It is also proved that during the month of December, Sugarman was in Cincinnati asking his creditors for an extension, and that several meetings of the creditors were held to confer on that question, at several of which Thorner was present. It is also in evidence that Thorner visited Memphis some time before these meetings of creditors, and upon his return admitted in conversation that he had advised Sugarman & Frank to apply for the benefit of the bankrupt act. These facts, with others that might be referred to, prove conclusively not only that the firm was notoriously insolvent, but that Thorner was fully advised of its insolvency.

IV. The only remaining question is, whether Thorner's liability, as indorser for Sugarman & Frank, was such that the payment of the note inured to Thorner's benefit within the meaning of section 35 of the bankrupt act. On this point, there seem to be no decisions of any of the courts in bankruptcy that are directly applicable. And the court is called upon to decide the question in view of the construction to be given to the section referred to. The first part of that section before quoted, provides that any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance by a person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, if the person to whom the same is made is to be benefited thereby, and has reasonable cause to believe such person to be insolvent, and that the same is made in fraud of the provisions of the law, shall be void; and the assignee is authorized to sue for and recover the value from the person receiving the same, "or so to be benefited." And as throwing some light on the question of the construction of these provisions of section 35, it is proper to note that by section 39, which enumerates the causes for which a person may be declared a bankrupt, it is provided that a payment, transfer, etc., to any person or persons who are or may be liable as "indorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the act," or to give a preference to any creditor, shall be a ground for an adjudication of bankruptcy. This is only referred to as showing that although the term "indorser" is not specifically used in section 35, it was the clear intention of the law to make any payment or preference to an indorser or other surety fraudulent and void, where the other elements in the transaction existed to give it that character. The only question, therefore, arising under the fourth inquiry suggested is, whether the sending the eastern drafts, by Sugarman & Frank, to Thorner, to be applied by him to the payment of the $5,000 note held by Espy, Heidelbach & Co., on which Thorner was indorser, was a payment to him, as the person to be "benefited thereby," within the clause of section 35 referred to. The argument mainly insisted on by the counsel for the defendant is, that as the note held by the bankers on Sugarman & Frank was taken up by Thorner a few days before its maturity, he was then under no liability as indorser, and the payment of the note by Sugarman & Frank did not inure to his benefit, in the sense of making the payment with an intent to give a preference within the meaning of the law. It seems to the court this construction of the statute is too limited to meet either the spirit or intent of the law. While it is true Thorner's legal liability could not be legally enforced, as indorser, until the maturity of the note and demand of the maker, and notice of non-payment, yet, in the statutory sense of the term, there was a liability by Thorner from the date of the indorsement. He was the person to be benefited by the payment, whether made before or after the maturity of the note. He was thereby relieved from his liability, and therefore beneficially interested in the payment. And if Sugarman & Frank were insolvent at the time of the payment, and Thorner had reasonable cause so to believe, it was a fraudulent preference within the meaning of the law, without reference to the means or agency by which Sugarman & Frank made the payment. They were in a condition of insolvency, in which any appropriation of their means to pay or indemnify a creditor, who was aware of such insolvency, is condemned by the statute. It was a preference to one liable for him, and to be benefited thereby, which he had no right to make.

It is further contended by defendant's counsel that if the payment of the note imports a fraudulent preference, it was a preference to the bankers who held the note, and not to Thorner, the indorser. That this view can not be sustained is clear from two considerations: First, there is no proof or pretense that Espy, Heidelbach & Co. were apprised of the insolvency of Sugarman & Frank, and therefore the payment to them was not a preference in fraud of the law; second, they were not the parties benefited by the payment, as Thorner's indorsement made them wholly safe, as he is admitted to have been entirely solvent, and able to meet any demand against him. It was therefore, of no importance to them whether Sugarman & Frank paid the note, either before or at its maturity, as they would have been paid at once by the indorser when the note became due. The court, from the views stated, must hold the defendant liable for the amount paid to Espy, Heidelberg & Co., to be appropriated by the plaintiffs as assignees of Sugarman & Frank, for the equal benefit of all their creditors entitled to make proof of their accounts and claims.

NATURALIZATION—CHINESE—ACT 1875.

1. A native of China, of the Mongolian race, is not entitled to become a citizen of the United States under the Revised Statutes as amended in 1875. Rev. St. § 2169; Amend. Rev. St. p. 1435.

[Cited in Re Ah Chong, 2 Fed. Rep. 739.]

2. A Mongolian is not a "white person" within the meaning of the term as used in the naturalization laws of the United States.

[Cited in Re Camille, 6 Fed. Rep. 256.]

Application for naturalization by a native of China.

B. S. Brooks, for petitioner.
S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., contra.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. Ah Yup, a native and citizen of the empire of China, of the Mongolian race, presented a petition in writing, praying that he be permitted to make proof of the facts alleged, and upon satisfactory proof being made, and his taking the oath required in such cases, he be admitted as a citizen of the United States. The petition stated all the qualifications required by the statute to entitle the petitioner to be naturalized, provided the statute authorizes the naturalization of a native of China of the Mongolian race. The petitioner was represented by B. S. Brooks, a counsellor of this court. This being the first application made by a native Chinaman for naturalization, the members of the bar were requested by the court to make such suggestions as amici curiæ as occurred to them upon either side of the question; whereupon S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., argued the case very fully in opposition to the application. Suggestions were also made by other members of the bar present. The only question is, whether the statute authorizes the naturalization of a native of China of the Mongolian race.

In all the acts of congress relating to the naturalization of aliens, from that of April 14, 1802, down to the Revised Statutes, the language has been "that any alien, being a free white person, may be admitted to become a citizen," etc. After the adoption of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the national constitution; the former prohibiting slavery, and the latter declaring "who shall be citizens, congress in the act of July 14, 1870, amending the naturalization laws, added the following provision: "That the naturalization laws are hereby extended to aliens of African nativity, and to persons of African descent." 16 Stat. 256, § 7. Upon the revision of the statutes, the revisors, probably inadvertently, as congress did not contemplate a change in the laws in force, omitted the words "white persons;" section 2165 of the Revised Statutes, being the section conferring the right, reading: "An alien may be admitted to become a citizen," etc., etc. The provision relating to Africans of the act of 1870, is carried into the Revised Statutes in a separate section, which reads as follows: "The provisions of this title shall apply to aliens of African nativity, and to persons of African descent." Section 2169. This section was amended by the "act to correct errors and to supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States," of February 13, 1875, so as to read: "The provisions of this title shall apply to aliens being free white persons, and to aliens of African nativity, and to persons of African descent." Rev. St. (1st Ed.) p. 1435; 18 Stat. 318. And so the statute now stands.

The questions are: 1. Is a person of the Mongolian race a "white person" within the meaning of the statute? 2. Do these provisions exclude all but white persons and persons of African nativity or African descent. Words in a statute, other than technical terms, should be taken in their ordinary sense. The words "white person," as well argued by petitioner's counsel, taken in a strictly literal sense, constitute a very indefinite description of a class of persons, where none can be said to be literally white, and those called white may be found of every shade from the lightest blonde to the most swarthy brunette. But these words in this country, at least, have undoubtedly acquired a well settled meaning in common popular speech, and they are constantly used in the sense so acquired in the literature of the country, as well as in common parlance. As ordinarily used everywhere in the United States, one would scarcely fail to understand that the party employing the words "white person" would intend a person of the Caucasian race.

In speaking of the various classifications of races, Webster in his dictionary says, "The common classification is that of Blumenbach, who makes five. 1. The Caucasian, or white race, to which belong the greater part of the European nations and those of Western Asia; 2. The Mongolian, or yellow race, occupying Tartary, China, Japan, etc.; 3. The Ethiopian or Negro (black) race, occupying all Africa, except the north; 4. The American, or red race, containing the Indians of North and South America; and, 5. The Malay, or Brown race, occupying the islands of the Indian Archipelago," etc. This division was adopted from Buffon, with some changes in names, and is founded on the combined characteristics of complexion, hair and skull. Linnaeus makes four divisions, founded on the color of the skin: "1. European, whitish; 2. American, coppery; 3. Asiatic, tawny; and, 4. African, black." Cuvier makes three: Caucasian, Mongol, and Negro. Others make many more, but no one includes the white, or Caucasian, with the Mongolian or yellow race; and no one of those classifications recognizing color as one of the distinguishing characteristics includes the Mongolian in the white or whitish race." See New American Cyclopedia, tit. "Ethnology."

Neither in popular language, in literature, nor in scientific nomenclature, do we ordinarily, if ever, find the words "white person" used in a sense so comprehensive as to include an individual of the Mongolian race. Yet, in all, color, notwithstanding its indefiniteness as a word of description, is made an important factor in the basis adopted for the distinction and classification of races. I am not aware that the term "white person," as used in the statutes as they have stood from 1802 till the late revision, was ever supposed to include a Mongolian. While I find nothing in the history of the country, in common or scientific usage, or in legislative proceedings, to indicate that congress intended to include in the term "white person" any other than an individual of the Caucasian race, I do find much in the proceedings of congress to show that it was universally understood in that body, in its recent legislation, that it excluded Mongolians. At the time of the amendment, in 1870, extending the naturalization laws to the African race, Mr. Sumner made repeated and strenuous efforts to strike the word "white" from the naturalization laws, or to accomplish the same object by other language. It was opposed on the sole ground that the effect would be to authorize the admission of Chinese to citizenship. Every senator, who spoke upon the subject, assumed that they were then excluded by the term "white person," and that the amendment would admit them, and the amendment was advocated on the one hand, and opposed on the other, upon that single idea. Senator Morton, in the course of the discussion said: "This amendment involves the whole Chinese problem. * * * The country has just awakened to the question and to the enormous magnitude of the question, involving a possible immigration of many millions, involving another civilization; involving labor problems that no intellect can solve without study and time. Are you now prepared to settle the Chinese problem, thus in advance inviting that immigration?" Congressional Globe, pt. 6, 1869-70, p. 5122. Senator Sumner replied: "Senators undertake to disturb us in our judgment by reminding us of the possibility of large numbers swarming from China; but the answer to all this is very obvious and very simple. If the Chinese come here they will come for citizenship, or merely for labor. If they come for citizenship then in this desire do they give a pledge of loyalty to our institutions, and where is the peril in such vows? They are peaceful and industrious; how can their citizenship be the occasion of solicitude?" Id. 5155.

Many other senators spoke pro and con on the question, this being the point of the contest, and these extracts being fair examples of the opposing opinions. Id. 5121-5177. It was finally defeated, and the amendment cited, extending the right of naturalization to the African only, was adopted. It is clear, from these proceedings that congress retained the word "white" in the naturalization laws for the sole purpose of excluding the Chinese from the right of naturalization. Again, when it was found that the term "white person" had been omitted in the Revised Statutes it was restored by the act passed "to correct errors and to supply omissions" in the Revised Statutes before cited. Upon reporting this bill, Mr. Poland, chairman of the committee, explained the various amendments correcting the errors, and upon the amendment to insert the words "being free white persons," said: "The original naturalization laws only extended to free white persons. * * * A very few years since [in 1870] Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, then in the senate, moved to strike out the word 'white' from the naturalization laws, and it was objected to on the ground that that would authorize the naturalization of that class of Asiatic immigrants that are so plentiful on the Pacific coast. After considerable debate, instead of striking out the word 'white,' it was provided that the naturalization laws should extend to Africans, and persons of African descent." After explaining the omission in the Revised Statutes he adds: "The member of our committee who had this chapter on the naturalization laws to examine as a sub-committee, failed to notice this change in the law, or it would have been brought before the house when the revision was adopted." Congressional Record, vol. 4, pt. 2, Sess 1875, p. 1081. Upon this report the amendment was made as it now stands in the statute. Thus, whatever latitudinarian construction might otherwise have been given to the term "white person," it is entirely clear that congress intended by this legislation to exclude Mongolians from the right of naturalization. I am, therefore, of the opinion that a native of China, of the Mongolian race, is not a white person within the meaning of the act of congress.

The second question is answered in the discussion of the first. The amendment is intended to limit the operation of the provision as it then stood in the Revised Statutes. It would have been more appropriately inserted in section 2165, than where it is found in section 2169. But the purpose is clear. It was certainly intended to have some operation, or it would not have been adopted. The purpose undoubtedly was to restore the law to the condition in which it stood before the revision, and to exclude the Chinese. It was intended to exclude some classes, and as all white aliens and those of the African race are entitled to naturalization under other words, it is difficult to perceive whom it could exclude unless it be the Chinese. It follows that the petition must be denied, and it is so ordered.

Case No. 105.

The AIGBURTH.

The SARAH STARR.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas. 635.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 19, 1862.

PRIZE—RIGHTS OF CAPTOR—CONDEMNATION—EXPENSES—BONDING VESSEL.

1. Pending the appeals in these cases from decrees of condemnation, an order was made by this court, at the instance of the claimants, for bonding the vessels. They were appraised for that purpose, and the bonds were tendered, when the marshal intervened, and claimed payment of his fees and disbursements in the seizure and subsequent safe-keeping of the vessels, and also for wharfage, towage, &c., or at least that the claimants pay into court a sum of money to cover these fees and expenses: Held, that the claimants were, thus far, liable for nothing but the expenses of bonding the vessel.

2. Under the act of March 25, 1862, (12 Stat. 374,) the claimant is not responsible for the costs and expenses attending the seizure, detention, and safe custody of property seized as prize, unless there is a decree of condemnation, or of restitution on payment of costs.

3. All captures made by public armed vessels belong to the government and no title exists in the captors, except to their distributive shares of the proceeds after condemnation.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In admiralty.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. These two vessels were seized as prizes by the government, and were condemned in the court below, and are in this court on appeal. An order was heretofore made, at the instance of the claimants, for bonding them. They were appraised for that purpose, the Aigburth at $900, and the Sarah Starr at $2,000, and the bonds were tendered. The marshal has intervened, and claims the payment of his fees and disbursements in the seizure and subsequent safe-keeping of the vessels, and also for wharfage, towage, &c.; or, at least, that the claimants pay into court a sum of money to cover these fees and expenses.

The first section of the act of March 25, 1862, (12 Stat. 374,) provides "that all reasonable and proper claims and charges for pilotage, towage, wharfage, storage, insurance, and other expenses incident to the bringing in and safe custody and sale of the property captured as prize, shall be a charge upon the same, and, having been audited and allowed by the court, shall, in the event of a decree of condemnation, or of restitution on payment of costs, be paid out of the proceeds," &c. The third section contains a similar provision in respect to another class of expenses. It will be seen, from the above provisions, that the claimant is not responsible for the costs and expenses attending the seizure, detention, and safe custody of the vessel seized by the government, unless there is a decree of condemnation or of restitution on payment of costs. And such would have been the rule in the absence of any statute regulation. The government is the libellant, instituting proceedings against the vessel, and, like any other party instituting a suit, is responsible for the expenses incurred in the progress of litigation, with the right of being reimbursed in the event of success, namely, the condemnation of the vessel, or a decree of restitution to the claimant on terms, such as payment of the costs. The claimant acts on the defensive, and is not subject to any portion of the costs and expenses incurred by the proceedings of the libellant, except his own in the progress of the defence, till they are adjudged against him by the court in the final adjudication. If he is successful in resisting the seizure, and obtains a final decree in his favor, he is, as a general rule, entitled to all his costs and expenses against the adverse party; and if the latter is a private party, to an execution for these costs and expenses. If the government be the adverse party, as no decree for costs can be rendered against it, an application must be made to the proper department of the government, and such application must be made by all officers, or other persons who may have incurred expenses, or been subject to charges, at the instance of the government, in the course of the proceedings. It is true, that these costs and expenses are a charge upon the property seized, whether vessel or cargo, while it remains in the custody of the law; or, on its proceeds, in case of an interlocutory sale; or, on the bond, as representing the property, in case it is bonded; and this charge upon the res continues until the final adjudication of the case. If this is favorable to the libellant, they are paid out of the proceeds; if not, the property or proceeds are exempt, and are restored to the claimant. What these charges are, or may be, I am not now called upon to determine.

I have said that the government is the libellant, and is responsible for all lawful and proper expenses incurred in its behalf in conducting the proceedings. All captures made by public armed vessels belong to the government. By the laws of congress, after the condemnation of prize property, a portion of the proceeds is distributed among the officers and crew of the capturing vessel in proportions depending upon the relative force of that vessel and of the captured vessel. Still, the whole property is proceeded against in behalf of the government. No title exists in the captors, except to the distributive share of the proceeds after condemnation; and, until then, the captors have no interest which the court can notice for any purpose. An exception to the above views in respect to costs and expenses exists in cases where the claimant applies to the court for some disposition of the res which may involve expense, such as for an interlocutory sale of the property, or for bonding the same. In such cases the claimant must advance the legal and necessary expenses, in the first instance, subject to a proper adjustment between the parties by the court in the final adjudication.

Applying the principles above stated to the case before me, it is quite clear that the marshal's bill presented, which includes charges for his own services, and for wharfage, towage, &c., cannot be allowed. He must look to the government, the libellant, for these expenses, or postpone his claim until the final adjudication, when, if that be against the claimant, it may be paid out of the proceeds; otherwise, not. The security taken for the vessel represents the proceeds, and is the equivalent for the property restored. The only charges thus far against the claimant are the expenses of bonding the vessel. The above views may be taken as disposing of other cases which have been mentioned to the court in the course of the term.

Appeal from refusal to grant patent.

[Application by Herrick Aiken for a patent for certain alleged improvements in submarine propellers. The application was rejected by the commissioner. Applicant appeals. Affirmed.]

Z. C. Robbins, for appellant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. Appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting the application of the appellant for letters-patent for improvements in submarine propellers. The supervision of the judge is limited to the points involved by the reasons of appeal.

The following are the reasons of appeal filed in the patent office: "1. The reasons assigned by the commissioner for rejecting my application are irrelevant to the subject-matter under consideration, and therefore do not apply, and cannot be properly construed to meet the points in the case. 2.

The commissioner erred in declaring that the patent granted to James Montgomery, August 7th, 1847, was a bar to my application. 3. The commissioner erred in declaring that the rejected application filed by Perry G. Gardner was a bar to my application. 4. The commissioner erred in declaring that the rejected application filed by John Finley was a bar to my application. 5. The commissioner erred in judging of the uses, advantages, and effects of the radical divisions in the cylinders placed in front and rear of the propeller, screw, or wheel operating in the centre cylinder. 6. The commissioner erred in declaring that the patent granted to Thomas Reiley, January, 1842, was a bar to my claims for the radical divisions in the cylinders. 7. The commissioner erred in declaring in his letter of rejection of the 27th of February, 1850, that the rejected application filed by John Finley in 1838 was a bar to my application. 8. The commissioner has not referred to any propeller made in the same way and manner, nor to any propeller proposing the same combination of the several parts, nor that is composed of so few pieces, or that is so little liable to get out of order, or that has the same action upon the water, or that produces the same effect, or will propel a ship or other vessel so fast with the same amount of power applied, or that will propel a ship across the ocean in so short a time. Neither has the commissioner referred me to any submerged propeller professing identity, similarity, or interference with my invention; consequently his references are irrelevant, and do not apply to the subject-matter under consideration, and therefore his decision is contrary to law, and I therefore pray your honor to reverse it."

The first reason of appeal is "that the reasons assigned by the commissioner for rejecting the application are irrelevant to the subject-matter under consideration, and therefore do not apply." They are therefore no ground for reversing the decision of the commissioner. The supervision of the judge is confined to the points involved by the reasons of appeal. In this reason of appeal no point material to the case is involved. It is immaterial what reasons the commissioner assigned for his decision. His reasons might be insufficient, and yet the decision be correct. Such insufficient reasons are no ground to reverse his decision.

The second reason of appeal is "that the commissioner erred in declaring that the patent granted to James Montgomery, August 7th, 1847, was a bar to the appellant's application." No such declaration of decision was made by the commissioner, and there is no such ground for reversing his decision.

The same answer may be made to the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh reasons of appeal.

The eighth reason of appeal does not involve any point material to the issue in this case.

Mr. Aiken's propeller may possess all the benefits, advantages, and superiority which he claims for it, and yet the decision of the commissioner rejecting his application may be correct. The question is not whether Mr. Aiken's invention is more useful than that of others, but whether it is new and sufficiently useful to justify a patent; and that point is not involved by any of the reasons of appeal. The decision of the commissioner, therefore, in this case is affirmed.

The commissioner, in stating the grounds of his decision to the judge, in writing, in July, 1850, refers to his own letter to the applicant, dated February 27th, 1850, in which the commissioner says: "Your claims to letters-patent for alleged novelties in a submerged propeller have been submitted to a board of examiners, who have decided unanimously that they present nothing essentially new or patentable, and confirm the former decision of this office respecting the same." As this may tend to mislead the public as to the powers of the examiners in the patent office, I deem it proper to say that I have no knowledge of any legal board of examiners in the patent office having power or authority to affirm or reverse the decisions of the commissioner of patents. The powers and authority of the board of examiners provided for in the seventh section of the act of July 4th, 1836, were transferred to the judge by the eleventh section of the act of March 3d, 1839; and so much of the act of 1836 as provided for a board of examiners is repealed by the twelfth section of the act of March 3d, 1839. By the seventh section of the act of 1836, upon the filing of an application, &c., the commissioner is to make, or cause to be made, an examination of the alleged new invention, &c. This examination may be made by the commissioner alone or with the aid of such examiners as he may assign for that business; but he cannot transfer to them, or any of them, his own power to decide. He cannot constitute them a board of examiners, known in law as such. They are but the assistants of the commissioner in the discharge of his duties.

[Appeal by Herrick Aiken from the decision of the commissioner of patents refusing to grant letters patent for an improvement in car wheels. Reversed.]¹

T. Dennis, for appellant.
Senator M. Norris, of counsel.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This is an appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting the claim of the appellant for letters-patent for an improvement in car-wheels for railroads. After this cause was brought before the judge by petition of appeal, and after the commissioner of patents had, on the day assigned for the hearing of the appeal, laid "before him all the original papers and evidence in the case, together with the grounds of his decision fully set forth in writing touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal," Mr. Dennis, in behalf of Mr. Aiken, offered to file a written argument in reply to the commissioner's "grounds of his decision," but the judge refused to permit it to be filed. The grounds of the commissioner's decision and the reasons of appeal, which are to be set forth in writing, are to be confined to the points involved by the reasons of appeal, to which points the hearing and the decision of the judge are to be confined. No reply to the grounds of the commissioner's decision is contemplated by the statute. There must be a finis litium somewhere; and this seems to be implied here, as the statute does not authorize any further proceeding, except the final decision of the judge. No reply can be admitted to the grounds of the commissioner's decision laid before the judge, and no reply can be permitted to be filed in the office to be recorded with the proceedings. The last official act of the commissioner in the cause is to "lay before the judge all the original papers and evidence in the case, together with the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal." The case is no longer before the commissioner. The applicant has no legal right to reply to those grounds. They are before the judge, and not before the commissioner. The litigation is closed as between the appellant and the office. Nothing further can be done in the case in the office until the decision of the judge and his proceedings shall be certified to the commissioner.

The appellant filed in the office the following reasons of appeal: "1. The reasons assigned by the commissioner for rejecting my application are irrelevant to the subject-matter under consideration, and therefore do not apply, and cannot be properly construed to meet the points in the case. 2. The commissioner erred in declaring that the patent granted to J. H. Rodgers in February, 1836, was a bar to my application. 3. The commissioner erred in declaring that the patent granted to William Creed in February, 1843, was a bar to my application. 4. The commissioner erred in declaring that the rejected application of Jacob Newhanny was a bar to my application. 5. The commissioner erred in declaring the rejected application filed by Simeon Bedford was a bar to my application. 6. The commissioner erred in declaring the rejected application of William Compton was a bar to my application. 7. The commissioner erred in declaring the patent granted to James Stimpson was a bar to my application. 8. The commissioner erred in declaring that the various devices which are combined in my wheel—which devices he acknowledges were not all to be found in any one wheel, (see his letter of rejection, March 5th, 1850,) which several devices combined constitute the superiority of my wheel over all others—was not the subject of letters-patent. And he further erred in declaring that those devices, claimed in combination, present nothing which the law recognizes as a (patentable) combination, but merely as substitutions of well-known devices. (See same letter.) 9. The commissioner has not referred me to any wrought-iron car-wheels, nor to any other wheel the several parts of which possess the same advantages in the form and shape of the respective parts composing it, nor to any wheel which has the several parts put together in the same way and manner, nor to any wheel possessing equal strength in proportion to its weight." 1. The first reason of appeal is "that the reasons assigned by the commissioner for rejecting the application are irrelevant, and do not apply." But the reasons given by the commissioner may be insufficient or irrelevant, and yet the decision may be correct. The insufficiency of the commissioner's reasons is not, in itself, evidence that his decision was wrong, and consequently is no ground for reversing it. This answer is also applicable to the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh reasons of appeal. It is also a sufficient answer as to these reasons to say that there were no such decisions made by the commissioner. 8. The eighth reason of appeal is "that the commissioner erred in declaring that the various devices which are combined in my wheel—which devices he acknowledges are not all to be found in any one wheel, (see his letter of rejection,

March 5th, 1850,) which several devices combined constitute the superiority of my wheel over all others—was not the subject of letters-patent. And he further erred in declaring that those devices, claimed in combination, present nothing which the law recognizes as a (patentable) combination, but merely as substitutions of well-known devices." By the seventh section of the act of July 4th, 1836, it is enacted that on the filing of any such application, description, and specification, and the payment of the duty, the commissioner shall make, or cause to be made, an examination of the alleged new invention or discovery; "and if on any such examination it shall not appear to the commissioner that the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had been patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to the application, if the commissioner shall deem it to be sufficiently useful and important, it shall be his duty to issue a patent therefor."

It did not appear upon the examination that the matter for which the patent was claimed by the applicant had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, nor that it had been patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to the application. The decision of the commissioner, therefore, rejecting Mr. Aiken's application must rest only upon the commissioner's opinion that the invention was not "sufficiently useful and important." The degree of usefulness or importance is not described or limited by the statute, nor is it material if it interferes with no prior right or claim, and is in itself innocent. If good may be the result of granting a patent, and evil cannot, I should think it ought to be granted, especially as it is doubtful whether a rejected applicant has any means of having his right to the patent brought before a court of law to be tried by a jury. The decision of the judge upon appeal rejecting the application would seem to be conclusive. Upon examination of Mr. Aiken's specification, models, and drawings, it seems to me that the combination for which he asks a patent, and which in his specification he describes as follows, viz., "the combination of the rim E with the arms D at the ends of the spokes C, by means of the inner flange F and bevel E'," is new and sufficiently useful, and that, as there is no interference, he is entitled to a patent therefor. This decision renders it unnecessary to say anything respecting the ninth reason of appeal.

Case No. 109.

AIKEN v. BEMIS.

[3 Woodb. & M. 348; 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 644.]
Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1847.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—MATERIALS USED—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—DEPOSITIONS—NEW TRIAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—COSTS.

1. A new trial will not be granted on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of evidence, if there was some to be weighed on both sides, unless some clear mistake is shown, or some manifest abuse of power.

[Cited in Whetmore v. Murdock, Case No. 17,509.]

2. Where the action is for a misfeasance in violating a patent, and $2,000 damages are given, the court will not set it aside on the ground that they are excessive, unless they are plainly and largely beyond the injury inflicted.

3. The declarations of a person as an agent, in relation to the business entrusted to him, and made at the time when so entrusted, are competent concerning it in an action by a third person against the principal, as a part of the res gestæ, if they relate to the act clearly.

[Cited in Wilkes v. Dinsman, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 123.]

4. A new trial will be granted for newly discovered evidence, if there was not gross neglect in not procuring it at the first trial, and if it is not merely cumulative. Evidence is cumulative if it relates to the same subordinate or specific fact, to which proof was before adduced of a like character, but not when it is a new fact respecting the general question or point in issue.

[Cited in Whetmore v. Murdock, Case No. 17,509; Bentley v. Phelps, Id. 1,332.]

5. Where depositions or affidavits are taken with notice in conformity to a special order, but when the opposite side was not able to confer with his counsel and attend, they will be admitted with the condition that the opposite party have time to take them over again and cross-examine the witnesses.

6. Costs of the former trial must usually be the terms for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

7. Where a patent for a saw-set describes it as having a hammer of iron with a steel point, and says nothing of any other material or equivalents, and the evidence was, that a hammer entirely of steel had first been tried and abandoned by the patentee, before taking out his letters in this form, doubts exist, whether saw-sets made by the defendant with hammers entirely steel are a violation.

[Cited in Winans v. Denmead, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 347.]

At law. This was an action on the case [Herrick Aiken against S. C. Bemis] for violating a patent of the plaintiff. The letters were averred to have been obtained May 24th, 1830, for "a new and useful improvement on the saw-set," and the infringement to have been made in A. D. 1837 and 1838. At the trial here, at the last May term, before Sprague, J., the patent was given in evidence and described as consisting of a hammer, a shank, a regulating screw and spiral spring. It is not necessary to describe either of them, except that the hammer was to be of iron with a steel point. Much testimony was put in tending to prove that saw-sets similar to this had been known and used a few years before the date of these letters, and other testimony by the plaintiff to raise a presumption that some of the saw-set machines, which, by some of the witnesses of the defendant, were sworn to have been used earlier, were probably made by the plaintiff, after his invention and the maturing of his saw-set, which happened about two years previous to the taking out of his patent. The evidence, showing an infringement by the defendant, proved that the hammers in his saw-sets were all made of steel, and not in part of wrought iron, and that the plaintiff, in experiments made before completing his saw-set, found that steel hammers broke frequently, and wrought iron ones enduring longer, his specification was confined to the last with steel points. The defendant therefore moved for a nonsuit on this ground, which the court refused. The plaintiff then offered further proof that the manufacture by the defendant extended to six or seven hundred dozen, and that the profit on the sale of them was $2.00 per dozen. In the course of this testimony a witness swore that one Call, who made some of these saw-sets, was a foreman for Bemis, and that Call said he had made a certain number of them in all, specifying it, and gave to the witness an order on Bemis for the wages for his work. The admission of this testimony to that statement about the number was objected to, but it was allowed to go to the jury. A verdict was returned for the plaintiff for $2000 damages.

A motion was made for a new trial by the defendant, assigning the following causes. 1. The refusal to nonsuit the plaintiff for the variance in the hammer described in the specification, from that hammer made by Bemis. 2. The admission of Call's declarations as to the number of saw-sets made by Bemis. 3. The damages being excessive. 4. The verdict being against the weight of evidence. 5. Newly discovered evidence since the trial.

The affidavits as to the newly discovered evidence were numerous. The oath of the defendant showed that this new evidence not known before the trial, though one of the witnesses was named in the notice of the defense, thinking that as a mechanic, he was likely to know something of the subject. But he was not talked with nor summoned. A portion of the other witnesses resided at distances not very remote from the defendant. The substance of the newly discovered evidence was in depositions taken under an order requiring notice to be given to the opposite party. Their use was objected to by the plaintiff, because the notice was so short, that his counsel were unable to see him or confer together before the time arrived, and to reach the place of taking them seasonably.

But the court, on being satisfied no unfairness was intended by the defendant in the notice, stated that the depositions would be admitted conditionally, as they came within the order. In this class of inquiries they might, without a special order, always be ex parte. But the court said, that, if admitted, time would be allowed to the plaintiff, under the circumstances, to take the depositions over again, and cross-examine the witnesses, if he desired it. The plaintiff concluded to proceed without doing this. Among the new witnesses was Ealim Stebbins, who testified to seeing a saw-set like this, except brass for iron in the guards, as early as 1820, at Goodnow's, and another, belonging to D. B. Perkins, afterwards. Another witness was D. B. Perkins, who swore to seeing one like this as early as 1816, in Waterville, Me., one in Lancaster, N. H., in 1826, and one bought in Connecticut in 1828. The next new witness was Jethro Latham, who testified to buying another saw-set, like this in principle, between 1824 and 1826, in Rhode Island. Another new witness, O. Dickerson, testified to seeing in 1828 a different, but in some respects similar saw-set. Another, A. Blanchard, swore to the making, by himself and brother, in Palmer, Mass., of a like saw-set in 1826. It was constructed from a description given by his brother. He swore to another made in Springfield, by two machinists, in 1823 or 1825. Eli Parsons testified that he bought another similar one at Springfield in 1827. Horace Lee swore to another still in 1820, in Hartford, Conn., and Dyer White to another, less like the plaintiff's in form, but with some such principles, made by him in 1819.

The motion was argued at an adjourned session in September, 1847, by Bates and B. R. Curtis in its favor, and Hayes and J. P. Hale against it.

Before WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. It may not be amiss for the benefit of these parties, to notice all the grounds assigned here for a new trial, though we decide the question only on one of them. The cause relied on as to the damages being excessive, is not so clearly made out as to justify the setting aside of a verdict in an action for misfeasance. The case might be different in a suit on a contract, as there the rule of damages is more certain. Some of the data in favor of this large amount of damages in the present case, were rather loose, even for a misfeasance, but the sum given in this class of cases must be plainly exorbitant, or what is sometimes called "outrageous," to require the interference of the court. Allen v. Blunt, [Case No. 217,] and Taylor v. Carpenter, [Id. 13,785,] and cases there cited. [Leeman v. Allen,] 2 Wils, 160; [Beardmore v. Carrington,] Id. 244; [Coffin v. Coffin,] 4 Mass. 43; [Bodwell v. Osgood,]

3 Pick. 385; [Shute v. Barrett,] 7 Pick. 82; Washburn v. Gould, [Case No. 17,214.]

Another of the causes assigned for a new trial is, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Though this is sustained by some plausible appearances, it is not shown so clearly as to raise a strong presumption that the jury either wantonly abused their powers, or made some inadvertent mistake. These last are the leading tests in such cases. Fearing v. De Wolf, [Case No. 4,711,] [Wendell v. Safford,] 12 N. H. 171; [Jackson v. Loomis,] 12 Wend. 27; [Baker v. Briggs,] 8 Pick. 122. And where evidence existed on both sides which was material, and to be compared or weighed, as it did here, the finding of the jury is not to be disturbed, though the court would have come to a different conclusion upon it from that of the jury. See the cases cited in Fearing v. De Wolf, [Case No. 4,711,] and May [Macy] v. De Wolf, [Id. 8,933,] [Cunningham v. Magoun,] 18 Pick. 13; [Coffin v. Phenix Ins. Co.,] 15 Pick. 291; [Fowler v. Aetna Fire Ins. Co.,] 7 Wend. 270; 1 Sumn. 451, [Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co., Case No. 262,] [Wendell v. Safford,] 12 N. H. 179.

But the other reasons assigned for a new trial are of a different character, are supposed to be errors in law, and rest on exceptions entirely disconnected with the finding, or the opinion of the jury. One is a question arising on the refusal of the court, in the progress of the trial, to nonsuit the plaintiff on account of a variance between his specification and the form or substance of the machine, which was considered as an encroachment on the patent. It is well settled that if the machine used by the defendant differed materially from that described in the patent, it is not an infringement. Davoll v. Brown, [Case No. 3,662,] Webst. Pat. 11; [Brunton v. Hawkes,] 4 Barn. & Ald. 540. Where the patent is for a new combination, and not for newly invented parts, a violation must extend to the whole. [Prouty v. Ruggles,] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 341. The present was a case of the former character, for a combination, and the difference in the patent from the instrument here, consists in this—that the hammer of the saw-set was all made of steel by Bemis, and that all but the point was made of wrought iron in the patent. This locks, at the first blush, as not a very material difference, and one rather colorable or accidental, than designed. 1 Sumn. 485, [Ames v. Howard, Case No. 326,] [Heath v. Unwin,] 13 Mees. & W. 592; Phil. Pat. 372; Pet. C. C. 394, [Gray v. James, Case No. 5,718,] But when we advert to the evidence in the case, it appears that the use of wrought iron was found by experiments to be much better than steel, and was hence patented, and this, without making the specification in terms broad enough to cover steel also. It is a matter of doubt, therefore, whether the use of an inferior material for the hammer of the saw-set, when the patent covers only a superior one, is a legal violation of it. Why should the plaintiff complain of what he had tried but deemed too useless or valueless to be adopted? Had the patent extended only to the form or parts of the saw-set, combined as set out, and made of any kind of materials, or saying nothing as to the materials, the right would be violated by a machine of like form, as the form would be the sole matter patented. But when the patentee chooses to go farther, and cover, with his patent, the material of which a part of his machine is composed, he entirely endangers his right to prosecute when a different and inferior material is employed, and especially one, which he himself, after repeated experiments, had rejected. Webst. Pat. 27; [Electric Tel. Co. v. Nott,] 4 Man. G. & S. 462; 4 Mason, 1, [Earle v. Sawyer, Case No. 4,247,] [Lewis v. Davis,] 3 Car. & P. 502. The form of the specification in this case, extending to the material at all, was ill-advised, and especially so, without adding, as is usual, if made of any other material in the form and combination described. Webst. Pat. 20; [Prouty v. Draper,] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 341; [Brunton v. Hawkes,] 4 Barn. & Ald. 540. But we do not now decide this case on this point, being inclined, if practicable, to let the parties settle their rights on the merits as to the originality of the patent.

Another exception in law to the ruling of the court, is the admission of the declarations of Call. The ground on which their admission was sought to be justified, seems to be that Call was the agent of Bemis, and the declarations of the agent will often bind the principal. This ground is sound whenever the person is proved to have been agent in that particular business, and made the declarations while engaged in it, and in relation to it. They then become a part of the res gestae, and bind the principal as if made by himself. [U. S. v. Gooding,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 468; [Sundry Goods, etc., v. U. S.,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 364; Story, Ag. § 134; [Haynes v. Rutter,] 24 Pick. 245. I am inclined to think here, that, in truth, these declarations were made under such circumstances. But their admission being an exception to the general rule, that a party is not to be affected by the declarations of third persons, it would have been well to have shown with more distinctness, whether Call's agency extended to this particular business, and whether the declarations were made when he was engaged in it, and not afterwards. 2 Starkie, Ev. 60; Greenl. Ev. 144; Phil. Ev. 103; [Enos v. Tuttle,] 3 Conn. 250; [Sessions v. Little,] 9 N. H. 271; [Pool v. Bridges,] 4 Pick. 378; [Allen v. Duncan,] 11 Pick. 309.

Passing by this last fact as not so clear either way, as to be decisive of the motion,

I proceed to the other cause for a new trial, growing out of the new discovery of material evidence since the trial. On that, it is thought proper the jury should have an opportunity to deliberate, at least once, before disposing finally of the rights of these parties. The rules as to such evidence, when sufficient or not, to require a new trial, were fully considered and explained in Macy v. De Wolf, [Case No. 8,933.] The limitations are that—1. The evidence must not have been known before the trial. [Doe v. Roe,] 1 Johns. Cas. 402; [Vandervoort v. Smith,] 2 Caines, 155. 2. It must be material. 2 Wash. C. C. 411, [Marshall v. Union Ins. Co., Case No. 9,134.] 3. It must not be merely cumulative. [People v. Superior Court of City of New York,] 10 Wend. 285.

There is no doubt here, that most of this new evidence has been discovered since the trial, and, indeed, a part of it since the motion. This is sworn to and not contradicted. It is true, that in the notice given one of the witnesses was referred to before the trial, as likely to know something on the subject, and others resided near the parties. But the testimony is, that it was not then known whether any of them could in truth testify to what is material. Nor was that known as to some, even when this motion for a new trial was made. Next did the defendant employ due diligence? In a case like this, where the transactions or matter to be proved about similar saw-sets in use was of such long standing, being twenty years or more old, and where the defendant was not a party to them, nor supposed to possess any peculiar or previous knowledge of them, I do not see sufficient ground for imputing to him such negligence as should bar him from using this evidence. See cases in Fearing v. De Wolf. [Case No. 4,711.] And so far from excluding him from the use of any new evidence not discovered when the motion for a new trial was made, but ascertained before the hearing of the motion, and before judgment, certainly when the motion, as here, is broad enough in form, and early enough by our rules, the new evidence ought in justice to be considered and weighed with the rest. It may be regarded as a breach of the rule concerning the proof being newly discovered, that if evidence was not, in fact, known before the other trial, but ought to have been, and probably would have been by the exercise of due diligence, a new trial should not be awarded in consequence of it. It is true here, also, that the new witnesses did not reside very remote. But it is not shown that the defendant knew previously what they could testify, or had any special reason to suppose they were able to give useful testimony. And so far as he might suppose, on general facts and reasoning, that most mechanics would be likely to know something of the subject, he certainly seems to have resorted to enough of them, and used the testimony of enough at the trial to show due diligence, so far as required by any general information or duty. Nor can there be any question here that the new evidence is material. It goes to the very gist of the claim of the plaintiff, the originality of his patent. It goes, likewise, to several new saw-sets, similar in structure, testified to have been in use some years earlier, besides strengthening the old testimony, as to some of the old saw-sets proved at the former trial. The ends of justice, therefore, render it proper that a jury should, once at least, pass upon this testimony between these parties, as to saw-sets not sworn to, nor known before, unless it is what the law regards as merely cumulative. For it is, as before named, the last and an important condition, as to newly discovered evidence, that it be not merely cumulative. This means, that it be not heaping up farther proof as to the same point or fact, on which evidence was before offered. If it only serve to strengthen such old point or fact, and not to introduce any new one to the jury, a new trial is not allowable on account of it.

The only difficulty under this rule is, what must be considered, in this case, a new point or fact, and what is merely cumulative, as to an old one. When, as here, the general defense is placed on the ground that the patent of the plaintiff was not original, the meaning of the rule cannot be to exclude, as cumulative, newly discovered evidence of subordinate points or facts bearing on that general question. For in such a view, no new trial for new evidence could ever be obtained, all new evidence relating, as it must, if it be pertinent, to the general ground or general fact, put in issue before. But it must mean that new evidence to a subordinate point or fact is not competent when that subordinate point or particular fact was before gone into, because it is then cumulative or additional as to that fact. For example, here it would be a new point or fact, that a similar saw-set had been known and used in Hartford, Conn., in 1820, by the witness Lee, because nothing was proved in respect to that saw-set before. But it would not be a new point or fact, that a similar saw-set was known and used in Springfield, in 1827, by Parsons, because the point or fact was before gone into by the evidence, and further proof as to that would be merely cumulative. Much of this new evidence being then as to subordinate points and particular facts not before agitated, cannot be regarded as cumulative. [People v. Superior Court of City of New York,] 10 Wend. 285; [Porter v. Talcott,] 1 Cow. 359, 382; [Randolph v. Inhabitants of Easton,] 23 Pick. 248; [Guyot v. Butts,] 4 Wend. 579. See the precedents on this in Macy v. De Wolf, [Case No. 8,933;] [Warren v. Hope,] 6 Greenl. 479; 1 Sumn. 451, [Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co., Case No. 262;] 1 Sumn. 482, 491, [Ames v. Howard, Case No. 326;] [People v. Superior Court of City of New York,] 10

Wend. 204; [Gardner v. Mitchell,] 6 Pick. 114; [Parker v. Hardy,] 24 Pick. 246-248. The new particular facts or cases of the prior use of such a saw-set sworn to, are on the face of the affidavits very striking and numerous. They may all be disproved or contradicted at the trial, but they are proper to be brought to such a test. They make out, prima facie, one of the strongest cases to be found in the history of new trials for this cause, and require us, therefore, to grant the motion. But in these cases of new trials for newly discovered evidence, the terms are usually that the costs of the former trial be first paid. See the cases in Fearing v. De Wolf, [Case No. 4,711.] Another reason for such terms here is the near residence of the new witnesses and not obtaining them before. Though some other causes seem to unite in rendering a new trial just, yet as this is the principal and decisive one, we think those costs ought first to be paid, unless the defendant can offer some satisfactory reason for different terms. If no such reason be offered during the session, the new trial will be allowed on paying such costs.

Case No. 110.

AIKEN v. DOLAN

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 197; Merw. Pat. Inv. 95.]
Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June, 1867.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ASSIGNMENT—EQUITABLE TITLE—REISSUE—ANTICIPATION—SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENTS—DISCLAIMER.

1. An assignment of a patent for a knitting needle "to be applied exclusively to the knitting or construction of harnesses for looms, and for other purposes," obviously means harnesses for looms and harnesses for other purposes.

2. Where H. agreed with A. that upon the fulfillment of certain conditions, he, H., would assign to A. the extended term of certain letters patent, if the same should be extended: Held: That if the conditions had been fulfilled A. would have become the equitable owner of the extended term.

3. The conditions not having been fulfilled, the former ownership, legal and equitable, was continued as to third parties, and justice does not even require that a decree should be made without prejudice to the rights of A.

4. Whether, under such circumstances, A. ought not to have been made a party complainant or defendant to a bill filed by the assignees of H. to restrain a third party from infringement, quære.

5. The decision of the commissioner, extending letters patent, could not have been made without proof that the patentee had not derived a fair profit from his invention during the first part of the original term.

6. Such decision, having been made after public notice and official investigation, shows that throughout the United States he was generally considered, as he was still considered at the patent office, the first inventor.

7. Although the work and product of a prior knitting needle may have been imperfect, yet if both work and product were seen by persons who have not yet lost the recollection of them, and more than one of the needles, and a machine by which some of them were made, have been preserved to the present day, this would constitute a sufficient prior knowledge by others to prevent a subsequent invention from being new.

[Cited in Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Julien Electric Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 131.]

[See Albright v. Celluloid Harness Trimming Co., Case No. 147.]

8. An improvement, though depending upon a change of form, may be, in purpose and effect, a change in a material part of a process of manufacture, and patentable.

9. An invention may be good which remedies a theoretical defect, although no injurious effects have been observed in practice.

10. The original model, deposited in the patent office, may be examined for the purpose of solving any doubt raised by an inspection of the drawings.

11. Where claim was for "the application of a latch or tongue applied to the hook of the needle, and operated as herein described," and the specification stated that the needle was constructed "in the general form shown in the drawings," and it appeared that needles with a latch or tongue and hook were not new, but that needles with a certain curved swell shown in the drawings, but not otherwise referred to in the specification, were new: Held: That if the knowledge of needles without this swell had been universal or general, the declaration that the needle was constructed "in the general form shown in the drawings" might have sufficed to restrain the claim to needles made with a swell; but, it appearing that the knowledge of the primitive needle, though sufficient to defeat a subsequent patent, was very limited, the claim was broader than the invention. This defect might be cured by disclaimer.

12. The complainant by his counsel, proposing, at the hearing to disclaim any construction of a needle which has not the curved swell or its equivalent: Held: That such a disclaimer would deprive the complainant of all right to recover costs in the pending suit, but that there might be a decree for perpetual injunction, each party to pay his own costs, without any actual previous disclaimer of record in the patent office.

13. The defendant having, by the curvature of the swell of his needle, at least partially adopted the patented improvement, both in theory and practice, was adjudged to have infringed the patent.

In equity. This was a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendant from infringing letters patent [No. 6,025] for an "improvement in knitting needles," granted to James Hibbert, January 9, 1849, extended to Peleg Hull, administrator of James Hibbert, deceased, for seven years from January 9, 1863, and on April 22, 1863, assigned to complainant.

Two preliminary questions arose upon two papers executed during the original term of the patent. One of them was an assignment by the patentee in June, 1853, to Darius C. Brown, the granting clause of which was as follows:

"Now this indenture witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum hereinafter mentioned, I have assigned, sold, and set over unto the said Darius C. Brown, all the right, title, and interest which I have in said invention, as secured to me by said letters patent in these United States, to be applied exclusively to the knitting or construction of harnesses for looms, and for other purposes. The same to be held and enjoyed by the said Darius C. Brown for his own use and behoof, and for the use and behoof of his legal representatives and no others, to the full end of the term for which said letters patent are or may be granted."

The other paper was a contract between Peleg Hull, the administrator of Hibbert, and Herrick Aiken, and was, in full, as follows:

"This agreement made and entered into this twenty-third day of September, in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-two, by and between Peleg Hull, of the city and county of Providence, and state of Rhode Island, administrator of the estate of James Hibbert, late of said Providence, deceased, of the first part, and Herrick Aiken, of Franklin, in the county of Merrimack, and state of New Hampshire, of the second part, witnesseth:

"Whereas, the said James Hibbert did, in his lifetime, to wit: on the ninth day of January, A. D. eighteen hundred and forty-nine, obtain letters patent of the United States for an improvement in knitting needles, which letters patent are now about to expire. And whereas, said Peleg Hull, party of the first part, was duly appointed and qualified according to the laws of said state of Rhode Island, administrator of the estate of said James Hibbert, deceased. And whereas, the said Herrick Aiken, party of the second part, is desirous of purchasing the extension or extended term of said letters patent, if an extension of said letters patent can be obtained, and is willing to pay all expenses of every nature and description of obtaining the same, provided the extended term of said letters patent is assigned to him on the terms and conditions hereinafter stated and agreed to.

"Now this agreement witnesseth, that in consideration of one dollar by each of said parties to the other paid, and of other good and sufficient considerations, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said parties covenant and agree to and with each other in the manner following, that is to say: First. The said Peleg Hull, administrator aforesaid, party of the first part, agrees to sign all papers, make all affidavits, and do all other lawful acts and things as may be deemed necessary and requisite by counsel in applying for and obtaining an extension of the term of the said letters patent; and when the said extension shall be obtained, to assign the said extended term of said letters patent (within twenty days from the date of said extension) to said Herrick Aiken, the party of the second part, or his legal representatives. Second. The said Herrick Aiken, party of the second [part] agrees to pay all expenses of every nature and description incurred or to be incurred in applying for and obtaining an extension of the said letters patent, provided the said extended term of said letters patent is assigned to him or his legal representatives as aforesaid. And he hereby discharges said party of the first part, and his heirs and representatives, from all liability for any part of the expense incurred in applying for said extension, provided said extension is not granted. Third. The said Herrick Aiken, party of the second part, hereby agrees to pay said Peleg Hull, administrator aforesaid, party of the first part, upon the obtaining and the assigning to said Aiken or his representatives the extended term of said letters patent, and at the times and in the manner following, the sum of twenty-four hundred dollars, viz: six hundred dollars upon delivery of the assignment of said extension of said letters patent; six hundred dollars in six months from the date of the delivery of said assignment; six hundred dollars in twelve months from the date of delivery of said assignment; and six hundred dollars in eighteen months from the date of the delivery of said assignment; and said Peleg Hull, administrator aforesaid, agrees to accept the said sum in the manner aforesaid, in full for said extended term of said letters patent.

"In testimony whereof, said parties have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"Peleg Hull, [Seal.]

"Herrick Aiken, [Seal.]"

The nature of the invention is fully set forth in the opinion. The claim of the patent was as follows:

"What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the application of a latch or tongue applied to the hook of the needle, and operated as herein described."

Injunction granted.

Charles Sergeant, Henry Baldwin, Jr., and Causten Browne, for complainant.

John B. Gest, E. Spencer Miller, and Furman Sheppard, for defendant.

CADWALADER, District Judge. There have been two objections to the complainant's derivation of title from Hibbert, the patentee. One of them is founded upon the assignment to Darius C. Brown of all right, title, and interest in the invention "to be applied exclusively to the knitting or construction of harnesses for looms and for other purposes." This obviously meant harnesses for looms, and harnesses for other purposes. The objection, therefore, cannot be sustained. The other objection depends upon the effect of the agreement of September 23, 1862. I will consider this question as it would have been presented if the paper had been produced or its loss proved, and it had been duly verified.

If Herrick Aiken had fulfilled the conditions of this agreement, he would have become the equitable owner of the extended term. But, as he does not appear to have, in any wise, fulfilled them, the former ownership, legal and equitable, has continued as to third persons, if not as between the parties themselves. Justice does not even require that a decree should be made expressly without prejudice to the rights of Herrick Aiken, because, if he has any rights, legal or equitable, in what may be recoverable through this litigation, the complainant will be accountable to him without any such saving clause in the decree. In the mean time, the complainant is the sole party entitled, in the first instance, to redress from other persons. If the right of action had, on the contrary, been divided into fractional shares between the parties to the agreement, the defendant should not have been harassed by a suit in which they were not all made parties. The present is not such a case. Nevertheless, my first impression was that Herrick Aiken ought, according to the rules of procedure in equity, to have been made a party complainant or defendant; and independently of the question of verification, I still have some doubt upon the point. It is to be regretted that the objection has not been removed by amendment. For this, it is perhaps not too late, even now, to apply, if the complainant is desirous to prevent a recurrence of the question in the court of appeal.

The case will next be considered upon the merits of Hibbert's claim to have been the inventor of the latch needle as an optional substitute for the former spring-hook needle in knitting machines. The latch needle has not altogether superseded the spring-hook needle. Both are in use; and the spring-hook needle, though more fragile, may be a preferable implement in the manufacture of certain fabrics of the finer kind. The hook of the latch needle is rigid. The spring-hook needle is hollowed at the proper point for the reception of the end of the hook when depressed. Of this hollow space, and of the machine by which it was made, drawings were published more than a century ago. The hollow thus formed was, long before Hibbert's patent, designated in print as a longitudinal groove. It acquired, however, in the latch needle, the more distinct character of such a groove. In this needle, a pivot passes across the groove through each side of it. On this pivot the latch turns freely, lengthwise, in opposite directions toward and from the hook. It is thus turned by the loop of yarn passing forward and backward. This alternating longitudinal motion of the latch is arrested in the former direction by the hook, and in the latter direction by the termination of the groove into which the latch falls back. The specification of Hibbert's patent stated that the latch needle was designed to work on the knitting frames theretofore used. It has been objected that the specification does not describe the adaptation of this needle to knitting machines. To this objection a sufficient answer is that he claimed only the invention of a new and improved knitting needle, and not the invention of any adaptation of this improved implement. The latch needles are to this day bought and sold, and imported from abroad, separately from the knitting machine, as the spring-hook needles are, and had previously been. There is no reason to doubt that Hibbert honestly believed himself the first inventor of the latch needle. There is evidence tending to refer the date of his invention to the year 1846. Its true date certainly was not later than 1847. His patent was issued January 9, 1849. The introduction of latch needles into general use was, in the language of the answer in this case, "obstructed, perhaps, and retarded by the necessity of altering machines, changing the nature of the fabrics, and, in some measure, by the doubts and prejudices of manufacturers." But as the answer states, the manufacture and use of such needles gradually increased in extent until 1852, and having by this time become general, afterward increased more rapidly, "causing the alteration of machines and of fabrics to suit" them, etc. The testimony shows that this more rapid increase did not begin till after 1853, and that it may probably have been due mainly to improved adaptations of knitting machines. On December 29, 1862, it was decided by the commissioner of patents to extend Hibbert's exclusive privilege for seven years after the expiration of the first term of fourteen years, and it was extended accordingly. This decision could not have been made without proof that he had not derived a fair profit from his invention during the first part of the original term. The decision, having been made after public notice and official investigation, shows that throughout the United States he was generally considered, as he still was considered by the patent office, the first inventor. This belief may have been confirmed by the knowledge that in February, 1849, the month next after that in which his original patent had been issued, the invention was patented in England to another person as a novelty there. For some time after this extension, the rights of Hibbert appear to have been generally recognized in the United States. A person who, since 1853, has constructed "perhaps 1,000" machines for latch needles, took, in 1864, a license for making and using needles, under Hibbert's patent, at a certain rate or toll. At the date of the answer in this case (September 6, 1866), an opposition to the patent seems to have been more or less organized. At this time there were, according to the answer, some forty or fifty manufactories in the city of Philadelphia alone, which worked with latch needles, and employed with them from ten to fifteen thousand hands.

Hibbert's invention thus appears to have been original, whether the subject of it was new or not. What has been stated suffices to show that the subject had not been generally known or used either in the United States or in England. From all the proofs in the cause, moreover, it fully appears that the latch needle had never been used with profitable results in either country, certainly not in the United States. The needle and its use may, nevertheless, have been sufficiently known to a few persons to prevent it from being new. The improbability of this may diminish when we recur to the causes which prevented the invention from becoming profitable during several years next after the date of the patent.

A latch needle, according to the general description heretofore given, had been devised by Jeandeau in France, where he obtained a patent for it in 1806. His description of it was published in a printed book in 1831. How far such needles were afterward made and used on the continent of Europe, it would be useless to inquire, because they certainly were made and experimentally used in the United States a great many years before 1846. In one prior instance, at least, they were openly used in making an experimental fabric. The work and its product were imperfect; but both work and product were seen by persons who have not lost the recollection of them; and more than one of the needles, and a machine by which some of them were made, have been preserved to the present day. This was a sufficient prior knowledge by others to prevent the subsequent invention of Hibbert from being new. I have, therefore, not fully considered the objections which have been urged against Jeandeau's description of his invention, though I have not as yet been convinced of their sufficiency.

If the case rested here, the bill must be dismissed. But three questions remain for consideration: 1. Whether Hibbert was not the first inventor of a distinct patentable improvement of the primitive latch needle; 2. Whether, and how, his actual patent can be sustained as to this improvement; and, 3. Whether his limited right to it has been infringed.

I. The primitive latch needle, not only that of Jeandeau, but likewise that made and used as above in the United States, was formed without any elevation or swell at the middle of the groove, and without any depression beyond the pivot to that extremity of the groove which is furthest from the hook. At this extremity of the groove, where the latch falls back, the end of the latch must, in order that the loop may pass under it and raise it, be above the surface of the needle. This remark applies both to the primitive latch needle, already described, and to the improved latch needle hereafter described. But from this cause, in the primitive needle, the end of the latch when at this extremity of the groove, had necessarily a projection upward from the surface of the needle. Now, in the primitive needle, the yarn when passing backward from the hook, was held down to the surface, first of the needle and afterward of the latch, and was thus, on reaching the projecting end of the latch at the furthest extremity of the groove, jerked over the projection, with more or less of shock immediately following tension. The strain, with shock, must thus have occurred after every stitch. Whether any consequent injurious effect was externally perceptible in the texture of the fabric, is uncertain. There may have been none thus perceptible. But, however this may have been, there certainly was here, in theory, a defect in the operation of the primitive needle—a defect which it certainly was desirable to remedy. A needle of this primitive form was represented in the drawing which accompanied Hibbert's caveat, filed in the confidential archives of the patent office. The date of this caveat was March 31, 1847. In the course of the summer of 1847, Hibbert, when at work in a manufactory of coarse hosiery, made or caused to be made, latch needles with a curved elevation, since called a swell, which was highest at the middle of the groove, and with such a corresponding elevation of the pivot that the end of the latch was depressed when it fell back at that extremity of the groove where the latch of the primitive needle had projected upward. The curvature of the swell was determined so as to effect this depression of the latch with a sufficient longitudinal extension of the latch beyond the furthest extremity of the groove to receive the returning thread underneath. The remedy of the former defect was thus, in theory, complete. The improvement, though depending upon a change in form, was, in purpose and effect, a change in a material part of the process of manufacture. Tension of the yarn occurred at the swell, but was graduated so as to avoid shock. The witness, Emerson, has verified not only one of these working needles which has been preserved, but also a blank, as it is called, of another one, that is to say, an unfinished needle, with the swell prepared for the process by which the groove was to have been made. He states expressly that he commenced making such needles in June, 1847, and continued making them until October, 1847. The earliest construction of a needle with such a swell by any other person was at a later period in that year. Emerson, who worked by the hour for the hosiery company by whom Hibbert was employed, is explicit as to the date of the summer of 1847. Two other witnesses depose not less explicitly to the making of such needles by Hibbert. One of them says it was in the summer of 1846, and fixes the time by a visit of the third witness to Squam and Cape Ann during that summer. The latter witness deposes that it was in the month of June, immediately after the battles of the Rio Grande, and that he did not know whether it was 1846 or 1847, adding: "I went to Cape Ann on a visit immediately after those battles, and what fixes it in my mind is, the old gentleman whom I visited was much taken up with the matter, and could talk of nothing else; he was very patriotic; and during my stay at Cape Ann, there was one of those needles made and put in the loom." It is to be observed that though the first battles on the Rio Grande occurred in May, 1846, yet, in the following year the campaigns elsewhere in Mexico were probably of quite equal interest to the witness's talkative patriotic friend, and that the witness himself says he does not know whether the year was 1846 or 1847. I would have some difficulty in reconciling 1846 with Hibbert's drawing, which accompanied the caveat of March 31, 1847. There is no such difficulty if we apply the testimony of these two witnesses to the year 1847. Thus understood, they confirm Emerson, and he confirms their statements. The specification of Hibbert's patent was prepared afterward. It stated that he constructed his needle in the general form shown in drawings, all of which represent a needle with such a curved swell. He thus appears, upon the proofs, to have unquestionably been the first inventor of such an improved latch needle. But independently of any question as to the legal sufficiency of the specification, the respondent has relied on the drawings accompanying it as showing an upward projection of the end of the latch greater than consists with his having had the conception of any true theory of this improvement. The drawings were sketched very roughly; and without a comparison of them with the model in the patent office, there might possibly have been some little doubt under this head. The doubt is precisely such a one as a model may properly resolve. The model has been produced. Upon a first inspection of it the doubt seemed to be increased rather than removed, for the latch did not fall back to the bottom of the groove. An examination showed, however, that the latch has not now the free turn, or sweep back, described in the specification. This want of free play in the latch was evidently occasioned by an accidental compression of the groove. The cause of the compression was apparent externally. The latch, when it was gently forced down to the bottom of the groove, where it would have dropped back, if the play were free, had no upward projection. Nor had the latch in the needle produced by Emerson, in which the play was free. The accidental condition of the model is unimportant. Its normal condition is quite obvious, and when properly considered, removes any doubt which the drawings might otherwise have suggested.

II. But when the actual invention is thus referred to this improvement alone, the claim in the specification is too broad. It states that the invention consists in the application of the latch or tongue in connection with the hook of the needle, sweeping freely back and forth upon the center pin. The general operation of a latch needle is described, without any specific restriction to the form represented in the drawings. Then follow the words: "What I claim as my invention is the application of a latch or tongue applied to the hook of the needle, and operated as herein described." If the knowledge of latch needles of the primitive form had been universal, or even general, among those best acquainted with the use of knitting machines, the declaration that he constructed his needle in the general form shown in the drawings, might perhaps have sufficed to restrain the claim to the specific improvement in the curved needles exemplified in the form with a swell, and including, of course, other curvatures of equivalent effect. But this interpretation is both morally and legally inadmissible. According to the proofs of the state of the art at that period, the knowledge of the primitive latch needle, though quite sufficient to defeat a subsequent patent, was very limited—so limited as to exclude all possibility of the inference of any general knowledge on the subject. The patent is therefore broader than the actual novelty of the invention. By a proper disclaimer of the invention of latch needles without any such curvature, the patent would, however, be sustainable for the actual improvement. The complainant proposes, through his counsel, to disclaim any construction of a latch needle which has not a swell or its equivalent substantially as shown in the drawings, and to repeat, in the words of the original specification, that what he claims as the invention of the patentee is the application of the latch or tongue, etc., operated as therein described. The effect of such a disclaimer will be to deprive the complainant of all right to recover costs in the present suit. But a court of equity sometimes considers that which might and ought to be done as having already been done. There may, therefore, be a decree for a perpetual injunction, each party to pay his own costs, without any actual previous disclaimer of record in the patent office. According to the decision of the supreme court in O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 121, it might perhaps be supposed that I should go further, and, before any actual disclaimer, decree an account, or order an issue quantum damnificatus. But I do not think that a court, whose decision is liable to revision upon appeal, should, in such a case, make any decree beyond the perpetual injunction without an actual disclaimer previously recorded in the patent office. In the present stage of the case, therefore, I can do no more than award the injunction, with leave to disclaim, and afterward to move for such further order for an account, etc., as may be deemed proper. Whether an injunction shall be thus awarded depends upon the decision of the third question.

III. Has the defendant infringed the complainant's rights, restricted, as they are, to the specific improvement invented? It will be recollected that the latch needle with a curved swell was used by Hibbert in the manufacture of the coarsest fabrics. Instead of a curved elevation, thus highest where the pivot crosses the groove, the latch needles afterward used for finer work had a curved depression beyond the pivot, toward the extremity of the groove which is furthest from the hook. For the prevention of shock or jerk at the end of the latch, this depression was, in effect, a mere equivalent for the swell. In the application of this remark, the comparison must be with the primitive latch needle. The curved depression was, in another respect, an improvement upon the swell. This improvement consisted in maintaining a more equal tension of the yarn.

The defendant objects that the needle with a swell was unfit for the manufacture of finer fabrics; that for all fabrics the swell was a positive disadvantage instead of an improvement, and that the curved depression is altogether different, and was a real improvement. He admits and justifies his use of latch needles with the latter curvature. On examining these needles, their curvature appears to have been so determined as to become a precise equivalent for the swell in preventing an upward projection of the end of the latch at the extremity of the groove furthest from the hook. Assuming the correctness of his objection to the swell, and of his assertion of the superiority of the depression, these are not absolute, but relative differences between the effects of the two curvatures. The latter curvature was at least a partial adoption of the patented improvement, both in theory and in practice, and was therefore an infringement. The defendant has also used other latch needles with just such a curved swell as the drawings of Hibbert's patent exhibit. This he justifies or excuses upon the allegation that the swell was a mere objectionable excrescence, caused by the method of making the needles. In the language of his principal witness, they are made by swedging out the slit or groove, instead of sawing it out. He describes this process of swedging, and how it may produce the bulge or swell upward. The argument hereupon is, that by filing down the swell, the needles, though impaired in strength, might be more useful for certain kinds of work. To all such arguments, upon the mere question of infringement, the ordinary answer would suffice. Let the swell be filed off, and the needle, without it, may be used. It is not necessary, therefore, to inquire whether the spring needle might not be preferable for such work as would require the swell to be filed out.

But, upon this part of the case, I was, during the second argument, very desirous to learn whether, before Hibbert's patent, spring needles had been made with such a bulge or curvature. They are now sometimes made with it, and if this had occurred before the patent, I was not quite certain whether it might not, perhaps, with reference to the phraseology of the specification, have some legal operation upon the effect of the complainant's proposed disclaimer. It now appears that spring needles were, of old, made with a lateral or outward bulge; but it has not appeared that they ever had a bulge or swell upward. The inquiry, therefore, does not arise; and this part of the case depends upon the question of infringement alone. Upon this question the argument for the defendant can not be sustained. He should, therefore, be enjoined against making or using any such needles as those of which specimens are exhibited on the paper annexed to the deposition of John Taylor, and against using any needles of such a curvature as to depress the end of the latch where it falls back at the extremity of the groove furthest from the hook, or any curvature of equivalent effect.

Case No. 111.

AIKEN v. EDRINGTON et al.

[15 N. B. R. 271.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. Nov., 1876.

BANKRUPTCY — RIGHTS OF STRANGERS — EQUAL EQUITIES — ASSIGNEE AS AGENT FOR CREDITORS — PLEADING.

[1. E., Sr., desiring to screen his property from creditors, advanced money to pay off certain mortgages, the mortgagee, by procurement of E., Sr., transferred the mortgage debts and security to E., Jr., who was adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of his creditors, and the assignee in bankruptcy foreclosed the mortgages and received the proceeds. Complainant, an assignee of a judgment creditor of E., Sr., claimed such proceeds as the property of E., Sr. Held, that the bill was not demurrable in failing to allege that complainant was the owner of his demand at the time of the fraudulent transfer, he being entitled to all the rights of his assignor in the premises.]

[2. In such case the creditors of E., Jr., could not be affected by any secret trust on his part for the benefit of E., Sr.; and their equities with respect to the fund in the hands of the assignee being equal to those of the creditors of E., Sr., and the mere fact that such fund was in the hands of the assignee amounting to an appropriation thereof to the use of the creditors of the bankrupt, E., Jr., they could not be compelled to surrender the same in favor of complainant.]

[3. An assignee in bankruptcy, in all else than in setting aside property exempt to the bankrupt, is the agent of the law for the benefit of creditors; and a fund in his hands realized from the assignment is to be deemed appropriated to the use of the creditors, as between such creditors and others having equal equities with respect to such fund, before it passed to the assignee.]

In bankruptcy.

A. H. Handy, for complainant.

Cotchings & Ingersoll and Pittman & Pittman, contra.

HILL, District Judge. This is a bill filed by complainant against said Edrington, Sr., and O'Reilly, assignee in bankruptcy of Steele & Edrington, and who is also assignee of said William H. Edrington, Jr., to subject to the satisfaction of a judgment at law obtained by complainant against W. H. Edrington, Sr., a fund now in the hands of said O'Reilly as assignee of said W. H. Edrington, Jr., and which it is alleged is the money of said Edrington, Sr., and as to the complainant subject to the payment of his judgment. The questions now submitted for consideration arise upon the demurrer of O'Reilly to the bill, and amended bill of complainant.

The first ground of demurrer insisted upon in argument is that the bill upon its face shows that if complainant had any rights, they accrued more than two years before filing his bill, and that his remedy is barred by the limitation of two years provided in the bankrupt law, and that neither the original bill nor amended bill avers sufficient facts in avoidance of the bar. This ground of demurrer is well taken as to the original bill. If, however, the grounds stated in avoidance of the bar applied to O'Reilly, as concealing the alleged fraud between Edrington, Sr., and Edrington, Jr., the demurrer would not be on this point well taken. I am in doubt as to its application to O'Reilly, and therefore think it best to overrule the demurrer on this point, reserving to the defendant the right to set up the same defense in the answer, if an answer shall be required upon other grounds of demurrer being overruled. Another ground of demurrer insisted upon is that complainant does not show by his bill that he was a creditor of W. H. Edrington, Sr., when the fraudulent disposition of his funds was made, and out of which the equitable claim insisted upon is alleged. To entitle the complainant to the relief asked, it is necessary to allege and prove that the demand under which he claims was in existence when the alleged fraud was committed. The bill does not allege that complainant was the owner of the demands when the fraud was committed, and if it depended upon his being the owner of the demands at that time, the demurrer on this point would be well taken, but it is alleged that he is the assignee of these demands and that they did then exist. I am inclined to the opinion that the assignee of the demands is entitled to the same rights that the assignor would have been had the assignment not been made, and on demurrer hold this objection not well taken. The main ground relied upon is that the bill does not allege such facts as will entitle the complainant to any equitable relief.

The substance of the allegations and charges made in the bill as grounds for the relief sought are, that Edrington, Sr., was the owner of a considerable sum of money which he wished to conceal from his creditors, and especially those whose debts were afterwards assigned to complainant, and, with a view of defrauding them, made an arrangement with Holt and Mrs. Shipp to pay off two mortgages executed the one by Holt and wife, and the other by Mrs. Shipp, to secure certain indebtedness of said bargains respectively to one E. Peal, their commission merchant in New Orleans, and for the foreclosure of which bills were then pending in the chancery court of Adams county. These mortgages conveyed the interest of the bargains in a large tract of land in Issaquena county, as a security for the satisfaction of the mortgage debts. By the arrangement the notes of the parties were executed for the money advanced to Peal, who transferred the mortgage debt and security to W. H. Edrington, Jr., to whom the notes were made payable. The suits for the foreclosure were prosecuted to final decrees, and the land directed to be sold to pay the mortgage debts, or, as between Edrington and the parties, the notes so executed to Edrington, Jr. These notes not having been paid, and Edrington, Jr., having been adjudicated a bankrupt upon the petition of the creditors of Steele & Edrington, which included the individual estate of Edrington, Jr., the interest in the suits for foreclosure of the mortgages having been assigned to Edrington, Jr., proceedings were taken by O'Reilly, assignee in bankruptcy of Edrington, Jr., to enforce the payment of these decrees, as the assets of said Edrington, which resulted in a sale of the lands by the decree of the district court for this district, and that O'Reilly, the assignee, now holds the proceeds in the shape of notes given for the purchase-money. The claim set up by complainant to this fund is, first, that the money was the money of Edrington, Sr., that the whole transaction was a fraudulent contrivance to prevent it from being subjected to the payment of his debts; secondly, that Edrington, Jr., was only the trustee of Edrington, Sr., and that the title to the money realized did not pass to O'Reilly, assignee. It is insisted by O'Reilly's counsel, that, conceding the equity of complainant as to Edrington, Jr., if no bankruptcy had intervened, the equities of the creditors of Edrington, Jr., are equal to those of Edrington, Sr.; that this fund is the result of a litigation commenced by the creditors of Edrington, Jr., and prosecuted by his assignee for the use of his creditors; and that, their equities being equal to those of complainant, they being first in time cannot be required to give up the fruits of their negligence, [diligence.] Upon the other hand, it is insisted by complainant's counsel that O'Reilly is a mere stakeholder as to this fund, and that he cannot set up any right against complainant that could not have been set up by Edrington, Jr. I am satisfied that if this were a bill against Edrington, Jr., the allegations made in the bill, if not denied and if established by the proof, would entitle the complainant to the relief prayed for. But the assignment having been made to and in the name of Edrington, Jr., his creditors had a right to look to that as a fund for payment of the debts contracted by said Edrington, as much as did the creditors of his father to look to his estate for the payment of their debts. The appropriation of the money so fraudulently made, as alleged, was, if a trust, a secret one and not obligatory upon the creditors of Edrington, Jr., who were ignorant of it. It being fraudulent as charged, Edrington, Sr., was estopped from claiming. I am very much inclined to the opinion that the equities of the creditors of the Edringtons to this fund are at least equal, if those of the son are not superior. But, considering them as equal, the question arises as to the present status of the fund. Have the proceedings had resulted in an appropriation of it to the creditors of Steele & Edrington, or the individual creditors of Edrington? If so they cannot be compelled to part with it to one whose rights are not superior.

The solution of the question presented depends very much upon the relation the assignee sustains to the bankrupt and to his creditors. The only relation he sustains to the bankrupt or office he performs for him is to set aside his exempt property; in all else he is the agent of the law for the benefit of the creditors; in other words, his duty is to collect the bankrupt estate for distribution among the creditors according to their respective rights and priorities. The assignment of the bankrupt's estate to him confers upon him, as a general rule, only such title to the estate legal or equitable as the bankrupt possessed. Whatever that title may be it is his duty to assert for the benefit of the creditors, and as the representative of the creditors he may, and it is his duty to, go further, and recover from the assignees of the bankrupt any property or other assets which the creditors themselves could have recovered, though the bankrupt himself might have been estopped from its recovery. The bankruptcy operates as an injunction against the creditors to proceed by the usual remedies against the bankrupt and his fraudulent assignees; so that this right in the assignee is indispensable to the ends of justice. When the creditor proves his debt it has all the effect of a judgment against the estate of the bankrupt, and draws to it all the beneficial results of a judgment at law, a decree in chancery, for the satisfaction of his demand as far as the bankrupt estate will afford such satisfaction.

The assignee, for the purpose of obtaining this satisfaction, is required to pursue and take in possession the bankrupt's estate, of whatever kind or character it may consist, and to reduce it into money, and pay the same into court or to such persons as the court by its order may direct; in the performance of this duty he supplies the place of the sheriff or marshal. This being so, the property or funds, when received by him, is in effect an appropriation of the assets to the use of the creditors, as much so as if seized or sold by the sheriff or marshal; and if not recoverable from the sheriff or marshal, if held by them under legal process, cannot be recovered from the assignee. It follows that, if the premise is correct, that the equity to this fund in the creditors of the bankrupt is equal to that of complainant, the logical and legal result must be that they cannot be required to surrender it, although if complainant had first pursued and obtained possession of it, it could not have been taken from him. I have considered the rules of law stated, and so ably presented by the learned counsel of complainant, and at first was of opinion that the demurrer should be overruled, and the defendant required to answer; but having come to the conclusion that complainant has no superior equity to the fund over that of the creditors of the bankrupt, and the further conclusion that there has been an appropriation of the fund in their favor as against all claims not superior to that which they hold, I can see no other result than the defeat of complainant's claim to this fund. If correct in this it will save trouble and cost to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the bill and let the cause go to the supreme court on the question as decided. If the complainant sees proper to take this course the fund will be decreed to await the result. Therefore the decree will be that the demurrer be sustained and the bill dismissed.

Case No. 112.

AIKEN v. FERRY.

[6 Sawy. 79.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Nov. 7, 1879.

DECISIONS OF THE LAND OFFICE—RIGHT TO CONTEST—PRE-EMPTION—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. The action of the land office upon the questions of fact arising in the course of its business is conclusive upon other tribunals, unless it appears that such action is the result of fraud or mistake, other than an error of judgment in estimating the value of evidence, or making deductions therefrom; but, for error in the construction or application of the law relating to such business, its decisions may be reviewed and modified or annulled by the courts.

2. The pre-emption act requires a pre-emptor to inhabit the tract claimed by him, and this means to abide there,—to actually reside upon the premises until the final proof and payment is made.

3. No one can be heard to question or contest the right of another to a patent for public land until he shows some right in himself in or to the premises.

4. The right of pre-emption is not an interest in the land, but the right to be preferred as a purchaser of a certain portion of the public domain, and it accrues when the settler has complied with the prerequisites of the act by making his settlement and filing his declaratory statement.

5. If a settler under the pre-emption act is a qualified pre-emptor at the time of filing his declaratory statement, he is entitled, as against the United States, to become the purchaser of the premises.

6. The term "proprietor" as used in the inhibition contained in section 10 of the pre-emption act, (5 Stat. 455; Rev. St. § 2260,) means an absolute and legal owner; and therefore where one owns land in trust for another, or has entered public land with cash or scrip, but has not received a patent therefor, he is not such a "proprietor" thereof, and is therefore not thereby disqualified to acquire the right of pre-emption.

7. Upon an erroneous construction of the law relating to the qualification of a pre-emptor, the land office canceled the entry of A., and issued a patent to F., a junior settler, for a portion of the tract entered by A. Held, that F. was a trustee for A. as to such portion, and must convey the same to him on receiving the purchase price thereof.

8. A parol contract in relation to lands, if set out in the bill, is to have the same effect, as against the plaintiff, as if it had been made in writing.

[In equity. Bill by James Aiken against James D. Ferry for injunction. Heard on bill, answer, replication, exhibits, and proofs. Decree for plaintiff.]

Walter W. Thayer, for plaintiff.

Rufus Mallory, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought to enjoin the defendant from enforcing a judgment of this court for the recovery of the possession of the south-east quarter of the south-east quarter of section 2, and the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section 11 of township 27 south, of range 13 west, of the Willamet [Willamette] meridian and that the patent to said premises heretofore issued by the United States to George W. Pratt, the vendor of the defendant, be held to inure to the benefit of the plaintiff, and that the defendant be required to release his interest therein to the plaintiff. The case was heard upon the bill, answer, replication, and exhibits, and the depositions of numerous witnesses.

The material facts established by the testimony are as follows: In 1863, James Aiken, the plaintiff, made a settlement and residence upon a defined portion of the public lands near the Isthmus slough in Coos county, Oregon, and within what proved to be township 27 south, of range 13 west, of the public surveys, with a view to acquire the title thereto under the pre-emption laws of the United States; and cultivated the same and made substantial and valuable improvements thereon. In the early part of 1869, and after the line between the said township 27 and township 26 had been run, the plaintiff concluded that the area of one hundred and sixty acres, which should include his then dwelling-house, would not extend to his southern and eastern line, and therefore built another dwelling-house upon the tract further east and south, and on what is now known as the south-west quarter of the south-east quarter of section 2 of said township 27, and within the limits of the clearing and cultivation made by him before that time, and moved therein in the month of May of said year, and continued to reside there, and improve and cultivate the premises, including a portion of the legal subdivisions in controversy, until after April 16, 1872.

The eastern line of the plaintiff's original location was a line drawn due north and south from a large dead fir tree standing in the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section 11, and two hundred and seventy-four feet west of the east line of said sections 2 and 11.

In March, 1869, George W. Pratt was living in a house belonging to the plaintiff near the Isthmus slough, when, upon the suggestion of the plaintiff, he determined to make a settlement upon a quarter section of the unsurveyed public lands lying immediately to the west of the plaintiff's settlement, and said plaintiff went with said Pratt, upon the land, and showed him said dead fir tree and his east line as aforesaid, and it was then and there understood and agreed, by and between said plaintiff and Pratt, that said line should be the actual boundary between their locations, and that if the line of the public survey should not coincide therewith, and either of them was, therefore, required to go beyond said agreed line to the nearest line of said survey in making his declaratory statement and proof of settlement before the register and receiver, he would, as soon as he obtained title to his pre-emption, release or convey the same to the other back to said agreed line or boundary.

In pursuance of this arrangement, Pratt commenced to improve his location, and during the years 1869 and 1870 cleared three or four acres of the land to the east of the agreed line, and cultivated some portion of the same, but continued to reside with his family in the plaintiff's house on the slough. In June, 1870, Pratt commenced to clear a place for a house a short distance to the west of the agreed line, and in the fall of that year built a small house of sawed lumber thereon, and moved into the same with his family, where he resided until January, 1871. Between this date and February, 1872, he did not reside upon the location. At the latter date he returned to the place, and resided there until the latter part of the summer of 1872, and during the contest between himself and the plaintiff before the register and receiver, when he left the premises permanently. In September, 1870, when Pratt commenced to build this house, the plaintiff went upon the ground and protested against the act as a violation of his right and a breach of the agreement between them. Pratt admitted the agreement, but justified his conduct upon the ground that the plaintiff could not hold the land any way.

Township 21 was surveyed in October, 1871, and the plat and survey were approved in March, 1872.

On June 21, 1869, the plaintiff filed with the register and receiver his declaratory statement as a settler upon "unoffered and unsurveyed" lands, describing therein the premises by metes and bounds, and as "containing one hundred and sixty acres, more or less;" and on March 30, 1872, made his declaratory statement before the same officers as a settler upon lands "not subject to the private entry," and described as the south half of the south-east quarter of section 2, and the north half of the north-east quarter of section 11 in said township 27, and alleging a settlement thereon, on May 20, 1869; and on April 16 thereafter made final proof and payment therefor, and obtained a certificate from the officers aforesaid, to the effect, that he had become the purchaser under the pre-emption laws of the said legal subdivisions of the public lands. On April 17, 1872, Pratt made a declaratory statement before the register and receiver as a settler under the pre-emption laws, for the south-west quarter of the south-west quarter of section 1, the south-east quarter of the south-east quarter of section 2, the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section 11, and the north-west quarter of the north-west quarter of section 12, alleging a settlement thereon March 1, 1869; and on the thirteenth of May thereafter made final proof and payment therefor. After Pratt had filed his declaratory statement, alleging a settlement prior to that claimed by the plaintiff in his statement, the latter filed an amended statement, alleging that his settlement actually commenced in 1863, and that he had not deemed the date of the commencement of his settlement material, and asked to have his declaratory statement amended accordingly. On August 2, 1872, the commissioner of the general land office suspended Pratt's entry because it was in conflict with the plaintiff's, and directed the register and receiver to appoint a day to hear the parties to the conflict. The contest was then heard before the register and receiver, who thereupon transmitted the case to the commissioner with their opinion in favor of the entry of Pratt.

On June 24, 1874, the commissioner decided the contest in favor of Pratt, upon the ground "that at the time Aiken filed for the tract claimed by him he was not a qualified pre-emptor, and has no right to the land in dispute," because on January 22, 1872, he "was the owner in his own name" of section 36, township 26, range 13 west, although on March 12 of the same year he had sold and disposed of an undivided three-fourths of the same; and because on June 1, 1871, he, jointly with five others, located two thousand and eighty acres of public lands in the district of lands subject to sale at Roseburg, Oregon, upon agricultural college scrip issued to the state of Texas, and on the same day entered with said others for cash, at the land office in said district, three thousand five hundred and twenty acres, and on February 1, 1872, entered at the same place and in like manner one thousand five hundred and twenty acres, of public land, thereby becoming the owner of a one-sixth interest in seven thousand one hundred and twenty acres of land, which entries and location were then in force and the interest of Aiken therein still owned by him. On August 5, 1875, the acting secretary of the interior affirmed the decision of the commissioner, and on October 1, 1875, a patent was issued to Pratt in accordance therewith. The opinion of the commissioner also finds that Pratt commenced "a bona fide settlement on the tract claimed by him," on March 1, 1869, but that his residence thereon did not commence until 1870. It ignores the amended declaratory statement of the plaintiff, and gives the date of his original one incorrectly as April 5, instead of March 30, 1872; and also states the number of acres of land located by the plaintiff and others with agricultural college scrip incorrectly at two thousand two hundred and eighty acres instead of two thousand two hundred and forty. But the decision of the commissioner in favor of the entry of Pratt and against that of the plaintiff was not made upon the question of the priority of settlement, but solely and explicitly upon the ground that Aiken was disqualified to enter lands as a pre-emptor on account of his interest in other entries and locations aforesaid; which decision is alleged by the plaintiff to have been erroneous.

On December 22, 1875, Pratt conveyed the premises included in his entry to the defendant for the nominal consideration of eight hundred dollars cash in hand, but in fact for three hundred dollars cash and a promise to pay the remaining five hundred dollars when the right to the eighty acres, involved in this suit, should be finally determined in favor of Pratt, and the same is not yet paid.

This court is now asked to review the action of the land office in this matter, and the question arises at the threshold of the inquiry how far such action is binding and conclusive upon the courts. The general rule on the subject is very clearly laid down by the supreme court, but, owing to the nature of the subject, some difficulty and differences of opinion will sometimes rise in the application of it. In Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 83, Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, after admitting "the general doctrine that, when the law has confided to a special tribunal the authority to hear and determine certain matters arising in the course of its duties, the decision of that tribunal within the scope of its authority is conclusive upon all others," and that the action of the land office in issuing a patent for any of the public land, subject to sale, is conclusive of the legal title wherever this title must control, defines and limits the scope of judicial inquiry in such cases as follows:

"On the other hand, there has always existed in the courts of equity the power, in certain classes of cases, to inquire into and correct mistakes, injustice, and wrong in both judicial and executive action, however solemn the form which the result of that action may assume, when it invades private rights; and by virtue of this power the final judgments of courts of law have been annulled or modified, and patents and other important instruments, issuing from the crown or other executive branch of the government, have been corrected or declared void, or other relief granted. No reason is perceived why the action of the land office should constitute an exception to this principle. In dealing with the public domain under the system of laws enacted by congress for their management and sale, that tribunal decides upon private rights of great value, and very often, from the nature of its functions, this is by a proceeding essentially ex parte, and peculiarly liable to the influences of frauds, false swearing, and mistakes. These are among the most ancient and well established grounds of the special jurisdiction of courts of equity, just referred to, and the necessity and value of that jurisdiction are nowhere better exemplified than in its application to cases arising in the land office."

In the subsequent case of Shepley v. Cowan, [91 U. S.] 340, Mr. Justice Field, in speaking for the court, says, that if the officers of the land department "err in the construction of the law applicable to any case, or if fraud is practiced upon them, or they themselves are chargeable with fraudulent practices, their rulings may be reviewed and annulled by the courts; * * * but for mere errors of judgment upon the weight of evidence in a contested case before them, the only remedy is by appeal from one officer to another of the department, and perhaps, under special circumstances, to the president."

Guided by the rule furnished by these cases, it is evident that this court can not review the action of the land office, however erroneous, if fairly and regularly had, upon the mere question of fact, as to which was the prior settler upon the disputed premises, Aiken or Pratt. And therefore, although to my mind it is as plain as proof can make it, that Pratt did not even commence to make his settlement upon the disputed premises until long after Aiken did his, and that he did not commence to inhabit it or actually reside upon the same, or erect a dwelling thereon, until the fall of 1870, at least eighteen months after the plaintiff had made his actual residence thereon, and years after he had cultivated and improved the same, still this court can not disregard or set aside a contrary finding by the officers of the land office, unaffected by fraud or mistake other than error in estimating the value of evidence. But if the determination of that question hinged upon a question of law,—as for instance, is it not absolutely necessary, to constitute a settlement under the pre-emption law, that the pre-emptor should erect a dwelling on the land and actually reside upon the same?—and the decision of the land office thereon was erroneous, then this court, upon a proper case made, would set it aside. Now, in this case, so far as appears, there was no actual decision as to which, Aiken or Pratt, was the prior settler in fact, but the contest seems to have been made upon the point that Aiken was not a qualified pre-emptor, and therefore could not make a legal settlement. The right of pre-emption is given by section 10 of the act of September 4, 1841, (5 Stat. 455; section 2259, Rev. St.,) which provides that any one of a specified class of persons who may perform certain acts with reference to the public lands, shall be entitled to enter not more than one hundred and sixty acres thereof at the minimum price. These acts are: 1. Make a settlement in person on such lands; 2. Inhabit and improve the same; and 3. Erect a dwelling thereon. Now, nothing short of the performance of these acts makes a person a qualified pre-emptor of the public lands, or constitutes a settlement thereon. Inhabitan- cy, an abiding or actual residence upon the land, is required, and until this begins a settlement is not made. Therefore, admitting the facts which the commissioner says are shown by the evidence, as a matter of law, it is plain that Pratt did not make a settlement upon the disputed premises until the fall of 1870, when he erected a dwelling thereon and commenced to inhabit the same; and that is confessedly long subsequent to the date of Aiken's settlement. But if the plaintiff was not a qualified pre-emptor, he cannot be heard to object to the validity of Pratt's entry, which is, so far as he is concerned, a matter wholly between the latter and the United States. The plaintiff must first show in himself some right in or to the premises before he can question the validity of the defendant's title. Stark v. Starrs, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 418.

The material question, then, to be considered is, was the plaintiff a qualified pre-emptor? The pre-emption act (section 10, supra; Rev. St. § 2260) provides that "no person who is the proprietor of three hundred and twenty acres of land in any state or territory of the United States * * * shall acquire any right of pre-emption under this act." This "right of pre-emption" is not an interest in the land, but only the right to be preferred as a purchaser of a certain portion of the public lands at the minimum price, irrespective of its real value. Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 296; 10 Op. Atty. Gen. 57. Such right must accrue upon the performance of the acts on account of which it is given. These are the settlement on the land, including its improvement and inhabitation, and the filing of the declaratory statement. If upon the filing of this statement the settler is a qualified pre-emptor, as against the United States, he is entitled to make the purchase, although he may not have been so when he went upon the premises, and by a parity of reasoning if thereafter and before he makes the entry he should become the owner of three hundred and twenty acres of land by inheritance or otherwise, he would not be thereby disqualified to make the purchase. True, the proof of the performance of these acts and the qualification of the settler must be furnished to the officers before the purchase can be made or the right of pre-emption exercised. But this is only the appointed means of making evident to the land office the facts which already exist, and on account of which the right of pre-emption is given.

Tried by this construction of the law, was the plaintiff a qualified pre-emptor when he filed his declaratory statement, and thereby made his claim to be a pre-emptor on March 30, 1872? And first as to his alleged interest in section 36 aforesaid. The fact is, as it clearly appears from the evidence, that the plaintiff did not acquire the whole of this section in January, 1872, from the state of Oregon, but only the southwest quarter thereof on January 22 of that year. The other three quarters of the section were conveyed to him by different persons on February 12, 13, and 16, 1872, respectively, but, in fact, in trust for others who furnished the money to pay for them, to whom the plaintiff conveyed the same immediately; but there being some defect in the conveyance, it was returned and another given in its place, which was not accomplished until March 12, 1872. A person who owns land in trust for others is not a proprietor of such lands within the inhibition of the pre-emption act, and is therefore not thereby disqualified from becoming a pre-emptor. But it does not appear that the evidence showing that the plaintiff held the three quarters of this section in trust only was before the land office, and therefore it does not appear that the question whether a mere trustee is a "proprietor," within the meaning of the pre-emption act, was before the commissioner or passed upon by him.

But the commissioner did find that the plaintiff had disposed of three quarters of this section, on March 12, 1872, and therefore was only the proprietor of one hundred and sixty acres of the same when he made his declaratory statement. His interest, then, in this section did not disqualify him from acquiring the right of pre-emption when and as he attempted to, and the ruling of the land office to the contrary was erroneous.

As to the scrip and cash entries for seven thousand one hundred acres of land, the case stands thus: Upon the evidence it clearly appears that the plaintiff, on February 19, 1872, conveyed all his interest in these entries to his brother, A. G. Aiken, who on October 12, 1875, reconveyed the same to him; so that upon the face of the record, the plaintiff had no interest in these lands when he filed his declaratory statement. The bona fides of these conveyances has been questioned by counsel, but the only ground for suspicion is the admitted facts and circumstances of the transaction. And I think that these are enough to put the party asserting that they were made in good faith to the proof of the same.

Upon this view of the matter, evidence has been offered tending to show the bona fides of the transaction. But it is not necessary to pass upon this question here. It does not appear that these conveyances were before the land office; and if they had been, and a question arose there as to their integrity, the decision thereon would not be subject to review here, upon the question of fact simply.

And this brings me to the question whether, on March 30, 1872, the plaintiff was the "proprietor" of the one sixth or any portion of the land included in the entries of June 1, 1871, and February 1, 1872. An entry of lands for cash or scrip gives the party making it a right to a patent therefor, if it be found regular and valid. But it does not pass the title which remains in the United States, until the patent issues. The person making the entry, if there be no valid objection thereto, as against the government, has a right to a conveyance of the legal title, but as the government cannot be sued without its consent, such a right is little else than a mere moral one. After the entry, and notwithstanding it, congress has the power to withdraw the land from sale, reserve it for public purposes, or dispose of it to another. True, in the latter case, a court of equity may compel the patentee to convey to the one who has the prior equity by reason of his prior entry. Besides, the entry may prove illegal and unauthorized, and therefore be canceled and set aside.

I am aware that some expressions in the opinion of the court, in Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 191, and the Yosemite Valley Case, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 86, particularly the latter, are to the effect that when a settler under the pre-emption law has complied therewith, and paid the price of the land, he has a vested interest in the premises of which he cannot be deprived. But certainly this interest is not the legal title or estate which is necessary to make one a proprietor or owner in the full and legal sense of the word. Such an interest is nothing but an equity which there is no means of enforcing, at least so long as the government retains the legal title. In my judgment, the proprietorship contemplated by the pre-emption act is a legal and absolute one, and not the mere equity of a land office entry, which may or may not ripen into such ownership.

It follows from these premises, that the plaintiff at the time of filing his declaratory statement, or at any time thereafter pending his entry and contest, was not the proprietor of three hundred and twenty acres of land, and therefore not disqualified to acquire a pre-emption right. The patent to Pratt so far as it includes the south-east quarter of the south-east quarter of said section 2, and the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of said section 11, was therefore wrongfully issued upon an erroneous construction of the law, and he took the same in trust for the plaintiff, who was entitled to the patent therefor. The defendant took his conveyance from Pratt of this eighty acres without consideration and with knowledge of all the circumstances.

The equity of the case is with the plaintiff, and the only question is whether the defendant shall be required to convey to him the whole of this eighty acres, or only that portion of it lying to the west of the boundary agreed upon between Aiken and Pratt. Pratt having repudiated the agreement and the defendant denied it, the latter can not well now ask for its recognition and enforcement by the court. It may also be objected that the agreement is invalid, not being in writing. But so far as the plaintiff is concerned, that difficulty is obviated by the fact that the agreement has been set out by him in his bill, and thereby established with the same certainty and effect as if originally reduced to writing. Therefore, in granting him the relief sought, effect will be given to this agreement as set forth in his bill. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 761-766.

The decree of the court will be that the defendant be enjoined from enforcing his judgment in this court against the complainant, except to recover the possession of that portion of the south-east quarter of the south-east quarter of section 2, and the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section 11 aforesaid, lying east of the line running parallel to the eastern boundary of said legal sub-divisions and one hundred and seventy-four feet west of the same; and that within sixty days hereof, the defendant convey to the plaintiff by a proper conveyance, with sufficient covenants against his own acts, to be approved by the master of this court, the remainder of said legal subdivisions—the plaintiff first paying to the defendant the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre therefor, either in lawful money or by applying such an amount upon the costs and expenses incurred by him in the prosecution of this suit, and that the defendant pay the plaintiff said costs and expenses.

Case No. 113.

AIKEN v. MANCHESTER PRINT WORKS.

[2 Cliff. 435.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1865.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ASSIGNMENT AND LICENSE—RIGHT OF PURCHASER TO USE PATENTED MACHINE—REPAIRS.

1. Where a person has purchased of the owner of the invention certain knitting-machines, with which the vendor was accustomed to send a package of the needles used in the same, it was held, that the sale of the machines did not carry with it a right to the purchaser to manufacture new needles of the same construction as those sold him, when those which he had bought were worn out, although the machines could not be operated without them, and the needles were the patented invention of the seller; the needles, however, being the subject-matter of a different patent from that covering the machines.

[Cited in Singer Manuf'g Co. v. Springfield Foundry Co., 34 Fed. Rep. 395.]

2. The grant of a machine, with the right to use it, does not import the same privileges under the patent as the sale of the right to make and vend the patented machine.

[Cited in Adams v. Burks, Case No. 50; Singer Manuf'g Co. v. Springfield Foundry Co., 34 Fed. Rep. 395.]

3. In the latter case the purchaser buys a portion of the franchise, and the right he acquires necessarily terminates at the time limited for the continuance of the patent; but in the former, the machine sold passes outside of the monopoly, and is no longer under the protection of the patent act.

[Cited in Adams v. Burks, Case No. 50.]

4. Redress for injury in such case must be sought in the state courts, under state laws, and not under the special jurisdiction conferred on the federal courts by the patent act.

5. In this case the purchasers could repair the machines and the needles, or improve them (if in so doing they infringed no patented right,) because both needles and machines had paid the royalty to the patent, and were outside the limits of the monopoly, and the property of the purchaser; but the purchase of these particular machines and devices conferred no power to manufacture new ones to take their places when once worn out or destroyed.

[At law. Action by Walter Aiken against the Manchester Print Works for infringement of patent No. 6,025. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Trespass on the case for the alleged infringement of a patent on knitting-machine needles. The action was in the name of the assignee of the patent. The inventor was James Hibbert; and the original patent was issued to him on the 9th of January, 1849. Subsequently the inventor deceased, and the patent on the 9th of December, 1862, was reissued to his administrator, and extended for a further term of seven years. The administrator assigned the patent, and the first assignee assigned to the plaintiff, who was the legal owner of the entire interest. Plea was the general issue with notice of special matter, that the original patentee was not the first and original inventor of the improvement; but the actual defence set up at the trial was that of license from the plaintiff. The extended patent was introduced by the plaintiff, and he also offered evidence to show that the defendants had made and used the patented device, as alleged in the declaration. The invention was stated in the specification to consist of a latch or tongue in connection with the hook of the needle, sweeping freely back and forth upon a center pin; and it was not controverted that the invention was well described. The claim of the patent was for the application of a latch or tongue to the hook of the needle, and operated as therein described; and the claim was, in the view of the court, in exact accordance with the description in the specification. The defendants offered to prove that they purchased certain knitting-machines of the plaintiff, with the right of using the same, and that the needles made and used by them were used in such machines as they had purchased of the plaintiff, or which he had manufactured for his brother, who had sold the machines to the defendants with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff. The parties conceded that the knitting-machines were also the subject of certain other patents, and that the plaintiff was in whole or in part the legal owner of such patents. The evidence showed that the several knitting-machines purchased by the defendants contained a full set of needles, and that the purchase and sale embraced a surplus number of the same tied up in a small bundle attached to each machine, and which were delivered with the machines as part of the purchase and sale. New needles, it appeared, would last about four weeks, and the machines could not be operated as knitting-machines, without the needles. The defence was, that the sale of the machines by the plaintiff to the defendants gave them the right, when the needles which were made part of the purchase were worn out, to manufacture others and to replace those worn out, and to use the same for the purposes for which the machine was originally constructed. But the court instructed the jury that the sale by the plaintiff, and the purchase by the defendants, of the knitting-machines and the needles in and accompanying the same, did not confer upon the defendants any right, after the needles were worn out, or had become useless, to manufacture other needles, as patented to the plaintiff, and use the same in the machines so sold and purchased. Under the ruling of the court, a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question of law reserved, with power in the court to render judgment on the verdict, or to set the same aside and to enter judgment for the defendants; but reserving the right to either party to turn the case into a bill of exceptions.

Causten Browne and Daniel Barnard, for plaintiff.

S. N. Bell and D. Clark, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The proposition of the defendants is, that the sale of the machines implies the right to use the same, and that, when the needles were worn out, so that the machine could not be operated, it carries with it the right to manufacture new ones as the necessary means to enable them to enjoy the right of use implied by the purchase. Take the question as stated, and it is certainly one of importance, and one which deserves to be carefully considered. Analogous questions, however, have several times been presented to the supreme court, and the views of the court, as expressed in those cases, will aid very much in reaching a right conclusion as to the rights of the parties in this controversy. An intelligent discussion of the question requires that the distinction between the grant of the right to make and vend the patented machine, and the grant of the machine with the right to use it, should be kept constantly in view. Such a question first came before the court in the case of Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, where it was much considered, and it was generally conceded that the true distinction was there maintained, but it must be admitted that there are some expressions in the opinion of the court not quite satisfactory. Subsequently the same question was again presented to the same court in the case of Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 549, which places the question upon its true foundation. Patentees acquire the right under a patent to exclude every one from making, using, or vending the thing patented without their permission, and they acquire nothing more. When the patentee sells the exclusive privilege of making, using, or vending it for use in a particular place, the purchaser buys a portion of the franchise; but the interest he acquires necessarily terminates at the time limited for the continuance of the patent, unless it be otherwise specially stipulated in the contract. But the purchaser of the implement or machine, for the purpose of using it in the ordinary pursuits of life, stands on different grounds. When the patented machine rightfully passes from the patentee to the purchaser or from any other person by him authorized to convey it, the machine is then no longer within the limits of the monopoly. Then the machine so sold passes outside of the monopoly, and is no longer under the protection of the patent act. Redress, in such cases, in case of injury, must be sought in the courts of the state, according to the laws of the state, and not in the federal courts, under the special jurisdiction conferred for the protection of patent rights. Repeated decisions of the supreme court have laid down this doctrine, until it cannot any longer be regarded as an open question. Chaffee v. Boston Belting Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 217; Bloomer v. Millinger, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 351. Able counsel, in the case last named, desired the court to qualify the previous decisions upon this subject; but the unanimous opinion of the judges was opposed to the suggestion, and held that such a purchaser may continue to use the machine until it is worn out, or he may repair it or improve upon it, as he pleases, in the same manner as if dealing with property of any other kind. [Crane v. Price,] Webst. Pat. Cas. 413, note p. Great care must, however, be observed in applying that rule to the present case. Undoubtedly both the machines and the needles purchased by the defendants fall within the rule. The defendants may repair them or improve upon them as they please, so that they do not infringe any patent right, because the machines and the needles, having paid the royalty imposed under the patent act, are no longer within the limits of the monopoly. These articles have become private, individual property, not protected by the laws of the United States, but by the laws of the state in which the property is situated. The indubitable right of the defendants is to repair or improve the articles as long as they will last, but they cannot make new ones, nor can they, in the exercise of their right to repair the old ones, infringe another man's patent. Right to repair is limited by the same rules that operate in the repair of other property. The owner may repair, but he cannot appropriate the materials belonging to another man, in effecting the purpose. Purchasers in this case may repair the needles they purchased, but they cannot manufacture new ones, without license. Reference is made to the case of Wilson v. Simpson, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 123; but a careful examination of the case will show that it affirms the very rule here maintained. When we speak of the right to restore a part of a deficient combination, we mean, say the court, the part of one entirely original, and not of any other patented thing, which has been introduced into it to aid its intended performance. The cutters and knives, in that case, were not subject to a patent, and of course the respondent had a right to use them as materials to repair his machine; but unfortunately for the defendants in this case, the needle is subject to a patent, and in making and using it they have infringed the right of the plaintiff.

In view of the whole case, we are clearly of the opinion that there must be judgment on the verdict.

[NOTE. "Patented implements or machines sold to be used in the ordinary pursuits of life become the private individual property of the purchasers, and are no longer specifically protected by the patent laws of the state where the implements or machines are owned or used. Sales of this kind may be made by the patentee with or without conditions, as in other cases; but where the sale is absolute, and without any conditions, the rule is well settled that the purchaser may continue to use the implement or machine purchased until it is worn out, or he may repair it, or improve it as he pleases, in same manner as if dealing with property of any other kind." SEAMEN—WAGES—FORFEITURE.

[A vessel, in poor repair, was blown off by stress of weather from an island on which the master was left; and the mate, on assuming command, bore away to a distant island with the assurance of favorable wind and weather, instead of returning to rejoin the master, which the condition of the vessel and the state of the weather rendered practicable, though perhaps imprudent. Held, that wilful misconduct and a fraudulent motive cannot be imputed to the mate so as to forfeit his wages.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Richard R. Airey against the brig Ann C. Pratt and Leonard B. Pratt, master and claimant, for seaman's wages. Decree for libelant. Affirmed on subsequent appeal to the circuit court. Airey v. The Ann C. Pratt, Case No. 114.]

The libel of Airey, for his wages, was argued and heard at the same time and on the same evidence with that on the bottomry bond. But in considering the mate's claim for wages, his own deposition, which was admitted in the case of bottomry, (The Fortitude, Case No. 4,953,) must be excluded. The exclusion, however, of this part of the evidence does not materially change the aspect of the case. The objection to the mate's libel is that he forfeited his wages by misconduct, and the facts relied upon to show his alleged misconduct sufficiently appear from the testimony of the other witnesses. The principal cause of forfeiture insisted upon is the alleged misconduct of Airey at St. Michael. When blown off by stress of weather from the island, it is said that it was his duty to bring the vessel back, and restore the command to the master, and that, the condition of the vessel and the state of the weather being such as to render this practicable, if not clearly the safest and most prudent course to be taken, his determination to bear away for the distant island of St. Thomas can reasonably be accounted for on no other supposition than a determination to leave the master, and assume for the remainder of the voyage the command himself. If such was the fact, it was a gross violation of duty, and the lightest penalty with which it ought to be visited would be a forfeiture of his wages.

Two experienced shipmasters were examined as experts on this question; and with all the facts explained to them with respect to the condition of the ship and the state of the weather, they expressed a clear opinion that the vessel might with safety have been carried back to the island, and that a judicious and prudent navigator would have done this rather than bear away for a distant port, as that of St. Thomas. Their opinion is undoubtedly entitled to much consideration; but it cannot, even admitting its correctness, be held to be decisive of the present case.

The question here is not precisely whether this on the whole was the most advisable and prudent course to be taken, but whether it was so clearly and manifestly so, that no man of ordinary judgment could have mistaken it. Airey, like every other man, is entitled to the ordinary presumption in his favor, that he has acted fairly and honestly, until this is overcome by satisfactory evidence. But Airey, also, like every other man who offers himself for a particular service, engages and pledges himself both for his competency and his fidelity. A mate may be degraded and put before the mast as well for want of skill as want of faithfulness. And we are bound to suppose that he had a reasonable degree of skill and experience in seamanship and navigation to enable him to take the command and manage the vessel on the happening of any casualty which separated the master from the ship. This is one of the contingencies that is contemplated by his contract. Up to this time the conduct of the mate seems to have been entirely unexceptionable, and we are not justified in imputing to him willful misconduct on doubtful and inconclusive evidence. By a casualty, for which no blame attached to him, he was left in the command of the vessel, and was obliged to act under trying circumstances, and such as involved considerable danger. Taking all the evidence together, it appears to me that there was but one of two courses which could with propriety be taken: Either to return to the island and rejoin the master, or bear away for a West India port. Had he attempted to return, and the weather continued as it had been for the preceding fortnight or three weeks, the vessel and the lives of all on board would have been exposed to no inconsiderable danger. The brig had, during the whole voyage, leaked badly, and she had shown herself unfit to contend with tempestuous weather. By steering for St. Thomas, it was known that in a short time he would take the trade winds, when the wind would be in their favor, with an assurance of favorable weather. They might then with confidence calculate on saving themselves and the ship. We have the opinion of two respectable and experienced shipmasters, that under all the circumstances, the proper course would have been to return to the island. Airey chose the other. If it be admitted that the opinion of the shipmasters is the most probable, is the case so clear as to leave no room for an honest difference of opinion? So clear that we are driven to impute the conduct of the mate to dishonest and fraudulent motives? I think not. Granting that it might have been more judicious to have attempted to return to the island, the determination of Airey to proceed to St. Thomas at the worst was but an error of judgment, and such an error as it would be very harsh to ascribe to a fraudulent and dishonest purpose.

In procuring the repairs to be done at St. Thomas, I see nothing in the evidence that gives serious countenance to the charge of fraud. The expense was probably somewhat more than the same labor and materials would have cost in her home port, perhaps something more than would have been the cost, if the owner had been present to superintend the repairs. But this is, I presume, not unfrequently the case when vessels are repaired under such circumstances. On the whole, I find nothing in the mate's conduct which will justify the court in refusing to him his wages; but they are allowed on the contract price, and nothing can be given in this case extra for his service as master.

SEAMEN—FORFEITURE OF WAGES—MISCONDUCT OF MATE TEMPORARILY IN COMMAND.

In a suit in rem by a mate, to recover his wages under the shipping articles, the court cannot investigate an allegation of misconduct as master, while in the temporary command of the vessel as master, in a voyage, during which the master was not on board, with a view to inflicting a forfeiture of wages as mate.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

This was a libel in the admiralty [by Richard R. Airey against the brig Ann C. Pratt, (Leonard B. Pratt, master and claimant.)] The case is stated in the opinion of the court. [Decree for libellant. Claimant appeals. Modified and affirmed.]

Rowe, for libellant.

W. P. Fessenden, contra.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and WARE, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The libellant claims his wages, as mate, for the voyages of the brig Ann C. Pratt, which are described in the opinion of the court in the case of Carrington et al. against that vessel, (1 Curt. 340, [The Ann C. Pratt, Case No. 409,]) decided at the last term of this court. The claimant alleges a forfeiture of the wages by three different instances of misconduct.

The first is, that the libellant did not bring the brig back to St. Michael, when driven to sea from that island. The facts, upon which this cause of forfeiture depends, have been already considered in the case, upon the bottomry bond, [Id.] and the conduct of the libellant found not open to serious objection.

The second ground relied on by the claimant is, that when the brig was driven to sea, there was on board, in a trunk belonging to the master, specie "to the amount of $1,000, or near that sum;" that the libellant broke open the trunk, took the money into his own possession, and has not accounted for it. That such a trunk was on board, containing some specie, which the libellant took possession of, is admitted. The evidence concerning his having broken the trunk to obtain it is conflicting, and the fact, standing by itself, does not seem to me material. Because, in the actual circumstances in which the libellant was placed, he had a right to take and use this specie. He had become the temporary master of the brig, which needed repairs. This money was on board, and belonged to the owner of the vessel. It was the duty of the libellant to use it in payment for the repairs. If, as the claimant asserts, the trunk was locked, and Captain Pratt had the key, the libellant might properly force the lock. If, as the libellant alleges, the key was left in the lock, he could have no motive to use force upon it, and it would be difficult to believe he did so. I do not pause to determine this question of fact, for the reasons above indicated, which are in accordance with the ground assumed in the answer. That alleges it to have been the duty of the libellant to apply the specie to make payment for the repairs; and if this be so, the particular mode in which the libellant got it out of the trunk is unimportant, unless it be connected with some other circumstance tending to prove fraud.

In the account of the disbursements for the repairs of the brig at St. Thomas, the sum of $307.10 is credited to the vessel, as so much cash received from the libellant; who admits that he retained, for his own use, fifty dollars, and says he paid the sum of $192.90 "to the crew, and to disburse the vessel," and that this accounts for the whole of the specie which was on board, amounting to the sum of five hundred and fifty dollars only, and not the sum of one thousand dollars, as is alleged in the answer. Considering that the accounts of Carrington & Co., who were the consignees of the vessel, show large disbursements for the vessel, including payments to and for the seamen, I confess this account by the libellant of these funds, is not entirely satisfactory to my mind. But the claimant has offered no other legal evidence of the amount of the specie on board, or of its disbursement or retention by the libellant. The answer simply declares that there was on board, in specie, the sum of $1,000, or about that sum, and that the libellant has not accounted for it. Unless the deposition of the libellant, taken in the suit on the bottomry bond, is invoked into this case, I find no evidence whatever to show the amount of specie on board; because this suit being against the master, as well as the brig, his deposition is not evidence. And if the libellant's deposition is to be considered as put in evidence, the whole of it must be read, and taken to be true, unless shown by satisfactory evidence to be false. Though clouded by some grave suspicions, I cannot say that the case affords sufficient grounds upon which to rest a charge of fraudulent misappropriation of money left on board, contrary to the sworn statements of the libellant in his deposition; and, therefore, I do not find this ground of forfeiture to be made out, in point of fact.

It remains to consider the last alleged cause of forfeiture, which is the same investigated in the suit on the bottomry bond. It appears that the libellant, while acting as temporary master at St. Thomas, in concert with the bottomry holder, gave a bottomry bond on the brig for a larger sum than was actually advanced, for the purpose of defrauding the underwriters on the vessel. The question is, whether this misconduct forfeits the wages claimed in this suit.

Forfeiture of the wages of seamen, though in some cases regulated by positive law, rests upon violation of contract, the performance of which is enforced by the marine law by means of this species of punishment. Consequently, before such a forfeiture can be adjudged, it must appear that the contract, under which the wages are claimed, has been violated. It is not enough that some other contract, between the same parties, has been broken, however gross the wrong may be. Now, this is a libel in rem by the mate, to recover the wages due to him in that capacity. The claim for wages, as temporary master, can not be enforced against the vessel. It is no part of the subject-matter of this libel, which does not allege it, but confines the demand to the wages due to the libellant as mate, pursuant to his written contract in the shipping articles. The libel lays no foundation for any inquiry into an implied contract, arising out of the emergency of a temporary command, either for the purpose of awarding or withholding compensation, for services rendered in that command. That is a subject, the merits of which can be investigated only in a suit founded on that contract. If it is found to have existed, and to have been so violated as to come within the principles upon which the marine law inflicts a forfeiture, and the pleadings lay the necessary foundation for such an adjudication, a forfeiture of rights, under the implied contract, for a gross breach of its duties, would follow. But in a suit founded on a very different contract, to recover compensation for services which are unconnected with the duties alleged to have been neglected, I cannot see how a forfeiture can be inflicted. Such is this case; for in his capacity of mate, it is not alleged the libellant was guilty of any neglect of duty. The charge is, that after he had succeeded to the command, and in the course of exercising it, he failed in the honest performance of its obligations. This charge does not seem to me to meet the claim, and, therefore, without prejudice to any rights of the claimant in any suit arising out of the implied contract, I am of opinion it must be dismissed. I think it proper to add, however, that if it had appeared that the misconduct of the libellant had occasioned damage to the claimant, I should have thought it proper to suspend the decree until he could have an opportunity to bring a suit for its recovery, to the end that a set-off might be made; and also, that, as the libellant admits he appropriated to his own use the sum of fifty dollars, he must be taken to have done this in the only way in which it was honest for him to do it, and that was as part payment of his wages; and so, this amount must be deducted from the amount of his wages. I do not think he can qualify his own wrong, in taking this money from the funds of the vessel, and sending it home, by alleging he did it in his capacity of temporary master, and so will account in that capacity, and not as mate. He had no right to take it in the capacity of master or mate; and I consider it my duty to treat it as part payment of his wages; the only debt, so far as now appears to the court, due to him from the vessel or the owner.

As this deduction does not appear to have been made in the district court, its decree must be altered in this particular; in all other respects, it is affirmed. I allow no costs on the appeal to either party.

SHIPPING—CHARTER-PARTY—DESTRUCTION OF VESSEL.—APPEAL.

1. Under a covenant in a charter-party to restore the vessel to the owners, "dangers of the seas excepted," the charterer is liable for the value of the vessel in case of its destruction by an accidental fire originating on board, such fire not being one of the dangers of the seas, within the exception.

[See The Peytona, Case No. 11,058.]

2. The fact that the vessel, when burned, was lying on a shoal on which she had stranded, is not ground for reducing the damages, where it is not alleged nor satisfactorily proved that her value was materially diminished by the stranding, as the burden is on the charterers to bring the case within the exception of dangers of the seas.]

[3. The charter money for the time preceding the destruction of the vessel may be allowed as damages.]

4. If the libellant does not appeal from a decree of the district court, he cannot ask to have the damages increased here.

[In admiralty. Libel by Chandler R. Merrill against James Airey and others for breach of a covenant in a charter party. Decree for libellant. Merrill v. Airey, Case No. 9,468. Respondents appeal.]

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and WARE, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a libel on a charter-party filed by the appellee against the present appellants. It is founded on a covenant contained in the charter-party, by which the schooner William Henry was let by the libellant to the respondents for voyages from Frankfort, in Maine, where the vessel lay, to the Chesapeake bay, or any southern port or ports in the United States; the charterers to victual and man the vessel and appoint the master. And the charterers covenanted "to deliver the said schooner to the owner aforesaid, at said Frankfort, in as good order as she shall be in when delivered to them, ordinary wearing, and dangers of the seas excepted." During her first voyage the schooner was destroyed by fire; and the first question to be determined is, whether fire, other than from lightning, is one of the "dangers of the seas," within the meaning of that phrase in the charter-party.

¹Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

Neither the researches of the learned counsel, who have evidently carefully examined the books, nor my own, have enabled me to find any precedent, on which I can rely. For though the phrase "perils of the seas" has been long in use, and has been often adjudicated upon, it has been only in reference to the liabilities of carriers, under bills of lading, and of underwriters upon policies of insurance. In King v. Shepherd, [Case No. 7,804.] Mr. Justice Story, in commenting on these words as interpreted when occurring in bills of lading and policies of insurance, says: "The rules which regulate losses under policies of insurance, are by no means the same as either necessarily, or ordinarily govern in cases of common carriers. Each contract has its own peculiar principles of interpretation, and it is not safe, in many instances, to reason from one to the other." And this is true also when applied to charter-parties; at least so far as to admonish us not hastily to adopt an interpretation of the phrase, "perils of the seas," in a bill of lading, or policy of insurance, and apply it to an exception in a covenant in a charter-party. The responsibility of carriers is rested by the common law upon grounds of public policy which have materially influenced the interpretation placed upon the exceptions to their liability. And undoubtedly the great object of policies of insurance, indemnity of the assured, and the practical necessities of commerce under them, have greatly affected their interpretation. I have not felt at liberty therefore to assume that these words must or do import the same in a covenant by the charterer with the owner, as in a policy or bill of lading. But I have also looked at the natural and fair import of the words, the connection in which they occur, the office they were designed to perform, and the obligations which belong to the relation in which the parties stood to each other under the contract.

And first, as to the natural and fair import of the phrase "dangers of the seas," I think it must be admitted that it indicates only those perils which are peculiar to the sea. So it has been generally understood. Story, Bailm. § 512; 3 Kent, Comm. 275. It is true that a broader meaning has, in many cases of insurance, been given to it; and it would not be practicable to fix any definition of the phrase which would be justly applicable to it in all contracts. The words have a strict sense, in which they include only the natural accidents peculiar to the sea. They have also a more extended sense in which they import accidents occurring upon the sea. And the true question here is, whether they should receive one or the other interpretation when they stand as an exception in a covenant by the charterer to restore the vessel to the owner.

It is a sound rule of construction, that a covenant, introduced ex industria into an instrument, shall be deemed to have been inserted for some purpose, and that the purpose was, not to leave the rights of the parties, as they would have been, had no such covenant existed. Now if this covenant had not been inserted, it would have been the duty of the charterer to restore the vessel to the owner, at the expiration of the voyages for which she was hired, excepting only ordinary wear, and such losses as the charterer, by the use of due diligence, could not guard against. Such are the obligations attached by the law, independent of all stipulations, to the contract of hiring a thing. Story, Bailm. § 397-400. And if this exception is to receive a lax interpretation, the covenant adds nothing to the obligations of the charterer. He is only bound to restore the vessel, excepting ordinary wear and such losses upon the sea, as the charterer could not, by using due diligence, prevent. For I suppose it cannot be maintained that a casualty would be deemed a peril of the sea, within this exception, if the charterer, by the use of due diligence, could have guarded against and prevented it. Otherwise, the covenant, instead of adding anything to the obligations of the hirer, has lessened those obligations. It does not seem to me probable that the parties have inserted this covenant intending to lessen the obligations attached by the law to the contract of hiring, or to leave those obligations unchanged. And this view is strengthened by the form and nature of the covenant and the exception out of it, and the rule of interpretation applicable to such an exception. By the covenant the charterer makes himself an insurer; by the exception he excludes certain risks. The rule of construction as to exceptions is, that they are to be taken most strongly against the party for whose benefit they are introduced. This rule has been repeatedly applied to contracts of insurance. The court of exchequer rested its decision upon it in Blackett v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 2 Crompton & J. 251. In Donnell v. Columbian Ins. Co., [Case No. 3,987.] Mr. Justice Story held it properly applicable to such contracts, as he also did in Palmer v. Warren Ins. Co., [Id. 10,698.] It is a settled rule of construction which is applicable to this covenant. These words of exception being introduced by the covenantor for his own benefit, if they are capable of bearing a more or less extended meaning, the rule requires that meaning to be allowed to them which is least beneficial to the covenantor.

It is a circumstance of some importance in my judgment, though for reasons before suggested not decisive, that accidental fire, occurring through human agency, has never been held to be a peril of the sea under any marine contract. I am aware that in Plaisted v. Boston & K. Steam Nav. Co., 27 Me. 135, it is said by the court to be settled, that fire is a peril of the sea within a policy of insurance. It is true, that the risk of fire is assumed by marine policies, because fire is one of the perils expressly enumerated in such policies. Mr. Phillips in his last edition, (volume 2, note 1099,) says it would have been included, if not expressly mentioned. Perhaps this is a fair deduction from the nature and objects of the contract of insurance; but so far as I know, it never has been included; and the fact that the risk of fire, eo nomine, is taken, in addition to perils of the seas, has some tendency to show that this phrase has not generally been understood to embrace fire, even in such contracts. And I think he would be a bold man who should now venture to strike out from the enumerated risks on a marine policy, the word fire, trusting to the courts to insert it by construction. I should apprehend some difficulty in making such a construction at this day. Taking a more practical view of this question, it does not seem to me that a contract by the charterer to be responsible to the owner for losses by accidental fire is in its nature unreasonable or unlikely to be made. The hirer, in this case had the entire possession, command, and navigation of the vessel. He appointed the master and hired the crew. They were his servants. The owner might well say to him, if a fire occurs through the negligence of your servants on the high seas, or in a distant port, I shall have no proper means of proving that negligence. I do not choose to leave any such question open. You must take the responsibility for loss by fire. It was upon grounds of public policy, similar to these, that the common law held carriers liable for accidental fire, and though that public policy did not embrace charterers of vessels, it shows that owners may find reasons of a similar character for protecting themselves by contract from similar dangers. Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the fire by which this vessel was destroyed, was not a peril of the sea within the exception in the covenant, and consequently the charterer was liable for the loss.

As to the damages, as the libellant did not appeal, he cannot claim greater damages in this court than were allowed in the district court. Stratton v. Jarvis, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 4; Canter v. American Ins. Co., 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 318. The respondents have made some suggestions, by way of argument, to reduce the amount of damages decreed below; but I think the decree should not be disturbed in this particular. The respondents did not assign as error in that decree, that the damages, if any should be allowed, were excessive. But if they had done so, I do not think any error has been shown. It is urged that the value of the vessel as she lay on the shoal should be taken, and this is correct, provided the stranding was not upon a well-known shoal, or was effected by causes beyond the control of the master. There is difficulty in coming to a conclusion, favorable to the respondents, on either of these points. I have not thought it necessary to go into a minute examination of the evidence concerning them, because I am of opinion that I cannot treat the value of the vessel as materially diminished by the stranding. It is not so pleaded in the answer, which admits her value to be $2,000, the sum fixed upon by the district court. Nor does the evidence satisfactorily show, that the position of the vessel on the shoal was such, as exposed her to much peril, or would have occasioned any considerable expense to get her off. There is not a little discrepancy between the evidence which comes from the vessel and the shoresmen who went on board. And, considering that the burden is on the respondents, to bring the case within the exception in their covenant, by showing that the vessel's value was reduced, before she was burnt, by a danger of the sea, I am not satisfied that they have sustained that burden. The libel claims the charter money for one month and a half, and the answer denies that any thing ever became due on this account. But it does not allege that the vessel was unseaworthy when she sailed on her voyage from Frankfort, and if she were not, I perceive no reason why this monthly hire was not properly allowed by the district court. The decree of the district court is affirmed with costs.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel, owned by a citizen of New Orleans, and registered there, by authority of the Confederate States, on the 20th of November, 1861, was captured by the United States public ship New London on the 28th of November, 1861, in Mississippi sound, laden with a cargo of turpentine and tar. The cargo was the property of Black, the supercargo. Neither the manifest nor any other papers on board the vessel designate the voyage contemplated to be made; but it appears, from the testimony of the master and the mate, on their examination, and by the written parole given by the supercargo on the arrest of the vessel, that the cargo and vessel were destined for Balize, in Honduras. The evidence in the case is unequivocal that the voyage was undertaken by the mutual concurrence of the owner of the vessel and the owner of the cargo, to evade the blockade at the port of New Orleans, and that they were both of them, at the time, residents of that place, and well aware of the existence of the blockade. The supercargo was an Englishman by birth, but had been, for many years prior to the seizure of the cargo, residing with his family at New Orleans, and doing business there. The owner of the vessel, though a native of the state of New York, had been for many years settled in business in New Orleans, and a resident there with family. He purchased the vessel, and had her registered to him in his own name, and on his oath that he was a citizen of the Confederate States, on the 20th of November, 1861. Jecker v. Montgomery, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 498; Id., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 110; Fay v. Montgomery, [Case No. 4,709.]

After the capture, the flag officer of the United States squadron ordered an appraisal of the vessel, and appropriated her to the use of the United States government, and transmitted her cargo and officers, on the United States' vessel supply, to the port of New York, to the cognizance of the United States prize court. The prize was thus brought fully under the cognizance of this court. Proceeds of Prizes of War, [Case No. 11,440.]

Upon the proofs in the suit produced by the attorney for the United States, no one appearing to contest the same, it is ordered that a decree be entered condemning the appraised valuation of the vessel and the cargo seized on board of her, with costs, and directing a distribution of the proceeds thereof, according to law.

Circuit Court, Seventh Circuit, D. Wisconsin. Feb. Term, 1869.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—TIME OF MAKING APPLICATION.

1. A state court has no power to entertain an appeal or other proceeding to review an order made in such court granting a petition to remove a cause from the state court to a court of the United States; nor can the state court withhold or delay the transfer of the record from its clerk's office to the United States court pending any such review.

2. An application in a state court for the removal of a cause to a United States court, made after trial and judgment in a state court of original jurisdiction, and judgment of a state court of appellate jurisdiction, which in effect reverses the judgment below and orders a new trial or hearing, is in season, where the application is made under the act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 558),—which authorizes the petition to be filed at any time “before the final hearing or trial” of the suit. The reversal and order for a new trial or hearing open the case to litigation the same as if no judgment had ever been rendered.

[3. Cited in Kellogg v. Hughes, Case No. 7,662; McCallon v. Waterman, Id. 8,675. Questioned in Hancock v. Holbrook, 27 Fed. Rep. 402, as to the point that it is not necessary that the plaintiff or defendant, consisting of more than one party, should be collectively so situated as to authorize a removal.]

This was a motion by the plaintiff, a citizen of the state of New York, for an order allowing him to file in this court copies of the process, pleadings, depositions, testimony and other proceedings in this cause, the clerk of the state court from which removal was sought having refused to make and certify such copies. This case had been pending in the circuit court of Dane county, which on the 28th of October, 1869, had on petition and papers filed by the plaintiff required the defendant to show cause why the case should not be removed to the circuit court of the United States. On the 8th of November the following order was entered: "And the court having heard the counsel of the parties, and being sufficiently advised therein, ordered and declared that in this action now pending in this court there is a controversy between Jay Camiah Akerly, the plaintiff, a citizen of the state of New York, and Levi B. Vilas, one of the defendants, a citizen of the state of Wisconsin; that the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs; that the plaintiff has made and filed in this court an affidavit as required by the act of congress, approved March 2, 1867, and in all other respects complied with said act. And it is further ordered, that this court doth accept the surety offered by the plaintiff, and that all proceedings in said cause be and they are hereby stayed, and this cause is hereby removed into the circuit court of the United States, in and for the district of Wisconsin." On the 26th day of December, 1868, application was made by the plaintiff to the clerk of the circuit court of Dane county for a certified copy of the record and proceedings in this case, for the purpose of transferring it to this court, according to the order of that court, and the bond of the plaintiff, according to law, and the fees of the clerk for making and certifying a copy were tendered, which he refused to accept; he also refused to furnish the copies demanded, stating that he was bound to obey an order of the Dane county circuit court, prohibiting him from making such copies. The state court, in addition to the order of removal, had made an order allowing an appeal from said order of removal to the state supreme court, and enjoining its clerk from furnishing copies and proceedings pending said appeal. [In its various phases, the case is also reported in 15 Wis. 401; 21 Wis. 88, 382; 23 Wis. 207, 628; 24 Wis. 165; 25 Wis. Append. A. 703.]

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for complainant.
 Spooner & Vilas, for defendants.

MILLER, District Judge. This motion is made under the act of March 2, 1833, § 4, (4 Stat. 634,) which enacts that "in any case in which any party is, or may be, by law entitled to copies of the records and proceedings in any suit or prosecution in any state court to be used in any court of the United States, if the clerk of said court shall upon demand, and the payment or tender of the legal fees, refuse or neglect to deliver to such party certified copies of such record and proceedings, the court of the United States in which such record and proceedings may be needed, on proof by affidavit, that the clerk of such court has refused or neglected to deliver copies thereof on demand as aforesaid, may direct and allow such record to be supplied by affidavit or otherwise, as the circumstances of the case may require or allow, and thereupon such proceeding, trial and judgment may be had in the said court of the United States, and all such process awarded, as if certified copies of such records and proceedings had been regularly before the said court." The conditions of removal of causes from a court of the state to a court of the United States, according to the act approved March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 558,) are that where a suit is pending in the state court at the time of the application for removal, in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, such citizen of another state, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, if he shall make and file in such court an affidavit stating that he has reason to, and does believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court, may, at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit, file a petition in such state court for the removal of the suit into the next circuit court of the United States, to be held in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety for his entering in such court on the first day of its session copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony and other proceedings, &c. And it shall be thereupon the duty of the state court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the suit.

The circuit court of Dane county was satisfied that all the requirements of the act were complied with by plaintiff, and on inspection of the record found that there had not been a final trial or hearing of the suit. The court then accepted the surety offered, and ordered that all proceedings in the suit be stayed. In section 12 of the act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73) is the same provision in respect to the surety upon an application for the removal of causes from state to United States courts, "that it shall be the duty of the state court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the cause." The supreme court of the United States in Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 97, decided that when the application for the removal of a cause is in proper form, and the facts on which the application is founded are made to appear according to the requirement of the act, the party is entitled to a right to have the cause removed under the law of the United States, and the judge of the state court has no discretion to withhold the right. And when, on application for the removal, it is shown that the case is one embraced by the act, and that the party has complied with the required conditions, it is the duty of the state court to proceed no further in the cause, and every step further taken in the case, whether in the same court or in an appellate court, is coram non judge and, of course, nugatory. See, also, Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 198. Submitting to the authority of the act of congress, and of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, I have no other discretion than to decide that the clerk of the circuit court of Dane county was not justified in withholding the transcript from the plaintiff, either under the prohibition of the court, or by reason of the appeal after acceptance of the surety, and the order of removal of the cause to this court.

I will dispose of the remaining positions of the defendant's counsel as if upon a motion to remand the cause to the Dane circuit court.

It is objected that all the defendants are not citizens of the state of Wisconsin. Levi B. Vilas and Esther G. Vilas, his wife, are the principal party defendants. They are the parties to the mortgage in suit. It is alleged that Martin T. Vilas, one of the defendants, is a citizen of the state of Vermont, and is the owner of the equity of redemption of the mortgaged premises. Thomas Reynolds and Leonard J. Farwell, the remaining defendants, are citizens of this state. It is set out in the petition for removal that the persons named as defendants, except Levi B. Vilas and wife, have been either personally served with process issued in the cause, or have voluntarily entered their appearance, and that all the defendants except Levi B. Vilas have, by the rules and practice of the court, confessed and admitted the plaintiff's cause of action, by not answering the complaint of plaintiff, as required by law and rules and practice of the court. The state court finds that in this action now pending there is a controversy between Jay Camiah Akerly, plaintiff, and Levi B. Vilas, one of the defendants. From this it would seem that the allegation of the petition that the complainant had been taken as confessed against all the defendants except Levi B. Vilas, is correct. The service and appearance of those defendants may possibly require them to appear and answer a new bill to be brought in this court, or, in default of an answer, to let the bill be taken as confessed against them. But whether such be the practice or not, I need not now determine. At the final hearing a question may be raised whether a decree can be made irrespective of these defendants. At present they do not appear to be necessary parties. See Wood v. Davis, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 467.

Another objection to the removal of the cause to this court is, that the application was not made "before the final hearing or trial in the state court."

It appears from a report of the case in 21 Wis. 88, that the suit is for foreclosure of a mortgage given by Levi B. Vilas and wife, to secure the payment of certain bonds. That the cause came on to be heard between the plaintiff and Vilas, the defendant, and a decree was rendered against the plaintiff, the court holding that the bonds and mortgage were invalid, from which decree the plaintiff appealed to the supreme court. And the defendant also appealed for alleged error of the court in striking out his counter-claims, and rejecting evidence in support of them. The supreme court decided that the bonds and mortgage were valid, and that one of the counter-claims was improperly stricken out, and reversed the judgment of the circuit court on both appeals. The cause came on a second time to be tried before the circuit court, when a decree was rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which defendant Vilas appealed upon the ground of the rejection by the court of a certain counter-claim set up in his answer. The supreme court reversed that judgment or decree, and remanded the cause to the Dane circuit court for further proceedings according to law. If the cause had been finally determined by either judgment of the circuit court, or by order of the supreme court, then the application for removal would not have been filed before "the final hearing or trial." But the last order of the supreme court, reversing the judgment of the circuit court, and remanding the cause to that court for further proceedings according to law, opened the whole case to litigation, the same as if no judgment had ever been rendered. The supreme court in effect ordered a venire facias de novo, which required the circuit court to hear the cause as if no hearing or trial had taken place. The whole proceedings were in fieri when the petition for removal was presented to the circuit court. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the petition was presented before the final hearing or trial of the cause.

The motion of plaintiff is granted.

NOTE, [from original report in 2 Biss. 110.] At the September term of the U. S. circuit court, present, Justice Davis and District Judge Miller, a motion of defendants for an order rescinding the above order was denied.

The opinion of the supreme court of Wisconsin in this case will be found in 24 Wis. 165.

Rich*, 106 Mass. 180. Consult also Kingsburg v. Kingsbury, June, 1871, to appear in a subsequent volume of these Reports, [Case No. 7,817,] where it is held that where the decree of the court below was reversed by the supreme court of the state with instructions to dismiss the suit, an application for removal came too late; that it was not the intention of congress that a party dissatisfied with the rulings of the state courts might have a rehearing in the federal courts. Where in a proper case the necessary steps are taken for removal, the state court has no further jurisdiction, and any subsequent steps are coram

For proper practice where the plaintiff persists in proceeding in state court consult Id. Where the defendant, a citizen of another state, regularly files his petition and bond in the state court, in accordance with the provisions of the judiciary act, for the removal of the cause to the U. S. circuit court, the state court is ipso facto ousted of jurisdiction. Any further proceedings are coram non iudice and void. Stevens v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 41 N. Y. 149.

NOTE, [from original report in 1 Abb. U. S. 234.] Subsequent to this decision, the appeal was moved, on behalf of the plaintiff, in the supreme court of the state, and a decision rendered reaching the general results that the order of removal was reviewable on appeal in the state court, and that it was improperly made and should be reversed. We give so much of the opinion in the state court as relates to these two points:

PAINE, J. The application for removal was made by the plaintiff under the act of congress of March 2, 1867, and the appellant claims that the order was erroneous upon two grounds: 1st. That the case was not within the act; 2nd. That if it were within it, the act itself, so far as it professes to authorize a nonresident plaintiff who had commenced his suit in the state court to obtain removal, is invalid.

The respondent's counsel have declined to argue either of these questions, but have contented themselves with simply submitting and briefly discussing the proposition that this court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine this appeal. Of course, this question must be determined upon the hypothesis that it is possible that the case may not have been within the act of congress, and that even if within it, the act may have been invalid. Counsel assume this possibility, for they say that the appellant's remedy "(if indeed he has any) is to apply to the federal court to remand the case to the state court." In support of the position they refer to two classes of authorities. But these wholly fail to sustain it, and in truth warrant directly the opposite conclusion. And it would seem impossible to have drawn any such inference from them, except by confounding the distinction between the two classes, and applying the doctrines of both indiscriminately to each. Thus they first refer to several cases, holding that where a proper application for a removal is made, in a case where the party is entitled to a removal by law, the jurisdiction of the state court ceases, and every subsequent step, except that of sending the case away, is coram non iudice and void. They next cite another class, holding that where the order of removal was improperly made, in a case where the party was not entitled to it, an application may be made to the federal court to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction, and they then seek to transfer to the latter class of cases the doctrines of the former, and to hold that the jurisdiction of the state court ceases, and every step subsequent to the application for removal is equally unauthorized and void in those cases where the order of removal is improper and the party not entitled to it by law, as in the others. Such a conclusion is in conflict with both classes of cases. Both proceed upon the express assumption that it is only when the removal is authorized by law, and the application properly made, that the jurisdiction of the state court is divested and that of the federal court attaches. Both proceed upon the assumption that where this is not the case, the jurisdiction of the state court remains, and the federal court acquires none whatever. And yet we are now asked to hold, that although this case may have been one of the latter class—though it may be one in which there was no law authorizing a removal, and in which, consequently, the federal court acquired no jurisdiction, yet that by some unaccountable process the state court lost it, so that between the two the jurisdiction has lapsed entirely. Such a conclusion would be extraordinary indeed, and it has as little support in authority as it has in reason.

If there was no law authorizing the removal, and there was none if either of the positions taken by the appellant is true, then the jurisdiction of the state court remained unimpaired, and there was no obstacle in the way of its exercise, except the erroneous order that the case be removed. And the idea that the appellate power of the state court cannot be invoked to correct this error—that it remains in abeyance, suspended by such an unauthorized application, that the court which has jurisdiction must decline to exercise it, until the court that has none shall see fit to disclaim it—is one that cannot be supported upon any reasoning. But if the right to appeal exists in a case where the removal is unauthorized, then it must also exist even when the order of removal is proper. The question whether the court has power to hear and determine the appeal, cannot depend upon the conclusion to which it may come on the merits of the order to be reviewed. Nothing is better settled in legal practice, than that an order by which a subordinate court dismisses a case for want of jurisdiction, or in any way divests itself of jurisdiction, is subject to review on appeal. It is within the express provision of our statute that allows an appeal from any order which prevents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken. It is the common practice of all courts. The case of Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, cited by the respondent, is one where the supreme court of the United States reviewed such an order, made by the United States circuit court. It is true in that case the order or judgment of dismissal was reversed, the court holding that the circuit court had jurisdiction. But if they had held differently, they would have affirmed the order, and not have dismissed the writ of error. This is the invariable practice. And this shows that the exercise of the power to hear and determine an appeal from an order by which a subordinate court attempts to divest itself of jurisdiction, is not an assertion of jurisdiction in the case subsequent to and in defiance of the application for removal. It is merely the decision upon that application itself. And that decision, whether the power be exercised by a subordinate or appellate court, is not the exercise of jurisdiction in the case. It is the determination of an independent preliminary question, and one which every court, from the necessity of the case, has the power to determine whenever presented. And whoever invokes the exercise of this power on the part of a subordinate tribunal of the state, must invoke it subject to all the conditions imposed upon that tribunal by the law of its existence; and one of those conditions is that an order made upon such an application is appealable.

That the power to hear and determine an appeal from such an order is entirely independent of the question of jurisdiction to proceed upon the merits of the action, the case of Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48, is an express authority. A motion was there made to dismiss the appeal on the ground of a want of jurisdiction originally in the subordinate court, and the chief justice delivered the opinion of the court, "that the question of jurisdiction in the lower court is a proper one for appeal to this court, and for argument when the case is regularly reached, and that this court have jurisdiction on such appeal." The motion was therefore denied, and upon the express ground that their jurisdiction of the appeal was wholly independent of the actual jurisdiction of the lower court, to try the action upon its merits. And if this is so, the exercise of this appellate power is not the exercise of that jurisdiction of which it is claimed the state court is divested by the presentation of a proper application for removal. It is true that if the appellate court should sustain the jurisdiction of the state tribunals, they might proceed subsequently to attempt to exercise it. But the mere determination of the question whether such jurisdiction had ceased or continued is not an exercise of it, any more when made by the appellate than it was when made by the subordinate court. Indeed, the right and the duty of the state courts to exercise such appellate power has been expressly decided by the supreme court of the United States in Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 198. The court of common pleas in the city of New York had denied an application for removal, and afterwards proceeded to try the action on the merits, and rendered judgment. It was taken by appeal to the superior court, which affirmed the judgment. And the supreme court of the United States reversed that judgment, not on the ground that the superior court erred in taking jurisdiction of the appeal, but in neglecting to reverse the judgment of the common pleas for refusing the application for a removal. They say: "The error of the superior court was, therefore, an error occurring in the exercise of its jurisdiction, by not giving due effect to the act of congress under which the plaintiff in error claimed," &c. And it made an order remanding the case to the superior court, with directions for further proceedings in conformity to the opinion. And such further proceedings would consist wholly of an exercise of the appellate power of the superior court to reverse the judgment of the common pleas. And yet we are referred to this case by the respondent's counsel to support their assertion, that this court will "stultify itself by taking jurisdiction of this appeal."

This court certainly is not oblivious of the fact, that if it should hold that a removal of this suit was unauthorized, and should subsequently proceed to render final judgment after such further trial as may be necessary, the supreme court of the United States may assert its appellate jurisdiction over that judgment, may reverse it, and remand the case with directions similar to those in Kanouse v. Martin, as counsel suggest. But we feel very confident that if it should do so, it will not be because this court erred in assuming jurisdiction of the appeal, but because it will think this court erred in holding the plaintiff not entitled to a removal.

I have thus endeavored to state the distinction between the exercise of the power to decide upon the application for a removal, whether by the subordinate or appellate court, and the exercise of jurisdiction over the merits of the action, for the purpose of showing that the broad language used by the court in Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 104, cannot in any event be applicable to the exercise of such appellate power. But it is perhaps doubtful whether the same language would be now used by that court. The subsequent case of Kanouse v. Martin seems studiously to avoid it, and makes no suggestion that the judgment of the court of common pleas, and of the superior court were void for want of jurisdiction, but speaks of them throughout the opinion as merely "erroneous." And the same view is also supported by the case of Hadley v. Dunlap, 10 Ohio St. 1. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that this order is appealable, and that it is a duty of this court from which it cannot shrink, to proceed to a determination of the questions presented.

Was the case within the provisions of the act of congress? The act provides that the non-resident party to a suit in a state court, between a citizen of that state and a citizen of another state, shall be entitled to a removal, on making the proper application, "at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit." The question arises upon this language, "Was the application here made "before the final hearing or trial," in accordance with its intent and meaning?"

What was its intent? I think it will not be claimed that the word "final," as used in this provision, applies to or qualifies the word "trial." The word "hearing" has an established meaning as applicable to equity cases. It means the same thing in those cases that the word "trial" does in cases at law; and the words "final hearing" have long been used to designate the trial of an equity case upon the merits, as distinguished from the hearing of any preliminary questions arising in the cause, and which are termed interlocutory. This use and meaning of the words are too well established and too familiar to require reference. I assume, therefore, that the meaning of the statute is the same as though these words were transposed, and it provided that the application might be made at any time "before trial or final hearing," and that no implication can be raised by attempting to apply the word "final" to the word "trial," that congress intended to distinguish between those trials which might only partially dispose of the case, and such as might occur afterwards, and to allow this right of removal so long as any question yet remained to be tried, in order to the complete disposition of the suit. It will be observed that in the act of 1866, of which this is amendatory, the words were so transposed, and the application was required to be made "before trial or final hearing;" and their transposition in the present statute was evidently merely casual, not designed to effect, and not effecting any change whatever in their meaning. The obvious intention of the statute was to require the party desiring to apply for a removal to do so before trial in actions at law, and, what is the same thing, before final hearing in actions in equity. The reason and justice of this, if a removal is to be allowed at all, are apparent. Only the non-resident can apply for it. And it would constitute the very essence of injustice to give him the right to experiment upon the decisions of the state tribunals, obtaining those which if in his favor would be binding and conclusive upon the other party, but which if against himself, he could repudiate and take his chances again in a new tribunal. The statute did not intend to provide for any such wrong, but on the contrary clearly designed to exclude the possibility of it, by requiring the application to be made before trial or final hearing. It seems clear, therefore, that whenever in any state court there has been a trial in an action at law, or a final hearing in an action in equity, the result of which was an adjudication, which upon the principles governing judicial decisions would be final between the parties, as to any portion of the merits of the action, the case has passed beyond the stage when it was within either the letter or the spirit of the law. How was it with this suit in that respect? It was an equitable action, brought in 1860, to foreclose a mortgage in the circuit court of Dane county. The defendant, in accordance with the practice prevailing in this state, interposed by way of defense certain counter-claims, growing out of and connected with the transactions in which the mortgage originated. To these there was a demurrer by the plaintiff, which was overruled, and the order overruling it was affirmed on appeal to this court. Various proceedings were subsequently had, and the case was then brought to final hearing, and a decree rendered in favor of the defendant, dismissing the complaint. That was reversed on appeal to this court, and another final hearing was had, in which the plaintiff obtained a judgment. That was reversed by this court, and the cause remanded for further proceedings; and at that stage of it this application for a removal was made. It will be seen, therefore, that instead of being made before final hearing, it was not made until after there had been two final hearings. And it is no solecism to speak of two final hearings in an equity case, any more than it is to speak of two trials in an action at law.

It is material, then, to consider what was the effect of the several decisions of this court in respect to the rights of the parties as to the matters involved in them. No doctrine is better settled here than that the matters decided become res adjudicata; those decisions became the law of the case, binding upon the parties, binding on the subordinate court, and disposing finally of the questions decided. Whatever further proceedings might be necessary to the ultimate disposition of the case, those questions were no longer open. Luning v. State, 1 Chand. 264; Parker v. Pomeroy, 2 Wis. 112; Downer v. Cross, Id. 371; Cole v. Clarke, 3 Wis. 323; Reed v. Jones, 15 Wis. 40. If this rule were peculiar to this state, still the decisions of this court would govern, as to the effect of our own judicial proceedings between the parties. But the same rule prevails everywhere; and it has been asserted by the supreme court of the United States quite as strongly as by any other tribunal. In Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 304, counsel raised a question as to the propriety of a former decision, the case having already been before the court on a former writ of error. On page 355, the court say: "In the next place, in ordinary cases, a second writ of error has never been supposed to draw in question the propriety of the first judgment, and it is difficult to perceive how such a proceeding could be sustained upon principle. A final judgment of this court is supposed to be conclusive upon the rights which it decides, and no statute has provided any process by which this court can revise its own judgments. In several cases which have been formally adjudged in this court, the same point was argued by counsel and expressly overruled. It was solemnly held that a final judgment of this court was conclusive upon the parties, and could not be re-examined." So it was held that the same rule prevailed in equity, and that a second appeal to that court brought up only the propriety of the proceedings in the court below, subsequent to the mandate on the first. Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 109. In Ex parte Sibbald, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 492, that court said, "a final decree in chancery is as conclusive as a judgment at law. Both are conclusive of the rights of the parties thereby adjudicated." See also, Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 413; Roberts v. Cooper, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 467. It appears, therefore, that by the principles universally recognized as applicable to the effect of judicial proceedings, there had been several trials of this case, both in the subordinate and appellate courts of this state, and several judgments by the latter, which, so far as our judicial system is concerned, were final and conclusive between the parties, as to the questions decided.

It is true, those judgments did not finally dispose of the case. But that fact does not at all impeach their finality as to the matters disposed of by them. There are few important cases but what are carried more than once into the appellate courts. But the fact that the judgments of those courts do not in the first instance completely dispose of the case, has never been supposed to annul their effect entirely, and to place the case, when it got back into the subordinate court, precisely as it would be if there had never been any trial or appeal whatever. On the contrary, as the authorities above referred to fully show, when the case gets back into the inferior court it carries with it the judgment of the superior as the established law of the case, and no questions are open to further examination except those which that judgment has left open.

A trial or final hearing consists of the examination and determination both of questions of law and fact. In equity cases the court may determine both. On appeal this court may determine both. But the case may have been so presented that we could only properly determine the questions of law, leaving a further trial upon a part or all of the facts necessary for a complete adjustment of the controversy. This was true in this suit. The struggle in the case was upon the questions of law growing out of the defendant's counter-claims. Those questions were fully considered, and finally decided on the last appeal to this court; and the case was remanded for such further trial upon the questions of fact, as was necessary to its final determination. And yet after all these years of litigation, these repeated hearings and judgments, both of the subordinate and appellate courts of this state, it is now claimed that this application for a removal was made, "before trial or final hearing." If such had been the intention of congress, I cannot think it would have stopped where it did. If it would set aside and destroy the effect of repeated trials and judgments, why hesitate before the last one? If it would intervene after all the most important questions in the case had been tried and passed into judgments, binding and conclusive on the parties, why pause before the fact that some question, perhaps a minor and unimportant one, still remained to be tried, in order to a complete disposition of the case? When tried, the judgment concerning it could be no more final, no more binding, than the previous judgments had been as to matters involved in them. Hence, if they were to be overthrown, why not overthrow the whole, and allow the party to remove his case, and try it anew in a court of original jurisdiction, after it was finally and wholly disposed of by the judgment of the state court? There could be no greater objection to the justice of such a law than there is to it as it now stands. If it is to have the effect contended for. If the effect of two trials and judgments in all the state courts was to be annulled, there could be no reason why the same thing should not be done as to three or any other number necessary to dispose of the case.

But the act furnishes no evidence of such intention. On the contrary, both its letter and spirit exclude it. The law had formerly allowed only non-resident defendants to apply for a removal. And they were required to be prompt, and to make their election at the outset, and before taking any steps which could be construed into a voluntary submission to the jurisdiction of the state court. This act designed to extend the right to non-resident plaintiffs as well. It designed to extend the time, so that the application might be made at any time before trial or final hearing. But it did not design to go so far as to allow the party actually to submit his case to the judgment of the state court on the merits, and then, if its judgment should be against him, but should not happen to finally determine the case, to exercise his right of removal. To induce a court of justice to infer a design to effect such an object, to borrow the language of Chief Justice Marshall, "the intention should be expressed with irresistible clearness." But here, so far from that being the case, congress has explicitly required that the application shall be made "before final hearing or trial." And the spirit and object of the act unite with its letter, in conducting imperatively to the conclusion that its meaning was to require it to be made before the party had voluntarily submitted his case to any trial or final hearing whatever in the state court.

Nor is this conclusion at all impeached by the rule that has been established by the federal and other courts, under statutes authorizing appeals or writs of error from final judgments or decrees. It is generally held there, that the decree or judgment must be one purporting a full and final disposition of the case, and not on its face reserving a part of it for future decision by the court; yet, even in those cases, the rule has not been held with unreasonable strictness, but those decrees which substantially dispose of the merits of the controversy are held final so as to allow an appeal, although some matters essential to a complete execution of the decree are reserved for further examination and decree. Thus, in For-gay v. Conrad, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 201, a decree was passed disposing of the general merits of the action, but directing an account of rents and profits, and reserving that subject for further decree. A motion was made to dismiss, on the ground that the decree was not final. The court said: "The question upon the motion to dismiss is, whether this is a final decree within the meaning of the acts of congress. Undoubtedly it is not final within the strict technical sense of that term. But this court has not heretofore understood the words 'final decrees' in this strict and technical sense, but has given to them a more liberal, and, as we think, a more reasonable construction, and one more consonant to the intention of the legislature." See, also, Bronson v. Railroad, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 524, 531. But even if, under this class of statutes, it were held that the decree or judgment must be absolutely final to authorize an appeal, no argument could be drawn from it by analogy against the conclusion already arrived at. The difference in the objects of the two statutes would at once furnish an answer. The one is designed to regulate the exercise of an appellate jurisdiction, by which the judgments of an inferior tribunal may be reviewed. It is natural in such case to require the inferior court first to dispose, substantially at least, of the whole case, before the appellate power could be invoked. But the object of the other statute was not to provide for a review of the decisions of an inferior tribunal, but for the exercise of an election by a party to a suit in a state court, to transfer it to another court of original jurisdiction for trial. The design was to authorize an election between the two; not to give him a chance at both. And this object can only be accomplished by requiring, as the statute does, the application to be made before any trial or final hearing in the case. The object of the one statute was to prevent an appeal until everything had been decided. The object of the other was to authorize a removal only before anything had been decided.

It seems to me clear, therefore, that this case was not within the act of congress, and that the order for removal was unauthorized. I am aware that the learned judge of the district court of the United States for this district has reached a different conclusion. His opinion upon the subject is published in the American Law Register for April, 1869. Upon this point he says: "If the cause had been finally determined by either judgment of the circuit court, or by order of the supreme court, then the application for removal would not have been filed before 'the final hearing or trial.' But the last order of the supreme court reversing the judgment of the circuit court, and remanding the cause to that court for further proceedings according to law, opened the whole case to litigation, the same as if no judgment had ever been rendered. The supreme court in effect ordered a venire facias de novo, which required the circuit court to hear the cause as if no hearing or trial had taken place." If this is so, then this court has been laboring under a great delusion. If, after a case has been three times in this court, twice on appeal from final judgments in the court below, if after the essential vital legal questions upon which its decision depends have been solemnly adjudicated by this court, and the cause remanded to the circuit, it starts there anew with nothing settled, "the whole case opened to litigation, as if no judgment had ever been rendered," then are not only our labors fruitless indeed, but those of the unfortunate litigants in the state courts are vainer than the labors of Sisyphus. We have not so understood the law. We have uniformly applied to our decisions, so far as relates to matters within our jurisdiction, the same rule which the supreme court of the United States applies to its decisions; and have held that they become the law of the case, binding on the parties and the subordinate courts, and that the questions decided are not open to further litigation. We cannot have erred in this, unless the decisions of this court constitute an exception to the rule by which those of all other courts are governed.

I cannot but regret that this difference of opinion has arisen between this court and the learned judge of the district court. It may be the cause of much embarrassment and expense to the parties. But inasmuch as the difference does exist, I know of no way to avoid its consequences, whatever they may be. There seems but one course open to this court, consistent with its duty to itself and to the state, when its appellate power is invoked in the regular course of judicial proceedings, and that is, to exercise the jurisdiction which it believes itself to possess, according to its best judgment, whether that be well or ill founded.

The remainder of the opinion relates to the question whether it is competent for congress to authorize a non-resident plaintiff, who has voluntarily brought his suit in the state court, to obtain a removal.

AKERLY v. VILAS.¹

[3 Biss. 332; 5 Chi. Leg. News, 73; 16 Int. Rev. Rec. 154.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Wisconsin. Sept., 1872.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ORIGINAL PLEADINGS—DEFENSES PRESERVED—INTERLOCUTORY ORDERS—ESTOPPEL.

1. An action removed after issue joined, from the state to the federal courts, under the act of July 27, 1866, as amended by the act of March 2, 1867, must be tried in the federal courts upon the pleadings certified from the state courts, and the same force and effect must be given to them by the federal courts as in the state courts if the case had remained there.

2. In such a case the cause stands in the federal courts as it stood in the courts of the state, the former clothed with the powers of the state courts, and all rights acquired by, and all defenses allowed under the state laws are to be recognized in this court.

3. Congress did not intend by these statutes to allow either party to obtain a practice or ruling more favorable to them, or when dissatisfied in the state court to obtain a trial de novo.

4. The decision of a court upon a motion does not partake of the quality of a judgment in such a sense as to preclude the same court from a further examination of the same question. The proceedings before judgment are within its control, and orders made may be revised, and vacated or set aside.

5. The doctrine of estoppel does not go so far as to preclude a further inquiry and a rehearing of a motion upon an enlarged state of facts, nor prevent this court from revising an order made in the case while pending in the United States circuit court for the district from which it had been removed.

6. The doctrine of res adjudicata considered.

[7. Cited in Wolff v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., Case No. 17,924, to the point that, where a suit comes into the federal court by removal, it brings along with it as an incident all the costs which accrued or attached under the state law during the time it remained in the state court.]

In equity. This was an action commenced in the circuit court of Dane county, in the State of Wisconsin, in 1860, to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendant to plaintiff and one Mrs. Lord, she having assigned her interest to plaintiff. The defendant answered, setting up various defenses and counter claims, among others an alleged breach of covenant by the plaintiff, for which he claimed damages in the sum of $100,000, stating that the mortgage was given to secure a part of the purchase price of certain real estate conveyed by plaintiff to defendant by deed, containing covenants of quiet enjoyment and general warranty, and averring a breach thereof by the plaintiff. The circuit court struck out the counter-claim, but on appeal the supreme court of the state held it well pleaded under the state practice, and remanded the case for further proceedings. After such decision, and after the testimony had been taken upon the issues made up in the state court, the plaintiff procured a removal of the case to the United States circuit court for the district of Wisconsin, under the act of March 2, 1867. For opinion on this removal consult 2 Biss. 110, [Akerly v. Vilas, Case No. 119.] The plaintiff, by reason of an order of the state circuit judge, prohibiting the clerk from furnishing copies of the pleadings and proceedings in the case in that court, was unable to obtain certified copies of the record, etc., from the state court, but the United States court allowed sworn copies to be filed in lieu thereof, and thereupon entered and docketed the case. The plaintiff then filed a new bill and the court entered an order or rule that defendant plead or demur thereto. Defendant moved to strike it from the files, which motion was denied. The defendant then answered on the merits and plaintiff excepted. Before the exceptions were passed upon, the defendant obtained an order, under the 6th section of the act dividing Wisconsin into two districts, transferring the case from the eastern to this district. After the transcript of the record of the eastern district was filed in this court, the defendant moved for an order that plaintiff procure and file certified copies of the process, pleadings, etc., from the state court, which motion was granted, and such copies were procured and filed. The defendant then moved for an order striking out all the pleadings filed in the federal court, and directing the action to be tried on the pleadings and issues made up in the state court. The plaintiff, at the same time, moved that his exceptions to the defendant's answer (which contained the same matters of defense and counter claims as the answer filed in the state court) be allowed. The case is reported in its various phases, in 15 Wis. 401; 21 Wis. 88, 377; 23 Wis. 207; 25 Wis. Appen. A. 703.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for complainant.
Wm. F. Vilas & P. F. Spooner, for defendants.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and HOPKINS, District Judge.

HOPKINS, District Judge. This case, as presented by the motions of the respective parties, involves but two questions requiring consideration at this time.

First. Does the act of July 27, 1866, (2 Brightly, 115; 14 Stat. 306,) as amended by act of March 2, 1867, (2 Brightly, 116; 14 Stat. 558,) providing for the removal of certain cases from the state to the federal courts for trial, authorize or allow the parties to file new pleadings in the federal courts, or to change the issue, made up in the state courts before removal?

Second. If not, is this court estopped by the orders made while in the circuit court of the United States, before the removal of the cause to this district, one, requiring the defendant to answer the new bill filed in that court, and the other, denying a motion made by the defendant to strike such bill from the files? Another important question might arise, if the court should reach that point, viz.: Whether the decision on those motions involved or settled the kind of answer, or the matter of the answer, the defendant might put in. It seems to me, if it should be necessary to consider this, that the alleged estoppel might be found not to extend to or embrace the questions presented on this motion.

The defendant answered, setting up the history of the case in the state courts, and the same defenses that he set up in the state court, upon which the various proceedings recited therein had been had.

The complainant filed exceptions to that answer, which present the question, for the first time, it seems to me, as to the kind of defense and answer the defendant might interpose in this court; or, in other words, whether the case should be tried upon the issues made up in the state court, or whether it should be considered as commenced de novo, and new pleadings be filed containing only such matters of defense as are permissible under the practice and pleadings of this court in cases originally commenced herein. This is the important question and it requires careful consideration. The practice, where a case was removed to the federal court, under the judiciary act of 1789,

(1 Brightly, 128; 1 Stat. 79), in states where the statutes had changed the common law forms, was to file new pleadings. That act, however, only required the party removing to file copies of the process. Section 12. And, as under that, the application had to be made on the defendant's entering his appearance, it was before he had plead, or taken any steps in the case. So the courts had to treat it as a case just commenced in the federal courts, and apply to it the practice existing there.

The act under which this case was removed is essentially different from that in many respects, and requires a very different practice.

The act under which this case was removed authorizes the application to be made after issue joined, and requires the party petitioning for removal to give ball to enter in the federal court copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit. The act to which this is amendatory declares that "all pleadings filed or entered as aforesaid in the United States court by the defendant applying for the removal of the cause, shall have the same force and effect in every respect and for every purpose as the original pleadings would have had by the laws and practice of the courts of such state if the cause had remained in the state court." In that act, as in the amendment to it, the following provision is contained: "And said copies being so entered as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process." This, the plaintiff's counsel claims, makes it necessary to treat the case as just commenced in this court by the service of process, and to take the usual proceedings as from that point. I cannot concur in that view. Full effect is given to that provision by holding it to mean that the jurisdiction of the court over the parties and the subject matter is as complete when brought in in that way, as when obtained by the service of original process.

The same phrase or sentence is in the original act of 1789, and in the act of 1866, and congress could not have intended it should receive any such construction, for then it would conflict with the provision in the last act declaring what were the force and effect of the pleadings filed in the state courts. The act of 1867 being an amendment of the act of 1866, according to the rule for the construction of amendments to statutes, is to be read as if incorporated into the original act, which would make the clause in that act prescribing the effect to be given to the pleadings in the state courts applicable alike to cases of removal under the amended act.

Thus construed, they mean that all proceedings necessary after the removal to a final trial or hearing shall be conducted in the same manner, and the case, as to such proceedings, shall be regarded as if originally commenced in this court. In the language of the statute, "the state courts shall proceed no further therein, and the suit shall thereafter proceed in the federal courts." If it were not so, and the proceedings were not to stand as the pleadings in the cause, why require copies to be filed? What was the object of this change from the judiciary act of 1789? That only required copies of the process to be filed; this, copies of the process, pleadings, depositions, testimony and proceedings.

I cannot construe the statute otherwise than that the issues made up in the case on its removal remain and constitute the issues to be tried in the federal courts; and as a necessary consequence, all the rights secured by either party under the practice and laws of the state where the suit was commenced, are impressed upon the case, and as full effect must be given to them in the federal as would have been given by the state courts if tried there. And by this is meant nothing more than this—that when the case is removed, it stands in the federal court as it stood in the inferior and appellate courts of the state, the federal courts clothed with the powers of all the state courts through which the case might pass, but subject of course to the limitations existing under our mixed system, and giving the proper effect only to the adjudications of the highest court of the state, as well in the past as in the future progress of the case. There is no hardship in this construction. A non-resident plaintiff voluntarily commences a suit in the state court when he might sue in the federal court. He therefore has no reason to complain. A non-resident defendant, when sued in the state courts, may remove before pleading, if he chooses; so he cannot complain. Therefore, to hold, after such voluntary action of the parties, that all rights acquired by, and all defenses allowable under the state laws, are to be recognized and preserved in the federal courts, is not inflicting any hardship upon either party, certainly not on the party entitled to a removal.

The opinion of the court, by Chase, Ch. J., in West v. City of Aurora, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 139, a case removed from the state court of Indiana on application of plaintiff after plea by defendant, seems especially applicable upon this point. In that he says: "They (the plaintiffs) were bound to know of what rights the defendants to their suit might avail themselves under the code (of Indiana.) Submitting themselves to its (the state's) jurisdiction, they submitted themselves to it in its whole extent." The same doctrine is laid down in Thompson v. Railroad Co., Id. 134. By the statutes of Ohio, a suit was authorized to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, which was not the rule in the United States courts. The case was properly commenced under the Ohio statute, and the supreme court, in passing upon the effect to be given to that statute, say: "If they could have maintained it in their names in the state court, they had an equal right to maintain it in their names when it arrived in the federal court."

So the fact that the defendant's answer contains defenses which would not be allowable in actions originally commenced in this court, does not determine the question of his right to interpose such an answer. If such defenses are pleadable in the state courts, they must be allowed in this court, for all the rights acquired by the defendant under the state laws before removal, are, and must be, recognized and preserved here as sacredly as in the state courts. In such cases the federal courts have to look to the state laws and practice to determine the sufficiency of the pleadings. This construction prevents abuse, while the other would allow parties to speculate and experiment upon their chances in the state courts, and, if they found the state law gave their adversaries more privileges than they would have under the practice and system of pleadings in the federal courts, they would remove their cases to that court, and thus strike out the pleadings and defenses they might not like, and commence and continue their case upon a theory better suited to their purposes.

The act does not permit any such injustice. It allows the removal of the case to the federal courts for trial in the condition it is in when removed, and provides for finishing it up from that point in those courts.

It does not confer upon the court appellate, but only original jurisdiction, concurrent with the state courts. The case is transferred cum onere. It may, therefore, be conceded that the defenses set up in this answer would not be admissible under the system of pleadings and practice of this court. But that does not dispose of the question under consideration, for congress has the power to change the form of pleadings, and adopt any system of practice and pleadings it may choose. That matter is wholly within its discretion. This it has recently done in cases other than those of equity and admiralty, and there is no doubt it could change the forms of pleadings in those cases also. Act of June 1, 1872. And it may fairly be held that by providing for the removal of cases after issue joined, they intended to establish or allow a different practice in such cases; to accept the pleadings made up in the state courts, and to try such cases on those pleadings, and, to that end, the pleadings, testimony, and all proceedings were required to be certified so that the federal court can take up the case in the condition it receives it, and try it, so far as the pleadings are concerned, as it would have been tried in the state courts, preserving to the respective parties all their constitutional rights. This construction gives force and effect to all of the provisions of the act, and seems to be its natural meaning.

The removal is allowed because it is feared that a fair trial cannot be had from "prejudice or local influence," not because the statutes of the state in reference to the practice of its courts are different from the practice of this court. Congress did not intend to condemn the codes and mode of procedure in the state courts, either as unsuited or inadequate to the attainment of justice.

The object of the statute was to secure an impartial trial of the case, having reference to the tribunals, the courts, or juries, not the systems of practice that might exist in the several states. It did not intend to allow a case to be removed because a state might adopt the code, or allow to defendants additional defenses to those permitted in the federal courts.

This case would furnish as striking an illustration of the injustice of an opposite construction as could well be supposed. It had been pending and severely litigated in the circuit and supreme courts of this state for a period of eight years before removal. It had been repeatedly before the supreme court of the state. The pleadings had been considered and sustained by that court, as in accordance with the statutes of the state. The testimony bearing upon the issues had been taken by both parties. Now, to allow a removal of the case, at that stage, to this court, and to reject all the pleadings, decisions and proceedings had in the case before removal, and commence de novo, would be a reproach upon our system of jurisprudence. But it is argued by the plaintiff's counsel, that if this construction is correct, as an original proposition, the court is estopped from so holding, because of the order of the circuit court of the United States, before removal here, denying the motion to strike from the files the bill filed therein, after the removal from the state court. It therefore becomes necessary to examine whether or not this court is thus restricted. It is undoubtedly true that courts very seldom rehear a matter or review a decision made upon a motion upon the same facts; yet they may. The conclusive effect of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is not questioned. But the question here is, whether that rule embraces this case. Did that decision partake of the quality of a judgment in such a sense as to bring it within the doctrine of res adjudicata, so as to preclude that court, if this cause had continued before it, from further examining the question presented here; and if it did not, then this court is not estopped, for it has the same control over the case as the other court would have had, and is not estopped to any greater extent than that, and it is its duty to decide all questions that may be presented, and it cannot avoid that responsibility on the ground of estoppel, unless the decision clearly brings it within the established rules on that subject. It cannot rightly withhold its judgment on the ground of courtesy or comity unless the former decision is final. The most generous comity does not require one court to give to the decision of another court of concurrent jurisdiction any greater force than the court pronouncing it. Comity does not enlarge the conclusive operation of the doctrine of res adjudicata.

It therefore becomes necessary to examine the cases and ascertain what are the rules on the subject of res adjudicata, and to what cases, and under what circumstances they are to be applied. The reported cases have left the question in some doubt and confusion. The United States supreme court, in Breedlove v. Nicolet, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 413, in effect hold that decisions upon motions are not final or absolutely binding upon the court in the further progress of the cause. In that case, after several pleas in bar, the defendant offered, and was allowed by the court, to plead in abatement to the jurisdiction; and afterwards, and on the trial, that plea was disregarded and taken from the files of the court, although it had been placed there by order of the court. On error to the supreme court the point was distinctly taken, "that the plea to the jurisdiction was lawfully filed, and ought not to have been taken from the files by the court." On that question, Marshall, C. J., said: "All the proceedings are supposed to be within the control of the court while they are in paper, and before a jury is sworn or a judgment given. If so, the orders made may be revised, and such as in the judgment of the court may have been irregularly and improperly made, may be set aside." In that case, the court had ordered the plea to be filed, which was on the trial disregarded and taken off. In this case the court denied the motion to strike the bill from the files. No distinction is perceivable in the cases, so far as the question of the power of the court is concerned, and it seems to me, according to the doctrine of that case, that the orders relied upon in this do not deprive the court of the power of reconsidering those questions and of vacating those orders, if it thinks it right to do so. Such being my understanding of that case, the plaintiff's objection on the ground of estoppel cannot be sustained. Nor is this doctrine without support in other well-reasoned cases. In Simson v. Hart, 14 Johns. 62, 76, Spencer, J., who delivered the opinion of the court of errors, in speaking of decisions upon motions, says: "In the same court these decisions are not considered as so final and decisive as to furnish a bar to another and further decision of the question. Courts, to prevent vexatious and repeated applications upon the same point, have rules which preclude the agitation of the same questions upon the same state of facts. These rules are for the orderly conduct of business, and are not founded upon the principle of res adjudicata."

This language was used in the case of a bill in equity, filed to set off judgments obtained in different courts. It was objected that because a court of law which had jurisdiction had denied a motion to accomplish the same object, that a court of equity could not grant the relief asked. But the court held that the decision of the motion did not bar the suit; that such application, and the decision thereon, did not partake of the quality of a judgment, so as to be a bar, on the ground among others, "that the same court might, with entire propriety, hear a new discussion of the question." See, also, Dickenson v. Gilliland, 1 Cow. 495; Arden v. Patterson, 5 Johns. Ch. 52.

But there is another answer to the pretended estoppel. The doctrine of estoppel does not, within any rule, go so far as to prevent further inquiry and a rehearing of a motion upon an enlarged state of facts. "The decision of a court upon a motion is received as an estoppel only upon facts exactly similar. The case must be exactly commensurate with what it was when the prior order was made." People v. Mercein, 3 Hill, 399, 416. By this language it will be seen with what strictness the courts apply the rule when they recognize its existence. Mitchell v. Allen, 12 Wend. 290; Dollfus v. Frosch, 5 Hill, 493. That construction defeats the estoppel set up here. This case is changed; it is not in the exact condition it was when the orders relied upon were made. At that time certified copies of the pleadings in the state court were not filed. Since then the defendant has answered, and the plaintiff has excepted to it, and this court has granted an order after argument requiring the plaintiff to procure and file copies of process, pleadings, etc., which has been done, so that the pleadings and proceedings had in the state court are now for the first time before this court in an authentic form. I think, therefore, the case is so far changed on this motion that this court, within the most generous extension of the doctrine of res adjudicata, is not estopped from entertaining and deciding the questions now presented. But, as I at first suggested, I do not see how the decision relied upon could be extended so as to include and determine the question as to what kind of an answer the defendant might interpose. That could not properly be considered until the answer was filed. I therefore think the motion of the defendant should be granted.

NOTE, [from original report.] The federal courts follow the state practice in cases removed under the acts of congress. Republic Ins. Co. v. Williams, [Case No. 11,707.] Also, in many respects, in pleadings and practice in bankruptcy proceedings. In re Findlay, [Id. 4,789.] That congress did not intend to allow a party dissatisfied with the ruling of the state court to obtain a more favorable tribunal, or a trial de novo, consult Kingsbury v. Kingsbury, [Id. 7,817.] That at any time previous to final decree, all interlocutory orders are subject to examination and revision, see Pullan v. Cincinnati & C. A. L. R. Co., (May term, 1873,) [Id. 11,461.] After a judgment in the state court which has been reversed by the appellate court and a new trial ordered, the case can be removed. Dart v. McKinney, [Id. 3,583.] But if in a chancery proceeding the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to the court below to dismiss the bill, an application for removal comes too late. Boggs v. Willard, [Id. 1,603.]

[C. C. Akin, the holder of a fire insurance policy on an hotel and furniture, had mortgaged the property to Wassel & Moore, and, with the consent of the company, assigned his policy to them to the extent of their interest. Thereafter Akin paid to the local agent at Hot Springs the premium for the renewal of the policy, and took a receipt in the following form:

["Hot Springs, Ark., July 9th, 1872. $176.50. Rec'd of John L. Miller, for the use of C. C. Akin, one hundred and seventy-six 50-100 dollars for the renewal of a policy of insurance on the Akin House and furniture, issued in the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company, on five thousand dollars. J. J. Sumpter, Agent."]

[Wassel & Moore, wishing to make sure of the renewal of the policy, made application therefor to the agent at Little Rock, but, on being informed of the action of Akin, were satisfied therewith, and took no further steps. By mistake the company made out and executed a policy to Wassel & Moore, instead of to Akin, and sent it to their agent at Little Rock, in whose office it remained until after the property was destroyed by fire, unknown to either Akin or Wassel & Moore.]

CALDWELL, District Judge. It is contended that plaintiff has mistaken his remedy; that, upon the facts proved, the case is one of exclusively equitable cognizance. This contention is based on the assumption that an action at law will not lie upon a contract of insurance unless a policy has been issued and the action is founded on such policy. It is well settled that where there is a valid agreement for insurance, the failure of the insurer to issue a policy, is no impediment to a recovery of the amount of insurance, in case of loss, in an action at law upon the contract. McCulloch v. Eagle Ins. Co., 1 Pick. 277; Lightbody v. North American Ins. Co., 23 Wend. 18; State Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Porter, 3 Grant, Cas. 123; Eureka Ins. Co. v. Robinson, Rea & Co., 56 Pa. St. 256; Benjamin v. Saratoga Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 415; Audubon v. Excelsior Ins. Co., 27 N. Y. 216; Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America, [Case No. 7,920;] American Horse Ins. Co. v. Patterson, 23 Ind. 17; New England Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 536; Fland. Fire Ins. 118.

The plaintiff has a good cause of action at law on the contract for the renewal of the policy. The premium was paid for the renewal for one year, of an existing policy, the precise terms of which were known to both parties, and when the premium was paid by the plaintiff, and accepted by the defendant, upon such an agreement, the contract of insurance was complete; there remained no more for the plaintiff to do, and in case of loss, the legal liability of the defendant was perfect.

It is common practice to renew, or continue in force, existing policies by means of what is termed a renewal receipt. This is what was done in this case. The plaintiff is not to be prejudiced by the mistake of the defendant in making out a policy to Wassel & Moore; and certainly the defendant will not be heard to say that the plaintiff shall not have the benefit of his contract until he has gone into a court of equity, and annulled or reformed a policy in which he is not named, and has no interest, which he never asked to be issued, which was never delivered to him, and of the very existence of which he was ignorant.

2. The defense that the action was not brought within one year from date of loss, is not sustained. The complaint was filed within the year, but no summons was issued, because the then agent and attorney of the defendant requested that none should be issued, and agreed to enter the appearance of the defendant, and plead to the action, and took the complaint off the files for that purpose. This took place before the year expired, and for the purpose of disposing of this question, the subsequent appearance of the defendant must have relation back to the date of the agreement.

It would be gross fraud to allow the defendant to come in by other counsel, after the year had elapsed, and set up that the suit was not brought within the year, because no summons had issued on the complaint, when the plaintiff had refrained from issuing such summons at the request of the defendant's agent and attorney, and upon the assurance that defendant's appearance should be entered with like effect as if summons had issued on filing the complaint.

3. After the loss, the agent of the defendant for adjusting losses and the plaintiff met in this city. The plaintiff was ready and willing to furnish the requisite preliminary proofs of loss, in accordance with the terms of defendant's policy; but the defendant's agent misconceived the rights and duties of the parties, took the ground there was no contract of insurance existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and refused to recognize plaintiff's right to prove for his admitted loss, on that ground. By this action the defendant waived the production of preliminary proofs of loss by the plaintiff. Fland. Ins. 541.

Besides, under the advice and direction of plaintiff's agent, Wassel & Moore, whom the agent insisted were the only proper parties to do so, did make out and furnish the preliminary proofs of this very loss.

The defense is without merits, and judgment will be entered in favor of the plaintiff for $7,469, being the amount of the policy and interest thereon from date of loss, less the sum of $3,875 paid with plaintiff's assent to Wassel & Moore.

Case No. 122.

The ALABAMA.

The GAMECOCK.

[1 Ben. 476.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1867.³

COLLISION—TOW AND TUG—LOOKOUT—LIGHTS—PILOT—PLEADING.

1. The bark Ninfa de los Mares was coming up the Narrows into the harbor of New York, about 200 yards from the west shore, in the evening. She was towed by the steam tug Gamecock at the end of a hawser. She had the regulation lights set. The tug, however, did not carry the two white lights required by law to be carried by a steam vessel having another in tow, but had the lights required to be carried by all steam vessels. The steamer Alabama was going down the Narrows to sea. She was in charge of a pilot, but had no lookout stationed forward, the quartermaster in the wheelhouse, who was assisting the man at the wheel, being the only lookout. She saw the lights of the tug, and directed her course so as to pass her some fifty or a hundred feet to the eastward, but she did not see the lights of the bark in tow until she was very near the tug, when the latter gave two whistles, and a voice from her shouted that the steamer would run into the bark. The steamer's helm was at once put hard a starboard, but she ran into the bark, striking her on her starboard bow, and sinking her in a few minutes. The libel was filed against both the steamer and the tug to recover the damages. Held, that the Alabama was in fault in not having a proper lookout, and that her going so close to the tug, when there was abundant sea room, was, to say the least, not evidence of very careful management on her part.

[Cited in The Ancon, Case No. 348.]

2. That the fact of her being in charge of a pilot was no defence.

[Cited in The Ancon, Case No. 348.]

3. That the tug was also in fault in not having the lights required by law, and that the collision was the result of these faults on both vessels.

4. That where injury is done by or received by a vessel in tow of another, the inquiry, by which the responsibility of either vessel is to be determined, should always be as to which party is the principal and which is the servant.

5. That in this case the tug was the principal, and the Alabama could not charge the tug's negligence as a fault upon the bark.

6. That the fact that the libel did not specify the want of proper lights on the tug as an element in her negligence made no difference, there being no dispute as to what lights the tug had, and no surprise upon her as to the evidence given about her lights. That, if desired, an amendment of the libel to that effect would be allowed.

[In admiralty. Libel for collision. Decree for libellant. Modified on appeal by circuit court, in The Alabama, Case No. 123, but afterwards affirmed by supreme court, (92 U. S. 695.)]

³[Decree of district court modified by circuit court in The Alabama, Case No. 123, but affirmed by supreme court, 92 U. S. 695.]

This was a libel for a collision brought by Nicholas de las Casas, the owner of the Spanish bark Ninfa de los Mares against the steamer Alabama and the steam tug Gamecock, both of them American vessels. The collision occurred about six o'clock P. M. on the 15th of December, 1865, in the Narrows, a little below Fort Richmond, on the Staten Island side, and about 200 yards easterly from the shore. The bark was on a voyage from Havana to New York, and was in tow of the tug going up through the Narrows to New York. She was towed by a hawser about fifty or sixty fathoms long, running from the stern of the tug to her port bow. The Alabama was proceeding to sea from New York on a voyage to New Orleans. The Alabama and the bark came into collision, and the result was that the bark was cut to the water's edge, on her starboard bow, near her fore-rigging, and sank, and was totally lost. The bark charged the fault on both of the other vessels. The case made by the libel was, that some ten or fifteen minutes before the collision, the port light of the Alabama was observed from the bark, bearing from one and a half to two points on her starboard bow, and apparently approaching in an opposite direction; that the bark had her proper lights set; that her course was about north to north half-east; that her movement was wholly dependent upon that of the tug, her master having employed the tug about 1 o'clock P. M. of that day to tow her to New York; that a few minutes before the collision a double whistle was heard from the tug, as a signal for the Alabama to pass the tug and bark on their starboard side, and for the bark to starboard her wheel, and that the tug would starboard her wheel; that this was done by the tug, but that the Alabama came right on into the bark, although the bark, by starboarding her wheel, in obedience to the signal of the tug, did all that she could to avoid the collision; and that there was no fault on the part of the bark. In regard to the fault of the other vessels, the libel averred that the collision happened "wholly through the carelessness, mismanagement, and improper seamanship of those in charge at the time of the said steamer, and of the said tug boat, in suffering their respective vessels to approach so near each other, and then on the part of those in charge of the said tug boat, in permitting the said bark to be so hit, and on the part of those in charge of the said steamer, in permitting her to so hit the said bark." The answer of the Alabama set up, that she left her dock in New York about five o'clock P. M., under charge of a pilot; that her lights were set and burning, and she was going at a slow rate of speed, and had a competent lookout properly stationed and faithfully attending to his duty; that shortly after 6 o'clock P. M., when the Alabama was near Fort Richmond, she discovered the tug a considerable distance off, bearing on her port bow; that, as the vessels approached each other, the tug changed her course suddenly, without giving any warning, and attempted to cross the Alabama's bow, and pass on her starboard side; that as soon as that intention was manifested, every effort was made by the Alabama to avoid a collision, and she cleared the tug, but collided with the bark; that the night was dark, and the fact that the tug was towing the bark on a line could not be seen or known from the Alabama before the vessels came together, or so nearly together that it was impossible to avoid a collision with the bark; that the bark had all her sails furled and could not be distinguished from a vessel at anchor, and had no proper lights or lookout, and no warning was given that she was moving astern of the tug; that the bark was responsible for the conduct of the tug, and the tug and the bark were respectively improperly and unlawfully navigated; and that the collision occurred through the fault and improper navigation of the bark, individually or in common with the fault of the tug, and not by the fault of the Alabama.

The answer of the tug averred that the towing was to be and was performed in the usual manner; that the collision did not occur through the fault of those on board of the tug; that when the Alabama was first observed from the tug she bore on her starboard bow, sailing in an opposite direction; and that she should have stopped or passed the tug and bark at a safe distance to the eastward, as she was well able to do, in which case the collision would not have taken place. The bark had a pilot on board, and was steering as nearly as possible in the wake of the tug. Her proper lights for a sailing vessel being towed were set and burning, that is, a green starboard light and a red port light, and they were properly arranged. She carried no light calculated to mislead the Alabama. The tug had the proper green and red side lights, but she did not have the two white mast-head lights arranged vertically, which were required by law to be carried by a steam vessel, when towing another vessel, in addition to the colored side lights, in order to distinguish her from other steam vessels. Instead of those lights she had a single white light on a flag pole aft. The Alabama had her proper colored side lights and her white foremast light. In this condition of the lights on the vessels they approached each other.

The pilot of the Alabama testified, that he was heading south half-west when he first saw the lights of the tug, two miles or more away; that he was then a little above Clifton, and about a quarter of a mile from the shore, and the tug's lights bore south half-east, half a point or a little more on his port bow; that he then saw her green and red lights and her white light above; that, on seeing those lights, he ordered the man at the wheel to look out for his port wheel so as to pass to the right; that he then discovered that the tug was trying to cross his bow, the tug being to the eastward of the lights on Sandy Hook and the Navesink Highlands, and those lights being half a point to the eastward of the course of the Alabama, and the tug appearing to him to be drawing across those lights to go to the westward of the Alabama; that he then ordered the man at the wheel to keep his helm starboard, and it was kept starboard until he discovered that the tug would go clear of the Alabama, and then he told the man at the wheel to steady; that the next thing he heard was two blasts from the steam whistle of the tug, which came when the tug was not more than sixty feet from the Alabama; that at that time he saw the green and white lights of the tug; that at the time the whistles blew he heard a hail from the tug, warning him that he would be on the bark; that the helm of the Alabama was immediately put hard to starboard, and her engine was slowed, and stopped and backed, but she struck the bark within a minute after the hail; that he did not know until the hail that the tug had a vessel in tow; and that he saw no lights on the bark. On his cross examination he said that when he saw the tug drawing to the westward he starboarded to let her go to the westward of him, and straightened on his course when he thought the tug had room enough to go clear on the westward; that the whistles blew right after he straightened on his course; that he arrived at the conclusion to let the tug pass to the westward of him from three to five minutes before the tug blew the whistles; and that he expected the tug to pass him from fifty to one hundred feet off.

The captain of the tug testified that he was as near the Staten Island shore as he considered it safe to go with the bark; that up to the time he blew his whistles the Alabama was all the time on his starboard bow; that he did not change his course up to the time he blew his whistles; that when he blew his whistles he starboarded his wheel a little—all he dared, as he was then within two hundred yards of the shore; that when the Alabama was a quarter of a mile away, he saw her white light and both of her colored lights; and that the tug was heading between north and north by west.

E. W. Stoughton and J. E. Parsons, for bark.

Beebe, Donohue & Cook, for tug.

Owen, Nash & Gray, for steamer.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I take the testimony of the two witnesses who were piloting the respective steam vessels as showing more clearly than any other testimony the actual course of the navigation of the vessels. The captain of the tug, who was in her pilot house at the wheel all the time, had no apprehension of any collision with the Alabama. He did not put his helm to port, or change his course, or signify, by giving one blast of his whistle, that he desired each vessel to keep to the right. As to any change of course by the tug, I think the clear weight of the testimony is, that the tug did not change her course before she blew the two whistles at the very moment of peril. The pilot of the Alabama did not blow any whistle as a signal to the tug to take the one side or the other. He arrived at the conclusion that the tug was going to the westward, and, acting on that conclusion, he starboarded his helm until he thought he could go clear of her on the eastward, and then he straightened on his course, intending to clear her by from fifty to one hundred feet. The tug did not port her helm, and thus bring herself and the bark into the danger which the Alabama was trying to avoid. She kept her course, and any apparent drawing of the tug to the westward, as seen from the Alabama, must have been the effect of the starboarding by the Alabama of her own helm, and not the cause of that starboarding. If the Alabama had thought that she and the tug were meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, she would have ported her helm and signalled the tug by her whistle. But the Alabama starboarded her helm and gave no signal, and for the manifest reason that she apprehended no collision; and the tug certainly apprehended none. The Alabama was in no manner thwarted by the movements of the tug or of the bark, in carrying out her purpose of going to the eastward. She elected to go to the eastward a sufficient length of time before the collision to enable her to carry that intention safely into execution, as respected both the tug and the bark, but for two circumstances. These were (1st) the resolve of the Alabama to pass as close to the tug as within from fifty to one hundred feet; (2d) the absence of all knowledge on the part of the Alabama that the tug had a vessel in tow. The intention of the Alabama to pass so close to the tug would not perhaps, of itself, unattended by any other facts, be sufficient to charge her with fault in this collision with the bark. But she had abundance of room to the eastward, and a broad channel in that direction, seven or eight times in width the distance at which the tug was from the western shore, with sufficient depth of water, and it was, to say the least, not evidence of very careful navigation on the part of the Alabama, that she did not try to give a wider berth to the tug. But still the Alabama went clear of the tug, and she would doubtless have gone clear of the bark, if she had known that the bark was in tow astern of the tug. The failure of the Alabama to know that the tug had the bark in tow is shown, by the evidence, to have been owing to two things—(1) the absence, on the Alabama, of a proper lookout, properly stationed and attending exclusively to the proper duties of a lookout; (2) the failure of the tug to carry the two bright white mast-head lights vertically, so as to distinguish her from other steam vessels. As to the lookout on the Alabama, the evidence is conclusive that the only person who pretended to be discharging the duties of a lookout was Pullin, the quartermaster, and he, instead of being at his proper post on the bow of the vessel, was in the pilot-house assisting the man at the wheel. The rest of the men who were in the watch with Pullin, and some of whom ought to have been on the lookout on the bow of the vessel, were in the forecabin at their supper, and remained there till after the collision. The attempt to show that there was a man on the lookout on the bow of the Alabama wholly fails. No such man is produced as a witness, nor is his name disclosed. Now, if any fact is established by the evidence, it is the fact that the bark had her colored lights properly set and burning. They ought to have been seen from the Alabama, and probably would have been seen if the Alabama had had a proper lookout. It is true that the pilot of the Alabama, and the other persons who were in and about the pilot house of that vessel, saw the lights of the tug and did not see the lights of the bark; but it is extremely probable, from the evidence, that a proper and vigilant lookout on the bow of the Alabama would have discovered the lights of the bark. There was nothing in the character of the night to obscure them. The men on the bark saw the lights on the Alabama at a long distance. Moreover, the evidence goes to show that a proper lookout in a proper place on the Alabama would have discovered the bark herself in season to have enabled the Alabama to clear her. It is impossible to resist the conclusion, that the want of a proper lookout on the Alabama contributed materially to the collision. So, also, the absence of the proper lights on the tug contributed in a great degree probably to the collision. The pilot of the Alabama discovered the lights of the tug at the distance of two miles or more, and saw them accurately, as they were, the two colored lights and the white light above. He recognized them, so far as the evidence shows, for what they indicated—a steam vessel under way. But he did not recognize them as indicating a steam vessel towing another vessel, for the reason that they gave no such indication. The provision for the two vertical white lights is made by law, as the statute expressly says, to distinguish from other steam vessels a steam vessel towing another vessel. The conclusion of fact and of law is, that if the pilot of the Alabama had been advised by the presence of those lights that the tug had a vessel in tow, he would have given her a wider berth than he did, and would have cleared the bark.

It is claimed on the part of the tug that the pleadings do not raise the question of the want of proper lights on the tug. But I think the pleadings are sufficient to raise that question. The libel does not specify the want of lights on the tug, but it avers that the collision happened through the carelessness, mismanagement and improper conduct of those in charge at the time of the tug, in suffering the tug and the Alabama to approach so near each other. The want of proper lights on the tug was an element and ingredient of the carelessness of those in charge of the tug, which contributed to the near approach of the Alabama. But, if desired, an amendment of the libel in that respect would be allowed, there being no dispute as to what lights the tug in fact had, and no surprise upon her as to the evidence given about her lights.

The bark being wholly without fault, and the collision being due to the negligence of the Alabama and the tug, it would naturally follow that the bark would be entitled to recover from the Alabama and the tug the damages caused by the collision. The answer of the Alabama sets up, however, that the bark was responsible, under the circumstances, for the conduct of the tug; and it is claimed that the tug was the servant of the bark in the towing service; that the bark is liable for the acts of the tug; that the case, so far as respects the Alabama, must be decided as if the only parties litigating were the Alabama and the tug; and that the bark has no greater rights, as against the Alabama, than the tug would have had, if she had been injured by the collision, and her owner were the sole libellant. There is a conflict of decisions on this point, and it is not authoritatively settled for this court. Most of the cases on the subject are cases where the third vessel, neither the tug nor the tow, was the libelling or complaining party. In regard to the question whether the tug or the tow is responsible when a third party sues for a collision with either, the author of Parsons' Maritime Law. (volume 1, p. 208,) cites several of the conflicting authorities, some of them holding that the vessel towing is but the servant of that which is towed, and that the latter is responsible for the acts of the former, as its servant, and others holding that the vessel towed is for the time under the absolute control of the vessel towing, and that the latter is responsible for any mischief done, and draws the conclusion, that it is an error to assume that either of these relations must exist in any particular case, and that the inquiry should always be, which party is the principal and which the servant. Such I conceive to be the sound rule. The language of Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of The Express, [Case No. 4,596,] seems to imply, that where the tug is not in fact, at the time, under the direction and control of the master and hands on board of the tow, the tow will not be responsible for any damage that happens through the fault of the tug. In the case of Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 110, which was a libel by a third vessel, against a tug and her tow for a collision between the tow and the third vessel, the supreme court condemned the tug and acquitted the tow. In the course of the opinion of the court in that case, it is said (page 122) that, "whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew and in the usual and ordinary course of such employment, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, over waters where such necessary motive power is necessary or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels." It is also said, in that case, (page 123) that the owners of the tow do not, by employing a tug to transport their vessel from one point to another, necessarily constitute the master and crew of the tug their agents in performing the service; that they do not appoint the master of the tug or ship the crew, and cannot displace the one or the other; and that the master of the tug, notwithstanding the contract for the service was negotiated with him, continues to be the agent of the owners of his own vessel, and they are responsible for his acts in her navigation. It is true that these observations were made in reference to the liability of the tug and the tow to a third party. But I think that they are also applicable to a case where the tow sues the tug for an injury caused to the tow by a collision between the tow and a third vessel, to which the negligence of the tug contributed, and also to a case where the tow sues the third vessel for such an injury. In the present case, the tug was exclusively under the charge of her own master and crew. She was employed in the usual and ordinary course of her employment, to tow this bark, a foreign vessel, coming into one of our ports. The service was a customary and proper one. The pilot and master and crew of the bark did not direct, or undertake to direct, the navigation of the tug or the arrangement of her lights, and were not bound to do so. The bark did nothing but follow as closely as possible in the wake of the tug, and she made no manoeuvre which contributed to the collision or interfered with the free control of the tug over her own movements and arrangements. To say that, under these circumstances, the bark should be held responsible for the acts or omissions of the tug would be, in my judgment, to violate the sound principles of justice. Such a responsibility on the part of the bark would make her liable to a third vessel, in case the tug had negligently run into and sunk such vessel, the bark having been navigated precisely as she was in this case. A responsibility so broad would be greatly injurious to the interests of commerce, and would effectually put an end to the towing business, for no tow would then be towed unless it had the exclusive control of the tug, and no tug would surrender such control to the tow.

If applied to this case, the effect of the doctrine contended for by the Alabama, that the tug and the bark are to be considered as one vessel, and that the bark, though personally innocent, is to have imputed to her the acts and omissions of the tug, would be, as against the Alabama, to cause the damage occasioned by the collision to be apportioned between the tug and the bark, considered as one vessel, and the Alabama. I hold that the Alabama is not entitled to the benefit of any such doctrine. The tug does not, in her answer, claim the existence or benefit of any such doctrine, or claim that the bark was responsible for the faults of the tug, or that the tug is not responsible for her own faults to the bark. It is useless to speculate whether, even if, as regards the Alabama, the tug and the bark be considered as one vessel, the tug ought not, as between herself and the bark, both the tug and the Alabama being in fault, to make good to the bark all the damages which she does not recover from the Alabama. As suggested by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of The Express, (before cited,) there is a difficulty, as between a tug and her tow, in assigning to each vessel its proper measure of responsibility, when either, through the fault of either, comes into collision with a third vessel. Every case of the kind must be decided, as it arises, on the facts attending it.

It is set up as a defence by the Alabama, in her answer, that she had on board, at the time of this collision, a pilot duly licensed under the laws of the state of New York, who offered his services to her, and whose services she was obliged by law to accept; that such pilot took and had the entire control of all her movements until and at the time of the collision; that her master, officers, and crew merely carried out the orders of such pilot, in directing her movements; and that, if the collision was caused by the movements of the Alabama, or by her failure to make proper movements in reference to the tug and the bark, or either, neither the Alabama nor her claimants are responsible therefor. This point of defence does not extend so far as to claim that the Alabama is not responsible for not having a proper lookout, or that the pilot was in any manner charged with the duty of seeing that she had a proper lookout. And in a case where, as here, the fault found against the vessel is not any act or omission for which the pilot is responsible, but is the want of a proper lookout, it would be going too far to say that the vessel is to be exonerated from such fault, because she had a pilot on board charged with her navigation, even if she would be exonerated from a fault in her navigation caused directly by the pilot. If the presence of a pilot is to exonerate the vessel from the fault of not having a proper lookout, it is difficult to see why it would not exonerate her from the fault of not having her reversing machinery in proper order. Yet, to hold the vessel not responsible for the latter fault, when under charge, as to her navigation, of a regular pilot, would be a violation of all principle. I do not understand that the English rule, which relieves a vessel from responsibility for her navigation while she is under the charge of a pilot, extends any further than to relieve her from the consequences of a fault directly attributable to the bad management or negligence of the pilot. But, however that may be, the law is settled for this court, (Walsh v. The China, Cir. Ct. U. S. July, 1866, [Case No. 17,114,]) that a vessel is responsible for the negligence or unskillfulness of a licensed pilot, whose services she is by law bound to accept.

The rules of navigation are now so well settled, and in most cases by positive statute, so far at least as vessels owned by citizens of the United States are concerned, that there can be no excuse for their wilful and deliberate violation. The necessity, especially in the case of a steam vessel, of having a proper lookout, properly stationed and actually and vigilantly employed in his duty, and of having, properly set and burning, the lights required by statute, has been enforced by the courts of admiralty of the United States so uniformly, that it must now be accepted as settled, that wherever the want of a proper lookout, or the want of proper lights, is shown, it will be for the vessel which has not the lookout or the lights to show that any collision which occurs is not in any way attributable to the absence of the lookout or the lights, or she will be condemned in damages. Notwithstanding the serious admonitions which they have received from the courts, large steam vessels are most glaringly remiss in regard to having a proper lookout, and small tugs pay no heed, while towing other vessels, to the statutory requirement making provision that they shall carry two bright white masthead lights vertically, in addition to their green and red side lights, so as to distinguish them from other steam vessels, and convey to other vessels the knowledge that they have vessels in tow. The interests of commerce require that these maritime rules should be strictly enforced.

It results, that there must be a decree condemning both the tug and the Alabama in damages, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of the damages to the libellant.

[NOTE. On appeal to the circuit court this decree was affirmed, except that it was held that the steamer could not be required to make up a deficiency caused by the fact that the value of the tug was less than one half of the damages sustained. This was overruled by the supreme court, and the decree of the district court was affirmed. See The Alabama and The Gamecock, Case No. 123, and note to that case, 92 U. S. 695.]

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAMERS AND TOW—APPORTIONMENT OF DAMAGES.

A steamer collided with a sailing vessel in tow of a steam-tug. In a suit in rem, brought by the owners of the sailing vessel against both of the other vessels, to recover for the damages sustained by them by the collision, it was held, both of such other vessels being found in fault, that each must be held liable for only one-half of such damages, and that the steamer could not be held to make up a deficiency caused by the fact that the value of the steam-tug was less than one-half of such damages.

[See note at end of case.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In admiralty. In this case, a sailing ship, the Ninfa de los Mares, in tow of a steam-tug, the Gamecock, was collided with by a steamer, the Alabama, and sunk. The owner of the ship libelled both of the other vessels, in rem, in the district court. That court held both of such vessels in fault, and gave a decree to the libellants against each of them, for the full amount of the damages. 1 Ben. 476, [The Alabama, Case No. 122.] The steam-tug had been released, on a bond being given in a sum, representing her value, less than one-half the amount of such damages. An appeal was taken to this court on the part of each of the condemned vessels. [Decree of district court modified. John E. Parsons, for libellant.

Charles Donohue, for the Gamecock.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, (after affirming the decree on all other points:) In regard to the liability of the Alabama for more than one-half of the damages, this court has already decided that her liability cannot be increased by the circumstance, in which she had no agency, that the Gamecock is not of value sufficient to pay the other half. The City of Hartford and The Unit, [Case No. 2,753.] See, also, The Atlas, [Id. 633, Id. 634.] It is urged, that such a holding involves a liability on the part of the Ninfa herself, which would make her liable for the fault of the tug, in such a sense, that, if the Alabama had sustained the greater damage, the Ninfa must contribute thereto. Not at all; the holding merely imports that her relations to the tug which she had employed were such that she can recover no more than the tug, if injured to the same extent, could recover, or than the tug, if she had paid to the owners of the Ninfa her full value, in discharge of her own plain liability, could in return recover from the Alabama, towards indemnity. As between the Ninfa and the tug, the latter, under her contract for safe towage, or towage with proper care, prudence and skill, was liable for the whole loss. So that, whether this proceeding against the Alabama is prosecuted by the one or the other, ought not to affect the Alabama. It is very true, that, by the rules of the common law, one who is injured by the concurring fault of two or more may, it is held, recover full indemnity from either or all. But the admiralty does not inevitably follow the common law rules. Where, as between two, each is in fault, at law, neither can recover, but, in admiralty, each contributes. On the one hand, it is not inequitable to say, that the contribution of one ought not to be increased by circumstances which she had no agency in producing; and, on the other, it is not inequitable to say that the tow, as in this case, voluntarily subjected herself to the hazards of the misconduct of the tug, and, therefore, to the contingency that such misconduct might, in case of loss, give her no claim beyond contribution from another vessel. Had the tug discharged her own liability to the Ninfa upon her contract, as she ought, the tug could recover no more. The Ninfa should not be permitted to charge the Alabama more, because the Ninfa may have trusted irresponsible parties.

I am aware that the question is one of great interest and importance. There are, I think, some cases in the supreme court in which it must necessarily be soon considered; and we shall then be instructed whether to follow the views of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Milan, 1 Lush. [Adm.] 388, 404, and applied in the cases before cited, or to act upon a different rule in the admiralty courts of this country. For the present, I must say that the opinion in the case of The City of Hartford and The Unit, [supra.] must be taken as the opinion in this case, upon the point now under consideration.

The decree, therefore, will award to the libellants a recovery from each vessel, of one-half of the damages caused by the collision, as found in the district court, with costs in the court below, but without costs, on the appeal to this court, to either party.

[NOTE. In reversing the decree of the circuit court, Mr. Justice Bradley said that a decree should be made against the Alabama and the Gamecock, "each for one moiety of the entire damage, interest and costs, so far as the stipulated value of said vessel shall extend; and any balance of such moiety over and above such stipulated value of either vessel, or which the libellant shall be unable to collect or enforce, shall be paid by the other vessel * * * to the extent of the stipulated value thereof, beyond the moiety due from said vessel." The Alabama and The Gamecock, 92 U. INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—ACT MARCH 2, 1867—JURISDICTION — FOREIGN RAILROAD CORPORATION.

1. A proceeding in voluntary bankruptcy, under section 39 of the bankruptcy act of March 2d, 1867, (14 Stat. 536,) may be prosecuted in the district in which the debtor has carried on business for the requisite time specified in section 11 of that act, although he resides and may be found in another district.

2. A railroad company, incorporated by the laws of a state, for constructing and operating a railroad, cannot be proceeded against, in bankruptcy, in a district court without the state or states where its railroad is, or is to be, built, maintained and operated, on the petition of a creditor, charging an act of bankruptcy.

3. Allegation and proof that such company kept an office in such district for six months next preceding the filing of the petition, where its officers acted and its board of directors met, and where it contracted debts and made loans, purchases and payments, do not give such court jurisdiction.

4. The business of a railroad company, within the meaning of the eleventh section of the said act, can only be carried on where the railroad is, or is to be, constructed, maintained and operated.

5. Hence, the district court for the southern district of New York has no jurisdiction to adjudge an Alabama railroad corporation a bankrupt, on the petition of a creditor.

Enoch L. Fancher, for creditor.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. On the petition of a creditor, the respondent, a corporation created and organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Alabama, and owning and operating a railroad in the states of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Tennessee, was summoned to appear in the district court for the southern district of New York, to show cause why such corporation should not be adjudged a bankrupt. It was alleged in the petition, that the corporation owned property in the state of New York, and had, for the longest period of time within the six months next immediately preceding the date of the filing of the petition, had its principal office, place of business, and domicile in the city of New York, in which the corporation had transacted the ordinary moneyed, commercial and financial business of a railroad corporation.

The corporation pleaded or answered specially to this petition, that the district court for the southern district of New York had no jurisdiction to proceed against the said corporation, upon such petition, or to make any adjudication in bankruptcy against the respondent. After taking proofs touching the carrying on of the business alleged in the petition, by the respondent, within the said southern district of New York, this plea was overruled, and the district court then proceeded to adjudge, and did adjudge, the said corporation a bankrupt. The respondent, the corporation, now seeks a review and reversal of that adjudication; and it was stated by counsel, on the argument, that the question to be considered on the review is this: Had the district court jurisdiction to proceed against this railroad corporation, upon a petition in invitum, because such corporation transacted, within this district, the business alleged in the petition in this case?

If I were charged with the duty of legislating upon this subject, I should hesitate long before I exposed a corporation incorporated in Alabama or California, for the construction of a railroad in those states, and for maintaining and operating the same there, to a proceeding in a distant district, for the settlement of its affairs, the disposal of its property, and the distribution of the proceeds, (operating practically as a dissolution thereof,) as a bankrupt. It would seem to me most inconvenient and disadvantageous to its creditors, most unsuitable, though not wholly impracticable, in respect of the closing of the estate, collecting, managing, and disposing of the assets, and transferring them, under the direction of the court, which ought to be conveniently accessible to all who are interested, needlessly, but inevitably, most expensive, and, presumptively, bringing the parties ultimately interested in its affairs, whether as creditors or stockholders, to a great distance, to protect their respective interests, following to this district the proceeds of the railroad and its equipment, which might well be administered at home. Difficulty will ordinarily exist, also, in effectively reaching the officers, to compel their furnishing accounts and details which the law requires for the settlement of the estate; and, even if they can be compelled to send such information here, or to attend here in person to give it, this must be needlessly expensive, troublesome and vexatious, and, in case of resistance, will, in general, be very unsatisfactory in the mode of proceeding, and in its results. Presumptively, at least, the property of such a corporation is invested in its railroad, and its equipment, and means of conducting the business for which it was incorporated, which are in the state or district where its railroad is built and is to be operated, under its charter; and it seems to me wholly unfit, that the district court for the southern district of New York should have the duty imposed upon it, of administering the affairs of such a distant corporation. When the fact is recalled, that, probably, no railroad company exists in the United States, which does not habitually transact some business in the city of New York, the burthen and inconvenience of such a jurisdiction, liable to be invoked by any one creditor, on a charge of bankruptcy, becomes apparent, to a degree that makes it incredible that such a jurisdiction, and the consequent duty to exercise it when invoked, have been imposed upon that court.

It is, however, no part of the duty of this court to legislate, but only to ascertain and apply the law as it is; and these suggestions can serve no purpose, unless they shall aid in interpreting the statutes under which the proceedings have been instituted, and which are claimed to sustain them.

The 48th section of the bankrupt law of March 2d, 1837, (14 Stat. 540,) declares, that the word "person," in that law, shall include "corporation." This must, of course, be qualified, in any of the provisions which are necessarily inapplicable to a corporation, and by any provisions that are specially and expressly made for corporations only, if any such there be. But, in respect of the question now before me, I find no such qualification, either express or implied, since no claim is made that the language of the 37th section of the act prevents its application to a railroad corporation, as has sometimes been contended. The 11th section, providing for voluntary bankruptcy, may, therefore, be read as if the words "moneyed, business or commercial corporations and joint stock companies" were inserted therein, and it will then provide, that such corporation, owing debts, * * * may apply by petition, addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for six months, or for the longest period during the six months, next immediately preceding the time of filing such petition; and jurisdiction is given to proceed, on such petition, to adjudge the petitioner a bankrupt. Nevertheless, it is clear, that a corporation can have no residence out of the state by whose laws it was created, and that, therefore, in virtue of residence, no jurisdiction can be acquired by any district court outside of such state. And, in construing the words "carried on business," it may be proper to consider what, as applied to a corporation, they reasonably import. Again, the 37th section declares, that, upon the petition of any creditor or creditors of such a corporation as is therein mentioned, * * the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are, in the act, afterwards provided in the case of debtors. This, in terms, subjects the corporations named to a proceeding in invitum for an adjudication of bankruptcy, as fully as other debtors are subjected thereto by the subsequent provisions of the act. Following the act to its subsequent provisions, we find, that, by section 39, any person—and, of course, any such corporation as is before mentioned—who commits any of the acts specified, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions thereafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt, on the petition of one or more of his creditors, &c.

Neither in the 37th nor the 39th section, nor in any other section relating to involuntary bankruptcy, is there any express designation of the judge or court to whom the petition shall be presented, or who shall have jurisdiction thereof. The first section of the act makes the several district courts of the United States courts of bankruptcy, and confers on them jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, in their several districts. In which of the district courts, then, may proceedings be taken by a creditor, whether against a corporation or an individual? No express terms of the statute give an answer to this question. Certainly, it ought not to be open to creditors, or to a creditor, to select any district court of the United States, at his or their option. It must be such court as, upon the general rules governing the jurisdiction of the district court, can acquire jurisdiction, or such court as may seem to have been intended by congress, in analogy to the jurisdiction given where the proceedings are voluntary. The latter would seem to be the generally received opinion; and, in this district, it has, I believe, been the practical construction of the act. The act having assimilated the proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy, after the respondent has been adjudged a bankrupt, to the proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy, it is not unnatural to infer, that, when congress, by the 39th section, authorized an adjudication upon the petition of a creditor, they meant, upon a petition addressed to the court which, by the previous 11th section, was authorized to adjudge a debtor a bankrupt on his own petition. The supreme court of the United States, in framing the sixteenth of the general orders in bankruptcy, seem to have acted upon this construction of the act, in providing for the contingency of two or more petitions against the same individual, in different districts.

My own unaided examination of the act would have suggested the doubt, whether, although congress had given to the debtor the opportunity to apply to the court of the district wherein he resided, or to the court of the district in which he carried on business, they had not, when they provided for a hostile proceeding against him, intentionally omitted a similar provision, and, in that respect, intended that the proceeding should conform, by analogy, to the 11th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, (1 Stat. 78, 79,) which forbids that any civil suit shall be brought, in either the district or the circuit court, by original process, against an inhabitant of the United States, except in the district whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he may be found when served with process. All the provisions of the act concerning involuntary bankruptcy may be harmonized with this construction. If he reside within the district then he may be served personally, or by leaving at his place of abode; or, if he have absconded, or be concealed, or his place of residence cannot be ascertained, then by publication, (section 40.) Although it was the design of congress to enable creditors to compel a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy to do that which, in a state of insolvency, he ought to do voluntarily, agreeably to the 11th section, it does not follow that they intended to enable creditors, or a creditor, to call the debtor, on a charge of having committed such an act, thousands of miles from his residence, to contest the charge, merely because he had carried on some business at such remote point. The great hardship of such a call is manifest; and the general tenor of the 40th section indicates, that it is where the debtor resides that the proceeding is, in general, to be conducted, his not being found, by reason of his absconding, or being concealed, or having no known residence, being the excepted cases of service by publication. It does not occur to me that there is any greater fitness or propriety in compelling an alleged debtor to go to a remote district to contest, in the court of bankruptcy, the claim of, or the alleged indebtedness to, a pretended creditor, as well as the truth of the charge of bankruptcy, (for both of these may be involved in the litigation,) than there is in compelling such supposed debtor to go to a remote district to defend an ordinary suit by the same party, under precisely the same circumstances, which, by the judiciary act, is expressly prohibited; and, there being no express provision of the bankrupt law to this effect, I should have been reluctant to indulge in construction not necessarily required by what is expressed, so as to produce a result quite in conflict with the former law. In view of the general construction given to the act, and the sanction such construction has received from the deliberate action of the supreme court of the United States, I do not feel at liberty to dispose of this case by giving weight to the doubt which I have thus expressed. I must yield that doubt and hold, until otherwise advised, that a proceeding in involuntary bankruptcy may be prosecuted in the district in which the debtor carries on business, although he resides and may be found in another.

The further conclusion above stated—that a corporation included in the provisions of section 37 is in the like condition, in this respect, as a natural person—leaves only one question open—When applied to a railroad corporation, what do the terms, “in which such debtor has resided or carried on business,” mean?

(1.) A corporation has, and can have, no residence, except in the state by whose laws it exists. It cannot, of its own mere motion, change its residence. This has often been decided by the supreme court. This is claimed here by the counsel for the corporation, and it is conceded by the counsel for the creditor. Hence, also, it is well settled, that a corporation created by the laws of one state, cannot be found in another judicial district of the United States, to be served with process, through its officers, in an action in the federal courts of such last-named district. Jurisdiction for the district court cannot, therefore, be maintained in this case on the ground of residence of the debtor, nor on the ground that the debtor, being a corporation under the laws of Alabama, was found in this district.

(2.) Do the facts here show that the corporation, the alleged debtor, carried on business in this district, within the meaning of the said eleventh section of the bankrupt law? In its broadest sense, the term “business” includes nearly all the affairs in which either an individual or a corporation can be actors. Indulgence in pleasure, participation in domestic enjoyment, and engagement in the offices of merely personal religion, may be exceptions, in the case of an individual. But the employment of means to secure or provide for these would, to him, be business; and, to a corporation, these exceptions can have no application. The conduct of any and all of the affairs of a corporation is business. Does, then, the doing of any acts whatever pertaining to the affairs of a railroad corporation constitute “carrying on business,” in the sense of the act? Has the term, “carrying on business,” the same meaning as “transacting any of its business”? If the necessities or interests of a railroad company require that an agent should be sent to a timber region to purchase or otherwise procure (e. g., by cutting, sawing, &c.) materials for its superstructure, is that carrying on business there? If it send an agent or agents to a city, the centre of capital, to negotiate its bonds and raise money in aid of the construction of its road, and such agency be continued for that purpose, and for receiving subsequent remittances and making payments of interest or other indebtedness, at an office provided therefor, is that carrying on business in such city, within the meaning of the act? I am constrained, not only by considerations already suggested, but by what, upon the words themselves, should be deemed their proper interpretation, to answer these questions in the negative. There are, in the carrying on of a business, many affairs which are merely incidental, and which may be, and often are, transacted elsewhere than at the place where the business—that which is the real design and purpose or object in view—is located; and such transactions may be of such frequent, or even daily, occurrence as to require an agency of considerable duration. It would seem to me greatly unjust and unreasonable to regard such transactions as a carrying on of business, in the sense of the law. “Carrying on business” looks to the scheme and purpose to which such transactions tend, and not to the incidental transactions themselves. Thus, the business of a railroad corporation is, by its charter, the construction, maintenance, and operation of a railroad. That is its business. In aid thereof, it may be necessary or expedient to employ agents and agencies—since it can only act by agents—in other places than those in which its business of constructing, maintaining, and operating the road can be done. But, the transactions of such agents are only collateral or incidental. They do not, in a just sense, constitute the business of the railroad company. That business cannot be removed. The company itself cannot transfer it. Agents, or officers who are agents, and only agents, may, from a distance, advise therein, give rules or directions to other agents for its management, but the business of the railroad company can only be done where the railroad is, or is to be, constructed, maintained, and operated.

The petition herein states, that the alleged bankrupt corporation has had its principal office, place of business, and domicile, in the city of New York—in part, at least, a legal impossibility—in which place, and during, &c., such corporation has transacted the ordinary, moneyed, commercial, and financial business of a railroad corporation. There was evidence that what the officers of the corporation called its general office was in New York; that its officers were there, and its board of directors were accustomed to meet at such office; that there the records and various accounts of its affairs and business were kept; and that there the corporation procured loans, or made purchases, in aid of the construction of its railroad and its equipment. Here is but an agency, whether it be minor or major, special or principal. It does not affect the present enquiry, that the agents embrace more or less in number or in authority. It is not here that the business is done, or can be done, for which the company was created, although here are business transactions, within the power of the corporation, it may be, but only in aid of its substantive business, and incidentally necessary, perhaps, to its accomplishment.

Further illustrations might be drawn from the existence of very numerous banks, and manufacturing and other corporations, in the various states of the Union, which, although carrying on the business for which they are incorporated within the states where they are created, nevertheless have, for very important and necessary incidental transactions continuous agencies in one or more of our principal cities. It was not intended, by reason of such transactions, to subject them to proceedings in bankruptcy where those agencies were maintained, whether there conducted by agents under one name or another, either officers, clerks, or by whatever name or official relation designated.

In view of all the considerations which I have suggested, I am of opinion, that, in reference to a railroad corporation created by the state of Alabama, for the building, maintaining, and operating a railroad in that state, a construction of the act which subjects it to proceedings in bankruptcy in this district is not reasonable, not required by the language of the statute, and not according to its intention. I do not fail to see, that the contrary may be plausibly argued, as, in fact, it has been, possibly and ably, by the counsel for the creditor. But the corporation cannot itself remove to this district. It cannot, in this district, carry on the business for which it was created. It can only, out of sufferance, do here such collateral or incidental things as are not its substantive business, but only aids thereto, or which facilitate its accomplishment.

It follows, that the objection to the jurisdiction of the district court for the southern district of New York should have been sustained, and the petition of the creditor dismissed. The adjudication declaring the company a bankrupt is, accordingly, reversed.

[In bankruptcy. Petition by the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company for review of a decree of the district court adjudicating the company bankrupt, on petition of William A. C. Jones. Decree reversed.]

WOODS, Circuit Judge. On the eighth day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company was, on the petition of William A. C. Jones, adjudged a bankrupt by the district court for the middle district of Alabama, sitting in bankruptcy. This petition is filed to review and reverse that adjudication.

The facts, as developed by the pleadings and testimony, are these: the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company is a railroad corporation created by the laws of Alabama. A corporation of the same name, and with the same board of directors and the same officers, is also chartered by each of the states of Georgia, Tennessee and Mississippi. The terminus of the road are Chattanooga, Tennessee, and Meridian, Mississippi, and the road traverses the four states above named. The road passes through the counties of DeKalb, Etowah, St. Clair and Jefferson, in the northern district of Alabama, and through the counties of Shelby and Tuscaloosa in the middle district, and Hale, Greene and Sumter in the southern district. The principal office of the company is at Chattanooga, Tennessee, and it has no principal office in the state of Alabama, nor does the president, or any of the directors, or the superintendent, reside in or keep any office of the corporation within the state of Alabama, nor have they or either of them been "found" within the middle district of the state of Alabama. The order to show cause directed to be served upon the corporation in the original proceedings was served, as shown by the affidavit of A. J. Walker, on June third, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, by L. B. Jones, deputy United States marshal for the eastern district of Tennessee, upon J. C. Stanton, in the office of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company, in Chattanooga, Tennessee, in which said office said Stanton was acting as the general superintendent of said railroad company, and he was at the time of such service the superintendent of said company, managing its affairs through its entire length, including the state of Alabama. The petition of William A. C. Jones, upon which the adjudication of bankruptcy was made, avers, among other things, that he is a creditor of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of Alabama, which for a period of six months next preceding the date of the filing of the petition, had carried on business in the state of Alabama and the middle district thereof in its said corporate name; that the petitioner's demand against the company was a promissory note, dated Boston, December nineteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, made by the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company, for the payment of four thousand and ninety-seven dollars and seventeen cents, to the order of W. A. C. Jones, at the National Security Bank, Boston, two years after date; and that within six calendar months next preceding the date of the petition, the said company had committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankrupt act, to wit: That said company, within the period aforesaid, and within said district, to wit: on the third day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, being a corporation under the laws of the state of Alabama, and organized as a joint stock company and carrying on a moneyed business within the limits of said district, had fraudulently stopped or suspended, and had not resumed payment of its commercial paper within a period of fourteen days. Like averments are made as to two other notes of the company held by the petitioner, one for five thousand and sixty-six dollars, and the other for five thousand dollars. On the day upon which the order to show cause was returnable, the company made default, and was, upon proof of the service of the order to show cause made as before stated, adjudged a bankrupt, and Egbert H. Grandin and John F. Bailey, citizens of Alabama, were appointed temporary custodians of the property of the company, and were authorized and directed to take possession thereof. The petition of review states many grounds upon which a reversal of the decree of the bankrupt court is asked. In the view we take of the case it will be unnecessary to notice them all.

Some preliminary questions were raised on the hearing of the petition of review, which the court is required to pass upon.

1. The authority of counsel to file this petition and appear for the railroad company was denied. The counsel for the railroad company thereupon stated professionally that they were duly authorized by the company to institute and prosecute this proceeding. In our opinion this statement must be taken as conclusive evidence of the fact asserted, unless some proof to the contrary is shown. No such proof is offered, and this objection may be well considered as out of the way.

2. The service of the petition of review was made upon Walker and Murphy, who were of counsel for Jones in the original proceeding. It is objected that this is not sufficient; that as soon as the decree of bankruptcy was rendered the case was at an end, and their relation of attorneys ceased. It appears from the proof that an attempt to serve Jones with notice of the petition of review was made, but it is alleged the service was defective. We think the service upon the attorneys of Jones was sufficient. The proceeding in review is a part of the original case, and for the purposes of the review the parties are still in court. "The proceeding in bankruptcy from the filing of the petition to the discharge of the bankrupt and the final dividend is a single statutory case or proceeding." York's Case, [Case No. 18,139.] The proceeding in review is intended to be speedy and summary. Reasonable notice to counsel accomplishes the ends of justice. If it were necessary to serve the party himself, he might defeat the reversal of the decree by avoiding service of notice, which it is alleged Jones in this case has attempted to do. The practice of serving the notice upon counsel is now well established in this circuit, and as no injustice can result from the practice, we are not disposed to change it. We consider the service upon counsel sufficient, and this objection is overruled. Even if the service were bad, it has been cured by the appearance of the defendant, Jones, and the filing of his answer to the petition of review.

3. It is suggested that in the middle district of Alabama, neither the circuit court nor a judge thereof has jurisdiction to review the proceeding of the district court for that district sitting in bankruptcy. This view is based upon the act of congress (5 Stat. 315, § 8) which provides that the district court for the middle district of Alabama, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction and powers of a district court of the United States, shall, within the limits of said district, have jurisdiction of all causes except appeals and writs of error which now are, or hereafter may be, by law, made cognizable in a circuit court of the United States, and shall proceed therein in the same manner as a circuit court.

The fair construction of this act does not make the said district court a circuit court. It remains a district court, but with enlarged jurisdiction. It is not clothed with all the powers of a circuit court, for it is denied jurisdiction in cases of appeal and writs of error. This jurisdiction is necessary to make it a circuit court, as that term is used in the statutes of the United States. It can scarcely be claimed that the judge of the middle district sitting in the district court would have jurisdiction to review and reverse his own decree made as a bankrupt judge. The reasons are obvious. The power of review is conferred by the bankrupt act on the circuit court in term time, or a circuit judge in vacation. The district court of the middle district of Alabama is not a circuit court, nor is the judge thereof a circuit judge. He may sit as a judge in a circuit court, but that does not make him, especially in vacation, a circuit judge, as that term is used in the bankrupt act. Under the bankrupt act of eighteen hundred and forty-one it was held by the United States supreme court ([Nelson v. Carland,] 1 How. [42 U. S.] 265.) that upon questions adjourned from the district to the circuit court, the district judge could not sit as a member of the circuit court, and consequently the points adjourned could not be brought before the supreme court by a certificate of division. If we are correct in these views, it follows that unless the circuit judge has jurisdiction in this case, the right of review is denied in cases of bankruptcy in the middle district of Alabama, and others where the district court has circuit court powers. The constitution of the United States authorizes congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, and the bankrupt act of eighteen hundred and sixty-seven is entitled an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. If we yield to the view that the revising jurisdiction conferred by the second section of the bankrupt act upon the circuit court and its judges does not apply to the middle district of Alabama, the law is not uniform, nor is the system uniform. Important remedies are denied to parties in the bankrupt court of this district which are conferred upon parties in other districts, and the bankrupt law is open to the constitutional objection that it is not uniform. We are constrained so to construe the law, if possible, as to make it conform to the constitution, and where two constructions are fairly open for adoption, the one which avoids constitutional objections must be preferred.

There is another view of this question which we think is conclusive. The second section of the bankrupt act provides that the several circuit courts of the United States within and for the district where the proceeding in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction, &c., and the powers and jurisdiction hereby granted may be exercised either by said court or by a justice thereof in term time or vacation. By the act of congress passed July third, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, (14 Stat. 209, § 2,) it is provided among other things that the districts of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, &c., shall constitute the fifth circuit. The district court which rendered the decree now under consideration is in the state of Alabama, and consequently within one of the districts comprising the fifth circuit, and therefore the circuit court and the judges thereof for the district of Alabama have by the terms of the bankrupt act jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under the act, and may hear and determine them upon bill, petition, or other proper process. The objection to our jurisdiction in this case must be overruled.

This brings us to consider the grounds upon which a reversal of the decree adjudging the petitioner a bankrupt is sought. It is objected to the decree that a railroad company is not of such character as to be included within the provisions of the bankrupt act. The act, section 37, provides that its provisions shall apply to all moneyed, business or commercial corporations and joint stock companies; and that, upon petition of any officer of such corporation or company duly authorized thereto, or upon petition of any creditor of such corporation or company, made and presented in the manner provided in respect to debtors, the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are provided in the case of debtors. It is said on behalf of the petitioner that a railroad company is not a moneyed, business or commercial corporation. We cannot concur in this view. A corporation carrying on and pursuing any lawful business defined by its charter, and clothed with power to do so, for the sake of gain, is clearly a business corporation and amenable to the provisions of the bankrupt act. Rankin v. Florida, A. & G. C. R. Co., [Case No. 11,567.] The petitioner is authorized by its charter to construct a railroad and to convey thereon, for gain, passengers and freight. Its main and primary object is to do these things for gain. It is, therefore, a business corporation, as the term business is popularly understood. It seems to be the clear intent of the thirty-seventh section to bring within the scope of the bankrupt act all corporations, except those organized for religious, charitable, social, literary, educational, municipal or political purposes. These may all be in one sense, moneyed or business corporations, for they must all have and use money and transact business, to some extent, in order to carry out their objects. But we do not call them moneyed corporations as we would a bank, nor do we call them business corporations, as we would a manufacturing or mining company or express company, because their chief and primary object is not to transact business or make gain. They necessarily transact business in order to accomplish other ends than the mere doing of business and making profit. The building of a railroad is certainly carrying on a business. The transporting of passengers, mails and freight for hire is certainly a business, and a company organized to make gain from these pursuits as its chief and ultimate purpose is clearly a business corporation. The voluntary application of a railroad company to be adjudged a bankrupt would hardly be dismissed on the ground that it was not a business corporation. Adams v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., [Case No. 47.]

But the petitioner says that admitting it to be a business corporation, it cannot be forced into involuntary bankruptcy on the ground that it has fraudulently stopped payment of its commercial paper, unless it is also averred and shown to be a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner. In order to compel a corporation into involuntary bankruptcy under the clause of the thirty-ninth section, which this proceeding in bankruptcy is based upon, three things are necessary to be averred and proven. 1. That the corporation is a moneyed, business or commercial corporation. 2. That it is a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner. 3. That it has fraudulently stopped payment, or has stopped and not resumed payment of its commercial paper for a period of fourteen days. A moneyed, business or commercial corporation may be forced into bankruptcy under the fifth clause of the twenty-ninth section, if it makes any assignment, gift, sale or conveyance, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder its creditors; or under the eighth clause, if guilty of any of the acts therein specified, without being shown to be either a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner. But where the proceeding is based on the ninth clause, as in this case, it is indispensable to aver and prove that the debtor sustained one of these characters. Has this been averred or proved in this case? The petition does not make any such averment, and is, therefore, fatally defective. Has this necessary fact been made out by the proof? The characters and powers of a corporation must be determined by its charter. A corporation authorized to carry on a banking business cannot construct or operate a railroad or carry on the business of a manufacturer or common carrier. A municipal corporation cannot, unless expressly authorized by its charter, carry on the business of a banker, miner or manufacturer.

A corporation is an artificial person, the creature of law. It has no powers except what are given by its incorporating act, either expressly or as incidental to its existence and its express powers. Beatty v. Knowler, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 152; Perrine v. Chesapeake & Del. Canal Co., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 172; Russell v. Topping, [Case No. 12,163;] Straus v. Eagle Ins. Co., 5 Ohio St. 59; City Council of Montgomery v. Plank Road Co., 31 Ala. 76; Brady v. Mayor of New York, 20 N. Y. 312; New London v. Brainard, 22 Conn. 552; Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co., 27 Pa. St. 339; Caldwell v. City of Alton, 33 Ill. 416; Smith v. Morse, 2 Cal. 524. No vote or act of a corporation can enlarge its chartered authority, either as to the subjects on which it is intended to operate or the persons or property of the corporators. Salem Milldam Corp. v. Ropes, 6 Pick. 23. A body corporate can only act in the mode prescribed by the law creating it. To enable its agents to bind the company, they must act pursuant to the incorporating act. [Head v. Providence Ins. Co.] 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 166. Express powers granted a corporation must be exercised in the manner pointed out in the statute. Smith v. Eureka Flour Mills Co., 6 Cal. 1. The corporation in executing a public work cannot substitute its own more convenient mode of proceeding for that pointed out by its constituting statute. Reg. v. Manchester &

L. Ry. Co., 3 Q. B. 528. When a specific act is directed to be done by a particular agent of a corporation, it must be done by that agent. Maddox v. Graham, 2 Metc. [Ky.] 56.

These principles and authorities illustrate the rule applicable to the question in hand. If the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company is a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner, it must be made so by its charter. The company derives its powers and franchises from the act to charter the Wills Valley Railroad, passed by the general assembly of Alabama, and approved February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-two; the act to incorporate the Northeast and Southwest Alabama Railroad Company, passed by the same general assembly, and approved December twelfth, eighteen hundred and fifty-three; and an act, also passed by the general assembly of Alabama, relating to the Wills Valley Railroad Company and the Northeast and Southwest Alabama Railroad Company, approved November eighteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight; which last named act authorized the purchase by the former company of the property and franchises of the latter. Said last named act also authorized the Wills Valley Railroad Company, after said purchase, to change its name to "The Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company;" and further provides that the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company should exercise all the corporate authority and functions, rights and privileges of both the Northeast and Southwest Alabama Railroad Company and the Wills Valley Railroad Company. Therefore we must consult the charters of the two latter companies to ascertain the powers and franchises of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company. An inspection of these charters shows that neither of these companies was authorized to carry on the business of a banker, broker, merchant, trader or miner; and being neither by the law of its creation, it cannot be made such by any act of its officers, agents, or employes, or even by a vote of its board of directors. The twenty-second section of the act to incorporate the Northeast and Southwest Railroad Company provides, however, that "said company shall have power to erect and carry on machine shops, iron furnaces, foundries and rolling mills, and such other mechanical works as may be necessary, and to make, manufacture and furnish iron and other materials for the full equipment of the road, and to continue to make and manufacture the same under the provisions of this charter either for sale or their own use." Clearly this gives authority to the road to become a manufacturer—but this authority does not make the company a manufacturer unless it actually engages in the business of manufacturing. The business must also be carried on for the purpose of selling the products manufactured and not for the exclusive use of the company, to make it a manufacturer within the meaning of the bankrupt act. A planter who manufactures plows and other agricultural implements, or weaves cloth, as many do, for his own use and not for sale cannot be considered a manufacturer, nor can a railroad company that makes iron rails and cars for its own exclusive use, and not for sale, be deemed a manufacturer. It might do this under its general power to construct, equip and operate a railroad without any special grant for that purpose. If no mode is prescribed for the exercise of a power, the grant of which is clearly defined, the corporation may adopt such mode as in its judgment will secure the purpose contemplated. No proof was submitted to the bankrupt court nor has any been submitted to this court to show that the corporation chartered by the state of Alabama as the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company has ever carried on the business of a manufacturer. Some proof was submitted to us, that in Chattanooga, Tenn., a railroad corporation known as the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company has carried on the business of manufacturing iron rails and cars, but no attempt was made to show that the articles manufactured were for sale and not for the exclusive use of the company. The fair presumption is that this corporation is the one chartered by the state of Tennessee. It is not alleged in the petition filed in the district court that the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company was either banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner, and no proof was offered showing that it was either. The inevitable conclusion is that the petitioner ought not to have been adjudicated a bankrupt upon the petition and proofs submitted to the judge of the district court.

We might leave the case here, but an interesting question of practice is raised which we will proceed to notice. The facts touching the charter of this railroad company by the four states of Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, where its line runs, and where its principal office is, have already been stated. It has also already been stated how the order to show cause, issuing from the bankrupt court, was served. It is objected that this service was defective and void. The bankrupt act, section forty, prescribes how service shall be made in cases of involuntary bankruptcy. A copy of the petition and order to show cause shall be served on such debtor by delivering the same to him personally, or by leaving the same at his last or usual place of abode; or if such debtor cannot be found, or his place of residence ascertained, service shall be made by publication in such manner as the judge may direct. By the words "if such debtor cannot be found," we understood "if he cannot be found within the jurisdiction of the court." We do not understand that the debtor may be served, or that the marshal is compelled to serve him in another jurisdiction, even when he knows precisely where he may be found. The words "not found" have a well settled technical meaning, and mean not found in the jurisdiction of the court. If no proper officer of this company could be found within the jurisdiction of the court, that did not authorize service out of the jurisdiction. In such case other modes of service must be resorted to. Service may be made at the last or usual place of residence of the debtor. Was the leaving of a copy of the order at the office of the debtor in Chattanooga, Tennessee, such a service as would bring the party into court? A corporation created by the laws of Alabama may carry on business in another state, but cannot be said to have a residence there. In Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519, held that "the legal person or entity known to the common law as a corporation, can have no legal existence out of the bounds of the sovereignty by which it is created; that it exists only by force of law, and that where that law ceases to operate the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation." Can a corporation be said to have a last or usual place of residence in a place where it cannot exist? It has been held that a corporation created by the laws of one state, is not rendered liable to be sued by process served in another state, by the fact that it carries on business in this latter state, and that the process has been delivered to its officers and agents found therein. The bankrupt act requires that the petition shall be addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided for the six months next preceding the time of filing the petition. If, therefore, it is claimed that the order to show cause was properly served by leaving a copy at the residence of the company in Chattanooga, Tennessee, it follows that the petition should have been filed in that district and addressed to the judge thereof. The fact that the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company is also chartered by the state of Tennessee, as well as Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, does not make it one corporate body, on which service could be made at its residence in any one of those states. In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 297, the supreme court "held that a corporation cannot exist as one body under charters from two separate states. It has no legal existence in either state except by the law of the state, and neither state could confer on it a corporate existence in the other, nor add to or diminish the powers conferred. It may be composed of and represent, under the same corporate name, the same natural persons; but the legal entity or person which exists by force of law can have no existence beyond the limits of the state which brings it into life and endows it with its faculties and powers. The president and directors of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company is therefore a distinct and separate corporate body in Indiana from the corporate body of the same name in Ohio." The result is that service was made neither personally nor at the last or usual place of residence of the debtor. As no other service was attempted, there has been no valid service.

It is said that unless the service made is held good there can be no service in this case. We do not so construe the law. Provision is made for service in just such case as this. If the debtor cannot be found, or his place of residence ascertained, service may be made by publication. It is certain that if the jurisdiction of the district court over this case can be maintained, the residence of the debtor is in this district. If the place of that residence cannot be ascertained, as if there is no office of the company within the district and it is uncertain or unascertained where the process should be left, and no person representing the corporation on whom service can properly be made, can be found in the district, then service by publication may and should be resorted to. We think it clear that service upon an officer of the corporation, out of the district and state and circuit, or service at the supposed residence of the corporation, also out of the district and state and circuit, is defective and invalid.

Whether this corporation has any residence at all in this district is a question which admits of debate, but the proof upon this point is meagre, and it is unnecessary to pass upon it.

The adjudication of bankruptcy in the bankrupt court was upon default of the debtor and upon a fatally defective petition. Even if the defect in the petition could be cured on this hearing by proof to establish the act of bankruptcy not averred in the petition filed in the bankrupt court, we think the proof submitted to us fails to show any act of bankruptcy on the part of the debtor. We are also of opinion that no sufficient service was made upon the debtor. For these reasons the decree of the district court for the middle district of Alabama, sitting in bankruptcy, adjudging the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company a bankrupt, is reversed. The custodians appointed under said decree will deliver without delay all the property of said company which they have taken into possession by virtue of that decree, and the petition of William A. C. Jones to have said company adjudged as a bankrupt, will be dismissed at his costs.

[NOTE. A subsequent petition to the circuit court for review of another adjudication of bankruptcy afterwards made by the district court against the same company was dismissed. See Alabama & C. R. Co. v. Jones, Case No. 127.]

Walker & Murphey, for William A. C. Jones, petitioning creditor in bankruptcy, respondent.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. These causes have been argued and submitted together. The first is heard upon a motion for the appointment of a receiver, to take into possession the property of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Co., and for an injunction to restrain a sale of said property by the bankrupt court of the middle district of Alabama. The question of the appointment of a receiver was long and ably argued at the last term of this court, and the motion to appoint was denied; but on the suggestion of counsel that a new fact had come to their knowledge which would remove the obstacle which the court found to the appointment of a receiver, the motion was continued. It turns out, however, that the supposed fact did not exist, and the motion has now been argued on substantially the same facts as at last term. I have listened with patience to the very able arguments submitted for the motion, but have not been able to reach any different conclusion from that announced heretofore.

The proposition of complainant is that this court shall appoint a receiver who shall wrest the property in controversy from the custody of the circuit court of the United States, for the southern district of Mississippi, and from the state chancery courts of Alabama, Georgia and Tennessee. These state chancery courts are courts of general jurisdiction, with powers just as large as the powers of this court, and just as competent to administer full relief. If this were not true, yet it will certainly not be denied as respects the United States circuit court for Mississippi. The jurisdiction of that court is precisely the jurisdiction of this; it as fully represents the powers of the high court of chancery of England as this. The complainant here could get the same measure of relief in that court as could be administered in this. By what right can he ask this court to stretch its hands beyond the limits of its territorial jurisdiction and wrest property from the court, of which it has acquired jurisdiction, which is in gremio legis and in process of administration by that court? The fact that the complainant raises questions here, as he claims, which are not raised in the suits referred to, does not authorise this court to take from those courts the property which they have under their control. This court may pass upon questions not raised in the other courts, even between the same parties and relating to the same, but no case can be found authorising this court to interfere with the property in the possession of other courts of concurrent jurisdiction.

The fact that the receivers appointed by three other courts are not doing their duty, or have in any degree abandoned the property, does not authorise this court to interfere. The receivers are responsible to the courts which appointed them, and to those courts alone. Appeal should be made to the court which appointed them, and any redress for their misconduct must be sought there. Nor can a question of the jurisdiction of those other courts be made here, so as to deprive them of their custody of the property. That question should be first made to the courts exercising the jurisdiction, and not here. But as I decided at the last term, and as it is alleged the supreme court of this state recently decided, I believe the jurisdiction of the courts referred to is complete over the subject matter of the suits and the parties. This jurisdiction having been first acquired, controls, and cannot and should not be interfered with by this or any other court. I am therefore constrained, as heretofore, to deny the motion for the appointment of a receiver.

At the last term of this court I expressed the opinion that the adjudication in bankruptcy of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Co., was, as presented at that time by the record of the bankrupt court, a void adjudication. The ground of this opinion was that the order to show cause was made on the fifteenth of September, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and the petition was not filed, as appeared by the record, until the nineteenth day of September following. The holding was that the commencement of the proceedings was the filing of the petition, and no valid order could be made until the proceedings were commenced. Since the last term of this court, a nunc pro tunc order has been made in the bankrupt court by which the date of the filing of the petition has been corrected. By the record, as amended, it appears that the petition was filed on September fifteenth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, at twelve o'clock M. This record as amended, if the amendment is properly made, we are bound to take as the record of the court, and to regard it precisely as if it had originally shown the true date of the filing to be September fifteenth. It is objected that the amendment was not properly made, because there was nothing of record to amend by. Whether this is necessary in the mere matter of the date of the filing of a petition, a purely ministerial act, it is unnecessary to decide. It seems to me, however, that there are two sufficient answers to the objection. The first is, that every court has power to alter and amend its records so as to conform to the truth, during the term to which the record relates. In the bankrupt court, so far as relates to each particular case, there is but one term. The terms of the bankrupt court are not divided by vacations. The first section of the bankrupt act provides "that the said (the bankrupt) courts shall be always open for the transaction of business." So that, from the beginning of a proceeding in bankruptcy to its termination, there is but one term. Now, can it be claimed with any show of reason, that during the pendency of proceedings in a particular case, the court could not, upon the representation of the clerk that he had omitted to file-mark a particular paper, or had filed it of a wrong date, and upon being satisfied of the truth of the representation, order him to file the paper as to [of] the date when lodged in his office? To do this would be exercising a power exercised almost every day by courts in term time; a power, too, generally exercised without the formality of a written order, entered upon the minutes.

But second: it appears from the record that the amendment in question was made upon proof satisfactory to the court, and even if it were necessary to amend by the record, this court is bound to presume that the evidence offered in support of the amendment was legal and sufficient. This court must presume that the bankrupt court acted in good faith, that it did its duty, and when its record shows that a certain fact was found on satisfactory proof—that the proof was legal and conclusive.

So we have the record of the bankrupt court, showing that the petition in bankruptcy was filed on September fifteenth, at twelve o'clock M. Can this record be impeached in this court? The authorities are adverse to the proposition. [Craig v. State of Missouri,] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 463; Mankin v. Chandler, [Case No. 9,030;] [Scott v. Shearman,] 2 W. Bl. 977; [The Mary,] 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 144; [Williams v. Armroyd,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 423, 432; [Walden v. Craig's Heirs,] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 147; [Com. v. Messenger,] 4 Mass. 467; [Putnam v. Man,] 3 Wend. 202; [Legro v. Lord,] 10 Me. 163. When the court has found upon a jurisdictional fact, it is conclusive. The record here shows that upon proof submitted the fact in question was passed upon by the court. It is res adjudicata, and cannot be contradicted by parol testimony. It is not denied that the petition in this case was filed at some time. The filing of the petition gave the court jurisdiction of the case. It became a case in the court and was properly there. Being a case in court, the court had the power and jurisdiction to make the record of the proceedings conform to the truth, and if the truth was that the petition was filed on a certain day, it was within the power of the court to make the record speak that fact.

We must take it as a conclusively established fact that the petition was filed on the fifteenth of September, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, at twelve, M. The order to show cause, however, states that "before the filing of the petition the same was presented to the circuit judge for his order." But the record also shows that on the same day that the circuit judge made the order to show cause, and prior to making the order, he directed the proofs and petition to be filed. As the present record shows that the petition was filed on the same day at noon, so that it is the result of the entire record either that the petition was filed before the order to show cause was signed, or contemporaneously with the order. This is the way the record reads: "Before the filing of the foregoing petition and proofs the same was submitted to the circuit judge, who, having read the same, now orders said petition and proofs to be filed." (The record shows this was done at noon of that day.) Then follows the order of the judge to show cause. All things are presumed to be rightly done. It is to be presumed, unless the record show the contrary, that when the judge ordered the petition to be filed it was done either before or contemporaneously with the making of the order. Taking the record as it now stands it is impossible to say that the order to show cause was made before the filing of the petition. The fair intendment of the record is otherwise. The ground, therefore, upon which I expressed the opinion at the last term, that the adjudication was void for want of authorised service upon the bankrupt, is taken away by the amended record now presented. The amendment has been made by the proper court having the authority, and this court is constrained to hold that it was rightly and truthfully done.

But it appears to me that the present petitioner is not authorised to complain of this adjudication in this court. A revisory petition can only be filed by a party aggrieved. Until adjudication there are but two parties to an involuntary petition in bankruptcy—the petitioning creditor and the debtor. The latter, and the latter only, can complain of the adjudication. In the very nature of the case, he is the only party who can be aggrieved by the adjudication. A creditor, even one who has proved his debt, cannot come in after the adjudication and seek to have it reversed, for the obvious reason that he was not a party to the proceedings of which he complains.

The other matters complained of in the petition do not seem to me to present any subject for the revisory power of this court. It is not every proceeding in a bankrupt case that this court is authorised to review. This court is not empowered to pass upon the doings and actings of the registers or assignees or creditors. The "case" or "question" presented here for revision must be a case or question fairly presented to and passed upon by the bankrupt court. That is the court of first resort. To that court first must the question and the proofs be presented, and if that court errs upon the question presented, then, and then only, can resort be had to this court. A party cannot come to this court in the first instance to make his case or question. Thus, in the case of Bailey v. Whitfield, [Case No. 748,] this court, when asked to set aside an alleged fraudulent sale of real estate ordered by the bankrupt court and made by the assignee, refused to do so, because the motion had not first been presented to the bankrupt court, holding that we could only review the action of the court and not the action of the assignee.

The result of these views is, that the petition of review, taken in connection with the record of the bankrupt court as now shown, does not present a case which authorises this court to reverse the bankrupt proceedings. The petition of Stephens must, therefore, be dismissed.

SALVAGE—RECEIVING CARGO TO LIGHTEN STRANDED SHIP—AMOUNT OF AWARD.

[1. Salvors who render no service to a ship which is aground other than receiving part of the cargo which the master was about to jettison, in order to float the ship, have no claim for salvage against the ship, but only against the portion of cargo thus received and saved by them.]

[2. Where a ship is aground in great peril, salvors who receive her cargo to the value of $30,000, and thus lighten her enough to get her afloat, and who willingly and in good faith do their utmost to assist the master both by advice and by helping at the pumps until the vessel gets into port, should get the highest possible award against the cargo so received by them, especially when it is probable that the master would have jettisoned a greater amount of the cargo had they not been present to receive it; and in such case an award of $23,500 is suitable.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by William F. English and others against the ship Alabamian and cargo for salvage. Decree for libellants as to a part of the cargo.]

Charles Watkins, for libellants.

A. Gordon, for respondents.

MARVIN, Superior Court Judge. The ship Alabamian, (Lane, master,) bound from New York to Mobile, laden with an assorted cargo, estimated to be worth $200,000, about four o'clock in the morning of the twenty-sixth of March, ran on to that part of the Florida reef known as the Washerwoman. The master threw overboard a part of his cargo; and after the arrival of the libellants' wrecking vessels a part was transferred on board of them, and brought to this port. The ship being got off the reef, she, with the cargo left on board of her, was also brought here, and libelled in this court for salvage. The facts and circumstances connected with this disaster—the imminent perils which surrounded the ship and cargo, while upon the reef—the manner and means of her preservation, are sufficiently and well set forth in the pleadings.

The first question to be considered is, are the ship and entire cargo subject to the claim of salvage; or is that part of the cargo transferred on board the wrecking vessels, only, subject to the claim of salvage? "Salvage is a compensation given for saving property exposed to marine peril." This definition is believed to be correct. The property then must be saved by the persons claiming the compensation; for the compensation is given for saving. It must also be exposed to marine peril. If there be no peril there can be no saving. Marine perils and saving from these perils, by the persons claiming salvage, must concur to entitle them to this extraordinary compensation. The entire property must be saved. In order to charge the entire property with the claim of salvage. The saving of part will not create a claim of salvage against the residue. That these are the fundamental rules upon which the right to salvage is based I have no doubt. They were expressly recognized in the case of The Elenor,¹ decided in this court in 1836 by Judge Webb, but held not applicable to that case; as the entire property in that case had evidently been saved by the actors. Let us apply these principles to the case under consideration.—From the testimony in the case I am satisfied that the services of the libellants in no way conducted to the saving of the ship and that part of the cargo left on board of her at the time she came off the reef. They were saved by the coolness and skill of the master, favoring winds, favorable tide, and other auspicious circumstances of nature. Beyond the simple act of receiving a part of the ship's cargo on board their vessels, the services of the libellants were not needed; and under the circumstances of the case, however extraordinary or laborious their exertions to save the ship and cargo might have been, it is evident that their exertions could not save them from the perils which surrounded. The libellants did everything that was wanted—everything that was asked of them—everything they could do to rescue the ship and cargo from her perilous situation. They assisted in lightening the ship. They rescued a part of the cargo aboard their own vessels. But the ship would have been lightened to the same extent by throwing the same quantity of cargo overboard, which could have been done by the master and crew in as short a period of time as was employed in transferring the cargo on board their vessels; and which it is evident the master would have done, from his having commenced such jettison. I am of the opinion that the service of the libellants did not contribute to the saving of the ship, and that part of the cargo left on board of her at the time she came off the reef. It follows that these are not subject to any valid claim on the part of the libellants for salvage, and as to these the attachment of this court against them has im-providently issued.

The next question is, what amount of the value of that part of the ship's cargo, transferred on board the libellants' vessel ought to be decreed them as salvage? The value of this portion of the ship's cargo cannot be precisely ascertained without considerable delay to the ship's sailing on her voyage, and some expense and trouble. A part of it has been appraised; the rest is estimated. The whole is believed to be worth $30,000. From the pleadings and proofs it is clear that this amount of the value of the ship's cargo has been saved by the services of the libellants from certain total loss. But for their services this amount of property would certainly have been committed to the devouring ocean. It is quite probable, too, if the libellants had not been at hand to render assistance, that the master, in his anxiety to lighten his ship sufficiently to be sure of her going off the first favorable tide, would have thrown overboard more of his cargo than was saved in the libellants' vessels. The good conduct of the salvors in this case; their prompt readiness and willingness to render all the assistance in their power; their perfect good faith in giving good and withholding bad advice to the master when the ship was exposed to the greatest peril, and when the slightest mismanagement, the least imprudent experimenting in taking in, setting or trimming the sails, would inevitably have lost her; their promptness and willingness in assisting at the pumps to keep the ship free on her way from the reef to this port, and while she was being discharged at the wharf,—induces me to award to them upon the value of the property saved by them the highest rate of salvage which my views of the case and the rules of law will at all justify. By rewarding good conduct, good faith, and promptness to render assistance, when assistance is really needed, with a generous liberality, and by withholding this liberality when these virtues are wanting, or not apparent, I shall teach a moral lesson to the professional wreckers upon this coast that must and will secure comparative protection to the commerce of the Florida gulf. Impressed with these views, I shall in this case decree to the libellants as a salvage compensation the sum of $23,500. I feel that under the circumstances of this case, this is a large salvage, but as in governments and morals, so also in the decisions of this court, particular interests had better be made, sometimes, to yield to a certain extent to the greater interests of the general whole; and a general policy, which has for its object the safety of commerce through the dangerous Florida gulf, had better be vindicated and sustained, which policy requires that when the conduct of the professional wrecker is good it should be rewarded,—when bad, punished. See [Mason v. The Blaireau,] 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 240.

The clerk will enter up the decree in form.

The ALASKA.

[3 Ben. 391.]¹

District Court, E. D. New York. Sept., 1869.

PILOTAGE—JURISDICTION—TENDER.

1. Where a pilot boarded a ship, some thirty miles from Barnegat, and the master of the ship proposed that his employment should not commence till the vessel reached pilot ground, whereupon the pilot went to bed, and was called when Sandy Hook hove in sight, and then took charge of the vessel, and thereafter libelled her for the amount of offshore pilotage, awarded by the laws of the state of New York: held, that the court had jurisdiction of the action, [as it was on a maritime contract.]

2. That the libellant could only recover for in-shore pilotage, and that, as the amount of in-shore pilotage had been tendered before suit, the decree must be without costs.

[3. Cited in Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 76, as authority for holding a contract for wharfage to be a maritime contract.]

In admiralty. This was an action to enforce an alleged lien upon the American bark called the "Alaska," for pilotage. The libellant, who was a New Jersey pilot, boarded the bark when some thirty miles south southeast from Barnegat, bound to New York. He did not, however, take charge until Sandy Hook light was just in sight, from which place he acted as pilot until the vessel was moored in the port of New York, which was her home port. For this service he presented a bill for off-shore pilotage. The owners of the vessel refused to pay off-shore pilotage, but, before suit, tendered the regular in-shore pilotage, which was refused, whereupon this action was brought. [Decree by libellant for amount of in-shore pilotage.]

Emerson, Goodrich & Wheeler, for libellant.

F. A. Wilcox, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The objection which has been taken to the jurisdiction of the court is not maintainable. A court of admiralty has undoubted jurisdiction to entertain a proceeding in rem against a ship, whether owned in this state or elsewhere, to enforce payment for services actually rendered to such ship in piloting her from sea. If such a service be not maritime, I can conceive of none. The Rob. J. Mercer, [Case No. 11,891;] Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 120.

Nor can the existence of state pilot laws, regulating pilotage service in and out of the port of New York, have any effect to change the nature of the service. The states cannot, by legislating in regard to services clearly maritime, make them other than what they are. Statutes of the states regulating the appointment and compensation of pilots, have been held to be valid laws for such purposes, which can be enforced in the tribunals of the states, and are to be looked to as determining the amount of the compensation to be allowed pilots who hold offices under them, whenever the claim to such compensation may be advanced; but they can have no effect to limit the jurisdiction over all causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, which, under the constitution, has been conferred upon the district court of the United States. Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 120.

The libellant is, therefore, entitled to maintain his action, founded as it is upon a maritime contract. But upon the facts, as they appear, he is not entitled to recover the full amount which he has claimed. The evidence shows that the pilot, when he went on board the vessel, assented to the proposition of the master, that his employment should not commence until the vessel reached pilot ground. He accordingly went to bed, was waked when Sandy Hook light hove in sight, and then first took charge as pilot.

Under such a state of facts, he must be deemed to have first offered his services as pilot when the vessel reached pilot ground, and to have waived any right which he might have had, if he had held the master to accept or refuse his services when the ship was first hailed.

The decree will, accordingly, be for the amount of the in-shore pilotage, and as the tender of that amount before suit brought is admitted, the decree must be without costs.

Case No. 130.

The ALASKA.

[7 Ben. 183.]¹

COLLISION IN LONG ISLAND SOUND — SCHOONERS CROSSING—12TH (NOW 17TH) RULE.

1. Two schooners, the A. and the H., were beating through Long Island sound, bound to New York, the wind being about west by south. Both vessels were on the port tack, standing off from the Long Island shore, the A. being ahead, and to windward of the H. The H., however, being the faster vessel, passed the A., and came about on the starboard tack, for the purpose, as she said, of avoiding the strength of the ebb tide, and obtaining a more favorable wind nearer the Long Island shore. Shortly after she came on the starboard tack, she was run into by the A., which struck her on the port quarter. She alleged that she had room enough to get by the A., but that the wind headed her off, and favored the A., and that the A. was bound to have kept out of her way, but made no effort to do so. The A. claimed that the H. came on her starboard tack so close to the A. that it was not possible for the A. to go under her stern, although her helm was at once put hard a-port: Held. That, if the case were one calling for the application of the 12th rule [now rule 17] for avoiding collisions, the burden of proof would be on the A. to show an excuse for not keeping out of the way of the H.;

[See Bartlett v. Williams, Case No. 1,081.]

2. But that, on the facts, the H. was in fault, in coming on her starboard tack so close to the A. as to compel the A. to change her course so as to avoid the H. Her manoeuvre was a hazardous one;

3. That, on the facts, the helm of the A. was ported as soon as the H. tacked, and that the A. was free from fault.

In admiralty.

R. H. Huntley, for libellants.

W. R. Beebe and A. J. Heath, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed by the owners of the schooner Marietta Hand against the schooner Alaska, to recover for the damages sustained by the libellants, in consequence of a collision which took place between the two vessels on the 26th of April, 1872, between 3 and 4 o'clock P. M., in fine and clear weather, in Long Island sound, a little to the westward of Plum Island, and not far from the Long Island shore. Both vessels were bound to New York through the sound, and both were beating, the wind being about west by south, and blowing a fresh breeze. Just before the collision, both vessels were on the port tack, standing off from Long Island shore. At the commencement of the standing of both vessels on such port tack, the Alaska was ahead, and to the windward of the Hand. While they both continued to stand on such tack, the Hand, being in ballast and light, forereached and passed the Alaska, the Alaska being still to the windward. The Hand then tacked and came on to the starboard tack, the Alaska still keeping on the port tack. In this condition of things the collision occurred, the Alaska, head on, striking the port quarter of the Hand a glancing blow near the stern of the Hand.

The libel alleges, that the Hand stood on the port tack until she had beaten it out; that then, owing to the strength of the ebb tide in the middle of the sound, and to the fact that she could obtain a more favorable wind nearer the shore of Long Island, she tacked, to stand toward Long Island; that, when she so tacked, the Alaska was 600 or 700 feet astern of her, and bore about one point off her weather quarter; that, as the Hand went about, the wind headed her off on the starboard tack, and thereby favored the Alaska, so as to enable her to luff nearer to the position into which the tack just made brought the Hand; that, upon discovering this, those on board of the Hand hailed the Alaska to keep off, but she kept on and ran into the Hand; that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of the Alaska, in not keeping away, in not having a lookout properly stationed, and in having a load of lumber piled so high on her deck, that those on board of her could not see the Hand; and that, if the Alaska had slightly changed her wheel, she would have passed to the leeward of the Hand, and thus have avoided a collision. This libel was sworn to by the libellant Hawkins, one of the owners of the Hand, six days after the collision, and was drawn up on a statement made by Hawkins, and by Hallock, the master of the Hand, who was examined on the trial as a witness for the libellants.

The answer avers that, on the port tack of both vessels, the Hand ranged a little ahead of the Alaska, and when about once or twice her length ahead, and about three points off the starboard and lee bow of the Alaska, the Hand suddenly, and without any warning, and when the two vessels were in too near proximity, tacked, apparently attempting to run across the bows of the Alaska, and ran into the Alaska; that everything that could be done on board of the Alaska was done to avoid the collision, but it was inevitable from the instant of the last unseamanlike manoeuvre of the Hand, though the helm of the Alaska was put and kept hard a-port; and that the collision was wholly the fault of the Hand.

The contention on the part of the Hand is, that the courses of the two vessels were crossing, and they had the wind on different sides, and it was the duty of the Alaska, under article 12, as having the wind on the port side to keep out of the way of the Hand, both vessels being close hauled. If the state of things contemplated in article 12 existed, the burden of proof is on the Alaska to show an excuse for not keeping out of the way of the Hand, as the existence of such a state of things, there having been a collision between the two vessels, is prima facie evidence of fault in the Alaska, and conclusive evidence of fault in her, unless successfully rebutted by her. It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine whether article 12 applies to the case. The Alaska contends, that it does not apply, for the reason that the Hand, when on the port tack with the Alaska, and when to the leeward of the Alaska, and when only about once or twice the length of the Hand ahead of the Alaska, and about three points off the starboard and lee bow of the Alaska, suddenly, and without any warning, and when the two vessels were in too near proximity, tacked and attempted to run across the bows of the Alaska, and caused the collision, although the Alaska, from the instant of the Hand's manoeuvre, put and kept her helm hard a-port. With the wind about west by south, the Alaska, on her port tack, close hauled and lying say five points to the wind, would be heading about northwest, and the Hand, on her starboard tack, close hauled, and lying say five points to the wind, would be heading about south southwest. These courses were crossing.

The libel states, that, when the Hand tacked, the Alaska was 600 or 700 feet astern of the Hand, and bore about one point off the weather quarter of the Hand; and that, as the Hand went about, the wind headed her off on the starboard tack (that is, caused her to head more to the southward than south southwest, as I understand it, so as to diminish her opportunity of crossing ahead of the Alaska), and favored the Alaska, so as to enable her to luff nearer to the position into which the tack just made brought the Hand (that is, so as to enable the Alaska to head more to the westward than north-west). This story of the Hand, told six days after the collision, is a very different one from that told by Hallock, the master of the Hand, at the trial, 20 months after the collision. Hallock was on the deck of the Hand, and at her wheel, and testifies, at the trial, that, when the Hand tacked the last time before the collision, she was from a half to three quarters of a mile ahead of the Alaska, which would be from 2,640 to 3,960 feet ahead, instead of 600 or 700 feet ahead. He also testifies that, after getting on the starboard tack, he stood on it from 10 to 15 minutes before the collision. There is nothing of this in the libel. He also testifies, that he was nearly half a mile to the leeward of the Alaska, when he so tacked; and that he supposed he was far enough ahead to cross the bows of the Alaska. It is impossible, I think, from all the evidence in the case, to resist the conclusion, that the Hand, being light, was not only trying to outsail the Alaska, and did outsail her, but also then undertook to wind her and cross her bows, and to do that in such close proximity to the Alaska, as to compel the Alaska, under the rule of navigation, to depart from her course so as to avoid the Hand. If, as is alleged in the libel, the ebb tide was stronger in the middle of the sound, and the Hand could obtain a more favorable wind nearer the Long Island shore, and these were the reasons why she tacked when and where she did, there is nothing to show that these reasons were not and ought not to have been as controlling before she passed the Alaska as afterwards, and nothing to show why the Hand did not tack at a point where she would have been certain to go under the stern of the Alaska, and where she would not have attempted to cross the bows of the Alaska. The admission by the master of the Hand, that he supposed, when he tacked, that he was far enough ahead to cross the bows of the Alaska, is a confession that he intended to cross her bows. This was a hazardous manoeuvre in a vessel sailing close hauled, and liable to be headed off both by the wind and the tide, and to make leeway enough to disappoint the expectation of crossing the bows of the Alaska. Nevertheless, if the Hand, in fact, tacked far enough off from the Alaska, to make the 12th article applicable, it must be applied, although the Hand, in tacking when and where she did, did so for the avowed purpose of winding the Alaska. That the wind was likely to head the Hand off, when she got on the starboard tack, was a circumstance which ought to have entered into the calculation of the master of the Hand, before he put his helm down to go about, and there can be no justification for him, if he went about when the Alaska was only 600 or 700 feet astern of the Hand, and then tried to cross the bows of the Alaska. This view, by the time of the trial, came to be controlling, and the witnesses from the Hand depart from the statement of the libel, and place the Alaska, at the time the Hand went about, at a much greater distance astern of the Hand than 600 or 700 feet. Burke, the acting mate of the Hand, who was walking the deck, puts the Alaska at the distance of about half a mile astern of the Hand when the Hand tacked, and says, that when the Hand got filled away the Alaska was about half a mile off in a straight line, and about four points off the lee bow of the Hand, and that, at the time the Hand tacked, they calculated to go ahead of the Alaska. This witness makes ten feet in a rod, and fifty rods in an eighth of a mile.

The libel charges, as reasons why the Alaska did not keep away, her want of a lookout, interception of vision by her deck load of lumber, and failure to port.

Ambrose Strout, the master of the Alaska, who was on her deck, the mate having the wheel, says that the Hand was about twice to three times her length ahead of the Alaska, when she tacked; that the Hand had just got fairly filled away when the vessels struck; that, when they saw the Hand tacking, the Alaska's wheel was hove hard up, and her main sheet was run off; that Ferrin W. Strout was stationed as a lookout on the fore-castle, forward; and that the lookout noticed that the Hand was tacking, and he, the master, saw her himself at the same time, and saw her when she was coming up into the wind. Ferrin W. Strout, the lookout, testifies, that he was on the lookout; that the Hand ranged about twice her length ahead of the Alaska, and then tacked; that she had barely filled away before the collision; that he was standing on the fore-castle deck, when the Hand tacked; and that, when he saw her tack, he halloed to the man at the wheel of the Alaska, and then the wheel of the Alaska was hove up and her main sheet was run off, and she paid off a little, but there was not time to pay off more before the vessels struck. Stover, a hand on the deck of the Alaska, and who saw the collision, testifies, that the lookout on the Alaska sang out to the man at her wheel to port his wheel, that the Hand was tacking under their bow. Uriah W. Strout, the mate of the Alaska, who was at her wheel, testifies, that the Hand ranged ahead, and when she got a little on the starboard bow of the Alaska, a mite ahead, if anything, tacked; that they saw her when she tacked, and they went to keep off, and hove their helm hard up, and fell off a very little before the collision; and that the collision could not have been avoided after the Hand went in stays, because, when she tacked, she was so near to the Alaska, being about half a point on the lee bow of the Alaska, and about twice her length ahead.

On the whole evidence, I am of opinion, that the libellants have failed to make out their case against the Alaska, and that she has excused her not avoiding the Hand, by showing that the Hand improperly tacked so closely under the bows of the Alaska as to make it impossible for the Alaska to avoid her by the exercise of reasonable diligence and skill. The Alaska had no reason to suppose that the Hand had beaten out her port tack, or would go about, and there seems to have been no reason for her going about, except a desire to wind the Alaska. The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Minnesota.]

In admiralty. A libel in rem was filed in the United States district court for Minnesota, in August, 1875, to enforce a maritime lien for necessary material and supplies furnished by the libellant to the Albany, at the request of the master. These were so furnished by libellant in 1873, at La Crosse, in the state of Wisconsin, where the libellant resided and did business. The owner of the Albany was then, and still is, one Jacob Heime, who resided at Boscobel, in the state of Wisconsin. Boscobel is within the collection district which has its collector's office at Galena, Illinois, where the said Albany was enrolled and licensed, and Galena is the nearest collector's office to Boscobel. The Albany was engaged in navigating the Mississippi river, and during the winters she regularly laid up at Boscobel. She has painted on her stern, as required by the act of congress, the words, "The Albany, Boscobel, Wisconsin." In 1875, the Albany was mortgaged to certain of the claimants, whose mortgages were duly registered just before the seizure of the boat. The mortgagees had no notice of the libellant's claim. The Albany has been at the port of La Crosse as often as once a month during each season of navigation, since the libellant furnished said materials and supplies. There were two main questions argued in the district court: 1. Has the libellant a maritime lien? 2. If so, is the same stale as respects the mortgagees? The district court entered a decree in favor of the libellant. The owner and mortgagees appeal. [Decree reversed and libel dismissed.]

W. P. Warner, for claimants, (appellants.)
J. H. Davidson, for libellant, (appellee.)

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The decisive question in this case is, what was the home-port or state, of the steamboat Albany? It is a question of very great importance, and in respect of which some conflict of judicial opinion appears to exist. It has been deliberately considered, and without spreading upon this opinion all the learning applicable to it, I proceed to state my views concerning it. As strengthening the conclusion arrived at, and illustrating the reasons upon which it is based, it is desirable, briefly, to advert to the general law upon the subject of maritime liens or hypothecations. By the civil law, the material-man, for repairs made or necessary supplies furnished to a vessel, had an implied or tacit lien, whether the vessel was in her home-port or in a foreign port. Abb. Shipp. 142; The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 590, 2 Cent. Law J. 410. And such is the undoubted rule in the maritime nations of Europe, which have adopted the civil law as the basis of the jurisprudence. It is equally well known that this principle has not been adopted as the law of England, or, rather, after having obtained in the admiralty courts of that country for some time, it was overturned by the hostility of the common law courts. The Zodiac, 1 Hagg. Adm. 325.

In the present case, the supplies were furnished to the vessel at the instance of the master, and in the maritime law of Europe certain limitations upon his power, as between him and the owner, in respect of contracts for supplies or money to obtain them, are declared to exist.

By the celebrated marine ordinance of Louis XIV., whose provisions have been largely embodied in the Code de Commerce, material-men furnishing supplies are entitled to a lien; but this right is subject to the qualification (article 232, Code de Commerce) that the master shall not, in the place of residence (dans le lieu de la demeure) of the owners or their agent, without special authority, cause repairs to be made, buy sails, cordage, etc., or take up money for that purpose. But if the master violate this duty, the material-man, acting in good faith, is not deprived of his right or remedies. The words, "the place where the owner resides," are construed in France to comprehend the whole district, but not the whole country. Selden v. Hendrickson, (The Richmond), [Case No. 12,639.] But in England there is no implied lien recognized for repairs made or supplies furnished in that country—the principle of the civil law in this respect having been, as above observed, overthrown by the early hostility of the common law courts to the admiralty jurisdiction. But for necessary repairs made and supplies furnished abroad or in a foreign port, the English courts recognize and enforce a maritime lien.

It is important to notice the reasons given in the English courts for this distinction. Lord Mansfield says: "Work done for a ship in England, is supposed to be on the personal credit of the employer"—the owner or master. "In foreign ports," he adds, "the master may hypothecate the ship." Wilkins v. Carmichael, 1 Doug. 101. And, finally, the house of lords, in 1789, to conform the law of Scotland to the law of England, in Wood v. Hamilton, [3 Pat. App. 148.] decided that persons who had repaired and furnished a ship in Scotland, the place of the owner's residence, had no lien or privilege upon the ship itself. Abb. Shipp. c. 3, pt. 2, p. 147.

A maritime lien for supplies and necessary repairs abroad, furnished at the instance of the master, the owner being absent, is allowed from necessity and the encouragement of trade. Abb. Shipp. 144, 145.

The question in England, as to what is the place of residence of the owner, has given rise to controversy; but Lord Tenterden says: "I apprehend the whole of England is considered, for this purpose, as the residence of an Englishman; at least before the commencement of the voyage." Abb. Shipp. 155; Selden v. Hendrickson, [Case No. 12,639.] where the subject is discussed by Chief Justice Marshall. But the question is now settled in Great Britain by statutable provision. By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, § 8, all ports within Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands, and the islands adjacent, if part of the queen's dominions, are to be deemed home-ports in relation to the rights and remedies of persons having claims for repairs done or supplies furnished to ships.

Such being the state of the law in Europe and England, it became a question in the admiralty courts in this country, soon after their creation under the constitution, what doctrines they would adopt in respect of repairs and supplies. Some followed the more enlarged right given by the continental or general maritime law; others the more restricted right recognized by the English courts. In this condition of the law, at home and abroad, the supreme court of the United States, in 1819, decided the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438. In that case a Baltimore merchant furnished supplies to the ship General Smith, which was owned at Baltimore, and the court decided that there was no lien upon the vessel. In delivering its judgment, Mr. Justice Story thus states the doctrine of the court: "Where repairs have been made or necessaries have been furnished to a foreign ship, or to a ship in the port of a state to which she does not belong, the general maritime law, following the civil law, gives the party a lien on the ship itself for his security. But in respect to repairs and necessaries in the port or state to which the ship belongs, the case is governed by the municipal law of that state, and no lien is implied, unless it is recognized by that law." The case of The General Smith has been frequently approved by the supreme court, and in the recent case of The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 558, it has been solemnly reaffirmed, with but two dissenting judges. In applying the rule of The General Smith in other cases, the following language, bearing upon the question in the case under consideration, has been used: "Material-men who furnish materials or supplies for a vessel * * in a port other than a port of the state where the vessel belongs, have a maritime lien on the vessel" therefor. The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 643, per Clifford, J. But not "for materials and supplies furnished to a vessel in her home-port." Id. 645. "A maritime lien does not arise for repairs made and supplies furnished in the home-port of the vessel." This "question was put at rest" by The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 443. Per Clifford, J., in The Kalorama, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 211; People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, 402.

We are thus brought to the question in the present case, whether the Albany, within the doctrine of the supreme court, belonged to the state of Wisconsin, where her owner resided, and to which she purported to belong, by the words painted upon her stern, or belonged to the state of Illinois, in which she was enrolled. Or, in other words, which is the home-port? 1. Is it the particular town or city in a state in which the owner resides, and is every other port in the state, as well as elsewhere, foreign? 2. Is the vessel at a home-port at all ports in the state in which her owner actually resides, although she may be enrolled in another state? Or, 3. Does the state in which the enrollment is made conclusively determine the home-port or domestic character of the vessel, irrespective of the residence of the owner?

To solve the questions, let us first seek the aid of adjudged cases. In The Nestor, [Case No. 10,126,] A. D. 1831, on which a lien for supplies furnished in the District of Columbia for the Nestor, belonging to the port of Portland, Maine, was sustained, Mr. Justice Story said: "The admiralty has a clear jurisdiction to maintain such suits whenever the supplies have been furnished to the vessel in a foreign port; and every port is foreign to her which is not in the same state to which she belongs. So the doctrine was laid down in the case of The General Smith, and it has never, to my knowledge, been in the slightest degree departed from." "Ports of states, other than those of the state where the vessel belongs," says Clifford, J., "are considered as foreign ports." The Lulu, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 200, 202. "The term 'foreign port' in the jurisprudence of the United States," says the same learned judge, in a case on the circuit, "includes all maritime ports other than those of the state where the vessel belongs." Burke v. The Richmond, [Case No. 2,161.] And see the same illustration put by the same judge in the case of The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] at page 594.

The language of the opinion in the case of The General Smith and of Mr. Justice Story and Mr. Justice Clifford, above referred to, fairly implies, I think, that the domestic or foreign character of the vessel is determined by the state in which the owner resides, and not by the state in which the enrollment is made. And decided cases, —The General Smith, [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 438;] The Nestor, [Case No. 10,126;] The Chusan, [Id. 2,717,]—in the statement of them, show that the residence of the owner was regarded, and not the enrollment.

In the case of The Golden Gate, [Id. 6,492;] decided by an able admiralty judge, the precise question was presented, whether the foreign or domestic character of a vessel depended on the residence of her owner, or on the port of her enrollment. Judge Wells decided that where these were different, the residence of the owners governed as respects the rights and remedies of material-men. And the same reason is given by him as the one which is supposed to underlie the rule in this country denying a maritime lien for supplies to a domestic vessel. Judge Wells says: "If the owners reside in a foreign country, or in another state, the material-man is presumed to give credit to the boat and also to the owners—because he is not presumed to rely alone on the owners who live so remote and who are beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of his state. If the owners reside in the same state with the material-man, the latter can easily resort to them for payment and readily enforce it in the courts; therefore he may well be supposed to give credit to the owners alone. It is apparent, therefore, that the place of enrollment has nothing to do with the credit that is given; and has, therefore, nothing to do with the question of lien."

A similar principle was approved and applied by Judge Leavitt, in the case of The Superior, [Case No. 4,115.] He holds that the place of enrollment is only prima facie evidence of the port or state to which the vessel belongs, and denies the soundness of The Indiana, [Id. 14,165,] so far as it decided that the vessel necessarily belonged to the port where she is enrolled.

The exact question whether the home-port of a vessel is determined by the residence of the owner or the place of enrollment, arose in The Mary Bell, [Case No. 9,199,] and it was decided by Judge Deady that the state in which the owner resided, and not that in which the enrollment was made, governed. Judge Betts made a similar decision in the southern district of New York. The Kosciusko, [Id. 13,901.] And in The Alida, [Id. 199,] this learned judge says: "Where services or supplies are rendered to a foreign ship, a lien attaches by the general maritime law, and the different states of the federal Union are, in regard to this question, regarded as foreign states to each other." This conclusion accords with the views of Chief Justice Marshall, in Selden v. Hendrickson, [Case No. 12,639,] 1819, where, after stating the law of England, he says: "The same principle applied to the United States, requires, I think, that a port in one state should not be considered as the place of residence of owners who live in another state." * * * "If every port, except that in which the owner actually resides, be not for this purpose (the hypothecation of the vessel) a foreign port, I perceive no rule more proper in this country, no rule better adapted to our situation, and to the reason of the thing, than to say that the power of the master to hypothecate exists in every port out of the state in which the owner resides, where he has no agent."

I am aware that in The Loper, [Case No. 11,119,] A. D. 1851, Mr. Chief Justice Taney is reported as laying down a contrary doctrine, and as saying: "The circumstance that the owner or charterer (of the Loper) was a citizen of another state, would not make her a foreign vessel in the port of Baltimore; the port at which she was enrolled and licensed was her home-port. As she belonged to Baltimore, and the supplies were furnished here, they were furnished at her home-port, and created no lien upon the vessel. This question was directly decided in the case of The General Smith." And this is all of the opinion of the chief justice on this point. He enters into no reasoning, and although great weight is due to every expression of this eminent judge, I think it manifest, from the opinion itself, that his attention was not called to the considerations affecting the question, and that he acted upon the supposition that the case was controlled by The General Smith, and decided it by simply citing and following the judgment of the supreme court.

A still different view has been taken as to what constitutes the home-port of an American steamboat engaged in inland navigation, by Judge Deady, in the case of The Favorite, [Case No. 4,699,] which was enrolled in Oregon, and whose owner resided at the place of enrollment. The learned judge, after remarking that, "under the ruling of The Lottawanna by the supreme court, what constitutes the home-port is yet an open question," says: "I think, upon reason and convenience, the home-port ought to be the one where the vessel is enrolled. Away from that place, whether in or out of the state where her owner resides, she is supposed to be in itinere, and therefore relying upon her credit for the purchase of supplies to continue the voyage." And he held that material-men residing in Oregon were entitled to a maritime lien, if they resided at a town or port in the state different from the one where the owner resided and the boat was enrolled. I do not think the judge intended to overrule his decision in the case of The Mary Bell, supra, and however convenient the doctrine he held would be, and however desirable it might be deemed as limiting the doctrine of The General Smith, denying a lien upon domestic vessels, I have not been able to persuade myself that it is consistent on this point with the judgments of the supreme court.

All of the adjudications in respect to the rights and remedies of material-men, since the case of The General Smith, have proceeded, I think, upon the notion that vessels owned in the state where the credit was given are to be considered as domestic vessels, and there is in such cases no maritime lien; if owned without the state there is a maritime lien, and I shall decide this case upon the assumption that this view is the one we are required to take by the decisions of the supreme court.

I have not discussed the question upon principle. It were profitless to do so. I content myself with the observation that it would doubtless have been better, in view of our local situation, if the supreme court had adopted the rule of the general maritime law, recognizing a lien for proper repairs made and supplies furnished on the credit of the vessel, without respect to the states in which the creditor and owner of the vessel reside. The doctrine of the supreme court, which it is safe to say would never have been adopted if the court could have had the benefit of the reflected light of subsequent experience, when applied to vessels navigating on lakes and inland waters, traversing several states, has produced, and if it remains will continue to produce, confusion, inconvenience, hardship, and injustice between creditors equally meritorious. But the supreme court, in The Lottawanna, in the face of an unanswerable dissent, stands by, rather than vindicates, the doctrine of The General Smith, discriminating between the rights and remedies of domestic and foreign material-men. The inferior courts must accept its exposition of the law as authoritative until that tribunal changes its judgment, or congress shall, as in my judgment it ought, make that provision for domestic creditors which is so ineffectually provided by the boat laws of the different states.

My understanding of the decisions of the supreme court as to the rights and remedies of material-men, lead me in this case to these conclusions:

1. That the Albany "belonged" to the state of Wisconsin, and that every port in that state was, as respects material-men, the home-port of the vessel. The libellant, residing in and extending credit in that state, is, under the view of the supreme court, conclusively presumed to have extended it to the owner, who resided in the state, or to the master, and has no implied or maritime lien on the vessel.

2. That as respects the rights and remedies of material-men, the home-port or state of a vessel is the state wherein the owner resides, and not the state or district in which she is enrolled, where the two are different. To hold in such a case that the enrollment controlled, would destroy the only foundation upon which a distinction between the rights of domestic and foreign material-men has been made, viz.: that the former are presumed to extend credit to the owner, whom they are supposed to know, or whom, at all events, they may pursue in the courts of their own state. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 527; The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 593. The decree of the district court is reversed, and a decree will be here entered dismissing the libel at the costs of the libellant. Decree accordingly.

ALBANY DREDGING CO. v. The GLADIOLUS and The CONCORDIA.¹

[MS.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 5, 1877.²

COLLISION—DREDGE—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

[Cited in The Ceres, Case No. 2,555, to the point that a court of admiralty has jurisdiction over every injury committed on the high seas or navigable waters, the character of the thing injured being immaterial.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem for collision by Elijah Brainerd and James G. Ketcham, copartners, trading as the Albany Dredging Company, and owners of the dredge Starbuck, against the tug Gladiolus and the bark Concordia. The case was referred to assessors, whose report is now submitted. Decree for libelants. Affirmed by circuit court, without opinion.]

The tug Gladiolus was towing the bark Concordia down the Schuylkill on Sunday A. M., Dec. 10, 1876, and the latter vessel ran into the dredge Starbuck, which was anchored at the mouth of that river in mid-channel, being pulled out there over Sunday, and held by means of spuds, (i. e., long poles stuck in the mud. The damages to the dredge were assessed at $1,100. The assessors were of opinion (1) that the dredge was in fault for blocking up so much of the channel on Sunday. (2) The tug was in fault for not keeping further to the westward than she did. (3) The bark was in fault for not keeping in the wake of the tug before they got into close proximity with the dredge.

CADWALADER, District Judge. I concur in the opinion as to the dredge; nevertheless I am of opinion that her fault did not so contribute to the collision as to defeat the right of action at the suit of her owners. The decree is in their favor for their damages to be hereafter ascertained, and to be recovered as may be hereafter decreed. The relation of the tug with the bark will also be defined hereafter if it shall be requested.

[The court is, at present, inclined to the opinion that each is liable for half of the damages suffered by the bark.]

[On the next day the court intimated a doubt whether any amount could be awarded against the tug, but reserved the point for future consideration, saying that in the mean time the amount of damage suffered by the owners of the dredge should be ascertained.]

[NOTE. This case was affirmed by the circuit court without opinion. It is stated in the citation of this case in The Ceres, Case No. 2,555, that the jurisdiction was sustained against objection. The only reference to this point in the record briefs or argument is the following clause taken from the answer: "That the damages claimed for injuries to the said dredge are excessive, and, for want of jurisdiction, cannot be recovered in a suit in rem in this court." The citation in The Ceres, Id., is incorrect. It should be No. 2, April Sessions, 1878, instead of 1874.]

Case No. 133.

ALBANY EXCH. BANK v. JOHNSON.

[5 Law Rep. 313.]

District Court, N. D. New York. July, 1842.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—PETITION BY CORPORATION—VERIFICATION.

1. The president, cashier, treasurer, or other officers of a corporation, who undertake to make proof of debts due to the corporation, in accordance with the fifth section of the bankrupt act, must receive a special appointment for that purpose.

2. Whether a petition in invitum, in behalf of a corporation, can properly be received without proof that the persons by whom it is signed and verified are in fact the authorized agents of the corporation,—quaere.

3. By the terms of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act, partners in trade cannot be decreed bankrupts in invitum, on the ground of insolvency alone.

4. Under the circumstances of this case, it was held, that no act of bankruptcy had been committed by the parties petitioned against.

[Cited in Re Bonnet, Case No. 1,632; Ashby v. Steere, Id. 576.]

In bankruptcy. This was a petition by the Albany Exchange Bank that Ralph Johnson and Benjamin P. Watrous be decreed bankrupts. The petition alleged that the debtors were merchants, doing business as such in the city of Albany, and composing the firm of Johnson & Watrous, and contained the usual allegations as to their indebtedness. It charged them with having, on the twenty-seventh day of April last, fraudulently executed a bond in the penalty of $12,000, conditioned for the payment of $10,000, together with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment thereon, to Andrew J. Johnson, Anthony Ten Eyck and Robert Johnson, on which bond and warrant of attorney a judgment was entered up in the supreme court of the state for $12,000 besides costs, on the third of May last; and also with having on the same day fraudulently executed another bond in the penalty of $3,000, conditioned for the payment of $2,000, together with a warrant of attorney, in favor of Andrew Watrous, on which a judgment was also entered up on the third day of May last, for $3,000, besides costs. The petition further alleged that writs of fieri facias were issued on each of these judgments on the twenty-seventh of May last, in virtue of which writs the sheriff had sold the goods and stock in trade of said R. Johnson and B. P. Watrous; that as the petitioners are informed and believe, at the time of the execution of the said bonds and warrants, the said Johnson & Watrous were, ever since have been, and still are, insolvent, and that, as the petitioners believe, the said bond and warrants were executed for the express purpose of securing to the obligees therein named the payment of their claims, and of giving them a preference over the general creditors of the said Ralph Johnson and Benjamin P. Watrous. On the day appointed to show cause, the alleged bankrupts and the judgment creditors above named appeared by their counsel to oppose the granting of a decree of bankruptcy, and put in their answers and objections to the petition under oath. The facts and circumstances relative to the judgments and executions complained of in the petition, as detailed in these answers and the explanatory affidavit of Mr. Ferguson, the attorney for the judgment creditors, were substantially as follows: Prior to and on the twelfth of March last, the alleged bankrupts Johnson & Watrous were retail merchants in good credit, and were solvent or fully believed themselves to be so. The above named Andrew J. Johnson, A. Ten Eyck and Robert Johnson were their indorsers, and Andrew Watrous was also their indorser or acceptor. A short time previous to the twelfth of March last, the alleged bankrupts applied to the said A. J. Johnson, Ten Eyck, and R. Johnson, to continue and also to increase their responsibilities as indorsers, and this "they" consented to do provided the said Johnson & Watrous would give them some kind of security as indemnity against unforeseen accidents or reversions in business." The latter therefore executed to the former, on the twelfth of March last, a bond and warrant of attorney the penalty of which bond was $12,000, and which was conditioned for the payment of $10,300. This bond and warrant were designed for the security as well of Andrew Watrous above named, as of the persons therein named, this being expressly understood and at the time of the execution of the bond and warrant. At that time the alleged bankrupts were considered by all parties concerned, and believed themselves to be, perfectly solvent. It was not intended to enter up any judgment on the bond and warrant, unless at some future time there should unexpectedly appear to be a reason for so doing. But on the twenty-seventh of April, in pursuance of the request of Andrew Watrous, and for the sole purpose, as he stated, of giving him a separate, independent security, the alleged bankrupts executed to him the bond and warrant mentioned in the petition and at the same time executed to Andrew J. Johnson and others the other bond and warrant mentioned in the petition, on which judgments were entered on the third of May and execution subsequently issued. The alleged bankrupts expressly averred that at the time these bonds and warrants were executed they believed themselves, and the obligees in the bonds averred that they believed them to be solvent; and the alleged bankrupts denied that they were executed in contemplation of bankruptcy. Their subsequent failure or apprehension of failure which induced the entry of judgment on the bonds and warrants arose from the failure of one Oliver De Goff to whom they had loaned their notes, for whom they were responsible as indorsers, and in whose solvency they had full confidence until the time of his failure.

Gould, for petitioning creditor.
J. Hammond, for respondents.

CONKLING, District Judge. One of the objections urged at the bar to a decree of bankruptcy in this case is, the want of any sufficient evidence that the two persons who signed the petition, and by whom the debt due to the petitioners was proved, had authority thus to act. To the name of one of them the abbreviation "Cash'r." and to the name of the other the abbreviation "Pres't," is added; and in the jurat of the commissioner, they are respectively denominated the president and the cashier of the Albany Exchange Bank. The fifth section of the bankrupt act provides that "corporations to whom any debts are due may make proof thereof by their president, cashier, treasurer, or other officer, who may be specially appointed for that purpose;" and by one of the rules of the court, petitioning creditors are required to prove their debt before presenting their petition. If, as I think is the case, the qualification "who may be specially appointed," etc. applies as well to the officers named, as to any "other officer" who may undertake to act in behalf of a corporation, it would seem to follow that for the purpose of proving a debt to a corporation, by the oath of one of its officers such officer must receive a special appointment for that purpose. Indeed, independently of the above recited provision of the act, it may well be doubted whether a petition of this nature in behalf of a corporation, could properly be received without proof that the persons by whom it was signed and verified were in fact the official organs or the authorized agents of the corporation. But as this objection was overlooked at the time the rule to show cause was granted, and as at this stage of the proceeding the petitioning creditors ought probably, at any rate, to be allowed to supply the deficiency, I deem it proper, in this instance, to pass over the objection and proceed to a brief examination of the merits of the case.

It is well known that a very large proportion of the commercial and mercantile business of this country is carried on by means of mutual credit, and it cannot, I think, be conceded that a solvent merchant may not lawfully give security in any of the accustomed forms, in good faith, to another, as the condition on which he is from time to time to receive a loan of the credit of the latter, and for the purpose of securing him in anticipation against the vicissitudes of trade. It is true the practice of giving such security, especially by bond and warrant of attorney, may lead to consequences which it is the policy of bankrupt laws, as far as is consistent with the general interests of trade, to prevent. But such security given to an indorser, is no more obnoxious to this objection than the like security would be if given to secure the payment of money borrowed to be employed in trade. If, therefore, the indorsers in this case, instead of taking the separate bonds and warrants executed on the twenty-seventh of April, as a substitute for the bond and warrant executed on the twelfth of March, had contented themselves with this original security, which there is no just pretence for supposing to have been given in contemplation of bankruptcy, or for the purpose (within the meaning of the first section of the bankrupt act) of willingly or fraudulently procuring the goods of the obligors to be taken in execution, I should not have hesitated to decide that no act of bankruptcy had been committed. The change of security was undoubtedly a hazardous experiment, and the fact that the new bonds and warrants were for a larger sum than that for which the original security was given, is a circumstance which increases the difficulty of the case. But it is to be considered that neither the bond and warrant of the twelfth of March, nor the two bonds and warrants of the twenty-seventh of April, were given to secure any specific or ascertained amount, but only for the purpose of indemnity against contingent liabilities. The motive, if there was any, for thus increasing the amount does not appear, and it seems reasonable to suppose that it was the effect of inadvertence or caprice on the part of the person who was employed to draw the new securities; for when executions came subsequently to be issued, the aggregate amount which the plaintiffs claimed a right to levy, fell short of the amount of the original bond. Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot take it upon myself to decide that the substitution of the securities of the twenty-seventh of April, for the security of the twelfth of March, changed the legal predicament of these debtors, under the bankrupt act. This case differs essentially from that of the Messrs. Loomis, decided last week. In that case the bond and warrant were executed for the avowed purpose of giving a preference to indorsers, for liabilities already incurred, under the apprehension of impending bankruptcy. Perhaps in that case too much importance was ascribed to the fact that execution was immediately sued out, when by a late statute of this state executions are not permitted to be issued until after the expiration of thirty days from the entry of the judgment. On the argument of that cause, I inquired of the counsel whether the act was applicable to judgments confessed under a warrant of attorney containing the usual release of all errors in the judgment and in the issuing of execution. The answer of the counsel for the petitioning creditors was in the affirmative; and this answer was acquiesced in by the counsel for the debtors, and was corroborated by the opinion of a highly intelligent gentleman of the profession whom I subsequently consulted. On the argument of the present case, however, its correctness was denied. The question does not appear to have arisen in the state courts, and I doubt whether as between the judgment debtor and creditor, the former would be entitled to any relief against an execution issued within the thirty days upon a judgment thus confessed; although as between a judgment creditor of this description and another judgment creditor who had obtained his judgment by the ordinary mode of adverse process, a different rule ought perhaps to prevail. If this be so, the suing out of executions, and the seizure of the debtor's goods a few days before the expiration of the thirty days without resistance on their part, was an unimportant circumstance. My conclusion is. 1. That in the giving of the securities in question in this case, there was no actual fraud: 2. That they cannot be considered as having been voluntarily given in contemplation of bankruptcy for the purpose of giving an unlawful preference; and, 3. That these debtors are not chargeable with having "fraudulently or willingly procured their goods, &c. to be taken in execution."

It remains to inquire whether they are liable to be declared bankrupts in virtue of the fourteenth section of the act. It is very clear that the petition was not drawn with a view to this section, and that the allegation that the debtors are insolvent, was introduced only for the purpose of giving character to the alleged acts of bankruptcy. The argument of the counsel for the objectors, that the debtors ought not upon this petition to be called upon to meet this allegation, therefore, was not without plausibility and weight. But I propose for the present to pass by this objection, and to consider the petition, taken in connexion with the admissions of the objectors, as sufficient to raise the question whether partners in trade can be declared bankrupts on the petition of a creditor, on the ground of insolvency alone. It must be admitted that such seems to be the literal import of the language of the fourteenth section. It declares "that when two or more persons, who are partners in trade, become insolvent, an order may be made in the manner provided in this act, either on the petition of such partners, or any one of them, or on the petition of any creditor of the partners; upon which order all the joint stock," etc. The question whether this enactment is to receive a literal interpretation with respect to the point now before the court, it will be perceived at a glance, is one of very great importance: for if the provision is to be so interpreted, it will introduce a principle of great comprehension and stringency, which has not hitherto found a place in the bankrupt laws of England, and which had no place in the American act of 1800. Its practical operation would unquestionably be very severe, and it is to be feared, in many instances, unjust. So far as mercantile partnerships are concerned, it would subvert the well settled maxim of English law, that men may be insolvent without being bankrupts, and become bankrupts without being insolvent; for while it would declare that insolvency shall of itself constitute bankruptcy, the absence of any other provisions in the act authorizing proceedings against partners jointly, would leave it at least doubtful whether partners in trade could be jointly decreed bankrupts on the petition of a creditor, on any other ground than that of insolvency. It is obvious, I think, that the execution of the act under such a construction would be attended with numerous and very serious embarrassments. What is to be considered as constituting insolvency in the sense here intended? Is a mercantile firm to be adjudged to have "become insolvent" upon its first failure, and under whatever circumstances, to meet its pecuniary engagements? Few, I imagine, could be found who would assert the reasonableness of such a rule. Is it to be pronounced insolvent whenever its assets are insufficient to discharge all its liabilities, however small may be the deficiency? If so, how is this fact to be ascertained? It would be easy, but it is unnecessary to illustrate the pertinency and force of these questions. Such a construction of this section would also involve what seems to me a striking inconsistency; for if it is just and expedient that partners in trade should be liable to be decreed bankrupts, in invitum, on the ground of insolvency alone, why should not individual traders be subject to the same liability? This construction, as already observed, is suggested by the literal import of the phrase "become insolvent;" and it may, I think, be added, that this is the only circumstance by which such a construction is recommended. But if these words are to receive a literal interpretation, I see not why the residue of the clause in which they occur ought not also to receive a like construction; and then it would follow that any insolvent mercantile firm might be decreed bankrupt on the application of any creditor, without regard to the amount of the indebtedness of such firm, or to the amount of the debt owing to the petitioning creditor; for the clause in question contains no limitation whatever, with regard to either of these points. Are we then to conclude that this further innovation and inconsistency were intended? Then again, it declares that in the cases embraced by it, "an order may be made in the manner provided in this act." What order is here meant? To determine this point, resort must be had to the antecedent parts of the act. But the act says nothing of any "order" adapted to the case. It provides for the granting and entering of decrees of bankruptcy; but these decrees are, I believe, nowhere called orders—while the act does speak of making orders for other purposes. I presume, however, that the phrase "an order may be made," was intended to import that a decree of bankruptcy might be entered. This criticism will serve to show the generality and looseness which characterize the language of this whole provision.

This act is universally admitted to be highly obscure, and much of its obscurity seems to me to have been caused by an attempt to embrace the two descriptions of cases for which it provides, by the same forms of language, instead of keeping them separate, and adapting the phraseology to each, without regard to the other; and the clause under consideration presents, I think, an example of the truth of this remark. Its terms, it will be seen, are perfectly suited to cases of voluntary application. These are all founded on the admitted insolvency of the applicant. It is important to remark, also, that there is abundant scope for the operation of this provision even in regard to compulsory cases, without giving to it the literal construction in question, because the antecedent provisions of the act relate, in terms, only to individual bankrupts, and this provision was proper for the purpose of authorizing proceedings under the act against partners. The clause in question, under this view of its object, forms a natural and proper introduction to the important and more happily expressed provisions which follow, concerning the duties of assignees and the mode of distributing the estates of bankrupt partners. I consider the last provision of this section, moreover, as militating strongly against a literal construction of the first clause. It declares that "in all other respects," (i. e. except as to the duties of the assignee and the mode of distribution,) "the proceedings against partners shall be conducted in like manner as if they had been commenced and prosecuted against one person alone." This provision, it appears to me, goes far towards an express adoption of all the conditions and limitations prescribed by the act relative to individual cases. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that in respect to compulsory applications, the phrase "become insolvent" in the first part of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act, is to be interpreted as equivalent to the phrase "shall commit any act of bankruptcy." I am aware that this decision may excite some surprise; but it is the result of mature reflection, and I fully believe it to be sound. This petition must accordingly be dismissed, with costs.

ALBEE v. MAY.

[2 Paine, 74.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. May Term, 1834.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — EX POST FACTO AND RETROSPECTIVE LAWS.

1. A state statute, retrospective in its operation, allowing ejected occupants of land to recover for improvements made by them while in possession, held to be a valid law, not being repugnant to the constitutions of the state or of the United States.

[Cited in Litchfield v. Johnson, Case No. 8,387. See, also, Society v. Wheeler, Id. 13,156.]

2. By the common law, the owner, when he recovers possession, is entitled to the improvements without paying for them. Its maxim of "caveat emptor" is designed to prevent intrusions on land without proper inquiry as to the title. The civil law, on the other hand, allows a bona fide possessor an indemnity for beneficial improvements, which seems to be an equitable rule; and whether a court of equity, on a bill to recover the rents and profits, would not allow a bona fide possessor to deduct his actual expenses for such improvements? Quere.

3. Retrospective laws divesting vested rights are impolitic and unjust; but they are not ex post facto laws within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, nor repugnant to any other of its provisions; and if not repugnant to the state constitution, a court cannot pronounce them to be void, merely because in their judgment they are contrary to the principles of natural justice. A remedy for such legislation rests with the people, and long acquiescence on their part strengthens the reasons why the judiciary should not interfere.

At law. This was an action [by Albee and Bundy against May] to recover under the statute of the state passed November 15th, 1820, the value of betterments or improvements made on land. [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

The defendant had recovered the lands in ejectment of the plaintiffs. Afterwards the plaintiffs brought this action, which was tried at the May circuit, 1831, and a verdict taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case reserving the questions of law. The plaintiffs became bona fide purchasers of the land, and made the improvements prior to the 15th of November, 1820. The act of 15th November, 1820, contained the following proviso: "This act shall not extend to cases arising after the passing of this act." Page 180. A similar act had been passed in 1800, containing the same proviso, and had with the proviso been several times re-enacted prior to the act of 1820, so that when the improvements were made there was no law giving an action for their recovery; the law then in existence only applying to cases which had occurred previously to its passage.

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, and PAINE, District Judge.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The defendant recovered, in an action of ejectment, the premises on which the improvements now in question had been made, and the present action is brought under the provisions of a statute of this state to recover the value of such improvements. The plaintiffs were bona fide purchasers, supposing themselves to have a good title to the premises.² The improvements were made prior

² There is certainly no reason, in general, why the owner of land should be compelled to pay for improvements which he neither directed nor desired, as a condition on which he is to gain possession of his property. But when an occupant has taken possession under a bona fide purchase, and made permanent improvements, it is very hard for him to lose both land and improvements. If the plaintiff is not content with acquiring possession of his property in au to the act under which the present suit is brought, which bears date on the 15th November, 1820. This act declares that it shall not extend to cases accruing after the passage of this act, and is, therefore, in terms retrospective, and presents the question directly whether this court has authority to declare such law void, and this is the only question involved in the case. By the common law, when the owner recovers his land in an action of ejectment, he is entitled to the possession without paying for any improvements which may have been made upon his land. Such improvements are considered as annexed to the freehold, and to have been made at the peril of the possessor. The civil law, however, in this respect varies from the common law, and, according to the rule which there prevails, a bona fide possessor is entitled to be reimbursed, by way of indemnity, the expenses of beneficial improvements. This would seem to be founded on principles of equity, so far as the actual value of the property is increased by the labor of another. The common law, acting under the maxim of caveat emptor, considered this as too loose a rule, and opening a door calculated to give encouragement to intrusions upon land, without due and proper inquiry into the title. It has, however, been pretty strongly intimated by English chancellors, that when a party is obliged to resort to a court of equity for the recovery of the rents and profits of his land, a bona fide possessor would be allowed to deduct the amount of his actual expenses for beneficial improvements. [Dormer v. Fortescue,] 3 Atk. 134. But this rule, if adopted, ought not to be applied to any case when there was not the most satisfactory evidence that the possession was taken in good faith, and under a full belief that the title had been acquired from the rightful owner.

The law now in question is not repugnant to any express provision in the constitutions of the United States or of the state of Vermont. The only article in the constitution of the United States that can possibly have any bearing upon the question, is that which declares that no state shall pass any ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts. Article 1, § 10. This is not an ex post facto law, according to the legal understanding of laws of this description. They relate only to criminal cases and venal statutes. Nor does it impair the obligation of any contract. There is no subsisting contract between these parties which could be improved condition, after he has neglected to assert his title for a number of years, it is certainly equitable that the defendant should be allowed the value of his improvements, made in good faith to the extent of the rents and profits claimed. This view of the subject is fully supported by Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 81, 82, and the authorities there cited, especially Coulter's Case, 5 Coke, 30. And see Jackson v. Loomis, 4 Cow. 168.

impaired.* There is no conflict between the constitution of the state of Vermont and this law. The only provision at all looking to the question is that which declares that the legislative and judicial and executive departments shall be held distinct, so that neither exercise the powers belonging to the other. The subject-matter of this law, if within the legitimate scope of any department of the government, properly belongs to the legislative. It cannot in any sense be considered judicial or executive; and the inquiry is therefore narrowed down to the single question, whether being retrospective in its operation makes it void. As a general and abstract question, the policy and justice of such laws may well be doubted; but how far courts of justice have a right to enter into these considerations, when there is no conflict between the law and the constitution, is a point on which different opinions have been entertained. This court, however, is bound to adopt the view taken of the question by the supreme court of the United States. Although no direct decision upon the point has been made in that court, yet, from what has fallen from the judges on various occasions, when the question has been brought incidentally under consideration, the view evidently taken has been, that the validity of such laws, where no constitutional provision was infringed, did not fall within the province of courts of justice.

This question came under the consideration of the supreme court of the United States, at an early day (1798), in the case of Calder v. Bull, 1 Cond. Rep. 172, [3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 386,] though it was not the point on which the judgment of the court turned. Mr. Justice Chase was of opinion that the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction to determine that any law of a state legislature contrary to the constitution of such state, was void; but that such question belonged to the state courts. What fell from Mr. Justice Paterson in that case, would seem to show that the attention of the convention in the formation of the constitution, was called to this very subject. He was a member of the convention, and "I had," says he, "an ardent desire to have extended the provision in the constitution to retrospective laws in general. There is neither policy nor safety in such laws. It may be truly said of retrospective laws of every description, that they neither accord with sound legislation, nor the fundamental principles of the social compact." But he did not consider all retrospective laws embraced in the prohibition to the states to pass ex post facto laws: that these words, when applied to a law, must have a technical meaning, and refer to crimes, pains and penalties. Mr. Justice Iredell says, if a government composed of legislative, executive and judicial departments, established by a constitution which imposes no limits on the legislative power, the consequence would inevitably be, that whatever the legislative power chose to enact, would be lawfully enacted, and the judicial power would never interpose to pronounce it void. That if the legislature pass a law within the general scope of their constitutional power, the court cannot pronounce it to be void, merely because, in their judgment, it is contrary to the principles of natural justice.

*An act suspending legal proceedings during an actual invasion, is not a law impairing the obligation of contracts. Johnson v. Duncan, 1 Cond. La. Rep. 157. Whether the legislature can rightfully declare that the result of a litigated suit against one person, shall be evidence against another to affect rights of the latter, which had accrued previous to the passage of the statute? Quaere. Wood v. Byington, 2 Barb. Ch. 387. It is not competent for the legislature, by a retroactive statute, to make the opinion of the attorney-general that a contract between the state and an individual, in relation to convict labor, was illegal, conclusive evidence of such illegality, as against the latter. Trustees, etc., v. Lawrence, 11 Paige, 80. But if the contract was in fact illegal, or if it was originally valid, and the contractors had violated it, so as to authorize the state to rescind it, the inspectors of the prison were, under the act of 1842, bound to act upon the opinion of the attorney-general, and to rescind the contract. Id.

In the recent case of Satterlee v. Matthewson, (2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 413,) the language of the court is very strong in relation to the powers of the courts of the United States to declare state laws of this description unconstitutional. The objection, say the court, most relied upon is, that the effect of this act was to divest vested rights. There is, certainly, no part of the constitution of the United States which applies to a state law of this description. Nor are we aware of any decision of this court, or of any circuit court, which has condemned such a law upon this ground, provided its effect be not to impair the obligation of a contract. Reference is made to what fell from the chief justice in the case of Fletcher v. Peck, [Case No. 4,865:] That it might well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government do not prescribe some limits to the legislative power; and he asks, if any be prescribed, where are they to be found if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation? But, say the court, it is nowhere intimated in that opinion, that a state statute, which divests vested rights, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States. So in the case of Wilkinson v. Leland, (2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 661,) the court observes: "We cannot say this is an excess of legislative power, unless we are prepared to say, that in a state not having a written constitution, acts of legislation, having a retrospective operation, are void as to all persons not assenting thereto, even though they may be for beneficial purposes, and to enforce existing rights; and we think this cannot be assumed as a general principle by courts of justice.

It may here be remarked, that if the state constitution is entirely silent on the subject, the question stands on the same footing as if there be no written constitution." In the case of Propagation Soc. v. Wheeler, [Case No. 13,156,] a law, similar to the one in question, was decided in the first circuit to be unconstitutional, but it was put on the ground that it was repugnant to the state constitution, which forbade retrospective laws.

That the law of Vermont, now in question, is a retrospective law, cannot be doubted. It impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws; it attaches a new disability in respect to transactions already past, and creates new liabilities. But it is not repugnant to any provision in the constitution of the United States or of the state of Vermont; and this is the sole ground upon which I rest my opinion. Wherever there is a conflict between the law and the constitution, both cannot stand; and it is properly within the province of courts of justice to determine the validity of such a law. But when no such conflict arises, it is matter resting in the discretion of the legislature, who are responsible to the people and are not under judicial control; and although not an advocate for the justice or policy of retrospective laws, I feel less repugnance to the one now under consideration, because similar laws have been in existence in this state almost from its first organization, and having so repeatedly received the sanction of different legislatures, and their validity having been in no manner questioned in the courts of justice, there is reason to conclude that they are satisfactory to the public. We are, accordingly, of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

[NOTE. In Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. (33 U. S.) 88, Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the court, said: "It is clear that this court has no right to pronounce an act of the state legislature void, as contrary to the constitution of the United States, from the mere fact that it divests vested rights of property. The constitution of the United States does not prohibit the states from passing retrospective laws generally, but only ex post facto laws. Now, it has been solemnly settled by this court that the phrase 'ex post facto laws' is not applicable to civil laws, but to penal and criminal laws, * * * which impose punishments and forfeitures, for acts antecedently done, and not to civil proceedings which affect private rights retrospectively." An act passed after the rendition of a judgment in favor of a bank, which authorized the defendant therein to set off against it the circulating notes of the bank which he procured after the judgment, is, as between the bank and the defendant, valid, and does not impair the obligation of the contract sued on, or of the judgment. Blount v. Windley, 95 U. S. 180. An act declaring that acts performed by any two of the tax commissioners shall have the same validity as if performed by all three, though retrospective, is not for that reason unconstitutional. Schenck v. Peay, Case No. 12,451. As to the validity of retrospective laws which divest vested rights, see Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. (36 U. S.) 540; Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Nesbitt, 10 How. (51 U. S.) 401. There is nothing in the constitution which prohibits a legislature from passing an act which divests rights vested by law, provided its effect be not to impair the obligation of a contract. Randall v. Krieger, 23 How. (90 U. S.) 147. A retrospective statute, remedial in its nature, that confirms existing rights by adding to the means of enforcing existing obligations, may be constitutional. Peay v. Schenck, Case No. 12,449; Griffing v. Gibb, Id. 5,819; Schenck v. Peay, Id. 12,451; Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 380; Curtis v. Whitney, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 68. An act imposing a higher tax on an incorporated bank than that contemplated in its charter is unconstitutional, as impairing the obligation of a contract. Piqua Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. (57 U. S.) 369.]

Case No. 135.

The ALBEMARLE.

[8 Blatchf. 200.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 6, 1871.

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAMERS—SIGNALS—DAMAGES.

1. In this case, two steamers were meeting nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision. One of them gave a signal of one whistle. The other responded by a signal of one whistle. Then both of them ported, but they collided: Held, that it was the duty of each to port in due season, and that each of them failed to port soon enough.

[Cited in The City of Hartford, Case No. 2,752. Distinguished in The Sammie, 37 Fed. Rep. 909.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Held, also, that, if it was erroneous and dangerous to port, the vessel giving the signal as a proposition to the other, was not more culpable for doing so, than the vessel which assented, by the response, to the proposed movement, and that both became parties concurring in a hazardous and erroneous experiment.

[Cited in The City of Hartford, Case No. 2,752.]

3. One of the vessels held in fault for not having a proper and vigilant look-out, and both vessels held in fault, and a decree made that both share in the loss.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

[In admiralty. Libel for collision. Decree finding both vessels in fault.]

Charles Donohue, for libellant.

Edward H. Owen, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. At about 9½ o'clock in the night of the 20th of August, 1867, off the coast of New Jersey, a few miles below Barnegat light, the steamship James T. Brady, belonging to the libellant, and the steamship Albemarle came into collision. The latter was bound from New York to Norfolk, and the former from Delaware bay to New York. The libellant's witnesses describe the Albemarle as approaching in a course heading almost directly towards the Brady, but being, when sighted, slightly off the port bow. Those on the Albemarle describe the Brady as seen off the starboard bow, and testify that she continued to approach, opening more and more on the starboard bow. When within 500 yards apart, their speed being, respectively, the Brady, 11 or 12 miles, and the Albemarle, 8 or 9 miles, the Brady blew one whistle, to signify her wish to port her helm and pass to the right. The Albemarle responded with one whistle, indicating her assent. On receiving the response, the Brady ported and swung towards the east. The Albemarle, as her witnesses testify, also ported, but, before her course was much changed, the two vessels came together. The witnesses from the Brady testify that the Albemarle did not port, but starboarded, and that she ran into the Brady on a starboard wheel. The contradiction between the witnesses for the respective parties is not necessarily so great as a cursory perusal of the testimony would suggest, touching the position and course of the two vessels and the bearing of each from the other. Thus, the course of the James T. Brady was, as her witnesses represent, north-east by north, and she saw the lights of the Albemarle when from 1½ to 2 miles distant, about one point over her port bow, and the bearing continued about the same or diminishing to half a point, until the Brady gave the signal, by her one whistle, that she proposed to port and pass to the eastward of the Albemarle, and, at some moments, her white light, and then her red and white lights, and then her green and white lights, and for a time all three lights, were visible. The course of the Albemarle, as her witnesses testify, was south south-west. She saw the James T. Brady at a distance of five miles, seeing first her white light and then her green light. When first seen, the witnesses state, she bore from two to two and a half points on their starboard bow, and her green light continued in view until she ported, in accordance with the signal before mentioned.

Now, if the two courses above stated be assumed to be nearly accurate, and the position of the respective vessels, when the Albemarle sighted the Brady, was such that the point of intersection of the courses was considerably nearer to the Albemarle than to the Brady, it would follow that the Albemarle would see the Brady at about one and a half or two points off her starboard bow, and she would, as they approached each other, continue to bear over such starboard bow; while, also, when the Brady reached a point distant two miles from the Albemarle, the latter would bear about one point off the Brady's port bow, and that bearing would continue, or gradually draw in towards the bow, until the Albemarle reached the point of intersection. The relative speed of the Brady being, however, the greatest, they might reach the point of intersection at about the same moment. In such case, if courses and bearings were alone considered, it is obvious, that, if they were regarded as meeting on opposite courses, nearly end on, so as to involve danger of collision, it would be the duty of each to port and pass to the right; or, if they were regarded as crossing, so as to involve danger of collision, then, as the Albemarle had the Brady on her starboard, it would be the duty of the Albemarle to keep out of the way, and the duty of the Brady to keep her course. The testimony of the witnesses on either side, therefore, in respect to the position and course of the vessels and their respective bearings from each other, is in no conflict that is not entirely reconcilable or that would suggest any distrust of either; and, in this view, the testimony from each corroborates the testimony from the other. It follows, therefore, that the testimony of the witnesses produced from the James T. Brady, that they, when at about one mile, or one mile and a half, from the Albemarle, had her about one point on their own port bow, and that her bearing on that bow was diminished to about half a point, is not only not contradicted but is strengthened by the evidence from the Albemarle; and, at the same time, their testimony that they saw all three of the Albemarle's lights, and that there was such variation as to give them at one time a glimpse of the red without the green, and again of the green without the red, is not improbable. The Albemarle, in the position she was, would show her red light, and, if she first reached the point of intersection, she would next show the green; or, without this, in even a moderate shifting of the vessel by the waves, the lights might be exhibited to the Brady as her witnesses say they saw them. Up to this point then, the witnesses from the Brady not only give a possible, but a probable, account of the position and manner of approach of the two vessels, and of the manner in which the lights of the Albemarle were presented to their view, but the witnesses from the other vessel corroborate them. The conclusion from this would be inevitable, that the vessels, from the time the Brady saw the Albemarle, were meeting nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, in which case it was the duty of both to port, without waiting for signals, and that the Albemarle should have done so. But here the harmony of the testimony stops. The witnesses from the Albemarle testify, not only that the Brady's green light was in view, and about two points on her starboard bow, so soon as she came near enough to make colored lights visible, but they further testify that her green light continued to open until it bore about four points on that bow. If the Albemarle had passed the intersection of the two courses, when this last observation was made, she might have brought the Brady's green light four points on her starboard bow. Until she reached that point of intersection, the light of the Brady would close in upon that bow, and, after passing, it would open, and might open so far as to bear four points off. But this cannot be harmonized with the testimony from the Brady. It would bring the Albemarle largely off the starboard bow of the Brady before she ported. It may be true, but the general conformity of the testimony of all the witnesses in other respects disposes me to think, that, while the witnesses from the Albemarle are correct in saying that they saw the green light of the Brady off their own starboard bow, they have over-estimated the time and degree. This critical examination and comparison of courses, distances and bearings is subject to this obvious remark, that, in practice, it is not to be expected that witnesses will be able to testify to very close mathematical or geometrical observations, and we must regard general conformity in relation to leading facts as usually convincing. I cannot resist the conclusion, that the vessels were so approaching that it was the duty of each to port the helm in due season, and that, in this respect, both vessels were in fault. The movement should have been earlier made.

The prompt and ready response of the Albemarle to the whistle of the Brady is very important in its influence upon the question whether, in truth, the Brady was four points off the starboard bow at that time, and so near that her porting brought them almost instantly together. It must and ought to be taken to be incredible, that, if such was the then position and course of the vessels, the Albemarle would have assented to such a manoeuvre. In that situation, it was grossly improper, and both proposition and assent indicated gross unskillfulness and ignorance, or gross inattention and negligence. These concurring, would, I think, of themselves alone, make a case for contribution to the loss caused by the concurring fault of both. I have, more charitably, I think, regarded the assent of the Albemarle as indicating that the Brady was not in the relative position stated; but, in either view, the Albemarle would not be without fault.

It is doing no injustice to the Albemarle to say, that the assent of her officers to the signal to port the helm, given by the Brady, is strong evidence that, at the time, they did not regard it as an improper movement, and better evidence that the vessels were approaching nearly end on than testimony of those same officers, given on a retrospective view of the occurrence, under a strong motive to cast all the blame upon the Brady. And the alternative again recurs—if the movement was so obviously improper as they now represent, they were concurring actors in the unskillfulness or error which caused the loss. I do not say that the Albemarle, by assenting to the signal of the Brady to port the helm and go to starboard, is estopped to allege that it was wrong in the Brady to do so, or that, in a sudden exigency, caused by the fault of another vessel, she is to be held accountable for an erroneous judgment formed on the instant. But, here, the Brady gave the signal and waited a reply. That reply assured her that the approaching vessel concurred with her in her opinion as to what was required of both. Then, and not until then, she ported her helm, and the Albemarle did the same; but it was too late to avoid collision. Both being in an open sea, each having the same opportunity to judge what prudence required, I cannot regard the proposition of the Brady, even if it was erroneous, as any more culpable than the assent of the Albemarle, so that, if it was wrong, they shared in the mistake. But, in truth, the grand fault of both vessels was, that they did not act sooner, instead of waiting till instant collision was impending. The rule of the statute is as imperative as any other, that, when approaching so as to involve risk of collision, each should slacken speed, and, if necessary, stop and reverse. This should not be delayed till efforts to slow, stop and reverse will be useless.

That the Brady was not free from fault, on still other grounds, is quite clear. She had no proper look-out; or, if the man at her bow was competent, then he was not vigilant. He ought to have seen the Albemarle as soon, or nearly as soon, as the Brady was seen from the Albemarle. The look-out did not report the Albemarle until within one and a half or two miles distant. True, he says he thinks she was three miles off, but he had only the short experience of three months at sea, and his judgment is contradicted by two experienced pilots on board. He did not report her until she had been seen by the man at the wheel, and the pilot in charge did not discover her until the man at the wheel called his attention to her. This shows great want of vigilance, and, although there was then time to make whatever movement the case required, yet, as they were approaching at a combined rate of twenty miles an hour, it left them a very short time in which to note the position, course and lights of the Albemarle, and apply the discretion which they were bound to exercise.

An alternative view of the duty of the Albemarle, founded upon the rule that, when ships are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, that which has the other on her starboard, must keep out of the way, and the other should keep her course, will also make the Albemarle a sharer in the fault.

If the view presented by the testimony of her witnesses be adopted, and, when the signal was given by the Brady, the latter bore four points off her starboard bow, it was a clear fault in the Brady to attempt to cross, without first consulting the Albemarle. The Albemarle had the right to insist that the Brady should keep her course. When both agreed that the experiment of crossing should be made, they became concurring parties to the experiment and mutual sharers in the hazard.

The criticism, that it was a perilous movement of the Brady, and that she had no right to put the Albemarle in a critical situation and hold her responsible for a hasty judgment, proves too much. For, if there was, at that moment, no peril, there was nothing in the mere proposition, which required the officers of the Albemarle to act hastily. If the position of the two was such that it was plain that the Brady ought not to port, and that the Albemarle was safe without any change, then her officers acted in no sudden exigency, for the Brady did not change until the assent of the Albemarle thereto was given. The criticism, therefore, involves this, namely, that an exigency had in fact already arisen, in which, and in a consciousness of danger, the Albemarle received the signal, and was called on to exercise instant judgment. This is precisely what has been already above stated, and it puts the Albemarle in fault, in not herself acting sooner, either by slowing, or by changing her course, or by herself signaling the Brady. This view of the subject brings me, as every view of the case which I think warranted by a full consideration of the testimony on both sides does, to the conclusion, that these two vessels were both in fault, and that they should share in the loss which resulted therefrom. A decree must be entered in conformity with that view.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—WORSTED SHAWLS.

[Worsted shawls are not dutiable at 41 per cent. ad valorem as woolen goods, or goods of which wool is a component part, under the tariff act of July 14, 1832, (4 Stat. 583,) but are entitled to entry free of duty.]

[At law. Action by Albers & Co. against William Frick, collector of the port of Baltimore, to recover customs duties alleged to have been illegally exacted. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.]

Before TANEY, Circuit Justice, and HEATH, District Judge.

This was an action for the recovery of forty-one per cent. ad valorem duty, paid on seventy dozen worsted shawls, imported by the plaintiffs from Bremen, which they had paid to the collector, with protest against their being classed as woolen goods, or goods of which wool is a component part, but that they were free of duty. [4 Stat. 583.] Several gentlemen, conversant with the article, were examined, who stated that the goods in question were composed entirely of worsted yarn, which differed from what is termed "woolen yarn," it being spun from only the longest fibres of wool, which is separated by hackling and combing, while yarn is spun from carded wool, without such separation. It was also shown, that, as these goods had been imported in separate shawls, they did not come under the denomination of worsted stuff goods, which they would be called had they been imported in pieces of thirty or forty yards, when they would be admitted free of duty. The plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, that, if they believed the shawls to be worsted, they should render a verdict for the plaintiffs as worsted had been decided by Judge Thompson, of New York, and the decision sustained by the supreme court, [Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 137,] not to be liable to duty. After some remarks from the district attorney, the court so instructed the jury, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs, $550.

At law. Motion to amend the record of this case, in which judgment was rendered at the last term of this court, and execution issued, upon which one of the defendants was arrested and committed to gaol, and afterwards was sworn out of gaol under the insolvent debtors acts. [Motion overruled.]

The petition was as follows: "Your petitioners, John H. Albers and Christian Born, of the city, county, and state of New York, merchants, under the firm and style of J. H. Albers & Born, respectfully state, that at the last April term of this court, they recovered judgment, as plaintiffs, in a certain action against Albert Whitney, Rufus C. Kemp, and Benjamin L. Mann, all of said Boston, merchants and copartners under the firm of Whitney, Kemp & Co.; that, by a slight clerical error in the writ, the name of said Albers was written James H. Alvers, instead of John H. Albers, and in consequence thereof, so appears in the record of the judgment in said action. Wherefore, they humbly pray, that the record of the proceedings and judgment in said case be amended, by inserting John H. Albers in place of James H. Alvers, where the same occurs."

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The power of this court to grant amendments is dependent upon statute; and, so far as it has been provided for, it is by the 32d section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, [1 Stat. 91.] That section provides, "That no summons, writ, declaration, return, process, judgment, or other proceedings in civil causes, in any of the courts of the United States, shall be abated, arrested, quashed, or reversed, for any defect or want of form; but the courts shall respectively proceed and give judgment according as the right of the cause and matter of law shall appear to them, without regarding any imperfections, defects, or want of form, in such writ, &c.," except only such as the party shall specially set down by demurrer as causes thereof. The courts are further authorized from time to time to amend all such imperfections, defects, and want of form, other than those set down by demurrer. The statute then proceeds to declare, that the courts "may at any time permit either of the parties to amend any defect in the process or pleadings, (not adding, as in the preceding part of the section, 'judgments and proceedings,') upon such conditions as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion and by their rules, prescribe." Now, upon the foundation of this section, no authority is given to the courts of the United States to make any amendments in judgments, except as to defects and want of form. In the present case, the amendment is not of any matter or defect of form. The form of the declaration is right. The defect proposed to be remedied is a mistake of fact in the christian name of one of the plaintiffs. This mistake, too, is not apparent on the record, nor is it to be amended by any matter, apparent upon other parts of the record. But it is to be made out upon affidavits and evidence allunde to establish the fact. There is, therefore, nothing on the record to amend by.

It is plain, that at the common law no judgment was amendable after the term at which it was entered. And amendments could be made in the process, pleadings, and proceedings only while the cause stood in paper, and before judgment. The authority to amend, then, even in England, in cases of this sort, is dependent upon and limited by statute. Mr. Tidd, in his excellent work on Practice, has laid this down, as the clear doctrine of the courts, in all cases of ordinary suits (excluding fines and recoveries) in the English courts of justice. 1 Tidd, Pr. (9th Ed. 1828.) 711, 712. Judgments and records are there never allowed to be amended, except, in the first place, where the case is within the reach of some statute; or, in the next place, where there is something to amend by, that is, where there is some memorial, paper, or other minute of the transactions in the case, from which what actually took place in the prior proceedings can be clearly ascertained and known. Id. 713, 714. In the case before us, there has been no mistake in the prior proceedings. The mistake is in a fact, that never was brought out in the prior process, or pleadings, or proceedings in the cause. It is a mistake, dehors the record and proceedings, a mistake in the christian name of one of the plaintiffs, which could not be made apparent except by some plea, which should have disclosed it. If known to the defendants, they waived the objection, and submitted to have a judgment against them by default. It appears to me, then, that this is not a case for any amendment, authorized to be made by this court. Neither do I perceive, in what respect the purposes of justice would be aided by the amendment. On the contrary, as one of the defendants has been committed on the execution, which issued on the judgment, and has been discharged under the poor debtors' act from his imprisonment, there might be danger, that the court might, by the amendment, do injustice or injury to him. Suppose a new execution to issue after the amendment, might not that defendant be taken anew in execution, notwithstanding his former discharge? I do not say, that he could. But we ought not to subject him to the hazard. Besides; the amendment does not seem necessary for any reasonable object. The judgment, as it stands, concludes all the defendants, as to the very defect in controversy; and it is not now open to them to contest the fact, that the plaintiff's name was, as stated in the writ and declaration; at least, so far as this judgment is concerned, its validity on this point cannot be questioned. Motion overruled.

BETTS, District Judge. In this case, heard at the same term and almost simultaneously with that of The Maria, [Case No. 9,073,] the proofs given in the latter suit are invoked by the libellants and made part of the evidence. The vessel and cargo were captured May 1, 1862, at sea, a few miles off Charleston harbor, by the United States gunboat Huron, and were sent to this port for adjudication. The libel, demanding their confiscation as prize of war, was filed May 17, 1862.

On the 10th of June thereafter, the master of the vessel, John F. Stein, intervened, and filed claims and answers to the libel, in behalf of Thomas McWilliam, as owner of the vessel, and of Francisco Otero &

Co. and Rafael L. Sanchez, as owners of different portions of the cargo.

The ship's papers exhibit a British certificate of registry, given at Nassau, April 9, 1862, to Thomas McWilliam, of that port, but a resident of Mantanzas. The vessel was built in New Jersey, and then took the name of Irene. Her crew list bears date April 18, 1862, and is for a voyage from Nassau to New York, without any return port being designated. A clearance of the vessel at Nassau for the port of New York was granted by the receiver general, April 20, 1862. There were on board bills of lading and invoices of portions of the cargo from Nassau and Mantanzas, and a charter-party between Thomas McWilliam and Francisco Otero & Co., executed in Mantanzas, March 20, 1862, letting the vessel to the latter for the transportation of a cargo to be furnished by the hirers at Mantanzas and Nassau on a voyage to New York.

The suit from which evidence is invoked into this case is that of U. S. v. The Maria, [before cited.] It was instituted May 21, 1862. The vessel was registered at Nassau, April 16, 1862, to William Smith, of Glasgow, Scotland, as having been built in Charleston, South Carolina, and was cleared at Nassau for New York April 16, 1862, and was captured April 30, 1862, by a United States vessel-of-war, near the coast of South Carolina. She had on board an invoice of forty boxes, containing 80 dozen cotton cards, shipped March 28, 1862, by Rafael L. Sanchez, at Mantanzas, to be delivered at New York to Martinez, Gonzales & Co. The said Sanchez, by his claim and answer, filed in that suit July 8, 1862, claimed the merchandise as his property; and it is alleged by the counsel for the libellants that the consignor and consignees in that suit (the Maria and cargo) and the one here on trial (the Albert and cargo) are the same parties, and that the shipments have relation to a common commodity and purpose. On that allegation the evidence in the suit of U. S. v. The Maria was allowed by the court to become, by invocation, evidence in the present suit.

That evidence, so brought into this case, shows that a Mr. Monet, of the firm of Monet, Jemenez & Co., charterers of the schooner Maria, was a passenger on board of that vessel at the time of her capture, and had with him on board a triplicate bill of lading for the cards on the two vessels, in which it was expressed that the cards should be landed in a southern port. It also appears, by comparison of the ship's papers, found on board the two vessels, that the said cards were shipped in both vessels under a common statement in the shipping papers of the destination of the vessels from Mantanzas to New York, and a common letter of instructions by the shipper to the consignees.

This evidence shows satisfactorily, that the shipment of the cards was for some southern port, and that the destination of this vessel, equally with that of her consort, the Maria, was simulated and false in that respect. The bill of lading engaging the delivery of one of the shipments at a southern port was carried covertly on board of the Maria, by one of the carriers of the goods, as his instructions and guide for the delivery of the cotton cards shipped on both vessels. The log of the vessel, found on board, presents a suspicious appearance in several particulars. The whole front part of the book, consisting of many leaves, is cut out and absent. The first entry remaining bears date April 21, 1862, and appears to be the continuation of a preceding statement. The log does not name the time or place of departure, nor the place of destination; but the first entry implies that the vessel was then underway, and ten miles east of the Hole-in-the-Wall. The latitude and longitude are first noted April 23, and the latitude is recorded each succeeding day in April, but the longitude is not mentioned again. No course or distance run is given in the log. The vessel was captured on the first of May, but no entry is made of the fact. It is manifest that the log was kept with a view to conceal the true nature and intention of the voyage; and its gross mutilation amounts, under the rules of the prize law, to an act of culpability, which incurs the penalty of forfeiture of vessel and cargo.

The purchase of the vessel from an enemy by a resident in a neutral country, and the knowledge by the purchaser and the charterers of the existence of the war and of the blockade, and the intention to employ the vessel in violation of the blockade, are condemnatory facts, and, on the proofs before the court, plainly induce the forfeiture of vessel and cargo.

Again, there are in proof cumulative offenses in the conduct of this voyage and of its antecedent either one of which subjects the vessel to confiscation; and the last one is conclusively criminatory of the cargo. The voyage last preceding this one was made in evasion of the blockade of Charleston, and the present voyage was single and entire, from Mantanzas, with the privilege of stopping at Nassau. From the latter port the voyage was directly and palpably for the purpose of violating the blockade of Charleston. All the witnesses concur in statements of the transaction which denote that intent unmistakably.

There is nothing in the case demanding a more detailed exposition of the reasons supporting the decree which the court feels constrained to pronounce. The adventure is flagrantly one of the many disclosed to the public by the incidents of this war, in which an exceedingly frail covering is paraded to screen a bold determination and effort to drive a criminal traffic with the rebels from neutral trading points situated in the vicinity of blockaded ports. That traffic is not diminishing in boldness and perseverance, but, though favored with manifold successes in the aggregate, yet the eyes of the law and justice are not so completely purblind but that many efforts to violate the public law and the rights of the government are frustrated, and result in the discomfiture of pursuits which tend to the great wrong of this country, and to a disruption of harmony between the United States and their neutral friends. A decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo will be entered.

This decree was affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, November 11, 1863. Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 663, [The Albert, Case No. 139.]

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—STRESS OF WEATHER.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In admiralty. [Decree of condemnation, affirming The Albert, Case No. 138.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This vessel and cargo were captured off Rattlesnake Shoals, near the mouth of Charleston harbor, South Carolina, about fifteen or twenty miles from Charleston. The vessel was, at the time, steering a straight course into the harbor. The capture was made on the 1st of May, 1862. The vessel, with part of her cargo, sailed from Matamoras, Cuba, stopped at Nassau, and took in the rest, and started, according to her papers, for the port of New York. The cargo consisted chiefly of coffee, sweet oil, fruits, and salt. The captain admits that he was wide of his regular course to New York at the time of the capture; and also that he was steering, at the time, square into the coast, which, as explained by one of the officers on board of the gunboat Huron, which made the capture, was sailing square into the harbor of Charleston.

The excuse set up is, that the vessel encountered great stress of weather and head winds. But it does not appear that she was in any way disabled or crippled, or that any reason existed for seeking to enter the port of Charleston.

The whole of the proofs satisfy me that the excuse set up is without any meritorious foundation, and does not reasonably explain the suspicious position of the vessel. She had been previously warned not to enter the port, as it was in a state of blockade, and the warning is noted on her papers. The court below condemned the vessel and cargo. The Albert, [Case No. 138.] I think that the decree was right, and should be affirmed. The vessel and cargo have been sold under an interlocutory order, and the fund remains for distribution.

SALVAGE—SHIP BURNING AT ANCHORAGE—AMOUNT OF AWARD.

[Cited in Bowers v. The European, 44 Fed. Rep. 491.]

[In admiralty. Libel for salvage by James Coyle, William Lee, and others against the ship Albert Gallatin, her cargo, etc.]

BUSTEED, District Judge. The libels in these cases are filed to recover salvage services rendered to the ship Albert Gallatin, which was struck by lightning on the morning of the 17th of April, A. D. 1868, as she lay at her anchorage in the Bay of Mobile, and fire thereby communicated to her cargo in the hold. At the time of her accident she had upwards of thirty-five hundred bales of cotton on board. It was therefore referred to a master to take the proofs. From these it appears that property was saved of the gross value of three hundred and forty-six thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and sixty-two cents, and that all the salvaging vessels were steamers. It is admitted that the services rendered were of a meritorious character, the only contest between the claimants and the libellants being as to their value.

It may be conceded that the proofs do not show the salvage services imminently jeopardized life or property, but that they were of a most disagreeable and laborious character, and that they involved great personal discomfort and risk to the health, is equally evident. The court does not deem it necessary to refer to the evidence in connection

ALBERTI v. The VIRGINIA.

[2 Paine, 115.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1840.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—CONTRACT NOT RELATING TO MARITIME SERVICE.

1. If a charter party embraces stipulations merely of a personal nature, having no relation to a maritime service in the safe carrying and delivery of the cargo, courts of admiralty have not jurisdiction to afford relief for a breach of such part of the contract.

[Cited in Peck v. Laughlin, Case No. 10,890; Deely v. The Ernest and Alice, Id. 3,735; The Clytie, Id. 2,914.]

2. Still less have they jurisdiction where such stipulations are contained in an instrument distinct from the charter party.

[Cited in Peck v. Laughlin, Case No. 10,890; Deely v. The Ernest and Alice, Id. 3,735.]

3. The owner of a vessel under charter for the West Indies and a market, agreed by letter that, if a certain price could not be obtained at a designated port, the vessel should proceed to another; which agreement he violated. Held, that admiralty had not jurisdiction of the case.

In admiralty. This was an appeal from the district court of the southern district of New York, from a decree dismissing a libel for want of jurisdiction. [Affirmed.]

The libel set forth that Charles Willey, the owner of the brig Virginia, Bethell, master, on the 14th day of March, 1840, chartered said brig to the libellants. This charter party was in the following words:—"This charter party made and entered into, this fourteenth day of March, 1840, by and between Charles Willey of Jacksonville, E. F., owner of the brig called the Virginia, of the first part, and Alberti, O'Neil & Dunbar of Woodstock, E. F., of the second part, witnesseth: The party of the first part agrees to charter to the party of the second part, the said brig for a voyage to the West Indies and a market, and to take a full cargo of pine lumber, two-thirds to be on account of the parties of the second part, one-third on account of said brig and owner. The parties of the second part agree to pay at the rate of fourteen dollars per thousand feet freight. It is understood that the vessel is to proceed as soon as practicable to the St. Mary's River, Ga., and there take in a full cargo of lumber in and under deck, to be furnished by the party of the second part, within reach of the vessel's tackles at their mill. The party of the second part are to allow five per cent. commission to the captain for sale of two-thirds of cargo in the West Indies, no other charge to be made on the portion belonging to the charterers. Alberti, O'Neil & Dunbar. Charles Willey."

The libel also stated that the vessel having been loaded pursuant to the charter party, the libellants gave to said Willey a letter of instructions, and to which they referred as forming a part of the charter party, or as explaining the duty of Willey and the master, under the charter party. The following is a copy of the letter. "Woodstock, S. S. Mill, 22d April, 1840. Capt. C. Willey, Brig Virginia—Dear Sir: Two-thirds of the cargo now on board your vessel is on account and in conformity with the understanding had between us. You will proceed to Guyama and dispose of your cargo, provided you can do so at a price covering invoice price and freight. We furnish you a letter of introduction to Mr. G. W. Gifford, who we would advise you to consult in the disposition of your cargo. Should you sell there, please pay over the proceeds of our portion to Mr. G. W. Gifford, and request him to remit by undoubted draft the proceeds to our agents, Messrs. Nesmith & Leeds, New York; should you not sell, proceed elsewhere with a view of effecting sales on the best terms possible; should you not be able to reach our limit (or even, we will consent to say, one dollar less) short of Jamaica, you will please proceed to Falmouth, and there discharge your cargo, which by letter in your possession is consigned to Mr. Samuel Magnus. Should you sell at any intermediate port between Guyama and Falmouth, please remit the proceeds of our portion by undoubted draft to our agents at New York, or should you sell at a port where the proceeds can be invested in produce to greater advantage for our interest than by bills, you are at liberty to do so, with the understanding the freight to New York is to be customary, and that it be consigned to our agents there, advising them of the shipment, that they may have insurance effected. Should you remit by bills, please send the first and second by different vessels to our agents, and bring the third in your own vessel. It is understood five per cent. is all the charge, excepting duty, we will allow on the sale of our lumber; you will please bear in mind the freight is paid here, hence we are to receive the whole sale of our portion of cargo, after deducting the duty and five per cent. commission. Should you feel disposed, and there is an opportunity of doing well at St. Johns, you may substitute that for Guyama for your first port.

"Trusting you will find a good market, your ob't servants, Alberti, O'Neil & Dunbar."

The libel further stated that Willey wrote a receipt at the foot of the letter, of which the following is a copy: "I hereby acknowledge to have received, from Alberti, O'Neil & Dunbar, a letter of instructions, of which the foregoing is a true copy, and I promise to comply with its requisitions. Charles Willey."

The libel further alleged that, if the instructions and charter party had been complied with, the lumber would have sold for enough to cover the cost and freight; but that the master, in violation of the charter party and the letter of instructions, and of his duty as master, sailed directly for St. Johns, in the island of Porto Rico, and without making any effort to get the best price he could, or to comply with the letter of instructions, sold the cargo at a great loss, and at a price much less than he would have obtained had he complied with the charter party and letter of instructions. That the libellants had been unable to get any settlement with Willey, and that they claimed of him the invoice cost of their share of the cargo, with the amount of freight they had paid, less commissions, &c. And the libel prayed a condemnation of the record, &c.

The claimants demurred generally and for want of jurisdiction.² By the decree of the court, the demurrer was allowed and the libel dismissed with costs. From this decree the libellants appealed.

T. Sedgwick, for appellants.

The points made by the appellants were:

I. The jurisdiction of the district court, as an instance court of admiralty, extends generally to all maritime contracts. 2 Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 88; The Mary, [Case No. 9,187;] Zarel [Zane] v. The President, [Id. 18,201;] The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat, [23 U. S.] 428; The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175. It is not necessary to review these cases at length. By maritime contracts, our courts have understood contracts relating to the business of the navigation of the sea. Every agreement directly relating to that business has been considered a subject of admiralty jurisdiction.

II. This jurisdiction more particularly embraces charter parties and agreements of an analogous character. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 487; 3 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) p. 220; De Lovio v. Boit, [Case No. 3,776;] The Volunteer, [Id. 16,991;] Andrews v. Essex Fire Co., [Id. 374.]

III. The charter party and letter of instruc-

² As to the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts, reference may be made to the following cases in Paine:—The Amiable Nancy, [Case No. 331;] Livingston v. Van Ingen, [Id. 8,420;] Denn v. Harnden, [Id. 4,819;] Lucas v. Morris, [Id. 8,587;] Ward v. Arredondo, [Id. 17,148;] Smith v. Jackson, [Id. 13,064;] *Rabaud v. tions, in this case, are to be considered as forming but one instrument; or the instructions are merely to be considered evidence construing and explaining the terms of the charter party. Thus far the libellants suppose there can be no doubt. Contracts relating to the navigation of the seas are proper subjects of admiralty jurisdiction. Charter parties form one of the largest branches of this class of contracts. The charter party and instructions here are to be taken together in this case as one instrument; and that a charter party or a contract of an analogous nature being an affreightment of a vessel for a maritime service. But we are now met by the objection that the part or subdivision of the contract here complained of as broken, does not relate to maritime affairs. Let us state the matter as strongly as it can be stated against the libellants. It is said that the maritime contract here, viz., to carry the lumber to the West Indies, was fully performed; and that the sale of the goods on land, for a price below that limited, was an act performed by the master as consignee; and that, consequently, the admiralty has no concern with it. This view of the matter has been taken by the district judge, and, therefore, while I insist with the utmost confidence that it is erroneous, I am bound to do so with deference and respect. I am quite ready to concede that in a charter party stipulations might be inserted which would be of a character wholly unmaritime, (if I may so express myself,) and which would give the admiralty no jurisdiction whatever. If the master were made, properly speaking, consignee of the cargo, if it had arrived at its ultimate destination and was landed, and he should then misapply it or its proceeds, I readily admit that no charter party could give the admiralty jurisdiction. If here, after the vessel had arrived at Falmouth, and the cargo were on shore, he had converted it to any improper purpose, the vessel clearly would not then be answerable. But is that this case? What is the contract here? Simply this: To carry this lumber to Jamaica, provided the price of lumber at the intermediate ports does not reach a certain limit. Has that contract been performed? Not at all. The vessel only carried the cargo to Porto Rico. The vessel has not done what she undertook to do. That must always give jurisdiction to the admiralty in rem. It is all very well for defendants in cases like this to chaunt the praises of the trial by jury; but how are we to get at a case like this with a jury, the most clumsy and awkward engine that justice ever invented or condescended to make use of? When shall we find this Florida gentleman, Mr. Willey, within our territories? The jurisdiction of admiralty in personam may be hedged in with propriety, because the person is there given to the custody of a single judge; but in rem, the jurisdiction of admiralty is wholesome, liberal, almost essential to the interests of commerce and to international intercourse. What is the basis, the reason of it? Why, merely that the vessel, the thing, the res, by means of which the benefit is obtained, shall stand security to the other party for the protection of his rights. Now, to apply it to this case, what was the consideration upon which the libellants put the lumber on board the vessel? Was it not that it should go to Falmouth, provided the price could not be got short of there? Is not this a contract to which the vessel is bound? What is the breach of the contract? Why, that the lumber was taken out of the vessel at a port short of her destination. Is not this a breach of the contract, and upon altum mare? The master was not to land the lumber at St. Johns to see what the price was, and then to sell it if it reached a certain point—not at all. The libel distinctly charges that he went to St. Johns, and there, without making any effort to get the price limited, sold it. The distinct breach charged is, then, that the master delivered the cargo at St. Johns, instead of Falmouth. It is not that, acting as consignee, he misconducted himself. He never was consignee. The consignee was at Falmouth, and is expressly pointed out in the letter of instructions; and the master could not be consignee, unless the price limited was reached short of Falmouth, and that case never occurred. He never was consignee, therefore, and the very first stick of lumber that he lifted to land it at St. Johns, was lifted in violation of the contract. If he had been authorized to land and wait for the market, then he would have been consignee, and then the precise case would have arisen which, as the counsel for the defendants suppose, presents itself here. But it was not so. He was only authorized to land the cargo short of Falmouth, under certain circumstances. Those circumstances never existed. The landing of the cargo is, therefore, what we complain of. The voyage that the vessel undertook to make has not been completed. It is precisely as if the instructions had run thus: "You will proceed to St. Johns, and if there you find one of our firm to receive the cargo, you will land it; otherwise, you will proceed to Falmouth." Suppose, with the instructions, the master had gone to St. Johns, and there (although the partner whom he was to meet did not appear) he had landed the cargo and sacrificed it, can there be a doubt the jurisdiction of the admiralty would have attached? The counsel treats the matter as if it was the sale that we objected to. So we do. But it is the landing of the cargo for the purpose of sale, that formed the first violation of the contract, and which gives the admiralty jurisdiction.

F. B. Cutting, for respondents, said:

I. The jurisdiction of the instance court of admiralty over all contracts which are of a maritime nature, may be conceded, without prejudice to the demurrer in this case; for there is nothing concerning navigation or maritime service involved in the present controversy. The broad proposition that all claims arising out of a contract or course of dealing which embraces any maritime matters may be enforced in the admiralty, is certainly unsupported by authority, and never would be tolerated by such lovers of the common law as the American community. It is not proposed to go into the ancient discussions touching the extent or limits of admiralty jurisdiction, nor yet to burthen the court with an extended review of modern authorities. Such a course is not necessary in this case. The counsel cites De Lovio v. Bolt, [Case No. 3,776,] as an authority. This certainly is not extraordinary, since, although that sentence is understood to have been reversed because no counsel could be found hardy enough to argue in support of it, yet the learned judge who pronounced it seems to think that for this very reason its doctrines are not overturned. 1 Sumn. 554, 555, 565, [The Volunteer, Id. 16,991.] Judge Ware, in his reports—with due submission to the tribunal next in authority above him—actually questions the fact of the reversal. 1 Ware, 152, [Drinkwater v. The Spartan, Id. 4,085.] It will, however, be observed that a policy of insurance relates exclusively to a maritime matter—to wit, the perils of the seas; and if admiralty jurisdiction could be sustained in such a case, it would not affect the present question. Even the great champion of admiralty jurisdiction, Judge Story, does not carry his doctrines to the extent required by the libellants. In the case cited from 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 182, [The Orleans v. Phoebus,] he states expressly that "the admiralty has no jurisdiction at all in matters of account between part owners," such as an account of the vessel's earnings, or for a part owner's services or advances. In the case cited from 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 428; see 6 Cond. R. 173, [The Thomas Jefferson,]—he says: "In the great struggles between the courts of common law and the admiralty, the latter never attempted to assert any jurisdiction except over maritime contracts. See, also, 1 Mason, 509, [The Anne, Case No. 412.] Whether the admiralty shall exercise a jurisdiction coextensive with the most enlarged practice of any court of admiralty under the civil law systems of ancient or modern Europe, or be restrained within the narrow limits into which—in maintenance of the sacred right of trial by jury, that safeguard of private right, and palladium of public liberty, equally dear to Englishmen and Americans—it was forced by the firm and steady action of the English courts of common law, need not, we apprehend, now be decided. In different circuits, certainly, very different views are entertained upon it. Mr. Justice Story, with a zeal and learning which does him great credit, stands forth the champion of the former position; but other judges, with equal ability, and, we think, a more sound conception of the principles of our constitution, and the nature of our judicial system, maintain the latter. Vide Bains v. The Catharine, [Case No. 756;] Ramsay v. The Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; The Grand Turk, [Case No. 5,683;] 1 Kent, Comm. (1st Ed.) p. 352. The fate of this question, whenever presented to the court of dernier ressort, admits of little doubt. To say that the admiralty jurisdiction extends to all maritime contracts, is not advancing a step in the argument; for it remains to be determined what are maritime contracts. It seems to us, that the just limit to this jurisdiction, in respect to contracts, is that it embraces all those that relate to the actual operation of navigating the high seas; to this extent it is beneficial, perhaps necessary, to international commerce. Beyond this, the jurisdiction is wholly useless, and is actually forbidden by law; for, in all other cases, the common law is as competent to give relief to the suitor as a court of admiralty. Judiciary Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 9, [1 Stat. 76.] This would include suits for mariners' wages, for supplies and repairs furnished vessels actually engaged in maritime commerce, marine hypothecations, suits in rem to enforce the payment of freight, and controversies between part owners as to the possession and employment of such vessels; but not a policy of insurance, nor a controversy in relation to the sale of a cargo in a foreign port, by the consignee thereof. The counsel for the libellant cites, and the libel seems framed upon the doctrine contained in, a note to Dunlap's Practice, 488. Without entering into the question whether those cases are correctly decided or not, let it be observed that they are all decided, with some apparent misgivings on the part of the courts as to the question; and yet, they only assert the jurisdiction of the admiralty to enforce the specific lien given, even by the common law, for freight earned by a vessel for transporting goods upon the high seas. Do these cases assert that every commercial adventure entered into by merchants, in which one of the contracting parties owns a ship that is used in some branch of the operation, may be drawn into the admiralty? Surely not. We presume this court would hardly entertain a suit on a policy of insurance, and yet such a suit would possess much more of a maritime nature than the present libel. The general phrase found in elementary writers, that a charter party is a maritime contract, of which a court of admiralty has jurisdiction, unsupported and unexplained as it is by adjudications on the point, is as unsafe and unsubstantial a basis on which to rest this jurisdiction, as the like remark, in the same "authorities," in relation to a policy of insurance. Surely if the jurisdiction now claimed had any rightful existence, some traces of it would be found in actual adjudication. The silence of Westminster Hall is often appealed to as evidence against a common law claim. The silence of the admiralty is evidence here.

II. The present case presents a contract for the carriage of a quantity of lumber to the West Indies, and a market; with a letter of instructions, sent, as the libel states, to whoever should go as master in the vessel, appointing him consignee of the lumber, and prescribing the conduct to be pursued by him in respect to the sale of the cargo, and disposition of the proceeds. The vessel performed her voyage, agreeably to the charter party, to a port in the West Indies, a port indicated to the consignee in the letter of instructions, as a market; and there, on land, acting as consignee of the cargo, the master sold the cargo as he was directed to do by his instructions, but below the prescribed price. This is matter of contract or of tort. If of tort, it was not committed by the master, as master, but as consignee, nor was it committed super altum mare; and, therefore, the instance court of admiralty has not jurisdiction of it, especially in rem against the property of the owners of the vessel. 1 Dunl. Adm. Pr. 50; 2 Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 144; 2 Pet. Adm. Dec. Append. 74, [Treatise on Masters of Ships, art. 2, Fed. Cas., Append. to last volume.] If it is matter of contract, then, it is for executing, imperfectly and improperly, a contract made on land, whereby the master was to act as consignee of the cargo, to receive it as such in a foreign port, and there sell it. The whole maritime matter of the case, everything belonging to the seas, or constituting any part of the charter party, or contract of affreightment, is performed; but, after the delivery of the cargo to the consignee, at the market or land by him selected, he has been guilty of a departure from instructions in the manner of sale. Suppose the breach of instructions had consisted of a neglect to advise, as to the return of proceeds invested, by which the libellants omitting to insure had suffered a loss. Surely this would not give admiralty jurisdiction in rem, to enforce a claim for damages against the vessel which took out the original cargo. The characters of master and consignee are altogether distinct and independent, and will be so deemed, even where the offices coincide in the same individual. The law will then regard the individual as holding the one office or the other, according to his actual position and employment at the time of the act to be discussed. Per Kent, J., Kendrick v. Delafeld, 2 Caines, 72. In this case there can be no doubt on that point; when the master, as consignee, determined to sell at the first port, he acted in his character of consignee; his sale was in the character of consignee. That sale is the act complained of, it is the act of a commercial agent in the land service, having no connection whatever with the navigation of the seas, or any matter maritime, and its legal merits must be tested, by the rules of the common law, before a jury. The reference in the charter party, to the fact that the master would probably be selling agent, is properly no part of the charter party, as such. If an agreement relative to commerce on land be written upon the same paper with an agreement relative to matters maritime, the jurisdiction over the whole contract would not thereby be conferred upon the admiralty; particularly if the whole matter complained of, and in respect to which the breach occurred, related to the first branch. Even applying to such a case the grasping maxim of chancery, that jurisdiction existing for one purpose, the admiralty may retain it generally, would do the libellants no good; for no breach of the contract is complained of in that part of it which has a maritime aspect. The maritime obligation to carry the goods to the market in the West Indies, which the shipper's consignee should select for its sale, was fully performed. The only object of referring to the sale in the charter party, was to negative the idea of any greater charge than a commission; and that, it will be observed, is to be paid, not to the owner, but to the master: not as freight, but as a commission for selling; it is, by force of that term, a land matter. The shipper need not have selected the master as his consignee; he was at liberty to select whom he pleased for that office. On the whole, it is respectfully submitted to the court, that the libel does not present a claim of a maritime nature, and that the libel was properly dismissed. The sentence should be affirmed with damages, for the vexation and delay of this appeal.

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Judge, and BRISTOL, District Judge.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case is brought up by appeal from the decree of the district court, dismissing the libel for want of jurisdiction. The argument of the appellant's counsel seems to assume that the letter of instructions is to be taken as a part of the charter party, and to receive the same construction, and be subject to the same jurisdiction, as if incorporated in the charter party. [See note at end of case.] I by no means mean to admit that if this had been the case, it would not have made any difference with respect to the jurisdiction of the court. If a charter party embraces stipulations purely of a personal nature, having no relation to a maritime service, in the safe carrying and delivery of the cargo, the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court could not reach the case and afford relief for a breach of such part of the contract. But it seems to me that the instructions in this case are entirely independent of the charter party; they bear different dates, and were not executed at the same time. The latter bears date the 14th of March, and the former on the 22d of April, 1840. The charter party is for a voyage to the West Indies, and a market generally; and the instructions limit the delivery of the cargo to certain specified places. But what is more important in the present case, the instructions contain stipulations for services to be rendered on land in relation to the dispositions of the cargo; and besides, the duty and undertaking of the charterer are not left to rest upon his liability growing out of the charter party, but he enters into a special contract in relation to matters contained in the instructions, which afford a reasonable inference that the parties did not understand the charter party and letter of instructions as one instrument. But this is not the real and fatal objection to the jurisdiction of the court. The nature of the services stipulated to be rendered, which form the subject-matter of the relief sought by the libel, does not belong to the admiralty jurisdiction of the court. It was not of a maritime character; it did not relate to the safe carrying and delivery of the cargo, or anything to be done upon the high seas, but related entirely to the sale of the cargo and matters to be done after the termination of the charter party and safe landing of the cargo. The whole complaint in the libel rests upon alleged violations of these instructions by selling the cargo at a less price than was thereby limited. This is matter belonging entirely to courts of common law. I am accordingly of opinion that the decree of the district judge ought to be affirmed.

NOTE, [from original report.] "The general rule which our courts of law have adopted in the construction of this, as well as other mercantile instruments," says Mr. Abbott, (Shipp. p. 250.) "is, that the construction should be liberal, agreeable to the real intention of the parties, and conformable to the usage of trade in general, and of the particular trade to which the contract relates." "If by the terms of the charter party," says Mr. Abbott, (Shipp. p. 376 et seq.) "a particular number of days is stipulated for the delivery, either generally or by way of demurrage, the master must wait the appointed time for that purpose, reckoning the days from the time of the ship's arrival at the usual place of discharge in the port, and not at the port merely. These charges are in ordinary cases primage, and the usual petty average, as expressed in the bill of lading; in case of any loss that became the subject of general average, the civil law imposed upon the master the duty of adjusting and settling such average, and obtaining from the owners of the cargo saved the sums to be paid as a contribution to the loss, and allowed him to detain the cargo for that purpose. This power of detaining the cargo is also given by the laws of Oleron, and by the French ordinance. It is said to be the practice in this country, in the case of a general ship, for the master to take security from the merchants before he delivers the goods, for payment of their shares of this contribution when the average shall be adjusted. If goods are conveyed in pursuance of a charter party, the right of detention for the freight may depend upon the terms of the particular contract: where there is no special contract, as in the case of a general ship, the master is not bound absolutely to part with the possession of any part of his cargo, until the freight and other charges, due in respect of such part, are paid. Valin informs us that the entire contents of a single bill of lading are to be considered as one part, although consisting of very different articles, but that the contents of one bill of lading are not bound to the payment due for the contents of another bill of lading, although consigned to the same person. In this country, however, it has been held, that the master may detain any part of the merchandise for the freight of all that is consigned to the same person, which seems to be a more reasonable and convenient rule. The master, however, cannot detain the goods on board the ship, until these payments are made, as the merchant would then have no opportunity of examining their condition. By the ordinance of Wisbuy, and also by the French ordinance, the master may seize and detain the goods in the lighters, or barges, which are [to] transport them to the quay, and by the former he may detain the lighters by the ship's side. Cleirac, in his commentary on the laws of Oleron, says that the same power is given by the ordinance of Philip the Second and by the Consolato del Mare, and that the latter allows him to detain goods equal in value to four times the amount of the freight. The ordinance of Rotterdam allows the master to detain the goods for his freight, but requires him to unload and take care of them, that they may not be diminished or spoiled. In England the practice is to send such goods as are not required to be landed at any particular dock to a public wharf, and order the wharfinger not to part with them till the freight and other charges are paid, if the master is doubtful of the payment. And by the law of England, if the master once parts with the possession out of the hands of himself and his agents, he loses his lien or hold upon the goods, and cannot afterwards reclaim them. If the master land his goods at any particular wharf or dock, in obedience to an act of parliament, he does not thereby part with his lien. If goods are landed or sold by the officers of the customs, the freight not having been paid, the produce of the sale is to be first applied to the payment of the freight."

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE — ENEMY PROPERTY.

missioners having been opened by order of the court, and judgment of condemnation of the vessel and cargo being moved thereon by the United States attorney, and no person appearing to oppose the same, an interlocutory order of condemnation, pursuant to the motion, was granted. On the submission of the proofs so brought in for the consideration of the court, the same were examined, and showed the case to be this: The vessel was captured with her cargo, by the United States ship-of-war Penguin, on the 25th of November, 1861. She was first discovered making for a port six or seven miles off North Edisto, in South Carolina, and twelve or fifteen miles southeast of Charleston; but on being pursued by the Penguin, veered her course northly, in the direction of New York.

She exhibited to the captors a certificate of British registry to Pembroke Saunders, of Nassau, N. P., merchant, executed November 13, 1861, and a certificate of the due clearance of her cargo by the receiver general at that port, November 16, and an affidavit taken before the British consul there resident, of Henry R. Saunders, to the verity of the invoice of the cargo. With these documents were bills of parcels of the cargo shipped, and the shipping articles purporting to have been executed by the master and crew of the schooner, on the 15th of November, for a voyage from Nassau to New York and back to the port of Nassau.

On the 23d of November the schooner was boarded by Lieutenant Wiltse, of the United States navy, from the ship-of-war St. Lawrence, off the coast of Georgia, who indorsed on her register a warning not to enter any port south of Hampton Roads, on account of the blockade.

Two of the seamen, examined in preparatory, testified that they had no knowledge of any attempt or design on the part of the schooner to enter a blockaded port, nor any actual knowledge that Charleston or the contiguous ports were blockaded, and supposed she was truly performing a voyage from Nassau to New York. One of them, however, admits that the vessel had run so near the South Carolina coast, and headed so directly toward it, as to render her movements suspicious.

The other witness, however, on his examination before the prize commissioners, made an unreserved and apparently ingenuous and credible exposure of the enterprise.

He was the mate of the vessel and part owner of her and the cargo. He states that he and her master, and the other owners of the vessel and cargo, have for very many years been residents, with their families, in Savannah, Georgia. The vessel was furnished by them solely with their own funds, as was the cargo.

The voyage commenced from Savannah to Nassau. The vessel was there laden with cargo owned by them, and sailed for their benefit. They had long known of the blockade of Savannah and Charleston, and of the southern coast generally. Her voyage was to be from Savannah to Nassau, and back from Nassau to Savannah, or some such blockaded port as they could get her into; and, after she departed from Nassau, she was never directed towards New York, nor intended to make that course, further than that, on discovering that she was chased by the United States war-ship which captured her, she assumed a course towards New York, hoping to escape the pursuit.

It is needless to detail the testimony further. There are no facts produced in contradiction of this evidence, and it is conclusive of the criminality and confiscability of the vessel and cargo, both showing it to be wholly enemy property, and as demonstrating that, if it could successfully wear a neutral cloak, it was procured, shipped, and transported for the purpose of evading the blockade it was attempting to run when captured.

Judgment and condemnation as lawful prize of vessel and cargo.

PRIZE—EXAMINATION OF PRISONERS—CUSTODY OF SHIP.

[1. When a prize is sent into port, without the prisoners taken in her, whose examination is important, the prize commissioner will be ordered to give the ship and cargo into the custody of the marshal, to be held until the prize master shall have returned to the flag officer, in order that the prisoners, or an affidavit giving the reasons for their detention, may be brought into court.]

[2. Where the prize master was present at the capture, the prize commissioner will be ordered to examine him.]

In admiralty.

CADWALADER, District Judge. In this case the examination of the persons captured in the vessel is of immediate, as well as probable, ultimate importance. The usual and regular course is to send them in her, in the custody of the prize master, to the place of intended adjudication. This course has not been pursued in this instance. The prize master states that these persons were detained in the war steamer Seminole, in Hampton Roads, where he believes that they are now are. He does not know why they were not sent in her, nor does he know any reason why they should not be sent hither for examination. The papers of the vessel are all here. To send them away would be contrary to the usual course of practice, and would, unless under extraordinary circumstances, be objectionable. A commission to take the examinations where the witnesses now are, addressed to a person there, would be inconvenient, as the commissioner would not, without the papers, be able to take the depositions advisedly. The preparation and transmission of copies, besides being attended with delay and expense, might endanger their premature publication. Moreover, a prize commissioner, as the immediate delegate of the judge, ought, if possible, to be a person with whom he can, from time to time communicate, in the progress of the cause. Another course, which might be preferable, would be to send one of the prize commissioners of the court to Hampton Roads for the purpose of taking the examination. But this might be attended with great expense, and, though not necessarily improper, is, I believe, unprecedented.

Under the circumstances of the case, I will make an order that the prize commissioner to whom the papers have already been delivered shall, upon taking possession of the vessel and cargo, deliver them immediately into the custody of the marshal, who will remain in possession under the direction of the commissioner. This will enable the prize master to return with a copy of these proceedings, to the flag officer, under whose order he has brought the captured vessel hither. The flag officer will probably either send the prisoners to this place in the custody of the same prize master, or of another officer, or send an affidavit explaining the reasons for not sending them. The decision of a prize cause is usually pronounced upon the examination of the persons on board of the captured vessel, and of her papers. In this case there may, perhaps, be some special reason for examining the prize master, who states that he was present at the capture. The commissioner may therefore examine him at once, for which this will be his warrant.

Case No. 144.

The ALBION LINCOLN.

[1 Lowell, 71.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1866.

SALVAGE—COMPENSATION—APPORTIONMENT—VALUE OF GOODS.

1. Where five distinct sets of salvors took part in stripping and unloading a stranded vessel, they have not separate liens on the several articles saved by each set, but all are entitled to be paid out of all the property saved.

2. The award to each set of salvors who strip and discharge a wrecked vessel does not usually depend upon the value of the goods which each actually saved.

[Cited in Scott v. Four Hundred and Forty-Five Tons of Coal, 39 Fed. Rep. 287.]

3. The value of the property saved is usually estimated at the time and place of salvage;

but where the salvors refused to deliver the property to the owners, and neglected to bring their libels until after the goods had fallen in market value, held, that the price was to be ascertained when the libels were filed and the warrants to deliver executed.

[In admiralty. Libel for salvage. Decree for libelants.]

Salvage. On Wednesday, January 18, 1865, the bark Albion Lincoln, bound from some port in the West Indies for Portland, with a cargo of molasses, got on shore at Nashawena, an island at the entrance of Vineyard sound, lying about fifteen miles from New Bedford on one side and Holmes Hole on the other. The vessel came off the rocks, but had lost her rudder, and was not in a condition to be navigated to a place of safety. Some men from the neighboring island of Cuttyhunk came on board, and were employed to pump. The mate went to New Bedford for assistance, arriving there in the afternoon. Finding that no steamer was to be had, he engaged the libellant Baker, with his pilot-boat Dragonet, to go with him and tow off the bark. They were unable to reach the spot that night, but came to anchor at the nearest place of safe anchorage. Early in the morning, the master and crew of the bark came on board the Dragonet and informed them that the vessel had gone ashore again during the night, and was fast on the rocks. It was plain that the pilot-boat was not well suited to the service that would now be required of receiving the cargo from the Albion Lincoln. Captain Baker, however, was an experienced wrecker, and had vessels and men at New Bedford; and upon a representation of these facts to the master he agreed that Baker should go to work and save what was possible of vessel and cargo, and be paid a reasonable compensation. In the mean time, the schooner Independence, belonging to the libellant Cromwell, of Holmes Hole, had arrived with a crew of picked men, accustomed to such service. They had heard of a vessel in the sound with her colors union down, and had come out to her assistance. Making a harbor of necessity the evening before, at Tarpaulin Cove, and arriving very early in the morning, they found the bark deserted. By inquiry on shore, they learned that the master was on the pilot-boat, and Captain Cromwell went to see him. What passed there was stated very differently by different witnesses; Captain Baker said he agreed with Capt. Cromwell to be jointly interested with him in the salvage. Cromwell denied this. There was no doubt, however, that Cromwell's assistance was accepted on some terms, and all went to work to strip the vessel, so far as was proper and prudent, to lighten her; this work, and the saving of five or six hogsheads of molasses, occupied the whole of that day (Thursday). Towards night, the master of the bark and his crew went to New Bedford with Captain Baker, in the Dragonet, intending to return the next day with two wrecking schooners, the Z. Secor and the Experiment, which belonged to Baker. They procured the vessels, manned them, and started, but were detained by ice, and could not reach the wreck until Sunday afternoon or evening. Monday and Tuesday were stormy; but on Wednesday, Jan. 25, Captain Baker saved some hogsheads of molasses. In the mean time, on the first Friday evening, the Emma Jane, a light-draft schooner, able to lie alongside the wreck, arrived, and Capt. Cromwell made a bargain for her assistance, and during Friday and Saturday these two vessels got out a considerable part of all the cargo that was saved. They saved something, though not much, on the second Wednesday and Thursday. Two other vessels, the Platten See and the Martin Van Buren, also saved some cargo. All this before Captain Baker's return. Captain Church, who came down with the first party on the Dragonet, remained during the whole time, and had some sort of charge of the vessel, but not a general supervision of the business. He worked chiefly with the men from Cuttyhunk, who remained during the whole time. By Thursday night, January 26, or Friday morning, it was discovered that the molasses, which had been stowed with the bungs of the hogsheads out, as is usual in voyages from the West Indies, was so far mixed with water, that it was not worth saving, and all parties gave up the work.

LOWELL, District Judge. Two libels are brought here. One by Captain Baker, for himself and the several officers and men of his three vessels, with whom joins Captain Church, for himself and the men from Cuttyhunk; the other by Captain Cromwell and Captain Cleveland, of the Independence and Emma Jane, for themselves and the crews of those vessels. It is said that the master and owners of the Platten See and Martin Van Buren have arranged with the owners of the molasses for compensation to be paid hereafter. The sails, spars, and rigging, were taken to New Bedford, and sold by auction; the cargo was somewhat scattered, but was collected at Holmes Hole, and eventually sent to New York and sold. The net proceeds of the sale are about five thousand two hundred dollars. And upon this the question is made, what value I am to assume for the property saved. It seems that the market price of molasses fell very rapidly during the interval between the saving and the sale of this cargo; and the libellants say, this fluctuation of values is at the risk of the general owner. It is undoubtedly true, as a general proposition, that the value, at the time and place of saving, is to be considered rather than the value at any other time and place, because this shows the benefit done to the owner of the property, if he receives it then and there, whatever disposition he may choose to make of it: The George Dean, Swab. 290. But in this case, the owners did not receive their property, and the salvors refused to let them take it, and brought their libel after the owners had begun to attempt its removal and had hired a vessel to take it to New York, and this was a long time after the goods had been landed. It is argued that the claimants are responsible for this delay. But the evidence does not bear out this contention. The underwriters' agents appear to have tried, in good faith, to compromise the matter, and to have made an offer which was entirely liberal; but a settlement was prevented by the conflicting claims and pretensions of the different salvors. At all events, no settlement was made; and down to the day the second libel was filed, the owners had not full possession of their property, and were not bound, personally, to pay anything for its having been saved. If it had been destroyed at that time, no action could have been sustained against them for salvage, properly so called, though possibly something might have been recovered for actual expenses. This state of facts raises the distinction between the present case and those cited at the bar, as, for instance, that concerning the conversion of a whale, decided in January last. In this case, there was no contract, and no responsibility for a specific part of the goods deliverable at the time and place of salvage; but only for such sum of money, or such part of the goods or of their value, as might be just and reasonable, and the parties could not agree upon that; but the libellants, being at liberty to apply to the court at any time, neglected to apply until the goods had fallen in value. If the court had then ordered an appraisement, or had decreed to the libellants a specific part of the goods, as is sometimes done, it is seen at once that the salvors would sustain their proportion of the loss, as it is right they should. I cannot hold the owners responsible for the value of goods which they were not allowed to take away.

The property was delivered to the claimants, by the marshal, on the 13th of March, and was sold in New York, early in April. Granting that it could have been as well sold at Holmes Hole, of which there is some evidence, it would be proper, in making the estimate, to disallow the expense of getting it to New York, and to take a somewhat earlier time; but a very considerable fall of prices had occurred before any proceedings were had. Upon all the evidence, I assume the value as about six thousand dollars. The services performed by the salvors were meritorious, and at great expense of time. The cargo was under water during a part of each tide and the weather extremely cold, the thermometer, on several days, being at about zero of Fahrenheit; and, altogether, the difficulty and labor were very considerable. A great part of the time consumed, however, especially by Captain Baker and his men, was spent in trying to get an opportunity to work. The fund, reckoned on any fair basis, is small, not sufficient to allow of a large salvage reward to any one. This is one of the risks which wreckers take, however, and in the case of most of the libellants, who are often employed in the business, it may be supposed to be made up by the larger reward earned when the property is large.

Another question, much debated in this case, is the principle of the distribution of whatever salvage may be thought reasonable for the whole service. There are five distinct sets of salvors; and most of them have acted upon the theory that their lien and claim are upon the specific goods rescued by them; they put their initials on these casks, and stood guard over them and forbade their removal, have expected a definite part of them for their reward, and have, in one instance, filed their libel against them. This course of proceedings strikes me as novel. I have been accustomed to look upon the vessel, freight, and cargo, or what was saved of them, as one fund, upon the whole of which all the salvors, though not associated by any contract among themselves, had a lien for such sum as, upon the whole, was found due to each. In the case of the vessel and freight this is necessarily so, and I am not aware that any different rule holds with respect to cargo, or to the materials of a ship that has been broken up. The success of the particular salvors, though often a necessary preliminary to the recovery of any reward, is but one element in determining its amount; there are others of great importance, such as the time and labor expended and the risk run. In some reported cases one set of salvors have plainly contributed much more to the safety of the property, and the other set have been allowed as large, and sometimes the larger reward. Success is essential, but that having been obtained, the share depends largely on the nature of the effort: The Santipore, 1 Spinks, 231; The Genesee, 12 Jur. 401; The Atlas, 1 Lush. 518; The E. U., 1 Spinks, 63. As a general rule, the court will not assess a different ratio of salvage upon different parts of the property, according to the labor expended on those parts, though it may do so if the justice of the case requires it. The Vesta, 2 Hagg. [Adm.] 189. And the salvor who happened to find and rescue a very valuable part of the cargo would not usually be compensated in proportion to its value. It is only one of the elements of the computation. Take in this very case the instance of the men from Cuttyhunk. They were on board the vessel before she was bilged, and every day afterwards. It is impossible to say how far they contributed to save all that was saved by their exertions on the first Wednesday. They got out but little molasses considering their numbers, because they worked at the fore hold, from which it was difficult to discharge the cargo. But they had as good a right to work at the after hold as the crews of the Emma Jane and the Independence; any arrangement they may have made for a division of labor, was made, as I must presume, for their common convenience; and they appear to stand very much alike, except that Captain Church's men were able to sleep on shore with their families, and therefore were not subject to so much discomfort, which is a point of some importance; and they furnished no vessels or other appliances.

Coming to Captain Baker's case, we find that he employed nearly as many men as Captains Cromwell and Cleveland, and one more vessel; but he did not arrive in time to save a great deal of the cargo, and his men were not subjected to the same hardship or severity of labor. I do not find that Captain Baker has made good his demand to share equally with Captain Cromwell, on the strength of a bargain with him to that effect. Even setting aside the express denial of the latter, the conversation reported by Baker hardly amounts to such a contract; and when I consider the various circumstances of the case which would render such an agreement improbable, and others which seem to show that the conduct of Cromwell was inconsistent with it, I cannot say that any such bargain was fully understood by him, however it may have been with the other party. But Baker's time, expense, and exertions are entitled to be considered in apportioning the salvage, just as Captain Cromwell's time, trouble, and expense connected with the shipping and care of the steam-pump are to be taken into account. They were all working for a common object, and to that extent are necessarily interested together, whether they intended to be so or not. It is not possible to say precisely how far each contributed to the whole result, nor precisely what one might have saved if the others had not saved what they did. It is upon these principles that I shall divide the salvage: and I am glad to find that, looked at merely as wages, it will not be entirely insignificant. The case does not require me to make distribution to the individuals, but only to the different sets of salvors. I shall decree to the Independence and Emma Jane, $1500; to Captain Baker, for himself and his crew, $600; to Captain Church, and the men from Cuttyhunk, $350. Decree accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY — DISCHARGE OF GARNISHMENT — RIGHTS OF ATTACHMENT CREDITOR.

[A garnishment in a state court of the defendant's credits in a bank was discharged by his giving a bond required therefor by statute to satisfy the judgment, and the money was drawn by him from the bank, and deposited with a third person as indemnity to the sureties on his bond. Held, that the assignee appointed in proceedings in bankruptcy commenced against him more than a year after the garnishment was not entitled to an injunction against further proceedings in the suit in the state court, nor to the money so deposited, as assets of the estate; as the lien of the attaching creditor, acquired more than four months before the bankruptcy proceedings, was not destroyed by the giving of the bond.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition of the assignee in bankruptcy of William Albrecht for an injunction to restrain proceedings in a suit against the bankrupt in a state court. Denied.]

[It appeared that the suit in question was brought by one Seeley against Albrecht, in a circuit court of the state of Michigan, and that a writ of garnishment was issued there-in against the bank, as a debtor of Albrecht; that Albrecht obtained the discharge of the garnishment by giving a bond to satisfy the judgment, as required by statute, and drew the money due him from the bank, and deposited it with one Rich as indemnity to the sureties on the bond; and thereafter no further proceedings were taken in the suit. The proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced more than a year after the garnishment. The assignee sought to stay the proceedings in the state court, and claimed the fund deposited with Rich as part of the assets of the bankrupt's estate.]

C. E. Warner, for plaintiff in garnishment.

BROWN, District Judge. This case turns upon the construction given to the several provisions of the bankrupt law with respect to the dissolution of attachments, and the effect of a discharge. [Rev. St.] § 5044, enacts, that the assignment of the bankrupt "shall dissolve any attachment made within four months next preceding the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings." Section 5106 provides that "no creditor whose debt is provable shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor, against the bankrupt, until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined; and any such suit or proceedings shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge, provided the suit may proceed to judgment for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due," etc. Section 5119 declares that "a discharge in bankruptcy duly granted, shall release the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities, and demands which were, or might have been, proved against his estate in bankruptcy." A distinction is taken, in the section first above quoted, between attachments issued more, and those issued less than four months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. While nothing is said, in express terms, with regard to the former, the clear inference is, that the liens acquired by them were designed to be preserved. Such is the uniform course of decision, and, indeed, it was conceded that if the bond had not been given, and the garnishment proceedings thereby discontinued, Comp. Laws, § 6512, the plaintiff would have been at liberty to prosecute his suit, at least so far as to protect his lien upon the money in the hands of the garnishee, and this petition could not have been sustained. Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612; Davenport v. Tilton, 10 Metc. [Mass.] 320; Bates v. Tappan, 3 N. B. R. 647, 99 Mass. 376; Bosworth v. Pomeroy, 112 Mass. 293; Bowman v. Harding, 4 N. B. R. 20, 56 Me. 559; Stoddard v. Locke, 9 N. B. R. 71, 43 Vt. 574; Daggett v. Cook, 37 Conn. 341; Valliant v. Childress, 11 N. B. R. 317, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 643. It is insisted, however, that as soon as the bond was filed, and the suit in garnishment discontinued, the action became a purely personal one, and subject to be barred by a discharge, as if no garnishment had ever issued. The question does not seem to have been passed upon in the federal courts. The state authorities are in direct conflict. In the case of Carpenter v. Turrell, 100 Mass. 450, where the attachment was dissolved by a bond, the court held a discharge in bankruptcy a good plea to the further prosecution of the suit; the argument being, that the bond was not intended as a substitute for the attachment. "It does not merely restore the possession of the property to the debtor, subject to the attachment; it dissolves the attachment utterly. It is not given for the property itself, nor as security for its value; but for the payment absolutely of the judgment, when recovered in the suit, whatever may be its amount." A somewhat similar question had arisen under the insolvent law of the state, in Loring v. Eager, 3 Cush. 188. In that case it appeared, however, that the attachment would have been dissolved if no bond had been given, and the court observed, taking in this regard apparently a different view from that entertained in the latter case, "the bond was a security substituted for the security obtained by the attachment of the defendants' property; and we cannot suppose that the legislature intended that the plaintiffs should have any greater rights under the bond, in a case like this, than they would have had under the attachment."

The case of Payne v. Able, 4 N. B. R. 220, 7 Bush. 344, though an apparent authority in favor of the petitioner, is really of no pertinence, as the attachment was levied less than four months before the petition was filed. The case of Williams v. Atkinson, 36 Tex. 16, also relied upon by the petitioner here, does not seem to me to have any bearing upon the case. The discharge in bankruptcy was held to be a good plea, notwithstanding the attachment proceedings were commenced more than four months before the bankruptcy, upon the ground that the remedy of the plaintiffs in attachment was in the United States court. In so far as this case is an authority at all, it seems to be in conflict with the other cases above cited upon the same subject. The case of Carpenter v. Turrell is criticised by the New York courts, in Holyoke v. Adams, 10 N. B. R. 270, in which, under similar circumstances, it was held that the discharge in bankruptcy would not prevent judgment being recovered, and the sureties upon the bond being bound therefor. Motion was made in this case for a stay of proceedings, and the court held that the execution and delivery of the undertaking in attachment, was in legal contemplation a continuation of the attachment proceedings. "The propriety of this is apparent from the obligation assumed by the sureties, which is to pay any judgment that may be recovered in the action, the sureties thus agreeing to do exactly what the property seized would do when applied, viz. pay the judgment obtained, and also from the presumption that the property levied upon would have remained in statu quo until the judgment was recovered, if the undertaking had not been given." The case was carried through the special and general terms of the supreme court, and finally to the court of appeals, the opinion of which is published in 59 N. Y. 233. It is but just to say, however, that the question was not directly passed upon by the court of appeals. The supreme court of New Hampshire, in Zollar v. Janvrin, 49 N. H. 114, indicated a very decided opinion in the same direction, although the case went off upon another point. The court observes: "It would seem to be beyond doubt, that if it be the policy of the law to protect such securities, its protection should also be extended to the case where, for the benefit of the debtors, the lien of an attachment is only dissolved by the substitution of another security." In my opinion these cases enunciate the sounder principle. It was the obvious intent of the legislature to preserve the lien of attachments acquired more than four months before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, as well as to annul writs thereafter issued; and we are bound to give effect to this intention, even if, in so doing, we depart from the letter of other general provisions of the statute in sections 5106 and 5119 relative to discharges.

In Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 623, it is said: "But it is among the elementary principles with regard to the construction of statutes, that every section, provision, and clause of a statute shall be expounded by a reference to every other, and if possible, every clause and provision shall avail and have the effect contemplated by the legislature. One portion of a statute should not be construed to annul and destroy what has been clearly granted by another. The most general and absolute terms of one section may be qualified and limited by conditions and exceptions contained in another, so that all may stand together." This language was used by the court in an endeavor to harmonize two apparently conflicting provisions of the bankrupt act of 1841, similar to these; one of which declared that a discharge should be deemed a full and complete discharge of all debts provable under the act; and the other of which provided that nothing in the act contained should be construed to annul, destroy, or impair any liens. The language seems to me pertinent to the case under consideration. See, also, Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 4 Gill. & J. 1152; Brown v. Somerville, 8 Md. 444; Jackson v. Collins, 3 Cow. 89. I deem it inconsistent with the general purpose of the act to hold that the lien of a creditor, lawfully acquired by his diligence, shall be lost by the debtor giving a bond to saury the judgment, an action entirely beyond the control of the creditor, and one which was designed to secure, not to defeat, the ultimate payment of his debt. The bankrupt law has wisely interposed to protect the property of an insolvent debtor from being swallowed up by attachments issued upon the eve of bankruptcy, but has not interfered with liens acquired in the ordinary course of business, and before insolvency is threatened. But under the construction given by the Massachusetts courts, the preference of the attaching creditor is lost, if the debtor is sufficiently responsible to obtain a bond, while it is preserved, if his situation is so desperate as to make the release of the property impossible. Subsequent cases in the same court indicate the serious consequences likely to follow the practical enforcement of this doctrine. In Hamilton v. Bryant, 14 N. B. R. 479, 114 Mass. 543, the bond in attachment was not given until the adjudication in bankruptcy, and two years after the commencement of suit; and yet the court held the plaintiff was not entitled to a special judgment against the defendant and sureties. Braley v. Boomer, 12 N. B. R. 303, 116 Mass. 527; Johnson v. Collins, 12 N. B. R. 70, 117 Mass. 343. From this, then, it results that any attachment lien existing on the property of the bankrupt at the time of filing the petition, may be defeated by any person interested adversely to such lien (as, for instance, another creditor or the assignee) giving a bond in the name of the defendant, with sureties, to pay the judgment; in other words, securing the debt by a bond which can never be made available itself, and which destroys the security the plaintiff already had. A more complete subversion of the legislative intent can scarcely be imagined. I think the language used in section 5044 should be construed to qualify the general provisions of the later sections with regard to discharges. It may be the assignee is entitled to a temporary stay of proceedings until the question of a discharge is determined, to enable him to appear, plead the discharge, and raise the question in the state court; but as the petition was not framed upon that basis, and the suggestion was not made upon the argument, it is unnecessary to pass upon this question. The petition must be denied without prejudice.

ALBREE et al. v. JOHNSON.

[1 Flip. 341; 6 Chi. Leg. News, 296.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. April Term, 1874.

HUSBAND AND WIFE — ACTION AGAINST WIFE — JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT — VACATION — CORRECTION BY WRIT OF ERROR CORAM NOBIS.

1. Defendant moved to set aside judgment taken on a promissory note, on the ground that the maker of the note was at the beginning of the suit a married woman: Held, that the fact of coverture at the commencement of the suit and entry of judgment are questions of fact, and that a writ of error coram nobis will lie.
2. That on motion and affidavits the same may be reversed and set aside at any time during the coverture and before the satisfaction of the judgment.
3. Coram nobis in cases of coverture to set aside irregular judgments against married women—motion in place of the writ less expensive, and the more modern practice. The appropriate use of the writ of error coram nobis is to enable a court to correct its own errors.
4. To give jurisdiction against a married woman in a suit at law, her liability must appear in the proceedings affirmatively, and will not be inferred.
5. In equity her separate property may be reached, and she may be charged, but at law she cannot confess judgment, and judgment by default may be set aside.

and set aside judgment, with application for writ of error coram nobis. Motion granted.]

WELKER, District Judge. This was an action of assumpsit commenced by the plaintiffs against the defendant, on the 16th day of September, A. D. 1868, upon a certain promissory note. The declaration alleges "that whereas the said Maria E. Johnson, wife of one W. S. Johnson, by the said W. S. Johnson, her agent, for that purpose duly authorized, on the 7th day of October, 1867, at Pittsburgh, Pa., made her promissory note in writing, and delivered the same to the said George Albree & Son, and thereby promised to pay to the order of the said George Albree & Son, the sum of $776.56 one day after the date thereof," and alleging promise to pay, and that it was not paid. At the September term, 1868, of this court, judgment was rendered on default against the defendant for the sum of $826.35, and costs of suit. Execution was issued on the judgment on the — day of —, A. D. 1874, and placed in the hands of the marshal for service. On the 25th day of October, 1874, William S. Johnson and the above-named Maria E. Johnson filed a motion in this court for a stay of execution and to set aside the judgment, and for grounds of their motion allege and state that when the said action was commenced against the said Maria E. Johnson, and at the time when judgment was so rendered against her, she was, and ever since has been and still is, the lawful wife of the said William S. Johnson; and that the said Maria E. Johnson, so being a married woman at the time of the commencement of the action and rendition of judgment, the judgment so rendered against her was without authority of law, and was and is irregular, unauthorized and void. The motion is supported by affidavits showing that the defendant, at the time this suit was commenced, and judgment rendered, was and now is a married woman, the wife of William S. Johnson, who joins her in this motion. The said Maria E. Johnson, with her husband, also at the same time presents an application for the allowance of a writ of error coram nobis, and assigns for error in fact, that she was a married woman at the time of the commencement of this suit and rendition of judgment, and asks, if said motion be overruled, that a writ of error be allowed on her application, and the reversal of the judgment for the reasons aforesaid by this court.

The first question that arises in the consideration of this motion and application, is: Did the coverture of the defendant, Maria E. Johnson, at the time this suit was commenced and judgment rendered, constitute an error in fact, so as to entitle her to a writ of error coram nobis to reverse the judgment rendered by default? Generally errors in fact are such as affect the judgment and do not appear upon the record.

The record in this case nowhere shows that the defendant was a married woman at the time suit was commenced and judgment rendered. It is a fact brought to the notice of the court in this motion by affidavits. The declaration does state that at the time she executed the note sued upon, she was the wife of one W. S. Johnson. The note is dated the 23d of October, 1867, nearly a year before the commencement of suit. The judgment is a personal one against her as though she were a femme sole. It is laid down in many authorities, that among the errors in fact for which error coram nobis lies, are: 1st—The death of one of the parties at the commencement of the suit; the appearance of an infant in a personal action by an attorney, and not by guardian; the coverture of either party at the commencement of the suit when her husband is not joined with her. Bouvier's Dictionary, [Vol. II.] 664, and the authorities there cited. Again, in Pickett's Heirs v. Legerwood, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 148, it is said: "The cases for error coram nobis are enumerated without any material variation in all the books of practice, and rest on the authority of the sages and the fathers of the law. I will refer to the pages of Archbold for the following enumerations: "Error in the process or through default of the clerk; error in fact, as where the defendant, being under age, sued by attorney in any other action but ejectment; that either plaintiff or defendant was a married woman at the commencement of the suit, or died before verdict or interlocutory judgment, and the like." In the case of Dows v. Harper, 6 Ohio, 520, it is said: "The supreme court being our highest judicial tribunal, no other court can examine its proceedings, and if the writ of error coram nobis resident is refused in our practice, wrongs resulting from the errors in fact of this court would remain without redress. The supreme court of New York has adopted the like practice. [Dewitt v. Post,] 11 Johns. 460." In this case the error in fact assigned was the death of Payne, one of the plaintiffs, before judgment; and the writ was allowed. In Brock. 162, [Strode v. The Stafford Justices, Case No. 13,537,] Chief Justice Marshall, in a case where the defendant died before judgment, in the circuit court of the United States, in the district of Virginia, after some fourteen years had elapsed, allowed a writ of error coram nobis, to reverse the judgment, on the petition of defendant's administrator, for this alleged error in fact; and on the hearing reversed the judgment for that error. In Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 337, it was decided, that the circuit court, on motion, may set aside a judgment of a former term, on default of a defendant who had no notice of the action, holding the judgment merely void, and that the court had power summarily to declare it inoperative and stop proceedings under it. These authorities, it seems to me, clearly show that errors in fact can be reviewed on writ of error coram nobis; and that among the errors of fact against which relief will be granted is coverture of the defendant at the time of judgment.

Can the same thing be effected by a motion for that purpose, supported by affidavits? In 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 148, already referred to, the supreme court say: "It cannot be questioned that the appropriate use of the writ of error, coram nobis, is to enable a court to correct its own errors; those errors which precede the judgment. In practice, the same end is now generally attained by motion, sustained, if the case require it, by affidavit." It will be remembered that in this case the court enumerated the errors in fact for which error coram nobis would lie, and among them that the defendant was a married woman, etc. In 14 How. [55 U. S.] 346, referred to above, the court say, in relation to the practice of the court: "It is believed to be the settled modern practice, that in all instances in which irregularities could formerly be corrected upon a writ of error coram nobis, or audita querela, the same object may be effected by motion to the court as a mode more simple, more expeditious and less fruitful of difficulty and expense." In this case, the court also say: "In this case the cause was still under the control and correction of the court for the enforcement of its judgment, and the supervision of its own process; and in the exercise of this function, it was competent for it to look back upon the entire progress of the case up to the writ and indorsements thereon, under the rule already stated as applicable to judgments by default, and to correct any irregularities which might be detected." These cases in the federal courts seem to settle that errors in fact may be reached as well by motion as by writ of error coram nobis.

Let us now examine whether a personal judgment can be sustained against a married woman. There is no claim that this judgment is anything but a personal judgment, although it is attempted under it to reach defendant's individual property to satisfy it. This is important as bearing upon the point raised by counsel for the plaintiffs, that a judgment by default should not be set aside unless a good defense is made out for the defendant, as well as with reference to the validity of the judgment rendered against the defendant, then being a married woman. In Swan's Practice, (page 111,) in a note, it is said: "A married woman is not, in general, competent to enter into contracts so as to render her liable to a personal decree or judgment." In Watkins v. Abrahams, 24 N. Y. 76, it is said: "I do not understand that a personal judgment can be entered against a femme covert by confession. There are good reasons why this cannot be done. In the first place, the common law courts in England and this country do not allow a judgment in personam to be given against a femme covert. It has been so long and well settled that such a judgment could not be rendered against her, that it has been held erroneous, and such judgments invariably have been set aside on motion." In the case of Swayne v. Lyon, 67 Pa. St. 436, the court say: "An erroneous judgment upon a bad declaration collaterally may be a valid judgment—the declaration showing no legal cause of action whatever. But I apprehend that cannot be as against a married woman. Every judgment against her which does not show on its face her liability, is a void judgment. This is the principle of Caldwell v. Walters, 6 Harris, [18 Pa. St.] 79." In Griffith v. Clarke, 18 Md. 457, it is decided that "a promissory note signed by a femme covert cannot be enforced against her by any proceeding at law. A judgment by default against her, when sued at law, is a nullity." In Morse v. Toppan, 3 Gray, 411, a judgment was rendered against the defendant, a married woman, by default. In a suit on the judgment afterward brought, Chief Justice Parsons said: "The fact that the defendant was a married woman when the judgment was rendered against her, would alone be a good bar to this action. It would be the same as if she had entered into an obligation by bond at the same time, to which she might have pleaded non est factum. A judgment is in the nature of a contract—it is a specialty, and creates a debt, and, to have that effect, it must be taken against one capable of contracting a debt." In Kerr on Frauds, (page 148,) it is stated: "At law, a married woman is under an absolute incapacity to bind herself by any agreement. Her separate existence is not contemplated, but is merged by the coverture in that of her husband. But in equity, the case is wholly different. Her separate existence, both as regards her liabilities and her rights, is acknowledged in equity to the extent of the property she enjoys for her separate use. In respect to such property, she is capable of disposition and doing other acts as if she were a femme sole." In the case of Phillips v. Graves, 20 Ohio St. 371, the supreme court of Ohio review fully the rights and liabilities of married women at common law, as well as under our statutes. The suit was brought against the wife, joining her husband therein, upon a written contract signed by the wife alone for the purchase of a piano, and the petition alleged and set forth that she had separate property, and intended by the contract to charge that for the payment of the piano so purchased for her separate use. It was a proceeding in equity. In delivering the opinion, the court say: "Thus, a strange anomaly exists in English and American jurisprudence. Courts of law and courts of equity co-exist in the same realm; the former merging the legal existence of the wife in the husband; the latter recognizing her separate existence; the former declaring her incapable of acquiring, holding, or disposing of property; the latter recognizing her ability to acquire, control, and dispose of her estate; the former denying her capacity to contract, or to sue or to be sued; the latter enforcing her agreement by granting relief both for and against her." Again: "While the judge declares her contracts absolutely void, the chancellor proceeds in rem, and charges her separate estate as equity and good conscience may require." In reference to our statutes, "in relation to the rights and liabilities of married women," the court further say: "These statutes do not, nor were they intended to, abridge the powers, or restrain or limit the jurisdiction of courts of equity in relation to the separate estates of married women; but, on the other hand, they do enlarge the jurisdiction of the chancellor, in so far as the general property of married women is charged, by the force of these statutes, to separate property. The legislative intention was to change the legal status of married women, and declare their legal rights and liabilities." This case also settles that the proper remedy to reach the separate property of married women for their liabilities is by proceedings in equity. It is claimed by the plaintiffs that under the Ohio statutes, in force at the commencement of this suit, a married woman was liable to be sued for her contracts, the same as if femme sole; and I am cited to the second section of the act "concerning the rights and liabilities of married women," as conferring the right to sue and be sued. This section provides that under certain circumstances, on application to the court of common pleas, the court may, by an order or judgment, invest her with that power. The declaration in this case does not aver that any such proceedings were had. In the absence of such averment, the court cannot presume such proceedings. To give jurisdiction against a married woman in a suit at law, her liability to be such must appear in the proceedings affirmatively, and will not be inferred. I have examined the authorities cited by counsel for the plaintiffs, and find that they do not materially conflict with those bearing upon the questions involved in this case already alluded to. Most of them are upon the point that judgment will not be disturbed on motion at a subsequent term of the court. But they are in cases where service was properly made, and no disabilities of the defendants alleged as a ground for the motion. On a careful review of the authorities, giving them such examination as seemed to be necessary to fully understand the principles decided by them, I have arrived at the following conclusions:

1st—That the coverture of the defendant at the commencement of this suit, and rendition of judgment herein, is a question of fact that might be remedied by writ of error coram nobis, and same reversed on such writ.

2d—That the same end can be attained by a motion supported by affidavits, at any time before the satisfaction of the judgment, and during existence of the coverture.

3d—The defendant, Maria E. Johnson, on the showing made on the motion, is entitled to have the execution issued upon the judgment set aside, and also the judgment rendered against her on default set aside, and be let in to defend the action; and I direct the order to be accordingly entered.

Case No. 147.

ALBRIGHT v. CELLULOID HARNESS-TRIMMING CO.

SAME v. SAME.

[2 Ban. & A. 629; 12 O. G. 227; Merw. Pat. Inv. 254.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. June, 1877.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — REISSUE — ANTICIPATION—INFRINGEMENT—EXPERIMENTAL USE.

1. It is not necessary that a reissue should embrace everything found in the original, since the prohibition of the act is limited to the adding of new matter to the specifications.

2. There is no obligation upon the patentee to claim all things in the reissue which were claimed in the original invention.

3. On the question of originality, mere experiments never put to practical use, are not anticipations.

[See Aiken v. Dolan, Case No. 110.]

4. He is the first inventor and entitled to the patent, who, being an original discoverer, has first perfected and adapted the invention to actual use.

5. An experimental making and user of a patented article is a technical infringement.

6. Reissued letters patent No. 5,155, granted to complainant, November 26th, 1872, for improvement in dies for finishing rubber-coated harness mountings, held valid.

In equity.

J. C. Clayton, for complainant.

A. S. Hubbell, for defendants.

NIXON, District Judge. There are several suits pending between these parties, and I will first consider the case which was denominated "No. 1" on the argument, and which has been brought against the defendant corporation for infringing certain letters patent, numbered 5,155, for "Improvement in the manufacture of rubber-coated harness-trimmings," being a reissue to the complainant, of the date of November 26th, 1872, the original patent having been granted February 13th, 1872, and antedated January 27th, 1872.¹ The only claim of the reissue is for the dies, a tool adapted to do a particular work, and the complainant states in his schedule to the reissue, that his invention consists in making and using a pair of dies for pressing, finishing, polishing and trimming the edges of the vulcanized coating of harness-trimmings, such as rings, buckles, terrets, hooks and like articles. The answer of the defendant substantially denies the infringement, and that the complainant was the original and first inventor of the dies described in the reissue, or any material part thereof, alleging that the same was used by a number of persons, whose names and places of business are set forth. It further alleges that the thing patented had been described in printed publications prior to complainant's alleged discovery or invention, and more particularly in a number of English and American patents therein enumerated; that the same had been in public use, or on sale, in this country for more than two years before the complainant made application for his original letters patent; and, also, that the reissue was not for the same invention as was fully described in the original patent. Such grounds of defence necessarily involve the construction of complainant's invention; and in order to construe it intelligently, we must first examine the original patent, including the specifications, drawings, etc., and ascertain, if we can, what the patentee discloses and claims therein to be his invention; then look at the reissue to see whether any other or different invention is set up; and next consider the state of the art at the date of the patent to learn from thence what the patentee is entitled to claim as his own.

The case, as prepared and ably argued by the counsel, covers a very extensive field of investigation, and, having given to it the care and attention which its importance to the parties seems to demand, we shall proceed to briefly state our conclusions, rather than the processes of reasoning by which they have been reached. In the specifications of the patent, the patentee states, that his invention consists of making a pair of dies for pressing, polishing and trimming the edges of the rubber coating of harness-trimmings, so as to imitate stitching, and to finish each article without hand-labor. In other words, he proposes with an instrument or tool to do an old thing in a new and better way. He was not the first to use dies in the manufacture of rings, buckles, terrets or other harness-mountings, nor the first to imitate leather stitching on rubber-coated articles, nor the first to densify and polish with dies plastic compositions, surrounding a metal core, by heat and pressure. Numerous English and American patents—as, notably, the patent to Thomas Deakin, December 22d, 1842, for the use of metallic dies to receive the metal skeleton; the English patent to Newton, September 4th, 1851, and to Moses Poole, March 28th, 1853, for the Good-year invention of applying india-rubber compositions in making and finishing parts of harness; the patent to William Green, August 6th, 1857, in regard to imitation stitching; and the American patent to Welling, dated April 28th, 1862, for pressing and solidifying the mass of any plastic composition around an iron ring by means of dies—reveal methods of separately accomplishing those different results.

The operation of the invention is simple. A metal ring, buckle or other article is coated with the rubber and placed in one of the dies, and the other die is pressed down upon it. The dies, or the article itself, are moderately heated, so that the pressure of the polished dies will polish or finish the article. The dies are beveled off at a and c of Fig. 2 of the drawings, so as to form sharp edges. These edges a cut off the waste at the inner side of the ring, while the edges c cut off the waste on the outer side. In this way the act of pressing together the dies polishes, trims and finishes each article in the best and quickest manner. e shows the indented lines, which produce an imitation of stitches. The dies touch each other x, y, and z, so that they cannot crush the article placed in them. The claim of the patent in the original is for—"The construction and operation of the dies A and B with cutting-edges a and c, substantially as described, for finishing rubber-coated harness-mountings."

On the 26th of November, 1872, the patent was reissued in two divisions, as is expressly authorized by section 4916 of the Revised Statutes. Of these Division A, numbered 5,155, was for the dies, and Division B, numbered 5,156, for the process of manufacturing metallic harness-trimmings covered with rubber or other known vulcanizable gum. Suit No. 1 was brought for infringement of the reissue No. 5,155. A comparison of the specifications, drawings and claims fails to show that any new matter has been introduced into the reissue which did not appear in the original patent. It is true that Division A does not embrace everything which is found in the original; but it is not necessary that it should, since the prohibition of the act is limited to the adding of new matter to the specifications, and there is no obligation upon the patentee to claim all things in the reissue which were claimed in the original invention. Carver v. Braintree-Manuf'g Co., [Case No. 2,485.] Of what, then, does the invention consist as described in the reissue? We have a die in two parts, so constructed as to press, solidify, polish and trim the edges of a partially made ring with an iron core, and to impart to it by a single operation the desired form, rib and imitation stitch, and at the same time separating the waste material from the article. It embodies the following features: (1) A central cavity for the body of the article to be formed; (2) a recess surrounding the cavity in which to form a projecting rib adapted to receive ornamentation; (3) provision, by grooves, for the escape of the surplus material; (4) cutting or defining edges to separate the surplus material on the inner and outer edges of the article; (5) concentric recesses to receive the waste; and (6) bearing-surfaces to determine the thickness of the finished article, and to prevent crushing the same. Whether this is a new device or not, does not depend upon the question whether the separate instrumentalities are new, but rather upon the question whether any new and useful result is produced by their combination. The evidence seems to be, that the complainant, who is also the patentee, has been able, by the use of this die, to bring upon the market a better article of rubber-coated harness-trimming, with less labor and expense, than had before been produced. Before its introduction, the workmen were in the habit of placing the soft rubber around the metal core, and, as a preliminary step, of putting it through the process of vulcanization, after which the article was trimmed, polished and finished by hand, and the stitches marked thereon with the sharp-pointed wheel. These separate and laborious methods have been superseded by the complainant's invention. Not much time need be spent upon the inquiry whether the defendant corporation has infringed.

At complainant's request they produced a pair of finishing-dies, such as they used in the manufacture of celluloid-coated harness trimmings, and the same has been marked complainant's Exhibit No. 12. Complainant's Exhibit No. 7 was put in to show the die described and claimed in reissue No. 5,155, and the question is whether the use of the former is an infringement of the characteristic devices of the latter. Their features of resemblance are more numerous than their features of dissimilarity. Even where they are not identical in form, they seem to be so in function. For instance, the sharp cutting-edges described and appearing in Exhibit No. 7, are not described and do not appear in Exhibit No. 12. Their absence, and the substitution in their place by the defendants of the broad bearing-surfaces, was largely commented upon by their counsel on the argument, and it was assumed that such a change effected a substantial difference in the mode of operation of the two dies; but actual experiments shown do not sustain the assumption. It was found that the dividing-ridge in Exhibit 12—the defendant's die—through bearing-surfaces, acted also as cut-offs of the surplus material, and produced substantially the same result at the sharper cutting-edges of Exhibit 7—the complainant's die. A thicker fin was ordinarily left on the outer rim of the article pressed in the one case than in the other, and where a coating material was used less dense than the hard rubber, such as celluloid, it seems that the broad bearing-surface insured a better finish than the cutting-edges, by holding more of the material within the dies for solidification and polish; but the construction and mode of operation of the two dies are so substantially alike that the use of Exhibit No. 12 must be held to be an infringement of Exhibit No. 7.

Nothing was brought forward in the case which casts serious doubts upon the originality of the complainant's patent, except the Sturgis die, Exhibit No. 18, produced by the complainant. Mr. Sturgis says that, in the spring or summer of 1865, he made a pair of dies to press up a composition with which he wished to coat an iron buckle to imitate the stitched leather buckle. He pressed up different compositions, experimenting with leather and paper and cloth. He never made any quantity, or ever put any on the market, "being a mere matter of experimenting." It does not appear that these experiments were successful, as he testifies that he abandoned them and laid the dies away upon the shelf in his shop, where they remained until they were brought out for the purpose of defence in this case. He did not perfect or adopt his invention, if he made one, to successful use. His dies were first made as molds or stuffing-boxes, with holes at the back, through which he forced the composition around the iron frame previously placed in the die. That mode did not work successfully, as the tendency was for the composition to force the iron frame out of place. He then closed up the openings with solder, and, instead of forcing in the composition, he placed it above and below the iron frame before the die was closed. He experimented alone about a couple of months, and pressed up, with these different materials, probably a half-gross of buckles. He fails everywhere in his testimony to indicate that he regarded his device, whether used as a stuffing-box or a die, as of any practical value, and he ceased for years all efforts to make it successful. Under these circumstances what he did must be put in the category of abandoned experiments. "He is the first inventor," says the supreme court in Whiteley v. Swayne, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 685, "and entitled to the patent, who, being an original discoverer, has first perfected and adapted the invention to actual use." Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 477; Washburn v. Gould, [Case No. 17,214;] Parham v. American Button Hole, etc., Co., [Id. 10,713;] The Corn-Planter Patent, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 181. Let a decree be entered in case No. 1 for an injunction and account, according to the prayer of the bill of complaint.

It is not necessary to make any extended reference to case No. 2. The suit is brought for the infringement of letters patent No. 137,373, issued to the complainant April 15, 1873, for "improvements in the manufacture of rubber-coated harness-trimmings." The patentee says in the specification that the nature of his invention consists in the formation of a die constructed of two or more pieces for stamping and finishing harness or carriage trimmings, when a metallic body is covered with suitably prepared rubber or other equivalent substances, without having any refuse or surplus material in the die when the process is done, and he alleges that it is an improvement on the patent issued to him February 13th, 1872, and reissued in two divisions, November 26th, 1872. His claim is for "the die A B, constructed substantially as described, for pressing and finishing composition-coated harness or carriage trimmings without leaving any refuse material in them, as set forth." The improvement, therefore, consists in a die that finishes and polishes the coated article with no provision for waste or surplus material. Have the defendants infringed by making or using such a die? They admit in their answer that subsequent to the date of the said letters patent No. 137,873, among other experiments made or caused to be made at their factory in Newark, in the course of perfecting their manufacture of harness-trimmings coated with celluloid, they tried dies of substantially the form and construction, and having the same operation described in said letters patent; but such use was only experimental, and the said experiments demonstrated the fact that harness-trimmings coated with celluloid cannot be manufactured in dies thus constructed, and that they accordingly abandoned the experiment.

It should be said, in justice to the candor and frankness of the defendant corporation, that this admission on their part is quite as full as the complainant's proofs. Their superintendent, Lockwood, says that prior to July, 1874, he saw in their factory a die similar to Exhibit No. 8, which it is admitted was constructed according to the patent under consideration, and the complainant, Albright, testified that he visited the defendants' rooms in Newark, in October or November, 1873, and saw there one large oval brace-buckle die and one or two ring-dies constructed on the plan of Exhibit No. 8, and also buckles and rings, which, from their general appearance, he believed had been pressed in these dies. That seems to be the extent of the testimony as to the making and using the dies. It is a technical infringement, and is sufficient to authorize an injunction restraining their future use; but no reference will be ordered, as no damage or profits have been shown or suggested.

[NOTE. Patent No. 137,873 was granted April 15, 1873, and, so far as ascertained, was not involved in any reported cases, other than the above prior to 1880. Patent No. 123,603 was granted February 13, 1872, to A. Albright, and was referred to in Albright v. Teas, 23 O. G. 829. This patent was reissued November 26, 1872, No. 5,155.]

SALVAGE—ANCHOR SERVICE—GETTING SHIP OFF SHOAL—AMOUNT OF AWARD.

[1. Where a salvor employs two other vessels to assist in getting a ship off a shoal by carrying out anchors, when their help is not in fact necessary, the award should not be greater than it would be if one vessel had rendered the whole service.]

[2. Where a ship worth $20,000 is aground in a perilous position, and employs a schooner to carry out her anchors, and by that means gets safely off, an award of $2,500 to the salvors is suitable.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Simeon Shaw and others against the ship Albus and cargo for salvage. Decree for libellants.]

Winer Bethel, for libellants.

W. W. McCall, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This ship, laden with ice, bound to New Orleans, ran ashore upon the American shoal. At 8 o'clock in the morning the schooner Florida arrived at the ship, and was employed by the master to aid in getting her off. The ship was among shoals, touching slightly, but did not need lightening. She needed an anchor, or perhaps two carried out. The Florida dropped her anchor of about one thousand pounds' weight, and ran her chain and hawser to the ship. The Florida failing to get the ship off by twelve o'clock, and it being high water, the Texas and Jane Eliza were also employed. The Texas dropped her heavy anchor, and by the use of the two anchors the ship was heaved off by about three o'clock. The service rendered was purely anchor service, but highly valuable and meritorious. It is doubtful whether the master, in this case, could have run out his anchors, and saved his vessel. But although the employment of the Texas and Jane Eliza was, under the circumstances, very proper, yet still, I think, had the master of the Florida made his plans a little better, that probably he could have extricated the ship without the assistance of the other vessels. Although there is some doubt, yet I think one vessel was enough for the service. The ship was in considerable peril. She may be valued at $20,000. Twenty-five hundred dollars is a suitable compensation.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the libellants receive and recover in full compensation for their services the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars and their costs and expenses of this suit, the proctor's fee for defending the said ship and cargo and other charges; and that the marshal restore said ship to the master for and on account of whom it may concern.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PATENTABILITY—COMBINATION—AGGREGATION.

The letters patent granted to J. Wesley Webber, August 17th, 1869, [No. 93,775,] for an "improved kindling wood," the claim thereof being, "The accompanying or fastening one or more fire-lighters, A, to or with the bundle of the common article of manufacture known as bundle or kindling wood, the fire-lighter to be suitably moulded or pressed, and to be made of a combustible material, such as resin or tar, the ingredients of which I do not claim, my invention consisting wholly of accompanying or fastening a fire-lighter, A, to or with the bundle, or at the string, B, of the bundle of the common article of manufacture known as bundle or kindling wood," are void for want of patentable invention.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. On the 17th of August, 1869, letters patent of the United States were granted to J. Wesley Webber for "a new and useful improved kindling wood." The specification states, that the invention is "a new improvement, consisting of accompanying or fastening one or more fire-lighters to each bundle of the common article of manufacture known as 'bundle or kindling wood,' (see drawing marked 'C,') having for its object, to facilitate the lighting or ignition, by means of the said fire-lighter, of wood, thus saving the consumer the labor of chopping the wood in fine pieces." It further states, that the nature of the "invention or improvement consists in accompanying or fastening one or more fire-lighters, A, in a suitable manner, or to the string of the bundle of the common article of manufacture known as bundle or kindling wood, marked 'C,' in the accompanying drawing." The claim is in these words: "The accompanying or fastening one or more fire-lighters, A, to or with the bundle of the common article of manufacture known as bundle or kindling wood, the fire-lighter to be suitably moulded or pressed, and to be made of a combustible material, such as resin or tar, the ingredients of which I do not claim, my invention consisting wholly of accompanying or fastening a fire-lighter, A, to or with the bundle, or at the string, B, of the bundle of the common article of manufacture known as bundle or kindling wood." The drawing represents a cylindrical bundle of kindling wood, consisting of some 50 pieces of substantially uniform length, confined by a string tied around the circumference, and with a fire-lighter fastened to the string. The plaintiffs, as owners of the patent, have filed a bill in equity against the defendant, founded on an alleged infringement of the patent, for an injunction and an account. The defendant has answered the bill. The answer avers, that the defendant is making and selling bundle kindling wood, and that he puts into each bundle so made and sold by him, a kindler made under letters patent of the United States granted to Frederick D. Cordes and Andre Geiger, October 31st, 1876, for an "improvement in fire kindlers." It also alleges, that the invention patented was not in fact patentable, or the subject-matter of invention. The Cordes and Geiger patent is for an invention made by Cordes, which consists in making the fire kindler "of a bundle of parallel pieces of straw, or other tubular palms, which are filled and covered with melted resin, pitch, or other easily combustible material." The defendant inserts his kindler in the bundle, either next the string or in the body. The plaintiffs now apply to the court for a preliminary injunction, to restrain the defendant from infringing the Webber patent, by further making and selling what he has so made and sold.

In April, 1875, James Carrick & Co., being the owners of the said Webber patent for the city and county of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, brought a suit in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland, against James A. Hooper, Jr., alleging that said Hooper had infringed said patent by making and selling bundles of kindling wood with fire-lighters, arranged in the manner claimed in said patent, and praying relief. In May, 1875, the defendant answered the bill, setting up, as the only defence, non-infringement. An amended answer was filed in November, 1876, denying the novelty of the invention, and giving the names of prior users of it, and averring its public use and sale in this country for more than two years prior to Webber's application for a patent for it, and denying infringement. Neither answer set up that the invention was not patentable, or the subject-matter of invention. The court, on January 7th, 1878, entered a decree for the plaintiffs, for an account of profits and damages, and made a reference to a master to take such account. [Carrick v. Hooper, Case No. 2,411a.] The decree declared the patent to be good and valid, and awarded a perpetual injunction. The master, by his report, made March 25th, 1878, after hearing evidence, and being attended by both parties, reported, that the defendant had made no profit from his business of selling bundle kindling wood, but had incurred a loss in conducting the same; that he had carried on the business of selling bundle kindling wood in Baltimore city, and had made three kinds, namely, (1) plain, (2) dipped, and (3) with a fire-lighter inserted in the bundle; that the plain was not claimed to be an infringement; that he had made 100,000 bundles of No. 2, and 50,000 of No. 3; that it appeared that the royalty paid in New York by those doing business under the Webber patent, was 5 cents per 100 bundles; that that was a proper sum to allow for a royalty in Baltimore; that, if the court should find No. 2 to be an infringement, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover $50 therefor; and that if the court should find No. 3 to be an infringement the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover $25 therefor. On the 18th of May, 1878, the court made an order that the report assessing the damages at $75 be confirmed, with costs.

It is shown, on the part of the plaintiffs in this case, that Alcott, one of the plaintiffs in this case, has been receiving royalty for the use of the invention for more than 4 years; and that Alcott's firm made and sold, in 1875, an average of more than 20,000 bundles a week, of bundle kindling wood made under the Webber patent. The advantages of it are set forth to be, that it can be kindled without shavings or paper; that it saves the necessity of splitting any of the wood fine; that it is convenient and economical, as it furnishes the appropriate amount of kindler to each separate bundle; that it is always ready and only requires a match to kindle it; that, since its introduction, it has been very difficult to sell the ordinary bundle kindling wood to those who have used the kindling wood with the fire-lighter in the bundle; and that, when the wood is sold without the fire-lighter, it can only be sold at a considerably less price than the bundles made under the Webber patent.

The specification of the Webber patent states, that the invention consists merely in fastening the fire-lighter to the bundle of kindling wood, or accompanying the bundle of kindling wood with the fire-lighter. It refers to the bundle of kindling wood as a common article of manufacture. Nothing is claimed as new in regard to the construction, or composition, or shape, or manufacture of the fire-lighter. Any old fire-lighter may be used as the fire-lighter of the patent. The ingredients of the fire-lighter are disclaimed. All that is necessary, in respect to the fire-lighter, is, that it should be suitably moulded or pressed, and be combustible and capable of setting fire to the wood.

I do not think that the subject-matter of the claim is a patentable invention. On the part of the plaintiffs, it is sought to distinguish this case from cases in which inventions have been held not to be patentable, by the contention, that, in this case, the uniting of the fire-lighter with the bundle of kindling wood contributes towards the common result of lighting a fire, and that expense is saved and convenience is promoted. It may be true, that, as a matter of trade, a bundle of kindling wood with a fire-lighter inserted in it, or attached to it, will sell more readily than a bundle of kindling wood alone, or than a bundle of kindling wood separately and a fire-lighter separately; and that a bundle of kindling wood with a fire-lighter inserted in it, or attached to it, will bring a higher price than a simple bundle of kindling wood. It may also be true, that the Webber bundle has the advantages in use that are claimed for it. But, there is no patentable invention in accompanying the bundle with the kindler, by attachment or insertion. It might as well be claimed, that it was a patentable invention to tie a match to a cigar, or a straw for drinking to a drinking glass, or a fork to a can of food. The case is not unlike that of Langdon v. De Groot, [Case No. 8,059,] where the claim of the patent consisted in folding thread and cotton into skeins or hanks of a convenient quantity for retailing, with a sealed wrapper around the same, and a label containing the number and description of the article. The invention was held not to be patentable. In the present case, the purchaser of the Webber bundle gets a bundle of kindling wood and a fire-lighter. He gets no more than if he purchased the two separately. If he purchases a given number of plain bundles of kindling wood and an equal number of fire-lighters, and has them in his house to be used, one fire-lighter with one bundle of kindling wood, he would infringe this patent, if he should tie the former to the latter or insert the former in the latter. No such result can be admitted. The mere aggregation of the two things is not a patentable combination. Until the kindler is lighted there is no joint result consequent on the aggregation of the two. The lighting or combustion of the Webber kindler presents nothing new, in contrast with the lighting or combustion of a kindler which was never tied to or inserted in the bundle.

It does not appear that the question was distinctly considered in the case in Maryland. There are numerous cases in the courts of the United States which show that there is not a sufficiency of invention in this case to support the patent. Knight v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., [Case No. 7,882;] Bean v. Smallwood, [Id. 1,173;] Winans v. Boston & P. R. Co., [Id. 17,858;] Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 248; Phillips v. Page, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 164;

ADMIRALTY—PLEADING—TECHNICAL PLEADINGS NOT NECESSARY.

1. Where an answer is made without oath, as authorized by rule 57, it should still respond fully and particularly to every material averment of the libel.
2. Mere narrative statements in a libel, which allege no damages, and claim no particular remedy, need not be replied to specifically by answer.
3. Where a libel alleges a particular agreement was made, and a written instrument was executed, and the instrument embodies the substance of such agreement, an admission by the answer of the execution of the instrument is substantially an admission of the contents of the instrument.
4. The practice in admiralty does not exact a course of technical proceedings.
5. If the answer admits, to a reasonable intendment, facts stated in the libel, it will be sufficient, though loose and informal as a pleading.

[In admiralty. Exceptions to answer overruled.]

J. B. Parry, for libellant.
Benedict, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. This case turns upon a point of pleading. A libel was filed in rem, against the brig, and in personam against her owner, on a charter-party. It charges breaches of the charter-party, and prays the respondent and all others in interest may be cited to appear and answer thereto, and that the brig and parties on intervening may be condemned in damages, &c., but did not demand that the answers should be made on oath. The owner appeared, and filed his answer thereto, without oath. This he was authorized to do by the 57th rule of court, which declares that "an answer need not be put in under oath, unless so required by a sworn libel, or one filed by the United States." Betts, Pr. App. 22. Still the answer, if not attested to on oath, should respond particularly and fully to every material averment of the libel. Betts, Adm. 53.

The libellant takes exception to the answer for insufficiency, in two particulars; that it does not admit or deny the agreement set forth in the fourth article of the libel, that the brig should, for one hundred dollars additional compensation, proceed from Cienfuegos to Havana, and there take in cargo; nor that the one hundred dollars was paid by the agent of the libellant, and received by the agent of the respondent, within the terms and intent of the agreement. It is not plain that this branch of the case is any way material to the libellant's right of action, the run from Cienfuegos to Havana not having been stipulated in the charter-party; and admitting a valid contract to perform that voyage as set forth, yet the libel does not specify any damages accruing out of the non-performance of that stipulation, or other cause of action accruing to him by the neglect or refusal of the respondent to fulfil that engagement. It seems rather introduced as a link in the narrative of the operations of the vessel than as a substantive gravamen in the suit against which any relief or remedy was demanded, and in that point of view the statement does not amount to an allegation which requires a specific answer. But if the averment be regarded material and formal, I am inclined to think the answer is substantially sufficient to meet its requirements for the execution, by the respondent's agent, of the written receipt set forth in the libel, and the payment thereof of $100, are both admitted, and the receipt embodies the agreement alleged in the libel. This mode of answering, though informal and loose as a pleading, is a substantial admission of the facts stated in the libel, and sufficient, under the liberal practice of admiralty courts, to give the libellant every advantage he could derive from an answer more technical, and exactly adapted to the representations of the libel. The second exception I think supererogatory. The answer to all reasonable intendment sets forth the fact demanded by the exception. It is quite immaterial that the answer should admit or deny in court that the act charged was done "in pursuance of the agreement." The agreement to do the act, and its performance, are both admitted; and if the libellant's case requires that the performance should be "in pursuance of the agreement," the law will intend it was so. I think, therefore, the exceptions must both be disallowed and overruled with costs, to be taxed.

BANKRUPTCY — SALE OF REALTY BY ASSIGNEE — CONFIRMATION—LIABILITY OF PURCHASER.

[The purchaser of real estate in Illinois from an assignee in bankruptcy in the district of Maine, at a sale ordered by the register in bankruptcy, is not, under the established practice of that district, entitled to a confirmation of the sale by the court wherewith to perfect his title according to the laws of Illinois, but must establish his title whenever the occasion may arise.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Edward Alden for a confirmation by the court of a sale to him by the assignee in bankruptcy of Hiram O. Alden of certain real estate in Illinois, in order to perfect his title according to the laws of that state. Denied.]

Upon the application of the assignee of Hiram O. Alden, bankrupt, the register in charge of said cause, March 24, A. D. 1877, pursuant to 19th rule in bankruptcy of said court, issued to said assignee an order concerning sale of property by assignee, by which said assignee was ordered to sell at public auction certain real estate belonging to said bankrupt's estate, situate in the state of Illinois. Under this order of the court, the assignee advertised said property for sale at public auction in the manner provided by law. Said sale being advertised once a week, for three successive weeks, in the Republican Journal, a newspaper published in Belfast, county of Waldo, in said district of Maine, and being the newspaper regularly designated by the judge of said court for the publication of all notices of proceedings in bankruptcy in Waldo county. At the auction sale of the above premises, pursuant to the aforesaid advertisements, the lands in Illinois were bid off by Mr. Edward Alden, of Boston, who, thereupon, petitioned the court to approve and confirm said sale, and grant him a certificate of such confirmation under the seal of said court, with the view of enabling him, said purchaser, as he alleges, to perfect his title to said premises in accordance with the laws of the state of Illinois and the rules of the courts of said state regulating the transfer of real estate. The register declined to issue such a certificate, and, on application of the petitioner, certified to the court that all the proceedings attending said sale had been regular, and were in accordance with the law and the rules of this court. The court thereupon passed the following order:

FOX, District Judge. The established practice in this district is for the court not to confirm any sales made by an assignee, but to leave the purchaser to establish his title whenever the occasion may arise. Such was the ruling in Donnell's Case, [Case No. 3,986a,] in Cumberland county, and it has ever since been adhered to.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF CLAIM—LIMITATION.

[On a motion to expunge the proof of a claim against a bankrupt from the record, it appeared from the affidavit in the cause that the bankrupt filed his petition December 30, 1842, and was decreed a bankrupt February 21, 1843. The proof of the creditor was filed August, 1843. A dividend of which due notice was given was declared September 26th. The motion to expunge was made January 30, 1844, a dividend having been allowed and paid on the claim. It further appeared that the amount and nature of the claim was incorrectly entered on the books, though the proof itself and the dividend correctly stated it. It was not denied that the debt was a just and valid one. Held, that the motion should be overruled, as the inaccuracy on the record in regard to the claim was not a ground of expunging the proof, and that the statute of limitations did not apply.]

In bankruptcy. This was a motion filed to expunge the proof of Leonard Alden, on the ground that it was barred by the statute of limitations. A preliminary objection was taken to the filing of the motion, upon the ground that the application was too late. It appeared, by the affidavits in the cause, that Francis Alden filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt December 30, 1842, and was decreed bankrupt February 21, 1843. The proof of Leonard Alden was filed August 1, 1843. A dividend was ordered upon his estate September 26th, of which due notice was given; and the motion to expunge the proof was made January 30, 1844, a dividend having been allowed and paid on the respondent's claim.

It further appeared, that before filing the motion to expunge, the counsel for the creditors, objecting to Francis Alden's discharge, at whose request the present motion was made by the assignee, examined the records to ascertain whether a majority in numbers and value of the creditors, who had proved their claims, joined in the objections; and on that examination it appeared that the amount of Leonard Alden's claim was incorrectly entered on the book, though the proof itself and the dividend sheet correctly stated it. The bankrupt, in his original schedule, had stated Leonard Alden's claim to be upon notes, but the claim moved to be expunged was on account. It was not denied that the debt was originally a just and valid claim, but it was contended that it was barred by the statute of limitations, and that, under the circumstances, the motion was not too late.

On the other hand, it was contended, on behalf of Mr. Alden, that the statute of limitations was a technical defence, and that a party who seeks to set it up should be held to comply strictly with the principles under which it was admissible as a bar; that a decree had been rendered allowing this claim, upon due notice, to all parties, which ought not to be reopened, even if the court could, consistently with established principles, reverse the decree; and that it was never known that a judgment was reversed in order to give a party an opportunity to set up the statute of limitations.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, held that, under the ninth rule in bankruptcy, the court might reverse such a decree upon good cause shown, which must be by an application in writing, supported by affidavits setting forth the grounds upon which a revision was sought; that it was a question to the discretion of the court to be governed by the analogies in cases of bills of review in equity, which might be allowed in cases of newly discovered evidence or error on the face of the record; that it did not appear that the assignee had ever examined this claim, or deemed that it was his duty to examine the claims; that no creditor had ever used any diligence before the dividend was ordered; that the inaccuracy upon the record was not the ground of any omission to move to expunge claim before the dividend was ordered; that the statute of limitations might be a conscientious defence under some circumstances, as where a party knew that the debt was paid, but had lost the evidence of payment, it was perfectly conscientious to set up the statute. But in this case, it was not contended that the debt had ever been paid. The creditor had sworn to its validity, the debtor might be examined by the assignee under oath; and in a matter to be adjudged according to the discretion of the court, his honor would not allow the motion to be received, and sustained the objection taken by Leonard Alden, and dismissed the motion with costs.

E. H. Owen, for receivers.

W. E. Curtis, for Alden, petitioning creditor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. As the property in the hands of the receivers of the company must be regarded as being in the possession of the several state courts which appointed such receivers, and as such receivers were appointed and entered on their duties as such, and took possession of the railroads and other property of the company before these proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted, and as thus such state courts were in possession of such railroads and other property when these proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and have continued in possession of the same ever since, it is not for this court to interfere with such possession, at least until the title of the receivers is impeached for some cause for which it is impeachable under the bankrupt act; nor is it for this court, before such title is thus impeached, to interfere with the management or control of such railroads and other property by such state courts or by such receivers under the orders of such state courts. As to the discontinuance of the suit in New York, in which the receivers were appointed, if such discontinuance has the effect to revoke the appointment and authority of the receivers under the proceedings in that suit, then the injunction of this court does not restrain them from doing anything which they are doing by virtue of such appointment, and such injunction need not be vacated or modified. If the discontinuance of such suit does not render null any title which such receiver acquired through the proceedings in such suit, and they are still acting as receivers under the appointment made in the proceedings in such suit, they must be regarded as so acting on behalf of the court in which such suit was pending, and as its agents as to property in its custody, notwithstanding the suit is discontinued. With these views, it is proper that the injunction heretofore issued herein on the third of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, be so far modified that the making and entering by the receivers into the contract, and the giving by them of the securities authorized by the decree of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, made on the twenty-third of December, eighteen hundred and seventy, shall not be deemed or taken to be a violation or contempt of such injunction, and that in all other respects such injunction be continued in force.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INFRINGEMENT — SUBSTANTIAL DIFFERENCE — SUGGESTIONS — ORIGINALITY.

At law. This was an action for an infringement of a patent right for an improvement in scythe snathes. The original patentee was Dexter Peirce, who took out letters patent, March 11th, 1837, (No. 144.) He afterwards assigned his right and interest under these letters patent to several persons, who again assigned to the plaintiffs in the present case. The special improvement, which formed the subject matter of the present suit, was described in the claim as follows: "What I claim as my own invention and not previously known, and desire to secure by letters patent, is my constructing the nib or thole irons and woods, so as by the extension of the iron beyond the wood, with a screw and nut to regulate and fasten the nibs or tholes in any situation desirable on the snead." Before the patent of Peirce, the nibs of scythes had been clumsily fastened to the snathe by means of an iron ring, tightened by wedges. These wedges were easily loosened by the use of the scythe. The defendants manufactured and sold a large number of nibs, which were secured to the snathe by a ring at the end of an iron stem. This stem passed through the wood of the nib, was threaded at the top, and fitted into a nut, which was adjusted in the end of the wood. The wood moved in a brass cellar, which was at the bottom, and being turned by the hand, operated as a wrench upon the nut, and was pressed upon the scythe snathe; and in this way the nib was secured and regulated in any situation, desirable on the snead. The nib used by the defendants, is usually known as Clapp's method or improvement. It was contended, by the plaintiffs' counsel, that this was substantially the same with the improvement of the plaintiffs. Several witnesses were examined, as experts, who testified, that the two differed in certain particulars and details, but that they were the same in principle. For the defense it was urged, that the plaintiffs could not have an exclusive right to the use of the screw for purposes of fastening. But it was answered, that the claim was not for this element, but simply for a combination, into which it entered; and this view was sustained by the court. It was also urged, that the two nibs were unlike; and that the nib of the defendants was not an infringement of the right of the plaintiffs. No witnesses were called to this point by the defendants. Evidence was given to show, that the nib of the defendants was better than that of the plaintiffs, and that it found a reader market. But the court instructed the jury to disregard this consideration, except so far as it went to show a substantial difference between the two nibs. It was no matter, if the defendants' nib was more polished, or even worked better than the plaintiffs', provided it embodied the principle of the plaintiffs'. It did not follow, because the defendants improved the machine of the plaintiffs, that, therefore, they could use it. Another defense was set up, which received particular attention from the court. Daniel Draper testified, that, in conversation with Dexter Peirce, the patentee, sometime at the end of the winter, or beginning of the spring of 1835, he remarked, that he found great difficulty in suiting his customers, in respect to the nibs of scythe snathes; and that he thought they might be improved by the application of the nut and screw to the nib or thole. He did not suggest any mode of doing this. He never reduced his idea to practice. The witness said, that Peirce treated the idea as impracticable, and laughed at it. It appeared on cross-examination, that the witness had been, in the early part of his life, a tanner, and then went into the patent wood ware business, in which he continued till January 1, 1835, when he formed a copartnership with another person for the manufacture of hammers and scythe snathes; but that he did not continue to make snathes more than six months. The witness knew, that Peirce took out a patent, in March, 1837, for his improvement in the scythe snathe, and that he had assigned the same for a valuable consideration; but he never spoke to him on the subject, or reminded him of the suggestion he had made, though he was in the habit of seeing him from time to time.

Fletcher and Charles Sumner, for plaintiffs.

B. Rand and B. R. Curtis, for defendants.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice, on these facts, submitted to the jury this question: Did Draper communicate to Peirce substantially the improvement, for which he took out his patent, so that, without more inventive power, Peirce could have applied it? It was not enough, that Draper gave a hint; nor, on the other hand, was it necessary, that he should communicate every minute thing about the invention; but he must have communicated the substance. He further instructed the jury, that the original patentee had sworn, that he was the true and first inventor of the improvement, for which he had taken out letters patent; that this oath was required by law, prior to the issue of the letters patent; so that, supposing the jury should be of opinion, that the asserted communication of Draper covered the substance of Peirce's invention, then there would be oath against oath. If they should be of opinion, that Draper simply gave a hint, which Peirce afterwards reduced to practice, then the two oaths would not conflict. If Peirce swore falsely, that he was the first and true inventor, then he was liable to indictment for perjury. The testimony of Draper with regard to Peirce was in the nature of confessions, and this was always regarded as an uncertain kind of evidence. The conversation was in private, and nobody could contradict the witness. The judge stated, that this was the first time, within his long experience on the bench, that such a conversation had been set up as a ground for destroying the title of a patentee to his invention.

The judge further instructed the jury, that it was not necessary, that the two oaths should be identical, in order to make one an infringement of the other. The true question was: Are the means used substantially the same, although not in every minute particular? With regard to damages, the jury were told not to give extravagant or vindictive damages; but such as would establish the right of the plaintiffs, and indemnify them against all the expenses of litigating their right. If the defendants were sued a second time for violating the right of the plaintiffs, then it might be proper to give vindictive damages. The jury thereupon found a verdict for the plaintiffs, for $1167.66.

At a subsequent day of the term, (Dec. 21,) the case came on again, on a motion for a new trial. The motion was grounded upon the following reasons. (1.) That the judge ruled, in the course of the trial, that one Peirce, who was offered as a witness, was interested, and could not be examined as a witness. (2.) That the judge further ruled, that an affidavit, made by the said Peirce, before he took out his patent and in order to obtain the same, was evidence in the cause, although it appeared, that the said Peirce was interested at the time he made the said affidavit. (3.) That the judge instructed the jury, that they were to take into consideration the said oath of Peirce, and that only one witness having sworn, that he communicated to Peirce the substance of the invention, and Peirce having sworn by his said affidavit, that he believed himself to be the original inventor, the jury had oath against oath; and that the jury must decide, whether the solemn oath of Peirce had been thus overcome by the testimony of one witness. (4.) That the damages assessed by the jury were excessive.

B. R. Curtis urged, in support of the first three grounds of the motion, that the ruling of the court was inconsistent with the general principles of the law of evidence; that it conflicted with the rule, requiring an opportunity to cross-examine a witness; also, with the other rule, excluding the testimony of an interested witness. In support of his views, he cited the English cases in actions on the case for a malicious suit. He also relied upon the proceedings of courts of justice under the registry laws, and bankrupt laws. He further urged, that the statute, requiring the oath of the patentee, was intended to secure the public against fraud. But that, if the construction of the court was to prevail, it would operate as a security to the patentee, and would be, not a shield to the public, but a sword against it. He also argued, in support of the last ground of the motion for a new trial, that the damages were excessive.

STORY, Circuit Justice, without hearing the other side, ruled, as at the trial, that the patent was prima facie evidence in the case; that the patent recited the oath, and that the jury had cognizance of it; in short, that the oath was in the case, and the jury were entitled to judge of its force. This was the foundation of the onus probandi, that was thrown upon the defendants in a patent cause. The courts of the United States had constantly acted upon this view. With regard to the question of damages, the judge confessed, that the damages awarded by the jury were greater than were anticipated. But still there did not seem to be any such gross mistake in the jury, as would authorize setting aside their verdict. It was a matter submitted to their fair judgment. Judgment according to the verdict.

ALDERDICE v. STATE BANK OF VIRGINIA.

District Court, E. D. Virginia. 1875.

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. 1875.

BANKRUPTCY — PROHIBITED AND FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS — PREFERENCES — PRESUMPTIONS AGAINST CREDITOR.

1. Where a tobacco manufacturer, who has been overchecking to a large amount for several months on a bank, by collusion with a defaulting teller; and who, on his transactions being discovered, fails to pay up his default, but executes a deed of preference to secure to the bank the amount overdrawn, within a month of involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy against him in which the adjudication goes by default; Held, that although the general business transactions and condition of the bankrupt, at the time of making the deed of preference (disconnected from the especial transactions with the bank covered by the deed), may not have been sufficient to constitute reasonable cause to believe that he was insolvent and made the deed to defeat the provisions of the bankrupt law; yet, that these especial facts out of which the deed arose, were sufficient to remove all doubt and to constitute reasonable cause of belief in the mind of the president of the preferred bank.
