MILLER, Circuit Justice, orally.—In the matter of the application of the American Middlings Purifier Company against John A. Christian & Co., we are compelled, this morning, to announce the result of our consultations on it, although, perhaps, very inadequately prepared to do it with perfect satisfaction to ourselves. I must leave today, in order to reach the circuit court at Denver, Judge Dillon not being in attendance at that court, and it will have been in session a couple of days when I get there in any event, and, under the circumstances, we must give it the best judgment that we have.

The application is for a preliminary injunction in behalf of the plaintiff, upon allegation that the process used in the manufacture of flour patented by plaintiff's assignor in 1863, and a reissue in 1874, is infringed by the defendants. There is no answer to the bill, and the motion is heard on the bill on the affidavits of plaintiff and the affidavits of defendants. The plaintiff brought suit on this same patent in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, a year or two ago, against Deener and others, for an infringement of it. In the court of that district the plaintiff failed to establish his case. Upon what precise ground the court below rendered its judgment I do not know, and it is not material. The plaintiff here and the plaintiff there took an appeal to the supreme court of the United States, and that case was heard and decided at the last term of court. The decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia was reversed, and a decree was rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the supreme court of the United States. [94 U. S. 780.] The effect to be given this decree in the present proceedings is one of the main questions to be determined now. The counsel for the plaintiff in this case insists upon treating it as almost conclusive of the validity of the plaintiff's patent. The counsel for the defendants, in their argument, treat it as of very little value in a suit against the present defendant, who is a different party from the defendant in that suit.

I think that the uniform course of decisions in the courts of the United States, where a previous decision has been had by a circuit court with regard to the validity of a patent, has been to treat it as of the very highest nature, and as almost conclusive in an application for injunction in another case founded on the same patent. No one pretends, no one argues, that such a decision, even by a circuit court, is absolutely conclusive on a final hearing on the merits of the case; but since patents are of such extensive and general operation all over the country, and since the litigation in regard to patents has been found so expensive and so wearisome to the courts, it has become almost a matter of necessity, after the validity of a patent, as distinguished from the question of infringement, has been passed upon by a competent tribunal upon a fair hearing, to treat that decision, in any future application in other courts and against other parties, as strongly persuasive of the validity of the patent; and this is especially so on the question of a preliminary injunction, and there is reason for it. The decision of the circuit court (I am saying nothing about the supreme court of the United States) in such cases is generally, I may add, always, except where there are cases of collusion, the result of careful and deliberate consideration, either of a protracted trial before a jury, or of a careful and full hearing upon depositions before a court. The presumption, therefore, that the title to the patent itself, and its validity (if that were brought in question in one of these suits), was more critically and more thoroughly looked into, and decided upon better hearing and more mature consideration than it can be in a preliminary injunction, is very strong. Therefore, I think I may state it, fairly and correctly, that wherever a patent has been established, even by the decision of the circuit court, under a careful consideration, in a subsequent application, either before the same court or any other, for a preliminary injunction or for any preliminary relief, that decision is of very great weight.

This case stands on better ground than that. The decision which is brought to our notice in this case is a decision of the supreme court of the United States, the court whose judgments are final upon all questions of patent law; whether the parties in interest now were before it or not, its decision as to what is law in the case governs the decision of all the other courts in the United States. Where the question is one of complicated facts, and the facts may be controverted, and are controverted in the supreme court of the United States, with regard to the validity of the patent, of course the decision of that court upon those facts is conclusive, so far as the facts are the same; and, in addition to that, it is a very fair presumption that wherever the validity of the patent is a question which is brought to the attention and consideration of the supreme court of the United States, all the questions concerning that patent which could possibly be before the court, were before it, and were fully and well considered, and received its full and careful attention. I, therefore, cannot agree with the counsel, who has so ably argued this case for the defendants, that the case comes here as though this was the first time the patent was brought before the court.

As regards this particular judgment of the supreme court of the United States, it is assailed on the ground, in the first place, that the validity of the patent was but a minor consideration in the case, and did not receive the full and careful attention of the court; and, in the second place, on the ground that the whole suit, from beginning to end, in which that question was decided, was collusive and fraudulent, for the purpose of procuring the judgment of the appellate court in favor of the validity of this patent.

As to the first proposition, that the question of the validity of the patent did not receive the attention of the court carefully, that is refuted at once by the record of the case, and by the opinion of the court. The record of the case shows that it was assailed; that as many as seven or eight different grounds assailing it were set up in the supplemental answer, filed for that very purpose, and it shows that these questions were argued by the counsel upon their briefs, and it shows that the court turned its attention to the questions that were raised in this defence, especially upon that class of objections which go to show the want of novelty—the one that is most relied upon in this case. I may, perhaps, add my personal knowledge of what took place in court which I do not think I am at liberty to disregard here, although sitting in another court, as to the attention which the whole of this case received. It was submitted to the court on printed argument very early in the term—I should think certainly as early as sometime in the month of October; that is my recollection. It was submitted on printed briefs, on both sides, of—taking them together—I should think, five hundred pages. It was held under advisement by the court before it was decided in conference for two or three months, up to the adjournment just previous to Christmas. It was then decided, and the opinion confided to one of the most careful, laborious, and able patent law judges of the United States. He kept that opinion from the week preceding Christmas until the last week of the session of the court, in March. It underwent, undoubtedly, a careful scrutiny and consideration in every branch of it. It is impossible, therefore, under these circumstances, to infer that all there was in the case did not receive the fullest and most careful consideration of the court. There is another thing that shows that it received the consideration of the court. It is possible, in a court like ours, where we are all of one opinion and at one time, that something may have escaped our attention; but two of the best patent lawyers in that court dissented from the opinion and judgment of the court, as appears by the record. The fact that these judges dissent shows that their objections must have been carefully considered in court, as they were in the conference, and rebuts any suggestion that there was any hasty or ill-advised action in the matter.

As regards the collusion: It is a sad thing to say that perhaps no class of cases coming before the courts have as much fraud, perjury, and wicked conduct generally, as patent cases. The vast amount involved in some of them, the conflicting interests, with a variety of people of all classes—the contest between patentees themselves, in which the sums involved are almost fabulous—lead to perjury and fraud of the grossest kind. It is the undoubted experience of the judges who are familiar with patent cases, that there is a large amount of false swearing and corruption in them. It is possible, therefore—our court has recognized the fact in two or three cases coming before it—that there may be a collusive suit brought to our court for the purpose of establishing a patent, in which the control of the litigation is all upon one side, though apparently there is an honest contest between two parties with regard to it. When, therefore, a proposition of that kind is made, it is to be considered. But there is no attempt here to establish a collusion by any affidavits or proof that either of the parties engaged in that case, in the supreme court of the United States, or in the district court, were committing a fraud. There is no attempt, except from the character of the record itself, to show that there was anything but an honest contest in regard to it. The inference that it was a collusive suit is attempted to be drawn from the circumstances, which, I think, are not at all conclusive, and hardly persuasive. One of these is that the suit was suddenly brought, after the reissue of the patent, and speedily carried through the courts. But a reason for that is quite obvious in the nature of the transaction itself. The reissue, on which alone any of these suits are attempted to be sustained, was made at a time which left but five or six years of the patent to run. The parties owning the patent under it knew—it is now apparent, at least, on these affidavits before me—that it was generally known that the patent would be resisted by a very large and influential body of men. It was nothing, therefore, but sensible, reasonable, and proper that the patentee should select the nearest infringer of the patent, and get his case through the courts in a speedy manner, to decide whether he had such a claim, and that is what he did; and I see nothing indicative of fraud or collusion in the fact. If it could be shown that the defendants selected had no interest in the contest; that they were not actually engaged in milling at all; if it could be shown that they made any suspicious bargain with the plaintiff in that case, all these considerations would go to impeach the character of the case; but, with a single exception, that after the suit had been decided in favor of the defendants below, the parties agreed to some arrangement about the damages which might be recovered, or the mode of settling the amount of damages, if the plaintiff finally succeeded, there is nothing I can see in the case that justifies a suspicion of any collusion or fraud in the matter. I am, therefore, compelled to hold that that decision possesses all the validity, and is entitled to all the respect and consideration, and to all the weight which any other decision of the supreme court of the United States could have. And I am not aware—I do not believe—that any case exists or can be found in which an inferior court has held, on an application for a preliminary injunction, that the decision of the supreme court of the United States establishing the validity of a patent can be assailed in the court below. I do not myself go so far in this case as that. I do not say on this application it could not be shown that a patent was invalid if the evidence was strong enough to overcome the credit that is due to the judgment of the supreme court of the United States. But I say there is no precedent for holding that even that can be done; and I certainly am unwilling, myself, sitting here as a circuit judge, to hold that that decision is of no more weight and character than the decision of a circuit court, which is open to re-examination in the supreme court of the United States, which might be carried up there and reversed, and which is made by only one of the judges of an inferior court.

Other considerations are brought to bear in this particular case, conceding the force to be given to that decision by this court, why the injunction in this case should not be granted. The first of these is a statement by counsel for the defendants, that no injunction can be granted unless there has been proof of previous user of the patent by plaintiff, or parties claiming under the same patent, and it is denied that there is any such proof here. If any very extensive evidence of previous user is an indispensable thing to the granting of an injunction, I am prepared to admit that it is not proven in this case. But I do not understand that previous user is an absolute and indispensable element of granting an injunction. I understand it stands only as one of the means or modes of satisfying the court of the right of the plaintiff to an injunction. It is to be presumed that when a party has used publicly and notoriously for any considerable length of time a patent, claiming exclusive right to it, the public have acquiesced in that claim, and against a man who comes to infringe it and to contest the rights of the plaintiff, there arises a presumption in consequence of that user, which is a very strong one; but does that user afford as strong a presumption as a deliberate contest in a suit through a circuit court and up to the supreme court of the United States, of the validity of the patent and the right of the plaintiff to its exclusive use? This is the thing to be established. This is the foundation. If this is conceded, or is established, the right to the injunction is clear, whether there is user or not; and to hold that no injunction can issue without several years previous user, is, in effect, to hold that if the public combine not to use a man's patent—the general public—or if he can't introduce it into use, or if he can't convince the public that it is a thing profitable to be used, and if it is (as it is in this case) of a thing that he can't, and probably will not, use himself, but is intended for the use of others, in a large measure, why it would follow, as a matter of course, that he never can get an injunction; and that his patent may run out and he never can get any value of it at all, because he has been unable to get anybody to use it. This is particularly applicable with reference to this process patent, because it is a patent, not for a machine, not for a product, not for an article, not for a patent medicine; it is a patent for a process or mode of doing a particular thing which is being done all over the world. How could he establish a user in this case unless he himself was able to own an extensive flouring mill, or to pay somebody to use his patent enough to make it a general user? I do not think there is anything in that question as applicable to the present case, and especially in view of the fact which I shall now proceed to consider under the second objection, and that is laches. In other words, the argument of the defendants is that the plaintiff, having procured his patent in 1863, laid by and took no steps to enforce it against anybody until 1874 or 1875. That argument struck me at first as having a good deal of force in it, and it is founded, if it were true, and there is no excuse for it, in very strong principles; because if a man has a patent of that kind and he sees the world at large using it for eight or ten years, takes no steps to arrest it, sues nobody, sets up no claim, gives no warning, it is a very natural and strong reason why, under these circumstances, he should not be permitted to come subsequently and arrest everybody by process of injunction. In each and in every case that question depends upon its own facts.

However, it is apparent that in the original patents issued in 1863, there were defects in the specifications, which rendered them unavailable, in the estimation of the plaintiff, in a suit against anybody who was infringing them, for the reason that they really included the rights of the prior patentees, Cogswell & McKiernan. He, therefore, before he commenced any contest with these parties, who were very numerous and very powerful, was under the necessity of giving up his patents and asking a reissue, not that he might enlarge his claim, as so often is done to the detriment of the public, but, in point of fact, that he might diminish and limit his claims, which he did, being aware that he had to enter into a severe contest, and, therefore, equipped himself by casting off all that might embarrass him, and restricting his patents to that which he thought he could carry; and this he had a right to do, and in this he was wise. There was, therefore, no laches in that matter, unless, during all this time his patents, as they originally stood, were in general use, and in such use as to attract his notice and attention. The affidavits of the defendants remove that difficulty or objection, because, unless we consider the production of farina by a particular process as infringing the patent, the defendants themselves here show, by their own affidavits, that what is called the new process mill^{ing} commenced in this country about 1871 or 1872, and they assert that, and insist upon it in their own affidavits; so that, supposing the plaintiff in this case to have been vigilant, as vigilant as any man could expect him to be, it was only about 1871 or 1872 that there was any general attempt to use his patent or to infringe it, and then, if you will suppose him to have instituted his inquiries with a view to commence proceedings, it is no great length of time to allow him a year or two to see how far his patent covered those supposed infringements, and how far his patent, as it existed, could be enforced against them.

And so, up to the time that he got out his reissued patent, I see no reason to charge him with any laches or negligence in the matter; and it will hardly be pretended, I think, that laches could be imputed to him after that time, because since he got his reissue of the patent, he selected the nearest and quickest opportunity to bring it to the test of the courts.

The main difficulty and embarrassing part of this case, to me, and to my associate, is the next question that presents itself, and that is, the endeavor, by affidavits, and exhibits, and models, to show, in point of fact, that the patent of the plaintiff was anticipated—that it was not novel, and that it was, therefore, void. In other words, to show that the decision of the supreme court of the United States, holding that it was a valid patent, was an erroneous decision, and not, as counsel very courteously says, because it made a mistake in principle, but because there was a defect of the testimony in that case which is supplied in this.

That branch of the subject is embarrassing for two or three reasons. In the first place, I do not pretend—I cannot speak for my associate in that regard—that I am as competent to decide it as some other judges more conversant with patents and scientific principles. In the second place, I have no confidence myself in the impression produced by any number of ex parte affidavits of experts. My own experience, both in the local courts and in the supreme court of the United States, is that, whenever the matter in contest involves an immense sum in value, and where the question turns mainly upon opinions of experts, there is no difficulty in introducing any amount of them on either side; and yet this class of cases is one in which there is value to be attached to experts. But if I had time to sit down and examine, one by one, all of these affidavits, most of which, although they are supposed to be treating of patents, only amount, after all, to saying, each one of them, "as I understand it, such and such a thing was done," or "as I understand it, such and such a thing was not done," and, "as I understand it, such and such a patent involves such and such a principle, and others do not," all of which, after all, was only their opinion, although they state them as facts; I say if I had time (and that would require two or three weeks), I might possibly go into this thing and reach an opinion which would, at least, be satisfactory to me, whether that patent was anticipated, and is, therefore, invalid. But I do not feel at liberty, in the face of what the supreme court of the United States has decided, after five or six months deliberation, upon these ex parte affidavits, which I have not the time to examine fully, to hold, in reference to this temporary application, that this patent is invalid; and that is about all I will say on that subject, because it is all that is necessary to say, since the whole subject will be fully investigated hereafter, when the defendants will have the fullest and fairest opportunity, after they have filed their answer and stated specifically upon what prior use, prior patents, or prior publications they intend to rely, after they have brought them to the test of depositions, witnesses cross-examined, models carefully looked into in the presence of the court, and explained; after all that they will have an opportunity to have full justice, and if they can show that this patent is invalid, as I hold it is not conclusively shown, they will have an opportunity to do it. But I do not now think that I would be discharging my duty to decide on this hasty hearing, that this class of affidavits, which, as I heard them read, and as I have looked into them in my private room, do not satisfy me of the proposition of the defendants, that I was at liberty, because of their number, to hold that this patent is an invalid patent.

There are two other reasons urged, not against this patent, not against the patent itself, but which, admitting the patent to be a valid patent, why the injunction should not be granted. The first of those is that there is actually no infringement proved; the infringement is denied by the affidavits, even conceding the patent to be valid. As to that, it is hardly necessary for me to say more than that the defendants themselves creditably and manfully rely upon impeaching the patent, and hardly venture to say that they have not used the process of the plaintiff. Their whole evidence goes to show that they have used, and they insist that they have used a machine which destroys the plaintiff's patent because it antedates it. They themselves have narrowed the question, then, not to one of infringement, but to the validity of the patent. It is manly in them to do so. I have no doubt myself that this is to be the test case, unless the one already decided is; and I take the liberty of saying that the cross-imputations of the gentlemen here, about fraudulent misconduct on both sides, seem to me utterly without foundation. The plaintiff has shown himself a worthy foe, and a manly one, through the whole of this contest. He prepared himself in proper panoply when he went to the supreme court of the United States and got his decision before he attempted to trouble the little mills all over the country. When he has got himself ready for the fight he selects the advance foe, the party who says, "I own the largest mill in the western world," and who has the assistance of all the other millers, with notice to come and defend his suit. Knowing that fact, the plaintiff selects that very party as the one upon whom he makes his first attack. If he had no faith in his patent, if he had intended to go around and blackmail the smaller manufacturers, he might have hunted up those who couldn't defend, in little out-of-the-way places. He has not done it, and he makes an open battle. Defendants also make a manly defence. Although they say they don't think they have infringed, they come squarely up and say they mean to fight the validity of the patent. They have a right to do it, and they will have it under this decision. I hope this case will prove an exception to the fraudulent devices which have been practised, and that both parties will conduct this suit hereafter in that straightforward way which has characterized them both up to the present time.

The defendants also say that because they are of great ability and amply able to respond to any damages that may be obtained by the final decree, and because their operations are very extensive, and the issue of an injunction would interfere very largely with their business, would be productive of much more harm to them than the refusal of the injunction would be to the plaintiff, therefore the injunction ought not to be issued.

In regard to the issuing of an injunction, I do not think that the ability of the respondents to pay ultimate damages ought to be very much considered in this case. It is a matter worthy of very great consideration that the patent of the plaintiff will expire inside of three years from the date of this present application.

It is very easy for the defendants—very probably the defendants will contest this case so severely that no final decree will be obtained until the patent is exhausted, and it will remain a question of very grave doubt whether any decree rendered for damages after the expiration of the patent—unless some preliminary measure has been taken to give validity to it—would cover those damages. It is therefore important, it is absolutely necessary, if the plaintiff has any just claim, that the relief should be granted. It should be such as would enable it, if it finally got a decree, even if it was five or six years hence, to realize the benefit of this litigation. I am, therefore, of the opinion (in which my brother Nelson concurs), that it is our duty to grant the relief asked in this case, subject to a further provision, which has been well considered in previous cases, and which we have a right to apply, and which we propose to apply in this case. And in that view of it the responsibility and ability of the respondents is a great inducement to us to make the order which we propose to make, and that is an order granting the injunction, unless the defendants, within a reasonable time—say such time as convenient to my brother judge here, ten or twenty days—shall come in and give the bond which has often been required in such cases. In that view of the subject we think that nobody will be hurt. The defendants are amply able to give that bond.

The bond will be conditioned for the payment of any final decree for money in favor of the plaintiff in this case, and conditioned for their keeping an accurate and faithful account of the amount of flour made by them in their mills with the machines which they admit they use, and for a report of that once every three months to the court, under oath.

I am very happy to be supported in nearly all that I have said, certainly in all that we have decided on this subject, by the case referred to by counsel for defendants, of Forbush v. Bradford, [Case No. 4,930.]

Judge Miller here read from this decision, and after hearing counsel in behalf of the respective parties, said: "Under all the circumstances of the case, we think that a bond for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars will be sufficient; we do not think that will be oppressive. That will be the order."

Ordered accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] The supreme court, in December, 1877, refused to set aside the decree in the Deener Case, the imputed collusion not being shown, but reserved the rights of other persons interested in the question of the validity of the Cochrane patent. Case No. 308.

AMERICAN MIDLINGS PURIFIER CO.
v. VAIL et al.

[15 Blatchf. 315; 4 Ban. & A. 1.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 28, 1878.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—INJUNCTION BY CONSENT—DECISION ON MERITS.

After a motion for a preliminary injunction in a suit in equity for the infringement of letters patent had been heard, and before it was decided, the defendants filed a paper withdrawing their opposition to the motion. Thereupon the court granted the injunction and refused to make any other decision on the motion, although the plaintiff insisted that the motion should be decided on the merits, with a view to other cases.

[In equity. Suit by the American Middlings Purifier Company against Daniel S. Vail and others, for infringement of letters patent Nos. 37,317 and 37,318. Plaintiff moves for a preliminary injunction. Granted.]

Charles F. Blake and Rodney Mason, for plaintiffs.

George Harding, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The motion for a preliminary injunction in this case was made in the regular way between the contesting parties, and was resisted with all the ability, research, and investigation that could well be brought to the defense of any action or proceeding. The matter ran along for a considerable number of days, broken by other engagements of the judge, and finally, I think, it was finished when I was sitting here on the 23d day of July last, either that day or the next. The papers, however, were not in readiness for the court to take up the case for decision until a subsequent day, because my recollection is, that, after I left the city, I received a printed paper containing points or suggestions on the part of Mr. Harding; and I think I also received a similar paper from the other side. At all events, it was some time in the month of August before the papers were in a condition in which a judge could take them up for decision, in justice or good faith to the counsel who submitted them. The decision in the case was not delayed for any reason connected with anything in the case itself, but it was delayed because earlier cases had precedence. Up to this time, this case has not been reached by me in the regular order of decision.

This case is now in this position. The counsel for the defendants comes into court and files a paper, in which he sets forth that the defendants have become bankrupt, that they have ceased running their mill, and that, through their counsel, they withdraw their opposition to the motion. That paper was handed to me, and I put it upon the files of the court, with a memorandum on the back of it, that the plaintiffs might have an order reciting the contents of this paper, and stating that the motion, for that reason, is granted; that is, the plaintiffs could have such an order, if they pleased. If they do not wish to take such an order, they need not do so. There is no actual contest between the parties to the motion; and, according to well settled principles, laid down by the supreme court of the United States in many cases, this court cannot proceed to a decision of a motion on the merits. As has been said by judges of the supreme court in similar cases, the court must have a real contest before it. It cannot be employed as a moot court. The principles that underlie that doctrine are, in the first place, that it is manifestly not proper for courts to be employed for that purpose; and, in the second place, that the judicial mind cannot be in a proper state for deciding a case in which there is no real contest between the parties to it. These principles are well settled, and are applicable to a case of this kind. The very fact alleged on the part of the plaintiffs, that this decision is sought in order to affect other cases, is the very reason laid down by the supreme court why no such decision should be made. It is definitely laid down by that court, that, when there is no real contest between the parties to a suit, and a decision will affect third parties, the case will not be decided by the court. I will refer to a case in which that question is discussed by the supreme court. It is the case of Lord v. Veazie, 8 How. [49 U. S.]

251. That case had elements in it which are not in this case, but the same fact existed, that there was no real dispute between the parties. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, says, that the court is satisfied that there is no real dispute between the plaintiff and defendant, that it is a case where their interests are not adverse, but that they have arrived at a point in the controversy where there is no real dispute between them. The court says: "In these proceedings the plaintiff and defendant are attempting to procure the opinion of this court upon a question of law, in the decision of which they have a common interest opposed to that of other persons, who are not parties to this suit." It was an important case, and there was a large amount of property involved. The court goes on to say, that "an amicable action, in the sense in which these words are used in courts of justice, presupposes that there is a real dispute between the parties concerning some matter of right; and, in a case of that kind, it sometimes happens, that, for the purpose of obtaining a decision of the controversy without incurring needless expense and trouble, they agree to conduct the suit in an amicable manner; that is to say, that they will not embarrass each other" unnecessarily. "But there must be an actual controversy and adverse interests." And then the court says: "A judgment entered under such circumstances, and for such purposes, is a mere form."

There is a case in 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 419, the case of Cleveland v. Chamberlain, in which the court cites the case of Lord v. Veazie. Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court, and he puts his decision upon the very ground that is urged here by the plaintiffs as a reason why the court should decide this motion, to wit, that the decision will affect third parties. He states that as the very ground why the court should not decide the case. He says, that the controversy is carried on "for the evident purpose of obtaining a decision injurious to the rights and interests of third parties. There is no material difference between this case and that of Lord v. Veazie, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 254, where the whole proceeding was justly rebuked by the court, as in contempt of the court, and highly reprehensible. * * * It is plain that this is no adversary proceeding, no controversy between the appellant and the nominal appellee." And then the court quotes from the case in 8 How. [49 U. S.] The order of the court in the case is very significant. It is as follows: "This cause came on to be argued on the transcript of the record from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, and, it appearing to the court here, from affidavits and other evidence filed in this case, in behalf of persons not parties to this suit, that this appeal is not conducted by parties having adverse interests, but for the purpose of obtaining a decision of this court to affect the interest of persons not parties, it is, therefore, now here ordered and adjudged by this court, that the appeal in this case be and the same is hereby dismissed;" thus placing the dismissal upon the very ground that is urged here as a ground for deciding this motion on its merits.

If any authority were needed in support of the proposition that these defendants have a right to come into court at this time, and consent to this injunction, it is found in the case of Latham's and Deming's Appeals, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 145, where a party came into court with a stipulation asking to dismiss his own appeal. It was one of the legal tender cases. The court had fixed a day for the hearing, and every thing was in readiness. The attorney-general of the United States objected to the court receiving this dismissal by the party of his own appeal, and said that it was a surprise to him, and that he desired to argue the case. But the court said that the appellants had the right to dismiss their appeal. Upon precisely the same principle, these defendants have the absolute right to consent to this injunction. So far as the motion for an injunction is concerned, they have put an end to the suit, and this has become a case in which there is no contest between the parties to the motion. Consequently, it would be contrary to all precedent for this court to decide the merits of the motion. The plaintiffs are at liberty to take an order for an injunction, but the court, of course, will not force it upon them. They may take it or not, as they please.

In this case, in its present posture, the decision of the court is, that, because the defendants have withdrawn their opposition to the motion for an injunction, an injunction is granted for the reasons stated in the withdrawal paper which has been filed, and the court declines to make any other decision upon the motion.

AMERICAN NICHOLSON PAVEMENT CO.
v. ELIZABETH et al.[1 Ban. & A. 439; 6 O. G. 764.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Sept., 1874.*

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—LIABILITY OF INFRINGER—LICENSES—ROYALTIES—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—ACCOUNTING—POWERS OF MASTER—INTEREST.

1. The rules, upon which the equitable accountability of an infringer is to be estimated and ascertained, considered. In general, the infringer is liable for the whole profits derived from the infringement, unless it be shown, that some portion of the profits were derived from the use of instrumentalities or improvements, not covered by the infringed patent, and which co-operated with the patented invention in producing the result from which the profits accrued.

[Cited in Buerk v. Imhaeuser, Case No. 2, 107.]

2. Under the circumstances of this case, the onus of proving that instrumentalities or improvements, not covered by the infringed patent, contributed, and the extent and value to which they contributed, to the defendants' profits, rested upon the defendants; and, as they failed to give affirmative proof thereof, before the master, they were properly charged with the whole amount of the profits which they derived. Citing Carter v. Baker, [Case No. 2, 472.]

3. The owner of a patent for a wooden pavement, granted the exclusive right to J. & M. to construct and lay, and license others to construct and lay, the patented pavement, within a specified territory, subject to an agreement, that if by reason of decisions of the courts, or otherwise, it should be found impracticable for J. & M. to obtain contracts to be made with them in any town or city in said territory, or the work of constructing such pavement should be required by law to be let under public lettings, open to general competition, then J. & M. were to grant to any such town or city desiring to lay the same, a license so to do, upon a license fee not to exceed thirty-one cents a square yard, or they were to publicly authorize any person or persons desiring to bid at such lettings, to lay the same upon the same terms, of which sum sixteen cents per yard were to be made payable to the assignor of the patent and the remainder to J. & M. A license was granted to the complainants by J. & M., subject to the above agreement, to construct and lay the patented pavement in the city of Elizabeth, the charter of which (Laws N. J. 1863, p. 156), required that all contracts for doing work or furnishing materials for any improvement should be advertised for three weeks in a newspaper printed and circulating in said city, and should, at all times, be given to the lowest bidder. The charter was amended in 1870, by act of the legislature, providing, that whenever, in any intended improvement, it was contemplated to use any patented process or materials, the owners of one half of the property, in running feet along the line of the intended improvement, should remonstrate in writing against the use of any specified patent, or petition for the use of any specified patent, or for the use of one, or two or more specified patents, and, thereupon, the contract for the said work should be awarded only in accordance with the request of such proportion of owners. The majority of the owners of property on certain of the streets in the city of Elizabeth, petitioned that those streets be paved by certain of the defendants, who, thereupon, obtained contracts therefor, and performed the work. The pavement laid by them was decided, in this suit, to be an infringement of the patent under which the complainant's rights exist. Upon the accounting before the master, under the decree in this suit, the defendants claimed that, as, under the charter, the complainant could not lay the pavements which had been awarded to defendants upon the application of the majority of the land-owners, its profits were limited to fifteen cents a square yard by the terms of its license: Held, that the defendants' accountability was not limited to the payment of the royalty reserved by the license.

4. Where, upon an accounting before a master, evidence is offered which is objected to, and which the master does not exclude, the objection, that the master erred in failing to exclude the evidence, does not properly come before the court upon exceptions to the master's ruling. The testimony should have been taken down, a note made of the objections of the opposing counsel, and the reasons for its incompetency, stated, and its admissibility determined by the court, on the argument, where the question would arise, upon a motion to strike out, by those objecting.

5. Evidence, before a master, upon an accounting under a decree in a suit for infringing a patent for wooden pavements, is incompetent to show that there were other forms of wooden pavement open to the public, which they might have used, and made the profits, or some portion of the profits, which had been realized in the use of complainant's invention.

[See note at end of case.]

6. The master, upon an accounting, charged the defendants with the gross profits, and allowed them the amount of an uncollectable balance of account against the city of Plainfield, included in the gross profits: Held, no error.

[See note at end of case.]

7. The master allowed to the defendant, the N. J. Wood Paving Co., $7,000, as reasonable compensation for the services of its officers; it being shown, that the sole business of the corporation, was the business which involved the infringement of the complainant's patent, and that its contracts in said business had produced upward of $300,000: Held, no error.

8. The master allowed $6,107.50, for an "expense account," the items and vouchers for which were produced before him: Held, no error.

9. The master allowed the amount of royalties, reserved under a license, and paid by defendants to the owners of a patent for the pavement constructed by them, which is adjudged in this suit, to infringe complainant's patent. The infringing pavement appeared to contain a novel feature, alleged to have been an improvement over complainant's pavement, and patented. The license was to lay the pavement upon the payment of the royalties, and the same had been paid: Held, that as the complainant failed to show that the money thus expended was unnecessary or extravagant in amount, the court would not hold that the master erred in allowing the payment. It seems, that the onus was upon the complainant to show that the improvement did not contribute, so much as the amount of the royalties, toward the aggregate profits of the enterprise.

10. The complainants are entitled to interest upon the profits, only from the date of the final decree. Citing Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 653.

C. A. Seward, for complainant.
Keller & Blake, for defendants.

NIXON, District Judge. The case comes up on exceptions, filed by both parties, to the report of the master. By the decree of the court, entered March 26, 1872, the defendants were held to have infringed the letters patent of complainant, by making, using, and vending, in the city of Elizabeth, wooden pavements, containing the improvements described therein, and recited in the first and second claims, and were ordered to account for the damages, or use and profits, in consequence of said infringement.

A reference was made to William I. Magie, Esq., of Elizabeth, to take and report such account. He has reported substantially, that the defendant, the New Jersey Wood Pavement Company, has laid 72,042 8-10 square yards of the Brocklebank and Trainer pavement, as follows:

In the city of Plainfield	2,700	square yards.
In the city of Elizabeth:
Grove and Garden streets.....	10,148 4-10	"
Newark avenue....	30,827 3-10	"
Sherman avenue....	4,958 1-10	"
Ninth [North ave.] ³ avenue.....	14,957	"
Grier avenue.....	3,449	"
Sherman avenue, outside of city limits.....	5,008	"
Total.....	72,042 8-10	"

³From 6 O. G. 765.

That it was entitled to receive, therefore, as the contract price for the work, the gross sum of $346,934.83; that it had, in fact, received from the city of Elizabeth $310,198.29; from the city of Plainfield $10,834.69, and in land, for paving Sherman avenue, outside of the city limits, taken at the contract price, of the value of $22,513.50; that the gross profits of the defendants upon all the work, after deducting the actual cost of materials and labor (except such as, having been omitted in the account, were claimed as afterward stated), and assuming that the whole contract price of the Plainfield pavement could be collected, and that the lands given in payment of the Sherman avenue extension were worth the contract price—was $123,610.78; that from these gross profits, admitted by the defendants, they claimed certain deductions, stated by the master, with his finding therein, as follows:

1. For profits on the various materials and the labor used and employed in the construction of said pavement, $31,611.92; which he refused to allow.

2. For losses, arising from the impossibility of collecting the contract price of the Plainfield pavement, $3,388.35; which he allowed.

3. For salaries of George W. Tubbs, William W. Crane, and Augustus C. Kellogg, officers of the defendant, the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, $14,000; of which, he allowed $7,000, the amount of said salaries for one year, during which the work was done.

4. For the rent of the premises, occupied by the defendant, $6,000; of which he found and allowed $3000, being the rent for one year, during the time the said work was done.

5. For wood, not charged in the cost of the work, and deemed to have been used as fuel in doing the same, $570.93; which he allowed.

6. For $2,675.09, claimed to have been expended, in erecting a dock on ground leased to said defendants; which he refused to allow.

7. For $550, for red sand, and $4,237.20, for levelling sand, claimed to have been used as materials in said work, and not deducted in making up the foregoing account of gross profits; which he allowed.

8. For machinery, claimed to be procured by defendant, and adapted to said work and then on hand, and of no value, $4,893.22; which he allowed.

9. For an expense account, not included in the cost of labor and materials, entering into said account of gross profits, but claimed to be properly chargeable thereto, $6,107.50; which he allowed.

10. For $25,000, claimed to have been paid for an interest in the patent of Brocklebank & Trainer; which he refused to allow.

11. For an account called a "loss and gain account," not included in the statement of gross profits, $156.76; which was allowed.

12. For profits claimed by said defendants upon other work, allowed to have been included in said contracts, $6,572.75; which he refused to allow.

13. For $13,808.42, the amount claimed to have been paid as royalty or license fee for laying the said pavements under the Brocklebank & Trainer patent; which he allowed.

14. For $15,241.33, the sum claimed to have been paid by the defendants to stockholders and others, as a rebate upon pavement laid in front of their respective lands; which he refused to allow.

15. And for probable loss on the sale of lands, taken for the work done on the extension of Sherman avenue, the sum of $5,003; which he allowed.

He further reported, that the aggregate amount of the allowances made by the master on these claims, was $48,775.38, leaving the net profits of the defendants on said work $74,835.40; upon which sum, the complainant was allowed interest, at the rate of seven per cent, from the 29th of August, 1870, the average date of the payments made by the city of Elizabeth, to the date of the report, amounting to $16,538.51, making for net profits and interest the sum of $91,423.91.

He further reported, that the counsel for the complainant conceded before him, that, inasmuch as the bill had been filed in the cause, prior to the passage of the act of July 8, 1870, authorizing damages as well as profits, to be assessed by the master, in equity cases, no damages could be assessed; and, that he had restricted his inquiry, solely, to the gains and profits of the defendants in the infringement specified in the decree.

To the report of the master, the complainant has filed six exceptions, and the defendants twelve; but, before these are considered, it is important to ascertain, if we can, the principle on which the complainant's profits for the illegal use of his patent are to be estimated. This obviously depends upon the character of the patented invention, and upon the mode in which the owner chooses to allow the public to use his monopoly, and upon the methods of procedure in the tribunal to which he appeals for redress. The subject occupied the attention of the supreme court in Seymour v. McCormick, 16 How. [37 U. S.] 489, and the difficulty in laying down a rule, applicable to all cases, was adverted to. Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court—the case being a suit at law—observed, that: "It must be apparent to the most superficial observer * * * that there cannot, in the nature of things, be any one rule of damages, which will equally apply to all cases. The mode of ascertaining actual damages must necessarily depend on the peculiar nature of the monopoly granted. A man who invents or discovers a new composition of matter, such as vulcanized india rubber, or a valuable medicine, may find his profit to consist in a close monopoly, forbidding any one to compete with him in the market, the patentee himself being able to supply the whole demand, at his own price. If he should grant licenses to all who might desire to manufacture his composition, mutual competition might destroy the value of each license. * * * If any person could use the invention or discovery, by paying what a jury might suppose to be the fair value of a license, it is plain that competition would destroy the whole value of the monopoly. In such cases, the profit of the infringer may be the only criterion of the actual damage of the patentee. But one who invents some improvement in the machinery of a mill, could not claim that the profits of the whole mill should be the measure of damages for the use of his improvement. And where the profit of the patentee consists neither in the exclusive use of the thing invented or discovered, nor in the monopoly of making it for others to use, it is evident that this rule could not apply.

* * * Where an inventor finds it profitable to exercise his monopoly by selling licenses to make or use his improvement, he has himself fixed the average of his actual damage, when his invention has been used without his license. If he claims anything above that amount, he is bound to substantiate his claim, by clear and distinct evidence. When he has himself established the market value of his improvement, as separate and distinct from the other machinery with which it is connected, he can have no claim in justice or equity to make the profits of the whole machine the measure of his demand. It is only where, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, no other rule can be found, that the defendant's profits become the criterion of the plaintiff's loss." But this is when the proceedings are at law, where the inquiry is about the actual damages, sustained by the patentee, from the infringement. Here we are in equity, and the question which concerns us is: For what profits should the infringer account for the unauthorized use of the invention?

It may be answered generally, that the patentee is entitled to a just compensation for the injury which he has sustained from the invasion of his rights. How this is to be ascertained, depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. If the owner's profit consists in having a license fee paid to him, by all who use the invention, the amount of the license is his profit; and when that is paid, the injury done by the use without a license, is satisfied. If it consist in the exclusive use of the thing patented, or in the monopoly of making it for others to use, additional considerations are involved. We are then to inquire: What is the character of the invention? Is it a new machine, or manufacture, or composition of matter, whose entire value and usefulness result from the mechanism, combination, or constituents, which the genius of the patentee has originated, arranged, or produced? Or is it a mere addition to, or improvement of, an existing machine, manufacture, or process, rendering them more valuable and profitable, but not necessary to their use, and which may be used in a less profitable way, without the addition or improvement? In other words, when profits have gone into an infringer's pocket, he is regarded as the holder of property not belonging to him, but which he must restore to the rightful owner. If the invention infringed cover the entire machine, manufacture, or combination used by the infringer, then the whole profits should go to the patentee. If it cover only a part, and there are other and different elements in the organism, contributing to make up the aggregate profits, then, only such proportion should go to him, as has sprung from his contribution toward the value of the whole.

In the case before us, the complainant is the licensee of the owners of Nicholson's extended patent. It has "the sole and exclusive right and license to construct and lay, and to authorize others to construct and lay, the (Nicholson) patented pavement, within the state of New Jersey, except Jersey City, during the entire extended term of said patent." It pays for the license a royalty of sixteen cents for every square yard of the pavement which shall be laid in the said territory, within thirty days after the completion of such pavement. Its profits arise from its exclusive use of the invention; from the monopoly, which it has, of constructing, or bargaining with others to construct, the pavement, upon agreed terms, anywhere in the state; except in certain cases, to which reference will hereafter be made, and in which it is bound, by covenants with its grantor, to grant a license for laying the pavement in a sum not exceeding thirty-one cents a square yard. That exclusive use or monopoly of the complainant has been interfered with by the defendants. They have laid its patented combination in the streets of Elizabeth, without its consent. The rule in equity seems to be settled, under such circumstances, that the measure of damages, due to the complainant, is the amount of profits made by the infringers, unless, as has been intimated, some portion of the profits have been derived from the use of constituents of the combination, not the property of the patentee, and, for the use of which, he is not entitled to compensation.

What, then, is the Nicholson pavement? What is the owner of the patent authorized to demand for the infringement of its distinguishing characteristics? It was held at the final hearing, that the defendants had infringed the first and second claims, to wit: 1. A continuous foundation or support, directly upon the roadway, having arranged thereon a series of blocks, with parallel sides, endwise in rows, so as to leave a continuous narrow groove, or channel way, between each row, and filling said grooves or channel ways with broken stone, gravel and tar, or other materials. 2. The formation of a pavement, by laying a foundation directly upon the roadway, and then employing two sets of blocks, one a principal set, that shall form the under surface of the pavement when completed, and an auxiliary set of blocks or strips of board, which shall form no part of the surface, but determine the width of the groove between the principal blocks, and also the filling of said groove, when so formed, with broken stone, gravel and tar, or other like material. In the opinion, sustaining the novelty of the invention, American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. City of Elizabeth, [Case No. 311,] it was observed: "The complainant's patent is doubtless for a combination. The several parts that make up the structure, are: (1) A continuous foundation directly upon the roadway. (2) A series of blocks, with parallel sides, standing endwise in rows, that form the under surface of the pavement. (3) An auxiliary set of blocks or strips of board, which form no part of the surface, but determine the width of the grooves between the principal blocks. (4) The filling of the grooves, when so formed, between the principal blocks, with broken stone, gravel and tar, or other like material. It is not claimed that any one of these parts is new, but that, in their combination, they produce a new and useful result."

Now, what had the defendants done? In what did their infringement consist? They did not, as it is conceded they were authorized to do, take a portion of the ingredients or elements which constituted the combination, and add to them other ingredients or elements, that were newly discovered, and which were not equivalent for those left out, thus producing a new combination substantially different from the complainant's. They took the combination as Nicholson had formed it. They seized the whole of his invention. There is nothing in his patent, which is not contained in the Brocklebank & Trainer patent. But they did more than this. They added a new feature to the Nicholson combination. They rabbeted the blocks on one or both sides, in a dovetail or vertical form, and beveled the strips to suit the rabbets; which addition, it is claimed, made a mechanically different structure, and was an improvement, in that it guarded against the displacement of the strips or short blocks, and distributed the pressure upon the pavement over a larger surface.

We are inclined to believe that there is a good foundation for this claim of the defendants, whether we look for it in the evidence of the case, or, in the well-ascertained principles of mechanics; and that the Brocklebank & Trainer patent, by this addition, has improved upon the Nicholson combination.

We are then brought to the inquiry: What effect should the improvement of the defendants, have upon the question of complainant's profits? It undoubtedly added to the expense of laying the pavement, and to that extent, diminished the profits of the whole work. If it had lessened the cost, it is quite evident that the amount, thus saved, ought to be credited to the improvement. Upon the same principle, why should not the sum expended, in consequence of the increased labor of the addition, be charged to it?

But without troubling ourselves further with this aspect of the case, it seems to us that the relative value of the defendants' addition to the complainant's invention, ought to have been the subject matter of evidence before the master, although neither party offered specific testimony in regard to it. And the burden of proof was obviously on the defendants. They had been adjudged infringers. They had appropriated the complainant's invention, and realized, from its use, large profits. Their books of account were produced, and exhibited the gross amount. From this, they asked the master to make deductions, and it was for them to show what deductions should be allowed. They had caused a mingling and a confusion of rights, by unlawfully adding an improvement of their own to the property of the complainant, and, it was their duty, and not the complainant's, to prove what proportion of the profits, if any, ought to be credited to the changes which they had made in the combination of the complainants. This proposition was warmly contested by the able counsel of the defendants, in the argument; but it seems to the court so clear, that it hardly needs authority to support it. If any be required, it will be found in Carter v. Baker, [Case No. 2,472,] where the learned judge of the ninth circuit, in charging the jury upon this precise question, said: "If the defendants have improved their machine, and if any of the profits are properly credited to defendants' improvement, they do not belong to the plaintiffs; but as the defendants have wrongfully connected the plaintiffs' improvement with their own, and they caused the confusion of rights, if any portion of the profits are properly to be credited to the defendants' improvements, the burden rests upon them to show affirmatively that fact, and how much of those profits ought to be credited to this improvement, and deducted from the profits of the sale of the whole machine as improved." As no affirmative proof was offered, the master made no apportionment of the profits to the defendants, for any speculative value added to the invention by Brocklebank & Trainer, unless we regard in that light the $13,868 42-100, claimed by them, and allowed by the master, for the royalty, or license fee, paid for the use of that patent in laying the pavements, and to which we shall more particularly refer, when we come to consider the exceptions to his report. But incidental reference has already been made to another fact in the case, which the counsel for the defendants claim, as a controlling one, in the estimation of the complainant's profits: to wit, that the complainant is limited, by the terms of its license, to the compensation or royalty of thirty-one cents per square yard; fifteen of which is payable to it, and sixteen to the owners of the extended patent.

It appears from the exhibits and testimony that Nicholson, the owner of the original patent, died January 6, 1868, and that George T. Bigelow was appointed the administrator of his estate; that the said Bigelow, as administrator, applied for and procured an extension of the patent for seven years from August 8, 1868, and conveyed the one third of the extended term to Edwin C. Larned and Stephen A. Goodwin; that Bigelow, Larned and Goodwin, entered into an agreement with Charles E. Jenkins and W. T. B. Milliken, on the 14th of August, 1868, wherein they granted to the said Jenkins and Milliken, the sole and exclusive right and license to construct and lay, or to authorize and license others to construct and lay, the patented pavement, in all the cities, towns and places of New Jersey, except Jersey City, upon certain terms, conditions and stipulations therein contained, one of which was as follows: "If it shall, by reason of decisions of the courts or otherwise, be found impracticable for the said parties of the second part to obtain contracts for laying said pavement, in any town or city in said territory, to be made with such parties of the second part; or the work of constructing such pavement is required by law to be let under public lettings, open to general competition, then the said parties of the second part agree, that they will grant to any such town or city desiring to lay the same, a license so to do, upon a license fee not to exceed the sum of thirty-one cents a square yard; or will publicly authorize any person or persons desiring to bid at such lettings to lay the same upon the same terms as above stated; of which sum, the sum of sixteen cents shall in every case be made payable to the said parties of the first part, as hereinbefore provided; but, for the fulfilment of any such contracts or licenses made or granted, as in this clause provided, the said parties of the second part shall be in no wise responsible."

The complainant's title was derived from Jenkins and Milliken, by license, dated September 5, 1868, and the license was taken upon, and subject to, the same terms, conditions, and stipulations, on which its grantors held the patent. By the 123d section of the act to revise and amend the charter of the city of Elizabeth, approved March 4, 1863 (Laws of N. J., p. 156,) it was enacted that all contracts for doing work or furnishing materials for any improvement provided under this act, exceeding $100, shall be advertised for three weeks in a newspaper printed and circulating in the city, and shall at all times be given to the lowest bidder. A supplement was passed February 9, 1870, which practically repealed the foregoing section, and was to the effect that, whenever the city council should determine to cause any improvement to be made, which contemplates the use of any patented process or materials, and the owners of one half of the property, in running feet, along the line of the intended improvement, should remonstrate in writing against the use of any specified patent, or petition for the use of any specified patent, or for the use of one, of two or more specified patents, in making such improvement, the city council should award the contract for the said work, only in accordance with the request of such proportion of owners. This was followed shortly afterward by the act to incorporate the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, approved March 17, 1870, in which George W. Tubbs, William W. Crane, A. C. Kellogg, and nine other named gentlemen, were constituted directors of the corporation, and authorized in their corporate name to construct and lay wooden pavements, and to purchase all materials, patents, and patent rights, that might be deemed of advantage to their business. By the 2d section, the capital stock was limited to $250,000, but the company was prohibited from commencing business until $10,000 were subscribed and paid in in cash. This little inconvenience was obviated, however, by the 4th section, in which the directors were authorized, in behalf of the company, to receive any patents or patent rights suitable for its purpose, at a valuation to be agreed upon, and in lieu of cash subscriptions for stock. The objects for which the company was formed may be readily inferred from the method of its organization. Mr. Tubbs, the president, on his cross-examination, at the final accounting, folio 243, tells the story as follows: "The nominal stock of the company was $250,000. There never was anything paid in, in money, by the stockholders. The stock was issued, as paid up stock, for the license under the Brocklebank & Trainer patent, which was owned by Crane, myself, and A. C. Kellogg, under the firm of Crane, Tubbs & Co. The license covered New Jersey. I think all the stock was issued for the license. One half was transferred back to the company as working capital. I think the stock was issued to me and by me transferred. Of the other one half of the stock, issued for the license, the largest part went to Crane, Tubbs & Co. I think there were ten shares issued to each of the directors. Crane and myself received them as such directors; the shares were $100 each, the twelve directors had 120 shares, and the balance of the 1,250 shares went to Tubbs & Co. Those directors who did not serve, did not take their stock."

It does not distinctly appear, how many of the twelve directors accepted the stock thus issued, but, as the Legislature of the State, at the next session (Laws N. J. 1871, p. 312), reduced the number to seven, it is quite probable that some of the gentlemen declined or failed to accept. In any event, all that there was, or is, in the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, except the few shares of stock thus issued to the directors, belonged to Tubbs, Crane & Co., to wit, a license to use the Brocklebank & Trainer patent in laying wooden pavements in New Jersey, upon the payment of a royalty to the patentees of twenty cents for each square yard.

Previous to the time when the charter for the New Jersey Wood Paving Company was obtained, the complainant had entered into several agreements with the city of Elizabeth for laying the Nicholson pavement, one as early as December 4, 1868, for upward of 9,000 square yards on Broad street; another, July 1, 1869, for 1,620 square yards on Grove street; another, July 14, 1869, for 4,244 square yards on Cherry street and another November 15th of the same year, for 10,674 square yards on Grier avenue. Other contracts were made during 1870 and 1871, eight in number, upon as many different streets or avenues, measuring upward of 100,000 square yards. As these continued through a course of years, and largely outnumbered the contracts executed with the defendants, it must be assumed that other reasons than dissatisfaction with the Nicholson pavement constrained the city to enter into the latter, and these reasons are probably founded in the provisions of the supplement of February 9, 1870, which became a law, before any contract was made by the city, to lay the Brocklebank & Trainer pavement.

The first of these was entered into with George W. Tubbs, February 18, 1870, for the improvement of Garden street; the second, on March 18, 1870, for Newark avenue; the third, on April 20, 1870, for Grove street; the fourth, with the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, on July 12, 1870, for Ninth avenue; and the fifth and sixth, with George W. Tubbs, in the month of September, for Sherman and Grier avenues. The owners of half the property upon these streets and avenues had petitioned the common council of the city to contract for the Brocklebank & Trainer pavement, either because they preferred it, or were interested in it, or because the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, who controlled it, had agreed to refund to these gentlemen a portion of the money which should be paid by the taxpayers of the city for having it laid. On this point, the testimony of Geo. W. Tubbs before the master is quite suggestive. He says, p. 59, fol. 235: "There is an item of abatement to directors, amounting to $14,709 66-100. That means, this: when the company was formed, and we were getting the charter, it was agreed with the parties who got the charter, that when we paved in front of their property they should have the benefit of fifty cents a yard. That was deducted out, and thus this item arose. That amount was paid back to them." Statements of that sort rendered it unnecessary for the complainants to show, at whose instance, and for what purpose, the supplement was passed. Such is a detail of the facts of the situation, as derived from the evidence in the case. It is insisted by the counsel of the defendants, that, while this legislation existed, the complainant could not lay the pavements, which had been awarded to the defendants on the application of the majority of land-owners, and hence, that its profits were limited to fifteen cents a square yard by the express terms of its license. Neither branch of this proposition is true in the sense in which it is propounded. In the first place, a preliminary suggestion is, that it would not be quite becoming a court of equity to allow the defendants to profit by their own wrong, and it is that which they ask the court to do.

The improvement of certain streets, in the city of Elizabeth, was deemed desirable, and steps were taken to accomplish it. The Legislature of the state was applied to by certain gentlemen, who obtained the enactment of a law, that practically shut up the city to award the work to the licensees of the Brocklebank & Trainer patent; for, by its provisions, a majority of the land owners controlled the selection, and it was made their interest to demand the laying of that pavement, by having refunded to them a portion of the profits derived from the whole work. Large profits were realized by the licensees from these contracts, but, realized from the use of the complainant's invention. Will the court allow the bulk of these profits to be retained by the infringers, because the complainant could not be a competitor for the work, when it so clearly appears, that whatever disabilities existed in regard to competition, were produced by the infringers themselves?

Again, it is assumed, that the complainant could not lay these pavements, because the property owners had asked for the use of defendants,' and not the complainant's, patent. But is it altogether sure that the Brocklebank & Trainer patent would have been preferred, if it had not been, in fact, the Nicholson invention, with something added? And shall the defendants be allowed to accumulate large gains by using complainant's property, and afterwards, to retain them, upon the plea that complainant could not have made them? Is not this raising a new and false standard for the measure of complainant's damages? In estimating its profits, is it not changing the inquiry from what the defendants actually made, into what the complainant could or could not make? And is not this as remote from the real question, as the exploded inquisition into what the defendants might or might not have made? But, without following these suggestions to their ultimate results, let us look a little closer into the matter, and ascertain whether any contingency arose, which limited the licensees of the Nicholson pavement to the sum of fifteen cents per square yard. Upon what conditions did the licensees, agree with the owner of the patent, to permit third parties to lay the pavement for thirty-one cents per square yard? These were two in number: (1) Where, by reason of the decision of the courts, or otherwise, it was found impracticable for the licensees to obtain contracts for laying it in any town or city of New Jersey; and (2) where the work of constructing the pavement was required by law to be let under public lettings, and open to general competition; neither of which existed in the present case.

Conclusive proof that it had not been found impracticable, by reason of any decisions of the courts or otherwise, for the complainant to obtain contracts to lay the Nicholson pavement in Elizabeth, is discovered in the fact that it entered into a number of contracts for laying such pavement, both before and after the dates of the contracts with the defendants. And after the supplement of February 9, 1870, there could be no public lettings, open to general competition, for street improvements, because that act concluded the city in regard to the patents to be used, by the expressed preference of a majority of land owners on the line of the street, and no one could bid for the work, except the owners or licensees of the particular patent, which the property holders had selected. But let it be admitted that these contingencies in fact existed, what, then, did the licensees agree to do? These two things: (1) "To grant to any town or city, desiring to lay the Nicholson pavement, a license so to do, upon a license fee not to exceed thirty-one cents per square yard." (2) "To publicly authorize any person or persons, desiring to bid at public lettings, to lay the Nicholson pavement" upon the same terms.

In reference to the first, did the city of Elizabeth ever express a desire to lay this pavement upon these streets? Was it not estopped, by the provisions of the law, from having a voice in the matter? Did not the 2d section of the act of 1870, make it the duty of its mayor to veto every contract that the city council should award, which was not in strict accordance with the expressed wishes of a majority of the property owners, in regard to the use of a specified patent? In reference to the second, there is no proof of any public lettings, nor of the existence of persons desiring to bid at them. There could be none, "open to general competition," in any proper sense, after the supplement of 1870; and, if there had been, no bids could have been received and considered for these streets, from persons who proposed to use the complainant's patent. But again, this covenant was between the owner and the licensees of the Nicholson extended patent, and was imposed upon the latter for the benefit of the former. The owner's profit was a royalty of sixteen cents, for every square yard of pavement, laid; and it was their interest to secure the laying of as many square yards as possible, and to guard against the temptation, which such methods of compensation suggest, of putting down a small quantity of pavement, at a large profit, rather than a large quantity at a small profit.

The city of Elizabeth, under the circumstances mentioned in the covenant, could have required the complainant to lay the pavement, at the price limited therein, but did not. These defendants, under the like contingencies, could have bargained to use the complainant's patent, without being guilty of infringement, upon the payment of the prescribed consideration, but did not. On the contrary, in consequence of owning the property on certain streets, or from making it the interest of other property owners, by secret agreements, to pay them a portion of the profits, they secured a request for the laying of the Brocklebank & Trainer pavement, and entirely ignored any arrangements by which the taxpayers of the city might receive the economical advantages resulting to the public, from the terms on which the complainant held the Nicholson patent. Shall it now be said, that a court of equity ought to allow them to invoke, for their protection and immunity against the surrender of their unlawful gains, a covenant between other parties, executed for other purposes, and from the benefit of which they took all available means to exclude themselves and the city of Elizabeth?

It results from the foregoing views, and the court holds: 1. That if the defendants desired an allowance from their ascertained profits, for the benefits contributed to the complainant's invention, by the Brocklebank & Trainer addition, the burden of proof was on them to show to the master, approximately, at least, the extent of the advantages which were added, and the proportion of the profits which were made, by their improvement of the Nicholson combination. 2. That at this stage of the proceedings, where the only question before the master was the one of accounting for the profits realized from the infringement of the complainant's patent, there was no principle of justice or equity that limited the accountability of the defendants to the payment of certain royalties, which, under other circumstances, the complainant might have been compelled to accept as the proper measure of its loss.

We are now brought to the consideration of the exceptions filed to the findings of the master. Before looking at them, it is proper to premise, that there is nothing in the case, which authorizes the court, if it had the power, and were so disposed, to visit upon the defendants any consequences in the nature of a penalty. They were not wanton infringers. They were proceeding under an authority, equal on its face, to that of the complainant, to wit, a patent from the government of the United States, and they had a right to assume, that it was valid until a competent tribunal decided to the contrary. They are not to be treated like another class of infringers—unhappily too large—who, without a pretext of right, seize upon the inventions or the property of others, and trust to the ignorance, or the poverty, or the kindheartedness of the owners, for immunity in retaining their piratical gains. All that the defendants should be required to do, in the present case, is to simply restore to the complainant the money, which the use of its property had enabled them to make.

We will first advert to the exceptions of the complainant.

1. The first is, that the master erred, in not excluding certain evidence, for the reasons assigned, when it was offered. The question which the counsel of the complainant seeks to raise, does not properly come up by exceptions to the master's ruling. His course was, in accordance with the prevailing practice in the circuits, to wit, taking down the testimony; noting the objections of the opposing counsel, and the reasons stated for its incompetency; leaving its admissibility to be determined by the court, on the argument, where the question would arise, on a motion to strike out, by those objecting. Whilst, therefore, we are not willing to say that the exception is well taken, and that the master erred in admitting the testimony and noting the objections, we have no hesitation in holding that, under the reference, the evidence was incompetent. It was offered by the defendants, to show that there were other forms of wooden pavement open to the public, which they might have used, and made the profits, or some portion of the profits, which had been realized in the use of the complainant's invention. It is a sufficient reply to such offer, to observe, that the defendants preferred and used the complainant's property, and made their gains therefrom; and that these gains no less belong to the complainant, because they might have realized other gains by the use of lawful methods.

2. The second objection is not well taken, and seems to misapprehend the action of the master. It alleges that he erred, in "allowing for losses arising from the impossibility of collecting the contract price of the Plainfield pavement, the sum of $3,388.35, such loss being of prospective profits only." The master, in the account, charged the defendants with the whole sum to be received for laying said pavement, $14,223.14. He states, in his report, that the gross profits, charged to defendants, amounted to $123,610.78, only "by assuming that the whole contract price of the Plainfield pavement could be collected." The proof was (fol. 315), that they received on account of said contract $9,273.24 in cash, and $1,561.45 in materials not used, making the aggregate of $10,834.69, and that the residue of the consideration could not be collected. The actual loss, therefore, to the defendants, upon this mode of accounting, was the difference between these amounts, to wit, $3,388.35, which sum the master properly deducted.

3. The third exception objects to the master's allowance of $7,000 to the officers of the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, as reasonable compensation for their services during the year in which the pavements were laid. The six contracts of the defendants, were assigned to, and completed in the name of The New Jersey Wood Paving Company, of which corporation, George W. Tubbs was president, and A. C. Kellogg and William W. Crane were successively treasurers, all of whom acted as general superintendents in the work of laying the pavements. The board of directors voted to these gentlemen, $7,000 a year, as salaries during the time that they held the offices, and performed the labor of superintendence. As the company was engaged in very little other work while these pavements were being laid, the defendants claimed that two years' salary, amounting to $14,000, was only a reasonable allowance to these officers, and that the sum ought to be deducted from the profits which their skill and vigilance had helped to earn. The master reported that all the work was completed within a year, and that one year's salary of $7,000 was a proper compensation. The complainant insists that nothing should be allowed to infringers, from the profits, for personal services rendered, and quotes Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 788, to sustain this view of the law. But, an examination of that case, shows that, the contrary was held. In making up the account, the master there allowed, as deductions from the profits, "the usual salaries of the managing officers," but "refused to allow the extraordinary salaries, which, it appeared by the books, had been paid—being satisfied they were dividends of profit under another name, and put in that guise for concealment and delusion." His action was approved by the court, both as to the allowance and disallowance; and the principle to be extracted from that decision, is, that while courts will rebuke all attempts on the part of infringers to cover up or absorb gains and profits, under the names of salary, or compensation for personal service, yet, in those cases where defendants have not forfeited the favor of the court, by their naked piracy of the rights of others, a reasonable allowance will be made to them from the profits, for their care and skill in directing the execution of the work. As, in the present case, the work was of such magnitude and character that the contracts produced the gross sum of upwards of $300,000, the amount of $7,000 would not seem to be an unusual, or extraordinary remuneration to three competent men for conducting and superintending it.

4. The fourth exception is to the allowance of $6,107.50 for "an expense account," not included in the cost of labor and materials. The allegation, is that, there was no evidence before the master as to the constitution of such amount, or as to the nature of the application or expenditure thereof, or that the same was paid in good faith by the defendants, to other persons, for expenses. The testimony of S. S. Morse, the secretary of the company (fol. 303), was, that this charge was made up by numerous expense bills, for various items that could not be classified, and, therefore, went into the general expense account. He added: "I have an account of the various items, here, and the vouchers." The only cross-examination, on this subject, to which he was subjected, was at folio 341, where, he was asked to explain what he meant by expense account, and replied: "I mean for salaries and such things that I could not class and charge to a particular job." It must be assumed, under these circumstances, that the master was satisfied from an examination into the accounts and vouchers produced, that there was a proper foundation for the charge.

5. The fifth exception complains of the master for allowing $156 76-100 for an account called "a loss and gain account." Such a vague charge demands explanation and none is given. It first appears, at the close of the accounting, in exhibit G, of defendants. We have examined the testimony, and can nowhere find an allusion to, or explanation of, the item. As it seems to be unsupported by evidence, the exception is sustained.

6. The last exception by the complainant is that the master erred in deducting $13,868.42 as royalty, or license fee, paid for laying 69,342 square yards of pavement, under the Brocklebank & Trainer patent. Two reasons are assigned for objecting to the allowance: (1) Because, as to said sum, the defendants have no title as against the complainant. (2) Because the evidence before the master, affirmatively showed, that the same was not paid in good faith by the defendants to other persons for expenses. The defendants were the licensees of Brocklebank & Trainer, and had agreed to give to them, as the owners of the patent, a royalty of twenty cents, for every square yard of pavement, put down. The quantity paid [laid]³ amounted to the above sum, and Mr. Tubbs testified, that it was paid to Brocklebank & Trainer. Mr. Morse, on the other hand, says that the amount was in fact paid by the company, but that $729.80 went to Michael Doyle, and the balance to Captain Tubbs. It does not concern the present inquiry, to whom the money was paid, if it was, in truth, a legitimate expense, to be deducted from the profits. The master makes the allowance, and gives his reason for it in the following words: "Defendant further claimed that there should be allowed, and deducted from the gross profits, $13,868.42, claimed to have been paid as royalty or license fee for laying 69,342 square yards of said pavement, under the Brocklebank & Trainer patent. It appearing that said pavement, decreed in the cause to be an infringement of plaintiff's patent, contains a novel feature, alleged to have been an improvement, and patented, and that the license to lay the same was upon the payment of such license fee, and which has been paid, I find and allow the said sum etc., as a proper deduction."

We have already considered the question, whether the master ought to have made an allowance to the defendants as the licensees of the Brocklebank & Trainer patent, for their addition to the Nicholson invention, and have held that, in the absence of affirmative proof, on the part of the defendants, of its value, he was justified in giving no credit for such addition. But here we have a different question. The contracts on which the profits were realized, were for the use of the Brocklebank & Trainer pavement. No other could be put down. The defendants had bargained to pay the above sum to its owners, whenever they used the patent, and, so far as it appears, had made the bargain in good faith. It was an expense necessary to be incurred, in order to fulfil their contracts. They agreed to pay, and did in fact pay, twenty cents a square yard for the Brocklebank & Trainer improvement. Perhaps the improvement did not contribute, so much as that, towards the aggregate profits of the enterprise. It is difficult to apportion in such cases. But, if it did not, is not the burden of proof here shifted, and ought not the complainant, to have shown affirmatively, that the expenditure, thus made, was unnecessary, or extravagant in amount? This was evidently the view which the master took, and, in default of such proof, we are not prepared to affirm that he erred in allowing the payment as a deduction from the profits.

We have now reached the defendants' exceptions, but, as the principles upon which most of them rest, have been incidentally discussed in the foregoing opinion, it will not be necessary to allude to them in detail. It is sufficient to say, that they have all been carefully considered, and, in our judgment, must all be overruled, except the 9th, in regard to the allowance of interest by the master. Whatever might have been the opinion of the court, as to their action in this respect, if the question had been open, we are constrained to say, on the authority of Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [51 U. S.] 653, that the case before us, is not one where interest should be allowed, until after the final decree. However much that case differs from this, in regard to the contribution to the aggregate profits, by the use of constituents in the infringing process, not belonging to the patentee who complained of the infringement, it is the same in regard to the defendants' liability to interest on the profits; and the reasons assigned by the supreme court for sustaining the exceptions to the master's report, allowing interest there, are precisely applicable here. Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion, in the conclusion of which he said: "The defendant should not have been charged with interest before the final decree. The profits which are recoverable against an infringer of a patent, are, in fact, a compensation for the injury the patentee has sustained from the invasion of his right. They are the measure of his damages. Though called profits, they are really damages, and unliquidated, until the decree is made. Interest is not generally allowable upon unliquidated damages. We will not say, that in no possible case can interest be allowed. It is enough that the case in hand does not justify such an allowance. The defendant manufactured the wheels, of which the complaint is made, under the patent granted to him in 1861. His infringement of the complainant's patent was not wanton. He had before him the judgment of the patent office, that his process was not an invasion of the patent granted to the complainant, and though this does not protect him against responsibility for damage, it ought to relieve him from liability to interest on profit." There must be a decree for the complainant, for the amount reported due by the master, to wit; $91,423.91, after first deducting therefrom $16,538.51, the interest allowed by him, and adding thereto $156.76, which he improperly deducted from the acknowledged gross profits.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken by the defendants to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed so far as it affected the New Jersey Wood Paving Company, but reversed as to the other defendants, the city of Elizabeth and George W. Tubbs. The court held that a decree for an injunction should have been rendered to prevent them from constructing such pavement during the term of the patent, but that they could not be held accountable for profits, this bill having been filed before the passage of the act of July 8, 1870, (16 Stat. 198,) which first authorized courts of equity to allow damages in addition to profits. In considering this aspect of the case, Mr. Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Though the defendant's business be ever so profitable, if the use of the invention has not contributed to the profits none can be recovered. The same result would seem to follow where it is impossible to show the profitable effect of using the invention upon the business results of the party infringing. * * * The party who made the profit by the construction of the pavement in question was the New Jersey Wood Paving Company. The city of Elizabeth made no profit at all. It paid the same for putting down the pavement in question that it was paying to the defendants in error for putting down the Nicholson; but damages are not sought, or, at least, are not recoverable, in this suit. Profits only, as such, can be recovered therein." The court held that the evidence was that the city and Tubbs, whose only relation to the transaction was the salary he received for superintending the work, made no profits at all. As to the foreign patents relied upon by the defense, it was held that none of them combine the elements, or combination of elements, of Nicholson's, and therefore present no ground for invalidating his patents. As to the other defense, growing out of the alleged public use of Nicholson's pavement for six years before applying for a patent, it appeared that Nicholson, with the consent of the owners of a public road near Boston, had put down some of his new pavement at his own expense, and for experimental purposes only. The learned justice remarked that "the nature of a street pavement is such that it cannot be experimented upon satisfactorily, except on a highway, which is always public," and, further, that "had the city of Boston or other parties used the invention, by laying down the pavement in other streets and places, with Nicholson's consent and allowance, then, indeed, the invention itself would have been in public use, within the meaning of the law; but this was not the case. * * * Nicholson did not let it go beyond his control. He did nothing that indicated any intent to do so. He kept it under his own eyes, and never for a moment abandoned the intent to obtain a patent for it." City of Elizabeth v. American Nicholson Pavement Co., 97 U. S. 126.]

[The patent involved in this litigation, No. 11,491, was granted August 8, 1854, to S. Nicholson, reissued December 1, 1865, No. 1,583, and August 20, 1867, No. 2,748. The first reissue was involved in Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Hatch, Case No. 10,251. The second reissue was involved in the case to which this note is appended, and in *Nicholson Pavement Co. v. AMERICAN NICHOLSON PAVEMENT CO. v. ELIZABETH et al.

[1 Ban. & A. 463; 6 O. G. 772.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct., 1874.

APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT—REQUISITES—AMOUNT OF BOND.

1. Where the decree is for recovery of money not otherwise secured, the practice of the court, upon an allowance of an appeal from the circuit to the supreme court, requiring a bond, with one or more sureties, for double the amount of the decree and costs, should not be departed from, except in cases where the appellee is made secure in other ways, and where such requirement, under some special circumstances, will operate as a hardship on the appellant.

2. The practice of requiring the bond to be in double the amount ought not always to be insisted on, as the law does not require that the security should be in any fixed proportion to the decree. It is only necessary that it should be sufficient.

3. The case of Stafford v. Union Bank, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 135, considered.

Jersey Wood Paving Company, for an injunction restraining the infringement of patent No. 11,491, and its several reissues. Decree for complainant. American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. City of Elizabeth, Case No. 311; Id. 309. Heard on application to determine the amount of bond to be given upon allowance of appeal to the supreme court. The decree was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court. 97 U. S. 126.]

C. A. Seward, for complainant.
Keller & Blake, for defendants.

NIXON, District Judge. This is an application to the court to determine the amount of the bond and security to be given on the allowance of an appeal to the supreme court. The 56th section of the patent act of July 8, 1870, (16 Stat. 207,) allows a writ of error, on appeal to the supreme court from any judgment or decree of a circuit court, in any case at law or in equity, touching patent rights, in the same manner, and under the same circumstances, as in other judgments and decrees of such circuit courts, without regard to the value or sum in controversy. The 22d section of the judiciary act, (1 Stat. 73,) as modified by the 2d section of the act of March 3, 1803, (2 Stat. 244,) prescribes the conditions and circumstances under which writs of error and appeals may be brought, and enacts, that every justice or judge, signing a citation on any writ, shall take good and sufficient security, that the plaintiff in error, or appellant, shall prosecute his writ to effect, and answer all damages and costs, if he fail to make his plea good. By the act of December 12, 1794, (1 Stat. 404,) passed to amend and explain the above recited section, the security to be required and taken, on the signing of a citation, or any writ of error, which shall not be a supersedeas and stay execution, shall be only to such amount, as, in the opinion of the judge taking the same, shall be sufficient to answer all such costs, as, upon the affirmance of the judgment or decree, may be adjudged to the respondent in error.

In order that the writ may operate as a supersedeas, and stay the execution, it is necessary that a copy should be lodged for the adverse party in the clerk's office, where the record remains, within ten days, Sundays exclusive, after rendering the judgment or passing the decree complained of, and, also, that the bond, approved by the judge, allowing the writ, should be filed there. It is true, that by the 11th section of the act of June 1, 1872, (17 Stat. 198,) a supersedeas may be obtained, if security be given and the bond approved by the judge within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment or signing the decree; but, it has been held, that such a supersedeas stays the proceedings, only, after the filing of the bond, and, that all liens, previously acquired, remain. Commissioners of Boise Co. v. Gorman, [19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 661.] In furtherance of the objects of the foregoing legislation, rule No. 29 of the supreme court, prescribes that: "Supersedeas bonds, in the circuit courts, must be taken, with good and sufficient security, that the plaintiff in error or appellant shall prosecute his writ of appeal to effect, and answer all damages and costs, if he fail to make his plea good; such indemnity, where the judgment or decree is for the recovery of money not otherwise secured, must be for the whole amount of the judgment or decree, including just damages for delay and costs and interest on the appeal."

A final decree was entered against all the defendants, The New Jersey Wood Paving Company, George W. Tubbs, and the city of Elizabeth, as joint trust-feasors or infringers, on the — day of —, A. D. 1874, for the sum of $— and costs. No execution has been issued, and one of the objects to be gained by filing the bond, is to obtain a supersedeas, under the act of June 1, 1872. If this were not desirable, an appeal could be had by giving the bond in a sum sufficient to cover the costs that may be adjudged to the respondent in error, by virtue of the provisions of the act of December 12, 1794. In cases of this sort, where, in the language of the 29th rule, "the decree is for the recovery of money not otherwise secured," the practice of the court, heretofore, has been to require a bond, with one or more sureties, for double the amount of the decree and costs, and such practice should not be departed from, except in those cases where the appellee is made secure in other ways, and where such requirement, under some special circumstances, will operate as a hardship on the appellant. In the present case, the court is asked to approve of the bond of the defendants alone, not requiring any other security, and the application is based upon two conditions: First, because the decree, binding the real estate of the defendants, is itself a sufficient security; and, second, because the bond of one of the defendants, the city of Elizabeth, gives to the complainant all the indemnity which ought to be demanded.

The reply to the first is, that under the laws of the state of New Jersey (Nix. Dig. tit. "Executions," §§ 3, 4), the lien of the decree is liable to be divested by younger decrees or judgments, upon which executions may be issued. The reply to the second is, that if it be true, as was alleged by the counsel of the defendants, and, we doubt not, honestly, that the bond of one of the defendants is ample security for the whole decree, then sureties can be obtained without difficulty, as no pecuniary risk or damage is run by third persons in entering upon the bond; and, if it is not true, then justice to the complainant suggests that additional security should be required.

In Stafford v. Union Bank, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 135, it was this last consideration which seemed to have weight with the supreme court in its refusal to sanction the diminution of the amount of the bond, because other security had been given. The case was this: A bill was filed in the district court of Texas for the foreclosure of a mortgage on certain slaves, then in the possession of parties who had hired their labor. The court appointed a receiver, to receive all sums of money accruing from their hire pendente lite, and required him to give bonds in the aggregate penalty of $40,000, for the faithful discharge of his duties. The hirers of the slaves also executed bonds, in the penal sum of $80,000 for the safe keeping and delivering of the slaves. A final decree was rendered February 25, 1854, by which it was directed, that the sums accruing from the hire of the slaves, in the custody of the receiver, amounting to $25,379, should be paid by the receiver to the complainant, and credited on the total amount due from the defendants; and that, in case the defendants failed to pay the balance remaining due after such credit, amounting to $39,877, on the 1st of July, 1854, they should be foreclosed of their equity of redemption, and the master should seize and sell the slaves at public auction, etc., and pay to the complainant, out of the proceeds of the sale, the foregoing sum of $39,877, in satisfaction of the debt. On the tenth day after the entry of the said decree, the defendants prayed an appeal, which the court granted, upon the condition that they should enter into a bond, with sureties, in the penal sum of $10,000, conditioned to prosecute their appeal with effect, and answer all damages and costs. Objections being interposed, by complainant, to the amount of the bond, the court overruled them, on the ground that the bonds of the receiver and of the hirers of the slaves, with good and sufficient sureties, in the aggregate sum of $120,000, were, in fact, for the benefit of the complainant, and that the only additional security he ought to demand, was, for the special damages which might be imposed by the supreme court for the delay.

It was held that the court below erred in taking security for less than the whole amount of the decree, and that the two facts above named—first, that the receiver appointed by the court had given bonds for a large amount, and, second, that the persons, to whom the mortgaged property had been hired, had executed security for its safe keeping and delivery—did not relieve the judge from the obligation, under the law, of requiring security, on the appeal bond, equal to the amount of the decree. And Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court, remarked: "The hardship of this rule," i. e., demanding of the appellant, a bond for the full amount of the decree. "is more imaginary, than real. * * * If the receiver has given security, in $40,000, faithfully to pay over the money in his hands, and if those persons who employed the slaves have given bond in $80,000 for the safe keeping and delivery of them, and the sureties are good, the appellant can have no difficulty in giving the security on his appeal to the amount of the decree in the district court. It is true, the property is taken out of his possession and control, but it is in possession of persons who gave bonds for its safe keeping and delivery when required, a part of it, in payment of the decree, and the residue, to be sold in satisfaction of the balance of the decree. In this condition of the property, if the transaction be bona fide (and it may be presumed to be fair, as the arrangement was made under the order of the court,) the responsibility on the appeal bond can be little more than nominal."

The counsel for the defendants invited the attention of the court to the case of Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 153, where the supreme court seemed to depart from the principle of Stafford v. Union Bank, supra; but nothing was done in that case, which would sustain this court, in approving the bond of the defendants, without requiring any other security. There, the decree had been for $310,753, and the judge of the circuit, following the usual practice, had demanded a bond in double the amount of the decree. Application was made to the supreme court for the reduction of the sum; and, it appearing to the court, that the defendants had given security, in part, by the deposit of the bond of the United States and other private bonds, in the sum of $200,000, the appellant was allowed to withdraw the bond then on file, upon filing a bond, in lieu thereof, in the sum of $225,000, with good and sufficient sureties. It will be observed, that the court founded its action, in that case, on the fact, first, that the appellant had already placed under the control of the court actual assets of the value of not less than $200,000, for the benefit of the appellee, and, second, upon the further consideration that the substituted bond for $225,000 should be executed with good and sufficient sureties. The chief justice, indeed, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, that the usual practice of requiring the bond in double the amount, ought not always to be insisted on, as the law did not require that the security should be in any fixed proportion to the decree. It was only necessary that it should be sufficient. Such a suggestion addresses itself to the reason of the court, especially, in those cases where the decree is for a large sum, and it was acted on, by this court, in the case of New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Wetherill, [Case No. 17,464,] in which the decree was for upward of $300,000. We added to that, a sum, reckoned large enough, to cover all possible increase for interest, costs, and damages for delay, and directed that the bonds should be executed only for such amount. It was not doubted, in that case, but that the property of the appellant, bound by the decree, was more than sufficient to pay the decree, interest, damages, and costs; and that the bond of the appellant, without other security, was ample for every probable liability arising from the affirmance of the decree on the appeal. Yet, it did not seem to occur, either to the counsel, or the court, that anything less, ought to be offered or accepted, than approved sureties in addition to the bond.

We do not think, in the present case, that the appellants should be required to give bond in double the amount of the decree. One hundred thousand dollars will entirely secure all that the appellee, under any conceivable circumstances, will be entitled to claim on affirmation of the decree of the circuit court, and, if all the defendants unite in a bond in that penalty, conditioned to prosecute their appeal to effect, and answer all damages and costs against either of the defendants, with good and sufficient sureties, it will be approved by the court.

AMERICAN NICHOLSON PAVEMENT CO. v. ELIZABETH et al.

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. May 13, 1873.*

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — DIFFERENT FORMS IN ONE PATENT—REISSUE—DILIGENCE—ABANDONMENT—INFRINGEMENT.

1. When the commissioner grants a reissue, the courts must assume that he has examined and found that all the necessary conditions existed which authorized him to perform the act, and that the invention described in the reissued letters patent is the same as the invention claimed in the original letters patent.

2. As the two forms of pavement described in Nicholson's letters patent are related to a like subject, and in their nature are connected together, and as the elements necessary for the construction of the one are substantially used in the other, no objections can be properly raised because both forms are included in the one patent.

3. Where the patentee, when he applied for his patent, evidently attached more importance to one form of his invention than the other, but afterwards changed his opinion and reissued, laying more stress on the second form, such modification of opinion on his part does not disturb the fact that both forms were described, though imperfectly, in his first specifications.

4. The question of diligence is not an absolute, but a relative one, and must be considered in reference to the subject-matter of the experiments.

5. In Nicholson's invention, in all calculations as to cost, which necessarily involved the fact of durability, long use and lapse of time were essential ingredients.

†[Affirmed by supreme court as to one defendant, but reversed as to the other two, in City of Elizabeth v. American Nicholson Pavement Co., 97 U. S. 126.]

6. Where the patentee allowed six years to elapse after putting down his pavement, before applying for a patent; Held, that in the absence of all intent, and in the face of a manifest contrary intent, the court will not infer, from the facts of the case, that there was any such public use of the invention, or any such dedication or abandonment, by the inventor, as would avoid the patent.

[See note to American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. City of Elizabeth, Case No. 309.]

7. The use of the invention described and claimed in letters patent for improved pavement, granted Brocklebank and Trainer, July 12, 1869, is an infringement of the first and second claims of complainant's patent.

8. If it is granted that these additions contained in this patent are valuable improvements, they are nevertheless grafted upon the Nicholson pavement, and cannot be used in connection with it without the consent of its owners.

The claims of the reissue are as follows: "1. Placing a continuous foundation or support, as above described, directly upon the roadway; then arranging thereon a series of blocks, having parallel sides, endwise in rows, so as to leave a continuous narrow groove or channel-way between each row, and then filling said grooves or channel-ways with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like materials. 2. I claim the formation of a pavement by laying a foundation directly upon the roadway, substantially as described, and then employing two sets of blocks—one a principal set of blocks that shall form the wooden surface of the pavement when completed, and an auxiliary set of blocks or strips of board, which shall form no part of the surface of the pavement, but determine the width of the groove between the principal blocks, and also the filling of said groove, when so formed between the principal blocks, with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material. 3. Placing a continuous foundation or support, as above described, directly upon the roadway, and then arranging thereon a series of blocks having parallel sides endwise in a checkered manner, so as to leave a series of checkered spaces or cavities between said blocks, and then filling said checkered cavities with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material. 4. I claim the formation of a pavement by laying a foundation directly upon the roadway, substantially as above described, and then employing two sets of blocks, viz.: One a principal set of blocks that shall form the wooden surface of the pavement, and an auxiliary set of blocks that shall form no part of the wooden surface of the pavement, but determine the dimensions of the tessellated cavities between the principal blocks, and then filling said tessellated cavities with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material." The issues in the case and the material facts are fully set forth in the opinion of the court.

C. A. Seward and B. Williamson, for complainants.

C. F. Blake and C. M. Keller, for defendants.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a bill in equity for an injunction and an account, for an alleged infringement by the defendants of a patent granted to Samuel Nicholson, for an improvement in wooden pavements, on August 8, 1854. The bill set forth that the said Nicholson surrendered the original letters patent issued to him as aforesaid, and obtained a reissue upon corrected descriptions and specifications, December 1, 1863; that he afterward surrendered these reissued letters patent, and obtained another reissue on August 20, 1867; that he died intestate on January 6, 1868; and that letters of administration were duly issued to George T. Bigelow, who, as administrator, applied to the commissioner of patents, by petition, on July 7, 1868, for a renewal and extension of said patent, and that the same was renewed and extended for the period of seven years from August 8, 1868; that by mesne assignments in writing from the said Bigelow, administrator, etc., the complainant had become the sole owner of the said extended patent for the state of New Jersey, except so much of said state as is embraced within the corporate limits of Jersey City. The bill further alleges that the validity of the said original and reissued letters patent has been settled and established by long and extensive use and by public acquiescence, and also by judicial determination, and that the defendants have infringed the same by constructing and using a wooden pavement or pavements in the city of Elizabeth, embracing the invention or improvement contained in the last reissued letters patent, or the substantial or material parts thereof.

The answer of the defendants sets up substantially these defenses:

1. They deny that Samuel Nicholson was the original and first inventor of the improved wooden pavement described in his letters patent.

2. They allege that the reissued letters patent are fraudulent and void, as covering and including many things not invented by Nicholson, and not described and claimed in his original letters patent.

3. That the complainant's patent is void for want of novelty.

4. That the alleged invention was in public use, with the knowledge and consent of Nicholson, long prior to his application for letters patent, and that such public use worked an abandonment and dedicated the invention to the public.

Admitting that they had constructed and laid, and were then constructing and laying, certain wooden pavements in the city of Elizabeth, under and in accordance with letters patent granted to the defendants, Brocklebank and Trainer, dated January 12, 1869, they deny that by so doing they have infringed upon the rights of complainants. I have examined the testimony taken by the parties, and have given to the arguments of counsel the attention which their marked ability and learning, and the large interests involved, seemed to demand; and I will briefly state the conclusions that I have reached, without stopping now to detail the reasons which led me to such conclusions.

The complainant's patent, if valid, is doubtless for a combination. The several parts that make up the structure are:

1. A continuous foundation directly upon the roadway.

2. A series of blocks, with parallel sides, standing endwise in rows, that form the wooden surface of the pavement.

3. An auxiliary set of blocks or strips of board, which form no part of the surface, but determine the width of the grooves between the principal blocks.

4. The filling of the grooves, when so formed, between the principal blocks with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material.

It is not claimed that any one of these parts is new, but that in their combination they produce a new and useful result.

1. Was Nicholson the original and first inventor, or is the patent void for want of novelty? I have carefully examined the copies of specifications and the large number of models produced, representing the pavements described in eighteen English patents issued previous to the date of the Nicholson patent; and, while nearly all of them have one or more of its elements, I find that none of them, except perhaps the Hosking patent, to which I shall allude hereafter, suggests the combination which Nicholson has made.

There are strong presumptions in favor of the novelty of Nicholson's invention. The issue of the patent, its reissue, its extension by the commissioner, its long use and the public acquiescence, the judgment of competent legal tribunals, where the question of its novelty was directly involved—are all facts to be taken into the account. The burden is upon the defendants to rebut and overthrow these presumptions, which, in the opinion of the court, they have failed to do.

2. Are the reissued letters patent fraudulent and void because they cover and include more than Nicholson invented, described, and claimed in his original letters patent? The patent act authorized a surrender of the original letters and a reissue for the residue of the term, when the patent first granted should be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention, more than he had a right to claim as new, if the error had arisen from inadvertency, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention. It is an appeal to the judgment of the commissioner, and when he grants a reissue, the court must assume that he has examined and found that all the necessary conditions existed which authorized him to perform the act, and that the invention described in the reissued letters patent is the same as the invention claimed in the original letters patent. The only exceptions to such an inference are, where it appears upon the face of the patent itself that the commissioner has clearly exceeded his authority, or where the new patent has been procured by fraud or by collusion between the commissioner and the patentee. There is no proof of fraud or collusion, and a comparison of the specification and claim of the original patent with the corrected and amended description of the two reissues, establishes the fact, I think, beyond question, that he included nothing in the latter which was not fairly indicated and suggested in the former. The original patent was for improved wooden pavements. He specifies and claims therein the invention of a pavement which may be constructed in one of two forms—either by using the long and short blocks, or "by arranging the long blocks side by side and in rows transversely of the roadway, and with spaces between each two rows of them, in each of which spaces a strip of board may be introduced, the width of the board being equal to about half the length of the blocks." As these are related to a like subject, and in their nature are connected together, and as the elements necessary for the construction of the one are substantially used in the other, no objections can be properly raised, because both forms are included in the one patent. It is quite evident that when the first patent was applied for, and the first surrender and reissue made, the inventor attached more importance to, and expected greater results from, the former than from the latter mode of construction; but his experiments afterward changed his views in this respect, and in his reissue of August 20, 1867, his first and second claims are for the pavement with continuous transverse grooves made by the introduction of boards, for the infringement of which the present suit is brought. But such modification of opinion on his part as to their relative value, does not disturb the fact that both forms were described, although imperfectly, in his first specifications.

3. Has there been such a public use of the invention, such a dedication of it to the public, or such an abandonment by the patentee, as to void the patent? As these acts are closely related to each other in their essential qualities, and as the several questions grow out of one transaction, I shall consider them together. The transaction was this: The inventor was the treasurer of the Boston and Roxbury Mill Corporation—a private company chartered by the legislature of Massachusetts on June 14, 1814. The act incorporating it is made an exhibit in the case, and it appears from the third section that it was authorized to make and finish a dam from Charles street, in Boston, to the upland at Sewall's Point, in Brookline; to connect the different parts thereof by bridges and causeways so as to render the same a good and substantial road, suitable for the passing of men, loaded teams, and carriages of all kinds; and, when finished, railed at the sides and furnished with lamps, to receive tolls for passing over the same. It was a private road over the dam, about thirty feet in width and one mile in length, with two bridges, and all under the exclusive control of the corporation. There was a toll-gate and house on the southerly side of the road, near one of the bridges. Nicholson was appointed treasurer of the company in 1833, and while acting in that position—to wit, on August 4, 1847—he filed a caveat in the office of the commissioner of patents. His petition represents that "he has discovered or invented certain new and useful improvements in street or road pavements, and that he was then engaged in making experiments for the purpose of perfecting the same, preparatory for depositing at the patent office of the United States a correct specification thereof, in view to obtain letters patent therefor. He desires to obtain an exclusive property in his said invention or discovery, and prays that said caveat may be considered as the preliminary application or petition required by law to be made in order to obtain letters patent; and that his right in the said invention or discovery may be protected until he shall have matured the same." In the description annexed to the caveat, he states his invention or improvement to be as follows:

"Wooden blocks are cut from joists of about four inches square, one-half of which are cut eight inches long, the other half are cut four inches long. They are placed side by side on the prepared earth, the ends being upward, and in alternate position of long and short blocks, so that no two blocks of the same length will stand together, but so as to present a checkered surface. The lower ends being on a level, the upper will present alternate open squares of about four inches by four inches deep. Into said openings a small quantity of coarse salt is first put, then small broken stone is firmly rammed, so that the whole surface of the pavement is firm and level; then tar is poured over the whole surface, after which a sprinkling of sand or gravel. * * * Instead of broken stone and tar, used in the spaces above named, any other material or cement may answer as well, the design being to use something which will expand as the wood contracts, by which a hard surface prevents water from penetrating to rot the wood. * * * The earth may be prepared to receive the pavement, by covering the surface with paper saturated with tar or other preventive to moisture rising to rot the under surface of the blocks." The checkered pavement only is here specifically described, but the combination for which he afterward received his patent is suggested. And that this combination was in his mind, is proved by the fact that in the following summer, and as he stated to the witness Nutting, at his own expense, he caused to be laid on the dam opposite to the toll-house a piece of wooden pavement about seventy-five feet in length and of the width of the turnpike road, constructed in three different forms, to wit: 1. The checkered form, with long and short blocks. 2. The transverse channel form, with long blocks and strips, and with concrete filling. 3. The circular form, composed of small round logs of equal length set close together, with the intervening spaces filled with concrete. The foundation of a part was composed of boards or wood, and in other places it consisted of tar and sand. Both modes were used to ascertain, by experiment, which would best accomplish the desired results of an even, solid earth-bed, and a preventive of moisture being absorbed from the ground by the under blocks. Section 12 of the act of July 4, 1836, under which the foregoing caveat was filed, authorizes any person who shall have invented any new art, machine, or improvement thereof, and shall desire further time to mature the same, upon payment of twenty dollars, to file in the patent office a caveat, setting forth the design and purpose thereof, and its principal and distinguishing characteristics, and praying protection of his right till he shall have matured his invention. Such caveat is filed in the confidential archives of the office, and preserved in secrecy. The obvious design of this section is to afford to inventors the opportunity of perfecting their discoveries and inventions. To prevent an abuse of the privilege, it is further provided that if an application is made by any other person, within one year from the time of filing the caveat, for a patent of any invention with which it may in any respect interfere, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to deposit the descriptions, specifications, drawings, and model in confidential archives of the office, and to give notice by mail to the person filing the caveat of such application, who shall, within three months after receiving the notice, if he would avail himself of the benefits of his caveat, file his description, specifications, drawings, and model. If no such application is made, the caveator has a reasonable time in which to mature his invention or discovery; and when his letters patent are issued, if he have used due diligence, he has the right to have his matured invention incorporated into his patent, and to supersede those that have intervened between the date of his first discovery and his subsequent taking out of the patent. Curt. Pat. § 270. It is impossible to read the testimony in reference to laying this section of the pavement upon the dam, and the conduct and declarations of Nicholson respecting it, without reaching the conclusion that he was making an honest experiment, and that the caveat was filed by him for protection while he was engaged in it. It was a private corporation, and the roadway was under his control as treasurer. It was a favorable spot to test the strength and durability of the pavement, because heavily laden teams stopped and started in front of the toll-gate. He was not exposing to the public the mode of its construction, because that could not be learned from the portion exposed to the public view, and no one had a right to disturb it. But he allowed six years to elapse after putting down the three forms of pavement before he applied for the patent. Was this using reasonable diligence? The question of diligence is not an absolute, but relative one, and must be considered in reference to the subject-matter of the experiments. Could the value and practical utility of such an invention be sooner ascertained? In all calculations as to cost, which necessarily involved the fact of durability, long use and lapse of time were essential ingredients. In the absence of all intent, and indeed in the face of a manifest contrary intent, I am not willing to infer from the facts of the case that there was any such public use of the invention, or any such dedication or abandonment, by the inventor, as would avoid the patent afterward issued to Nicholson. As the foregoing view of the legal effect of the caveat, and the experiments under it, and the patent afterward issued, carries the invention of Nicholson back to a period of time antedating the English patent of Hosking, it does not seem necessary for me now to consider whether or not the former infringes the latter. It will hardly be contended that when Nicholson laid on the Milldam road his pavement, with long blocks and transverse slips and grooves, in the month of July, 1848, he derived his knowledge of such a combination of elements from a patent, the specifications of which were not enrolled in the foreign office until March, 1850.

4. The only question remaining is the one of infringement. The defendants acknowledge that they have constructed and laid, and are constructing and laying, the pavement in the city of Elizabeth, which the complainants, in their bill, allege infringes their patent, but justify under certain letters patent issued to two of the defendants, Brocklebank and Trainer, on January 12, 1869. I have examined this patent and the specifications and claim annexed to it, and, conceding all that the patentees claim for it, its use must be regarded as an infringement of the combination embraced in the complainant's patent. They state, in their schedule, that "the invention relates to improvements in wood pavements, and consists in an improved arrangement of the same, whereby the flooring is strengthened and adapted for the better securing of the vertical blocks to the flooring." They then describe the flooring, vertical blocks, strips between the blocks secured to the floor by nailing, and spaces between the blocks and above the strips filled with tar, gravel, cement, or other substance in the usual manner. Their claim is for "the combination of the bed, transverse strips, and vertical blocks, when the latter are rebated, either on one or both sides, and either with dovetail rebates or otherwise, and the said strips fitted to the rebates and secured to the bed, all substantially as and for the purpose specified." If you add to this the filling of the grooves, or spaces between the vertical blocks and above the strips, with some concrete substance, which must be done before the pavement is of any practical value, you have undoubtedly the Nicholson combination, having added to it, however, rebates upon one or both sides of the blocks of dovetail or vertical form, which addition, it is claimed, is an improvement, in more securely fastening to the flooring both the blocks and strips, and in the equalization of the pressure upon the pavement, and its distribution over a larger surface. If it be granted that these additions are valuable improvements, they are nevertheless merely grafted upon the Nicholson patent, and can not be used in connection with it without the consent of its owners. The affidavits of Brocklebank and Trainer, taken in 1868, to be used upon the application of the administrator of Nicholson for an extension of the Nicholson patent, and exhibited in this case, fully disclose the estimate in which the patent was held by these defendants. They not only recognize its novelty, but are very extravagant in their praises of its utility and value. Not mentioning their specification of its merits in particular cases, they are of opinion that its general introduction into the streets of the cities and towns of the United States would save to the people in various ways, in the next seven years, from five to seven hundred millions of dollars. If it be commendable in them to strive to make it more useful by improvements, it is hardly just that they should seek to rob such a benefactor of his race of the glory of his invention, or deprive his legal representatives of the profits from the extension, which they did so much, I doubt not honestly, to obtain. I am of the opinion that the patent of the defendants infringes the first and second claims of the extended patent of the complainant, and that a decree should be entered according to the prayer of the bill.

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. June, 1870.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—FORMER JUDGMENT AND DECREE—INFRINGEMENT—PAVEMENT.

1. A former judgment and decree, although against other parties, raises a strong presumption that the patent is valid. A former decree, coupled with the fact that the right of the patentee has been extensively acknowledged, is sufficient to establish prima facie the title of the patentee, and justify a preliminary injunction against any clear infringement. It must be held as to all matters directly adjudicated by former decrees, that they make a prima facie case against the defendant.

[Cited in Page v. Holmes Burglar Alarm Tel. Co., 2 Fed. 337.]

2. A preliminary injunction is always an extraordinary exercise of judicial powers. Its purpose is to preserve the existing state of things until the rights of the parties can be fairly investigated. It is not to be used for any other purpose.

[Cited in Page v. Holmes Burglar Alarm Tel. Co., 2 Fed. 337; R. E. Dietz Co. v. C. T. Ham Manuf'g Co., 47 Fed. 322.]

3. A preliminary injunction looks forward to a trial, and when it is of no importance to preserve things as they are when the injunction is asked for, it will not be granted.

4. A preliminary injunction ought never to be issued unless the right of a patentee is an established or admitted one, and unless the alleged invasion of the right is proved beyond reasonable doubt.

[Cited in R. E. Dietz Co. v. C. T. Ham Manuf'g Co., 47 Fed. 322; Stahl v. Williams, 52 Fed. 651.]

5. There are cases in which change of form may destroy a combination, as those in which form is necessary to secure the beneficial result, and where a change of form of one or more of the things combined works a different result.

6. Upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, it is not without weight that experts differ in opinion respecting the matter.

7. A preliminary injunction against infringement can not be resorted to for the purpose of compelling a city to give a contract to the complainants rather than to their competitors, though the latter were the lowest bidders.

[8. Cited in Sargent Manuf'g Co. v. Woodruff, Case No. 12,368, to the point that a grant of letters patent raises a presumption that the invention patented is not an infringement of an earlier patent.]

Subsequently, upon the merits, decree was entered for complainant, (American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. City of Elizabeth, Case No. 311;) and, upon exceptions to the master's report, a decree was entered for complainant for a specific amount, (Id. 309.) Defendants appealed to the supreme court, where that decree was reversed as to the city of Elizabeth and George W. Tubbs, but affirmed as to the New Jersey Wood Pavement Company, the other defendant. City of Elizabeth v. American Nicholson Pavement Co., 97 U. S. 126. For a report of hearing upon an application for the determination of the amount of security to be given on an allowance of an appeal to the supreme court, see American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. City of Elizabeth, Case No. 310.]

This was a motion for a provisional injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing letters patent for an "improved wooden pavement," granted to Samuel Nicholson, August 8, 1854, reissued December 1, 1863, again reissued August 20, 1867, and extended to the administrator of Nicholson for seven years from August 8, 1868, and assigned, for a portion of the state of New Jersey, to complainants. The claims of the original and first reissued patents will be found in the report of the case of Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Hatch, [Case No. 10,251.] The claims of the last reissue were as follows: "I. Placing a continuous foundation or support, as above described, directly upon the roadway, then arranging thereon a series of blocks having parallel sides, endwise in rows, so as to have a continuous narrow groove or channel-way between each row, and then filling said grooves or channel-ways with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like materials. II. The formation of a pavement by laying a foundation directly upon the road-way, substantially as described, and then employing two sets of blocks, one a principal set of blocks, that shall form the wooden surface of the pavement when completed, and an auxiliary set of blocks or strips of board, which shall form no part of the surface of the pavement, but determine the width of the groove, between the principal blocks, and also the filling of said groove, when so formed between the principal blocks, with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material. III. Placing a continuous foundation or support, as above described, directly upon the roadway, and then arranging thereon a series of blocks having parallel sides, endwise in a checkered manner, so as to leave a series of checkered spaces or cavities between said blocks, and then filling said checkered cavities with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material. IV. The formation of a pavement by laying a foundation directly upon the road-way, substantially as above described, and then employing two sets of blocks, viz: one a principal set of blocks that shall form the wooden surface of the pavement; but determine the dimensions of the tasseled cavities between the principal blocks, and then filling said tasseled cavities with broken stone, gravel, and tar, or other like material."

Before STRONG, Circuit Justice, and McKENNAN, Circuit Judge.

STRONG, Circuit Justice. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendants from making or constructing a wooden pavement containing the improvements and inventions described in a patent owned by the complainants, and set forth in their bill. The affidavits and exhibits presented in support of the motion show, that on August 8, 1854, a patent was granted to Samuel Nicholson for an improved wooden pavement; that in 1863 this patent was surrendered, and new letters patent were issued for the same invention; that in 1867 the reissued letters were surrendered, and other letters patent were issued for the remainder of the term of fourteen years; that the letters last mentioned were extended to the administrator of Nicholson for a period of seven years from August 8, 1868, and that the complainants have, by assignment, become the owners of the exclusive right to make, construct, and use, and to vend to others the right to make, construct, and use, the invention and the improved wooden pavement described in the original and reissued patents, during the extended term, in all the state of New Jersey, except within the corporate limits of Jersey City. It further appears that the improvement thus patented has been exclusively used in numerous cities and towns in the United States, in subordination to the claim of Nicholson to an exclusive right in himself, and that the validity of the reissued patent of 1863 was established as against the city of Chicago, in a suit brought by Nicholson, in the northern district of Illinois, against said city for an alleged infringement, in which a final decree was entered January 7, 1867, in favor of the patentee, and against the defendants, for twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and thirty dollars and thirty cents. From this decree an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the United States, but the appeal was subsequently withdrawn. It further appears that after the reissue of 1867, Nicholson filed a bill in the circuit court against the defendants, viz: The city of Chicago, complaining of an infringement of that reissued patent, and that after issue had been joined on a denial of its validity, and after proof had been taken, a decree was made against the city, and subsequently the city accepted a license, agreeing to pay a royalty for all subsequent use of the improvement. Though these suits were against other parties, and though the defendants in this case are still at liberty to contest the validity of the patent, the judgment and the decree entered against the city of Chicago raise a strong presumption that the patent is valid. Coupled with the fact already noticed, that the right of the patentee has been extensively acknowledged, and that many pavements have been laid down in subordination to it, they are sufficient to establish, prima facie, the title of the patentee, and to justify a preliminary injunction against any clear infringement, unless it is made to appear that the title of Nicholson was not fairly in controversy in the suits wherein they were made, or that some material fact was not known when the cases were tried, and was not then considered. There is no reason to suspect that the judgment and decree were collusively obtained, and, therefore, they are entitled to all the weight that is usually attributed to decrees in such cases. It must be held that as to all matters directly adjudicated by them, they make a prima facie case against the defendants. But the validity of the patent is now assailed for a reason that was not urged when those decrees were obtained.

It now appears that in 1849, English letters patent were granted to John Hosking for an improved wooden pavement, which the complainants admit is substantially the same as that patented by Nicholson in 1854. True, the specifications of Hosking's pavement was not enrolled until March, 1850; but that was more than four years before the patent to Nicholson. The issue of this English patent was a fact not known when the litigation was in progress in the circuit court of Illinois, and its effect upon the plaintiff's claim has never been determined. Models of the Hosking and of the Nicholson pavements have been exhibited to us, and we can not doubt that if the form of the short block or strip between the long blocks, separating them and thus forming a groove, is not a substantial part of the Nicholson combination, and if it is not essential to that combination that the long block and short block, or strip, should have parallel sides throughout, with no rebate in the long blocks, the Hosking and the Nicholson pavement are the same in principle. And such is the evidence. It is not necessary, however, to enlarge upon this, for it is conceded that unless the right granted to Nicholson relates back to a time anterior to the Hosking patent, it must fail. To reach this, and to show that the invention of Nicholson was prior to the issue of the Hosking patent, the complainants have shown that Nicholson filed a caveat on May 2, 1847, in which he claimed that he was then engaged in perfecting an invention for wooden pavements, and filed with the caveat a description of his invention. This was seven years before his patent issued, but it is now insisted that the patent relates back to the caveat. We are not prepared to concede such an effect to Nicholson's caveat. On examining the description it gave of this alleged invention, we find that it mentioned only a pavement having a chequered surface, with alternate open spaces cubical in form, of about four inches by four. It makes no allusion to continuous channels or grooves, which, as well as cubical cells, are described in the specifications of the patent afterward issued, and which are described in the Hosking patent. Whether the two combinations, the one of long blocks and short blocks laid alternately so as to form cells, and the other of long blocks and short blocks, or strips, laid so as to form continuous channels or grooves, are substantially the same combination; whether they are one invention, so that a description of the first gives notice of the other, we are not prepared to determine. Nor are we willing, at this stage of the case, to decide what is the effect of long delay to apply for a patent after a caveat has been filed. Certainly, if the Hosking patent was granted before Nicholson invented the combination of a grooved pavement, such as was described in the patent issued to him in 1854, the complainant's title to the improvement, which they allege the defendants have infringed, is not clear. There is, however, evidence that Nicholson's invention of the grooved pavement was made as early as 1848, and consequently before the English patent to Hosking. It is found in a pamphlet issued by Nicholson, in 1857, in which he asserts that he laid down such a pavement in Boston early in July, 1848. This pamphlet we understand the defendants to have used for another purpose on the hearing of this motion. If the fact inserted in it be established, it may be very material to the inquiry whether the patent of 1854 is affected at all by the earlier patents to Hosking. But we do not propose to enter at length upon this part of the case, for if it be assumed that nothing has been shown to rebut the prima facie case made out by the complainant's patent, the use under it, and the adjudications made in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois; if the title of the complainants to the exclusive use of the thing patented to Nicholson is sufficiently established, we are still of opinion that the present motion ought to be overruled. A preliminary injunction is always an extraordinary exercise of judicial powers. Its purpose is to preserve the existing state of things until the rights of the parties can be fairly investigated. It is not to be used for any other purpose. It looks forward to a trial, and when it is of no importance to preserve things as they are when the injunction is asked for, it will not be granted. It ought never to be issued unless the right of a patentee is an established or admitted one, and unless the alleged invasion of the right is proved beyond reasonable doubt.

In Parker v. Sears, [Case No. 10,748,] it was laid down by Mr. Justice Grier that no interlocutory injunction should issue unless the complainant's title and the defendant's infringement are admitted, or are so palpable and clear that the court can entertain no doubt on the subject. His language was still more emphatic to the same effect in Goodyear v. Dunbar, [Id. 5,570.] We do not feel disposed to depart from the rule laid down in these cases, especially as it commends itself to our convictions of right. Applying it to the present case, we are to inquire whether, if the title of the complainant is unquestionable, the defendants are clearly guilty of an infringement. Is this made out so fully that we can say there is an undoubted infringement? The defendants are acting under a patent granted to Brocklebank & Trainor, January 12, 1869. It ought to be assumed that they are doing only what they believe they have a right to do. Whether this belief is well founded or not, whether the combination patented to Brocklebank & Trainor is, as they assert, a different combination from that invented by Nicholson, is a vital question upon which the parties are directly at issue. The grant of letters patent, in 1869, to Brocklebank & Trainor, was virtually a decision of the patent office that there is a substantive difference between their invention and that patented to Nicholson. It raises a presumption that building a pavement according to the claims of the later patentees, is not an infringement of the earlier patents. This presumption, though it may be overthrown, is not to be disregarded in considering a motion for a preliminary injunction. It is noticeable that the improvement claimed in the patent of 1869 is the entire combination that makes up a wooden pavement. The patent is not for an improvement on a combination previously made. What is claimed is "the combination of the bed (foundation), transverse strips and vertical blocks, when the latter are rebated, on one or both sides, and either with dovetailed rebates or otherwise, and the said strips fitted to the rebates and secured to the bed for the purpose of forming the wooden pavement." Thus the patent is not for an addition, but for an entire combination. We are now asked to decide that the patent is only for a colorable change of the combination patented to Nicholson, and to decide this at the beginning of the case. It may be that is so; but that it is, can not be said to be clear. There is certainly a change of form of the constituents of the combination, if there is not a difference in the mode of arrangement. Doubtless, change of form of the constituents of a combination is often no substantial change. It may be only the substitution of an equivalent. The combination remains the same, though the form of the things combined greatly varies. But there are cases in which a change of form destroys the combination. They are those in which form is necessary to secure the beneficial result, and when, of course, a change of form of one or more of the things combined works a different result. There is considerable reason for the belief that Nicholson's combination demands blocks or strips of certain shapes or form, as essential to it, and that it contemplates blocks and strips having parallel sides throughout, without rebates in either. This was necessary to secure one of the avowed advantages of his invention—its cheapness of construction. Now it is very evident that the combination of the Brocklebank & Trainor patent works a different result in two important particulars from that obtained by the Nicholson combination. It distributes the pressure upon the surface of the pavement over a larger base, and it guards against a displacement of the strips or short blocks that separate the long blocks. This is effected by the defined forms of the constituents of the combination. The rebated long block and the strip, or short block, so fashioned as to be fitted to the rebate, are, perhaps, something more than mere equivalents.

It is true that the strip answers one of the purposes which the strip answers in the Nicholson pavement. It separates the long blocks, and thus forms a groove; but it is not necessarily for that reason substantially the same in the combination. In Eames v. Godfrey, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 78, which was an action for an infringement of a patent for a combination, it was ruled that the defendant had a right to use any of the parts of the patented combination if he did not use the whole, and that if he used all the parts but one, and for that substituted another mechanical structure substantially different in its construction and operation, but serving the same purpose, he was not guilty of an infringement. So, in Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 341, which was an action for an infringement of a patent for an improvement in the construction of a plow, use of all the parts of which the combination was made was held essential to constitute an infringement. The language of the court in that case is, in part at least, applicable here. There, as well as here, the combination only was claimed. It was composed of parts arranged with reference to each other in the manner described; and Chief Justice Taney said: "The use of any two or three parts only, or of two combined with a third, which is substantially different in form or in the manner of its arrangement and connection with the others," was not the use of the thing patented. The parts of Brocklebank & Trainor's improvement are different in form from those of Nicholson's; their arrangement is different, and so is their connection with each other. It is not, therefore, clear that in using the improvement the defendants are infringing any rights of the complainants. It is not without weight that experts differ in opinion respecting the matter. Mr. Treadwell testifies that in his opinion, and for reasons given by him, the Elizabeth pavement (that of which the complainants complain) is substantially different from the Nicholson pavement described in the last Nicholson reissue, and referred to in the first and second claims thereof. Other witnesses are of a different opinion, but it is manifest that we ought not now to decide the question summarily.

We come the more readily to this conclusion because the complainants can not be injured by our refusal to enjoin the defendants now, especially if the refusal be upon terms with which the defendants offer to comply. On the contrary, it may be for their interest that the pavement be laid. The proofs show that the Nicholson pavement can not be laid on Newark avenue. The law of the state and the action of the property holders on the line of the avenue forbid it. But, if in putting down the Brocklebank & Trainor pavement, the Nicholson improvement is used, as the complainants contend it will be, they may recover compensation for its use. We have said nothing of the appearance this motion has of being an attempt to compel the city of Elizabeth to give the contract for paving to the complainants rather than to their competitors in bidding for it, though the bid of their competitors was lowest. A preliminary injunction against infringement can not be resorted to for any such purpose.

The injunction will, therefore, be refused, if the defendants give a bond in the penal sum of thirty thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of such sum (if any) as may be decreed in favor of the complainants on the final hearing of this cause. The bond to be filed with the clerk of the court, and to be approved by the clerk or by a judge of the court within twenty days after notice of this order.

[6. A patent secures to the patentee only the means specified to produce the effect; and a patented machine is not infringed by a machine which produces the same effect, but in which the means used are not substantially the same.]

In equity. This was a bill in equity, founded upon letters patent. [Nos. 2,275 and 2,970.] The facts are fully set forth in the opinion of the court:

Roger S. Baldwin and Charles M. Keller, for plaintiffs.

Ralph I. Ingersoll and Edwin W. Stoughton, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and INGERSOLL, District Judge.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. The plaintiffs, by their bill, seek to enjoin the defendants from using a machine to paper pins, the right to use which they claim to be exclusively vested in them. The foundation of their claim rests upon two certain patents, the right to which patents, with the privileges by such patents granted, they now have by virtue of assignments from the patentees. One of these patents was issued to Samuel Slocum, and bears date the 30th of September, 1841, and was to run for fourteen years from the last-mentioned date. The other patent was issued to John J. Howe, and bears date the 24th of February, 1843, and was to run fourteen years from the 5th of December, 1852. The validity of these patents is not contested by the defendants. They admit that the plaintiffs have all the rights which these patents purport to grant. They admit further, that they are using a machine for papering pins; but they deny that, by such use, they have infringed upon any of the rights so granted by such patents.

The defendants claim a right to use the machine for the papering of pins which they are operating, upon the ground that, by such use, they do not infringe upon any rights granted by such patents, or either of them. They claim, also, that the right to use such machine, so operated by them, is exclusively vested in them, by virtue of a patent granted to Chauncey O. Crosby, and which last-mentioned patent they own, by virtue of an assignment from the patentee.

There has been heretofore, at times, some diversity of opinion as to the extent of the rights secured to an inventor or discoverer by the patent issued in his favor. The supreme court of the United States has, however, settled and determined what rights are so secured to the patentee; so, that now, there can be no diversity of opinion on the subject. In the case of O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 62, the rule, as laid down by the chief justice, in giving the opinion of the court, is, in substance, as follows: "He who discovers that a certain useful result will be produced in any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, by the use of certain means, is entitled to a patent for such discovery, provided he sets forth, in his specification, the means he uses to procure such useful result, in a manner so full and exact, that any one skilled in the art or business to which it appertains, can, by using the means he specifies, without any addition to or subtraction from them, produce precisely the result he describes. And, if this cannot be done by the means he describes, the patent is void. And, if this can be done, then the patent confers on him the exclusive right to use the means he specifies, to produce the result or effect he describes, and nothing more. And it makes no difference, in this respect, whether the effect is produced by chemical agency or combination, or by the application of discoveries or principles in natural philosophy, known or unknown before his invention, or by machinery acting together upon mechanical principles. In either case, he must describe the manner and process, as above mentioned, and the end it accomplishes. And every one may lawfully accomplish the same end, and without infringing the patent, if he uses means substantially different from those described. But, if the means used to accomplish the same end, are substantially like those which the patentee describes, the patent has been infringed, and the one using them must be responsible for such infringement."

The rules thus laid down must govern this case. The patent does not secure to the patentee the result or effect produced, but only the means described, by which such result or effect is produced. The means which he specifies, to produce the result or effect, are secured, and nothing more. And all other means to produce the same result or effect, and not patented to any one, are open to the public. A mere change in the form of the machinery, however, or the means specified, by which the result or effect described is produced, or an alteration in some of the unessential parts, or a substitution or use of known equivalent mechanical powers, not varying essentially the machine, or its mode of operation or organization, will not make the new machine a new invention. The patentee may, however, limit his claim, in his specification, to one particular form of machine, and thus exclude all other forms, though such other forms would embody his invention, and thereby not secure to himself the whole that he has invented. In such a case, he is secured only in the particular form claimed. The patent law was intended to secure to the inventor his whole invention or discovery, but not unless he claimed to be secured in the whole. And, if he claims only a part, or some particular form, such part, or particular form only, is secured to him. No more can be secured by the patent than has been invented or discovered; and no more can be secured than is claimed to be secured in the specification.

In the case of Winans v. Denmead, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 330, the substantial means used by the defendant to accomplish the object sought, were the same as those described and claimed in the specification of the plaintiff's patent. There was no other change than a slight change of form, not varying in substance the means used by the plaintiff, and set forth and described in the specification of his patent. And, as a mere change in the form of the machinery, or the means specified, by which the result is produced, not varying essentially the mode of operation of the thing patented, will not vary its organization, or be deemed a new or different invention, the defendant was deemed to have been an infringer of the plaintiff's rights secured to him by his patent.

The invention of Slocum, as described in his specification, is a "machine for sticking pins into paper" in a row. It consists of a horizontal plate, as described, with as many grooves as the number of pins intended to be stuck in a row, which grooves are of sufficient length and depth to receive one pin and one only; a sliding hopper, so constructed as to hold a number of pins, one directly over the other in a horizontal position, and so made to slide directly over the grooves, as to deposit one of the pins in each groove by gravitation; and a sliding plate or follower, upon the front edge of which projects a system of points or wires corresponding with the grooves, so that, when the sliding plate or follower is driven forward, the wires enter the grooves in which the pins are separated, and drive forward the pins which are thus made to perforate the previously adjusted folds of a folded and crimped paper, which is held between clamps. And, in the specification, Slocum claims, as his invention, the plate with grooves, as described, for separating the pins, the sliding hopper, which deposits the pins in the grooves, as described, and the sliding plate or follower, with the wires attached thereto, in combination with the grooved plate, as described, and also these in combination with the hopper, as described.

The invention of Howe, as described in his specification, is for an improvement on Slocum's machine for sheeting pins, that is, for sticking pins in rows into sheets of paper. The machine of Slocum did not crimp the paper. But the paper was crimped in the old way, by a separate operation, and then taken out of the crimping apparatus, and placed in clamps, and, while in such clamps, and out of the clamping jaws, the pins perforated through the crimps previously formed, and in that way were sheeted. The improvement of Howe upon the machine of Slocum, crimped the paper, and the pins were stuck in rows into the paper, while the paper was within and held by the crimping apparatus. This improvement consisted of transverse notches made in the crimping jaws of the old crimping apparatus, so that the pins could enter at proper distances between the crimping jaws, and perforate the paper, while the same was being crimped. Before this improvement, no method was known by which the pins could be made to penetrate the paper, and thus be sheeted, while the paper was under the process of being crimped. The old mode was to stick the pins after the paper had been crimped. Howe's improvement was, by means of these transverse notches, to stick the pins while the paper was in the crimping process, and while the crimper, which crimped the paper, held the paper in the form in which it was crimped. It was not to sheet the pins after the paper had gone through the crimping process, and had passed out of the crimping jaws. He, in substance, took the old English crimping bar, and made transverse notches in it, at suitable distances between the jaws, so that the pins could penetrate through these notches, into and through the crimps of the paper, while the paper was within the crimping jaws, and in the process of being crimped.

The patent which was granted to Crosby, bears date the 1st day of April, 1851. The machine which the defendants are operating, is constructed substantially according to the specification annexed to that patent. Crosby, in his specification, claims to be the inventor of "a new and useful machine for sticking pins," and the patent is granted to him, according to his claim, for "a new and useful improved machine for sticking pins on paper." The specification and claim are not for an improvement on Slocum's machine, or on Howe's machine, for sticking pins; but for an independent machine, governed by different principles; for a machine to produce a result by means substantially different from the means secured to either Slocum or Howe to produce a like result, to wit, the "sticking of pins on paper." The patent is prima facie evidence that Crosby has an exclusive right to that which the patent purports to grant; that he is the first inventor of the machine specified and described in his specification; and that he is the first inventor of an independent machine, governed by different principles, and using means substantially different from the means used by either Slocum or Howe to produce the like result. Corning v. Burden, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 252. The patent to Crosby affords prima facie evidence, therefore, that the means described by him, in his specification, to produce the result of sticking pins on paper, are substantially different from the means described by either Slocum or Howe to produce the like result. And the plaintiffs, to succeed in the case, must counteract this prima facie evidence by sufficient countervailing testimony.

The object of Crosby's machine, is to stick pins in a fillet of paper, across the strip of paper, the crimps being lengthwise of the paper; and to crimp the paper in that way, and coil the fillet, when stuck, into a roll of any convenient size, so that the heads of the pins will be presented on the disc of the roll, and all by one continuous operation. The essential parts of the machine, as operated by the defendants, or the substantial means by which the desired result of sticking the pins on paper is produced, are crimping rollers, by which the paper is crimped; an inclined channel-way, formed by two bars, by which the pins are made to slide down, in a vertical position, hanging by their heads, between the two bars; a revolving screw, one end of which is placed at the bottom of the channel-way, and which, by revolving, is made, at each revolution, to take, in its thread, from the bottom of this channel-way, one pin from the body of pins in the channel-way, separate the same from the body of pins, carry it, by the mechanical force of the revolution of the separating screw, to the other end of the screw, change the pin from a vertical to a horizontal position, and, at the end of the screw to which the pin is carried, cause it to drop, in a horizontal position, into a groove-channel; and a punch at the head of the pin, as it is dropped into the groove-channel, which is made, by machinery, to drive the pins forward at regular intervals, as fast as they drop into the groove-channel, into the crimped paper, after it has passed out of the jaws of the crimping rollers. When the paper is stuck, it has, in the place where it is being stuck, passed out of the crimping jaws; and, during this operation of sticking, one end of the paper is held in a rigid state by the crimping rollers, and the other end by the coiling roller. The paper is stuck on its passage from the crimping rollers to the coiling roller; and, as the paper is stuck, it is coiled into a roll. The machine is automatic, while other machines known before were not so.

The object of Slocum was to paper the pins at given specified distances apart. And, for that purpose, he uses a plate, with a certain number of grooves in it, into which the pins are placed by certain machinery, and through which grooves the pins are pushed into the paper. The distances apart at which the pins are pushed into the paper, are regulated and controlled by the distances apart of the grooves in the plate, and by those distances only. And his machine is so organized as to regulate the distances at which the pins shall be separated and stuck into the paper, by the distances apart of the grooves in the plate. This is a mechanical law of the machine. There is no such mechanical law in the defendants' machine. As, in the machine of Crosby, there is only one groove, through which the pins are pushed, one at a time, into the paper, the distances apart at which they are pushed into the paper by his machine, cannot be regulated by any such mechanical law. These distances are dependent, therefore, upon upon some other mechanical rule—upon some other mechanical organization. In Slocum's machine, these distances are regulated by one organization. In Crosby's machine they are regulated by another and different organization. In Slocum's machine, the distances apart of the grooves in the plate control the manner in which the pins are placed in the paper. In Crosby's machine, an entirely different organization of the machine controls the manner in which the pins are placed in the paper.

Before the invention of Slocum, grooves or channels had been used, in which to place the pins, with the view to push them into paper, and they had been pushed in in various ways. The grooves used by him as the channels to push the pins into the paper are also used to separate the pins—as channels to deposit the pins in, one by one, one in each groove, as they drop from the hopper, when the hopper passes over the plate. Previous to his invention, the separation had been made by hand, and he invented a particular mode of separation, other than by hand, and sets forth, in his specification, the particular means he uses to produce the result. The plate with grooves, as he describes it, for separating the pins, he claims as his invention. He also claims the sliding hopper, which passes over the plate, and deposits a pin in each groove, as his invention. He also claims the sliding plate or follower, with the series of wires attached thereto, as described by him, in combination with his groove-plate, as described; and these also in combination with the sliding hopper, as described. This is all he does claim. Grooves, as such merely, through which the pins are pushed into the paper, he does not claim. The object of his machine is, to separate the pins from a pile or mass of pins, and place them in channels, at suitable distances apart to be pushed into the paper, and then, by means of the plate, with the series of wires attached, as described, to push them into the paper.

The instrumentalities, or substantial means, in Slocum's machine, by which the pins are separated from a pile or column, preparatory to being pushed into the paper, are a hopper, and a bed containing grooves of the exact size of the barrel of the pin. And, to effect this separation, the hopper must either slide over the plate with grooves, or the grooved plate must slide or otherwise pass under the hopper. And, to enable the pin to be separated, it must be in the hopper in a horizontal position, or nearly so. The separation cannot be accomplished by that machine, unless the hopper slides over the plate, or the plate slides, or in some other way passes, under the hopper. Without one of these operations, the machine, for this purpose, is useless. One of these operations is essential to it. It is not a Slocum machine for separating, without one of these operations.

Neither of these operations can be found, either in form or in substance, in the Crosby machine. There is no hopper in Crosby's machine, unless the inclined channel-way, in which the pins hang by their heads in a vertical position, be considered as a hopper. That, if it be considered as a hopper, does not move. It is stationary. Of course, it neither slides nor passes over anything. From the lower extremity of the inclined channel-way, the pins are taken, one by one, by the thread of a screw, while it is revolving, and while the pin is vertical, and, by force of mechanical power, the pin is carried, in the thread of the screw, to the other end of the screw, and is there deposited by the screw, in a horizontal position, in a groove-channel. The screw, while operating, has no motion but a revolving motion. During the whole time, it remains in the same space. It neither moves forward nor back. There is, then, nothing in the machine, which, either in form or in substance, has any resemblance or similitude to a sliding hopper, sliding or passing over recesses in a plate, to receive the pins as they drop from a hopper, or to recesses for receiving pins, sliding or passing under a hopper. In Slocum's machine, one of these processes must take place; and, without one of them, a machine for this purpose cannot be a Slocum machine.

In the Slocum machine, the recess in the plate, which receives the pin from the hopper, must be of the exact size of the barrel of the pin. In the Crosby machine, the recess in the thread of the screw, which receives the pin, and by which it is transported to the other end of the screw, and which, it is claimed, is a mechanical equivalent for the recess in the plate with grooves in Slocum's machine, need not be of the exact depth or breadth of the barrel of the pin. It may be of any size, provided it is not sufficiently large to permit the head of the pin to fall through. The essential means used in Crosby's machine to bring about the result, to wit, a separation of the pins from the pile or column, are, therefore, substantially different from the means used in Slocum's machine to produce the same result. In this respect, the two machines operate differently, and depend upon distinct organizations. The same substantial means are not used in each.

The mode in which the pins are pushed into the paper by the defendants' machine, is by a punch applied to the head of the pins, after they are deposited by the screw in the groove-channel, by which the pins are made one by one to penetrate the paper through the crimps. Slocum does not claim, as his invention or discovery, the mode generally of pushing pins through a grooved channel into paper, by means of a punch applied to the head of the pin. The state of the arts, as shown to exist prior to the time of his invention, shows that he could not with success have made any such claim. His claim is for his plate, with a series of wires attached, in combination with the grooved plate, as described by him, by which combination a row of pins is stuck by one operation. The mode adopted by the defendants in their machine is, therefore, not embraced in Slocum's claim. They have a right, therefore, to use it, notwithstanding the patent granted to him.

From the descriptions already given of the Howe machine and of the Crosby machine, and from the working of the machines, as exhibited on the hearing, it appears manifest, that the mode of operation of Crosby's, as it respects the improvement or invention claimed by Howe, is different from the mode of operation of Howe's. Howe's invention is but an alteration of the old English crimping bar, by the cutting of transverse notches through the bar, where the two jaws meet, to enable the pins to pass through these notches, and thereby stick the paper, while it is within the crimping jaws, and while it is being crimped. Notches or apertures of some kind are an essential means to effect the result which Howe designed by his invention. Without them his improvement does not exist. There are no notches or apertures in Crosby's crimping rollers, and nothing which bears any resemblance or similitude to them. The pins are stuck, not when the paper is within the crimping jaws, but after it has passed out of them. The device of Crosby is essentially different from that of Howe. The pins are stuck, by Howe's invention, while the paper is within the crimping jaws, by means of notches or apertures in the crimping bars. No such means are used by Crosby. The principles of the two machines, in their modes of operation, and in the means used by each to effect the result accomplished, are different. Therefore, they are not identical. One is not an infringement upon the other. With this view of the case, the decree must be that the plaintiffs' bill be dismissed, with costs to the defendants.

In re AMERICAN PLATE GLASS, etc., INS. CO.

[12 N. B. R. 56.]

District Court, D. New Jersey.

BANKRUPTCY—CONTINGENT LIABILITIES—FIRE INSURANCE POLICY.

[A fire insurance policy is a "contingent liability," within the meaning of section 19, cl. 4, of the bankruptcy act of 1867; and on the bankruptcy of the insurance company the assured is entitled to share in the dividends to the extent of any loss occurring before the order for the final dividend.]

In bankruptcy.

NIXON, District Judge. The question presented to the court under the proceedings in this case is, whether a claim against a bankrupt fire insurance company is provable for the amount of a loss on a policy of insurance, which occurred after the proceedings in bankruptcy had commenced. This depends obviously on the construction to be given to the fourth clause of the 19th section of the bankrupt act, to wit:—"In all cases of contingent debts and contingent liabilities, contracted by the bankrupt, and not herein otherwise provided for, the creditor may make claim therefor, and have his claim allowed, with the right to share in the dividends, if the contingency shall happen before the order for the final dividend." When we have ascertained what is here meant by "contingent debts and contingent liabilities," there is nothing left in the clause for construction. Is a policy of fire insurance a contingent debt, or contingent liability of the party which issues it? It certainly is not a debt in any proper sense of the term. It is a contract—an agreement of indemnity, on the part of the insurer, to make good the insured against loss from fire, of certain property described in the policy. It does not become a debt until the contingency happens on which a demand for indemnity can be made, and the amount of the loss is ascertained. But it is, as certainly, a contingent liability. The party accepting the consideration and issuing the policy becomes liable for the payment of a sum of money upon the happening of an uncertain event. A careful examination of the American and English cases, shows that debts payable on a contingency, and contingent liabilities, which may never become due, are not provable against a bankrupt estate; because, whilst they exist in that condition, they are not susceptible of valuation. But the reason ceases in the case of a policy of insurance as soon as the contingency or loss happens, on which a demand for payment can be based.

An express provision for a claim of this sort was made in the 39th section of the bankrupt act of April 4, 1800, where it was enacted that "the assured in any policy of insurance shall be admitted to claim, and after the contingency or loss, to prove the debt thereon, in the like manner as if the same had happened before the issuing the commission; and the bankrupt shall be discharged, as if such money had been due and payable before the time of his or her becoming bankrupt." The 5th section of the bankrupt act of August 19th, 1841, was probably intended to have a broader scope. It provided that "all creditors whose debts are not due and payable until a future day, all annuitants, holders of bottomry and respondentia bonds, holders of policies of insurance, sureties, indorsers, bail, or other persons having uncertain or contingent demands against such bankrupt, shall be permitted to come in and prove such debts or claims under this act, and shall have a right when their debts and claims become absolute, to have the same allowed them." It was accordingly held by the supreme court in Mace v. Wells, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 272, that under this section, the surety of the bankrupt on a promissory note, had a right, in consequence of his mere liability to pay, to prove the demand against the maker, who had become bankrupt; and that his failure to make such proof did not entitle him to recover the money subsequently paid by him, although he did not make the payment until after the bankrupt's discharge. The principle of the decision undoubtedly was, that the amount of the demand was capable of being ascertained, and hence became provable within the provisions of the law. It was afterwards held in Riggin v. Magwire, 15 Wall. [52 U. S.] 549, that under the same section, so long as it remained wholly uncertain whether a contract or engagement would ever give rise to an actual duty or liability, and there was no means of removing the uncertainty by calculation, such contract or engagement was not provable.

The 19th section of the present bankrupt act, after providing for the proof of all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the commencement of proceedings against him, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future day; and for all claims against him as drawer, indorser, surety, bail, or guarantor upon any bill, bond, note, or other contract, or for any debt of another person, although his liability did not become absolute until after adjudication, then authorizes a creditor to make his claim for any other contingent liability, and accords to him the right to share in the dividends of the estate, if the contingency upon which the same becomes payable happens before the final dividend. I do not see any reason to doubt that this clause means what it says, and that under it a policy holder may claim for the full amount of his policy against the bankrupt company before any loss occurs. The claim thus put in is not susceptible of valuation, and all payment upon it must be postponed until the loss occurs. If none occur before the final dividend, nothing becomes due upon it. But if the contingency happen, to wit, a loss on the insured property before that date, the claimant is permitted to participate in the dividends of the estate, in the aggregate of his loss, whether total or partial, limited only by the amount of his policy.

It is, therefore, the opinion of the court that the claimant in this case is not excluded from proving his claim, from the fact that the loss occurred after adjudication, but before the final dividend.

AMERICAN SADDLE CO. v. HOGG.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March 22, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PATENTABILITY—ANTICIPATION—PAD FOR HARNESS SADDLES—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. An invention of a pad for harness-saddles, having, as its distinguishing feature, an impervious bearing surface of vulcanized rubber or gutta-percha, is not anticipated by previous use of harness-saddle pads having bearing surfaces of other materials than vulcanized rubber, or rubber-cloth, or gutta-percha.

2. In a suit in equity to restrain infringement of a patent, a prior patent not mentioned in the defendant's answer is admissible only as evidence of the state of the art at the date of the invention claimed in the complainant's patent. If seasonable objection is taken, it is not admissible to show want of novelty in that invention.

In equity. Bill in equity for an injunction to restrain alleged infringement of letters-patent for an improved harness-saddle pad, granted R. C. Sturges Jan. 19, 1869, [No. 86,112,] and for an account of profits. The case is stated in the opinion. Decree for complainants.

P. H. Hutchinson, for complainant.

S. E. Ireson and J. H. Bradley, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The complainant is the patentee under letters-patent of the United States, issued on the nineteenth day of January, 1869, as assignee of R. C. Sturges, for a new and useful improved harness-saddle pad.

The inventor claimed as the distinguishing feature of his improved pad an impervious bearing surface of vulcanized rubber or gutta-percha. The principal advantage claimed for this bearing surface was not only that it protected the stuffing of the pad from animal exudations, and remained clean, smooth, and soft, but also that the effect of the vulcanized rubber surface was to prevent galls upon the back of an animal working under one of these pads, and that the sulphur used in the process of vulcanization had certain curative properties when the pads were used upon horses or mules whose backs had become galled when working under other pads. His claim was for an improved pad for harness-saddles, the distinguishing feature of which is an impervious bearing surface of vulcanized rubber combined with the other portions of the pad, substantially as set forth in his specification.

The answer of the defendant puts in issue the novelty of the invention, and gives the names and residences of five different parties alleged by the defendant to have used and sold the substantial and material parts, claimed as new, before the invention thereof by the complainant's assignor.

The evidence in the record only proves the manufacture and use by the persons specified, or some of them, of a saddle pad constructed substantially in the same manner as those described in the complainant's specification, with a bearing surface of material other than vulcanized rubber or rubber-cloth. This evidence does not affect the novelty of the invention claimed by Sturges, the distinguishing feature claimed for which was the combination, with such pads as were previously made, of a new impervious bearing surface of vulcanized rubber.

Letters-patent of the United States, granted to William Leonard on the third day of September, 1867, have been introduced in evidence, and are admissible as showing the state of the art prior to Sturges's invention.

[Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Partially reported in Merw. Pat. Inv. 340.]

Their competency for any other purpose is objected to by the complainant, defendant not having given any notice in the answer that he should rely upon these letters-patent, or the invention described therein, as showing prior knowledge or use.

The patent was for a1 improvement in horse-collars. The patentee described his invention as relating to the construction of the collar, with reference to the employment of vulcanized rubber, or its compounds, for the bearing surfaces thereof. "The object," he states, "of employing the rubber is to prevent absorption of perspiration from the body of the animal by and into the stuffing of the collar, and to obviate the formation of permanent wrinkles in that surface of the collar which comes in contact with the skin of the animal; and I consider the rubber beneficial for the cure of skin galls, by reason of the healing influence of the sulphur contained in the vulcanized material."

In Leonard's patent, as in the complainant's, reference is made to a mode of securing to the edge of the rubber a strip of some stronger material, by which to secure the rubber to the remaining portions of the pad. It thus appears that the Leonard patent embodies, in the form of a horse-collar, substantially, if not identically, the same points of invention which in the complainant's patent are embodied in the form of a harness-saddle pad.

If this point of defence were open, therefore, to the defendant by the introduction of the Leonard patent, of which no previous notice was given in the defendant's answer, we might have been compelled to decide that the complainant was not entitled to a patent for applying a bearing surface of vulcanized rubber to that part of a harness which comes in contact with the back of an animal, when the same application of the same bearing surface for the same purposes to that part of the harness which comes in contact with the horse's neck had been previously patented; for it is [would have been]² difficult to discover any thing new and material, either in principle, in combination, or in the mode of operation, in order to adapt it to its new [and analogous]² use. But the Leonard patent is not set up in defence in the answer; the objection to its introduction in evidence was seasonably taken, and clearly it cannot be admitted in evidence to supersede the invention of the assignor to the complainant, as that would operate as a surprise upon the complainant. Howe v. Williams, [Case No. 6,778.]

²[From 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 353.]

The case of Vance v. Campbell, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 427, relied upon by the defendant, decides only that no notice is necessary in order to justify the admission of evidence, for the purpose of showing the state of the art in respect to improvements existing at the date of the complainant's invention, in the class of articles to which it belongs.

In reference to the state of the art prior to the inventions of Leonard and Sturges, the use of a vulcanized rubber bearing surface for the purposes set forth by Leonard and by Sturges was new and patentable. Whether the invention of Leonard anticipated and superseded that of Sturges is a question not raised by the pleadings in this case, and respecting which no competent evidence is to be found in the record.

[No use can be made by the court of the Leonard patent, in the view entertained by the court of the respective inventions described and claimed by Leonard and Sturges, to limit or define the claim in the Sturges patent, except one which would render the Sturges patent void, by reason of a prior invention by Leonard, of all the material and substantial parts of the invention claimed by Sturges. Such a use of the Leonard patent the court is not authorized to make in this case. If that issue had been made in the pleadings, and notice had been given to the complainants that the respondent relied upon Leonard's patent as anticipating the invention of Sturges, the court can not know that complainants would not have met that issue, if presented, by proof that, although Leonard's patent antedated the patent of Sturges, the invention of Sturges antedated Leonard's.]²

Treating the complainant's patent, as upon the evidence in this case the court is bound to treat it, as a good and valid patent, it is unnecessary to say any thing further upon the subject of infringement than that Exhibit E, one of the saddle pads made by the defendant, is so manifestly identical with Exhibit D, the saddle pad manufactured under complainant's patent, that it differs from it in no respect, except the addition of an elastic loop to attach it to the saddle.

The defendant's patent, if valid, is only so for the combination with the pad of his elastic loop, as distinguished from non-elastic loops previously used. There is no pretence that this gives him any right to use the invention of the complainant, or of any [other]² person, to which his elastic band or loop may be applied.

Decree for complainants.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. 29, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—EVIDENCE—DISAGREEMENT OF COUNSEL—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. The court will not so far take notice of an alleged parol agreement of counsel made out of court, as to undertake, where there is a conflict of opinion between the respective counsel as to the terms of the agreement, or a difference of recollection as to its existence or meaning, to decide the question of accuracy of recollection or construction.

2. A waiver of an objection entered on the record of a suit in equity, should also be entered on the record.

In equity. Petition by the defendant for rehearing of a cause in equity between the same parties, previously decided in favor of the complainant. The grounds on which the petition was based are stated in the opinion. Petition denied.

P. H. Hutchinson, for complainant.

S. E. Ireson and J. H. Bradley, for defendant.

SHEP-LEY, Circuit Judge. The grounds of the petition for rehearing are; that the court decided that a certain patent, which had been granted to one William Leonard for certain improvements in horse-collars (although introduced in evidence and properly in the case for the purpose of showing to the court the state of the art), could not be used by the defendant to show that the patentee was not the first and original inventor of any material and substantial part of the thing patented; the defendant having given no notice of such a defence in his answer, or stated therein the name of Leonard as patentee, or the date of his patent, and when granted, or the names or residences of any persons alleged to have had prior knowledge of the thing patented, or where or by whom it was used.

The defendant alleges further, that he gave the complainant a notice in writing, more than thirty days before the hearing, that he should offer the Leonard patent in evidence; and that also, during the time of taking testimony before the examiner, he produced and offered the Leonard patent in evidence; and that when objection was made to its admissibility on the ground that no such defence was set up in the answer, and no notice had been given, the counsel for defendant claimed that complainant had previously agreed "to waive all objections to the admission of said Leonard patent in evidence for want of notice of the same;" and stated that, unless complainant's counsel adhered to his former agreement, he should ask to suspend the further taking of testimony in the cause until he had moved the court for leave to amend the answer filed in the cause, by pleading the Leonard patent therein; that thereupon complainant's counsel renewed his agreement not to object to the admission of said Leonard patent for want of notice of the same; and that, upon the said agreement being so made and renewed, the taking of said testimony was continued.

At the hearing of the cause the objection was insisted upon; and it appeared by the report of the examiner to have been duly taken and insisted upon when the testimony was produced before the examiner; nor was any record made of any waiver of the same, or agreement to waive the objection, at the hearing. When the objection was insisted on at the hearing, defendant's counsel insisted on the admissibility of the evidence, but did not then claim or state to the court that any agreement existed to waive the objection, nor claim that he was surprised by the objection being taken. Counsel claims to have forgotten at the hearing the fact that a written notice had been given, but does not claim to have forgotten the verbal agreement which he now contends was made at the time testimony was produced before the examiner.

By reference to the letter of defendant's counsel of Jan. 27, 1871, it will be seen that no notice is therein given of any intention to introduce the Leonard patent in evidence as proof of prior invention; and, in fact, the letter does not in any respect comply with the provisions of the statute in relation to notice of prior knowledge or use, or with the practice at that time in courts of equity, requiring like notice in equity proceedings.

The defendant's case for a rehearing must therefore depend entirely upon his claim that there was a verbal agreement between the counsel that complainant's counsel would waive his objection to the use of the patent in evidence, based upon the want of any allegation in the answer or other notice of such a defence.

The record in the cause shows that the objection was not waived, but insisted upon, when the evidence was offered before the examiner. Counsel for defendant offers affidavits tending to show that such an agreement was made; complainant's counsel introduces his own affidavit that he never made any agreement to waive the objection, and never intended to waive it, and never did waive it.

The court will not so far take notice of parol agreements of counsel, made or alleged to be made out of court, as to undertake, when there is a conflict of opinion between the respective counsel as to the terms of the agreement, or a difference of recollection as to its existence or meaning, to decide the question of comparative accuracy of recollection or construction, and determine, first, whether such a parol agreement existed; and, secondly, what were its terms; and, thirdly, whether the court would enforce it against the objections of counsel or parties.

Especially in a case like the present, where, if such an agreement to waive the objection was made at the hearing before the examiner, it was in the power of the parties, and it was their duty, to have the waiver entered upon the same record on which the objection appeared. But with the full knowledge that the record showed the objection would be insisted upon, counsel proceeded to put on record the testimony objected to, without any record of any waiver of, or agreement to waive, the objection. The objection was insisted on at the hearing of the cause, and no application was made then for delay, or any intimation given to the court that counsel were surprised that an objection was insisted upon, which the printed record, which had long been in the hands of counsel, notified the counsel would be raised at the hearing. Under such circumstances, it is too late for an infringer to ask to have the case reopened to allow him to interpose a defence which he did not set up in his answer, and to give the requisite notices. A patentee is entitled to the presumptions arising from the grant of his patent; and in general, where infringers rely upon a defence which attacks the validity of the patent itself, they should be apprised of that defence themselves, and give the patentee notice of it before the hearing of the cause. Motion for rehearing denied.

AMERICAN SHOE-TIP CO. v. NATIONAL SHOE-TOE PROTECTOR CO.

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. March 27, 1877.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—INJUNCTION — REASONABLE DOUBT AS TO VALIDITY—PRIORITY—REISSUE—DISCLAIMER.

1. Where an application for a preliminary injunction is founded upon long public acquiescence in the complainant's patent, and on adjudications in other courts in favor of its validity, the existence of these facts is, prima facie, a sufficient reason for the court to grant an injunction pending the litigation, only in those cases where the infringement is palpable.

2. But, if any reasonable doubt exists as to the validity of the patent, and where the defendant is acting under the authority of another patent, the court should not grant an injunction until after the examination and decision in regard to the claims of the conflicting patents, upon the merits of the case.

[See Crowell v. Harlow, Case No. 3,444; Burleigh Rock-Drill Co. v. Lobdell, Id. 2,166.]

3. Priority having been declared in favor of the invention described and claimed in the complainant's patent, in an interference proceeding with the inventor of the invention described and claimed in the patent under which the defendants act: Held, that after long public acquiescence as was shown in this case, it is too late to open the inquiry as to priority on a motion for a preliminary injunction.

4. A patent may be reissued so as to include features of the invention disclaimed in the original, where the disclaimer was the result of an error or mistake on the part of the patent office.

[See Poppenhusen v. Falke, Case No. 11,279.]

[In equity. Bill by the American Shoe-Tip Company against the National Shoe-Toe Protector Company for infringement of patent No. 26,329. Heard on motion for preliminary injunction. Motion granted.]

Dickerson & Beaman, for complainant.
George Harding, for defendants.

NIXON, District Judge. The application in this case is for a preliminary injunction; and it is founded upon long public acquiescence in the complainant's patent, and on adjudication in other courts in favor of its validity. The existence of these facts is, prima facie, a sufficient reason for the court to interfere, by the injunction, pending the litigation, only in those cases where the infringement is palpable. If any reasonable doubt exists upon that point, and especially if the defendant is acting under the authority of a patent, there should be no interference by the court until after the examination and decision in regard to the claims of the conflicting patents, upon the merits of the case.

Much controversy was had on the argument concerning the scope of the invention owned by the complainant. The original patent, No. 26,329, was for a new article of manufacture, and was granted to James M. Allen, the assignee of Newman Silverthorn, the inventor, on the 29th of November, 1859, for an "improved boot and shoe tip." In the specification and claims it was limited to a shoe-tip made of manufactured rubber or gutta-percha. The inventor expressly disclaims leather tips or metallic tips, and he enters into a long argument to show why the rubber tips are different, and how they are superior. "I am aware," he says, "that the leather tips have been known and used for a long time; and that metallic tips have been made and patented. I lay no claim to either of these things. I make a tip that is more ornamental than the leather, which it resembles very much, and much more durable than leather. Both the leather and the metal are difficult to crimp, fashion, or form, so as to make a neat covering for the toe of the shoe. But the prepared rubber may be moulded, fashioned or formed with great care and perfection, and with a finish equal to the best patent leather. So also may the gutta-percha be moulded into form, the nature of the materials of which my tips are composed being such that it can be readily put into any form or shape, and retain its enduring properties, while they admit of a high degree of polish, that adds greater market value to the shoe than the leather or metal tips do. 'Patent leather,' as it is termed, is exceedingly difficult to crimp or tree into shape for a boot or shoe tip; but a prepared rubber or gutta-percha tip can be moulded or formed into the required shape with the greatest facility, and finished to bear the greatest resemblance to patent leather, while it is much cheaper, more enduring, and much more readily secured to the boot or shoe—thus, in every essential making a better article than either the leather or metal tips heretofore used." The complainants insist, that notwithstanding this broad disclaimer of leather and metal tips, the invention of Silverthorn, in fact, covers them, and that the disclaimer was the result of a mistake or error in the officers of the patent office, which was subsequently corrected.

It appears from a record submitted on the argument, that on the 16th of May, 1856, Silverthorn filed a caveat in the confidential archives of the office, claiming that he had "made certain improvements in the mode of constructing boots and shoes," and was then "engaged in making experiments for the perfecting the same, preparatory to his applying for letters patent therefor." He therein describes the nature of his invention to consist—"In providing the upper on the toes of boots and shoes with fenders of copper, brass, india-rubber, gutta-percha, or any other substance, for the purpose of protecting against grasses, etc., cutting or wearing out the uppers on the toes of boots and shoes, which fender is required to be made so as to fit upon the toe, previous to putting on the outsole, and to extend beneath the outsole far enough to receive the pegs, which are to fasten it on, etc." He claimed as his invention: "The application to the toe of boots and shoes, in the manner" therein "described, of any substance that would protect the upper from being cut or worn out by the long grasses, etc., as herein described."

With this caveat pending, on the 16th of December following, one George A. Mitchell filed an application for letters patent for a metallic tip. After describing the mode of making and attaching it to the boot and shoe, he claimed as his invention: "The application of a thin plate to the toes of children's, boys', and men's boots and shoes, so as to prevent them from wearing out; using for that purpose the aforesaid metal, or compounds, or any other, substantially the same, which will produce the intended effect."

An interference being declared between them, a large amount of testimony was taken, and the commissioner of patents, on the 6th of November, 1857, decided in favor of the priority of the Mitchell invention, and granted to him letters patent for the same. Silverthorn then withdrew his application, with the condition, however, annexed, that he should not be debarred at any future time from testing the validity of the patent granted to Mitchell. On the 7th of December, 1858, Mitchell, having surrendered his patent, obtained a reissue with an additional claim for the metallic tip, described in his specification as a "new article of manufacture." On the 13th of July, 1859, the application of Silverthorn was renewed, limiting the claim to a shoe-tip of india-rubber or gutta-percha, disclaiming the metallic tip; and the above-recited letters patent No. 26,329, dated November 29th, 1859, were issued to James M. Allen, his assignee. On the 12th of December, 1860, Mitchell surrendered his reissue patent, and applied for a reissue thereof under the broad claim for a protecting tip of any materials for the toes of boots and shoes. The commissioner allowed the claim, and ordered the reissue, but, before it was taken from the patent office, Silverthorn's assignee surrendered his patent, and on the 14th of February, 1861, applied for a reissue, with a claim as broad as Mitchell's, and in direct conflict therewith.

An interference being again declared, the controversy between the applicants went from the examiners to the commissioner, who again decided in favor of Mitchell. The assignee of Silverthorn appealed to the supreme court of the District of Columbia. [Silverthorn's Assignee v. Mitchell, Case No. 12,859.] The court, on the 4th of August, 1862, by Chief Justice Dunlop, reversed the decision of the commissioner of patents, and held (1) that the two surrenders and applications for reissues opened the claims of both parties for re-examination, as if they had been original applicants, and enabled the former errors in the patent to be corrected; (2) that Silverthorn was the original and first inventor of the invention claimed; (3) that the design of congress in authorizing a reissue was to confer on inventors the full benefit and extent of their whole invention; and (4) that the assignee of Silverthorn should have reissued to him the letters patent for the shoe-tip, as claimed.

A reissue was accordingly made on the 2d of September, 1862, to George Goodyear, who has become the assignee of Allen in letters patent No. 1,339, which, being assigned to the complainant corporation, was again surrendered and reissued August 4, 1868, by letters patent No. 3,070. The patent expiring November 29, 1873, the commissioner extended the same, and the suit is brought on these extended letters patent. Having described the invention, in the specification of the last reissued patent, it is stated: "That the claim of the invention is not confined to the particular material of which the tip is or may be made; nor yet to the manner or process by which the same is or may be produced or applied, but what is claimed as the invention of the said Newman Silverthorn is, a formed tip, substantially as described, as an article of manufacture."

The controversy between Silverthorn and

Mitchell as to the priority of the invention of the boot-tip generally, as an article of manufacture, closed more than fourteen years ago, and, so far as the knowledge of the court extends, the public has generally acquiesced in the decision in favor of Silverthorn. It is too late to open the inquiry on a motion for a preliminary injunction, and if the shoe-tip, as an article of manufacture, which the defendants acknowledge to have made and sold, infringes the claim of the Silverthorn patent, a prima facie case is revealed that warrants and demands the interference of the court until the final hearing.

The defendants frankly produce the article of which complaint is made, and describe the process of manufacturing it.

It is a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and it has some features, I am inclined to believe, which render it more valuable than the complainant's device. But it is a formed shoe-tip, nevertheless, and is an article of manufacture made and sold separate from the shoe. It is a toe-protector, and although it does not cover the upper leather of the boot, it is inverted and fastened around the toe, substantially as the complainant's tip, and performs the same useful functions of protecting it against wear. I do not see how it can be used without infringing the central idea of the complainant's patent, to wit, the protection of the toe of the boot or shoe; and although it may be an improvement, it is nevertheless an infringement; and an injunction must be ordered to restrain the defendants until the further order of the court, and it is ordered accordingly.

[NOTE. So far as ascertained, this patent has not been involved in any other reported cases prior to 1880.]

In this case, the creditors had adopted a resolution, under section forty-three of the bankrupt act, appointing trustees, and the matter of confirming the resolution came up before the court. PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—EQUIVALENT FOR COMBINATION—MACHINE FOR SHAPING WHIP STOCKS.

1. Patent No. 53,003, to L. Hull, for gauge-lathe, and reissue of same, No. 7,262, construed and sustained. It is now well settled that the patentee or owner of a patent for a combination is as much entitled to equivalents as the patentee or owner of any other class of inventions. By an equivalent, in such a case, it is meant that the element or ingredient substituted for the one withdrawn performs the same function as the other, and that it was well known at the date of the patent in question as a proper substitute for the one omitted in the patented combination.

2. The invention, consisting chiefly in the combination, in a machine for shaping whip-stocks, of a holding and feeding mechanism, with revolving cutters having their axis of rotation at right angles, or nearly so, to the axis of the stocks, and of guides for directing and controlling the action of the cutters, as described in the specification and shown in the drawings, is infringed by a machine in which numerous blades are substituted for the burrs of the patentee, and where a formal change merely is made in the clamping and advancing mechanism by combining the two in one apparatus instead of performing the operation by two separate devices.

In equity. Bill in equity upon the alleged infringement of reissued letters-patent No. 7,262, dated Aug. 15, 1876, to the complainant, as assignee of Liverus Hull, for improvement in gauge lathes. The original patent was No. 53,003, and was dated March 6, 1866. [Decree for complainant for an account and for an injunction.]

Gillett & Stevens and S. J. Gordon, for complainant.

Brief of S. J. Gordon.

The view the complainants take of this invention and patent is, that inasmuch as, according to the state of the art, this invention was the first of its kind, which is not controverted, to embody successfully any holding, guiding, and reducing devices to round whip-stocks, Hull's patent covers all holding, guiding, and reducing devices, acting together substantially as his devices act together, and effecting the same result. Or, in other words, that under a patent holding such a place in the art to which it belongs, it is of no manner of importance whether the clamping devices to hold the whip-stock are of one form or another, so long as the stock is held; or whether the advancing and rotating devices are of one or another description, so long as they do advance and rotate the whip-stock; or whether the guides are of the same pattern or not, so long as they do guide and present the whip-stock properly to the cutters; or whether the cutters are burrs or blades or files, especially if they act alike, to scrape "off fine particles of rattan and whalebone," for it must be remembered it will not do to shave or whittle whalebone when advanced and rotated simultaneously in a machine. Mr. Hull says: "I have tried it many times and seen it tried by others, but in every case it was a total failure to accomplish any good result." Upon examining the Lombard or defendant's machine, it is found, and the testimony of all the experts and parties is in substantial accord on this point, that it contains and is dependent for its success upon its clamping or whip-stock-holding devices, its advancing and rotating devices, its guiding and reducing devices. Those effects have all to be produced by his mechanism to get the desired result, just as Mr. Hull had to produce them by his mechanism,—no more and no less. Mr. Lombard knew all about Hull's machine, was familiar with it, as was every one engaged in whip-manufacture in Westfield for the last eight years. He was alive to the manufacturing advantages which the old and leading company in that business had long possessed by using Hull's patented invention. If a rival machine could be built that did not interfere with the Hull patent, it would place other companies on a par with the complainants, and be likely to bring a handsome return to its ingenious constructor. As before said, Lombard had to take the precise steps of holding, presenting, advancing, revolving, and reducing, that Hull had taken. His problem was to take them, if possible, by different mechanical devices—by equivalent devices—getting as far away from Hull as he could, but producing the same effects. How does he do it? What differences of construction has his ingenuity been able to devise? He must rotate his cutters; he must use two cutters set as Hull's are; he must have guides; he must advance the whip-stock; he must rotate the whip-stock; he must clamp or hold the whip-stock to advance, rotate, and present it to the action of the cutters.

It is all summed up in this: He makes changes in two of those necessary devices,—the cutters and the clamps. Instead of burrs to scrape off the enamel of the rattan and the whalebone, he uses one hundred and twenty blades that act as burrs to scrape it off, the same things Hull used before he adopted burrs, and discarded as inferior. It is not necessary to enlarge upon that. The work and finish of the blades are coarser and less perfect. They are a mere evasion—the substitution of one common and well-known wood-working implement for another. The refuse, made by Hull's burrs and Lombard's one hundred and twenty blades, is hardly distinguishable. Far more cunning was the evasion of the clamping and advancing mechanisms by combining them in one; by making the rotating clamps also advance the stock—that is, making the clamps carry along the stock. One device is made to do two things, instead of having the two things done by separate instruments. Hull clamps his stock to a carriage, and moves the carriage. Lombard makes the clamps also serve as the propelling instrumentality. The fallacy of thinking a beneficent patent can be so escaped is here; not in knowing or not remembering what an invention is. It is not the precise, particular, defined mechanical instrumentalities that co-act in the result, for they may be embodied in a hundred forms; but it is the grand idea, the underlying principle, in obedience to which the mechanical instrumentalities act. Mr. Hull's invention was not conical burrs, or travelling carriage, or confining clamps, or revolving gears. But it was the comprehension of the steps to be taken to round a whip-stock by machinery; conceiving the plan to take mechanically those steps, one by one, or together, as necessity demanded. When those had been conceived and completely projected in his mind, the invention was made; and no matter in what form it was reduced to practice, no matter which of the various mechanical means, familiar to the craft, his taste or experiments led him to select in embodying his invention, it would not change it. It is just as much within the broad plan or principle upon which the machine is constructed, whether the whip-stock to be operated upon is fixed between two points, and then the points progressed, while the stock is revolved and its surface regularly reduced, or whether the stock, after being fixed between the points, is pushed along over them, or by them, while it is revolved, and its surface reduced. Both alike present it fitly to the reducing mechanism—which is the great thing to be done, the consummation of the details. If Mr. Hull occupied Lombard's place in the art, and was a mere alleged improver on prior patentees, it would be different. Then he would be held to his devices; for the whole scope of his invention would be found in his devices. But Mr. Hull was the founder of the art of rounding whip-stocks by machinery, as Elias Howe, Jr., was of sewing by machinery, between whose case and that of Mr. Hull's there is a striking parallelism. Both had an old, abandoned, worthless, impracticable machine, or attempt at a machine, made before they began, set up by infringers to rob them of the honor and profit of their achievements. Both required holding mechanism, advancing mechanisms, and mechanisms to operate upon fabrics, and in both cases those operations were the all-essential, the vital, salient features of the inventions. Both clamped the fabrics to be operated upon to a carriage, and then propelled that carriage. The successors of Howe liberated the fabric from the carriage, and made the clamps feed the fabric. The successor of Hull has done just that—liberated the whip-stock from the carriage, and made the clamps feed it along. But there was a vast difference in the results of the changes made by their respective successors. The improvers upon Howe put his invention into almost every house on the face of the globe. The improver upon Hull has not practically advanced the art at all. The followers of Mr. Howe fought desperately to escape his patent upon just that ground, that they did not hold and carry as he did. But court after court, beginning here, said No, gentlemen, that will not do; you clamp and carry, and you must clamp and carry, or you can never make a seam; and, therefore, you are within the sweep of the great principle he conceived and worked out. Your pieces of metal may be different from his, but, measured by what they do, their purpose and aim, and they are embraced by his discovery, because without some mechanical devices to perform these functions, nothing can be accomplished; and the first organizer of a machine to do what machinery never did before covers all mechanical devices and equivalents that take his steps to his result.

Hezekiah Lombard, respondent, pro se.

The bill is brought upon reissued patent, granted to the complainants as assignees of Liverus Hull, for a new and useful machine for dressing whip handles or stocks, alleging an infringement of the same by the defendant, and praying an injunction and an account of damages. The answer denies any infringement of said patent, and alleges that said Liverus Hull was not the inventor of the improvement in gauge lathes described and claimed in said letters-patent, and that the alleged invention of said Hull was known and used by John O. Griffin, James P. Whipple, and others, before the time of the alleged invention of said Hull. The complainants produce John Boyd Elliot, a mechanical expert, who affirms that the first two claims only of their patent are infringed by the defendant. A model of a machine is introduced by the defendant, which John O. Griffin and James P. Whipple affirm to be a correct representation of a machine made and used by them previous to 1860, six or eight years before the invention of Liverus Hull. Said machine does not contain all the devices of the Hull machine, but contains all the devices referred to in the first two claims of the complainants' patent and substantially in the same combination. The evidence shows that the clamps in the Sacket machine are substantially the same and combined the same, with the same device and for the same purpose as in the Hull machines. That the guides for holding the stock are substantially the same, and for the same purpose, and in the same combination with cutters and clamps as in the Hull machine. That the cutters are substantially the same and in the same combination with the same devices as in the Hull machine. And the evidence shows that there are no clamps in the machines used by the defendant substantially like the clamps described in the complainants' patent, and claimed in the first and second claims thereof, nor no clamps whatever. And the evidence further shows that the clamps in the complainants' patent are only fastenings to hold the whip to the rotating mandrels, and have no other office or use. The evidence shows further that the feed rollers in the machines used by the defendant perform the office of rotating the whips and carrying it in the direction of its length without any carriage and without moving with the whip. That they do not operate as clamps. That they are not adjustable for the same purpose as the clamps in the complainants' patent. That they are not adjustable at all. That the feed rolls have no function whatever that the clamps have. That there are no cutters in defendant's machine whose axis of rotation is at right angles to the stock, or substantially so, nor that have substantially the same action on the stock, or perform substantially the same office in dressing the stock as the cutters do and are claimed to do and have in the complainants' patent. That there are no guides in the defendant's machine for firmly holding the stock in one position relative to its axis whilst being dressed by the cutters, nor for any other purpose for which the guides in the complainants' patent are specified to be used for. That the evidence further shows that there are no guides needed in the defendant's machine for the same purpose as described in the complainants' patent; that the guides used in the defendant's machines are for another and different purpose and have different functions from those used in the complainants' patent. That the state of the art at the time of the said invention, was such that the patentee is not entitled to the principle. That the complainants' patent is for a combination.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Power to grant letters-patent is conferred by an act of congress, and when that power has been lawfully exercised and a patent has been duly granted, it is of itself prima facie evidence that the patentee is the original and first inventor of that which is therein described and secured to him as his invention. Defective patents may in certain cases be surrendered and reissued for the same invention in a corrected form, and when that is done in conformity with the requirements of law, the same prima facie presumption arises in favor of the patentee as that which arose in his favor from the original patent before it was surrendered. Sufficient appears to show that the assignor of the complainants became and was the inventor of a new and useful improvement in gauge lathes, and that letters-patent were granted to him, as such inventor, for the same; that the patentee, for due cause shown, surrendered the original patent, and that a new patent, with an amended specification, was subsequently issued to the complainants for the same invention, which is the subject of the present controversy. Service was made, and the respondent appeared and filed an answer. Such defences only as were pressed at the argument will be noticed, of which the following are the most material:—

1. That the assignor of the complainants was not the original and first inventor of the patented improvement.

2. That the charge of infringement is not proved, that the respondent never made, used, or sold the patented improvement, and never in any way infringed the rights of the complainants under their patent.

Applicants for a patent are required by the patent act to give a short title or description of the invention or discovery, correctly indicating its nature and design, and pursuant to that requirement the original patentee stated in the specification that he had invented a new and useful machine for dressing whip-handles or stocks, or other articles of a like nature, adding thereto that the object of his invention was to properly round and shape the handles or stocks of whips, and other articles of like character.

Important explanations are superadded substantially as follows: that to accomplish the work correctly, the stock must travel longitudinally towards the cutting devices, or vice versa, in order that the material removed from the stock may be stripped or cut lengthwise of the same instead of around it, or transversely, so that the surface of the stock will be left smooth; and he adds that the proper form or shape must be given to the stock at the same time that its surface is being finished, and consequently that the cutting apparatus must be controlled by a guide corresponding to the taper or form of the stock or handle of the whip. Preceding, as those explanations do, the statement of the claims of the patentee, they show in concise terms the true nature and character of the organized machine, and it is obvious that he intended by those explanations to illustrate in a general way the mode of operation by which the several devices, when combined, will accomplish the described new and useful result.

Strong support to that proposition is found in the paragraph which follows those explanations, in which the patentee states that the invention consists chiefly in the combination of a holding and feeding mechanism, and revolving cutters having their axis of rotation at right angles, or nearly so, to the axis of the stock, meaning the whip-handle to be rounded and shaped, and the described guides for controlling the action of the cutters, meaning the described cutting apparatus of the machine, as fully explained in the specification and drawings. Machines of the kind must of course have a frame of a suitable form to support the other parts of the machine, as shown in the drawings. The machine in this case has a carriage mounted upon the frame, the carriage being arranged to travel on guides or rails, for the purpose of giving a longitudinal motion to the stock. Standards are also mounted upon the carriage for supporting the mandrels which hold the stock in proper position to be guided to the cutters.

Devices of the kind for holding the stock are indispensable, and the specification shows that they are rotated by suitable gearing in such a manner as to keep the stock constantly revolving while it is under the action of the cutting apparatus. Means of attaching the stock to the mandrels are also shown, which is accompanied by clasping each end between a pair of levers, pivoted on a device called a head, mounted on the inner ends of the mandrels, which serves as a fulcrum to the levers and also causes them to revolve. Between the outer end of each pair of the levers there is arranged a cone, which can be longitudinally adjusted by a screw formed on the mandrels in a way to spread or release the outer ends of the levers, so as to close or open their inner ends, between which the opposite ends of the stock are held in proper position to the cutters. Suffice it to say, without entering further into the details, that every element of the machine, and its mode of operation, is given in the specification, confirming the remarks previously made, that the invention consists in the combination of the described mechanism for rounding and shaping stocks or handles for whips, or other articles of a like nature, including the described holding and feeding mechanism, together with the cutting apparatus, having its axis of rotation at right angles, or nearly so, to the axis of the stock, with the described guides for controlling and regulating the action of the cutters with their entire apparatus, as shown in the specification and drawings.

Five claims are annexed to the specification, the first two of which only will be reproduced, as it is not now claimed that the other three have been infringed:—

1. The combination, in a machine for shaping whip-stocks, of two rotating and adjustable clamps for holding the whip-stock, with revolving cutters, whose axis of rotation is at right angles to the axis of the stock, substantially as described for the object set forth.

2. The combination, in a machine for shaping whip-stocks, of revolving cutters, the adjustable and rotating clamps for holding and revolving whip-stocks, and the guides through which the stock is passed for firmly holding the stock while being dressed by the cutters as described.

Whip-handles or stocks are constructed in the rough before they are in a suitable condition to be dressed and smoothed, or rounded and shaped, by the machine described in the complainants' patent, which is true, also, of the whip-stocks manufactured by the respondent.

Undressed whip-stocks of the kind in controversy are described by the respondent as composed of eleven pieces, as follows:—

1. A middle piece of wood, or rattan, called a wedge, to which is attached a spike at one end and a piece of whalebone at the other.

2. On this central core, or wedge, are laid four other pieces of rattan called sidings, which are half round, with one edge planed off so as to allow them to fit the wedge or centre piece.

3. Then there are four other pieces of rattan called chinks, shaped so as to fit the pieces of siding, to fill up the crevices between the siding pieces, and make the handle large enough for a whip-stock.

4. All these pieces being thus prepared, they are then glued or cemented together before the stock is in a suitable condition to be dressed and finished in the machine.

Stocks of the kind are composed of rattan, whalebone, and glue, besides the spike at butt-end. When constructed in the rough they are not fit for the market.

Four things are required of the machine in order to dress the rough stock, and make it salable as a finished article:—

1. It must have means for holding the stock during the operation of dressing the article.

2. It must have means of advancing and rotating the article at the same time.

3. Means of guiding the rough article must be furnished, so as to preserve its shape during the operation.

4. It must have a cutting apparatus, to reduce the circumference of the rough article from butt to tip, as it is advanced and rotated.

By referring to the specification, it appears that the patentee adopted for holding devices two standards, to support two mandrels having a pair of levers which clasp each end of the whip-stock. Having devised means to hold the article, his next step was to provide an apparatus to advance the stock and cause it to rotate at the same time, which he accomplishes by a carriage travelling on rails and by a gearing causing the mandrels to revolve as the apparatus advances. Two notched plates are provided for guiding devices, sliding upon each other, so that when the stock is in the notches of the plates and between them, "they close upon the stock, and steady it under the cutting action." Two upright revolving steel burr-cylinders are provided as reducing devices, and it must be admitted that they are admirably adapted to the accomplishment of the function, without risk of injury even to the most slender part of the stock.

Argument to show that the patented invention is one of merit and of a highly useful character is quite unnecessary, as the remarks already made are amply sufficient to demonstrate that proposition to every impartial and well-informed mind; but it must be remembered that it is not a patent for the result, nor can it receive a construction which will shut out all other improvements. None of the elements or devices of the patent are claimed, nor do either of the claims, which it is alleged the respondent has infringed, warrant the construction that the original patentee was the original and first inventor of the entire machine. Instead of that, both the first and the second claims plainly proceed upon the ground that the invention is for a combination of old elements, and the words of the specification afford persuasive and convincing proof that such is the true theory of the patent, whether the question is tested by the specification or the claims which it is alleged have been infringed. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it is clear that the invention consists chiefly in the combination of a holding and feeding mechanism, with revolving cutters, having their axis of rotation at right angles, or nearly so, to the axis of the stock, and of guides for directing and controlling the action of the cutters, as described in the specification and shown in the drawings.

Suppose that is so, still it is contended by the complainants, and well contended, that the patentee or owner of a patent for a combination is as much entitled to equivalents as the patentee or owner of any other class of inventions. Doubts at one time existed as to the correctness of that proposition, but it is now well settled in accordance with the views of the complainants. Gould v. Rees, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 194; Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 28.

Questions of the kind usually arise in comparing the machine of the defendant with that of the plaintiff, and the rule is, that if the defendant omits entirely one of the elements or ingredients of the patented combination without substituting any other in its place, he does not infringe the plaintiff's patent; and if he substitutes another in place of the one omitted, which is new, or which performs a substantially different function, or, even if it is old, was not known at the date of the plaintiff's patent as a proper substitute for the omitted element or ingredient, then the charge of infringement is not maintained. By an equivalent in such a case, it is meant that the element or ingredient, substituted for the one withdrawn performs the same function as the other, and that it was well known at the date of the patent in question as a proper substitute for the one omitted in the patented combination. Hence it follows that a party who merely substitutes another old element or ingredient for one of the elements or ingredients of a patented combination is an infringer, if the substitute performs the same function as the one omitted, and was well known at the date of the patent as a proper substitute for the element or ingredient employed in the patented combination. Roberts v. Harnden, [Case No. 11,903.] Mere formal alterations of a combination in letters-patent do not constitute any defence to the charge of infringement, as the inventor of such an improvement is as much entitled to suppress every other combination of the same devices to produce the same result as the inventor of any other patented process or product. Examples of the kind frequently arise in suits for infringement, as where a spring is substituted for a lever to produce power, or where a weight is substituted for a spring to produce pressure, and many others, where the same rule may be applied.

Much discussion of the first defence is not required, as it is obvious that the evidence introduced by the respondent is insufficient to overcome the prima facie presumption arising from the patent that the assignor of the complainants was the original and first inventor of the improvement. Incomplete as the evidence is in respect to the Sacket machine, it is clear beyond all doubt that it cannot be held to support that defence. Taken as a whole, the evidence fails to satisfy the court that the supposed invention was ever completed as an operative machine. Nor is the evidence sufficiently full and explicit to enable the court to understand what its construction was, or its precise mode of operation. Persistent efforts appear to have been made by the supposed inventor, to induce manufacturers in his neighborhood to adopt it, without success, and the proof is, that, in almost every instance in which it was tried, it split the whalebone, and that when it did not, it left it in a worse shape to finish by hand than it was before the stock was put into the machine.

These efforts to introduce the machine were made twenty years ago, and have not since been renewed, showing, to the satisfaction of the court, that it was a mere experiment, and that it was finally abandoned. Such a defence requires better evidence to support it, and, in the absence of such evidence, the defence must be overruled. Grant that, and still the respondent denies that he has ever made, used, or sold the patented improvement, which, in the view of the court, is the principal issue between the parties. Questions of the kind, where the invention is embodied in a machine, are usually best determined by a comparison of the machine made by the respondent with the mechanism described in the specification and drawings of the complainants' patent. Very material aid in making that comparison has been derived in this case from the testimony of the expert witness examined by the complainants.

Nothing can be plainer than the proposition that it was the object of the assignor of the complainants to construct a machine that would round and shape undressed whipstocks and other similar articles with greater facility and with less expense than it could be accomplished by hand, all of which he effected by the devices of the machine described in the specification and shown in the drawing, and it is equally certain that the respondent desired to accomplish the same thing and nothing more, unless it was to change the form of the devices so as to avoid the charge of infringement. He knew what the devices were which were employed by the assignor of the complainants, and he was entirely familiar with the patented machine and its mode of operation. Years of experience had proved its utility and adaptation to accomplish the object for which it was constructed and patented. Beyond all question, it embodies a particular plan, and the evidence satisfies the court that the respondent borrowed every feature of his plan from the patented machine.

All agree that such a machine, to be successful, must have a holding and feeding mechanism, that it must have means to cause the stock to revolve as it advances, and that it must have revolving cutters with axis of rotation at right angles, or nearly so, to the axis of the stock, and that it must be provided with guides for controlling and regulating the cutters in order to keep the stock constantly revolving, while it is subjected to the cutting or rasping operation. Proof of conclusive character is found in the record that the object of the respondent in constructing his machine was the same as that of the assignor of the complainants, and the court is of the opinion that he accomplishes it by substantially the same means. Decided support to that proposition is derived from a comparison of the two machines and from the testimony of the expert witnesses.

Enough appears to show that the respondent adopted the same combination as that adopted by the assignor of the complainants, that is, that he provided means for holding, presenting, advancing, rotating and reducing the undressed stock, as is described in the specification and drawings of the patent. Changes were made by him in two of the necessary devices. Instead of burrs to scrape off the enamel of the rattans and whalebone, he uses numerous blades, sometimes as many as a hundred and twenty, that perform the same function as the burrs in the patented machine. Blades of the kind were first adopted by the original patentee, but he soon discarded them and substituted the burrs, which are much to be preferred. Formal change is also made in the clamping and advancing mechanism, by combining the two in one apparatus, that is, the respondent's device is made to do two things instead of having the two things done by separate devices, the difference being that the assignor of the complainants clamps his stocks to a carriage and moves the carriage, whereas the respondent makes the clamps also serve as the propelling instrumentality. Suffice it to say that the expert examined by the complainants states that he finds in the model of the respondent what he regards as substantially the same combination of devices and for precisely the same purpose as those specified and claimed in the first and second claims of the complainants' patent. Extended reasons are given by the witness in support of the conclusion, but it is unnecessary to reproduce his testimony. It is fully corroborated by a comparison of the alleged infringing exhibit with the patented improvement. Nor is it necessary to examine into the extent of the infringement, as that will fall within the province of the master. Decree for the complainants for an account and for an injunction.

[NOTE. So far as ascertained, there are no other reported cases directly involving this patent prior to 1880.]

Case No. 320.

AMERICAN WOOD-PAPER CO v. FIBRE DISINTEGRATING CO.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 362; 6 Blatchf. 27.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Jan. 7, 1868.*

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — PATENTABILITY—NOVELTY—EXTENT OF CLAIM—"SIMILAR SUBSTANCE"—INFRINGEMENT—PROCESS—COMBINATION—OMISSION OF MATERIAL PARTS—PRIOR ADJUDICATION.

1. A decision of a court of equity upon final hearing, in relation to the validity of letters patent, furnishes an authority for the action of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

[Cited in Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, Case No. 5,603; Willis v. Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co., 15 Fed. 570.]

2. It appears impossible to consider that to be a new material, patentable as a new product, which is simply a substance long well-known to exist in wood and other substances, left in a state nearly pure, and consequently, fit for the manufacture of paper on being bleached by the removal from it of the intercellulose with which it is found to be combined in wood.

[See note at end of case.]

3. The last clause of the claim of the letters patent of Mellier is not such a formal summing up and defining of the limits of the invention, as to restrict the patent to the single substance there mentioned, "other vegetable fibrous materials," having been referred to in the body of the specification.

4. Upon the question whether wood is a "similar substance" to straw in the manufacture of paper: Held: That as wood is a fibrous vegetable substance requiring the like treatment with straw, treated by the respondents in the same way and for the same purpose, it must be held to be a "similar substance" within the meaning of the Mellier patent.

5. The principle which Mellier discovered was, that the effect of a solution of pure caustic soda on certain vegetable substances could be increased by it, under pressure, at a temperature of not less than 310°, so as to result in the production of nearly pure fiber without resort to any other chemical process; thereby saving both alkali and time.

†[Affirmed by supreme court. 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 566.]

6. If the defendants used a process, involving the same principle, to produce the same result in substantially the same way, they can not escape the patent by a previous shivering of the material into shreds, or by a previous boiling it in an open vessel in spent alkali, or by putting it through a beating engine, and then calling the Mellier patent a "one-stage process," and the defendants' a "two-stage process."

[See note at end of case.]

7. The pressure of seventy pounds, as spoken of in the Mellier patent, means seventy pounds according to the French tables from which one atmosphere must be deducted to obtain the pressure indicated upon the steam gauge.

8. The patent No. 25,418, granted to Keen, is for a combination of which the stirrers described are a material part. If no stirrers are used by the defendants, there can be no infringement.

9. The second patent No. 38,901 is for a combination of which the diaphragm and well are material parts, and as the defendants charge their boiler below the diaphragm, and use no well, they do not infringe.

[In equity. Bill by the American Wood-Paper Company against the Fibre Disintegrating Company to restrain the infringement of patents Nos. 11,343, 17,387, 25,418, and 38,901. Decree for complainant. An appeal was subsequently taken to the supreme court, and this decree was affirmed. American Wood-Paper Co. v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 566.]

The facts of the case are substantially the same as those set forth in American Wood-Paper Co. v. Heft, [Case No. 322.]

Thomas A. Jenckes, for complainants.
George Gifford, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a suit in equity founded upon five different patents relating to the production of pulp fit for the manufacture of paper, which patents, it is alleged, the respondents have infringed. The questions raised in the case are so similar to those already considered in other actions founded upon the same patents, and especially in an action brought by the same complainants in the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, [American Wood-Paper Co. v. Heft, Case No. 322,] and there decided since the commencement of the present suit, that I feel relieved of much of the responsibility which I should otherwise feel in disposing of questions of this character. In the light of these decisions, my way to a correct determination is not obscure.

As to two of the patents sued on, the patents reissued to Watt & Burgess, numbered 1448 and 1449, the determination of the court in the case referred to furnishes an authority from which I should not feel at liberty, had I the inclination, to dissent. In accordance with that authority, it must here be held that the Watt & Burgess patent, No. 1448, which is for a pulp suitable for the manufacture of paper, made from wood or other vegetable substances by boiling the wood or other substances in an alkali, under pressure, as described, can not be sustained as a valid patent for a new product. Aside from that authority, I should feel bound to say that it appears impossible to consider that to be a new material, patentable as a new product, which is simply a substance long well-known to exist in wood and other substances, left in a state "nearly pure," and consequently fit for the manufacture of paper on being bleached by the removal from it of the intercellulose with which it is found to be combined in wood. The patent No. 1448, is for such a material as a new product, in the production of which, under the patent, if there be anything new, it is, as it seems to me, the process, not the product. The same authority must also dispose of the complainants' case, so far as it rests upon the Watt & Burgess patent No. 1449, which is for the process of producing this material from wood and other vegetable substances as described.

As regards this patent, the learned judge of the district court who took part in the decision of the Pennsylvania case, in his opinion, as delivered, makes the case turn upon the question of fact whether the process described in the reissued patent was invented by Watt & Burgess prior to the issue of their original patent in 1853, and he finds upon evidence, in substance the same as the evidence before me in this case, that this process had not then been invented by Watt & Burgess. Such is also my conclusion; and I am also of the opinion that the reissued patent is for a process substantially different from any described in the original patent. So far, then, as the bill rests upon the two Watt & Burgess patents 1448 and 1449, it must fail. But the complainants have not based their action upon the Watt & Burgess patents alone; they have also averred and proved the ownership of a patent issued to one Mellier on August 7, 1857, and numbered 17,387. This patent is for the use of a vessel of a peculiar description for heating the material in the manufacture of paper pulp, and also for a process of disintegrating vegetable matter for the purpose of producing pure cellulose fit for the manufacture of paper. It is the latter claim alone which is called in question here. This patent also was brought to the consideration of the court in the Pennsylvania case referred to, where the judges differed in opinion respecting it. It has likewise been considered and passed upon by the circuit court of this circuit, in the case of Buchanan v. Howland, decided in Albany, March 23, 1863, Hall, J., [Case No. 2,074.]

To the claim based upon the patent of Mellier, the first ground of defense taken here is, that the evidence does not show Mellier to have been the first inventor of the process described in his patent. The same point was taken in the Pennsylvania case referred to, and there Judge Cadwalader held with the complainant and Mr. Justice Grier to the contrary. In the Albany case, however, the patent was sustained by the court as for a new and useful process described by Mellier. The evidence before me upon the point in question differs somewhat from the evidence presented in the Albany case, but is substantially the same as that offered in the Pennsylvania case. I have considered it with care, and see nothing in it which should lead to a different conclusion from that arrived at by those experienced judges who have heretofore sustained the patent.

The next ground of defense is, that the Mellier patent is for a method of treating straw, and does not cover bamboo, which is the material mostly used by the respondents. This point I can not consider to be free from doubt. In the opinion delivered by Judge Hall in the Albany case, the patent is always spoken of as a patent relating to straw; but in that case the infringement proved was in regard to straw, and the court had no occasion to consider, and expressed no opinion as to whether the patent extended to any other substance. In the Pennsylvania case the point was fairly raised, and upon it Judge Cadwalader expressed the opinion that the patent would cover any fibrous vegetable substance requiring like treatment with straw for the purpose in view, and that wood was within its scope, while Mr. Justice Grier considered the patent to be confined to straw et similia. It appears to me quite manifest, from the language of the specification, that the patentee considered his process as applicable and beneficial in the treatment, not only of straw, but also of other vegetable substances. He uses throughout, the phrase "straw and other vegetable fibrous materials requiring like treatment." His description of his process nowhere limits it to the single article of straw, and his patent is for his process as described; but he does, in the last clause of his specification, say: "I also claim the within process for bleaching straw, consisting, etc. * * * substantially as described." Now, his process described is not a process for bleaching, in the ordinary acceptance of that term, nor is it a process for treating straw alone. No person looking at the whole paper would fail to see that the patented discovery related to other material as well as straw; and in view of the peculiar phraseology of the last clause, which is called the claim, and of the intention manifest elsewhere in the instrument, I incline to the opinion that, according to the principles applicable in the construction of the patent, the last clause should not be held to be such a formal summing up and defining of the limits of the invention as to restrict the patents to the single substance there mentioned, and this must have been the conclusion of Mr. Justice Grier, as well as of Judge Cadwalader. If, then, the patent extends to any other substance than straw, in the common and limited signification of the word, the respondents are within its scope by reason of their treatment of bamboo. They appear at times to have treated common straw, but their principal article is bamboo, which they use for the purpose of producing from it the desired pulp for the manufacture of paper, the stalks of this plant, which is the gigantic grass of the tropics, belonging to the same botanical order as wheat, oats, etc. The defendants, by means of a peculiar process of their own, shiver the bamboo into a mass of tendril-like shreds or strips very like a mass of straw, which they then boil in caustic alkali, under pressure, sometimes having previously boiled it in spirit alkali, in open vessels, and sometimes not. It is certainly a fibrous vegetable substance requiring like treatment for the purpose in question. It was treated by the respondents in the same way that they treated straw, and for the same purpose, and is in form and substance so very like to the common straw, that it must, in my opinion, be held to be within the scope of the Mellier patent. But again, it is said that the Mellier patent is claimed to a patent for a single-stage chemical process resulting in the production of pulp fit for paper, in which case the respondents do not infringe it, because their treatment is a two-stage process.

The principle of the Mellier discovery was that the effect of a solution of pure caustic soda upon certain vegetable substances could be increased by the use of it, under pressure, at a temperature not less than about 310°, so as to result in the production of nearly pure fiber without resort to any other chemical process, thereby saving both alkali and time. The final process used by the defendants is, as I understand the evidence, a process which invokes the same principle to produce the same result, and in substantially the same way. If this be so, they do not escape the patent by a previous shivering of the material into shreds, or by a previous boiling it in an open vessel in spent alkali, or by putting it through a beating engine. The material so previously treated, is still a fibrous vegetable substance, requiring to be treated by the Mellier process to produce the pulp desired; and when the defendants apply that process to it they infringe. But the respondents insist that they do not infringe the Mellier patent because they use a pressure lower than the minimum pressure required by the Mellier process, which they claim to be the pressure represented by seventy pounds upon the steam gauge. Upon this point I concur with Judge Cadwalader, in the opinion that the minimum pressure of the Mellier patent is the pressure indicated by fifty-five pounds upon the steam gauge instead of seventy pounds. It is true that the patent designated seventy pounds, but it says internal pressure, and gives 310° Fahrenheit as the corresponding temperature. Now, 310° Fahrenheit is not a temperature corresponding with seventy pounds, as indicated by the steam gauge; and it is quite evident, I think, that the patentee, in mentioning seventy pounds, had in his mind the French tables, which differ from the American tables, and according to which the weight of one atmosphere, 14.7, must be deducted to give the gauge-pressure intended to be indicated. Nor does the statement in the specification that "a steam gauge properly fixed will enable one to ascertain when the pressure had attained the required degree," appear to me to be inconsistent with this construction. Any skillful person must see from the specification that the internal pressure was to be considered, and that pressure he would ascertain by adding an atmosphere to the reading of the gauge. According to the evidence, the respondents have, at times, used an external pressure of sixty pounds, equivalent to an internal pressure of seventy-five pounds, running down, it is true, at times as low as forty pounds; but their claim is to the right to any rate of pressure, which, according to the views here expressed, is untenable. So, too, in regard to the strength of caustic alkali used. The respondent must be considered within the Mellier patent which designated for straw a strength of from 2° to 3° Beaume. The testimony of the respondents' witness as explained by the respondents, gives a strength of less than 3½° Beaume, and used by them, which would bring them fairly enough within the scope of the patent in question.

I have thus considered the principal objection made to the complainants' demand as based upon the Mellier patent, and my conclusion is, that the decree must be in favor of complainants, so far as that portion of their claim is concerned.

• There remains to be considered the two boiler patents which are set out in the bill as to which it seems sufficient to say that the first boiler patent of Keen, No. 25,418, is for a combination of which the stirrers described are a material part; the evidence, however, shows that the stirrers are not used by the respondents; not using the complainant's combination, they do not infringe his patent. The second boiler patent of 1863, No. 38,901, is also for a combination of which the diaphragm and well are material parts. The respondents use no well with the diaphragm, but charge their boiler below the diaphragm. There is, then, no use of the defendants' combination secured by the patent. So far as the complainants' case rests upon these two boiler patents, it must fail.

The decree must accordingly be in favor of the complainants, the terms of which may be settled on notice to the opposite party, when I will also dispose of the question of costs.

[NOTE. This decree was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion, of which he also prepared the following syllabus:

"[1. A manufacture or a product of a process may be no novelty, and therefore unpatentable, while the process or agency by which it is produced may be both new and useful.

"[2. In cases of chemical inventions, when the manufacture claimed as novel is not a new composition of matter, but an extract obtained by the decomposition or disintegration of material substances, it is of no importance, in considering its patentability, to inquire from what it has been extracted.

"[3. When the substance of two articles produced by different processes is the same, and their uses are the same, they cannot be considered different manufactures.

"[4. Paper pulp extracted from wood by chemical agencies alone is not a different manufacture from paper pulp obtained from vegetable substances by chemical and mechanical processes.

"[5. The reissued patent granted to Ladd & Keene, April 7, 1863, for a pulp suitable for the manufacture of paper, made from wood or other vegetable substances, is void for want of novelty.

"[6. The patent granted to Watt & Burgess, July 18, 1854, was for a process, consisting of three stages, for obtaining paper pulp from wood. The reissue to Ladd & Keene, dated April 7, 1863, is for a single stage process. It is not, therefore, for the same invention; hence the reissue is void.

"[7. Construction of the two boiler patents granted to Morris L. Keene, the one dated September 13, 1850, and the other June 16, 1863, both held to be for combinations.

"[8. A construction of the patent granted May 26, 1857, to Marie Amedee Mellier.

"[(A) The patent covers the process claimed when applied to wood, as well as when applied to straw.

"[(B) The 'internal pressure,' as described in the specification, is to be ascertained by deducting from the pressure marked by the steam gauge the weight of one atmosphere."

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June, 1870.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — EXTENSION BY COMMISSIONER — PAPER PULP — EXTENT OF CLAIM — IMPROVEMENTS IN PROCESS.

1. The extension of a patent by the commissioner of patents is a judicial act, not to be impeached, except in some direct proceeding duly instituted for that purpose.

2. The letters patent granted to Marie Amedie Charles Mellier, May 26th, 1857, for fourteen years from August 7th, 1854, for an "improvement in making paper pulp," are valid, Mellier was the original and first inventor of the process claimed therein, and his invention is useful.

3. The first claim of that patent being for "the use of a solution of caustic soda, (Na O,) in a compartment of a rotary vessel, separate from that which contains the steam heat, substantially as described," semble, that the mere substitution of heated air, or fire heat, instead of steam, would be an evasion of the patent, involving no substantial difference in the operation.

4. As to the second claim of that patent, which is for "the within described process for bleaching straw, consisting in boiling it in a solution of pure caustic soda, (Na O,) from two to three degrees Baume, at a temperature of not less than 310 degrees Fahrenheit, after it has been soaked and cleansed, and before submitting it to the action of a solution of chloride of lime, from one to one and a half degrees, substantially as described," the patentee is not confined to so exact and literal an interpretation of that claim, that, by abating a trifling degree of heat, countervailed by extending the process a fraction of time, or other departures not substantially different, the liability for infringement may be avoided; and, in respect of heat, the use of the precise amount is not limited, so as not to include higher degrees.

5. Held, that, if the defendants had made any improvements on Mellier's process, they had not thereby changed its substantial character, or acquired the right to use it.

[In equity. Bill by the American Wood-Paper Company against the Glen's Falls Paper Company for an accounting, and for an injunction restraining the infringement of patent No. 17,387, and reissues Nos. 1,448 and 1,449 of patent No. 11,343. Decree for plaintiff. A rehearing was subsequently granted, and is reported under same title. American Wood-Paper Co. v. Glen's Falls Paper Co., Case No. 321a.]

Re-issued letters patent Nos. 1,448 and 1,449 were granted to William F. Ladd and Morris L. Keen, as assignees of Charles Watt and Hugh Burgess, April 7th, 1863, for "improvements in pulping and disintegrating vegetable substances." The original letters patent [No. 11,343] were granted, as a single patent, to Watt and Burgess, July 18th, 1854, for fourteen years from August 10th, 1853, and were re-issued to Ladd and Keen, October 5th, 1858, and again re-issued to them, in two parts, April 7th, 1863. The claims of these two re-issues are set forth in American Wood-Paper Co. v. Heft, [Case No. 322.] This suit was brought, in part, also, on letters patent granted to Marie Amedie Charles Mellier, May 26th, 1857, for fourteen years from August 7th, 1854, for an "improvement in making paper pulp." The specification and claims of this patent are set forth in Buchanan v. Howland, [Id. 2,074.] The claims were as follows: "(1.) The use of a solution of caustic soda, (Na O,) in a compartment of a rotary vessel, separate from that which contains the steam heat, substantially as described. (2.) The within described process for bleaching straw, consisting in boiling it in a solution of pure caustic soda, (Na O,) from two to three degrees Baume, at a temperature of not less than 310 degrees Fahrenheit, after it has been soaked and cleansed, and before submitting it to the action of a solution of chloride of lime, from one to one and a half degrees, substantially as described." This suit was brought in 1867. The Mellier patent having expired during its pendency, a supplemental bill was filed, alleging that the patent was duly extended on the 24th of July, 1868, for seven years from the 7th of August, 1868. The defendant in this case was manufacturing paper from straw alone. The case was heard on pleadings and proofs, and decided in June, 1870.

Thomas A. Jenckes, for plaintiff.

Henry R. Selden and Joel Tiffany, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The time required for the reading, study, and comparison of the mass of evidence, oral and documentary, and the pleadings, exhibits, arguments of counsel and other documents submitted in this cause, forbids that I should, with numerous other cases before me requiring examination, devote much time to the labor of writing an opinion. To discuss the case upon all the evidence, would require time which is demanded of me by other parties for the consideration of their cases. I have examined with great care the pleadings, proofs, and arguments, and cases referred to, and confine myself to a very brief statement of my conclusions without discussion or elaboration.

In the first place, as to the objection founded upon an alleged irregularity in the extension of the patent held by the complainants. This objection goes only to the measure of the relief to be granted if the complainants sustain their bill in other respects. It would limit the period of accounting and forbid the granting of injunctions. I regard the objection, however, as unavailing. First. Because I think no fraud was practiced by the applicant for the extension; and if the reference, made in the order extending the time to file proofs, to rule 74, in distinct terms and making such extension subject thereto, did not per se prevent the claim that the time to file arguments was also extended, it is nevertheless only an irregularity. The extension of the time for closing testimony to July 16 (i. e. for fifteen days), was made expressly under the conditions prescribed by the seventy-fourth rule. That rule forbids a postponement of the hearing so as to cause risk of preventing a decision in season. To have allowed after the 16th, twenty days for the reception of arguments, would have extended the time till the 5th day of August, in a case in which the patent sought to be extended would expire on the 7th.

It seems quite clear that a misunderstanding existed on the subject in the mind of the contestants and that there was an oral arrangement between Mr. Stoughton, on behalf of the applicant, and the attorney for the contestants, that the arguments might be submitted by the 30th and 31st of July. But it is not shown that the commissioner made any such order. The existence of this arrangement, notwithstanding the present denial of Mr. Stoughton's authority to make it on behalf of the applicant, may have been sufficient ground for opening the case, if the power existed, and if it was practicable to do so, and obtain a decision before the patent expired. I am not satisfied that upon the proofs I could pronounce the extension void if the matter was open to consideration as a ground of defense.²

Second, I regard the opinion of the supreme court, delivered by Mr. Justice Swayne, in Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 788, as conclusive on this subject, and that the extension of the Mellier patent by the commissioner must be treated as a judicial act, not to be impeached, except in some direct proceeding duly instituted for that purpose. In the language of that opinion: "His decision must be held conclusive until the patent is impeached in a proceeding had directly for that purpose, according to the rules which define the remedy, as shown by the precedents and authorities upon the subject. We are not, therefore, at liberty to enter upon the examination of the evidences of fraud to which we have been invited by the counsel for the appellants. The door to that inquiry in this case is closed upon us by the hand of the law." See, also, Foley v. Harrison, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 433, 448. As to the merits of the case made by the complainant, it is sufficient for the decision of this case to say, that I concur in the opinion of Judge Hall, (Buchanan v. Howland, [Case No. 2,074,]) wherein he says: "We think the patent of Mellier is valid; that he is the original and first inventor of the process claimed therein; that his invention is useful." And I concur in the reasons for this conclusion fully stated in his opinion.

It is not necessary to consider the first claim made in that patent, for two reasons: The validity of the patent in respect to the second claim, establishes the complainant's right, for the purposes of this case; and I do not understand that the defendant is using vessels of the description mentioned in the first claim. Nevertheless, if the difference consisted simply in the substitution of heated air (or fire heat) instead of steam, I should strongly incline to hold that the substitution was an evasion, involving no substantial difference in the operation which the patent was designed to protect.

Upon a most painstaking consideration of the proofs, I think the defendant has not withdrawn this case from the operation of the views expressed by Judge Hall in the case referred to. I am constrained, by the proofs given by the defendant itself to find, that the invention by Mellier and his process, substantially described in the patent, are the grand inventions that have brought into practical use the art of converting woody substances into useful pulp for the manufacture of paper, in a manner convenient and economical; and that, without them, all the experience of chemists, inventors, and manufacturers prior thereto, was unavailing, (the inventions of Watt and Burgess, perhaps, excepted.) The testimony of the various witnesses called to attack the process of Mellier, (themselves mainly connected with rival manufactories, alleged to be infringing the patent,) shows slight departures, in some details, from the exact letter of Mellier's description, some in one direction and some in the opposite, each declaring that his own is the best and most useful, efficient or economical, thus contradicting each other, and showing, to my mind, most conclusively, that the process of Mellier is the true and effective one, around which these opposing opinions gather, throwing doubt not upon that, but upon the usefulness and materiality of the respective deviations therefrom. Concurring as I do with Judge Hall, that the patentee is not confined to so exact and literal an interpretation of his claim, that, by abating a trifling degree of heat, counterbalanced by extending the process a fraction of time, or other departures not substantially different, the liability for infringement may be avoided, and that, in respect of heat, the use of the precise amount is not limited, so as not to include higher degrees, I regard the variations by the defendant as immaterial departures from his description. If the defendant, or any of its witnesses, have made any improvements upon this process, by adding salt, or grease, or petroleum, they have not thereby changed its substantial character, nor acquired the right to use it. But, as to all these points, the proofs on behalf of the complainant seem to me to fully sustain its claim.

As to infringement by the defendant, what I have said leaves but one result. My inference from all the testimony is, that, since the value of this patent has become known and appreciated, manufacturers of paper, and experimenters upon wood and straw, have been industrious, and, I might doubtless say, ingenious, in their endeavors to evade it, by colorable departures therefrom, and by suggesting some useless additions, therein repeating the history of all important inventions, and the experience of useful inventors since patents were granted. I find, therefore, that the process used by the defendant is, in substance, Mellier's process, and that the complainant is entitled to a decree.

I forbear discussing the title of the complainants under the patents of Watt and Burgess, or expressing any opinion thereon, because I do not deem it essential to the decision which I make. To hold that the complainant is not entitled to maintain its bill as assignee of the Watt and Burgess patents, would not conflict with my view of its right under the Mellier patent; while, if the Watt and Burgess patents are also infringed, its title to recover would be no less. A decree must be entered directing an account in the usual form, and awarding an injunction restraining the defendant from using the process of Mellier, or that it is now using, which is adjudged an infringement, or any process substantially the same, with other proper incidental and usual details, with costs.

AMERICAN WOOD-PAPER CO. v. GLEN'S FALLS PAPER CO.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June, 1871.

LAW—RETROSPECTIVE LAWS—VACANCIES IN GOVERNMENT SERVICE—TIME AN ACT TAKES EFFECT—DATE OF A DECISION—PROVISIONAL JUDGMENT.

1. The act of July 23, 1868, "to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the executive departments," applied as well to existing as to future vacancies caused by death or resignation.

2. A vacancy existed in the office of commissioner of patents at the time of the passage of the act, and the chief clerk was, by virtue of section 2 of the act of 1836, acting commissioner. The act of 1868 contained a proviso that "in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the commissioner of patents, the duties of said commissioner * * * shall devolve upon the examiner in chief in said office, oldest in length of commission." Held, that this act, from the time it took effect as a law, operated to deprive the chief clerk of the patent office of power and jurisdiction to extend a patent.

3. The date of a decision is the time when it is finally settled and approved, and ready to be promulgated.

4. The idea of a judgment or decision, in its nature judicial, being made provisionally, while the question whether any or what judgment should be pronounced, was kept open to await argument, would be a novelty.

[Cited in Re Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 1,678.]

5. Whether the making of the decision which is indorsed upon the file wrapper of an application for an extension, even though it be deemed to establish the right of the applicant to an extension, is the official act which operates as a legal extension of the patent, quaere.

6. An act of congress, depriving the chief clerk of authority to act as commissioner of patents, bore the signature of the president, and the words, "approved July 23, 1868." It was transmitted to the office of the secretary of state and received there about four o'clock in the afternoon of July 21. Between the hours of seven and eleven o'clock in the evening of the 24th, the chief clerk, acting as commissioner, signed the order for the extension of the patent in question. Held, that under any hypothesis, as to the time when the act of congress took effect, the order of the chief clerk was a nullity.

[In equity. Bill by the American Wood-Paper Company against the Glen's Falls Paper Company for an accounting, and for an injunction restraining the infringement of patent No. 17,387, and reissues Nos. 1,148 and 1,449 of patent No. 11,343. Decree for plaintiff. American Wood-Paper Co. v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 320. On rehearing the decree was for the plaintiff, except as to the injunction prayed for.]

[The circumstances under which the rehearing was granted, and the facts involved, are fully set forth in the following statement of the case prepared by the court:] "This suit was brought in 1867, to restrain the infringement, by the defendant, of certain patents held by the complainant as assignee, and especially a patent granted to Marie Amedie Charles Mellier, for fourteen years from August 7, 1854, and which having expired pending this suit, was, by a supplemental bill, alleged to have been duly extended on July 24, 1868, for the period of seven years from the expiration of the term thereof. Upon the hearings of the cause, upon the pleadings and proofs, a decree of this court is made, at the June term of this court, in 1870, sustaining the title of the plaintiff, under the patent and the extension thereof, ordering an injunction and an account of profits, etc., with costs, against the defendant. At that time the counsel for the defendant (Mr. Tiffany) was not aware of the provisions of section 3 of an act of congress, passed in July, 1868, which is now claimed to render the extension of the Mellier patent wholly void, and the attention of the court was not called to that act on the hearing, nor until counsel obtained information thereof, after the entry of the decree. At the next term, to wit: the October term (in December as of October term), the defendant having theretofore obtained a stay of proceedings, applied to the court for a rehearing, and the application was granted, with leave to each party to produce further proofs in relation to the time of the passage of the act of congress, and to the time when the extension of the patent was made. Upon such further proofs the case has been heard, and is now to be decided. By section 2 of the act approved July 4, 1836, (5 Stat. 117,) a chief clerk of the patent office is to be appointed, "who, in all cases during the necessary absence of the commissioner, or when the said principal office shall become vacant, shall have the charge and custody of the seal and of the records, books, papers, machines, models, and all other things belonging to the said office, and shall perform the duties of commissioner during such vacancy."

In January, 1868, by the resignation of the commissioner of patents, a vacancy in the office was created, and, by virtue of the act above referred to, A. M. Stout assumed the performance of the duties of commissioner, and continued to act as commissioner down to July 24, 1868, and including that day. Chapter 227 of the Acts of 1868, entitled "An act to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the executive departments," contains a proviso, "that in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the commissioner of patents, the duties of said commissioner, until a successor be appointed, or such absence or sickness shall cease, shall devolve upon the examiner in chief, in said office, oldest in length of commission;" and by section 4 of the act it was enacted, "that all acts heretofore passed on the subject of temporarily supplying vacancies in the executive departments * * * and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are, hereby repealed." This enactment bears the signature of the president, with the words, "approved July 23, 1868." 15 Stat. 168, 169.

On what is called the file wrapper of the papers relating to the extension of the Mellier patent is indorsed: "July 24, 1868. It is ordered that this patent be extended for seven years from date of expiration (no argument filed for the contestants). Written opinion to be filed. A. M. Stout, Acting Commissioner." And a certificate of extension is in evidence signed by "A. M. Stout, Acting Commissioner," bearing date July 24, 1868, which recites that he "did on that day decide that the said patent ought to be extended," and proceeds: "Now, therefore, I, Alexander M. Stout, acting commissioner of patents, by virtue, etc., * * * do renew and extend said patent, and certify that the same is hereby extended, for the term of seven years from the expiration of the first term, viz: from August 7, 1868; which certificate, being duly entered of record in the patent office, the said patent has now the same effect in law as though the same had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years. In testimony," etc. The extension of patents in certain cases was provided for by section 18 of the act of 1836, above referred to, and although the power of extending patents was vested in the commissioner by the act of May 27, 1848, (9 Stat. 231,) the provisions of the said section 18 are still deemed important. It provides that if it appear to the board thereby constituted that it is just and proper that the term of the patent should be extended * * * "it should be the duty of the commissioner to renew and extend the patent, by making a certificate thereon of such extension, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the first term, which certificate, with a certificate of said board of their judgment and opinion aforesaid, shall be entered of record in the patent office; and thereupon the said patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years."

Proofs were produced, on the part of the plaintiff, tending to show that a contest had been had before the acting commissioner, and a report on the subject was received from the examiner, adverse to an extension of the patent, on July 20, 1868, and an ex parte hearing had thereupon on that or the following day, but the case awaited the appearance and filing or presentation of an argument by the contestants who had been active in resisting the extension, and the testimony of the acting commissioner, Stout, expresses a strong belief in these terms: "I feel sure I read the evidence * * * on or before July 20, and then made up my mind that I would grant the extension, unless my mind should be changed by some other evidence or argument than such as I had seen." * * * "I have a strong conviction, with scarcely a doubt, that I indorsed my order for the extension on that day as it now appears, except that it bore date July 20, instead of the 24th, and that I held the case up for the chance of a claim to be heard on the part of the contestants, or to meet the chance of the counsel on the side of the affirmative appearing and claiming to be heard; and on the 24th, I made a figure 4 over the 0, so that it would appear to have not been decided till that day, but I cannot state this positively, because I can not distinctly call to mind the doing of these two acts." Other of his testimony shows that he was aware of the pendency of the bill of July, 1868, above cited, and of the probability of its becoming a law, and of his ceasing to hold the position of acting commissioner, and he says: "As I had made the decision, I wanted it to stand subject to the coming in of the contestants, as before stated; the indorsement having been made, the patent would be extended, unless I should change it." This expectation that an argument from the contestants would be presented at a future day, was indicated further by some of the proofs originally taken in the cause, but the witness testifies with much positiveness that he actually made the said order on the file wrapper before July 25, 1868. The plaintiff also gave evidence tending to show that the act of congress in question remained in the hands of the president until the afternoon of July 24, and was then sent by him to the office of the secretary of state, and there filed, at or not long before four o'clock of that day, the office hours at that office then being from nine o'clock A. M. to four o'clock P. M.

The defendant, on the other hand, has produced testimony tending to show that the indorsement on the file wrapper of the order "that the patent be extended for seven years, etc.," was not delivered or made final by the acting commissioner until the evening of the 24th of July, after seven o'clock, and that until that time the subject of the extension was held open by the acting commissioner, and was the subject of actual discussion, and until then undetermined. That the certificate of extension was not in fact drawn and signed until after that day. And that neither the decision of the acting commissioner nor the certificate of extension were entered in the records of the patent office until on or after July 25. The defendant claims that by force of the act of July, 1868, all power of A. M. Stout, chief clerk, to act as commissioner, ceased on July 23, 1868, the day of the date of the signature of the president of the United States to that bill. That on the approval of an act of congress by the president it becomes a law, citing article 1, § 7, of the constitution of the United States. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 137; In re Welman, 20 Vt. 653; U. S. v. Williams, [Case No. 16,723;] Arnold v. U. S., 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 104; Matthews v. Zane, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 211; Gardner v. The Collector, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 499. That the date of the approval of the bill by the president is that date by himself thereto affixed, or at all events, that date is prima facie evidence that he did on that day approve and sign the bill. And there is in this case no evidence to the contrary. That, even if it were conceded that an act took effect from the reception thereof from the president by the secretary of state, the act did take effect on the 24th of July on the plaintiff's own showing. And that the law recognizes no fraction of a day, and therefore the act is to be deemed in full operation during the whole of that day, and whatever was done by Stout, as acting commissioner, on the 24th of July, was without authority and void. That, in fact, if fractions of a day can be taken into account, whatever Stout did touching the extension of this patent on the 24th of July was done after the act, approved and signed by the president, had been received from him, and filed in the office of the secretary of state. That nothing done by Stout, before the 24th of July, was an extension of the patent, or had any legal operation. That his mental conclusion to extend the patent, if cause to the contrary was not shown, or his provisional indorsement on the file wrapper—if indeed the belief he expresses in his testimony be assumed to be well founded—can not have any legal effect to extend the patent. And that the order itself made on the file wrapper was a mere decision that the patent ought to be extended, and though made on the 24th of July, was not, per se, a legal extension of the patent. That even if it were conceded that it would have been the proper ground of an extension to be made, upon which, if his acts done on the 24th of July are recognized as valid, the officer succeeding to the duties of commissioner might legally have extended the patent, the mere decision or order did not extend the patent. And hence the certificate of extension made after that day by Stout has no validity. That by terms of the statute, the certificate of extension is to be indorsed on the patent, and such certificate and the decision are to be entered of record; and it is "thereupon," and not until then, that the patent is as matter of law extended. That if the operation of the act of 1868 did not work a total repeal of section 2 of the act of 1836, so far as that section gave to the chief clerk the powers of the commissioner when he was absent, or the principal office vacant, and therefore if there were neither commissioner nor an examiner in chief, such clerk might act; such qualification of the act of 1868 can not avail the plaintiffs here, because there was at all times during the 24th and 25th of July, and afterward until a commissioner was appointed, an examiner in chief, and the oldest of such examiners in term of office, in actual attendance at the patent office.

For the plaintiff it is insisted: "That the act of July, 1868, did not operate to repeal, but only to modify for the future the law of 1868, by interposing certain other officers, who might act as commissioner, and so render a total vacancy less probable. That whatever its operation, it was wholly prospective, and it could have no effect until a commissioner of patents should be appointed, and death, absence, resignation, or sickness should thereafter occur, and therefore the powers of the chief clerk, under the act of 1836, remained unimpaired until a commissioner was appointed. That the act of granting an extension was judicial in its character, and therefore all the presumptions are in favor of its validity. Rubber Co. v. Good- year, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 788, 797, 798; Kempe's Lessee v. Kennedy, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 173; Polk's Lessee v. Wendal, 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 98; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 193; Bagnell v. Broderick, [13 Pet. (38 U. S.)] 450; Voorhees v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 449; Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319; Minter v. Crommelin, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 87. That the acts of Stout as acting commissioner on July 24, 1868, are valid acts. He was then in the rightful discharge of the duties of commissioner. That the date affixed by the president to his approval, July 23, 1868, is not conclusive, the affixing of a date by the president not being required by law. That the approval of the president has no operation so long as he retains the bill in his possession. He could legally strike it out if he finally determined to withhold his approval. Such approval does not take effect until it is promulgated, and the appropriate and only mode of giving it final effect is the delivery thereof to the secretary of state, on the reception of which, and not before, the act became the law of the land. That the time a bill is received from the president is in law the time when approval by him becomes effective, and is 'to be resorted to whenever the time a law goes into operation becomes the subject of inquiry. Gardner v. The Collector, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 499. That otherwise a statute might have operated upon the acts and rights of citizens, and affect them civilly and criminally, while the act is in the president's drawer, and knowledge of its existence as the law of the land impossible. That whenever the rights of the citizen are to be affected by an inquiry into the precise time a law took effect, it is not to be adjudged that it was in force during the whole of the day on which it became a law, but parts of a day are to be recognized and considered by the courts of the United States. In re Ankrim, [Case No. 395;] In re Richardson, [Id. 11,777;] In re Wynne, [Id. 18,117.] That it is for the defendant to show affirmatively that the granting of the extension was after the act was received by the secretary of state, and that the power and jurisdiction of Stout to act as commissioner had ceased when he made the order for the extension, and this has not been done. That the plaintiff has shown affirmatively that the act was not received by the secretary of state until four o'clock of the 24th of July, and that the defendants have not shown that the order for the extension was made after that hour. That Stout was in the actual and legal performance of the duties of commissioner until Hodges, the senior examiner, assumed their discharge on the 25th of July; and the defendants have not shown that the order for the extension and the certificate of extension were not made and signed by Stout, and the record thereof made before Hodges assumed the duties of acting commissioner.

"That the rights of the patentee were complete and finally vested when the order for the extension was made. That in law the record is taken to be made at and from the moment when the duty to record the extension arose, whether the actual writing of the record in the book of record was done on that or on a subsequent day."

Thomas A. Jenckes, for complainant.
Samuel S. Fisher, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. A rehearing was ordered in this case for the mere purpose of bringing under consideration the effect of the act of July, 1868, entitled "an act to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the executive department," upon the rights of the parties. It was not intended to consider further the questions of fact or law which were raised and discussed on the original hearing of the cause upon the pleadings and the proofs then taken. On the face of the statute, as it appears in the authorized publication thereof, and as it now seems on the act as received from the president of the United States by the secretary of state, it appeared that the act was approved on July 23, 1868, and prima facie at least, it was to be deemed to have become operative as the law of the land on that day. And, as the proofs then stood, the extension of the patent on which the plaintiff relies in his supplemental bill was made after that date, and when, by force of the act, as construed by the defendant, the power of the chief clerk of the patent office by whom the extension was made had ceased. If the alleged extension was invalid, then, although the original patent to Mellier was valid, and the defendant was found to have infringed it, the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction on the final decree, because the original patent expired on August 7, 1868, and the plaintiff was not entitled, by reason of the defendant's infringement, to an account of profits, except so far as profits arose out of a use made of the patented invention prior to the last-named day.

On the application for a rehearing, the plaintiff not only insisted that the act of July, 1868, did not (even though it became a law on the 23d of July) impair the validity of the extension of the patent, but the right was claimed to produce proofs from which it would result, by legal consequence, that the act did not take effect as law until July 24, 1868; that the authority of the chief clerk was in full force when the extension was made, and that the extension was in every view of the subject valid. It seemed to me just to permit both parties to produce further proofs to the end that the actual facts might appear, and that all legal questions, whether of the propriety of inquiring beyond what appeared on the act itself as the date of approval, or of the effect of the facts developed on such inquiry, might be raised and appear by the record to have been presented for consideration. Numerous interesting and delicate questions of great importance to these parties, and some of them of moment to the citizens of the United States, are now suggested. Among them are the questions, whether an act of congress becomes the law of the land eo instante the president puts his name thereto; whether during the ten days, for which by the constitution he is at liberty to retain a bill for consideration, the bill is so far under his control that, notwithstanding he may have first affixed his signature, he may, if subsequent information or subsequent reflection lead him to disapprove, erase such signature and return the bill with his objections; whether if he have affixed his name at his residence or in the executive chamber, and the bill remains in his drawer, it is nevertheless operative as a law; whether during the whole number of ten days it is entirely under his control, so that he may approve or disapprove, his signature only operating when he surrenders the possession of the bill; whether the act of September 15, 1789 (1 Stat. 68), providing that whenever a bill having been approved and signed shall become a law or take effect, it shall forthwith thereafter be received by the secretary of state from the president, and, as soon as conveniently may be, published, has or can have any effect to determine when the president has lost control of the question, or when his approval has legal operation (as matter of appropriate legal evidence); or whether such act imports, or can constitutionally import, that delivery to the secretary of state must be made before the law can operate; and whether any promulgation whatever is necessary to make an act of congress or the president's approval thereof operative? These questions, or multiplied forms of substantially the same question, are of great interest. So, also, whether when a statute takes effect on a given day, it is to be deemed in operation during the whole of that day, so as to affect the validity of acts done on the same day but at an hour prior to the actual enactment; and whether the court may recognize fractions of a day in declaring the effect, and inquire at what hour of the day the statute became operative; and if so, what are the sources of evidence; if the statute takes effect from the signing by the president, may the hour at which his signature was affixed be proved by parol, and the effect of the statute so be made to depend upon proofs necessarily somewhat unreliable.

These and other kindred questions discussed herein are of general interest. In more immediate relation to the subject of the extension of patents, it is of some interest to inquire what in law amounts to an extension. Is it the written decision or order of the commissioner, or is it the executed certificate of extension, or is the record of such decision and certificate an essential prerequisite? My conclusions upon the case, as now developed, render it unnecessary that I should express an opinion upon these various questions above stated. The legal effect of the act of 1868 upon the rights of the parties, if it was in operation when Mr. Stout, chief clerk, made the extension; whether any thing done before July 24, 1868, operated as a legal extension of the patent; and whether, assuming that the plaintiffs are right in their claim that the act had no legal operation until the president had signed and delivered the bill to the secretary of state, the extension was made after that time, are questions which, whatever may be my opinion on the other questions, may be decisive of the present case. ✓

On these last-named questions I state my conclusions very briefly.

1. The act of 1868, from the time it took effect as a law, operated to deprive the chief clerk of the patent office of power and jurisdiction to extend a patent. Looking to the object of the act, and the repeal of all existing acts on the subject of supplying vacancies, it is to my mind clear that the act, in all its principal provisions, must apply to existing vacancies caused by death or resignation. It embraces heads of departments, chiefs of bureaus, and other officers thereof, and if the authority conferred did not reach existing vacancies, then the repeal of all prior laws on the subject of temporarily supplying vacancies, left such vacancies unfilled, and without authority in any person to perform the duties, and the functions of the office could be discharged by no one. The reason for the enactment applied with the same force to an existing vacancy as to one which should thereafter occur. The words, "in case of death, resignation, absence, or sickness" of an officer, are as appropriate to describe existing facts as those which may occur in the future, and no reason occurs to me for confining it to the latter class. It may not be of much importance, but it is not impertinent to observe that this construction of the act was contemporaneously given to it by congress and by the patent office itself.

2. It is entirely clear that upon the pleadings and the proofs, in this case, it must be held that nothing done by Mr. Stout, the chief clerk, as acting commissioner, before the 24th of July, operated as a legal extension of the patent. The plaintiff in his bill relies upon an extension of the patent made on the 24th of July, and he has not averred any thing as a ground of claim that any prior act, decision, or adjudication gave him any right beyond the term of the original patent. The proofs place him in no different situation if he were not concluded by the pleadings; the certificate of extension relied upon bears date on the 24th of July, and was certainly not executed before that day. I think the proofs show that it was signed after that day. The decision or order entered upon the file wrapper (as the disposition of the contest touching the extension), as finally settled and approved by Mr. Stout, as acting commissioner, bears the deliberate and final date of the 24th July. The apparent endeavor to give it earlier effect, through the testimony of Mr. Stout to his belief or conviction that he wrote it on the 20th, having made up his mind to grant the extension unless his mind should be changed, will not avail. It is manifest, from the proofs in the cause, that there had been a vigorous contest, and that the acting commissioner expected to receive an argument from the contestants. The rules of the patent office provided for it. I have already held in this case that I could not go into any inquiry touching the validity of the patent founded on any irregularity, or failure, to conform to those rules. But this reference to the rules conforms to, and confirms what the witness in substance states, that nothing was done prior to the 24th, which was either understood to be, or was intended to be, conclusive as a decision. The idea of a judgment or decision in its nature judicial, being made provisionally, while the question whether any, or what judgment, should be pronounced, was kept open to await argument, would be a novelty. The entry, if made on the 20th, may have been a minute of views the acting commissioner then entertained; but he says himself that they were not promulgated, and that he did not intend to promulgate them until the 24th, when he thinks he made the date "24th," for the purpose of giving the decision some effect. I add what his testimony fairly imports, that the applicant was almost daily urging a decision; the acting commissioner was waiting for the appearance of the counsel for the contestants, and the final decision was withheld, he "retaining his power over it," until the 24th, when, under the influence of apprehension that his power would cease by force of the act then already passed both houses of congress, and known to have been laid before the president, and a desire to have the extension made, which he thought the applicant justly entitled to, he made his decision final on that day.

3. Having reached a conclusion that the patent was a valid patent; that the defendants are infringers of that patent; having no reason to doubt that the decision of the acting commissioner that the applicant was entitled to an extension was just and proper, I have come to the examination of the question of fact, as to when the extension was actually made, without impulse or possible prejudice unfavorable to the plaintiff. I trust, also, without any impression on my mind unfavorable to a just view of the evidence. If, then, the claims of the plaintiff as to the time when or the event upon which an act of congress becomes operative as the law of the land be conceded, and be fixed at the time when the act is received by the secretary of state, and the extension of a patent be held to create a vested right in the applicant not to be defeated by any retroactive legislation, by legal fiction or otherwise, even for an hour or other part of a day, the question of fact remains, when was the act in question, with the approval of the president, delivered and received by the secretary of state? And when, in fact, was the patent extended by the chief clerk as acting commissioner. On the first of these questions the proof is entirely convincing, and there is no contradiction to this extent, viz: it was not later than four o'clock in the afternoon. Although one of the witnesses ventures the opinion that the message to the senate, announcing the approval of the bill, did not reach the senate before half-past four, the grounds of his opinion are not very obvious, and if a mere opinion founded on the business done in that body after that message was received, and before five o'clock, is of any moment, I think the inference that it arrived there earlier much better warranted. And the fact that the bill sent by another messenger was filed in the office of the secretary of state on that day, and that the office hours were from nine to four, ought to be deemed to settle that question.

On the other question, it is pertinent to say that I deem it doubtful that the making of the decision which is indorsed on the file wrapper, is the official act which operates as a legal extension of the patent, even though it be deemed to establish his right to such extension. It may be a final decision, and if made while the chief clerk had jurisdiction and power to make it, might perhaps be conclusive upon his successor in the discharge of the duties of commissioner. Whether even the certificate of extension grounded thereon had not such relation back to that decision that it might be signed by such chief clerk after his power had ceased, the same being treated simply as the embodiment of that decision in proper form as evidence of the title of applicant, I express no opinion. Taking all this most favorably to the claim of the plaintiff, when was the decision, in fact, made? The testimony satisfies me, and I must, therefore, find that it was made between seven and eleven o'clock in the evening of the 24th of July, and, therefore, after the act of congress had been approved, signed, and filed in the office of the secretary of state. On the 20th or 21st, Hay (administrator of Mellier), the applicant, had been heard upon the subject of the granting of his application. The matter was kept open to enable the counsel for contestant to be heard under the rules. Those rules contemplated the giving of even more time to the contestants. Hay was nevertheless "almost daily urging a decision." An apprehension had arisen that the act of congress, taking away the power of the chief clerk, would be signed by the president. On that evening, between seven and eleven o'clock, Hay and others were present in the office. Hay had no business there "but to urge the extension of this patent." Mr. Stout was devoting his attention to the papers in the application for such extension. One of the clerks in the office was present, and read to him some papers connected with the case. He also devoted some attention to another application for an extension of a patent. That he decided adversely to the applicant under the same date, July 24, and as to that it is obvious there was no occasion for further attention if he had already, at an earlier hour of the day, actually made an adverse decision, for that terminated his duties in relation thereto. A rumor reached the office in the course of the evening that the act of congress above referred to had been signed by the president, and some one volunteered to go to the capitol to inquire. One witness thinks he returned with a confirmation of the rumor, but the witness, Pennebacker, testifies that he himself volunteered to go, and went, and was told that the persons inquired of had no notice of such signing, and that he returned and delivered the message. Mr. Stout is quite positive that he did not know of such signing until the next day. This would leave him at liberty to act in the matter of the extension. And all these circumstances indicate most strongly that it was then and there that his decision was made and intended to be operative and final.

This conclusion renders an opinion upon most of the questions discussed unnecessary, and therefore I do not inquire further whether the act is, as matter of law, to be deemed the law of the land during all the 24th day of July, or on whom is the burden of showing whether the decision was before or after the time at which the bill was filed in the office of the secretary of state, if that be the hour and moment when it took effect. Nor whether the operation of an act of congress shall be made to depend upon evidence in parol to matters lying in the memory of witnesses, and not in the record. Notwithstanding my conclusion, the case may, perhaps, illustrate the uncertainty attending such inquiries touching the law of the land, and often, it may be, when very grave consequences will flow from the opening of such a question to parol proof. It may be argued, with some force at least, that a law enacted by congress, approved and signed by the president, is to be taken as the expression of what is wisest and best, and that if an official act in contravention of its provisions or requirements be insisted upon, he who relies upon such act as valid, should, if he be permitted to divide the day of enactment into portions, show on his part, by very clear evidence, that the official act relied upon preceded the enactment of the law. The plaintiff must have a decree herein in conformity with the former decision, so far as it affirms the validity of the original patent and the infringement thereof, and directs an account of profits down to August 7, 1868, when that original patent expired, but no injunction restraining the deendants in the future use of the invention in question should be granted.

15. If the decree had been for the complainants on the fifth patent, it should have been without costs.—Cadwalader, J.

In equity. This was a bill in equity filed [by the American Wood-Paper Company against J. D. Heft and others] to restrain the defendants from infringing the following letters patent, which had been assigned to complainants:

I. Letters patent for "Improvements in pulping and disintegrating vegetable substances," granted to Charles Watt and Hugh Burgess, July 18, 1854, [No. 11,343,] for fourteen years from August 10, 1853, when the same invention was patented in England, assigned to William F. Ladd and Morris L. Keen, reissued to them October 5, 1858, and again reissued to them, April 7, 1863. This invention, as described in the original patents, was substantially as follows: The wood was reduced to shavings (the finer the better), boiled in a solution of caustic alkali (time and strength to suit the wood), washed and pressed, and exposed to the action of chlorine, or any composition of chlorine and oxygen, either gaseous or aqueous, washed and pressed again, using occasionally mechanical aid, and then placed in a weak solution of caustic alkali, when it will assume the form of a brown pulp. The latter is freed from alkali by washing, and then bleached in the usual way.

The claim of the original patent was as follows: "The pulping and disintegrating of shavings of wood, and other similar vegetable matter for making paper, by treating them with caustic alkali, chlorine, simple or its compound with oxygen and alkali, in the order substantially as described."

The claim of the two reissues, Nos. 1448 and 1449, granted April 7, 1863, were as follows:

Reissue No. 1448: "A pulp suitable for the manufacture of paper, made from wood or other vegetable substances by boiling the wood or other vegetable substance in an alkali under pressure, substantially as described."

Reissue No. 1449: "First, the process of treating wood or other vegetable substance by boiling in an alkali under pressure, as a process, or preparatory process, for making pulp for the manufacture of paper from such woods or other vegetable substances substantially as described. Second, the process of treating resinous woods by boiling in an alkali under pressure, and treating the product with chlorine and its compounds with oxygen, for making white pulp for the manufacture of paper from such woods, substantially as described."

II. Letters patent for "improvement in making paper pulp," granted to Marie Amedie Charles Mellier, May 26, 1857, [No. 17,387,] for fourteen years from August 7, 1854, when the same invention was patented in France. The specification of this patent is given in full in the report of the case of Buchanan v. Howland, [Case No. 2,074.] The invention had "for its object a peculiar process for the treating of straw and other vegetable fibrous materials requiring like treatment, preparatory to the use of such fibers in the manufacture of paper; and the improvement consists in subjecting straw, or such other fibrous materials, to a pressure of at least seventy pounds on the square inch, when boiling such fibrous matters in a solution of caustic alkali."

The disclaimer and claims of the patent were as follows: "Having thus described the nature of my said invention and the manner of performing the same, I would have it understood that I do not claim the general use of caustic alkaline solution, nor the employment generally of a close boiler for boiling straw, or other vegetable fibrous substances. But what I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the use of a solution of caustic soda (N a O) in a compartment of a rotary vessel separate from that which contains the steam heat, substantially as described. I also claim the within described process for bleaching straw, consisting in boiling it in a solution of pure caustic soda (N a O) from two to three degrees Beaume, at a temperature of not less than three hundred and ten degrees Fahrenheit; after it has been soaked and cleansed, and before submitting it to the action of a solution of chloride of lime, from one to one and a half degrees, substantially as described."

III. Letters patent for "improvement in boilers for making paper pulp from wood," granted to Morris L. Keen, September 13, 1859, [No. 25,418.]

The claim of this patent was as follows: "A boiler for boiling under pressure wood and ligneous materials for making paper pulp, constructed with an expansion chamber, stirrers, and discharge valve or cock, arranged for the purposes and in the manner substantially as stated."

IV. Letters patent for "Improved boiler for making paper pulp," granted to Morris L. Keen, June 16, 1863, [No. 33,901.]

The claims of this patent were as follows: "First, a boiler provided with a perforated diaphragm and well, or their substantial equivalents, arranged in the manner and for the purpose described. Also, in combination with the boiler, the arrangement of the discharge pipe and valve, for the purpose of blowing out or discharging the contents of the boiler under pressure, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

The defendants relied upon the invalidity of the reissues of the Watt & Burgess patent, insisting that they were not for the same invention as the original. They also insisted that Mellier's patent was limited to the use of caustic soda at a temperature due to a pressure of seventy pounds, claiming that the patentee had repeatedly stated in his specification that a pressure of seventy pounds was equivalent to 310° Fahrenheit. The defendants used a pressure not exceeding sixty pounds.

[Complainants' bill was dismissed, with costs, and an appeal was taken to the supreme court by complainants, but was dismissed on a question not affecting the merits. See The American Wood-Paper Co. v. Heft, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 333.]

Thomas A. Jenckes, for complainants.
George Harding, for defendants.

Before GRIER, Circuit Justice, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. That the reissued patents of 1863 are illegal and void requires no further reasons than those alleged in the answer and clearly substantiated by the evidence.

Mellier's patent is intended for straw alone, et similia.

He was not the first to succeed in this enterprise.

His patent must be construed by taking a view of all its parts.

He says his invention consists in subjecting straw to a pressure of at least seventy pounds to the square inch—prefers eighty.

"I have found by experiment that it is essential that a temperature equivalent to seventy pounds must be employed."

The only practical method of determining the temperature of the liquid is by noting the pressure on the boiler—testimony of Burgess.

Accordingly the patentee describes seventy pounds as synonymous with 310° Fahrenheit. Again, he describes it at seventy to eighty-four pounds. The claim uses the term not less than 310° Fahrenheit which he has before defined by seventy pounds to the square inch.

The claim of this patent was sustained only against those who went beyond the seventy pounds in New York.

The process used by defendants does not come up to the minimum claimed by Mellier.

The defendants do not use over sixty pounds to the square inch.

There is no proof that defendants infringe either of Keen's boiler patents, that of 1859 or 1863.

Keen's patent of 1859 is for a combination of devices which is not used by defendants.

His patent of 1863 claims a perforated diaphragm of which he was not the inventor—see Martin Nixon's patent, 1853.

Nor was he first to use a discharge pipe and valve for the purpose of blowing out or discharging the contents of the boiler under pressure.

The arrangement of a discharge pipe, with stop-cock, is what every one using a vertical boiler might use without invention, and is not open to be monopolized by Keen.

The combination of devices in defendants' Dixon patent has more claim to originality and invention, and does not infringe either of Keen's patents. The bill ought to be dismissed.

CADWALADER, District Judge. As to the patents for alleged improvements in the boiler, or its appendages, it may suffice it to say, that so far as the alleged inventions may have been patentable and new, they have not been infringed. The other patents on which the bill is founded require careful consideration. I regret that the early departure of the circuit judge for Washington renders a decision so soon after the argument necessary.

Watt & Burgess, practical chemists, on August 19, 1853, obtained a patent in England. On July 18, 1854, they obtained one from the United States, for the same alleged invention, for fourteen years from the date of their English patent. The patent from the United States, and a reissued patent which was substituted for it, have been successively surrendered, and a second reissue has been obtained. This reissue was in two patents, dated April 7, 1863, Nos. 1448 and 1449. Each describes a process for boiling fine shavings, or cuttings of wood, or other vegetable substances, in a solution of caustic alkali, in a close vessel, under a high pressure, in order to obtain a pulp fit for making paper, the length of the time of boiling, and the strength and heat of the solution graduated respectively to one another, and to the more or less refractory nature of the vegetable substance to be thus treated; the duration of such boiling from four hours to twelve; the strength of the solution from 17° to 12° or 10° T. (corresponding with 12° to 8½° or 7¼° Beaume); and the heat ordinarily "at near or above" 300° Fahrenheit, which might, however, be raised to 500°. This means a minimum heat, not much below that indicated on the steam-gauge as due to a pressure of fifty pounds to the square inch, which heat might be increased as required. The pressure appears, from the evidence, to be no further useful than as the required heat of the liquid above 212° can not be imparted except under pressure, nor measured otherwise than by the degree of pressure, as indicated on the steam-gauge. The specification implies, that the graduation of the heat, the strength, and the duration were to depend, in a great measure, upon experience, not restricted within any narrow limits. Their graduation to the nature of the vegetable substance, whatever it might be, is expressly required in the specification. Their adjustment or graduation to one another, as occasion might require, though not expressed, is obviously implied.

The claim in the specification of No. 1448

is of the invention of a pulp suitable for the manufacture of paper made from wood, or other vegetable substances, by boiling in an alkali, under pressure substantially as described. The claim in the specification of No. 1449 is the invention of treating wood, or other vegetable substances, by boiling in an alkali, under pressure, as a process, or preparatory process, for making pulp for the manufacture of paper substantially as described. The invention claimed in these two patents, whether that of a product, or that of a process, depends wholly upon boiling in an alkaline solution in a close vessel, with such graduation of heat, strength, and time to one another, and to the refractoriness of the material, as may produce a suitable pulp at one operation. The question is whether Watt & Burgess invented either the product or the process at or before the date of their English patent of August 19, 1853, to which the American patents relate. Before this date, and before any maturity of their previous experiments, a pulp fit for making paper had been obtained by others from such fibrous substances as wood and straw, through the use of different processes for disintegration of the fibers. In every such case, the process had been one of successive stages. The substances had been boiled in an alkali, strong or weak, in open vessels and in close ones, under pressure and without pressure. The process had never been such as to produce the pulp at one operation. In some cases the boiling itself had been repeated. In all of them, there had, besides mere soaking and cleansing, been a succession of mechanical or of chemical treatments, or of both, with applications of heat. But, as I have already said, a suitable pulp, that is to say, cellulose approximately pure, had, through some of these former processes, been obtained from both wood and straw. It is thus very clear that Watt & Burgess did not, nor did either of them, invent or discover the product as distinguished from the process.

As to the process, it was, on the part of the defendants, assumed that the case must be decided upon the patent No. 1449 alone; and, independently of the question whether the process in itself was new, the argument was urged that this patent was invalid because it claimed too much. The claim in it is for the invention of a process, or preparatory process. The novelty, if there was any, consisting wholly in the singleness of the process, it could not, according to the argument, be considered new as a preparatory process. Perhaps the phrase preparatory process, in the specification of this patent, has not precisely the meaning which this argument attributes to it. Pulp which is already fit for making brown paper, requires bleaching, in order to render it suitable for making white paper. If no further treatment than suffices to whiten the pulp is required for the latter purpose, the same process which suffices to finish the pulp for making brown paper, is thus, in a relative sense, preparatory as to white paper. If this were otherwise, the objection to the patent could be removed by a disclaimer, as was done in Morse's Case, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 120, 121. It is therefore unnecessary to inquire whether the difficulty might not also be avoided by recurring to the patent No. 1448, which is not simply for a product, but for the product as made by the single process described.

The specification will therefore be considered as including a legally-sufficient claim of the invention of the process of boiling in an alkaline solution in a close vessel with such a graduation and adjustment of heat, strength, and time as will produce the pulp at a single operation. That the process thus claimed, if actually invented by Watt & Burgess at any time not later than the date of their English patent, was new, is, I think, on the evidence, unquestionable. Therefore, if they had invented it by August 19, 1853, the reissued patent must be sustained.

The evidence upon the question of fact as to the alleged invention of this date, consists of the testimony of Mr. Burgess, and his manuscripts, which have been preserved; the specifications of the English patent, and of the first patent obtained from the United States; the correspondence and other papers on file in the patent office, and the specimens deposited there. Let us consider first the documentary evidence, and afterward the testimony of Mr. Burgess.

It is quite clear, from all the writings which are not of date subsequent to the American patent of July, 1854, that what was patented, and what it was intended to patent in 1853 and 1854, was an alleged invention of a process of successive stages, one of which was boiling in an alkali, and that such boiling might be under pressure, but that it was optional. The patentees did not intend to describe, or to claim, any process completed at one operation, to which boiling under pressure was indispensable. It may be said that there is, nevertheless, no absolute impossibility that they had invented such a process; and that the legal question under the reissue is not what they had intended to patent, but what they had, in fact, invented. This, in the abstract, is true. But its mere legal truth does not lessen the immense improbability that they had, in fact, invented or discovered the process.

Nor is this improbability diminished by the testimony of Mr. Burgess, that economical considerations may have influenced the patentees to suppress, at the time, a part of their supposed invention. His testimony, as given to this effect at this late day, does not go, by any means, to the extent assumed in the argument for the complainants. If the matured invention had been fully conceived by him, it is probable that motives of economy would, on the contrary, have suggested the idea of elevating the temperature in order to reduce the quantity of alkali used. The experiments of Watt & Burgess, in England, were begun in 1851, and there is nothing in the testimony of Mr. Burgess to induce a belief that by August 19, 1853, either of them had made any experiment with a view to such a simultaneous graduation of the time of boiling, and graduation of the heat and of the strength of the solution, as was required for a process of only a single stage. He testifies that in a laboratory in 1852 he produced a pure pulp by boiling in a caustic alkaline solution. But how long it was boiled, he does not state, nor of what strength was the liquid. He says that he had not the means at his disposal for determining the pressure used. How many, or what were the stages of the process, he does not mention. He left England for the United States in the early part of 1854. The single previous experiment in which he made a pulp at one operation occupied only about twenty minutes, when he was alone in the laboratory. On this occasion he put about a pound of pine wood into a wrought iron mercury bottle of the size of about fourteen by six or eight inches. He could not recollect the strength of the solution, and had no means of determining the pressure. There was no ascertainment or estimate of strength, or heat, or time, much less graduation or adjustment of them; nor was there any attempt at either, unless it consisted in the simple use of extreme heat. From the shortness of the time, the pressure must (if the material was crude) have been very high, far above the extreme of tension for any working purpose. He does not appear to have had any mental conception of such a practical process as the patents of 1863 describe.

Great care in referring the different parts of his testimony to the proper periods must be observed, or it may be misapplied. In 1854, after the American patent of July in that year, he recommenced experiments in this country, and before the end of the same year had approximately matured them. Whether he then attained a sufficient knowledge of the process afterward described in the reissued patents of 1863 can not be material. If such was the fact, and if Mellier had not obtained his patent in the mean time, it would be the misfortune of the complainants that Mr. Burgess did not apply for an independent patent in the latter part of 1854, instead of referring his new invention, by the reissues, to the patent of August, 1853. But the misfortune could not be judicially remedied. No such invention had been made at that time, and consequently the bill, so far as it rests upon the patents of reissue, must be dismissed.

The remaining question is, whether the bill can be maintained on the patent to Mellier, which is also vested in the complainants. A patent granted to Ladet, in France, on August 7, 1854, appears to have been obtained by him for this Mellier. The patent from the United States was obtained by Mellier himself on May 26, 1857, for fourteen years from the former date, August 7, 1854. He had, in the meantime, 1855, obtained a patent in England. The first claim and many parts of the specification of his American patent are applicable to the subject which is here of no importance. Hereafter, when his claim is mentioned, it will be understood as the second claim. He describes the invention as a process for the treating of straw and other vegetable fibrous materials requiring like treatment preparatory to the use of such fibers in the manufacture of paper. The improvement, he says, consists in subjecting straw or such other fibrous materials to a pressure of at least seventy pounds on the square inch, when boiling such fibrous matters in a solution of caustic alkali. For this purpose the straw or fibrous matters are cut, soaked, and cleaned, and then placed in a suitable boiler. He prefers a temperature to produce at or above eighty pounds on the square inch in the boiler containing the fibrous materials; but says that so high a temperature is not absolutely necessary, for he has found by experiment a temperature equivalent to seventy pounds on the square inch essential. The quantity of alkali used is at the rate of about sixteen per cent. of the straw or fibrous substance under treatment. In describing the details of the process, he says that the heat is to be raised to such a degree as to attain and maintain for a time an internal pressure equal to, or exceeding, seventy pounds on the square inch, that is, about 310° Fahrenheit, by which a considerable saving of alkali, as well as time and fuel, results, as compared with former means of using a caustic alkali, in preparing straw and other fibers for paper makers. He adds, that by submitting the straw or similar fibrous materials to a pressure of between seventy and eighty-four pounds on the square inch inside of the boiler, he can reduce considerably the proportion of alkali, and that the solution which he preferred to use was to be from 2° to 3° Beaume, and at the rate of about seventy gallons to each hundred weight of straw or other fibrous vegetable matters requiring like treatment; and that he found it desirable to keep up the heat and pressure during about three hours after the above pressure obtained. After further washing, the straw or fiber may, he says, be bleached in the ordinary manner, and this will be found to be accomplished by a comparatively small quantity of chloride of lime.

He declared that he did not claim the general use of caustic alkaline solutions, nor the employment generally of a close boiler for boiling straw or other vegetable fibrous substances, but claimed the process for bleaching straw consisting in boiling it in a solution of pure caustic soda from 2° to 3° Beaume, at a temperature not less than 310° Fahrenheit, after it has been soaked and cleaned, and before submitting it to the action of a solution of chloride of lime from 1° to 1½° substantially as described. In this claim and in the body of the patent, the word bleaching is used with applications chemically the same, but practically somewhat different, through difference in degree. The word signifies, in the claim, a disintegrating, and in the body of the patent a mere whitening process.

The reason for giving so full an abstract, almost a transcript, of the material parts of the specification, with some of its repetitions of the same phrases, will appear as we proceed. In the mean time, we may remark that whenever the number of pounds of pressure is mentioned by Mellier, he means the internal pressure, exceeding by fourteen and seven-tenths pounds, the pressure as indicated on the steam-gauges here in use, the difference being the weight of the atmosphere. This difference must always be considered in comparing this French expression of the measure with the usual expression of it in this country. Thus the measure of seventy pounds in the specification of Mellier corresponds with about fifty-five pounds on the steam-gauge here in use. His French patent mentions a pressure of five or six atmospheres. From the less extreme, five atmospheres, the deduction of one for this difference leaves the minimum four atmospheres, not quite fifty-nine pounds. An observation of less importance is that the tables used by him, according to which the degrees of heat are tested by the pressures, must have been somewhat inaccurate. Thus, in the specification of his American patent, he gives seventy pounds, or, as indicated on our steam-gauges, about fifty-five pounds as the pressure due to a heat of 310° Fahrenheit. The pressure due to such a heat should have been stated as internally about seventy-four pounds, or, as indicated on the steam-gauges, about fifty-nine pounds. So, in his English patent, he mentions eighty pounds on the square inch as the pressure due to a heat of about 322° Fahrenheit, whereas the internal pressure due to such a heat is about eighty-seven pounds, and the pressure as indicated on our steam-gauges about seventy-two pounds. These comparisons are facilitated by the tables annexed to Dr. Rand's testimony.

It is argued for the defendant that the process described in this patent applies to straw alone, or is limited to it by the claim; that the patentee was not the first person who succeeded in applying the process even to straw, and that if he was, the claim is limited to the use of a temperature not below 310° Fahrenheit, which he defines as seventy pounds to the square inch, internal pressure (corresponding with a pressure of about fifty-five pounds as indicated on the steam-gauge); that the pressure used by the defendants is below this, and that consequently they do not infringe the patent. I do not think any part of this argument maintainable. As I understand the specification, it describes, in substance, the process afterward claimed in the reissued patents of 1863, as the invention of Watt & Burgess. If so, Mellier would appear to have been the first person who discovered that the temperature and strength of the solution, and the duration of the boiling, could, in practice, be so graduated and adjusted as to produce the pulp at one operation. The claim does not, in the apparent purpose of that part of it which mentions straw, resemble in all respects the claims ordinarily found at the foot of specifications of patents. If it did, it would limit the application of this patent to straw alone. But there is, in this respect, very little resemblance to such ordinary claims. The intended subjects of the process patented are explicitly and repeatedly designated in the specification as straw and other fibrous vegetable substances requiring like treatment, for the purpose in view. This treatment is exemplified with the requisite descriptive precision in the type case of straw. The description of this application of the treatment suffices to enable a skillful person to apply it to other substances requiring like treatment. Such a person ought to know, and if he did not, passages in the specification would instruct him, that with a crude fibrous vegetable substance, more refractory than straw, a stronger alkali, or a greater heat, or a longer time of boiling, would be necessary. In the application of the treatment to such a substance, the proportions which were as yet untaught by science, would be tested by future experience. The case of straw best exemplified the "considerable saving of alkali as well as time," etc., which the specification mentions. But a solution in which, at a certain temperature, straw could be made into a pulp in a certain time, would, if the strength were increased, and the time of boiling prolonged, serve to make wood into pulp, in the same close vessel, with, or perhaps without, an elevation of temperature. With an elevation of temperature the wood might be made into a pulp in the same time as the straw, or in a time somewhat longer, and, perhaps, in a solution of somewhat greater strength. Experience would furnish and test the standards.

The substances must, indeed, be such as require like treatment with straw for the purpose in view. But what is this purpose? It is to obtain cellulose approximately pure, by disintegration. A fibrous vegetable substance which is ligneous, is not the less an object of this purpose because it is ligneous, if the treatment of it should be similar, and differing only in graduation and adjustment.

That the treatment required for straw and for wood are not otherwise different, appears beyond a doubt, from the answers of the defendants in this case, and from the sworn report of the viewers who witnessed the processes at the defendants' manufactory. Their answer describes the process then and previously used by them in making pulp for paper from wood, and also in making it from straw. They at first treated wood with a solution of caustic alkali of the strength of 12° Beaume; but afterward found a strength from 4° to 6°, say 5°, to answer best. For straw they state that they have used a strength of about 3° Beaume. For both wood and straw they state the pressure as between fifty and sixty pounds, not exceeding sixty pounds. In the subsequent experiments at the manufactory, they used a pressure generally somewhat lower, but with a more than corresponding increase in the strength of the solutions.

The claim of Mellier sums up in the specification so far as it had exemplified the application of the general process in the specific treatment of straw, which, when boiled in a solution of only 2° or 3° Beaume, requires a temperature of at least 310° Fahrenheit, if this heat of the liquid is to be maintained, as he suggests, for only three hours. But in a solution of greater strength, like that used by the defendants for straw, with a cooking process continued for a longer time, as theirs was in the experiments witnessed by the viewers, the specification implies that a lower temperature would suffice. In Mellier's French patent the time of boiling mentioned is, instead of three, six or eight hours, and the strength of the solution, instead of 2° or 3°, is 3° or 4° Beaume. The French patent described the process as consisting in the production of a pulp, either white or of a color fit for the manufacture of paper from straw or other fibrous vegetable matters; and, in describing the details, occasionally mentioned straw without mentioning other materials.

Independently of recurrence to Mellier's French patent, I think his patent from the United States maintainable as to both wood and straw. I also think that the defendants have infringed as to each, and that if the patent were limited to straw, there should be still a decree for the complainants. But I am not of opinion that such an absolute restriction is within the fair import of the specification. The difference of opinion upon the bench applies to this patent only. But it prevents a decree for the complainants. Their bill must be dismissed in order that they may be enabled to appeal. The dismissal should be without costs. If the decree had been in their favor, it should, I think, have been without costs.

[NOTE. For a reference to the other cases involving the same patents, see note to American Wood-Paper Co. v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 320. An appeal was afterwards taken to the supreme court by the American Wood-Paper Co., but the appeal was dismissed, on the ground that the complainants owned and controlled both sides of the litigation. In re McKAY et al.

[1 Lowell, 561; 7 N. B. R. 230.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCES—CHATTEL MORTGAGE —FUTURE ADVANCES—SECURITY.

1. An insolvent trader may mortgage his stock and tools for present and future advances with the actual and honest intent to raise money to continue his business. It seems, that such a mortgage would not necessarily be fraudulent though a part of the consideration were an existing debt.

2. Where the honest intent was clear, and the mortgage was made for past as well as future advances, but mainly for the latter, and it appeared that the past advances were already secured upon property reasonably believed to be fully adequate, the mortgage was upheld although it turned out that the former security had not been quite sufficient.

3. A chattel mortgage of machinery and other things which would be trade fixtures as between landlord and tenant, will give the mortgagee a valid lien as against the assignee in bankruptcy, although as against a prior mortgagee of the realty the fixtures would be real estate, if it appears that such prior mortgagee makes no claim to the fixtures.

4. Where a mortgage was given to indemnify the mortgagee for his advances, and he lent his acceptances to the mortgagor, and after the bankruptcy of the latter bought up the paper at a discount, held, that he could charge against the mortgaged property only what he had paid in cash to take up the acceptances.

5. Where a mortgage is made in Massachusetts of an unfinished locomotive, the mortgagee will hold the additions afterwards made to the article by the mortgagor before his bankruptcy, by accretion; but a mere mortgage of materials would not, it seems, give him the right to new articles manufactured from those materials.

6. A mortgage given in pursuance of a parol agreement to give security, if required, will not hold against the assignee in bankruptcy, if the act of giving the mortgage would have been a preference at the time it was given, but for the agreement.

[Cited in Strain v. Gourdin, Case No. 13,521.]

7. Whether or not a written promise to convey certain definite property as security, given when the debt was contracted, would save the mortgage afterwards given from being a preference, quaere?

[Cited in Re Jackson Iron Manuf'g Co., Case No. 7,153.]

8. Advances made in good faith while a mortgage is being prepared, and as part of the money agreed to be secured by it, will be protected, though there should be a change of the debtor's circumstances after the money was advanced, and before the deed was delivered.

In Bankruptcy.

B. F. Thomas and J. D. Ball, for petitioner.

T. K. Lothrop, for assignees.

[Reported by Hon. John Lowell LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

LOWELL, District Judge. The petitioner, as trustee for himself and his partner holds a mortgage upon nearly all the stock, tools, and other movable property of the bankrupt, and it was to be expected that the general creditors should look upon the transaction with suspicion, and inquire carefully into its consideration. The advances were all made after the nineteenth of September; the mortgage was made on the seventeenth of October, and McKay & Aldus stopped payment in the latter part of November of the same year, 1868. A mortgage of all the property of a trader, or of so much as will make him insolvent, when given for a pre-existing debt is, by the law of England, conclusively presumed to be a fraud upon the bankrupt act: Worseley v. Demattos, 1 Burrows, 467; Dutton v. Morrison, 17 Ves. 199; Lindon v. Sharp, 6 Man. & G. 895; Stewart v. Moody, 1 Cromp. M. & R. 777; and although our law does not deal in conclusive presumptions, yet the result is much the same, for it would be almost impossible to explain away such an apparent preference. It is not so with security given for present or future advances, which if made in good faith and without notice of any fraudulent intent on the part of the trader, cannot be acts of bankruptcy, for the reason that a fair exchange of equivalents injures no one. Unless, therefore, the mortgagee is party or privy to some fraud or preference, as in the case of Ex parte Mendell, (Re Butler,) [Case No. 9,418,] he may hold his security against the assignee however insolvent the mortgagor may have been at the time: Hutton v. Cruttwell, 1 El. & Bl. 15; Bittlestone v. Cooke, 6 El. & Bl. 296; Harris v. Rickett, 4 Hurl. & N. 1. In cases of a mixed character, where security for a past debt is coupled with a further advance, the law of England is thus stated by the latest text writer: "It does not appear to be formally settled whether the assignment by a debtor of the whole of his effects, in consideration partly of an existing debt and partly of an advance, is or is not an act of bankruptcy." After citing the authorities on both sides, he adds: "The weight of authority would seem to be in favor of a transaction of this sort not being an act of bankruptcy where the advance is made bona fide to enable the debtor to meet his engagements and carry on his business. Such an act may be and in fact often is the wisest course a trader can take to promote the interest of his creditors." Rob. Bankr. 110, citing In re Colemere, 1 Ch. App. 128; Allen v. Bonnett, 21 Law T. (N. S.) 578.

I am inclined to think that the test proposed by Mr. Robson is the true one under our law. It is not every insolvent who can be made bankrupt by his creditors, though every insolvent can petition in his own behalf. Congress has carefully refrained from saying that a state of insolvency is equivalent to an act of bankruptcy, though hopeless insolvency as proved by certain tests is so. For instance, a trader whose paper lies over for fourteen days has become bankrupt; but if his credit is sufficient to enable him to obtain a renewal within thirteen days, he cannot be proceeded against as a bankrupt on that ground. The question being in each case whether there was an intent to prefer, there may be many in which the evidence of a real and honest intention not to stop payment may make valid a security which was partly given for money previously advanced, if coupled with sufficient present advantages to the debtor to relieve the case of any fraudulent appearance. And there may even be cases where the purpose and expectation to keep on are so manifest that no intent to prefer can be found, though the insolvency was well known to both parties. The present case, however, is not one which calls for any critical examination into the boundary lines of the domain of preference. The history of the dealings between these parties from the 19th of September onward fails to show any intended fraud on the act. Indeed I understand it to be admitted that there was no such intent at first; but the assignees think they can discover a point where good faith ends and preference begins. They argue that the lenders advanced more money than they had intended or more than they had security for, and when they found this out determined to take the mortgage at any risk, to cover their advances and secure themselves if possible. The evidence lends no aid to this theory, but sets out a continuing course of dealing in which loans and security were contemporaneous throughout. I find it to be fully established that the firm of McKay & Aldus hoped and intended to continue their business, and made the mortgage with that view, and that their representations to the petitioner were calculated to make him believe not only that such was their hope, but that it was one that might be reasonably entertained. A mortgage made under such circumstances and for such a purpose cannot be successfully assailed if it is given for present and future advances only. It is argued, however, very strongly that this mortgage was intended mainly for past loans. No doubt it reads so on its face; but the proof is that many of the acceptances recited in it, although some of them are dated back a few days, so that all should not fall due at once, were given on the credit of this mortgage, and were not in fact delivered until the security itself was delivered. Our law of preference sets aside all payments and conveyances made with intent to prefer one creditor over the rest, whatever motives may have been brought to bear on the debtor by threat, entreaty, or legal coercion. And with us it is perhaps not the law, as it is in England, that a general promise of security given at the time the debt is contracted, may be executed after the debtor has become insolvent. Such a promise will not save the act from being a preference, if it would have been one without the promise. This, I have more than once ruled to the jury, and there are reported cases for it: Arnold v. Maynard, [Case No. 561;] Graham v. Stark, [Id. 5676;] Blodgett v. Hildreth, 11 Cush. 311. I have been accustomed to say that such an agreement merely amounts to an agreement to give a preference if one should become necessary. But I have always ruled that security fairly given, as part of the same transaction as the loan, could not be invalidated by a change of the borrower's situation re infecta, as if the money were advanced while the mortgage was in course of preparation, and the debtor fails in the mean time. I have not seen or known of any case which brings up the somewhat nicer question, argued here, whether specific and definite security, unconditionally stipulated for in writing, may be given after a lapse of time and a change of circumstances. This may depend on whether the contract is one that a court of law or equity would enforce in invitum; for I apprehend and have often decided subject to a correction that has not yet been made, that the assignee stands no better than the bankrupt in all matters of title, excepting where there is actual or constructive fraud. The petitioner insists that the letter of McKay & Aldus to him, of 21 September, if acted on and if the money was advanced on the faith of it, would give him an equitable lien which would prevail against the assignee. I shall not examine the point of law, because the facts negative any illegal intent, so that I must uphold the mortgage whether it was a mere continuation of the written promise or was a new contract. The petitioner advanced money from time to time and took security for each advance, and when the mortgage was ordered and was being drawn up, he had what appeared to be ample security for his then existing advances. It has turned out that one piece of property which he then held is of much less value than was supposed, and one other of somewhat less value, but there was no reason to suspect this at the time, and the difference even now is but trifling compared with the whole amount at issue, and I cannot find as a fact that this mortgage was given with any intent to prefer, or with any fear that the existing advances were not amply secured. The conduct of both parties before and after and at the time show as clearly as does all the rest of the evidence that the mortgage was intended for a legitimate business transaction, having relation to the continuance and not the stopping of the trade, and that the advances made at and after the time were the sole moving consideration for the mortgage. Under these circumstances I do not feel justified in avoiding the mortgage even to the extent of the few thousand dollars that are said not to have been already fully secured of the advances made in September. I do not undertake to recapitulate evidence, but I may say here that considering the dates, I doubt whether there is even a small balance of the earlier advances left to be paid out of the property embraced in the mortgage; because I think it will be found that acceptances for at least four or five thousand dollars were advanced while the mortgage was in preparation, and these would be protected by it if such was the agreement of the parties when they were given.

The mortgage being valid, it becomes a question of importance to the parties to decide what property is lawfully conveyed by it. It purports to grant "all the lathes, planers, drills, shafting, belting, pulleys, steam engines, boilers, and all the other machinery, tools, implements, furniture, locomotives, and other machinery and machines, whether finished, &c., and all the iron, steel, and other materials," on or about the land and buildings of the mortgagors' works at East Boston. There was an earlier mortgage on the land held by the Lowell Institution for Savings, to secure the payment of $60,000. The assignees maintained and still maintain that many of the things claimed by the petitioner under his conveyance were in fact a part of the realty, and held by the savings bank. They sold the equity of redemption of the real estate, after due notice, and after making a written agreement with the petitioner that the sale should not prejudice his rights, but that the disputed fixtures should be considered as worth their appraised value so far as the present controversy is concerned. The equity brought a large sum over the incumbrance of the savings bank. It is not seriously questioned by either party that certain steam engines, boilers, belting, and shafting, at least, are of the character of trade fixtures, which if put in by a tenant for years or at will, might be removed by him during his term: Wall v. Hinds, 4 Gray, 270; Whiting v. Brastow, 4 Pick. 310; Gaffield v. Hapgood, 17 Pick. 192. And it is no less certain that as against the savings bank, holding a prior mortgage of the land, they became a part of the realty, which neither the mortgagors nor any one claiming under them could remove: Winslow v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 4 Metc. [Mass.] 306; Butler v. Page, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 40; Bliss v. Whitney, 9 Allen, 114; Lynde v. Rowe, 12 Allen, 100; Richardson v. Copeland, 6 Gray, 536. The petitioner contends, and I think with reason, that the assignees having received for the equity of redemption a sum equal to the value of these fixtures must be considered to have received it for the fixtures clear of the mortgage. This distinguishes the case from Richardson v. Copeland, where the mortgagees of the realty applied to the insolvent court to have the estate sold, and for leave to prove for any deficiency, so that the defendant in that case derived title under the mortgagees, and is so treated throughout the case. Here the first mortgagee has no interest in the controversy; the assignees do not hold under him, and cannot set up his title. The rights of these parties are the same as if the estate had been sold free of all incumbrances, and the first mortgagee had been paid off, and a surplus was remaining in the registry of the court to be paid to such persons as could make a title. The late case of Hunt v. Bay State Iron Co., 97 Mass. 279, decides that by an agreement between the vendors of iron rails and a railway company, the rails may remain the chattels of the vendor, after they are affixed to the realty; that the vendor's property in them cannot be asserted against prior incumbrancers, nor against subsequent bona fide incumbrancers or purchasers without notice, but will hold good against purchasers with notice. That case seems to me decisive of this, because an assignee in bankruptcy takes with notice: Mitchell v. Winslow, [Case No. 9,673;] Winsor v. McLellan, [Id. 17,887;] Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 87; In re Atkinson, 2 De Gex, M. & G. 140; In re Barr's Trusts, 4 Kay & J. 219.

It is argued on behalf of the assignees that a contract to treat fixtures as chattels, whether it be express or implied, must be made before they are actually affixed to the realty; and for this some remarks of Dewey, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Gibbs v. Estey, 15 Gray, 587, are quoted. But those remarks appear to be intended only for parol agreements concerning buildings and fixtures annexed by a stranger, and to mean that such a parol agreement or license cannot change real into personal estate after its character has been once established. So if the question here were between the petitioner and the savings bank, no mere oral license of the latter, given after the engines were set up, could be shown. Growing wood or crops may be sold by parol, with a parol license to sever them; and I am much inclined to think that trade fixtures might be. At all events there can be no doubt that the owner can in writing and for a valuable consideration convey severable chattels in such a way as to bind himself and his assignee in bankruptcy by estoppel at least. The discussions of the question whether fixtures have passed by a deed or mortgage all assume, and many of them express that if the owner chooses to except the fixtures out of his conveyance of the fee, he may lawfully do so. Two or three decisions in England, which are thought to state the law too strongly against mortgagees, are yet supported on the ground that the particular conveyances may be construed as including or excluding the fixtures as the case may be. See Waterfall v. Penistone, 6 Bl. & Bl. 876; Trappes v. Harter, 2 Crompt. & M. 153; Cullwick v. Swindell, L. R. 3 Eq. 249; Colegrave v. Dias Santos, 2 Barn. & C. 76; Harlan v. Harlan, 20 Pa. St. 303. So in Richardson v. Copeland, 6 Gray, 538, the chief justice says: "No title to these articles passed to the mortgagees which they could assert against a third party," referring, no doubt, to a prior incumbrancer or an innocent purchaser of the land, as in Hunt v. Bay State Iron Co., and as the defendant in the case then before the court seems to have been in effect. The assignee is not a third party, in this sense.

By the insolvent law of Massachusetts the assignee took whatever any creditor might have taken on execution against the insolvent, and this included some things which do not pass to an assignee in bankruptcy, such as real estate which had been attached as the property of the bankrupt and afterwards sold by him subject to the incumbrance.

I am of opinion that the conveyance to the petitioner, under these circumstances, no question arising between him and the earlier mortgagee of the realty, passed a title which is good against the assignees. Some of the articles mentioned in the argument do not appear to be described in the petitioner's mortgage, and do not pass. Such are the gas, steam, air, and water pipes, and the benches and closets, unless they are tools, implements, or machinery, and it hardly seems to me that they are either of these. I do not understand that it is important to settle each particular of this kind, because the money realized is sufficient to pay the mortgage debt in full if the principal fixtures are held to be included.

I agree with the assignees that any saying that the petitioner has made by buying up his own acceptances must be credited to the estate, because the mortgage was for indemnity only, and not for a sum certain; and if he could have got rid of the acceptances without payment there would have been a right to redeem on repayment of the cash advances. If any locomotives were in course of manufacture when the mortgage was given, the additions to them would pass by accretion up to the time of the bankruptcy, even if the materials were not included in the mortgage, which I suppose most of them were. But I apprehend that a mere mortgage of materials would not convey new articles made out of those materials. See Harding v. Coburn, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 333. Let a decree be drawn in conformity with this opinion.

Case No. 324.

AMES et al. v. COLORADO CENT. R. CO.

[4 Dill. 251;¹ 9 Chi. Leg. News, 132; 3 Cent. Law J. 815.]

Circuit Court, D. Colorado. Dec. 6, 1876.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO AS A STATE AND ITS EFFECT UPON THE TERRITORIAL COURTS AND UPON CAUSES PENDING THEREIN AT THE TIME OF SUCH ADMISSION — CONSTRUCTION OF ENABLING ACT (18 STAT. 474) AND ACT JUNE 26, 1876, CREATING FEDERAL COURTS IN COLORADO.

1. The effect of the admission of the territory of Colorado as a state, and the erection of federal courts therein (Laws Cong. 1875-76, p. 61), and the extension of the laws of the United States over the same, was, ipso facto, to extinguish the territorial government and the territorial courts as courts of the general government.

[Cited in Ames v. Colorado Cent. R. Co., Case No. 325; Sargent v. Kindred, 49 Fed. 487.]

2. By special provisions in the enabling act and the constitution of the state, the territorial courts, on the admission of the state, became the provisional and temporary courts of the state.

3. The above mentioned act of June 26th, 1876, makes provision for the disposition of all cases pending in the territorial courts at the time of the admission of Colorado into the Union; cases of federal character are transferred to the proper federal court; other cases to the state courts.

4. The federal character of the cause must appear in the pleadings or of record; if it does not thus appear, the state court may lawfully proceed therein, and its action will be valid.

5. Where the federal jurisdiction depended on citizenship, and the requisite citizenship to give federal jurisdiction did not appear of record, the party who does not reveal such citizenship, but after the admission of the state proceeded actively in a cause pending in the local courts, was held to have made his election under the act of June 26th, 1876, to remain in the state court. Whether such election would preclude the party from taking a transfer of the cause under the general removal acts, quære?

In equity. This cause came before the circuit judge on a motion by the plaintiffs for an order on the clerk of the United States circuit court for Colorado to docket the cause (the original files from the territorial court accompanying said motion, as also a certified transcript), and for a further order on the said clerk to issue a writ of assistance in said cause to the United States marshal of Colorado, to put the receiver heretofore appointed by the judge of the local court in possession of the road and property of the defendant company. This motion is resisted by the railroad company. The files and records submitted show the following facts, stated in the order of their occurrence: June 21st, 1876, the bill in this case was filed in the district court of the United States of the late territory of Colorado, for the county of Boulder, by Ames and Duff, the trustees of a mortgage made by the defendant company, dated June 1st, 1872, upon the railroad property, tolls, income, and franchises of the company, to secure bonds to the amount of one million two hundred and twelve thousand dollars, with coupons payable semi-annually, alleging default in payment of interest due December 1st, 1872, to and including June, 1876, and praying an injunction (for reasons stated), restraining the company from disposing of or encumbering its property, or increasing its capital stock, for a receiver, and a foreclosure of the mortgage. The railroad company is the only defendant. That is the general nature of the bill which was filed in the local court on the 21st of June of the current year. July 13th, 1876, the company filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the Boulder district court, which, on July 18th, was overruled. July 22d, 1876, the company filed an answer to the merits, and on July 24th a replication was filed by the plaintiffs. The motion for the appointment of a receiver was resisted and not finally determined until early in August, when the district court of Boulder county appointed a receiver. The receiver was unable to obtain possession, and on August 12th, 1876, the judge of said court ordered out a writ of assistance to put the receiver in possession. While the application for a receiver was pending, and before it was decided, namely, August 1st, 1876, the proclamation of the president was issued for the admission of Colorado as a state. The pleadings show that the defendant company is a corporation created by the late territory of Colorado, but the citizenship of the plaintiffs (Ames and Duff) is not shown by the bill of complaint, except by the following averment:

"Humbly complaining, Fred. L. Ames, of Easton, Massachusetts, and John R. Duff, of the city of Boston, and state of Massachusetts, state that they are trustees," etc.

There is no distinct averment that they are citizens of the state of Massachusetts. October 24th, 1876, an affidavit, sworn to October 23d, 1876, was filed with the clerk of the Boulder district court (the court not being in session) by one of the plaintiffs' solicitors, stating that "the said Ames and Duff, complainants in said suit, are citizens of the state of Massachusetts, and the Colorado Central Railroad Company is a corporation," etc., containing no statement as to the citizenship of the plaintiffs at the time when the suit was commenced in the territorial court, though in the disposition finally made of it that is not very material; but in other cases it is certainly desirable, if not necessary, that there should be shown citizenship at the time when the suit was commenced, and the said clerk was at the same time notified in writing by the said solicitors that, "upon the filing of the affidavit, the above entitled cause becomes transferred to the circuit court of the United States for this circuit, and transmit the files and certified copy of the record entries in said cause to the said circuit court." That is, in brief, the state of the cause in the local court.

Now, as to the legislation applicable to this cause. March 3d, 1875, the enabling act in respect to Colorado was passed. [18 Stat. 474.] March 14th, the constitution of Colorado was framed. June 26th, 1876, the act of congress "to further the administration of justice in the state of Colorado," and creating the federal courts therein, was passed. July 1st, 1876, an election was held, at which the constitution was adopted. August 1st, 1876, the proclamation of the president declaring Colorado admitted as a state, was issued. The enabling act, aforementioned, contains the following: "Sec. 1. That the inhabitants of the territory of Colorado are hereby authorized to form for themselves, out of said territory, a state government, with the name of the state of Colorado, which state, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatever, as hereinafter provided." The fifth section provides that if a majority sanctions that constitution, the president, without any further action, may issue his proclamation, and thereupon the state becomes admitted without any action whatever on the part of congress. Then follows a provision as to senators and representatives, and the one supposed to be material, in these words: "And until said state officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, the territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices." That is the enabling act. The above mentioned act of congress of June 26th, 1876, as to the federal courts in Colorado, contains the following: "That when the state shall be admitted into the Union, according to the provisions of the act approved March 3d, 1875, the laws of the United States not legally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said state as elsewhere within the United States; and said state shall constitute one judicial district, to be called the district of Colorado, and for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, with the same rights, powers, and duties provided by law for similar officers in the other states, except as herein otherwise provided; and said district of Colorado shall be attached to, and constitute a part of, the eighth judicial circuit; and a term of the circuit court and district court for said district, shall be held at Denver, in said state, on the first Tuesday in July and on the first Tuesday in December in each year." Sections 5 and 8 are material. Section 5 contains a provision in respect to the disposition of pending cases in the supreme court of the United States, on writs of error or appeal from the supreme court of the territory of Colorado, and that such cases "may be heard and determined by the supreme court of the United States, and the remand of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the supreme court of the United States to the circuit or district courts of the district of Colorado, or to the supreme court of the state of Colorado, as the nature of the case may require; and each of said last mentioned courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Colorado territory, as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same, and to award the mesne of final process therein." Section 8, which is the section in relation to pending cases in the territorial courts: "That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the territory of Colorado, at the time of the admission of said state into the Union, whereof the circuit or district courts by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States, had said courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of the supreme and district courts of said territory, and all the files, records, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and district courts respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law."

This is all there is in the acts of congress relating to this cause. In the constitution of the state of Colorado, are the following provisions: Article 8, § 7, provides for the general election to be held on the first Tuesday in October, and at that election state officers, including judges, were elected by the people. In the fifth section of the schedule is this provision: "Whenever any two of the judges of the supreme court of the state, elected or appointed under the provisions of this constitution, shall have qualified in their office, the causes theretofore pending in the supreme court of the territory, and the papers, records, and proceedings of said court, and the seal and other property pertaining thereto, shall pass into the jurisdiction and possession of the supreme court of the state, and, until so superseded, the supreme court of the territory and the judges thereof shall continue with like power and jurisdiction as if this constitution had not been adopted. Whenever the judge of the district court of any district, elected or appointed under the provisions of this constitution, shall have qualified in his office, the several causes theretofore pending in the district court of the territory within any county in such district, and the records, papers, and proceedings of said district court, and the seal and other property pertaining thereto, shall pass into the jurisdiction and possession of the district court of the state for such county, and, until the district courts of the territory shall be superseded in manner aforesaid, the said courts and the judges thereof shall continue with the same jurisdictions and powers to be exercised in the same judicial districts, respectively, as heretofore constituted under the laws of the territory."

[The motion to docket the case was denied. For a subsequent hearing, see Ames v. Colorado Cent. R. Co., Case No. 325.]

Mr. Poppleton, for the motion.
Smith & Hall, opposed.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The motion here presented, namely, to docket this cause in the federal court, and for a writ of assistance, derives its importance not only for the large interests involved in the particular cause, but from the fact that the principles upon which it must be determined necessarily fix the status, as respects federal or state jurisdiction, of all other causes pending in the courts of the late territory of Colorado at the time of its admission, August 1st, 1876, into the Union as a state. These considerations have induced me to submit the conclusions at which I have arrived to the justice of the supreme court allotted to the circuit, for his judgment thereon.

In examining the question here arising, the legislation of congress in respect to the admission of other territories as states, and establishing federal courts therein on their admission, has been examined, as well, also, as the several judgments of the supreme court as to the effect of such legislation. Florida: 5 Stat. 742, 788, construed in the leading case of Benner v. Porter, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 235; Hunt v. Palao, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 589. Iowa: Webster v. Reid, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 437. Texas: 9 Stat. 1108, construed in Calkin v. Cocke, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 227. Wisconsin: 9 Stat. 567, 233, construed in McNulty v. Batty, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 72. Nevada: 13 Stat. 30, 440, construed in Freeborn v. Smith, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 160. Nebraska: Express Co. v. Kountze, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 342.

It is not deemed necessary to refer to this legislation, and to these cases, at any considerable length. They demonstrate the absolute necessity, on the erection of a territory into a state, and the admission of the latter into the Union, of legislative provisions by congress and the state as to causes pending in the territorial courts at the time of such admission.

The effect, judicially declared, of the unconditional admission of a territory as a state, and the erection of federal courts therein, and the extension of the laws of the United States over the same, is ipso facto to extinguish the territorial government, and with it the existence of the territorial courts of the general government. In the Florida case Benner v. Porter, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 235, 241, there was a provision in the constitution of the state, as there is in the constitution of Colorado, to the effect that all "territorial officers should hold and exercise their respective offices and appointments until superseded under this constitution." This was considered by the supreme court as being done to prevent an interregnum, and to have that effect, not by continuing even sub modo the territorial existence, but by making these officers, by the force of the state constitution, and the assent of congress to the admission of the state into the Union, state officers for the time being.

The territorial courts cease, on the admission of the state, to be courts of the territory, for the territorial government is displaced and abrogated; but, by adoption on the part of the state, with the consent of congress, these courts become the provisional and temporary courts of the state.

The act of congress of June 26th, 1876, in respect to the administration of justice in Colorado, unmistakably proceeds upon this view. It declares that the laws of the United States shall have force and effect immediately on the admission of the state. It created and established at once federal courts in the state, and makes more specific and careful provisions as to the disposition of pending cases, whether in the supreme court of the United States or in the supreme and district courts of the territory, than had been done by congress in any other instance in providing for a change from territorial existence to that of a state. That act determines what shall be done with "all cases" pending in all the territorial courts, "at the time of the admission of said state into the Union." Pending cases which might have been brought in the federal courts established by the act, had such courts existed when the cases were commenced, are transferred to the proper federal court, which is declared to be the "successor" of the territorial courts, a term which implies that these courts cease to exist as courts of the general government. All other cases remain and belong to the courts adopted or established by the constitution of the state. Cases of federal jurisdiction may be such by reason of parties, as where the United States or a federal corporation is a party, or because they arise under the constitution and laws of the United States, or because of citizenship, without respect to subject matter.

The federal character of a case must appear in the pleadings, or of record. If the federal character of a case pending at the time of the admission of Colorado thus appears, it belongs to the federal courts, if the case be such, as to subject matter or parties and amount, as that it might have been brought in such federal court if it had been in existence when the suit was commenced. If the federal character of a pending cause does not thus appear, the court in which it is pending may rightfully proceed therein after the admission of the state, at least until it is shown to the court that it is one of federal cognizance.

In the present cause the pleadings did not show that it was one of federal character, as there was no averment in the bill of complaint of the citizenship of the plaintiffs. As the cause was in the court and the court was in existence, and the federal character of the cause did not appear, it follows that the court had jurisdiction to act therein after the admission of the state.

It is contended by the defendant company that the complainants have elected to remain in the state court, and that, having done so, they are bound thereby, in virtue of the common law principle that an election once deliberately made is binding and irreversible. In other words, after the 1st day of August, the plaintiffs could have taken steps to show the federal character of the cause, and arrested all further action of that court. Instead of doing this, they invoked the continued exercise of the jurisdiction and powers of that court, and obtained on August [17]² an order appointing a receiver, and subsequently [August 21]² procured an order for a writ of assistance, which was issued. After having, with knowledge of all the facts as to jurisdiction, done this, can they afterwards change the forum, and if so, what limitation in point of time exists, and can it be exercised down to the time of final hearing? It is my judgment, in a case whose federal character does not appear of record, that the party who, with knowledge of all the facts, wishes the case to go to the federal court under section 8 of the act of June 26th, 1876, must take his election before voluntarily invoking the action and power of the court; otherwise he is concluded from afterwards electing to reveal its federal character, and have a transfer by virtue of the last mentioned act.

The case, by his consent and action, has become one belonging to the local court, and can only be removed therefrom, if at all, under the removal acts applicable generally to the transfer of causes from the state to the federal courts. It may be true that the plaintiff can, like other suitors elsewhere, have the benefit of the removal acts, if he can bring his case within them, but it is not necessary to determine this point.

The result of these views is that, as the plaintiffs, after the admission of the state, not only voluntarily submitted to the action of the local court, but invoked it and obtained it, they could not afterwards transfer the cause on affidavits filed with the clerk of that court, in the manner here attempted. The motion to docket the cause in the circuit court must therefore be denied.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. I concur in this opinion—in the first part of it, fully; in the latter part of it, on the ground that the party now seeking to docket the case in the circuit court took active steps in the case after he had the right to have it docketed in the circuit court. But, in the future application of the rule, I should not accept silence or passive inaction in the state courts as conclusive against a party of his election between the two courts. Motion denied.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1875—TIME.

1. The act of March 3, 1875, [18 Stat. 470. § 2.] which provides that any suit "now pending or hereafter brought in any state court" of the description therein specified, may be removed into a federal court, is not applicable to a suit brought in a territorial court, although, on the admission of the territory as a state, such suit passed into the jurisdiction of a state court.

[Cited in Dunton v. Muth, 45 Fed. 390.]

2. Under that act, application to remove a cause must be made to the state court at or before the term in which, according to the local law and practice of the court, the cause could have been finally heard. Accordingly, where issue was joined nearly one month before the end of a term of the state court, and it does not appear but that a final hearing could have been had at that term, an application thereafter made to remove the cause under the act of 1875 will be denied. See, on this point, Scott v. Clinton & S. R. Co., [Case No. 12,527.]

Co.*, 8 Fed. 198; Meyer v. Norton, 9 Fed. 435; Johnson v. Johnson, 13 Fed. 193; Cramer v. Mack, 12 Fed. 804.]

In equity. Bill to foreclose a mortgage. A very full history of this case is given in connection with the opinion of the circuit judge on the motion to docket under the act of June 26, 1876, which was announced at this term. 4 Dill. 251, [Ames v. Colorado Cent. R. Co., Case No. 324.] For convenience, it may be well to state the following again: The bill was filed in the district court of Boulder county, June 21, 1876; issue was joined July 24, 1876; the territory of Colorado became a state by proclamation of the president, August 1, 1876, and the last order made at the July term of the Boulder court was entered August 21, 1876. After the motion to docket the case in this court was denied [Id.,] and on the 7th of December, 1876, plaintiffs filed in the state court a petition alleging that they are citizens of Massachusetts, and defendant is a corporation created by a law of the territory of Colorado, and other facts, substantially as required by the act of 1875 concerning the removal of causes from state to federal courts. A bond was also filed, with conditions as required by that act, the sufficiency of which was not questioned in this court. Afterwards (December 9, 1876), plaintiffs filed in this court a transcript of the files, record, and proceedings in the Boulder court, and sought to have the cause removed. Thereupon, December 11, defendant moved to dismiss, which is here treated as a motion to remand.

E. L. Smith, for the motion.

A. J. Poppleton and J. I. Redick, contra.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and HALLET, District Judge.

HALLET, District Judge. This suit was brought in the district court of Boulder county, under the late territorial government, and the question here presented is, whether it may be removed into this court under the act of congress of March 3, 1875. In terms, that act extends to cases then pending or thereafter to be brought in any state court. This suit was not then pending in any court, nor was it afterwards brought in a state court, although it came into such a court by operation of law on the admission of the state, sometime after it was begun.

It was ingeniously urged in the argument at the bar that, by assenting to the jurisdiction of the state court, plaintiffs did in fact bring the suit in that court; but this will not bear examination. The bringing of a suit is understood to mean the institution or commencement of it, and so the language is in Revised Statutes, section 639, on the same subject. This occurred in this instance in a territorial, not a state court. Pending the suit the character of the court was changed into a state court, and there being nothing in the record to show its federal character, the court retained jurisdiction of it. 4 Dill. 251, [Ames v. Colorado Cent. R. Co., Case No. 324.]²

Plaintiffs did not in any sense bring the suit in or into the state court. They found it there, where the law had left it in the transition from a territorial to a state government, and they consented to go on with it in that jurisdiction. In that way they consented [elected]³ to remain in the state court; but they did not, in any reasonable construction of the act of 1875, bring the suit in that court. This view is enforced by the circumstance that congress has provided a special way of transferring causes on the admission of a state by general law (Rev. St. §§ 567, 569, 704), and also in this instance by the act establishing this court, June 26, 1876. This legislation, relating to a particular class of cases and designed to carry out the general purpose of the removal acts, seems to proceed on the theory that the latter are not applicable to cases which originate in a territorial court. If congress had consigned all federal cases to the state courts, plaintiffs would be within the reason, if not the letter, of the removal acts. But this was not done; and that which was done does not in any way tend to prove that the removal acts are by construction to be extended to cases like this—i. e., to cases not within their terms. If, however, this reasoning is unsound, there is another obstacle to the removal of the cause.

Accepting the act of 1875 as applicable to the case, by the third section it is provided that the petition for removal shall be filed in the state court "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." "The term here referred to appears to be that at which the cause may be tried or heard on the merits, according to the practice of the court, without regard to the special circumstances of the case, as whether the parties are ready for trial, and the like.

Certainly we cannot, in determining a question of this kind, enter into every circumstance that may delay or facilitate the progress of a cause, as whether there are nice points to be decided, which require time for consideration, whether the court was otherwise occupied, and so on. Such an investigation would be in every way embarrassing and uncertain as to the result, and therefore it may be dismissed as impracticable. We are, then, to inquire whether, according to the practice of the court, this suit could have been finally heard at the July term of the Boulder court, without reference to any of those circumstances that have been mentioned as likely to retard its progress. It appears that issue was joined on the 24th day of July, 1876, and the court remained in session for a period of twenty-eight days thereafter.

No time was allowed, by rule of court or otherwise, for taking testimony, and we cannot assume that any specific time was necessary. It was claimed at the bar that our rule, 69, should govern, but that rule was not in force in the Boulder court. Palmer v. Cowdrey, 2 Colo. 1. So far as the record shows, the cause could have been brought on at any time within the twenty-eight days which remained of the term after issue was joined. If the writer may speak from his own knowledge of the course of practice in the territorial courts, he feels bound to declare that it was entirely regular to bring a cause to hearing at the term in which issue was joined, and this was often done, especially in foreclosure suits. It is true that important suits often went over the term; but this was owing to the press of business, or other extraneous cause, and not to any rule of practice. It seems, therefore, that the application to remove the cause was not in apt time, not being made at the term when a hearing could have been had. For these reasons, the motion to remand will be allowed, with costs.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. I concur. I am inclined to think the first ground sound; but if, under the local law and practice, the case could have been finally heard at the July term, then I am clear that the application for removal should have been made at that term, assuming that the act of March 3, 1875, applies to the case. Motion sustained.

2. Where an invention is so loosely and inaccurately described in the specification, that the court cannot, without resorting to conjecture, gather what it is, then the patent is void; but if the court can clearly see the nature and extent of the claim, however imperfectly and inartificially it may be expressed, the patent is good.

3. A patent contained the following words in the description of the invention: "I do not claim the felting, vats, rollers, presses, wire-cloth, or any separate parts of the above described machinery or apparatus, as my invention; what I do claim as new, and as my invention, is the construction and use of the peculiar cylinder above described, and the several parts thereof in combination for the purpose aforesaid." Held, that it is not the cylinder alone, or its several parts, which are claimed per se, but they are claimed in their actual combination with the other machinery, to make paper.

5. It is the practice of this court, in all cases of surprise at the trial, by new matter proving a ground material to either party, and clearly made out by affidavit, to postpone or continue the cause. If the party interested, however, elects to go on with the cause, relying upon other matters, he is understood to waive the matter of surprise, and he cannot take his chance with the jury, and, if unsuccessful, then move the matter as a ground for a new trial.

6. A new trial is not granted upon mere cumulative evidence.

Downing, Case No. 13,036, to the point that "the avoidance of patents for claiming too much is of frequent occurrence, and needs no explanation as to the reasons for it, when an applicant is so improvident or unjust to others as to claim for himself more than he invented, and the credit or profit of which belongs to others rather than to himself."]

[9. Cited in Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 41, to the point that it is fatal to a patent that it consists in the application of an old process to a new subject, without any exercise of the inventive faculty, and without the development of any new or original idea.]

[10. Cited in Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 555, to the point that a combination of two or more old elements in a machine, producing a new and useful result, is patentable.]

At law. Case [of John Ames against Charles Howard and others] for an infringement of a patent-right for a new and useful improvement in the machinery for making paper. The specification annexed to the patent contained the following summary of the invention, as claimed by the patentee: "The drawing hereto annexed is to be taken and considered as a part of this specification. But it is to be understood, that I do not claim the felting, vats, rollers, presses, wire-cloth, or any separate parts of the above described machinery or apparatus, as my invention. And I hereby declare, that what I claim, as new and as my invention, is the construction and use of the peculiar kind of cylinder above described, and the several parts thereof in combination for the purposes aforesaid." The cylinder here referred to is particularly described in the specification, and it is there stated to be partly immersed and used in the vat containing the paper pulp, "having one end of the cylinder close to the side of the vat, which forms a covering therefor." And in another part of the specification it is stated: "One end of the cylinder thus formed is to be covered, and made water-tight by a copper or other sufficient covering, and the other end, uncovered, is to be brought and kept in close contact with the side of the vat or reservoir aforesaid, which is to be so adapted to it, as to form a covering water-tight for that end of the cylinder, which while it revolves is below the top of the vat or reservoir." The specification then proceeds to describe the mode in which the water, draining through the cylinder, is to be conducted off through a hole in the side of the vat, which covers the open end of the cylinder. It was not disputed at the trial, that the cylinder was not capable of, nor intended for, any distinct use separate from the vat; and that to make paper on it, it was indispensable, that it should be placed in the vat in the manner above described. Plea, the general issue, with notice of special matter.

At the trial it was contended by the defendants, that the true construction of the patent was, that the plaintiff claimed only the cylinder, and the several parts thereof, in combination with each other, as his peculiar invention. The court thought otherwise; and declared to the jury, "that the patent is for the construction and use of the peculiar kind of cylinder, and the several parts thereof, in combination with the other parts of the machinery, for the purpose of making paper. It is for the combination, and not for the separate parts thereof. It is not for the peculiar structure and use of the cylinder alone, as the invention of the plaintiff; but it is for it in, and as a part of, the combination. Nor is it alone for the several parts of the cylinder, in actual combination by themselves with each other; but in the combination with other parts of the machinery to produce paper."

At the trial the cause was argued by William Bliss and Rand for the plaintiff, and by George Bliss and Fletcher for the defendants. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for $412.50 single damages.

A motion was afterwards made by the defendants for a new trial, the grounds of which appear in the opinion of the court, and was argued by Rand for the plaintiff, who cited Smith v. Brush, 8 Johns. 84; Pike v. Evans, 15 Johns. 210; Williams v. Baldwin, 18 Johns. 489; Spong v. Hog, 2 W. Bl. 802; Ford v. Tilly, 2 Salk. 653; Watson v. Sutton, 1 Salk. 272; *Cooke v. STORY, Circuit Justice. The first ground of the motion is on account of a supposed misconstruction of the patent of the plaintiff by the court. And the question now is, whether the direction of the court was right in point of law. Patents for inventions are not to be treated as mere monopolies odious in the eyes of the law, and therefore not to be favored; nor are they to be construed with the utmost rigor, as strictissimi juris. The constitution of the United States, in giving authority to congress to grant such patents for a limited period, declares the object to be to promote the progress of science and useful arts, an object as truly national, and meritorious, and well founded in public policy, as any which can possibly be within the scope of national protection. Hence it has always been the course of the American courts, (and it has latterly become that of the English courts also,) to construe these patents fairly and liberally, and not to subject them to any over-nice and critical refinements. The object is to ascertain, what, from the fair sense of the words of the specification, is the nature and extent of the invention claimed by the party; and when the nature and extent of that claim are apparent, not to fritter away his rights upon formal or subtle objections of a purely technical character.

Now, let us see, what is the invention, as claimed by the plaintiff in the specification in this case. I agree, that if he has left it wholly ambiguous and uncertain, so loosely defined, and so inaccurately expressed, that the court cannot upon fair interpretation of the words, and without resorting to mere vague conjecture of intention, gather what it is, then the patent is void for this defect. But if the court can clearly see, what is the nature and extent of the claim, by a reasonable use of the means of interpretation of the language used, then the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of it, however imperfectly and inartificially he may have expressed himself. And for this purpose we are not to single out particular phrases standing alone, but to take the whole in connexion. The plaintiff begins by stating negatively, what he does not claim as his invention; and this may well help us to ascertain, what he does claim. He says he does not claim "the felting, vats, rollers, presses, wire-cloth, or any separate parts of the above described machinery or apparatus," as his invention. Now, among the above described machinery is the cylinder, and the several parts thereof. The cylinder therefore may fairly be deemed a separate part of the machinery, for it constitutes a part separable in its nature, and distinct in its formation, though adapted to a particular mode of use. He then proceeds to say, "What I do claim, as new and as my invention, is the construction and use of the peculiar cylinder above described, and the several parts thereof in combination for the purpose aforesaid." Now the defendants read this language, as if the words were, I claim the construction and use of this peculiar cylinder, and I claim the several parts thereof in combination with each other to form a cylinder for the purpose of making paper. Let us see, whether this is consistent with giving a due effect to all the words used, and with the antecedent negative declarations of the plaintiff. He before has said, that he does not claim, as his invention, any of the separate parts of the machinery; therefore it is very clear, that he does not claim the separate parts of the cylinder. But then, it is said, he claims these parts in combination with each other. But these parts in combination with each other constitute neither more nor less than the cylinder itself; so that upon this construction the words, "and the several parts thereof in combination," are mere repetition and tautology, and have no distinct meaning. The claim is read exactly, as if these words were struck out. Certainly no court of justice is at liberty to strike out any words, which are sensible in the place, where they occur, and are capable of a distinct application. We are to give, if practicable, effect to all the words, as containing a distinct expression of the intention of the party. Besides; upon this interpretation of the language, the party does not claim the construction and use of the cylinder as his own, but the application of it to a particular purpose, as his own. It requires no commentary to establish, that the application of an old thing to a new use, without any other invention, is not a patentable contrivance. A man, who should use a common coffee-mill for the first time to grind peas, could hardly maintain a patent for it. A man, who should for the first time card wool on a common cotton carding-machine, would find it difficult to establish an exclusive right to the use of it for such a purpose. So that this construction of the words of the specification could hardly be presumed to express the intention of the party; for then he would not claim the thing, but a particular use of the thing for a particular purpose. The plaintiff in the present case claims more than a mere use; he claims the construction of this peculiar cylinder, and the several parts of it. And how does he claim them "in combination"? In what manner? In combination with each other? No; but "in combination for the purpose aforesaid;" that is, for the purpose of making paper. The grammatical connexion of the passage, then, requires that we should read it, that he claims, as his invention, the cylinder itself, (as well as the several parts thereof,) in combination for the purpose of making paper. It is not then the cylinder alone, or its several parts, which are claimed per se; but they are claimed in their actual combination with the other machinery to make paper. In this view of the clause full effect is given to all the words, and the sense is at once natural and consistent. My judgment, therefore, is, that the construction given by the court at the trial is correct; and that, as matter of law, there is no error in it.

The next objection is necessarily out of the case; for the comment attributed to the court was, upon a suggestion of the defendants' counsel, immediately withdrawn from the jury by the court; and the whole matter of fact contained in Gilpin's deposition, as well as its credibility, was left entirely open and free to the jury. I cannot say, that they have misunderstood it; or that they have not drawn the right conclusion deducible from it. It was a matter peculiarly within their province; and the ample comments on Gilpin's testimony, at the trial, by the counsel on both sides, sufficiently evinced, that it was in some parts confused and unsatisfactory, and susceptible of different interpretations.

The next objection is, that in point of law the plaintiff is not entitled, without some previous notice, or claim, to maintain this action under his patent against the defendants, for continuing the use of the machines erected and put in use by them before the patent issued. This objection cannot prevail. I am by no means prepared to say, that any notice is in cases of this sort ever necessary to any party, who is actually using a machine in violation of a patent-right. But it is very clear, that in this case enough was established in evidence to show, that the defendants had the most ample knowledge of the original patent taken out by the plaintiff in 1822, and of which the present is only a continuation, being grounded upon a surrender of the first for mere defects in the original specification. Whoever erects or uses a patented machine, does it at his peril. He takes upon himself all the chances of its being originally valid; or of its being afterwards made so by a surrender of it, and the grant of a new patent, which may cure any defects, and is grantable according to the principles of law. That this new patent was so grantable is clear, as well from the decision of the supreme court in Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, as from the act of congress of the 3d of July, 1833, c. 162. There is no pretence to say that the defendants were bona fide purchasers without any knowledge or notice of any adverse claim of the plaintiff under this original patent; and the damages were by the court expressly limited to damages, which accrued to the plaintiff by the use of the machine after the new patent was granted to the plaintiff. Without doubt the jury conformed in their verdict to this direction of the court.

The other original objections may be passed over without notice, and indeed are insupportable in point of law. But another ground for a new trial has been since filed, founded partly upon surprise at the trial, and partly upon the discovery of new evidence applicable to the point, stated at the trial, which constitutes the matter of surprise. It came out in evidence on the trial, in the course of the cross examinations, that the original cylinder constructed by the plaintiff had bars of wood, instead of brass; and one or more of the witnesses asserted, that the brass bars were substituted for wood after the grant of the original patent in 1822. This was explicitly denied by other witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff, who asserted, that the brass bars were substituted before the patent. Upon this point the parties were at issue at the trial; and it was made a strong ground of defence. No application was made to the court by the defendants for a postponement or continuance of the cause for the purpose of a more full and thorough examination of the point, or to search for farther testimony. The uniform practice of this court is, in all cases of surprise at the trial by new matters, forming a ground important to either party, and clearly made out by affidavit, to postpone or continue the cause. And if the party interested makes no such application, but elects to go on with the cause, relying upon his other strength to sustain his claim or defence, he is understood to waive the matter of surprise; and he cannot be permitted to take his chance with the jury, and, if unsuccessful, then to move the matter, as a ground for a new trial. The purposes of justice would be defeated and not advanced by any different course. And courts, which adopt a different rule, act upon the ground, that in their own modes of trial and practice the party has no opportunity to postpone or continue the cause; but is compellable to proceed in the trial. Upon this short ground, therefore, the objection of surprise is removed from the case. But it is by no means clear, that the matter so waived was, in point of law, a good ground of defence to the action. That depended upon the fact, whether the plaintiff made it by his specification a constituent part of his invention, that the bars should be of brass, and not of wood; for if they might be made of either, consistently with his general claim, then there was no objection to the patent in this respect. Now, the court was by no means satisfied at the trial, that such was in fact the claim of the plaintiff. But, for the purposes of the trial, the evidence was left to the jury, as if it constituted a complete ground of defence. The jury so acted upon it; and, having decided against it, as matter of fact, it would be a strong ground for the court to interfere now upon a mere doubt, whether the plaintiff's claim had in point of law such an extent or not. I do not state this with any other view, than to say, that it is a matter still sub judice, upon which my mind is not so clear, as to induce me to grant a new trial, merely with a view to open anew the discussion of it. But, then, as to the new evidence offered, what is its nature? It is merely cumulative; and the settled practice of this court is never to grant a new trial upon mere cumulative evidence, where there is no other ground of objection to the verdict. That point has been fully considered in the case of Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co., at this term, [Case No. 262.] But it has been long since established in the habitual course of proceedings of the court. The counter affidavits, however, offered on behalf of the plaintiff, go to establish strong cumulative proofs the other way. And under such circumstances, the court will always decline to interfere; because it will not undertake to measure the weight of the new testimony on either side, or send the parties again to litigation upon the chances of a verdict, upon new conflicting evidence. The defendants have asked, if they may put in new rebutting evidence to the affidavits of the plaintiff, offered in reply to those first offered by themselves. Certainly not. They must present their whole case at once to the court; and not lead it on through a series of confirming and rebutting proofs, thus protracting the cause to an unreasonable extent.

There is another view, which may properly be taken of this point. The special written notice of defence by the defendants actually includes within its reach the very matter now set up as a surprise. It states, that the invention claimed by the plaintiff by his patent in 1832, "is according to the specification thereof wholly different and distinct" from the pretended invention mentioned in the patent of 1822. Of course this notice covers the whole claim of each patent; and it puts in controversy every part of the last patent, which is distinguishable from the first, and does not constitute a part of the invention claimed in the first. The defendant, therefore, was by his own special notice of defence, bound to institute all proper inquiries into the nature and actual structure of the original machine, and all the differences between that and the structure of the machine described in the patent of 1832. If he had used ordinary diligence, it is now manifest, that he might have obtained full evidence to any point, which could properly sustain the defence. He came to the trial, content with the preparation and the points, to which his evidence actually led him; and there can be no reason for letting him into a new trial, merely because he could now, upon farther reflection and farther lights, have made a fuller or a better defence. "Interest reipublicae ut finis esset litium," is an old maxim, deeply fixed in the fundamentals of the common law. And Voet beautifully expressed its true reason, when he said, "Ne autem lites immortales essent, dum litigantes mortales sint." The motion for a new trial is therefore overruled.

Motion overruled.

1. If the plaintiff fails to prove the special contract stated in his declaration, or the contract has been performed on his part, and a duty imposed on the defendant to pay, in money, the amount due, the plaintiff may recover on the general counts.

[See Stanley v. Whipple, Case No. 13,286.]

2. If the special contract be barred by the statute of limitations, and the plaintiff can show an express promise to pay, since which the statute has not run, he may recover on such promise.

Jones & Williams, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Frazer, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of assumpsit, brought to recover the price of a paper machine, sold by the plaintiffs to the defendant. The declaration set out the special contract, and the common counts were added. Defendant pleaded the general issue, and the statute of limitations. In support of the first count in the declaration a receipt was offered in evidence, from the defendant to the plaintiffs, in which the defendant stipulated to pay two hundred dollars in three months, two hundred in six months, and two hundred dollars in nine months, to be paid in wrapping paper, and these payments being made the machine was to be the defendant's. This contract was dated in 1826. A part of the wrapping paper, of an inferior quality, was delivered; and, after some years of delay, the defendant expressly promised to pay the residue of the debt, or provide for the payment of it.

It is contended that the sale of the machine was conditional, and not absolute; and that no action will lie upon the contract. By the contract the seller had a lien upon the machine for the purchase money. When paid for it was to be the property of the purchaser. But the payments were to be made in the manner, and at the times, prescribed; and, if not so made, the defendant was liable to be sued for a breach of the contract. The statute of limitations, it is insisted, bars a recovery on the special contract. And here a question is made, whether the case comes under the statute of the state where the contract was made, or where it is sought to be enforced. The statute of limitations of the state where the suit is brought must govern. It is the law of the forum, and applies in all cases where the jurisdiction of the forum is invoked.

The statute of Michigan does bar all remedy upon the special contract. Since the breach of the contract, and before the commencement of this suit, the limitation of the statute has run, and, consequently, the bar is complete. But after the delivery of the wrapping paper, in part, and before the statute had run, the defendant, as appears from the written evidence, promised to pay the balance due. And this promise, if valid, is not barred by the statute. It is contended that this promise, at most, could only relate to the former contract, and the mode of payment therein provided. But is this the true construction of the promise? The payments, in wrapping paper, were all to be made in nine months. After this period the plaintiffs were under no obligations to receive the paper, nor could the defendant expect to pay it. And, on being called on for payment by the plaintiffs, several years after the nine months had expired, and threatened that, unless he paid the balance, the machine would be taken from him, he promised to pay it. That there was a valuable consideration for this promise will not be denied. And that the promise was to pay in money is equally obvious. The special contract, in regard to the sale of the machine, is properly shown as the consideration of the express promise; and as this promise was to pay money, we think it is evidence for the jury, under the count, for the sale of the machine.

The plaintiffs, it is alleged, has failed to prove the special contract as laid in the declaration. This, if admitted, would give them a right to go on the general count. And we think the plaintiffs have a right to recover on the express assumpsit, since which the statute has not run, and that the whole circumstances of the case may be gone into to show the amount due. The case is clearly within the rule that, where the contract has been performed by the plaintiff, and a duty is imposed on the defendant to pay the amount due, in money, a recovery may be had on the general count, although there was a special contract. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Knapp, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 541. On the authority of Smith v. Smith, 2 Johns. 235, Pierce v. Crafts, 12 Johns. 90, the court held, in the case of Crandal v. Bradley, 7 Wend. 311, that a note payable in specific articles was admissible in evidence under the money counts. This was a departure from the English rule. The jury found for the plaintiffs the balance due. Judgment.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—BONDS AND MORTGAGES—SUBSTITUTION OF NEW BONDS FOR THOSE SE-CURED BY THE MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE.

1. The modification of a mortgage does not extinguish it, nor is its lien affected by the substitution of a new note or bond for the original note or bond secured by it.

2. A railroad company having executed a mortgage to secure a limited number of bonds, afterwards executed another mortgage on the same property to secure a larger number of bonds, which recited that the holders of the bonds secured by the original mortgage had agreed to surrender the same, and receive in substitution therefor new bonds, to be secured by the original mortgage as modified by the second mortgage. All the bonds secured by the first mortgage, except twenty, were exchanged for bonds secured by the second. Held, that the holders of said twenty bonds were not entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the mortgaged property in preference to the holders of the substituted bonds; but that they could not be prejudiced by the increase of the number of bonds secured by the second mortgage, but were entitled to the same proportion of the proceeds of the mortgaged property as if the second mortgage had not been executed.

3. There is nothing in the jurisprudence of Louisiana contrary to the doctrine of this case.

Heard on petition of Arphaxad Loomis and others.

W. W. Howe, for petitioners.

John A. Campbell, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case was filed for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the principal defendant on its property and road west of the Mississippi river, in the state of Louisiana. It appears from an agreed statement of facts that on the 15th of March, 1870, the railroad corporation, then known as the New Orleans, Mobile & Chattanooga Railroad Company, conveyed by a deed of that date all its estate and property in Louisiana and Texas west of the Mississippi river, to secure bonds, to be issued at the rate of $12,500 per mile of the main line of road from New Orleans to the Sabine river, and $25,000 per mile from the Sabine to Houston, in Texas, making the entire amount that might be issued under this deed of trust to be $5,562,000, and no more. There were issued, in fact, under the deed of trust, $2,825,000 only. This deed of trust provided that no bonds whatever should be issued on branch roads till they were constructed and their tracks laid. On the first of January, 1872, the railroad company, its name in the meantime having been changed by act of the legislature to the New Orleans, Mobile & Texas Railroad Company, executed a new deed of trust of that date on the same property as that conveyed by the deed of March 15, 1870. The purpose of this deed was to change the limit of the amount of the bonds of the company to be issued under said deed of trust of March 15, 1870, so as to allow besides the bonds already issued an additional issue of $25,000 per mile of bonds for each mile of a branch road to be constructed from Brashear City to Vermillionville, but not to exceed the sum of $1,625,000. This deed of trust recited that it had been arranged and agreed that the holders of the outstanding bonds under the original mortgage and deed of trust should surrender the same for cancellation and receive in substitution therefor bonds to the like amount executed in the name of the New Orleans, Mobile & Texas Railroad Company. This project was so far carried out that all the holders of bonds, secured by the original mortgage and deed of trust of March 15, 1870, except Arphaxad Loomis, and the other petitioners, surrendered their bonds, and received in their stead new bonds issued under and secured by the original mortgage and deed of trust as modified and limited by the deed of January 1, 1872. Loomis and the other petitioners are the holders of twenty of the original bonds. They claim to have a priority over all the new bonds issued to take up the original bonds, and pray for a decree which shall recognize this priority, and declare their bonds to be a first lien on the property conveyed by the trust deed of March 15, 1870, and that their bonds be paid by preference out of the proceeds of the sale of the railroad property when a sale is made.

The theory upon which the prayer of this petition is based is, that those bonds dated January 1, 1872, issued in lieu of the original bonds dated March 15, 1870, are in no way secured by the original trust deed, but have a lien on the railroad property by virtue only of the deed of January 1, 1872. An inspection of this latter trust deed will show that this theory is not founded on fact. The trust deed of 1872 states the fact of the execution of the deed of March 15, 1870, and the inscription thereof, etc., and the purpose of the railroad company to change the limit of the amount of bonds to be issued and secured under the original trust deed; recites that the holders of the outstanding bonds issued under the original trust deed have agreed to surrender the same, "and receive in substitution therefor new bonds for a like amount executed by the New Orleans, Mobile & Texas Railroad Company, to be issued under and secured by said mortgage or deed of trust (the deed of March 15, 1870) as the same is modified and limited by this instrument." The deed of January 1, 1872, further declares, that "the parties hereto, in consideration of the premises, etc., have covenanted, granted and agreed and do hereby covenant, grant and agree to and with each other, that the stipulations and provisions of the above mentioned mortgage or deed of trust of March 15, 1870, shall be and are hereby modified and limited in the manner and to the effect following, with like effect as if such mortgage or deed of trust had originally contained such modifying and limiting provisions which are herein contained," etc. The deed of January 1, 1872, further declares that "the said party of the first part (the railroad company) in consideration of the premises and of one dollar, etc., in order to secure the payment of the principal and interest of its said first mortgage bonds to be issued in the form and of the tenor and to the effect herein above described in that behalf, according to the tenor and effect of said bonds and the accompanying coupons, and for further assurance and confirmation of the estates and interest conveyed in mortgage by the said original mortgage or trust deed of March 15, 1870, as hereby modified, hath granted, bargained and sold." etc.

These provisions of the deed of January 1, 1872, clearly reveal the purpose of the parties thereto, that the bondholders, surrendering their original bonds for the new ones should not lose any right or estate granted by the first deed of trust, save as the same were modified by the second. It was upon this express condition, thrice repeated in the trust deed of January 1, 1872, that the bondholders consented to give up their old bonds and take the new ones.

It clearly appears that there was to be no cancellation of the mortgage of 1870; all the bonds were designed to be secured by it. The new bonds correspond with the old in amount, interest, time of payment, and only differ in date, and the name of the company, which had been changed since the old bonds were issued.

The modification of the mortgage does not extinguish it, nor is its lien affected by the substitution of a new note for the old one. Watkins v. Hill, 8 Pick. 522; Pomroy v. Rice, 16 Pick. 22; Brinckerhoff v. Lansing, 4 Johns. Ch. 65; Dana v. Binney, 7 Vt. 501;

Chase v. Abbott, 20 Iowa, 154; Conner v. Banks, 18 Ala. 42; Cullum v. Branch Bank at Mobile, 23 Ala. 798. The petitioners claim, however, that the question must be governed by the law of Louisiana, and cite the case of Bell v. Murphy, 2 La. Ann. 765, as authority to show what the jurisprudence of this state is upon the question in hand. In that case a mortgage was given to secure the mortgagee for a particular indorsement made by him for the accommodation of the mortgagor. The note thus indorsed was partly paid by the mortgagor, and a new note given for the remainder due, which the mortgagee indorsed. The court held that the mortgage did not indemnify the mortgagee for this latter indorsement. The reason given was that the mortgage was not a general one to secure the plaintiff for indorsements. It was given as security against the indorsement of a specific note, which the evidence showed had been subsequently novated and extinguished. That case differs from this in this most material particular, that in this case there was an express understanding that the original mortgage should stand for the benefit of the new bonds, and it was upon that condition that the substitution was made. The court is asked to step in between the parties and annul this contract. The law does not annul contracts made by the parties unless they are fraudulent or against public policy. No reason can be given why the contract made between the railroad company and its bondholders should not be enforced.

A very instructive case upon the question presented by this petition, is Stevens v. Mid-Hants Ry. Co., 7 Eng. R. 555, reported also in 8 Ch. App. 1064. In my judgment, the petitioners are not entitled to be paid the full amount of their bonds in preference to the holders of the substituted and other bonds issued under the deed of trust of January 1, 1872. The most that petitioners can claim is that they shall not be prejudiced by any change made in the terms of the deed of March 15, 1870, by the deed of January 1, 1872. They are entitled to have their rights preserved under the original trust deed. This may be done by giving them such part of the proceeds of the sale as they would have been entitled to if the new bonds and new trust deed had never been executed. In other words, as only 2,825 bonds, of one thousand dollars each, were issued under the original trust deed, of which the petitioners hold twenty, they are entitled to twenty 2,825ths of the proceeds of the sale, and no more.

SALVAGE—DERELICT—JOINT SALVORS—AWARD.

1. When property is left derelict on the high seas, those who first find and take possession of it, with the intention of saving it, acquire a right to the exclusive possession, which others, who afterwards discover it, have no right to disturb.

[Cited in The W. D. B., Case No. 17,306.]

2. The right of property, in goods thus abandoned from necessity, is not lost to the owners, and those who find and undertake to save them are bound in good faith to consult the interest of the owners as well as their own. If they have not sufficient force to effect the salvage without great risk of the loss of the goods, they cannot, consistently with the good faith which they owe to the owners, refuse the assistance of others, who offer their aid, and who may thus become entitled as joint salvors to a share in the reward.

[See The Cairnmore, 20 Fed. 519; The Ida L. Howard, Case No. 6,999.]

In admiralty. This was a case of salvage. The Amethyst, a British vessel, sailed from Boston to St. John, in New Brunswick, May 1. On the 3d, at 5 o'clock A. M., she was struck by a heavy squall, and upset. Of twelve persons on board, including passengers, ten saved themselves by hanging to the wreck until 11 o'clock A. M., when they were taken off by the schooner Compeer, of Ellsworth. Two were drowned, and their bodies subsequently found on board the wreck. On the 7th of May, the schooners May Flower, Ocean, and Wave sailed from Boothbay on a fishing voyage, and fell in with the wreck just before sunset. She was boarded from one of the schooners that evening, and the skippers of the three schooners agreed to lie by during the night, and tow her into port next day. She then lay about fifteen or twenty miles south-east of the island of Monhegan. The three schooners hoisted signal lights, and lay by in company through the night, and remained so near the wreck that she was seen at 10 and at 12 o'clock. One was so near as to be in danger of coming in collision with her. At daylight the wreck was seen at the distance of a mile or a mile and a half from the schooners, according to the testimony of the crews. Another vessel was at the same time seen bearing down on the wreck. They manned their boats for the purpose of resuming the possession, but when they arrived, they found that she had been boarded from the stranger vessel, which had then come up with her, and which proved to be the Only Son, from St. Andrews, New Brunswick, bound to Boston. When the parties met, a controversy arose between them, each party claiming the right of prior possession. That of the three schooners, said that they had discovered and boarded her the night before; the crew of the Only Son claimed the right as having the actual possession. Hard words and threats passed between them; the party from the schooners cut the lines, which were made fast to the wreck, from the Only Son, and being superior in numbers, maintained their possession. The crew of the latter vessel, during the dispute, took from her an anchor, and secured it on board their own vessel, and then were compelled to abandon the prize to their adversaries. The schooners then made fast to her with their cables, one before the other, and proceeded with her in tow to Boothbay harbor. On the morning of the 8th, the weather was pleasant and the sea calm; but in the latter part of the day the wind arose and increased to a storm, so that before they got into the harbor, the schooners, one after another, parted their cables from the wreck, which was driven on a dangerous reef of rocks, and the schooners with some difficulty saved themselves from the same danger. The next lay hands were procured to assist in saving the property. The principal direction of the business, which was attended with serious difficulties of different kinds, was taken by Mr. McClintock, who appears to have conducted with spirit, prudence, and good faith. The vessel lay anchored to the sea, and the waves ran high; the labor was severe, and the risk of life not inconsiderable in getting the cargo from the wreck; and, after it was landed, it was necessary to employ men to guard and protect the property from persons who were prowling around for the purpose of plunder. [Decree for libellants.]

A claim was interposed by J. T. Sherwood, her Britannic majesty's consul, for the owner, and the case was argued by Deblois, for the claimants, and Howard, for the libellants.

WARE, District Judge. This is a case of salvage of a vessel and cargo, found derelict and saved, under circumstances of considerable peril and severe labor; and it cannot be doubted that a liberal reward ought to be allowed, unless the claim of the salvors has been forfeited or impaired by misconduct on their part. It is contended that there has been such misconduct as ought justly to go either in diminution or to a forfeiture of their claims. The fact relied upon, as impairing their merits, is their refusal to accept the aid of the Only Son, in saving and securing the property, in consequence of which, it is argued that the vessel was finally lost upon the rocks, when the additional strength of another vessel might have saved her and brought her into port. It is contended that the master and crew of the Only Son being on the spot with their vessel, and ready to assist in the salvage, the libellants were bound to accept their assistance, and admit them as joint salvors; and they have in fact appeared and filed a claim for a share of the salvage.

As to the claim of the master and crew of the Only Son, it is to be remarked, that in the controversy that arose between the parties, they did not claim nor ask to be admitted as joint salvors. They claimed the sole and exclusive possession of the wreck, as being first in discovering and taking possession of it. Their avowed purpose was to exclude the libellants entirely, and take her into port themselves.

It is clear, upon the evidence, that when the Only Son discovered the wreck, it was in the legal possession of the libellants. The proof is that they discovered and boarded it on the evening of the 7th of May. They left no hands on board, it is true, to retain the actual and corporeal possession during the night, nor could men have remained on board during the night, without some risk of life. But they lay by in company, near the wreck, for the purpose of taking her in tow the next morning. The title which is acquired to property by finding, is a species of occupation; and it is laid down as a rule of law, by the civilians, that the mere discovery or sight of the thing is not sufficient to vest in the finder a right of property in the thing found. Pothier, Traite, de la Propriete, No. 63. His title is acquired by possession, and this must be an actual possession. He cannot take and keep possession by an act of the will, oculis et affectu, as he may when property is transferred by contract, and the possession given by a symbolical delivery. To consummate his title, there must be a corporeal prehension of the thing. Though it is said that it is established by custom (moribus receptum est) and that such was the ancient law of the Romans, when two are near together, or in company, where the thing is found, that the title is acquired in common. Pothier, Pandects, 41, 1, 8; Heineccius, Recitationes in Instit., § 350; Voet ad Pandect, 41, 1, 9. Upon these principles, the discovery of the wreck left derelict, by the three schooners, and the boarding her from one of them, was sufficient to give them the right of possession. The three which were in company when she was discovered were entitled to share equally in the good fortune, though she was boarded and the actual possession taken by only one, for those who boarded took possession for the benefit of all. [See note at end of case.]

The right of possession having become perfect, was not lost by temporarily leaving the wreck, without the intention of ultimately abandoning it, but with the purpose of returning and resuming the actual possession, and carrying her to a place of safety the next morning. Things being once in our possession remain so, while they are subject to our custody, and are so situated that we can resume the actual possession at pleasure; and this principle is equally applicable whether the right of dominion is acquired by finding or by an onerous title. Pothier, Traite de la Possession, No. 79; Vinnius. In Just. Inst. lib. 2, 1, 18. When, therefore, the wreck was discovered by the Only Son, on the morning of the 8th, the fishermen, though not in the actual possession, pedis positione, had that kind of possession that preserved all the possessory rights which they acquired the night before. Having discovered and taken the property into their hands, they had a right to retain it for the purpose of carrying it to a place of safety, and entitling themselves to the reward allowed in such cases, and to exclude all others from interfering with their possession. They had not only acquired rights, but had come under obligations with respect to the property. The finder of property, left derelict at sea, does not acquire the dominion or the absolute property in what is found. He acquires the right of possession only, with a title to a reasonable reward for his services, when the property is brought to a place of safety. The finders were, therefore, bound, unless they chose to abandon it, to exert themselves with all due care, fidelity, and vigilance, to preserve and protect the residuary interest remaining in the true owners. The master and crew of the Only Son, although they doubtless supposed that they were the first discoverers of the wreck, had no right to disturb the possession of the libellants; and as they were not in sight when the schooners first discovered and took possession of it, they have no just grounds for claiming to be admitted as joint salvors.

But although the libellants may have had the right of exclusive possession, they were bound to use every reasonable precaution to insure the safety of the property, for the benefit of the owners, and it is argued, therefore, that it was their duty to accept the aid of the Only Son, though they might thereby diminish their share of the salvage. It is true that salvors are bound to act with good faith towards the owners, and this obliges them to use all reasonable and available means to insure the safety of the property. They are influenced, primarily, in engaging in the service, by the expectation of reward. But when once they have engaged in the business, their own interest is not alone involved. When the goods are rescued from danger and brought to a place of safety, they are saved for the owner, after deducting a just and proper compensation for the salvors. A person undertaking to save derelict goods stands, in relation to the owner, somewhat in the character of a negotiorum gestor of the Roman law, that of a voluntary agent who interferences in the affairs of another without a mandate or authority, and he is bound to act for the interest of the owner as well as his own. Generally the interest of both will be the same, that of conveying the goods to a place of safety without loss and expense; but if it is otherwise, it would be a violation of good faith for a salvor to look solely to the enhancing of his reward at the expense of the owner. The golden rule, of dealing with others as we would have others deal with us, is a principle of social duty, deeply laid in morals and in the constitution of human nature; and in these cases of providential calamity, it is a rule of law as well as of morals. If the finder cannot, with his own force, convey the property to a place of safety, without imminent risk of a total or material loss, he cannot, consistently with his obligations to the owner, refuse the assistance of other persons proffering their aid, or exclude them from rendering it, under the pretext that he was the first finder and had thus gained a right to the exclusive possession. The principles of good faith are of universal obligation, and binding in all cases in which the interests of others are involved.

Upon this part of the argument the question is, whether the three schooners with their own crews, constituted a force apparently sufficient for the service, under the circumstances of the case. For if the force was manifestly inadequate, so that the attempt to save the wreck, without other assistance, would be exposing the property to great hazard, then it was their duty not merely to accept, but to solicit aid, and not expose the property of the owner to a total loss, in their eagerness to enhance their own reward. The Amethyst was a vessel of 93 tons; the schooners were smaller, one being of 60, one of 55, and one of 45 tons; but each was manned with a full crew of fishermen, amounting in the whole to eighteen men. The weather was calm, and the wreck lay about fifteen miles from the island of Monhegan, in which there is no harbor, and about double that distance from the safe harbor of Boothbay. To one not versed in nautical affairs this would appear to be a sufficient force to tow the wreck into port, with ordinarily favorable weather, and the prospect of the morning was that of good weather. The prudence and propriety of men's actions are not to be judged by the event, but by the circumstances under which they act. If they conduct with reasonable prudence and good judgment, they are not to be made responsible because the event, from causes which could not be foreseen nor reasonably anticipated, has disappointed their expectations. The schooners took the wreck in tow, and had, without difficulty, carried her nearly to a place of safety, when, the weather having become boisterous, the cables broke, one after another, from the violence of the tempest, from their holdings, and at last from the wreck, and she was carried by the waves on a dangerous reef of rocks, so that the vessel was nearly a total loss. Now it is not apparent how another vessel, of about the same tonnage as the fishermen, would prevent this calamity. If the weather had continued favorable, the three were sufficient; and in the storm which arose, it is not probable that the presence of the Only Son would have insured, or could have contributed much towards, her safety. On the facts proved, it does not appear that the libellants would have been chargeable with any fault which would impair their claims for salvage, by declining to admit their participation in the service, if it had been offered. But in point of fact it was not offered.

The whole mass of property saved in this case is small; the value, after deducting expenses, amounting only to $841.12, the largest part of one moiety of which is exhausted by the necessary expenses of getting the property ashore and securing it, after the wreck went on the rocks. So that leaving but a pittance for the owners, the compensation of the salvors will scarcely amount to a quantum meruit, for the laborious and dangerous service of rescuing the goods from the waves, and I may add, saving them from pillage from the piratical shoresmen, after they were landed. I shall allow $400 salvage, leaving the cost and expenses a charge on the residue.

Decree: This case came on to be heard upon the libel, answer, depositions, and exhibits in the cause, and was argued by counsel; upon consideration whereof it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that there be allowed, out of the proceeds of the sale of the savings of the wreck of the vessel and the cargo now in the registry, the sum of $400 as salvage. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that of said sum of $400 there be allowed and paid to—

And it is further ordered, that all costs and expenses be charged on the residue of the proceeds of the sale remaining in the registry, amounting to $441.12, and after deducting the same that the remaining sum be paid to Joseph T. Sherwood, Esq., her Britannic majesty's consul, and the authorized attorney of the claimants, for their use. NOTE, [from original report.] It is, says Pothier, an ancient pretension, that of claiming a part of a thing found, on the pretext of having seen it at the same time; we find it in Plautus, in Rudente, act 4, scene 3. Trachalio claimed a share in a valise which Gripus had fished up from the sea. On this demand, Gripus asks, "Quemne ego excepi e mari?" Trachalio coolly replies, "Et ego inspectavi e littore." Phaedrus commemorates the same pretension in a dispute between two bald men for a comb,— "Invenit calvus forte in trivio pectinem; Accessit alter aequo defectus pilis; Eia, inquit, in commune quodcumque est lucri;"—this is a windfall for both of us.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and VAN NESS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. This was a libel for damages in the district court for the southern district of New York, by the owner of the schooner the Amiable Nancy and her cargo, and by the master, mate, supercargo, and one of the mariners, against the appellants, as owners of the private armed brig the Scourge.

The facts were in brief as follows: The

²[Opinion not reported, and not now accessible.]

Amiable Nancy, a neutral vessel, on a voyage from Port-au-Prince to Bermuda, but steering, at the time of capture, for Antigua, was boarded in the year eighteen hundred and fourteen by a crew sent for the purpose of search and examination, by the commander of the Scourge. Having ascertained her neutral character, and the regularity of her papers, which employed about ten minutes, the crew of the Scourge, instead of returning to their own vessel, continued two hours on board of the Nancy; during which time they plundered the libellants of property valued by themselves at five hundred and seventy-nine dollars, and took away some articles belonging to the vessel, worth about twenty-five dollars. They also destroyed or carried away the schooner's papers, and beat and otherwise ill treated the supercargo and mariners. The schooner being abandoned by the boarding crew, pursued her course for Antigua, where she arrived the fourth day after her detention as aforesaid, and was there seized by his Britannic majesty's guard brig the Spider, in whose possession she remained about a fortnight. She was then libeled in the vice-admiralty of Antigua, and a condemnation expected, as is alleged, on the ground of her not being furnished with any papers. No counsel was employed, but a condemnation was suffered to pass by default, on a previous agreement between the captors and supercargo, entered into by the advice of the merchant who acted as consignee, that immediately after the condemnation, the schooner and cargo should be delivered to the supercargo, on his paying one thousand dollars to the captors, and all law and court charges. The supercargo, was obliged to take away the balance in specie, he being allowed to put no cargo on board in consequence of the condemnation. This sum of one thousand dollars was accordingly paid to the captors, as also five hundred and forty-two dollars and twenty-one cents for court and law charges; to raise which, in specie, as no other money would be received, and also specie to take away with him, it became necessary to sell at a great discount the bills which had been given in payment of the schooner's cargo, which occasioned a further loss of five hundred and thirty-six dollars and forty-four cents. The whole sum disbursed for the items already mentioned, and for sundries supplied the schooner during her detention, amounted to two thousand one hundred and twenty-seven dollars and forty cents. The cargo, at the time of the plunder, consisted of 312½ barrels of corn, and one of arrow root, the invoice price of which at Port-au-Prince, exclusive of some charges, was sixteen hundred and twenty-one dollars and fifty-six cents. The corn was sold at Antigua, but before permission could be obtained for that purpose, the price of this article had fallen a dollar per bushel. Some of the corn was injured by the Spider's crew, who had mixed damaged with good corn, which caused a fermentation, that rendered it unfit for use; and it was in consequence thrown overboard, which produced a loss of twelve hundred dollars; at least the corn sold, which was 944½ bushels, netted two thousand six hundred and one dollars and nine cents. The maintenance of the master and supercargo while at Antigua, twenty-five tons stone ballast, the charge for protest, and allowing fifteen dollars per day for the expense of the schooner, while lying at Antigua, amounted to four hundred and fourteen dollars. The cargo might have been sold at Antigua (but for the interruption of the Spider,) for rum, and the probable amount of sales in that case would have been three thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars. This rum, it is stated might have been sold at St. Bartholomews, where it is said the schooner would have gone, had she not been captured by the Spider, and would have there produced probably more than four thousand dollars. It appears further, that the original plan of the voyage was to sell the cargo at Bermuda. The price of corn at which place is not mentioned, except it is stated to be very high. At Bermuda eight hundred muskets were to be taken in, which had already been contracted for at three dollars each, and for which the Haytien government was under agreement (which however is not produced,) to pay sixteen dollars a piece. From Antigua the schooner proceeded to St. Bartholomews, where she took in sundry articles, which sold, at an average, at the enormous profit of about three hundred per cent. at Port-au-Prince. Some of the parties concerned in the plunder of this schooner, have been tried by a naval court martial and punished for their misconduct.

On this evidence, the district court ordered the clerk to associate to himself two respectable merchants, and with them to estimate the damages sustained by the libellants by reason of the capture, and detention of the Amiable Nancy.

1. Those arising from the destruction of and taking and carrying away property from on board the said vessel.

2. All the expenses incurred at Antigua, including the loss on the corn and wages of the crew.

3. Interest on the amount of damages thus arising, from the time of the vessel's leaving Antigua.

4. A reasonable allowance for coming to the United States to prosecute this claim, collect testimony, &c.

5. The court further ordered, that the claim for damages, for personal injuries, and counsel fees, be allowed; but that the assessment of the same be made by the court on the filing and confirmation of the clerk's report.

In obedience to this order the clerk, and merchants as associated with him reported, that they had assessed the damages as follows:

Monies paid for redeeming vessel and cargo at Antigua after condemnation.....	$2,127 60
Loss sustained on the sales of the cargo of corn at Antigua in consequence of the capture.....	1,200 00
Detention, wages of the crew at Antigua in consequence of the Spider brig, occasioned by the loss of ship's papers.....	414 00
Articles of plunder from the schooner.....	25 00
Money and effects plundered from Mr. Roux, the supercargo.....	470 00 from the master.....	100 00
from the mate.....	80 00
from four of the mariners.....	124 00
Losses sustained in consequence of the expenses occasioned by the seizure and condemnation in Antigua, growing out of the schooner having been deprived of her papers by the crew of the Scourge, as proved by the deposition of Samuel Dawson and T. Lavand of Port-au-Prince.....	3,500 00
Interest on this sum from 1st January, 1815, to 1st July, 1817, at 6 per cent. per annum.....	1,206 07
Allowance for Mr. Roux's expenses to and from Port-au-Prince, Antigua, Boston, &c. detention in New York, loss of time, and other incidental expenses, procuring evidence, and attending the trial.....	1,500 00
		$10,746 67

This report was filed and confirmed on the 30th June, 1817, when the court further decreed, that there be paid to the libellants for personal injuries the following sums:

To the supercargo.....	$ 500
To the captain.....	100
To the mate.....	100
To the martner, Elia Lenar.....	50
To the supercargo for commission.....	1,000
For counsel fees, proctor's fees, and the costs of court.....	750
	2,500 00

making a sum total to be paid by the appellants of $13,246.67.

From this decree the owners of the Scourge have appealed to this court, and contend,

1. That the district court had no jurisdiction of the cause.

This court will not stop to inquire whether it be too late to urge this objection to the decree, because, which is one answer given to it by the respondent, no plea to the jurisdiction was interposed below; for it entertains no doubt that the libel was properly filed in that court, and that error would have been committed if it had been dismissed on that ground. Some doubts were expressed whether, if such cases be cognizable in the district court, they are so in virtue of the powers which it possesses as a prize, or of those which exercise it as an instance court; and it was supposed, or at least intimated, by one of the appellant's counsel, that if cases of this kind were to be regarded as appendages of its prize jurisdiction, the present suit could not be sustained, in as much as the district court possessed no such jurisdiction, without some special act of congress conferring it. In support of this position, the practice of Great Britain was referred to. It is true that a court of admiralty in England, merely as such, has no jurisdiction over prizes; but that to constitute such an authority in it, or to call it forth at the breaking out of hostilities, a commission under the great seal issues to the lord high admiral to enjoin it on the court of admiralty to proceed on all cases of captures, &c. and to hear and determine according to the course of the admiralty and the law of nations. Such is undoubtedly the practice of Great Britain, introduced probably from a silence on this subject in the commission by which a judge of the admiralty is appointed, which enumerates particularly every object of his jurisdiction, but says nothing of prizes. It is not known that this is the practice of any other nation, but it is believed that their courts of admiralty, are regarded as the national and proper tribunals for taking cognizance of captures in time of war, without any special delegation from the sovereign for that purpose, on every commencement of hostilities. If so, and the district court by its act of organization has exclusive original cognizance of "all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," why should it be restricted in its cognizance to such cases as belong to the English courts of admiralty as instance courts, more than those of any other nation? Civil causes, it is said, do not embrace cases of prize, which arise out of and are determined by the jus belli, and not by the civil or municipal law. But it cannot be necessary to pursue this inquiry farther; for as early as the year 1794 [Penhallow v. Doane,] 3 Dall, [3 U. S.] 61, the supreme court of the United States unanimously decided, that every district court of the United States possessed all the powers of a court of admiralty, whether considered as an instance or as a prize court; so that, if the present case belongs to the admiralty at all, which is not denied, it is unimportant in the present inquiry to determine under what particular branch of its jurisdiction it be cognizable, as it must have a right to inquire into and to ascertain the quantum of damages and costs in all cases of marine trespass or tort.

But admitting the jurisdiction of the district court, it is denied by the appellants, that they are liable at all for the injuries enumerated in the libel. After so many and such direct authorities on this point, it is matter of some surprise that a question of this kind should be made. It has long been regarded as a general principle of maritime law, and not resulting from any special contract, that owners of a privateer are liable for torts committed by captains whom they may employ; and whatever doubt may have once existed as to the extent of this responsibility, it is now well settled, that it is not limited by the value of the privateer, which would often prove a very inadequate compensation, but that they are personally accountable for the whole of the injury committed. This is not only the uniform language of elementary writers, who have treated of the subject, but is one of the points decided by the supreme court in the case already referred to. It is there declared, "that the owners of a privateer are responsible for the conduct of their agents, the officers and crew, to all the world, and that the measure of such responsibility is the full value of the property injured or destroyed." The only exception to this rule, or rather the only case which is supposed not to fall within it, is where the master is guilty of a tort in matters totally foreign to his authority; and this is supposed to be the case before the court. The authority of the boarding crew extended, it is said, to the making of a search, and to capture, if circumstances should justify it, but not to rob and ill treat the crew of a friendly vessel.

Admitting this to have been their authority, if they were acting under it, as was the case when they committed the outrage, the owners are liable, although the outrage itself was not intended to have been sanctioned by it. "If the captain of a privateer," says Browne, "emissus ad praedandum perperam proedetur, if commissioned to cruise against an enemy, he plunders a friend, the owner is responsible;" and assigns as a reason, that his agent was then acting within his province when the wrong was perpetrated. So the owners were held liable by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 333, for any spoliation or damage done to the property, which was not considered as authorized or excused by a right to seize and bring in a vessel for further examination.

The court being of opinion that the owners in this case are responsible to the libellants, will proceed to inquire to what extent the latter can ask a compensation at their hands; and whether the district court has not erred in the principles which it adopted in fixing on this remuneration. The court cannot refrain from remarking, before it proceeds, that it is impossible not to be struck with the very large amount which has been assessed for damages, when compared with the actual injury sustained. The whole of the property plundered was not worth, in the opinion of the libellants themselves, who cannot be suspected of an under-valuation, more than six hundred dollars, or thereabouts, and the appellants have been decreed to pay for this outrage, connected with some personal injury, very improper indeed, but not very serious, and for which seven hundred and fifty dollars was deemed an adequate recompense, the large sum of thirteen thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars and forty-six cents; that is, more than twenty times the extent of the articles plundered, and more than four times the value of the schooner and the whole of the cargo, although the vessel remained with the owner, and no part of the cargo was touched. It may well, therefore, be supposed, that some mistake has been made; as such damages for such an injury are, probably, without example in any court, of whose decisions we have any information.

The appellants say, that the respondents are entitled to nothing more than an indemnity for the property taken, and to a reasonable remuneration for personal injuries. Believing this to be the proper and only safe rule of damage, they insist that they are entitled to be relieved here against the sums allowed for redeeming the vessel at Antigua, after the condemnation, for the loss sustained on the sales of the cargo at that place; and for the loss sustained in consequence of the schooner's not completing her voyage to Bermuda, and returning from thence to Port-au-Prince. These are not exactly the terms in which this loss is expressed; but it is very clear that the report, by referring to the testimony of Dawson and Lavand, intended the allowance of three thousand five hundred dollars, as a compensation for the loss of the voyage. The interest on these items, and the commission of the supercargo, are also objected to by the appellants. These sums form an aggregate of nine thousand thirty-three dollars and sixty-seven cents. All these allowances were made on a supposition, that the losses for which they were intended as a compensation, were produced by the destruction of the schooner's papers.

It is not possible to express in language sufficiently strong, the indignant feelings which are excited by this wanton act on the part of the boarding crew; but we must not indulge these feelings so far as to prevent a dispassionate consideration of the conduct of the supercargo, and whether it has justly involved the appellants in the very extensive responsibilities which, it is alleged, have grown out of it. Without determining what consequence or liability might have attached to the owners of the privateer, if a condemnation after a full defence had been pronounced for the want of papers, the court will inquire, whether they can be liable for any damage occasioned by the compromise that was made. To render this act of the supercargo binding on the appellants, so far as to create in them a responsibility for any of its consequences, it ought to have been made not only in good faith, but it should be one which might be fairly justified by the circumstances of the case, and above all, there should be some privity between those making and those who are to be affected by it. The bona fides of this transaction the court is not disposed to call in question, although it would have been more satisfactorily made out, if the supercargo, instead of relying on the advice of his consignee, who was not a professional gentleman, had submitted the case to a proctor in the island of Antigua, and had acted under his directions.

But however fair the conduct of the supercargo may have been in this transaction, this court is of opinion, that the circumstances in which the schooner and cargo were found at Antigua, did not call for any such sacrifice, as was agreed to by the supercargo. If it be true, that the only cause alleged for proceeding against them as a prize of war, was a want of papers, it would be a libel on the court of vice-admiralty of that island, or any other court, to entertain a moment's doubt of their acquittal and restoration, as soon as it appeared, as it would by the answers to the standing interrogatories, that such destitution was occasioned by a robbery or plunder on the high seas. Nor is it to be believed, if that fact was satisfactorily made out, that the captors would think of an appeal. The apprehensions, therefore, of great delay and a heavy expense, were altogether visionary. But if the compromise were proper, and made in good faith, there is such a total absence of all privity between the parties making it, and those who are now to be charged with it, that it must be considered as altogether at the peril of the former. A compromise with captors in time of war, respecting property under insurance, is binding upon underwriters, because by capture a technical total loss takes place, upon which the master becomes an agent for all the parties in interest, and it is therefore reasonable that his acts should bind those whom he represents. But in the case before the court, there is no contract or agency expressed or implied. A trespass can never create such a relation between those who commit the tort and those who are injured by it, as to constitute the latter the attorneys or agents of the former.

None of the consequences therefore flowing from the compromise are chargeable on the appellants. This however, is not the only ground for rejecting many of the allowances which were made by the district court. If the compromise were binding on the appellants, they have been rendered answerable for damages, either not necessarily consequent on it, or too uncertain. If they are to form a proper charge against the owners of the Scourge. To this objection the charge of three thousand five hundred dollars for loss of voyage, is peculiarly liable, which is also a departure from the rule prescribed for the assessment of damages, in cases of this kind, by the supreme court of the United States. By that rule, the measure of responsibility, "is the full value of the property injured or destroyed."

Damages for the loss of voyage, are by much too contingent and uncertain, to form the basis of any satisfactory calculations; for if it be adopted as a rule, it must apply to long as well as to short voyages. Every one will at once perceive the injustice of such an allowance in an India voyage, where a capture and plunder of all her specie might take place, the very day after the vessel's leaving port; and in less than a fortnight she might be on a second voyage with a new supply of dollars. Why, in such a case, should the profits be paid by the captors? And here, who can say, although the voyage be shorter, that the Amiable Nancy would ever have arrived at Bermuda, or what might have been the state of the market there, or whether the muskets would have been delivered according to contract? Or if so, whether the vessel would have reached Port-au-Prince in safety, and found the government of Hayti disposed to pay for them, at what is now alleged to have been the stipulated price? Or who can say, if it be conceded that the original voyage was frustrated by the irregular conduct of the crew of the privateer, (which may well be doubted, as the schooner was bound to Antigua when she was boarded,) that another voyage equally, or more profitable, might not have been projected at Antigua?

It is a fact in this cause, that a very enormous profit, approaching to three hundred per cent., was made on the cargo shipped at St. Bartholomews, and sold at Port-au-Prince, which, it is true, was not very large; but if the appellants be liable for any loss occasioned by not going to Bermuda, some deduction should be made for the gains actually made on the voyage from St. Bartholomews to Port-au-Prince. The nature of this action, however, is relied on as justifying a mode of assessing damages different from the one which is applied to ordinary cases of trespass. It is taken for granted, that vindictive damages are to be recovered, and that in such cases a court will not be very particular as to the limits within which it will circumscribe a defendant's liability. But why assess vindictive damages? Have the appellants committed the outrage, or ordered it, or in any way sanctioned it? Or have they divided the plunder, or derived any benefit whatever from it? They were employing their vessel in a way permitted and encouraged by the government of their country, and under the securities prescribed by law. It is true, they have had the misfortune, which is but too common in this business, of employing men who have disgraced the flag under which they acted.

Unless this misfortune be attributed to them as a crime, they are innocent of any actual or intentional injury, and perhaps more entitled to the protection of the court than those who are generally defendants in actions of trespass.

However desirable it may be, in the opinion of many, to put a stop to this mode of warfare, no court has a right to throw obstacles in its way, or to discourage it, by imposing excessive and extravagant penalties for every irregularity, however trifling, so long as government think proper to furnish public and private vessels with commissions of this kind. If the rule of vindictive damage, which has been pressed upon the court, were adopted, it might amount to a total prohibition of privateering; which no court, mindful of its duty, will think it has any right to effect in this way. Nor will such mode of assessing damages add much, while the practice is continued, to the security which neutrals already have, against occasional trespasses on their property. If the fear of a forfeiture of wages and corporal punishment, to both of which some of this crew have been sentenced by a naval court martial for their improper conduct, will not restrain mariners, who engage in this service, within proper limits, it is not probable that they will be influenced by any apprehensions of laying on their employers an onerous responsibility. But if such a rule is to be resorted to, as a means of exciting those who engage in this species of warfare to greater circumspection in the choice of seamen, it is believed that every expectation of that kind will prove fallacious. It will not be easy, whatever care or diligence be used, to make any discrimination on which much dependence can be placed. Seamen for this purpose would continue to be selected more for their bodily strength, their personal courage and seamanship, than from any regard to their moral character; about which it would be much more difficult to acquire information, than concerning the other qualifications which have been mentioned.

There are other objections to such an arbitrary measure of damages. It places too much in the discretion of a judge, who, under the influence of the angry feelings which such irregularities are well calculated to call forth, would often award an immoderate compensation without reflecting, that the person who is to make it, may be as innocent as those to whom it is to be paid, and may hold in as great detestation as the court itself the violation or wrong that has been perpetrated. Such heavy assessments, and which are scarcely reducible to any rule, will also prevent compromises between the parties. No offer of compensation by the owner of a privateer, however fair, and although fully commensurate with the loss that has been sustained, will satisfy the extravagant pretensions of the injured party, which such a rule will prompt him to set up.

Neither is the loss on the corn, from the damage occasioned by the conduct of the Spider's crew, to be thrown on the appellants. This would render them liable, not only for the illegal acts of their own mariners, but of those in whose choice they could have no agency.

The supercargo's commission must also be deducted; for besides the objection to it, that its loss was occasioned, if at all, by his own compromise, it is liable to a further difficulty. It does not appear what remuneration he was to receive, but by scarcely any possibility could his commission on the sales of the outward cargo, to which it must be restricted, have amounted to any thing like the sum which has been allowed. There is nothing indeed in the evidence to render it very clear, that his commission has not been earned and paid.

The interest on these items will, of course, be deducted, and indeed if these sums were allowed, it would hardly be proper, after so liberal an assessment of damages, to have calculated any interest on them.

Little or no objection has been made to the compensation allowed for the personal wrongs inflicted on some of the respondents, which therefore will not be disturbed; but I cannot suppress my surprise, that for injuries of this nature, which are often produced by some intemperate language of the party claiming a recompense, the owners should ever have been considered as answerable.

Considering that seven hundred and fifty dollars has been allowed for counsel fees, and the proctor's costs, and the costs of court, the further sum of fifteen hundred dollars, given to Mr. Roux for his expenses in producing evidences, attending the trial, &c., is too much, and must be reduced one half, especially as the greater part of the testimony has been collected for the purpose of rendering the appellants liable for charges, which, in the opinion of this court, cannot be recovered of them.

This court reverses the sentence of the district court, and allows as follows:

To the owners of the schooner for expenses during the detention at Antigua, according to the estimate of the consignee.....	$300 00
For the expenses of mate and supercargo while there, and according to the estimate of the same witness	70 00
For articles plundered from schooner.....	25 00
Interest on these sums at ten per cent. from 1st January, 1815, to 1st September, 1817, two years and eight months..	103 94
		$ 498 94
To the master of the schooner for articles taken from him...	100 00
The same interest.....	26 66
For personal injuries.....	100 00
		226 66
		725 60

Amount brought forward	$725 60
To the supercargo,
For articles taken from him	470 00
The same interest	114 32
For personal wrongs	500 00
For his expenses in collecting testimony at Antigua, Port- au-Prince, &c., and attending trial	750 00
	1,864 32
To the mate,
For property lost by him	80 00
The like interest	21 32
For the injury to his person	100 00
	201 32
To Lenar, the sailor,
For property taken from him	54 00
The like interest	14 40
For his personal injury	50 00

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the sentence of the district court be reversed, and that there be paid by the appellants to the respondents and libellants, the said sum of two thousand nine hundred and nine dollars and sixty-four cents, in the manner following, that is to say: To the libellant, Peter Joseph Merault, owner of the schooner and cargo, the sum of four hundred and ninety-eight dollars ninety-four cents: To the libellant, Gallien Aneil, master of the schooner, the sum of two hundred and twenty-six dollars sixty-six cents: To the libellant, Frederick Roux, the supercargo, the sum of eighteen hundred and sixty-four dollars thirty-two cents: To the libellant, Anthony Moasset, the mate, the sum of two hundred and one dollars thirty-two cents; and to the libellant, Elia Lenar, one of the mariners, the sum of one hundred and eighteen dollars forty cents. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the appellants pay to the libellants the further sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars for counsel fees, and also the proctor's costs, and the costs of the district court, to be taxed; and it is further ordered, that each party pay his own costs in this court.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, the point embraced in the first paragraph of the syllabus was affirmed; and it was further held that, in the event of an illegal seizure, the wrongdoers are responsible in case of wanton outrage, though the owners of the privateer are not bound to the extent of vindictive damages. The item for deterioration of cargo was rejected, because it was not occasioned by the improper conduct of the captors. The measure of damages is the cost or value of the property lost, and, in case of injury, the diminution in value by reason thereof, with interest; but no allowance should be made for possible profits of an unfinished voyage. The items for ransom were rejected, but allowance for court and other expenses, amounting to $774.21, was added to the decree of the circuit court. The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. (16 U. S.) 546.]

This was a bill in equity, originally filed in the circuit court of Fond Du Lac, and transferred thence to the circuit court of the United States, praying for an injunction to restrain the executors of the last will and testament of James Amory from setting up or using the said will to defeat the legal rights of the complainant. The judges of the circuit court were divided in opinion as to whether a demurrer to the bill should be sustained.

J. M. Gillet, for complainant.
S. W. Pinney, for respondent.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and MILLER, District Judge.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. On the 16th of August, 1861, James Amory died at Fond Du Lac, in this state, possessed of considerable personal and real estate, part of which was in Wisconsin. In September following Samuel B. Amory and John Amory, the brothers of James, presented in the county court of Fond Du Lac county a will, and asked that it be probated. Some time afterwards the present plaintiff appeared by counsel in that court, claiming to be the widow and heir of James Amory, and objected to the probate of the will, and asked for time to show that it was not the will of James Amory, and should not be probated. The case was continued from time to time until the 18th of December, when a further application was made by her for a postponement, but it was refused, and the will was admitted to probate by the county judge. Thereupon she appealed to the circuit court of the county, and the case went up to that court, and in the circuit court the executors of the will claimed that she had no right to appeal, on the ground that she had not been the wife of James Amory, and therefore had no interest in the estate, and for the purpose of establishing that, they introduced a record from the state of New York of proceedings in divorce, in which she had made an application against James Amory for a divorce on various grounds, and in which it appeared that one of the questions made in the case was whether in point of fact she was the wife of James Amory, it being alleged that at the time she was married to James Amory, in March, 1846, she had a husband living, and the court found the fact to be so, and for that reason, as it appears, the divorce was not granted and the bill was dismissed. This, of course, if true, shows that she had no interest in the property, but that she was a stranger, and had no right to appear or interfere with the estate of James Amory. She then alleged that the decree introduced from New York was obtained by the fraud of her attorney, and she asked that the question should be submitted to a jury, whether or not it was a fraudulent decree.

The circuit court ordered the issue of fact to be submitted to a jury, and then refused to dismiss the appeal, denying in other words the application of the executors. Thereupon, under the practice which prevails in this state, the executors took an appeal from the order of the court refusing to dismiss the appeal to the supreme court of the state. The case remains just as it was with the application on the part of the plaintiff for a trial by jury, granted by the court with various affidavits that were filed, and everything connected with the case as it was; the only question taken to the supreme court being whether the appeal should have been dismissed. The supreme court decided that the circuit court ought to have dismissed the appeal on the ground that the record from New York was conclusive that she never was the wife of James Amory, and therefore that she had no interest in the estate, and directed the circuit court to dismiss the appeal. The case was then remitted to the circuit court, and, in compliance with the order of the supreme court, the circuit court dismissed the appeal. Shortly after the present plaintiff commenced a suit in the circuit court of Fond Du Lac county, and some time afterwards that suit, which is this suit, was transferred under the act of congress of 1867, before a complaint or any bill was filed, to this court, and after its transfer to this court the bill was filed, which is now the subject of demurrer.

Now there may be perhaps a question whether it was competent for the plaintiff, after the case had been thus dismissed under the order of the supreme court of the state, to make an application to the circuit court to get rid of the will which was thus established. Had she that right on the ground that the decree was obtained by fraud? I think she had. I do not think that question had become res adjudicata. Concede that the opinion of the supreme court is right, that the parties there might have tried the question upon the affidavits instead of an issue by a jury, and that that was a proper practice, the answer to it is, that it never was tried in that way. The plaintiff never submitted that issue upon affidavits, never asked for the decree of the court upon that issue upon affidavits, and therefore she was not precluded from making an application to the state court to have that issue tried in a proper way. She did ask that it be tried by a jury. Her appeal had been dismissed on the ground that she had no interest whatever in the subject-matter of controversy. Now, is it possible that this can be so? Is there no remedy in such a case? Suppose the case of a woman living in New York: a man owns an estate in Wisconsin and dies there; a will is presented, made by him as is alleged; it is probated, she comes forward and claims that she was the wife of the man who is thus dead. Can it be that without any notice to her, without, it may be, even her knowing that her husband is dead, she cannot have an opportunity of determining whether or not this is a will which divests her of any legal rights which she might possess? Can it be that because a will has been probated without her knowledge she cannot have an opportunity of being heard? How is she to be heard under the practice in this state? As I understand it she can be heard at law only by appeal. If she has no appeal, can she apply to a court of equity and obtain an order from a court of equity that this supposed will, if it was not in fact the will of her deceased husband, shall not be used against her to prejudice her rights? I certainly do not see why.

Now while that is not the case here, her appeal had been summarily cut off and disposed of by the supreme court of the state, without any trial upon the issue which she tendered. And she had the right, in my opinion, to present her case on the equity side of the circuit court of this state to prevent these parties who had that probated will from using it to her prejudice, if in fact it was not a will. If that is so, she had the right to apply to this court, and to transfer her cause from a state court to the circuit court of the United States. Otherwise, the supposed safeguards which the constitution and the laws of the United States have thrown around the citizens of other states, become in such a case completely nugatory. That never could have been the intention of the constitutional provision and the acts of congress upon the subject.

Again: It is not necessary for us to determine now upon a demurrer to this bill whether all the relief that is sought for can be given. If any relief claimed by the plaintiff can be given, the demurrer should be overruled. This plaintiff claims to be the wife of James Amory. It appears upon the face of the bill that the will was set up against her and probated. He had no children. If he made no will, she, if his wife, was his heir under the law of this state. If he made a will, the devisees became his heirs. But he even by his will could not divest her of her rights of dower. If she was his wife she had a right that existed entirely independent of the will, and with which the probating of the will had nothing to do. And if his wife, she could come into the courts of this state and enforce her right of dower. Now if she does that, what bar is there to such an application? The bill says that the bar will be this record from the state of New York, which of itself would be prima facie sufficient, showing that she never was the wife of James Amory. But when she alleges that this decree of the New York court is void, because it was obtained by fraud, and established that fact, then she is entitled to relief independent of all considerations of the will, so far as her right of dower is concerned, unless, indeed, independent of the decree, they show that she was not the wife of James Amory.

It is enough to say that I think in the bill there are allegations sufficient, if sustained, to show that the decree of the court of New York was obtained by fraud. The particulars of the fraud are set forth in the bill. Among other frauds it is alleged that the very framing of the decree was fraudulently made by a person who apparently was acting as her attorney, but who was employed and fed by James Amory himself against her. If that is so, it cannot be controverted, I think, that when she makes an application in this court or any court of the state for her rights of dower, and they interpose this decree, she has the right to show that it is of no effect, so far as the question of marriage is concerned. And if that is so, it does not affect this question of the probate of the will. I admit that as a general rule the probate of a will is to be treated as conclusive, certainly, wherever it comes up collaterally, but I am not prepared to admit that where a party has been so summarily dismissed from pursuing a remedy which the law furnished—to show that there was no will, and it was improperly probated—is without any redress by a direct application to a competent court to prevent the use of that will against the enforcement of all legal and equitable rights. A case recently came before the supreme court of the United States upon an application of a distributee against an administrator for the distribution of an estate, and the objection was taken that the party must go to the state court, as that was a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the probate court, and that an application could not be made to the federal court although a party was a citizen of another state; and the court say such a rule would deprive the citizens of the several states of some of the rights which the constitution and the laws confer on them. Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 425. But it is scarcely competent for the legislature of Wisconsin to deprive a citizen of any other state of his legal or equitable rights, under the constitution and laws of congress, by declaring that they must be enforced in a local court.

In the Gaines case [Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 642] there was a will of Daniel Clark, dated in 1811, which was probated in the upper court of Louisiana, and the executors went on and sold property, and placed the parties in possession. And Mrs. Gaines claimed under a subsequent will of 1813. She sought to enforce her rights in the federal courts, and they held that the probate of the will of 1813 revoked of itself the will of 1811. In Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 650, the supreme court intimate that it was competent for a court of chancery to protect the rights of the plaintiff. It was suggested that those rights existed notwithstanding the probate of the will of 1811, although the will of 1813 had not been at that time probated.

These defendants in this case are residuary legatees under the will of James Amory. They claim all the real estate in this state. The plaintiff, if she be the wife of James Amory, has the right to come into court to enforce her rights of dower, to say the least. How can she not, if she is the wife of James Amory, prevent these parties from using this decree of the New York court against her if it is void or of no effect? I am not prepared to admit the rule contended for, that it is indispensable she should go into New York and have the decree vacated there.

I say if it is used here where she seeks to enforce her rights, that she has the power to get rid of it by showing that it is fraudulent without going into the state of New York and having it vacated. And when the court of Louisiana admitted to probate the will of Daniel Clark of 1813, they did it with the express reservation that any person might attack it by a direct proceeding whose rights were affected by it, and the supreme court of the United States in adjudicating the case of Gaines v. Hennen, in 24 How. [65 U. S.] 558, stated the same rule as applicable to the will. They proceeded upon the basis that any person by a direct proceeding could attack the will of 1813 which had been probated by a state court. So that taking all the facts, together, I am not prepared to say that the demurrer to this bill should be sustained, and that there is no equity, and while admitting there may be a question whether the party should not apply to the circuit court of the state instead of coming here by way of review to have the appeal set aside so far as relates to the probate of the will, I have no doubt that the bill can be sustained on the ground that she is entitled to dower if the decree was obtained by fraud in the state of New York, and as to a bill of review there possibly might be difficulty. In the state court her appeal was dismissed. There was no issue between the parties; the plaintiff never has submitted the issue or tried the question of fraud upon an issue even upon affidavits, as I understand the case. And as I said, I think it a case for the equitable interposition of the court. At any rate I leave this as a question that might come up hereafter. On the other point, that of dower, I have no doubt.

Counsel having asked what was the effect of the disagreement in the opinion of the court:

Judge DRUMMOND.—The law provides, where the judges are opposed in opinion, the point shall be certified to the supreme court, provided that the case may proceed, if in the opinion of the court it can be done without prejudice to the merits. My impression is at present that the case had better proceed; the parties can stand by their demurrer if they choose, and the plaintiff go on and make the proof, or of course the demurrer can be withdrawn, and in that case the point could be made by answer, just as well as by the demurrer, and then the question would come up on the final hearing.

Judge MILLER.—I think the bill will have to be dismissed, and the parties take their appeal.

Judge DRUMMOND.—I will be perfectly willing to certify it up, provided it can be done, but I am satisfied that it cannot be done.

Judge MILLER.—I do not think it is a case proper to be certified up, either. That is my view.

[NOTE. This case was heard before Drummond, circuit judge, and Miller, district judge. The latter was of the opinion that the demurrer should be sustained and the bill dismissed. His opinion will be found in Amory v. Amory, Case No. 334. The hearing was before the passage of Act June 1, 1872, (17 Stat. 196,) as to which the note to this case in the American Law Register for September, 1873, is erroneous, but no certificate of disagreement had been signed when that act passed. The demurrer was overruled, with leave to answer. On final hearing, the bill was dismissed. See Amory v. Amory, Case No. 335.]

Case No. 334.

AMORY v. AMORY.

[3 Biss. 266;¹ 12 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 38.]
Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April Term, 1872.

DECREE—WHEN CONCLUSIVE.

1. The original judgment or decree of a court having jurisdiction, cannot be disturbed in a co-ordinate tribunal, nor in a collateral action.
2. The decree of a state court having jurisdiction of a suit and of the parties, is conclusive of the matters determined, and cannot be impeached in the courts of the United States.
3. The circuit courts of the United States are not constituted to review and reverse the proceedings and judgments of state courts. It is the duty of such courts to give full faith and credit to the judicial proceedings and records of state tribunals.

In equity. This was a demurrer to a bill in equity, by Angelina Amory, praying that the defendants, Samuel B. Amory and John Amory, as executors of the last will and testament of James Amory, deceased, might be perpetually enjoined and restrained from pleading, setting up, interposing, or insisting upon the record proceedings or judgment of the superior court of New York city, for divorce, in any action or proceeding complainant might commence or prosecute in the courts of Wisconsin, for the purpose of recovering any portion of the real or personal estate of which James Amory died seized or possessed; and that the complainant might be adjudged and decreed the lawful widow and heir of the said James Amory. The bill sets forth that complainant intermarried with one William A. Williams, in the year 1839, at Portland, in Maine; that in September, 1841, at Boston, he shipped as second mate on board the ship Louvre, on a voyage from Boston to the East Indies and back, since which time she has not been able, after great exertions, to get any intelligence of or from Williams, except that he had deserted the ship at Singapore, East Indies, and it was rumored that he was lost in the China Sea. It is alleged that in the year 1845, complainant removed to New York, where she became acquainted with James Amory, to whom she was lawfully married on the 12th of March, 1846; that she continued to live with him as his lawful wife until September, 1856, being during all that time recognized, received and treated as his lawful wife by him and his family and friends; and that in that same time there were various suits and proceedings in court in which she was a party with James Amory, as his wife, and she as such signed deeds and releases, etc. The bill further states that they separated by mutual consent; that in July, 1857, complainant commenced an action in the superior court of New York against James Amory, for a divorce, on the ground of adultery, in which, after a reference and report by the referee to the court, a decree was entered dismissing her bill, from which she, by her attorney, took an appeal in August, 1862, which was dismissed on motion of the attorney of James Amory, in May, 1863, on the ground that the appeal was not taken in time, according to the laws of the state. Complainant alleges that she was ignorant of the law which limited the appeal to thirty days after the service of notice of the judgment, and charges ignorance, negligence and bad faith on the part of the attorney who had appeared for her in the case. The bill then states, that James Amory departed this life in the city of Fond du Lac, in the state of Wisconsin, on the 16th day of August, 1868, where he was a resident and inhabitant, seized of a large real and personal estate, without lawful issue, and intestate, leaving complainant his lawful widow and heir under the laws of Wisconsin. It is further stated that on the 12th day of September, 1868, an instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of said James Amory, deceased, was presented to the county court of Fond du Lac county, by the defendants, together with their petition, praying that a day be appointed for hearing the proofs of said last will and testament, and that notice be given, etc., and that letters testamentary be issued to them as executors; that the will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to the defendants, from which complainant took an appeal to the circuit court of the county, on the hearing of which the defendants interposed the decree in the divorce suit as final and conclusive against her right to interfere in the proceedings before the county court; that such proceedings were had in the circuit court, and in the supreme court of this state, that the appeal from the order of the county court was dismissed, it having been determined in the supreme court, in the absence of any trial of any of the questions of fact involved in such appeal, that the judgment in said action for a divorce was final and conclusive against this complainant, in respect to her interest in the subject matter of said appeal. 26

Wis. 152. Complainant further charges that the said alleged will is not in fact the last will of James Amory; and that her defense to said will is in all respects good and true; and that but for interposing said judgment record of the action for divorce, she would have been able fully to prove and maintain the same. The bill also prays that the judgments, orders and decrees of all said courts may be adjudged to be void and of no effect, and that the defendants, as executors, may be restrained and enjoined from executing said will under the order admitting it to probate, or from converting or disposing of the estate of said deceased; and that during the pendency of this suit the defendants be restrained and enjoined from executing the will, etc.

The records of the proceedings of all the courts mentioned in the bill are annexed. In the record of the divorce case in New York, it appears that complainant was pressed to proceed with the suit, and that a decree was rendered on her default, dismissing the action. On motion and affidavits the decree was opened, on condition that they would set down the case for trial peremptorily on a day named, and James Amory was ordered to pay two hundred dollars to enable her to prepare for trial. Reference was made to H. W. Robinson, by consent of the counsel of the parties. The referee took testimony and heard the parties by their counsel on the points submitted, and reported that the parties were not married on or about the 12th of March, 1846, or at any other time; that at that time, the complainant was the wife of William A. Williams, and not a single woman, nor capable of contracting a lawful marriage; and that Williams did not die previous to the 12th March, 1846. On the 2d of October, 1860, the cause coming on to be heard on the report of the referee, this complainant's counsel moved the court to open the case for further proof, which was denied, and a final decree was rendered against her. A petition was afterwards presented by this complainant to the superior court of New York, praying that the judgment against her be opened, which petition was denied. [For a subsequent hearing in this case, see Amory v. Amory, Case No. 335.]

J. M. Gillett and Carpenter & Murphy, for complainant.

S. U. Pinney, for defendants.

MILLER, District Judge. Complainant married James Amory as the widow of Williams. Amory had a right to consider her competent to enter into the marriage relation with him. They cohabited as husband and wife for nearly ten years, and during that time the facts of recognition occurred, he believing her to be his lawful wife. It coming to his knowledge that they were not lawfully married, for the reason stated, he was not estopped in the action for a divorce from pleading and proving that her husband, Williams, was not dead at the date of his own marriage with her the 12th of March, 1846. She imposed on him in marrying him before she had reasonable or legal cause of belief of Williams' death. She married him before legal presumption of death by the expiration of seven years from the time Williams was last heard of. And it was proven before the referee that a letter from him had been recently received. She is in fault in this respect, not James Amory. Whenever he discovered complainant's want of legal right to become his wife, it became his duty to repudiate the marriage with her. The superior court was correct in disregarding the alleged facts of recognition in the petition to open the judgment.

This bill is virtually an appeal to this court from the judgment in the divorce case, and also from the orders and proceedings in the county and circuit courts of Fond du Lac, and of the supreme court of this state, and is sought to be sustained upon the alleged fraud of complainant's attorney, Shaffer. This court is not constituted to review and reverse proceedings and judgments of state courts. It is our duty to give full faith and credit to those judicial proceedings and records. It is well understood that the courts of the United States will not revise or correct judgments or decrees of state courts, where the jurisdiction of those courts appears in the record. A judgment or decree pronounced by a competent tribunal against a party having notice of the pendency of the suit is to be regarded by every other coordinate tribunal, and if the judgment or decree be erroneous, the error can be corrected only by a superior appellate tribunal. The binding distinction is between judgments or decrees merely void, and such as are voidable only; the former are binding nowhere, the latter everywhere, until reversed by a superior authority. Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 466-470. The record in the action for divorce exhibits complete jurisdiction in the courts of the state of New York, and a conclusive judgment or decree not void anywhere. The complainant, by her bill and accompanying exhibits, attempts to show that the judgment or decree of that court is voidable for fraud on the part of her attorney. This she cannot do in this court. She must appeal for relief to the courts of the state of New York.

It is well settled by authority and long practice, that to an action on a judgment record, nul tiel record is the proper and only plea. The plea of nul debet is demurrable. Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 481. If it is found on inspection of the record, that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties, the judgment is conclusive. For fraud in obtaining jurisdiction, either by an unauthorized appearance of defendant by an attorney, or by confession of judgment by an attorney without authority, or by a false return to the original process, or by any fraud on the party, relief can only be obtained in the court possessed of the original record. The tribunal wherein an action is pending, on representation of the facts, usually gives the party time to make his application for relief to the original court; and upon a certificate that the judgment is reversed or vacated, the plea of nul tiel record becomes available. The original judgment or decree of a court having jurisdiction cannot be disturbed in a coordinate tribunal, or in a collateral action. It is conclusive on the merits. Landes v. Perkins, 12 Mo. 254; Landes v. Brant, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 349-371; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319; McPherson v. Cunliff, 11 Serg. & R. 422; Dunlap v. Stetson, [Case No. 4,164;] Diggs v. Wolcott, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 179; Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 329; McKim v. Voorhies, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 279; M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 312; Benton v. Burgot, 10 Serg. & R. 240; Huff v. Hutchinson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 586; Parrish v. Ferris, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 606. Pleas to the contrary, of payment, or satisfaction, or release of the judgment, or of the statute of limitations, are allowable. Upon the same principle, the judgments and orders of the courts of this state are conclusive in a collateral action or proceeding. The complainant, not having prosecuted her action for divorce with proper diligence, cannot come to this court for relief, on the ground that an appeal was pending from a discretionary order of the court denying her petition for a rehearing, at the time of the death of James Amory, particularly as that order was correct and justifiable. The court of New York adjudged that complainant was not the wife of James Amory, consequently she cannot set up a claim here as his widow.

The prayer of the bill, that the defendants as executors of the last will and testament of James Amory, deceased, may be restrained and enjoined from executing the will, under the orders of the county court admitting the same to probate, involves direct interference on the part of this court with an exclusive and independent power and duty of that court. That court possesses exclusive and independent probate powers. This court has none. The orders of that court within its jurisdiction are as conclusive as the judgments of this court. That court has charge of the estate of the testator, and has the lawful power to admit the will to probate, to issue letters testamentary, and to control the action of the executors according to the will, who are trustees of the legatees. All persons interested in the estate have lawful right to look to that court for protection. That court has jurisdiction of the probate of the will and of issuing letters testamentary, and this complainant appeared and had her day in that court, the proceedings of which are sanctioned by the supreme court of the state. She cannot, as a non-resident of the state, claim the jurisdiction and action of this court, upon the facts pleaded in her bill with the exhibits annexed as part thereof, and the demurrer must be sustained and the bill dismissed.

NOTE, [from original report.] The above case was heard before Judges Drummond and Miller, the former being of opinion that the complainant might, in this court, show fraud in the proceedings in the courts of New York. No certificate of disagreement, however, had been signed at the time of the passage of the act of congress of June 1st, 1872. (17 Stat. 196,) providing that in cases of a difference of opinion between the circuit and district judges the opinion of the former shall prevail, and thereupon, upon Judge Drummond's suggestion that the same point could be made by answer as well as by demurrer, the demurrer was overruled, with leave to answer, and the case is still pending. The opinion and note in American Law Register for September, 1873, are not strictly correct, the case having been heard at the January term, 1872, and decided at the April term, and prior to the passage of the act of congress. The opinion of Judge Drummond is reserved until the final hearing of the cause.

Case No. 335.

AMORY v. AMORY.

[6 Biss. 174; 6 Chi. Leg. News, 349.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. July, 1874.

IMPEACHING DECREE—WIDOW—PROOF OF HEIRSHIP—LACHES.

1. Fraud upon a party by her counsel in a state court will not invalidate a decree where it does not satisfactorily appear that it altered the result.

2. A woman claiming an estate from a man as his widow and heir-at-law, required in this case to give satisfactory proof, independent of her own statement, that she was actually the wife of the deceased.

3. If, soon after decree, the party has knowledge of facts calculated to throw suspicion upon the conduct of her counsel, she is bound to use due diligence in inquiring and in seeking relief, and a delay of eleven years bars any relief against the decree and the consequences of the fraud alleged.

In equity. This was a bill of Angellina Amory, claiming as widow and heir-at-law of James Amory, deceased, praying that the defendants, Samuel P. Amory and John Amory, executors, might be enjoined from pleading a decree of divorce by the superior court of New York city in bar of proceedings by the complainant to recover the estate of the said James Amory, and praying that the complainant might be adjudged the lawful widow and heir of said James Amory. The bill alleged fraud by the complainant's counsel in the divorce proceedings in the New York court. The facts are stated in the opinion, and more fully in 3 Biss. 266. [Amory v. Amory, Case No. 334.] where Judge Miller's opinion is given sustaining the demurrer filed to the bill.

S. U. Pinney, for defendants.

Before DAVIS, Circuit Justice, and DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The principal controversy in this case turns upon the effect of a decree of the superior court of the city of New York, as upon that must depend the right of the plaintiff to sustain the bill in this case, it being founded solely on the ground that she was, at the time of his death, the wife of James Amory, who died at Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, in August, 1868, intestate and without issue. In 1857, the plaintiff presented a complaint against James Amory in the superior court of the city of New York, alleging that she was married to him in that city, in 1846, and that they lived together as man and wife; that he had been guilty of adultery, and asking for a divorce on that ground.

James Amory answered the complaint and among other things, denied the marriage. The case was submitted to a referee to report certain facts, and he reported that the plaintiff and James Amory had not been married, and that she could not, at the time of the alleged marriage, make a lawful contract of marriage, because she, at the time, had a husband, one William A. Williams, living. In October, 1860, the superior court confirmed the report of the referee, and adjudged that she was not, and never had been, the wife of James Amory, and that she should take nothing by her complaint, and that judgment be entered in favor of the said James Amory upon the merits, and against her. She made various efforts to have this decree reversed or modified, but at the time of filing the bill in this case it was in full force.

1. We are of opinion that if any fraud was practiced or wrong done to her by her counsel in the conduct of the divorce suit in the superior court of New York, it was of such a character as not to change the effect of the decree of that court. It does not satisfactorily appear that he suppressed any evidence within his knowledge bearing upon the case. And upon the proofs before the referee and the court, it cannot be said that the main fact found by the decree, or the decree itself, was unwarranted. If her counsel was acting in the interest of James Amory, as she alleges, it must appear that his wrongful act caused a decree which otherwise would not have been made. There is nothing in the evidence to show that any misconduct of the counsel altered the result.

2. In any event, it must appear as a fact that the plaintiff was actually the wife of James Amory. Undoubtedly the parties lived together as man and wife for some years, from which, in the absence of other evidence, a marriage might be inferred. But in this case there is such other evidence, and independent of her own statement, there is no satisfactory proof that a marriage ceremony ever took place between them. She was offered as a witness in the case, in the superior court, to prove it, but she was adjudged incompetent and it had to be determined by other testimony.

3. It appears that the plaintiff, not long after the decree was rendered in the superior court, had knowledge of certain facts, which, if true, were calculated to cast suspicion upon the conduct of her counsel. They were, at any rate, of such a character as to put her upon inquiry, and require her to use diligence to avoid the consequences of the fraud charged upon her counsel. This suit was not commenced till March, 1871, and we think she should not have waited so long before she asked for affirmative relief against the decree of the superior court of the city of New York. We have not considered the other objections made by the counsel of the defendants to the relief prayed for in the bill. The bill will be dismissed.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice, concurring.

Case No. 336.

AMORY v. LAWRENCE et al.

[3 Cliff. 523.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1872.

MORTGAGES—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EQUITY—PAROL EVIDENCE—LIMITATIONS—PLEADING.

1. It is the settled rule in the federal courts that oral evidence is admissible to show that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage.

[See Howland v. Blake, Case No. 6,792; Cadman v. Peter, 12 Fed. 363; Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332; Dow v. Chamberlin, Case No. 4,037; Bentley v. Phelps, Id. 1,331; Andrews v. Hyde, Id. 377.]

2. The complainant being indebted in a large sum, conveyed certain real estate to one Otis, upon an agreement with one Appleton, that he should pay the amount due the complainant's creditors, and take a transfer of the property conveyed, and account to the complainant for the balance left of the property after he had paid himself the amount advanced and interest. The trustee was to hold the property as security for the money advanced. Held: The conveyance, though absolute on its face, was, under the decisions of the supreme court, a mortgage.

3. After the trustee had been repaid, the rents and profits of the property in the trustee's hands was a debt or liability not under seal, for which the trustee was responsible to the complainant, and as such constituted a good cause of an action of contract or suit in equity.

4. But the claim in this case was barred by the statute of limitations.

5. The construction given to state statutes of limitations, by the courts of the state in which such statutes are enacted, furnish the rule of decision in the federal courts in cases where they apply.

6. The courts of equity in Massachusetts apply the statute of limitation in suits in equity.

7. The statute of limitations in this case began to apply when the complainant first became aware that the trustee had been repaid for his advances out of the proceeds of the sale or the rents and profits of the real estate conveyed to him, and knew what his rights in the premises were.

8. The claim against the executors of the deceased trustee, for the balance in the hands of the trustee of moneys collected in execution of the trust, beyond the amount advanced and interest, was held to be barred by the statute of limitations, the complainant having known, twelve years before the filing of the bill, that the trustee had been repaid for such advance and interest.

9. Where an absolute deed is intended as a mortgage, a subsequent purchaser with notice, stands in the place of the equitable mortgagee.

10. Six years is no bar to redeem a mortgage, nor is the plea of laches any defence to the suit, unless they are shown to have extended to the period of twenty years.

11. Courts of equity, in the case of a mortgagor coming to redeem, have fixed upon the term of twenty years after forfeiture and possession taken by the mortgagee, no interest having been paid in the meantime, and with no circumstances accounting for the neglect, as a period beyond which the right of redemption shall not be favored.

[See Slicer v. Bank of Pittsburgh, 16 How. (57 U. S.) 571; Cromwell v. Bank of Pittsburgh, Case No. 3,409; Dexter v. Arnold, Id. 3,857.]

12. Lapse of twenty years without any recognition of the complainant's rights to redeem the mortgaged premises, consisting of the undivided seventh part of the dower estate of the complainant's mother, and which the trustee in his lifetime conveyed to the last named respondent, was not shown in this case.

13. In this case, the property covered by the complainant's claim against the trustee (which claim the complainant purchased from the assignees in bankruptcy) was property not taken possession of by the assignee, to which the title of the bankrupt is good against all the world, except the assignee or any one to whom he might convey.

14. An assignee in bankruptcy is not bound to take property which may be onerous to the estate, or burden instead of benefit it. If he does not take it, it remains in the bankrupt.

[Cited in Kimberling v. Hartly, 1 Fed. 575; Garrett v. Sayles, Id. 377; American File Co. v. Garrett, 110 U. S. 289, 4 Sup. Ct. 94; Taylor v. Irwin, 20 Fed. 620; Sessions v. Romadka, 145 U. S. 29, 12 Sup. Ct. 801.]

15. After the lapse of years, in this case, the court held that the conclusion must be that the assignee elected not to take possession of certain property of which the complainant when a bankrupt took an assignment as set forth in the bill.

16. Reasonable presumptions are admitted by a demurrer, as well as matters expressly alleged.

17. The allegation in the bill was sufficient, although it did not state that the assignment of the claim against the trustee was under an order of court first made, because the presumption is that such sale was made in conformity to such an order, and because, independently of the assignment, the bankrupt's title was good against all the world if the assignee elected not to take the property as not beneficial to the estate.

18. Waiver by the bill of oath in the answer, amounts to nothing unless accepted by the respondents.

In equity. Bill in equity praying for an account from the executors of William Appleton of certain real and personal estate conveyed by the complainant to said William Appleton during his life, and of the receipts derived therefrom, either from its sale or as income, and that said executors might be decreed to pay to the complainant all such sums as might be found due him on such accounting. The bill also prayed that one of the respondents, Thomas C. Amory, might be decreed to account for and pay to the complainant certain rents, profits, and receipts derived from certain real estate alleged to have been conveyed to said Thomas C. Amory by said decedent, William Appleton, and to reconvey said real estate to complainant. The complainant being indebted in the sum of $10,000 to Isaac Coffin, on July 26, 1831, conveyed to William F. Otis certain real and personal property, including his reversionary interest in the dower set off to his mother in his father's estate. That conveyance was made upon an agreement with William Appleton, deceased, that he should pay the amount due to his creditor, and take a transfer of the property conveyed, and account to the complainant for the balance left of the property after he had repaid himself the amount advanced for the transfer and interest. In 1832 the complainant with his family removed to New York and remained there until 1842, when he returned to Massachusetts. In 1840, while residing in New York, he failed in business and in the following year went into bankruptcy and obtained a certificate of discharge in 1853. Until the year 1860 he was ignorant whether the decedent Appleton had been paid or not, what he had advanced on the complainant's account, but he believed as early as 1847 that he had been paid the full amount. The complainant's mother died in 1847, and one seventh of the estate held by her as dower reverted to the decedent. The complainant's confidence in the decedent, Appleton, remained undiminished, as he did not know the amount he had realized from the personal estate, nor what disposition he had made of his share of his father's real estate; but when he became convinced that Appleton intended to retain his, the complainant's share, in the dower estate, his confidence was much shaken, and he then requested the decedent to render his account of his receipts from the property so conveyed by the complainant. They had before that time frequently spoken of the trust property, and Appleton had never intimated that he did not intend to account for the proceeds, and when he requested the account, the decedent recognized his right, but would not agree definitely to make the account. Appleton told the complainant that it would be impossible to tell what the receipts would be until his share in his father's estate was all sold, and intimated that the property would not sell for more than enough to pay him, the decedent.

Repeated requests were made for the account, but the requests were always refused, the decedent asserting that he had not been paid the amount advanced. After his failure, the complainant was in reduced circumstances, and dependent upon his friends for a considerable portion of the income necessary for his and his family's support. Small amounts were paid by the decedent prior to 1850, and at that time in consequence of complainant's demands for an account, the decedent agreed to pay the complainant $600 per annum, which has ever since been paid.

In 1860 he was enabled to have an examination made of the accounts, and being advised to purchase from his assignees in bankruptcy his claim against the decedent, he "accordingly procured an assignment" of the same, and he then ascertained the accounts to be as set forth in the bill of complaint, which showed that he was justly entitled to a large balance beyond the amount advanced and interest. In 1832 the decedent paid the complainant $5,000, in 1842 $400, in 1856 $1,600, in 1858 $600, annually as agreed, making an amount not exceeding $10,000. The income derived from the property held in trust, must have been at least $20,000, and the net receipts of the decedent beyond his advances, at least $5,000 up to 1862, when the account closed, as stated in the bill. The complainant caused a statement of the whole matter to be made, and sent to those most interested in his welfare, hoping that publicity would force the decedent, then alive, to do him justice, but his friends being opposed to his cause, refused him any aid, without which it was impossible for him to proceed to suit. On the 27th of January, 1862, the decedent conveyed one seventh of certain real estate to complainant's brother, Thomas C. Amory, which estate was worth at least $15,000, and at the time of the conveyance the grantee had full knowledge that the grantor held the same as trustee for the complainant, and that the complainant was doing all in his power to recover it.

In 1862 the trustee, William Appleton, died, and before his death caused the complainant, through Thomas C. Amory, to be informed that he had left with his executors a file of papers relating to his rights of property conveyed to the decedent, and that his executors had directions to see that his, complainant's, rights were acknowledged, and that the property was restored to him. Expressions of regret on the part of the trustee, were also conveyed to the complainant, that justice to him had been delayed until it was impossible for the trustee to settle the matter personally with the complainant.

The complainant called the attention of the executors and devisees to the matter, but they refused to investigate his claim.

Such were the facts as alleged in the bill of complaint. The respondents filed three demurrers to the bill.

The Demurrer of Amos A. Lawrence, Thomas Jefferson Coolidge, William Appleton, and Charles H. Appleton, Certain of the Defendants Named in Said Bill, as They Are the Executors of the Will of William Appleton, Deceased.

These defendants, by protestation not confessing or acknowledging all or any of the matter and things in the said complainant's bill contained, to be true in manner and form, as the same are therein and thereby set forth and alleged, do demur to the said bill, and for causes of demurrer show—First. That the complainant hath not in and by his said bill, made or stated such a case as entitles him in a court of equity to any discovery from these defendants, or relief against them as to the matters contained in said bill or any of them. Second. That the complainant, in and by his said bill, in violation of law and the rules of this court, deprives the defendants of their right of answering under oath. Wherefore, and for divers other good causes of demurrer appearing in the said bill, the said defendants do demur thereto, and pray the judgment of this honorable court, whether they shall be compelled to make any further answer to said bill, and humbly pray to be hence dismissed.

The Demurrer of William Appleton, Charles H. Appleton, S. E. Appleton, Hetty S. Coolidge, Certain of the Defendants Named in Said Bill, as They Are Devisees and Legatees under the Will of Said William Appleton, Deceased.

These defendants by protestation not confessing or acknowledging all or any of the things in the complainant's bill contained, to be true in manner and form, as the same are therein set forth and alleged, do demur to said bill, and for cause of demurrer show—First. That the complainant hath not, in and by his said bill, made or stated such a case as entitles him in a court of equity to any discovery from these defendants, or relief against them as to the matters contained in said bill or any of them. Second. That the complainant, in and by his said bill, in violation of law and the rules of this court, deprives the defendants of their right of answering under oath. That it appears, in and by said bill, that it is exhibited against certain persons as executors of the will of William Appleton, deceased, and against these defendants as devisees and legatees under said will, and these defendants, as such devisees and legatees, are improperly joined as parties defendant to said bill. Wherefore, and for divers other good causes of demurrer appearing in the said bill, the said defendants do demur thereto, and pray the judgment, of this honorable court, whether they shall be compelled to make any further answer to said bill, and humbly pray to be hence dismissed with their reasonable costs in this behalf sustained.

The Demurrer of Thomas C. Amory, One of the Defendants Named in Said Bill.

This defendant, by protestation not confessing or acknowledging all or any of the matters and things in the said complainant's bill contained to be true in manner and form, as the same are therein and thereby set forth and alleged, doth demur to said bill and for causes of demurrer showeth—First. That the complainant hath not in and by his said bill made or stated such a case as entitles him in a court of equity to any discovery from this defendant or relief against him as to the matters contained in said bill or any of them. Second. That the complainant in and by his said bill, in violation of law and the rules of this court, deprives the defendant of his right of answering under oath. Wherefore, and for divers other good causes of demurrer appearing in said bill, this defendant doth demur thereto, and prays the judgment of this honorable court, whether he shall be compelled to make any further answer to said bill, and humbly prays to be hence dismissed with his reasonable costs in this behalf sustained. [Bill dismissed as to executors and devisees, but for complainant as against Thomas C. Amory.]

B. F. Butler and Bumpus & Johnson, for complainant.

Sidney Bartlett and C. A. Welch, for respondents.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Admitted as the matters well pleaded in the bill of complaint are by the demurrers, the only question is as to their legal effect. Several objections are taken to the right of the complainant to a decree, which will be briefly considered in the following order. That the claim is within the statute of frauds, as the trust was not created or declared by an instrument in writing, signed by the party creating or declaring the same, as it is settled law in this state, that no trust can be created or declared except by such an instrument. That the claim is barred by the statute of limitations, which enacts that all actions of contract, founded upon any contract or liability not under seal, express or implied, with certain exceptions not material to be noticed, shall be commenced within six years next after the cause of action accrues and not afterwards. Gen. St. Mass. 777. That if the claim is not barred by the statute of limitations, still, it is barred by the laches of the complainant, and those through whom he claims. That the bill of complaint fails to show that the complainant is entitled to any relief, because it is not alleged that he acquired a good title from his assignees in bankruptcy. That the cause of action is barred by the two years' limitation in the bankrupt act, under which the certificate of discharge was obtained. That the bill of complaint is demurrable, because the complainant attempted to deprive the respondents of their right to answer under oath contrary to the rules and practice of the court existing at the time of filing the bill.

Much discussion of the first question is unnecessary, as it depends at this day entirely upon authority. Undoubtedly the objection would prevail before the supreme court of the state, but the rule in equity is different in the federal courts, as appears by numerous decided cases. Whether oral evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that a deed, absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage, was directly presented in the case of Wyman v. Babcock, [Case No. 18,113,] and the decision of the court was that such evidence is admissible for that purpose; and that the statute of frauds is no bar to the admission of the evidence where it is offered to show that such a deed was intended as a mortgage. Twenty years earlier Judge Story decided the question the same way in the case of Taylor v. Luther, [Case No. 13,796,] holding that there is nothing in the statute of frauds rendering parol evidence inadmissible to show that an absolute deed was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance had been omitted or destroyed by fraud or mistake, or omitted by design upon mutual confidence between the parties. He examined the question upon principle and authority, and gave his reasons for the conclusion, and ten years later in the case of Jenkins v. Eldredge, [Case No. 7,267,] he reaffirmed the same position after giving the question a very elaborate consideration. Repeated decisions of the supreme court have affirmed the same rule, and it may now be regarded as settled in all the federal courts. Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 238; Sprigg v. Mt. Pleasant Bank, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 201; Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 126; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 139; Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 299.

Two questions are involved in the second proposition of the defence which, inasmuch as separate demurrers are filed, must be separately considered. 1. Whether the claim of the complainant against the executors of the trustee, for the income and receipts from the sale of the trust property in the lifetime of the trustee, other than the undivided parcel conveyed to the last-named respondent, is or is not barred as assumed by the executors, in their demurrer. 2. Whether the right to redeem the undivided seventh part of the property conveyed by the trustee to the last-named respondent is not also barred by lapse of time, as assumed by that respondent. Before examining those questions, however, it becomes necessary to ascertain more definitely what was the real nature of the original transaction, and for that purpose reference need only be made to the bill of complaint, as all the well-pleaded allegations of the same are admitted by the several demurrers. Schedules of the property, as the complainant alleges, were prepared under the direction of the trustee, it being agreed that he, the complainant, should not part with any of his property until the trustee had made the arrangement to pay the $10,000 to the complainant's creditor, that he made the transfer of his entire property as agreed, it being clearly and distinctly understood between him and the trustee, that the latter was to hold the property simply as security for the $10,000 to be advanced by the trustee, and that he, the trustee, was to account for the balance as soon as he should be repaid the amount advanced, with interest. Payment was accordingly made to the creditor, the property conveyed to the person designated, and ultimately transferred to the trustee, and the whole transaction perfected as agreed between the complainant and the trustee. Viewed in the light of the decisions of the federal courts, the conveyance beyond all doubt, though absolute on its face, was a mortgage. Wyman v. Babcock, [Case No. 18,113,] Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 299.

Assume the allegations of both to be correct, and it appears that the trustee was fully paid prior to 1860, and the complainant admits that in that year it came to his knowledge not only that the trustee was fully paid, but that he had in his hands a large balance derived from receipts for the property sold, and the rents and profits of the property which was due to the complainant. Whatever that balance was beyond the sum advanced and interest was a debt or liability not under seal, for which the trustee was responsible to the complainant, and as such constituted a good cause for an action of contract or a suit in equity. Wyman v. Babcock, [Case No. 18,113,] same case, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 300. Such actions are barred by the six years' limitation, and the court is of the opinion that the claim against the executors is barred by that limitation. Gen. St. Mass. 777. State statutes of limitation and the construction of the same as given by the courts of the state furnish the rule of decision in the federal courts in cases where they apply. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 599. Courts of equity in this state apply the statute of limitations in such cases in suits in equity to the same effect as they are applied in actions at law. Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212; Dodge v. Essex Ins. Co., 12 Gray. 71. Rights concealed by the trustee are not subject to such a rule of limitation; but it appears that the complainant knew what his rights were in that regard, twelve years before the bill was filed, as well as he knew what they were when the bill was framed, and it is clear that the statute commenced to run, so far as respects the balance in the hands of the trustee, arising from the sale of the property, or from the rents and profits collected beyond the amount advanced, and interest, when the party seeking relief became fully acquainted with the facts, and knew what his rights were in the premises. Perry, Trusts, § 230; Pritchard v. Chandler, [Case No. 11,436;] Ang. Lim. (2d Ed.) 176; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90; Hallett v. Collins, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 174; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 177; Finney v. Cochran, 1 Watts & S. 118. Governed by these considerations, the court is of the opinion that the claim against the executors for the balance in the hands of the trustee for moneys collected in execution of the trust beyond the amount advanced, and interest, is barred by the statute of limitations, and having come to that conclusion, it follows that the claim against the devisees of the decedent trustee is without any foundation. Attempt is made to show that the limitation of six years should not be applied in this case, as the trustee died in 1862, but that suggestion cannot relieve the complainant from the bar, as the case is controlled by section 10 of the state limitation act, which in that state of the case only extends the time for bringing the action for the period of two years next after the grant of letters testamentary or of administration. Gen. St. Mass. 778. Suggestion is also made that the bill may be sustained against the executors as a mere naked bill of discovery; but the court is of a different opinion, for two reasons. 1. Because the executors in the further prosecution of the bill against the other respondent of the decree, or for the complainant, are competent witnesses for either party. 2. Because the complainant has been guilty of laches in bringing his bill which may well be taken into the account in determining that question.

Besides the money demand against the executors and devisees of the trustee, the complainant also claims to redeem the mortgaged premises so far as respects the undivided seventh part of the dower estate which the trustee in his lifetime conveyed to the last-named respondent. Evidently that claim rests upon entirely different principles from the money demand against the other respondents, as the property exists in specie without change, and is held by the grantee of the trustee who made the purchase, and took the conveyance of the property with full knowledge of the trust and of the rights of the complainant under the original arrangement whereby the title of his grantor was acquired. Where an absolute deed is intended as a mortgage, a subsequent purchaser with notice stands in the place of the equitable mortgagee. Williams v. Thorn, 11 Paige, 459; Vattier v. Hinde, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 253; Everett v. Stone, [Case No. 4,577.]

Six years is no bar to a claim to redeem a mortgage, nor is the plea of laches any defence to the suit unless it is shown to have extended to a period of twenty years. In the case of a mortgagor coming to redeem, courts of equity have by analogy to the statute of limitations, which takes away the right of entry of the plaintiff after twenty years' adverse possession, fixed upon that term as the period after forfeiture and possession taken by the mortgagee, no interest having been paid in the mean time, and no circumstances to account for the neglect appearing, beyond which a right of redemption shall not be favored. Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 497; Wyman v. Babcock, [Case No. 18,113;] Dexter v. Arnold, [Id. 3,859;] Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 168; 4 Kent, Comm. (11th Ed.) 187; Demarest v. Wynkoop, 3 Johns. Ch. 129. Twenty years without a recognition of the rights of the complainant is not shown in this case. Numerous allegations of the bill contradict any such theory, and show that such a defence in the present state of the pleadings cannot be sustained, as the bill alleges that in 1847 the trustee constantly recognized the rights of the complainant, and told him in substance that it was impossible to say what the receipts would be until his share in his father's estate was all sold, that he also recognized his right to an account, but would not agree definitely to give it, intimating that the property would not amount to more than enough to pay him what he advanced; that in 1850 he agreed to pay him $600 annually, which has ever since been paid; that in 1856 he paid $1,600, and $600 in 1858, which must be understood as a sum in addition to annual payment under the prior agreement. Examined in the light of the declarations of the trustee and these several payments, especially the payment at one time of the sum of $1,600, it is impossible to adopt the theory that the rights of the complainant were not recognized by the trustee within the period covered by those several allegations. Sixteen years only have elapsed since the large payment of $1,600 was made by the trustee.

Sufficient has already been remarked in disposing of the second objection of the respondent to show that the third objection cannot be sustained, and it is accordingly overruled.

Objection is also made that the allegations of the bill are not sufficient to show that the complainant acquired a good title to the property from his assignees in bankruptcy. All the bill alleges upon the subject is that he was advised to purchase from his assignees in bankruptcy his claim against the trustee, and that he accordingly procured an assignment. Express provision was made by section 9 of the bankrupt act of the 19th of August, 1841, that all sales, transfers, and other conveyances of the assignee of the bankrupt's property and rights of property shall be made at such times and in such manner as shall be ordered and appointed by the court in bankruptcy, and the supreme court of Massachusetts decided in the case of Osborn v. Basterral, 4 Cush. 406, that the sale of a bankrupt's real estate under an order of the district court in which no time or place of sale was fixed by the court, is irregular and void. In general, when a sale is made under a statute power, said Shaw, Ch. J., it must appear that the requisition of the statute as conditions precedent to the operation of the power to pass the estate, have been complied with. When the title to real estate is solely through a power, it must, in order to be sustainable, be proved that such power was duly executed. Cleveland v. Boerum, 27 Barb. 254. Title was claimed it will be seen in both of those cases under purchases by strangers to the proceedings in bankruptcy, and consequently their claim of title rested solely upon the assumption that the power to sell was duly executed by the assignee. Unlike what occurred in those cases, the purchase in the case before the court was made by the bankrupt, whose title, in the case of onerous property, where the assignee elects not to take it into possession, is good against all the world, except the assignee or some one to whom he conveyed the property. Smith v. Gordon, [Case No. 13,052.] All the property and rights of property belonging to the bankrupt, unquestionably pass by force of the decree of bankruptcy to the assignee by operation of law, and become vested in him as soon as he is appointed. But though the legal title passes to the assignee, he is not bound, said Judge Ware, to take possession of all the property. Leasehold estates pass to the assignee under the English bankrupt laws, but the assignee is not bound to take the lease and charge the estate with the payment of the rent, as the rent may be greater than the value of the lease, and thus the estate may be burdened instead of being benefited, and in such a case the claim may be abandoned by the assignee. He is not bound in such a case to take the property into his possession, and if he elects not to take the property, it remains in the bankrupt, and no one certainly, except the assignee, has a right to dispute his possession. Copeland v. Stephens, 1 Barn. & Ald. 603; Fowler v. Down, 1 Bos. & P. 44.

Years have elapsed since the proceedings in bankruptcy were closed, and the irresistible conclusion from all the averments of the bill is, that the assignee never elected to take possession of this property, or made any claim whatever upon the trustee for the same. Assignees may refuse to take possession of onerous properties or such as will be a burden instead of a profit, and the clear presumption from the bill as admitted by the demurrer is that the claim against the trustee was regarded in that light by the assignee. Robeson says it has long been a recognized principle of the bankrupt law that the assignees of a bankrupt are not bound to take property of an onerous or unprofitable character, or property which will be a burden instead of a benefit. They are on that subject regarded as being in a very different position from that of the executors of a deceased testator, as the former take the property by operation of law, while the latter claim title through their testator, and are bound to perform his obligations to the extent of his assets. Robs. Bankr. 322. Where the assignee elects not to take the right of the bankrupt and charge the estate with the burden of an uncertain litigation, the right, whatever it is, survives in the bankrupt, and some of the authorities hold that it may be pursued by any creditor not a party to the proceedings in bankruptcy. Smith v. Gordon, [Case No. 13,052.] Persons acting as assignees in such a case are required to elect, within a reasonable time, and the rule is that if they refuse to elect when required to do so, it is deemed an election to reject the estate. Lawrence v. Knowles, 5 Bing. N. C. 399; Carter v. Warne, 4 Car. & P. 191; Graham v. Van Diemen's Land Co., 11 Exch. 101; Ex parte Blandy, 1 Deac. 286; Tuck v. Fyson, 6 Bing. 321. Doubtless the complainant, in such a case, must allege or prove enough to show that the assignee is estopped to set up any right in opposition to his claim, and the court is of the opinion that enough is alleged in this case to satisfy that requirement. Reasonable presumptions are admitted by the demurrer as well as the matters expressly alleged. Pursuant to advice which the complainant received to purchase from his assignees his claim against the trustee, the allegation is that he procured an assignment of the same, which must be understood in this award as a transfer of all the property and estate embraced in the claim which he was advised to purchase by an appropriate legal instrument. Suppose that is so, still the argument is that the allegation is not sufficient, because it is not alleged that the sale was made by the order of the bankrupt court; but the opinion of the court is that such a prior order was not necessary under the circumstances of this case, to give validity to the sale, or if it was, that the reasonable presumption from the allegation of the bill is, that the assignment was made in pursuance of such an order of court. Independent of the assignment, his title, under the circumstances of that case, was good against all the world except the assignee, as the presumption is that the property was regarded as onerous, and that the assignee elected not to take it into possession or to prosecute the claim.

The next objection is that the cause of action is barred by the two years' limitation in the bankrupt law under which the complainant was adjudged a bankrupt. Suffice to say that the limitation does not apply to the case of an assignee, which is all that need be said upon the subject in the present case. Banks v. Ogden, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 69.

It is also objected that the complainant attempted to deprive the respondents of their right to an answer under oath; but the controlling answer to the objection is, that it can have no such effect, as the waiver amounts to nothing unless the respondents accept it. Heath v. Erie Ry. Co., [Case No. 6,306;] Story, Eq. Pl. § 874. Bill dismissed as to the executors and devisees. Decree for complainant against Thomas C. Amory.

BANKRUPTCY—PROCEDURE—UNAUTHORIZED DECREE—CERTIFICATES OF DISCHARGE.

[1. In the absence of an express rule, the bankruptcy court will follow the rules of the circuit and district courts whereby agreements between counsel must be in writing or of record in order to bind their clients, provided that no inequitable result would be caused thereby.]

[2. Where the clerk enters a decree in bankruptcy granting a final discharge when the only decree authorized is one declaring the objections by the creditors to be badly pleaded, such unauthorized decree should be set aside.]

[3. After a decree of final discharge has been property taken out by a bankrupt, the following papers must—under Act Aug. 19, 1841, § 4, (5. Stat. 440, c. 9)—be submitted to the judge for examination, and receive his indorsement before certificate of discharge can be properly granted: (1) The official assignee's report; (2) the report of the clerk, stating whether the bankrupt has been regular in his proceedings, and has conformed to the orders of the court, and what creditors dissent to a final discharge. And, where the certificate has been granted before these steps have been taken, it should be revoked when the judge finds these papers, thereafter submitted, to be essentially defective, and refuses to approve the same.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Jonathan Amory and Henry H. Leeds. Heard on motion by certain creditors to vacate and revoke certificates of discharge heretofore taken out by the bankrupts. Granted.]

BETTS, District Judge. This case was a motion to vacate and revoke the certificates of discharge delivered to the bankrupts, on the 19th ult., and the circumstances of the case were briefly these. When the day for final hearing came round, objections were interposed by J. & G. Richardson, to which objections the bankrupt took exceptions, and the cause was set down for argument on the docket; Mr. Gerard, appearing for the creditors, and Mr. Noyes for the bankrupts. On Friday, the 18th of November, Mr. Noyes being engaged in the superior court, arranged with Mr. Gerard that if the cause should be reached that day, he would not argue it. It was not reached that day, and not being reached up to Saturday about 12 M., and Mr. Noyes being still engaged in the superior court, Mr. Gerard left the city, just notifying Mr. Noyes of his absence. It was called on between 1 and 3 P. M., and Mr. Barnard who had been engaged by Mr. Leeds to attend in the absence of Mr. Noyes, (but without Mr. Noyes' knowledge) no person appearing to oppose, moved for a decree by default of the opposing creditors. The following order was then entered: "Ordered that the objections filed in the cause by J. N. Platt, Esq., be, and the same are hereby overruled, and it is further ordered that the said bankrupts receive a certificate of discharge." Immediately on the entering of this order, certificates of discharge under the seal of the court were ordered to the bankrupts, and on the Monday following, the present motion to vacate them was read. The arrangement between Messrs. Gerard and Noyes, it is proper to say, was entirely unknown to Mr. Leeds, as is established by the affidavit of Mr. Noyes.

For the creditors it was charged (1) that the default was taken by the bankrupts in violation of an agreement made between their counsel and in entire surprise of the latter.

2. That the order was irregular and void, not being conformable to the decree of the court, and was not entered in presence of the court, but in the clerk's office, and at the dictation of the bankrupt's counsel.

3. That the delivery of the certificate by the clerk was irregular and without authority of the court. The positions to be considered now are: First, the regularity of the proceedings on the part of the bankrupts, in obtaining a default pending the arrangement between the respective counsel. It is insisted that the proceeding was not only inequitable and a surprise upon the creditors, but that it was irregular and absolutely void, the agreement of the counsel for the bankrupts having put it out of their power to go on with the case, without first disavowing the acts of their counsel, and giving notice to the other party.

For the bankrupts it is contended that this being a mere parol agreement of their counsel not communicated to them, it did not bind them, and that they were at liberty to proceed in court in their causes the same as if such understanding had not existed.

The court can give no weight to the suggestion that the bankrupts could only act through Mr. Noyes. They had a perfect right to move or argue them in person, or to substitute any other counsel to take charge of them.

Was the engagement between Messrs. Gerard and Noyes obligatory upon their respective clients? If it was, the proceeding to take default in violation of that agreement was irregular and the decree should be held void. The supreme court of the state by rule of April, 1796, declared that no private engagement or consent between parties in respect to proceedings in a cause, should be alleged or suggested by either of them against the other, unless entered in the book of rules by consent, or unless the evidence thereof shall be in writing, subscribed by the party against whom it is alleged or suggested. The same rule in substance has been ever since incorporated in the practice of that court and the court of chancery. The circuit and district courts of this district have also provided by rule that no agreement or consent between parties or their attorneys, in respect to proceedings in court, shall be binding unless reduced to writing and subscribed by the party against whom it shall be alleged or suggested. These rules are very strictly adhered to by the courts unless an intention is discovered to impose upon or mislead a party through parole stipulations.

The supreme court of the U. S. enforced an agreement by an attorney for a bank, to enforce execution against the principal debtor, and postpone it against the surety, although the agreement was verbal and denied by the bank. [Union Bank of Georgetown v. Geary, 5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 99.] No distinction can be taken in reason between the agreements made by counsel and those made by the party himself, or his attorney, and the rule exacting written evidence should apply indiscriminately to all. It is difficult also to perceive why an arrangement between counsel to defer the argument of a cause on the calendar and ready to be called, is not an agreement in respect to proceedings in court, and as such rendered of no avail by the standing rules of the court. The court of errors do not consider the rule applicable to that court, and accordingly gave effect to an arrangement similar to that before this court without regarding it material that the agreement was verbal and not in writing. The case in the court of errors was substantially the same with these now under consideration, with one circumstance in the present that did not appear then. The express admission of the counsel for the bankrupts [is] that the agreement was entered into at his instance and was acted upon in full faith, by the counsel for the creditors. There was no specific rule of the bankruptcy court exacting written evidence of agreement in respect to proceedings therein, and all the regulations are framed upon the assumption that any step or stipulation affecting the progress of a cause would be indicated by the appropriate entry on the docket, or made by express order of the court, or by stipulation between the parties. In matters not provided for by express rule it has been the constant practice of the court to recur to the known principles governing the practice of the circuit and district courts in analogous cases.

The right of counsel and attorneys to bind their principals by their stipulations in respect to proceedings in court, cannot be questioned, and if the question is to be decreed open for the court to decide upon, conformably to the justice and equity of the case, I should have no difficulty in determining that the bankrupts here ought to be bound by the agreement of their counsel. Still I am exceedingly unwilling to trench upon the established and notorious practice of the court, and lay it down as a definite rule, that parties to this court shall be bound by parole agreements entered into by their counsel or attorneys. I shall always be disinclined to recognize them when disavowed or denied by either party, although I do not intend to say that if relief rested solely on the affirmance of the agreement between the counsel, the court would not act upon the authority of the court of errors of this state, and uphold the stipulation in furtherance of the palpable equity in the case, but I forbear in pronouncing in favor of the binding obligation of such parole arrangements as a general rule of decision.

Admitting the stipulation between the counsel could not prevent the bankrupts from taking further proceedings while it continued, it is urged that their subsequent proceedings were irregular and unauthorized by law. The motion acted on by the court was one for defaulting the opposing creditors and the order of the court was given to that extent and no further.—(Judge BETTS, here went into an elaborate review of the proceedings of the case, and continued:) The counsel states in his affidavit that after the default he attended at the clerk's office to have the necessary orders entered allowing the exceptions to the objections, overruling objections, and ordering certificate and discharge. At his instance and direction the decree first above stated was entered in the docket and certified by the assistant in the clerk's office. The decree did not conform to the allegata composing the issue between the parties, but went out and transcended that issue. Instead of declaring the particulars set up by the objections to be imperfectly or inaptly pleaded, it by a single bound overleaped the points presented, decided against the objections on the merits, and decreed a final discharge to the bankrupts. In these respects it was unauthorized by any express direction of the court, and it assumed conclusions and consequences which the order of default did not warrant. No court will allow an irregular or unauthorized entry on its docket, or minutes, however formal it may be in terms, to work an injury to parties not procuring or assenting to it. Accordingly the rule of the 19th November last, decreeing a final discharge to the bankrupts must be set aside and vacated as irregular and void.

On the same day and almost concurrently with the entry of the decree on the docket, the certificates of discharge were made out and delivered to the bankrupts by an assistant in the clerk's office. If the decree of discharge had been proper and regularly taken out, still the delivery of the certificates cannot follow instantly upon such decree. Several important steps are to be taken—1st, the clerk is to examine and report to the court if the bankrupt has been regular in his proceedings and conformed to all the orders of the court; and what creditors dissent to a discharge; 2d, the official assignee is to file his report, and 3d, the judge is to examine these papers and endorse his certificate on them. These being done, the clerk may deliver a certificate. [Act Aug. 19, 1841, § 4, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.)] In the present case these documents were not submitted to the court until Monday, (the certificates having been delivered on Saturday preceding) and they are found essentially defective and have not been approved by the judge. The bankrupts are accordingly in possession of their certificates without due authority of law.

I accordingly pronounce the decree of final discharge entered in these cases on the 19th Nov. last void, and order and decree that the same be revoked and vacated, and I further order that the bankrupts respectively deliver to the clerk's office on the 5th instant, the certificates issued them on the 19th of November last.

BANKRUPTCY—ILLEGAL PREFERENCES AND TRANSFERS—ACT OF 1841—DISCHARGE.

[1. The receipt by certain creditors of an insolvent partnership of money and other assets on a composition and compromise of their claims, and in full discharge thereof, is a preference, within the prohibition of the bankruptcy act of August 19, 1841, § 3, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9,) when it appears that other creditors got nothing, and that the settlement was made after January 1, 1841,² and prior to the passage of the act, with the general authority and concurrence of both partners, though no particular acts are proved against one of them.]

[2. Similar settlements with certain creditors, to the exclusion of others, made after the act of 1841 went into effect, are preferences, within the prohibition of that act.]

[3. Preferences of certain creditors, to the exclusion of others, are not exempted from the prohibition of the bankruptcy act of 1841 because obtained through the urgent demands of such creditors, or by means of threats to bring actions for their claims.]

[4. A retiring partner of an insolvent firm to whom the other partners make payment in satisfaction of his interest in the partnership is not a creditor, within the meaning of the second proviso of the bankruptcy act of August 19, 1841, § 2, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.)³

[5. Assignments and transfers of real estate and personal property by a bankrupt to his sister, who is not at the time a bona fide creditor, although fraudulent and void in law, are not a bar to the bankrupt's discharge, under the act of August 19, 1841, §§ 2, 4, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9,) unless such frauds were committed after the passage of the act.]³

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Jonathan Amory and Henry H. Leeds. Certificates of discharge which had been taken out were heretofore vacated. Case No. 336a. Certain questions were referred to the circuit justice, who died without answering them, and they are now submitted by agreement to the district judge. Discharges denied.]

Before BETTS, District Judge.

The following points in this case, which were referred to THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, who deceased without passing thereon, have been decided by BETTS, District Judge, at the request of the counsel for both parties:

First. If a debtor being insolvent since the 1st of January, 1841, makes compromise arrangements with a part of his creditors, and then pays to them a portion of their debts or assigns them assets of his estate in satisfaction of the debts and thereby exhausts the whole of his estate, having creditors who have received no part of their debts, are such payments or assignments prohibited by the bankrupt act?

Second. Does it vary the case if the same terms of compromise were offered to all of his creditors, by the insolvent at the time, and he was then able to fulfill the offer, or that the assets not accepted were subsequently expended in his necessary support and management of the business of the estate, or that they had become worthless from depreciation?

Third. Is a bankrupt whose application is voluntary barred a discharge, if, being insolvent, he by payment, assignment, or otherwise after the 1st January, 1841, gives or secures a preference of one creditor over another on the urgency and importunity of such creditor, and does it vary the case if the creditor threatens to bring suit, such payment or assignment not being made under actual coercion of law?

³[See note at end of case.]

Fourth. If on the dissolution of a copartnership previous to January, 1841, and then actually insolvent, one partner retires and is paid by the others a sum of money in satisfaction of his interest in the partnership, (the remaining partners at the time contemplating the passage of a bankrupt law,) is such retiring partner a creditor, and such payment a preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law?

Fifth. Does the conveyance of real estate by a party deeply in debt to another not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser for valuable consideration—and which would be void as against creditors under the state law—the conveyance being made previous to the 1st January, 1841, and not in contemplation of the passage of any bankrupt law, bar the discharge of such debtor under the bankrupt act, his application being voluntary?

Sixth. Does it vary the case if such conveyance is made in contemplation of bankruptcy?

It appearing to the court upon the proofs in the case that after the 1st of January, 1841, and prior to the passage of the bankrupt act, [of August 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9,)] various creditors of the bankrupts, by the general concurrence and authority of both bankrupts, (but no particular acts of the bankrupt Amory in this behalf are proved,) received payments in money, and various other creditors by assignments and transfers of assets of the bankrupts of value, on a composition and compromise with the said creditors of their respective debts, and in full discharge and satisfaction thereof by such composition and part payment, and that numerous others then creditors of the bankrupt received no payment whatever on their respective debts then due. Wherefore it is considered by the court that such payments and assignments, was giving and securing a preference to one creditor over another against the prohibition of the bankrupt law.

And it further appearing to the court that the bankrupts after the passage of the bankrupt law, and after the same went into operation and effect, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, in like manner compounded and settled debts owing by them, by payment thereof in part in cash to some creditors, and to others by assignments and transfers of assets of the bankrupts of value, for the purpose that the said debts on such composition and payment should be released and discharged to the said bankrupts, and that the same were thereupon released accordingly, and that others, then creditors of the bankrupts, received no payment whatever on their debts then due, and that the bankrupts had not at the time means to make such payments equal to all their creditors. Wherefore it is further considered by the court that such payments and assignments were made for the purpose of giving such particular creditors a preference or priority over the general creditors of the said bankrupts.

And it is further considered by the court that preferential payments or assignments made by bankrupts to portions of their creditors are not exempted from the prohibition of the bankrupt law, because obtained through the urgent demands of such creditors, or by means of threats to bring actions therefor.

It is further considered by the court that the assignment and payment of assets and funds by the bankrupts to the retiring partner previous to the 1st January, 1841, if made in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law is not a preference to one creditor over another within the meaning of the second proviso of the second section of the act.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed by the court, that so much of the said objections and amended objections to the discharge of both the said bankrupts, as allege payments or assignments by way of preference as aforesaid, be allowed to the extent above particularized and specified, and no further; and it is further adjudged and decreed that such objections and amended objections so allowed, are in law a bar to the discharge prayed for—and in respect to the bankrupt Jonathan Amory, it is further ordered that all the objections and amended objections to his discharge, imputing a wilful omission or refusal to conform to the requisites of the bankrupt act, and a fraudulent concealment of any of the effects or property of the said bankrupt, be disallowed and overruled.

And in respect to the bankrupt Henry H. Leeds, it appearing to the court that the various assignments and transfers of real estate and personal estate made by him to his sister Frances B. Koun, were all made prior to the passage of the bankrupt law, and it further appearing to the court upon the proofs that his said sister was not at the time of any of the said transfers and assignments a bona fide creditor of the said bankrupt, it is therefore considered by the court, that such transfers and assignments did not give or secure any preference or priority to one creditor over others of the bankrupt within the intent and meaning of the law, and is therefore no bar under the second section of the act to the discharge prayed for.

And it being considered by the court, that although such transfers or assignments under the proofs are void in law, and fraudulent as against creditors, yet frauds of that character can legally bar the discharge of the bankrupt, only when committed posterior to the enactment of the bankrupt law; and it being further considered by the court, that though upon the proofs it is made to appear that the bankrupt in and by such assignments and transfers placed property in the hands of his sister with intent fraudulently to cover the same and enjoy the benefit himself, and ultimately to resume the full ownership thereof, yet that transactions fraudulent in themselves, consummated before the passage of the bankrupt act, are not frauds within the meaning of the fourth section of the said act, which bar a discharge and certificate to a bankrupt.

And it not appearing to the court that the said bankrupt has, since the passage of the said act, made any fraudulent transfers of property, or concealed his estate or property, or committed any other act of fraud in respect thereto or the proceedings under the act, it is considered and adjudged by the court, that all the objections interposed to the discharge of the said Henry H. Leeds (other than the objections before specially allowed) be overruled and disallowed.

No costs allowed to either party.

[NOTE. The bankruptcy act of August 19, 1841, § 6, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.) conferred jurisdiction in bankruptcy on the United States district courts, and provided that the district judge "may adjourn any point or question arising in any case in bankruptcy, into the circuit court for the district, in his discretion, to be there heard and determined; and for this purpose the circuit court * * * shall * * * be deemed always open."

[Section 2 provides "that all future payments, securities, conveyances or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, indorser, surety, or other person, any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupts; and all other payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by such bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person or persons whatever, not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon this act; and the assignee under the bankruptcy shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover and receive the same as part of the assets of the bankruptcy; and the person making such unlawful preferences and payments shall receive no discharge under the provisions of this act."

[The second proviso of section 2 declares that, if it shall appear to the court in the case of the bankruptcy proceedings that a voluntary bankrupt has subsequent to January 1, 1841, or at any other time, in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, given any preference to one creditor over another, he shall not receive a discharge without the assent of a majority in interest of the creditors not so preferred.

[Section 4 provides "that every bankrupt who shall bona fide surrender all his property, and rights of property, with the exception before mentioned, for the benefit of his creditors, and shall fully comply with and obey all the orders and directions which may from time to time be passed by the proper court, and shall otherwise conform to all the other requisitions of this act, shall (unless a majority in number and value of his creditors who have proved their debts shall file their written dissent thereto) be entitled to a full discharge from all his debts. * * * And if any such bankrupt shall be guilty of any fraud, or willful concealment of his property or right of property, or shall have preferred any of his creditors contrary to the provisions of this act, or shall willfully omit or refuse to comply with any orders or directions of such court, or to conform to any other requisites of this act, * * * he shall not be entitled to any such discharge."]

BANKRUPTCY—ILLEGAL PREFERENCES AND TRANSFERS—ACT OF 1841—DISCHARGE.

[1. The receipt by certain creditors of an insolvent partnership of money and other assets of a composition and compromise of their claims, and in full discharge thereof, is a preference, within the prohibition of the bankruptcy act of August 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.) when it appears that other creditors got nothing, and that the settlement was made after January 1, 1841, and prior to and in contemplation of the passage of the act, with the general authority and concurrence of both partners, though no particular acts are proved against one of them. In re Amory and Leeds, Case No. 336b, affirmed.]

[See In re Amory and Leeds, 336b, note.]

[2. Similar settlements with certain creditors, to the exclusion of others, made after the act of 1841 went into effect, are preferences, within the prohibition of that act. In re Amory and Leeds, Case No. 336b, affirmed.]

[3. Preferences of certain creditors, to the exclusion of others, are not exempted from the prohibition of the bankrupt act of 1841 because obtained through the urgent demands of such creditors, or by means of threats to bring actions for their claims. In re Amory and Leeds, Case No. 336b, affirmed.]

[4. Such preferences are within the prohibition of the law, although the bankrupt originally offered to compromise with all his creditors at a fixed and equal ratio; especially when the compromises actually obtained were not in a uniform ratio.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Jonathan Amory and Henry H. Leeds. Certificates of discharge which had been taken out were vacated, (In re Amory and Leeds, Case No. 336a;) and discharges were thereafter refused, (Id., Case No. 336b.) The bankrupts appeal. Affirmed.]

In the matter of Jonathan Amory and Henry H. Leeds, bankrupts.

The court [below] denied the application for the discharges on the grounds—

1st. That the debtors as partners, after the 1st of January, 1841, had compromised with certain of their creditors and obtained releases therefrom by paying part of their respective debts in cash, or by transfer of assets of the house equivalent to cash, while numerous other creditors were left unpaid in whole or part, thereby giving a preference to a portion of the creditors of the house, in contravention of the bankrupt law.

2d. That after the passage of the bankrupt law, and after the same went into operation and effect, the bankrupts, in contemplation of bankruptcy, in like manner compounded and settled with certain of their creditors by payment in part, either in cash or by transfer of assets of the house, and obtained releases therefrom whilst other creditors were left unpaid, whereby preference was given to particular creditors, contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt law. 3d. The court below further held, that giving preference to particulars as aforesaid, by reason of the urgent and pressing demands of the creditors, or threats of bringing suit to recover their debts, did not exempt the act from the prohibition of the provisions of the law.

I have reviewed the case on appeal, after the benefit of a full argument by the learned counsel, on the part of the petitioners and creditors, and am entirely satisfied that the conclusion at which the court below arrived, both as to the facts and law, are well founded, and the discharges are properly denied. That preferences were given to certain creditors by the bankrupts in making payments by the way of compromise, after the 1st January, 1841, after the passage of the law, and even after the same went into operation, and when the house was hopelessly insolvent, is not denied. But it is supposed that the offer by the bankrupts to all of their creditors, as originally made, to put them on an equal footing in the general compromise, if they would come in, accept the 13½ per cent., and release their debts, takes the case out of the prohibition against the preferences in the law, as this offer was in the spirit of that law, and contemplated a distribution of the assets in conformity to, its provisions. But the answer is, the creditors were not bound to accept the compromise, and were at liberty to put themselves upon their legal rights, whatever they might be. The offer of compromise neither abridged these rights, as respects the bankrupt law, nor conferred upon the debtors the privilege of controverting any of its provisions. The refusal of any one creditor left both the creditor and debtor, as it respected their relative position and rights, the same as if no such compromise had been tendered. Any other conclusion would enable the bankrupt either to force his creditors into a compromise, or legalize any preference he might choose to make to favored assenting creditors, though in contravention of the express inhibition of the bankrupt act. Again, the payments made in point of fact, in effecting the compromise by the bankrupts, varied as to the amount, according as arrangements could be made with each particular creditor—some realizing more, some less, ranging, I believe, from 10 to 50 per cent. and some even at par; at all events, no uniform pro rata distribution of the assets was offered in compounding with the creditors. But apparently such per cent. advanced or secured by transfer of assets as was exacted by the creditor before he would consent to discharge his demand.

I am also satisfied from the evidence in the case, that these preferences were made in favor of creditors who would consent to release their demands after 1st of Jan. 1841, and before the passing of the bankrupt law, in contemplation of the passing of that law, a threat having been held out by the bankrupts of an intention to take the benefit of the same, if passed into a law, unless the creditors would close with their term of compromise offered. These preferences, therefore, thus given after the 1st of Jan. 1841, and also after the passage of said law, and its going into operation, were in contravention of the express provisions of the 2d and 4th sections, and are necessarily fatal to the application for the discharges.

The court therefore deny the application for discharge in both cases, with costs.

The AMOS C. BARSTOW.

[8 Ben. 401.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1876.

COLLISION IN NARRAGANSETT BAY—STEAMER AND SCHOONER — CHANGE OF COURSE BY SCHOONER TO AVOID ANOTHER SCHOONER.

1. A schooner was sunk by a collision with a propeller in Narragansett bay. The schooner was beating up the bay, and tacked from the west shore and stood across on her port tack. While on this tack she saw, as she alleged, that she was likely to come in collision with another schooner, which was holding her starboard tack, if both vessels kept their courses, whereupon she again tacked and came on the starboard tack, and shortly afterwards was struck by the propeller's stem, on her starboard side, near amidships. On behalf of the propeller it was alleged, that, as she was coming down the bay, she saw the schooner coming from the west shore and ported her helm to go under the schooner's stern, and had swung off to starboard, when the schooner suddenly, and without notice or reason, came about on her starboard tack, when so near the propeller that she could not be avoided: Held, That the tacking of the schooner, on the evidence, was so short a time before the collision as not to leave room for the propeller, which had taken measures, by porting, to go under the schooner's stern, as she was going east, to change her course so as to get under the stern of the schooner as she was going west;

2. That though such change of course by the schooner might not have been a fault, as respected the other schooner, which she was trying to avoid, that did not show that she was not in fault as respected the propeller;

3. That, the steamer was not in fault in not slowing before the schooner changed her course; that she took proper measures in time to avoid the schooner and stopped and backed as soon as there was any apparent necessity for it; and that she was not chargeable with the consequences of the collision.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company as owners of the schooner Wind, against the propeller Amos C. Barstow, to recover for the damages sustained by the libellants, by means of a collision which took place about 2 o'clock A. M. on the 17th of April, 1874, between the schooner and the propeller, in the western channel of Narragansett bay, between Conanicut island and the main land, not far above the south end of the island. The propeller was going down the bay and the schooner was beating up against the wind. Although the sky was obscured by clouds, and the stars were not visible, it was not thick or foggy, and there was no difficulty in seeing the lights of vessels. Both the propeller and the schooner had their proper lights set and burning. While the propeller was up the bay from the schooner, and going down, the schooner, from being on her starboard tack, heading to the western shore, came about under the western shore to her port tack and stood over towards the eastward. The wind was about north-east and the schooner's course was about east-south-east. The channel there is from a mile and a quarter to a mile and a half wide.

The libel alleges, that, when the schooner had just filled away on such port tack, she saw the propeller's lights, bow and stern and green lights, to the northward and eastward, up the channel; that, after the schooner had kept on such port tack for a short distance, she saw that she was likely to collide with another schooner which was on the starboard tack, if both kept their courses; that she then tacked and came on to the starboard tack; that, when she commenced to make such last tack, the propeller was more than a quarter of a mile to the eastward and northward of the schooner, and at a long distance from her course; that the propeller had not changed her course when the schooner came about, but, just as the schooner was filling away on such starboard tack, it was discovered that the steamer had ported and was rapidly closing in on the schooner and her course; that the propeller came on, still swinging at a rapid rate, until very close to the schooner, when her machinery stopped working but her headway was still rapid; and that, when it was seen that the propeller was evidently coming into the schooner, and in order, if possible, to make the blow a glancing one, the wheel of the schooner was kept hard-a-starboard, and the swing was kept up until she was struck by the propeller heavily, head on, at about amidships, cutting into her and causing her to sink. The libel alleges, as faults on the part of the propeller, causing the collision, that she did not have a proper look-out; that she did not keep on her course instead of porting, or, if any change was necessary, did not starboard instead of porting; that she did not starboard after she had ported, when she found that the schooner was standing in shore; that she did not take the proper measures in time to avoid the schooner; and that she did not stop and back in time to avoid the schooner.

The answer alleges, that, after the propeller, in going down the western channel, had passed Dutch island, she discovered a number of schooners and small sailing vessels, most of them on the eastwardly side of the channel, on their course up the bay, on the starboard tack, showing green lights, and also discovered the libellants' schooner on her starboard tack, on the westerly side of the channel, showing a green light, and, soon thereafter, nearing the west side, changing to the port tack, shutting in the green light and showing a red light; that the course of the propeller was then south by west; that she was not on the easterly side, but near the middle of the channel, and was making her way to the leeward of the said schooners and small sailing vessels, which were on the starboard tack, having ample room and time to pass ahead of them; that the movements of the libellants' schooner were closely watched by those on board of the propeller, and, observing her progress from the westerly side on her port tack last mentioned, it was determined to keep to the starboard, so as to pass under her stern; that, accordingly, as the schooner was nearing the centre of the channel, on her port tack last mentioned, the wheel of the propeller was put hard to port, and her course changed from south by west to west-south-west; that, if the schooner had stood her tack out, or kept on her course, as she was bound to do, the propeller would have passed well under the stern of the schooner and no danger of collision would have been incurred; that, thereafter, and when the schooner, on her port tack, had reached a point about 400 or 500 feet ahead of the propeller, and one or two points off the port bow of the propeller, she suddenly, without any apparent reason, and without giving any signal, having ample room to proceed on her course, came about with great rapidity, changing her course and her tack, shutting in her red light, and showing her green light to the propeller; that, immediately, seeing this unexpected change of the course of the schooner, orders were promptly given on board of the propeller, and promptly executed, to slow, stop and back her; and that the collision was caused wholly by the negligence and unseamanlike conduct of those on board of the schooner, in not keeping on her course and standing out her port tack, and, if there was any fear of collision with the other schooner, in not giving way instead of going about, in not porting her helm, after she had made her last tack, instead of putting her helm hard to starboard, and in not showing a lighted torch or giving any signal, by lights or otherwise, of her intention to change her tack, in time to enable those on board of the propeller to understand her proposed movements.

The libel admits that the schooner changed her course in the presence of the propeller, and went from her port tack to her starboard tack, after she had seen the lights of the propeller, and knew that that vessel was a steamer coming down the channel. But the libel alleges, that, when the schooner commenced to make such starboard tack, the propeller was a long distance from the course of the schooner, and had not yet ported to go under the stern of the schooner. This allegation is not borne out by the evidence. It is clearly established, that the red light of the schooner was seen from the propeller when the schooner was well over to the western shore, and that the propeller then properly discharged her duty of taking measures to avoid the schooner, by porting her helm, so as to pass under the stern of the schooner. She did this some time before the schooner left her port tack. She would have passed safely under the stern of the schooner, if the schooner had not suddenly changed her course, and thrust herself on the course of the propeller. It is impossible to see any fault in the propeller in any of the particulars alleged in the libel. Her lookout was adequate, because those in her pilot house saw the schooner's red light in ample season, and watched it, and took timely measures to avoid the schooner. It was proper for the propeller to port and go under the schooner's stern. It would have been imprudent for her to attempt to cross the bows of the schooner. She was on a swing to starboard, by porting, when she discovered that the schooner had starboarded; and, if it were an error of judgment for the propeller not then to starboard, which is not established, such error, in an exigency caused by the sudden movement of the schooner, cannot be imputed as a fault. The propeller did take proper measures in time to avoid the schooner, and she stopped and backed as soon as there was any apparent necessity for her doing so. This disposes of all the allegations of fault, contained in the libel. It was not incumbent on the propeller to diminish her usual speed until she saw that the schooner had changed her course.

The schooner may not have been in fault as against the other schooner, which it is alleged she was attempting to avoid; but that does not show she was not in fault as against the propeller, although engaged in discharging a duty she was bound to discharge towards such other schooner. She gave the propeller no signal, by a lighted torch or otherwise, when she was about to change her course suddenly, before she had run out her tack; and, even if, at the last moment, she could not avoid the other schooner by porting, but was obliged to starboard, it is entirely clear that she could equally have avoided the other schooner, if she had ported when further away from such other schooner. When on her previous starboard tack she knew that such other schooner was following her on that tack, and that it would be her duty, on the port tack, to avoid such other schooner. The libel is dismissed, with costs.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company, owners of the ship Aldanah, against the ferry boat John Adams, for damages caused by collision. Decree for libellants.]

The libel was filed in the district court on the 12th of February, 1859, but on the 17th of April, 1860, it was transferred to this court, pursuant to the act of the 3d of March, 1821, because the district judge was so concerned in interest as to render it improper for him, in his opinion, to sit in the trial of the cause. The facts were these: On the 19th of January, 1859, the ship Aldanah arrived at Boston from New Orleans, with a cargo of cotton, and on the 20th was moored in the harbor of Boston, at a place called Battery wharf. The steamer John Adams, in attempting to pass across the harbor from the eastern side to a slip or dock southerly of the place where the ship lay, ran into the stern of the ship, striking her stern-post, opening the wood ends of the vessel, and caused her to leak, and thereby injured a part of the cotton, the property of libellants. The John Adams was a ferry-boat and was at the time on her usual trip across the harbor. The respondent set up as a defence that the collision was the result of inevitable accident, and alleged that the steamer, in attempting to cross the harbor, was carried against the ship by the tide, in a dense fog, which shut down on the water when the steamer was about half-way across the harbor. They also alleged that, when the fog became too dense to proceed with safety, orders were given to slow, and finally to stop; that while thus stopping the steamer was mid-channel and exposed to a strong flood-tide which carried her from her course. After waiting for a time, and no change in the condition of the atmosphere taking place, the whistle was sounded, and, as a measure of safety to the steamer and other vessels, she was moved slowly for a brief period, then the wheels were reversed, and when in this condition the collision occurred. The respondents averred that such was the condition of the weather that no precaution on their part could have prevented a collision, even if the steamer had been moving by the tide alone. There was considerable testimony introduced tending to show that the ship's stern-post was not properly fastened, and that if it had been as strong as usual the ship would not have sprung aleak on account of the blow.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Inevitable accident is the main ground of defence assumed by the respondents. They do not controvert the fact that the collision occurred at the time and place and substantially in the manner as alleged in the libel. It took place between eight and nine o'clock in the morning of the 20th of January, 1859, while the ship was lying at the wharf. She had arrived the day previous from New Orleans, and the evidence is full to the point that she was properly moored, under the direction of the wharfinger, at a wharf where vessels of that description and all classes of vessels were accustomed to be moored. According to the testimony of the wharfinger, she was moored in the usual method at the end of what is called the middle pier of the wharf, with head-fasts and stern-fasts and with good ranging-fasts each way, and the mate testifies that she had a hawser across the dock. Her stem, as she lay, headed northerly, and her stern was towards the ferry slip. Two barks were moored at the pier next south of the ship and between her and the slip where the steamer was accustomed to land. One was outside of the other, and the jib-boom of the outer bark was partly over the stern of the ship, extending inside of the centre. Her boat was suspended by tackles on a level with the jib-boom, and the force of the collision was such that it was stove and broken in two pieces, so that one half was left hanging from one tackle, and the other half from the other. As described by the wharfinger, the pier at which the ship was moored projects some fifteen or twenty feet beyond where the two barks lay. Its width is about one hundred and thirty feet, and it is about the same distance from the southerly corner of the southerly pier to the ferry slip. When the collision occurred the ship was lying in a line with the cap-sill of the wharf, and extended some fifteen or twenty feet beyond the corner of the pier to which she was fastened. She registered ten hundred and forty-seven tons, and was one hundred and seventy-three feet long. Ships of all sizes have been moored at that wharf for a period of fifteen or twenty years, without any accident having occurred, and the wharfinger says he considers it one of the safest berths in the harbor. At the time the collision occurred the mate of the ship was standing on her port rail, and the blow was so severe that he was knocked off the rail by the concussion. Both the master and the mate lived on board, but the former was temporarily absent at the time of the disaster. He returned, however, before the steamer left the stream, and immediately examined the ship to ascertain what damage had been done. Her bulwarks on the starboard side, about six feet from the stern, were stove for the distance of eight feet, exhibiting the appearance as if the timbers striking the vessel had hit her endwise. Pieces of wood from the steamer were left sticking in the broken parts of the bulwarks of the ship. The bulwarks were constructed of white-pine, and were ceiled inside with three-inch hard-pine planks. One of the hard-pine planks was broken, and so also was one of the wheel-ropes. It was a two and a quarter inch rope not lashed at all, and was broken near the middle. Damage was also done to the rudder, which was made of oak. Abreast the twenty-two foot mark it had a large scar on the starboard corner of the after part, an inch deep, and one or more of the braces also were started. It was not far from eight o'clock in the morning when the steamer started from her slip on the eastern side. As alleged in the answer she was a ferry-boat, and had on board two teams and some fifty passengers to be transported across the harbor to the main part of the city. Prior to her starting there was considerable fog on the western side of the stream, but, as it did not rest on the water, by six or eight feet, the hulls of vessels and other objects on the opposite side were plainly visible. Under these circumstances, the master of the steamer thought it prudent to make the trip without consulting the superintendent. He accordingly gave the order to start, and when the steamer had proceeded about one quarter of the way across, the fog shut down, first on the western and then on the eastern side, and became so very dense, as the master says, that he lost the sight of both shores. Orders were then given to slow, and the steamer proceeded as slow, according to the testimony of the engineer, as she could be worked under steam and have her wheels pass their centres. When about half-way across, the master says he gave the signal to stop, and then to reverse the wheels, and the orders were obeyed so as to stop the boat. That course was adopted in the hope that there would be a change in the weather, and with a view to ascertain the true position of the steamer. For that purpose the steamer remained stationary some three or four minutes, but, finding that the weather was not improving, the master directed her to be started again under a slow bell; but after the engine had made some three or four revolutions, the signal was again given by the master to stop. He then stepped two or three feet to the forward part of the pilot-house to ascertain whether he could see any object that would enable him to determine where he was, but could not; and accordingly gave the signal to reverse. At that moment the passengers began to move from the forward to the after part of the boat, and before there was time for the engine to make one revolution under his last order the collision occurred. During all this time the master was in the pilot-house at an elevation of twenty-eight feet above the water-line of the vessel, and he admits that he could not see the water at all, and that he could only see the "glimmer" of men standing on the forward part of the steamer. Her whole company consisted of five men, to wit, the master, one engineer, one fireman, and two deck hands. One of the deck hands was stationed forward, but the other was aft, and the master says the former was at his post and was the lookout for the steamer. But it does not appear that the master made any inquiries of him during the passage, or that the lookout made any communication to the master or any other person in charge of the vessel.

Many of the passengers, as is usual in such cases, were standing on the forward part of the deck, and it is insisted by the respondents that they were looking out, and that their testimony shows that every reasonable precaution was taken to avoid a collision. Much conflict exists in the testimony, especially as to the distance that objects could be seen during the last half of the passage, and as to the speed of the steamer at the time of the disaster. Several witnesses examined by the respondents express the opinion that the ship could not be seen at the distance of more than ten or twelve feet as the steamer approached the western shore. On the other hand, about an equal number examined by the libellants testify that she could be seen at the distance of from one to two hundred feet. John F. Randall, the mate of the outer bark, says he saw the steamer come in collision with the ship while he was walking fore and aft on the quarter-deck of the bark, and he says when he first saw her she was from one hundred to one hundred and twenty feet from the place where he was standing. She was seen also as she approached by one of the stevedores on board the ship. At first he thought she was making her right course for the slip, which proved to be a mistake. He is unable to state the distance, but says she seemed to be far enough off to make her right course to the dock. When the master of the ship returned, the steamer was still in the stream, and he says he saw her when she was two hundred feet distant from the place of collision. His statement is substantially confirmed by the mate, who says he could see her at a distance of a hundred and fifty feet; and the carpenter of the ship testifies that the fog was not so dense at any time but that he could see the length of the ship, and he affirms that he saw the steamer at the time she was backing out when she was a hundred feet distant, and then turned away and went aft. One witness of experience also, who was on board the steamer, confirms these statements. He says he saw the ship as they approached when she was one hundred and forty feet distant, and that he hailed the steersman of the boat as soon as he saw her. To the same effect also is the testimony of the principal stevedore who was on board the ship engaged in discharging cargo. He says he could see as far as fifty yards, though he admits it was foggy. Opposed to these statements is the testimony of the master of the steamer, the deck-hand who was forward, and some five or six of the passengers, who express the opinion that objects could not be seen at a greater distance than from ten to twenty feet. One theory may be suggested which perhaps may reconcile the testimony of the witnesses. Those examined by the respondents did not see the ship until they were close to her, and consequently they are of the opinion that she could not have been seen at any greater distance. On the other hand, the witnesses for the libellants saw her at the respective distances mentioned in their testimony, and therefore they know that she could be seen at that distance; or, in other words, one class of the witnesses speak from knowledge, while the other class but give their opinions. At all events, I am of the opinion, after a careful review of the evidence, that the density of the fog was not such that the collision might not have been prevented if the lookout of the steamer had performed his duty.

Very little reliance can be placed upon a crowd of passengers as a substitute for a competent lookout in such an emergency. They are generally eager to reach the opposite shore, and oftentimes by their unreasonable complaints induce those in charge of the vessel to adopt rash and dangerous experiments. Passengers, in point of fact, cannot be regarded as lookouts in any sense known to the maritime law, certainly not unless they are specially designated by the master for that purpose. Lookouts are usually and properly selected from the persons belonging to the vessel, and they must be persons of suitable experience, and continue constantly subject to the command of the master. Every steamboat travelling in the thoroughfares of commerce ought to have a trustworthy and constant lookout besides the wheelsman, for the reason that it is impossible for him to steer the vessel and keep the proper watch, especially when his position is so elevated that either fog or mist may prevent him from seeing the water. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 463. Steamers thus navigating must have constant and vigilant lookouts stationed in proper places on the vessel, and charged with the duty for which lookouts are required, and they must be actually employed in the performance of the duty to which they are assigned. Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 570. According to his own statement, the lookout in this case did not see the ship until the steamer was within five or six feet of her.

He says he was standing on the bow of the boat some ten feet from the edge, and seven or eight feet inside of the chain, and he affirms that he was carefully attending to his duty. But the statement is incredible, if he was competent for the place. Whether his failure to perform the duty required of a lookout arose from his incompetency or from inattention is wholly immaterial in the present inquiry, as in either event the owners of the steamer are responsible for the consequences. Looking at the whole evidence, there is much reason also to conclude that the master was less cautious than he ought to have been in the emergency in which he was placed. From his own testimony it is quite obvious that he had lost the bearings of the steamer on the western side, and was in great uncertainty as to his real position. Assume that what he states is true, that he could not discern objects on the deck, or see the water at all, and then it follows that he had no means of knowing whether the lookout was attending to his duty or whether he was he was at his post. After he had stopped his boat in the first instance, he spoke to the engineer, and remarked that he could not see anything, and was going ahead under a slow bell. His second order to stop was too late, and the order to back on that occasion was not given till the moment when the passengers began to run from the bow of the boat. Some of them had then seen the ship, and one of them had hailed the steersman of the steamer. All of these occurrences must have taken place in the presence and hearing of the lookout, if he was at his post, and yet there was no hail from him, and he now affirms that he did not see the ship until the steamer was "just about striking her." Taking his own account of the transaction, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that he was incompetent for the place or inattentive to his duty. Having come to this conclusion, one or two remarks as to the speed of the steamer will be sufficient. On this point also there is much conflict in the testimony. Several witnesses called by the respondents testify that she was not going faster than at the rate of a mile an hour, and the engineer affirms that she was moving as slow as she could under steam. But several very competent witnesses examined by the libellants express the opinion that her speed was at the rate of four knots per hour, and the circumstances attending the disaster go very far to confirm their statements. She first hit the ship, staving her bulwarks, scarring the rudder, and breaking one of the wheel-ropes, and then passed to the bark, lying partly inside of the ship, and stove her boat, cutting it in two pieces. Had her speed been reduced to the rate of a mile an hour, it is scarcely possible that such consequences would have flowed from the collision.

Without entering more into detail, I am of the opinion that the steamer cannot be excused upon the ground of inevitable accident, and the evidence falls so far short of establishing that defence, that it is hardly necessary to enter into any extended consideration of the law upon that subject. Inevitable accident, in the absolute and strict sense of the term, says Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Europa, 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 550, very seldom takes place. According to his view, the word "inevitable" must be considered as a relative term, and must be construed, not absolutely, but reasonably, with regard to the circumstances of each particular case. In a case where there was no evidence to establish a prima facie presumption of negligence or want of seamanship, and the party proceeded against had alleged inevitable accident, he held that the burden was not on the respondent to prove it, but that the party seeking indemnification must prove that the other party was to blame. The Bolina, 3 Notes of Cas. 208. That question, however, came up again in the case of The Lochlibo, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 318, before the same learned judge. On this last occasion, after defining the term "inevitable accident" as meaning a collision which occurs when both parties have endeavored by every means in their power, with due care and caution, and a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the accident, he held it to be clear that prima facie the onus probandi was on the owners of the moving vessel, and that they were bound to establish by credible evidence that their vessel was not to blame at all, or that the blame rested solely with the pilot who was on board, in which case the owners would be exonerated from all responsibility. It was held by the supreme court, in the case of New York & V. S. S. Co. v. Calderwood, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 246, that neither rain, nor the darkness of the night, nor the absence of a light from a barge or sailing-vessel, nor the fact that the steamer was well manned and furnished and conducted with caution, will excuse the steamer for coming in collision with the barge or sailing-vessel where the barge or sailing-vessel is at anchor, or sailing in a thoroughfare out of the usual track of the steamer. Mr. Parsons lays down the rule, that if a ship at anchor and one in motion come into collision, the presumption is that it is the fault of the ship in motion, unless the anchored vessel was where she should not have been. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 201. If a vessel anchor in an improper place, she must take the consequences that fairly result from her own improper act. Strout v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 89; The Scioto, [Case No. 12,508.] But whether she be in a proper place or not, and whether properly or improperly anchored, the other vessel must avoid her if it be reasonably practicable and consistent with her own safety. Knowlton v. Sanford, 32 Me. 148; The Batavier, 40 Eng. Law & Eq. 25. All the evidence in this case shows that the ship was moored in a proper place, and that she was as helpless in her condition at the time of the accident as the wharf to which she was fastened. Beyond question it is incumbent upon the libellants to show that their vessel was in a proper place, and that the collision occurred; but after those facts are shown, I hold that the burden of proof is upon the respondents, either to show that their vessel was without fault, or that the disaster was the result of fault on the part of the complaining party. Inevitable accident, under such circumstances, cannot be presumed, especially when the occurrence was in the daytime, but must be clearly proved by the party setting up that defence, unless the fact appears from the evidence introduced by the libellants to make out their case. Ferry-boats in crossing the harbor of a commercial port, either in a dense fog in the daytime or in the darkness of the night, ought to proceed with great circumspection and caution; and when those in charge of them have lost the bearings of the vessel, and do not know that the way is clear, they should stop, and if necessary come to anchor, and if, contrary to these suggestions, they rashly advance, the owners must stand the consequences; as in that state of the case the mere excuse that they could not see or did not know where they were will afford no justification for a collision. Three or four knots an hour was too fast under the circumstances of this case, especially if it be assumed that the fog was so dense that a large ship moored at the wharf could not be seen at the distance of more than ten or twenty feet. Vessels in motion for the purpose of crossing a narrow channel dividing a commercial port are under the strongest obligations to keep out of the way of those properly moored at the wharves; and if in any given case they cannot accomplish that duty in any other way than by returning temporarily to the position from which they started, and that expedient is safe and reasonably practicable, they are bound so to do in order to prevent a collision. Dr. Lushington said, in the case of The Juliet Erskine, 6 Notes of Cas. 633, that he was not competent to say what was a proper quantity of sail, in the case before him, or what was not; but he was competent to form the opinion that if, on a dark night, the vessel was proceeding at such a rate that those on her deck had not sufficient command over her so as to avoid all reasonable chance of accident, then that was too expeditious a rate, because it is the duty of those who navigate the commercial marine of the country to take care that they do not, for the sake of expedition, injure the property of other people. That principle was again affirmed in the case of The Batavier, 40 Eng. Law & Eq. 25. Sir John Patteson said in that case that at whatever rate the steamer was going, if going at such a rate as made it dangerous to any craft which she ought to have seen and might have seen, she had no right to go at that rate. At all events, she was bound to stop if it was necessary to do so, in order to prevent damage being done to the craft in the river. No doubt the passengers in this case were impatient at the delay, but it is a mistake to suppose that the steamer was compelled to advance at the hazard of a collision. She had stopped once for three or four minutes, and might have stopped again without difficulty, or if it had been absolutely necessary she might have returned to the slip on the eastern side.

It is insisted by the respondents, in the second place, that the ship under the circumstances should have kept a watch, and that those in charge of her were in fault in not giving a signal to warn the steamer of her danger as she approached where the ship lay. No authority is cited in support of the proposition, and it is believed that none can be found where a vessel properly moored at a wharf, out of the usual track of a colliding steamer, has been held to be in fault because she failed to give a signal in the daytime to warn off the steamer as she approached. Some attempt was made to prove that the usage of the port required it, but every witness who was examined upon the subject denied all knowledge of any such usage. Owners frequently find it necessary to moor their vessels at the wharf for a considerable time when the vessel is waiting for employment, or when she is the subject of legal controversy, and to require the owners to keep a watch when the vessel is thus unemployed would be to expose them to an unnecessary and useless expense. Those in charge of the ship in this case knew that she was entirely out of the usual track of the steamer, and had no more reason to expect that the steamer would collide with their vessel until it was too late to give any signal, than the proprietors of the wharf had that the steamer would run against the pier to which the ship was fastened. She had her usual highway before her free and unobstructed, and it was her duty to keep in it, or at least to keep out of the way of vessels properly moored at the wharf; and clearly she had no right to complain that a ship lying entirely out of her pathway did not keep a watch to admonish those in charge of her to perform their obligations. Unnecessary burdens or useless restrictions are not imposed by the rules of the maritime law. Such rules are founded in reason, and only require parties so to conduct themselves in the enjoyment of their own rights as not to injure the rights of other persons. Absence of a light from a barge or sailing-vessel in the night-time will not in general excuse a steamer from coming in collision with such barge or sailing-vessel, if the latter is at anchor out of the usual track of the steam-vessel; and if not, it is difficult to see any reason why a vessel properly moored at a wharf where she does not in any respect encumber the pathway of commerce, or in any manner impede, obstruct, or hinder the passage of other vessels, should be required in the daytime to keep a watch. Such a requirement as the one involved in the proposition would impose an unnecessary burden on the owners of vessels, and in the absence of any proof of usage in the port, or of any decided case to support the proposition, it must be overruled.

In the third place, it is insisted by the respondents that the master of the ship was guilty of gross negligence in not sounding her pumps immediately after the collision, and in not discovering the leak at an earlier moment. It is admitted by the libellants that the leak was not discovered until the next morning after the collision, and they do not controvert the fact that the vessel at that time had made ten feet of water, or that she was then drawing three feet more than she drew the day previous. But they deny that there was any negligence on the part of those in charge of the ship in not making the discovery earlier. She was a tight ship, and had always been so since she was built. According to the testimony of the mate, the pumps suck at fifteen or sixteen inches, and they had been sounded about a half an hour before the collision, when she had eleven inches of water. They were also sounded the day previous, when she had but nine inches of water; and two days before the collision she had but seven inches of water, and those in charge of her testify that, on the voyage from which she had just returned, she had made less water than is usual even for well-built ships. Most of the witnesses agree that it is not usual to sound the pumps more than once in twenty-four hours, while the ship is lying at the wharf discharging cargo, and some of them say that they seldom think of sounding them at all under such circumstances. Examination of the vessel was made by the master immediately after his return, and before the steamer reached her slip. All the injuries that could be discovered indicated that the entire damage was above water. They were such as have already been described, but the pitch in her wood-end seams above water was not cracked. In the course of the forenoon she was also examined by two experienced ship-carpenters, who were sent by the respondents for the purpose of repairing the damage done by the collision. No directions were given by them to have the pumps tried, and one of them assigns as the reason that he never thought of the thing, as he should not have supposed it possible that such a blow would have caused the vessel to leak. Witnesses called by the respondents express the opinion that the pumps should have been tried immediately, but wisdom after the fact is entitled to much less respect than that which precedes the necessity for its exercise. All can now see that it would have been wise to have tried the pumps; but inasmuch as all the injuries were apparently above water, and the pumps had just been sounded, it is not probable that many, if any, ship-masters would have thought of it at the time.

On the morning after the collision, while the master was standing on the wharf, a pilot inquired of him whether the ship was not deeper in the water than she was when she arrived. At first he thought not, and well-nigh convinced the pilot that he was in error; but upon looking at the water-mark on the rudder, he found that she was three feet deeper in the water than she was on the morning previous. Whereupon he gave orders to sound the pumps, and ascertained for the first time that she had made ten feet of water. Four pumps were employed during the day, and two were kept going until eleven o'clock at night, and men were hired to watch and tend the pumps until the cargo was discharged. Five days after the collision the leak was discovered by the carpenter. It proved to be an opening in the wood-ends of the vessel, between the thirteen and fourteen foot mark, and was occasioned by the stern-post being started. Repeated efforts were made in the mean time to discover the leak, but without success. In view of all the circumstances, I am of the opinion that the charge of negligence is not sustained.

Lastly, it is insisted by the respondents in substance and effect that the blow given by the collision would not have started the stern-post of the vessel, and opened the seams of her wood-ends so as to have caused her to leak, if she had been well built and her stern-post had been properly secured and fastened, and sufficiently calked and pitched below low-water mark. Two questions are presented by the proposition,—one of fact and the other of law. It assumes as matter of fact that the ship was not well built, and that her stern-post was not properly secured and fastened. Whether the theory assumed be true or not is a question of fact to be determined from the evidence. She had performed her voyage without any difficulty, and to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned, and was then lying moored at the wharf with a full cargo on board of undamaged merchandise, and to all appearance was in a sound and sea-worthy condition. Every presumption, therefore, on this branch of the case, is in favor of the libellants, and clearly it is incumbent on the respondents to prove the theory of fact on which the proposition rests. Much testimony was introduced on this point by both sides, and it is no more than just to say that it is very conflicting. Looking at the whole evidence, however, in connection with the circumstances of the case, it is the better opinion that the theory assumed by the respondents is not well founded. But suppose it to be admitted that the ship was not in sufficient repair to render her sea-worthy for a new voyage, still there is not a word of proof in the case to show that she was not sufficiently staunch and strong to fulfil all the unfinished purposes connected with the voyage from which she had just returned. On the contrary, the evidence is full to the point that she did not leak, and was in all respects sufficiently sea-worthy to have enabled those in charge of her to have discharged her cargo without damage, and to have delivered the cotton pursuant to the contract of affreightment. For the argument's sake, therefore, let it be conceded that her condition was such as is here described; that is, that she was not sufficiently staunch or was too much out of repair for a new voyage, but that she was amply sufficient to have enabled her master to have discharged the cargo without damage and to have performed his contract. That view of the facts is certainly as favorable to the respondents, to say the least of it, as the evidence will sustain. Assuming the facts to be as already found, I am of the opinion that the defence set up by the respondents cannot be sustained and that they are just as clearly liable on that state of the case to the extent of the damage done as they would have been if the ship had been staunch, in good repair, and in all respects sea-worthy for a new voyage. They cannot defend themselves in this case against the wrong done by the collision, upon the ground that the blow would have been harmless if the vessel had been stronger, provided she was sufficient to enable her officers to discharge the cargo without damage, any more than a person accused of wilful homicide could successfully set up that the deceased would have recovered if he had not been in feeble health at the time the blow was inflicted. Extreme cases may be imagined, as if the injured vessel was actually sinking at the time of the collision, or was on fire and enveloped in flames, when possibly a different rule would apply; but if reasonably considered, the vessel was sufficient to accomplish the remaining purposes of the voyage, and was not certainly in a condition of inevitable destruction from natural causes, then it is clear that such a defence cannot prevail, and that is all that it is necessary to decide in this case. Whether such a defence could be admitted under any or different circumstances is not a question at the present time. It is no defence to a suit for damages caused by a collision, says Parsons, that no loss would have been sustained if the injured vessel had been stronger; and it was held by the supreme court of Kentucky that the fact that the plaintiff's boat was a weak one, afforded no protection to the defendant, if the collision happened through his carelessness. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 211; Inman v. Funk, 7 B. Mon. 538. Upon the whole case, I am of the opinion, that the libellants are entitled to recover, and there must be a decree accordingly. Should any dispute arise in determining the amount of the damage, the cause must be referred to a commissioner to make the estimate.

MARITIME LIENS—STEVEDORE'S LIEN—PERSONAL OBLIGATIONS OF OWNER.

1. A stevedore has no lien upon a vessel for his services in discharging her in port, and cannot sue in rem in admiralty for his compensation.

2. Where a debt, which might otherwise have been a lien on a vessel, is contracted under an explicit agreement with the master individually, that affords evidence that the creditor has agreed to look only to the personal responsibility of the master, or, at most, of the owner, and that the vessel is exonerated from any lien.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem by a stevedore for services performed in discharging a vessel in port. The services were rendered upon an express agreement with the master for a stipulated sum.

J. D. De Lacey, for libellant.

Edwin Burr and Erastus C. Benedict, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. This action is resisted, in the first place, on the ground that the libellant has no lien upon the vessel, because his services as a stevedore were not, in their nature, maritime, and were really performed on land. It is to be remarked that the services consisted of nothing done to the vessel in her repairing or refitment, but of labor expended, partly on board and partly on shore, in discharging her cargo. This description of service has never yet been recognized as of a privileged order. It does not fall within the extensive list of debts privileged by the civil law; nor does it seem to be comprehended within the principle upon which a lien or privilege is allowed.

A vessel is made chargeable with certain services, because they are necessary for her preservation or useful employment. Under this head is embraced the compensation of material men and others, for labor done upon the vessel, or in her navigation, or in promoting the health or comfort of the ship's company on a voyage. The language of the civil law has direct reference to this description of service; and the French law, which gives a broader application to the privilege than has ever been yielded in England, does not extend it beyond those engaged in labors connected with the equipment or refitment of the vessel, either in respect to the vessel herself, or her necessary stores, her crew, &c., or in services performed on her during her voyage. The American law has never gone beyond the doctrines recognized in the continental courts of Europe; and it seems to me that it would be a departure from the well-understood terms of the maritime law in this respect, and from the principle which pervades its enactments, to give a lien upon the vessel to a claim of the character of the one now under consideration. It in no respect merits such privilege, any more than do the services of any other class of laborers in any work connected with the business of the ship. It does not seem to differ from a transportation of the cargo from one place to another on the land; and the cartman who hauls off the lading and facilitates the discharge of the vessel, aids her in the same manner as the laborer who raises the cargo from her hold.

Independently of this objection to the maintenance of the present demand here, because of its character, there are other reasons why it cannot be enforced as a lien on the vessel. The testimony shows that it accrued under an explicit agreement with the master; and the whole nature of the contract shows that the personal responsibility of the master, or, at most, of the owner, was alone looked to. This would be sufficient of itself to exonerate the vessel, in a case where she might be chargeable in the absence of any personal credit. The mere circumstance that the price was fixed for which the services were to be rendered, will not free the vessel from a lien which would otherwise exist, because there is in this nothing inconsistent with the continuance of the lien, and nothing from which a waiver of it can be implied. But, when there is a clear unreserved agreement with the master individually, specifying the terms and mode of payment, the inference will be exceedingly forcible, that the personal responsibility alone was contemplated, and the creditor will be compelled to rely upon that. Hutton v. Bragg, 7 Taunt. 14; Ex parte Lewis, [Case No. 8,310;] Murray v. Lazarus, [Id. 9,962.] Upon both grounds, my judgment is against this action. Libel dismissed, with costs.

1. The district courts of the United States are permanent prize tribunals, and take cognizance of questions of prize by virtue of their general jurisdiction.

2. Prize courts are subject to the instructions of their own sovereign. In the absence of such instructions, their jurisdiction and rules of decision are to be ascertained by reference to the known powers of such tribunals, and the principles by which they are governed under the public law and the practice of nations.

3. The United States may be engaged in war, and have all the rights of a belligerent, without any declaration by congress. In such a war, it would be the duty of the president to exert all his powers as commander-in-chief of the army and navy to capture or destroy the enemy. And if, under his instructions, an enemy's ship should be taken and sent in for adjudication, the prize court must proceed to decide the question of prize upon the principles of public law.

4. The hostilities which were commenced, and have been prosecuted, by the rebel confederates against the United States, constitute war in the legal and constitutional sense of that term.

[See note at end of case.]

5. In this war, the rebels are, at the same time, belligerents and traitors, and subject to the liabilities of both. The United States sustains the double character of a belligerent and sovereign, and has the rights of both. The temporary non-user of any such rights is not a renunciation of them, but they may be called into practical exercise at pleasure. The United States has full belligerent rights, which are in no degree impaired by the fact that their enemies owe allegiance, and have added the guilt of treason to that of unjust war.

[Cited in Miller v. U. S., 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 307.]

6. If a hostile power, either from without or within our territory, shall make formidable war upon the United States, the president is bound to use the army and navy to carry on the war effectively against such an enemy. He may do so in the manner, and by the measures, usual in modern civilized warfare. One of the most familiar of these is the capture of an enemy's property, public and private, on the ocean.

7. The statute of 1807, c. 39, authorizes the president to employ the army and navy to suppress an insurrection. The manner in which they are to be used is left to the discretion of the president, guided by the usages and principles of civilized war. These, undoubtedly, authorize the capture of enemy's property at sea.

[See note at end of case.]

8. What is enemy's property is a judicial question. Residence of the owner in the enemy's country may be of such a character as to stamp property conclusively as hostile. The court may be compelled to decide what shall be deemed enemy's country.

[Cited in Keppel's Adm'rs v. Petersburg R. Co., Case No. 7,722.]

[See note at end of case.]

9. Richmond, in Virginia, held to be enemy's country, and property captured on the ocean belonging to a permanent resident of that place, to be lawful prize.

[See note at end of case.]

10. In establishing the blockade, the president exercised a great belligerent right. He could not prohibit or restrict the commerce of any state by a mere municipal regulation. The blockade, and the orders of the president to the navy, by which captures have been made, have been confirmed by congress by Stat. 1861, c. 63. This has the force of instructions to prize tribunals to regard those proceedings of the president as legal and valid.

[See note at end of case.]

11. The president, as commander-in-chief, may instruct the officers of the navy to capture, or to abstain from capturing, certain vessels or cargoes. The statute of 1861, c. 23, adds to the means of the president, but in no degree detracts from his previous authority to treat persons or property as he shall deem best.

12. The proviso in the 24th section of the crimes act of 1790, c. 9, and the analogous provision in the constitution, art. 3, § 3, do not preclude the government from having a forfeiture or condemnation of property, at least in cases where the owner has not been convicted of treason.

13. The acts of congress, passed in the summer of 1861, were intended to make the prosecution of the war more efficient, and, in no degree, to curtail the authority which the pres-

[In admiralty. Libel in rem against the brig Amy Warwick and cargo, as prize of war. The vessel sailed from Rio Janeiro, May 29, 1861, with a cargo of coffee, destined to Hampton Roads for orders. By her charter party she was to go either to Richmond, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. She was captured August 10, 1861, by the United States ship of war Quaker City, and brought into this district for condemnation Robert Edmond, Isaac Davenport, Jr., and James Blair, trading as Edmond, Davenport & Co. at Richmond, Va., through their New York agents, claimed 400 bags of coffee, a portion of the cargo. Property condemned.

[The brig was claimed by David Currie and others, and the balance of the cargo by Dunlop, Moncure & Co., all of Richmond. These claims were dismissed, (the former decree unreported, the latter reported sub nom. The Amy Warwick, Case No. 342.) Another claim was filed by J. L. Phipps & Co., an English house at Rio Janeiro, for an advance made to supply a deficit of funds to purchase the cargo. This claim was allowed. The Amy Warwick, Id. 343. On appeal to the circuit court, the decrees of the district court were duly affirmed, (nowhere reported, opinion not now accessible,) whereupon all of the claimants, except Phipps & Co., appealed to the supreme court. Affirmed. The Prize Cases, 2 Black, (67 U. S.) 635.]

I. The property of an enemy, taken on the high seas, is prize of war; and residence in an enemy's country gives to the property of the resident, so found, a hostile character, irrespective of the actual feelings or intent of the owner. In such case, the condemnation is not a penalty on the owner for actual or implied hostility, but because the property is, or may become, a part of the resources of the enemy or be under the enemy's control. The Venus, 8 Cranch, [12 U. II. In civil war, the government may exercise all the rights of the public war against rebels, among which are blockade and the capture of property engaged in commerce upon the high sea. *Wheat. Int. III. That Richmond, Va., was enemy's country at the time of the capture, is shown by the public acts of the president, by those of the state of Virginia, and of the confederate congress and executive, and by those facts of public notoriety of which prize courts always take cognizance. (Mr. Dana here cited various acts, proclamations, orders, ordinances, &c., of the president, of Virginia, and of the confederation.) A government de facto, engaged in war with the United States, was fully established there, with the apparent consent of the people of that district.

V. The acts of congress of July 13, c. 3, (12 Stat. 255,) and August 6, c. 60, (12 Stat. 319,) do not relate to maritime captures under the war power. They are general acts, applicable to all future times, and not specially directed to the present state of things. They do not assume to determine what shall constitute a state of war, or whether or not there was, at the time of their passage, a war, or where and how far it extended, or what shall be considered a termination of a state of war. They rather recognize that those facts are to be passed upon by the president, from time to time, with full discretion as to policy in dealing with persons or districts. They confer certain powers on the president, attach certain consequences to his acts and declarations, and provide certain new and special modes of procedure. If the passing of those acts is to be construed as a legislative declaration that no captures or confiscations are to be made except under those acts, it will follow that the blockade, established by the proclamations of April last, could not be enforced against neutrals, except where their property was used in aid of the insurrection, with the owner's knowledge, nor against our own vessels, except in that case, or in case of a trading with the enemy by vessels going directly to or from ports in loyal states. Vessels breaking blockade by voyages between enemy's ports, or bound to or from neutral ports, would not be reached by the act of July 13. The act of August 6, c. 60, would reach no property, contraband or not, which was not used in aid of the insurrection with the owner's knowledge; and section 6 of the act of July 13 reaches no vessels owned by rebels, and found in rebel ports; and a privateer could not be condemned without proof that the owners knew she was used in aid of the insurrection, and consented to the use. Yet the statute of August 6, c. 63, (12 Stat. 326,) confirms all the orders and proclamations of the president, including a blockade "under the law of nations," and was passed after many captures, as enemy's property, had been made, which the prior acts would not have warranted. The acts of 13th July and 6th August, c. 60, must be considered as avoiding all question of belligerent powers, and the time and mode of their use, and as providing additional civil and municipal forfeitures, to follow certain acts of the president in any cases, now or hereafter. Any other construction would prevent the president from exercising any rights of capture, not provided for in those acts, whatever might be the state of a civil war, now or hereafter, and whatever the exigency. And the act of August 6, c. 63, must be treated as admitting the rightful exercise of the war power of blockade and capture in the present insurrection. Among all the condemnations of prizes that have been made, not one has been placed on the ground of the acts of July 13, or August 6, c. 60.

Sidney Bartlett & Edward Bangs, for claimants.

The fundamental question that must rule this case is:—Under our frame of government, when an armed rebellion exists, which, wrongfully availing itself of state or municipal organizations, and professing to act in their name, holds forcible possession of the territory of such state, or municipality, and when the government is attempting to suppress such rebellion by arms,—Do these facts, ipso facto, and without further legislation by congress, produce a state of war of such character that all persons, by retaining their residence within the limits of such state or municipality, become public enemies, and their property found at sea, or wherever found, and however innocently employed, becomes subject to confiscation by the United States? And it is submitted,—

I. That, regarded as a question of public law, as held and applied to monarchical or other forms of governments with no written constitution like our own, there is no authority for the position that consequences of the character above set forth, ipso facto, in the absence of any decree, edict, or act of legislation, result from war against an armed insurrection occupying portions or districts of an empire or kingdom. Upon this point the doctrine, as stated by Mr. Justice Nelson, is as follows: "On the breaking out of a war between two nations, the citizens, or subjects, of the respective belligerents, are deemed by the law of nations to be the enemies of each other. The same is true, in a qualified sense, in the case of a civil war arising out of an insurrection or rebellion against the mother government. In the latter case, the citizens or subjects residing within the insurrectionary district, not implicated in the rebellion, but adhering to their allegiance, are not enemies, nor to be regarded as such. This distinction was constantly observed by the English government in the disturbances in Scotland under the Pretender and his son, in the years 1715 and 1745. It modifies the law, as it respects the condition of the citizens, or subjects, residing within the limits of the revolted district, who remain loyal to the government." (Charge to the grand jury, Nov., 1861.) Nor does the question of the magnitude of the rebellion affect the principle, since it can hardly be left to judicial tribunals to find whether that magnitude is sufficient to bring the principle into existence.

II. That, even if such results could be deemed to flow from the principles of public law, held and applied under other forms of governments, yet, under our constitution, the question is purely a political one, in which the judgment of the legal tribunal must follow and rest wholly upon the acts and declarations of the executive, based upon some act of congress, or upon the direct legislation of congress itself. Those acts, and that conduct, may create a state of war, attended by all the consequences of open public war with foreign enemies; or those consequences may be distinctly modified and changed in their application to war of this character, as may be determined by considerations of policy.

III. That the mere exercise, by the executive, of the powers confided to him by the constitution and laws to suppress insurrection,—such as calling out the militia, restraining access to and from ports or places held by rebels,—do not, in the absence of special legislative provisions on the subject, create the general status of war, followed by the same consequences as war with foreign enemies.

IV. That the acts of congress, following and connected with, but not professing to repeal or modify, the acts and proclamations of the president, are to be construed together as declaratory of the original relations and liabilities of persons and property to the government, flowing from the condition of public affairs to which they relate, and that these acts and proclamations show conclusively that no such state of public war exists, or has ever existed, as authorizes the confiscation of property found at sea, or elsewhere, merely because it belongs to citizens resident in a portion of the United States held by parties engaged in an armed insurrection. On the contrary, the acts of congress throughout show that no such result flows from this rebellion. Among other acts, that of July 13, 1861, declares that forfeiture shall attach to a ship or vessel found at sea or in port, from and after fifteen days from the issuing of the president's proclamation. Another (July 31, 1861, c. 28, 12 Stat. 283) provides for arming loyal citizens resident in the rebellious states,—citizens whose property, if found at sea, upon the theory of this libel, is to be the subject of forfeiture.

V. If the rule of public law could be held to warrant forfeiture without any legislation, yet the acts of congress in this case must be deemed to have repealed that rule.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This vessel, with a cargo of coffee, of the value of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, sailed from Rio Janeiro, on the 29th day of May last, bound for Hampton Roads; and, on the 10th day of July, was captured by the United States ship-of-war Quaker City, and sent into this district for adjudication. A libel has been filed against both vessel and cargo, as prize; and this hearing is upon the preparatory evidence, and the public acts of the United States and of the rebel states. Condemnation is asked on the ground of enemy's property. A claim to the greater part of the cargo has been presented in behalf of Messrs. Phipps & Co., British subjects resident in Rio Janeiro; but their title is disputed by the captors. Four hundred bags of the coffee have been claimed by Edmond, Davenport & Co., of Richmond, Va., and there is no doubt of their exclusive ownership. The question arising upon this claim of Edmond, Davenport & Co., will be first considered; because, if their part of the cargo be not liable to condemnation, the inquiry as to the ownership of the residue will be immaterial. This claim was filed on the 9th of August last by agents residing in New York. The claimants are therein described to be Robert Edmond, Isaac Davenport, Jr., and James Blair, merchants, copartners, residing and doing business in Richmond in the state of Virginia, under the firm name of Edmond, Davenport & Co. There is no evidence that they ever had any other residence or place of business. Is their part of the cargo liable to condemnation as enemy's property? That is the question.

In war, each belligerent may seize and confiscate all the property of the other, wherever found; and this right extends to the property, found at sea, of all persons permanently resident in the enemy's country. Property of private persons found by a nation within its own territory, on the breaking out of hostilities, is not usually confiscated by civilized nations, in modern times. The sovereign may, indeed, seize and appropriate it; but this being contrary to the general usage, it is not to be presumed that the sovereign wills it; and the courts, therefore, will not condemn such property without an express injunction to do so, which, in this country, must be by an act of congress. Brown v. U. S., 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 110. Very different are the public law and usages as to enemy's property found on the ocean, which is, by all nations, seized and condemned as lawful prize. In many countries, there are permanent prize tribunals, which, on the breaking out of a war, take cognizance of captures on the ocean, and this by virtue of their general jurisdiction, and without any special authority being imparted for the occasion. Such are the district courts of the United States. The mere creation by congress of a permanent prize court, would, it is believed, invest it with the jurisdiction and authority usually appertaining to such tribunals by the law and practice of nations. It is unnecessary, however, to dwell on this view, because there are several acts of congress relative to captures on the sea. These acts do not, in terms, confer upon the court the power to adjudicate cases of prize, but they assume and recognize the existence of that power, and regulate its exercise. Thus, the statute of 1800, c. 33, (2 Stat. 45,) makes it the duty of the commander of a vessel who shall capture or seize any vessel as a prize, to send all the papers found on board to the judge of the district to which the prize is sent. The same statute further provides that no person in the navy shall take from any vessel, seized as a prize, any property "before the same shall be adjudged lawful prize by a competent court," but "the whole shall be brought in, and judgment passed thereon." The same statute, and the acts of 1816, c. 56, (3 Stat. 287,) and of 1849, c. 103, (9 Stat. 374,) provide for the disposition of the proceeds of vessels and cargoes which shall be adjudged good prize. These statutes, to some extent, prescribe the mode of procedure, but do not define the jurisdiction of prize courts, nor prescribe the rules of decision. These are to be ascertained by reference to the known powers of such tribunals, and the principles by which they are governed, in determining what shall be deemed lawful prize under the public law, and the practice of nations.

What shall be deemed enemy's property is a question of frequent occurrence in prize courts, and on which certain rules and principles are well established. Property captured at sea and owned by persons resident in an enemy's country is deemed hostile and subject to condemnation, without any evidence as to the individual opinions or predilections of the owner. If he be the subject of a neutral nation, or of the capturing belligerent, and has expressed no disloyal sentiments towards his native country, still his residence in the enemy's country impresses upon his property engaged in commerce and found upon the ocean a hostile character, and subjects it to condemnation. The Venus, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 253. See, also, The Hoop, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 196, and the cases there collected; and also the cases cited by Cadwallader, J., in The General Parkhill, (Dist. Ct. E. D. Pa., July, 1861,) [Case No. 10,755a.] But it is contended that although this property might be liable to confiscation if the contest were a foreign war, yet that it is otherwise in a rebellion or civil war. This requires attention. As the constitution gives congress the power to declare war, some have thought that without such previous declaration, war, in all its fulness, that is, carrying with it all the incidents and consequences of a war, cannot exist. This is a manifest error. It ignores the fact that there are two parties to a war, and that it may be commenced by either. If a foreign nation should send its fleets and armies to capture our vessels, ravage our coast, and invade our soil, would not this be war,—giving to the United States, as a nation, the position and rights of a belligerent? Such hostilities would impose upon the president the duty of exerting all his powers, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, to capture or destroy the enemy; and if, under his instructions, an enemy's ship should be taken and sent in for adjudication, the prize court must proceed to decide the question of prize upon the principles of public law. How this civil war commenced, every one knows. A traitorous confederation, comprising several organized states, after seizing by force several forts and custom-houses, attacked a fortress of the United States garrisoned with its soldiers, under the sanctity of its flag, and by superior military force compelled those soldiers to surrender, and that flag to be lowered. This was war,—open, flagrant, flagitious war; and it has never ceased to be waged by the same confederates with their utmost ability. Some have thought that because the rebels are traitors, their hostilities cannot be deemed war, in the legal or constitutional sense of that term. But without such war there can be no traitors. Such is the clear language of the constitution. It declares that treason against the United States "shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." Some have apprehended that if this conflict of arms is to be deemed war, our enemies must have, against the government, all the immunities of international belligerents. But this is to overlook the double character which these enemies sustain. They are at the same time belligerents and traitors, and subject to the liabilities of both; while the United States sustains the double character of a belligerent and sovereign, and has the rights of both. These rights co-exist, and may be exercised at pleasure. Thus, we may treat the crew of a rebel privateer merely as prisoners of war, or as pirates, or traitors; or we may, at the same time, give to a part of the crew the one character, and to the residue the other. And, after treating them as prisoners of war, we may exercise our sovereign power and deal with them as traitors. The temporary non-user of such rights is not a renunciation of them, but they may be called into practical exercise at pleasure. In modern times, if a rebellion has assumed such dimensions as to raise armies and involve great numbers, it has not been usual, during the contest, to exercise toward prisoners the sovereign right of dealing with them as traitors. They have generally been treated as prisoners of war until the contest is over. But this forbearance does not preclude their government from afterwards inflicting such punishment as justice and policy may require.

Mr. Wheaton, in his "Elements of International Law," page 365, so strongly maintains belligerent rights in civil war, that some of his language would imply that there are no other rights. This, however, could not have been intended; for, if sovereign rights be at an end, the war is merely international. Civil war, ex vi termini, imports that sovereign rights are not relinquished, but insisted on. The war is waged to maintain them. Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 272, was a case arising out of the exercise of sovereign rights by France in her civil war with St. Domingo. The courts recognized the co-existence of belligerent and sovereign rights. Cheriot v. Foussat, 3 Bin. 252, also arose out of a municipal regulation made by France in the same civil war; and the court remark that France was possessed of belligerent rights which might be exercised against neutral nations. Dobree v. Napier, 3 Scott, 225, arose out of a blockade of the coast of Portugal by the queen of that country; and the condemnation of a vessel as prize for the breach of it was holden to be valid. See, also, The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 306, and U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 635. The United States has, during the present war, exercised both belligerent and sovereign rights. Examples of the former are, receiving capitulations of the enemy as prisoners of war, and holding and exchanging them as such; and a still more prominent instance is the blockade, which, before the assembling of congress, was established by the military authority of the commander-in-chief.

I am satisfied that the United States, as a nation, has full and complete belligerent rights, which are in no degree impaired by the fact that its enemies owe allegiance, and have superadded the guilt of treason to that of unjust war. But it is insisted that if these rights exist, still the authority to exercise them by arresting and condemning enemy's property must emanate from the legislature; and that there has been no legislation authorizing this capture.

Congress has established permanent prize tribunals, and created an army and navy. The constitution declares that the president shall be the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States. He is thus clothed with all the power appertaining to that high office; and he is not only authorized, but bound, to exert it when the exigency for which it was given shall arise. If a hostile power, either from without or within our territory, shall assail and capture our forts, and raise armies to overthrow our government, and invade its soil, and menace the capital of the nation, and shall issue commissions to public and private armed ships to depredate on our commerce, the president is bound to use the army and navy to carry on the war effectively against such an enemy, both by land and by sea. And he may do so in the manner, and by the measures, usual in modern civilized warfare; one of the most familiar of which is the capture of enemy's property, public and private, on the ocean. In war, the commander-in-chief is not only authorized to make captures by sea and conquests by land; but he may even govern the conquered territory, until congress shall have seen fit to interpose by legislation. In our last war, California having been subjugated, the commander-in-chief imposed duties, established custom-houses, and collected revenues; and this was sanctioned by the supreme court as a legitimate exercise of military power. Cross v. Harrison, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 164. There can be no doubt of the right of the president to make maritime captures and submit them to judicial investigation. It is one of the best-established and least dangerous of his powers as commander-in-chief. Further than this, congress has legislated upon the subject, although it was not necessary for it to do so. The statute of 1807, c. 39 (2 Stat. 443,) provides that, whenever it is lawful for the president to call forth the militia to suppress an insurrection, he may employ the land and naval forces of the United States for that purpose. The authority to use the army and navy is thus expressly confirmed; but the manner in which they are to be used, is not prescribed. That is left to the discretion of the president, guided by the usages and principles of civilized war; and these principles and usages undoubtedly authorize the capture of enemy's property at sea.

What is enemy's property is a judicial question, to be decided by the prize courts; and, unless otherwise instructed by their own sovereign, they must be guided by the rules and principles of public law. Property may be condemned as hostile, without proof of the personal sentiments of the owner being disloyal. Acts which tend to subvert the interests of the enemy may impress a hostile character upon property, without regard to the political views or wishes of the owner. Residence of the owner in the enemy's country may be of such a character as to stamp the property conclusively as hostile. How far residence may, in any case, be open to explanation, or the presumption arising therefrom be repelled, I have no occasion to consider. When a hostile character is imputed to property because of the residence of the owner, the court may be compelled to decide whether the place of his residence be enemy's country. What shall be deemed enemy's country is sometimes a question of much difficulty. Some nations or tribes can hardly be said to have any country. Such are the nomadic Arabs, and such were the children of Israel during some part, at least, of their migration from Egypt. A belligerent nation may invade a neutral province, and hold the control of it, and yet the possession be such as not necessarily to impress upon the inhabitants a hostile character. Thus in the case of The Gerasimo, 11 Moore, P. C. 101, it was decided that, although Russia had taken forcible possession of the Danubian principalities, and for a time held dominion over them, yet that a ship of a resident of Wallachia was not liable to capture by a British cruiser as enemy's property; the occupation of that province by Russia being not only forcible, against the will of the inhabitants, but avowedly temporary, and for a special purpose. If Wallachia, by its local government, the Hospodar and Divan, had voluntarily joined with Russia and made common cause in the war against England, the inhabitants would, unquestionably, have been enemies, and their property on the ocean lawful prize.

In cases which may come within the definition of civil war, there may be only an assemblage of individuals in military array, without political organization or territorial limit; or armed bands may make hostile incursions into a loyal state, or hold divided, contested, or precarious possession of portions of it, as now in Missouri and Kentucky. In such cases, local residence may not create any presumption of hostility. Far otherwise is it in Virginia. On the seventeenth day of April, 1861, being immediately after the rebel confederates had attacked and captured Fort Sumter, a convention of delegates, by solemn ordinance, undertook to place all the inhabitants of that state in an attitude of rebellion, and to join in the war which had been previously begun against the United States. The act of rebellion was to take immediate effect, and an alliance making common cause with the confederate enemy was immediately formed, and hostilities actively waged by armies raised within, and invited from without, the state. All this was, indeed, subject to be disaffirmed by a vote of the whole people of the state, to be taken on the twenty-third day of May; but no part of it has been disaffirmed. On the contrary, the popular vote on that day, apparently by a large majority, ratified the proceedings of the convention, the alliance, and the war. The western counties of the state nobly vindicated their honor and their fidelity, by refusing submission to rebel mandates, and adhering to the Union. They did not, indeed, change their domicile, but they removed the power of rebel Virginia from the place of their domicile. The Virginia rebellion was not the act of individuals asserting that moral right of revolution which belongs to all subjects, but it was the assertion of a pretended state right. It was founded solely on the deadly doctrine of secession, which claims that the state, as an organized political body, may sever itself from the Union. In attempting this, and carrying on the war, it acted by majorities claiming implicit obedience from the minority. The exterior boundaries of the state and its internal division by counties have been clearly defined; and the city of Richmond, where these claimants reside, is within the territory over which, by known limits, this political body has, for nine months past, held absolute dominion. Such residence subjects both property and person to the absolute control of the enemy, and augments his resources and his strength. And I see no sufficient reason why it is not to be deemed a continued residence in an enemy's country, which subjects property captured on the ocean to condemnation as lawful prize. In this case, it does not appear that the claimants ever had a domicile in any other place than Richmond; nor is there any evidence going to explain their continuance there, or to repel the presumption of hostility arising therefrom. It is not necessary, therefore, to decide whether such evidence could be admitted, or what would be its effect. In questions so novel, I do not think fit to go farther than the case before me requires. But it is objected that the question, what persons or country are to be deemed hostile, is not a judicial one; or rather that the courts cannot consider any person or country to be hostile, unless the legislature has previously designated them as such. This is directly met by the case of The Gerasimo, 11 Moore, P. C. 101, above cited, in which the sole question was whether the province of Wallachia was enemy's country, so as to subject the property of a resident therein to capture as prize. This question the high court of admiralty decided in the affirmative, and the privy council in the negative. Both decisions were founded exclusively upon the character of the Russian occupation, as exhibited by the evidence, the court having no aid or instruction by any act either of the queen or the parliament. The cause was most elaborately discussed, both by the bar and the bench, and yet not a doubt was suggested of the question being strictly judicial.

This objection, that it does not belong to the court to decide who shall be deemed enemies, or rather, that the court can decide only one way, and that against the captors, unless congress has previously declared who shall be considered enemies, really carries us back to the questions whether there can be war without a declaration by congress, and whether, in civil war, the parent country has full belligerent rights. Those questions have already been considered; and it is believed that such rights exist, and among them, undoubtedly, is that of making maritime captures of enemy's property. And when property is brought in for adjudication, the court must decide whether it be hostile or not; and, in doing so, it must, in the absence of legislative instruction, be guided by general principles and usage, under which one criterion of enemy's property is the residence of the owner. This is a known and well-established rule of decision which the court cannot disregard. It is not necessary, however, to determine how the court would deal with these questions in the absence of any action by other departments of the government, because there has been such action. In addition to other important acts, the president, by proclamation of the twenty-seventh of April, [12 Stat. 1259,] established a blockade of the ports of Virginia. This was the exercise of a great belligerent right, and could have been done under no other. He could not prohibit or restrict the commerce of any state by a mere municipal regulation. The blockade was avowedly established as a belligerent act under the law of nations; and it was accordingly announced that it would be rendered effective by an adequate naval force; and, in all proceedings in relation to it by our own country and other nations, it has been regarded as a belligerent act. Under it there have been divers captures by our navy and condemnations by our courts. Now such a blockade could not be valid unless it be of enemy's country.

Some have thought that it was to be deemed enemy's country, because of the proclamation of the president. It seems to me rather that the proclamation and the blockade are to be upheld as legal and valid because the territory is that of an enemy. But whichever view is adopted, the result is the same; namely, that the court must regard the country as hostile. Richmond, where these claimants reside, is one of the places that was thus blockaded. This is not all. The proclamation of a blockade of Virginia, as hostile territory, and the orders of the president to the navy, under which captures like the present have been made, have been expressly confirmed by congress. The statute of 6th August last, c. 63, declares that such acts and orders shall have the same efficacy as if they had been previously authorized by legislative enactments. Without going into a discussion of the effect of that confirmation, it is evident that it must have the force of an instruction to prize tribunals to regard those proceedings of the president as legal and valid.

It has been urged that in a civil war it may sometimes be very impolitic to confiscate the property of persons resident in the rebel country; and that the expediency of doing so is a political question to be determined by the legislature. We are now dealing only with maritime captures. It is true that policy may sometimes require that the property of such residents should be exempted from arrest; and it is quite as certain that sometimes it ought not to be exempted. There should therefore be somewhere lodged a discretionary power to capture this property or not, as varying circumstances and exigencies may require. This power is now vested in the president. He controls the navy, and directs what captures shall be made. He may instruct inferior officers that particular vessels, or those belonging to certain persons, or engaged in a particular trade, are not to be arrested.

What captures shall be made, like many other questions of policy in conducting the war, may beneficially be left to the discretion of the commander-in-chief. The statute of 1861, c. 28, (12 Stat. 283,) has been referred to as assuming that there are loyal citizens in the rebel states who are to be aided and protected, and it is urged that their property should not be subject to confiscation. That act places two millions of dollars in the hands of the president, to be used at his discretion in arming, organizing, and sustaining loyal citizens in rebel districts. This act undoubtedly contemplates that there may be such loyal citizens, and that it may be expedient so to aid and strengthen them; and it makes an appropriation for that purpose. But it is wisely left to the unrestricted judgment of the president to determine who are such loyal citizens, if any, and to what extent they shall be treated as such. It adds to the means of the president, but in no degree detracts from his previous authority, to treat persons or property as he shall deem best. It has been contended that the proviso in the 24th section of the crimes act of 1790, c. 9, (1 Stat. 117,) should prevent condemnation of this cargo as prize. That act describes certain offenses and prescribes their punishment; and among them is the crime of treason. The proviso declares that no conviction shall work corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate. This shows that the law-givers thought that death was a sufficient penalty, without confiscation following as a legal consequence of conviction.

There is an analogous provision in the constitution, art. 3, § 3; and, as it has embarrassed some minds, it deserves attention. In the first place, the objection assumes that there can be no condemnation unless the claimants are traitors. This is an error. As already stated, property may be treated as hostile, although the owner has not been guilty of treason. He may be an alien, owing no allegiance; or a citizen, whose opinions or wishes are not proved to be hostile, and yet he may be so situated, and his property be so used, as to subject it to capture as prize. A striking case is to be found in The Venus, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 253. In that case, a citizen of the United States, residing at Liverpool, shipped property for New York on the 4th of July, 1812, having no knowledge of the war, which had been previously declared by the United States. This property was captured by an American privateer, and held by the supreme court to be lawful prize. The court, in delivering their opinion, say that although the claimant, being a citizen of the United States, "cannot be considered an enemy in the strict sense of the word, yet he is deemed such, with reference to the seizure of so much of his property concerned in the trade of the enemy as is connected with his residence. It is found adhering to the enemy. He is himself adhering to the enemy, although not criminally so." See also the cases collected by Sir William Scott, in The Hoop, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 196.

In the case now before me, it is not proved or contended by either party that these claimants have been guilty of the crime of treason; and surely the claimants cannot set it up, in argument, as a defence. In the second place, the owner may, by certain acts, have subjected his property to be treated as enemy's, and, by other distinct acts, committed the crime of treason; and confiscation may be inflicted for the former, and the penalty of death for the latter,—just as the same person may be guilty of larceny, and subsequently of murder, and be fined for the first, and afterwards convicted of the capital offence. Third, suppose there should be but one act, which is such a use of property as subjects it to confiscation, and, at the same time, constitutes an overt act of treason; and suppose, further, that the government cannot proceed for both penalties, yet they may elect. They are not bound to prosecute for the crime; and if they enforce the forfeiture, the most that can be contended is, that they are thereby precluded from subsequently having a conviction for the treason.

The acts passed by congress last summer have been referred to as expressing the views of the legislature upon the subject of confiscations in the present war. As they do not reach cases like the present, it is contended that it was the intention of the legislature that such property should not be condemned. It is obvious that, in their general purpose and effect, they were intended to make the prosecution of the war more efficient, to give additional means and power to the president, but in no degree to curtail the authority which he previously possessed. They embrace some cases in which confiscation would not follow from the general law, and render others more definite and certain, and provide new modes of procedure. The belligerent right of capture at sea previously existed, and congress has left it unimpaired. Further still: This right of maritime capture was not only well known, but had actually and notoriously been exercised. The last session of congress closed on the 6th day of August. Prior to that time, divers captures had been made of vessels and cargoes belonging to inhabitants of insurgent districts. In particular, the General Parkhill was captured on the twelfth day of May, and sent to Philadelphia, and there condemned as enemy's property at the June term of the district court, [Case No. 10,755a.] The Pioneer, [Id. 11,172.] The Crenshaw, [Id. 3,384.] The North Carolina, [Id. 10,317,] and The Hallie Jackson, [Id. 5,961.] were sent into the port of New York in the course of May and June, and the vessels or their cargoes have since been condemned as enemy's property. In this very case of The Amy Warwick, the capture was made on the 10th of July, and the libel was filed on the 18th of that month. All these captures were made by ships of war, and, of course, under orders emanating from the president. Yet, so far from discountenancing these proceedings, congress, as we have already seen, did, by the act of the 6th of August, c. 63, § 3, expressly confirm all orders respecting the army and navy which had been made by the president since the 4th of March last. The counsel for the claimant has relied upon a recent charge by Mr. Justice Nelson to the grand jury, in the second circuit. That learned judge did not enter into any discussion of prize law. The occasion did not call for it. He expressed the opinion, if correctly reported in the newspapers, that loyal citizens of rebel districts were not to be treated as enemies, nor their property confiscated. But he did not undertake to say who were to be deemed loyal citizens, what was to be the evidence of their fidelity, or how the presumptions arising from continued residence in the enemy's country were to be overcome. The counsel for the captors has relied upon a remark made by Judge Dunlop in the case of The Tropic Wind, [Case No. 14,187,] and upon the learned decisions of Judge Cadwallader in the case of The General Parkhill, [supra,] and of Judge Betts in the cases of The Crenshaw, The North Carolina, The Pioneer, and The Hallie Jackson, [supra.] These cases are directly in point; and I might well have rested my decision solely upon the authority of those able and distinguished judges. But as it has been contended that those decisions are not sustained by the authorities which were cited in their support, I have yielded to the earnest invitation of the eminent counsel in this cause, to investigate the principles and authorities which it involves. Claim rejected, and the property condemned.

[NOTE. On appeal to the circuit court the district court decrees were affirmed, whereupon Edmond, Davenport & Co., Dunlop, Moncure & Co., and David Currie and others appealed to the supreme court. The decree appealed from was duly affirmed. Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The war is not the less a civil war, with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an 'insurrection' by one side, and the insurgents considered as rebels and traitors. It is not necessary that the independence of the revolted province or state be acknowledged in order to constitute it a party belligerent in a war, according to the law of nations. Foreign nations acknowledge it as a war by their declarations of neutrality. The condition of neutrality cannot exist unless there be two belligerent parties. * * * Whether the president, in fulfilling his duties, as commander-in-chief, in suppressing an insurrection, has met with such armed resistance, and a civil war of such alarming proportions as will compel him to accord to them the character of belligerents, is a question to be decided by him, and this court must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department of the government to which this power was intrusted. He must determine what degree of force the crisis demands. The proclamation of blockade is, itself, official and conclusive evidence to the court that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized a recourse to such a measure, under the circumstances peculiar to the case. * * * Therefore, we are of opinion that the president had a right, jure belli, to institute a blockade of ports in possession of the states in rebellion which neutrals are bound to regard." The court held further that "enemies," in the technical sense in which it is used in prize courts, distinct from the common law, include rebels and traitors as well as aliens; that the seceding states claimed to be sovereign, and to absolve their citizens from allegiance; that the territory within the southern lines was all enemies' territory, because claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power. "All persons residing within this territory, whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power are, in this contest, liable to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners." The liability to capture as enemies' property does not in any manner depend on the personal allegiance of the owner. It is the illegal traffic that stamps it as enemies' property. It is of no consequence whether it belongs to an ally or a citizen. "The produce of the soil of the hostile territory, as well as other property engaged in the commerce of the hostile power, as the source of its wealth and strength, are always regarded as legitimate prize, without regard to the domicile of the owner, and much more so if he reside and trade within their territory." Case No. 342.

The AMY WARWICK, (Dunlop, Moncure & Co., Claimants.)

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1862.²

PRIZE PRACTICE—CIVIL WAR—CONFISCATION—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. The decision upon the claim of Edmond, Davenport & Co., 2 Spr. 123, [The Amy Warwick, Case No. 341,] to a part of this cargo, affirmed.

[See The Amy Warwick, Case No. 341, note.]

2. The language of the prize law, that property is to be condemned as enemy's, or is to be deemed enemy's, or is impressed with a hostile character, does not necessarily import that the owner is personally hostile, but only that his property has been placed in such relation to the enemy that a court of prize is to deal with it as if it belonged to the enemy.

3. The statute of 1862, c. 50, (12 Stat. 374,) for the better administration of the law of prize, affects only the mode of procedure. It prescribes no rule of decision, but leaves the court to be guided by the general law as known to the prize courts of the civilized world.

4. This statute applies to cases arising in this civil war, as well as to those that may arise in international war, and makes no distinction between them in the mode of procedure, or the rules of decision.

[See The Amy Warwick, Case No. 341, note.]

5. The rights of war exist only while the war continues. Titles to property, or political jurisdiction, acquired during the war by the exercise of belligerent rights, may survive the war.

6. The conquest of a foreign country gives absolute and unlimited sovereign rights. But no nation makes such a conquest of its own territory.

7. In this civil war, the military power is called in only to maintain the government in the exercise of its legitimate civil authority. No success can extend the powers of any department beyond the limits prescribed by the organic law.

[Cited in Semmes v. City Fire Ins. Co., Case No. 12,651.]

8. When the United States takes possession of any rebel district, it acquires no new title, but merely vindicates that which previously existed; and it is to do only what is necessary for that purpose.

[Cited in Semmes v. City Fire Ins. Co., Case No. 12,651; Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 614.]

9. Belligerent confiscations take effect only upon property of which possession is taken during the war. As against property which continues under the control of the enemy, they are wholly inoperative.

10. If possession is acquired by or after the peace, then previous legislation may take effect; but it will be by the right of sovereignty, not as an act of war.

11. Confiscations which go not against an offending thing, but arise from the personal delinquency of the owner, should be inflicted only upon due conviction of personal guilt.

²[Affirmed by circuit court, (decree nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.) Affirmed by supreme court, sub nom. The Prize Cases, 2 Black, (67 U. S.) 635.]

12. Such penalties have no connection whatever with the decisions of prize courts enforcing belligerent rights upon property captured at sea.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem against the brig Amy Warwick and cargo, as prize of war. The vessel sailed from Rio Janeiro May 29, 1861, with a cargo of coffee, destined to Hampton Roads for orders. By her charter party she was to go either to Richmond, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. She was captured August 10, 1861, by the United States ship of war Quaker City, and brought into this district for condemnation. Dunlop, Moncure & Co., of Richmond, Va., claim a portion of her cargo. Property condemned, and claim dismissed.]

[The brig was claimed by David Currie and others, and the balance of the cargo by Edmond, Davenport & Co., all of Richmond, Va. Both claims were dismissed, (the former decree unreported, the latter reported sub nom. The Amy Warwick, Case No. 341.) Another claim was filed by J. L. Phipps & Co., an English house at Rio Janeiro, for an advance made to supply a deficit of funds to purchase the cargo. This claim was allowed. The Amy Warwick, Id. 343. On appeal to the circuit court the decrees of the district court were duly affirmed, (nowhere reported, opinion not now accessible,) whereupon all of the claimants except Phipps & Co., appealed to the supreme court. R. H. Dana, Jr., U. S. Atty., for captors.
S. Bartlett and E. Bangs, for claimants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. These claimants, Dunlop, Moncure, & Co., having been permanent residents of Richmond, Virginia, before and ever since the sailing and capture of this vessel, are in the same condition as were Edmond, Davenport, & Co., the claimants of the four hundred bags of coffee which have already been condemned. [The Amy Warwick, Case No. 341.] If the opinion given in that case be adhered to, this claim must be dismissed. I have seen no reason to change that opinion. On the contrary, two important propositions, namely, that Richmond is enemy's country, and that permanent residence therein by the owner of property captured at sea is cause of condemnation without proof of personal disloyalty, have been strengthened by subsequent events and the recent legislation of congress. Richmond is not only the capital of rebel Virginia, but has continued to be the seat of the usurped confederate government; and no country was ever more absolutely under the dominion of an enemy, or more clearly within his territorial limits. Every reason why residence should cause condemnation in maritime captures in any war applies in full force to the case now before me. These claimants do not even offer proof of their loyalty, and there is a high probability that they are willingly co-operating with the enemy. But, if this be not so, they were at the time of this capture, and have ever since continued to be, under his absolute control; and that control is an inexorable military despotism. Every dollar put into their hands or under their control is, to all practical purposes, in the hands of the enemy, and adds to his strength. The question before me is, whether this property shall be restored to the claimants, or condemned as prize. No intermediate or other course is asked or suggested by either party. Should the court decree restoration, it must order the $120,000 now in the registry to be paid over to these inhabitants of Richmond. It will be delivered to their agent, who resides in New York, and will be subject to their order. They will doubtless order it to be transmitted in gold or exchanged to their banker in London, and it will be there held and disposed of for the benefit of the rebel confederates, and may at once be invested in munitions of war, and shipped for the rebel states by way of Havana, and then the fleet of the United States must be upon the alert endeavoring to intercept and capture the proceeds of the money now in the possession of this court. Any theoretical views which lead to such a result should be distrusted.

The decrees of the district courts condemning property as hostile, have been objected to on the ground that they pronounce the owners to be enemies, when in fact they may be personally loyal. But it is a mistake to suppose that those judgments go beyond the fact of permanent residence, and assert personal guilt in the owner. This mistake has probably arisen from misapprehending the import of certain language of frequent recurrence in prize law, such as that property is to be condemned as enemy's, or is to be deemed enemy's, or that it is impressed with a hostile character. These are equivalent expressions. They do not necessarily import that the owner is personally hostile, but only that his property has been placed in such relation to the enemy that a court of prize is to deal with it as if it belonged to the enemy. It is quite a mistake to suppose that property is never to be condemned except for personal delinquency of the owner. Even under the municipal law, ships and cargoes are liable to condemnation for the use that has been made of them where there has been no guilty knowledge or intent on the part of the owner; and, in prize law, condemnation is not the infliction of personal punishment on proof of individual guilt, but it is a matter of belligerent policy to destroy the commerce of the enemy and diminish his resources. This is emphatically set forth in the case of The Venus, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 253, where property of a citizen of the United States was condemned by reason of his residence, although, as the supreme court expressly declares, there was no personal guilt. The same doctrine is found in many other cases. The objection, when scrutinized, involves a denial of the power of the court to make any condemnation as prize under the principles and according to the rules of the general law, and the practice of nations; and this is to deny to the United States the exercise of belligerent rights. For there is no right of war more clearly established or more universally exercised than that of maritime captures; and no reason can be assigned why the United States should be deprived of the power of exercising this important right in the present war. How far the peculiar circumstances of this or any other conflict should induce forbearance, like many other questions of policy in the conduct of the war, is to be determined by the commander-in-chief or the legislature. It is for them, or one of them, to say what captures should be made, and what cases, or classes of cases, shall be sent in, and condemnation sought by prosecution. In adjudicating such cases, the courts must be guided and governed by established principles and rules of decision. This is well known to the other departments of the government; and, when they send a captured vessel to the court to be there proceeded against as a prize, they necessarily intend, in the absence of other instructions, that the court shall proceed and decide according to the established rules and principles of prize law. There is no other guide. That the great conflict in which we are now engaged is war, in the legal sense of the term, is shown by the express language of the constitution in defining the crime of treason; that the United States, in this war, has, on the ocean, all the rights of belligerents, has never been distinctly controverted. To deny it is to break up the blockade, and every condemnation under it. Those who have thought that the courts cannot enforce the belligerent rights of the nation without the action of congress, should, I think, be satisfied that there has been sufficient legislation. In addition to the statutes passed during the last summer, and particularly the ratifying act of the 6th of August, which was adverted to in my former opinion, congress, on the twenty-fifth day of March last, (Acts 1862, c. 50; 12 Stat. 374,) passed an act to regulate the mode of procedure in prize cases. The first section relates to the custody and preservation of captured property, and the taking of evidence. The second and third sections relate to expenses, and the compensation of officers. The fourth section relates to the disposition of prize property after final condemnation. This statute affects only the mode of procedure. It gives no direction as to the principles or doctrines by which the court is to be guided in its adjudications. It does not touch the rule of decision. The title of this statute declares it to be an "Act for the better administration of the law of prize." The court, then, is to administer the law of prize, and that must be the general law as known to the prize tribunals of the civilized world, with such modifications as may be made by our own legislature. But to what cases is this general law of prize to be applied? This question is answered by the fifth section of the statute, which declares that its provisions "shall apply as well to cases now pending as to all future cases of maritime captures." This court is thus expressly directed to administer the prize law in cases now pending or hereafter to arise in this civil war, as well as in cases of maritime captures in future international wars. No distinction is indicated between these two classes of captures, or in the rules of law which are to be applied to them. Further still: the legislature expressly recognizes the pendency of prize cases. In many of those cases, the only question was whether property should be condemned by reason of the residence of the owner in the enemy's country. This question had been decided by the district courts of three judicial districts, all concurring in decrees of condemnation. This was well known; and yet congress, in passing an act for the better administration of the prize law in cases then pending or hereafter to arise, does not prescribe any rules of decision or in any way discountenance those which had been adopted by the courts: this may be deemed an acquiescence in or a tacit approbation of those rules.

An objection to the prize decisions of the district courts has arisen, from an apprehension of radical consequences. It has been supposed that, if the government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a state and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges, and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error,—a grave and dangerous error. The rights of war exist only while the war continues. Thus, if peace be concluded, a capture made immediately afterwards on the ocean, even where the peace could not have been known, is unauthorized, and property so taken is not prize of war, and must be restored. Wheat. Int. Law, 619. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised when there are no belligerents. Titles to property or to political jurisdiction acquired during the war, by the exercise of belligerent rights, may indeed survive the war. The holder of such a title may permanently exercise, during peace, all the rights which appertain to his title; but they must be rights only of proprietorship or sovereignty; they cannot be belligerent. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute and unlimited sovereign rights. But no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile power, either from without or within a nation, takes possession and holds absolute dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expels or overthrows the enemy and suppresses hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights. Id. 616. During the war of 1812, the British took possession of Castine, and held exclusive and unlimited control over it, as conquered territory. So complete was the alienation, that the supreme court held that goods imported into it were not brought into the United States, so as to be subject to import duties. U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 246. Castine was restored to us under the treaty of peace; but it was never supposed that the United States acquired a new title by the treaty, and could thenceforth govern it as merely ceded territory. And if, before the end of the war, the United States had, by force of arms, driven the British from Castine, and regained our rightful possession, no one would have imagined that we could thenceforth hold and govern it as conquered territory, depriving the inhabitants of all pre-existing political rights. And when, in this civil war, the United States shall have succeeded in putting down this rebellion and restoring peace in any state, it will only have vindicated its original authority, and restored itself to a condition to exercise its previous sovereign rights under the constitution. In a civil war, the military power is called in only to maintain the government in the exercise of its legitimate civil authority. No success can extend the powers of any department beyond the limits prescribed by the organic law. That would be not to maintain the constitution, but to subvert it. Any act of congress which would annul the rights of any state under the constitution, and permanently subject the inhabitants to arbitrary power, would be as utterly unconstitutional and void as the secession ordinances with which this atrocious rebellion commenced. The fact that the inhabitants of a state have passed such ordinances can make no difference. They are legal nullities; and it is because they are so, that war is waged to maintain the government. The war is justified only on the ground of their total invalidity. It is hardly necessary to remark, that I do not mean that the restoration of peace will preclude the government from enforcing any municipal law or from punishing any offence against previously existing laws. Another objection to those decisions of the district courts is founded upon the apprehension that they may lead to or countenance cruel and impolitic confiscations of private property found on land. This apprehension is unfounded. No such consequence can legitimately follow. Those decisions undoubtedly assert that the United States has the rights of a belligerent. But the extent of those rights on land, or the manner in which they are to be exercised, was not discussed. They were not specially mentioned, except to say that enemy's property found by a belligerent on land, within his own country, on the breaking out of a war, will not be condemned by the courts, although it would be if found at sea. This distinction, so far as it goes, tends to show that the doctrine of maritime captures is not to be applied to seizures on land. But the danger upon which this objection is founded, does not arise from the administration of the prize law by the courts, or the exercise of belligerent rights by military commanders upon military exigencies. The objection really arises from fear of the legislation of congress. It is apprehended that they may pass sweeping or general acts of confiscation, to take practical effect only after the rebellion shall have been suppressed; that whole estates, real and personal, which have not been seized during the war, may be taken and confiscated upon coming within reach of the government, after hostilities shall have ceased. This, as we have seen, would not be the exercise of belligerent rights, the war being at an end. Belligerent confiscations take effect only upon property of which possession is taken during the war. As against property which continues under the control of the enemy, they are wholly inoperative. If possession be acquired by or after the peace, then previous legislation may take effect, but it will be by the right of sovereignty, not as an act of war. Under despotic governments, the power of municipal confiscation may be unlimited; but under our government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a state is given and limited by the constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before. When the United States takes possession of any rebel district, it acquires no new title, but merely vindicates that which previously existed, and is to do only what is necessary for that purpose. Confiscations of property, not for any use that has been made of it, which go not against an offending thing, but are inflicted for the personal delinquency of the owner, are punitive; and punishment should be inflicted only upon due conviction of personal guilt. What offences shall be created, and what penalties affixed, must be left to the justice and wisdom of congress, within the limits prescribed by the constitution. Such penal enactments have no connection whatever with the decisions of prize courts, enforcing belligerent rights upon property captured at sea during the war. I have thus noticed the objections which have been made to the former opinion of the court, so far as they have come to my knowledge. They do not seem to me to be well founded. The claim of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. must be dismissed.

The AMY WARWICK, (J. L. Phipps & Co., Claimants.)

[2 Spr. 150; 24 Law Rep. 501, 544.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1862.*

PRIZE PRACTICE—RIGHTS OF NEUTRAL—DISPOSITION OF CAPTURED PROPERTY.

1. A detailed statement, supported by affidavits, is required of any party who asks leave to offer new and independent proof.

2. This rule does not apply where it is only sought to meet with counter proof, to the same points, evidence introduced by an opponent.

3. In a case of further proof, the testimony was ordered to be taken in the form of depositions on interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, that being the more satisfactory form of proof.

4. Objections to the delivery of the captured property on bonds, to claimants.

5. Where a neutral has a jus in re, where he is in possession with a right of retention until a certain amount is paid to him, the captor takes cum onere and should allow the amount of such right. But where the neutral has merely a jus ad rem, which he cannot enforce without the aid of a court of justice, his claim will not be recognized by a prize court.

6. A neutral merchant purchased a cargo of coffee for enemy correspondents, partly with their funds and partly with his own, and shipped it under a bill of lading by which it was to be delivered to his order, and with a statement thereon that part of the coffee was the property of neutrals. Held, that, having the legal title and possession, he was not to be deemed a lien holder, but rather a trustee with the right of retention until his advance should be paid to him.

7. In such case, a prize court will look beyond the legal title, and deal with the beneficial interest. The neutral will be paid the amount of his advance, and the residue of the property will be condemned as enemy's.

8. A motion for a second order for further proof was refused, because it was made at the final hearing (it being doubtful whether the motion could have been granted even if made at an early day), when it was known that the cause was to be carried up by appeal, and because such an order would occasion great delay, while it could be granted in the circuit court without delaying the final decision.

†[Affirmed by circuit court, (decree nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.)]

Co. and Dunlop, Moncure & Co.,—all of Richmond, Va. J. L. Phipps & Co., an English house at Rio Janeiro, filed a claim for an advance made to supply a deficit of funds to purchase the cargo. The property was condemned, (The Amy Warwick, Case No. 341; Id. 342,) and all the claims dismissed, excepting that of Phipps & Co.]

In the decree lately made in this cause, the brig and a part of the cargo were condemned as enemy's property, being confessedly the property of permanent residents in Richmond, Va. The rest of the cargo, 4700 bags of coffee, was claimed by Messrs. Phipps & Co., an English house at Rio Janeiro, having a branch house in New York. After the hearing on the evidence in preparatory, by which it appeared that this cargo was bought for a Richmond house, the claimants moved for leave to offer further proof, for the purpose of showing that they were neutrals; that they advanced about $15 000 to supply a deficit of funds to purchase this cargo; that they took and held the bills of lading in their own name, to protect their advance, and had not waived or parted with their legal title. This motion was supported by affidavits of the claimants' belief in those facts, and of their grounds for expecting to obtain the proof of them. The motion was allowed. The captors then moved that the order include a right to them to take counter proof to the same points. The claimants objected that the captors must file a motion, with affidavits, as had been required of them.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, was of opinion that a detailed statement, supported by affidavits, was required of any party who asked leave to offer new and independent proof, but that the rule did not apply to a party who only sought to meet with counter proof, to the same points, the evidence introduced by an opponent. A question also arose whether the proofs should be by affidavits or in the form of depositions. The English and some American cases were referred to, as allowing affidavits in cases of what is technically called further proof, as distinguished from plea and proof.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, said that, without deciding that affidavits were inadmissible in cases of further proof, he should order the proofs in this case, as more satisfactory, to be taken by a commissioner, on interrogatories and cross-interrogatories. The order was accordingly made, allowing the claimants to take further proof to the points set forth in their motion, and the captors to take counter proofs to the same points, each to file interrogatories within three days, with three days for cross-interrogatories, the proofs to be returned on or before a day fixed. The claimants then moved to have the cargo appraised and delivered to them on bonds. They claimed that the hearing in preparatory being had, and they being allowed further proof, they were entitled to take the property on bonds, by the practice of prize courts. This was opposed by the captors, who moved for a decree for a sale of the cargo.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. There are very serious objections to delivering captured property on bonds to claimants, which have always weighed with prize courts. Before the hearing in preparatory, it cannot well be judicially known that the claimants are not enemies, or acting for enemies, or that they have such absolute title in the property as to be the persons to whom it should be restored, in case it should be decided to be no prize,—beside the consideration that the captured property may itself be evidence. If, on the hearing, their claim remained in doubt on any of these points, why should they take the property rather than the captors? The court must be careful to deliver the property to none but actual owners, and persons who would not pass it to any enemy for whom they might act. There are other difficulties attending this course. It throws on the captors the risk of the sufficiency of the bondsmen at the time, and their continued solvency until a final decision in the appellate court. It gives the claimants the choice of abiding or not abiding by the appraisement. If it is low, they would adopt it and give bonds, and so make a profit at the expense of the captors. If the appraisement is to the full value, they may decline to give the bonds. And there is always danger of undervaluation, not only by fraud, and by the pressure of interests in the trade, but from erroneous principles of estimation. A public sale is the best and fairest proof of value; and the most satisfactory course is to sell the property, deposit the funds in the registry to be delivered to the parties finally decided to be entitled to them, where there are no special circumstances. But, in this case, there is an especial objection to the delivery to these claimants. As the hearing left the case, and as the claimants propose to place it on further proof, they hold the legal title only to protect their advance, which is only about $10,000 out of a value of over $100,000. The residue they would hold in trust for an enemy. Being neutrals, their duty would be, after deducting their advance, to deliver the residue to the enemy. Now, the prize court of no nation can be expected to deliver captured property over to a neutral who would hold it in trust for an enemy. The most that a neutral claiming an interest can expect, is that his interest shall be protected. This is sufficiently done by allowing him to pay his advance out of the proceeds in the registry. Whether a prize court will respect such an interest, and whether there is such an interest in this case, are points to be argued and determined after the further proofs shall come in. After this opinion of the court, the claimants made no objection to the captors' motion for a sale. A decree was accordingly made for a sale of all the cargo by the marshal, after notice in the chief commercial papers of New York and Boston.

A hearing was subsequently had on the further proof taken in the case.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. I come now to the claim of J. L. Phipps & Co. After a hearing upon the preparatory evidence, the court, on motion of the claimants, allowed the introduction of further proof. It now appears that these claimants, five in number, are British subjects, two of them residing in New York, one in Rio de Janeiro, and two in Liverpool, and they constitute the three commercial houses of J. L. Phipps & Co. at New York, Phipps Brothers & Co. at Rio, and Phipps & Co. at Liverpool. In March, 1861, this brig, the Amy Warwick, was owned by David Currie and others of Richmond, Va., who chartered her to Dunlop, Moncure, & Co., of that city, for a voyage to Rio, and back to a port of discharge in the United States. Currie and others appointed and paid the master and crew, and retained the ownership of the vessel, during the voyage. Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. put on board a cargo of merchandise consigned to Phipps Brothers & Co. at Rio. They disposed of the cargo, and with the funds of the Richmond house in their hands, and £2000 of their own money, purchased these 4700 bags of coffee, and put them on board this vessel, then bound to Hampton Roads for orders. They took from the master a bill of lading, which stated that Phipps, Brothers & Co. were the shippers of this coffee, and that it was to be delivered to their order. Indorsed upon the bill of lading was a statement declaring that a portion of the coffee was the property of British subjects. This was signed and sworn to by the managing partner at Rio. Phipps, Brothers & Co. indorsed the bill of lading over to J. L. Phipps & Co., of New York. They also delivered to the master one part of the bill of lading, and an invoice of the coffee, and a letter of advice, to be conveyed to the firm in New York. This letter states that the coffee was shipped for account of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co., and that the bill of lading would have been sent to them, had it not been deemed advisable, by reason of the unsettled state of political affairs, for the better protection of the property, and to prevent privateers from molesting the vessel, to have it certified on the bill of lading that a portion of the coffee was British property, and that this referred to the portion against which they had valued on Liverpool. That portion is stated in the claim to be £2000. After the capture, this letter of advice and the accompanying bill of lading came to the hands of J. L. Phipps & Co. at New York, and they indorsed and delivered the bill of lading to Charles M. Fry & Co., of New York, under an agreement that from the coffee there should first be paid to J. L. Phipps & Co. the £2000 advanced by the firm at Rio in making the purchase, and that the residue of the coffee and its proceeds should be held by Fry & Co. as the agents, and for the benefit, of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. On the 9th of August last, Charles M. Fry filed a claim in this court as agent and in behalf of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co., alleging that they were the owners of the whole of this coffee, excepting the interest of Phipps Brothers & Co. therein to the amount of £2000 advanced towards the purchase. The claim of J. L. Phipps & Co. was filed on the 4th of September last. It alleges that this coffee was purchased by them partly by funds of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co., and partly by £2000 of their own money, that the legal title has always remained in them, "and that no other person is the legal owner, except the equitable interest of said Dunlop, Moncure, & Co." These facts seem plainly to lead to the conclusion that the claimants ought to be repaid the amount which they expended from their own funds in the purchase of the coffee, and that the residue of the proceeds should be condemned. This result I shall adopt, unless precluded from doing so by authority. The counsel for the captors contend that the claimants had only a lien on this cargo, and that liens will not be protected or regarded in a prize court. This position is sustained by the authorities as to certain kinds of liens. The extent of this doctrine, and the reasons on which it is founded, are stated by the supreme court in The Frances, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 418. It is there said that "cases of liens created by the mere private contract of individuals, depending upon the different laws of different countries, are not allowed, because of the difficulties which would arise in deciding upon them, and the door which would be open to fraud." Similar reasons are given by Lord Stowell in The Marianna, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 25, 26, and in several other cases. These reasons are especially applicable to latent liens created under local laws. They do not reach the case now before the court. This coffee was purchased by the claimants at Rio, and shipped by them on board this brig under a bill of lading, by which the master was bound to deliver it to their order, and they ordered it to be delivered to

J. L. Phipps & Co., that is, to themselves. They then retained the legal title, and the possession of the master was their possession. Being the legal owners of the property, they can hardly be said to have a lien upon it; a lien being in strictness an incumbrance on the property of another. Their real character was that of trustees holding the legal title and possession, with a right of retention until their advances should be paid.

In The Frances, and many other cases, it is held that the lien of a neutral carrier for the freight of enemy's goods is, upon capture, to be allowed. The general doctrine seems to be that where a neutral has a jus in re, where he is in possession with a right of retention until a certain amount is paid to him, the captor takes cum onere, and must allow the amount of such right. But where the neutral has merely a jus ad rem, which he cannot enforce without the aid of a court of justice, his claim will not be recognized by a prize court. The Tobago, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 218. The high court of admiralty in England has in some instances gone further against captors, and allowed to British merchants the amount of their claims upon enemies' ships for repairs and supplies. The Belvidere, 1 Dods. 356; The Vrow Sarah, 1 Dods. 355, note. See, also, The Constantia Harlessen, Edw. Adm. 232. The case of the St. Joze Indiano, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 208, has been cited by the counsel for the claimants; and they contend that it sustains their whole claim, and requires all the coffee to be restored to them. That case is a stringent authority to the extent of the £2000 which the claimants invested or advanced in the purchase; but I do not think that it authorizes me to go further. It is in several respects distinguishable from the present case. There the legal title to the cargo was held by enemies. Here it is held by neutrals. In both, the cargo was purchased partly by funds of the holder of the legal title, and partly by funds of their foreign correspondents. But, in the case now before the court, the amount advanced by these neutral claimants is clearly ascertained, while, in the St. Joze Indiano, the amount advanced by the enemy purchasers of the cargo, who held the legal title, did not appear by the preparatory evidence, and could have been ascertained only by further proof to be derived from the enemy, and to depend upon such accounts as he should make up after knowledge of the capture. Another and more important distinction between the cases is the indorsement on this bill of lading, made and sworn to by one of the claimants at Rio, stating that a portion of the coffee was the property of British subjects, thus distinctly announcing that, although, by virtue of the bill of lading, they had the legal title to the whole, part only really belonged to them, and that they held the residue for the benefit of others who were not British subjects. And accompanying this bill of lading was a letter of instruction from the claimants' house in Rio to their house in New York, in which it is distinctly said that the portion stated in that indorsement to be the property of British subjects is the amount for which they had drawn on their house in Liverpool toward the purchase of the cargo. That amount was £2000. Nor is this all. After the capture, a letter with instructions and the bill of lading came to the hands of the New York house, the bill of lading being indorsed to their order; and thereupon they indorsed and delivered over the bill of lading to Charles M. Fry & Co., who were the agents of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co.; and at the time of such transfer it was agreed that, from the coffee or its proceeds, the £2000 should be paid to the claimants, and that the residue should be held by Fry & Co. as the agents, and for the benefit, of Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. The claimants thus transferred the legal title to the coffee, so far as was in their power in its then condition, to Fry & Co., who were to hold it merely as trustees, first for the benefit of the claimants to the extent of their advances, and the residue for the benefit of the Richmond merchants. Now suppose that the whole of the proceeds of the coffee should be restored to these claimants, it would clearly be their duty, after deducting the £2000 advanced by them, to pay over the residue to Fry & Co. as agents, and for the benefit of the Richmond merchants. The court would thus in effect order that residue (about nine-tenths of the whole) to be paid to Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. Every reason which has been or can be assigned against restoring this cargo to Dunlop, Moncure, & Co., upon their own claim, made through Fry & Co., exists in full force against restoring the residue upon the claim made by J. L. Phipps & Co. These two separate claims have been interposed to the whole of the 4700 bags of coffee. The claimants hope that one of them may be wholly sustained. It is immaterial to them which, and they are accordingly both represented by the same counsel. If the whole property shall be delivered to Fry & Co., they will pay to Phipps & Co. the £2000, and hold the residue for Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. If the whole be delivered to Phipps & Co., they will pay themselves the £2000, and hold the residue for Dunlop, Moncure, & Co. Prize courts have never thus protected the interest of the enemy. In The Abo, decided in 1854, Spinks, 351, Dr. Lushington says, "This court inquires in whom the property is vested, and not merely at what is called a legal title at common law." In The Maria, decided in 1857, 11 Moore, P. C. 281, 287, it appears that the high court of admiralty condemned a vessel because a neutral claimant held only the legal title, while the beneficial interest belonged to other neutrals. On appeal, this judgment was reversed by the privy council, because the whole property was in neutrals; no doubt was suggested that, if the beneficial interest had been in enemies, there must have been condemnation. It is contended that the doctrine of these cases is inconsistent with that of the supreme court in The St. Joze Indiano, [supra.]. I do not think it necessary to determine whether that case goes the length of deciding that, wherever the mere legal title is in an enemy, condemnation must follow; because, if it be so, it only shows what is apparent from other cases, that belligerents sometimes condemn property upon a doctrine which they do not adopt when it will acquit. If this ought not to be, if in fairness a uniform rule should be established, it certainly ought not to be that which stops at the mere legal title, but that which ascertains and deals with the real beneficial interest. For, if the court were never to look beyond the legal title, the result would be that when such title is held by an enemy in trust for a neutral, the latter loses his whole property; but, when the legal title is in a neutral in trust for an enemy, the property is restored to the neutral, not for his benefit, but merely as a conduit through which it is to be conveyed to the enemy. To refuse to look beyond the legal title is to close our eyes for the benefit of the enemy. It would enable him always to protect his property by simply putting it in the name of a neutral trustee.

This cargo has been sold by an interlocutory order, and the proceeds brought into the registry. If the amount had been less than the original cost, it might have been necessary to look at the order under which the purchase was made, to see whether Phipps & Co. would not be limited to the same proportion of the coffee or its proceeds as the amount of their advance was of the whole purchase money. But that inquiry is unnecessary, because the proceeds exceeds the original cost, interest, and expenses, and Phipps & Co. claim, to their own use only, the amount of their advance and interest. That claim must be allowed. I am saved the necessity of determining the time and rate of interest, the parties having agreed that for this trial the £2000 and interest shall be deemed equal to $10,793.63. This agreement is not to affect either party in any appellate tribunal. The claim of J. L. Phipps & Co., which I have been considering, states the amount of their advances to be £2000. They have now, at this late period, presented a claim for £900 more, and moved for an order for further proof to enable them to obtain evidence to show that their advances toward the purchase amounted to £2900. Considering the statements as to the advance found on the bill of lading in the letter of advice and in the original claim, and that this motion is founded on an account made up in Rio in December last, long after this capture must have been there known, I doubt whether the motion could have been granted, if it had been made at an earlier day. It is unnecessary, however, to consider that question, because it comes so late that I think I must refuse it by reason of the delay which its allowance at this time would occasion. This cause is to be carried to the circuit court, and thence, it is understood, to the highest tribunal. If further time be allowed in this court, an appeal cannot be taken to the May term of the circuit court. It must go over to October, a loss of five months, and this may occasion the delay of a year in the supreme court; whereas, if a decree be now entered, and the appeal taken, the circuit court can allow further proof, if it see fit to do so, as to the quantum of the advances, without postponing the hearing and determination of the great and vital questions, and without delaying the ultimate decision of the cause.

Decree, that ten thousand seven hundred and ninety-three dollars and sixty-three cents be paid to J. L. Phipps & Co., and that the residue of the proceeds in the registry be condemned.

NOTE, [from original report.] On appeal to the circuit court, £2910. 11s. was allowed instead of £2000. Interest was only allowed to the date of the capture, because the property was so mingled with the belligerents, that it could not be separated until the proof were taken; and for the same reason, the rate of exchange on the day of the capture was taken. No appeal was taken to the supreme court as to so much of the decree as allowed the claim of Phipps & Co. The decree of condemnation of the residue was affirmed. The AMY WARWICK.

AUCTION OF PRIZE CARGO—COMMISSIONS OF AUCTIONEER.

[The cargo of a prize ship was sold at public auction. The sale was successful in its results, $145,393.04 being realized. Care, diligence, and labor proportionate to the importance and magnitude of the sale were exercised by the auctioneer, embracing labor in the preparation of samples, sorting and cataloguing the merchandise in lots, prior to the sale. Held, a commission of one-half of one per cent. was a suitable compensation for his services.]

In admiralty. At the sale of the Amy Warwick's cargo, which brought, $145,393.04, the auctioneer, N. A. Thompson, charged, for his services, a commission of two and one-half per cent., amounting to $3633.26. This charge was objected to by Mr. Dana, the United States Attorney, and by the counsel for the claimants, as excessive; and

Sprague, J., ordered evidence to be taken as to the custom of auctioneers and merchants in similar cases. On the return of this evidence, the question was argued by Mr. Dana, and by counsel for the auctioneer.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The question is, what compensation shall be allowed to the auctioneer. It is agreed that the marshal made no special contract with the auctioneer as to his compensation. It is suggested that there is an implied contract between them, by which the auctioneer is to receive the commission usually paid where no special contract is made. I cannot accede to this position. The marshal stated to Mr. Thompson that he had no authority to make any contract with him as to his compensation, for the reason that the court must finally decide on all charges; and Mr. Thompson so understood it. If there was no authority to make a contract, that excludes an implied contract as well as an express contract. There can be no contract binding the court as to the pay of the auctioneer; for it is the duty of the court to pass upon it, as a judicial question. The only point to be decided, therefore, is, What is a suitable compensation? To determine this, I have had evidence taken as to the usual or market rates of payment. The result of the testimony seems to be this: Where the auctioneer is also consignee of the property, and acts, in fact, as commission merchant, receives the merchandise, is responsible for its custody and preservation, decides on the manner, time, and terms of its sale, sells it and collects the money, he charges two and one-half per cent. If he guarantees the payments, he charges more. There are also some special cases, such as the sale of wrecked goods, where the auctioneer takes the charge of them, sees to the transportation, does many of the duties of consignee, and where the duties of auctioneer, from the state of the goods, are onerous, in which he charges two and one-half per cent. But if he performs the simple duties of an auctioneer of property in the custody of another, and there is nothing extraordinary in the condition of the property, the rule is to charge one per cent. But, if the property is not of sufficient value to make one per cent an adequate compensation, a round sum is charged. And if the value is great, as if it amounts to $50,000, or $100,000, it is customary to make a bargain beforehand; in which case, the rates agreed are often one-half or even one-quarter of one per cent. All the witnesses, those called by the auctioneers as well as those called by the claimants and captors, said they had never known a case where merchandise of one kind, as tea, coffee, or rice, of the value of $100,000 or upwards, had been sold by auction to a private person, when as much as one per cent had been paid. Special bargains were always made, and the rates would depend on circumstances; but in such cases, for the ordinary duties of auctioneers, from one-half to one-quarter of one per cent. would be a compensation, for which the most capable and trustworthy auctioneers would be glad to make the sales. Real estate and ships are not sold on a commission, but for round sums, and usually for sums, if the value is large, which would range from one-quarter to one-tenth of one per cent. In those cases, the duty is simple, and the auctioneer does not usually collect the money. Certain auctioneers have testified that, in selling for marshals heretofore, they have always charged two and one-half per cent., and for navy agents five per cent.; but as they admitted, on cross-examination, that they had always paid back one-half of their commissions to the officers employing them, I may properly disregard that evidence altogether. It is proper that I should add that these witnesses said they had not sold for any persons now in office, and under my jurisdiction. There was also evidence that the auctioneer who sells all the prizes in New York charges two and one-half per cent.; but this was only in the form of a letter, read by consent, with no cross-examination, and at most is only the charges of one person in another city. The result of all the evidence, to my mind, is plainly this: In the sale of merchandise, where the duties are simply those of an auctioneer, if the value is small, a round sum is charged; if very large, a special bargain is made; and in ordinary and average cases, the custom is to charge one per cent. It remains only to inquire, What were the duties performed in this case?

This cargo was coffee. It was in the custody of the marshal in a store-house. The marshal is responsible for the care and custody until the goods are turned into money, and is paid liberally for it. The auctioneer has not only no charge or custody, but cannot interfere with the goods in any manner beyond what is necessary to effect a good sale, and then subject to the marshal's care and custody. The auctioneer exercises no judgment as to the mode, time, or terms of the sale. These are determined by the court. The court directs the sale to be by auction, the terms to be cash, and the time of the sale is fixed by the warrant. The auctioneer assumes no responsibility on these points. He collects the money, it appears; but it is cash, and the duty is simply to receive and pay over to the marshal. But there were duties which the auctioneer performed, which did require time and attention, prior to the sale. He visited the stores four or five times, spending a couple of hours each time; and his partner visited them as many times, spending as much time on each occasion; and their clerk made several visits there. The object of these visits there was to arrange the coffee into lots, label the lots, obtain samples of each, arrange the samples and send them to merchants here and in New York, prepare catalogues of the lots, and see to their printing and distribution. For the labor of others in these duties, separate charges are made, including all the printing, &c. There were some one hundred and seventy lots. The sale itself occupied from an hour to an hour and a half. The successful bidders could take their choice of lots, and take from one lot to the whole. There were, in fact, six purchasers in all. After the sale, the bills were made out, and the money collected from each purchaser, in cash or treasury notes, and paid over to the marshal. The sale was a successful one, and entirely satisfactory to the captors and the claimants; and it is understood that the auctioneer brought to bear diligence, attention, and the skill of his occupation. The amount was large, and attracted attention, and the consequent responsibility is to be paid for.

I desire to have it understood, as this case will tend to fix the rule in this district, that I treat the sale as one of magnitude, entailing proportionate care and responsibility, attended with labor beforehand in preparing samples, sorting, cataloguing, &c., which employed what might amount to the time of the auctioneer, his partner, and clerk, for the better part of three or four days, and one in which diligence and skill were exercised, and a sale entirely successful in its results. On the other hand, the duties were only those of an auctioneer, with such limitations on the exercise of discretion as I have noticed. I cannot think of allowing any such sum as has been charged,—two and a half per cent., amounting to over $3,600. I desire to allow such a sum as, followed in future cases, will secure the services of the most skillful and responsible auctioneers, who shall feel themselves liberally paid. The interests of all, as well as justice to the persons employed, dictate such a policy. I am satisfied that in this case a commission of one-half of one per cent., amounting to $726.96, will be such a compensation. It is accordingly allowed, in lieu of the charge made. At the same time, I am called upon to settle the allowance to the same auctioneer for selling the prize cargoes of the steamer P. C. Wallis, and the schooners Southern Independence, Victoria, and Charlotte. His charges are two and a half per cent. The duties performed are rather less in time and care than in the case of the Amy Warwick's cargo. Having some reference to the amounts of the respective sales, I assign the compensation as follows: Southern Independence and Victoria, one-half per cent. each; Charlotte, five-eighths per cent.; P. C. Wallis, one per cent. The result of all the cases is as follows:—

1 FED. CAS.—52

Amy Warwick	$145,393 04
Allowed ½ per cent.....	726 96
Southern Independence	64,013 94

Case No. 345.

AMY et al. v. SHELBY COUNTY.

[1 Flip. 104.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. Ang. 7, 1872.

TAXATION OF COSTS—FEES FOR RECEIVING AND FILING.

1. No paper is "filed" unless it has the proper indorsement of the clerk. Merely placing it in the court papers is no "filing." When indorsed by the clerk "received and filed," and actually filed, a fee of ten cents is allowed, and when it is necessary to enter a note on the calendar of such fact an additional fee of fifteen cents is allowed.

2. When the number of words are less than a hundred they are counted a folio, and as such entry is, in fact, a record, the departmental construction is the proper one, which gives the clerk ten cents for "filing" a paper and fifteen cents for the record entry in the calendar.

Appeal from taxation of clerk's cost. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Randolph, Hammond & Jordan, for plaintiffs.

Wm. W. McDowell, for defendant.

WITHEY, District Judge. Two thousand coupons, being for interest on certain bonds of Shelby county, were introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered in his favor, for the amount of all the coupons and interest. The clerk charged as fees ten cents for filing each coupon—$200—also for making certificate on each of the fact that judgment was rendered thereon—fifteen cents—$300; the court, for greater security against any improper use of such obligations, having ordered such certificates to be canceled. The ex-clerk rendered the services, and the taxation was by the present clerk. From his taxation defendant appeals. By agreement the appeal is submitted to me, as the cause was tried while I was on the bench discharging the duties of the district judge of Tennessee, who was necessarily absent in the eastern district.

I have carefully examined the question presented, and am of opinion that the taxed bill of clerk's fees should be reformed. The fee bill gives the clerk "for filing and entering every declaration, plea or other paper, ten cents." This relates to papers in the cause which constitute a part of the files proper, and embraces such only as when filed cannot be withdrawn of right by either party. Thus, a promissory note or bond, upon which suit is brought, introduced in evidence, is not a paper to be filed in the cause. It belongs to the party producing it, and when it has subserved its purpose as evidence, has no necessary place in the files; is not to be indorsed "received and filed," nor is it to be entered in the court calendar. It is true that such papers are usually left with the files, but strictly a note or bond used merely as evidence, is no part of the files proper, any more than is a deed used for a like purpose. The duty of the clerk is to indorse on such note or bond, where it constitutes the subject matter of the suit, a certificate of the fact that judgment has been rendered thereon. This is done to guard against any subsequent assertion of a claim thereon, or other improper use thereof. For such certificate the clerk is entitled to a fee of fifteen cents. If for any reason the court directs such paper to be filed, the clerk will be entitled to the fee of ten cents "for filing and entering." The coupons were used merely as items of evidence; they are not necessarily to be "filed and entered," and constitute in no proper sense a part of the files in the cause, unless the court ordered them to be filed. No such order was made, but the court did order that each coupon be indorsed by the clerk with a certificate that judgment was rendered thereon, in order that no improper use could be made of them thereafter. This was done by the clerk, but none are indorsed "received and filed," etc., and I do not see how the clerk can claim under the fee-bill ten cents each for filing papers which have never been filed. The clerk argues that when the coupons are placed in the files of the case, they are filed. I regard this a mistaken view. No paper is filed unless it has the proper indorsement thereon. The fee of ten cents is given for making such indorsement, and when necessary, entering a note on the calendar of the paper and date of filing.

The accounting officer of the proper department of the government allows ten cents for filing each paper, and fifteen cents additional for entering in the calendar a note of the filing; holding, I suppose, that such entry is a "record" entitling the clerk to a fee of fifteen cents a folio. When the number of words are less than one hundred they are counted a folio, and inasmuch as such entry is in fact a record, I am inclined to regard the departmental construction the proper one, which gives the clerk ten cents for filing a paper and fifteen cents for the record entry in the calendar. Again, the fee-bill, (and it is under this claim, as I understand, that the department gives the fifteen cents for entering in the calendar a paper regarding it a record,) provides "for making any record certificate, return or report, for each folio fifteen cents." In reference to the coupons in question, the court directed, as before stated, the clerk to indorse on each of the two thousand coupons a certificate that judgment was rendered thereon, with date, number of cause and court. This was done, and for this service the clerk has charged a fee of fifteen cents each for two thousand certificates of one folio each, regarding such indorsement as a certificate. In this, I think the clerk is correct. While it is not a "record," it is a "certificate" of the fact that each coupon had gone into judgment, and a most important one for the defendant, Shelby county. It is a certificate of cancellation for which the county can well afford to pay, and is, I think, strictly within the terms of the fee-bill last referred to, a "certificate." The fee of fifteen cents per folio, counting each certificate one folio, amounts to three hundred dollars. This I allow.

I remark, that had the clerk, in fact, under the circumstances, actually indorsed on each coupon, "Recorded and filed," etc., I should be disposed to allow the fee of ten cents for filing. This not having been done, and not being necessary, I do not allow it. The ex-clerk's fees, as taxed by the present clerk, amounting to $841.22. I disallow the item of $200 for "filing 2,000 other papers in cause, ten cents each," and tax the clerk's cost under this bill at six hundred and forty-one dollars and twenty-two cents ($641.22.)

SALVAGE—SUPERSEDING MASTER—TAMPERING WITH EVIDENCE—COSTS.

1. Where the libellant went on board the brig at Bermuda to come in her to New York, and alleged that the master proved incompetent, and after being out twenty-three days, the provisions and water falling short, he took charge of the vessel and brought her into a port of Nova Scotia, contrary to the wishes of her master, and thereby saved her to her owners, Held, That the facts alleged by the libellant as to the condition of the vessel were not sustained by the proof.

2. That whether the libellant did supersede the master or not, the facts of the case were not such as to warrant the court in giving him compensation for such action. No such extraordinary remedy was necessary under the circumstances shown. That the libellant's claim, therefore, must be dismissed.

3. Where the log of the vessel, as produced in court, had plainly been tampered with by the master or mate, or both—the master being part owner, and the mate his brother, Held, that such a circumstance might well justify a court in rejecting, without ceremony, not only the log, but also the evidence of the persons who attempted to impose it upon the court.

4. That the court would mark its disapproval of such misconduct by condemning the vessel to pay the costs of the action.

In admiralty. This was an action to recover salvage. The libel was filed by Walter

Burke in behalf of himself and all others, and it averred that in December last the libellant, Burke, being in Bermuda, and desirous of coming to New York, was offered a passage, free of expense, in the Italian brig "Anastasia," and he accordingly came on board for that purpose, and that there came on board at the same port a crew of six consul's men also bound to New York; that in the prosecution of the voyage the vessel met with adverse winds and cold weather, which the Italian master and crew proved incompetent to contend with successfully; that the vessel was frequently and unnecessarily put back, and so kept knocking about for some twenty-three days without making any port, when the whole voyage need not have occupied more than ten or fifteen days at the farthest; that on the twenty-third day of the voyage, when the provisions and water were already getting short, and when the vessel was within about thirty miles from the port of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, the wind then blowing from the northwest and the brig being badly iced, the master announced his intent to put back again and run for Bermuda; that such course, if adopted, would have placed the vessel in great danger of loss through the starvation of all on board; whereupon, the libellant, Burke, in order to preserve the vessel, took charge of the same, and with the aid of the consul's men knocked off the ice and headed her for Liverpool, contrary to the wishes of the master; that she arrived off Liverpool the same night at dark, and stood off and on till morning, when she went into the harbor in safety; and but for the services so rendered by him, the libellant alleged that the vessel would, as he believed, have been totally lost, and that such services were extraordinary and entitled him to a salvage compensation. These allegations the claimants for the most part denied, and they insisted that the vessel was in no danger; that her master and crew were competent to her navigation; that the libellant rendered no service; and that the vessel went into Liverpool in accordance with the wishes of her master, in order that they might get rid of the libellant and the consul's men, who, as it is claimed, seemed desirous of causing disturbance on the vessel.

Benedict, Tracy & Benedict, for libellant.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue and T. Scudder, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case has been treated on both sides as if the crew of consul's men were to be considered libellants as well as Burke, although the libel sets forth that no special services were rendered by the crew—makes no claim for compensation to them, and prays no decree in their favor. I shall therefore consider the case as it has been treated by the advocates, and shall in the first instance dispose of the claim of the seamen by saying that the proof that they were paid in Liverpool for their services on board, a sum which they received in full of all their demands, is clear. They were intelligent men, and knew what they were about when they accepted this payment as in full, and I must hold any claim they may have had, to have been satisfied by this payment.

There remains the demand of Burke. The position of this person on board the brig, as described by himself, is somewhat anomalous, and I do not consider it clear that he can be considered to have been a passenger within the meaning of the maritime law as applied to passengers in cases of salvage.

In the case of The Hanna, 15 Law T. (N. S.) 334, it was held by Dr. Lushington that a person very similarly situated was not a passenger nor a seaman, but a nondescript.

This question, however, is immaterial in this case, as I am of the opinion that it is not in any respect a case where a salvage can be awarded to him. It will be observed that the libellant does not claim to have performed any considerable labor or incurred any personal risk or displayed any extraordinary ability, but his demand is based upon the fact, as he claims it to have been, that he assumed the extraordinary responsibility of overruling the actual master of the vessel and of putting himself at the head of the consul's men and carrying the vessel into Liverpool without the direction and contrary to the wishes of her master. That the libellant did this is stoutly denied by the Italian master and crew; but if he did, I cannot, under the facts of this case, endorse his action to such an extent as to award him a salvage compensation therefor.

This vessel had suffered no injury from stress of weather. The allegation that she was short of provisions or water is not sustained by the proofs. Her master and crew were in good health, sufficient in number for the ordinary crew of such a vessel; and, although their method of navigation would doubtless be far from satisfactory to most American seamen, they were competent, after their fashion and in their own time, to complete their voyage. It is, therefore, not a case where the extraordinary remedy which the libellant claims to have resorted to was necessary for the salvation of the vessel. It must be a strong case, clearly proved, which would justify a court in commending, by a salvage award, the assumption of such authority and such a responsibility.

The interests of commerce, which are the foundation of the whole doctrine of salvage, require that the master of a ship, who has been intrusted by the owners to take charge of their property, and who is responsible to them for its safe return, shall continue in command, as long as there is any vessel left to be commanded. He may call salvors to his aid, but he is to be superseded while at sea only as a last resort in a case of desperate necessity. I do not say that the case may not arise where it might be the duty of a passenger, seaman, or any other competent person present, to overrule the master and change the destination of a vessel against his wishes, nor do I say that the due assumption of such a responsibility would not be good ground for awarding a salvage compensation. But I apprehend that a case far stronger than the present one must be made out to justify such an award, whether to a person who did or did not owe duty to the ship.

I shall therefore reject the libellant's claim to recover a salvage award, but in so doing cannot allow to pass unnoticed a feature in the defence which I regret much to have seen. I allude to the condition of the brig's log book as produced in court by the claimant. It is clearly to be seen that this log has been tampered with by the master (who is part owner of the brig) or the mate (who is his brother), or both—parts erased—parts written in since the occurrence of the transactions purporting to be related. Such a circumstance might well justify a court in rejecting without ceremony, not only the log itself, but also the evidence of the persons who attempt to impose it upon the court, and in a different case from the present might have ensured defeat to the claimants.

In the absence of any other way of marking my disapproval of such misconduct, I shall render in this case a decree similar to one rendered by Dr. Lushington for a different reason in the salvage case of The Rosalind, 2 Mar. Law Cas. 220, and while I award no sum to the libellant as salvage, shall condemn the vessel to pay the costs of this action.

The ANASTASIA.

[1 Ben. 188.]

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1867.

BOTTOMRY—CHARTERED VESSEL—PRIOR ADVANCE REPAID OUT OF FREIGHT IN PREFERENCE TO SUBSEQUENT BOTTOMRY—UNIFORMITY IN MARITIME DECISIONS DESIRABLE.

1. The Italian brig Anastasia was chartered in Marseilles to the libellant for a voyage to New York for the round sum of £600. The charter-party provided that the master should sign bills of lading without prejudice to it, the loss or profit arising on them to be for account of the charterer; that the ship should be consigned to the charterer's correspondents, and that the charterer should "advance to the captain in Marseilles 4,000 francs on account of the freight, without interest or commissions, the captain paying the premium of insurance." The charterer advanced the 4,000 francs, and the vessel sailed with a cargo, partly the charterer's and partly taken on board by his orders. The freight by the bills of lading amounted to $3,163.89, in gold, being $283.89 in excess of the charter money. The vessel on the voyage met with disaster, and her captain took up money for her by bottomry on ship, cargo, and freight, and completed his voyage. The bottomry not being paid, the bondholder filed his libel against ship, freight, and cargo, and the consignees paid the freight into court, and gave bonds for the value of the cargo, which abundantly secured the bond. Thereupon, the charterer filed a libel against the freight, claiming the amount of his advance and the excess above the charter money. By consent, his libel was treated as a petition, and the libel of the bondholder as an answer to it.

2. Held, That, under the rules which are applied in favor of bottomry bonds as against prior bottomries, mortgages, and other loans to the master or owner, it should be held that a bottomry bond binds not only the ship but her whole earnings. But that a distinction is made in the cases, between advances on freight and other advances, and it is held that sums advanced upon account of the freight must be deducted in preference to the bottomry.

[Cited in The Eureka, Case No. 4,547.]

3. That in this case the freight was, so far as the ship owner was concerned, paid to the extent of the advance, and was not at risk.

4. That the power to hypothecate by bottomry the cargo as well as the ship, is one conferred by the maritime law to facilitate commerce; and that it will be in furtherance of that object to limit the power as to the freight to the interest of the ship owner in the freight. This will enable a charterer to make an advance without risk of losing his security by a subsequent bottomry, which in many cases will enable a ship to raise money without bottomry, and will work no injustice to shippers of cargo, who, shipping in a chartered ship, may be held to have assented to the terms of the charter which provides for the advance.

5. That the interests of commerce require uniformity in the maritime law, as administered in the maritime courts of all countries.

In admiralty. In June, 1867, the Italian brig Anastasia, being in the port of Marseilles, was chartered to one Alfred Giraud, for a voyage thence to the port of New York. The charter-party, among other things, provided that the ship should receive its full and entire cargo at the choice of the charterer; that she should not be laden with merchandise other than that of the charterer or that sent by his order; and that she should sail to New York direct, and there make delivery of the cargo in conformity with the bills of lading, on payment of the freight of the round sum of £600, being for the entire capacity of the vessel. It was also further provided by the charter-party that the master should sign the bills of lading for the freight therein specified, without prejudice to the charter-party, the loss or profit arising thereupon to be for the account of the charterer; that the master should consign his vessel to the correspondents of the charterer in New York, and the charterer should "advance to the captain in Marseilles 4,000 francs on account of the freight without interest or commissions, the captain paying the premium of insurance." In pursuance of this contract the charterer advanced the stipulated sum of 4,000 francs, and the vessel set sail, laden with cargo, partly belonging to the charterer, and the balance taken by his orders, the freight list of which amounted to the sum of $3,163.89, in gold, according to the bills of lading executed by the master in pursuance of the charter-party. During the voyage the vessel met with disaster, and was compelled to put into Bermuda, where the master raised the sum of £2,500, upon bottomry of the ship, freight, and cargo. Departing from Bermuda, the vessel arrived in New York, when the master declined to consign her to the correspondents of the charterer, refused to deliver up the bills of lading, or allow them to collect the freight, and neglected to pay the bottomry bond when due. The holder of the bond thereupon filed his libel in this court against ship, freight, and cargo; whereupon the consignees of the cargo paid into court the freight money according to the bills of lading, and the ship and freight being insufficient to discharge the bottomry bond, they gave security for the value of the cargo, thus abundantly securing payment of the bond. The freight money being thus in the registry, the charterer, Alfred Giraud, filed his libel against it, claiming to be entitled to be paid out of it, in preference to the bondholder, his advance of 4,000 francs, and $283.89, being the excess of the freight list above the £600 for which the ship was chartered, and praying that the court would marshal the assets and direct payment of these sums to him. This libel being treated as a petition, and the libel of the bondholder being by consent taken as an answer thereto, and the master having filed an answer setting forth the facts attending the bottomry for the information of the court, but not claiming to be entitled to receive any part of the fund, the cause came up upon the issue so framed and the facts as alleged in the respective pleadings which were admitted to be true.

C. M. Da Costa, in behalf of the charterer, argued the following points:

1. At the time of the execution of the bond, the brig had received, on account of the freight due her from the charterer, the sum of 4,000 francs. The captain, therefore, could not and did not pledge it to the bondholder. Had no bond been given, the ship owner would, of course, have had to make the deduction; and, in the language of Dr. Lushington, "The bondholder, who stands in the ship owner's place with reference to this freight, must also be subject to the same deduction." The Catherine, Swab. 264. On principle, too, a man cannot pledge what does not belong to him. All that was then due the ship was the charter money, less the advance; with the freight list the master had, by the terms of the charter-party, no concern.

2. The rule is well settled, that a general hypothecation of the freight by the master in a foreign port, will be construed to include all the freight of the whole voyage, whether earned at the time the bond is made or not, provided it has not been paid to the master or owner.

Or, stated in other language: When freight is included in a bottomry bond, any portion of the freight which has been paid anterior to the date of the bond, is not subject to it. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 429; The John, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 170; The Cynthia, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 625; The Catherine, Swab. 264; The Standard, Id. 267; The Salacia, Holt, Adm. Cas. 322. In this last and latest case, Dr. Lushington reiterates the rule laid down in his former decisions, but adds, that in case the charter-party provides (as it did there) that the advance was to be made for ship's disbursements, it will not be deemed an advance on account of freight, but a loan to the captain, unless the charter authorizes it to be deducted on the settlement of the freight. In the case at bar, this distinction does not apply, for the charter-party in express terms says, that it is an advance on account of the freight or charter money.

3. The theory invoked that the bottomry bond saved the adventure, and that therefore the advance should be subject to it, is not tenable for a moment, because—1. At the date of the bond, the advance had been paid, and was therefore no longer at risk. 2. Besides, a bondholder has nothing to do with what is at risk or not; all he looks to is the property pledged. The theory of general average, cannot be, therefore, and never is, invoked in his favor. What interests, if any, shall contribute in general average, does not concern him, but only the owners of the property pledged, and their underwriters. The Gratitude, 3. C. Rob. Adm. 264; Bradley v. Maryland Ins. Co., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 378, 405, 406.

4. The English cases cited under points 1 and 2 are directly in point. The fact that in the case at bar, the charterer himself shipped, only a part of the cargo (the rest being shipped by others with his permission, and by his orders), can make no difference in principle. True, we claim the profit to be for our account, but so would the loss have been. The charter-party expressly provided for the profit or loss being for account of the charterer. Had there been a loss, the bondholder could have compelled the charterer to have paid into court the entire charter money, less the advances. Besides, it nowhere appears in the English cases, that the charterers were the sole shippers of the cargo; and the case of The John, ubi supra, arose between the bondholder and an assignee of the charter-party.

5. All the equities are with the libellant; the bondholder is amply secured. The value of the cargo, alone, is fully five times as much as his bond. The court will, therefore, under any circumstances, so marshal the assets as to enforce the libellant's claim against the freight, leaving the bondholder to enforce his out of the ship, balance of freight, and cargo. See the rule as laid down by Dr. Lushington in The Trident, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 29, 35.

6. The libellant, therefore, is entitled to a decree for the amount claimed, with costs.

J. S. Ridgway, for the respondents, presented the following points:

1. The freight pledged to the lender on bottomry, &c., at Bermuda, was the freight expressed in the bills of lading and payable by the consignees of the cargo then on board for the carriage and delivery of said cargo, contradistinguished from the charter money (denominated freight) or hire of the vessel agreed to be paid by charterer to the owner of the vessel.

2. The power of the master, as agent of all concerned, including the charterer of the vessel, as well as the owner thereof and owners of cargo, to so pledge the freight payable for carriage of such cargo, will not be questioned. And in the present case, not only can the general principle be invoked that the master is in that capacity agent of all concerned, including the charterer, but the provision in the charter-party to the effect that the master shall sign bills of lading of cargo shipped, at rates of freight therefor designated by the charterer, is a recognition in express terms of such agency, and sufficient of itself to constitute the master such agent of the charterer, with power to act in his behalf concerning the subject matter.

3. The charterer was owner pro hac vice, and as such entitled to the ship's earnings on the voyage, and had undertaken the risks of safe carriage and delivery of the cargo specified in the bills of lading. The freight stipulated in the bills of lading was at risk, and dependent upon safe delivery of said cargo at the port of destination. No part of the freight stipulated in said bills of lading had been paid in advance, and the fact of the payment of part, or even the whole of the charter money in advance, does not in a case like the present, of a speculative character, create or constitute a valid claim or lien by or on the part of such charterer to be reimbursed out of the said freight the amount advanced by him on account of the charter or hire of the vessel, superior to or in preference to that of a lender on bottomry; for all the freight was at risk, and by means of the loan on bottomry, &c., was preserved to the benefit of the charterer for whose account and risk said voyage was undertaken and prosecuted. Standing in the position of owner for the voyage, such advance by the charterer, being on account of hire of the vessel and to acquire the control thereof for the voyage for speculative purposes, can be no more the ground of any valid claim to reimbursement of that amount to him out of the freight in preference to the claim and lien of a lender on bottomry, &c., than would the payment of a like sum by a purchaser on account of purchase money or the payment by the absolute owner of such amount to provision the vessel for and dispatch her on the voyage. The freight on cargo on board, from which the party so advancing (whether owner or charterer) is or expects to be reimbursed with profit, is at risk, and on such freight, preserved and secured by means of such loan, the lender on bottomry has the first claim and lien, and it is such freight that is pledged. The Eliza, 3 Hagg. Adm. 87; 2 Park Ins. 881.

4. The cases of The Catherine, Swab. 264; The John, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 170; The Cynthia, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 625; The Standard, Swab. 267,—cited and relied on by the libellant, do not, nor do either of them, support or warrant the conclusion sought to be deduced therefrom by him, and the principle upon which the decisions in each and all of said cases rest, is entirely consistent and in harmony with the principle contended for on the part of the bottomry bondholder in the present case. The case before the court differs from the cases so cited, and each of them, in the essential particular and distinguishing fact that in the present case the charter was a "speculative charter," and the freight in the registry is the freight on the cargo of a general ship, payable by the several consignees on delivery of such cargo, and of or on account of which freight no part had been paid in advance, while in the cases so cited it does not appear that the charters were speculative charters, or that there was any cargo on board other than cargo belonging to the charterer or assignees of the charterer, in which cases charter money represents freight on, or compensation for carriage of, cargo on board, and payments in advance on account of such charter money, are substantially and in effect payments in advance of freight on cargo so carried.

5. A bottomry bond operates upon property then the subject of risk. In consideration of the maritime interest, the lender assumes the risks of perils of the seas to time of termination of the voyage and against which he may insure. And in case of a total loss of vessel and cargo by perils of the seas and without fault of any party, the bond would be of no force or effect further and would cease to operate, even though by its terms freight was pledged and though notwithstanding such loss, the charterer was indebted to the owner of the vessel for or on account of charter money or hire of the vessel. The amount of such indebtedness could not be reached by admiralty process, and not because of any defect in the remedies provided, but on principle; because a lender on bottomry, &c., cannot take maritime interest and at the same time have a claim on or hold as security property not subject to risk or perils of the seas on such voyage; and also because (as in the present case) the freight pledged is the compensation for the carriage of goods, and is in the cargo; while the charter money or hire of the vessel rests in covenant, and is not in the cargo, except in in-the master in pursuance of the charter-party. During the voyage the vessel met with disaster, and was compelled to put into Bermuda, where the master raised the sum of £2,500, upon bottomry of the ship, freight, and cargo. Departing from Bermuda, the vessel arrived in New York, when the master declined to consign her to the correspondents of the charterer, refused to deliver up the bills of lading, or allow them to collect the freight, and neglected to pay the bottomry bond when due. The holder of the bond thereupon filed his libel in this court against ship, freight, and cargo; whereupon the consignees of the cargo paid into court the freight money according to the bills of lading, and the ship and freight being insufficient to discharge the bottomry bond, they gave security for the value of the cargo, thus abundantly securing payment of the bond. The freight money being thus in the registry, the charterer, Alfred Giraud, filed his libel against it, claiming to be entitled to be paid out of it, in preference to the bondholder, his advance of 4,000 francs, and $283.89, being the excess of the freight list above the £600 for which the ship was chartered, and praying that the court would marshal the assets and direct payment of these sums to him. This libel being treated as a petition, and the libel of the bondholder being by consent taken as an answer thereto, and the master having filed an answer setting forth the facts attending the bottomry for the information of the court, but not claiming to be entitled to receive any part of the fund, the cause came up upon the issue so framed and the facts as alleged in the respective pleadings which were admitted to be true.

C. M. Da Costa, in behalf of the charterer, argued the following points:

1. At the time of the execution of the bond, the brig had received, on account of the freight due her from the charterer, the sum of 4,000 francs. The captain, therefore, could not and did not pledge it to the bondholder. Had no bond been given, the ship owner would, of course, have had to make the deduction; and, in the language of Dr. Lushington, "The bondholder, who stands in the ship owner's place with reference to this freight, must also be subject to the same deduction." The Catherine, Swab. 264. On principle, too, a man cannot pledge what does not belong to him. All that was then due the ship was the charter money, less the advance; with the freight list the master had, by the terms of the charter-party, no concern.

2. The rule is well settled, that a general hypothecation of the freight by the master in a foreign port, will be construed to include all the freight of the whole voyage, whether earned at the time the bond is made or not, provided it has not been paid to the master or owner.

Or, stated in other language: When freight is included in a bottomry bond, any portion of the freight which has been paid anterior to the date of the bond, is not subject to it. 1 Pars. Mar. True, we claim the profit to be for our account, but so would the loss have been. The charter-party expressly provided for the profit or loss being for account of the charterer. Had there been a loss, the bondholder could have compelled the charterer to have paid into court the entire charter money, less the advances. Besides, it nowhere appears in the English cases, that the charterers were the sole shippers of the cargo; and the case of The John, ubi supra, arose between the bondholder and an assignee of the charter-party.

5. All the equities are with the libellant; the bondholder is amply secured. The value of the cargo, alone, is fully five times as much as his bond. The court will, therefore, under any circumstances, so marshal the assets as to enforce the libellant's claim against the freight, leaving the bondholder to enforce his out of the ship, balance of freight, and cargo. See the rule as laid down by Dr. Lushington in The Trident, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 29, 35.

6. The libellant, therefore, is entitled to a decree for the amount claimed, with costs.

J. S. Ridgway, for the respondents, presented the following points:

1. The freight pledged to the lender on bottomry, &c., at Bermuda, was the freight expressed in the bills of lading and payable by the consignees of the cargo then on board for the carriage and delivery of said cargo, contradistinguished from the charter money (denominated freight) or hire of the vessel agreed to be paid by charterer to the owner of the vessel.

2. The power of the master, as agent of all concerned, including the charterer of the vessel, as well as the owner thereof and owners of cargo, to so pledge the freight payable for carriage of such cargo, will not be questioned. And in the present case, not only can the general principle be invoked that the master is in that capacity agent of all concerned, including the charterer, but the provision in the charter-party to the effect that the master shall sign bills of lading of cargo shipped, at rates of freight therefor designated by the charterer, is a recognition in express terms of such agency, and sufficient of itself to constitute the master such agent of the charterer, with power to act in his behalf concerning the subject matter.

3. The charterer was owner pro hac vice, and as such entitled to the ship's earnings on the voyage, and had undertaken the risks of safe carriage and delivery of the cargo specified in the bills of lading. The freight stipulated in the bills of lading was at risk, and dependent upon safe delivery of said cargo at the port of destination. No part of the freight stipulated in said bills of lading had been paid in advance, and the fact of the payment of part, or even the whole of the charter money in advance, does not in a case like the present, of a speculative character, create or constitute a valid claim or lien by or on the part of such charterer to be reimbursed out of the said freight the amount advanced by him on account of the charter or hire of the vessel, superior to or in preference to that of a lender on bottomry; for all the freight was at risk, and by means of the loan on bottomry, &c., was preserved to the benefit of the charterer for whose account and risk said voyage was undertaken and prosecuted. Standing in the position of owner for the voyage, such advance by the charterer, being on account of hire of the vessel and to acquire the control thereof for the voyage for speculative purposes, can be no more the ground of any valid claim to reimbursement of that amount to him out of the freight in preference to the claim and lien of a lender on bottomry, &c., than would the payment of a like sum by a purchaser on account of purchase money or the payment by the absolute owner of such amount to provision the vessel for and dispatch her on the voyage. The freight on cargo on board, from which the party so advancing (whether owner or charterer) is or expects to be reimbursed with profit, is at risk, and on such freight, preserved and secured by means of such loan, the lender on bottomry has the first claim and lien, and it is such freight that is pledged. The Eliza, 3 Hagg. Adm. 87; 2 Park Ins. 881.

4. The cases of The Catherine, Swab. 264; The John, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 170; The Cynthia, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 625; The Standard, Swab. 267,—cited and relied on by the libellant, do not, nor do either of them, support or warrant the conclusion sought to be deduced therefrom by him, and the principle upon which the decisions in each and all of said cases rest, is entirely consistent and in harmony with the principle contended for on the part of the bottomry bondholder in the present case. The case before the court differs from the cases so cited, and each of them, in the essential particular and distinguishing fact that in the present case the charter was a "speculative charter," and the freight in the registry is the freight on the cargo of a general ship, payable by the several consignees on delivery of such cargo, and of or on account of which freight no part had been paid in advance, while in the cases so cited it does not appear that the charters were speculative charters, or that there was any cargo on board other than cargo belonging to the charterer or assignees of the charterer, in which cases charter money represents freight on, or compensation for carriage of, cargo on board, and payments in advance on account of such charter money, are substantially and in effect payments in advance of freight on cargo so carried.

5. A bottomry bond operates upon property then the subject of risk. In consideration of the maritime interest, the lender assumes the risks of perils of the seas to time of termination of the voyage and against which he may insure. And in case of a total loss of vessel and cargo by perils of the seas and without fault of any party, the bond would be of no force or effect further and would cease to operate, even though by its terms freight was pledged and though notwithstanding such loss, the charterer was indebted to the owner of the vessel for or on account of charter money or hire of the vessel. The amount of such indebtedness could not be reached by admiralty process, and not because of any defect in the remedies provided, but on principle; because a lender on bottomry, &c., cannot take maritime interest and at the same time have a claim on or hold as security property not subject to risk or perils of the seas on such voyage; and also because (as in the present case) the freight pledged is the compensation for the carriage of goods, and is in the cargo; while the charter money or hire of the vessel rests in covenant, and is not in the cargo, except in inproaching her nearly bows on, at the distance of a mile and a half.

2. The duty of unremitting attention on the part of a lookout enforced.

3. If the night was foggy, as claimed by the libellants, the steamer should have blown her whistle and moderated her speed, both of which precautions she neglected until too late.

4. If sufficiently clear to permit an approaching vessel to be seen at the distance of a mile and a half, her negligence in not keeping out of the way was inexcusable, if not unaccountable.

5. The familiar excuse set up by the steamer, that the schooner changed her course and ran across her bows, rejected as not supported by the testimony; and because, if it did occur, as stated by the steamer's second officer and lookout, the steamer had ample time to avoid the disaster.

[In admiralty. Decree for libellants. Affirmed in The Ancon v. Thompson, 17 Fed. 742.]

Milton Andros, for plaintiffs.

McAllister & Bergin, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. At about a quarter before five o'clock on Saturday morning September 15, the schooner Phil Sheridan, bound on a voyage from this port to the Umpqua river, state of Oregon, was run into by the steamer Ancon, and received such injuries as caused her shortly afterwards to capsize and become a total loss.

At the time of the accident two persons were on the deck of the schooner—the helmsman, and a lookout forward. The schooner was sailing close hauled to the wind, and heading towards the land on a north-east half north course. Her speed is stated by those on board to have been from two to two and a half knots per hour. The claimants' witnesses, however, suppose that a four-knot breeze was blowing; but this opinion is the result of an estimate of its velocity founded on the course of the smoke issuing from the steamer's smoke-stack, a method of determining the rate at which a schooner, close hauled to the wind, was actually sailing, which seems quite unreliable. In the view I take of the case, the point is immaterial.

Upon taking the wheel at two o'clock A. M., the helmsman had been instructed by the mate to keep a good lookout for the land, towards which the vessel was heading. He was first apprised of the steamer's approach by hearing the noise of her wheels, and supposing it to be the sound of breakers on the beach, he gave his wheel a round turn, and, fixing it with a diamond screw with which it was provided, he ran forward to see if the shore was discernible. Almost immediately on reaching the forward part of the vessel, he discovered the steamer looming through the darkness some two or three hundred yards distant, and bearing down upon the port bows of the schooner. The men endeavored, by shouting, blowing the fog-horn, etc., to attract the attention of the steamer; and the helmsman, rushing aft, found the captain—who had been aroused by the noise —at the wheel, with the helm hard-a-port. The collision occurred a few seconds afterwards, and was in fact inevitable from the moment the steamer was first discovered by the schooner.

It is not denied that the schooner was provided with lights, set and burning as required by law. It is also in proof that a fog-horn was blown at short intervals for about twenty or thirty minutes previous to the collision. The failure of the schooner not sooner to discover the steamer is accounted for by the circumstance that a dense fog prevailed, which rendered it impossible to do so. On this point the testimony is irreconcilably conflicting, not merely because the claimants' witnesses deny that a fog prevailed—although they admit that the night was very dark, that the sky was "clouded" and overcast, and that it was "smoky"—but because, if the second mate is to be credited, the schooner was first seen by him at a distance, he "can safely say," of one and a half or two miles. Her green light was also seen by Meihan, the watchman, as he says, at the distance of seven hundred yards.

The schooner was struck near her forward rigging on the port side, and, swinging around under the force of the blow, fell alongside of the steamer on her starboard side. No effort was spared to rescue her crew and passengers, and they were all, though with imminent peril to one of them, transferred to the steamer. The steamer lay near the schooner some three quarters of an hour or fifty minutes, when the master of the steamer, observing that the schooner had fallen over on her side, with her sails in the water, abandoned all hope of saving her and proceeded on his voyage.

The evidence in the case is very voluminous. Much of it, however, relates to matters comparatively immaterial, and much of it to matters so clearly established by proof as to obviate the necessity of a critical comparison and analysis.

The case may almost be determined on the testimony of one witness—Mr. Douglas, the second mate of the steamer, the officer of the deck at the time of the collision—and by applying to the facts, as stated by him, a few well-settled and familiar rules of law.

Mr. Douglas testifies that when he first saw the schooner he was standing about twenty feet from the stem of the steamer, forward of the standard compass. He had relieved and taken the place of the regular lookout, and given him permission to go below to get some coffee. He first saw the vessel, but not her lights, at the distance of one and a half or two miles. She then bore about one point, or a little better, on his starboard bow; two or three minutes later he saw the schooner's green or starboard lights. He then gave orders to the quartermaster to starboard the helm, and the vessel went off about two points towards the shore. This he verified by the compass, but "thought," he says, "that the course of the vessel was not altered quite fast enough." He does not appear, however, to have acted on that impression by repeating his order to the helmsman. At the time this change in the steamer's course was made, the schooner was distant about a mile.

The account given by Mr. Douglas of the succeeding occurrences is obscure and inconsistent.

On his direct examination he states that, after changing his course two points, as above described, he "thought he instantly saw two lights." He "then walked aft, about ten feet beyond the pilot-house, and notified the quartermaster that he had lost the appearance of the lights—to look out." He answered me, 'Yes, sir.'" "I then walked forward to the compass and looked at the compass again, and looked out for them again, and I saw they were coming very near, and I then ordered him to stop; seeing the red light, the flame, I ordered him to stop her; I then ordered him to blow the whistle, and he blew the whistle; I then ordered him to put his helm hard-a-starboard; I ordered him to blow the whistle to alarm the people, for I knew there would be a collision then."

On his cross-examination, in reply to an inquiry, how long after he saw the green light both lights came in view, he says: "That was instantaneous—probably two or three minutes after. It was so instantaneous that it confused me. That was when I ordered the quartermaster to look out—that he was changing his course."

The schooner was then, he says, probably half a mile or three quarters of a mile off. The two lights were in sight about half a minute. He then went aft to warn the quartermaster, and on his return only the red light was visible. The schooner was then "close aboard; probably two hundred and fifty yards off." It was then that he gave orders to stop and to put the helm hard-a-starboard. The helm up to this moment had remained as he had first ordered, viz., two or three spokes to starboard. In a subsequent part of his deposition the witness admits that, when he gave the order to stop, the schooner was within two hundred and fifty feet of the steamer. He also states that the collision occurred almost instantly on his return from the pilot-house, and that the time during which the schooner was not under his observation was about three minutes. He subsequently says, that on reflection he is inclined to think he has overestimated this interval.

The above is the substance of Mr. Douglas' testimony, expressed in his own language. Assuming his account to be in all respects accurate, there can be no doubt that the steamer was in fault. A vessel is described at a distance of one and a half or two miles; she is run down by a steamer which had, by stopping, backing, or changing her helm, absolute control of her movements.

It is apparent from Mr. Douglas' narrative that, with the exception of starboarding the helm two spokes, nothing was done by the steamer to warn the approaching vessel, or to avert the disaster. The testimony clearly shows that the blowing of the steamer's whistle, the stopping of the vessel, and the putting of the helm hard-a-starboard, all took place too late to be of service, and when the collision was inevitable. When the lookout was permitted to go below, he was not relieved by another of the crew. The officer of the deck undertook to act as his substitute. So negligently did he perform his self-imposed duties, or rather so negligently did he attempt to discharge the duties of lookout and of officer of the deck at the same time, that he deserts his post, goes to the pilot-house, and only regains his station (after an absence of, as at first stated by him, three minutes) at the moment of the collision. At the speed at which the vessels were approaching each other, more than half a mile of the interval between them would be traversed in that time.

The absence of a competent lookout is of itself a circumstance strongly condemnatory, and clear and satisfactory proof will be exacted that the misfortune encountered was not attributable to her misconduct in that particular. Nor will the captain or officer of the deck be accepted as competent lookouts. Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How. [62 U. The want of a lookout is not excusable because all hands are called to haul in a damaged mainsail, or to reef sails, or to haul down the flying jib, or to stow the anchor or by a custom for all the ship's company to stand lookout the first day of the voyage. Whitridge v. Dill, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 453; The Catharine v. Dickinson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 177; Thorp v. Hammond, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 414; The H. P. Baldwin, [Case No. 6,812;] The Lady Franklin, [Id. 7,984;] Sturges v. The Mazeppa, [Id. 11,271.]

The authorities I have cited sufficiently illustrate the inflexible rigor with which the rule which requires a competent lookout to be stationed, and that he be vigilant and unremitting in the discharge of his duty, is enforced.

"When strong evidence in a case of collision tends to show that the catastrophe was owing to the failure of the lookout of the libeled vessel to attend to his duty, every doubt as to the performance of the duty, and the effect of non-performance, should be resolved against the vessel sought to be inculpated, until she vindicates herself by testimony conclusive to the contrary." The Ariadne, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 475.

The proof in the case at bar brings it fully within the principles thus laid down by the supreme court. But it is not merely that the second mate dismissed the lookout and assumed the discharge of his duties, and that he left his post and was absent during several critical minutes, while there was yet time to avert the disaster, but, by his own showing, he sees a vessel approaching nearly bows on, at the distance of one and a half or two miles; he sees her, as he says, change her course at the distance of one half or three fourths of a mile, and yet, up to the moment of the collision, takes none of the precautions, such as stopping, slowing, blowing his whistle, etc., enjoined by law and dictated by common prudence.

On the contrary, the starboarding (which might have been proper if, as he says, he first saw her green light) is persisted in after the red light became visible, and when there was ample room, by porting his helm, to pass under the stern or on the port side of the schooner, or by stopping and backing to have avoided all possibility of disaster.

The steamer being thus found to be clearly in fault, it remains to consider whether the schooner, by any fault on her part, contributed to the disaster. It is intimated, though not directly charged, by Mr. Douglas, that the cause of the accident was the change by the schooner of her course, so that she ran directly across the bows of the steamer.

This defense is characterized by Mr. J. Grier as "a stereotyped excuse, usually resorted to for the purpose of justifying a careless collision; it is always improbable, and generally false." [Haney v. Baltimore Steam Packet Co.] 23 How. [64 U. S.] 291.

The only evidence tending to show that the schooner made the change in her course imputed to her, is the statement of Mr. Douglas, that he first saw her green light alone. To accept this statement, we must disbelieve the evidence of those on board the schooner;

we must also reject the inferences which may naturally and safely be drawn from facts which are not fairly open to dispute.

The schooner was beating up the coast against a north north-west wind. She was close hauled to the wind on her port tack. The steamer was coming down the coast, heading nearly south. If, as the second mate testifies, she was one point on his starboard bow, the green light would probably not be visible to him—certainly not her green light alone. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that she went about and was put on the other tack. Her helmsman and lookout both testify that she was standing towards the land. The latter had been cautioned by the mate to look out for the shore, and the noise of the steamer's paddles was at first mistaken by both of them for the sound of breakers on the beach. This circumstance, which it is impossible to suppose they have invented, appears conclusively to show that they were in fact on the port tack, heading in shore, and that the vessel had not gone about so as to present her green or starboard light to the approaching steamer. No necessity or convenience of navigation is suggested which could have induced the schooner, when sailing on the wind, to luff up so as to expose her green light alone to a vessel approaching her from an opposite direction; and I see no reason for discrediting, on the faith of Mr. Douglas' unsupported statement, the positive testimony of those on board of her.

With regard to the weather, the testimony is, as has been observed, conflicting. All agree that the night was cloudy and dark. The claimants' witnesses deny that it was foggy. Two circumstances, however, lead me to the conclusion that in this they are mistaken:

1. The fact, which is uncontradicted, that some time before the accident, the fog-horn was passed by the man at the wheel of the schooner to the lookout, and was blown at short intervals up to the moment of the collision. That at the time of the collision it was sounded and heard on board the steamer is not denied. The weather, therefore, must have been such as to suggest to the crew of the schooner the propriety of its use.

2. A fog did in fact set in after the collision. It was of short duration; but the line which led from the steam whistle forward to the lookout station, was adjusted, and the whistle was sounded some half a dozen times, a short time after the collision.

This, though it does not prove, makes it probable that similar weather prevailed before the collision. The supposition, that owing to the fog the second mate of the steamer failed to observe the schooner until she was close aboard of her, is the more natural, and indeed more charitable, explanation of the occurrence, for it relieves Mr. Douglas of the imputation of gross and almost unac-countable negligence, to which otherwise he would be obnoxious. It does not, however, acquit the steamer; for it was her plain duty to moderate her speed and to blow her steam whistle, both of which precautions she utterly neglected. A decree will be entered in favor of the libellants, and an order of reference to take proofs as to the damage.

Case No. 349.

Ex parte ANDERSON et al.

[3 Woods, 124.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Jan. Term, 1878.

ELECTIONS—OFFENSES AGAINST ELECTION LAWS— REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

1. Members of the election returning board established by the law of Louisiana are, even when engaged in canvassing the votes cast for presidential electors, state and not federal officers.

2. The petition of a party against whom a prosecution has been instituted in a state court, to remove said prosecution to the federal court on the ground that the same is on account of an act done under the provisions of title 26, Rev. St., should state such facts as show to the court that the case falls within the category of removable causes.

This was the petition of Thomas C. Anderson and others for a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, to remove into this court an information filed against them in the superior criminal court for the parish of Orleans, by the district attorney for said parish, charging them with feloniously publishing a false election return of the parish of Vernon of an election of presidential electors.

E. North Cullon, for petitioner.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. I have given careful consideration to the application for removing the prosecution in the above case to the circuit court of the United States, and for a writ of habeas corpus cum causa to that end. The right of removal is claimed under section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and under that clause of the section which authorizes a removal when any civil or criminal prosecution is commenced in a state court against an officer of the United States, or other person, on account of any act done under the provisions of title 26, "The Elective Franchise," or on account of any right, title or authority claimed by such officer or other person, under any of said provisions. To entitle the petitioners to the removal sought, therefore, their petition ought to show that the prosecution against them is either for some act done by them, as officers of the United States, or otherwise, under the provisions of title 26, or on account of some right, title or authority claimed by them under any of said provisions. Does the petition show this? It states that the information against them charges them with falsely and feloniously uttering and publishing as true, in their capacity of returning board officers, a certain altered, false, forged and counterfeited public record, to wit, the returns from the parish of Vernon of an election held for presidential electors in the state of Louisiana, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, under a writ of election dated September 16, 1876, ordering the same, knowing the said public record to be false, altered, forged and counterfeited. The petition further states that the acts for which they are accused are charged to have been done whilst they were acting under authority of law, and under oath of office, as a board of canvassers of election returns for presidential electors; and it claims that, in so acting, they were officers of the United States, and that the correctness and legality of their said election returns were duly presented by the said presidential electors before the electoral commission appointed under act of congress, passed January 29, 1877; and were by said commission fully investigated, adjudicated and sustained, and thereby became a thing adjudged. The petition further states that all their acts in the premises were done in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the 15th amendment to the constitution of the United States, and of the enactments of congress passed to enforce it—those acts consisting of officially inspecting, certifying, reporting and giving effect to the votes of all the citizens legally polled at said election in said parish of Vernon, and to none other. The petition denies the charge of making false, altered or forged returns, and insists that the petitioners are prosecuted for having, in their official capacity, given effect to the laws of the United States for the enforcement of the equal, civil and political rights of citizens of the United States, growing out of and appertaining to the elective franchise.

The claim that the petitioners, in acting as members of the returning board of Louisiana, were officers of the United States in reference to the election returns of presidential electors, is not tenable. They were state officers, appointed under a state law, and acting under state authority. The claim that the correctness of their returns was adjudicated by the electoral commission, is equally untenable. The electoral commission declined to go behind the returns, or to examine into their correctness. It denied its jurisdiction to do this. These grounds of removal, therefore, are not founded on fact.

The other ground alleged, namely, that the acts on which the charge of making false returns is based, were done by the petitioners in pursuance of the enforcement laws of the United States, is more to the purpose. The difficulty is, an entire want of specification of the acts referred to. This may be owing to the fact that no specification of particular acts is made in the information against them. The charge is simply that of falsely and feloniously uttering and publishing as true false and forged returns from the parish of Vernon, of an election for presidential electors. What evidence will be presented in support of the charge does not appear. It may have no respect to the acts of the petitioners, done by them in pursuance of the acts of congress. The charge does not necessarily, nor presumptively, imply this. The petitioners can only conjecture that it will be so. In many cases there would not exist any doubt as to the specific acts complained of, and the defendants would have no difficulty in affirming the authority under which they were done. A revenue officer making a seizure, for example, and being prosecuted for taking the party's goods, could, with reasonable certainty, affirm what goods he was charged with taking, and could safely and with due certainty allege the authority by which he did the acts complained of, and thus be enabled to remove the cause to the federal courts. So if, in obedience to the enforcement act, an officer of election receives the votes of unregistered persons, not allowed to register on account of color, and is indicted for receiving unlawful votes, to wit, the votes of A, B and C, specified by name, or even without such specification, he could very properly affirm what particular acts he was indicted for, and could have no difficulty in removing his cause.

But in the present case the charge is for publishing a false return of an election held at a particular place. The defendants cannot allege that the return was made under an act of congress. It was not. But they suspect that it will be attempted to make out against them the falsity charged, by proving certain acts which they did under the enforcement act. This, however, they can hardly know with sufficient certainty, and if they do know it, they have not specified the acts, or class of acts, which they suppose to be the basis of the charge, so that the court may see with sufficient clearness that the case is one that is removable. It seems to me, therefore, that no sufficient case is presented for a removal of the cause. To be entitled to removal, the case must be shown to be within the category of removable causes. The general assertion of the party that it is so, or any general assertion that does not enable the court to see that it is so, is not sufficient. But the petitioners are not without remedy. If, on the trial, it should be attempted to sustain the charge by acts of the petitioners, done by them in pursuance of the acts of congress, they can then claim the benefit of those acts; and, if refused by the court, can carry their case to the supreme court of the United States by writ of error. The application must be denied.

Case No. 350.

In re ANDERSON.

[7 Biss. 233; 12 N. B. R. 502.]

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. July, 1876.

GUARANTY—DOES NOT MAKE SECURED DEBT.

A guaranty is not such a security under the meaning of the bankrupt law that the creditor must surrender it to the assignee if he desires to prove his debt in full, and such creditor has the right to prove such debt as an unsecured one.

[Cited in In re Broich, Case No. 1,921; In re May & Co., Id. 9,327; In re Kinne, 5 Fed. 60.]

In bankruptcy. The bankrupt, in order to obtain credit from the firm of Richards, Shaw & Winslow, procured John Servis to guarantee the payment of goods purchased of them by him to an amount not exceeding two thousand dollars, whereupon credit was extended to him by said firm to the sum of about three thousand dollars and he was indebted to them to about that amount for goods sold, when he was adjudicated bankrupt, two thousand of which was secured by the guaranty of Servis as hereinbefore mentioned. After the bankruptcy, the said firm made and filed with the register, Hon. C. Graham, proof of the whole claim as unsecured. The proof contained the usual allegations of no payments or security except the guarantee as aforesaid. The assignee and some of the other creditors objected to the allowance of the whole as an unsecured claim against the bankrupt, contending that to the extent of the amount guaranteed it should be treated as a secured debt and proven as such. Thereupon, the register, at the request of the attorneys of the respective parties, submitted and certified to this court the question "whether said claim should be allowed in gross as proven, or whether it should be allowed and proven in two separate items, one for two thousand dollars as secured, and one for one thousand and sixty-three dollars and forty cents, being the balance of the account, as unsecured."

Cameron & Losey, for assignee.

Wing & Prentiss, for creditors.

HOPKINS, District Judge. The counsel for the assignee has submitted an argument to me, in which it is insisted that the account to the extent of the amount guaranteed is a secured debt and should be proven as such. It is not denied but that the bankrupt was indebted to those creditors for goods sold him in the amount stated in the proof. The only question, therefore, is one of law, that is, whether this debt, to the extent of the guaranty of Servis, who is good, and responsible for the amount of it, is to be regarded as a secured debt within the meaning of the bankrupt law. This depends upon the proper interpretation of section 5075, Rev. St. That section reads: "When a creditor has a mortgage or pledge of real or personal property of the bankrupt, or a lien thereon, to secure the payment of a debt owing to him from the bankrupt, he shall be admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt due after deducting the value of such property. * * * Or the creditor may release or convey his claim to the assignee upon such property and be admitted to prove his debt. * * * If the property is not so sold or released and delivered up, the creditor shall not be allowed to prove any part of his debt." This is the provision in regard to proving secured debts, and it so clearly defines the kind of security meant, it seems to me that there can be but little doubt that a debt secured by the guaranty or indorsement of a third person does not fall within the purview of the acts. The security must be upon property real or personal of the bankrupt, that may be surrendered or conveyed to the assignee, and the estate in his hands be augmented thereby. It, in terms, applies only to security of property upon bankruptcy. It has been held both in this country and England (where the statute is similar to ours) that when a debt of the bankrupt is secured by the guaranty or indorsement of a third party and such third party has secured the debt by mortgage on his own property, that such a case was neither within the spirit or meaning of the act. A creditor holding such a security could not by a release or surrender use it for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate. In the assignee's hands it would be wholly unavailing. It has also been held that a creditor holding security upon the separate estate of the wife of the bankrupt for his debt is not a secured creditor within the act, and may prove his debt as unsecured. Ex parte Hedderly, 2 Mont. D. & D. 487; Ex parte Parr, 18 Ves. 65. The rule is stated that a creditor has a right in bankruptcy to prove and avail himself of all collateral securities from third persons to the full extent of the debt. Section 6075, in harmony with this conclusion, provides that when a party is liable upon a note or contract as a member of two firms having distinct estates to be wound up in bankruptcy, the debt may be proved as against both. See, also, in further elucidation and support of this view, Ex parte Goodman, 3 Madd. 373; In re Plummer, 1 Phil. Ch. 56; Peacock's Case, 2 Glyn & J. 27; Ex parte Adams, 3 Mont. & A. 157. The English authorities on this point were examined and approved by Justice Story, in Re Babcock, [Case No. 696.] That was the case of an accommodation acceptor of a bill of exchange going into bankruptcy, and the holder of the bill having attached certain property of the drawer, and having also proved his debt against the acceptor's estate.

Judge Story said: "Admitting the attachment to be a security and the bankrupt to be an accommodation acceptor, it is clear that the creditor has a right to proceed against the bankrupt for his debt in bankruptcy, and also against the other parties to the bill under his attachment until he has recovered the full amount of his debt, for it is not a security given by the bankrupt of his own property." That case was like this in some respects, for it seems that creditors had a suit pending, when the adjudication was had, against Servis, their guarantor, in which I learn from the counsel's argument, they had attached property of the guarantor. In Re Cram, [Case No. 3,343,] this question is very fully considered, and the same conclusion reached as I have arrived at in this case. Further support of this interpretation is found in section 5070, which authorizes indorsers or guarantors of bankrupts to prove such debt when not paid, in case the creditor holding them fails to make proof thereof, and thus obtain the benefit of all dividends in reduction of their liability. That class of persons are within the protection of the bankrupt act—are regarded as quasi creditors of the bankrupt, and entitled to have the dividends applied, as far as they go, in extinguishment of their liability for the bankrupt.

The assignee has no claim upon them or against them; they are in no sense liable to the bankrupt's estate, but the estate is under legal obligation to pay and protect them. In Raikes v. Todd, 8 Adol. & E. 846, a guaranty very similar to this was under consideration, and in that case, as in this, the principal debtor had gone into bankruptcy, and the creditor had proven his whole debt, which was in excess of the amount guaranteed. The guaranty being for a sum not exceeding two thousand pounds, and the whole debt proven being over twenty-four hundred pounds; a dividend had been paid the creditor upon the whole claim proven, of about three hundred pounds, leaving over two thousand pounds due, and an action was prosecuted against the guarantor for the two thousand pounds, the amount guaranteed by him. The defendant pleaded the amount of the dividend ratably applicable to the amount guaranteed as a payment pro tanto, and contended that it was to be distributed ratably over the whole balance, and that his liability was discharged to the extent of the dividend applicable to the amount guaranteed by him; that as a security under this bankrupt act (the same as under ours) who had paid a debt, could stand in place of the creditor, the declared dividend should be appropriated as so much upon every distinct pound; the plaintiff contending that he might recover the dividend on his own proof and apply the whole in reduction of the excess above the sum guaranteed. This claim of the plaintiff, however, was not sustained. The court held that the security was to pay only the excess of the sum which he guaranteed over and above the dividend paid in respect of such sum. Bardwell v. Lydall, 7 Bing. 489, is to the same effect. This seems to me a correct exposition of the meaning and principle of these provisions of the bankrupt act, in regard to sureties for the bankrupt, and secures to them the benefits and protection contemplated by the act. Applying this doctrine to this case, these creditors would be required to apply the dividend paid in respect to the amount guaranteed by Servis in reduction of the claim upon him, each dollar of the claim being considered as reduced to the extent of the dividend paid by the bankrupt's estate. In that way the guarantor gets the same benefit as if he had paid the two thousand dollars guaranteed and then proved it up himself. It is in legal effect the same as paying it to the guarantor, as it is paid for his benefit and in extinguishment of his liability. This view of the equities of the case and the legal rights of the parties shows very clearly to my mind that the creditor not only has the right to prove for the full amount, but that it is a legal duty to do so if he proves at all. I, therefore, hold that these creditors, Richards, Shaw & Winslow, have the right to prove their full debt against the estate of the bankrupt in this case as an unsecured debt, and remit the matter to the register with direction to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

In re ANDERSON.

Ex parte WELSH.

[2 Hughes, 378; 9 N. B. R. 360.]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. March 16, 1874, and April 18, 1876.

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Nov. 30, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—CREDITORS' BILL—WIFE'S PROPERTY—HUSBAND AS TRUSTEE—WIFE AS WITNESS—JURISDICTION OF STATE COURTS—LIMITATIONS.

1. A proceeding in bankruptcy is in the nature of a general creditor's bill in equity, which, when once commenced, gives the bankruptcy court exclusive jurisdiction to administer the bankrupt's whole estate, and, therefore, the filing, after such a proceeding is instituted, of a general creditor's bill against the bankrupt, in a state court, is in conflict with the bankruptcy act and can give no jurisdiction to the state court.

2. In the schedule of this bankrupt was included his interest in lands inherited by his wife from her father. It was a question whether this was simply a life interest by the curtesy, or a fee acquired, ratified by a court, in the course of a suit instituted in a state court after the petition in bankruptcy by a judgment creditor against the bankrupt, his assignee, and his other judgment creditors, in the form of a general creditor's bill. In the progress of this suit an agreement in writing in the form of a decree was signed by the attorney in fact of his judgment creditors, by the bankrupt himself, by his wife (who acted, however, under extreme moral duress and pressure), and was also intended to be signed by the assignee in bankruptcy, but was not so signed; by which writing the wife was to have only a fourth of his land and the creditors to get the rest. In this state of facts, held that this written agreement cannot bind the bankrupt's estate either favorably or adversely, because (1st), it was not signed by the assignee; (2d), because the signature of the bankrupt who was civilliter mortuus as to his estate was a nullity so far as the estate was concerned; and (3d), because a decree in a judicial proceeding coram non iudice is a nullity binding nobody.

3. Held, also, that the fact of the bankrupt having received his discharge in bankruptcy made no difference in giving effect to the writing he had signed, as to the estate surrendered in bankruptcy.

4. Held, also, that the assignee had no power to give consent to an extrajudicial decree of the state court, the laws of congress nowhere giving him power to become defendant to a proceeding in a state court commenced in invidiam towards and essentially in conflict with the jurisdiction which the bankruptcy act of congress gives to the bankruptcy court.

[Cited in Augustine v. McFarland, Case No. 648.]

5. In proceedings in bankruptcy the wife of the bankrupt is a competent witness to facts affecting the estate of the bankrupt (Revised Statutes of the United States, paragraph 5088), and so is every party "to the trial or cause" (section 8, of 22d June, 1874, amending section 26 of the general bankrupt act.)

6. The limitation of two years imposed upon certain proceedings by or against an assignee in bankruptcy does not bar a petition by a married woman who for more than two years has been defrauded by her husband, who is a bankrupt, when the fraud came to her knowledge within two years before filing her petition in the bankruptcy proceeding, claiming her rights against the bankrupt's estate.

7. Where a married woman, who has been deprived of her rights, under the coercion of judicial proceedings which she is made to believe are about to ratify the wrong she has sustained, signs an agreement by which she endeavors to save a part of what is due her, a court of bankruptcy on principles of equity will exercise all the power it has in setting aside such agreement and reinstating her in her rights.

8. Where a husband has by fraud or mistake been invested with the title in fee simple of real estate inherited by his wife, equity will treat him as a trustee of his wife, and a court of bankruptcy will refuse to subject the land to liens of the creditors of the husband who is a bankrupt.

In bankruptcy.

This cause came twice before the district court. On the first of the two occasions the facts were as follows, on which the decision of 16th March, 1874, affirmed 30th November, 1874, was based: Anderson filed his petition in this court on the 29th December, 1868; on the 26th January, 1869, he was adjudicated a bankrupt by the register. In his schedules he surrendered large real estate in Montgomery county, including his interest in a tract of 1200 acres of land on Mill creek, inherited by his wife, Sarah J. Anderson, from her father. The debts shown by his schedules amounted to some $25,000 or more, of which $19,000 were judgment liens. C. B. Gardner was appointed his assignee. Anderson received his discharge in bankruptcy on the 14th November, 1872. Some time in the latter part of 1869, a general creditor's bill was brought in the circuit court of the state for Montgomery county, by the executors of James R. Kent, holding a judgment lien for about $6750, against George W. Anderson, his assignee in bankruptcy, and his other judgment creditors, as defendants. There is no copy of the record of that suit in this court, but both Anderson and his assignee answered the bill. That suit went on in the circuit court of Montgomery until the 20th December, 1872, when an agreement in writing was entered into by J. J. Wade, attorney in fact for the judgment creditors on one part, and by Anderson and his wife on the other part, but in which the assignee of the bankrupt did not join, by which it was stipulated, in substance, that the tract on Mill creek and probably some other of the real estate mentioned in the creditor's bill should be divided into four parts, one of which parts, or so much as might be necessary, should be sold in satisfaction of the judgment debt to Kent's estate and costs; another part should be settled on Mrs. Anderson; and the other two parts should be sold for payment of the remaining debts of the bankrupt according to their priorities. There was a privy acknowledgment of this writing by Mrs. Anderson before a notary, who was an attorney for the creditors. This writing seems to have been executed under circumstances of pressure brought to bear on Anderson and his wife. One of its stipulations was, that it should be put into the form of a decree by the circuit court of Montgomery; and that court did instantly, on the day the agreement was executed, render a decree carrying out its stipulations, appointing T. E. Sullivan and John Gardner its commissioners to make sale of the lands. This cause did not come formally before this court until the 29th July, 1873, when Anderson filed his petition here, one of the allegations in which was, that "when your petitioner was adjudicated a bankrupt, a suit was pending in the circuit court of Montgomery to subject your petitioner's lands," etc. In that petition Anderson prayed for the exemption to him of a $2000 homestead out of the lands which had been the subject of the written agreement of the 20th December, 1872. He also prayed for a restraining order against Sullivan and Gardner, commissioners, forbidding the sale of the real estate ordered to be sold by the decree of the local court. This court granted the restraining order thus asked for, and the motion now on the part of the commissioners is to dissolve that order. The petition having alleged that the chancery suit in the local court was pending when the petioner was adjudicated a bankrupt, this court was misinformed as to the material fact that that suit had been brought after the adjudication in bankruptcy. A further disguise of this fact was effected by the "abstract of proceedings" filed in this cause by the register, H. C. Gibbons, which is false in all its dates, and which post-dates the filing of the petition and all subsequent proceedings by twelve months. Whether that post-dating was a mistake or a device does not appear. The same petitioner filed another petition here on the 28th November, 1873, alleging, amongst other things, that "since filing his original petition" in bankruptcy, "and after this court had taken jurisdiction in the premises, the executors of James R. Kent filed a creditors' bill in the circuit court for Montgomery county," etc., etc., and praying that the parties in said suit, their attorneys and all other persons may be restrained from proceeding further in said suit, and that all matters touching his estate as a bankrupt may be adjudicated and settled here in this court. His wife, Sarah J. Anderson, by her next friend, has also come to this court, in a petition which is found in the papers, but the date of the filing of which is not noted, reciting the material facts bearing upon her title to the 1200 acre tract of land which has been mentioned; and praying, among other things, that her interests in the same may be protected. Thus is this court called upon to take action in the premises, for the first time since its knowledge of the fact that the creditor's suit brought in the local court, as mentioned, was brought after the adjudication of Anderson as a bankrupt.

[This cause was afterwards heard on petition for review. See 23 Fed. 482.]

T. E. Sullivan and J. J. Wade for creditors.

Robert Stiles, for bankrupt's wife.

HUGHES, District Judge. Upon the facts as they have been recited I have to say as follows:

The written agreement of 20th December, 1872, cannot bind the bankrupt's estate; first, because it was not signed by the assignee; and second, because the signature of George W. Anderson, who was civilliter mortuus, was a nullity so far as the estate was concerned.

There is nothing in the point made by the commissioners in their answer, that Anderson signed the agreement after he received his discharge. By the very language of that paper, he was only "discharged of and from all debts provable against his estate which existed on the 31st of December, A. D. 1868." He was not discharged, as a party, from this court; and was in no manner or degree reinvested by the discharge with control over the estate which he had surrendered in bankruptcy. As to that estate, his becoming a party to the agreement in question was an absolute nullity.

As an agreement between the parties to it, this writing had no validity against the bankrupt's estate. Did it derive validity from the consent which the assignee gave to the decree rendered in accordance with and execution of the agreement? The decree could only derive validity, if at all, from the consent of the assignee. He did consent.* The only question is, Had he power to do so?

I think he had not such power, for several reasons. The assignee in bankruptcy is the creature of the laws of congress on that subject. He has no power but such as these laws give him. And nowhere do they give an assignee power to become defendant to a suit, in another court than the bankrupt court, commenced after the petition and adjudication. He may become party defendant to a suit elsewhere which has been commenced against the bankrupt before his petition, and which may be pending at the time of the petition; but not to such a suit commenced after the petition. In fact, the law does not contemplate the possibility of such a suit. Having given full jurisdiction over the bankrupt's estate to the bankruptcy court, and mindful of the mockery of doing so if another court could appropriate that jurisdiction after the adjudication, it does not contemplate the possibility of an assignee going into another court as a defendant in such a suit, and nowhere gives him authority to do so.

It gives the assignee power to go out into other courts, and sue as plaintiff in right of the estate; its language being "he may sue and recover the said estate, debts, and effects." It gives him power to prosecute as plaintiff suits thus commenced by himself after the adjudication, or suits which may have been commenced by the bankrupt, and may be pending at the time of the bankruptcy. But it confines his power to appear as defendant to suits which were pending at the date of the bankruptcy; its language being: "He may defend all suits at law or in equity pending at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, in which such a bankrupt is a party in his own name, in the same manner and with the like effect as they might have been defended by such bankrupt," but for the bankruptcy.

The suit in the circuit court for Montgomery having been commenced after the adjudication, the assignee had no power to become defendant in it; his doing so was of no validity to bind the estate, and any consent which he may have given to the proceedings in that suit was null and void. It is useless, therefore, to consider the question whether the state court had jurisdiction of a general creditor's bill against this bankrupt after his adjudication. Being civiliter mortuus as to the estate, his being a party to that suit was a nullity; and his assignee having no power to be a party to the suit, his being made so was a nullity. The suit itself was therefore a suit ex parte as to this estate, and its proceedings can in no manner bind it. I will say, however, on this question of jurisdiction, that I know of no case, in any of the reports, of a general creditor's suit in chancery being brought in another court than the court of bankruptcy against the bankrupt after his adjudication. I assume such a proceeding to be wholly anomalous. The law contracts with the bankrupt that in consideration of his surrendering his whole estate (certain exemptions excepted) for the benefit of his creditors, he shall be discharged of all debts provable against him existing at the date of adjudication. It provides a court to execute this contract, and it gives that court full and exclusive control of his estate for that purpose. For the law to allow any of these creditors to go into another court after the bankrupt has made his surrender, for the purpose of asserting control over the estate, would be to break faith with the other creditors and the bankrupt himself, and convert the whole proceeding in the bankrupt court into a mockery and fraud. The pretension to such a jurisdiction does not bear serious examination, nor deserve it.

I will say passim that the restraining order of 29th July, 1873, cannot stand longer on that prayer of the petition which prays for a homestead. The homestead exemption is not allowable to Anderson, and the restraining order granted for its protection cannot stand longer on that ground. I will sign an order continuing the restraining order given by this court on the 29th July, 1873, but basing it on the grounds set forth in this decision.

On appeal from an order entered by the district court as indicated, the circuit court rendered the following supervisory decision:

BOND, Circuit Judge. I am of opinion that this petition to the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, to set aside a decree of the district court continuing the restraining order of the 29th of July, 1873, ought to be dismissed. Whatever may be the rights of the petitioner, Mrs. Anderson, in the district court, I do not think it necessary to determine; but it is clear that both she and her husband were entitled to be heard therein, and that the proceedings in the state court, commenced after the adjudication in bankruptcy, were null and void so far as they affected the rights of any person who might come into the bankrupt court claiming an interest in the property

* At the first hearing of this cause it was believed and conceded that the assignee had given his consent; but in fact he did not. Not until 27th November, 1875, did he consent, which he did then by indorsing on a copy of the agreement of 20th December, 1873, his acceptance and adoption of it.

in litigation in the state court; and there was necessity for the first restraining order, to prevent any disposition of the property till such claim was adjudicated; and upon the petition of Mrs. Anderson in the district court it was necessary to continue said order, which the district court has done, which action is the matter complained of. The court remands the case to the district court with directions to proceed to ascertain the rights of the parties claiming the property in litigation in the state court, without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the controversy.

On April 18th, 1876, this cause came on again before the district court, when, upon the facts and questions of law stated in writing, that court again rendered a decision in the cause as follows:

HUGHES, District Judge. In ascertaining the facts of this case I have relied chiefly upon that portion of the evidence to which no exception was taken by counsel on either side. But the objections which were made to the competency of Mrs. Anderson are not good. This is a "cause or trial" arising under the bankruptcy act; and it is expressly provided by that act, section 5088, that the wife of a bankrupt may be examined, and by the amendment of June 22d, 1874 (section 8 amending section 26), it is provided generally that any party to a trial or cause under the bankruptcy act shall be a competent witness. Premising this much, I proceed to state the leading facts of the case, which, so far as they seem to be material, are as follows: Sarah J. Anderson, the wife of the bankrupt, was an heir of Jacob Kent, who died intestate in 1858, leaving a large real and personal estate. There were several co-heirs, most of whom had received greater or less portions of the estate during their father's lifetime. In the division and distribution of the estate it was found that the homestead farm was nearly equivalent to the interest of one of the heirs and distributees. It was desired by the family that some one of the heirs should purchase this farm. Mrs. Anderson was persuaded, and agreed to do so, and accordingly, on August 26th, 1858, the day on which the home farm and most of the personal property of the estate was advertised to be sold, it was announced in the presence of the company that the home farm would not be sold, and that Mrs. Anderson had consented to take it as her share of the estate. Robert Gibbony, administrator of Jacob Kent, was authorized by the heirs to settle among them their shares of the estate, and to make sale of the lands for division. His authority was in the form of a power of attorney, dated the 19th July, 1858, signed by the heirs, and the husbands of those who were femes covert. But this power of attorney had no validity in law to bind these femes covert, not having been privily acknowledged by them. By a paper similarly signed, it was agreed by the several heirs that each might take parts of the estate of the intestate Jacob Kent at such appraisement as might be made by persons appointed by the county court of Montgomery county, which was the county in which the intestate died and his estate was. On the 7th of February, 1859, there was an arbitration and appraisement (made by three citizens chosen for the purpose) of the home farm, and the valuation of it was thereby fixed at $13,248, which, as was recited in the paper signed by the arbitrators, was "to be paid for by Mrs. Anderson's entire interest in the estate." In short, for several years, the purchase of the farm was treated by all concerned as made by Mrs. Anderson, the consideration paid for it being her interest in her father's estate.

At some time during Gibbony's agency in selling the lands of the estate, he sold to George W. Anderson, individually, a tract of 335 acres lying contiguous to the home farm for the price of $6 an acre. Gibbony went on to sell all the other of the numerous tracts of land belonging to the estate, none of which, except the home farm, as aforesaid, was retained by any of the heirs. In the year 1862 (August 20th), having made contracts for the sale of all the lands, and probably collected much of the purchase-money, Gibbony caused deeds to be prepared, executed, and acknowledged, conveying on the part of all the heirs the several parcels of land (except the home farm) to the several purchasers of them. Mrs. Anderson, on the faith of having purchased the home farm with her own interest, joined in these deeds granting fee simple titles for all the other several parcels of the lands of the estate to the respective purchasers of them.

Notwithstanding the clear understanding which had been had at the beginning, and had continued for several years, between all persons in interest, and especially between Gibbony and Mrs. Anderson, that she had taken the home farm for her interest in the estate, yet Gibbony, in procuring the execution of the deeds conveying the several portions of the realty belonging to the estate as just mentioned, caused the remaining heirs, in conveying their interests in the home farm, to make a deed for it to George W. Anderson instead of Mrs. Anderson, and to reserve in this deed a vendor's lien (now claimed in favor of Gibbony's widow and representative) for about $4000 due from George W. Anderson to the estate of Gibbony. On the 21st of August, 1862, the day after this deed of the remaining heirs purports to have been executed, Gibbony, by a paper signed between himself and George W. Anderson, treated the home tract of 1200 acres and the tract of 335 acres purchased individually by Anderson as both sold to Anderson himself, and took Anderson's bond for the aggregate sum of the $13,248 which had been awarded by arbitration as the price of the home farm, and $6 per acre for the 335 acre tract. Whether or not Anderson's connection with these proceedings of Gibbony was fraudulent or not in intention, does not appear. The objects of Gibbony seem to have been to secure the debt of about $4000 which he held against Anderson personally, upon the home tract as well as upon the other tract, and to make commissions as administrator upon the valuation price of the home farm ($13,248), as well as upon his actual sales. No considerable amount of money, if any, was ever paid by George W. Anderson on account of this $13,248; and Gibbony, as to most if not all of it, from time to time as he settled his fiduciary accounts before commissioners, merely handed to Anderson receipts purporting that he had received from Mrs. Anderson amounts approximately making up the price of the home farm. Afterwards, when the transaction of August 21st, 1862, came to be put in the form of G. W. Anderson's bond of that date, Gibbony credited these receipts nominally from Mrs. Anderson upon the record. Of these proceedings between Gibbony and her husband Mrs. Anderson was all the while ignorant; and it would seem also that the deed from her co-heirs conveying the home tract to Anderson instead of his wife was never delivered to Anderson; that the execution of it to himself individually was unknown to him; and that it was deposited for registration in the clerk's office of the county without the knowledge either of Anderson or his wife. The existence of the deed to her husband remained unknown to Mrs. Anderson until some recent time, which is not shown in the evidence or the proceedings. For all that the proceedings show, she did not know of the fraud practiced upon her until December, 1872.

In December, 1868, George W. Anderson had filed his petition here as a bankrupt, and was so adjudicated. In his schedule, B 1, he gave in his interest in the 1200 acres of land which have been referred to, as a life estate, stating that this tract of land "was inherited by Sarah J. Anderson, wife of petitioner, from her father, Jacob Kent, and petitioner only has a life estate in the same depending on his own life."

Notwithstanding the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the representatives of the estate of James R. Kent, who had received in 1867 a judgment for a large amount against George W. Anderson, filed, in August, 1869, a general creditor's bill in the circuit court of Montgomery county against G. W. Anderson and his two assignees in bankruptcy, for the purpose of subjecting his lands (treating the farm of Mrs. Anderson as his own in fee simple) to their own judgment and those of several other creditors, and to the vendor's lien for about $4000 held by Gibbony's representatives, all the liens amounting to about $19,000, the whole real property, including the homestead, being supposed to be worth upwards of $20,000.

The said court entertained the bill, and proceeded with the cause until it was ready for hearing. About the time the cause was ready for hearing Mrs. Anderson was made to believe that the deed of 1862 to her husband of the homestead farm had bereft her of her rights, and that she could not preserve her right to the whole home tract, and was persuaded to sign, which she did with great reluctance and distress, an agreement with the attorney of the creditors of her husband, by which it was stipulated that a decree should be entered for a division by survey of the home tract into four parts, giving the choice to herself of one of these parts to be held by her in separate right in fee simple; and for permitting the sale of the other parts for the benefit of her husband's creditors, and by which she agreed to such a division and distribution of the property. Her joining in this writing was acknowledged privily by her before one of the counsel of the creditors on the 20th December, 1872, under circumstances of haste and pressure; and a consent decree in accordance with an agreement was entered by the local court on the same day, directing the agreement to be carried into execution. The assignee of George W. Anderson (or rather the surviving assignee of two, one of whom is dead) did not sign the agreement of 20th December, 1873, at the time, but he has lately, to wit, on the 27th November, 1875, indorsed on a copy of it his acceptance and adoption of it.

After this decree was entered and the survey for division under it made, Mrs. Anderson joined her husband in a deed conveying the parts of the home tract not retained by her for the benefit of creditors, in pursuance of the agreement and decree just mentioned. This deed was acknowledged by her before the assignee of George W. Anderson in bankruptcy, a party in interest, but was never duly delivered; was recalled before delivery; and that part of the decree has never been executed by herself and her husband. So far as her own action goes, therefore, there is no further committal of herself to the alienation of her home tract than the agreement she signed with the attorney of the creditors, and the decree of the court made upon it; both on December 20th, 1872.

In an effort still to escape the action of the Montgomery court; George W. Anderson filed a petition in this court on the 29th July, 1873, praying an injunction against the plaintiff in the suit in that court, and his creditors, parties thereto, from all further proceedings therein, which was granted by the then judge of the court. The object of this petition was to have a homestead to the value of $2000 set apart to the bankrupt out of the real estate he had surrendered in bankruptcy. This claim being inadmissible, that petition has been dismissed and the order of injunction granted upon it would have been dissolved but for the fact that afterwards, probably in December, 1873, Mrs. Anderson came into this court, by petition setting out the leading facts which have been recited, and praying the court to set aside and annul the deed of her co-heirs to George W. Anderson, of 20th August, 1862, and to require these co-heirs to convey the home tract to George W. Anderson only for his life, and after his death to herself and her heirs.

The petition brought to the knowledge of this court, for the first time, the proceedings that had taken place in the circuit court of Montgomery county; the agreement which Mrs. Anderson had signed, under the coercion of those proceedings, with the attorney of her husband's creditors, and the decree of the said court based upon that agreement.

This court decided, upon that petition, that the proceedings against George W. Anderson, a bankrupt and civilliter mortuus as to his estate, was ex parte, and as to the estate in bankruptcy and the assignees of the estate, was coram non iudice and null; the estate being in the custody and within the exclusive jurisdiction of this court, and the assignees having no power to make themselves parties to a proceeding in the nature of a creditors' bill against the bankrupt, his estate, and his assignees, commenced after the adjudication in bankruptcy. See Case of George W. Anderson, [opinion of Hughes, district judge, in the district court, ante, page 832.] Its decree to this effect was made on the 16th March, 1874, and was affirmed on appeal November 30th, 1874. That decree also enjoined all further proceedings in the circuit court of Montgomery by the assignees and by the parties plaintiff there, and no further steps have been taken in that court.

The case is in this court as a court of bankruptcy on the petition of Mrs. Anderson, by her next friend, which has been mentioned, on a plea of the statute of limitations interposed by the assignee to defendant's petition, and on the petition and answer of Isalah A. Walsh, administrator, d. b. n. of James R. Kent, the creditor who filed the general creditors' bill in the circuit court of Montgomery county, which has also been mentioned. This last petition (filed here December 7th, 1875) prays for a specific execution of the agreement signed by Mrs. Anderson on the 20th December, 1872. As to the rest, it is an answer to Mrs. Anderson's petition.

This court has, in this proceeding, jurisdiction to settle the title to the homestead farm of the Kent estate, at least as between Mrs. Anderson and all the creditors of her husband, George W. Anderson, who are before the court, inasmuch as Mrs. Anderson has herself voluntarily invoked the powers of the court in that behalf. How far it will exercise this jurisdiction in the present condition of the pleadings, I will state in the sequel.

The plea of the statute of limitations interposed by the counsel for the assignee against the petition of Mrs. Anderson is not good.

The bankruptcy court, in the bankruptcy proceeding, has jurisdiction under the first section of the bankruptcy law, for the ascertainment and liquidation of all liens and other specific claims upon the estate of the bankrupt, and for the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties. Its jurisdiction is conclusive. Rev. St., § 711. This duty to settle conflicting interests between various parties is not affected by any provision of law limiting suits and proceedings within two years in cases where a mere adverse interest of the assignee in bankruptcy is concerned. Even if it were, however, Mrs. Anderson's petition was brought before the expiration of two years after she came to knowledge of the fraud. I now proceed to state my conclusions as to the rights of Mrs. Anderson in the home farm of her father, which is the principal matter to be dealt with in this proceeding.

The pivotal fact is that certain property belonging to a married woman, and in which the husband had no beneficial interest, was, without any fault on the part of the woman and without her knowledge, wrongfully, improperly, and mistakenly conveyed directly to the husband. Based upon this state of facts, the first proposition is, that as between husband and wife the husband took no beneficial title at all, and in equity the case stands upon the same footing as though that had been done which should have been done, and in pursuance of the well-known canon of equity jurisprudence, the court would regard that as having been done which ought to have been done. I therefore hold that Anderson took not for himself, but only as trustee for his wife, by the deed of 20th August, 1862, made by the co-heirs of his wife to him.

The second proposition is that the case stands upon exactly the same footing as between the wife thus situated and every other person not within the strict definition of a bona fide purchaser from the husband, without notice of the equitable title in the wife. None but a bona fide, actual purchaser, without notice, can take against the wife.

The third proposition is, that in order to constitute a bona fide purchaser within the above rule, the purchase-money must have been actually paid before notice, (2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq., White & T. 3d Amer. Ed., pp. 62, 91, 101); and must have been actually paid in money or negotiable instruments and not in bonds or other securities not negotiable, (Id. pp. 62, 117). The object of this latter part of the rule is manifest; for if the payment were made otherwise, the purchaser would be able to protect himself by pleading a failure of consideration.

It is not sufficient that a conveyance of the legal title is made as security for an antecedent debt. Id. pp. 103, 108. Neither judgment creditors nor assignees for creditors are bona fide purchasers within this rule. Id. pp. 105-108, 110.

The fourth proposition is, and it is a corollary from the preceding one, that no property held by the bankrupt in trust shall pass by the register's assignment in bankruptcy to the assignee. This is expressly stated by section 5053 of the Revised Statutes. Vide, also, Fisher v. Henderson, [Case No. 4820;] Faxon v. Folvey, 110 Mass. 392. The authorities which might be cited and books referred to in support of these various propositions are exceedingly numerous and entirely decisive.

The fifth proposition is, that an assignment in bankruptcy will not pass a trust estate, for the court will not presume that the trustee intended to commit a breach of trust. Perry, Trusts, § 336; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 488; Hill, Trustees, margin pp. 269, 539; Lounsbury v. Purdy, 18 N. Y. 520; Copeman v. Gallant, 1 P. Wms. 314; Finch v. Earl of Winchelsea, Id. 278; Bennet v. Davis, 2 P. Wms. 318; Scott v. Surman, Willes, 402; Carpenter v. Marnell, 3 Bos. & P. 40; Winch v. Keeley, 1 Term R. 619; Dangerfield v. Thomas, 9 Adol. & E. 292; Kip v. Bank of New York, 10 Johns. 63; Blin v. Pierce, 20 Vt. 25; Ontario Bank v. Mumford, 2 Barb. Ch. 596; Hynson v. Burton, 5 Pike, 496; Price v. Raiston, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 60; Kennedy v. Strong, 10 Johns. 289; Clarke v. Minot, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 346. I will now state my conclusions on the foregoing facts and law.

The title of George W. Anderson in the home farm was in trust for his wife. That title being held in trust did not pass to Anderson's assignee in bankruptcy, but remained in him for the benefit of his wife, none but a life interest in the property attaching to himself. None but this life estate can be subject to the judgment liens against Anderson. The agreement of Mrs. Anderson, signed and acknowledged the 20th December, 1872, was made so unwillingly and under such moral duress that a court of equity ought to set it aside; the more as the acknowledgment of it was made before a notary who was of counsel for her adversaries and thereby morally disqualified from taking it. As the proceedings in the circuit court of Montgomery county were coram non iudice, the decree of that court carrying the agreement into execution was a nullity; nothing but the agreement itself can be considered in the case.

I have had no difficulty in arriving at the facts of the case or at the law and the rights of parties arising from those facts.

But I have some difficulty in deciding what to do with the agreement signed 20th December, 1872, by Mrs. Anderson, in the present condition of the pleadings here. But one of the creditors who through their attorney were parties to that agreement is before the court, viz., J. A. Welsh, administrator, d. b. n., of James R. Kent. It is competent for me to dismiss his petition; but it is not competent for me at this time to adjudicate upon that agreement in a manner to bind the other creditors of George W. Anderson who were through their attorney parties to the agreement but are not before the court. I have no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court to make all these creditors parties defendant to the petition brought voluntarily here by Mrs. Anderson for the purpose of setting aside that agreement; for it is competent for the court under the first section of the bankruptcy act "to adjust the conflicting interest of all parties" asserting claims upon the estate of the bankrupt, and if all the creditors who were parties to the agreement of 20th December, 1872, were before the court by personal notice and summons as defendants to Mrs. Anderson's petition, I should not hesitate to pass upon that agreement, and, upon the present proofs in the case, to set it aside.

The most I could do now would be to dismiss the petition of J. A. Welsh, administrator, etc., and declare that George W. Anderson brought into this court as assets no other estate in the home farm in question than an estate for life, and leaving open the question how far Mrs. Anderson's joining in the agreement of 20th December, 1872, affected her title in the home farm, until all parties in interest shall be before the court.

[2 N. B. R. 537, (Quarto, 166.)]

District Court, D. North Carolina.

BANKRUPTCY—COSTS—POOR DEBTOR'S OATH.

[Rule 30 in bankruptcy provides that, where the debtor "makes proof to the satisfaction of the court" that he is unable to pay the costs prescribed by the act and rules, the judge may, in his discretion, direct that the costs shall be limited to the amount required to be deposited. Held, that such an order will not be made upon the mere affidavit of the debtor that he is unable to pay the costs, as that is merely a statement of opinion, which may not be justified by the facts.]

[In bankruptcy. The bankrupt alleges that he has filed his petition, and has deposited $50, as required by law; makes affidavit as to his inability to pay the costs prescribed by the bankrupt act and the general orders in bankruptcy, exceeding the sum deposited; and prays that an order may be made by the court directing that the fees and costs should not exceed said sum.]

John W. Hinsdale, for bankrupt.

BROOKS, District Judge. This is a petition at the instance of David Anderson, filed the 28th December, 1868, who alleges that he has filed his petition in bankruptcy, that he has deposited fifty dollars as required by law, and makes oath that he is unable to pay the costs prescribed by the bankrupt act and the general orders in bankruptcy, exceeding said sum deposited.

The language of that part of Rule 30 which relates to this subject, is as follows: "In cases where the debtor has no means, and makes proof to the satisfaction of the court that he is unable to pay the costs prescribed by the act and these orders, the judge, in his discretion, may direct that the fees and costs therein shall not exceed the sum required to be deposited."

The petitioner rests his application for the order he asks, upon his declaration alone, made under oath, that he is unable to pay more than the sum deposited. I do not regard his inability sufficiently shown in this case. There are some laws so formed as to require a judicial officer to do certain official acts upon certain prescribed oath or oaths being made before him, as in our attachment laws. If the party applying shall make the oaths required, and execute the bonds, there is no discretion left with the judge, justice, or clerk; they must issue the attachment demanded. I might refer to other acts of our assembly of a similar character. There is a marked difference in the effect of the language used in these acts and that quoted above from Rule 30 in bankruptcy. In the former, the officer to whom application is made must act, he must grant the process when the prescribed oaths are made; there is no discretion: and in the latter, the oath of the petitioner may be considered with, or without, the affidavits of other persons to aid the judge in exercising a sound discretion.

The court is to presume every petitioner able to pay the lawful costs in a proceeding in bankruptcy, until he who may allege inability to pay such costs "shall make proof to the satisfaction of the court." Now, the petitioner swears that he is unable to pay any additional costs, and I grant that the petitioner may honestly believe this to be true, yet, if I knew his situation and circumstances fully, I might entertain a contrary opinion. There are those who would, and, indeed, do often declare their inability to pay a debt, and such are sometimes doubtless honest in the opinion so expressed; and yet I would as honestly differ with them upon the question of their ability: such might believe that it was of the highest necessity to support a style of living or even extravagance, which I would regard in no way necessary or proper in one involved in debt. In this case were I to grant the prayer of the petitioner, I would do so only upon the opinion of the petitioner, without any statement even made by him from which I am able to determine whether his opinion is correct or otherwise. The prayer of the petitioner is refused. Let this be certified to the petitioner.

ANDERSON'S CASE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 243.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Columbia. May Term, 1821.

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE—ARREST FOR PRIOR DEBT.

A debtor, discharged under the insolvent act, cannot be arrested for a debt contracted before his discharge, although not payable till after his discharge.

James Anderson, who had been discharged under the act of congress, for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia, was arrested for a debt contracted before his discharge, but payable after his discharge.

On motion of his counsel, Mr. Fendall. THE COURT ordered him to be discharged from the arrest, upon entering his appearance without bail.

Case No. 354.

ANDERSON v. BANK.

[Chase, 535.]²

Circuit Court, D. North Carolina. June Term, 1869.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — RELATION — EFFECT OF CIVIL WAR—LIABILITY OF AGENT—TAKING CONFEDERATE CURRENCY—PLEADING.

1. The late civil war did not revoke an agency in the southern states, established before the war, by a citizen of one of the northern states, but such an agent was bound to act with due care and diligence.

[See Botts & Darnall v. Crenshaw, Case No. 1,690.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. The receipt of Confederate treasury notes in payment of a debt due to a citizen adhering to the national government was not the exercise of such diligence.

[See Fretz v. Stover, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 198; Taylor v. Thomas, Id. 479.]

3. Such receipt did not discharge the debtor from his debt, though paid in form, and the notes delivered to him as paid by the agent, were not paid in fact.

[See note at end of case.]

4. Nothing could discharge him except ratification of the acts of the agent or voluntary release by the creditor, or actual payment in lawful money.

5. The agent can not be sued along with the debtor for the amount of the debt, without an averment of the insolvency of the debtor.

6. But this having been done, the plaintiff may either amend his bill and charge the insolvency of the principal, or he may, under the circumstances, take a decree against the agent for the value of the Confederate currency paid by the debtor, and a further decree against the debtor for what would then remain due after crediting this on the debt.

7. If the plaintiff is not content with such a decree, he may amend his bill by alleging the insolvency of Harris and loss of his debt through the unauthorized action of the bank.

In equity. Anderson lived in Kentucky and employed Young, also a citizen of that state, to sell mules for him in North Carolina. In August, 1860, Young as his agent sold mules to Harris in North Carolina, and took the notes of Harris for the purchase-money, payable to Anderson in January, 1861. Immediately after receiving the notes, Young deposited them in the Bank of Cape Fear at Raleigh, North Carolina, for collection, having first endorsed them for Anderson, as his agent, to Jones, cashier of the bank.

Harris did not pay the notes when they became due, but on January 22, 1861, paid part of one of them, which amount the bank remitted to Anderson by mail, less commissions and exchange. On February 22, 1861, Harris made another payment on account, which amount the bank likewise remitted by mail to Anderson, less commissions and exchange. In November, 1862, Harris paid to the bank the balance due on the notes, with interest to the date of payment in Confederate treasury notes, and received from the bank his two notes to Anderson.

The currency so received was placed by the bank to the credit of Anderson on special deposit, and subsequently invested by it in Confederate seven per cent. bonds, which bonds were placed in a package, among the special deposits of the bank marked, "Jno. Jay Anderson, Side View, Montgomery County, Kentucky." During the fall of 1862 Young was in Raleigh, and went with Harris to the Bank of Cape Fear, where Harris paid the notes in Confederate currency to Jones in the presence of Young. Whereupon Young demanded the amount so paid of Jones, who declined to deliver it to him on the ground that he had no authority from Anderson to collect it. Young claimed to have authority from the fact that Harris had given him the notes as agent for Anderson, and that he as such agent had endorsed and delivered them to Jones for collection.

As soon as the war terminated, and communication between Kentucky and North Carolina was restored, Anderson repudiated the action of the bank in securing Confederate currency for his notes, and filed his bill in equity against Harris and the bank, charging that the notes never had been paid; that they had been delivered to Harris without authority by collusion between the bank and Harris to defraud him.

The respondents put in separate answers. The bank admitted the reception of the notes for collection. Stated that it had remitted to Anderson all collections as long as it was possible to do so, and that in receiving payment of the notes in Confederate currency, it had acted with due care and diligence in protecting Anderson's interest, exercising the same discretion as was used by the best business men in the community in the transaction of their own business, and just as much as had been at that time exercised by prudent executors, guardians, and other fiduciaries, and denied the charge of collusion. Harris, in his answer, admitted the main facts as charged, denied collusion, and claimed that Young as agent of Anderson had ratified his payment to the bank.

Young testified that on his visit to Raleigh in 1862, he was no longer agent of Anderson, that relation having terminated the year before.

Phillips & Buttle, for complainant.
Rogers & Bachelor, for the bank.
E. G. Haywood, for Harris.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This is a suit in equity by the plaintiff, a citizen of Kentucky, against the defendants, who are citizens of North Carolina. The substance of the case is that Anderson having sold some mules to Harris, received his bonds for the price, and deposited them in the Bank of Cape Fear for collection, late in 1860, or early in 1861. Subsequently, the bank received partial payments, which were remitted to Anderson. The civil war broke out soon afterward, and there were no further payments until November, 1862, when the balance on the first bond was paid. The second bond of $450, and interest, were paid in full early in 1863. These payments were made in Confederate notes, and the bonds were surrendered to Harris.

The bill charges that there was collusion between the bank and Harris in this attempt to satisfy the bonds by payment in Confederate currency, and prays that the defendant may be compelled to satisfy the debt due from Harris. The bill does not allege that Harris is insolvent, and the charge of collusion is denied by the answer, and not supported by proof.

There is no doubt that the bank was constituted his agent for collection by the plaintiff, and it is not denied that its duties as such were faithfully fulfilled until after the commencement of the civil war. The agency of the bank was not terminated by the breaking out of hostilities. The bank might, indeed, have declined to act further under its agency, and might have retained the bonds for delivery to the plaintiff, but if it acted at all, it was bound to act with care and diligence. In our opinion, the receipt of Confederate notes, in payment of a debt due to a citizen of a state adhering to the national government, was not the exercise of such diligence. Such receipt, however, did not discharge the debtor from his debt. The bonds, though paid in form and delivered to him as paid by the agent, were not paid in fact. He still remained liable for the full amount of the debt. Nothing could discharge him except ratification of the acts of the agent, or voluntary release by the creditor, or actual payment in lawful money. No discharge, such as is here described, is alleged. The evidence is that the creditor disavowed the unauthorized acts of the agent and insisted on payment in full. But he can not recover damages for consequential loss without proof of such loss. If the debtor is not discharged, and is able to pay the debt, and no loss has arisen to the creditor from the acts of the bank, it is difficult to see how the creditor can establish any right as against that corporation. Rights and remedies as between the bank and the debtor are matters between them, and not between the bank and the creditor, unless loss has arisen to the creditor. But the bill contains no allegation of the insolvency of the debtor or of other loss. In the present state of the pleadings, therefore, the particular relief prayed for in the bill can not be granted.

But since the bank is undoubtedly liable to the debtor for the value of the Confederate notes received from him, and the debtor remains liable to the creditor for the full amount of the bonds, we think that, to avoid multiplicity and circuitry of action, under the general prayer for relief, and upon the whole case, a decree may be made for the payment by the bank to the plaintiff of the amount due to Harris, and against Harris for the balance remaining due after crediting that amount upon the bonds. If the plaintiff is not content with such a decree, his bill, in its present form, must be dismissed; but if he chooses, he may amend by alleging the insolvency of Harris, and loss of his debt through the unauthorized action of the bank. Emerson v. Mallett, Phil. Eq. 236; State v. Mebane, 63 N. C. 315; "Liability of Guardian," see Confederate Notes.

[NOTE. The one exception to the rule that war suspends all commercial intercourse between the citizens of two belligerent states is that of allowing the payment of debts to an agent of an alien enemy, where such agent resides in the same state with the debtor. But, said Mr. Justice Bradley, in Insurance Co. v. Davis, 95 U. S. 425, "this indulgence is subject to restrictions. In the first place, it must not be done with the view of transmitting the funds to the principal during the continuance of the war, though, if so transmitted without the debtor's connivance, he will not be responsible for it. * * * In the next place, in order to the subsistence of the agency during the war, it must have the assent of the parties thereto. * * * It is not enough that there was an agency prior to the war. It would be contrary to reason that a man without his consent should continue to be bound by the acts of one whose relations to him have undergone such a fundamental alteration as that produced by a war between the two countries, to which they respectively belong."]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1851.

COMPROMISE—PAYMENT—NEGOTIABLE PAPER.

[A draft given in compromise of a suit, and thereafter protested for nonpayment, is not a payment of the claim, and the original suit may proceed as if no settlement had taken place.]

[In admiralty. Libel for a marine tort by Moses Anderson against William H. Brown and Nathaniel Jarvis, owners of the steamship Pacific. A settlement was heretofore had. Heard on motion by libelant to proceed with the suit, and to add one Lowry as a party respondent. Granted.]

Before JUDSON, District Judge.

This action was commenced by the libelants for $5,000 damages for a marine tort against the defendants, as owners of the steamship Pacific. Process of citation was issued, and both defendants were served. After service a settlement of the suit was made by paying the libelants a draft for $750. After the draft became due, it was protested for nonpayment. A motion was now made by the libelant to proceed with the suit, and add another party, a Mr. Lowry, as defendant, and for an order to hold all the defendants to bail. Mr. D. W. Mahon, Jr., was heard for the libelant in support of the motion, and Mr. T. J. Brady, for the defendants, in opposition, who relied on rule 25 of the supreme court of United States. After considerable discussion, the judge decided in favor of the libelant, granting the amendment prayed for, and allowing the suit to proceed as if no settlement had taken place, and ordering the defendants to be held to bail on $1,200; thus deciding that a draft is no payment unless paid.

ANDERSON et al. v. GERDING.

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. Oct., 1879.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—ESTOPPEL TO RAISE OBJECTIONS—RES JUDICATA.

1. Three suits were brought in a state court by the same plaintiffs, citizens of one state, against the same defendant, a citizen of another state, on three promissory notes of the latter, all given for parts of the same consideration, and each for less than five hundred dollars, and the same defense existed to and was pleaded against all of the notes. Held, that a verdict and judgment in one of the suits would constitute an estoppel, and be decisive of the others, and,

2. That, therefore, the matter in dispute, in each one of said suits, exceeded the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and that any one or all of said suits might be removed to the federal court under the act of March 3, 1875.

At law. This was a petition for the writ of certiorari filed by defendant Gerding, under section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from state courts, and for other purposes." (18 Stat. 470.) The petition stated, in substance, that Anderson, Starr & Co., a firm all of whose members were citizens of the state of New York, on February 25, 1879, brought against the petitioner Gerding, who was a citizen of the state of Georgia, three several suits in the superior court of the county of Putnam, in the state of Georgia, on three several promissory notes, which purported to have been made by the firm of Gerding & Co., of which firm the petitioner was the surviving partner, and all payable to the order of the plaintiffs. Two of the notes, on which said suits were founded, were dated May 21, 1878, and were each for the payment of three hundred and nineteen dollars, and the third was dated July 25, 1878, and was for the payment of three hundred and twenty-four dollars. One of the notes fell due November 1, 1878, another December 1, 1878, and the third December 25, 1878.

Before the term of said state court in which said suits, or either of them, could be first tried, Gerding filed in said court his petition for the removal of said three suits to this court. His petition was accompanied by a sufficient bond as required by law. The petition for removal filed in the state court, averred that the amount of money involved in said three suits exceeded, exclusive of costs, the sum of five hundred dollars; that all of said notes were made for the same consideration, and that whatever defenses could or would be made to either of said suits, could and would be made to the others, and that all of said suits involved but one controversy or matter in dispute. This petition, therefore, prayed the state court to consolidate said three suits, if necessary, and for an order of the court directing the removal of said suits to this court. The petition for certiorari further alleged that the state court refused to comply with the prayer of the petition filed therein; refused to consolidate said causes, and refused to make an order for their removal. By an amendment to his petition for certiorari, the petitioner alleged that at the September term, 1879, of the state, the petitioner amended his petition for the removal of said causes, and alleged that he had filed the same identical pleas and none other to each of said suits, and, therefore, there was but one controversy embraced in the three suits. The petition for certiorari further alleged that the state court, notwithstanding said amendment, and the offer by the petitioner of a new bond, still refused to make the order for the removal of said causes to this court. The petition and amended petition prayed for the writ of certiorari directed to the state court, commanding it to make a return of the record in said causes. The plaintiff, in the original action, did not deny any of the facts alleged in the petition for removal, but he resisted the removal of the suits on the ground that in neither one of said suits did the sum sued for exceed the value of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs.

Clifford Anderson, W. A. Reid, and W. B. Wingfield, for petitioner.

George S. Thomas and W. F. Jenkins, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The state court refused to consolidate the three causes brought against the defendant Gerding. The motion made for that purpose was addressed to the sound discretion of that court: Lewis v. Daniel, 45 Ga. 124. The action of the state court on the motion cannot, therefore, be reviewed by this court. The petition for certiorari is, therefore, to be considered just as if the motion to consolidate had not been made, and the question is, are the causes, or either of them, removable under the act of March 3, 1875. The plaintiffs and the defendant are citizens of different states. The question then is, does each one of these suits involve a controversy where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars.

In the case of Troy v. Evans, 97 U. S. 1, the supreme court held that, "prima facie the judgment against the defendant, in an action for money, is the measure of the jurisdiction of the United States courts in his behalf. This prima facie case continues until the contrary is shown, and if jurisdiction is invoked because of the collateral effect a judgment may have in another action, it must appear that the judgment conclusively settles the rights of the parties in a matter actually in dispute, the sum or value of which exceeds the required amount." From this statement of the law, it follows that, as the matter in dispute in neither of these suits exceeds the sum or value of five hundred dollars the cases cannot be removed, unless a judgment in one of the cases would conclusively settle the others. If the judgment in one does conclusively settle the controversy in the others, then the matter in dispute, in either of the suits, may be said to exceed the sum of five hundred dollars.

The petition for removal alleged that the three notes sued on were given for the same consideration; that the defense to all three of the notes was the same, and that the three suits involved but one controversy. It further appears, from the record, that the identical same pleas were filed by the defendant in each of the three suits—one of these pleas being nil debet. The question is, therefore, will a judgment in one of these suits be conclusive in the others. If it will, the amount in dispute will be sufficient to give this court jurisdiction, and authorize the removal of the cases, if otherwise, the cases cannot be removed. The rule of law upon this point is thus laid down by the supreme court in the case of Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351: "Where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in a prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. In all cases, therefore, where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action to matters arising upon a suit in a different cause of action, the inquiry must always be as to the point or questions actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined. Only upon such matters is the judgment conclusive in another action." So in Stinson v. Dousman, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 461, it was held that though the suit be for less than the amount necessary to give the court jurisdiction, yet if it is connected with a claim to property, and the effect of the judgment would adjust the legal and equitable claims of the parties thereto, and the value of the property exceeds two thousand dollars, jurisdiction will be maintained. See, also, Rake v. Pope, 7 Ala. 161.

Applying the rule thus laid down, if it appears that the same identical defense is made in each of the cases, that the same questions are in issue in each, then a judgment in one case will be a bar to a judgment in the others, consequently the amount in dispute in each case is not the sum sued for in that particular case, but that sum and also the sums sued for in the other cases. For one trial and judgment would decide all the cases. The petition for certiorari avers, and the averment is not denied, that this state of facts does exist, that there is the same defense as to all the notes, and that the three suits involve but one controversy. In each of these suits, therefore, the amount sued for in all these suits is in dispute, and that amount exceeds five hundred dollars. This court, therefore, has jurisdiction over any one of the suits, and there is no reason why any one or all should not be removed. Let the writ of certiorari issue as prayed for.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The case is put entirely upon the want of jurisdiction. James Jackson cannot be considered a party within the sense of the constitution and the act of congress. All the parties must be capable of suing. Some of the lessors are citizens of New York, or at least there is no averment of citizenship; and it must appear upon the face of the record, affirmatively, that the court has jurisdiction.

The court gives no opinion upon the other points. Judgment reversed.

[In equity. Hearing at chambers.]

A. S. Sullivan, for petitioners.

H. R. Jackson, for complainants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. On the 2d day of July, 1873, a petition was presented to me at chambers in Washington, D. C., by Mr. Sullivan, on behalf of the state of Florida, the trustees of the internal improvement fund of the state of Florida, the Jacksonville, Pensacola & Mobile Railroad Co., and Milton S. Littlefield, praying for a stay of the sale of the road and franchises of said company, advertised by the marshal to be made on the 7th of July inst., under the decree and decretal orders heretofore rendered in this suit.

Mr. Jackson, for the complainants, objected to the application, being heard, first, on the ground that a justice of the supreme court is prohibited by the 7th section of the "act to further the administration of justice," approved June 1, 1872, from entertaining an application for an injunction or for a restraining order out of his circuit; secondly, that the governor of the state, being made a defendant as one of the trustees of the improvement fund ex officio, pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that a suit would not lie in this court against a state, and on that plea the complainants voluntarily dismissed the bill as to said governor, and in like manner dismissed the same as to the comptroller of the state—so that the state and the trustees of the internal improvement fund had expressly declined to be parties in the case, and had no standing to be heard therein; thirdly, if it should be decided to hear the application, the complainant desired to present affidavits to show that delay of the sale would be highly prejudicial to the complainants and the public. The first point of objection I overruled for the reasons already stated in the case of Searles v. Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co., [Case No. 12,586.] The second is of a more serious character. The objection, in substance, is this: that persons who are not parties to a suit, have no standing in court to enable them to file a petition in said suit. If they have occasion to ask any relief in relation to the matters involved in said suit, or to the proceedings therein, they must file an original bill. This is undoubtedly the general rule. Strangers to a cause cannot be heard therein either by petition or motion, except in certain cases arising from necessity, as where the pleadings contain scandal against a stranger, or where a stranger purchases the subject of litigation pending the suit, and the like. Daniell, Ch. Pr. 357, 1080; [Toosey v. Burchell,] Jac. 159; [Bozon v. Bolland,] 1 Russ. & M. 69. Creditors who are allowed to prove debts, and persons belonging to a class on whose behalf a suit is brought, are regarded as quasi parties, and of course may have a standing in court. But in this case, the state of Florida and the trustees of the internal improvement fund, being strangers to the suit, and not occupying any such relation thereto at the present time as to entitle them to intervene, and therefore not being bound by what is decreed or done in the suit, they cannot be received or heard on petition for a stay of proceedings therein. It would be a source of great hardship if persons not parties were allowed thus to come in and interfere. I say nothing here of the expediency or inexpediency of proceeding in the cause without making the trustees of the internal improvement fund parties, and without invoking the intervention of the state; that is a matter which more particularly concerns the plaintiffs; and if any failure to make proper parties should be found to render the proceedings of less value, they must abide the consequences. The only manner in which the state or the trustees can interfere with the proceedings is by original bill. The allegation that they intend to file such a bill is not sufficient.

The other parties to the petition, namely, the Jacksonville, Pensacola & Mobile Railroad Company and M. S. Littlefield, are parties to the suit, and to them the above objection does not apply. They are capable of filing a petition in the cause, and if the case were a proper one for the interference of the court, perhaps the petition might be amended by striking out the names of their copetitioners. But the case made by the petition, and the admitted facts, are not sufficient, as it seems to me, to authorize an interference with the proceedings. The railroad company and Littlefield cannot now ask for any alteration of the decree. They virtually consented to its terms, and withdrew all defense which they had set up in the cause. They have applied for a rehearing, and it has been denied after full argument. The decree, as above said, was essentially a consent decree. It was made upon terms, and those terms were fully expressed in an agreement between the parties, dated the 20th of December last. By that agreement the complainants were to discontinue certain other suits—one in the state court of chancery in Jefferson county, Florida, in which a receiver had been appointed, and one in this court, sitting at Tallahassee—and were not to press execution on the decree if the defendants made the payments next referred to. The defendants were to pay ten thousand dollars within thirty days from the date of the agreement, and ten thousand dollars every thirty days thereafter until the whole debt was paid and satisfied; and if default was made, the complainants were to wait ninety days after such default before making seizure and sale of the property.

The defendants, the railroad company and Littlefield, if they have any ground at all for a stay of proceedings, must found it upon this agreement. They allege that the complainants, through the marshal, are proceeding to a sale of the property against the equity of their agreement. The facts seem to be that the complainants complied with the agreement on their part, by discontinuing the suits referred to; but that the defendants did not pay the first installment of ten thousand dollars until the 15th of February (whereas it should have been paid on the 19th of January), and have not paid any of the other installments. The defendants say that the complainants consented to the delay of the first installment, not having themselves discontinued their suits immediately, and thereby having delayed the defendants in obtaining possession of the property. The complainants admit that they accepted the first payment, but insist that they did not waive the payment of the succeeding installments. This is not controverted, and I do not see, therefore, what ground of equity the defendants have for staying the proceedings for sale. The second installment was due on the 18th of February, and the others at successive intervals of thirty days thereafter, and none of them were paid. The ninety days' indulgence which the complainants agreed to give expired on the 19th of May. The sale was advertised for the 7th of July. But the defendants do not even tender or offer to pay the installments which have fallen due. The petition is not based on any such ground as that of a desire or willingness to comply with the substance of the agreement. It is based rather on alleged equities of the state, and on the charge that the complainants have violated the agreement made on December 20th last.

Being of opinion that the complainants, as against the said defendants, have a right to proceed with the execution and sale, and that the defendants have shown no good reason for restraining them, I must deny the application for injunction.

TAXATION OF COSTS—WITNESS FEES.

1. The fact that the deposition of a witness has been taken upon a dedimus potestatem, and is on file, forms no objection to the allowance of the travel fees of such witness, in the taxation of costs, if he attended and was examined in person.

2. Under the fee bill of February 5, 1853, as well as under former laws, the successful party is entitled to tax travel fees of a witness who resides out of the state and more than one hundred miles from the place of trial, and who attends voluntarily, upon mere request.

[3. Cited in Cahn v. Monroe, 29 Fed. 675, to the point that witness fees are taxable, although the witness was not subpoenaed, if his attendance was procured in good faith.]

Question of taxation of costs. After the trial of this action, a question arose as to the amount to be allowed in the taxation of costs for the traveling fees of a witness,—Stafford. This witness resided in another district,—New York,—and more than one hundred miles from the place of trial. He was not subpoenaed, but attended voluntarily at the request of the plaintiffs. The defendant objected to the allowance of traveling fees of the witness from his residence to the place of trial, and for returning: 1st. Because his testimony by deposition had been taken and filed in the case. 2nd. Because the witness was not served with subpoena. 3rd. Because the travel was from beyond the district, and more than one hundred miles from the place of trial.

Alfred Russell, for plaintiffs.

Charles L. Atterbury, for defendant.

WITHEY, District Judge. The first objection is not allowable. If a witness is present at the trial his deposition ought not to be used. If the testimony was material, the party had a right to have the witness present before the court and jury, if his attendance could be procured.

The second objection is not well made, and that and the third will be considered together. If a witness resides in another state, and more than one hundred miles from the place of trial, a subpoena cannot be made effective; its service will be useless; it will afford no ground for an attachment. Is a party, therefore, obliged to take out a commission to take his testimony? or if the personal presence of the witness be deemed essential, and it can be procured, is the party deprived of the benefit of the act of 1853, which allows witnesses' fees for each day's attendance in court, one dollar and fifty cents, and five cents per mile for traveling from his place of residence to said place of trial, and five cents per mile for returning? Both questions are answered in the negative. No rule of court and no construction can properly be allowed to override the plain language and obvious import of this enactment. Under the act of 1799, it was held that traveling fees were allowable from the residence of the witness, although without the state, and more than one hundred miles from the place of trial. 3 Story, 84, [Whipple v. Cumberland Cotton Co., Case No. 17-515.] Before the passage of the act of 1853,

It was held,—5 McLean, 241, [Dreskill v. Parish, Case No. 4,076.]—under the act of 1799, that, if the witness “attended voluntarily, or without summons, his fees cannot be charged against the losing party.” This is but a literal rendering of the act of 1799, and, of course, it will bear the construction given it. That enactment allowed compensation “to witnesses summoned,” and not, as in the act of 1853, “to witnesses for each day’s attendance, &c.,” without reference to whether the witness be “summoned” or not. Clearly, under the act of 1853, a witness who attends by procurement of a party because his testimony was deemed material, is entitled to the per diem of one dollar and fifty cents, and traveling fees from his place of residence, and for returning, provided he actually traveled so far to reach the court, as it would be from his residence to the court. The taxation made in this case is proper.

[A railway from B. to W., which, by agreement with a connecting line, sells tickets over its own line with a coupon good for a passage over the connecting line from W. to N., cannot bind the connecting line by selling a similar ticket good for passage in the opposite direction,—from N. to W.]

At law. The plaintiff, who sued for damages for being put off the cars for want of a ticket, claimed to have had a ticket purchased by him in Boston at the regular office in the Boston and Worcester R. R. depot, as a through ticket for New York. It was proved that the Boston and Worcester R. R. Co. were authorized to sell through tickets from Boston to New York, with coupons headed “Boston to New York,” the last of which was good for one trip over the defendants’ railway; and that a reciprocal arrangement existed by which the defendants sold through tickets at New York for Boston, the coupons being headed “New York to Boston.” The plaintiff’s ticket was one of the latter description. The court (WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and SHIPMAN, District Judge) held that, assuming that the ticket agent at Boston had sold this ticket as a ticket for New York, he so exceeded his authority that the defendants are not bound by his act, and directed a verdict in their favor.

In admiralty.

D. T. Sullivan, for libellant.

Milton Andros, for respondents.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. My attention has been called, since the delivery of the opinion in the above case, [nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible,] to the fact that Mr. Marcy, Mrs. Ross, and the two boys, testify that they heard the master tell the men to stop fighting. I was, therefore, in error, in saying that the fact that the captain interfered for the protection of the men rested upon his own unsupported testimony. In the light of this correction I have carefully reconsidered the case, and have sought with some solicitude to free my mind from all bias arising from the fact that I had formed an opinion, based upon a partially mistaken view of the evidence. I do not deny that my confidence in the correctness of the conclusion heretofore reached, has been in some degree shaken, and yet, after reflecting upon all the facts, I am unable to bring my mind to the conclusion that the captain did all that he should have done to protect the man from the violence to which he was subjected. The law arms the master with absolute authority, but it charges him with corresponding responsibilities. He is sustained with a high hand, in all measures necessary to control disorder and enforce obedience from the crew. He has a similar authority and a like duty when it is necessary to protect the crew from the brutality of officers. What he permits he is therefore justly considered to commit; and he permits that which he does not, by a prompt and energetic exercise of his authority, prevent. It is clear that a great part of the injuries received by the man were inflicted after the master appeared on deck. The clothes of the latter were stained with blood when he returned to the cabin. It is also evident that the assault by the second mate, which began near the corner of the after hatch-house, continued until the parties “worked over,” as the master says, to the main rigging on the starboard side of the vessel.

The account given by Mr. Marcy, though he says he heard the captain tell them to stop fighting, does not seem to me to indicate that prompt and authoritative interposition which the circumstances demanded. Mr. Marcy denies having struck the man himself, or having spoken to him; I have with some hesitation accepted his statement. His narrative, however, bears some marks of improbability. He says that after throwing the knife overboard, he remained on the port side of the ship (it would seem a calm spectator of the struggle), some three or four minutes, when he heard the captain call. He immediately went to him and took hold of the second mate, and the men were separated.

Estimates of time under such circumstances are of course unreliable. But it may be concluded that Mr. Marcy, by his own showing, remained for an appreciable interval of time while the man was being beaten from the port corner of the hatch-house to the starboard main rigging, the master all the time vainly endeavoring to protect him, and to obtain from the second mate any respect for his authority; and yet he never stirred until called on to assist the master. This seems to me improbable, especially as we find Mr. Marcy, the moment the men were separated, starting with the second mate, in pursuit of Ross, whose only offense was that he was looking on, pursuing him into the forecabin with such demonstrations of violent intentions as to induce the master to follow, and after some occurrences, which are not disclosed, order them out of the forecabin.

That the master, at some period, ordered the men to stop fighting, I do not doubt; but the question is, when did he do so, and with what vigor did he enforce the command? Mr. Marcy is the only one of respondent's witnesses who saw the whole occurrence, and I am constrained to say that I cannot find in his evidence sufficient ground for concluding in the face of so much opposing testimony that the master discharged his whole duty under the circumstances. The fact that the master, so far as appears, in no way rebuked or reprimanded the second mate is not without significance. The latter had, in his presence, not only violently assaulted a seaman, but had continued that assault and inflicted serious injuries upon him, in contempt of the master's orders and in defiance of his authority. And yet the master leaves the deck without a word of rebuke or even remonstrance, and even without enjoining upon the second mate to abstain from further violence. The result of this omission was that the assaults of the second mate were renewed almost as soon as the captain had re-entered the cabin, and were continued until the cries of distress of the man had again called the captain on deck, where he found the second mate with a capstan bar in his hand. The master seems at once to have accepted the second mate's explanation, that "the man saw the bar in his hand, got scared and cried out." And yet, if the evidence of the man and of numerous witnesses is to be believed, he was struck by the second mate several times with the bar, and finally received some severe blows on the back of his head with something the second mate had fetched from his room for the purpose. All this would, I think, have been prevented had the master, when he retired to his cabin, given strict orders to the second mate not to lay hands on the man or in any way continue his assaults.

On the whole, I recur to my original conclusion that the master, though he has not been guilty of any willful wrong, and is probably a just and humane man, has failed to exert his authority with the vigor and effect which the law required. I consider it of much importance that masters should feel it to be as much their duty to restrain the violence of the officers, as it is to repress the insubordination of the men, and that they will be held responsible if they fail to do their utmost to protect the men from the outrages on the part of the inferior officers, which have so often brought disgrace upon our mercantile marine. Motion for a rehearing denied.

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. May 19, 1876.

LIFE INSURANCE—POLICY—CONDITION PRECEDENT—COURSE OF BUSINESS—RELIEF AGAINST FORFEITURE.

1. A policy of life insurance provided that if the insured did not pay annually in advance the interest on any unpaid notes or loans to the company on account of premiums, the company should not be liable for any part of the insurance, and the policy should cease and determine. Performance of this obligation by the assured was a condition precedent, and no recovery could be had without it.

2. The assured had been in the habit of paying this interest in cash, and for dividends earned the company credited him upon the principal of the notes outstanding; Held, that this course of business controlled the general principle of law, which requires payments upon notes to be credited first upon the interest, and then upon the principal, and that the policy would be forfeited, notwithstanding the dividends earned might exceed in amount the interest due upon the outstanding notes.

3. Against a forfeiture of a life insurance policy, incurred by non-payment of premiums upon the day stipulated, equity will not relieve.

In equity. Bill charged that on the 15th day of October, 1867, the defendant issued to William C. Anderson a policy of assurance for $10,000, the premiums being $490 per annum for life. It provided that, if two of said premiums shall be paid and default be made in payment of after premiums, the default shall not operate as a forfeiture, but the amount insured shall be commuted to the sum of the annual premiums paid. But if the insured failed to pay as above, or to pay annually in advance the interest on any unpaid notes or loans, then the company was not to be liable for any sum, but the policy was to cease. The policy continued in force to the 15th of October, 1870. Bill further stated that some of the interest—a small amount—on unpaid notes was not paid in advance annually; probably there was a failure to pay interest on one such note. The complainants did not know how this was. They insisted that the stipulation providing for payment of interest in advance was a penalty against which the court would relieve. Bill prayed for statement of the notes in defendant's possession and for an account of dividends that Anderson was entitled to since January 1, 1869; that the court would relieve against the forfeiture of the policy, and decree to complainants whatever amount might be justly due them. Demurrer was interposed, the grounds of which were, that, as the bill admitted the non-payment of certain interest in advance, when for that the policy provided a forfeiture, all previous payments thereon, and all dividend credits accruing thereon, should likewise be forfeited; and consequently equity would give no relief.

W. M. Smith, for complainant.
Kortrecht, Craft & Scales, for defendant.

BROWN, District Judge. There are three questions in this case, which, though not raised separately upon the face of the demurrer, are necessary to be determined in order that it may be properly disposed of. 1st—Under the policy in question, does the failure to pay the interest in advance upon the premium notes debar the plaintiff of a recovery, and work a forfeiture of the premiums already paid? 2d—Was the defendant bound to apply the dividends due the assured upon the interest upon the premium notes, instead of applying them upon the principal, and thus save the policy from lapsing? 3d—Will a court of equity relieve against the forfeiture of a policy of insurance incurred by reason of the non-payment of premiums?

The first question must be answered in the affirmative. The second proviso of the policy is unequivocal, that "if the assured fail to pay annually in advance the interest on any unpaid notes or loans which may be owing by the insured to the company on account of annual premiums, the company shall not be liable for the payment of the sum assured, or any part thereof, and this policy shall cease and determine." The fifth clause also provides that, "in every case where this policy shall cease or become null and void, all previous payments made thereon, and all dividend credits accruing therefrom, shall be forfeited to the said company." Nothing could be plainer than this language. The prompt payment of premiums is the very essence of the contract of life insurance. The company has a right to insist upon the performance of this covenant upon the day named, as a condition precedent to the continued existence of the policy. So far, at least, the law is well settled. Bliss, Ins. 253-274; May, Ins. 406; Robert v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 1 Disn. 355, 2 Disn. 106; Want v. Blunt, 12 East, 183; Beadle v. Chenango Co. Mut. Ins. Co., 3 Hill, 161; Pitt v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 100 Mass. 500; Baker v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 43 N. Y. 283; Phoenix Life Assur. Co. v. Sheridan, 8 H. L. Cas. 745; Catoir v. American Life Ins. & Trust Co., 4 Vroom, [33 N. J. Law.] 487. If it were otherwise, as it is optional with the assured to drop his policy at any time, the company could never know whether he intended to keep it alive or not. Phoenix Life Assur. Co. v. Sheridan, 8 H. L. Cas. 745; Simpson v. Accidental Death Ins. Co., 2 C. B. (N. S.) 257. If the company elects to accept a note, and insists upon its prompt payment, or upon payment of interest in advance, it is a proviso for the benefit of the assured, and the company has the same right to insist upon punctual payment. Patch v. Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co., 3 Bigelow, Cas. 780; Wall v. Home Ins. Co., 36 N. Y. 157; Williams v. Republic Ins. Co., 19 Mich. 469; Pitt v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 100 Mass. 500; Robert v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 1 Disn. 355. Nor is there anything harsh or oppressive in this requirement. The contract of insurance is one in which great risks are assumed by one party, and there is no injustice in requiring a punctilious observance of its obligations on the part of the other. The company says in substance to the assured: "Pay me $490 to-day, and if you die to-morrow, or at any time during the year, I will pay your representatives $10,000; pay me the same sum annually, and this arrangement shall be continued during your life, with the assurance that your representatives will receive the $10,000 upon your death, whenever it may happen. But if, on the other hand, you fail to make your annual payments, your heirs shall not only not receive the $10,000, but you shall forfeit the amount already paid." I see nothing unfair or inequitable in this bargain, nor any reason why the company should not insist upon an exact performance by the assured. The hardship, if any there is, is quite as likely to fall upon the one party as the other, with this difference, however, that the contingency of loss by death is one the company cannot possibly provide against, while the payment of premiums is always within the power of the assured, and nothing but his own negligence will cause a lapse of his policy. The fact that in this case the annual interest to be paid was very small, works no change in the principle. Indeed, it renders performance of his covenant on the part of the assured so much the easier.

I fail to see why courts should apply to policies of insurance rules of construction different from those applicable to ordinary instruments. If there is anything unjust in the proviso for the forfeiture, it is one which the legislature and not the courts are called upon to remedy. Something may be gained to justice by bending the law to the exigencies of an individual case; but more is lost by the bad precedent to the certainty of the law as a science. While a company which desires to increase its patronage and stand well in public estimation would not, as a matter of policy, habitually take advantage of accidental slips or omissions of its policy-holders, the law cannot distinguish between these cases and those where the assured elects deliberately to abandon his contract. In this case, however, there is nothing tending to show any desire on the part of the assured to keep his policy alive after October 15, 1870. As observed by the court of appeals of St. Louis, in the case of Russum v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., [1 Mo. App. 228,] the clause in the policy providing for commutation on failure to pay the annual premiums, and for a forfeiture on a failure to pay the interest, are not inconsistent. "They can both stand together, and we may give full effect to both. All that is needed for this is for the insured to bring himself within the terms of both. The first is intended to save the forfeiture which generally would be incurred by the failure to pay the annual premium; to this extent it is a privilege or advantage to the assured. The second proviso insists upon rigorous conditions in respect to what? Only of so much of any unpaid premium as the assured, instead of paying in cash, takes the indulgence of only paying interest on at six per cent. If he does not wish to incur the hazard of a forfeiture on account of this part of the premium, his remedy is easy. He can presently pay his note for the premium, and without more, he has a paid-up non-forfeitable policy for a fixed portion of the sum contemplated by the instrument when originally issued. If he wished, instead of this, to take the chances of gain, he must at the same time incur the hazard of loss; and cannot complain if he be held to the terms of the contract he has deliberately made."

I am unable to concur in the opinion of the court of appeals of Kentucky, in the case of St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. v. Grigsby, 2 Cent. Law J. 123, that by commutation this became "a paid-up policy, except that the company had the right, should its affairs render it necessary and proper, to demand the payment in whole or in part of the note executed for the unpaid portion of the three annual premiums." The court in this case treat the unpaid notes as loans to the assured, and the "interest on these loans in no sense an annual premium due from the assured to the insurer." The effect of the ruling is that the company has no remedy to enforce payment of notes, except to bring an ordinary action at law, to trust to dividends earned in a successful business to meet them, or to wait until the death of the assured and deduct them from the amount of his policy. If this be the law, then the assured, under every policy issued by the company, after the payment of the two first annual premiums, may give no further attention to it, and the company be left to carry on its business, pay its expenses, its losses, its dividends and other outlays, simply from the interest of the cash moiety of the first two annual premiums. The opinion throws no light upon the probable amount of dividends which a company, conducted under these principles might be expected to pay.

2d—Was the company bound to apply the dividends due the assured upon the interest instead of the principal of the premium notes, and thus save the policy from lapsing? The policy throws no light upon this point. It contains no agreement for the payment of the dividends. The charter of the company is not before the court, and we can look only to the allegations of the bill to answer the question. The bill avers that the defendant, being a mutual company, the assured, by virtue of his policy, became a member, and interested in its earnings and profits—was so considered and treated by defendant, and dividends were declared in his favor, and instead of being paid over to him in cash were credited on his annual premiums, as complainant supposes, and has no doubt, with the consent of the assured. From the bill and the exhibits the transaction appears to have been as follows: On the 15th of October, 1867, the policy was issued upon a payment of $245 in cash and a note for $245, upon which interest was paid in advance. On October 15th, 1868, the assured made another cash payment of $245, gave another note for the like amount, and paid in cash $20.40² interest on the two notes for one year. No dividend was credited to him at that time. On October 15th, 1869, a statement was made as follows:

Notes outstanding.....	$490 00
Less dividend declared Jan. 1, 1869..	87 45
Balance of outstanding note.....	$402 55
Note portion of premium—due above date	245 00
Total new note.....	$647 55

²[22 Int. Rev. Rec. 250, gives $29.40.]

Interest due in cash on note. $ 38 85
Cash part of premium due above date 245 00

Total cash required. $283 85

To this the receipt was appended.

While the general rule is admitted without hesitation, that where money is paid upon a note the law will apply it first upon the interest and then upon the principal, still, where the contract makes a different provision, or the course of business between the parties has established a different usage, I think the general rule must bend to this special agreement or custom. The policy makes no special provision for dividend credits, and its second proviso requires payment annually in advance of interest upon unpaid notes. The course of business between the parties, as evidenced by the exhibits, shows that the annual dividend which was credited to the assured was deducted from his notes outstanding October 15, 1869, and not from the interest upon the new note, which was given at that date. This interest was paid in cash. This was done with the assent of the assured, who appears to have given a new note for $647.55. All that the company could be required to do in crediting subsequent dividends was to apply them, as had been done before, upon the principal of the outstanding notes, and as the assured had paid his interest in cash, I think he must be held as assenting to this arrangement. A similar rule or custom was recognized as binding upon both parties in the case of Ohde v. The Northwestern Mut. Ins. Co., 4 Ins. Law J. 702. If there is anything in the regulations or prospectus of the company negating the course of business evidenced by these exhibits, it should be set forth, and I think the bill demurrable upon that ground.

3d—Has a court of equity power to relieve against the forfeiture of a policy? In Story's Equity Jurisprudence, (section 1314,) it is said: "Whenever a penalty is inserted merely to secure the performance or enjoyment of a collateral object, the latter is considered as the principal intent of the instrument, and the penalty is deemed only as accessory, and therefore as intended only to secure the due performance thereof, or the damage really incurred by the non-performance. In every such case the true test by which to ascertain whether relief can or can not be had in equity is, to consider whether compensation can be made or not." But in section 1323, it is said: "The doctrine seems now to be asserted in England that in all cases of forfeiture for the breach of any covenant other than a covenant to pay rent, no relief ought to be granted in equity, unless upon the ground of accident, mistake, fraud, or surprise, although the breach is capable of just compensation." Section 1325: "It is upon grounds somewhat similar, aided also by considerations of public policy and the necessity of a prompt performance in order to accomplish public or corporate objects, that courts of equity, in cases of the non-compliance of the stockholders with the terms of payment of their installments of stock at the time prescribed, by which a forfeiture of their shares is incurred under the by-laws of the institution, have refused to interfere by granting relief against such forfeiture." In the Grigsby Case, already cited, the court of appeals of Kentucky seemed to hold that equity would relieve against a forfeiture incurred by the non-payment of premiums; but I think this is opposed by a great weight of authority, including that of the learned circuit judge of this circuit, in the case of Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co., [Case No. 13,726,] where the doctrine is fully discussed, and the conclusion reached that equity has no power to afford relief. See, also, Robert v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 1 Disn. 355; Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. French, 2 Cin. R. 321. As a further discussion of this point would be a mere reiteration of the opinion of the learned judge in the case above cited, nothing more will be added, except to say that this opinion is considered as an adjudication binding upon this court. The demurrer to the bill is therefore sustained.

NOTE, [from original report.] Judge Emmons, in Frazer v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., [unreported,] at Nashville, decided almost the same question raised here. It was there contended that the policy was a paid-up one, there being only a small amount of interest to be paid every year. The court held that the policy, by reason of the failure to pay the stipulated interest, was not to be considered as forfeited, but as lapsed; and as time was of the essence of the contract, the plaintiff could not recover. See, also, cases of Seyms, Buck and Statham against the Insurance Companies, October Term, 1876, S. C. U. S. [93 U. S. 24.] The court decide in these cases, in effect, that a failure to pay annual premiums during war or peace, determines the policy, but that its equitable value may be recovered.

SEAMEN—WAGES—FORFEITURE—SEIZURE OF VESSEL BY REVENUE OFFICERS—LIEN.

1. A libel will be sustained, though the vessel has made a second voyage since the cause of libel accrued, if, by her sudden departure, the prosecution of the claim was previously prevented.

2. Where a vessel is seized by revenue officers, the mariners discharged, the vessel sold by her owner during seizure, and afterwards liberated, the lien of the mariners for wages is not destroyed.

[Cited in Carter v. The Morrisania, 3 Fed. 925.]

[See Swift v. The Frank and Willie, 45 Fed. 488.]

3. It is not such embezzlement as will forfeit a mariner's wages, if he sells part of the cargo, by the direction of the mate, during the permanent absence of the master, in order to procure necessary provisions for the vessel.

In admiralty. This was a libel [by Thomas and Wolley Anderson against the sloop Solon, James Holt, master] for wages. The libellants shipped on board the sloop Solon, at Philadelphia, on the 21st September, 1835, to ply between that port and New York, at twelve dollars per month. In January, 1836, the sloop sailed from New York for Philadelphia, but was obliged to go into harbor, on the coast of New Jersey, till the navigation of the Delaware should be open: it being then obstructed by ice. While in harbor, the captain left the sloop, taking her papers with him. During his absence, the provisions having become exhausted, the mate directed one of the libellants to sell a portion of the cargo, to procure food. The sloop was subsequently seized, by the custom-house officers, for want of the papers which were in the captain's possession, he still being absent. While under seizure, she was sold by her owner, and afterwards liberated. The new owner brought her to Philadelphia, when the libellants, who had been discharged at the time of the seizure, issued a summons to her master, which could not be served, on account of her immediately sailing for New York. On her return to Philadelphia, she was attached, in this suit, on the 14th April, 1836. The libellants claimed full wages, from the date of their shipping to their discharge at the time of seizure.

On the 13th May, 1836, the case came on for hearing, before Judge HOPKINSON. It was argued by Grinnell for the libellants, and by Bulkley for the respondent.

Bulkley for respondent.

The misfortunes of the vessel prevented the payment of wages; the seamen's lives were destroyed by the sale under seizure, as well as by her having made a second voyage before she was libelled; and the libellant, Thomas Anderson, had forfeited his wages by embezzlement of the cargo.

Grinnell, in reply.

If there are no provisions on board, the seamen may leave the vessel, and it will not be desertion followed by forfeiture of wages. The sloop was seized for the master's misconduct, and the voyage broken up by no act of the mariners. The libellant, Thomas Anderson, was not liable as for embezzlement, because he received the goods sold from an agent of the owner—the mate; and, also, because they were sold to procure necessary provisions. The sale of the vessel did not destroy the libellant's lien for wages. Abb. Shipp. 181. Process was issued the first time she came to the port where the libellants shipped. See Blaine v. The Charles Carter, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 328.

On the 20th May, 1836, HOPKINSON, District Judge, decreed in favor of the libellants for the full amount of wages claimed, and costs.

[NOTE. A vessel bound from Baltimore to the northwest coast of America stopped on the coast of Chili, pursuant to sealed instructions from the owners, for the purpose of engaging in illicit trade. She was seized, and, with her cargo, sold by the government, and the officers and crew imprisoned, some of them for nearly four years. Finally they were released, and returned to the United States, and the proceeds of the sale of the vessel and cargo deposited to the credit of its owners. The court, by Mr. Justice Story, held that the seamen, having had no knowledge of the illicit trade intended, were entitled to a lien on the proceeds of the sale for their wages from the time of their departure till their return to the United States, notwithstanding the seizure and sale of the ship and consequent discontinuance of the voyage. *Sheppard v. ANDERSON v. STRASSBURGER et al.

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1873.
FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—GOODS TAKEN UNDER LEVY—MARKET VALUE—SHERIFF'S SALE.

S. & P. recovered judgment against O., on which execution was issued, and the sheriff levied on his stock of goods. The next day, O. filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. A. was appointed assignee in bankruptcy. An injunction was issued restraining the sheriff from selling under the levy. This injunction was afterwards modified so as to allow the sheriff to sell and hold the proceeds in place of the goods. This was done, and at the sale, A. bought in the goods for the creditors, at $2,650. He then brought suit against S. & P. to recover the goods or their value. He testified that the creditors had the option of taking the goods at the $2,650, but did not take them, and he took them himself; and that he thought that competent parties would appraise the goods at $6,800. It appeared that S. & P., at the time of the entry of the judgment, knew O. to be bankrupt: Held, That A. was entitled to recover the goods or their value, and that the order modifying the injunction afforded S. & P. no defence; That they were liable, however, only for the $2,650, which the goods brought at the sheriff's sale.

In equity. This was a bill in equity filed by the plaintiff, [William Anderson.] as assignee in bankruptcy of Frederick Ordemann, [against Oscar Strassburger and George F. Pfeiffer.] The bill alleged the voluntary bankruptcy of Ordemann, on petition filed on November 1st, 1871, and the appointment of the plaintiff as his assignee on February 6th, 1872. It further alleged that the defendants, on October 31st, 1871, recovered a judgment against Ordemann; that Ordemann on that day suffered his stock in trade to be taken on legal process, viz., on an execution on said judgment; and that the defendants took the property to obtain a preference, and with knowledge that Ordemann was insolvent, and intended to give them a preference in fraud of the act. The bill prayed for a recovery of the goods or their value. In the bankruptcy proceedings, an injunction had been issued restraining the defendants from interfering with the property of Ordemann, which injunction was, on motion, modified so as to permit the sheriff to sell the goods on which he had levied, "and convert the same into money, and hold the proceeds in place and stead of the goods themselves, subject to the further order of the court;" and they were sold accordingly. The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the bill as to fraud or preference and the insolvency of Ordemann.

T. M. North, for plaintiff.
C. Wehle, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Under the recent decisions of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Buchanan v. Smith, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 277, and of the circuit court for this district in the case of Mayer v. Hermann, [Case No. 9,344,] the right of plaintiff to recover, on the facts in this case, is clear.

The order made by the bankruptcy court on the 11th of December, 1871, only modified the injunction "so as to permit the sheriff to sell" the goods levied on, and convert them into money, and hold the proceeds of sale in place of the goods, subject to the further order of the bankruptcy court. It left the defendants at liberty to have a sale if they chose to take the risk. If they should sell, the proceeds of sale would stand in place of the goods. But the plaintiff is entitled to recover the goods or their value, at his option. He asks for their value. He does not ask for the goods, and he is not compelled to take the proceeds, which are merely a substitute for the goods, if such proceeds are not the full value.

But, on the evidence, I think the value of the goods cannot be fixed at a higher sum than the $2,650 they brought on the sale. The plaintiff, who was not, at that time, assignee of the bankrupt, but was one of a firm who were creditors, bought in the goods at the sale for $2,650, acting for the creditors generally. He says that other creditors for whom he acted had the privilege of taking the stock by paying the $2,650, but they did not, and then he took it to himself at that price. Yet he fixes its value at $6,800, by saying that that is "the price at which it would be appraised by competent parties, under partition or division, or in anticipation of a forced sale." That is his definition of "market value." Yet he says that in all the transaction his desire was "to prevent sacrifice," and to have the stock "bring near its value," and he considered he was acting by direction of the creditors, so as to get for them "the largest possible percentage on their claims." Charged as he was with this trust, the presumption is that he discharged it properly, and, therefore, that he obtained full value for the goods he bid in, when he took them at $2,650. It cannot be that their fair market value was $6,800, and yet that he could get no more than $2,650 for them. The plaintiff is entitled to a decree for $2,650, with interest from the commencement of this suit, less a credit, on the 8th of March, 1872, of $875.39, with costs of suit.

Case No. 365.

ANDERSON et al. v. TOMPKINS.

[1 Brock. 456; 1 Amer. Lead. Cas. 429.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 12, 1820.

PARTNERSHIP — POWER TO BIND FIRM — ASSIGNMENT OF PROPERTY TO PAY FIRM DEBTS — ABSENT PARTNER — BOOK DEBTS NOT ASSIGNABLE.

1. One partner has a right to convey the partnership effects, (other than real estate) to the creditors of the firm, in payment of their debts, either to the creditors directly, or through the intervention of trustees, and if the transaction be bona fide, the deed will not be set aside, although the consent of the other partner was not obtained.

[Cited in Bohler v. Tappan, 1 Fed. 470.]

[See Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 289.]

2. Where all the partners of a mercantile firm are present, they have a right to be consulted in giving a preference to particular creditors, but this necessity is dispensed with, if one of the partners is absent in a foreign country.

3. The doctrine that a partner cannot bind his copartner by a deed, does not apply in a case in which the property purported to be conveyed by the deed, is of such a description, that a title to it passes by the mere act of delivery. The mere circumstance of annexing a seal to the instrument of conveyance, in such a case, does not annul a transfer so consummated.

4. If real property is conveyed to a firm, or to partners in trust for a firm, the members of the firm are tenants in common, and neither party can convey more than his undivided interest in the subject.

5. An assignment by deed of partnership debts, which are assignable at law, executed by one of the partners only, though void at law, will be sustained in equity, if it appear that the assignment was made with the bona fide intention of securing the creditors of the firm.

6. The book debts of a merchant are not assignable at law, and a deed executed by one member of a mercantile firm, purporting to convey such debts, does not pass the legal title. At law, the assignment is only a power to collect, and appropriate the debts, which is revocable. So far as collections were made under it, before revocation, the title to the money is in the trustees named in the deed. Such a power to collect, is a contract that could not be enforced at law, but will be sustained in equity, and have preference to any subsequent assignment by the other partner, as the prior equity must prevail in a contest between mere equities.

In equity. The complainants, merchants and partners, subjects of the king of Great Britain, filed their bill in this court, alleging, that they were creditors of John Tompkins and Adam Murray, late partners in trade, residing in the city of Richmond, and state of Virginia, under the firm of Tompkins & Murray, to the amount of £715 13s. sterling: that on or about the 28th day of April, 1819, Adam Murray, one of the partners, embarked for Europe; and on the 8th day of May following, John Tompkins, the other partner, without (as was alleged) the knowledge or consent of Adam Murray, executed a deed, of that date, to Nicholas Anderson & Tompkins, citizens of Virginia, purporting to convey to them, not only all the partnership effects, real and personal, of Tompkins & Murray, but also the separate property of Adam Murray, upon trust; 1st, for the benefit of Sutherland, Colquhoun & Co. and Samuel Christian, all of them citizens of Virginia; and, 2dly, for the benefit of such of the creditors of Tompkins & Murray, resident within the United States, as should within sixty days, and of such of them, resident elsewhere, as should within six months from the date of the publication of the trust, by the trustees, exhibit their claims: that prior to the execution of this deed, Tompkins & Murray purchased several lots of ground in the city of Richmond, and certain tracts of land in the state of Virginia: that Adam Murray was proprietor, also, of another lot of ground in the city of Richmond, in his own right, of a share of a tract of land in the state of Kentucky, of a tract of land in Illinois, and of sundry other articles of household furniture, and other personal estate in Virginia: that subsequent to the execution of the said deed of trust, the partnership was dissolved, and after the dissolution, Adam Murray, who has never returned to Virginia, executed several deeds, bearing date the 10th of November, 1819, conveying all his moiety of the partnership effects, both real and personal, of Tompkins & Murray, and the whole of his own individual property, in Virginia, to James Dunlop, of London, in trust for the benefit, 1st, of James and John Dunlop, to secure a debt due from the firm of Tompkins & Murray; 2dly, in satisfaction of a debt due from the same firm to Leslie & M'Indoe; and, 3dly, to secure the debt due to the complainants, Anderson & Wilkins. This suit was instituted for the twofold purpose of establishing the deed of the 10th of November, 1819, executed in England, by Adam Murray, and to set aside the deed of the 8th of May, 1819, executed by John Tompkins. The validity of the last mentioned deed was contested, as well as to the complainants, and the other creditors of Tompkins & Murray, who failed to exhibit their claims within the time prescribed therein, as to Adam Murray, on several grounds: 1st, it was contended, that during the existence of the firm, Tompkins could not, without authority from Murray, dispose of the partnership effects, or any part thereof, by deed: 2dly, that the deed was void, because it gave a preference to Colquhoun & Co. and Christian, to all other creditors, without consulting with Murray: 3dly, that it was void, because it purported to convey the separate property of Murray, over which Tompkins had no control.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This suit is brought to establish a deed, made by Adam Murray, a partner of the house of Tompkins & Murray, in November 1819, while in England, conveying his moiety of the property of that house, to certain creditors of the firm. On the 29th of April, 1819, Murray had embarked for England, leaving all the effects of the company in the hands of John Tompkins, the partner remaining in this country, who continued, for a short time, to conduct the business of the concern. The pressure of their affairs was such, that in May, the house stopped payment, and Tompkins, for himself and his partner, conveyed all the effects of the company, and also the separate property of himself and partner, to trustees for the payment, first, of certain creditors named in the deed, and then of those who should bring in their claims, the American creditors within sixty days, the foreign creditors within six months. As the deed under which the plaintiffs claim, can operate on that property only, which is not conveyed by the first, it will be proper, first, to inquire into the legal extent of the deed made by Tompkins.

That deed, as has been already stated, purports to convey the whole property of the concern, and the private property of the partners. That property, consisted of the effects of the partnership for sale, of real property, and of debts. I shall consider the deed in its application to each of these subjects.

First.—The goods in possession for sale. The convenience of trade requires, that each acting partner should have the entire control and disposition of this subject. It would destroy copartnerships entirely, if the co-operation of all the partners were necessary to dispose of a yard of cloth. It is, therefore, laid down, in all the books which treat on commercial transactions, that with respect to all articles to be sold, for the benefit of the concern, each partner, though the others be within reach, has, in the course of trade, an absolute right to dispose of the whole. "Each," says Watson, "has a power to dispose of the whole of the partnership effects." This is a general rule, resulting from the nature of the estate, and from the objects for which men associate in trade. They are joint tenants, without the right of survivorship, they are seized per mi et per tout, and they associate together, for objects which require that the whole powers of the partnership should reside in each partner, who is present and acting. These general doctrines are universal, and have not been controverted in this case; but it is contended, that they do not authorize the deed made by Tompkins, because, 1st. This is not an act in the course of trade, but is a disposition of the whole subject, and a dissolution of the partnership.

2d. It is a preference to particular creditors, in making which, Murray ought to be consulted.

3d. It is by deed. It will be readily conceded, that a fraudulent sale, whether made by deed or otherwise, would pass nothing to a vendee concerned in the fraud. But, with this exception, I feel much difficulty in setting any other limits to the power of a partner, in disposing of the effects of the company, purchased for sale. He may sell a yard, a piece, a bale, or any number of bales. He may sell the whole of any article, or of any number of articles. This power would certainly not be exercised in the presence of a partner, without consulting him; and if it were so exercised, slight circumstances would be sufficient to render the transaction suspicious, and, perhaps, to fix on it the imputation of fraud. In this respect, every case must depend on its own circumstances. But with respect to the power, in a case perfectly fair, I can perceive no ground, on which it is to be questioned. But this power, it is said, is limited to the course of trade. What is understood by the course of trade? Is it that which is actually done every day, or is it that which may be done, whenever the occasion for doing it presents itself?

There are small traders who scarcely ever, in practice, sell a piece of cloth uncut, or a cask of spirits. But may not a partner in such a store, sell a piece of cloth, or a cask of spirits? His power extends to the sale of the article, and the course of trade does not limit him as to quantity. So with respect to larger concerns. By the course of trade, is understood, dealing in an article in which the company is accustomed to deal; and dealing in that article for the company. Tompkins & Murray sold goods. A sale of goods was in the course of their trade, and within the power of either partner. A fair sale, then, of all or of a part of the goods, was within the power vested in a partner. This reasoning applies with increased force, when we consider the situation of these partners. The one was on a voyage to Europe, the other in possession of all the partnership effects for sale. The absent partner could have no agency in the sale of them. He could not be consulted. He could not give an opinion. In leaving the country, he must have intended to confide all its business to the partner who remained, for the purpose of transacting it. Had this, then, been a sale for money, or on credit, no person, I think, could have doubted its obligation. I can perceive no distinction in law, in reason, or in justice, between such a sale and the transaction which has taken place. A merchant may rightfully sell to his creditor, as well as for money. He may give goods in payment of a debt. If he may thus pay a small creditor, he may thus pay a large one. The quantum of debt, or of goods sold, cannot alter the right. Neither does it, as I conceive, affect the power, that these goods were conveyed to trustees to be sold by them. The mode of sale must, I think, depend on circumstances. Should goods be delivered to trustees, for sale, without necessity, the transaction would be examined with scrutinizing eyes, and might, under some circumstances, be impeached. But if the necessity be apparent, if the act is justified by its motives, if the mode of sale be such as the circumstances require, I cannot say, that the partner has exceeded his power. This is denominated a destruction of the partnership subject, and a dissolution of the partnership. But how is it a destruction of the subject? Can this appellation be bestowed on the application of the joint property, to the payment of the debts of the company? How is it a dissolution of the partnership? A partnership, is an association to carry on business jointly. This association may be formed for the future, before any goods are acquired. It may continue after the whole of a particular purchase has been sold. But either partner had a right to dissolve this partnership. The act, however, of applying the means of carrying on their business to the payment of their debts, might suspend the operations of the company, but did not dissolve the contract under which their operations were to be conducted.

Second.—It is said that Murray had a right to be consulted, on giving a preference to creditors. It is true, Murray had a right to be consulted. Had he been present, he ought to have been consulted. The act ought to have been, and probably would have been, a joint act. But Murray was not present. He had left the country, and could not be consulted. He had, by leaving the country, confided everything which respected their joint business to Tompkins; who was under the necessity of acting alone.

Third.—It is said, this transfer of property is by a deed, and that one partner has no right to bind another by deed. For this a case is cited, which I believe has never been questioned in England, or in this country. Harrison v. Jackson, 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 207.

I am not, and never have been, satisfied with the extent to which this doctrine has been carried. The particular point decided in it, is certainly to be sustained on technical reasoning, and perhaps ought not to be controverted. I do not mean to controvert it. That was an action of covenant on a deed; and if the instrument was not the deed of the defendants, the action could not be sustained. It was decided not to be the deed of the defendants, and I submit to the decision. No action can be sustained against the partner, who has not executed the instrument, on the deed of his copartner. No action can be sustained against the partner, which rests on the validity of such a deed, as to the person who has not executed it. This principle is settled. But I cannot admit its application in a case where the property may be transferred by delivery, under a parol contract. Where the right of sale is absolute, and the change of property is consummated by delivery, I cannot admit that a sale, so consummated, is annulled by the circumstance that it is attested by, or that the trusts under which it is made, are described in a deed. No case goes thus far; and I think such a decision could not be sustained on principle.

The power of applying all the goods on hand for sale, to the payment of the partnership debts, is, I think, a power created by the partnership, and the exercise of it must be regulated by circumstances. In extraordinary cases, an extraordinary use of power must be made. What is called the course of trade, is not confined to the most usual way of doing business, in the usual state of things. In the absence of one of the partners, in a case of admitted and urgent necessity, the power to sell may be exercised by the partner, who is present, and who must act alone, in such manner as the case requires, provided it be exercised fairly. In this case, the fairness of the transaction is not impeached, and, certainly, upon its face, it is not impeachable.

So far, then, as respects the partnership effects which were delivered, I have never, from the first opening of the cause, entertained a moment's doubt.

The next subject to be considered is the real property comprehended in this deed. Real property, whether held in partnership, or otherwise, can be conveyed only by deed, executed in the manner prescribed by statute. This deed can convey no more title at law, than is in the person who executed it. Property conveyed to a firm, or to partners in trust for a firm, is held by them as tenants in common, and neither party can convey more than his undivided interest.³ In this case, where the legal estate was in Tompkins, the whole property passes at law, by his deed. Where the legal estate was in Murray, the whole property passes at law, by his deed. Where the legal estate was in Tompkins & Murray, the property passes in moieties, by their several deeds. I do not think that the superior equity of either party is such, as to control the legal estate, or the disposition made by law of the subject.

Where the legal estate is in trustees, for the use of Tompkins & Murray, the title does not pass at law by either deed, and I have greatly doubted, whether the first deed ought not to be preferred. I have, however, come to the opinion, that this trust ought to follow the nature of the estate at law, and where the trustees have not conveyed before the subsequent deed was executed, that the title to this property, likewise, should pass in moieties.

The last subject to be considered, is, the debts due to the partnership. The right of one of the partners to assign debts which are assignable at law, is admitted, provided that assignment be made in the usual way. The assignment, then, of these debts, is as valid a transaction as the sale of goods on hand, if it be not contaminated by the seal. I should not suppose, on the principle settled in 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] that an action could be maintained on this assignment. But I am not satisfied that it does not pass the assignable paper, which the partner had a legal right to assign. I rather think it does.

A question of more difficulty respects the book debts. This is a part of the subject on which I have entertained, and still entertain, great doubts. The deed does not pass these debts at law. They are not assignable at law, but they are assignable in equity, and a court of equity sustains their assignment. At law, the assignment is only a power to collect and appropriate; and that power is revocable. So far as collections were made under it, before it was revoked, I can have no doubt, that the money collected was in the trustees. With respect to debts not collected, I have felt great doubts. I consider the power to collect, as a contract, which could not be enforced at law. But as Mr. Murray could not convey this property at law, and could only convey it in equity, I have supposed, that the prior equity must be sustained, and that these debts, also, pass by the deed of Tompkins.

The opinion of the court, then is, that the plaintiffs have a right to a decree for a sale of all the real property contained in the deed made by Adam Murray, the legal title to which was in Adam Murray, and to a moiety of the real property, the title to which, was in Tompkins & Murray, or in trustees for their benefit; and that the residue of the property passes to the trustees, in the deed executed by John Tompkins.

NOTE, [from original report.] During the continuance of a mercantile firm, one of the partners, though he is competent to bind, and does bind his own interest in the firm, cannot bind his copartners, by a submission to arbitration. Karthaus v. Ferrer, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 222. But see Buchanan v. Curry, 19 Johns. 137. The question, how far one partner may bind his copartner, by an instrument under seal, in equity, came under consideration in Sale v. Dishman's Ex'rs, 3 Leigh, 548. "Berryman & Dishman" were partners in trade, though it was proved, in fact, that Dishman had only permitted his name to be used in the firm, to give Berryman credit, and Dishman had advanced money to Berryman, which Dishman was to receive back, with interest, without regard to the profit or loss of the trade. Berryman covenanted with Sale, for the purchase of corn, for "Berryman & Dishman," and Berryman, alone, signed and sealed the covenant, in the name of "Berryman & Dishman;" but it was clear, that the firm was looked to as debtors for the amount. Tucker, President, said: "The contract, thus signed, and, (by mistake of received principles of law, which deny the right of one partner, to bind another at law by a seal,) being sealed also, was, nevertheless, binding in equity upon both parties." "In this case, then, the partners were clearly bound by the original contract." Decree accordingly.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1855.

CARRIERS—FREIGHT AND LIEN—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Where the printed form of a bill of lading of cotton contained, added at the bottom with a pen, the words, "contents and weight unknown," the freight to be paid at a certain rate per pound: Held that, although some figures were found in the margin of the bill of lading, apparently as the aggregate weight of the cotton, yet the shipper was bound to pay freight only on the actual weight of the cotton.

2. Held, also, that the vessel was liable in admiralty for the value of a part of the cotton, detained under a lien for the freight, after the shipper had offered to pay freight on the actual weight of the cotton, as soon as it should be ascertained.

dover, to recover the value of ten bales of cotton. After a decree in the district court in favor of the libellant, the claimants appealed to this court.

George William Wright, for libellant.

Welcome R. Beebe, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The cotton in question in this case was part of a cargo shipped at New Orleans in the ship Andover, and consigned to the libellant at this port, he paying the freight. The bill of lading contained the clause, "contents and weight unknown." The freight was to be paid at a certain rate per pound, and, in the margin of the bill, the figures 29,782 were placed, apparently as the aggregate weight of the cotton.

On the arrival of the cotton, the consignees of the ship claimed that the figures in the margin of the bill of lading should govern in determining the weight, while the libellant insisted that, as the bill of lading said, "weight unknown," the cotton should be weighed and freight be paid accordingly. He offered to pay the freight on these terms, and tendered the amount, to be paid as soon as it could be ascertained. The ten bales in question were retained, under the ship's lien, for freight. The court below decreed for the libellant, for the value of the cotton, less the amount of the freight. [Opinion not reported, and not now accessible.]

There is nothing in the bill of lading indicating that the weight was agreed on between the master and the shipper, but the contrary. For, notwithstanding the memorandum in the margin, as to the supposed or real weight of the cotton, the master, as is apparent, required the insertion, at the foot of the bill, before he signed it, of the words, "contents and weight unknown," thereby excluding any inference that the owner was to be bound by the memorandum. This memorandum is not even referred to in the body of the bill, as the reference there is obviously to marks and numbers on bales, which marks and numbers are given in the margin, and not to the figures there, purporting to give the weight. But, if otherwise, it would not vary the result. The bill of lading is a printed form filled up, and the words, "contents and weight unknown," are added at the bottom with a pen, clearly indicating an intent on the part of the master not to be bound by any supposed ascertainment of the weight at the time by the shipper. Any other construction would be in disregard of the clear import of the instrument, and unjust to the master and his owner.

Decree affirmed.

ANDRAE et al. v. REDFIELD.

[12 Blatchf. 407.]¹Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Jan. 19, 1875.²CUSTOMS DUTIES—ACTION TO RECOVER PAYMENT
—LIMITATIONS—ESTOPPEL—INJUNCTION.

1. The plaintiffs in this bill had claims to be repaid the excess of duties, paid by them under protest, to the defendant, while collector of the port of New York, upon imported goods. The statute of limitations was about to take effect, and the plaintiffs contemplated bringing suit. An officer in the custom house at New York stated to the attorney for the plaintiffs, that, according to the practice, the presentation of their claims to a designated officer at the custom house prevented the running of the statute of limitations, and that, if they should be so presented, and suits should thereafter be brought, the statute could not be and would not be interposed as a defence. The defendant, who, at the time, had gone out of office, disclaimed any control in the matter, but declared his confidence in the experience and knowledge of such officer, and expressed to the attorney his concurrence in such statement and opinion. The plaintiffs presented their claims, and refrained from bringing suits until after the statute had run against all of the claims, relying upon the recognition by the government of claims of the like nature, and upon what was so said by such officer and by the defendant. The plaintiffs afterwards brought suits at law against the defendant, to recover such excess of duties, and the defendant pleaded such statute. More than seven years after the pleas were interposed, the plaintiffs filed this bill in equity, praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant from insisting upon the statute as a defence. The defendant demurred to the bill, for want of equity: Held, that the bill must be dismissed.

2. The power of a court of equity cannot be invoked to enjoin a defendant from setting up the statute of limitations, on the ground that the cause of action sued on was originally good and valid.

3. The lapse of time before the bill was filed, after the pleas were interposed, commented on, as a ground for withholding relief, even if the plaintiffs might otherwise be entitled to it.

4. Regarding the actions at law as suits against the government, it cannot be prejudiced by any opinion or promise made or expressed by the defendant, especially when, at the time he said what he said, he was no longer in office.

[See note at end of case.]

5. Regarding such actions as suits against the defendant, he cannot be prejudiced by anything said or done by the government or its officials, without his concurrence, especially after he ceased to be collector.

[Cited in Hennequin v. Barney, 24 Fed. 582.]

[See Crooke v. Maxwell, Case No. 3,413.]

[See note at end of case.]

6. Such actions are properly to be regarded as suits against the defendant, in fact as well as in form.

7. Such conclusion is not affected by the fact that, as a condition of obtaining an injunction herein, pendente lite, the plaintiffs stipulated that, in any event, certificates of probable cause should be granted in such actions, to the end that no execution should issue against the property of the defendant.

²[Affirmed by supreme court in 98 U. S. 225.]

8. The officer in the custom house had no authority to bind the government by an agreement not to plead the statute of limitations; and, on what is set forth in the bill, he did not profess to make any such agreement.

9. The defendant made no such agreement, but only expressed an opinion; and, if what he said could be viewed as an agreement, it was without mutuality and without consideration.

10. According to the statute of limitations of New York, (Code Proc. § 110,) "no acknowledgment or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a * * * continuing contract, whereby to take the case out of the operation of" the statute, "unless the same be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby," and the highest court of that state has decided, that a parol agreement not to plead the statute cannot operate as a new promise, or as a waiver of the statute, or as an estoppel in pais.

11. The facts stated create no estoppel as against the government, or as against the defendant.

12. Decisions of the court granting or refusing a preliminary injunction are not conclusive, either upon the court or the parties, in a subsequent disposition of the cause by a decree.

[In equity. Bill by Otto Andrae and Bernhard Andrae, trading as Andrae & Co., and others, against Constance C. Redfield, executrix, and Frank B. Redfield, executor, of Heman J. Redfield, deceased, to enjoin the plea of the statute of limitations in certain suits pending at law. Heard on demurrer to the bill. Bill dismissed. Plaintiffs afterwards appealed to the supreme court, and the decree was affirmed. Andrae v. Redfield, 98 U. S. 225.]

Almon W. Griswold, for plaintiffs.

Webster & Craig, for defendant.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and WALLACE, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The bill of complaint herein is filed by the several plaintiffs in sixty separate actions at law, each brought to recover from the defendant an alleged excess of duty, illegally exacted by the defendant while collector of the port of New York. The payment of the various amounts exacted in excess of duty is alleged to have been made under protest, by the respective plaintiffs in the actions at law, at various dates in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, 1856 and 1857. It is not stated in the bill on what precise day the said several sixty actions at law were commenced, but it is inferrible, from what is stated, that they were commenced in May, 1864, about seven years after the defendant went out of office, as such collector, which was July 1st, 1857. In November, 1866, he pleaded, in those actions, among other defences, the statute of limitations. To the replications to those pleas demurrers were interposed, but issue was finally joined in April, 1872, and the cases were in apparent readiness for trial for several terms, but were postponed from term to term. In March, 1874, this bill was filed, the several plaintiffs in those actions at law uniting herein as complainants. The defendant has filed a general demurrer. The only relief sought by the bill is an injunction, to restrain the defendant "from prosecuting or maintaining, upon the trial of any of the said sixty suits, his plea of the statute of limitations, and from claiming or insisting, on said trials, upon any defence thereunder, and from, in any way or manner, claiming or pretending, in said sixty actions, or any of them, that the statute of limitations is a bar thereto."

The alleged excess of duty consists of two items or particulars: 1st. That, in ascertaining the dutiable value of the goods imported, the defendant erroneously included the expense of transportation from the principal market in the country from which they were imported, to the place of shipment; 2d. That he also erroneously included in such dutiable value a higher rate of commissions than the usual or customary rate for purchases made at the places from which the importations were made.

The bill is liable to some criticism for want of clearness, certainty and definiteness in many particulars; and it introduces many matters which occurred after the defendant ceased to be collector, to which he was not a party, which, even if they tend to show that the duties were illegally assessed, as matter of law, ought not, in any manner, otherwise to prejudice the defendant, nor to affect his right to defend the said actions by any legal defence. It may be gathered from the bill, that the facts relied on as grounds for the injunction are, that, at some time, the bill does not state when, though its language may, perhaps, warrant the inference that it was prior to February 1st, 1856, the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York and the circuit court of the United States for the district of California, in suits, in like cases, brought by other importers, decided that similar exactions were illegal; that the amounts of the exactions in those cases were refunded by the secretary of the treasury; that, on the 1st of February, 1856, the secretary of the treasury published a general regulation, declaring that freight or transportation from the foreign port of shipment to the port of importation, or from the place of production or manufacture to another port, for shipment or transshipment to the United States, is not a dutiable charge; that, on the 4th of October, 1856, the secretary of the treasury addressed a letter to this defendant, in these words: "Sir—On application being made to you by Messrs. A. Iselin & Co. and others, of New York, you are authorized and directed to cause to be prepared the usual certified statements for return of 'duty on freight,' in such cases where the same has been found to have been paid in excess, as decided by this department in general regulations, No. 63, p. 22, and under written protest, and transmit same to this department, for its consideration;" and that, on the 27th of May, 1857, the secretary of the treasury addressed another letter to the defendant, in the following terms: "Sir—I am in receipt of your letter of the 26th inst., transmitting a report of the U. S. appraisers in relation to the 'usual commissions' charged in China, Sweden, Norway, Holland and German ports, and have to state, in reply, that you will cause to be prepared and transmitted to this department the usual certified statements of return of the duty exacted in error, in all cases where it is found that the said duty has been on a rate of commission greater than the usual rate chargeable in the above named countries." It is not averred, in the bill, that any of the goods imported by the complainants in this suit were imported from either of the countries named in this letter, nor are the terms of general regulation No. 63 stated, so as to show specifically that the claims of these complainants in the several actions at law were embraced within the said letter of the previous 4th of October. These facts are, however, assumed as at least recognizing the principle claimed by the complainants, and the bill avers, that these letters determined and established the complainants' right to the return of the excess of moneys "so paid by them severally for duties," though it is not alleged that these letters were communicated to them by the secretary of the treasury, as a guide to their conduct in bringing suits, or otherwise, or were written or intended for the purpose of influencing them in that matter. If, however, it were conceded that the rights of the complainants to have returned to them the moneys so paid, or the moneys for which they ultimately brought their said several actions, were thereby determined and established, it is not very obvious that these letters constituted an excuse to the plaintiffs for not bringing suit within six years after their causes of action accrued, which should deprive the defendant of his defence, unless it be on the ground that a court of equity should, in all cases, enjoin a defendant from setting up the statute of limitations as a bar, if it appear clear that the cause of action was originally good and valid, as to which the observations of the court, touching the purpose and policy of statutes of limitations as statutes of repose, in Levy v. Stewart, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 249; U. S. v. Wiley, Id. 513; and Leflingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 599,—are of some significance. The power of a court of equity cannot be invoked to annul statutes of limitation on any such ground.

The bill then avers, that the complainants furnished to the auditor of the New York custom house statements of particulars, to enable him to prepare the certified statements called for by the aforesaid instructions of the secretary of the treasury, and that, before November 1st, 1859, all the particulars of their claims were furnished to such auditor. The occurrences which—if it be conceded that the plaintiffs had, prior thereto, valid causes of action—alone bear on the question, whether the complainants give such reasons as should move a court of equity to exercise the extraordinary power of enjoining the defendant from availing himself of his legal defence to suits brought against him, are, in substance, as alleged in the bill, the following: That, in the summer of 1859, the plaintiff's attorney suggested to such auditor, Mr. S. G. Ogden, (a subordinate in the New York custom house,) that the statute of limitations would apply to said claims, and the period of limitation of six years would expire, in some of the cases, on the 1st of November, 1859, and, in the residue of the cases, before July, 1863, and that he supposed it might be necessary to commence suits before November 1st, 1859, on all the claims, to prevent the statute from becoming a bar; that, to this, the said auditor replied, imputing it to the fault of the then collector, Mr. Schell, that the money was not refunded, stating, that the instructions given to such then collector, in May, 1858, (which included, in substance, the above letter of October 4th, 1856,) were peremptory, and further stating, that "all the plaintiffs had to do, to prevent the statute of limitations from running, was to present their claims, in each case, to the refunding clerk in the auditor's office, for adjustment, upon which presentation, by the rules and practice of the treasury department, the statute ceased to run," also, that, "if all the plaintiffs should commence suits for the recovery of these debts which the secretary had already ordered to be refunded, it would justify the department in the belief that it was done for the purpose of accumulating bills of costs, and must necessarily annoy the department, and unfavorably prejudice the department against the plaintiffs and their claims, and that it was not necessary to commence suits to prevent the statute from running, but only to present the claims;" that, afterwards, in or about September, 1859, the said attorney conversed with the defendant herein, (who had ceased to be collector,) and stated to him what the said auditor, Mr. Ogden, had said, to which the defendant replied, that he had no longer any control over the adjustment of these claims, and, as far as he was concerned, Auditor Ogden had the whole charge of the matter, who must be, from his long experience, familiar with the practice of the department, and the attorney could rely upon the accuracy of Mr. Ogden's statements; that, shortly thereafter, at a meeting of the said attorney and said Ogden and the defendant, said Ogden stated to the defendant, as he had before to the attorney, that, ac-ording to the practice of the department, if the plaintiffs had already presented their claims for refunding, or if they would do so, the statute ceased to run from the date of such presentation, as effectually as if suit was commenced; and he corroborated his assertions by referring the defendant to decisions of the department to that effect, and, at the same time, expressed his belief that Collector Schell would yet be persuaded to resume the adjustment; and that the defendant thereupon said, he saw no necessity for suing on these cases, and, if the plaintiffs had presented or would present their claims for adjustment, the statute ceased to run from that time, and could not and would not be interposed as a defence to the payment of them, and he concurred with Mr. Ogden in the expressed opinion, that Collector Schell would soon resume the adjustment of them, and added, that, of course, these claims would all be paid. The bill also avers, that, relying on the matters aforesaid, and for the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits, the plaintiffs refrained from bringing action immediately, in full faith and confidence that the statute of limitations would not be set up as a defence, in case suits should be brought on said claims at any time afterwards. As already suggested, there are other matters stated in the bill, to which the defendant was not a party, which tend to show that the government officers regarded claims of the nature of those alleged to be embraced in those sixty actions as valid, and constituting grounds for refunding whatever excess appeared, upon investigation, to have been paid. But it does not appear that these claims of the complainants were ever adjusted, and their specific nature, or the amounts thereof, ever ascertained, so as to be submitted to the treasury department in a form which, under the instructions referred to in the bill, would enable the secretary of the treasury to consider them, pass upon their legality or their amount, or give any order to pay them.

The case made by the bill may be, briefly, but, we think, completely, for all the purposes of the demurrer, stated as follows, assuming, of course, the facts alleged: The complainants had just and legal claims to be repaid the excess of duties, paid by them under protest, upon certain goods imported, and the defendant was liable to them therefor. The statutes of limitation were about to take effect, as a bar to an action for such excess, and the plaintiffs contemplated bringing suits. An officer in the New York custom house stated to the plaintiff's attorney, that, by the rules and practice of the treasury department, the presentation of their claims to the auditor, or to the refunding clerk at the custom house, prevented the running of the statute of limitations, and, if so presented, and suit was thereafter brought, that statute could not be, and would not be, interposed as a defence. The defendant, disclaiming any control in the matter, but declaring his confidence in the experience and knowledge of such officer, expressed to the plaintiffs' attorney his concurrence in the statement and opinion thus given. The plaintiffs did present their claims, and, in reliance upon the recognition by the secretary of the treasury of claims of the like nature, and upon the statements and opinion of such officer, and the concurrence of the defendant therein, refrained from bringing suit until after the statute had run against all of the claims. Suits having been then brought, and the defendant having interposed the statute of limitations as a bar, the complainants, seven years and upwards after these pleas of the statute of limitations were filed, apply to this court, as a court of equity, to restrain the defendant from insisting upon the statute as a defence.

If it were true that the interposition of this defence by the defendant was inequitable, in such sense that it created a cause of action in equity, the lapse of time since the pleas were interposed, exceeding another limitation of six years, furnishes the plausible suggestion, at least, that the complainants, at so late a day, and after keeping the defendant so long in the court of law, are entitled to slight favor. Courts of equity expect of applicants for the exercise of extraordinary jurisdiction, that they apply promptly, so soon as occasion arises. If this lapse of seven years since these pleas were filed be not held a bar to the complainants' prayer for what they deem equitable relief, it creates doubt whether, at so late a day, this court ought to interfere in their behalf. But, without resting any conclusion upon this view of the complainants' position in the controversy, we have deemed it proper to examine the bill, to see what, divested of much of obscurity, indefiniteness and want of precision, it can fairly, and as a matter of substance, be said to present, as an appeal to a court of equity to exercise the extraordinary power of interference with the defendant's clear legal right.

The case obviously suggests the inquiry—are the sixty actions at law to be regarded, for the purposes of this suit, as actions against the United States, or as actions against the defendant therein? The counsel for the plaintiffs insist, as we understand them, that they should be deemed actions against the United States; and yet the bill of complaint, by its allegations, would seem to be designed to deal with the case, on some points, as if the defendant were defendant in fact and in law, as well as in form, and, on other points, as if the United States was the real defendant, and as if the formal defendant was only defendant in form and has no real interest therein.

1. If the actions are to be treated as if they were actions against the government, then how can the government be prejudiced by any opinion, representation or constructive promise made or expressed by the defendant, and, especially, by any opinion, representation or constructive promise made or expressed after he ceased to be an officer of the government? We are of opinion, that, if such be the view we ought to take of those actions at law, the government cannot be so prejudiced. While the complainants are insisting that, for all purposes in a court of equity, those actions are against the government, in which the nominal defendant has no interest, still his opinion and alleged representations, long after the causes of action arose, and long after he ceased to be an officer of the government, are made, in the bill of complaint, prominent ground of that reliance which, as they aver, led them to refrain from bringing their actions. If it be true, that, for the purposes of this suit, the defendant has no interest in those actions, then he has, or should have, no control of those actions, then he could not do or say anything which would affect, or which should be permitted to affect, the rights of the government. It would necessarily follow, that all that is averred in the bill touching his assurances or representations, must be disregarded as irrelevant or immaterial. Thereupon, the complainants' case in this court would stand, and their claim to an injunction would rest, on these facts, viz.—the secretary of the treasury had recognized the validity of all claims of the like nature, and the complainants were assured by an auditor in the New York custom house, that the practice of the treasury department was, not to plead the statute of limitations in such cases, and that the statute did not run after the claims were presented to him or to a clerk in his office, and could not, and would not, be interposed, and, in reliance upon this, the complainants omitted to sue until the period of limitation had expired. On the question whether, in this aspect of the case, any just ground for an injunction can be found, some observations will be made in the further discussion which follows. In disposing of the demurrer to certain replications in the actions at law, the opinion was expressed, that the statute which, under certain circumstances, makes it the duty of the secretary of the treasury to pay the judgments, if any should be recovered against the defendant, had not barred him of any legal defence to the actions brought against him. We are inclined still to the opinion, that nothing in that statute was intended to operate to place the defendant at a disadvantage in a court of equity, and enable the government officers, by their acts, after the cause of action had accrued against him, to deprive him of his defence or defences. In that view, we suggest, that, although the counsel for the complainants repudiate that view of his relation to the suits, and claim that the actions should be treated as actions against the United States, it is proper to consider the case in its other aspect.

2. If, then, the actions at law are to be dealt with as, in law and in fact, as well as in form, actions against the defendant, then, clearly, the defendant is not to be prejudiced by anything whatever said or done by the government or its officials, (without his concurrence,) after he collected the money for which he is sued, and, especially, after he ceased to be collector, which was long before these actions were brought against him; nor can anything so said or done create any equity in favor of the complainants, as against him. In this aspect of his relation to the actions at law, he may defend himself and his property by any lawful means; and can a court of equity properly restrain him, except upon the ground that he, himself, has said or done something which deprives him of his defence? Certainly not, and, if not, then this case and the prayer of the complainants for an injunction stand upon the mere conversation alleged to have been had with him in September, 1859, in which he expressed his concurrence in the opinion and statements of Mr. Ogden, the auditor of the New York custom house.

It is proper to add, in support of the view that the actions at law in question are, in fact as well as in form, actions against the defendant, that, if judgments be recovered therein, they become liens upon his real estate, and although, by a provision in the 12th section of the act of congress of March 3d, 1863, (12 Stat. 741,) which is now found in section 989 of the Revised Statutes, it may, upon certain conditions, become the duty of the secretary of the treasury to pay the judgments, it cannot be now asserted, in advance of the trial, that such duty will become absolute. Suppose that such payment should not, in fact, be made, can it be said that the defendant has no interest in the question of recovery or no recovery against him; and, especially, suppose that the court before which the trial may be had should not deem the case, as developed on the trial, one in which a certificate of probable cause ought to be granted, how, then, is the defendant to avoid the payment, protect his property from an execution, or relieve his estate from the lien of the judgment? We are not advised that there is anything in the Revised Statutes of the United States which makes these actions any less actions against the defendant; and sections 3009 to 3014 do not seem to us to change the nature of these actions, or deprive the defendant of any defence which he would otherwise be entitled to interpose.

When these actions were brought against this defendant, he was not a government officer. He is not sued as such officer, in any such sense that the suit proceeds against his successor in office. He must abide the result, and must pay the judgments, if judgments be recovered against him, unless, first, the conditions be fulfilled hereafter, upon which he may obtain indemnity from the government, and unless, also, it shall become the duty of the secretary to pay the judgments and that duty shall be performed.

We are informed, that, on a motion for an injunction herein, pendente lite, the plaintiffs were required, as a condition of granting the motion, to stipulate that, whatever facts might be developed on the trial, a certificate of probable cause might be granted, to the end that no execution might issue against the property of the defendant. If this could otherwise affect our determination, no such fact is before us on this demurrer to the bill of complaint. But, we ought not to pass by the argument founded thereon, without observing, that the plaintiffs cannot change the essential nature of their actions against the defendant, by any such stipulation made by themselves; and, second, which we conceive to be of greater and more obvious importance, that it would be a fraud upon the government to permit parties, by stipulation, to cast upon the government officers the duty to pay a judgment recovered against an individual. Whether a certificate of probable cause ought or ought not to be granted, is for the determination of the judicial tribunal, upon the facts developed on the trial; and the interests of the government, and the duty of the government to pay, are not left to the determination or choice of the plaintiffs in the actions. If it should be held, that the question, whether the government shall be required to pay the judgments may be decided by the plaintiffs therein, the government would be exposed to abuses and to collusion. This view might be illustrated by various supposable cases, but it seems too obvious to require it.

Viewing the actions at law as actions against the defendant, further suggestions are pertinent to the question, whether he can be prejudiced or affected by the acts of the government or its officials. The defendant had retired from the office of collector. He was a private citizen. He is sued by the complainants, to recover money which they allege he, when collector, exacted from them illegally. Now, it may be conceded that all legitimate sources of information may be resorted to by the court, to assist in the inquiry, whether, upon facts which may be proved, the collections which he made were or were not, when made, illegal. But it is, we think, equally clear, that neither the government officers, nor any authority of the government, can create a liability, either at law or in equity, which he did not incur; and we deny that either a subordinate in the New York custom house, or even the secretary of the treasury himself, could deprive the defendant of his right to defend by any defence valid and legal for his protection.

3. To any suggestion that the actions at law may be regarded as of a mixed nature—in some possible contingencies, against the defendant, in other contingencies, as practically against the government—it must suffice to say, that this avails nothing in answer to the suggestions already made. In so far as the actions are to be treated as against the defendant, he is entitled to complete protection. He cannot be prejudiced by the acts, representations, or opinions of government officials, and, unless, by something said or done by himself, he has lost his legal defences, he must be permitted to urge them, and have judgment thereon in his favor, if the defences be valid; and this terminates the suits. On the other hand, in so far as these actions can be regarded (if at all) as actions against the government, it is true, as suggested in a previous point, that the acts, representations, or opinions of this defendant, after he ceased to be an officer of the government, cannot, either at law or in equity, prejudice the United States.

4. In any aspect of the case, what is the substance of the claim of the plaintiffs to a decree, and on what does such claim rest? On the argument of the demurrer to the plaintiffs' replications, (whereon an opinion was delivered, not reported,) it was claimed that there was an agreement not to plead the statute of limitations, made either by the defendant, or by the government officers, or by both. Several criticisms are pertinent to any such suggestion. The auditor of the New York custom house had no authority whatever to bind the government by any such agreement; and he did not profess to do so. He only assumed to state the rules and practice of the treasury department of the United States, to give an opinion upon the legal effect of the presentation of the complainants' claims to the auditor or refunding clerk, and to express the belief that the statute of limitations would not, after that, be urged as a defence to a suit or suits. This sufficiently, we think, disposes of any idea of contract by the government not to permit the statute to be pleaded, if it were conceded that any such contract could affect the defendant.

As to any idea of an agreement by the defendant, in the nature of a contract with the complainants—the conversation with the defendant, alleged in the bill of complaint, was so obviously the mere expression of an opinion as to what the department of the treasury and the then collector would do towards the adjustment and payment of the claims, and a concurrence in the opinions of the auditor, that it cannot import any undertaking on the part of the defendant whatever. Besides, viewed as a contract, it had in it no element of mutuality. There was no consideration therefor. The complainants did not agree not to sue, or to forbear for any period, short or long. On the contrary, they had the power, and the unimpeded right, to sue immediately. How, then, was the running of the statute hindered? They did sue as soon as they deemed it for their interest. In this view, and, indeed, in every possible view of the subject, the inquiry is pertinent—how long after this conversation, upon the complainants' theory, might they delay? for ten years, or for twenty, and still claim that the statute could not be pleaded as a defence?

Again, the courts of the United States recognize and give effect to the statutes of limitation of the states in which those courts exercise their jurisdiction. This is well settled. See some cases collected in the opinion in Re Cornwall, [Case No. 3,250.] The cause of action here in question arose in the state of New York. The defendant was then, and when these suits were brought, a resident of the state of New York. This court exercises its jurisdiction within the state of New York, and, in the construction of the statutes of the state, and in declaring their effect, has respect to the decisions of the state courts. The statute of limitations of that state, from the protection of which the complainants desire to exclude the defendant, declares, (Code Proc. § 110,) that "no acknowledgment or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a * * * continuing contract, whereby to take the case out of the operation of" the statute "unless the same be contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby." And the court of last resort in that state, in Shapley v. Abbott, 42 N. Y. 443, hold, that a parol agreement not to plead the statute cannot operate as an acknowledgment of the debt, nor as a new promise, nor as a waiver of the statute; and, finally, that, although relied upon very much, as it is alleged the complainants relied upon the circumstances stated in this bill, it does not operate as an estoppel in pais, to preclude the defence. Shall this court, as a court of equity, say, that a parol agreement not to plead the statute will take a case out of the operation of the statute, when a parol promise to pay would not? Especially, shall they say so of, at the utmost, a mere declaration of opinion, or even of intention, not to plead the statute, founded on no consideration, and involving no mutuality of agreement? To do so would completely defeat the design of the statute to protect parties against perjury, by requiring that no promise shall have such effect, if not in writing and signed, &c. In this connection, it may be proper to bear in mind, that no actual fraud is alleged or claimed, in this bill, to have been practiced upon these complainants.

5. This brings us to the argument forcibly urged upon our attention, which was, however, considered in Shapley v. Abbott, above referred to—that the defendant is estopped to insist upon the statute as a defence. This claim requires, as already suggested, that it be first determined who is, for the purposes of this suit, to be deemed the real defendant in the actions at law. If it be the government, as the complainants now insist, then the statements and representations of the defendant, after he ceased to be collector, should be laid out of view. What facts have the government stated or represented, so as to create an estoppel? Statutes, rules and regulations of the treasury department, if they show that the complainants once had a legal claim, if the facts be as stated in the bill, go no further. These do not affect the validity of the defence of the statute of limitations, either at law or in equity, if the complainants do not prosecute their once legal claim within the time limited. Can a subordinate officer in the custom house make representations, either touching the past or the future, which can estop the government in a case like the present? He is not appointed or authorized for any such purpose or with any such power. What he said or did was not in the receipt of money paid to him, or which he was authorized to receive, or in respect of which he was executing a general authority, such as enables agents, sometimes, to bind their principal by contemporaneous acts or declarations. The money was in the treasury of the United States. He had no power or authority to bind the government, by prescribing the terms or conditions upon which it should be refunded to the complainants.

But, what is it alleged that he represented? Nothing of substance, except, that, by the rules and practice of the department of the treasury, the presentation of the claim put an end to the running of the statute of limitations, and such statute could not and would not, thereafter, be set up as a bar. If that statement was an opinion, that, as matter of law, the presentation of the claims prevented the running of the statute, then, of course, it estopped no one. As a statement of a fact, it had no effect as an estoppel. It may, for the purposes of the question, be deemed the statement of the truth. Suppose that the rules and practice were as stated. Could not the department of the treasury change them at pleasure? The argument would make such a practice, once begun, forever binding and unchangeable, for, the moment an attempt was made to depart from it by setting up the statute of limitations as a defence, a court of equity would be called upon, as here, to enjoin the defence. All else that was said by the auditor was prospective. It had reference to the future conduct of a defence to a suit or suits which might thereafter be brought. If full authority to make the statement on behalf of the government were conceded, it was, at most, promissory. This is not of the nature of an estoppel in pais. In truth, it was but the expression of opinion, either of the law, or of what the treasury department would do in the future. Such an opinion is no estoppel. But, the want of authority in this official, already adverted to, is sufficiently conclusive, apart from these last mentioned distinctions.

If, on the other hand, we again treat the defendant as, for the purposes of this suit, the real party in interest, then the considerations arising out of the terms of the New York statute apply, and the decision of the New York court of appeals is pertinent; and, besides this, his conversation is subject to like observations as are above made on the conversation of the auditor. Fairly interpreted, all that the defendant is alleged to have said to the complainants' attorney had reference to the future conduct of the government or the secretary of the treasury in the matter, and was a concurrence in the views of Mr. Ogden, accompanied with an express disavowal or protest that he, the defendant, had any control in the adjustment and refunding which the attorney was urging. How, in the face of that protest, and of his express reference to the judgment and experience of Mr. Ogden, for information as to what the government would do, could the complainants rely upon anything said by him as binding any one in any form? It is, however, unnecessary to pursue the discussion in that aspect, since the complainants, on the argument of the demurrer, insist, that we should regard the government, and not the nominal defendant, as the real party, and, if so, the acts or declarations of the defendant, after he ceased to be an officer of the government, cannot estop the latter. We add, however, that we are unable to find in either aspect of the case any sufficient ground for declaring that either are estopped to make any legal defense to these actions at law which may be available. There are many other views bearing upon the sufficiency of this bill, which have been adverted to on the argument, in support of the demurrer, but we deem it unnecessary to pursue further a discussion already greatly protracted.

It is easy to group all the circumstances detailed in this bill of complaint, and assuming that the claims of the complainants were originally just and legal, say that the complainants ought not to be vexed and hindered by such a defence; that the government ought to have refunded their money; that the complainants did wait in reliance upon the circumstances detailed in the bill; that, although they may have been unwise in so long delaying to sue, they did not suppose that their rights would be prejudiced thereby; that, even now, the government ought to refund the money; and that, unless there is some suspicion of unfairness or fraud, some loss of evidence bearing upon the justice of their claims, or the amount thereof, or reason to believe that delay in bringing suit has wrought some prejudice or endangered some right, or there is danger in establishing a precedent, or some reason other than appears on the mere face of this bill, then the interposition of such a defence, by or at the instance of the government, enabling it to retain money wrongfully gotten into the treasury, and against importers who would seem to have been long and patiently doing what they could, short of suing, to obtain their rights, is ungracious, and invites an effort to avoid the effect of the statute, if possible. But we have not been able to find grounds upon which, on principles of law or equity, a court of equity can interfere.

It is suggested, that, as an injunction pendente lite was granted in this court, and upon this bill, we ought to deem the question res adjudicata, or ought, at least, to follow such allowance of the injunction as an authority. This would have saved us much time and labor; it would have been a throwing off of responsibility, quite grateful to us, if we had deemed it consistent with the proper discharge of duty. But, the granting of a preliminary injunction has for its precise object the retaining of all things in their then condition until the case can be deliberately heard or examined upon the issues finally made for hearing or trial. It is provisional merely. It is granted as matter of discretion. It is often and properly granted where the question is important and doubtful. When the case comes to be finally heard on the merits, and judgment is to be pronounced, the court are bound to apply to it the rules that govern the rights of the parties; and there is nothing provisional in such judgment. They then finally settle those rights. Until that can or should be done, a temporary injunction is often a discreet exercise of the power of the court, to see that nothing is done pendente lite which will impede the doing of what may be finally adjudged to be right, in the matter in controversy. But for this preliminary injunction, the defendant might have pressed the actions at law to trial and judgment, before this case could be heard and decided, so as to become the subject of further review, if the parties so desired. Decisions of the court granting or refusing a preliminary injunction are not conclusive either upon the court or the parties, and are not intended to be so, in a subsequent disposition of the cause by a decree. We are, therefore, not wanting in due respect to the court or the judge by whom the preliminary injunction was granted. On the contrary, our convictions tend to the belief, that, if sitting with us on the hearing of this demurrer, his conclusion must be the same as our own deliberate judgment.

The demurrer must be sustained, and the usual decree dismissing the bill, with costs, be entered, unless the complainants wish to amend. In that case, leave should be given, on the usual terms.

[NOTE. In affirming this decree, Mr. Justice Clifford, speaking for the supreme court, said: "Conceding that the United States is the real party, still the court is of opinion that there is nothing in the remarks attributed to the auditor of the customhouse, or to the refund clerk, or to the secretary of the treasury which can be held to preclude the respondent from pleading any proper plea to the actions which he may think necessary in making his defense. * * * Congress, undoubtedly, might authorize actions of the kind to be brought directly against the United States; but all must concede that such a power has never been exercised and is not conferred, and, in the absence of such legislation, the court is of the opinion that such actions may in certain aspects be treated as actions against the collector, unless it appears that he acted under the directions of the proper official authority, or that a case is made where no execution can issue against the collector. * * * Taken in the most favorable view for the complainants, it is clear that it is impossible to regard the remarks attributed to the secretary of the treasury or to the officers of the customs as a contract or promise made by either party. There was no promise to forbear instituting the suits; nor was there any promise, if forbearance was accorded, that the statute should cease to run. * * * When they separated, each party was as free to pursue his own course, as when the interview commenced. Complainants might have brought suits the same day, and, if they had, the respondent would have been at liberty to make any defense in his power, irrespective of anything which had transpired at the interview." Case No. 368.

ANDREAE et al. v. REDFIELD.

[15 Int. Rev. Rec. 105.]

Circuit Court, W. D. New York. Jan. Term, 1872.

LIMITATIONS — ACTION AGAINST COLLECTOR FOR DUTIES PAID—PROMISE NOT TO PLEAD STATUTE.

[1. In a replication to a plea of the statute of limitations, an allegation that the defendant resided out of the state 11 months, without an averment that the statutory period has not elapsed, exclusive of the time of his absence, is insufficient.]

[2. In a suit against a collector of customs whose plea is the statute of limitations, a replication alleging that the United States, and not the collector, were liable for the amount claimed; that the United States had made a new promise, and had promised not to plead the statute, if it contains any substantial defense to the plea, is double, and therefore insufficient.]

[3. The granting of leave to put in several replications merely permits the parties to put the matters in the record, and is not an adjudication of their sufficiency.]

[4. Where leave is given in a suit against a revenue collector to set up in reply to a plea of the statute of limitations an agreement that, if the plaintiffs filed their claims with the collector, the statute should not be pleaded, with an averment that they did file such claims, a replication setting up an agreement that the statute should not be pleaded to any claims for refund accruing within six years prior to the commencement of a test suit decided in favor of the plaintiffs, and acquiesced in by the treasury department, that such test suit had been so decided and acquiesced in, and wherein such suit is not particularly described, nor the connection of the case at bar with the alleged agreement or test suit shown, is too vague.]

[5. The averment in such a replication of a complete promise by the secretary of the treasury 10 years before the bringing of the suit is insufficient. The secretary's promise cannot be construed to operate without any limit as to time.]

[6. Act March 3, 1863, providing for the relief of collectors of customs by discharging their liability for unlawful collections out of the treasury, did not confer on the secretary of the treasury any such power that his promise not to plead the statute of limitations will avail plaintiffs in an action against a collector.]

[7. Where leave is granted to file four replications in an action against a collector of customs, of which the first two rest upon promises by the collector, and the last upon promises by the secretary of the treasury, as if the collector was a merely nominal defendant, such last replication is bad, since it is inconsistent with the others.]

[At law. Action by Otto Andrae and others against Herman J. Redfield, collector, for a refund of duties. Leave to file four replications was granted. On demurrer to the replications. Overruled in part.]

The following opinion discusses an important question of pleading in "Collectors' cases," under the act of March 3rd, 1863, and, in order that the points considered and disposed of may be more apparent, we give a synopsis of all the issues under the demurrer.

A. W. Griswold, John C. Darrow, and Samuel Hand, for plaintiffs.

Webster & Craig and H. J. Begly, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. This action is for money had and advanced, money paid, laid out and expended, had and received, etc., in the form of the ordinary money counts in assumpsit. The defendant, among other defences severally pleaded, by his third plea avers that the several causes of action did not, nor did either of them, accrue within six years before the commencement of this action. To this plea, the plaintiffs desired to file four replications, and, by the order produced on the hearing, it appears that the court, in 1867, made a special order permitting the plaintiffs to reply specially the matters specified in the order. The plaintiffs thereupon filed four several replications to the plea of the statute of limitations so pleaded. These replications are: 1st. That before the expiration of six years from the time when the moneys were had and received, etc., etc., by the defendant, the said defendant promised and agreed to and with the plaintiffs, that the statute of limitations should not be pleaded, in case the plaintiffs should file their claim to be refunded the said moneys, with the collector of the port of New York, and the plea avers that the plaintiffs did file and claim within the specified period. 2nd. That the plaintiffs within six years before the commencement of this suit renewed and ratified his promises in the declaration mentioned. 3rd. That after the causes of action had accrued to the plaintiffs, the defendant departed from, and resided out of the state of New York, for the period of about eleven months. And 4th. That by the act of congress of March 3rd, 1863, the defendant was discharged from all personal liability to repay the said several sums of money in the complaint mentioned, officially collected by the defendant, and paid into the treasury of the United States, but that it was by the said act made the duty of the secretary of the treasury to repay the several sums of money officially collected by the said defendant upon a recovery of a judgment against him in a suit brought against him in his official capacity to recover the said moneys, and that the secretary of the treasury, within six years before the commencement of this suit, did undertake and promise to pay the said several sums of money in the complaint of the plaintiffs mentioned; and that the defendant, while collector of the port of New York, paid over to the United States the moneys exacted by him from the plaintiffs on the condition, trust and agreement that the United States should and would undertake and assume to bear and be responsible for all claims that should be made against him as such collector for moneys received and exacted by order of the treasury department, and that the moneys paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant as in the complaint mentioned were so exacted. That this suit is defended by the United States, and "that before the expiration of six years from the time when the said money was paid to the defendant by the plaintiffs and by the defendant to the treasury of the United States, and within six years next before the commencement of this action, the said secretary of the United States did officially promulgate and make known and promise, and agree to, and with these plaintiffs, that the statute of limitations should not be pleaded as to any claims for refund of money so officially collected accruing within six years next prior to the commencement of a test suit in such cases, when such test suit had been decided in favor of the claimants and such decision acquiesced in by the treasury department. That test suits for the recovery of such money, as is in the complaint of the said plaintiffs mentioned, so officially collected, had been commenced in the courts of the United States in the years 1855 and 1856, and determined in favor of the plaintiffs therein, and the decision therein had been acquiesced in by the treasury department by letters of instruction issued by the secretary of the treasury, dated October, 1856, and May, 1857." To these four replications the defendant demurred. These replications may be briefly described as, 1. Promise by the defendant not to plead the statute if the claims should be filed with the collector. 2. New promise by the defendant. 3. Absence of the collector for about eleven months from the state. 4. New promise by the secretary of the treasury, and promise by the secretary of the treasury that the statute of limitations should not be pleaded if a test suit should be brought and decided in favor of the claimants.

As to the first of these replications, I should have had great doubts whether it was an answer at law to the pleas of the statute of limitations, but for the case of Gaylord v. Van Loan, 15 Wend. 308, and the cases therein referred to. Such an agreement, if to be enforced as an agreement, would seem to me to furnish occasion for an application to a court of equity to restrain the defendant from pleading his legal defence, where, by reason of the agreement, and what was done under it, it was inequitable to plead the statute. How it is, as an agreement, a legal answer to the plea is not obvious. The theory of an estoppel in pais makes the circumstances creating the estoppel conclusive evidence of the facts imported thereby, and as evidence of such fact it is useful. It is doubtless grossly inequitable for a defendant to plead the statute of limitations when, for a sufficient consideration, he has agreed with the plaintiffs that he will not; or to plead usury when, upon like consideration, he has agreed that he will not; or to set up any defence when, upon like consideration, he has agreed that he will not defend. But a replication to a plea setting up that the defendant, for a consideration, would not interpose any plea to the action would be a novelty at least. A court of equity can deal much better with agreements of this description, and can examine all the circumstances attending the making of the agreement and its performance, consider all the resulting equities, and grant or withhold an injunction or not as may be just. I, however, yield this doubt to the cases cited, especially since the defendant's counsel does not, in his argument, deny the sufficiency of the replication on any such ground.

The second replication does not seem to be objectionable upon any facts appearing in this replication or the plea to which it is addressed.

The third replication is clearly bad, and it seems to me frivolous. No issue can be joined upon it which will either determine the truth or legal effect of the plea, or avoid it. Suppose it to be found by a verdict that after the cause of action accrued, the defendant departed from and resided out of this state for about eleven months. It does not follow that six years have not elapsed since the cause of action accrued, exclusive of the period of such absence. The plaintiff should make his replication such that it takes his case out of the operation of the statute; i. e., such that if true he is entitled to recover. The issue here tendered is immaterial. When the statute exception "beyond seas" is pleaded, the replication should aver that six years have not elapsed since the defendant returned. So are the precedents, and so here the replication should show that six years have not elapsed, exclusive of the period of absence. I say nothing on the question whether it is necessary, under the statute of New York, to reply this absence specially; it is sufficient for this occasion that he has seen fit to do so, and he cannot be permitted to force the defendant into an issue upon such a replication as he here interposes.

The fourth replication is a novel and most extraordinary pleading. Its phraseology suggests that it was framed as and for a bill of complaint in equity, and yet it is as vague, indefinite, and uncertain in some of its parts as a bill of complaint may sometimes be where the complainant avers ignorance of particulars, and prays a discovery thereof from the defendant. As a pleading at law a most obvious defect is that it is double, if it contains any substantial matter in avoidance of the plea. Assuming that it is a legal answer to the plea, then it contains two answers, one a new promise by the secretary of the treasury, and the other a promise by the secretary that the statute of limitations should not be pleaded on certain conditions specified. I can hardly suppose that the plaintiff's averment of the payment of the money to the United States upon a trust, was intended as an avoidance of the plea on the ground that to a trust the statute of limitations does not apply; that doctrine might avail in a proper case, in an action between cestui que trust and trustee; but if that was the purpose on an idea that here the United States is to be regarded as the debtor, then there is a third substantial matter of avoidance.

This is sufficient to dispose of the fourth replication, but to obviate an application for amendment, it may be proper to make some further suggestions.

The granting of leave of court to put in several replications is no adjudication of the sufficiency of the matters mentioned in the order to be replied. It merely permits the parties to put the matters in the record to become the subject of examination and adjudication.

In the next place, so far as the plaintiff seeks to sustain this fourth replication by the order giving leave to file it, it is sufficient to say that the leave given did not contemplate the setting up of such an agreement as it contains, nor by any means such vague and indefinite allegations as accompany it. The purpose of a pleading is to apprise the adverse party of the facts relied upon, and intended to be proved, in such form that he can put them in issue with some idea of what he may expect to meet on the trial. The leave given was to set up an agreement that if the plaintiffs filed their claims with the collector, the statute of limitations should not be pleaded, with an averment that they did file such claims. The replication sets up an agreement that the statute should not be pleaded, as to any claims, for refund of money so officially collected, accruing within six years next prior to the commencement of a test suit in such cases, where such test suit had been decided in favor of the claimants, and such decision acquiesced in by the treasury department; and that test suits were commenced in the court of the United States in the years 1855 and 1856, and determined in favor of the plaintiffs therein, and such decision had been acquiesced in by the treasury department by letter issued by the secretary of the treasury, dated October, 1856, and May, 1857.

What is a test suit? On what particulars, in any answer to that question, can the defendant take issue if he wishes to do so under this replication? By whom, in what court, and where, have such suits been brought? Who were the parties, and by what particulars can they be identified, so that the defendant can take issue with the plaintiffs, and have some means of ascertaining that of which the replication should itself apprise him, viz; what is to be proved in support of the plaintiff's case?

Again, what connection have the causes of action in this suit with such agreement, or with such test suit? It is not averred in this replication that these moneys were paid to the defendant or to the United States before such agreement, or that the right to such moneys was involved in the suits referred to, or that the causes of action herein constituted claims for refund of money so officially collected accruing within six years next prior to the commencement of the test suits mentioned, or that a test suit was brought within six years after these causes of action accrued.

And again: If the agreement should be sustained, held, sufficiently pleaded and complied with, the decision of the test suit and the acquiescence of the secretary of the treasury are averred to have been completely communicated in May, 1857. Is it to be construed that such an agreement operates without any limit as to time? That the plaintiffs could wait ten years after such final acquiescence, and then bring suit unaffected by the statute of limitations? Clearly the order giving leave never contemplated such a replication as this; and if the replication cannot be sustained on this demurrer, without the aid of the order, it ought not to be sustained on any ground.

Thus far I have treated this fourth replication as if the agreement by the secretary of the treasury could be pleaded in avoidance of the statute. I do not intend to countenance that view of the subject. The theory upon which the plaintiffs seek to justify this fourth replication makes their entire replication inconsistent, and any support the agreement gives to the fourth is destructive of the first and second replications. That theory is that the act of congress of March 3rd, 1863, has operated as sort of novation by which the United States has become the debtor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant is discharged from liability. He being, however, retained as a defendant in form, so that by due judicial proceedings the validity and amount of the plaintiffs' claims may be ascertained and determined. Hence, the United States, being the real defendant, the new promise by the secretary of treasury, and his promise that the statute of limitations shall not be pleaded, are operative and available to the plaintiffs. What then becomes of the first and second replications, which aver that the defendant, Redfield, made a new promise? and that he promised not to plead the statute? Surely if the statute deprived him of all interest, and relieved him of all liability, and cast it upon the United States so that the latter became and is the real debtor and the real defendant, then those promises of the nominal defendant cannot be permitted to prejudice the government. The theory of the plaintiffs cannot be used to sustain the promises of the secretary of the treasury, and be repudiated to sustain those of the nominal defendant, as an avoidance of the statute at law. I am, however, of opinion that the act of 1863 has neither wrought any change in the rules of law governing pleadings in the action, or in the tests to be applied to them by a court of law, nor has it conferred upon the secretary of the treasury any such power that his promise will avail the plaintiffs at all in their action at law against the defendant. The action must proceed governed by such rules as would govern the question of recovery, or no recovery at law, had no such statute been enacted. It is for the protection of the defendant, not for the benefit of the plaintiffs, that the statute intervenes to provide for the relief of the former by making provision to discharge his liability out of the treasury.

Under these views, the defendant must have judgment upon his demurrer to the third and fourth replications, and as to the first and second replications the demurrer must be overruled with leave to the defendant to rejoin.

[NOTE. Rejoinders were filed to the first and second replications, and issue joined thereon. While the cases were still pending, the plaintiffs filed a bill of complaint to restrain the respondents from pleading the statute of limitations in the action at law, setting up a promise by the customs officials and the secretary of the treasury not to plead the statute of limitations, new promises by both these officers, and the fact that in other actions, on similar facts, judgment had been given for the importers, and the excessive duties refunded by the government. The bill was dismissed by the circuit court, and on appeal the supreme court affirmed that decision, on the ground that conversations wherein the government officers said that under like circumstances it was not the custom of the treasury department to plead the statute of limitations did not amount to a promise not to plead the statute, nor to a new promise, because not in writing; that, if they did amount to such a contract, it was void for lack of consideration; and that the defendants were not estopped to plead the statute because both parties were equally well informed of all the facts. Miller and Field, JJ., dissented, on the ground that the acts and promises of the government officials amounted to an estoppel in equity to the plea of the statute of limitations. Andrae v. Redfield, 98 U. S. 225.]

ARMY—ENLISTMENT OF MINOR—DISCHARGE ON REQUEST OF PARENT OR GUARDIAN.

A minor, who has enlisted in the army of the United States without the consent of his parent or guardian, must be discharged on request of his father.

[See, also, U. S. v. Wright, Case No. 16,777.]

Habeas corpus. A father asks the discharge of his minor son from an enlistment in the army, made without the father's consent.

Nathan Webb and Thomas Amory Deblois, for petitioner.

FOX, District Judge. The act of [March 16] 1802 [section 11, 2 Stat. 134] provided that no person under the age of twenty-one should be enlisted by any officer without the consent of his parent, guardian, or master, first had or obtained. The same provision is found in the act of 1813; but by act of [December 10] 1814, c. 10, §§ 1, 2, [3 Stat. 146,] the enlistment of men between the ages of eighteen and fifty was authorized; and it further provided, that such enlistment should be absolute and binding upon all parties under the age of twenty-one years; but any recruit might at any time within four days from his enlistment, reconsider and withdraw his enlistment. The third section repealed so much of the fifth section, of the act of [January 13] 1813 [3 Stat. 791, c. 12] as required the consent of the parent to the minor's enlistment. By act of [March 3] 1815, [3 Stat. 224,] entitled "an act fixing the military peace establishment of the United States," it was provided that the men should be recruited in the same manner, and with the same limitations, as are authorized by act of 1802. This revived the provision of the act of 1802, and restored the requirement of the consent of the parent to the enlistment of the minor. The act of 1814, I consider repealed, and the provision of the act of 1802 in this respect revived. The act of September 28, 1850, [section 5, 9 Stat. 507,] makes it the duty of the secretary of war to order the discharge of any soldier of the army, who at the time of his enlistment was under the age of twenty-one years, upon evidence being produced to him that such enlistment was without the consent of his parent or guardian. I consider this as only affording a more speedy redress to the parent, and conferring on the secretary of war the power, or rather charging him with the duty, of granting a discharge in such a case. Before this, it might be necessary to apply to the courts for a discharge, and in some cases the soldier might be in the Indian Territory, or some other locality where the order of the court could not be had. The duty therefore devolved on the secretary of war to grant a discharge. There is nothing which can be construed as legalizing such enlistment. The next act I find is that of [February 13] 1862, c. 25, [12 Stat. 339,] which by the second section repeals the fifth section of the act of September 28, 1850. The repeal of this section leaves the law as it was before the act of 1850 was passed. The authority, which was by that section conferred on the secretary of war, was by its repeal simply withdrawn, and it did not in any way touch the validity of the enlistment, or the power of the court over it. I have no doubt that the enlistment is illegal as against the parent, being without his consent, and that the minor should be discharged therefrom. Vide act of [February 24] 1864, c. 13, [13 Stat. 6,] and [act of July 4, 1864,] c. 237, [13 Stat. 379,] and act of [March 3] 1865, [15 Stat. 487.]

Discharge ordered.

BANKRUPTCY—COUNSEL'S FEES—PREPARATION OF SCHEDULE.

[The fee to be allowed counsel for the preparation of a schedule of a bankrupt is not to be determined by the amount of mere clerical labor performed; the systematizing, arrangement, and condensation of the matter should be considered; and a fee of $100 for preparing a schedule numbering 40 pages of bankruptcy blanks was properly allowed.]

By the register: Noah W. Shafer, the register to whom was referred the petition of Ferguson & Murray, Esqs., attorneys-at-law and solicitors for said bankrupts, for a reasonable compensation for preparing and making the individual and partnership schedules of said bankrupts, beg leave to report: That I have very carefully examined the matters alleged in the said petition, and have compared and considered the amount of professional labor involved, and also what is a reasonable compensation for the same. It has been adjudicated in your honorable court, that counsel in cases of this kind have the right to be compensated out of the funds of the bankrupt in the hands of the assignee, and the register accepts the adjudication as fixing the law and practice.

Then as to the amount of compensation. In examining the schedule I find that there are partnership schedules of Andrews & Jones, of Robert Andrews and Henry C. Jones, the individuals composing the said firm. The whole schedule numbers forty pages of bankruptcy blanks, exclusive of the blanks for jurats and certificates. The question of compensation of counsel fees in any given case is always difficult. It requires great care, experience, and caution to do justice to the solicitors and at the same time to preserve the estate from improper allowance. It is not the mere manual labor of writing that counsel, in cases of this kind, is required to do. He must first get his matter systematized, arranged, and condensed, so as to appear to as much advantage and convenience as is possible. This cannot be done with the celerity of mere copying, as all those who have tried it know. In a voluntary petition and schedules filed before me, or rather referred to me by your honorable court, not so large as this, not so many pages, nor any more difficult, the petitioner paid four hundred dollars for its preparation and the accompanying counsel and advice. I refer to the case of Stephen G. Barnes, [Case No. 1,010,] bankrupt, No. 2253 in bankruptcy. This, I have no hesitation in saying, is not to be taken as a fair precedent, for I am free to say that I think that a compensation entirely disproportionate to the work and professional skill required. In the case before me, and in view of the value that counsel put upon their own services (I mean counsel competent to perform the duties they undertake), the register does not think that one hundred dollars would be more than a reasonable compensation, but on the other hand, considers it reasonable—not too much, but at the same time ample for the services rendered. The professional labor required is much more than that required in an involuntary petition prior to the amendment of June 22, 1874, to the bankrupt law, in which cases, from seventy-five dollars to one hundred and twenty-five dollars have been allowed in my district. The assignee, A. W. Irwin, Esq., has funds of the said bankrupts in his hands, and whatever compensation is allowed, he has the funds to pay. The register would recommend that the petitioning counsel in this case be allowed the sum of one hundred dollars for the preparation of the schedules of bankrupt—both partnership and individual—the preparation of which was in obedience to the mandate of your honorable court, as contained in the warrant issued in the case, and further, that the assignee, A. W. Irwin, be directed to pay the same out of the funds of the estate in his hands. Respectfully submitted, N. W. Shafer.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. The foregoing report of register Shafer, recommending an allowance of one hundred dollars to Ferguson & Murray, Esqs., solicitors for said bankrupt, is confirmed, and the assignee is ordered to pay the same.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—VALIDITY OF REISSUE —PROCESS—NOVELTY—MANUFACTURE—ANTICIPATION—ABANDONMENT.

1. The reissued letters patent granted to Nelson W. Green, May 9th, 1871, for a process of constructing wells, are valid.

2. The state of the art of constructing wells at the time Green made his invention, explained. The peculiar features of Green's well, called the "driven well," explained.

3. The claim of the patent, namely, "The process of constructing wells by driving or forcing an instrument into the ground until it is projected into the water, without removing the earth upwards, as it is in boring, substantially as herein described," is a claim to a process: and the element of novelty in the process consists in driving a tube tightly into the earth, without removing the earth upwards, to serve as a well pit, and attaching thereto a pump, so that the process puts to practical use the new principle of forcing the water in the water-bearing strata of the earth from the earth into a well pit, by the use of artificial power applied to create a vacuum in the water-bearing strata of the earth, and at the same time in the well pit.

4. The claim may also well be construed as claiming the well as a manufacture constructed according to the process described.

5. A chance operation of a principle, unrecognized by any one at the time, and from which no information of its existence, and no knowledge of a method of its employment, is derived by any one, if proved to have occurred, will not be sufficient to defeat the claim of him who first discovers the principle, and, by putting it to a practical and intelligent use, first makes it available to man.

6. The question of the dedication and abandonment of his invention, by Green, to the public, considered. The question of Green's delay in applying for a patent, for more than four years after he made his invention, considered, as bearing on the question of abandonment.

[In equity. Suit by William D. Andrews and others against Theodore A. Carman to enjoin infringement of reissued patent No. 4,372, and for damages. Decree for complainants.]

George Gifford, Milo Goodrich, Benjamin F. Tracy, and Joseph O. Clayton, for plaintiffs.

William D. Shipman, Samuel L. Warner, and Silas A. Robinson, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a suit in equity brought by the owners of a patent issued to Nelson W. Green, on May 9th, 1871, designated as reissue No. 4372, [patent No. 73,425,] against Theodore A. Carman, for an injunction and damages because of an infringement of their patent. The case presents issues belonging to nearly every class known in patent litigations. Of the various questions so elaborately discussed before me, I shall first notice those relating to the construction of the patent.

The patent is for a process of constructing wells. In order to a correct understanding thereof, the state of the art should be first briefly explained. A well consists of a pit sunk in the earth until a water-bearing stratum of the earth is reached, from which the water therein will flow into the pit, and a supply of water be thus obtained. Two forms of well have long been known—one, the ordinary domestic well; the other, the artesian well. In the ordinary well, the well pit is sunk to a water-bearing stratum of the earth, from which the water will, by reason of the natural forces operating upon it, as it lies in the earth, ooze or flow from the earth into the bottom of the pit, as a reservoir, in sufficient quantities for the ordinary purposes of domestic use. In the artesian well, the well pit is sunk in the earth until a water-bearing stratum is reached where the water lies under the pressure of such a head, that, when struck by the well pit, it will come into the pit so rapidly that a stream of water is produced, flowing, by the force of its own current, from the earth, into and through the well pit, to the surface. These two forms are not different in their method of operation. Both rely upon the natural forces, as they are found operating upon the water in the water-bearing stratum reached by the well pit, to force the water from the earth into the pit. In both these forms the pit has uniformly been made by loosening the earth or rock and removing it upwards and out upon the surface, either by means of the spade or the drill or augur, and the sand bucket.

In this state of the art of obtaining a supply of water from the earth, a new form of well appeared, now known as the driven well, which forms the subject of this controversy. This well embodies an idea not present in any other form, namely, that the water in the water-bearing strata of the earth may, by the application of artificial power, be forced to flow from the earth into the well pit, with increased rapidity, so that a well pit only a few inches in diameter, sunk to a moderate depth, will afford an abundant supply of water, and constitute a practical and productive well. The characteristic difference between the driven well and other forms consists in the practical application of this new idea. In previous forms, the rapidity with which water flows from the earth into the well pit is dependent upon the natural forces as they happen to be found operating upon the water lying in the water-bearing stratum to which the well pit is sunk. The driven well adds artificial power, so applied as to cause a great increase in the rapidity with which the water in the earth will flow from the earth into the well pit. The foundation of this new form of well is the discovery that, if a pipe, with an opening at the lower end, be driven into the earth, extending down air-tight until it reaches the water, and have a pump attached air-tight to its upper end, and a vacuum be created in the pipe so fitted and connected with the water in the earth, water will flow abundantly from the earth into the pipe. The novelty consists in making the well pit to consist of the tube of a pump connected tightly with the earth. This is accomplished by driving into the earth a tube to be used as the tube of a pump and at the same time as the pit of a well. This manner of inserting the tube renders it possible, by means of a pump attached to the tube, to create a vacuum in the pit of the well, and at the same time in the water-bearing stratum of the earth.

This discovery once made, its application to the purpose of obtaining a supply of water from the earth, for the use of man, was a natural consequence; and it was at once applied to practical use, by substituting, in place of the larger excavation ordinarily made to serve as a well pit, a moderate sized tube driven tightly into the ground and having a pump attached. The advantages secured by this method are manifold. As the force with which the water will flow into the well pit is greatly increased, a tube of moderate diameter forms a sufficient well pit, thereby saving much expense and labor in constructing the well pit. Good water may, by this method, be reached when the surface water is bad. The well pit being airtight, all water is excluded except that lying in the water-bearing stratum to which the pit is sunk. By this method, a quicksand may be overcome, when it would otherwise prove an insurmountable obstacle. By this method, all danger of using water fouled by dirt or noxious matter thrown in from the surface is avoided; and, by this method, water can, in most localities, be obtained with cheapness and without delay. To these obvious advantages must be added the noticeable one, apparently demonstrated by the experiment made, that the supply of water thus obtained directly from the water-bearing strata of the earth, by the simple action of an ordinary pump attached to a tube driven tightly into the earth, is measured by the quantity of water lying in the stratum to which the tube is sunk, so that, in most instances, the supply obtained by this method is constant and inexhaustible, when the reservoir of an ordinary well sunk in the same place would speedily give out. The difference in this respect is remarkable, and apparently of great importance.

It is plain, therefore, to see that the subject under consideration has utility. It seems also plain that it is patentable as a new process. A well is not a machine, but a process. It is a method of obtaining a supply of water from the earth. No change in the qualities of water is effected by a well. The water is subjected to no treatment whereby a better article is produced. No mechanical device is necessary. A pit is sunk under such circumstances that water flows into it from the earth, and thus becomes available for use. What is accomplished by the process is, that water is obtained by the operation of the powers of nature upon the water lying in the earth.

The difference between the new process under consideration and the old is, that the pressure of the atmosphere, which, in the ordinary well, operates at the sides and bottom of the well pit, to maintain an equally distributed atmospheric pressure upon the water, whereby the flow of water into the well is made dependent upon the force of gravity, in the new process is removed from within the well pit, and ceases there to operate against the inward flow of water, so that the pressure of the atmosphere operates with its full power to force the water in the earth from the earth into the well pit, and without any opposition caused by meeting, in its flow, the pressure of the atmosphere at the sides or bottom of the pit. This process involves a new idea, which was put to practical use when the method was devised of fitting tightly in the earth, by the act of driving without removing the earth upwards, a tube open at both ends but otherwise airtight, and extending down to a water-bearing stratum, to which is attached a pump, a vacuum in the well pit, and at the same time in the water-bearing stratum of the earth, being necessarily created by the operation of a pump attached to a pipe so driven.

It has been supposed by the counsel for the defence, that the invention under consideration must consist of some new instrument, machine, or mechanical device, and they say: "The well, consisting of a vertical shaft with a reservoir of water at the bottom, being known, in all its varieties, from time immemorial, what was there for any one to invent? Clearly, nothing but some new instrument, machine or mechanical device for sinking the shaft down to the water, or of raising the water to the surface. It is impossible to conceive any other field of invention connected with the subject." Here is disclosed a clear misapprehension. The novelty of the process under consideration does not lie in a mechanical device for sinking the shaft or raising the water to the surface, but in the method whereby water, by the use of artificial power, is made to move with increased rapidity from the earth into the shaft, whence it results, that a tube but a few inches in diameter, driven down tightly to a water-bearing stratum of the earth, affords an abundant supply of water to a pump attached thereto, and constitutes a practical and productive well. Such an invention is without the field of mechanical contrivance. It consists in the new application of a power of nature, by which new application a new and useful result is attained. There is no new product, but an old product—water—is obtained from the earth in a new and advantageous manner.

There can be no patent for a principle; but, "for a principle so far embodied and connected with corporeal substances as to be in a condition to act, and to produce effects, in any trade, mystery or manual occupation, there may be a patent." The idea or principle of forcing water from the earth into a well pit by the use of artificial power is new, but is not by itself patentable. The idea, when made available by a method whereby it is put to practical use, is patentable as a process, and is thus secured to the person who has conceived the idea and invented the method. That method, in the present instance, consists in accomplishing the result first conceived by the inventor to be possible, by creating a vacuum in the water-bearing stratum of the earth and at the same time in the well pit, by means of a tube projected into a water-bearing stratum of the earth, and connected tightly with the earth, to which tube a pump is attached at the upper end. This constitutes "a combination or arrangement of processes to work out a new and useful result." It is "a process combining instrumentalities before known, but not employed together, to accomplish a new and useful result." The elements of the process may be old, but, when combined for the purpose of putting to practical use the new idea of forcing water in this way from the earth into a well pit, they constitute a new and useful process, within the meaning of the patent laws.

I have now pointed out what, in the light afforded by the history of the art, appear to me to be the patentable features of the structure known as the driven well. These views I conceive to be in harmony with the law upon this subject, as declared by the authorities, and to derive support from the following cases: Roberts v. Dickey, [Case No. 11,899;] McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202; Foote v. Silsby, [Case No. 4,919;] Le Roy v. Tatham, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 132; Nelson v. Harford, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 310; Tilghman v. Morse, [Case No. 14,044;] Crane v. Price, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 377.

I next proceed to examine the language of the patent upon which this action is founded, in order to determine whether the invention I have thus described is secured thereby. And here I meet one of the many sharp issues of this controversy; for, while the eminent counsel for the plaintiffs is clear that the patent does describe and cover such an invention, counsel on the other side, also eminent, contend with great earnestness, that the patent describes and covers nothing but the process of making a hole in the ground, and declare that the "pretended invention is a fabrication as discreditable as the patent is absurd." It is not difficult to agree with counsel that the patent is absurd, if it be true that it describes nothing but the process of making a hole in the ground. On the other hand, it is not easy to understand how a patent for nothing but the process of making a hole in the ground could be the result of the vigorous contest waged before the examiner, the examiners-in-chief, and the commissioners of patents, and also, on appeal, before the experienced judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which was supposed to have terminated successfully for the inventor, when it was finally decided, upon appeal, that a patent must issue to Green for the invention described in his "broad claim." It seems natural to suppose, that a patent issued under such circumstances was intended to cover something more than the process of making a hole in the ground; and I think it can be shown, that the language of the patent, when construed according to the settled rules applicable in such case, does cover something more, and secures the invention I have above endeavored to describe.

The language of the claim may be first considered. It is as follows: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is, the process of constructing wells by driving or forcing an instrument into the ground until it is projected into the water, without removing the earth upwards, as it is in boring, substantially as herein described." Here the invention is stated to be "a process of constructing wells," not a process of making holes. A well is more than a hole. As has been shown, it is a process of obtaining a supply of water from the earth. The words, "the process of constructing wells, substantially as herein described," are, therefore, equivalent to "the herein described process of obtaining a supply of water from the earth."

Nor is the scope of the claim, as thus understood, limited by the other language of the claim, wherein it is stated that an instrument is to be driven, and driven into the ground, and driven until it is projected into water, and so driven that the earth is packed tightly around it—for that is the necessary result of driving the instrument without removing the earth upwards—and, when so driven, is to remain. Here is described the characteristic feature of the process of constructing a driven well, but no well is described. Not even a hole in the ground is described; for, it is not stated that the instrument driven into the ground is to be withdrawn, or that it is to be hollow. To suppose, therefore, that it was the intention to secure no more than the operation described in the claim, as being a process for constructing a well, is to suppose an absurdity. The operation described in the claim not only will not produce a well, but it is no step in the operation of constructing any kind of a well, except the driven well. The claim points out that an instrument is to be driven to form a well pit, but how it can be that a well pit is the result of such an operation is not pointed out in the claim. Plainly, it was not intended, by the language of the claim, to describe fully the invention intended to be covered by the patent. Necessarily, therefore, and naturally, we are referred by the claim to the specification, for the full description of the process which the patent was intended to secure. In the specification, we find stated more clearly the distinguishing feature of the process, wherein it differs from any process before adopted for procuring a supply of water from the earth; for, the specification says, that an instrument is to be driven into the ground until it reaches water, having the earth packed tightly around it. It is by means of this packing of the earth tightly around the tube, that the force developed by the creating of the vacuum in the well pit is brought to bear directly upon the water lying in the water-bearing stratum, to force it into the well pit; and this driven tube forms the well pit of the new invention, for, as stated, it is to be a tube made air-tight throughout its length, except at its lower end, where are to be perforations for the admission of water, and through and from which the water may be drawn by a pump. The specification also mentions the vacuum, and points out where it is to be created, for, a vacuum must of necessity be formed in the well pit and in the water-bearing stratum, by operating a pump attached to such a tube, so driven into the earth.

I find, therefore, in the specification of this patent, either set forth in terms, or by necessary implication, all the elements of the process known as the driven well; and this description is such, that no one can perform the operation thus described, without obtaining a supply of water by the process under consideration, and by the use of the same idea which it is claimed was first conceived by Green.

Neither is there anything in that part of the specification stated to be made with reference to the drawings, to enable the process to be put to use, which excludes this invention from the patent. It is there said, that the tube may be contracted at its lower end, but it is also carefully stated, that the contraction must be "slight," and only to insure an easy passage to the place to which the tube is to be "driven or forced," thus maintaining the necessary feature of a tight connection between the tube and the earth, effected by the driving of the tube without removing the earth upwards, upon the preservation of which the success of the process depends. So, it is stated that the diameter of the tube to be driven may be "somewhat" smaller than the diameter of the well. Still, it is plain that the tube is always to be driven, whence, of necessity, it results that the earth is packed tightly around it.

But, it is said that the specification covers a flowing well, in which the features of the driven well do not exist. It is true, that the patent contains the statement, that, "in some cases, the water will flow out from the tube without the aid of the pump;" but, it will be observed, that this statement of a fact is not contained in the description proper of the invention. The specification first states in what the invention consists. Then, to enable others to use the invention, a description is given with reference to drawings; and, following this, is the statement under consideration, which can properly be considered to be simply the statement of a circumstance that sometimes occurs in conducting the operation, and which, when it does occur, obviously renders it unnecessary to go further in the operation by adding the pump, which, plainly, is supposed to be necessary in all cases where such a stream of water is not struck.

It thus appearing that the invention claimed by Green is found described in his specification, inasmuch as no violence will be done to the language of the claim by construing it to cover the invention, it is the clear duty of the court so to construe it. "If, by examination of the specification, and applying it to the then existing state of the art, we can learn what the invention was, then the claim, which was designed to be a condensed summary of the invention, is to be construed so as to be co-extensive with the invention, if that can be done without doing violence to its language." Whipple v. Middlesex Co., [Case No. 17,520.] See, also, Waterbury Brass Co. v. New York Brass Co., [Case No. 17,256;] Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 181; Haworth v. Hardcastle, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 480; Turrill v. Railroad Co., 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 491. So construed, this patent becomes co-extensive with the discovery, and secures an exclusive right to use the new idea or principle put to practical use by the new process described; for, to use the language of the defendant's counsel: "If Green invented a process, it was not in fact dependent on the particular form of the instrument, nor does his specification so claim it." The right secured by the patent is not, then, the right to certain instruments, nor to a combination of instruments, but it is the right to use his discovery in any method presenting the characteristic features of his method, and accomplishing the same result in substantially the same way.

But, it is said, that the evidence shows that no such idea or process was in the mind of Green at the time when he claims to have made his invention. As I view the testimony, the contrary of this is shown. Not to mention the testimony which Green now gives, when he describes his invention, there are several witnesses who heard him describe his invention at the time when he claims to have made it, and what they say he then disclosed as his new method of obtaining a supply of water from the earth, appears to be a complete description of the invention covered by the patent, as I have construed it. The proofs show that the patentee not only conceived this process and put it in operation, but stated, in terms, that its success depended upon a vacuum being formed by the pump, and that the tight connection between the earth and the well pit, by the act of driving the tube, was necessary to enable the vacuum to produce the sought for result upon the water lying in the earth.

Furthermore, it may be remarked, as bearing not only upon the language used by Green when he first described his invention, but also upon the language used in the patent, that the statement that a pump is to be attached to a tube forming a well pit, and driven to a water-bearing stratum without removing the earth upwards, involves, by necessary implication, the idea of a vacuum in the earth and in the well pit, as such a vacuum must result from the operation of the pump, provided the tube be driven tightly in the earth, as described. And this leads to the further remark, that the idea of a pump to be attached to the tube forming the well pit seems necessarily to be involved in the idea of using a tube as is described for the pit of a well. The sole object of the well being to obtain a supply of water, and it being manifest that water could not be procured from such a tube by hand or bucket, the statement that such a tube is to be the well pit, carries with it the idea of a pump attached thereto, that being the only practical method by which water could be drawn from such a tube.

I, therefore, understand this patent to be a patent for a process, and that the element of novelty in this process consists in the driving of a tube tightly into the earth, without removing the earth upwards, to serve as a well pit, and attaching thereto a pump, which process puts to practical use the new principle of forcing the water in the water-bearing strata of the earth from the earth into a well pit, by the use of artificial power applied to create a vacuum in the manner described.

But a somewhat different reading of the patent may be adopted, and supported by authority high in this court upon such a question. The claim, it will be recollected, states the invention to consist of "the process of constructing wells, substantially as herein described." This language is nearly identical with that which came under the consideration of Mr. Justice Nelson, in Many v. Jagger, [Case No. 9,055.] There, the claim was for the manner of constructing wheels "with double convex plates, one convex outwards and the other inwards, and an undivided hub, the whole cast in one piece, as herein fully set forth." This language was held to secure the thing made by the process described. There was, it was there said, no claim to the parts of the wheel taken separately and distinct from the perfect wheel, but the claim was for the entire wheel, as the patentees had constructed it, as a new manufacture. There was no novelty in the parts taken separately, but the "instrument," that is, the wheel produced in the manner described, was held to be secured by the claim. The form was held not to be material, as the wheel was one of those manufactures where the particular form of the thing is not essential to its utility. In the present case, then, the well may be taken to be a manufacture, and the claim of "a process of constructing wells," like the claim of "a manner of constructing wheels," will cover all wells constructed according to the process described, without regard to form, and whether the parts taken separately be new or old. See Many v. Jagger, [Id. 9,055.] See, also, Goodyear v. Central R. Co., [Id. 5,563.]

I have now to speak of a third construction of this patent, which has been strenuously contended for. It has been supposed that this patent can be upheld as being for an operation claimed to be new, as an operation in the process of making a well, or in its association with other operations of making a well, namely, the making of a well pit by forcing an instrument into the ground and moving the earth only laterally. The point of the invention is, by this construction, made to consist in a new manner of constructing the well pit, that is, by puncturing instead of excavating. The great stress which has been laid upon this view of the patent by counsel so learned, the opinion expressed by the expert called by the plaintiffs, and the vigor of the opposition made to such a construction, have led me to pause and consider whether I must not have fallen into error in supposing that the patent can rightfully be held to cover and secure, not a process of sinking a well pit, but the process of obtaining a supply of water from the earth, which I have found to be detailed in the specification, and endeavored to describe. But, the view I have expressed is so firmly impressed upon my mind, that I shall rest my decision upon it, and leave the more learned judges before whom the patent must shortly come to detect my error, and to uphold or destroy the patent as being for a method of sinking a well pit by puncturing instead of excavating.

The interpretation I have thus given to the patent renders it unnecessary to pass upon the evidence in the case, given to show that, prior to the time when Green claims to have made his invention, well pits had been sunk by puncturing the earth.

Was Green the man entitled to secure the invention which his patent describes? The evidence is convincing, that Green first conceived the idea, explained his idea to others, and caused the feasibility of his process to be tested by actual experiment. Comment has been made upon the fact that the particular tools and devices used in constructing the first wells made were not pointed out by Green. But, such comment loses its force, when it is considered that the tools and devices employed in sinking the shaft form no part of the invention claimed by Green. The invention consists in the method of putting to a practical use the new idea or principle of increasing the productive capacity of a well, by forcing water directly from the earth into the well pit, artificial power being employed to create, by the operation of a pump attached to a tube driven tightly into the earth, a vacuum within the tube and the water-bearing stratum into which it is projected, whence follows an increased pressure upon the water in the earth towards the well pit, and an abundant supply of water is afforded to the pump. This conception was of such a character, that, when described, there was left nothing to be done but to test its correctness by an experiment so simple, and involving the use of means in such common use, that it could be fully tested by any one, upon the mere statement of the idea. In the present instance, the process was, at the outset, put to the test of an experiment conducted near Green's house, in his presence, and under his directions. His idea, and his process of putting it to a practical use, then became part of the property of the public, available for the purposes intended, unless it be secured by the patent in question. Subsequent experiments are spoken of in the evidence, which may properly be claimed by Green as his experiments, for, they were conducted in pursuance of his directions, by those acting at the time under his orders.

Furthermore, it should be remarked, in this connection, that, when Green first stated his idea and described his process, there were two points of doubt—one, whether force could be called into operation by the creation of the vacuum, sufficient to overcome the resistance of the soil, and afford a supply of water to the pump; the other, whether, practically, a tube could be driven to a water-bearing stratum of the earth under various conditions of soil, always excluding, of course, rock formations. The general utility of the invention depended upon the result of tests applied to the latter of these points of doubt. A wide range of subsequent experiment might, therefore, well be allowed for such an invention, notwithstanding the circumstance that the first experiment proved that the principle was sound, and could be usefully applied in some circumstances.

Upon this branch of the case, the contention has been, whether Green was the inventor, or Byron Mudge, the person who, under the direction of Green, conducted the early experiments; and a patent issued to Mudge, October 24th, 1865, is set up in the answer. The defendant does not, however, claim under Mudge's patent or under any patent. In fact there is no patent to Mudge, as his original patent was surrendered, and, upon his application for a reissue, a case of interference between him and Green was declared, which, after a severe contest, upon a large amount of testimony, and after careful argument, was decided in favor of Green. No patent to Mudge is, therefore, in this case, nor is Mudge called as a witness. But the defendant contends, as he may rightfully do, that the evidence shows Mudge to have been the inventor, and not Green. I cannot find, upon the evidence, that this defence is sustained. On the contrary, it appears quite clearly that the inventor was Green.

A patent to James Suggett is also set up. That, however, is not a patent for a process, but for a combination which does not involve the use of Green's process, and to which Green makes no claim.

The whole question of prior use may at this place be disposed of. The answer sets up, that Green's process had been long before described in Ure's Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures, as well as in McKenzie's Five Thousand Receipts, and had been used in certain wells, constructed prior to the date of his invention, in the towns of Cortland, Ithaca, Dansville, Napierville, and Dexter, and in the salt wells at Syracuse. In respect to a well claimed to have been constructed by Stephen R. Hunter, at his planing mill in Cortland, I am compelled to the conclusion, that no such well was made at the time stated. In respect to the other wells as to which proof is given, a critical examination of the evidence would be here required, if the patent under consideration were considered to be a patent for the mere process of making the pit of a well, without removing the earth upwards. Over these wells there has been an extended controversy as to whether, in any of them, the well pit was constructed without removing the earth upwards. However this may be, it cannot be successfully contended that the evidence affords room to claim that any one engaged in the construction of these wells had, at that time, conceived the idea of using artificial power to force water directly from the earth into a well pit, as a means of obtaining an increased supply of water, or that any one of these wells presents the characteristic feature of Green's method, whereby the above idea is utilized and made practically available to accomplish that result. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, for me to determine whether or not the pit of any of the prior wells was constructed by puncturing or by excavating. The remark already made is also applicable to the evidence given in respect to the manner of sinking the salt wells. Plainly, the salt wells do not anticipate the process invented by Green. Nor is his process described in the printed publications set up in the answer; and, upon the evidence, it must be held, that the principle of Green's process was first conceived by him, and by him first made a practical and operative feature in a well.

It is, of course, true, that, prior to Green's invention, water had been pumped from a hole in the ground, and from a small hole. Doubtless, it is also true, that, in some such case, where a pump had been inserted in a small hole, for the purpose of raising therefrom the water found therein, the principle of Green's invention may at times have been called into operation. No such case is here proved; but, if such fact were proved, Green's right to a patent would not thereby be defeated. A chance operation of a principle, unrecognized by any one at the time, and from which no information of its existence, and no knowledge of a method of its employment, is derived by any one, if proved to have occurred, will not be sufficient to defeat the claim of him who first discovers the principle, and, by putting it to a practical and intelligent use, first makes it available to man.

As bearing upon the question whether the idea claimed to have been conceived by Green, and to have been put to practical use by him in his process, had before that been known and applied, it should also be noticed, that, while the advantages of the process claimed by Green are many and obvious, and, although, since the date claimed for his invention, numerous patents have been issued—some one hundred and fifty, I think, the evidence shows—for instruments to be used in putting down the tubes of such wells, no application for any such patent appears to have been made before that time. Moreover, the invention, when it was announced by Green, was received as a novelty, and, since then, an extensive business of constructing driven wells has sprung into existence, a business of such importance that the number of driven wells since constructed is computed by hundreds of thousands. In this state alone, the number is stated by a witness to be one hundred and fifty thousand and upwards. The change in the art of well making which the evidence discloses, of itself goes far to prove novelty. Indeed, when it is considered that the methods in use for obtaining a supply of water from the earth are matters of common knowledge, and that a well is a thing of every day use, everywhere, reference may be made to the common knowledge of mankind to show that it has not always been understood that a supply of water may be obtained in almost any place by simply driving down tight in the earth a tight tube and attaching thereto a pump. Even now, it is doubtless a new thing to many, to be told that, if an ordinary well, from which the water is drawn by a pump, be filled up with dirt and the dirt packed tightly about the pump, the productiveness of the well will be thereby increased.

My conclusion upon this branch of the case, therefore, is, that the invention of Green has not been shown to have been anticipated, and is properly claimed by Green as a new and useful invention made by him.

I come now to consider the question of dedication and abandonment, which is presented by the evidence here, and is a question as important as any raised in the case. It is contended that Green, at the time of his invention, dedicated it to the public, and also that he abandoned it as not worthy to be patented. The law pertinent to this branch of the inquiry is the law in force prior to January, 1866. By the patent act of 1870, as well as by the Revised Statutes, all rights previously acquired were preserved. The law governing here is to be found, therefore, in the acts of 1836 and of 1839, as those statutes have been interpreted and applied by the courts.

The facts relied upon as showing a dedication of his invention by Green, are, that he permitted a well made by his process at the Fair Grounds, in Cortland, where the 76th New York regiment, of which he was colonel, was then stationed, to be there publicly used, and that he arranged for providing tubes to be taken with his regiment when it should move, in order to supply it with water when in hostile localities. That these facts do not amount to a dedication, I think, is plain. The occasion which called forth this invention was the rumor that the rebels were intending to poison the wells in places where the Union armies might come, and the report that some part of the Union army had been compelled to surrender for want of water. There was supposed to be a necessity for some form of well that would be tight, to prevent the possibility of poison, and that could be constructed quickly, cheaply and easily, so as to be available for a moving army. Under the pressure of this supposed necessity Green conceived the idea of his well, and also devised the method by which that idea could be put to practical use. Once conceived, a very simple experiment would test the soundness of the position he had taken and maintained, in discussions had respecting his plan, that it was possible to force water from the earth into the pit of a well, by using a tube driven tightly into the earth for a well pit, and creating a vacuum therein by a pump attached. This experiment, as the evidence shows, was made under the direction of Green, and in pursuance of the directions he had given, at or near his house in Cortland. The first experiment was a success, in this, that it proved the possibility of obtaining a supply of water by this process; but, of course, it could not prove that a tube could be driven down to a water-bearing stratum in all localities, with the cheapness and dispatch necessary to render the process one of general utility. It was natural, therefore, to suppose, that, before the process could be declared to be satisfactory, other experiments, in other and different localities, should be made. He could, by law, use his invention for this purpose, and permit it to be used, for two years, without forfeiting his right to a patent. Under such circumstances, it would be going far to say, that his act of permitting the use of his process at the camp in Cortland, where his regiment was then in camp, and of providing material wherewith to construct such wells for his regiment when it should move into hostile territory, amounted to a dedication of his invention to public use, and worked a forfeiture of his right to it.

But, it is said, that the patent is invalid under the provision of the act of 1839. The act of 1839, as has repeatedly been held, has no effect to invalidate a patent, unless there be proof of a use of the invention more than two years prior to the application for the patent, and that such use was with the knowledge and allowance of the inventor. Here, there is no evidence of any use or sale of the invention by Green, prior to his application for a patent. Nor is there any direct proof of knowledge on his part of any such use or sale by others, during that period. There is, however, evidence, that, within two years prior to Green's application, some wells called driven wells were sunk in Cortland, and, as it is claimed, under such circumstances of publicity and locality, as to compel the inference that Green knew of the use of his process in their construction. It cannot be denied that knowledge of the putting down of some of these wells on the part of Green, seems highly probable. Still, there is no direct evidence of such knowledge, and Green denies the knowledge under oath. Furthermore, two witnesses produced by the defence, who also resided in Cortland, and one of whom was a justice of the peace, being asked as to these wells, say that no knowledge of such wells came to them. It seems necessary, therefore, to conclude, that the existence of those wells was not so notorious as to compel the inference that they were known to Green.

Here it may be noticed, also, that wells put down by James Suggett were under a patent issued to him March 9th, 1864, which patent was for a combination of three instruments—an iron perforated tube, a pointed plug to use as a drill, and a pump,—Haselden v. Ogden, [Case No. 6,190,]—and which it is a mistake to suppose necessarily involved the use of the process claimed by Green. It does not, therefore, follow, that knowledge of the fact that Suggett had put down wells in Cortland necessarily amounts to notice that the process of Green was being employed by Suggett. The rule of law being, that "proof of knowledge and acquiescence must be beyond all reasonable doubt, as every presumption is the other way,"—Jones v. Sewall, [Id. 7,493,] Clifford, J.,—I am of the opinion that Green is entitled to the benefit of the doubt raised by his own oath and the testimony of the two Hunters.

Again, it is contended that the acknowledged fact that Green made no application for a patent till January, 1866, between four and five years after the date of his invention, shows an abandonment of the invention. But, says Woodruff, J.: "Lapse of time does not, per se, constitute abandonment. It may be a circumstance to be considered. The circumstances of the case, other than mere lapse of time, almost always give complexion to delay, and either excuse it or give it conclusive effect. The statute has made contemporaneous public use, with the consent and allowance of the inventor, a bar, when it exceeds two years. But, in the absence of that, and of any other colorable circumstances, we know of no mere period of delay which ought, per se, to deprive an inventor of his patent." Russell & Erwin Co. v. Mallory, [Case No. 12,166.]

In the present instance, the circumstances attending the delay are unusual, and, as I consider them sufficient to excuse a delay which certainly must be deemed extraordinary, a statement of these circumstances seems necessary. I premise the statement by repeating, that, upon the evidence, there is no room to doubt the fact that Green, at the time of his invention, claimed to have made a valuable discovery and to have invented a new process; and, furthermore, that he then declared an intention to secure his process by patent, and expressed his belief that large profits would accrue to him therefrom. At that time, Green, who had been partly educated at West Point, was engaged in organizing a regiment at Cortland, his residence, and was expecting soon to take part in the war of the rebellion. Within a few days after his invention, in the discharge of what seemed to him to be his duty, he felt compelled to shoot one of the captains of his regiment, named McNett. The shot was not mortal, but inflicted serious injury. In the then state of the public mind, this occasion gave rise to intense public excitement, out of which sprang a controversy of extraordinary bitterness, involving numerous persons and continuing for several years. The effect upon Green was disastrous in the extreme. He was suspended from his command, then tried by a court of inquiry, at Albany, and reinstated in command. His regiment, after having, it is said, required the protection of a battery to save it from violence at the hands of evil-disposed people of the county, removed to Washington, where Green was relieved from his command, and then dismissed the service, and subjected to military charges. He was, in addition, harassed by civil suits brought to charge him with personal liability for articles used by his regiment. He was also arrested, and then indicted, for the shooting of McNett, and, after repeated postponements of the trial, effected because of the excited state of the public mind, was tried in 1866, and, the jury having disagreed, was discharged. During this period, he also became involved in church difficulties arising out of the shooting of McNett, was expelled from the church and compelled to appeal to the Bishop, and also became involved in litigation with the pastor of his church. His efforts during this period to secure a reversal of the order dismissing him from the service were constant and absorbing, and were attended with such anxiety of mind as to give rise to the charge that he was insane. This state of things continued up to 1866, during which period he was of necessity often absent from Cortland, at Albany and at Washington; and he devoted his entire time to the controversy in which he had become involved, abandoning all other occupation, and exhausting all his means. The pressure of these circumstances was such, that he became discouraged and despondent, and was in fact driven near to madness. The extraordinary nature of the circumstances in which the man was placed during these years is fully proved, by many witnesses of character. These circumstances certainly give complexion to his omission to secure his invention by patent, and serve to furnish a proper excuse for such omission. In regard to a man so circumstanced, it would hardly be safe, in face of his positive oath to the contrary, to infer an intention to abandon an invention which evidently he always considered of great importance. This conclusion is strengthened by the uncontroverted fact, that when, in November, 1865, Green saw, by an advertisement in the papers, that driven wells were being put down, although he was advised by counsel defending him on the indictment, not to apply for a patent, as he would thereby increase the number of his enemies, and prejudice himself on the trial of the indictment then about to come on, nevertheless he did then, and in opposition to the advice of his counsel, file his application and assert his right to the invention. I conclude, therefore, that, upon the facts of this case, it must be held that the defendant has not produced that full measure of actual proof which is necessary to sustain the defence of abandonment.

I have now disposed of all the issues which have been seriously contested in this important case. There are several objections taken to the patent as a reissue, but they have not been greatly pressed, and I do not find in any of them ground for declaring the reissue void. I have given to these objections all the attention they appear to deserve, but it seems hardly worth while to extend this opinion by a statement of the reasons which have led me to reject them. I content myself with saying, that I consider the original patent to have been for a process, as is the reissue, and that the process I find described in the reissue is also to be found described in the original patent.

As to the question of infringement, I do not understand that it is disputed. At any rate, it is clearly proved. There must, therefore, be a decree for the complainants, in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

EQUITY PRACTICE—DECREE PRO CONFESSO—SETTING ASIDE—LACHES.

In a suit in equity on a patent, a preliminary injunction was granted, on notice and without opposition. Afterwards a decree pro confesso was entered, and a reference ordered, which was commenced, and witnesses were examined, and the defendants produced their accounts and attended by counsel. Afterwards they moved to set aside the decree and for leave to file an answer, alleging matters which had been set up in a prior suit on the patent and overruled by the court, and sundry new matters. No mistake or misapprehension or neglect of counsel was alleged. The plaintiffs offered to limit their recovery to $500, which would be less than the expense to the defendants of trying the issues. The defendants had ceased to use the patented invention: Held, that the motion must be denied, on the plaintiffs stipulating to limit their recovery to $500.

Tracy & Catlin, for plaintiffs.

Betts, Atterbury & Betts, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon a motion to set aside a decree taken pro confesso. The action is founded upon the reissued patent of Nelson W. Green, dated May 9th, 1871, reissue 4,372, for what has been termed "the driven well." The action was commenced in July, 1876. A motion for an injunction was noticed for the 28th day of July, at which time no opposition was made, and the injunction was granted. On the 3d of November, a decree pro confesso was taken, no answer having been filed, which decree was regularly signed and entered on November 10th, and a reference to ascertain the amount of the damages was directed. Such reference was thereafter commenced, and several meetings were had and witnesses examined, at which meetings the defendants were represented by counsel. No application was made to set aside the decree until December following. During this period negotiations were being undertaken with a view to an agreement as to the amount of damages, in the course of which the defendants stated that they had no intention of defending the case, and tendered a sum of money for the damages. Now the defendants apply to have the decree set aside, and for leave to file an answer. No excuse is presented for the omission to answer at the proper time. The statement of the defendants, that "they had no idea there was any hurry about the matter," and that "the papers were printed, and I was extremely busy at the time, and I did not pay any special attention to them, or know their exact character," shows that there is no excuse; and the facts warrant the conclusion that the decree was suffered because the defendants had then no intention of defending. The intention to defend was subsequently formed, after the decree in question had been entered, and after the reference had been proceeded with. The decree sought to be set aside was regularly entered. Rule 18 does not require special notice of an application for a decree, when no answer is filed. Besides, here, the defendants and their attorneys knew that the decree had been entered, and they actually attended upon the reference to ascertain damages, where they produced their accounts, and witnesses were examined, without objection, although they were then represented by counsel, and this without the suggestion of an intention to contest any other question save that of the amount of damages.

I do not, on this motion, consider whether the defence set up in the answer which the defendants are asking permission to file, can be successful or not. A part of the matter set up has been considered by this court in an action similar to the present, brought against Carman, and, so far as this court is concerned, that portion of the answer has been disposed of and will not be again examined here. The other part of the answer, wherein is set forth certain patents and publications that have as yet never been presented to this court, which are supposed to show a prior description of the subject-matter of this patent, doubtless contains matter as to which the decision of this court can properly be invoked, when duly presented for determination. It may, therefore, for the purposes of this motion, be assumed that the answer discloses a meritorious defence. The question presented, then, is, whether the possession of a meritorious defence gives the defendants a right to have a regular decree pro confesso set aside, without regard to other circumstances. I know of no such rule. To entitle a defendant to be relieved from such a decree there must be a meritorious defence, and it must also appear, that, as between the parties to the action, equity requires that the defendant be allowed to interpose his defence. In the present case, no such equity exists, for the reason that the plaintiffs offer to limit their recovery to the sum of $500, which, it is plain to see, is less than the expense to which the defendants would be put, in case of a trial upon the issues raised by the answer. As to the injunction, the defendants make no objection, having ceased to use the plaintiffs' patent.

This is, then, a case where the plaintiffs obtained a regular decree pro confesso, not by means of any mistake or misapprehension of facts, or neglect of counsel, but through the deliberate intention of the defendants not to defend, and where the defendants now ask to be relieved from the effects of their omission to answer, although the result of granting such relief will be of no advantage to them and a disadvantage to the plaintiffs. For, it is apparent, from the nature of the action and of the questions involved in controversy, that holding the decree will, in view of the damages asked, require of the defendants no greater outlay of money than will be required by the trial which they seek; while, if the decree be set aside, the plaintiffs will thereby be put to large expense. A trial under such circumstances would seem to be a waste of money. The legal right of every citizen to spend money in litigation is not to be doubted, but it is a right that can be abandoned. In a case like the present, equity requires it to be held that the abandonment by the defendants of their right to defend upon the merits was final, and that the plaintiffs cannot be required to surrender their decree regularly obtained and deliberately suffered. The motion is, therefore, denied, upon the plaintiffs stipulating to limit their recovery to the sum they have named, $500.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—STATE OF LIMITATIONS—LAGUES.

[A debtor executed a fraudulent conveyance of his real estate in 1865, and in 1867 passed into bankruptcy. On June 12, 1874, the assignee filed a bill attacking the conveyance, alleging that the grantor had retained possession of the property after the conveyance, and received the rents and profits thereof, and containing no averments showing that plaintiff had taken steps or made inquiries to ascertain the bona fides of the conveyance, but merely averring that he was ignorant of the fraud until informed of the facts June 14, 1872. Defendants pleaded the limitation of two years prescribed by Act March 2, 1867, § 2. Held, whether the statute began to run from the date of the appointment of the assignee or from the discovery of the fraud, it was a bar in this case, for want of due diligence in discovering the fraud.]

[In bankruptcy. Bill by Isaac M. Andrews, assignee in bankruptcy of Nathaniel Dole, against said Nathaniel Dole and others, to set aside, as fraudulent, transfers of his property made by said bankrupt. Delos E. Culver, made defendant as trustee, demurred to the bill. Demurrer sustained.]

NIXON, District Judge. This is a bill filed by an assignee in bankruptcy to recover certain real estate and personal property, alleged to have been transferred by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors. The bill charges that the defendant, Nathaniel Dole, was adjudicated a bankrupt June 27, 1867, in the southern district of the state of New York; that the complainant was appointed assignee October 12, 1867, and that an assignment was duly made to him of all the estate and effects of the bankrupt, pursuant to the 14th section of the act; that Dole was engaged in business as a banker and broker in the city of New York in November, 1863, under the name and firm of Dole & Company, and continued in said business until March 14, 1864, when the firm failed and became insolvent, having liabilities to the amount of about five hundred thousand dollars; that at the time of said failure Dole was the owner of large tracts of real estate in Jersey City, New Jersey, and also the owner of 18,640 shares of the capital stock of the defendant, the Weehawken Ferry Company, of the par value of fifty dollars per share (the capital stock of the company being 20,000 shares), and also the owner of an indebtedness due to him from the said company, for moneys advanced, of about one hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars; that, shortly after the failure of Dole & Co., the said Dole conspired with one of the defendants, Jules S. De La Croix, to cheat and defraud his individual creditors, and the creditors of the said firm, by putting the title of his property in the name of the said De La Croix; that, in pursuance of this fraudulent design, he executed transfers of property as follows: (1) A deed from Dole and wife to the said De La Croix, dated March 30, 1864, for 18 52-100 acres of land, and duly recorded in the clerk's office of the county of Hudson, in Book 109 of Deeds, fol. 239; (2) one other deed, of the same date, for 71 87-100 acres, and recorded as aforesaid in Book 109 of Deeds, fol. 252; (3) one other deed, dated April 6, 1864, for 77½ acres, and recorded as aforesaid, in Book 107 of Deeds, fol. 557. That on the 31st of December, 1864, with the like fraudulent intent, he transferred to said De La Croix 18,640 shares of the capital stock of the Weehawken Ferry Co., and also his claim of indebtedness for one hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars against the said company; that the only consideration received by Dole for the said property was the promissory notes of De La Croix, amounting in the aggregate to fifty-two thousand dollars; that said De La Croix was the brother-in-law of Dole, residing in Newburyport, Massachusetts; that he was, and is, wholly irresponsible and without pecuniary means, and dependent upon said Dole for his support.

The bill further alleges, that on the 11th of August, 1865, Dole and his wife executed a new conveyance of the same real estate to the said De La Croix for the pretended consideration of two hundred and fourteen thousand dollars, in which the said land was more particularly described by metes and bounds, which last-mentioned deed was recorded as aforesaid in Book 122 of Deeds, fol. 627; that no consideration was ever paid for the said property by the said De La Croix, or for any part thereof; that Dole did not part with the possession, nor deliver the same or any part thereof to De La Croix; but, on the contrary, resided on the property during the years 1864 and 1865, and has held, possessed, controlled, managed, and enjoyed the same and the proceeds thereof; collecting the rents and profits thereof the same since pretended sales as before, and has appropriated the said rents and profits to his own benefit.

The bill further alleges, that about June 1, 1865, Dole purchased of one Waterbury, Reynolds & Downing, a large tract of land in Hudson county, for forty-five thousand dollars, and procured the title of the same to be made to the said De La Croix; that afterwards, to wit, about April 3, 1866, he sold one portion thereof to the Pennsylvania Coal Co., and another part to Henry G. Schmidt, at a profit of about fifty thousand dollars—the transaction being negotiated by the said Dole for his own benefit, in the name of the said De La Croix; and that of the property, transferred as aforesaid by Dole and wife to De La Croix, Dole has subsequently sold for his own use, in the name of De La Croix, several parcels, by deeds, as follows: (1) one to W. Niles, dated January 24, 1867, conveying a lot 200 by 350 feet for three thousand dollars; (2) one to Weehawken Ferry Co., dated November 9, 1867, for 15 82-100 acres for the expressed consideration of one hundred dollars; (3) one to F. H. Cassatt, dated March 2, 1868, for 18 52-100 acres for eighteen thousand dollars; (4) one to John L. Jones, dated June 17, 1868, for six acres for fifty thousand dollars; (5) one to Jay Gould, dated September 1, 1868, for 77½ acres for three hundred and fifty thousand dollars; (6) one other to the Weehawken Ferry Co., dated December 31, 1870, for 31 11-100 acres for two hundred thousand dollars; (7) another of the same date to same company for several lots of land for seventy-five thousand dollars; (8) another of the same date to the same company for 21 81-100 acres for seventy-five thousand dollars, and (9) another to same of like date for fifty thousand dollars. That the said Dole is now, and has been since long prior to March 1, 1864, the president of the Weehawken Ferry Co.; that during the month of December, 1870, he caused to be executed by said De La Croix and himself, as president of said Ferry Co., various conveyances and releases of land, and had transferred to the New Jersey Midland Railway Co., large portions of the said real estate held by De La Croix as aforesaid, for the bonds of the said Railway Co., of the par value of six hundred thousand dollars, and for the further consideration, that the company should assume and pay a certain indenture of mortgage, executed by the said Ferry Co. to one Francis Price, to secure the payment of one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars; that Dole caused to be executed for his own use and benefit, but in the name of De La Croix, various mortgages upon the real estate held by De La Croix as aforesaid; sometimes to aid him in his purchases of other property, and sometimes to secure debts contracted by said Dole prior to 1864; that on January 2, 1867, De La Croix gave a mortgage to one Hugh White on a parcel of the said real estate to secure the payment of thirty-six thousand one hundred and sixty dollars, said White being a creditor of Dole in 1864, and the mortgage being given to secure said debt, and to procure the dismissal of a bill filed by White to set aside the above recited pretended conveyances to De La Croix; that the said mortgage was afterward paid by Dole in September, 1868; that De La Croix executed mortgages upon the said property at the instance and suggestion of said Dole, as follows: (1) one to Chas. G. Waterbury and others, dated June 1, 1865, to secure eighteen thousand nine hundred and fifty-three dollars, and paid by Dole, July 6, 1868; (2) one Elizabeth Paterson, dated December 2, 1868, for four thousand eight hundred dollars; (3) one to Jeremiah Lathrop, trustee, September 1, 1866, to secure twenty-nine thousand eight hundred dollars, for the alleged use and benefit of several of the relatives of the said Dole; (4) one to Charles G. Sesson, November 12, 1864, for thirty-five thousand dollars; (5) one to John B. Niles, November 6, 1870, for six thousand dollars; (6) one to the Union Ferry Co., October 1, 1870, for twenty thousand dollars; and that on the 31st of December, 1870 (being the day of the above recited transfer of real estate by Dole, in the name of De La Croix, to the Weehawken Ferry Co., amounting in the aggregate to four hundred thousand dollars), the said Ferry Co., by its president, Dole, executed a mortgage upon the real estate so conveyed to the defendant, Delos E. Culver, as trustee, to secure the payment of seven hundred bonds of said Ferry Co., of the par value of one thousand dollars each, making the aggregate of seven hundred thousand dollars, the transaction being a part of the fraudulent scheme of said Dole and De La Croix to cover up said property, and to secrete it from the creditors of Dole, and the said bonds being the consideration for the real estate transferred to said company by De La Croix as aforesaid, and for the debt of one hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars which the company owed to Dole in 1864.

The bill further charges that the capital stock of the Weehawken Ferry Co. was divided into 20,000 shares, of the par value of fifty dollars per share; that Dole, at the time of his failure in 1864, owned nearly all of said said capital stock, to wit, 18,640 shares, which he then reported to be worthless, and transferred, without consideration, to De La Croix; that on the real estate conveyed as aforesaid by De La Croix were a number of dwelling-houses and extensive stone quarries, from which said Dole has since derived a large amount of money, and appropriated the same to his own benefit, using the name of De La Croix and of the Weehawken Ferry Co., of which he was president and chiefly owner, to conceal and cover up his interest in said property, and the profits derived from the rents and quarries aforesaid.

The complainant then avers "that he had no knowledge, information, belief, or suspicion of the fraudulent acts herein complained of, nor of any of them, nor of any of the acts, matters, and things relating in any manner to said property and the said transfers thereof until on and after the 14th day of June, 1872, when all the said fraudulent acts and deeds were communicated to him by one G. W. Lockwood, Jr., of the city of New York." After alleging that all of the property, real and personal, conveyed by Dole to De La Croix in March, April, and December, 1864, and August, 1865, or so much thereof as was retained by De La Croix when the petition in bankruptcy was filed on the 25th day of June, 1867, was held in secret trust for the use and benefit of Dole, the complainant charges that the said property, and all the rents, issues, and profits vested in him as the assignee of Dole, by virtue of the assignment, and that he is entitled to the same and to the proceeds of the sale thereof, in the hands of Dole, De La Croix, the Weehawken Ferry Co., and Delos E. Culver, trustee, or either of them.

The prayer of the bill is, that all the transfers of property, real and personal, made by the bankrupt, Dole, to De La Croix, as aforesaid, and by the said De La Croix to the Weehawken Ferry Co., may be decreed fraudulent and void; that the several defendants may be required to account for the proceeds realized by them, or either of them, from any sale or other disposition of said property, and to assign all bonds, mortgages, stock, notes, or other securities held by them and resulting from said sales, that an injunction may issue restraining the defendants, or any of them, from pledging, selling, encumbering, or interfering with the said property in fraud of the rights of said assignee and creditors of the said bankrupt, and for the appointment of a receiver.

To this bill the defendant, Delos W. Culver, having been served with process, appeared by counsel and demurred, and assigned several causes of demurrer. From the view taken by the court of the case, it will be necessary to examine only one of these, to wit, the third: That by the second section of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March, 2, 1837, it is among other things in substance enacted, that no suit shall in any case be maintainable, at law or in equity, in any court whatsoever, by any assignee in bankruptcy, touching the property and rights of property of the bankrupt, transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless such suit shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued for such assignee, and it appears on the face of the record in this suit that such suit was brought after the expiration of two years from the time the cause of action accrued for such assignee.

We are thus called upon to construe the last clause of the second section of the bankrupt act, relating to the time in which suits may be brought by assignees, in regard to the property and rights of property of the bankrupt. That section, after conferring upon the circuit courts concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of all suits at law or in equity, which may be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by any such person against the assignee, touching any property or rights of property of the bankrupt, transferable to or vested in such assignee, then enacts, "But no suit at law or in equity shall in any case be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee, provided that nothing herein contained shall revive a right of action barred at the time such assignee is appointed." I am not aware that this clause has yet received judicial construction, although it has attracted the attention of several judges in a number of cases, as for instance of Judge Dillon in Martin v. Smith, [Case No. 9,164;] of Judge Treat, in Davis v. Anderson, [Id. 3,623;] of Judge Sharswood, in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Peiper v. Harmer, 5 N. B. R. 252; of Judge Blatchford, in Re Dole, [Case No. 3,965;] and of Judge Hill, in Friedlander v. Holleman, [Id. 5,081.]

erty "conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of the creditors;" and, by the provisions of that section, all such property is at once vested in the assignee by virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the deed of assignment. It is insisted by the counsel of the defendant that the cause of action accrued to the assignee contemporaneously with the acquisition of the title to the property in controversy, and that as it appears by the bill that such title vested on the 12th of October, 1867, the action should have been commenced within two years from that date. The counsel for the complainant, on the other hand, maintains that as he comes into a court of equity for relief on the ground of fraud, and alleges a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action by the defendant, he is entitled to apply to the case the long established equity rule, that statutes of limitation do not begin to run until the fraud has been, or by reasonable diligence may have been, discovered. We have, then, the question fairly presented, whether such equity rule is to be invoked in those cases where the statute in express terms is made to apply to courts of equity as well as to courts of law, and where no exceptions to the limitation have been incorporated into the act itself?

It is a question upon which the best judicial minds of England and the United States have differed, and in view of the state of the law, is full of difficulty in all of its aspects. In examining it, let it be observed that statutes of limitations have never been understood to apply to courts of equity, in respect to causes of equitable cognizance, for the reason, as was observed by Lord Macclesfield in the Hollingsworth Case, 1 P. Wms., 744, that "they speak nothing of bills in equity." Yet, those courts have always held that wherever the legislature has limited a period for law proceedings, equity will, in analogous cases, consider itself bound by the limitation. Suits for relief, on the ground of fraud, have always been regarded, however, as exceptions to this extent, that equity will not allow the statute of limitations to operate until discovery of the fraud, or the means afforded of the discovery; holding, that pending its concealment by one party there was no laches in regard to the other, or, in other words, that it would be unconscionable for courts of equity, that are only bound by the spirit of the statute, to permit the defendant by pleading it, in cases of fraudulent concealment, to take advantage of his own fraud.

Attempts were early made to engraft this exception upon the statute of limitations in its application to its actions at law, and to the plea of the statute in bar to allow a replication, that there had been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action by the defendant, and that suits had been commenced within, etc., the date of the discovery of the fraud. Thus, the supreme court of Massachusetts, in [First Massachusetts]

Turnpike Corp. v. Field, [3 Mass. 201,] held, in a suit at law, that a replication to a plea of the statute of limitations was good which disclosed a fraudulent concealment of the breach of the contract. Ch. J. Parsons, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, that where the delay in bringing the suit was owing to the fraud of the defendant, the cause of action against him ought not to be considered as having accrued until the plaintiff obtained the knowledge that he had a cause of action; and that if this knowledge was concealed from him by defendant fraudulently, the court would violate a sound principle of law if they permitted the defendant to avail himself of his own fraud. And that eminent judge, Mr. Justice Story, in Sherwood v. Sutton, [Case No. 12,782,] in an action on the case for a deceitful representation in a sale, to which the statute of limitations was pleaded in bar, sustained the replication of the plaintiff, that there had been a fraudulent concealment of the deceit by the defendant, until within six years before the suit was commenced. His opinion in the case exhibits, of course, much learning and research, but he is careful to state at the outset: "As a consideration of no inconsiderable weight, that as there was no state court in the judicial establishment of New Hampshire (the district in which the action was pending) which possessed general equity powers, the remedy (i. e., the suspension of the statute until the discovery of the fraud,) if it was to be administered at all, must be administered in such cases through the instrumentality of the courts of law." He further conceded that, as the statute of limitations in New Hampshire was in substance a transcript of the statute of 21 Jac. 1, so far as it respected personal actions of that nature, and as it contained like exceptions in favor of infants, feme-coverts, etc., but none as to actions founded in fraud, where the fraud had been concealed during the period of limitation, the legal propriety of creating such an exception would depend upon the same principles here as it would in the courts of Westminster Hall. He then examined how such a plea had been treated at law in the English courts, and came to the conclusion that there was enough in the dicta of several judges, commencing with Lord Mansfield, in Bree v. Holbech, 2 Dougl. 655, to warrant the inference, that the law courts of that country would not hesitate to postpone the operation of the statute in case of the fraudulent concealment of the cause of action.

To the same effect was the intimation of Mr. Justice Curtis, in Prichard v. Chandler, [Case No. 11,436,] which was a case under the somewhat analogous statute of limitations in the bankrupt act of 1841, where it was in substance held, that if the bankrupt fraudulently concealed from the assignee the cause of action from the time when his title accrued, the two years' limitation did not begin to run.

But their attempts at judicial legislation were resisted in other states, and made little progress. The supreme court of Vermont, in Smith v. Bishop, 9 Vt. 110; of New York, in Troup v. Smith's Ex'rs, 20 Johns. 33; of Ohio, in Fee v. Fee, 10 Ohio, 469; and the court of appeals of Virginia, in Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511,—have all held, that at law, independent of any express provision, the statute of limitations begins to run from the time the cause of action first accrued, even where the defendant has fraudulently concealed it from the plaintiff.

The question came before the English court of exchequer in 1854, in the case of Imperial Gas Light & Coke Co. v. London Gas Light Co., 26 Eng. Law & Eq. 425, and the court held that to a plea of the statute of limitations, that the cause of action did not accrue in six years, it was no answer, that in consequence of the fraud of the defendant the plaintiff was prevented from discovering the cause before that time, and that he commenced his action within six years after he discovered it. The court assumed during the argument that the question was no longer open, and that the principle had been established by many cases, that the statute runs from the accruing and not from the discovery of the cause of action. C. B. Pollock, in delivering the opinion of the court, struck the keynote of the difficulty in allowing such a replication in proceedings at law, by observing: "The statute of limitations expressly points out certain cases in which it is not to run, that is, the cases of persons under certain species of incapacity, but it does not make any exception in favor of persons laboring under any other incapacity, and we cannot graft upon the statute the exception here sought to be engrafted on it, namely, where, by the fraud of the defendant, the plaintiff has been prevented from asserting his rights within the time prescribed by the statute." * * * "If we were to hold the legislature as having enacted, that the statute of limitations should not run, whenever the jury are satisfied that a fraud has been practiced to prevent its operation, it would not only give rise to much litigation, but to that which the law abhors—continual litigation: 'Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium.'"

The statute of limitations has been called the statute of peace, but if the construction here contended for by the plaintiffs were to prevail whenever there was a case of hardship or suggestion of fraud, you would have an action brought, though the statute had expired, and have it urged that the matter was for the jury and not for the court. To which suggestion Alderson, B., added: "There would be no statute of limitations against a widow with six children." And such is obviously the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, so far as it can be gathered from the general principles announced in the cases where it has had the statute of limitations under consideration. Thus, in

McIver v. Ragan, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 25, an attempt was made to incorporate into the statute an exception which the legislature had not expressed. The case was briefly this: An ejectment was brought for a large tract of land in North Carolina. The defendant claimed under a junior patent and an adverse possession of seven years, which, by the statute of limitations of the state, was a bar if the possession was under color of title. The plaintiff offered to show that no course or corner of the grant under which he claimed was marked; that the land in dispute was within the Cherokee Indian boundary, and was not ceded to the United States until 1806; that the action was commenced within seven years of that date, and that while the land was a part of the Indian Territory he was prohibited by the laws of the United States from entering thereon for surveying or marking the same. Ch. J. Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, and upon the claim that the statute ought not to be allowed to run while the disability existed in regard to surveying and marking the land, observed: "Whenever the situation of a party was such as in the opinion of the legislature to furnish a motive for excepting him from the operation of the law, the legislature has made the exception. It would be going far for this court to add to those exceptions. * * * If this difficulty be produced by the legislative power, the same power might provide a remedy; but courts cannot on that account insert in the statute of limitations an exception which the statute does not contain." The above case was referred to and quoted with approbation, by the same court in 1850, in Bank of State of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 529. Mr. Justice Catron, speaking for the whole court, observing: "The legislature having made no exception, the courts of justice can make none, as this would be legislating. * * * The rule is established beyond controversy."

The object of this review has been to indicate, first, that courts of equity, although they were not embraced within the statute of limitations, act in obedience to it, in cases where their jurisdiction is concurrent with courts of law; second, that they act by way of analogy only, where they apply it to equitable rights and titles not cognizable at law; and third, that they decline to recognize its obligations in cases of direct trust and secret fraud, not because they are above the law, but outside of it, and because the statute, not being addressed to or obligatory upon them, ought not to be applied in the exercise of an equitable discretion for the encouragement or protection of fraud. But if no discretion has been left to them by the legislature—if the statute has been prescribed for all courts, and in all suits in equity and at law—where is the authority in equity, any more than at law, to incorporate within it an exception which the Congress, in its desire to afford facilities for the speedy settlement of bankrupt estates, did not see proper to put in? And if any hardship should result, in particular cases, because of such omission, is not the remedy to be found in the legislature rather than in the courts?

Although my attention has not been directed to any judicial construction of the clause in question, there are several cases in which learned judges have incidentally suggested, that where the statute of limitations has in express terms been made applicable to all courts, no court ought to add an exception which the legislature has not expressed. Thus in U. S. v. Malliard, [Case No. 15,709,] a suit was brought by the government to recover the value of certain merchandise, on the ground that such value became forfeited by reason of the violation of the 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799. The defendants pleaded that the cause of action did not accrue within five years next before the bringing of the suit. To this the plaintiffs replied, that the acts set forth in that respect in the declaration, were fraudulently concealed by the defendants from the plaintiffs, until within five years before the suit, so that they could not until within that period elect whether to claim for forfeiture of the goods or of their value, or bring an action for such acts. To this replication the defendants demurred, and Judge Blatchford sustained the demurrer, saying, "It is well settled, that however strong the reason may be, a court cannot engraft on a statute of limitations an exception which the statute itself does not make * * * so, also, the clear weight of authority, at least in the state of New York, is, that where the statute does not make a fraudulent concealment of the existence of the cause of action an exception to the running of the statute, the court has no right or power to make such exception, either directly, or by the indirect method of saying that the cause of action does not accrue in case of a fraudulent concealment, until the discovery of the fraud. It is true that Mr. Justice Story, in Sherwood v. Sutton, [Case No. 12,782,] dissents from the decision in 20 Johns., (Troup v. Smith's Ex'rs); but I cannot but regard the making by the court of an exception, in a case of fraudulent concealment, when the statute does not make it, as violating the rule settled by the supreme court, as before stated."

Freelander v. Holleman, [Case No. 5,081,] was a suit brought by creditors of a bankrupt, making the assignee a party-defendant to set aside certain conveyances of the bankrupt as fraudulent and void. The court treated the case as if the assignee was a co-complainant, in order to consider the question presented, to wit: whether the limitation to bringing such suit in the second section of the bankrupt act, should be applied to the case. Judge Hill dismissed the bill, because it was not filed within two years after the title of the property in dispute had vested in the assignee by the deed of assignment, saying, "This act, unlike the state statute, makes no exception in favor of married women, infants, absence, or for concealment of the cause of action; and thus congress, having complete power over the whole subject, had the right to provide, and such provision is in accordance with the policy of the law, and is a rule which it is the duty of this and all other courts to apply when a case is presented to which it is applicable."

Martin v. Smith, [Case No. 9,164,] was an appeal from the district court to the circuit court of the United States, in Missouri, in a suit where a bill had been filed by an assignee in bankruptcy to recover property alleged to belong to the bankrupt estate. The case was made to turn upon the statute of the state of Missouri, which provides that "actions for relief on the ground of fraud must be brought within five years after the cause of action accrued; but the cause of action shall be deemed not to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party, at any time within ten years, of the facts constituting the fraud." It became necessary for Judge Dillon to construe this clause, and in doing so he observed: "If the provision had been merely that, 'actions for relief on the ground of fraud should be commenced within five years after the cause of action accrued,' it is extremely probable that the courts would have been obliged to have held that the statute would begin to run from the period when the fraud was consummated; and not as, under the well-known equity rule, from the period when the fraud was or should have been discovered. To remove all doubt on the point, and to preserve the equity doctrine on the subject, the legislature added the words: 'The cause of action in such case shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery * * * of the facts constituting the fraud.'"

If congress had been desirous of preserving the equity doctrine on this subject, in the bankrupt act, would not some such clause have been equally necessary?

But whilst I am strongly inclined to hold that the demurrer must be sustained on this ground, it is not necessary so to do. There is another ground on which, in my judgment, the demurrer is fatal to the bill as filed. It must be remembered that where courts of equity postpone the operation of the statute of limitations in cases of concealed fraud, the postponement is not until the discovery of the fraud, but until the period of time when, with due diligence, he might have discovered it.

The bill discloses these facts: The assignee was appointed in 1867. All the property and the rights of property of the bankrupt, including all that he had conveyed in fraud of his creditors, then vested in the assignee. It was his duty at once to devote his time to the collecting in the assets of the estate, in order to their distribution amongst the creditors. His attention was not to be confined to the property included in the schedules, but it was especially his duty to ascertain by what tenure this voluntary bankrupt retained the possession of a large amount of valuable real estate which he had not put in the schedules, or surrendered to the assignee. The bill alleges that the bankrupt reported no assets, but stated debts amounting to upwards of six hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It also alleges that he was then in the possession of property worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. After the recital of the conveyance by the bankrupt and wife to De La Croix, on August 11, 1865, of the real estate in controversy for the pretended consideration of two hundred and fourteen thousand dollars, it then avers "that no consideration was ever paid for said property by De La Croix, or for any part thereof; that Dole did not part with the possession, nor deliver the same or any part thereof, to De La Croix, but, on the contrary, resided on the property during the years 1864 and 1865, and has held, possessed, controlled, managed, and enjoyed the same and the proceeds thereof, collecting the rents and profits the same since said pretended sale as before, and has appropriated the said rents and profits, and the proceeds thereof, to his own use and benefit." Now, surely such a state of affairs should have put the assignee and creditors on inquiry. They had the whole effective machinery of the bankrupt law within their reach, to investigate, and sound to the bottom, every business transaction in which the bankrupt had been engaged for years before the adjudication. Was anything done or attempted by the assignee or the creditors until the filing of the present bill, June 12, 1874, nearly seven years after the cause of action had accrued to the assignee? If there was, he has not thought proper to disclose it in the bill. His only allegation on the subject is, that "he had no knowledge, information, belief, or suspicion of the fraudulent acts herein complained of, nor of any of them, nor of any of the acts, matters, and things relating to any of said property and the transfers thereof, until on and after June 14, 1872, when they were communicated to complainant by G. W. Lockwood, Jr., of the city of York."

But mere absence of knowledge is not a sufficient excuse for the delay, when the facts exist, which are notorious and which suggest inquiry to the assignee. Was any inquiry made? If so, it ought to have been stated; and if unsuccessful until so late a period, the reasons of the want of success should have been assigned. If courts can allow nearly seven years to elapse, after the appointment of an assignee, before he shall be required to take any steps to investigate alleged fraudulent transfers of property, or to ascertain why the bankrupt retains the possession and control of the bulk of his estate, after adjudication and without any excuse being assigned for such delay, except the naked statement that he did not know of the fraud until two years before the suit was brought, I can see no reason why seven times seven years may not be allowed to pass, and still a suit be maintainable upon the simple allegation of the want of knowledge. It is neither the province or prerogative of courts to repeal legislation by any such methods of construction.

The demurrer must be sustained, and the bill dismissed with costs. If, however, the assignee did in fact use diligence and did institute inquiries which the sagacity of the bankrupt baffled for five years, and if the omission to make any statement of this character was accidental and can be truthfully supplied by amendment to the bill, and if the complainant desires the opinion of the circuit or supreme court upon the first question on the demurrer, I shall be glad to allow him to amend and to have the case put in such a position that the judgment of this court may be reviewed, and if needs be corrected.

Case No. 374.

ANDREWS et al. v. ESSEX FIRE & MARINE INS. CO.

[3 Mason, 6.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1822.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — MARINE INSURANCE — REFORMING POLICY — EQUITY — MISCONDUCT OF MASTER.

1. A policy was underwritten, "1000 dollars on brig Union, and 4000 dollars on effects on board said brig from Salem to port or ports in the West Indies, one or more times for the purpose of selling her outward and procuring a return cargo, and at and from thence to her port of discharge in the United States." The memorandum for insurance contained this clause:—"The Union is bound to Kingston, Jamaica: if not allowed to sell there, will proceed to Cuba." At the time of the insurance, both parties supposed the port of Kingston open to American vessels under a proclamation of the governor; and neither contemplated any illicit trade. The Union went to Kingston, supposing the port was open, and was there seized and condemned for the illicit trade. Held, that the underwriters were not liable for the loss—that the omitted clause, if inserted in the policy, would not have altered the nature of the insurance, or liability of the underwriters.

[Cited in Dean v. Equitable Fire Ins. Co., Case No. 3,705.]

2. Held also, that a court of admiralty has jurisdiction over policies as maritime contracts; but not over contracts leading to policies;—that it cannot reform a policy by the antecedent contract;—that this part belongs to a court of equity.

3. Held also, that the omitted clause was not in the contemplation of both parties a part of the contract to be inserted in the policy; but was a representation of a fact.

4. Quære—If a loss by a peril insured against, occasioned by the misconduct of the master be a loss, for which underwriters are liable.

[7. Cited in Taylor v. Brigham, Case No. 13,781, to the point that the owners are liable for the willful and malicious acts of the master, done in the course and scope of his employment.]

In admiralty. This was a libel [by John H. Andrews and another against the Essex Fire & Marine Insurance Company] on a policy of insurance, underwritten by the respondents for the plaintiffs, on the 12th of January, 1819, as follows, viz. "the sum of 1000 dollars on the brig Union and appurtenances; also, 4000 dollars on effects on board said brig, from Salem to port or ports in the West Indies, one or more times, for the purpose of selling her outward and procuring a return cargo, and at and from thence to her port of discharge in the United States." The libel charges that a clause in the agreement on which the policy was underwritten, was omitted by mistake, and declares upon the policy as reformed. A total loss is alleged of vessel and cargo in the course of the voyage, by capture and seizure under the authority of the king of Great Britain and Ireland. The facts of the case were, that the plaintiffs, being owners of the Union and her cargo, were about to send her on a voyage to the island of Cuba, and on the 12th of January, 1819, when she was ready to sail on the voyage, a paragraph appeared in the newspapers, stating that a committee of the legislature of Jamaica had reported that the November storm had destroyed the principal articles for the labouring classes in the western parishes, and recommended that the governor be requested to open the ports of the island to all nations for the importation of those articles of provisions required to support the population generally, and in return, to allow payment in produce or otherwise; but that they had not heard that the Duke of Manchester (the governor) had acted upon it. In consequence of this information (which was known to both parties), the plaintiffs altered their voyage, and made application in the evening of the same day to the respondents for insurance by the following memorandum. "$3000 on brig Union and appurtenances, $8000 on effects on board said brig, Allen Putnam master, from Salem to port or ports in the West Indies, one or more times, for the purpose of selling outward and procuring a return cargo, and at and from thence to port of discharge in the United States; and what return if said vessel trades to but one port and arrives safe without loss? The Union is bound to Kingston, Jamaica; if not allowed to sell there, will proceed to Cuba." There were afterwards added the words, "2 years old, sheathed last voyage, 129 tons." The memorandum was laid before the president and directors on the same evening, who agreed to underwrite a policy for four per cent. Before the proposition was accepted by the plaintiffs, Mr. Shepherd came to the office, and informed the secretary, that he wished insurance only for $1000 on the vessel, and $4000 on the cargo, because he expected to get it for a less premium elsewhere; and the secretary then wrote upon the memorandum, "agreed for $1000 on vessel, and $4000 on effects as above," which Mr. Shepherd signed for himself and Mr. Andrews. The act of the secretary was confirmed by the president, and the policy was made out in the terms already stated, omitting the clause:—"The Union is bound to Kingston, Jamaica—if not allowed to trade there will proceed to Cuba." The policy as made out, was received by the plaintiffs without objection, and the usual premium note was given. By the public by-laws of the corporation "the president and directors consider themselves holden on a marine policy, from the time a verbal agreement is made between the president and the person applying for insurance. The president in all cases, where the person applying for insurance is unable to wait for the completion of his papers, will cause a memorandum of the agreement to be made and signed by the person applying for insurance." The brig sailed on the voyage, and having spoken with a pilot near Morant Point (Jamaica), who, upon inquiry, stated that the trade was open for Americans, the master concluded to go directly into the port of Kingston. Soon after his arrival in port, a boat came alongside, from which he learned that the port was not open, and that it was necessary for him to represent that he came into port in distress. He accordingly did this; but the vessel and cargo were immediately afterwards seized, and the master still insisting, upon the trial in the vice-admiralty court, that the case was one of real distress, there was a decree of condemnation pronounced of both. From this decree there was an appeal to the high court of admiralty, which is still pending. It was agreed on both sides that there was no intention of illicit trade by the owners on this voyage, but that it was undertaken solely upon the expectation that the trade was or would be, on arrival at Jamaica, open and free. It was farther in evidence that the present respondents never underwrote any risks upon voyages in illicit trade, and that this was the general custom of incorporated insurance offices. The plaintiffs contended, that they were entitled to answer for a total loss under all the circumstances of the case, the loss having been by a risk contemplated by the policy. They insisted in the first place, that the clause of the memorandum, to which reference has been made, was omitted by mistake, and constituted a part of the contract of insurance, and that they were entitled to have the policy reformed by the court so as to include that clause; and that if so reformed, the risk would be clearly covered by the policy. They insisted in the next place, that even without such reformation of the policy, the legal result was the same; and that the nature of the voyage being made known to the underwriters at the time of the policy, they were bound to the same extent, as if it were expressly stated upon the face of the policy.

On the other hand the underwriters explicitly denied all these positions; and contended that the loss was a loss by illicit trade, which neither in law, was insured, nor contemplated, in fact, by the parties to be insured. And farther, that if this ground should fail, the loss was occasioned by the fault and gross misconduct of the master in setting up a false and fraudulent pretence of distress, as the cause of going into the port of Kingston.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There cannot at the present day be any serious doubt that a court of equity has authority to reform a contract, where there has been an omission of a material stipulation by mistake. And a policy of insurance is just as much within the reach of the principle, as any other written contract. Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 419; Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 1 Ves. Sr. 317; Townshend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. 328, 333; Motteux v. Governor of London Assur. Co., 1 Atk. 545; Ramsbottom v. Gosden, 1 Ves. & B. 165; Watt v. Grove, 2 Sch. & L. 492; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 8, § 4, and notes; Hogan v. Delaware Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,582;] Condy's Marsh. Ins. 345a, note; Lyman v. United Ins. Co., 2 Johns. Ch. 630. But a court of equity ought to be extremely cautious in the exercise of such an authority, seeing that it trenches upon one of the most salutary rules of evidence, that parol evidence ought not to be admitted to vary a written instrument. It ought, therefore, in all cases to withhold its aid, where the mistake is not made out by the clearest evidence according to the understanding of both parties, and upon testimony entirely exact and satisfactory. There is less danger where the instrument is to be reformed by reference to a preliminary written contract, which it was designed to execute. But even here there is abundant room for caution, since the parties may have varied their intentions or the clause may not have been originally understood by either party to go to the extent now required. And these considerations acquire additional force, where circumstances have occurred in the intermediate time, which give an intense importance to the asserted mistake. Under these limitations the doctrine of courts of equity on this subject does not seem at variance with general convenience or justice.

In the present case the memorandum signed by the plaintiffs after it was agreed to by the president of the company, constituted a good and valid agreement binding upon the parties. The by laws of the company make it in such a case expressly obligatory upon them. And if there be an omission in the policy of any clause constituting a part of that agreement, it ought in equity and good conscience to be corrected. It is not sufficient for the underwriters, that they suppose the words do not cover a particular risk, for they may mistake the law, and their mistake shall not prejudice the other party. When once the contract is agreed to, whatever that contract, by a just and reasonable interpretation, includes, the underwriters are bound to insert in the policy, and if they omit to do it the assured has a right to insist upon a perfect conformity to the original proposition and agreement. The case under such circumstances is clearly distinguishable from the cases referred to at the bar [Lyman v. United Ins. Co.,] 2 Johns. Ch. 630; [Vandervoort v. Smith,] 2 Caines, 155, where the proposals for insurance never assumed any obligatory shape, and could therefore be considered in no other light, than as proposals, which were merged on the execution of the formal instrument. Here the proposal was agreed to and formed the basis for the execution of the policy; and there is no pretence to say that it was ever afterwards varied by the parties. The true question then is, whether the omitted clause in the contemplation of both the parties was to be inserted in the policy. I say both the parties, because it must be a joint intent and assent. It is not sufficient that one of the parties intended it, if it was not agreed to by the other. If the clause was to be inserted in the policy, then it is no answer on the part of the underwriters, that they may possibly be liable for the risk of illicit trade against the known general usage and designs of the corporation. They must take the legal consequences of all that stands in the text of their contract. And the opinions of the very respectable gentlemen, who have testified in this case, demonstrate that the general understanding of merchants is in perfect conformity to the principles of law on this subject. We must then resort in the first place to the memorandum itself to ascertain what was the contract to be executed. It is not pretended that every thing contained in the memorandum was to be inserted in the policy. It is perfectly notorious that proposals of this nature often contain remarks, representations, and queries for the information and guidance of the underwriters, which cannot by any reasonable construction be supposed proper for insertion in the policy. In many instances the insertion would be absurd, and in some might be repugnant to the obvious intent of the parties in their final act. This very memorandum illustrates the truth of these observations; for it contains particulars of inquiry and information, which neither party now supposes to belong to the policy. It is not sufficient therefore to show that a clause is in the memorandum, to justify its insertion in the policy, unless from its nature and object it clearly formed a part of the contract. A clause may in the event become material and decisive of a right if inserted, which may nevertheless, at the time of the proposal, not have been contemplated by either party as a part of the policy. It might make all the difference between a representation and a warranty, a difference in many cases of the most serious importance.

The memorandum in the present case contains a perfect description of the ship, the master, and the voyage intended to be insured; and the policy follows this description with the most minute care. It was drawn up according to the understanding of the insurance company as a full description of the risk; and it was received without objection by the plaintiffs. No application was made to alter it, until after the loss occurred, and then the materiality of the clause now in question became apparent. It is argued that being material, the plaintiffs are now entitled to have it inserted, because the parties must be presumed to have contemplated the insertion of every thing material to the risk. That is true in a limited sense; but not universally. If the clause be material in the event, it must still be seen whether in fact it constituted, in the understanding of the parties, a part of the original contract. If there had been an omission of a descriptive part of the voyage, or of the name of one of the owners, it would have been perfectly clear that these must have been constituted a necessary part of the policy upon the true import of the memorandum, and therefore the presumption of mistake would be irresistible. But if the clause be a mere statement of a fact, which in its place in the memorandum may be either construed a mere representation, or a modification of the terms of the contract, it stands equivocal, and the like presumption cannot prevail.

The underwriters may, as in the present case, understand it in one sense and the insured in another; and it is the presumed assent of both which gives it the effect of a contract. The acts of the parties under such circumstances become very material; and their acquiescence in one mode of execution of the policy would go far to show that it was the true mode. The clause in the memorandum is in these words: "The Union is bound to Kingston, Jamaica; if not allowed to sell there, will proceed to Cuba." It is certainly in terms a representation of a fact. Is it such a fact as belonged to the policy? That the clause was not intended to abridge the general liberty given in the description of the voyage is conceded on all sides. The brig was still to be at liberty to go to any other port or ports in the West Indies, otherwise the general description would be useless. It would be absurd to ask or give general liberty to all West India ports, and in the same breath to tie up the adventure to Kingston and Cuba. Was it designed as a warranty that the brig should go to those ports? This can scarcely now be contended, for the underwriters did not claim its insertion in this view; and the owners by reserving the general liberty of the West Indies may fairly be presumed to have reserved the liberty of changing honestly the direct voyage. Can it then be considered in any other view than as a representation of the present intention of the owners, to guard against any objection for concealment or misrepresentation? The plaintiffs contend that its insertion was necessary and intended by them because it would cover the risk of the contingency of the voyage to Jamaica being lawful. The defendants deny that they ever contemplated such a risk under the contract. The burthen of proof then rests on the plaintiffs; and if the language of the memorandum be not unambiguous, if the construction be not necessary, but doubtful; if the acts of the parties have left the presumption against the plaintiffs, a court of equity ought to be very slow in undertaking to reform the policy upon conjecture.

It is material here to consider that the answer of the company explicitly denies any intention to insert the clause, or to become liable for the risk of illicit trade. The latter might be true, and yet if they had in fact bound themselves to such a risk, their mistake of the law would not help them. But the circumstance of the denial is not insignificant, as it stands confirmed by their acts. If their practice is not to insure illicit voyages, and the policy conforms to this practice, it would require strong evidence to force upon them such a risk by a construction of a memorandum clause, which justly might admit of various interpretations, and might fairly be understood in different ways. The premium in a case of this nature is certainly not decisive either way; but if it be the usual premium for the common risks, it affords some presumption that the underwriters did not contemplate unusual risks; and in this view it may aid in the construction of doubtful words.

The rule of courts of equity is not to reform a policy, unless the mistake be made out by the clearest evidence. The cases of Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 1 Ves. Sr. 317, before Lord Hardwicke; of Lyman v. United Ins. Co., 2 Johns. Ch. 630, before Mr. Chancellor Kent; of Hogan v. Delaware Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,532,] Condy's Marsh. Ins. 345a, note, Whart. Dig. 320, before Mr. Justice Washington; and of Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 419, 442, before the supreme court of the United States,—are conclusive upon this point. The asserted omission in the present case is indeed incontestable upon the evidence; but whether it was a part of the contract omitted by mistake is, to say the least of it, extremely questionable. I do not mean to say that the plaintiffs did not act with the most perfect fairness, or did not contemplate an indemnity against the very loss, which has occurred. I believe they did; and that whatever security was to be obtained by a policy conforming to the substance of the memorandum they meant to provide for. The difficulty lies not in the honesty or reasonableness of their intentions, but in giving effect to those intentions, if they were not communicated in such a manner to the underwriters, in the memorandum, as to lead them to the conclusion, that the omitted clause was a part of the proposed contract. Whatever might be my opinion as a private man upon the propriety of inserting the clause, as a judge sitting in equity I should have extreme difficulty in saying that the case afforded plenary evidence of any mistake which the court was called upon to rectify. The terms of the memorandum are not necessarily matters of contract, and if they are ambiguous in their import or object, the parties must be left to their rights upon the policy as executed. Perhaps it is the less necessary to dwell on this point, because I am of opinion that if there be a mistake in the policy, this is not the tribunal to correct it. The authority over this subject is generally confided, and most conveniently, to courts of equity. The rules of evidence and the modes of relief in these courts are admirably adapted to cases of this nature; and it appears to me that the jurisdiction exclusively attaches these. To be sure in a certain sense, and in the exercise of their general jurisdiction, courts of admiralty may be properly said to be courts of equity, that is, courts proceeding ex aequo et bono, and not confined to the narrow notions of the common law. But courts of admiralty may be properly said to administer relief as courts of equity. They cannot entertain an original bill or libel for specific performance, or to correct a mistake, or to grant relief against a fraud, though they may perhaps sometimes, like courts of law, perform what may be deemed analogous functions. They may give the same benefit, as if there were no fraud or mistake, or omission of performance; but this can be in a few cases only, which fall, in all their circumstances, completely within their general jurisdiction. Courts of admiralty, in my view, have jurisdiction over maritime contracts when executed, but not over contracts leading to the execution of maritime contracts. If there were a contract to build a ship, or to sign a shipping paper, or to execute a bottomry bond, and the party refused to perform it, it has never been my impression that the enforcement of such a contract belonged to the admiralty. I know of no authority pointing to such a conclusion, and I must say I should be sorry to find one; for it would lead to the utter confusion of jurisdictions. But if the contract be an executed maritime contract, the jurisdiction attaches; and the admiralty may then administer relief upon that contract according to equity and good conscience. The law looks to the proximate and not to the remote cause as the source of jurisdiction; and deals with it only when it has assumed its final shape as a maritime contract. It has been said that the memorandum in the present case is an executed maritime contract, equivalent to a policy; but I understand it to be nothing more than an agreement for a policy; and if no policy had been executed this case as a court of admiralty would not have had jurisdiction to enforce it. We are not at liberty in such cases to consider that done which ought to have been done.

If therefore any thing in point of law, material to the plaintiffs' case, depends upon this clause, and a mistake has occurred in omitting it, my judgment is that a court of admiralty is incapable of administering the proper relief. The remedy lies at common law, for damages for nonperformance of the original agreement, or in equity, for a specific performance by reforming the policy. In the present suit I can only deal with the policy, as it stands. And this leads me to the other question made at the bar, which has always appeared to me to be the turning point of the cause, and to be in itself of very great difficulty and nicety. If in the investigation of it I could derive any consolation from full and learned arguments, I should be bound to make the acknowledgement, that nothing has been omitted. Still I cannot say, that I have arrived at a conclusion without very considerable hesitation.

It is perfectly settled that the underwriters, by the general terms of the policy, are not liable for any loss arising from foreign illicit trade, unless the policy be underwritten with the full knowledge on their part that such was the object of the voyage. This is the general doctrine of foreign maritime writers, and has been recognized in the fullest manner by the common law tribunals. 2 Valin, lib. 3, tit. 6, art. 49, pp. 127, 128, 130;

Gloss. 5, p. 23; Loccenius, lib. 2, c. 5, note 7, p. 981; Roccus, Anec. note 21; 1 Emerig. c. 8, § 5, p. 212; Targa, c. 71; Molloy, bk. 2, c. 7, § 15, p. 288; Marsh, Ins. bk. 1, c. 3, § 1, p. 60; Anon., 2 Vern. 176; Planche v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 251; Gardiner v. Smith, 1 Johns. Cas. 141; Richardson v. Maine Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 102; Parker v. Jones, 13 Mass. 173; Pollock v. Babcock, 6 Mass. 234. The reason of the doctrine is obvious. If the voyage be lawful, the underwriters cannot be presumed to undertake risks occasioned by a violation of law by the owner or his agents; and in such case the law, notwithstanding the general terms of the policy, will exempt them from such losses. But if the trade is known to be illicit, and can be carried on only by smuggling, and the underwriters do not make an exception of the risk of illicit trade, there is the strongest presumption of their intention to take it. Their knowledge does not indeed add new terms to the policy; but it takes away any pretence for saying that the loss by seizure, which is, an "arrest, restraint, or detainment of the sovereign" within the policy, was not contemplated by the parties. In the present case it is clear that no illicit trade was intended to be covered by the policy, for the trade was not supposed to be prohibited at the time. It is true that it was well known that Jamaica, as a colony of Great Britain, was restricted from foreign trade by the British colonial system. But it was as well known that authority had been given to the king to open the colonial ports under certain circumstances. The Adams, Edw. Adm. 289, 303; 46 Geo. III. c. 3; The Vixen, 1 Dod. 136. And this authority was supposed still in existence and might be exercised and promulgated through the colonial governor. The intelligence in newspapers without doubt led both parties to the belief, that this authority had then been, or would, before the arrival of the vessel, be rightfully exercised; and both parties proceeded in the insurance upon the ground that the trade would be lawful. In point of fact the port was not opened, and immediately upon the brig's arrival in port, she was seized and condemned for an illegal importation of goods, contrary to the navigation acts of Great Britain. These acts make it illegal to import any goods into any of the colonies except in ships, British built, and owned and navigated by British seamen to the extent of three-fourths of the crew. 12 Car. II. c. 18; 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 22. The libel against the Union and cargo proceeds upon these acts for the forfeiture. And it is perfectly clear by the whole current of authority that a voluntary arrival in port with a cargo constitutes an importation, within the purview of these and other revenue acts. The Eleanor, Edw. Adm. 135, 160; The Adams, Edw. Adm. 289, 298; The Sarah,

1 Dods. 77; Hale, Cust.; Harg. Law Tracts, 213; The Paisley, 1 Edw. Adm. Append. E. 18.

There can then be no doubt that the arrival at Jamaica being voluntary, and not from necessity or stress of weather, brought the case within the prohibitions of these laws; and that consequently the condemnation might be rightfully made upon this general ground, although the mistake of the master as to the trade being lawful, was the sole cause of his going into port. The question then is narrowed down to this consideration, whether the knowledge of the underwriters of the destination to Jamaica, under the circumstances, makes them liable for a loss by illicit trade, occasioned by mistake and ignorance and against the intentions of the owners. If the trade to Jamaica was prohibited universally, and this fact was understood by the underwriters, they would have been held to the risk of illicit trade. If the trade had been previously open, and was closed during the voyage, they might have been exonerated from that risk. The trade was not open at the time, but the parties contemplated that it would be during the voyage; and then comes the point, whether the underwriters took upon themselves the chance of its being open, and of course the risk of its being illicit.

It cannot be denied that the general words of the policy coupled with the knowledge of the actual destination fully authorized the voyage to Jamaica; as fully, indeed, in my judgment, as if the words had been inserted in the policy. And the case is put in the strongest manner, when it is asked what would be the effect, if the policy had been for a voyage in terms to Jamaica. I do not know, that this would relieve us from a single difficulty, for the same question would still recur, whether under the circumstances it covered the risk of an illicit entry into the ports of that island.

There is not a single case where the underwriters have been held responsible for losses of this nature, unless they have in express terms, or by fair implication, assumed it. If the present policy had contained an express exception of losses by illicit trade, a condemnation for proceeding to Jamaica, although there had been no actual trading there, would have been within the exception. The case of Church v. Hubbard, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 187, 232, is an authority directly in point; and that has been followed in the supreme court of Massachusetts. Higginson v. Pomeroy, 11 Mass. 104. See, also, Smith v. Delaware Ins. Co., 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 434. So that where the risk of illicit trade is not designed to be taken, the presumption is that the risk of proceeding to the port for this purpose is not taken. Is there any difference between a risk excluded by express words and a risk excluded by fair implication? If the underwriters are not presumed to take the risk of illicit trade, are they to be presumed from the same facts to take the risk of an illegal arrival or importation?

It is argued that the underwriters having insured the voyage to Jamaica must be presumed to warrant a right of entry into the port at least for the purpose of inquiry. That if they authorize the going to the port, they warrant by implication that the voyage to the port is lawful and thus assume the risk of seizure on this account. If this were so, the argument would be exceedingly strong in favour of the plaintiffs. But the authorities do not seem to speak pointedly to such a conclusion. The fair result of the cases in England and in Massachusetts is, that a denial of entry or an interdiction of commerce at the port of destination is not a risk within the common policy. Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 Bos. & P. 388; Ludbock v. Rowcroft, 5 Esp. 50; Parkin v. Tunno, 11 East, 22; Richardson v. Maine Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 102, 115. The decisions in New York do indeed maintain a different doctrine. See Suydam v. Marine Ins. Co., 1 Johns. 181; Schmidt v. United Ins. Co., Id. 249; Craig v. United Ins. Co., 6 Johns. 226. The supreme court of the United States has held that a restraint by blockade after the commencement of the voyage is a peril within the policy. Olivera v. Union Ins. Co., 3 Wheat. 183. And it was also decided, in conformity with the English cases, that the breaking up of the voyage for fear of capture, because the port of destination was shut, is not a peril within the policy. It was there said, "that the underwriter does not warrant that the vessel shall have a right to trade at the port of destination; but only that notwithstanding the perils insured against, the vessel shall proceed to such port." Smith v. Universal Ins. Co., 6 Wheat. 176. But this language was used in a case where the underwriters were expressly exempted from losses by illicit trade; so that it is in no degree different from that held in Suydam v. Marine Ins. Co., in New York. 1 Johns. 181. The precise point whether seizure for going into an interdicted port, which it is supposed might be open, is a risk within the common policy, does not appear to have arisen in England. In Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 Bos. & P. 388, Lord Alvanley admitted, that if the vessel had proceeded to Naples and had been actually seized, the loss might have been within the policy. Chief Justice Parsons, in Richardson v. Maine Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 102, 115, said, "If new regulations, made during the voyage, should render the trade illicit, and the master on his arrival should violate those regulations, and for that cause the property insured should be confiscated, the assurer will not be answerable, unless he had insured against seizure for illicit trade." This language may perhaps cover the case, where the master ignorantly violates the new regulations; but it does not seem addressed to a case, where there is a present interdiction and an expected opening of the port during the voyage, contemplated by both parties at the time of the insurance. In Pollock v. Babcock, Id. 235, the court decided that if a vessel be insured to an interdicted port, and be seized at an intermediate port (to which she had gone from necessity during the voyage,) on account of her destination, she not having in fact carried on, or attempted to carry on, an illicit trade, it is a loss within the common policy. The court seemed to consider that the going to the interdicted port was lawful, though it was unlawful to trade there. But it decided that if it was unlawful to go to the port, and that fact was unknown to both parties, still the insured was entitled to recover. It is somewhat singular that it was not decided whether, from the facts of the case, the underwriter did not take the risk of illicit trade by implication, for the report states that trade was generally known to be prohibited with the port. If they did take the risk, then the loss was clearly within the policy. If they did not, it is somewhat difficult to reconcile this case with others on the same subject. The case, so far as it goes, does seem to countenance the doctrine that on a voyage supposed to be lawful by the parties, but not in fact so, the underwriters are liable for a confiscation, for sailing on the voyage. In Parker v. Jones, 13 Mass. 173, both parties supposed the trade to be lawful to Curacao; but the property was condemned for a violation of the statute of 43 Geo. III. regulating that trade, and the court held the underwriters not liable for the loss, upon the ground that they had not taken the risk of illicit trade. Yet there it might have been said that as the vessel was insured to Curacao, there was an implied undertaking that the property insured might be carried there, and that the risk of its lawful importation was assumed by the underwriters.

Not being able to find the doctrine established that an insurance to a port includes, on the part of the underwriters, the risk of going into the port in violation of law, except where the risk of prohibited trade is assumed, I do not feel at liberty to incorporate it into the construction of the policy. The true principle seems to me to be this, that the policy guarantees an indemnity in going to the port against all losses by the perils insured against; and unless the peril of illicit entry at the port be contemplated as one of the risks insured against, the underwriters are not held. The risk of illicit entry is not presumed to be taken where the trade is not known to be prohibited and expected during the voyage to remain so. If both parties contemplate the trade as free, the policy covers only the ordinary risks. It is only when the trade is not expected to be carried on except by violation of the laws, that the underwriters are presumed to take that risk upon themselves. The chance of illicit trade is never assumed, unless it is clearly intended to be carried on.

It is asked, if the contingency of illicit trade was not contemplated in this case, what reason was there to insert the clause in the memorandum, that the brig was bound to Jamaica. My answer is, that it might be material information to the underwriters. They might wish to know the intended voyage; and if it were to an interdicted port, it might, even with the exception of prohibited trade, be a risk, which they might not choose to assume. But the same memorandum informed the underwriters that if the brig was not allowed to sell at Jamaica, she was to go to Cuba. This is a plain declaration, that the owners did not mean to force an illicit trade at Jamaica, or an illicit entry there. It was equivalent on their part to a notice, that the brig, though bound to a British colony, was intended to sail only on a lawful voyage, and that the insurance was to cover it as such. And if the owners had concealed the fact of a destination to Jamaica from the underwriters, as the general words of the policy would lead them to presume the voyage was to lawful ports only, it might have been questionable, if the concealment would not have avoided the policy. At all events, it would certainly have done so, if there would have been any increase of premium or risk. The owners in this respect conducted themselves with the most entire good faith and frankness.

What would have been the effect if the memorandum had only said, "The Union is bound to Kingston, Jamaica," I pretend not to decide. It is supposed in the argument, that it would then have clearly covered the risk of an illicit entry. But is this certain? If the parties contemplated only a lawful voyage, and the information led them to the belief, that such a voyage was lawful, could the underwriters be presumed to take the risk of its possible illegality? The law does not say that the underwriter takes the risk of illicit trade, where he by mistake supposes it lawful, but where the trade being known to be illicit, he cannot be presumed from the nature of the voyage to have had any other object in contemplation. Admitting even that the underwriters took the risk of the vessel's going to Jamaica to make inquiries, it is not shown that this was in point of law an illicit act. The very statute on which this condemnation was founded is for an illegal importation of goods, not for an inquiry before arrival in port. There is no British statute within my knowledge that makes it a cause of forfeiture to lie off a colonial port, or to make inquiries, if near the port, whether it be open or not. The statutes of Car. II. and Wm. III. apply only to importations consummated by a voluntary arrival in port. Unless therefore an arrival in port were necessary for the purpose of inquiry, which can scarcely be pretended, the vessel might have gone to, though not into the port of Kingston, and have been entirely protected by law. See The Sarah, 1 Dod. 79. The master himself proceeded upon this supposition. He made inquiries off the port, and was told that the port was open; and this information, given falsely by design or mistake, was the real cause of his going into port.

It is certainly true that both parties must have contemplated that the ports of Jamaica might not be open, for the memorandum provides in that case for a voyage to another island. But the effect of this is to show, not that the underwriters meant to take the risk of the voyage, being illicit, but that they meant to provide another voyage, if it should turn out to be illicit. They engage that the vessel may go to Jamaica, if allowed, if not, then she may go to Cuba. In a case of this peculiar cast I have searched the foreign jurists with a hope of meeting with some principles to illustrate it. But I cannot say that the search has resulted in anything satisfactory. Valin, after remarking, that illicit trade is not covered by a policy, where the underwriter is not informed of the risk at the time of the insurance, says, that his opinion is the same, in cases where the insured is himself ignorant that the trade is prohibited. 2 Valin, lib. 3, tit. 6, Assur. art. 49, pp. 127, 128.

Upon the whole my opinion is, after considerable hesitation, that the present policy, under all the circumstances of this case, did not cover the loss by the condemnation of the property for an illicit importation into Jamaica.

There is another point in the cause, upon which it may be thought necessary, after the full argument at the bar, that I should express an opinion. It is, that the loss was occasioned by the misconduct of the master in setting up a false pretence of distress, and that if the truth of the case had been stated, no condemnation could have been decreed. Whether in any case the underwriters are liable for a loss by any of the perils in the policy, the remote cause of which is the negligence and misconduct of the master and mariners not amounting to barratry, is a vexed question, upon which opposite opinions have been expressed by very distinguished courts. In England the point has recently received after a solemn discussion a decision in the affirmative. (Busk v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 2 Barn. & Ald. 73; Walker v. Maitland, 5 Barn. & Ald. 171; Mal. Law Merch. 111; Law v. Hollingsworth, 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 160; Park Ins. (6th Ed.) c. 3, p. 83; Carruthers v. Sydebotham, 4 Maule & S. 86; Marsh. Ins. c. 12, § 6. p. 519; Id. § 3, p. 494;) though it is not difficult to perceive, that the former opinions inclined the other way. In New York the point has been unequivocally settled in the negative, (Vos v. United Ins. Co., 2 Johns. Cas. 180; Grim v.

Phoenix Ins. Co., 13 Johns. 451;) and that appears to be the leading opinion also in Massachusetts. Cleveland v. Union Ins. Co., 8 Mass. 308, 320; Coffin v. Newburyport Marine Ins. Co., 9 Mass. 446. The foreign jurists generally concur in exempting the underwriters from losses by the fault of the master, unless that risk is expressly assumed. 2 Valin, lib. 3, tit. 6, Assur. art. 27, p. 79; Poth. Assur. note 64; 1 Emerigon, c. 12, § 17, p. 434; and see [Busk v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co.], 2 Barn. & Ald. 80, 81; Miller, Ins. 136, 138, etc.; Carevegis Dis. 142, notes 26, 27. In this diversity of doctrine I desire to suspend my own judgment, until the question is absolutely necessary to be decided. In the present case I am not satisfied that the loss was occasioned by the misconduct of the master. The libel and condemnation are for an illegal importation; and it is said, that if the arrival had been for the mere purpose of inquiry and had been so asserted. It would have been no breach of the statutes restricting the colonial trade. But it appears to me, that a voluntary importation of the goods, though under mistake or for the purpose of inquiry, is within the prohibitions of these statutes. The case of The Sarah, decided by Lord Stowell, (then Sir William Scott), is directly in point, (1 Dod. 79; The Vixen, Id. 136;) and no judge ever understood the colonial laws better or administered them with more lenity. I am therefore spared the necessity of looking at the more general question, since whatever may be the extent of the misconduct of the master, it is not shown to have been the efficient cause of this loss.

As however upon a principal point, the reformation of the policy, my opinion proceeds upon a defect of jurisdiction in the court, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to have that question litigated in another forum, and shall therefore decree that the libel be dismissed without prejudice to any other suit.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Nov., 1875.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — ACT OF 1875—TIME WHEN CAUSE MAY BE REMOVED.

By the provisions of section 3, Act 1875, [18 Stat. 470.] a cause pending when the act was passed may be removed to the federal from the state court, if "at or before the first term at which said cause could be first tried" after the passage of the act the petition and bond are filed. It was so held in a case where there had been a trial, and a new trial was granted before the act passed.

At law. On the 25th day of March, A. D. 1867, suit was brought by the plaintiffs [as executors of Andrews, deceased] against the defendants in the court of common pleas of Ohio, to recover the sum of $10,000 deposited with the defendants as indemnity for acceptance by them for the accommodation of the Steubenville and Indiana Railroad Company, and which the plaintiffs claim the defendants became liable to pay to them. Attachments were issued, and certain property was attached. On the 18th day of May, 1867, the defendants filed the motion to remove the cause into the circuit court of the United States. Upon the hearing of the motion it appeared that one of the plaintiffs was a citizen and resident of Illinois, and one a citizen and resident of Minnesota. The motion was overruled. Thereupon the parties made up the issues in said court of common pleas, and at the April term, 1873, a jury was waived and the case submitted to the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs were awarded a second trial, amendments were made to the pleadings, and the cause was, at the November term, 1874, tried before a jury, and a verdict had for the plaintiffs. At the same term the verdict was set aside, and the cause was continued till the January term, 1875. On the 25th of January the cause was continued. At the same term, on April 25, 1875, this order was set aside, and a petition was filed by the defendants praying for a removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States, under the provisions of the act of congress of March 3, 1875. Bond with good security was also filed. The grounds of removal were, that the defendants were citizens and residents of the state of Maryland, and that one of the plaintiffs was a resident of the state of Illinois, one a citizen and resident of Minnesota, and the other a citizen and resident of Ohio. The application was resisted on the ground that the case did not come within the provision of the act of March 3, 1875, because not filed with the court at or before the first term at which the cause could be tried, and before the trial thereof. On the hearing of this petition, the court, for the reason that the action was triable, and was actually tried in said court before the passage of the act of congress, overruled said motion. On the 12th day of May, 1874, the defendants filed in this court a transcript of the record and proceeding in said cause. On the 6th day of October, a motion was filed to strike the case from the docket for want of jurisdiction in this court.

Mr. Granger, of Muskingum county, and E. F. Hunter, for the motion.

A. G. Thurman, opposed.

SWING, District Judge. The disposition of this motion involves the construction of the second and third sections of the act of congress, passed March 3, 1875, [18 Stat. 470.] providing, etc. The second section of that act provides: "That any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any state court where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the constitution or law of the United States; * * * or, in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, etc., either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district. And when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs as defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district." The third section provides: "That whenever either party or any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section, shall desire to remove such suit from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, he or they may make and file a petition in such suit in such state court before or at the term at which said case could be tried, and before the trial thereof." The remaining part of the section refers to the bond and proceedings on removal.

It is not denied that the amount involved in this case, and the citizenship of the parties, were within the requirements of the second section. The amount was over $500. The controversy was between citizens of different states, and the suit was pending in a state court at the time of the passage of the act of congress, possessing every element to authorize its removal to the circuit court of the United States. The third section simply provided the time when and the mode in which the application shall be made for such removal, and the steps necessary to accomplish it. The mode is to be by petition to the state court, and the time is before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof. The facts found by the learned judge of the state court show that the petition was properly filed, and all the necessary steps taken in accordance with the provisions of the third section, and that the petition was filed before or at the term at which said cause could be tried after the passage of said act of congress. And if the term referred to be the term after the passage of the act, there can be no controversy in the case. The jurisdiction must be admitted. That congress had the power to authorize the removal of the cause in its then condition cannot be doubted. Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.]

214. Did they, by the terms and the spirit of this statute, so authorize its removal? The language of the statute is, any suit now pending; in other words, all suits now pending of the requisites may be removed, and the length of time which the suit had been pending, or the condition it was in if no final judgment had been rendered, could make no possible difference in the reason which operated upon congress to confer the jurisdiction, as is clearly shown in the reasoning of the court in the case of Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, [Id.] The term referred to is the term at which said cause—what cause? The cause referred to in the second section; to-wit: any cause pending at the passage of the act could be first tried after the passage of the act, and not the term, at which said cause could have been tried long before the passage of the act. The motion will, therefore, be overruled.

Case No. 376.

ANDREWS v. GRAVES.

[1 Dill. 108;¹ 4 N. B. R. 651.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1870.²

BANKRUPT ACT—PRACTICE—DEPOSITIONS—RIGHT OF ADVERSE PARTY TO USE, ETC.

1. Under a declaration upon the 35th section of the bankrupt act, alleging that the bankrupt did "transfer, assign, and convey," &c., to the defendant, the plaintiff is not limited on the trial to the proof of a technical assignment under the state insolvent laws.

2. A judgment will not be reversed because papers recognized on the trial in evidence were not formally read.

3. Under the circumstances stated in the opinion, it was held that district court did not err in allowing a deposition taken and filed by one party to be read in evidence by the other.

4. Dates fixed by the records of the court may be stated to the jury as facts.

5. The court will look at the entire charge to the jury, in order to ascertain whether the law was, upon the whole, fairly presented to them.

6. Construction of the 35th section of the bankrupt act; and the ingredients of a right of the assignee to recover thereunder, stated and commented on by Treat, District Judge.

In bankruptcy. Writ of error, to the district court for the western district. The action was brought by the assignee of Lawrence, against the defendant, under the 35th section of the bankrupt act. The plaintiff recovered, and the defendant sued out the writ of error, which now brings the cause before this court.

Glover & Shepley, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. Allen, for defendant in error.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

²[Affirming an unreported decree of the district court.]

TREAT, District Judge. Many of the errors assigned are dehors the record. This was an action, substantially, of trespass de bonis asportatis. The declaration avers that the bankrupt did on the (blank) day of October, 1869, "transfer, assign, and convey" (the statutory terms) to the defendant, &c.

The counsel below seems to have supposed the time material, and that the cause of action was limited to a technical assignment, as under the state statute, and consequently no evidence was admissible as to any other form of an alleged fraudulent transfer or conveyance, or as to any such transfer or conveyance at a different time from that stated in the declaration. The declaration is so framed as to cover any fraudulent transfer, assignment, or conveyance during the six months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. Hence all the errors assigned which are based on the incorrect hypothesis of counsel below as to the cause of action, disappear.

It is said there is no evidence that Andrews was adjudged bankrupt, or the plaintiff appointed assignee. The declaration avers these facts, and that the adjudication was made by the court which tried the case; and frequent reference is made at every stage of the case to the records of the court in the bankruptcy proceedings, showing that those records were produced and recognized as in evidence. No objection was made below that they were not formally read or offered in evidence; but all parties treated them as before the court and jury.

It appears that the defendant caused the deposition of Higgins to be taken on notice, before Register Lindenbower, and that at the time and place designated both parties appeared by counsel and examined, cross-examined, and re-examined the witnesses at great length; that said deposition was duly filed in the cause, and that defendant moved to strike the same from the files, on the grounds set out in the written motion therefor, and subsequently objected to the plaintiff's reading the deposition for reasons stated. The grounds thus stated are, except in one particular, dehors the record, and for aught known to this court, the motion and the objections were overruled, because it was apparent to the court that they had no foundation in fact. It does appear that the deposition was taken before the register at the instance of the defendant himself, and with the assent of the plaintiff, that after being duly certified was placed on file in the case. In Yeaton v. Fry, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 335, one of the errors assigned was that the plaintiff was permitted to read in evidence depositions informally taken by the defendant under a commission, and the supreme court held that there was no error committed, Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion. That case does not expressly determine all the points here presented, but it decides that, when depositions are not taken ex parte or de bene esse under the act of 1789, or both parties appear and examine and cross-examine, and the depositions are subsequently placed on file, the party at whose instance they were taken, cannot object to their being read by the opposite party on the ground of any irregularity or informality. Having taken a deposition under the circumstances named he cannot except thereto, nor cause the same to be suppressed. The officer before whom taken ought to cause the same to be transmitted to the court, for the benefit of all concerned, and once on file the defendant could not suppress or withdraw it. Although a register has no authority to take such a deposition, yet he has full authority to administer oaths; and when by the assent of parties he has taken such a deposition to be used as evidence in the cause, the same becomes a sworn statement made in the case to be used as evidence therein, to which the defendant causing the same to be taken cannot object. The irregularity was defendant's, to which the plaintiff might have excepted, not the defendant.

We do not understand the record to show that there was any objection to the use of the deposition on account of the incompetency of the officer before whom it was taken; nor does the objection seem to have been made that one party could not use the deposition taken by another, had it been properly certified, returned, and filed. But there having been an appearance before the officer by counsel of both parties, and a full examination and cross-examination of the witness, and no showing that the witness was present in court, and the course pursued being conformable to the usual practice in the state, we unite in holding that the court did not err in allowing the deposition to be read, without now deciding that one party has in all cases an absolute right to use depositions taken by his adversary.

As the records of the court before the judge fixed the precise date at which Andrews' petition in bankruptcy was filed, and were absolute verity, no error was committed in stating that date to the jury.

To determine whether there was error in charging the jury it is necessary to look to the whole charge, so as to ascertain whether one part thereof is not qualified by another, and thus the law fairly presented. The definition of insolvency in this case (the defendant being a merchant) was not only correct, but the allusion to another provision of that act, as illustrative of the reason of the rule, was unobjectionable.

All through the charge the court endeavored to enforce upon the jury that it was their exclusive province to weigh the testimony, and determine what it established. Their attention was called to the testimony bearing upon certain points to be ascertained, and the rules of law in reference thereto stated. If the charge were to be considered as to each sentence or point, dis severed from the other sentences or points in the complex problem, room might exist for sharp criticism as to successive details; but the question for review is whether the law governing the case was fairly and correctly stated, and not whether another and different mode of presenting them would not have been more satisfactory to one or the other of the parties litigant.

The law on which is based the plaintiff's right to recover, requires these facts to be proved:

1st. The vendor was insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency.

2d. The vendee had reasonable cause to believe such to be the condition of the vendor.

3d. The sale was made by the vendor with a view to contravene the provisions of the bankrupt act.

4th. The vendee had good reason to believe such to be the view or intent of the insolvent vendor in making the sale. Babitt v. Walbrun, [Case No. 694.]

Hence as to the vendor, it must be shown that he was insolvent, &c., and that he made the sale with the view named; and on the part of the vendee, that he had reasonable cause to believe the status of the vendor to be as charged, and his purpose or intent to be in making the sale a contravention of the act.

In ascertaining the alleged fact of insolvency, it was proper to charge the jury in such a way as to give them a clear view of the legal meaning of the term. That was done. Not only was a correct definition of insolvency given, as applicable to a merchant, but it was illustrated by reference to another provision of the act. That illustration, so far from being ground of error, was quite appropriate, in order that the jury might have a clear understanding of the general proposition stated. So it was proper to direct the attention of the jury to the distinction between "reasonable cause to believe" and "actual belief"—between willfully shutting the eyes against demonstrative facts and circumstances, and their obvious existence. In that respect the charge was more favorable to the defendant than a stricter statement of the rule might have justified.

The statute declares what shall be prima facie evidence of a fraudulent transfer, and when such a prima facie case is made out, and no explanatory evidence is offered, it is unnecessary for the court to enter upon minute or elaborate distinctions as to the force and effect thereof. The case should be treated in the light of the law as applicable to the testimony produced, and not with reference to supposed or imaginary states of proofs possible to be adduced in some other cause. The jury are to be instructed and not confused; and there is no need of going beyond the legal requirements of the case presented. In the light of the testimony, the court was called upon to define the rules of law applicable thereto, and did so without repeating each element of the problem as it passed to the next in logical order.

The testimony sufficiently established the insolvency of the vendor, and reasonable cause in the vendee to believe the vendor insolvent. It also showed that the sale was made out of the ordinary course of business, and consequently there was prima facie evidence of fraud—fraud on the part of the vendor, in which the defendant was directly participating. If the law declares a sale under given circumstances, prima facie evidence of fraud, it is prima facie evidence to all concerned—to the vendee as well as to the vendor. It is difficult to perceive how, when prima facie evidence of a fact is presented, a person has not reasonable cause to believe the fact to exist, or, in the language of the decision, “to be put upon inquiry.”

Dealing with the case as it thus stands, the court below brought with sufficient clearness to the minds of the jury the legal rules by which their action was to be governed, and guardedly stated that it was exclusively for them to give, even to the prima facie evidence, such weight as they might deem proper.

In referring to the testimony concerning the mortgage on the property of the bankrupt's wife, and the manner in which by the contrivance of the defendant and the bankrupt conjoined, that mortgage was paid off at the expense of the creditors, the court used the strong language with which the law characterizes such a transaction. Certainly there is no assignable error on that ground. If a father-in-law, when his son-in-law is known by him to be insolvent, and within a few days of his voluntary application to be adjudged a bankrupt, buys, out of the usual course of trade, a large, if not the largest portion of the insolvent's property, and gives notes payable at long dates, and then cashes the notes and pays to his own son as mortgagee the money thus furnished, in discharge of a mortgage on the property of his daughter, who is the wife of the bankrupt son-in-law, it is not improper to say the law frowns on such contrivances for using the bankrupt's means to the detriment of his honest creditors. That transaction obviously was the transfer of the bankrupt's property to his wife in fraud of his creditors, through the agency of the wife's father for the benefit of herself and of his son, the mortgagee.

The defect in the declaration was cured by the verdict under the statute of jeofails.

NOTE, [from original report.] In the circuit court for the eastern district of Arkansas, at the April term, 1871, (present, Dillon, Circuit Judge, and Caldwell, District Judge,) it was held, that where the plaintiff had taken ex parte a deposition de bene esse, and subsequently in like manner took the second deposition of the same witness upon the same subject, and read the last in evidence (which referred to the first), that the defendant might read to the jury the first deposition; and the case was distinguished from Sexton v. Brock, 15 Ark. 345, where this subject is fully considered, and the cases collected and reviewed by Mr. Chief Justice Watkins. See, also, Yeaton v. Fry, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 335.

Case No. 377.

ANDREWS et al. v. HYDE et al.

[3 Cliff. 516.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1872.²

MORTGAGES—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EQUITY—EVIDENCE—PLEADING.

1. Repeated decisions of the federal courts have established the rule that oral evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that a deed absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance was omitted from mutual confidence between the parties.

[See Amory v. Lawrence, Case No. 336; Howland v. Blake, Id. 6,792; Cadman v. Peter, 12 Fed. 363; Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332; Dow v. Chamberlin, Case No. 4,037; Bentley v. Phelps, Id. 1,331.]

2. The evidence to prove the agreement ought to be clear and satisfactory, as the rule is one of exceptional character in the law of evidence.

[See Cadman v. Peter, 12 Fed. 363.]

3. Where the evidence to prove the agreement, was that of only one of the parties, the other having deceased, and was uncorroborated by any word or act of the other, proof of friendly relations existing between the parties is not sufficient where the evidence is otherwise subject to doubt.

4. Where witnesses are not excluded on account of interest in the event of the suit, the rule still applies that their veracity or impartiality may be affected by such interest.

[See The Boston and Cargo, Case No. 1,673; The Helen R. Cooper and The R. L. Mabey, Id. 6,334.]

5. Something is due in such a case as this, to the denials of the answer to the effect that the conveyances were not made as security for any indebtedness.

6. Where the allegation of the bill is that certain real estate was conveyed to a deceased person as security for a debt, the complainant is not entitled to a decree upon the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness, and certainly not unless his statements are positive, and he appears to be without prejudice, bias, or interest adverse to the respondent.

[See Clark v. Van Riemsdyk, 9 Cranch, (13 U. S.) 153.]

In equity. The complainants were the assignees in bankruptcy of the estate of Horatio Woodman, and the respondents were the heirs at law and administrators of the estate of John A. Andrews, late of Boston, deceased. Briefly stated, the cause of action, as alleged, was as follows: That Woodman on the 17th of September, 1860, borrowed of John A. Andrews the sum of $6,000, for which he gave his notes, and as for security for the debt and notes he conveyed or caused to be conveyed to him by two deeds dated respectively September 17, 1860, and October 8, in the same year, certain real estate situated in the counties of Shelby and Franklin in the state of Iowa, as more fully described in the said deeds. Said deeds, as the complainants alleged, were executed as security for said indebtedness, and that the grantee agreed to hold the lands only as security as aforesaid, and that he would reconvey said real estate to said Woodman when he should pay the amount of the loan and interest. Based upon these allegations, the prayer of the bill was that the complainants might be permitted to redeem the said lands, and for an account. The principal deed in question was the one first described, which was acknowledged on the day of its date, and was recorded on the 26th of the same month in the proper registry of the county where the land is situated. It acknowledged the receipt of three thousand dollars, which the grantor told one of the witnesses was the full value of the land. When conveyed, the land was wild land, neither party occupying it. Service was made, and the respondents appeared, and filed an answer in which they denied that the land was conveyed as a security, and averred that the conveyance was absolute and not as security. Testimony was taken, and the district court entered a decree for the complainants, from which decree the respondents appealed to this court. [Decree reversed, and bill dismissed, with costs.]

Woodman testified that the deeds were never in the possession of the grantee, that they remained in his possession until the appointment of his assignees in bankruptcy, that the deeds were made as security for present and future loans, that at the date of the first deed he was owing the grantee $3,540.91, and that at the time of his death, October, 1867, he owed him $7,000.

H. D. Hyde, for appellees.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The testimony was full to the point that the deeds were given as security, and, if so, the complainants must be permitted to redeem, and they are entitled to an account as prayed in the bill, as repeated decisions of the federal courts have established the rule that oral evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance was omitted from mutual confidence between the parties. Wyman v. Babcock, [Case No. 18,113;] Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 299; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 139. Argument to support that rule of law is unnecessary, as it is well settled by authority, but the evidence to prove the agreement ought to be clear and satisfactory, as the rule is one of an exceptional character in the law of evidence. Unquestionably the issue in this case depends entirely upon the credit to be given to the party who made the conveyances, in a case where he is not corroborated by any act or word done or spoken by the other party.

Attempt is made to show that he is corroborated by certain circumstances in the case, but the circumstances relied upon are too remote or too slight, in the judgment of the court, to have any substantial weight in that regard. They are as follows: 1. That friendly relations had existed between the parties for many years; but it is difficult to see how that fact tends to show that it was agreed between them that a deed absolute on its face should be held merely as a security for money loaned, and that the grantor might redeem the same at any future period of time during his natural life. Woodman admits that he was buying and selling land-warrants and lands during that period, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that he would be as ready and willing to sell to a friend as to a stranger, especially as it appears that the lands in question cost him only about one dollar per acre. Having purchased the land cheaply, it is quite as probable that he might be willing to give his friend a good bargain for prompt payment, as that his friend should agree to allow him an indefinite and unlimited right of redemption in the lands. 2. That the grantee paid the taxes. The only evidence of that fact is found in his own testimony, and if credit is not given to the witness, the fact is not established. Payment of the taxes, if made by the grantor, could have easily been proved, but the fact, if established, would not amount to much, as persons holding Western lands frequently employ agents to pay their taxes. 3. That the grantee retained the possession of the original deeds. The fact as shown in evidence is, that the grantee did not have the deed first described. On the contrary, it was sent to the registry of deeds, where it remained for a long time. True, he states in his deposition that the deeds were returned to him as soon as they were recorded, and that they were retained by him, and remained in his possession until the appointment of his assignees, but it appears from the deposition of Augustine Jones, that Woodman, in August, 1870, told him that the deeds were in the office of the registry of deeds in Iowa, and that he would send for them, and that at a subsequent time, when the witness called for the deeds, he told him that they had not arrived. Superadded to that, is the letter of Woodman to that witness, dated September 8, 1870, in which he states that he has received "the original deed from me to Governor Andrew of the Shelby county land, which I enclose to you with two cancelled agreements" therein described, showing that the pretence that he had the deeds in his possession all the time, is unfounded. Such a pretence is invoked, as showing that the deeds were under his control as the real owner of the property, but the pretence being disproved, it tends to discredit the witness, instead of confirming his testimony. Had he retained the deeds, as the pretence is in his testimony, something doubtless might be inferred from that circumstance in support of the theory of the complainants, but he having set up that theory in his examination, in chief, and the pretence being disproved, it must be assumed that the circumstance tends to discredit the grantor as a witness, especially as it is not shown by any other witness that he ever claimed any interest in the land during the lifetime of the grantee, or that the grantee ever in any way recognized the pretence that he had any interest in the lands.

Nothing certainly can be inferred in support of the theory of the complainants from the character of the supposed transaction, as the story is quite improbable on its face. It is that the grantor executed an absolute deed of lands, put it on record without the knowledge of the grantee, and kept it a secret from him for the period of three years, without anything to show that the deed was not what it purported to be, both of the parties having experience as conveyancers, and being well aware of the necessity of a defeasance of some kind, and that the same condition of things was continued four years longer, after the grantee was informed of the conveyance, without any step being taken by either party to supply the omission. Such men, whether friends or not, would not be likely to leave their rights in such uncertainty. Much strength is added to that view from the fact that the grantor from September, 1866, to March 20, 1867, was not indebted to the grantee at all, and yet, as the theory of the complainants is, the title was allowed to stand in the name of the grantee as a security for indebtedness, when nothing was due to the party holding the absolute estate. Debtors are frequently negligent in procuring a renewal of an expiring defeasance in cases where they have been in fault in not making the stipulated payments to their creditor, but when the whole incumbrance is paid, they are much less likely to remain quiet without some written assurance that their rights will be respected.

Administration on the estate of the grantee was first granted to William Rogers, and it appears that the grantor in those deeds was one of the appraisers. Jones was the other, and he testifies that Woodman never, in any of their consultations, stated that his notes to the intestate were in any way secured, and it does not appear that he made any such disclosure when, at a subsequent period, he was appointed administrator de bonis of the same estate. In his deposition he states that when these deeds were executed, he was indebted to the grantee in the sum before mentioned, which was secured by the conveyances, but Jones says that in their conferences as appraisers, he never mentioned that the notes were secured, that he did say, at another time, that the deeds were given to secure the sum of $7,000, and that it was agreed at the time the deeds were made, that they should be security for that sum. Contradictory statements are certainly calculated to impair the credit of a witness, and it is clear that the statement that such an agreement was made at the time the deeds were made, is utterly inconsistent with his testimony given in the case, that the grantee did not have any knowledge of the deeds for three years after they were made and forwarded to be recorded. His statements also to Jones are inconsistent with each other, as at another time he told him that the land conveyed was worth just about $3,000, which was the amount borrowed of the grantee, and that after 1860 he never owed the grantee less than that amount, which cannot be true, if he is to be believed, as he testifies that he owed him nothing from September, 1866, to March 20, 1867, as before explained. He is also contradicted in other particulars. He told Jones he paid the interest regularly, that he took no receipts, and that the notes with the indorsements of interest were all destroyed. Interest was not paid as there stated, as conclusively appears from the letter of the grantee, dated December, 1862, to the grantor, which is an exhibit in the case. When cross-examined in respect to those exhibits, Woodman admitted that they showed that he did not pay interest from December 1, 1862, to March, 1867, a period of more than four years. Important parts of the relation he gives of his dealings with the grantee, are materially erroneous, if not wilfully false. He claims that his exhibit of those matters is taken from his notebook, and that the statement shows the true state of his indebtedness, but the administrator produces a large number of notes and checks to the amount of $1,300, to which the witness does not allude in his account, which goes very far to show that no reliance can be placed in his statements as their dealings, or the amount he owed the grantee when the deeds were given. Witnesses are no longer excluded on account of interest in the event of the suit, but the proof of interest affects the credit of the witness now, as well as before, the passage of the act not changing the rule in that regard, as it shows that the witness is not impartial, that he has a motive to color his statements or to suppress the truth or to state what is false.

Woodman is not impartial, though decreed to be a bankrupt before he testified, as he was a defaulter to a large amount to the estate of the deceased grantee, from which he could not obtain a discharge in the bankrupt court. No debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his de-falcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character, can be discharged by the bankrupt court in any case. 14 Stat. 533. As administrator of the estate, he is a defaulter to the amount of $6,759.39, for which he cannot be discharged under the bankrupt act, but if he can establish the theory that those deeds are mortgages, and compel the legal representatives to get the pay for the claim out of those lands, he will be relieved from that liability and embarrassment. Something also is due to the absolute denials of the answer, in which the respondents not only deny that the real estate was conveyed as a security for any indebtedness, but aver their belief that the deeds were made as absolute conveyances and not as a security. Administrators and heirs cannot be supposed, in such a case, to have personal knowledge upon the subject, but the decision of the supreme court warrants the conclusion that in such a case the complainant is not entitled to decree upon the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness, certainly not, unless his statements are positive and the witness appears to be without bias, prejudice, or interest adverse to the respondent. Carpenter v. Insurance Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 218. Grave doubts are entertained whether a decree in such a case ought ever to be made upon the uncorroborated testimony of the grantor, but it is not necessary to decide that point, as the court is clearly of opinion that such a decree ought not to be made where it appears that the witness is interested adversely to the respondent, is contradicted by another witness, and has himself given false and contradictory accounts of various matters material to the issue, and, especially, where it appears that the claim has been long delayed and was never made in the lifetime of the grantee. Claims of the kind are easily made, and unless full proof is required to sustain them, it is to be feared that the estates of dead men will afford much less comfort and support to their widows and minor children than the decedents supposed the estates would, while they were expending their strength in toil and industry to earn and save the property for that purpose. Decree reversed and bill dismissed with costs.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term. 1816.

WITNESS—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—EQUITY PLEADING—ADDITIONAL PARTIES—AGENCY.

1. A person who came to a knowledge of facts while he was a student in the office of an attorney who was consulted by a party in this cause, in relation to the matter to which he is called to testify, may be a witness. The rules of law which prohibit an attorney or counsel being witnesses, do not apply to a student in the office of such attorney or counsel.

2. Where the original bill contains no allegations against defendants, who have nevertheless answered the bill, they having been made parties by permission given by the court to the complainant, but who did not file an amended bill, if even a proper case for the interference of a court of equity were made out, the court would be compelled to dismiss the bill as against these defendants.

*[Reported by Richard Peters, Jr.]

In equity. This was a bill on the equity side of the court, filed by the widow and all the legal representatives of H. Solomon, deceased, except H. Solomon one of the defendants, in order to set aside the sales and conveyances of certain lots of ground in the city of Philadelphia, made by the sheriff under a writ of venditioni exponas issued at the suit of the defendant, E. Solomon, against the executors of his father, the aforesaid H. Solomon, deceased, and for other and further relief. By the bill it appears, that H. Solomon the father, died seized of the legal estate in two of the lots in question, and that the other five lots were granted by the state of Pennsylvania to a Mr. Franks. The bill alleges, that the purchase money was paid either by the said H. Solomon the father, or by his widow; and that she took out the patent in the name of Franks, intending it, however, to be in trust for herself, and the children of the said H. Solomon. Franks afterwards conveyed these five lots to the said widow and the children of the said H. Solomon to take, the widow her dower, and the children according to the intestate laws of this state. The bill then charges that the defendant E. Solomon, although he was the agent of the complainants (they residing in New York, and he in Philadelphia) in respect to the management of the said seven lots, yet, with a view to defraud them thereof, purchased a note of his father's due to the bank of North America, amounting together with interest to about the sum of 1300 dollars, for the sum of 50 dollars; and having instituted a suit thereon and recovered a judgment for the amount so due, he procured the above lots to be sold under a venditioni exponas, for about 1400 dollars, although in truth, he had previously agreed with a certain G. Bickham for the sale of the five lots, for upwards of 3000 dollars; and immediately after the said sheriff's sale, he sold the other two lots to the defendant, F. Gaul, for the price of 1850 dollars. That after the above sales and conveyances by the sheriff to G. Bickham, the judgment under which they were made was upon a writ of error reversed.

The answer of the executors of G. Bickham, denies all knowledge of the allegations in the bill, except that they find by certain papers, to which they refer, that the five lots were sold under the venditioni exponas to the said G. Bickham, and were conveyed by the sheriff to the said G. Bickham and to Jacob Reese and David Lydeg, for the use of the children of the said Jacob Reese in fee, and in case of their dying before they attained their full age, then to the use of the said Jacob Reese. That although the consideration mentioned in this deed was only 610 dollars, yet that 3266 dollars and 50 cents, were in fact paid by G. Bickham to the defendant, E. Solomon, as appears by his receipt. The answer of F. Gaul, states that he negotiated with a broker for the purchase of the other two lots, which were conveyed to him by E. Solomon for the consideration of 1850 dollars, which was paid to him, and he denies all notice of fraud or contrivance between G. Bickham, or any other person and the said E. Solomon. E. Solomon in his answer, denies that he was the agent of the plaintiff Andrews, the husband of one of H. Solomon's daughters, and of Meyers, who married another of the daughters, whose children are complainants; and he states further, that the sale of these lots took place at the instance, and with the knowledge of his mother, and of H. Solomon the other complainant, to whom the whole of the purchase money received for the above lots was paid. He states also, the total insolvency of his father at the time of his death.

Jacob Reese demurs to the relief sought by the bill for want of equity, and to the discovery of his legal title as well as to the relief, so far as the bill seeks to make him accountable for the fraud imputed to G. Bickham. He also answers the residue of the bill, and states that H. Solomon, the father, purchased the five lots from the state, and that the patent to Franks was granted under a secret trust, for the benefit of the said H. Solomon, the father; that G. Bickham purchased the five lots at the request of the executors of P. Lydeg, deceased, for the use of the two children of the defendant, from whose funds the purchase money was paid to E. Solomon. The answer of the two infant sons of Jacob Reese, by their guardian, is in the usual form, praying the protection of the court. To these answers general replications were put in.

At the hearing of this cause, the deposition of Daniel Addis, was offered by the complainants, and was objected to by the defendants, upon the ground that the facts stated by the witness, came to his knowledge whilst he was a student of Mr. Brown, the attorney who was consulted by Bickham and the defendant E. Solomon, in relation to the mode of securing the title to the aforesaid lots, and that it was in his character as student, that he obtained his information. The witness upon his cross examination, stated, that the declarations of Bickham were not made to him professionally, but that he frequently talked to him upon the business whenever he met him. In support of the objection, were cited [Morris v. Vanderen,] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 66; [Du Barre v. Livette,] Peake, 77. On the other side were cited 1 Phil. Ev. 103; Gilb. Ev. 138; [Holmes v. Comegys,] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 439; [Vaillant v. Dodeinead,] 2 Atk. 524.

By the Court: An attorney is not permitted to disclose as a witness, the secrets of his client, because in doing so, he would betray a confidence, which from necessity the client must repose in him. All the reasons which apply to the attorney, apply to an interpreter between the client and the attorney, of whom he is merely the organ. Not one of these reasons apply to the student; no confidence is reposed in him by the client, nor is there any necessity that it should. The court feels no inclination to extend the rule further than it has already gone. The evidence was admitted.

Hopkinson for F. Gaul contended, that the reversal of the judgment cannot affect the title of his client, the act of assembly (1 Laws Pa., Smith's Ed., 61) having declared, that purchasers under a judgment, which is afterwards reversed, shall not have their titles impeached on that account; that there is no imputation of fraud against the defendant, nor is he even charged with notice of fraud, in G. Bickham or Solomon.

The counsel for the complainants contended, that as the sale by the sheriff was merely nominal, all the lots having been previously sold at private sale for a much larger sum than that at which they were struck off to G. Bickham; the act of assembly, which was clearly intended to protect fair bona fide purchasers, under the sheriff, cannot apply. In England the rule in relation to purchasers of chattels at a sheriff's sale, under a judgment which is afterwards reversed, is precisely the same, as that established by this act of assembly; and yet if the sale be not fair, and is not wholly under the execution, the title of the purchaser is not protected. So the same rule applies to sales in market overt and the same distinction takes place. [Hoe's Case,] 5 Coke, 90b; [Manning's Case,] 8 Coke, 96b; [Goodyer v. Junce,] Yelv. 180; [Holford v. Andrewes,] Moore, 573; 19 Vin. Abr. 439, p. 4; 2 Bl. Comm. 450; 2 Inst. 713; [Close v. Gillespey,] 3 Johns. 525; [Mortlock v. Bulter,] 10 Ves. 292.

If G. Bickham was concerned in a contrivance with E. Solomon to defraud the complainants, those for whom he acted, or who claim under him, though without notice are affected by his fraud. [Huguenin v. Baseley,] 14 Ves. 289, 2 Fonb. 158; [Worseley v. Demattos,] 1 Burrows, 479. Chauncey, for Reese and his children, contended, that upon the demurrer, the bill must be dismissed, as to Reese the father; because the bill contains no charge whatever against him. His name is not even mentioned in the bill, and consequently if Bickham was guilty of fraud, still the defendant cannot be made to answer for it. The truth is, that Reese and his two sons were not originally defendants to this bill; but were afterwards made so, upon motion and leave of the court, but no amended bill was filed against them. There being no charge then, of any kind against these defendants, the complainants are entitled to no relief. But if this objection was not in the way, still the plaintiffs could not recover in this suit, because there is not the slightest evidence of fraud proved against Bickham or Solomon; and if there was, the defendants' title cannot be impeached on that account. Again, if the complainants have any title, it is merely at law.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. From the evidence given in this cause, it distinctly appears, that E. Solomon, the defendant, was the agent of the complainants, for protecting the whole of this property, as well as for the sale of it. That he informed them of the sales he had made of the five lots, and that which he expected to make of the two lots; and he intimated to them, very clearly in one of his letters, that it would be necessary, notwithstanding those private sales, to go through the form of a public sale. He stated to them that he had sold the five lots for 3,200 dollars, and was in treaty for the sale of the other two for 1,600 dollars. No evidence has been given to show that the complainants, or either of them, did, at any time object to the sales of these lots, or to the prices at which they were sold. The sales under the venditioni exponas, though merely formal as to the parties immediately interested in that property, were rendered necessary to protect the titles against the creditors of E. Solomon; for which purpose alone the note was purchased and the proceedings on it instituted by E. Solomon.

Without stopping, for the present, to notice the informality which the proceedings in this cause exhibit, I shall proceed upon the complainants' case as presented by themselves, to inquire where is their equity against any of the defendants, except E. Solomon? The gravamen of the bill is, that although E. Solomon was the agent of the complainants, he nevertheless contrived, covertly, to have their property seized and sold under execution, for about one-fourth nominally of the sum at which he had actually sold it by private bargain. These allegations may, and certainly do afford a very good reason for compelling E. Solomon to account for the purchase money actually received by him; but not for setting aside the sales of this property, sanctioned as they were by the complainants. If the sheriff's deeds passed to the grantees the legal estate in these lots, a court of equity will protect that estate, unless the purchasers were guilty of a fraud, or purchased with a knowledge of a fraud in those under whom they claim. But what evidence is there of fraud in any part of these transactions? It is not even pretended that the price at which these lots were sold, was inadequate to their value; nor is it pretended that the private sales of them were made without authority. If, on the other hand, the sheriff's deeds did not pass the legal estate, then the objection to those conveyances is purely of a legal nature, and consequently the complainants are not entitled to relief in a court of equity.

As to the five lots, the real beneficial purchasers were the children of Jacob Reese, G. Bickham acting as the agent of their guardian for their use. It is said that their title must be affected by the fraud of that agent. Be it so. But there is no fraud proved against Bickham, as has before been stated. Jacob Reese, therefore, and his sons, the cestui que use in the sheriff's deed, have both the legal and the equitable estate in this property. As to the two lots, which were purchased by Bickham for E. Solomon, and by him conveyed to F. Gaul, it is contended, that the title is not protected by the act of assembly, because that act ought not to be construed to apply to purchases made by the plaintiff himself, or to mere formal sales under execution as this was. As to this argument, I give no opinion, but will for the present admit it. Still the complainants cannot succeed in setting aside the sales of these lots, without showing themselves to be entitled to this relief upon some ground of equity. Now, in addition to the observations before made in relation to the five lots, it may be observed, that, as to those conveyed to Gaul, he is not even charged in the bill with notice of any fraud or other circumstance to invalidate his title in a court of equity; and, in his answer, he asserts himself to be a bona fide purchaser, without notice of any of the circumstances alleged against Bickham and E. Solomon.

Having spoken of informalties in the proceedings in this cause, it may be proper to state them more particularly, for the information of the bar. Subsequent to the filing of this bill, the court, upon the motion of the plaintiff, permitted the complainants to amend by making Jacob Reese and his sons defendants, but no amended bill was filed. The original, or rather the only bill filed in the cause, contains no allegations against these new made defendants, nor are their names even mentioned in it. During the argument, and as soon as this omission was discovered, the court gave leave to the complainants to file an amended bill; not to state any new matter, which would have been improper at that stage of the cause, but merely to call upon these new defendants to answer the original bill. But, even if the complainants had made out a proper case for the interference of equity, in reference to the title of Bickham, still the court would be compelled to dismiss the bill as to these defendants, since there is no allegation against them to which they could answer. It is true they have answered, but this does not entitle the complainants to relief against them, since they have not shown in their bill any ground for such relief. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 87.

The preceding part of this opinion was intended to show, that, upon the merits of the cause, the complainants are not entitled to relief against these defendants, and consequently that they cannot suffer on account of the informality just stated. As to the liability of E. Solomon, to account for the purchase money received by him for the above seven lots, with legal interest thereon, there can be no doubt. The court therefore direct an account as to these sums, and dismiss the bill with costs against the other defendants.

PRACTICE—TEST CASE—CONSIDERATION OF CAUSES.

Where a number of suits of like nature, and involving the same issues, are pending at the same time, the court may, in its discretion, order that one case be tried and determined as a test case for all, or that the several causes be consolidated and tried together. This rule applies as well to cases in equity as at law.

[Cited in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 293, 12 Sup. Ct. 912.]

Application is made to the court, and affidavits presented by the solicitors for the several defendants, who, to avoid costs and unnecessary expense, ask that these suits, which involve the same issues, and depend upon the same testimony, be consolidated, or one of them be selected as a test case, and proceedings in all others be stayed until such test case is determined; or that the court order that the testimony shall be taken in one case, to be selected by the complainants, and that such testimony be read in every case, or for such other relief as may be just.

Davis, O'Brien & Wilson, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge. These suits were brought to test the validity of a patent for an alleged new and useful improvement in wells—commonly known as the "drive well"—for damages for its infringement, and to restrain the defendants from further manufacture and use. The bill of complaint in some of the cases alleges the manufacture of the drive wells, and in others the use. Issue has been joined in all the cases. The same solicitors appear for all the defendants, and agree to enter a stipulation in writing that judgment may be entered in all the cases if the final decision in one shall be in favor of the complainants. It is admitted that one case of each class, when decided, will dispose of all the others of the same class, and that the testimony relating to the issues in one suit of a class will apply to all of the same class.

In view of these admissions and proposed stipulation. It would be manifestly unjust for the court to compel each defendant to incur the expense of preparing for hearing and argument if it can be avoided. It is not unusual in actions at law, and the reasoning applies equally to equity cases, to grant such applications. The plaintiffs are not injured thereby, but rather benefitted, for they are relieved from the trouble and expense of preparing numerous causes for hearing, where only the same questions are involved. The court can interpose a check to the argument of a multiplicity of these issues, irrespective of any concessions made by the parties, with a view to prevent useless waste of time and expense, and this application is within the spirit, if not within the letter, of section 921 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: "Sec. 921. When causes of a like nature, or relating to the same question, are pending before a court of the United States, or of any territory, the court may make such orders and rules, concerning proceedings therein, as may be conformable to the usages of courts for avoiding unnecessary costs or delay in the administration of justice, and may consolidate said causes when it appears reasonable to do so."

When the solicitors for the defendants sign and file in court consent that judgment may abide the event of a trial in one case of each class, the following order may be entered: "That all the causes of each class abide the event and final determination of the one of that class which the plaintiffs may elect to prepare the evidence in, and set down for hearing and argument, and that whatever decree may be finally rendered in the cause set down for hearing shall be entered in all the causes of that class, and either party shall be at liberty to have the records therein made and entered accordingly, unless, upon proper showing, additional and lately discovered evidence, relevant to the issues, which could not be procured and submitted in time, should be brought forward, and a rehearing asked and granted for that reason.

Ordered accordingly.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION AGAINST INFRINGERS.

A preliminary injunction in a patent cause was denied where the suit in which it was asked had been pending for many months, and was nearly ready for final hearing, and no ground for the writ was shown which was not known to the complainants at the time the suit was instituted.

In equity. The bill of complaint was filed November 10th, 1876, an answer filed February 5th, 1877, and the case put at issue March 27th, 1877. The testimony of both parties is being taken before a master, with a view to an early submission of the controversy. An application is now made for a temporary injunction [to restrain the infringement of patent No. 73,425, and based] upon the pleadings, affidavits, and a decision of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of New York, rendered in April, 1876, and certain proceedings instituted in the district court of Hennepin county, Minnesota, on the return of an execution against the defendant unsatisfied, March 14th, 1877. [Application denied.]²

NELSON, District Judge. I decline to grant a preliminary injunction at this time. The suit was instituted in November, 1876, and, as appears from the papers before me upon this motion, is in preparation for final hearing at the next term, in December. The evidence of witnesses already taken before the master, has been used as affidavits to be considered in disposing of the motion, and I am asked to examine it with reference to the claim for this preliminary injunction in advance of presentation at the final hearing. I do not think, at this late day, after nearly a year has passed since the commencement of this suit, and it is about to be argued and submitted upon the merits, I am required, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to give complainants the preliminary relief asked.

The principal reason urged upon this application is, that a previous decision has been rendered in a suit in the second circuit sustaining the validity of the patent. This court has recognized the great weight to be given such a decision upon an application for an injunction,—American Middlings Purifier Co. v. Christian, [Case No. 307,]—but, inasmuch as it was rendered six months before the commencement of this suit, and the complainants here were parties thereto, and fully aware of the effect of such decision in their behalf, some more persuasive reason must be urged, which will account for this delay, until the case is now about to be submitted and considered upon the pleadings and all the evidence. The pecuniary condition of the defendant is not changed from what it was in March last, and cannot be considered now as a controlling reason for granting the injunction.

The complainants have leave to renew this

ANDREWS v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Story, 202.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1842.

OFFICE AND OFFICERS — COMPENSATION—CHANGE IN DUTIES—EXPENSES—PENAL STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Every public officer is required to perform all duties, which are strictly official, although they may be required by laws passed after he comes into office, and may be cumulative upon his original duties, and although his compensation therefor be wholly inadequate. In such a case, he must look to the bounty of congress for any additional reward.

2. Where the collector of Ipswich claimed a commission on drafts drawn by him on the collector at Boston, in payment of bounties due to fishermen, under the act of [July 29] 1813, c. 34, [4 Bioren & D. Laws, 582; 2 Story's Laws, 1350; 3 Stat. 49, c. 35,] it was held, that there being no provision, by which a commission is allowed thereon, the collector could not charge a commission.

3. The collector of any port, being authorized by the act of [March 3] 1817, c. 282, § 7, [3 Story's Laws, 1650; 3 Stat. 397, c. 109,] to appoint a deputy, with the approbation of the secretary of the treasury; it seems, that a deputy, so appointed, should receive a reasonable compensation for his services, although no compensation therefor be fixed.

4. All expenditures, made by a collector for office rent, clerk-hire, fuel, and stationery, are to be deemed incidents to his office, and should be allowed as proper charges against the United States; and if he do not keep and transmit yearly accounts thereof, according to the requisitions of the act of [March 2] 1799, c. 129, § 2, [3 Bioren & D. Laws, 237; 1 Story's Laws, 665; 1 Stat. 704, c. 23,] he does not forfeit his right to be reimbursed for such expenditures, but only subjects himself to the payment of the penalty.

[Cited in Wilson v. Singer Manuf'g Co., Case No. 17,836.]

At law. Writ of error from the judgment of the district court, of Massachusetts district. The original suit was debt brought upon the official bond of Andrews, formerly collector of the port and district of Ipswich. The United States claimed a balance due for moneys received by the defendant; and the pleadings put the question, whether any such balance was due, directly to the jury. There was, also, a claim of set-off, by the defendant, for legal and equitable claims, asserted to be due to him; all of which were rejected at the trial, by the ruling of the district judge, to whose decisions on the points raised, a bill of exceptions was taken. The jury found a verdict for the United States for the sum of $1,142.27; upon which a writ of error was brought by the defendant. [Reversed.]

The bill of exceptions, after reciting the pleadings and issue, proceeded as follows— Which issue being joined as aforesaid, came on to be tried by a jury, duly empanelled and sworn for that purpose. The plaintiffs offered, and gave in evidence, a duly authenticated copy of the bond declared on. The plaintiffs, also, offered and gave in evidence a duly authenticated treasury transcript of the accounts of the said Asa Andrews, by which it appeared, that on the twenty-ninth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, there was in the hands of the said Asa Andrews, to the credit of the United States, the sum of nine hundred and twenty-one dollars and ninety-two cents. The plaintiffs here rested their case.

The defendants then proved, that the said Asa Andrews had, from time to time, during his continuance in the office of collector, as aforesaid, investigated claims for bounties to fishermen under the several laws of the United States, and had paid and disbursed to the said fishermen, in all, the sum of fifty-four thousand seven hundred and ten dollars and eighty-six cents, by drafts upon the collector at Boston, for which service he had received from the United States no compensation beyond the salary of his office, and that his claim for such compensation had been rejected by the treasury department, which rejection was proved. And the defendants prayed his honor, the judge, to instruct the jury, that the said Andrews was entitled to a reasonable compensation for this service, which was proved to be the most laborious duty of the said office. But his honor, the judge, refused so to instruct the jury, but instructed them, that the said Andrews was not by law entitled to any commission or compensation on the amount received by drafts on the collector at Boston, and applied to the payment of such bounty to fishermen, nor to any compensation for such service, beyond the salary of his office, and the commission on such portion of the amount of bounties paid, as was made from his own collection of duties in his district. The defendants then offered, and gave in evidence, the several commissions of the said Asa Andrews, as inspector of the revenue of the port of Ipswich, and proved, that the said Andrews performed the duties of the said office during the whole time that he held the office of collector as aforesaid. The defendants further proved the importation of large quantities of distilled spirits into the port of Ipswich, and that he performed all the duties pertaining to the said office of inspector, in reference to said distilled spirits, and prayed his honor, the judge, to instruct the jury, that he was entitled to compensation for his services, so performed, as inspector, in reference to distilled spirits, and to submit to the jury the question, whether he has been paid therefor or not; but his honor refused so to instruct the jury, but did instruct them, that the said Andrews was not entitled, in point of law, to any compensation for his said services, as inspector, beyond his salary as collector, and the fees, if any, allowed by law for such services. The defendants then proved, that the said Asa Andrews had, during the whole time of his continuance in office, employed a deputy-collector, duly appointed and commissioned as such deputy, by him, the said Asa Andrews, which deputy acted in his absence, and sometimes, when he was not absent; and as to deputies offered evidence, tending to show, that he had paid the said deputies, and that he had received no compensation or allowance for the said sums, so paid to the said deputies, and that his claim for such compensation or allowance had been rejected by the treasury department. The defendants further offered, and gave evidence, that the port of Ipswich embraced a long line of sea-coast, and of a character well calculated to afford facilities for defrauding the revenue; and proved by the testimony of several persons, who had been connected with the collection of the customs in the vicinity of the port of Ipswich, and by the late collector of said port of Ipswich, Timothy Souther, Esq., that it is, and has been necessary to the protection of the revenue, that there should be, at least, one subordinate officer in said port of Ipswich. The defendants also proved, that except at times when vessels from foreign ports were in, and were actually discharging, no compensation had been allowed for any subordinate officer. They further proved, that the said deputy-collector had performed the duties of a tide-waiter, or inspector, and that he was the only subordinate officer employed, except while foreign cargoes were discharging.

The defendants requested his honor, the judge, to instruct the jury, that the said Asa Andrews was entitled to be allowed such sums of money as he had paid to the said deputies; but his honor refused so to instruct the jury, but instructed them, that, in regard to any such deputies, they were entitled only to such fees, as by law were appointed for their services; and that the collector, having not made any charge for such services contemporaneously, nor at any time, in his quarterly accounts, rendered during his continuance in office, a demand for any discretionary allowance, which the officers of the treasury might make in the premises, could not in this suit be sustained. The defendants then proved, that the said Asa Andrews had performed the duties of the office of surveyor of the said port of Ipswich, and that he had received no compensation therefor, and that his claim for such compensation had been rejected by the treasury department; and the said defendants requested his honor, the judge, to instruct the jury, that the said Andrews was entitled to compensation for his said services as surveyor of said port; but his honor refused so to instruct the jury, and did instruct them, that the said Andrews was not entitled to any compensation for such services, further than his salary as collector, as aforesaid, and the legal fees for any duties at any time performed as surveyor, and that it was now too late to receive and sustain the defendant's demands for such services, which were not contemporaneously made, or introduced in any of his quarterly accounts, during his continuance in the office of collector.

It appears, that the defendants made certain charges of payments, from time to time, and at different periods, to weighers, gaugers, inspectors, &c.; but the defendants proved, that payments to such persons were made only at such times as vessels were in and actually discharging. The defendants then proved, that the expenditures of the said Asa Andrews for office rent, fuel, stationery, and clerk hire, during the time in which he held the office of collector, as aforesaid, amounted to the sum of fifteen hundred and fifty-five dollars and seventy cents; and that he had presented a yearly account of the said expenditures to the treasury department, and that no part of the same had ever been allowed to him, but that the said claim and every part of it had been disallowed by the said treasury department. The defendants prayed his honor to instruct the jury, that the said Andrews was entitled to compensation for the said expenditures of office rent, fuel, clerk hire, and stationery; but his honor refused so to instruct the jury, but instructed them that the said Andrews was not by law entitled to any allowance for the said expenditures. The defendants here rested their case, and thereupon the jury returned their verdict for the United States, for the sum of $1142.27.

The cause was now submitted to the court without argument by R. Choate, for the plaintiff in error, and by Dexter, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause having been submitted to the court without argument, I am not sure, that I fully comprehend all the grounds intended to be relied upon by counsel, either in objection to, or in support of, the various claims stated in the bill of exceptions. If any of these claims, although not strictly of a legal nature, are yet ex aequo et bono due to the defendant for extra services rendered, or moneys expended on account of, and for the benefit of the United States, it is very clear, that the defendant is entitled to an allowance and compensation therefor, upon the footing of a quantum meruit under the act of [March 3] 1797, c. 74, § 3, [2 Bioren & D. Laws, 594; 1 Story's Laws, 464; 1 Stat. 512, c. 20.] This was fully settled by the supreme court in U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 135, 143, 144, and has been repeatedly recognized in subsequent cases, and especially in the case of Gratiot v. U. S., 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 336, 370, 371. But where duties are required to be performed by a collector or other public officer, strictly official, and falling within the ordinary range thereof, there, although they may be conferred by laws subsequently passed, after he came into office, or may be cumulative upon the original duties of the officer, he must be deemed to take and hold the office cum onere; and however inadequate the compensation may be for his labor and services, he must content himself with the salary and fees allowed by law, and look to the bounty of congress for any additional reward.

Tried by these tests, let us now proceed to consider the various claims of the defendant, stated in the bill of exceptions. The first is for the ascertainment and payment by drafts on the collector at Boston, of the bounties due to fishermen, under the act of [July 29] 1813, c. 34, [4 Bioren & D. Laws, 582; 2 Story's Laws, 1350; 3 Stat. 49, c. 35.] and other prior repealed acts, and subsequent acts still in force, on the same subject. I do not, from the manner in which the ruling of the district judge is stated in the exception, precisely understand whether the learned judge meant to say, that if these bounties had been paid by the defendant, out of moneys of the United States, from the collection of duties in his district, the commissions would have been allowable for this particular service; but that, having been made by drafts drawn by him upon the collector at Boston, they were not allowable on the accounts of those drafts; or whether the learned judge meant only to say, that, as by the act of [March 2] 1799, c. 129, § 2, [3 Bioren & D. Laws, 237; 1 Story's Laws, 665; 1 Stat. 704, c. 23.] for the compensation of officers of the customs, three per cent. commissions were allowed to the collector of customs of Ipswich, on all moneys received by him on account of duties on goods imported into his district, and as no other cases were provided for, therefore, no commissions were payable on account of the payment of bounties to fishermen. If the former was intended to be laid down by the learned judge as law, I should not be prepared to adopt it; for, in my judgment, a payment by the drafts of the defendant on the collector at Boston, would be just as much a payment to entitle the defendant to the three per cent. commissions, in the sense of the law, as if he had paid the bounties out of any moneys in his own hands, under his official collections. The question, then, would be, whether the three per cent. is provided for by law in either case for the payment of bounties. I have not been able to find any provision for any compensation of this sort, in any act of congress; and if there be any, it has escaped my researches. If any exists, I desire to have it pointed out at the bar, before any final judgment is rendered in this case. But if the other be the true construction of the ruling of the learned judge, then, it seems to me perfectly correct; because, by the act of 1813, c. 34, § 5, as well as by the prior and subsequent acts upon the same subject, it is made a part of the ordinary official duties of the collector of the customs, to ascertain and pay these bounties; and then (as has been already suggested) he must rely upon the salary and fees annexed by law to the office, unless some additional compensation is allowed for this service, which, in a district like that of Ipswich, as will appear from the facts stated in the record, is one of no small labor and responsibility, compared with the other ordinary duties of the collectorship. In such a case, however, the appeal lies to the bounty of congress, and not to a judicial tribunal.

The next claim is for the compensation paid to a deputy collector, by the defendant. The act of 1799, c. 128, § 22, [3 Bioren & D. Laws, 457; 1 Story's Laws, 592; 1 Stat. c. 22.] authorized the collector, in cases of occasional and necessary absence, or of sickness, and not otherwise, to exercise and perform their functions by a deputy. The act of [March 3] 1817, c. 282, § 7, [3 Story's Laws, 650; 3 Stat. 397, c. 109.] authorized collectors, with the approbation of the secretary of the treasury, to employ such deputy collectors as they should deem necessary; and this provision was perpetuated by the act of [May 6] 1822, c. 56, § 4, [3 Stat. 681.] Another act, passed at the same session,—act of [May 7] 1822, c. 107, § 15, [3 Stat. 693.]—authorized the secretary of the treasury to limit and fix the compensation (among other officers of the customs) of each deputy collector, limiting it not to exceed, except for certain enumerated ports, one thousand dollars per annum, and for those ports, not to exceed fifteen hundred dollars, “for any services he may perform for the United States in any office or capacity.” I am not aware of any other act, which expressly provides for a distinct compensation to be paid by the United States to such deputy collectors. Whether the secretary of the treasury has ever sanctioned any allowance to any deputy for the port and district of Ipswich, I do not know; and there is nothing in the record, which leads to any conclusion on the subject. But, if he has sanctioned the appointment of a deputy for that port and district, and the business required it, it would seem reasonable, that some compensation should be paid by the United States for his services. Perhaps the case of such a deputy, if not otherwise compensated, may have been treated as embraced within the general provision in the act of 1799, c. 129, § 2, which authorizes the allowance of two dollars a day to every other person, than a regular inspector, whom the collector may find it necessary and expedient to employ as occasional inspector, or in any other way, in aid of the revenue. In the act of 7th of July, 1838, c. 169, § 3, [5 Stat. 264,] a limitation is put upon the allowance of compensation to deputy collectors; and the like provision occurs in the subsequent act of the 3d of March, 1841, c. 16, [35,] § 2, [5 Stat. 431.] However, as no evidence is contained in the record upon this particular point, it is impracticable for this court, upon a writ of error, to look beyond the mere ruling of the court below, upon the point of law; and the burthen of proof, to establish an error in the ruling, is upon the plaintiff in error.

In the next place, as to the allowance, claimed by the defendant for performing the duties of surveyor; it appears to me, that he is not entitled to any compensation therefor, upon the principles already stated; because, by the act of 1799, c. 128, § 21, when there is no surveyor assigned by law for a particular port, the collector of the customs is required to perform the duties of a surveyor, as far as may be.

The last objection, and that upon which I have felt the most difficulty, is the ruling of the learned judge upon the point, that the defendant, Andrews, requested the judge to instruct the jury, that he was entitled to compensation for office-rent, fuel, clerk-hire and stationery, which he had paid and expended in his office, as collector, of which he had presented a yearly account to the treasury department, and no part thereof had been allowed to him; but, on the contrary, had been disallowed. But the judge refused so to instruct the jury; but instructed them, that Andrews was not, by law, entitled to any allowance for the said expenditures.

No particular ground is stated in the record for this instruction given by the learned judge; and, therefore, if maintainable at all, it must be upon the general ground, that no allowances are by law to be made for such expenditures; or, if allowable, that they were not in due and proper season presented to the treasury department for allowance. It appears to me very clear, that these expenditures are properly to be deemed incidents to the office of the collector, and, therefore, that they ought to be allowed as proper charges against the United States. The act of 1799, c. 129, § 2, manifestly contemplates the allowance of them. It provides, that, "it shall be the duty of the respective collectors, &c., to keep accurate accounts of all fees and special emoluments received by them; also, of all expenditures, particularizing the expenditures for rent, fuel, stationery, and clerk-hire; and to transmit annually, within forty days after the last of December, an account, verified on oath or affirmation, to the comptroller of the treasury, &c.; and if any collector, &c., shall omit or neglect to keep an account as aforesaid, or to transmit the same, verified as aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, for the use of the United States."

It does not appear, from the bill of exceptions, whether Andrews did, in fact, keep such an account, or transmit it yearly to the department, as required by law. All that the bill of exceptions states, is, "that he had presented a yearly account of such expenditures, to the treasury department, and that no part of the same had been allowed to him," &c. Now, it may be, that this language refers only to the final claim made and disallowed at the treasury department, which is required by the act of 1797, c. 74, § 4, to entitle the party to an equitable set-off, in the present suit. If so, that is not such an account as the act of 1799, c. 129, § 2, requires. It may be, that it was intended to refer to the keeping and transmission of the accounts, as required by the latter act. The language is somewhat equivocal and uncertain. But construing it most unfavorably for Andrews, and that he did omit or neglect to keep and transmit such yearly account every year, as this latter act requires, still I think, that he did not forfeit his right to be reimbursed the amount of his expenditures for these purposes; and, at most, he incurred only the statute penalty, not exceeding five hundred dollars, as an indemnity to the United States, for any loss sustained thereby. Suppose these expenditures for one year had amounted to $10,000, as in some districts they might, and the accounts were not transmitted until more than forty days had elapsed after the last of December of that year: it would hardly be contended, that the whole claim was extinguished. And yet, such must be the result, if we construe the statute, by imposing a penalty, to have extinguished the claim, as soon as the penalty was incurred. I think that, not a natural, or necessary, or reasonable construction of the statute. It is not said, that the claim shall, by the omission or neglect, be forfeited or extinguished; and for the court so to interpret the statute, would be to enlarge the words, and the intent, and to create penalties beyond what the statute has declared. No rule in the interpretation of penal statutes has ever been carried to such an extent. On the contrary, the general rule universally recognized, is that penal statutes are to be construed strictly. They are never extended by implication. The penalty, itself, is not a fixed penalty. It is not to exceed five hundred dollars. It may be only one dollar. It appears to me, therefore, that the instruction of the learned judge is not correct in point of law; and has proceeded upon a ground, which the statute does not justify; and which the principles, established in other cases, as to equitable allowances, disclaim. My opinion, therefore, is, that the judgment of the district court must be reversed; and a venire facias de novo be awarded for a new trial of the whole cause at the bar of this court. Judgment reversed.

George Gifford, John Y. Page, and Lamprey & Jones, for complainants.

Davis O'Brien Wilson, for defendant.

Before NELSON, District Judge, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

NELSON, District Judge. This suit is brought to recover damages for an infringement of a patent, reissue No. 4,372, and for an injunction. The defences are: 1. Reissue obtained by fraud, and not for the same invention as the original. 2. Want of novelty, prior discovery and use. 3. Alleged invention for a result or effect, and not patentable. 4. Dedication to the public and abandonment. The original patent is No. 73,425, and, while the charge of fraud in procuring the reissue is not pressed, it is urged that the two instruments are for different inventions. To impeach a reissue, which is prima facie evidence that it is for the same invention, it must appear, in the absence of fraud, that the invention described therein is repugnant to the original. Middletown Tool Co. v. Judd, [Case No. 9,536.] The two patents, on examination, show that they were both granted for "a process of constructing wells," and the claim and specifications describe the process, which consists in driving a tube tightly into the earth until it reaches a water-bearing stratum, without removing the earth upward, and attaching to this well-pit a pump, airtight, the tube being perforated at the lower extremity and for a short distance upward to admit the water more freely to the inside. The reissue is not different from the original, and the claim does not include anything more than the patentee was entitled to.

Want of novelty.—To sustain this defence testimony of prior discovery and use is introduced, but a close examination and analysis of this evidence does not satisfy my mind of the existence of the drive-wells, before Green put into practical operation his invention. There is no clear and certain testimony that any one had previously conceived the idea of such a process and adapted it to practical use; it is too shadowy and doubtful. Curt. Pat. (Ed. 1849), §§ 40-48. There is no description of Green's process in any of the publications cited, and the claim is not strenuously pressed. It is evident the results noted therein are obtained by boring or excavating, and not by Green's process, and it is also clear that this process was not used in constructing the salt-wells at Syracuse, New York.

Alleged invention not patentable.—The utility of the invention can not be seriously denied. Its practical use, throughout this and foreign countries, attests this fact. It is a simple and cheap method of obtaining a supply of water, unknown until Green's discovery, and the patent issued is for a process and not a result. Although making a hole in the ground by driving a rod may be a part of the operation Green performs in obtaining a supply of water, his patent describes something more. Before his process, this pit or hole could only be utilized as a well, when by natural forces water flowed into the bottom, and a water-bearing stratum must necessarily be reached where these natural forces will cause a flow of water in such a quantity that the pit becomes a reservoir or produces a stream through the tube as an artesian well. Green, by driving a tube, open at the lower end as described, into the earth, to a water-bearing stratum, with the earth packed tightly about it until the water is reached, and attaching to it a pump, air-tight, constructs a well from which a supply of water is obtained when the pump is worked, and does not rely upon the ordinary operation of natural forces upon the water lying in the earth. The evidence shows that not only an abundant supply of water is thus obtained, but it is inexhaustible. In Kneass v. Schuylkill Bank, [Case No. 7,875,] the patented improvement secured and described in the specifications was for copper-plate or copper-plate and type printing on bank-notes, for the purpose of producing a particular effect, viz.: security against counterfeit; and it was urged that printing with types and copper-plate is not new, but had been long in common use before the invention described, and, therefore, the patent is for an effect. The court said: "This is a mistake; * * * the patent is not for the effect, but for the kind of printing by which the effect is produced." And the patent was sustained as a process, although the art of printing with copper-plates and letter-press was old. So here, a hole or well-pit is made, but the invention is for a combination of that operation with others described as necessary to construct a drive-well—a process. Green dispenses with digging and boring, and produces a new combination of operation.

Dedication to the public and abandonment.—The facts were reviewed by Judge Benedict in Andrews v. Carman, [Case No. 371,] and I concur in his conclusion, that they do not amount to a dedication, or sustain the defence of abandonment.

Decree for complainants is ordered, and a reference to a master to ascertain damages.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, concurs.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above-named vessel, with her cargo, was captured as prize, May 16, 1863, by the United States ship Courier, at sea, off Charleston, South Carolina, and was sent into this port for adjudication. She was here libelled as prize, and, no one intervening in court on the return of the monition as duly served, a decree of default was rendered in the suit. The papers found on the vessel namely, an enrolment in Charleston, April 16, 1863, to F. W. Claussen, a citizen of the Confederate States, under the authority of those States, a manifest of the cargo of cotton exported in her for Nassau, and a clearance of the vessel at the port of Charleston, of the same date, prove the vessel and cargo to be enemy property. The testimony of the master of the vessel in preparatorio proves that she was captured, as before stated, about forty miles off Charleston harbor, on the 16th of May, 1863, for having run the blockade of that port; that she carried no colors, but was cleared under the Confederate authority at Charleston; that the crew and the cargo came from Charleston; that the vessel was built there; that she had been waiting there, from April 25 preceding, for a chance to run out; that the master of the vessel and the owners of the cargo knew of the war and of the existence of the blockade; and that the vessel was run out to evade the blockade. The testimony of the other witnesses is to the same effect, the evidence all concurring in the proof that the vessel designedly and secretly escaped from Charleston, in violation of the blockade then existing and in force there.

It is, accordingly, ordered that a decree of condemnation and forfeiture against the vessel and cargo be entered.

TOWBOAT—UNKNOWN ROCK IN CHANNEL—MISFORTUNE.

1. Where a canal boat was being towed by a steamtug at the end of a hawser, with two other boats, she being the middle one, through the Kills on the north shore of Staten island, and brought up upon a single rock lying some two hundred feet from the end of a dock, the existence of such rock being proved not to be known to persons familiar with those waters, the tow at the time not being in line with the steamtug, but having sagged off inshore, Held, that a steamtug is not a common carrier of the vessel she tows.

[Cited in Powell v. The Willie, 2 Fed. 97; The Pierrepont, 42 Fed. 688.]

[See The America, Case No. 282.]

[See, also, note at end of case.]

2. That even common carriers are not held responsible for running upon rocks not generally known, and a fortiori steamtugs would not be.

3. That even though this tow was not in line with the towboat, but had sagged off towards the land, it is immaterial whether this was chargeable to the canal boat or the towboat, for there was nothing to indicate that any danger would be incurred by the sagging of the tow. So long as it was kept at a safe distance from the shore and from all other known objects, there was no negligence in any one which can be held to be the cause of the accident.

[Distinguished in The Stranger, Case No. 13,525.]

4. That the facts make out a case of misfortune, where the loss must be borne by the vessel on which it fell.

In admiralty. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Owen, Gray & Owen, for libellant.

Benedict, Tracy & Benedict, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by John B. Hinckley, the owner of the canal boat Oswego, against the towboat Angelina Corning, to recover $2,455 damages, caused by the sinking of the Oswego while being towed through the Kills by the Corning, in May, 1867. The Corning was bound from New Brunswick to New York with a tow of five boats arranged in two tiers. The first tier was composed of three boats, the Oswego being the middle one. The other two boats formed the second tier. The tide was flood, and the wind blew freshly from the N. W. After leaving Elizabeth, the tow passed by Shooters' island on the south side, and then kept towards the Staten island shore, running along that shore as near as was deemed safe in order to take advantage of the slack water there. When the tow had reached about up to the ship yard dock, which is to the west of Mushrose reef, and, according to some witnesses, shortly after the steamboat had changed her course to pass across to the Jersey shore, as is usual with such a tide, but, according to others, before the steamboat had made any such change, the Oswego, being the middle boat in the second tier, suddenly brought up hard and fast on a sunken rock whence it was found impossible to pull her off. She was accordingly left a total loss. No other boat was injured.

This rock on which the Oswego struck, as is made very clear by the evidence, was wholly unknown to navigators and to residents of the neighboring locality. It is not laid down in the charts, and there was nothing to indicate its existence to persons in charge of the Corning. Its position has since been ascertained by actual measurement to be two hundred feet out from the corner of the nearest dock, and, on examination, it proves to be a single stone about five feet square, lying several feet under water at the lowest tides. Around it on all sides the water is deep, and the ferry boats and other vessels have been accustomed to pass with safety inside of it wholly ignorant of the presence of such a danger.

No witness says that prior to this accident it was deemed unsafe for vessels to go as near the shore as this tow did, and on this occasion the striking of the canal boat on the rock was the first notice to any one of the presence of any danger.

These facts, and they are not really disputed, make a case of misfortune where the loss must be borne by the vessel on which it fell. The steamboat was not a common carrier; and to render her liable for the loss of the canal boat, it must appear to have been caused by some negligence on her part. No negligence is here shown. The tow was proceeding at a proper speed where the pilot had a right to suppose it could safely go. No known risk was run, and no needed precaution omitted.

But it is charged that it is the duty of the pilot of a towboat to see that the tow follows straight behind, and that in this case the tow was allowed to hang off some distance to leeward, and thereby the Oswego got upon the rock. Upon the evidence, I am inclined to think that shortly before the Oswego struck, the steamboat had altered her course to pass to the other side of the Kills, and it is quite certain that at the time of striking the tow was hanging off to leeward; and it is doubtless true, that had it been following directly behind the steamboat, the boats would have passed safely as the steamboat herself did. But whether this is chargeable to the pilot of the steamboat or to the men on the Oswego, is immaterial, for there was nothing to indicate that any danger would be incurred by the sagging of the tow. It is not the case of an undertaking by the pilot to execute an unusual and dangerous manoeuvre. Here the Oswego, when she struck, was where, according to all the knowledge possessed by any one, she could safely go. So long as the tow was kept at a safe distance from the shore, and from all other known objects, there was no negligence in any one which can be held to be the cause of the disaster. It was simply running on a rock which the pilot did not know of, and of which on the evidence he cannot be chargeable with knowledge. For running on rocks not generally known, even common carriers are not held responsible. Story, Bailm. § 516; Ang. Carr. § 182. A fortiori towboats should not be.

In the case of The Tempest, [Case No. 13,824,] Betts, J., the towboat was held not liable when a schooner being towed alongside was run on a rock at the foot of Tenth street.

In the case of The R. L. Stevens, the same ruling was made, although the stern tow struck a wharf. The present case seems clearly within the principle of those cases, and the result must be the same. The libel is accordingly dismissed.

[NOTE. "An engagement to tow does not impose either an obligation to insure or the liability of common carriers. The burden is always upon him who alleges the breach of such a contract to show either that there has been no attempt at performance, or that there has been negligence or unskillfulness to his injury in the performance. The contract requires no more than that he who undertakes to tow shall carry out his undertaking with that degree of caution and skill which prudent navigators usually employ in similar services. But there may be cases in which the result is a safe criterion by which to judge of the character of the act which caused it." Mr. Justice Strong, in The Webb, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 406. If a barge is sunk by contact with ice while being towed by a tug, the owner of the cargo must show negligence on the part of the tug to recover for the loss. The W. E. Gladwish, Case No. 17,355. [In admiralty. Libel for salvage by William Watson, Noyes, and others against the schooner Angeline and cargo. Decree for libellants.]

W. W. McCall, for libellants.

S. I. Douglas, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This schooner, measuring about 110 tons, bound from Wilmington to New Orleans laden with fifty barrels of tar, 100 pitch, and 400 rosin, ran ashore on the Carrysfort reef, about seven miles south of the light house, in the afternoon of the 19th instant. She had got ashore about thirty miles to the northward, early in the morning of the same day, when the libellants, Noyes of the sloop Vineyard, and Watson of the Mary H. Williams, went out to her. At the time they arrived she had been got off. The captain wanted a pilot, and asked Captain Noyes of the sloop Vineyard if he could give him a pilot. He answered "no;" they "were not pilots, but wreckers." Not getting a pilot, and not seeing his way out into the gulf, the captain undertook to come to Key West, inside the reef. He got under way and ran about thirty miles, when the vessel got ashore on one of the reefs. The captain now employed the libellants to assist him, and get him off.

The services rendered by the libellants, considered simply in themselves and unaffected by antecedent circumstances, were not of a very highly meritorious character. They consisted simply in taking out of the vessel 130 barrels of tar and rosin, which the master could have easily thrown overboard, and in good weather, heaving the vessel off. She was small, and could be easily managed by the crew of one wrecking vessel. The whole property is worth about $2,100. Under these circumstances about $400 would be a reasonable compensation for this service, but for the antecedent circumstances.

Now had the captain, Noyes, when he boarded the schooner in the morning, surrounded as she was by shoals and rocks, piloted her into the gulf, or to this port, I should not think $400 would be an unreasonable compensation, and he would in this manner have made as much by piloting this vessel, as he had any reasonable grounds for expecting he could make by getting her off the reef, in case she should get ashore. But it was the duty of the captain, Noyes, under the penalty of a diminution of compensation, to furnish a pilot, and not have replied they "were not pilots but wreckers." The licensed wreckers are pilots; and they are licensed as such to perform pilot service, as to carry out anchors and lighten vessels, and it is expected that every licensed master wrecker knows enough of the coast, and of the reef, to pilot, under ordinary circumstances, any vessel that may require their services. The amount of compensation for piloting, if not agreed upon and settled, is to be ascertained and determined in the same manner, that compensation for salvage service is determined, and the same legal remedies may be resorted to, for the recovery of the one as the other. The wreckers are not bound to pilot vessels, to point out shoals, or channels, or to give information concerning the tides gratuitously and without compensation, any more than they are bound to carry out anchors and lighten vessels without compensation, and the rendering any one of these services, at the request of the master under circumstances implying that it was not intended to be gratuitous, will entitle the wrecker, equally with any other service, to a reasonable compensation. And he is not at liberty to decline performing any minor service for a reasonable compensation in the expectation that any emergency may arise in which he may be called upon to perform greater. In the case of The Howard, [Case No. 6, 752a,] decided in 1838, (see files,) Judge Webb said: "He who holds back and quietly looks on at approaching ruin, until his own services become indispensable to the preservation of the property he sees exposed, with the expectation, that his reward will thereby be increased in proportion to the increased dangers, from which the property is ultimately rescued, will find that he is disappointed in the realization of his golden hopes, and that a display of his avarice at such a time, renders him an object of contumely and reproach." And in the case of The Montgomery, [Case No. 9,733,] the court said: "A prominent feature in the merit of the salvors, is the promptness with which their services were rendered. This is a quality highly commended in this court upon grounds of policy. A single anchor opportunely carried out, the assistance of a single wrecking vessel for half an hour, will often save a large amount of property from total loss. 'Bis dat qui cito dat.' On the other hand, tardiness in rendering such apparently slight, but really valuable, services, is severely reprehended."

In the present case, I think it was as much the duty of Captains Noyes and Watson both to offer their services as pilots to the master of the schooner, when they saw, that he needed such services, as it would be their duty to offer their services to lighten his vessel, and carry out his anchors, and get him off the reef, when they saw his vessel to be ashore. It was his duty, if he wanted a pilot, to ask for one, and to manifest a willingness to pay a reasonable compensation for his services; or to refer the amount to the proper legal tribunal; and it was their duty, when they saw the situation of his vessel to be such as to need a pilot, to offer their services as such pilots,—whether he asked for a pilot or not. Under the circumstances, I think one hundred dollars is a reasonable remuneration for the services rendered.

Mr. Stacy, for the motion.

Mr. Walker, opposed.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. That the provisions of the recent act requiring one-fourth in number and one-third in amount, of the creditors, to join in an involuntary petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, were intended to apply, and can and must be applied to all cases commenced between December 1st, 1873, and the passage of that act, in which there has been no adjudication, I entertain no doubt; and it has been so held by the district court for the northern district of Illinois. In re Scammon, [Case No. 12,430.] But the question here goes beyond that. It is whether those provisions were intended to apply, and can be applied, to cases so commenced, which had passed into judgment before the passage of the act. The act cannot be given the application and effect contended for, because it involves the vacating and annulling the judgment of the court, and granting a new trial. No rule of constitutional law is better settled than that, in a constitutional government, with a division of powers, like that of the United States, no legislative enactment can have the effect and operation to annul the judgment of a court already rendered, or grant a new trial, especially as it respects adjudications upon the private rights of parties. "When they have passed into judgment," says Justice Nelson, in State v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., cited below, "the right becomes absolute, and it is the duty of the court to enforce it." Cooley, Const. Lim. 93-95, and cases cited; State v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421, 431, and see also the dissenting opinions of Justices McLean, Grier, and Wayne, at pages 437, 449; Moser v. White, [29 Mich. 59,] decided by the supreme court of Michigan, at the January term of 1874, not yet reported.

Courts will not presume that congress intended to exceed its powers, or in any manner to invade the domain of the judiciary, unless such intent is clearly expressed by the words used, or by necessary implication. The words used in a statute may be broad enough, and they probably are in the statute under consideration, to admit of such a construction; but the courts will in no case give them a construction that involves the exercise of an excess of power, where, by a more limited application of them, such exercise of power is not involved. In the present instance the enactment in question is given full effect, and in my opinion all the effect congress intended it should have, by applying and limiting it to cases still pending, and undisposed of by adjudication. It is abundantly evident that congress did not intend these provisions to apply to cases already adjudicated, for the following reasons: First. It was not in their power to do so, as already shown. Second. They did not so expressly enact. Third. The provisions can have full and consistent effect without giving them such application. Fourth. They made no provision for the saving of rights accrued, or acts done under adjudications in cases where the proceedings might, under the provisions in question, eventually fail and be dismissed. And this has still greater force from the further fact that they did make such saving provision in case of a discontinuance of proceedings as provided by section 14. Other reasons will readily suggest themselves, but the foregoing I consider conclusive. I hold, therefore, that the provisions in question apply only to cases where the petition for adjudication is still pending, and not to cases in which adjudications had passed upon the petition before the approval of the act. It results that the motion must be denied. Ordered accordingly.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—COMPENSATION—SETTLEMENT BY CLIENT—COSTS—ESTOPPEL.

1. The proctor of the libellant, having given notice to the respondent that he should ask only for a decree for costs, cannot at the hearing proceed for damages.

2. A proctor who has commenced a suit for a seaman, upon a just claim, may proceed for costs, after a settlement made by the parties, without his knowledge. In admiralty.

A. Mackie, for libellant.

H. G. O. Colby, for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a libel in personam for damages, by a seaman, against the master of the whale ship Jasper. It was commenced on the 16th of April last. On the 18th, a settlement was made with the libellant, by Mr. Gibbs, the ship's agent, and Mr. Coggeshall, an out-fitter, as he is called, both acting for the master. The counsel for the libellant contends, that this settlement should be set aside, and the cause heard upon its original merits, and that if this be refused, he is at least entitled to a decree for costs.

As to the first point, it is admitted that on the 20th of April, formal notice was given to the respondent, by the proctor for the libellant, that he should thereafter proceed for costs only. It is now urged, that this notice was given under a misapprehension of facts. But there was no revocation of that notice, nor was the respondent in any way informed, until the hearing began, that there was to be anything in contestation, but the costs. He certainly could not then be required to meet any other question. No continuance or postponement of the hearing has been asked; and the libellant cannot now be permitted to proceed, on his original claim for damages.

The matter of costs stands on very different ground; that claim has always been insisted on. The libellant had recently returned from a whaling voyage, for which the whole amount due to him was only four dollars and some cents. He was destitute. His residence was in the western part of New York. He applied to Mr. Mackie, to obtain redress for wrongs alleged to have been inflicted by the master, during the voyage, and on the 16th of April this suit was commenced. On the day following, a warrant was put into the hands of a deputy marshal at New Bedford. On the 18th, while the marshal was in pursuit of the respondent, the libellant being in Coggeshall's store, there stated his pecuniary distress, and his purpose of prosecuting the captain. Coggeshall immediately went to Mr. Gibbs, the ship's agent; and as soon as the latter could procure a formal receipt to be written by a professional gentleman, it was delivered to Coggeshall, who returned to the store, and procured the libellant's signature thereto, upon paying him eight or ten dollars, and Angell forthwith left New Bedford. The master, after this settlement, and while ignorant of it, was arrested on the warrant, at his house, four miles from New Bedford, between two and three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day. No service was made on the mate. The receipt embraced all claims against both the master and mate. It is urged that the proctor ought not to be permitted to proceed for costs, because neither the respondent, nor his agent, had any knowledge that a suit had been commenced, or costs incurred, and that this case does not come under the decisions in The Planet, [Case No. 11,204;] Brooks v. Snell. [Id. 1,961.] Coggeshall and Gibbs knew that Mr. Mackie had been employed to institute a suit against the respondent, and that he had his residence and office in New Bedford; yet the receipt was obtained, without notice to him, or any inquiry as to what measures he had taken. I am satisfied that the settlement was designedly made, without the knowledge of the proctor, and if there was any want of information, as to what had been done by him in prosecution of the claim, it was a voluntary and intentional ignorance. The actors in this transaction, who by prior authority, or subsequent ratification, must be deemed the agents of the respondent, had ample notice to put them upon inquiry, and the means of full information at hand.

The actual expenses, which had been incurred by the proctor for clerk's and officer's fees, exceeded the whole amount paid to the libellant; according to the principles which have heretofore been recognized and practically applied in this court, he ought to have a decree for costs. Such a rule of proceeding is necessary, not merely for the protection of proctors as officers of the court, but still more for the sake of seamen themselves. They often arrive after long voyages, with just claims against officers of the ship, but without means and without friends. Their owners, who, as common employers, ought to desire equal justice to all who have served them, too often, without inquiry, take part at once against the seamen, and actively endeavor to defeat their claim. Sometimes they even withhold the wages actually due, in order to coerce them, by their necessities, to a surrender of their just rights. See The Commerce, [Case No. 3,054,] for the forms of receipts printed on the back of the shipping articles.

If a proctor, after investigating these claims and instituting legal proceedings, may, by a settlement intentionally made behind his back, be defrauded, not only of all compensation for his services, but even of moneys necessarily advanced, it will tend to discourage the honorable practitioner from attempting to vindicate these rights, and to throw the seaman upon those who will speculate upon his necessities. It is desirable, too, that adjustments with seamen should be made under the supervision of some one, both disposed and competent to see that justice is done to them. I am aware that those against whom sailors seek indemnity, are oftentimes more than displeased at the interference of any member of the bar, and attempt to disparage him by epithets, as engaging in a disreputable branch of the profession; but in this court such attempts are utterly futile. I know of nothing more meritorious in the practice of the law, than the obtaining, by fair and honorable means, redress for wrongs and oppression suffered by ignorant, destitute, homeless, and friendless seamen. It is not controverted that the libellant had sufficient grounds for the commencement of this suit.

IN BANKRUPTCY—SALE BY ASSIGNEE OF REAL ESTATE—RIGHT OF DOWER.

[Where a wife's right of dower is established by the decisions of the court against the assignee in insolvency, an exception to the confirmation of the sale of certain real estate, by the purchaser, on the ground that such sale was subject to the dower right, when it was stated at the sale that the property would be conveyed free from all incumbrances, will be sustained.]

[In bankruptcy. On motion to confirm the sale of an assignee of certain real estate of the bankrupt. Exception was made by the purchaser against the confirmation, on the ground that the sale did not discharge the dower right of the wife, as the terms of the sale provided. Exception sustained.]

A sale was made by an assignee in bankruptcy of real estate of the bankrupt. It was stated at the sale that the title should be clear of all charge and encumbrances.

On a motion to confirm the sale, an exception was filed by the purchaser, that the wife of the bankrupt if she survived him would be entitled to dower.

George L. Crawford, for the exception.—The case is ruled in principle by Eberle v. Fisher, 1 Harris, [13 Pa. St.] 526.

David W. Sellers, for the assignee.—Where the estate of the debtor is divested by operation of law dower is barred. The act of 1867 divests the estate as much as a sale for the payment of debts. The exceptions in section 14 do not save the rights of married women. The act of 1841 did; and hence the ruling in Worcester v. Clarke, 2 Grant, [Cas.] 84, does not apply.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The wife's right of dower having been established by the Pennsylvania decisions against the assignee in insolvency, there is no doubt that the purchaser's objection to the title is valid.

COLLISION WHILE COMING INTO DOCK—STRENGTH OF HAWSER.

A tug was sent in to the far end of a slip, with a hawser, to aid in hauling in a steamship which was backing into the slip. The motion of the steamship was intended to be checked by a spring line, but it parted, and the steamship backed into the tug and injured her: Held, that the steamship was responsible for the strength of the line, and was liable for the damages.

In admiralty. This was an action brought by the owner of the tug A. G. Cattell, to recover for the damages occasioned to her by a collision between her and the steamer Anglia, which occurred while the Anglia was backing into her place alongside of a pier in the North river. The libel alleges that the tug was employed to take a hawser from the steamer and carry it up the dock, and did so, the steamer backing in at the time; and that the steamer backed in so fast and so far, although hailed to stop, that the tug was unable to escape, but was crushed by the steamer's stern. The answer denied any negligence on the part of the steamer, and alleged that the tug was herself negligent, in that, although she knew the steamer was going to back in, she went in herself directly astern of the steamer, instead of going in under her quarter, so as to be out of the way. [Decree for libellant.]

W. R. Beebe, for libellant.

Henry Nicoll, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The tug went in behind the Anglia, as the latter was backing in, at the direction of the dock superintendent of the line to which the Anglia belonged, to carry to the wharf the hawser from the Anglia. There was nothing improper in her doing so, although the Anglia was all the time backing in. It clearly appears, from the evidence, that the Anglia would not have come back against the tug if the spring line by which the movement astern of the Anglia was being checked had not parted. The Anglia is responsible for the parting of that line. The tug was in a position in the rear of where the stern of the Anglia would have been if she had not, from the parting of the spring line, gone back to a distance greater than was necessary or customary to enable her to lie in her proper and usual berth with reference to the outer end of the pier. The Anglia must be held responsible for the damage, and there must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by the libellant.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured by the same United States war vessel, and almost simultaneously with the seizure of the steamer Scotia and cargo. The summary statement of that case tallies so closely, in the leading facts, with this, that a repetition of them will be tautological, unless the judgment of the court is to be reviewed on appeal, when the reasons inducing it will be more largely set forth. The voyage named in the papers in this case is, first, from Liverpool to Nassau, and thence, if required, to ports in the West India Islands, and back to ports in Europe. The whole representation of the adventure, upon the ship's papers, is more formal and mercantile than in the case of the Scotia; but the testimony of the witnesses examined, including the master, the mate and the pilot, concurs in stating, unreservedly, that although the ostensible voyage described on the papers was from Nassau to St. John, N. B., yet the real destination was to Charleston, and that the vessel was captured while attempting to enter that port. All concerned in the voyage knew that the port was blockaded. Upon the general principles declared in the case of the Scotia, a decree of condemnation and forfeiture is also rendered against the steamer Anglia and cargo.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas. 566.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1863.

PRIZE—VESSELS ENTITLED TO SHARE IN—PRACTICE—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. The proper practice suggested on references to ascertain what vessels are entitled to share in a prize.

2. The right to all prize captures vests primarily in the government; and individuals derive no benefit from them, except by means of positive grant from the public authority.

3. Every vessel of a blockading squadron is bound to do all in its power in the service to be performed, and the law presumes that that obligation is fulfilled, unless the contrary be proved.

4. A rule is different with respect to joint associations or enterprises for war purposes by privateers or cruisers owned by individuals.

5. The doctrine of reasonable or equitable reward has no place in an inquiry as to the distribution of prize money to national vessels under the statutes on that subject.

6. The single fact that a vessel is one of a common force does not constitute her a participant in the prize shares obtained by the separate members of the force.

7. It must also be shown that the vessel was "in sight" or "within signal distance" of the occurrence out of which the taking of the prize was realized.

8. She must have been so situated as to be able, of her own accord, to contribute direct assistance to the captors by deterring the enemy from resistance, or by aiding physically in overcoming such resistance; and the vessel to be aided must have possessed the means of communicating intelligent directions to the one whose aid was needed.

9. The acts of congress on the subject contemplate that the vessels should be in view of each other in order to correctly receive and respond to the signals given.

10. Under those acts, a vessel, in order to be entitled to share in the proceeds of prize property, must show that she was within signal distance of the vessel making the prize, in circumstances which might have justified the capturing vessel in demanding and expecting her assistance.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessels having been captured and condemned as prize, the appropriate proceedings were taken to determine the ultimate disposition of the prize proceeds. The right to all captures vests primarily in the government. Individuals derive no benefit from them, except by means of positive grant from the public authority. Hal. Law War, c. 30, §§ 3, 4; 2 Willm. Int. Law, c. 9.

The statutory provisions governing the subject in the United States are very concise, but are in the most essential point deficient in the perspicuity and exactness desirable for practical and useful ends. The first regulation of the matter by congress was in the act of March 2, 1799, (1 Stat. 715, § 6,) and was this: "The produce of prizes taken by the ships of the United States" shall "be proportioned and distributed," and (article 9) "whenever one or more ships of the United States are in sight at the time of any one or more other ships, as aforesaid, are taking a prize or prizes, or being engaged with an enemy, and they shall all be so in sight when the enemy shall strike or surrender, they shall share equally," &c. The act of April 23, 1800, (2 Stat. 53, § 6, art. 7,) repeats substantially the last provision in the same language. The act of July 17, 1862, (12 Stat. 606, § 3, subd. 4,) varies the phraseology in respect to the position of the capturing vessels with relation to each other, and directs that "when one or more vessels of the navy shall be within signal distance of another making a prize, all shall share in the prize," &c.

After the condemnation of the two above-named prizes, the directions of the 4th section of the act of March 25, 1862, (12 Stat. 375,) supplied the governing criterion to be pursued. The prize commissioners in this case were directed by the court "to proceed to take and report the requisite evidence to the court, to the end that a final decree may determine what public ships of the United States are entitled to share in the prize and whether the prize was of superior, equal or inferior force to the vessel or vessels making the capture." The commissioners sent to the court, in effect, their opinion or judgment upon the interpretation and scope of the law, and also a report of the evidence collected by them, determining, in result, that only two vessels, the Restless and the Flag, were entitled to share in either of the prizes, and that those two vessels were entitled to share in both.

It is not material to the case to consider the point discussed on the argument on this application, whether it is within the province of the commissioners to report to the court their judgment or conclusions as to the effect of the testimony taken by them on the questions brought to their attention, because it is indubitably within the competency of the court to adjudge definitively the subject under inquiry, whether by way of exception to the decision of the commissioners, or as an original point arising out of the proofs.

The two prizes were captured whilst attempting to evade the blockade of the port of Charleston. There is no question as to the justness of the report of the commissioners as to the title of the Restless and the Flag to participate in the proceeds of the prize taken. The matter of difference and discussion between the counsel relates to the exclusion of the two other vessels from the class of share-takers.

The Housatonic and the Flambeau were two members of the blockading squadron, stationed off Charleston at the time the Anglia and the Scotia were captured as prize by the Restless and the Flag, and claims are interposed in their behalf before the prize commissioners as entitled to share in the distribution of the above prizes. The report of the commissioners is adverse to the claims of the Housatonic and the Flambeau. The counsel for the latter vessel except thereto, in substance, and appeal to the court against such decision, demanding that those vessels be decreed a title to share in the proceeds of the capture; the Housatonic because she was in sight of the prize when taken, and the Flambeau because she was within signal distance of both at the same time.

It will be needless now to debate the point of practice, whether under the special enactment of the 4th section of the act of March 25, 1862, (12 Stat. 375.) or according to the regular course of procedure in prize practice, there should be in the first instance a formal reference of the subject by the court to the prize commissioners to obtain their decision explicitly on the point, and then a review thereof before the court, by way of exceptions, as is the accustomed method in admiralty proceedings; because the substantial end to be attained, in either mode of practice, is effected by obtaining from the court a decision at large upon the facts and the law involved in the report of the prize commissioners. It may not be irrelevant to observe, however, that it would conduce to perspicuity and conciseness in this class of references to have them mutual between the government and the captors, and then that the judgment of the court in settlement of differences as to law or fact, arising between the parties on the reference, should be sought for, as in admiralty practice, by specific exceptions filed.

The contestant parties in the present issues are the representatives of the Restless and the Flag, the vessels which actually arrested the prizes, and those of the Housatonic and the Flambeau, vessels which composed in part, with the other two, the forces which invested Charleston, and were on their stations adjacent to that port when the prizes were taken. Accordingly, the broad proposition is raised for consideration in these proceedings, whether on the whole case reported, the Housatonic and the Flambeau are entitled to share in the proceeds of these prizes.

The prize vessels were both of them captured in Bull's bay. At that time the Flambeau was stationed at Maffit's channel, off Charleston, sixteen miles distant from the place of capture. No signals were seen from the capturing vessels by the Flambeau at the time of capture. Several witnesses express the opinion that the Flambeau was within signal distance of the two prizes, the Anglia and the Scotia; and other witnesses, equally well situated to judge, express the opinion that neither the Housatonic nor the Flambeau was in sight, or within signal distance of the prizes or of the captor vessels at the time of the capture. The Housatonic is not proved to have been nearer to the scene of the transaction than the Flambeau. No evidence is given by the Housatonic or the Flambeau of any act of co-operation performed by either of them, in the capture of the Anglia or the Scotia, other than being at their stations in the blockading squadron, at a distance of about sixteen miles; nor is it shown that either of them saw or was seen by the prize vessels or the captor vessels at the time of the capture. The opinion is given by some of the witnesses that the stations of the Housatonic and the Flambeau were within signal distance, but no evidence is given that either of those vessels was at the time in sight of the transaction, whether that view is measured from the position of the prizes or that of the vessels claiming to share in their proceeds. The opinions given by the witnesses in that respect are not the result of actual experience, but are conjectural and from estimate only; and the statutory provisions are not clear of ambiguity, whether both the capturing and captured vessels are not to be, throughout the transaction, mutually within sight or signal distance.

The entire capture-being, by the principles of prize law, the property of the government, national vessels are not entitled to compensation out of the proceeds, except by express grant. Every vessel of a blockading squadron is bound to do all in its power in the service to be performed, and the law presumes that that obligation is fulfilled, unless the contrary be proved. The rule is different with respect to joint associations, or enterprises for war purposes, by privateers, or cruisers owned by individuals. Wheat. Mar. Capt. 287; Hal. Law War, c. 30, § 7. The doctrine of reasonable or equitable reward has, therefore no place in the inquiry before the court. It must be determined from the proofs before the court, whether the parties who claim an award of compensation out of the prizes, bring themselves within the terms and purpose of the statutory enactments upon the subject. It is plain that the grant of shares in prize moneys to vessels which are not the direct captors, is one of limitation and restriction. The single fact, that a vessel is one of a common force squadron, or other association or denomination, does not constitute her a participant in the prize shares obtained by the separate members of the body or force. The claimant must show the additional qualification, that her position was in sight, or within signal distance of the occurrence out of which the taking of the prize was realized. If the designations of the vessel, in the several statutes, as being "in sight," or "within signal distance," are regarded as equivalent descriptions, their natural import would seem to be, that the vessel must be so situated as to be of her own accord and discretion, able to contribute direct assistance to the captors, or to comply with any signal call given to her, by determining the enemy from resistance, or by aiding, physically, in overcoming such resistance, and, accordingly, that the vessel or vessels to be aided must possess the means of communicating intelligent directions to the one whose aid is needed. To accomplish that, to any valuable end, it would appear that the acts of congress must contemplate that the vessels should be in view of each other, in order to correctly receive and respond to the notices or signals given. The provisions in the acts of 1799 and 1800 manifest the purpose of congress to limit the distribution of prize shares to such vessels of the navy only as are able to co-operate in promoting captures set on foot in sight of each other—that is, they must be, at least, in a condition to contribute immediate concert of action in the undertaking, if required by an associate vessel. In my opinion, the phrase, "within signal distance" employed in the act of 1862, in place of the prior expression, "within sight," may have been substituted as carrying within it a like import with the antecedent one, with, perhaps, a stronger significance, that proximity of position, in relation to the capturing vessels, must be such as to render intercommunication with the different consorts practicable and intelligible. The mere variation of phraseology, in a revision or re-enactment of statutory law, is not regarded as a revocation of the law, unless plainly so expressed. Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 428-430, and notes.

This construction of the law precludes the claim advanced in favor of the Housatonic and the Flambeau—that they stood, at the time, connected in this service, under the relation of a joint enterprise, and that each is entitled to share in its advantages, upon the principles governing that class of associations.

Under the provisions of the English prize acts, the donation of prize proceeds was made to the takers. The English law courts had regarded the grant as comprehending, beyond the actual captors, those, also, who constructively contributed to the taking of the prize. But Sir William Scott is inclined to concur in the more recent views of the tribunals, that the limitation of the prize law should not be extended but should be rather more closely restrained to the terms of the acts. The Vryheid, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 22. He refers to the case of The Mars, note, [see note at end of case,] as fixing the doctrine, that several public ships, occupied in a common purpose, that is, to enforce a blockade, do not share as joint captors in a prize made by one of the number when they are not present at the capture. The La Flore, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 268. The same interpretation of the rule is applied by American writers; and the only vessels held to be entitled to share in a prize are those which are in sight at the time of the capture, their presence lending a constructive assistance to the capture. Wheat. Mar. Capt. c. 9, art. 20; Hal. Law War, c. 30, §§ 6, 7. The mere physical ability to discern the prize, or even the seeing her from the mast-head not imparting the ability to contribute assistance in making the capture, does not seem to have been recognized, in any authoritative case, as evidence of constructive assistance to another ship in effecting a capture. Upt. Mar. Warf. & Pr. (2d Ed.) 204-220.

The provision in the act of congress of July 17, 1862, (12 Stat. 606, § 3, subd. 4,) that, "when one or more vessels of the navy shall be within signal distance of another making a prize, all shall share in the prize," &c., affords no indication that the established rules in regard to joint captors in prize cases are intended to be changed, or that investments of enemy ports by fleets or squadrons or united navy forces, are to be deemed joint expeditions or enterprises, and subject to the regulations applicable to naval services of that denomination. It will not be implied, constructively, that assistance has been rendered by a ship not palpably contributing to the capture of another, unless she was within signal distance of the one making the prize, in circumstances which might have justified the capturing ship in demanding and expecting her assistance, and the prize vessel in apprehending her interference. These facts must be affirmatively proved by the vessel claiming to share in the proceeds of the prize property taken.

I think that, in the present instance, the claims of the Housatonic and the Flambeau have been correctly disallowed by the prize commissioners.

[NOTE. A note to The Vryheid, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 22, refers to the case of The Mars as follows: "Lords, 1760. This was a case of a French ship taken by one of three king's ships, which, being apprized of the design of the enemy to escape from Port au Prince, had taken their station at different outlets to intercept them. The capture was made by one ship. A claim was given on behalf of the other two to share as joint captors, though not present at the capture, but it was rejected."]

Case No. 392.

ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK v. MAHONEY MIN. CO.

[5 Sawy. 255; 6 Reporter, 705.]¹

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 26, 1878.²

CORPORATION—RATIFICATION—DECISION OF COURT
—WHEN OPERATIVE—KNOWLEDGE OF DIRECTORS.

1. Where the bank account of a mining company is overdrawn by its president and secretary, without special authority of its directors, the company will, notwithstanding, be held liable for the overdraft, if their acts in this respect be subsequently ratified by the directors. Such ratification may be made by their ordering the issue of a note of the company for the amount overdrawn.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Where a case is tried by a court without a jury, the decision of the court is not operative and binding, until reduced to form and filed or entered of record. Accordingly, where the district court of the state on the twenty-first of June announced its decision declaring that the election of directors of a mining company, then in office, was illegal and void, and that they should be removed from office, and on the same day its findings and decree carrying this decision into effect were prepared and dated, but were not filed with the clerk until June 22: Held, That the decree did not take effect until thus filed; and that until then the ousted directors were officers de facto, capable of ratifying the action of its president and secretary in overdrawing its bank account, and of ordering a note of the company to be issued for the amount.

3. The fact that the directors, or some of them, were informed of the decision announced by the court when they passed the resolution ordering the note to be issued, does not impair the efficacy of the resolution as a ratification of the action of the president and secretary in making the overdraft.

[At law. Action by the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, against the Mahoney Mining Company on a promissory note. Trial to the court. Judgment for plaintiff. The defendant afterwards appealed to the supreme court, and the judgment was affirmed. Mahoney Min. Co. v. Anglo-Californian Bank, 104 U. S. 192.]

The facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Wm. H. Sharp, for plaintiff.

Wm. M. Stewart, for defendant.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff is a corporation created under the laws of Great Britain. The defendant is a corporation formed under the laws of California. This action is brought to recover the sum of six thousand three hundred fifty-one dollars and seventy-two cents, alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, with interest from June 21, 1877. It was commenced in a district court of the state, and, on petition of the defendant, was removed to the circuit court of the United States. The complaint contains two counts, one for moneys loaned the defendant and moneys expended for its use; the other for an amount due upon a promissory note of the defendant for seven thousand five hundred dollars, bearing date the twenty-first of June, 1877, payable in gold coin one day after date, with interest at the rate of one and one half per cent. a month until paid.

It appears in evidence that from the original organization of the Mahoney Mining Company, up to the twenty-second of June, 1877, the Anglo-Californian Bank acted as its treasurer. Its moneys were from time to time deposited with the bank, and drawn out on checks of the company signed by its president and secretary. The account taken from the books of the bank, the correctness of which is not disputed, shows a series of deposits made by the company from January 8, 1874, to June 5, 1877, inclusive, and a series of its checks paid by the bank from January 19, 1874, to June 27, 1877, inclusive. Upon this account a balance appears to be due the plaintiff at this latter date, after proper allowances of interest, amounting to the sum demanded in this suit. Of this sum only thirty-two dollars and thirteen cents were paid after the removal of the directors, as hereafter mentioned.

On the twenty-first of June, 1877, at a special meeting of the directors of the mining company, held in the afternoon of that day, its president informed them that the account of the company at the bank was overdrawn to the amount of six thousand three hundred and nineteen dollars and fifty-nine cents, and that the managers of the bank required either the money, or a note of the company. A resolution was thereupon adopted authorizing the president and secretary to execute the note in suit. It was made for the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars, to cover not merely the amount overdrawn, but other anticipated advances. It is admitted by the counsel of the plaintiff that the note can be enforced only for the amount then due, with subsequent interest to date, and he asks a recovery thereon only to that extent.

The liability of the defendant for the amount overdrawn is denied on the ground that its president and secretary were not empowered to overdraw its account with the bank, and thus incur a debt for the company without special authorization of its directors; and that the attempted ratification of their action in this respect by the passage of the resolution on the twenty-first of June, 1877, and the execution of the note in suit, was ineffectual for any purpose, on the alleged ground that the directors had been at that time by judicial decree removed from office.

It may be true, as contended by counsel, that the president and secretary of the defendant were not empowered to overdraw its account, and that without special authority of its directors they could not in this way impose a liability upon the company. We do not deem it important to question the correctness of the position; we are inclined to the opinion that it is sound. The company will, however, be held liable for the amount, if the acts of its president and secretary in this respect were subsequently ratified by its directors. Such ratification might have been made directly by a resolution in terms approving of their action, or it might have been made indirectly by ordering the payment of the overdraft, or the issue of evidences of the liability of the company for the amount in the form of a note or bond. The latter mode was pursued; and it accomplished the purpose designed, if the directors who acted in passing the resolution mentioned were then in office. That resolution was a clear recognition and approval of the conduct of the president and secretary, if the directors were at the time capable of acting. The question, therefore, is whether they were then in office.

It appears that in a suit instituted in a district court of the state to remove the directors, a decision was rendered on the twenty-first of June, 1877, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, declaring that the election of the directors then in office was illegal and void, and that a meeting called for an election of directors on a subsequent day was legal and valid; and that the findings and decree of the court carrying this decision into effect were prepared and dated the same day, but were not filed with the clerk and entered of record until the following day, June 22. The question, therefore, is: when did this decree operate to oust the directors from office? when, in other words, did it take effect? For until then the parties ousted were officers de facto, holding under color of an election, having charge of the affairs of the company, and capable of binding it in all matters legitimately devolving upon directors of the company. Baird v. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. & R. 411; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 21 Pa. St. 131.

It seems to us clear that the decree did not take effect until it was regularly filed, or entered of record. Until it left the possession of the judge of the court, he could change it in any and all particulars; he could add to it, or limit, or reverse it. By the oral decision he had only announced his opinion; that opinion did not take the form of an authoritative decree until it had been filed with the clerk, and thus became a matter of record. Until then it was not binding upon any one. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and in such cases its findings must precede the entry of the decree, and the statute requires that they shall be filed with the clerk. Code Civil Proc., § 632.

The case cited by counsel from the supreme court of Vermont (Town of Huntington v. Town of Charlotte, 15 Vt. 50) does not, in our judgment, militate against these views. The opinion of the court in that case had reference to the formal enrollment of the decree, for it says that the decree was, for all the purposes intended, good when passed, that is, when reduced to form, and approved by the judge; and the question was, whether the omission of the clerk to formally spread it on the records prevented it from taking effect at the time when it was thus rendered. The court held that it did not; that the efficacy of the judgment did not depend upon the action of a functionary who had nothing to do with its rendition, and who, by law, was vested with no power or authority but the mere ministerial duty of enrolling it. We see nothing to question in this decision, but it has no application to the case at bar. Here there was nothing with reference to which the clerk could act at all until the findings and decree were filed by the district judge. Until then there was no legal form given to the decision of the court. The findings prepared required, under the statute, the signature of the judge, and their previous filing was essential to the entry of any judgment. The clerk could not add the signature of that officer, even if he could have drawn up in form the conclusions which the court had announced. See Whitney v. Belden, 4 Paige, 140; and 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1217.

The fact that the directors, or some of them, were informed of the decision announced by the judge of the district court, when the resolution was passed, does not change the efficacy of the resolution as a ratification of the action of the president and secretary in making the overdraft. They knew that the decision was not necessarily final; that it might possibly be changed upon petition of counsel, or upon the judge's own motion. They knew at least that a decision announced was not a decree entered, and they were not required to govern their action as though the one was equally operative as the other upon their position and rights as directors.

It is also contended by counsel of the defendant, that the resolution was ineffectual as a ratification, on the alleged ground that it was passed while an order, made in another suit by a state court, was in force restraining the parties from acting as directors. That case was subsequently abandoned; and it is stated by counsel of the plaintiff here, that the order was at the time discharged. But assuming that it was not discharged when the resolution was passed, we do not see how it can be held to have affected the plaintiff, not a party to the suit. The parties disobeying the order may have been proceeded against as for a contempt in the state court, but the order could not impair the efficacy of their action with a third party.

Upon a careful consideration of the whole case, we have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant upon the note for the amount of the overdraft, as shown by the account, and expressed in the resolution of the twenty-first of June, 1877, namely, the sum of six thousand three hundred and nineteen dollars and fifty-nine cents, with interest at the rate specified. Findings will be filed to that effect, and judgment entered thereon.

[NOTE. The judgment in this case was affirmed by the supreme court. Mahoney Min. Co. v. Anglo-California Bank, 104 U. S. 192. Touching upon the liability of the mining company for the amount of any overdraft checks of its president and secretary, Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, said that the mining company had power, under its charter, to borrow money "for use in its corporate business, and since an indebtedness thus created would, in the usual course of business, be evidenced by the checks of its president and secretary, the presumption should be indulged, not only that those officers, in making an overdraft, did not exceed their authority, but that the moneys thus obtained were paid over to or received by the company. * * * That presumption, if not, under the special circumstances of this case, conclusive, might have been overthrown by affirmative proof of want of authority, express or implied. * * * There is, however, no such proof in this case. * * * And the finding that 'no resolution or special authority of the defendant was shown authorizing its president or secretary, or either of them, to overdraw its account in bank,' fairly interpreted, means nothing more than that no proof was made, either way, on that point.]"

The ANGLO NORMAN.

[4 Sawy. 185.]

District Court, D. California. Feb. 8, 1877.

CARRIER OF PASSENGERS—"SEEN DANGERS"—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. The carrier of passengers is bound to exact care in providing the proper means of approaching his vessel, and of ascending to or descending from it. But this duty only arises where by contract or usage he is required to be in readiness to receive his passengers.

2. Where a passenger voluntarily encounters "a seen danger," and receives an injury in consequence of his own carelessness or awkwardness: Held, that he is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover.

In admiralty.

C. T. Botts and D. T. Sullivan, for libellants.

C. Temple Emmet, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. I have carefully perused the voluminous depositions taken in this case, and the elaborate briefs of the advocates.

I see no reason to modify the opinion intimated at the hearing, to the effect that the gangway, in passing over which the accident occurred, was not such a means of getting on board his vessel as the carrier was bound to provide. His contract and his duty as a carrier exacted the exercise of the utmost diligence and the employment of every means in his power to insure the safety of the passengers. The duty of a carrier of passengers requires him to exercise this diligence, not only in regard to the construction of his vehicle and its management after the passenger has come on board, but also in providing proper means of approaching it, and of ascending to and descending from it.

Thus, when a steamer took on board passengers from a hulk which the latter were obliged to cross to get on board, the carrier was held liable for injuries sustained by a passenger by falling down a hatchway negligently left uncovered.

If, then, the libellant in this case had repaired at the usual or appointed hour to the customary place of embarkation, and finding no other means of getting on board had, with due care, attempted to use the gangway constructed as described in this case, and had been injured in the attempt, I should have little doubt that the carrier would have been liable. It was not so obviously unsafe and dangerous as to indicate fool-hardiness on the libellant's part in attempting to use it rather than lose his passage. Any person of ordinary caution and prudence would probably have made a similar attempt. It had frequently been used on previous occasions by visitors to the ship, and twice by the libellant himself and his wife.

But the question in the case is, had the libellant the right, under the circumstances, to demand and expect that the carrier should be prepared to receive him as a passenger, and make that careful provision for his safety which the law exacts of him when he has entered upon the performance of his contract? The vessel lay at a wharf at the upper end of Darling harbor, above Darling harbor bridge, through which she passed by a draw-bridge. This wharf belonged to a railroad company, and was used exclusively in its business. The Anglo Norman was the first vessel of her size which had ever lain at the wharf; she was under charter, and had gone there to receive her cargo. The wharf was, as one of libellant's witnesses remarks, in "an out of the way place." It was approached by means of the railroad track which ran along it, and it could only be reached by climbing up some four feet and using the apertures between the timbers of which the wharf was constructed as steps. The testimony is clear that except in case of steamers and coasters having their own wharves, sea-going vessels almost invariably received their passengers after they hauled into the bay opposite the town, the passengers being conveyed to them in wherries, or, if numerous, in a tug. It is urged that the libellant had no knowledge of this usage. But it was his business to ascertain when and how, according to the custom of the place, passengers were to go on board the vessel.

It appears to me that, under these circumstances, the libellant had no right to expect that the carrier should make the same provision for his safe ingress to the vessel as if the wharf had been in the usual place from which passengers were received on board, and the gangway the only means of getting on board furnished or contemplated by the carrier. I do not mean to assert that the libellant is to be regarded as a trespasser. He is to be regarded rather as a visitor, but not as entitled at that time to exact of the carrier the performance of his contract with that extraordinary diligence which the stringent rules of law require the carrier of passengers to exercise.

Undoubtedly, if the gangway had contained some secret defect, if the planks had been rotten or insecurely fastened, so as to create an unknown and unsuspected danger, the carrier would have been responsible. But it was exactly what it purported to be. The danger, if any, of using it with due circumspection, was apparent. That that danger was not great is shown by the fact that it was used on several previous occasions by the libellant and other visitors to the ship.

It would seem that if the accident had occurred to the libellant on any of his previous visits, he would have had the same right to recover as he now contends for, which would be in effect to declare that at all times after the passengers had engaged their passage, the ship was bound to furnish and maintain the same commodious and perfectly safe means of getting on board that she would be bound to provide after she had announced her readiness to receive the passengers, and to enter upon the performance of her contract, or after she was in such a position as, by the usage of the port, it would become her duty to receive them.

But if this view be erroneous, and if it be admitted that the ship was guilty of some negligence, it seems clear, under the authorities, that the libellant was guilty of contributory negligence. His negligence consisted either in attempting to use the gangway at all, if it was as unsafe as he now contends, or else in his manner of using it. It has already been observed that the insufficiency of the gangway, if it was insufficient, was apparent. That insufficiency consisted in its narrowness and the absence of rails.

The libellant, therefore, voluntarily encountered a "seen danger." The case seems closely analogous to that of the miner who persisted in working after being apprised that the supports of the mine were insecure, or to the numerous cases where passengers have attempted to alight from railroad cars when in motion. In some of these cases, the injured party has been held guilty of contributory negligence, notwithstanding that the carrier was in fault in not stopping, or in running by the station. In this case, the libellant was under no necessity of using the gangway. He could have waited and come on board the ship as the other passengers did, after she had come round to the bay opposite the town, or he could have demanded that other means of coming on board should be provided. There is some evidence tending to show that he was informed that the vessel was not ready to receive him. This he denies. It is apparent from all the circumstances that the master did not then expect passengers to come on board, or consider himself bound to provide for their reception.

It would seem clear, from the libellant's own testimony, that he attempted to use the gangway "in a careless, awkward manner." He ascended it nearly abreast of his wife, as he says, holding her arm, or as some of the witnesses assert, arm in arm. The chief danger lay in its narrowness. If he used it at all, he was bound to use it in a prudent and cautious manner, and with such circumspection as its obvious condition required. Some of the witnesses testify that he admitted after the accident that it occurred by his own fault. That he was talking and laughing with his wife, and holding on to her arm, and through his own inattention he stumbled or lost his balance.

The libellant denies having made these admissions, but I think it clearly appears from all the circumstances of the case that he was awkward or careless in the mode of traversing the gangway. On any other supposition it is difficult to account for the accident. It had been frequently used by himself, and others, on previous occasions, and seems to have been broad enough for safety, if the requisite care had been observed.

I have little doubt that, under the evidence, a jury would find the libellant guilty of contributory negligence. If this be so, he cannot recover.

The damages that in any case I should feel justified in awarding would not be considerable. I cannot ascribe the subsequent miscarriage of the libellant's wife, more than two months afterward, to this accident. In a married life of less than two years, she had already experienced two miscarriages, and the length of time that intervened between the accident and its supposed effect render it highly improbable, if not absolutely impossible, that the latter could have been caused by the former. An award of damages founded on such an hypothesis would rest upon a conjecture of a possibility rather than upon proofs of a fact.

BANKRUPTCY—CONDITIONS OF DISCHARGE—PROPER BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

[A merchant miller whose business averaged $60,000 a year running through several years, who kept no other books than one showing his aggregate monthly payments for grain in one column and his sales in another, with nothing to show what sums were expended in carrying on his business and supporting his family, is not entitled to a discharge in bankruptcy, under Rev. St. § 5110, requiring a merchant or tradesman to keep "proper books of account" as a condition precedent to such discharge.]

In bankruptcy.

Specifications against discharge.

C. T. Glen, for opposing creditor.

Jos. Coult, for bankrupt.

NIXON, District Judge. The opposing creditors have filed fourteen specifications against the discharge of the bankrupt, several of which, if sustained, very seriously affect his moral character. It is not my intention to examine them seriatim, but it is due to the bankrupt to state that I have read the voluminous testimony with care, and whilst it is clear that he has done and said many things that cannot be approved, I am not convinced by the evidence that they have been done or said with a fraudulent intent. Section 5110 of the Revised Statutes enumerates the various grounds for which, under the bankrupt act, the court will refuse a discharge. It states under the seventh subdivision that no discharge shall be granted, or if granted shall be valid, "if the bankrupt, being a merchant or tradesman, has not at all times, after March 2, 1867, kept proper books of account." The fourteenth specification against the discharge alleges, in substance, that proper books of account have not been kept in the present case. This, is a question of fact, not one of fraudulent intent, and each case must be largely determined by its circumstances; what might be deemed proper books of account in one business, might be fairly considered fatally defective in another.

It is reckoned an important provision of the law, having in view a three-fold object: (1) to enable the debtor himself to ascertain at any time, by an examination of his financial creditors; (2) to have such a complete record of all his business transactions, that his creditors upon his call may be able to determine his ability to meet his engagements and undertakings; and (3) in case of bankruptcy, to assist the assignee in the administration of the estate, enabling him to trace out the dealings of the debtor, the causes of his failure and the honesty of his acts. The business of the bankrupt brings him within the definition of a tradesman. He was a merchant miller, purchasing grain and grinding it into flour and feed and retailing the manufactured articles from a store. The amount of his business averaged about sixty thousand dollars a year, running through several years. His book-keeping was peculiar and to the last degree unsatisfactory. He kept no cash-book or statement of cash receipts and disbursements. He had in his ledger an account with "merchandise," showing in one column his aggregate monthly payments for grain, and in another an aggregate monthly account of his sales. The difference between these columns he called profits. But his books do not show what moneys were expended by him in carrying on the business, nor what sums were taken out for his household and family expenses. It is quite clear that they did not reveal to him—and much less to others—the actual condition of his affairs; that he had no idea of his insolvency until about the time that he stopped payment, although he was not then able to pay to his creditors more than ten cents on the dollar. Books thus kept do not answer the requirements of the law. A cash-book, although important in exhibiting the nature and character of the receipts and disbursements of the business, is not indispensable, provided a cash account appears in the books, showing all the transactions.

Judge Blatchford recently held in Re Hannahs, [Case No. 6,032,] that in the absence of a cash-book, it must be clearly shown by the bankrupt that the entries, which would there appear, appear elsewhere in his books as entries of cash, and that the state of his cash receipts and payments can be ascertained by the books he did keep. The bankrupt's books fail to supply the deficiency here, and without looking at any other specifications or expressing any opinion in regard to them, the discharge must be refused.

Opinion of the Court.

At the suit of his creditors, the petitioner having been declared a bankrupt, filed a petition for his discharge on the 3d March, 1843, and the only question in the case is, whether it was filed in time. This question has been certified to this court, under the bankrupt act, from the district court. The act repealing the general bankrupt law, was passed the 3d March, 1843, and provided that "(the repeal)," "shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy, commenced before the passage of that act." In Matthews v. Zane, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 164, the court say, "the known rule being, that the statute, for the commencement of which no time is fixed, commences from its date." In England, it was long held that "every statute begins to have effect, unless a time for its commencement is therein mentioned, from the first day of that session of parliament in which it is made." Baco. Abr. 636, Let. "C.;" and this was applied to criminal as well as civil cases. In the case of the King v. Thurston, 1 Lev. 91, by this relation, an act was made murder, which was not so when the act was committed. And this rule of construction was sanctioned by the house of lords. Panter v. Attorney General, 6 Brown, Parl. Cas. 486. The monstrous injustice of this was remedied by the statute of the 33 Geo. III. c. 13, which declared that statutes should have effect only from the time they received the royal assent. It is unaccountable that this construction should have been continued by the English courts down to the year 1772. Nothing could show more forcibly with what pertinacity enlightened judges adhere to an established construction of statutes. This is not objectionable, where no injustice is done to private rights by the construction. But where, as in the above case, the law was made to have a retrospective effect, even to the forfeiture of life, it is a reproach to the tribunals of justice. In our government, such a statute would be ex post facto, and in violation of the constitution of the United States. The injustice of this construction in regard to civil rights, is equally clear, except where the provision is of a remedial character. Chancellor Kent (1 Comm. 455) says, "a retroactive statute would partake in its character of the mischiefs of an ex post facto law, as to all cases of crimes and penalties; and in every other case relating to contracts or property, it would be against every sound principle."

The rule of construction in this country, is that a statute takes effect, if not otherwise provided, on the day of its passage, including that day. Now this embraces the principle repudiated by the British statute. And no better reason is given than that the fraction of a day cannot be recognized in law; and as the statute was passed on the 3d of March, that day must necessarily be included.

That to notice the fraction of a day would be productive of inconvenience, is readily admitted. In most cases where no rights are impaired by the statute, there could be no ground of complaint; but suppose a legislature should make a certain act a capital offence, and the law should take effect on the day of its date, could an individual be punished under it, for an act done on the same day, but before the statute was, in fact, passed. If, in such a case an individual could be punished, it would be in virtue of a fiction of law; and there is no difference in principle, in a fiction that shall give the act a retroactive effect of half a day or half a year. In the one case, as well as in the other, when the act complained of was done, it was innocent, but a statute, subsequently passed, makes it penal. And if punishment in the one case can be inflicted, it may be in the other. The only difference is in time, not in principle.

A rule of construction which leads to such a result, cannot be a sound one. Like many technicalities which have grown out of judicial action, the fiction is sustained neither by justice nor reason. So far as relates to crime, the only reasonable and just rule of construction would be, that until after its promulgation the law cannot take effect. Any thing short of this might well be compared to the edicts of the Roman emperor, who elevated them so high that the people could not read them. Indeed, our modern legislation would be more cruel, unjust, and revolting. By great effort, possibly, the edicts might have been read, but no human effort can read that which belongs to the future, and which depends upon contingencies. But after the law is passed, who can have notice of it until it shall be published.

Remedial laws are not objectionable on this ground. They only remove a technical objection, and give effect to a bona fide transaction, as was the intention of the parties. But to all other legislation affecting personal rights, the objection holds. In the case of Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, Cowp. 714, there was much discussion whether the words in a lease, "to commence from the day of the date," meant inclusive or exclusive of the day it bore date. Lord Mansfield, after a laborious discussion, overruled his former decisions, and came to the conclusion that the words might be construed to include or exclude the day of the date, as from the context might appear to have been the intention of the parties. In that case, as the validity of the lease depended upon its taking effect on the day of its date, and as the court presumed it was the intention of the parties to make a valid lease, they held that the lease took effect on the day it was dated. But prior to that decision the general view had been, that "from the day of the date," in an instrument, excluded the day of the date.

All who are acquainted with the history of legislative action in congress know that bills passed on the 3d of March, in what is called the short session, are signed by the president late in the evening of that day, and are not published until some days afterwards. But the repealing act in question provides, "that it shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of that act." Now suppose by a fiction the repealing law would take effect so as to include that day; still the saving goes to the passage of the act, and not to the time it took effect. Where the computation of time in a statute is to be from an act done, the first day should be excluded. Ex parte Dean, 2 Cow. 605, 606; Homan v. Liswell, 6 Cow. 659. But this cannot be considered an original application for the benefit of the act. The petitioner having been declared a bankrupt on the 3d of March, 1842, he applied for his discharge. This is a proceeding depending upon the procedure of his creditors and inseparably connected with it. In fact and in law, it must be considered as a continuation of the former proceeding. In this view no doubt can be entertained, as the petitioner was declared a bankrupt before the repeal of the bankrupt law.

There is nothing in this application to prevent the court from giving a liberal construction of the saving in the repealing act, with the view of carrying out the remedial provisions of the bankrupt law. Upon the whole, I think the petition for the discharge, filed the 3d of March, 1843, was within the statute, as the decree of bankruptcy against the petitioner, in the form presented, constitutes a part of those proceedings; and that, consequently, the district court has jurisdiction of the petition, and may act upon it as the law authorizes. This opinion may be certified to the district court.

[NOTE. The supreme court of Vermont held that a petition filed March 3, 1843, was too late. In re Welman, 20 Vt. 653; In re Howes, 21 Vt. 619. Contra, see The Ann, Case No. 397.]

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of the blockade. Spoliation of papers by the master. Part of the cargo contraband of war.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured by the United States naval forces stationed off Mobile, Alabama, June 29, 1862, and were sent thence to this port for adjudication. A libel was filed against them July 17 thereafter, and, on the 9th of September, the owners, British subjects, residents in England, intervened, by their agent, and claimed the vessel and cargo as neutral property, contesting the legality of the seizure, and denying that Mobile was a blockaded port, or that they had lawful warning of such fact. On the hearing of the cause in court, counsel for the claimants appeared and contested the condemnation upon the law and facts of the case.

The substance of the case, on the preparatory proofs, is, that the vessel was fitted out in England, with a cargo consisting in part, of articles contraband of war, and that her destination was to ports in the West Indies, and from the last one, Havana, to Mobile, and thence back to England. The war between the United States and the rebel states, and the blockade of the southern ports, were well known in England when the vessel was fitted out and despatched. On her arrival at Havana it was reported that the blockade at New Orleans and Mobile had been raised by the United States. The report was not credited on the vessel, and it was determined to run her into Mobile. She attempted to make the entry secretly and covertly. When the blockading vessels lying off the port were discovered, the master destroyed his bills of lading, his private accounts, and the ship's entries.

The vessel was run in past the blockading fleet and Fort Morgan, and was there attacked by the United States forces and captured. She was anchored, and was unloading, when she was first attacked, and worked herself further in the harbor, but, being unable to get out of the reach of the attacking force, was abandoned by the master, the supercargo, and most of the crew, who went to Charleston. The master and two engineers embarked from Charleston for England in the steamer Memphis, and, on getting out of Charleston, that vessel also was captured and sent into this port. These officers were examined as witnesses in this suit, in preparatio, on the arrival of the Memphis at New York. They made a clear and unreserved disclosure of the facts above recapitulated.

The case is free from all ambiguity. The voyage undertaken in England was with full knowledge that Mobile was under blockade. The vessel was, notwithstanding, despatched with her cargo, of which a valuable part was contraband of war, to convey it to the use of the enemy, and make her return directly to the owners in England. A decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo is ordered to be entered.

In admiralty. The brigantine ANN was seized by the collector of the port of Newburyport, and libelled in the district court, for that said brig, on the 12th day of January, 1808, departed from said port and from the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, and proceeded on a foreign voyage, to wit, to the island of Jamaica, in the West Indies, contrary to the act of the 9th of January, 1808, c. 8, [2 Stat. 453.] It appeared that the ANN sailed from Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, with a cargo of flour, on the 22d day of December, 1807, bound for Newburyport. On the 31st of December, the brig arrived at Martha's Vineyard, where the captain and crew heard of the embargo. On the 12th of January, 1808, the brig arrived off the port of Newburyport, and anchored between two and three miles from Newburyport bar, (which is the limit of the port of Newburyport,) and about the same distance from the neighboring land. A part of the crew were here discharged, and a new crew [obtained] in their stead, and also a supercargo came on board. After taking in some provisions, and stores, and water, the brig sailed on the 13th of January for Jamaica, where she arrived in about 27 days, landed and sold her cargo, and returned to the United States with a cargo of rum; and was afterwards seized. It also appeared that [Isaac] Tenny, one of the claimants, had full notice of the transactions while the ANN lay off Newburyport, and assisted, or at least assented thereto. [Affirmed.]

G. Blake, for the United States.

S. Dexter, for claimant.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. As the ANN arrived off Newburyport, and within three miles of the shore, it is clear that she was within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States. All the writers upon public law agree that every nation has exclusive jurisdiction to the distance of a cannon shot, or marine league, over the waters adjacent to its shores, (Bynk. Qu. Pub. Juris. 61; 1 Azuni, [Mar. Law,] 204, § 15; Id. p. 185, § 4;) and this doctrine has been recognized by the supreme court of the United States. [Church v. Hubbard,] 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 187, 231. Indeed such waters are considered as a part of the territory of the sovereign. It is said in behalf of the claimant, that the embargo was not designed to operate upon vessels, unless they were within the ports of the United States. But the language of the act of 22d December, 1807, c. 5, [2 Stat. 451] is, that an embargo be laid on all ships and vessels in the ports and places within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States. Now the Ann was certainly in a place within the jurisdiction of the United States, and I do not feel at liberty to narrow by construction the express words of the Legislature.

A further objection has been taken to the allegations in the libel; but upon examination I find, that though very irregularly made, there is a substantial statement of the offence within the 3d section of the act of 9th Jan. 1808. But the main objection urged in behalf of the claimants is of a more important character. The act, under which the brig is libelled, received the signature of the president on the 9th of Jan. 1808, [2 Stat. 453,] and on that day became a law. But it is admitted, that it was not known at Newburyport on the day when the Ann sailed, and consequently that the claimants could not take notice of it. Now it is contended, that though a statute takes effect from its passage, yet a reasonable time must be allowed for its promulgation, so that the citizens may have notice of its existence, and that no person can be liable for an offence committed against such act, until such a time has elapsed, as will enable him, with reasonable diligence, to ascertain its prohibitions, otherwise an innocent man might be punished for actions, which were innocent for aught he knew, or could by possibility have known, at the time of their being done. And it is perfectly immaterial, whether such punishment be inflicted on his person or his property. In illustration of this doctrine, passages have been read from Blackstone's Commentaries (Bl. Comm. 44, 46) on the elementary principles of natural and civil law, and also from the constitution of the United States, where it prohibits the enactment of any ex post facto laws. I was much pressed by the argument of the learned counsel on this point. It would seem founded in the principles of good sense, and natural equity. And it is very certain, that the Ann was not by any law subject to forfeiture, (whatever might be the case as to the claimants in person) until the act of 9th Jan. 1808. The argument perhaps scarcely has its full weight, when applied to the present case, because the claimants were acting manifestly in violation of the original act, laying an embargo, and could not, as to that act, have any pretence to allege their own ignorance. But this circumstance ought not perhaps to vary the legal result. I will therefore consider the question, as though it stood open between parties perfectly innocent of any intended violation of law. At common law, all acts of parliament, unless another period is fixed, took effect, by relation, to the first day of the session: so that if an act had been brought in at the close of the session, and passed on the last day, which made an innocent act criminal, or even a capital offence, and if no day was fixed for the commencement of its operation, it had the same efficacy as if it had passed on the first day of the session; and all, who during a long session, had been doing an act, which at the time was legal and inoffensive, were liable to suffer the punishment prescribed by the statute. To be sure, this doctrine seems flatly unjust; but, as Christian says, (1 Bl. Comm. 70, note 4,) it is agreeable to ancient principles. Lord Coke lays down the position in 4 Inst. 25, and cites 33 Hen. 6, 17, which, upon examination, I find, fully supports it. The same doctrine is explicitly avowed in Brook's Abridgement, (Brook, Parliament, pl. 8, 6; Relation pl. 43,) and even applied to an attainder; is ruled in Plowd. Comm. 79b, and recognized in several other reporters, ([Standen v. University,] W. Jones, 22; [Henly v. Jones,] 1 Sid. 310, and cases cited; [Latless v. Patten,] 4 Term R. 660, note a;) was held by all the judges of England in Panter v. Attorney General, (6 Brown, Parl. Cas. 486;) and finally was declared too firmly fixed to admit of question in Latless v. Patten, 4 Term R. 660. The whole current of authorities therefore flows uniformly in one channel; and parliament listening at length to the voice of reason, by Stat. 33 Geo. III. c. 13, declared that the date of every statute should be endorsed on its receiving the royal assent, and from that time only should it have effect. 6 Bac. Abr. Gwillim St. (C.) 370.

Since the adoption of the constitution of the United States, which prohibits the passing of ex post facto laws, it seems to be considered, that statutes take effect immediately from the time of their date or passage, and not before; in the same manner as they now do in England. But we shall hardly find a case, in which the promulgation of them has been held necessary, to give them operation. So early as 39 Edw. III., this precise objection was taken; and Sir Robert Thorpe, then chief justice, answered, "although proclamation be not made in the county, every one is bound to take notice of that which is done in parliament; for as soon as the parliament hath concluded any thing, the law intends that every person hath notice thereof, for the parliament represents the body of the whole realm; and therefore it is not requisite that any proclamation be made, seeing the statute took effect before." 4 Inst. 26. The same point is recognized as law in Com. Dig. "Parliament," c. 23, and Hale on Parliament, 36, and in Bac. Abr. Stat. A. It seems, therefore, a settled doctrine, that a statute takes effect from the time of its passage, and needs no promulgation to give it operation. Against principles thus solemply adjudged, I cannot find a single opposing authority. I am aware of great difficulties in sustaining the reason of these principles; but sitting here, I am bound to pronounce the law as I find it, though I cannot but yield with reluctance to authorities, when they impose restraints on general equity. Decree affirmed.

[NOTE. Act Cong. Dec. 22, 1807, c. 5, (2 Stat. 451.) was repealed by Act March 1, 1809, c. 24, § 19, (2 Stat. 533.) In Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U. S. 381, it was held that a law increasing the duty on tobacco, which was approved by the president in the afternoon, does not apply to tobacco on which the duty was paid under the former law on the forenoon of the same day. SALVAGE—DERELICT—APPORTIONMENT OF SALVAGE—SPECIAL AGREEMENT OF MASTER.

1. The brig A. came into collision with another vessel, about 50 miles from Sandy Hook, at night, in a thick fog, when it was blowing hard. She received injuries, which led her master and crew to think she was about to sink, and they left her and got on board the other vessel. The next morning, about 7 A. M., the fog cleared off, and the master of the A. saw her about eleven miles off, but made no effort to return to her. The bark W. S., bound to New York, came to the A., and put on board of her a mate and one man, who got sail on her, and proceeded towards New York, taking a pilot about 10 A. M., and a tug about 11 A. M., which for the agreed sum of $600, towed the A. to New York, reaching the dock about 9 P. M. The A. was worth $3,500, her freight amounted to $1,500, and her cargo was worth $25,589, making in all $30,589. The master of the W. S. was sailing her under an agreement with her owners, to make this voyage on shares, he to navigate her, victual and man her, and pay half her port charges, and to receive half the earnings: Held, That, whether this was strictly a case of derelict or not, it was the case of a vessel abandoned at sea, where no evidence was given of an intention on the part of her master to return to her, and the awards, which have been given in cases of derelict, might well be looked to, as affording some guide to the judgment.

2. That $6,000 was a proper sum to be awarded as salvage, from which should be deducted the $600 paid to the tug by the claimants.

Goodrich & Wheeler, and W. R. Darling, for libellants.

Scudder & Carter, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action on behalf of the master and owners and crew of the bark Wylie Smith, to recover salvage of the brig Anna, and her cargo.

It appears that on the night of the 9th of April, 1872, the brig Anna came into collision with the bark Narragansett, off the Woodlands, in a thick fog and blowing hard. The master of the Anna, who was her owner, says the collision was a violent one, and shook her from stem to stern, and the blow was so violent that she leaked all over her house and deck. On the supposition that she would sink forthwith, all hands on board of her at once abandoned her and made for the bark, which they reached in safety. The wind had been blowing hard for about three hours before the collision, and continued to blow during the night with a heavy sea on. About four o'clock A. M. the wind went to the westward and moderated. The fog cleared off at about 7 A. M., when the Anna was discovered in sight of the Narragansett, about eleven miles off. The evidence fails to show that the owner of the Anna had any intention or desire to return to his vessel. No attempt was made to do so. About the same hour the Wylie Smith discovered the Anna abandoned; and, proceeding to her, placed on board of her a mate and a man, who undertook to get her into New York. The bulwarks were found broken on the starboard side from the main rigging forward, the jib boom broken and hanging across her bow, and the bowsprit split, and fourteen inches of water in her. She was not seriously injured, and could without difficulty sail to New York if properly manned. She was then about thirty miles southeast of the Highlands, with no land in sight but several vessels to be seen a long distance off at sea. The mate of the Wylie Smith got sail upon the brig, and proceeded towards New York, with the wind southwest but hauling to the westward, the Wylie Smith herself having proceeded on her voyage to New York. About 10 A. M. a pilot boarded the Anna, and about 11 A. M. a tug, cruising for business, approached, with whom a bargain was made by the salvors to tow them to New York for six hundred dollars.

They reached the dock in New York about 9 o'clock P. M. The value of the brig was $3,500, the freight amounted to about $1,500, and the cargo is valued at $25,589.

It is necessary only to allude here to the considerations which govern in awarding salvage. The amount is to be determined upon the consideration of all the circumstances, having reference not only to the labor and risk on the part of the salvors, and the advantage to the owners of the property saved, but also to the interests of commerce. In cases of derelict, one reason for a liberal award is stated to be that the property having been abandoned as lost, it does not lie in the mouth of its owner to complain of the reward paid to strangers, who return his property to him. And this consideration has been adverted to as having equal force whether the vessel abandoned is in a sound or wrecked condition. The rule of the ordinance was applied to a sound vessel abandoned when pursued by pirates, and subsequently found derelict. The Saint Jean Baptiste, 2 Giroud & C. 375.

Another consideration of force in this case arises out of that public interest, the protection of which lies at the foundation of the law of salvage. This brig was abandoned in near proximity to the entrance of a great sea-port, and in the track of vessels of every description inward and outward bound. Being left floating, with some sails still up, and with no one on board to set her lights, to keep her on her course, or to answer or give hails, she was a very dangerous thing. The presence of such an object in this locality at any time, if known, would justly cause alarm, and might well occasion great loss of life as well as of property. For the taking in charge and saving of a wreck so situated, the reward should be such as to insure at all times the rendering of any amount of labor, the incurring of any risk and the deviation by any vessel from any voyage in order to supply the wreck with a crew, and make her presence safe.

If, in this case, one of the ocean bound steamers had fallen in with the Anna, and turned about to tow her to a place of safety, I should not have hesitated to award liberal compensation for the detention, expense, and importance of such services, without much reference to the amount of the property absorbed thereby. But these claimants were so fortunate as to have this service (which some vessel must have rendered, if their property was ever to be restored) performed by a sailing vessel which was not required to deviate from her course, or to lose any considerable amount of time; and which, while she parted with her chief mate and a man, thereby increasing her own risk, did not sustain any loss. It is therefore possible to give her a liberal reward without absorbing the half or one-third part even of the property saved.

But it has been contended that this is a case of derelict, and in such cases one-third is always to be given. The law is otherwise. Post v. Jones, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 161. Whether therefore this be a case of strict derelict or not is of no importance; it is certainly the case of a salvage of a vessel abandoned at sea, where no evidence is produced of an intention on the part of her master to return to her. The awards which are made in the cases held strictly derelict, may therefore well be looked to as affording some guide to the judgment in this case.

According to the fixed regulations governing maritime courts, in many parts of the continent, salvage never exceeds one-third of the value saved, with the exception that it may be increased to one-half, when the salvage is accomplished with unusual exertions, and the value of the property is small. German Mercantile Law, 748. In France the Code de Commerce is silent upon the subject, and the Ordinance of 1681 still governs and furnishes the rule there applied, according to which, following the Roman law, one-third is awarded whenever property is found abandoned in open sea, or has been raised from its bottom. The Rhodian law distinguished between these two cases, giving one-fifth when the property was found abandoned but floating, and when property was raised from the bottom one-half to one-third, according to the depth of the water, thus recognizing that in cases of derelict, as well as others, the amount of labor expended should be taken into account. In modern cases the amount varies. In the great majority of instances the award approaches nearly to one-third. In a late case of a derelict saved without much labor, time, or risk, two-fifths were given where the value was small. Georgiana, [Case No. 5,355.]

In the case of The Viscega, Shipp. Gaz. April 30, 1859, where a derelict, valued at £1,450, was conducted into a harbor by a steamboat and a lifeboat with seven men, with little labor or loss of time and no danger, the award was £500.

In the case of The Majestas, Shipp. Gaz. March 31, 1858, a derelict, found five or six miles from the harbor, and conducted in with no difficulty by a tug in one day, on a value of £16,000, £2,000, or one-eighth, was given to the salvors.

In the light of these rules, and in view of the considerations above adverted to, I consider that the sum of $6,000 should be awarded as the salvage in this case.

From this sum must be deducted $600, the amount of the tug's bill settled by the claimants.

The next question in the case arises between the owners of the Wylie Smith and her master, respecting the apportionment of the award between them, in view of the fact that the master was not sailing on monthly wages, but had an agreement with the owners to make this voyage on shares—he to navigate the vessel, victual and man her, and pay half the port charges, and to receive half the earnings. As to this agreement, it is to be noted that the master was not made owner pro hac vice. His agreement was only for a single voyage, for which the vessel had a charter. His position was more nearly that of a master receiving a definite sum, i. e., half the charter money, for navigating and victualing and manning the vessel during the voyage, than of an owner. It is clear, therefore, that the owners of the Wylie Smith, whose vessel was used and put at risk, are entitled to share in the salvage. But it is equally clear that part of the ordinary risk of the owners was, by the agreement between them and the master, shifted to the master. In case of disaster arising from the absence of the mate and seaman, the master would have lost, not only his services for the voyage, but also his advances for the crew, provisions, and port charges. Without undertaking to determine the exact divisions of risk which arose from this agreement, it will be just, because of it, to give master $500 more than would otherwise have been his share.

The owners will, therefore, receive $1,800; the master, $2,300; the mate, who navigated the Anna, $800; the seaman who went with him, $200; the remaining $300 to be divided among the three other men, in proportion to their wages.

COLLISION IN HUDSON RIVER—VESSEL AT ANCHOR.

A schooner, lying at anchor off Caldwell's in the Hudson river, was sunk by a collision with a tow, which passed her in the night. Her owners filed a libel against two steamboats, which, fastened alongside each other, had towed some boats by the schooner that night. The schooner alleged that she was struck first by one of the two steamboats and then by the boats in tow. The steamboats alleged that, while there was a slight collision between one of them and the bowsprit of the schooner, the blow which did the injury to the schooner was given by the boats of another tow, which passed up the river ahead of them: Held, That, on the evidence, the schooner had failed to establish that the blow which caused her to sink was inflicted by the two steamboats or the boats in tow of them, and that the libel must be dismissed.

In admiralty. This was a libel by the owners of the schooner Tryall, to recover for the sinking of the schooner in the Hudson river, off Caldwell's, on the night of December 18th, 1870. The schooner was at anchor. Her story was, that the Anna, with the Carrie alongside, and having a tow of boats astern, came up the river and attempted to pass between the Tryall and the west shore, and that the Carrie struck the schooner and went by her, and the boats in tow also struck her, and that from the effects of such collision she sank. The story of the Anna and the Carrie was that a tug was going up ahead of them with a tow of boats astern; that those boats struck the Tryall; and that, after she got free from them, she swung around so that her bowsprit just touched the paddle-box of the Carrie, but not with force enough to do any injury.

R. D. Benedict, for libellant.
C. Van Santvoord, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. A careful consideration of the evidence in this case fails to satisfy me of the truth of the allegation of the libel, that the steamboat Carrie struck the libellants' schooner and carried away her bowsprit, and that afterwards a barge in tow of the two steamers struck the port bow of the schooner, and that the two collisions did so much injury and damage to the schooner that she sank. That the schooner was at anchor, and was struck and sunk, is undisputed. It is also not denied that the Carrie came in contact with the jib-boom of the schooner. But, the collision described by the master of the schooner as the first one of the two collisions, is described by him as a blow by the guard of a boat on the round of the port bow of the schooner, in a direction which took the schooner's bowsprit square off to the bow. The evidence satisfactorily shows that no such blow was given by the Carrie. Then, again, it is very apparent that the two blows which did the damage were given by a vessel and her tow, which, to the eyes of the men on the schooner and on the sloop to the westward of her, was the first tug and tow in order which came up from below. That there was such a tug and tow just ahead of the Anna and the Carrie and their tow cannot be doubted. It was this first tug and tow that hit the schooner and did the damage. This first tug, or a barge alongside of her, first hit the schooner, and then a boat in the hawser tier behind, in tow of such tug, hit the schooner. These blows, so disastrous, naturally caused excitement, and the passage of the Anna and Carrie close behind was not noticed by those on board of the schooner and the sloop. The witnesses all, on both sides, say that it was the first tug and tow that hit the schooner, and did the damage. That was not the Anna and the Carrie. The contact with the Carrie did no damage. On this view the testimony can all be reconciled. On any other view, wilful false swearing must be imputed to the claimants' witnesses. The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

PRIZE—SAILING UNDER ENEMY'S FLAG.

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, sailing under the enemy's flag, and under passes from the enemy.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The libel, filed March 5, 1862, alleges the capture of the steamer and cargo, as prize, November 22, 1861, in Mississippi sound, between Biloxi and Ocean Spring, by the United States steamer New London. The vessel was appraised by a naval survey, December 26, thereafter, and appropriated to the use of libellants, and the cargo was transmitted by another vessel to this port, for adjudication. A decree by default was rendered against both vessel and cargo, March 24, 1863, and the vessel's papers and the proofs in preparatorio have been laid before the court, to determine the liability of the captured property to confiscation.

The steamer was enrolled and licensed to citizens of the Confederate States, under the laws of those states, July 1, 1861, and was in the employ of such citizens when seized. The master testifies, on his examination, that the vessel was, when captured, sailing under the Confederate flag, and had no other on board; that he is a citizen and a resident of a Confederate state; that the vessel was engaged in trade between the ports of Pascagoula and New Orleans; that he was part owner of the vessel, and had an adventure in the cargo; and that he knew of the war and that those ports were under blockade. The witnesses examined, all of them, knew of the war and that those ports were under blockade.

It being thus demonstrated that the vessel and cargo were enemy property, sailing in the interest of the enemy, with the aid of passes from and protection of the flag of the enemy, the property captured is plainly prize of war; and, no defence being interposed, a decree of condemnation and forfeiture is directed to be entered.

[In admiralty. Libel by the owners of the bark Wiley Smith to recover salvage of the brig Anna and her cargo. Decree for libellant. Case No. 398. Claimants appeal. Affirmed.]

William R. Darling, William W. Goodrich, and Charles Donohue, for libellants.
Townsend Scudder, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The evidence shows, that the brig Anna, having come into collision with another vessel, at about 11 o'clock in the night of the 9th of April, 1872, and been injured, her master and crew, under the apprehension that she was sinking, escaped from her to the colliding vessel, and were brought into this port, to which she was bound. At the time of the collision, she was about twenty miles to the eastward of Sandy Hook, the night was very foggy, "the thickest," her master and owner testifies, that he ever saw, it was blowing hard, from the southwest, and she was under "close reefs." Contrary to the expectation of her master and crew, she did not sink, but, in the morning, she was discovered by the master and crew of the brig Wiley Smith, tossed by the waves, driven off ten or fifteen miles further from Sandy Hook, and near to the Long Island shore, and in great danger of going on the Long Island beach, upon which, the master of the Wiley Smith says, she would have driven within an hour. The wind had somewhat abated, but it was still blowing fresh from the southwest. Perceiving that she was a vessel in distress, the Wiley Smith was hove to, and sent her mate and one of her crew on board, (the Wiley Smith having, in all, captain, mate, and four seamen,) and it was agreed, that the mate and man should remain on board and endeavor to save the injured vessel. They succeeded in getting her under sail, and directed her towards this port, and, after making some progress, were hailed by a tug, with the master of which they bargained for towage to New York, for six hundred dollars, and she was towed in. The Wiley Smith also arrived here in safety. The Anna was conceded to be of the value of $7,500, though she was afterwards sold for less, and the net value of her cargo was $25,589.06, and the freight was $1,500, as was also conceded, making, in all, $34,589.06. The libels herein being filed by the owners, master and crew of the Wiley Smith, for salvage, the district court allowed to them the sum of $6,000, (including therein the sum paid for the service of the tug.) The claimants of the Anna and her cargo have appealed to this court, claiming that the allowance is excessive.

The discretion of the district court, in fixing the amount of salvage, is not to be overruled, where no principle of law has been violated, unless the error is very clear. The amount allowed is, no doubt, liberal, if the time and service by the Wiley Smith, or even her danger, were alone considered; while, on the other hand, considering the state of the weather, the probable destruction of the Anna, the diminution of hands on the Wiley Smith, the hazard of her own insurance, and the importance of the service to the owners of the Anna and her cargo, it does not seem to me extravagant. Very true, she might possibly have been saved by other means. Possibly, her master, on arriving in New York, in the morning, might have gone, or sent a vessel, in search of her, and, perhaps, have procured one for a much less compensation. But this is a mere conjecture. He and his crew had left her, believing that she was sinking, and it does not appear that they thought otherwise, until they saw her under sail, in the hands of the finders. That, whether regarded as finders of a derelict, or salvors of a vessel being driven on shore, the libellants are entitled to salvage, is not, and cannot be, denied. To this it is not necessary to cite the authorities, numerous as they are on that point.

A narrow and inadequate appreciation of such services as were here rendered would not sufficiently encourage vessels and their crews to depart from their own voyage, to save the property, and, as the case may be, the lives of others. Confessedly, the share of the property allowed is greatly less than the early practice of courts of admiralty would have sanctioned, and, in the changed condition of navigation, it is properly so; but, I do not feel warranted in saying, that the share allowed, (but little over one-sixth,) is so great, that this court should reduce it.

Let the libellants have a decree for the sums awarded, with costs.

Case No. 402.

The ANNA.

The REVERE.

The ANNIE DEAS.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas. 337.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 16, 1863.

PRIZE COURT—DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S FEES—COSTS.

1. The question of the allowance of costs and fees to the district attorney for services in prize cases considered.

2. The prize court is, and always has been, in the United States a component part of the admiralty court.

3. In prosecuting in prize cases, the district attorney acts as the law officer of the government, and not in any other capacity.

4. As the district attorney is compensated by fees and emoluments limited by law to a fixed salary, he cannot have any additional allowance for extra services within the scope of his appointment, unless such extra reward is expressly authorized by law.

5. The act of August 6, 1861, [12 Stat. 317.] in regard to the compensation of the district attorney, discussed.

6. The act of March 25, 1862, § 3, [12 Stat. 375.] does not abolish the restrictions on the compensation of the district attorney, or give to him for his personal use the amounts taxed to him for services in prize cases.

7. The acts of July 17, 1862, [12 Stat. 607.] and March 3, 1863, [12 Stat. 741.] show that the restrictions on the compensation of the district attorney are still in force.

8. The court will not apportion to the district attorney, by a direct decree, the amount of the costs taxed for his services in each prize suit which ought to be paid to him toward his aggregate salary.

9. The court will tax the costs of the district attorney in prize cases, under the existing laws, on the written assent of the counsel for the captors, and the deposition of the district attorney, proving the performance of the service and its reasonable value, and will leave it to the disbursing officers of the treasury to see that no more is retained by that officer than the sum given him by law.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The three above-named suits having terminated some time since by decrees of condemnation of the several vessels and their cargoes, the district attorney presented his several bills of costs therein to the court for taxation, attesting, by his own deposition, the actual rendition of the respective services charged by him in each case or proceeding and their just value; and he submitted, with each bill of costs, a written admission of the counsel for the captors, of service upon him, by the district attorney, of a copy thereof, and his assent to the correctness and justness of the items as charged.

Having information that congress, in closing its late session, adopted some enactments which might have a bearing materially affecting the allowance of costs to the officers of the court in prize proceedings, and especially those to be taxed to the district attorney of this district, I deferred acting upon the above taxations until authentic copies of such legislation might be furnished to the court. This delay was not under an expectation that congress had varied the law governing the destination of the forfeited funds to the captors and navy pensioners, but that they might have made more clear their intentions in respect to the method by which the restriction or limitation of the compensation to the officers of court is to be observed and carried into effect through the action of the court in the matter of taxation.

It does not appear, on the examination of these proceedings in congress, that any positive change is declared in the former provisions of the law in that respect, or that any other duty devolves upon the court than that of taxing costs according to the meaning of the law as it stood at the time the services were rendered; and it belongs exclusively to the executive department having the subject in charge, to determine the amounts of proceeds from the confiscated property which are legally payable to the district attorney. The last enactments, however, are considered to afford important confirmation of the construction heretofore placed by the court on the law of costs which fixes the allowances to the district attorney, and to afford a guide to the court in the matter of their adjustment. The interpretation of those laws is not before the court for judicial adjudication in this proceeding of taxation. The subject arises incidentally, and the determination of the court acts upon the disbursing departments suggestively only, leaving them free, upon their own responsibility, to award the sum assessed, or to limit that sum to such allowance as, in their judgment, the law authorizes them to allot, pursuant to its express provisions or authoritative construction.

With that function I do not presume to interfere, and have explicitly, in each taxation, reserved the subject for the action of the appropriate officer of the government with whom rests the adjustment of the accounts of the public servants who receive or disburse public money.

In support of the rate of allowance claimed by the district attorney, he submits, in writing, his own views and those of two eminent counsel, upon the intent and proper construction of the laws applicable to the subject. A cardinal position assumed in the argument I cannot accede to.

I. It is argued that the district attorney does not act in the prize court in the character of prosecuting officer in a court of law but rather in an executive capacity, exercising military functions and would not, accordingly, be placed here under restrictions applicable to his powers or compensation merely as law officer of the district court.

I think it definitely determined, in the usages of our jurisprudence before the adoption of the constitution, that the prize court was in existence, as a component part of the jurisdiction of the admiralty court, whether organized under the authority of the several states or colonies, or that of the confederation, (5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] Append. 106,) and became so by direct recognition of the supreme court, on the establishment of the federal constitution, (Const. art. 3, § 2; [Talbot v. The Achilles,] 3 Hopk. Works, 132, Pamph. 61; Talbot v. 3 Brigs, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 95; Jennings v. Carson, [Case No. 7,281,] and cases at large there cited; State v. Brailsford, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 5; Glass v. The Betsey, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 16,) and subsequently by express designation of congress, (2 Stat. 761, § 6,) in these words: "And in the case of all captured vessels, goods and effects, which shall be brought within the jurisdiction of the United States, the district courts of the United States shall have exclusive original cognizance thereof, as in civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." This position is necessarily affirmed, by implication, in the recent decisions, on appeal, by the supreme court, in numerous prize cases. The Hiawatha, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 635.

The district attorney is a statutory officer, created on the first organization of the government, and appointed in each district, in the words of the law, "to prosecute, in such district, all delinquents for crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions in which the United States shall be concerned, except before the supreme court in the district in which that court shall be holden." 1 Stat. 92, § 35. In this district the present officer was in commission at the commencement of the existing war, and has officially instituted in his own name all the prize suits brought in this court since the war. It is also manifest that congress regards the functions of the district attorney as a portion of his official powers in prize cases. 10 Stat. 168, § 3.

II. These officers are compensated, as a class by fees and emoluments, limited to a sum not exceeding $6,000 per annum, and in proportion for a less period, retainable by them, for their own personal compensation, from the entire earnings and receipts coming into their possession from the incomes of their respective offices and official acts during such period. To receive any other or greater compensation is declared to be a misdemeanor. 10 Stat. 166, 168, 169, § 3. The statute above recited was an affirmation and re-enactment of various anterior provisions of law respecting the compensation of public officers by fees and perquisites to limited amounts, and that method of payment is specifically applied to various officers serving in courts of justice, and enforced against them in the restrictions placed upon the quantum of emoluments allowed.

The supreme court, in a cause carefully considered, by a unanimous decision, held, that a compensation derived by a public officer from fees and emoluments, limited to a fixed amount, was virtually a salary restriction, which cut up by the roots all additional allowances for extra services within the scope of his appointment, unless such extra reward were expressly authorized by law, (Hoyt v. U. S., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 139;) and the same doctrine was recognized subsequently, (Converse v. U. S., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 464.) The provisions of positive law in that respect, for more than forty years, have been signally emphatic and peremptory. 5 Stat. 349, § 3; Id. 510, § 2.

III. A strong manifestation of the purpose of congress, and of the understanding of the district attorney of this district, that the compensation of this officer was and should continue subordinated to the restrictions before stated, exists in the terms of the act passed (at the instance of this officer as appears in his brief on this hearing) August 5, 1861, which changes the mode of his compensation to one by a salary of $6,000, in lieu of fees, &c., as theretofore, and super-adds, in a distinct section, the provision "that the accounts of said attorney, from and after the fourth day of April last, shall be adjusted and settled in the same manner as the same would have been adjusted and settled had this act been in operation on and after that day," necessarily importing that all moneys realized through perquisites or fees payable to the officer should continue, as theretofore, to be accounted for by the district attorney with the secretary of the interior as public funds, to the use of the government, except such part as had been disbursed by the secretary of the interior in satisfaction of the charges fixed upon the officer, and should be wholly withdrawn from his personal perquisites. This statute was passed after numerous prize actions had been commenced and prosecuted in this court to final decrees, through the district attorney's office, and it is to be inferred that the emoluments and costs arising to this officer from the source of business were within the contemplation of the act of August 6, 1861, as a portion of proceeds subject to settlement and adjustment before the interior department, by him in his capacity of receiver of public moneys, and to be assigned to other public use, according to law; nor can it be justly presumed that congress would divert such moneys to any purpose, in defeat of the beneficiary devotion of one moiety of them to the navy pension fund, and the other to the actual captors personally, by permanent law, (Act April 23, 1800; 2 Stat. 52, 53, §§ 5, 9; 12 Stat. 607, § 11.) unless such intention be expressly declared by law.

IV. Beyond the considerations already suggested, tending to show the purpose and policy under which the law fixed the compensation of the district attorney of this district at a sum not exceeding $6,000 per annum, the limitation seems to be in accordance with broad, general principles. It is to be noted that no public functionary, holding civil office under the United States within this district, is paid an annual compensation for personal services exceeding that amount, however multifarious, onerous, and important those services may be. The circuit judge of the United States presiding in this and two adjacent states, over four separate circuit courts, and at the same time discharging the duties of judge of the supreme court also; the subtreasurer of the United States; the collector, postmaster, marshal, naval officer, &c., have their compensation limited to that amount without regard to the multiplicity or diversity of the items of service exacted of them in each instance, (more than quadrupled by the exigencies of war,) and receive no augmentation of reward therefor, except it be granted directly for specific cause, the rule being that no increase of pay is allowed for the performance of any act within the scope of the employment of the appointee when serving for a fixed compensation. Hoyt v. U. S., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 141. No cause is manifest which should change the principle with regard to the allowance of surplus payments to the district attorney, to be retained and appropriated to him as personal compensation. No like legislation exists for further rewards to such classes of officers, including even the heads of departments, than their salaries, because of any addition of labors or responsibilities, however manifold, imposed upon them under the necessities of the war. The general law recognizes no other method of relief to incumbents in office for overcharge of duties, than by supplying the aid of increased agents, deputies, assistants or clerks, for carrying on the public business.

V. The argument is pressed with great earnestness, that the act of March 25, 1862, § 3, imports that congress intended to abrogate all restrictions of compensation to district attorneys derived from their services in prize cases, and that those earnings are granted to the attorneys without abatement or regard to the sum total to be received, and should be taxed to them in that sense with a view to such emoluments being paid to them personally, irrespective of the fee-bill of February 26, 1853, and prior laws, or the special act of August 6, 1861, affecting the district attorney of this district.

It is to be noticed, however, that no language is employed in the act of March 25, 1862, expressly granting to district attorneys a compensation to be adjusted and determined by the court for services in prize proceedings, additional to the salaries or limited pay already fixed by law; nor does the provision of section 3, in terms rescind or qualify the restrictions of the amounts payable to those officers personally. The implication from the frame of the act, if it does not amount to an indirect repeal of the first clause of the act of August 6, 1861, is not destitute of force and plausibility, that the leading intent of congress was to introduce into this novel course of practice a further scale of emoluments, in part to help raise the earnings of the attorneys in the different districts towards the maximum allotted by law to the office; and further, in part, in respect to districts producing surpluses beyond the stated compensation of the office, to assign portions of the proceeds for services in prize suits, by distribution, to the judiciary fund, in relief of expenses borne by the government in carrying on prosecutions in its name for the pecuniary benefit of navy pensioners and captors. The presumption is enhanced by the consideration that the income to the marshal remains under the old limitation, and all received by him exceeding $6,000 per annum is paid into the judiciary fund, notwithstanding his personal services and pecuniary responsibilities are greatly augmented by the war; and the surplus over his maximum pay, derived from proceedings in prize sales, must draw very large sums from the naval pension fund and the portion distributed to the individual captors—objects eminently favored by congress in the destination of prize funds.

Whether such object had influence or not in the form of the enactment, congress evinced emphatically, at the same session, by a declaratory act, that they did not use the language then employed with the design that it should convey unlimitedly the emoluments received from prize suits to the personal benefit of those officers:

1. An act was passed July 17, 1862, (12 Stat. 603, § 12,) with a proviso declaring "that the annual salaries of district attorneys, prize commissioners, and marshals shall, in no case, be so increased, under the several acts for compensation in prize, as to exceed, in the aggregate, the following sums, and any balance beyond the several sums shall be paid into the treasury, viz., district attorneys, $6,000; prize commissioners, $3,000; marshals, $6,000." This language would seem to make the limitation of the entire amount of compensation of each officer, for every service assigned to their respective offices, as precise and stringent as could be enacted; and the last expression of the legislative will is the one which must prevail in the execution of the law.

2. It is, moreover, manifest, by the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1863, §§ 11, 12, providing, among other things, for the payment of costs to district attorneys, that, when congress intends that the limitation in respect to costs, appointed in the fee-bill of February 26, 1853, shall not apply to costs subsequently granted to such officer, that purpose will be expressly signified by the law giving the costs; and that, otherwise, the restriction will embrace the new grant.

VI. The adjustment by the court of a just and suitable compensation to be received by the prize commissioners, the district attorney acting for the United States, and the counsel for the captors, "for their several and respective services in each prize case or proceeding," (Act March 25, 1862, § 3,) plainly does not presuppose that such varied services are to be performed in presence of the court, or with its personal cognizance.

Many of the services will, in their nature, have been essentially constructive. The compensation will necessarily rest on the basis of a quantum meruit. This, in the judicatories of the state, is a matter inquirable into by testimony, and determinable in open court. Stevens v. Adams, 23 Wend. 57; in error, 26 Wend. 451; Wilson v. Burr, 25 Wend. 386; Stow v. Hamlin, 11 How. Pr. 452; Sedg. Dam. 102, 103. The court, in regard to claims important in amount, or resting on extrinsic circumstances, would, in cases of dubious facts, be obliged to resort to references or other methods of investigation, admitting of proofs to be given in support of or in opposition to claims for quantum meruit compensation, the leading and affirmative evidence being required from the claimants. That mode of investigation would be but imperfectly employed by a judge sitting out of court, and acting only as a taxing officer.

VII. The manner in which compensation in prize suits is made payable in this district to the attorney, by section 3 of the act of March 25, 1862, evidently precludes the court from assigning the amount to the officer by a direct decree; because, first, it is to be preliminarily determined by the proper executive department whether the compensation of the district attorney is solely a salary, and then whether the entire amount is to be defrayed out of the prize fund created during the year in which the service was rendered, in the proportion the amount derived from each suit or proceeding bears to the salary of the officer for the particular year. Such apportionment must not only be perplexing and uncertain to be carried out by the judge, for want of facts necessary to make the computation, but must also be exceedingly complex and embarrassing and frequently impracticable of determination by a judge on taxation, because suits and proceedings in prize, in many cases, now after the lapse of more than two years, are found still pending in the courts undetermined; and no means are supplied for discriminating the part of the fund obtained from each proceeding in suit, which might be applied to the costs of the officer in making up his share.

VIII. The court accordingly decided, at an early day, that it lay with the disbursing officers of the government to adjudge the amount of compensation granted to the district attorney, and the prize commissioners by existing laws, and the method of its distribution and payment to them; and that the province of the court was limited to the mode and amount of taxation or adjustment of those particulars, apart from the assignment or payment of such costs.

The third section of the act of March 25, 1862, was deemed peremptory in its direction that the costs should be allowed by the court to the district attorney in prize proceedings, without regard to antecedent limitations of his compensation, but the power might be vested in the departments to enforce, on its disbursement, the restrictions on his personal compensation directed in prior provisions of law. That authority may be implied in the provisions enacted July 17, 1862, and March 3, 1863, or in an implied repeal of the third section of the act of March 23, 1862, in its application to the attorney of this district, or in the continuing, in this respect, of the law of taxation, subject to the governance of the act of February 26, 1853. Act Aug. 6, 1861, (12 Stat. 317, § 1.)

That rule will be still adhered to, and the court will not assume the responsibility of attempting to interfere with the discretion of the secretaries of the treasury, interior, or navy, in adjudging what proportion of the proceeds of prize property is by law payable to the district attorney. The taxation or adjustment of the costs of the attorney is made by the judge upon the written assent of the counsel for the captors, and the deposition of the district attorney proving the performance of the service and its reasonable value, no objection being interposed thereto from any party; and it lies with the disbursing officers of the treasury to see that no more is retained by the officer than the sum given him by law.

Should any question touching the exposition of the laws of costs on this subject be brought before the court for judicial examination and decision, the court would not feel itself committed on that question by this course of taxation.

The ANNA v. The GOLDEN HORN.

The GOLDEN HORN v. The ANNA.

[36 Leg. Int. 294; 14 Phila. 521.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. July 14, 1879.

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAM AND SAIL—FOG.

[When a master of a steamship knows that another vessel is in his front, enveloped by a fog, and goes forward without properly heeding her fog signals, and knowing further that in all probability there would not be sufficient time to avoid a collision when she came in sight, is guilty of negligence, which will render his vessel liable for an ensuing collision.]

In admiralty.

Charles Gibbons, Jr., and J. Warren Coulston, for the Anna.

James B. Roney, for the Golden Horn.

BUTLER, District Judge. On the 15th of May, 1879, near five o'clock in the afternoon, the German ship "Anna," and the English steamship "Golden Horn," underweigh at sea, in latitude 36° 53' north, and longitude 74° 12' west, came into collision, injuring each other seriously. On the 21st of May,

[Opinion reprinted from 36 Leg. Int. 294, by permission.]

the "Golden Horn" was libelled, for compensation to the "Anna," and three days later the "Anna" was libelled for compensation to the "Golden Horn." At the time of collision the wind was east northeast. The "Anna" was closehauled, going north, half west, and the "Golden Horn" about east. The evidence taken relieves the "Anna" from the imputation of fault, contained in the libel against her. Holding her course steadily, until danger became apparent, she then made every available effort to avoid it. The libel filed against her must, therefore, be dismissed. Is the "Golden Horn" responsible to the "Anna"? It was her duty to keep out of the "Anna's" way. She did not, and is, therefore, responsible; unless the circumstances existing at the time, excuse her. She avers they do; that a dense fog prevailed, concealing the approach of the "Anna," until it was too late to avoid the collision; that she was proceeding with proper caution, omitting no duty; and that the result was therefore the consequence of inevitable accident. If this averment be true, she is not responsible. But the burden of proving it rests on her. Has she borne this burden successfully? That a fog existed is undisputed. Its extent, or density, is in controversy; and the testimony of the witnesses from the respective vessels, is in direct conflict, regarding it. Those from the "Golden Horn" say it was so dense that a vessel could not be seen more than a few lengths off; that with a proper, vigilant look out, the "Anna" was not seen until within three or four lengths; and those on the "Anna" say it was so light as to admit of seeing a vessel at the distance of a mile and a-half; and that they plainly saw the "Golden Horn" at that distance. It is difficult to reach a satisfactory conclusion respecting the fact here involved. The circumstance that both vessels were signalling, as it is usual and proper to do in case of dangerous fog, to some extent supports the respondent's witnesses. But the existence of a comparatively light, or ordinary fog, would as well account for the signals as a dense one. Proper care, as well as the terms of the statute, would forbid their omission under such circumstances. And the weight of the direct testimony seems to be against the respondent. A careful consideration of all the evidence has not satisfied me that the "Anna" (with a vigilant lookout from the "Golden Horn,") could not have been seen earlier than she was, and in time to avoid the collision. While it seems probable that the fog was not so light as the libellant's witnesses represent, I am not satisfied that it was so dense as stated on the other side. The truth doubtless lies between these conflicting statements. This view of the case is fatal to the defence. But if the respondent's allegations respecting the fog, were accepted, the result would not be different. Passing by all other questions, arising on this view of the case, and coming directly to that of her duty at the time the "Anna's" horn was heard, and subsequently when she appeared to view, it seems quite plain that the respondent was in fault. The horn was twice heard; the second time very distinctly off her starboard bow. What was then done is not clear. There is evidence that her speed was reduced and her helm put to starboard; but looking at all the witnesses say on this subject, and the ship's log, it is quite uncertain whether the speed was reduced when the horn was heard, or when the vessel was subsequently seen. What the master says should have been done was "to put the helm hard a starboard, and let the engines go dead slow * * * in order to ascertain where the horn was. * * * We do not know how the vessel is going by hearing her horn, she might be going either way—might be going directly opposite from what we were going." Whether the helm was put hard a starboard, and the engines reduced to "dead slow," need not be determined, for taking the master's statement respecting the density of the fog, and the impossibility of knowing the "Anna's" locality and course at the time, it would seem quite plain that prudence required him to stop at once instead of simply decreasing his speed. With knowledge that a vessel was in his front, enveloped in fog, so dense as he represents, and knowing, as he must or should, that there might not, and probably would not be time to avoid collision after it came in view, to go blindly forward was negligent, if not reckless. He understood the distance at which a vessel could then be seen, was familiar with his ship, the working of her engine, and the space required to stop or turn. This distance, as the sequel proved, (accepting his statement,) was not sufficient to enable him to keep off. Under such a condition of circumstances as the master describes, I repeat, it would seem quite plain that common prudence required him to stop, when the horn was heard. Had he done so the collision would have been avoided. That there was time to do so, is reasonably clear; and that no effort was then made is equally clear. But taking the distance from the "Anna," when she first came in view, to be as stated by a majority of the respondent's witnesses, I am not satisfied that the space was not then sufficient to enable the respondent to keep off. According to this testimony the "Anna" was still some twelve hundred feet away. It would seem quite reasonable to believe that the respondent could have stopped within this distance, or so far changed her course, as to avoid the collision. I think the weight of the evidence—and all of it comes from the respondent's witnesses—is that the engine was not reversed when the "Anna" first came to view. The master was below and had to be sent for. Whether the messenger went when the second horn was heard, or afterwards when the vessel appeared, is uncertain. That the engine was not reversed until the master came on deck, and gave the order, is certain; and at this time, he says, the "Anna" was but one and a-half lengths away. Reversing the engine then, his vessel stopped, as he states, by the time the other was reached. Had it been done when the vessels were three lengths apart, the collision (according to this statement) could not have occurred.

I need not dwell on the case. Sufficient has been said to explain the reasons which impel the court to overrule the defence. The answers of the assessors respecting the duty and custom of steam vessels, placed as the "Golden Horn" was at the time she heard the "Anna" signal; and the power of the former to avoid the collision on seeing the latter, at, or near, a distance of twelve hundred feet, sustain the views I have expressed on these points; and will be found annexed hereto. A decree must be entered for the libellant.

The ANNA KIMBALL.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1861.¹
MARITIME LIENS—FREIGHT—POSSESSION—WAIVER OF LIEN.

1. Maritime liens do not depend upon possession.

2. But if the owner of a vessel part with the possession of goods by delivering them to the consignee, he thereby loses his lien for freight.

[See note at end of case.]

3. An agreement between the shipper of goods and the carrier, by which a credit is given for the freight beyond the time of delivery, is a waiver of the lien for freight.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Edward Kimball, owner of the ship Anna Kimball, against the ship's cargo, (Alexander Duncan and others, claimants,) to enforce a lien for freight. Decree for claimant. Reversed by the circuit court in Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, Case No. 7,772, and decree entered for libellant which was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court in The Kimball, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 37.]

²[Reversed by circuit court in The Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, Case No. 7,772, which decree was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court in The Kimball, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 37.]

This was a libel to enforce an alleged lien on the cargo of the ship Anna Kimball, for non-payment of the balance due upon the charter of the ship, amounting to about $10,000. The terms of the charter and the other facts appear in the statement of the pleadings, and in the opinion of the court. The defence was placed upon two grounds: 1st. That the terms of the charter making the balance of the charter money due at the end of the voyage, payable one-half in five days, and one-half in ten days after the discharge of the homeward cargo, were inconsistent with the retention of the cargo as security for the payment of such balance. 2d. That the libellant had, during the voyage, received from the charterers their two notes on six months for $10,000, and that the credit thus given was inconsistent with the retention of the cargo necessary for the preservation of the lien, and that it therefore amounted to a waiver of the lien. To this ground of defence the libellant replied, that shortly after taking the charterers' notes, they became insolvent; and that he then offered to return them the notes, which they refused to receive, and that he had always been and was now willing to give up the notes.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for libellant.
Bartlett & Thaxter, for claimant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. Maritime liens do not depend upon possession. This rule is almost universal, but there is one exception. If the owner of a vessel part with the possession of goods by delivering them to the consignee, he thereby loses his lien for freight. Such is the law at least in this circuit, it having been so declared by the circuit court, and followed by this court. And it has been held, that if an agreement be made between the shipper of goods and the carrier, by which a credit is given for the freight beyond the time when they are to be delivered to the shipper, the lien for freight is thereby waived; for in such case the carrier, being bound to deliver the goods before the freight is payable, must, in the performance of that contract, divest himself of the possession, and transfer it to the consignee without payment of the freight, and the lien must be thus terminated. In the present case, the libellant, on the 31st of August, 1857, took two notes for $10,000, payable in six months, for freight.

This necessarily gave a credit until the expiration of those notes. It was a new contract entered into by the parties for adequate consideration; both expected that the ship would arrive several months before the maturity of the notes, that is, before the freight would be payable, and both must have contemplated that the cargo would be delivered to the consignee upon arrival. There is no part of the agreement which indicates that the carrier was to hold on to the goods until the maturity of the notes, and the parties must have understood that the cargo would be delivered in the usual time after arrival. It could not have been contemplated, that the owner of the goods should be kept out of the possession and control of them for several months, because he had for an adequate consideration obtained a credit for that time for the freight. The credit upon such a condition would be an injury rather than a benefit. This ship did not arrive as early as was expected, but she arrived more than a month before the expiration of the credit.

The cargo was in a condition to be delivered to the consignee, and the delivery was duly demanded by him before the freight was payable; but the carrier refused to deliver it unless the freight was first paid. This refusal was wrongful. He had by a valid agreement given a credit for the freight which had not then expired, and by so doing had agreed that he would deliver the goods and relinquish his lien, without payment of the freight; and he cannot, by violating his agreement and holding on to the goods, place himself in a situation to maintain a suit to enforce the lien which he had agreed to relinquish.

[NOTE. This decree was reversed by the circuit court in Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, Case No. 7,772, and the circuit court decree was affirmed by the supreme court in The Kimball, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 37. Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, held that the clause in the charter party requiring a delivery of the cargo within reach of the ship's tackle does not contemplate such a delivery as to discharge the cargo from the lien for freight, but only its unloading from the ship. "The clause was intended for the benefit of the charterers. It gives them ample time to examine the goods, and ascertain their condition, and decide whether they will take them and pay the freight, or decline to receive them;" and especially is the lien preserved by another clause in the charter party which binds the cargo for the performance of the covenants contained therein, of which the payment of the charter money is one. "The notes were given before the termination of the voyage, and, consequently, before the balance of the charter money became due. Treating them as an advance of a portion of the freight, they could be recovered back; or their amount, if paid, if the vessel did not arrive. Freight, being the compensation for the carriage of goods, if paid in advance, is in all cases, unless there is a special agreement to the contrary, to be refunded if from any cause not attributable to the shipper the goods be not carried. * * * The notes were drawn so as to mature near the time of the anticipated arrival of the ship; and, according to the statement of the broker who made the arrangement, they were given for the accommodation of the shipowner, and were to be held over or renewed in case they fell due before the arrival." This is sufficient to repel "any presumption of a discharge of the claim of the shipowner, and of his lien upon the cargo in this case, by his taking the notes of the charterers." The Kimball, 3 Wall. District Court, D. California. 1859.¹

SHIPPING—GENERAL AVERAGE—EXPENSES—VALUATION OF SHIPPING—REPAIRS.

[1. Where consignees, in discharge of their duty as such, cause a general average to be adjusted and stated by an experienced despacheur, their expenses in so doing should be contributed for in general average, when the adjustment is affirmed by the court against objection.]

[2. When a ship arrived in port, it was found that damages had been sustained by the vessel and cargo, which were to be made good in general average, and it became necessary to collect from the shippers the estimated amounts for exact security therefor before delivering the goods, which was accordingly done by the consignees. Held, that their commissions at the customary rate of the port for such collections and payments should be contributed for in general average.]

[Libel by W. C. Annan and others against the ship Star of Hope to recover the value of goods which the ship had failed to deliver. A contribution in general average was ordered, and the case is now heard on exceptions to various charges in the commissioner's report. Overruled. [¹The ship Star of Hope sailed Feb. 10, 1856, from New York for San Francisco with a full cargo of divers kinds of merchandize including 500 casks and packages of spirituous liquors and 40 or 50 kegs of gunpowder prepared as 'patent safety fuses.' There were also 244 1-2 tons of coal shipped by the owners and stowed next to the liquors. On the 14th of April following it was discovered that great quantities of smoke and vapor were issuing from the fore and after hatches of the ship. She was proceeding on her voyage, at the time the discovery was made, in latitude forty-six degrees south, longitude fifty-three degrees west, but the weather was squally and the sea was rough. Precautions, such as are usual on such occasions, were immediately adopted: the hatches were fastened down, and 'everything made tight,' in order to check as much as possible the progress of the fire, at least until a port of succor could be reached. Great alarm was felt, and the fears of all were much increased by the fact, well known to all, that the cargo contained prepared gunpowder, and large quantities of spirituous liquors. Under the circumstances the crew refused to continue the voyage, and the master determined very properly, as the parties agree, to make for the bay of San Antonio, on the southeast coast of Patagonia, as the nearest anchorage, and at the end of four days the ship arrived off that bay, and set the usual signal for a pilot. Throughout that period the signs of fire continued to increase, and in getting up the chains, so as to be ready to cast anchor without delay, they were found to be quite hot, and there were other indications of fire, which greatly heightened the general alarm. Unwilling to run into a bay, unknown to him, without a pilot, the master set his signal as aforesaid, and waited three hours for one, but no one came, and it became evident that none could be expected, as the coast was wild and desolate. Something must be done, as the alarm increased as the impending peril became more imminent. Haul off, the master could not, as the wind and waves were against any such movement. He could not resume the voyage for the same reason, and also because the crew utterly refused their co-operation; nor could he with safety any longer attempt to 'lie to,' as the ship was gradually approaching the shore, and because she was exposed both to the impending peril of fire on board, and to the danger, scarcely less imminent, of shipwreck from the wind and waves. Nothing, therefore, remained for the master to do, which it was within his power to accomplish, but to run the vessel ashore, which it is agreed by the parties would have resulted in the 'certain and almost instant loss of vessel, cargo and all on board,' or to make the attempt to run into the bay without the assistance of a pilot. Evidently he would have been faithless to every interest committed to his charge if he had attempted to beach the vessel at that time and place, as the agreed statement shows that the weather was rough, that the wind was high and blowing towards the land with a heavy sea, and that the shore was rocky and precipitous. What the master did on the occasion is well described by the parties in the agreed statement in which they say he at length determined, as the best thing to be done for the general safety, and especially for the preservation of the cargo and the lives of those on board, to make the attempt to run in without a pilot, preferring all risks to be thereby incurred rather than to remain outside in the momentary apprehension of destruction to all, and the parties agree that he was fully justified in his decision as tested by all the circumstances, although the ship in attempting to enter the bay grounded on a reef, and before she could be got to sea again sprung a leak and sustained very serious injuries in her bottom. Great success, however, attended the movement, notwithstanding those injuries, as the water taken in by the ship extinguished the fire, and the ship remained fast and secure from shipwreck until the winds subsided and the sea became calm. Repairs could not be made at that place, and the parties agree that the injuries to the ship were such as fully justified the master in returning to Montevideo for that purpose, as that was the nearest port where the repairs could be made. He arrived there on the twenty-seventh of the same month, and it appears by the agreed statement that the just and necessary expenses incurred by the ship at that port to enable her to resume the voyage were $100,000, including repairs, unloading, warehousing and reloading of the cargo, and that the master, being without funds or credit, was obliged to sell a considerable portion of the cargo to defray those expenses. Repaired and rendered seaworthy by those means the ship, on the 11th of September, in the same year, resumed her voyage and arrived at her port of destination on the 7th of December following, and the master, without unnecessary delay, delivered the residue of the shipments in good order to the respective consignees, as required by the contract of affreightment."']

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In this case libels were filed by various shippers to recover the value of goods which the ship had failed to deliver. The liability of the ship was not contested, nor was it denied that the amount due the shippers for short delivery, or non delivery, were [was] to be diminished by the amounts due from them respectively for their shares of a general average contribution. The object, therefore, of the litigation was to obtain a decision of the court on the question, whether certain damage sustained by the ship by reason of a stranding, or the expense of repairing such damage, was to be made good by a general average contribution, or was particular average on the ship. The cause was submitted on an agreed statement of facts, and under a stipulation that after the decision of the court, as to the principle question, the general average should be stated and adjusted by a commissioner, in accordance with such decision, and the amounts to be recovered by each libellant should be subject to the deduction of the sums so ascertained to be due from them respectively, as their proportional shares of the general average contribution. The commissioner having stated the general average in accordance with the principles declared in the opinion of the court heretofore delivered, exceptions are now filed to various charges, and adjustments contained in the statement reported by him.

The first exception is to the allowance of various items contained in schedule B. of the statement. These items are for expenses and disbursements incurred in stating the general average. It appears by the agreed statement of facts, that Annan & Embury, who had become the assignees and successors in interest of Annan, Talmage & Co., the charterers of the ship, claimed and obtained the control of the vessel and cargo on her arrival at this port. They collected the freight, received the goods deliverable to themselves, and delivered the goods belonging to other shippers—first obtaining from them the amount of their general average contribution or security therefor. They, also, in the discharge of their duty as consignees, caused a general average to be adjusted and stated by an experienced despacheure—in the course of which proceeding the expenses and charges mentioned in Schedule B. were incurred. As the ship-owners or insurers were dissatisfied with the principles on which the adjustment was made, suit was brought in this court, in the form and under the circumstances above mentioned, to procure a judicial determination of the point in controversy. The decision of the court was in favor of the average as adjusted and stated by the despacheure, or rather, of the correctness of the principle on which the same has been made. The commissioner, therefore, to whom it was referred to state the average, was not required to enter into the details of the various charges, allowances, accounts, etc., necessary to be ascertained and liquidated before a statement of a general average can be made. But the statement already made was, by consent, adopted by him, and reported to the court, subject to any exceptions which might be taken. In that statement are included the expenses of making the adjustment, the propriety of including which, is the question raised by the exception under consideration.

It is not denied that as a general rule, the expense of adjusting a general average forms a part of the losses to be made good

by contribution. But it is said that this statement was abortive, and not the adjustment by which the rights of the parties are determined; that the statement made under the direction of this court is the only one that can have such an effect, and that, therefore, the expenses of attempting to make a previous statement must be rejected. But it is obvious that all those expenses were necessarily incurred for the general benefit. The expense for stationery, clerk hire, warehousing, opening, examining, and appraising cargo; for drayage of the same, insurance, notary's fees for preparing affidavits, and for the services of a professional adjuster in examining, stating and adjusting general average, were all indispensable to the ascertainment of the sums due from the various interests, in general average contribution. Had those expenses not been incurred, or those services not been performed, they would have been necessary under the order of this court, and before any decree in the cause could have been made. Instead of referring the cause to one of the ordinary commissioners of the court to report a statement of the general average, a reference to a competent professional adjuster would have been necessary, and the expenses above alluded to would have been incurred. All the interests have thus been directly benefited by these expenses, incurred for the common advantage and the determination of the only point on which a difference of opinion existed, has been made easy and expeditious. The decision of the court has moreover determined in effect that the statement so made was correct in the only point on which its correctness was disputed—which furnishes an additional reason why the expenses incident to making the statement should be carried, as is usual, to general average account. I am inclined to think that even if this were not so, and the court had declared the principles on which the adjustment had been made to be erroneous, the expenses of such attempted adjustment ought to be allowed in general average. It is of the utmost importance to commerce that settlements of this kind should be made without resort to suits at law. In practice, average statements are made by a class of persons who, in every commercial city, make that business a profession, and whom it is the universal custom to employ where an average contribution is to be stated and adjusted. The expense of examining and appraising goods, auditing and liquidating claims, etc., is necessarily considerable, and must be incurred before the data or elements of the calculation can be obtained. When, therefore, the master or agent of the ship, in good faith, and according to custom, engages the services of a competent and reputable adjuster, and incurs the expense preliminary or incidental to an adjustment, it seems equitable that such expenses should be paid for in general average, notwithstanding that the principles of the adjust may afterwards be found to be erroneous by a court. If such expenses be not allowed, the practical result might be that in all cases of general average suits at law would result, for the master would not incur the expense necessary to an adjustment by a despacheur, if such expenses would have to be borne by himself whenever any of the parties refused to assent to the correctness of the adjustment. He would naturally prefer that a suit should be at once brought, and the average adjusted by the court, in which case the expense would be contributed for, rather than incur the risk of being himself obliged to defray the whole expense of an attempted adjustment by despacheur. For these reasons I incline to think that such expenses should, in all cases, be placed to general average account. But, under the circumstances of the case, there can, I think, be no doubt that the expenses and charges referred to should be contributed for in general average.

It is objected, however, that the allowance of commissions, for collecting and paying general average is at all events inadmissible. This charge is made by the consignees of the ship under whose direction the general average was adjusted. Its amount appears to be the ordinary charge established by usage and sanctioned by a rule of the chamber of commerce of this city. If the services have been, or are to be rendered, and if the expense properly forms a part of and is incidental to the adjustment, settlement and final liquidation of a general average contribution, it ought, on principle, to be allowed, for it is an expense incidental to, or necessarily consequent upon the loss or damage which gave rise to the general average. When the ship arrived and it was found that damages had been sustained by the vessel and the shippers, which were to be made good in general average, it became necessary to collect from the shippers either the estimated amounts due from them respectively, or to exact security therefor before their goods were delivered to them. This was done by the consignees of the ship, as appears by the agreed statement of facts. It cannot be said that the amounts found to be due from each shipper are now to be collected under the decree of this court, by deducting them from the amount otherwise recoverable for short delivery, for it does not appear that all the shippers have libelled for non-delivery; and it is plain that as only a portion of the cargo was sold to obtain funds, the owners of the remaining portion have received their goods and have no claim upon the vessel. They are liable, however, to the vessel and the other interests to make good their proportionate share of the losses incurred for the common safety. These amounts must, therefore, be collected, and the customary commission for such a service ought to be allowed. In the stipulation on file, it is agreed that "from the amounts, if any decreed to be due to Annan & Embury (who were charterers and freighters as well as consignees of the ship) should be deducted not only the amounts due from them for freight under the charter party, but also the amount of the moneys paid or secured to be paid to them by the several consignees of the cargo as their proportion of the general average upon their respective portions of the said cargo, and the decree to be entered in their favor shall be only for the sum remaining after such deduction." They are thus treated in this stipulation not only as having collected or being bound to collect the general average contributions, but it would seem as insurers of those portions of the contributions for which they have taken security, for there is to be deducted from the amount due them for short delivery—not only the amount of contributions paid in by the various consignees of cargo, but also the amounts secured to be paid, but which are not yet collected. It seems to me that under these circumstances the customary mercantile commission for collecting the general average ought to be allowed, notwithstanding that in part such collections are to be made from themselves.

The second exception refers to the amount at which the contributory value of the ship is stated in the adjustment, or rather to the basis of the valuation. The valuation adopted is that at which she was insured. It is contended that her value at this port (admitted to be $40,000) forms the proper basis for estimating her contributory value. The principle on which the contributory value of the vessel, in general average, is estimated, is to ascertain her true value to her owner. But this value is neither increased nor diminished by an accidentally small or great demand for shipping at the port of delivery, as the vessel is ordinarily not intended to be sold, but to return to her home port. It is clear that the amount which is saved to her owner ought not to be estimated by the amount for which she could be sold in a foreign port where there may be no demand for, or no means of purchasing similar vessels. As the amount expended for repairs, in the course of the voyage, must be deducted from the contributory value, it is evident that if the value in a remote foreign port be taken as a basis for the calculation, that value may often not be equal to the expense of repairs, and thus the ship would contribute nothing. The rule usually adopted is to estimate the value of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, deducting therefrom a certain allowance for wear and tear, deterioration, etc. In New York and Pennsylvania the amount deducted is one-fifth; but such a deduction is necessarily arbitrary and unequal in its operation, and it seems is not adopted in New York, where the true value can be ascertained. It is stated by a recent writer, on the law of shipping, (Dixon, p. 501,) to be frequently "the best guide for determining the contributory interest of the ship, to make the valuation in its policy of insurance the basis of the calculation; but in such cases it is to be considered whether the ship was insured at her full value, including outfit, provisions, advanced wages and premium, net freights, etc., without profit, and after deducting the probable wear and tear, and the gross freights. In the first case the outfit, wear, tear, and premium are to be deducted." It does not appear on what basis the valuation in the policy was fixed. But the exception taken is founded on the idea that her value at this port is to be taken as the basis of the calculation; a mode of estimating her value which seems to me to be erroneous. I shall, therefore, overrule the exception, with liberty, however, to the claimant to except to the valuation as fixed—on the ground either that her true value at the commencement of the voyage, with the proper deductions for wear and tear, has not been ascertained; or on the ground that the proper deductions have not been made from the valuation in the policy, if that be taken as the basis of the calculation, provided always that that valuation include outfit, advanced wages and premium, etc., as mentioned in the work above quoted.

The third exception relates to certain repairs—the expenses of which are charged to the ship as particular average, and some of which are subjected to the customary deduction of one-third new for old. With respect to the repairs charged to the ship as particular average, it is contended that the rule is: "that only the repairs over and above those required to remove the incapacity of the ship to proceed on her voyage will be considered as having enured to her benefit and to be chargeable to her alone, but that all other repairs are to be made good in general average." But a moment's consideration will show us that this is not an accurate statement of the rule. It has already been decided that the damage by stranding, or the expense of repairing such damage, did not in this case form the subject of a general average contribution—but was to be borne by the ship as particular average. It was admitted that it was necessary to seek a port of distress—by reason of the incapacity of the ship to pursue her voyage. If then, the principle contended be applied to this case, it must be applied to all others where the ship necessarily seeks a port of refuge for repairs. In all such cases the ship is incapable of continuing her voyage, otherwise the deviation is unjustifiable, and the repairs made are always necessary to remove her incapacity to proceed. But such repairs are always reputed particular average. "If masts or rudder be carried away in a storm, or by lightning, it will be for the benefit of all parties concerned that they be replaced, but it was never yet contended that the owner of goods was to bear any part of the expense." Per Mr. J. Livingston; Walden v. Le Roy, 2 Caines, 262. It is obvious that if all repairs necessary to enable the ship to proceed are for that reason to be brought into general average, it will be difficult to imagine a case where repairs made in a port of distress will not be contributed, for the fact that the vessel is obliged to seek such a port and to make such repairs, will demonstrate that they were necessary to the further prosecution of the voyage. The true rule is stated by Mr. J. Bayley, in Plummer v. Wildman, 3 Maule & S. 482, the case chiefly relied on by the counsel for the claimant: "If the repairs were merely such as were necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage home, and were afterwards of no benefit to her, such repairs would properly come under the 'head of general average.'" The observations of Lord Ellenborough which precede those of Mr. J. Bayley, plainly referred to the particular circumstances of the case before him. It appears by the report, that the repairs which it was claimed should be paid for in general average were temporary and for the mere purpose of completing the voyage, and that when the vessel reached home, she was repaired more effectually. The true rule on the subject is thus laid down with his usual perspicuity, by Mr. Ch. Kent: "The cost of the repairs so far as they accrue to the ship alone as a benefit and would have been necessary in that port, on account of the ship alone, are not average. But if the expense of the repairs would not have been incurred but for the benefit of the cargo, and might have been deferred with safety to the ship to a less costly port, such extra expenses are general average." 3 Kent, Comm. 303. The test proposed by Mr. Phillips (2 Ins. § 1300) is: "How much of the repairs are temporary, and how much are permanent." In this case the repairs to the ship rendered necessary by the stranding were obviously of a permanent character. They consisted chiefly of caulking, coppering, painting, etc. But to effect these repairs certain incidental expenses were such as surveys, etc., wear and tear of materials, cordage, blocks, boat hire, etc. These expenses being incidental to and part of the cost of the repairs which are charged to the ship, should, it seems to me, on obvious principles, be charged to the same account. The repairs themselves being particular, and not general average, all the expenses of making them should also be reputed particular average. With respect to the expense of raising funds (i. e., loss on sale of cargo), it is obvious that it being ascertained which repairs of the expenses are general average, and which are particular average chargeable to the ship, the expense of raising funds to meet those expenses should be charged to particular average and to general average, in the proportion which those accounts bear to each other, or in other words, general average should be deemed to have obtained funds to pay general average expenses, and particular average funds to defray particular average expenses—and the premium or cost of obtaining them should be borne by each, according to the amounts deemed to have been raised for the benefit of each. This, I understand to have been done. Peters v. Warren Ins. Co., [Case No. 11,034.]

With respect to the deduction of one-third new for old, it is to be observed that this deduction is an arbitrary and sometimes not a very equitable allowance made for the supposed advantage accruing to the owner from having old materials replaced by new. The exception in favor of ships on their first voyage, which obtains in England, has not been annulled in America. Phil. Ins. § 1431. The reason of the rule being that the owner is presumed to be benefitted to the extent of one-third by the repairs, it follows, that in estimating the contributory value of the ship, there must be deducted from her value at the commencement of the voyage the cost of the repairs, less one-third new for old. For to that extent the repairs are presumed to have added to the permanent value of the ship.

The question thus raises, what expenses belong to repairs? It seems to be the usage to include in the expense of repairs, from which one-third is to be deducted, not merely the cost of materials and labor, but also the incidental charges necessarily incurred in making the repairs. In the case of Potter v. Ocean Ins. Co., [Case No. 11,335.] Judge Story held that this deduction should not be made from the expense of towing the vessel across the Mississippi, etc., to be repaired, and the cost of assistance in getting her across and boat hire, etc. But there seems to be no such charges in this statement of this case. The boat hire charged being that for workmen, whilst the vessel was hove down. It is claimed that the expense of heaving down preparatory to the repairs, and of staging, etc., during the repairs, should be brought into general average. But if the expense of repairs, etc., be, as has been already decided, particular average, I cannot perceive how I can discriminate between the expense of the repairs themselves and the necessary expenses incidental to them. The expense of heaving a ship down, and of staging to the workmen, seems to be as much a part of the cost of repairing her bottom as that of the plank, or copper, or oakum used for the purpose. Had any of these expenses been incurred for the purpose of merely temporary repairs, of no permanent benefit to the ship, and which it would be necessary subsequently to replace, they should undoubtedly have been brought into general average. But all the repairs seem to have been of a permanent character; and being such, all expenses of making them should be carried to account of particular average unless the disaster which rendered them necessary was such as to give rise to a general average contribution, a point already decided adversely to the claimant by this court.

A decree in conformity with this opinion must be entered.

[NOTE. The circuit court affirmed this decree on appeal, whereupon an appeal was taken to the supreme court, which reversed the decree. The Star of Hope v. Annan, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 203. Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion, said:

"Where the ship is voluntarily run ashore to avoid capture, foundering, or shipwreck, and she is afterwards recovered, so as to be able to perform her voyage, the loss resulting from the stranding, says Mr. Arnould, is to be made good by general average contribution; and the writer adds that there is no rule more clearly established than this by the uniform course of maritime law and usage. 2 Arn. Ins. 734; Lewis v. Williams, 1 Hall. 474. Sustained, as that proposition is at the present day, by universal consent, it does not seem to be necessary to refer to other authorities in its support, nor is it necessary to enlarge that rule in order to dispose of the present controversy; but, to prevent any misconception as to the views of the court, it is deemed proper to add that it is settled law in this court that the case is one for general average, although the ship was totally lost, if the stranding was voluntary, and was designed for the common safety, and it appears that the act of stranding resulted in saving the cargo. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 331; Caze v. Reilly, Case No. 2,533; Sims v. Gurney, 4 Bin. 513; Gray v. Waln, 2 Serg. & R. 229; 1 Pars. Shipp. 372; Merithew v. Sampson, 4 Allen, 192. Undoubtedly the sacrifice must be voluntary, and must have been intended as a means of saving the remaining property of the adventure, and the lives of those on board; and, unless such was the purpose of the act, it gives no claim for contribution; but it is not necessary that there should have been any intention to destroy the thing or things cast away, as no such intention is ever supposed to exist. On the contrary, it is sufficient that the property was selected to suffer the common peril in place of the whole of the associated interests that the remainder might be saved. 1 Pars. Shipp. 343.

[Suggestion is made that the act of stranding of the vessel in this case was not a voluntary act, as the reef where she grounded was not visible at the time, and was unknown to the master, but the agreed statement shows that in undertaking to run into the bay the master knew that the chief risk he had to encounter was the stranding of the ship, and the precautions which he took to guard against that danger show to the entire satisfaction of the court that the disaster was not altogether unexpected. As the ship advanced, the lead was constantly employed, showing eight fathoms at the first, then seven, then six only, and so on, the depth continuing to diminish at each throw of the lead until the ship grounded and remained fast. Grant that the master did not intend that the ship should ground on that reef; still it is clear that he was aware that such a danger was the chief one he had to encounter in entering the bay, and the case shows that he deliberately elected and decided to take that hazard, rather than to remain outside, where, in his judgment, the whole interests under his control, and the lives of all on board, were exposed to imminent peril, if not to certain destruction. Under these circumstances, it is not possible to decide that the will of man did not in some degree contribute to the stranding of the ship, which is all that is required to constitute the stranding a voluntary act, within the meaning of the commercial law. 2 Arn. Ins. 785; Emerigon, 324. Suppose the storm outside the bay was irresistible and overpowering, still it does not follow that there was no exercise of judgment, for there may be a choice of perils when there is no possibility of perfect safety. Sims v. Gurney, 4 Bin. 525; 2 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 325, and note v. Destruction of all the interests was apparently certain if the ship remained outside, but the master, under the circumstances, elected to enter the bay, without the assistance of a pilot, knowing that there was great danger that the ship might ground in the attempt; but his decision was that it was better for all concerned to make the attempt than to remain where he was, even if she did ground, and the result shows that he decided wisely for all interests, as damage resulted to none except to the ship, and she would, doubtless, have been destroyed if she had continued to remain outside of the bay. Rea v. Cutler, Case No. 11,599. * * *

"Brief consideration must also be given to the exceptions taken by the claimants, to the report of the commissioner, which were overruled by the court. They are three in number, and they will be considered in the order in which they were made.

"(1) That the commissioner erred in charging the ship or freight with any part of the expenses incurred by the charterers in the ex parte adjustment procured by them prior to the order of reference to the commissioner. Unusual difficulty attends the inquiry, on account of the indefinite character of the exception, and the uncertain state of the evidence; but, the conclusion of the court being that the case is one for general average, it seems to the court that those expenses constitute a matter to be adjusted between the charterers and the libellants, irrespective of the controversy presented in this record, unless the results of that adjustment were adopted and used by the commissioner. Influenced by these suggestions, the exception is sustained, but the matter is left open for further inquiry when the mandate is sent down.

"(2) That the commissioner erred in assuming that the valuation of the ship as given in the policy of insurance is the proper basis of her contributory value in the statement of the amount for general average. As a general rule, the value of the ship for contribution, where she had received no extraordinary injuries during the voyage, and has not been repaired on that account, is her value at the time of her arrival at the termination of the voyage, but if she met with damage before she arrived, by perils of the sea, and had been repaired, then the value to be assumed in the adjustment is her worth before such repairs were made. Neither party gave any evidence as to the value of the ship prior to the disaster except what appears in the policy of insurance, and, under the circumstances, it is difficult to see what better rule can be prescribed than that adopted by the commissioner. Hopk. Av. (3d Ed.) 104; 2 Arn. Ins. 812; Patapasco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 604; Clark v. United Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 7 Mass. 370; Dodge v. Union Marine Ins. Co., 17 Mass. 471. Strictly speaking, the rule is the value of the ship antecedent to the injuries received, but, as that requirement can seldom be met, the usual resort is her value at the port of her departure, making such deduction for deterioration as appears to be just and reasonable. 1 Pars. Shipp. 448; Mutual Safety Ins. Co. v. The George, Case No. 9,982. No proof on that subject, except the policy of insurance, was offered by either party, and, inasmuch as ships are seldom insured beyond their actual value, the exception is overruled.

["(3) That the commissioner erred in carrying into particular average certain expenses incurred by the master at the port where the repairs were made, which should have been regarded as the proper subject of general average. Considerable difficulty also attends this inquiry for the want of a more definite statement of the grounds of the complaint. We think it plain, however, that the exception must be sustained, as some of the matters charged as particular average, in whole or in part, ought clearly to have been included at their full value among the incidental expenses necessarily incurred in making the repairs; but, in view of the circumstances, we shall not attempt to do more than to state the general principles which should regulate the adjustment in the particulars involved in the exception, and leave their application to be made in the case by the court below, where the parties, if need be, may again be heard.

[Whatever the nature of the injury to the ship may be, and whether it arose from the act of the master in voluntarily sacrificing a part of it or in voluntarily stranding the vessel, the wages and provisions of the master, officers, and crew, from the time of putting away for the port of succor, and every expense necessarily incurred during the detention for the benefit of all concerned, are general average. Abb. Shipp. 601; Plummer v. Wildman, 3 Maule & S. 482; Walden v. Le Roy, 2 Caines, 263; Henshaw v. Marine Ins. Co., Id. 274; Nelson v. Belmont, 21 N. Y. 38; The Mary, Case No. 9,188. Repairs necessary to remove the inability of the ship to proceed on her voyage are now regarded everywhere as the proper subject of general average. Expenses for repairs beyond what is reasonably necessary for that purpose are not so regarded, but it is not necessary to examine the exceptions to the rule with any particularity in this case, as the parties agree that all the expenses incurred were necessary to enable the ship to resume her voyage. The wages and provisions of the master, officers, and crew are general average from the time the disaster occurs until the ship resumes her voyage, if proper diligence is employed in making the repairs. Padelford v. Boardman, 4 Mass. 548; Potter v. Ocean Ins. Co., Case No. 11,335. Towing the ship into port, and extra expenses necessarily incurred in pumping to keep her afloat until the leaks can be stopped, are to be included in the adjustment. 2 Phil. Ins. (3d Ed.) § 1326; Orrok v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 21 Pick. 469. Surveys, port charges, the hire of anchors, cables, boats, and other necessary apparatus, for temporary purposes in making the repairs, are all to be taken into the account, as well as the expenses of unloading, warehousing, and reloading the cargo after the repairs are completed. Potter v. Ocean Ins. Co., supra; The Mary, supra. Repairs in such a case cannot be made by the master unless he has means or credit; and if he has neither, and his situation is such that he cannot communicate with the owners, he may sell a part of the cargo for that purpose, if it is necessary for him to do so in order to raise the means to make the repairs. Sacrifices made to raise such means are the subject of general average, and the rule is the same whether the sacrifice was made by a sale of a part of the cargo or by the payment of marine interest. Orrok v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., supra; 1 Fars. Shipp. 400."]

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—CANAL BOAT—CONTRACT OF CARRIAGE.

[An action in rem against a canal boat for a breach of contract of carriage from Rome to New York via the Erie canal and Hudson river, is not within the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Giles Hawley against the canal-boat Ann Arbor for breach of a contract of carriage. Dismissed. Affirmed by the circuit court. Case No. 408.]

Mr. Tracy, for libelant.

Kirkland & Birdseye, for claimants.

Before INGERSOLL, District Judge.

The libel in this case is filed to recover the value of a quantity of butter shipped on the 5th or 6th of Dec., 1852, on board of the canal boat then lying in the Erie canal at Rome, Oneida county, to be carried to the city of New York, and there delivered. It is alleged that 449 tubs of butter were shipped, and only 427 delivered, and that the canal boat is responsible in admiralty for the loss. The claimants deny that more than 427 were shipped, or that the boat is liable in admiralty if they were lost. The evidence was given by one witness that he kept the tally of the tubs as they were shipped or had it kept; that 449 tubs of butter went on board; that the weight was marked on each tub, and that the weight of all was 50,552 pounds. Evidence was given, however, that some butter was put on board when he was not present, and one of the libelants, in obtaining a clearance at the collector's office at Rome, represented the weight to be 46,594 pounds. The captain of the boat, his wife and son, who came with the boat to New York, all testified that it did not appear to have been disturbed on the voyage, and could not have been without their knowledge, and all that was carried to New York was safely delivered to the consignees.

Held BY THE COURT, that it is not shown by sufficient proof that these 22 tubs were ever put on board, but what was put on board was safely delivered. That it therefore was not necessary to decide the question of jurisdiction, but, without having sufficiently considered that question, the impressions of the court are against the right of the libelants to proceed against the boat. The canal boat was not built to navigate tide waters, but the Erie canal, and is not a ship within the definition in Benedict's Admiralty, 215, not being a locomotive machine. When a ship is libeled in admiralty court for the breach of maritime compact it is upon the ground that the ship itself contracts—and if such a canal boat as this, while on the Erie canal, up in Oneida county, can enter into and bind itself by a contract so as to come within the control of a court of admiralty, I do not see but that any vessel or thing capable of containing freight, built and designed to make headway on the New York Central Rail Road by means of the wheels of the rail road cars, can in the same county enter into and bind itself by a maritime contract and come under the control of a court of admiralty, provided it is so constructed that when it arrives at Albany it can be launched from the wheels of the railroad carriage into tide water and be towed by a steamboat to New York.

Libel dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. This decision was affirmed by the circuit court. Case No. 408. It will be noticed that the remarks of the learned judge in this case on the question of jurisdiction are obiter dicta, as he distinctly says, and seem open to objection on several grounds. The reference to tide waters as determining the admiralty jurisdiction was doubtless an inadvertence, for ever since the decision in the case of The Genesee Chief, 12 How. (53 U. S.) 457, it has been uniformly held that the admiralty jurisdiction extends to all public navigable waters, whether subject to tides or not. In the principal case, however, the only natural public waterway (the Hudson) was tide water. Aside from this, the objection to the jurisdiction arises under three questions: (1) Is the Erie canal, in connection with the Hudson river, a public navigable water of the United States? (2) Is a canal boat having no locomotive power in itself a vessel subject to admiralty process in rem for breach of a contract of carriage? (3) Is a contract of carriage entered into with the owner of such a boat in an interior county of New York for the transportation of cargo, via Erie canal and Hudson river to New York city, a maritime contract?

[1. The first question must be answered in the affirmative, unless the artificial nature of the waterway is fatal to the jurisdiction, for the test is said to be whether the water is such that on it commerce can be carried on between different states or nations. The Genesee Chief, supra; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 557. In the case of The Montello, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 411, it was held that the Fox river, in Wisconsin, was navigable water of the United States, within the meaning of the act of congress regulating the licensing of coasting vessels. It appeared that there had been a considerable interstate commerce on the river in its natural state in boats of draft towed by animal power, but several short portages were necessary. The acceptance of the ordinance of 1787 had been imposed on the state as a condition of admission to the Union, and that ordinance provided that all navigable rivers leading into the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence and their portages should be public highways. The court held that capacity of the waters for use in their natural state for the purposes of commerce is the test of navigability, rather than the extent and manner of that use. The river had been improved by canals and locks, and steamboats plying on it were held subject to the license act. Objection to the jurisdiction had been taken below and overruled. In the case of Ex parte Boyer, 109 U. S. 629, 3 Sup. Ct. 434, the admiralty jurisdiction was held to extend to a case of collision in the Illinois and Lake Michigan canal, though it was wholly artificial, and wholly within the body of the state, and subject to its control. The canal had been built by the state with the aid of a land grant from congress, declaring that it should be public highway free of toll for the government of the United States, and for their property and persons in their service; and this on the ground that the canal was in fact a highway for commerce, so that vessels could pass on it from ports in one state to those in another.

[2. It seems well settled that the character of the thing injured by a maritime tort is immaterial. The jurisdiction depends wholly on the navigability of the waters where the injury occurs. The Ceres, Case No. 2,555; Albany Dredging Co. v. The Gladiolus, Case No. 132; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 441. In cases of contract the admiralty jurisdiction depends wholly on the subject-matter, whether maritime or not, and not on the locality. Waring v. Clarke, supra. In The E. M. McChesney, Case No. 4,463, Blatchford, District Judge, held that a canal boat having no motive power of its own was liable in rem for a breach of a contract for the carriage of grain from Buffalo to New York by way of the Erie canal. This decision was affirmed by Waite, Circuit Justice, in Case No. 4,464. The contract was made while the boat lay in Buffalo creek, and purported to be a bill of lading. The court held that, since part of the voyage was on the Hudson river, the contract was maritime. In The Hezekiah Baldwin, Case No. 6,449, a canal boat, without motive power of its own, and fitted as a floating elevator, was held subject to a maritime lien. In The General Cass, Case No. 5,307, Longyear, District Judge, held that lighters without motive power were subject to a maritime lien for towage rendered in the home port. Towage of a steam dredge and her scows is a maritime service for which a lien attaches. The Alabama, 22 Fed. 449. A maritime lien for supplies can be enforced against a steam dredge having no power of locomotion in itself. The Pioneer, 30 Fed. 206. A contract for the repair of a pleasure barge without motive power of its own is maritime, and a lien given by state statutes for such repairs in the home port is enforceable in admiralty. The City of Pittsburgh, 45 Fed. 699.

[3. On the authority of Ex parte Boyer, Waring v. Clarke, and The E. M. McChesney, supra, it would seem that a contract of carriage by a canal boat from some point on the Erie canal to New York city was a maritime contract, of which admiralty has jurisdiction.]

MARITIME LIENS—CANAL-BOATS—CONTRACT OF AFFREIGHTMENT.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem filed in the district court, against the canal-boat Ann Arbor, for the breach of a contract of affreightment in respect to certain tubs of butter, shipped by that craft, from Rome, (N. Y.) on the Erie canal, to the city of New York. The district court dismissed the libel, [The Ann Arbor, Case No. 407,] and the claimant appealed to this court, where further proof was taken.

Charles Tracy, for libellants.

Edwin W. Stoughton and Benjamin F. Dunning, for claimant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I think that the proof, including that taken in this court, leaves the question of fact doubtful, whether the tubs of butter claimed not to have been delivered at the port of destination, were shipped upon the canal-boat at Rome, as averred in the libel. The proof is too doubtful to found a decree upon it for the libellants. I am, also, inclined to think that the canal-boat is not a ship or vessel, upon the North river, or other navigable waters within the admiralty jurisdiction, subject to maritime liens in the admiralty, for breaches of contracts of affreightment. These boats are exclusively adapted to canal navigation. Of themselves, they have no power as respects navigation upon public waters, any more than a raft, an ark, or a mud-scow.

[In admiralty. Libel on bottomry bond by Nehemiah Carrington against the brig Ann C. Pratt, Leonard B. Pratt, claimant. Decree for libellant for his implied lien, the bond being void for fraud. (Not reported.) Claimant appeals. Reversed, and libel dismissed, with costs. The libellant then appealed to the supreme court, where the circuit court decree was affirmed, sub nom. Carrington v. The Ann C. Pratt, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 63.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court in a cause of bottomry. The brig Ann C. Pratt sailed from Frankfort, in the state of Maine, Nov. 7, 1850, commanded and owned by Leonard B. Pratt, on a voyage to the Western islands, and thence to such other port or ports as the master should determine to visit. She arrived at Terceira on the 29th of November having encountered severe gales and been obliged to throw over a part of her deck-load. She sailed thence for St. Michael, and arrived in sight of that island on the 31st of December, but owing to gales of wind and thick squally weather, was unable to come to anchor until the 11th of January; and from that day she lay in an open roadstead until the 13th of January, when, the master being on shore with the ship's papers, she was struck by a heavy squall, parted her cables and all her other fasts, and was driven to sea with no anchor on board. Richard R. Airey, the mate, took the command, and determined to run for St. Thomas, whither the master had, before the disaster, concluded to go from St. Michael. The propriety of this determination was questioned by the claimant, and much of the evidence bears on this question. The brig arrived at St. Thomas on the 6th of February; a survey was called, and pretty extensive repairs were ordered by the surveyors. Money to make these repairs was advanced by the libellant, and a bottomry bond taken, signed by Airey. Other facts, necessary to the determination of the case, are stated in the opinion of the court.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Judge, and WARE, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. There is a preliminary question in this case, which must be first disposed of. On the return of the process, in the court below, Leonard B. Pratt appeared and claimed the brig as sole owner. In that capacity, he was admitted by the court, contested the action upon answer and proof, appealed from the decree, and entered his appeal in this court. After the appeal had been claimed, an abandonment, which he had previously made of the brig to the company that had underwritten a policy of insurance on her, was accepted by the underwriters, who applied to the court, by petition, on the fourth day of the term at which the appeal was entered, setting forth these facts, and praying for leave to intervene. The question is, whether, at this stage of the cause, this can be allowed. The thirty-fourth admiralty rule of the supreme court regulates the exercise of the right of intervention by third persons, in some cases, where that right exists, "according to the course of admiralty proceedings;" but it does not determine in what cases third persons are entitled thus to be heard. The forty-third rule does declare, as well as regulate, the exercise of the right of intervening, pro interesse suo; but it extends only to an interest in any proceeds in the registry, and has no application to a case where the third person seeks to come in as sole owner of the res and contest the suit.

In the absence of any direct authority, it would seem to be quite clear, that a court of admiralty, no more than a court of equity, would take notice of mere voluntary assignments of the subject in dispute, made pendente lite by the respondent. It cannot suffer its proceedings thus to be incumbered or affected. It is clear, also, that when there is a change of ownership, by operation of law, as in case of death, the same objection does not exist, and that it would be in conformity with its practice, to admit the representative to appear. By a rule of the supreme court, passed in 1821, such a case is specially provided for in that court. It does not extend to the circuit or district courts, but is of importance, as showing the propriety of admitting a representative in an appellate court. It must be observed, however, that it is only as a representative, as having become clothed with the rights of the original claimant by succession, that the third person is admitted. Now, the case before me does not belong to either of these classes of cases. It is not an assignment by operation of law, nor is it a mere voluntary assignment pendente lite. The policy was underwritten, the disaster occurred, and the right of abandonment existed, in point of law, before the suit was begun. The inchoate right of the assured to recover, as for a constructive total loss, could only be perfected by making an abandonment; and when duly made and accepted it relates back to the time of the disaster, and clothes the underwriter with all rights which at that time belonged to the owner. I do not consider an abandonment, made to perfect the previously existing rights of the insured, as resting on the same ground as a voluntary assignment; nor that the legal operation of such a transfer should be treated by the admiralty as similar to a sale pendente lite. I can perceive no particular inconvenience in allowing the underwriter, who has accepted an abandonment, to intervene and be admitted a party to the suit, as having succeeded to the rights of the original claimant, and that, thereupon, the appeal would be heard, as in other cases. But this is a case in which the underwriter claims to have succeeded to all the rights of the original claimant in the subject proceeded against, and that the latter is consequently completely divested of all interest, and should be, of all control over the suit, as in case of death or bankruptcy; and if admitted, he must dominus litis.

The thirty-fourth rule seems well enough adapted to such cases. Unless this construction be put upon it, I perceive no provision even for the death of a party, after an appeal to this court; and as this court does not possess power to remit an admiralty cause to the district court, and there is no rule expressly providing for a supplemental libel to be filed here, some rule to prevent the abatement of suits is needful; and I shall hold this thirty-fourth rule to be applicable to all such cases. The order which was entered at a former day, de bene esse, may, therefore, stand.

Having disposed of this preliminary question, I proceed to consider the merits of this case. There are some points in the case which are too clear to require me to pause upon them. That the mate succeeded to the command, in the emergency which occurred, there can be no doubt. The presumption is, that he was a person of competent skill and ability to discharge his duties; and if he was, and fairly exercised his judgment and discretion, all interested were bound by his acts. Upon these points, I perceive nothing in the evidence which would impeach his conduct. There is a difference of opinion among the experts; but it is far from satisfying my mind, that the respondents can avail themselves of the determination of the mate to carry the vessel to St. Thomas, as a defence to this bond. I deem it unnecessary to detail the evidence bearing on this part of the case. It is equally clear, that the mate, as temporary master, had the power, in a fit case of necessity, to take up a loan on bottomry; and that the lender, in such a case, is not held to see to anything more than an apparent necessity for the repairs. The authority of the mate, as temporary master, is essential to enable him to give such a bond. Like other agencies, he who seeks to acquire a right through a bond thus executed, must see to it that the person assuming to act as master, is rightfully master. But if he be master, it does not impose any new duty of diligence upon the lender, that he became such by reason of a casualty in the course of the voyage. When the owners appoint the mate, they are supposed to contemplate such casualties, and to agree that the mate shall exercise all the needful powers of master, in case they occur; and third persons may rightfully treat with him as master, when he has thus become such. The Kennersley Castle and The Rubicon, 3 Hagg. Adm. 8, 9; The Alexander, 1 Dod. 280.

The real difficulty of the case begins when we have advanced beyond these questions, and reached the bond itself. The amount actually lent by the libellants was $3877.25. The bottomry bond was given in the sum of $4591.42. Two sets of accounts and vouchers were made out, the one corresponding with the truth of the case, the other with the fictitious amount of the bottomry bond, and both sets were sent to the father of Captain Pratt, accompanied by letters of advice from the libellant and Airey, informing him that the bond was given for this larger sum, and the false account and vouchers sent, to enable the owner to make a claim therefor on the underwriters upon the vessel. A bill of exchange for the true sum was drawn by Airey, at the same time the bond was given. The frankness with which this scheme is explained to the father of Captain Pratt, by a mercantile house apparently of good standing, may induce the belief that such practices are not infrequent; but if so, they are not therefore the less reprehensible, nor is it the less necessary that they should be looked at in their true light, and visited with their just consequences, when they appear in a court of justice. This is a fraudulent bond, and the court will not lend its aid to enforce it. Even if the third person, on whom it was designed to impose, had sustained no confidential relation to either of the parties to this transaction, still the bond would be void. The juster is entitled to protection from actual fraud; and the protection is given, by refusing relief to either party to the fraudulent arrangement, not on account of any merit of his opponent, but for the sake of public morals, and of the right of the party sought to be defrauded. This doctrine has been applied in numerous cases, even at the common law. Thus, a secret promise to pay to one creditor more than the composition paid to others for signing the deed, (Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372; Wells v. Girling, 1 Brod. & B. 447;) or to procure signatures to a petition for the discharge of an insolvent, (Payne v. Eden, 3 Caines, 213; Case v. Gerish, 15 Pick. 49;) or to prevent fair competition at an auction sale; or a sale on execution, (Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194; Gardiner

v. Morse, 25 Me. 140;) or a promise to give more for goods than the price a friend, who had been prevailed on to buy them for the defendant, had paid, (Jackson v. Duchaire, 3 Term R. 551; Pidcock v. Bishop, 3 Barn. & C. 605,)—are all void at law, though both parties before the court participated, and the fraud was directed against a third person. But in this case, the underwriters had a relation to the vessel and to Airey at the time this bond was given. A disaster had occurred, calling for repairs. If their amount should prove to be sufficient to justify an abandonment, and it should be duly made, or made and accepted, it would relate back, by operation of law, to the time of the disaster; and from that time, Airey would be the agent of the underwriters. This has actually happened; and in the posture in which the case now stands before the court, Airey, when he gave this bond, acted for account of whom it might concern, and it has turned out to concern the underwriters. I have no hesitation in pronouncing the bond to be void for fraud. Nor can the bond be suffered to stand as security, even for the sum actually advanced. I adopt the language of Kent, J., in Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 598, as expressing the true rule:—"I presume there is no instance to be met with of any reimbursement or indemnity afforded by a court of chancery to a particeps criminis in a case of positive fraud. In Smith v. Loader, Prec. Ch. 80, the party advancing money to an agent, under a combination with him to cheat the principal, lost his whole security from the principal for the money actually advanced to his agent. It is fit and proper this result should take place, as a contrary course might afford countenance to fraud, by giving it a partial effect." This is the settled rule in courts of chancery. Bates v. Graves, 2 Ves. Jr. 294; Attorney General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 283; Boyd v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Ch. 482. And it is as fit and applicable in a court of admiralty, which administers equity in maritime affairs.

One other question remains. Can the libellant be allowed to sustain the suit, upon the footing of a lien upon the vessel, under the general maritime law of Europe and America, for the sum actually advanced by him for repairs and supplies? The original libel is in a cause of bottomry, and propounds the bottomry bond, and seeks to recover upon it the whole principal sum, together with the marine interest, at the rate of ten per cent., stipulated for in the bond. The answer contested the validity of the bond, as being fraudulent. By an amendment, allowed to be filed at the hearing in the district court, an article was introduced, propounding a claim for the true amount advanced, together with the maritime interest; and upon this article, the court below declared that a lien existed in favor of the libellant, by operation of the general admiralty law, and decreed accordingly. The claimant appealed. That such a lien would have attached upon this vessel, by operation of law, if no bottomry contract had been made, is clear. But two very grave questions arise, Whether the contract for a bottomry loan, followed by the execution of the bottomry bond, and the institution of a suit to enforce it, are consistent with the existence of that lien, by operation of law; and whether the bond, being pronounced to be fraudulent, the court will aid the lender to recover what, independent of the fraud, would justly have belonged to him?

In considering the first of these questions, I must take it to be true, that the lien created by the maritime law may be, and is, waived by the creditor, by any act or contract which is inconsistent with an intention to receive or retain that lien. The cases of The Nestor, [Case No. 10,126,] and The Chusan, [Id. 2,717,] were discussed and decided upon an admission of the correctness of this position, which is supported by Ramsey v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611, and The William Money, 2 Hagg. Adm. 136. The inquiry is, whether what was actually done in this case is consistent with an intention to obtain or hold the lien, which the law maritime creates in favor of the lender of money to the master, for making necessary repairs in a foreign port? The original libel states that the master, being in want of money, and having no other adequate means of procuring the same, borrowed of the libellant the sum of $4,591.42, upon the bottomry and hypothecation of the said brig, her tackle and apparel, and said sum was accordingly advanced and paid by the libellant, at the rate of ten per cent. premium for the maritime risk, and that in fulfilment of the agreement of bottomry, the master executed the bond. Airey testified that he made an agreement with the libellant, not in writing, to furnish funds to repair the brig, and to give him a bottomry bond on the vessel, to secure the payment of what he might advance. "He was not willing to furnish the funds, unless I would do as we talked." So that, in point of fact, the libellant was unwilling to deal upon any other footing than that of a contract of bottomry; and both parties, from the beginning, contracted solely with reference to such a bond. Now, this is a contract of a peculiar character, distinguishable, by very marked characteristics, from an ordinary loan. Pothier, Contrat a la Grosse, n. 6, says, "It differs from all other contracts; it forms a particular species by itself." Boulay-Paty, in his notes to Emerigon on Bottomry, (volume 2, p. 417, c. 1, § 2,) uses the following emphatic language: "It is neither a sale nor a partnership, nor a loan, properly speaking, nor insurance, nor a compound of different contracts, undique collatis membris,—but it is a contract having a specific name,—un contrat nomine,—and a character peculiar to itself." And Emerigon, in the text, (ch. 1, § 4,) has an elaborate dissertation on "the difference between the contract of bottomry, of loan, of partnership, and insurance;" and he points out five distinct particulars in which a contract of this kind differs from a loan, the most important of which are, the risk taken by the lender, and the premium paid for that risk. To a certain extent, the same view of this contract is taken in the case of The Atlas, 2 Hagg. Adm. 51. Indeed, so important is the difference between the contract of bottomry and a simple loan, that it has generally been deemed essential that it should be contracted for at the outset, and before the advances were made, (as it was in this case,) to support a bond when actually given. The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538; The Augusta, 1 Dod. 283; The Hebe, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 146; The Wave, 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 589. This being so, it seems to me impossible to maintain that the parties intended that a lien, by operation of law, should exist, for the security of a simple loan, to make repairs, in this case.

One method of determining whether both the implied lien and the express hypothecation, by way of bottomry, can be intended to exist together, is to consider that the first has for its object to secure the repayment of a loan of money, which is absolutely to be repaid, either upon demand, or at a stipulated time, and for which the master may pledge the security of the vessel, the owners, and himself; while a loan on bottomry does not oblige the owner personally, is to be repaid only on condition of surviving the perils, the risk of which the lender assumes; and constitutes, as the writers on maritime law have so emphatically declared, an obligation of a distinct and peculiar kind. It is true, that in both cases liens exist; but the one is implied by law, the other is created by the act of the master; the one is security for a debt of the owners and the master, the other is a right to receive a sum of money out of the thing at risk, in case it should survive the perils, the hazard of which is assumed by the lender; the one is merely a collateral security for a simple loan; the other is a transaction standing quite by itself, not capable of being analyzed into a loan and a mortgage to secure it, and a contract of insurance, and another of partnership, undique collatis membris, but simply a contract of bottomry, unlike all of them, and resembling nothing, and being consistent with nothing, but itself. There is one analogy derived from courts of chancery, which is entitled to some consideration. It is the case of a purchaser, who has taken a mortgage on the estate sold, to secure the purchase-money. It will be seen at once how far short of the case now before me this is; for there, both the equitable lien implied by law, and the security created by act of parties, operate to secure one and the same contract to pay the purchase-money. Yet it has been, and still is, the subject of grave doubt, whether the implied lien can stand with a mortgage. Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige, 20; Little v. Brown, 2 Leigh, 353; Boos v. Ewing, 17 Ohio, 500; Manly v. Slason, 21 Vt. 275; Case of An Hostler, Metcalf's Yelv. 66, note. And it is settled, that any act of the parties, showing an intention not to rely on the implied lien, prevents its operation. Brown v. Gilman, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 255. Having entered into a contract, in its nature and incidents wholly distinct from a simple loan, secured by a lien implied by law, the maxim, expressum facit cessare tacitum, applies. In my judgment, he who loans money on bottomry, makes a contract, which is to be followed out through all its remedies, as such; and when it proves to be voidable for fraud, and is avoided, he cannot treat it as a simple loan, secured by a maritime lien, and thus charge it on the property which he failed to obtain a right to, by the only contract which was made. In accordance with this, is the eighteenth rule of practice in the admiralty, prescribed by the supreme court. "In all suits on bottomry bonds, properly so called, the suit shall be in rem only, against the property hypothecated, or the proceeds of the property, in whosoever hands the same may be found, unless the master has, without authority, given the bottomry bond, or by his fraud or misconduct, has avoided the same, or has subtracted the property, &c., in which latter cases the suit may be in personam against the wrongdoer." I apprehend that this points to the only remedy which the lender has, when the bond is void for the fraud of the master, and the lender has not participated in that fraud. If he has participated, it is at least questionable, whether the court would exert itself actively, to give him a remedy for his actual advances, even if a maritime lien was implied by law. If the bond itself, which created an express lien, cannot be allowed to stand as security for the money advanced, can he, by changing merely the form of his remedy, recover on a lien implied by law?

I know of no precedent for this; and analogous cases may be found, which are inconsistent with it. Thus, if a policy of insurance be void for fraud of the insured, the law will not allow the premium to be recovered back, though, in the absence of fraud, it implies a promise to repay it. Schwartz v. United States Ins. Co., [Case No. 12,505;] Felse v. Parkinson, 4 Taunt. 640; Tyler v. Horne, and Chapman v. Frazer, Marsh. Ins. 661; Waters v. Allen, 5 Hill, 421. In point of principle, I am of opinion, that the fraud is an answer to the substance of the claim, for a restoration of the money advanced, and that it is not material through what forms of remedy the recovery is sought. But it is not necessary to go to this extent in this case. It is enough, that the bond, being fraudulent, cannot be enforced: and that, in point of fact, no such loan, as raises an implied lien, was made. The result is, that the libel must be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. On appeal, the supreme court, by Mr. Justice Nelson, affirmed the circuit court decree, declaring the bottomry bond void for fraud, and said: "It is insisted, however, that the security should be held valid for the amount actually advanced, conceding it to be void for the excess. It is true that a bottomry bond may be good in part and bad in part, and may be upheld even in cases when taken for a sum in the aggregate larger than that which properly constitutes a lien upon the vessel within this species of security. There are many cases to this effect. Abb. Shipp. 126, note; The Aurora, 1 Wheat. (14 U. S.) 107; M'Cutchen v. Marshall, 8 Pet. (33 U. S.) 228. These are cases, however, in which the items rejected were not properly chargeable on the ship, or were embraced within the bond from inadvertence or mistake, and entirely consistent with the good faith of the parties in the transaction. They stand upon widely different principles from those where the objectionable items are fictitious, and inserted in the bond with intent to defraud third persons. The entire security in such cases becomes tainted with the fraud, and a particeps criminis is not allowed to come into court to enforce it, even for the money advanced or expended; for to permit it would afford countenance to the fraud by giving partial effect to it. * * * It is insisted, however, assuming the bond to be void and inoperative, that the lender is then remitted to his implied lien, the same as if no bond had been given. How this might be in a case where the instrument was defective and void, for want of authority to execute it, or for any other cause consistent with the good faith of the parties, it is not now necessary to inquire, or express an opinion. But we think it clear that no such principle can be admitted in a case where the bond has been avoided on the ground that it was entered into in bad faith, and with intent to defraud, on the part of the lenders. Any other conclusion would be giving to a party the benefit of his own turpitude, which the law forbids. Carrington v. The Ann C. Pratt, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 63.]

Case No. 410

The ANN D. RICHARDSON.

[Abb. Adm. 499.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1849.*

SHIPPING — DELIVERY OF GOODS — LIEN FOR FREIGHT — BREAKING UP OF VOYAGE — SALE OF CARGO.

1. As between the owner of the cargo and the ship-owner, the delivery of the cargo at the port of destination is a condition precedent to the right to freight; and without such delivery the acceptance of the cargo at an intermediate place by the owner of the cargo, is necessary to enable the ship-owner to recover either full or pro rata freight.

[Cited in The Joseph Farwell, 31 Fed. 848.]

2. The master, although agent for the ship and cargo to the extent of being empowered, in a case of extreme urgency, to sell either or both, is not authorized to accept the cargo on behalf of its owner short of the port of delivery.

3. The laying claim to the proceeds of a sale of a cargo made by the master at an intermediate port, or the bringing suit for such proceeds, does not amount, in law, to a voluntary acceptance of the cargo, or to a ratification of the act of the master in breaking up the voyage.

4. Where a vessel puts in at an intermediate port in distress, and it is there found that a portion of the cargo has been rendered worthless by perils of the sea, while the residue is not of sufficient value to warrant continuing the voyage, and such portion is therefore sold by the master and the voyage broken up, no claim for freight, either in full or pro rata, or upon a quantum meruit, can be maintained by the ship-owner against the shipper.

[Cited in The Joseph Farwell, 31 Fed. 847; The L'Amérique, 35 Fed. 844.]

5. Upon what principles the general average should be adjusted in such a case, as respects the contribution due from the cargo.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, by Robert Taylor against the bark Ann D. Richardson, to recover the proceeds of a sale of goods shipped on board the bark by the libellant.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Francis B. Cutting, for libellant.
Daniel Lord, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. The facts upon which the points in contestation in this cause arise, are these: The libellant shipped at Philadelphia, on March 18, 1847, on board the bark Ann D. Richardson, for Londonderry, a cargo consisting of wheat flour, Indian meal, corn, and navy bread, for which the usual bills of lading were executed by the master, engaging to deliver the cargo to the consignees in the bill of lading named, they paying stipulated freight therefor. The vessel sailed the next day on her voyage. She was new and staunch, but before leaving sight of the Capes made water at the rate of one hundred strokes the hour. It appears, however, upon the evidence, that she was fully seaworthy when she sailed, and that the amount of leakage she exhibited was usual in new vessels, and did not affect the cargo or her seaworthiness. On the 27th of March she encountered a heavy gale from the S. E., which continued to the 30th, and then increased to extreme violence. The bark was thrown on her beam ends, her masts were cut away, and she lay waterlogged. The crew, with great labor, freed her of water, and rigged spars and endeavored to work the vessel to Bermuda, but being unable to make that port, they put into St. Thomas, on the 23d of April, as a port of necessity. A survey was there held of the cargo. A portion of the corn, (537 bushels,) was found in a putrefying state, and was thrown overboard as valueless. The chief part of the residue of the cargo had been wet and damaged by the stress of weather to such a degree that it could not safely be transported to the port of destination, and the master was advised by the surveyors to sell the whole cargo remaining, that not injured not being deemed of value to justify carrying it to Londonderry. It was accordingly sold on the 11th of May, at auction, for $7,730.02.

The claimants allege this sum is subject to an average charge of $582.08; and they also contend that the vessel is entitled to full freight and primage for the whole voyage, amounting to $4,562.26, and the balance, $1,712.85, they are willing to pay over to the libellant. They deny their liability for any thing beyond that sum. The vessel was repaired at St. Thomas and ready to receive a cargo and prosecute her voyage, by the 2d of June. She did not offer to proceed to Londonderry with the sound portion of the cargo, nor did she provide any other vessel in her place. She was employed on a different service. The libellant was not present in person or by any authorized agent at St. Thomas, and was no way consulted in the disposition of the cargo and breaking up the voyage.

Three questions were discussed upon these facts: 1. Whether the owner of the vessel was entitled to full or pro rata freight, or any freight for the transportation of the cargo to St. Thomas. 2. Whether he was justified in selling the cargo and breaking up the voyage at the latter port. 3. What average the cargo of the libellant was legally liable to pay.

In arguing the case, the counsel have examined minutely the doctrines obtaining in the English and American courts, and it is strenuously contended for the ship-owner that upon the well-recognized principles of American law, full freight was earned in this case, and that the acts of the master, under the emergency, must be regarded as the acts of the libellant, by which the vessel was deprived of her cargo, and prevented completing the voyage undertaken. If this position is not sanctioned by the court, it is urged that the libellant, by demanding the proceeds of the cargo and bringing suit to recover them, adopts and confirms the sale made by the master.

It is not to be controverted that the English rule, applicable to a voyage so circumstanced, debars the ship-owner of all claim to freight. The case of Vlierboom v. Chapman, 13 Mees. & W. 230, presents a statement of facts covering all the essential features of this case. A cargo of rice was shipped at Batavia for Rotterdam, by the bill of lading to be delivered there on payment of a stipulated freight. The ship encountered a severe hurricane, and it became necessary to throw part of the cargo overboard and to take the vessel, in a damaged state, to the Mauritius. The cargo was there examined, and it was found necessary, without delay, to sell the whole, otherwise it would become utterly worthless from the progress of rapid putrefaction. The rice was sold at Mauritius by agents, to whom the master, acting bona fide, confided the ship and cargo; and the proceeds were remitted to the ship-owners. The plaintiff, (owner of the cargo,) had no agent at Mauritius, and neither of the parties was present at any part of the transaction, nor had any knowledge thereof until after the sale of the cargo. Thus far the two cases are brought under the same range of facts. The English suit, however, seems to have been an amicable one, as the defendants did not retain freight money, nor set up an absolute charge for it.

The question submitted to the court was, whether the defendants had any lien or right of deduction or set-off against the proceeds of the rice, either for the freight in the bill of lading, or for pro rata freight, or for any freight on a quantum meruit. The plaintiffs' point was, that under the above circumstances, the defendants were entitled to no set-off for freight. The defendants' point was, that they had a set-off or lien, for freight, to the extent of £1,413.0.4, the produce of the sale, or, at all events, to some extent. The court decided, that if the master might be regarded the agent of the owners ex necessitate, so as to validate the sale, he was not such agent with a right to accept for them a delivery of the cargo at Mauritius, in place of Rotterdam, and that the plaintiffs not having transported the cargo conformably to their contract, were not entitled to full freight, nor to pro rata freight, as for a part performance accepted in lieu of a full one. It was also decided, that there was no foundation for a quantum meruit claim or allowance of freight. The court grounded their reasoning and decision very much upon some American cases, cited by Judge Story, in his edition of Abbott on Shipping, (page 328.)

The argument for the defendant in this case now is, that the doctrine of the American decisions was misapprehended, and that the rule to be deduced from them is, that the ship-owner, under like circumstances, is entitled to full freight, or at least to pro rata freight. In the case of Miston v. Lord, [Case No. 9,655,] decided in the United States circuit court for this district, in September, 1848, the doctrines of the case of Vlierboom v. Chapman, were recognized in so far as the authority of the master to sell cargo under similar circumstances was involved. As between owners and underwriters, he may, on general authority, have an implied power to do what is fit and right to be done, with ship or cargo, in case of emergency. Park Ins. (Ed. 1842,) 345. But the court regarded it a fundamental principle of the contract of affreightment, that as between the owner of cargo and ship-owner, no right to freight accrued except upon performance of the contract by the ship, unless the terms of the contract were dispensed with by the owner of the cargo; although such discharge need not be by express agreement, but might be implied or inferred from his acts. This is believed to be the rule of maritime law adopted and enforced in the European and American courts. Pothier Traite du Contrat de Louage, No. 59; Boulay Paty, tit. 5, § 16; Pardessus, pt. 4, tit. 14, c. 2, No. 718; Abb. Shipp. 492, note 1; Vlierboom v. Chapman, 13 Mees. & W. 239; 3 Kent, [Comm.] (6th Ed.) 218; Hurtin v. Union Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,942.]

The delivery of the cargo at the port of destination is considered a condition precedent to the right to freight, and without that, the acceptance of the cargo at an intermediate place, by the owner of it, is necessary to enable the ship-owner to maintain a claim to full, or pro rata freight. Caze v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 358; 3 Kent, [Comm.] 228, 229, note a; Abb. Shipp. 534, note 1; The Nathaniel Hooper, [Case No. 10,032.] The case of The Nathaniel Hooper demonstrates that the rule in admiralty is in consonance with that at common law on the subject. [Case No. 10,032.] The case is not affected by the later decision in Jordan v. Warren Ins. Co., [Case No. 7,524,] for there a voluntary acceptance of the cargo by its owner was made; but a claim to the proceeds of sale, or bringing suit therefor, does not amount in law to a voluntary acceptance of the cargo, or to a ratification of the act of the master in breaking up the voyage; nor is the master, though agent for the ship and cargo to the extent of being empowered in a case of extreme urgency to sell either or both, ex officio an agent of the ship, authorized to accept the cargo short of the port of delivery and break up the voyage. Miston v. Lord, [Case No. 9,655.]

The points in the case now under consideration, not involved in the decision in Miston v. Lord, [supra,] or in Vlierboom v. Chapman, [supra,] are, that a portion of the cargo on the arrival of the vessel at St. Thomas was sound and in a condition to be transported to the port of destination, but was sold by the master together with that which was injured and perishing, and that the vessel was repaired within a reasonable time at St. Thomas, and placed in a condition to perform her voyage, but did not offer to complete it.

Most unquestionably the master was not bound to take on board and attempt to carry forward, the putrid and worthless portion of the cargo, nor was it his duty to receive that which had been so injured as to be liable to putrefaction, or to occasion disease or discomfort to her ship's company, or injury to the sound cargo in its transportation. Those principles are stated and enforced with earnest perspicuity in the two American cases before cited. Jordan v. Warren Ins. Co., [Case No. 7,524;] Miston v. Lord, [supra,] circuit court, 1848. When the whole cargo is so damaged that it cannot be transported without endangering the safety of the ship or crew, or cannot, from its perishing state, be probably so preserved as to endure transportation at all, the ship need not proceed with it, or offer to do so; but the remedy of the ship-owner is on his policy for freight, he having failed to earn it, by means of perils insured against or insurable. 1 Phil. Ins. 290. The loss of the cargo must, however, be total, for although damaged to such a degree as to be not worth the freight at the port of destination, this does not amount to that kind of total loss, which authorizes a recovery of the freight on a policy. Herbert v. Hallett, 3 Johns. Cas. 93; Griswold v. New York Ins. Co., 1 Johns. 205.

The present action seems framed upon the notion that if the ship-owner, on the facts, would have a right to recover freight on a policy of insurance, he has the same remedy against the owner of the cargo. That is clearly not the law. Considering the condition of the cargo on the arrival of the vessel at St. Thomas, as equivalent to a total loss or physical destruction of it, the plaintiff would be entitled, on insurance of freight, to recover his whole freight for the voyage, (1 Phil. Ins. 290, 427,) yet as against the shipper, he cannot recover freight except on performance of the condition of transporting the cargo and delivering it at the port of destination, conformably to the contract of affreightment.

Independent of this principle, there remained a portion of the cargo in this case, in sound condition; and to entitle the ship-owner to claim freight at all, he must have carried forward so much of the cargo as could be transported. It is no concern of his, whether by so doing the interests of the shipper would be advanced or consulted. He has nothing to do with the question of profit or loss to the shipper; and his vessel having been soon repaired and capable of performing the voyage, it was his duty to complete it, and then he would be entitled against the shipper to full freight on all the cargo delivered, in specie, whatever its condition or value; and might recover against the underwriter for that portion which perished on the voyage, which, for that reason, could not be delivered. I shall, therefore, pronounce against the libellant on that part of his action which claims the recovery of freight in full or pro rata, or compensation upon a quantum meruit.

It is not denied by the libellant that the ship-owner is entitled to a contribution from the cargo on the general average of losses sustained by the ship. But it has been made a serious question in the cause as to the particulars of valuation and loss which shall enter into the computation and adjustment of that average.

Counsel, on both sides, however, conceding that a readjustment must be made, admit that the better course now is to take general directions from the court respecting the method of stating the average, and to wait until the adjustment is presented, before a decision is asked in detail upon the particulars proper to be included in it. The adjuster may so settle these points as not to leave it desirable to either party to litigate the matter before the court. In the adjustment presented to the court, the ship is credited with full freight for the voyage. This is erroneous. No allowance is to be made on that item beyond the value of the freight on the cargo thrown overboard, and that value will be made contributable, also, in the general average. The cargo, on the question of general average, is not to be charged with any expenses incurred in respect to it, after the voyage was broken up and abandoned.

The charges for reparations made to the vessel subsequently, may properly be referred to as a means of measuring the actual value of her injuries sustained for the common benefit. That allowance has no application to claims for the care and management of the cargo after it ceased to be connected with the vessel for the purposes of the voyage. Services or expenditures of that character have no connection with the ship or the injuries she incurred for the common advantage, and cannot, therefore, be subjects of general average. A decree, with special directions, must be entered according to the foregoing principles.

SHIPPING—DELIVERY OF CARGO—FREIGHT.

In the case of The Ann D. Richardson, on appeal from the district court, in October, 1849, the case of Miston v. Lord [Case No. 9,655] was cited and its doctrine applied, and the decree of the district court affirmed. It was held that the master having failed to deliver the cargo according to the bill of lading, and there having been no waiver of performance, either express or implied, by the shipper or his agent at the port of distress, the owner of the vessel was not entitled to freight, notwithstanding the damaged state of the cargo justified its sale by the master at the port of distress; that the agency of the master on behalf of the shipper at the port of distress, arising out of the necessities occasioned by the disaster, was limited to the sale of the cargo; that no case had yet extended it further; and that sound principles forbade any further interference with the rights of the shipper.

The ANNE.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1818.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—PILOTAGE—WRONGDOERS OR MUTINEERS.

1. The admiralty has jurisdiction in personam, as well as in rem, for pilotage earned in piloting ships to, from, or on, the sea.

2. To make pilotage a lien on the ship, the contract must have been made by some person in the employment of the owner, duly authorized to make the contract, such as the master, or the quasi master. But mere wrongdoers or mutineers have no authority to bind the ship.

[4. Cited in The Clatsop Chief, 8 Fed. 163, 767, to the point that a proceeding in rem and in personam cannot be blended in one libel.]

In admiralty. This was a libel [against the Anne, George Manners, claimant,] brought to recover a compensation for piloting the British schooner Anne, from Brown's Bank near the American coast, to Boston. The material facts proved on the trial were shortly these:—The Anne was chartered in June, 1818, at Cork, in Ireland, to proceed from thence to Quebec with passengers. On the 10th of June she sailed from Cork with upwards of sixty passengers on board, ostensibly destined for Quebec. Being obliged to put into Padstow and St. Ives, in consequence of bad weather and some injury done to the vessel, she there dismissed as many passengers as exceeded the number limited by law to be carried out of Great Britain in a vessel of her burden, and again proceeded on her voyage on the 16th day of July. After being out some time, the passengers, amongst whom was a son and daughter of the charterer of the vessel, required of the master, that instead of going to Quebec, he should carry them either to New York or Philadelphia; alleging that they had contracted with the charterer to be landed at one of those ports. The master refusing to comply with their request, on the 17th of August they arose upon him in a body, took the vessel out of his possession, drove him with some violence and threats to the cabin; and having compelled the mate (who was made a defendant in this case) to take an oath, that he would carry the vessel into one of the above-mentioned ports, or into the port of Boston, put him in command. Shortly after this transaction, they began to fall short of provision; and after being upon a very small allowance for many days, and suffering great anxiety from the fear of starving, they fell in at sea with the Reindeer, a small fishing schooner, and obtained from her a supply of provision, and also prevailed upon the libellant, one of her crew, to pilot them into Boston. After arriving there, the mate and crew refused to pay the pilotage, upon the ground that it was a charge against the ship, and the master ought to pay it; and the master refused, alleging that the libellant came on board the Anne at the request of the mate and passengers, who were at that time in command of the vessel; that he made his contract with them, and must now look to them for its fulfilment.

The case was argued by Blake, Dist. Atty., and Blair, for libellant; and W. Sullivan, for claimant.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. A preliminary exception has been taken to the jurisdiction of the court in this cause, upon the ground, that no suit lies in the admiralty for pilotage, even when the service has been performed on the high seas. It is very true, that the courts of common law have held, (whether rightly in the full extent, is matter with me of extreme doubt) that if the contract be for services to be performed on a navigable river within the body of a county, no suit lies in the admiralty in favor of the pilot for such services. Ross v. Walker, 2 Wils. 264; Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 5, p. 183. And the high court of admiralty, under the imposing authority of prohibitions, has felt itself compelled to follow, with hesitating steps, in the narrow path thus prescribed by the common law. The Eleanor, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 39. But there never has been, as far as I know, a judicial doubt breathed anywhere of the rightful jurisdiction of the admiralty over suits for pilotage on the high seas. And, in point of fact, suits of this nature have been, and are continually entertained by the admiralty. The Nelson, Id. 227. Even in times of the most severe hostility, the courts of common law admitted, that the admiralty had jurisdiction over contracts made upon the sea to be performed upon the sea; and if there ever was a case, which came exactly within the terms of this description, it is the present; for the contract was made upon the sea to pilot the vessel into some port of the United States, she being then at least three days' sail from land. But if this were a perfectly new case, unaided by authority, I should still hold that the admiralty had upon principle a rightful jurisdiction, as well in personam as in rem, for pilotage due for services performed on, from, or to the sea; since it properly arises under a maritime contract, and differs in no substantial respect from the contract for mariner's wages. We may, therefore, safely dismiss this objection.

Upon examining the testimony in this case, which is extremely contradictory in many material respects, I cannot say, that the conclusion drawn by the district judge, as to the real state of facts, is not fully warranted by a decisive weight of evidence. Admitting that the original voyage was to Quebec, and not to the United States, it is difficult to resist the impression, that the master did, in common with the passengers, feel the services of the pilot to be very desirable, if not absolutely necessary. And the pilot was no ways reluctant in complying with the wishes of the parties, if he could be made perfectly secure of his stipulated pilotage. It cannot be disguised, also, that there is no inconsiderable probability, that the intention of some of the parties, and at least of the charterer, was, that the ostensible voyage to Quebec should terminate in a real voyage to the United States. And the provisions of the statutes of 43 Geo. III. c. 56, and 57 Geo. III. c. 157, restricting British, as well as foreign vessels, to a very small number of passengers, when bound to the United States, and allowing a very large number, when bound to the neighbouring British provinces, afford a very strong color to this supposition. Many circumstances, too, admit of an easy explanation in this way, which would otherwise be wrapt up in marvellous mystery and difficulty. In this view, the supposed mutiny, if not the effect of pre-concert, was not so much at variance with the wishes of any of the parties, as to involve any serious opposition, or inflame any very atrocious passions. The master might not have had any very sincere reluctance to acquiesce in a scheme, which he had no particular interest to oppose, even if he had not been previously consulted, as to the change of destination. To be sure, the case under this aspect involves a meditated fraud upon the British laws. But this court is not at liberty to enforce the municipal regulations of a foreign country, or to take cognizance of any frauds attempted on them. I confess that I have always been a good deal staggered by this doctrine. It has appeared to me more consonant with national comity, sound morals, and public justice, that courts of all countries should lend their aid to discountenance frauds upon the revenue laws of other countries, and decline to enforce any agreements entered into for the purpose of evading those laws. An exception might very properly apply, where those laws were in direct hostility to our own policy or laws, or were inconsistent with the principles of general justice. But the rule is now too stubborn to be controlled, and has been so long established, that it has become almost a formula in our text-books. See Marsh. Ins. bk. 1, c. 3, § 1, and 1 Valin, Comm. art. 49, p. 127; Pothier, Traite D'Assur. note 58; 1 Emerig. 212, 215; Planche v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 251; Lever v. Fletcher, Park. Ins. (6th Ed.) 313; The Courtney, Edw. Adm. 239; The Leander, Id. 35; The Fortuna, 1 Dod. 81; The Amedie, Id. 84, note. And, indeed, if the contrary doctrine existed, I do not perceive, that it could materially bear on the present case; because there is no pretence to say, that the pilot connived at the supposed mutiny or change of destination; and his services were really beneficial, and rendered bona fide for the common benefit. It was certainly not for him nicely to scan the various rights or duties of the parties; and it would be strange, if services, humanely rendered, were to be treated as crimes, not from any misconduct in the pilot, but from the relief having been afforded to persons, who had brought themselves into distress by their own previous misconduct. I can have no doubt, that the pilot has rendered a meritorious service, and is entitled to a just compensation from some of the parties.

But the principal question remains to be considered, and that is, against whom is the pilotage a rightful charge? The original suit began by a petition in personam against the mate (who at the time of the contract acted as master, the master having been suspended in the command by the asserted mutinous acts of the passengers) and prayed process as well against him as against the ship. Subsequently process was duly issued against the ship; and thereupon the original master, the mate, and the British consul for the owners, severally appeared, and put in a defensive allegation. Whether a proceeding in personam and in rem can be regularly combined, so as to entitle the libellant to a decree in personam, if he fails to establish his claim in rem, need not here be decided; because the parties have, by their own proceedings, waived any question on this head, and confined the ultimate process to the ship only; and if it cannot be maintained against the ship, there must be a dismissal of the present suit.

To make the pilotage a charge on the ship itself, or on the owners, there must be in cases of this nature (for I speak not of pilotage connected with, and forming a part of salvage services) an express or implied contract with the owner, or with his authorized agent. The master is for this purpose an authorized agent; and upon his death or absence the same authority devolves upon the next person properly succeeding to the master in the command of the ship. But it certainly cannot be maintained, upon any acknowledged principles of law, that mere wrongdoers or usurpers of the command of the ship, not acknowledged or appointed by the owner, can create a lien on the ship, or personally bind the owner by a contract, which they may choose to make, whether it be beneficial to him or not. A fortiori, a criminal usurpation of authority, or a piratical revolt, cannot afford any foundation for a title, which is to bind the ship or owner.

In the cause now before the court, if the transaction is to be taken, as a case of real mutiny, in which the master was forcibly deprived of his lawful authority, and driven from the command of the ship, neither the passengers nor the mate, who succeeded by the appointment of the passengers as master, had competent authority to enter into any contract binding upon the owner; no more, indeed, than any pirate or roving plunderer upon the ocean. If, on the other hand, it is to be taken as a merely feigned and fictitious proceeding, it becomes material to ascertain whether the master, in point of fact, entered into the contract directly or impliedly on his owner's account. For, if the contract, though for the benefit of the ship, was made by the pilot, under a knowledge of all the circumstances, with other persons on their own personal responsibility, I do not see how, because they have failed to perform it, a resulting security falls on the ship. Now, it is very remarkable, that the evidence, sufficiently discordant in other most important particulars, is uniform in this, that the master utterly refused (no matter, whether in pursuance of a preconcerted plan or not) to be accountable for the pilotage. It is very true, that he seems to have been desirous to retain the pilot; but at the same time he explicitly disavowed any agency in the transaction, and gave full notice, that the pilot was to look, not to him, but to the passengers for his recompense. The passengers did accordingly agree to pay it; and the pilot, trusting to their good faith, and, as I am persuaded, notwithstanding the pretence of violence, noways loth, engaged in the duty. The passengers have abused his confidence, and most disgracefully refused him a recompense, which he justly earned; and if any of them were before the court, I should not hesitate a moment in awarding him, as against them, the fullest compensation. It is no very welcome proof of the morality or gratitude of these emigrants thus landed in safety on our hospitable shores, that they should signalize themselves by a paltry artifice to evade a meritorious debt. But how can the court say, under these circumstances, that a contract explicitly declined (as the libellant himself admits) by the master, who alone had authority to bind the ship, and as explicitly entered into with the passengers, is to be deemed a debt due from the owner? The question is not, whether the owner has been ultimately benefited by the service; but whether he has contracted the debt. It is material also, that the libellant does not in any part of his allegation assert, that any contract was made by the original master; (and if he did, his own testimony would disprove it;) but his claim against the ship is rested on the retainer of the mate, then acting as master. The conduct, too, of the pilot, after the arrival of the Anne in port, evinces in a strong manner his own understanding, that he had no claim on the original master, and consequently no claim through him upon the ship itself. Upon the whole I cannot say, that there is sufficient evidence to warrant me holding, that the pilotage in this case ought to be a lien on the ship; and with the utmost respect for the opinion of the district court, I am compelled to pronounce, that its decree must be reversed. Considering however all the circumstances, I shall direct the reversal to be without costs to either party.

Decree reversed.

[N. Y. Daily T. July 14, 1865.]

District Court, S. D. New York.

COLLISION—TUG ENTERING STEAMER'S SLIP.

[A steam tug is legally chargeable with notice of the time when a steamer is to leave her berth on her regularly appointed and notorious trips, and is negligent in trying to enter the berth at such time, and while the steamer is already in motion, unless driven thereto by stress of weather or casualty.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Robert Annette, owner of the steamer Thomas E. Hulse, against the steam tug Storm, for collision. Decree for libellant.]

Sunbury & Telson, for libellant.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for claimants.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was a libel for a collision between the steamboat Thomas E. Hulse owned by the libellant and the steam tug Storm. The collision occurred in broad day light near the mouth of the slip between piers No. — and —, in the North river, on the — day of —, —.

Held BY THE COURT, that the Storm was legally chargeable with notice that the Hulse was in motion attempting to depart from her berth upon her regularly appointed and notorious destination to Fort Lee. That the Storm was only seeking the slip which she attempted to enter as a casual place of shelter without any legal priority of right or privilege to the occupation of it, in preference to the Hulse, and without being driven into it by stress of weather or by any compulsion or casualty. That, prima facie, the Hulse was entitled by a free and undisturbed passage out of the slip from which she was in the act of departing; and that the proceedings of the Storm in entering the said slip at the same time, thus crowding upon her and intercepting the movements of the Hulse, was unjustifiable and wrongful.

Decree therefore for libellant, and with a reference to compute damages.

Case No. 414.

The ANN GREEN.

[1 Gall. 274.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1812.²

PRIZE — SHIP'S PAPERS AND CREW — EVIDENCE — WAR — NEUTRAL SHIPPER — DOMICIL — SALVAGE — FREIGHT.

1. In prize causes the first hearing is to be on the ship's papers, and the preparatory evidence of the ship's crew. If these acquit or condemn, there is an end of the cause. If they present a case of doubt or difficulty, further proof is admissible by order, or by plea and proof. Further proof sometimes allowed to the captors.

2. If the captured crew do not give up papers on the first examination in preparatory, the court will not admit them afterwards. If a witness suppress material facts on his examination in preparatory, he shall not be permitted to supply the defect by a supplementary affidavit. The commissioners to take the answers on the standing interrogatories should not rest satisfied with general answers, but require full and minute details of all material facts.

3. The national character of a party depends upon his domicile. What constitutes such domicile. A British subject domiciled in the United States, though temporarily absent in a British island, is as to purposes of trade held to be an American merchant.

²[Affirming an unreported decree of the district court.]

4. The question of enemy or friend depends upon the domicile of the party. A shipment made to Canada by a British subject domiciled in the United States, but temporarily at Jamaica, in his character as a British subject, does not, if made in time of peace, affect the property with a hostile character, if war breaks out pending the voyage. But it is otherwise, if such shipment be made pending a known war.

[Cited in The Amado, Case No. 12,005.]

5. In general no claim is admitted in prize causes, in opposition to the ship's papers; but this rule is relaxed in favor of shipments made in peace.

6. Where a neutral is engaged in a trade, which is exclusively confined to the subjects of a country, and interdicted to all others, and cannot avowedly be carried on in the name of a foreigner, such a trade is so purely national, that it must follow the situation of the country, as to peace or war, and be deemed hostile or neutral accordingly; and in such a trade, it is immaterial whether the shipment be made in time of peace or war. The trade between Jamaica and Canada proved not to be of such a character. In time of war property cannot change its character in transitu; nor can property shipped, to become the property of an enemy, be protected by the neutrality of the shipper.

[Cited in The Sarah Starr, Case No. 12,352; The Delta, Id. 3,777.]

7. In order to entitle to salvage, as upon a recapture or rescue from an enemy, the property must have been taken from the actual or constructive possession of the enemy.

8. Captors are not in general entitled to freight on the capture of neutral property on board of an enemy's ship, unless the goods are carried to the port of destination, within the intent of the contracting parties. But if the property be ultimately bound to the market, where the captors carry the ship, or the proceeds are to go there indirectly, a direct communication being prohibited, freight is due to the captors. The captors are entitled to their expenses in all cases of further proof.

[On appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

In admiralty. This was a proceeding on the prize side of the court, on an allegation of prize by the libellant, commander of the privateer Gossamer, against the ship Ann Green and cargo. The ship and all the cargo, excepting fifty-six puncheons of rum, were condemned as enemy's property, no claim having been interposed therefor in the district court. The fifty-six puncheons of rum were claimed on account of Lewis Simond, Charles Wilkes, and Henry Cullen of New York, the asserted owners; and upon a full hearing of the cause in the district court, a decree of restitution passed, subject to freight and the captor's expenses. An appeal was interposed by the captors, and upon the hearing of the cause, which in the first instance was ordered to be upon the ship's papers, and the preparatory examinations, an interlocutory order passed for further proof to be made by the claimants, and that the evidence, which had been irregularly taken for the district court, might upon the final hearing be offered to this court. The facts of the case, so far as respects the present claim, are, that the ship sailed with her cargo from Jamaica for Quebec on the 20th day of June, 1812, and was captured and brought into Boston on the 1st day of August, 1812. A libel was filed, and the deposition in preparatory of the supercargo, Mr. Fish, was taken before the commissioners on the 3d day of August, and returned to the district court. On the 14th of the same August, upon application of the claimants, the examination of Mr. Fish was remanded to the commissioners for further answer on the last interrogatory. The new examination was taken on the 15th of August, and came up in the cause. Upon the original examination, the supercargo to the 12th interrogatory answered, "that the rum was shipped by various merchants living at Jamaica, and consigned to various persons at Quebec, whose names appear in the manifest, and papers delivered to the captors. He knoweth them not personally; but believeth them to be British subjects. The ownership of the rum he cannot declare, but must refer to the papers delivered up to the captors, to ascertain the ownership." To the 14th interrogatory he answered, that he knoweth not of any papers, &c., except those delivered to the captors. To the 16th interrogatory he answered in the negative, that there was no suppression or concealment of any papers, and to the 32d interrogatory he answered, "that he has declared the whole of his knowledge relating to the premises." On his supplementary examination to the last interrogatory, he stated, that after his former examination, and on the same day, he found, in the letter bag of, and on board the ship, fifteen letters, which he produced, and which he supposed had been taken possession of by the captors. That he verily believed those letters were placed in the letter bag at Jamaica, before the ship's departure for Quebec, and that they had ever since remained there. That on the 11th or 12th of August, Mr. Wilkes, one of the claimants, called on him in Boston, and asked, if he had not on board fifty-six puncheons of rum, shipped by Mr. Henry Cullen, or had any letters sent by Cullen; that upon examination of the covers of said letters, Cullen's hand-writing was recognised on two, which were directed to Messrs. John Mure & Co., Quebec, which were then opened and read in the deponent's presence. In one letter was contained a bill of lading signed by the deponent for fifty-six puncheons of rum shipped by Cullen in said ship to be delivered at Quebec; and the other contained two enclosures. That the deponent allowed Wilkes to retain them until this day, when they were returned to him, as he believes, unaltered. That the residue of the letters remain sealed. That the deponent hath no doubt, that the said fifty-six puncheons of rum, at the time of their shipment as aforesaid, and if restored, did, do, and will belong to the house of Simond & Co. of New York, because he knows it was the general opinion in Falmouth in Jamaica that Cullen was the agent of said house, doing business there as their agent, and not on his own individual account, and that about three weeks before he sailed he knew that Cullen had sent home a vessel, belonging to the house aforesaid, in ballast, although he had a great quantity of rum belonging to the said house then on hand, but could not ship it to the United States. Upon the order for further proof, it was proved that Mr. Cullen was a native of Scotland, and came to New York to live in 1795, being then about nine or ten years old. That on the 10th day of May, 1804, he was naturalized at New York, where he resided until the year 1808. That he was admitted as a partner of the house of Simond & Co. consisting of the claimants, on or about the year 1807, and they, having debts due to them to a large amount, sent him out to Jamaica in 1808, to collect the same. That he was absent at Jamaica about six or seven months, and then returned to New York; and went out a second time in March, 1810, and resided there about a year, and then returned to New York; and went out a third time in October, 1811, and had not yet returned. During all this time the affidavits of the claimants stated, that he was absent upon necessary business, connected exclusively with the collection of the debts due to the company; and there were many corroborative affidavits, which showed the general impression among all his acquaintance at New York, that he did not contemplate a residence at Jamaica for purposes of trade.

In the manifest of the cargo, fifty-six puncheons of rum were stated to be shipped by Henry Cullen, but no consignment was mentioned. No bill of lading appeared to have been found on board, except that which was produced upon the supplementary examination of Mr. Fish. In that the rum was consigned to Messrs. John Mure & Co., and the accompanying letters addressed to them contained instructions to sell and remit the proceeds, or to pay to the orders of Messrs. Simond & Co. The first letter of 26th of June said, "I owe Lewis, Simond & Co., of New York, a considerable sum, and I shall in all probability apply the proceeds of this shipment to the liquidation of that debt." The second letter of the 28th of the same month enclosed a letter to be forwarded to Messrs. Simond & Co. and said, "I now request that you will remit the nett proceeds of these fifty-six puncheons to Lewis, Simond & Co. of New York, or honor their drafts as they shall appear." The enclosed letter to Messrs. Simond & Co. after stating the shipment of the fifty-six puncheons by the Ann, contains the following expressions: "I am shipping about fifty puncheons in the Aid, Capt. Redmayne, on my account, consigned to Messrs. Bruce de Penthiou, Buzett, & Co., London, and the nett proceeds of this shipment also shall be paid to your order. These two shipments, I regret to say, are all that I am able to apply this year to the liquidation of the heavy debt I owe." Connected with the claimants' affidavits was a letter from Cullen to Messrs. Simond & Co., dated Falmouth, 7th of June, 1812, in which he said, "I am getting from all our correspondents about 100 puncheons rum only, half of which I ship in the ship Ann Green, Capt. Fish, to Quebec, consigned to John Mure & Co., as British property, that is to say, in my own name alone, the other half to Bruce de Penthiou, Buzett & Co. I write this week by the ——— British Packet, to B. de Penthiou, B. & Co. for insurance on both these shipments."

Blake, Dist. Atty., for the captors.

1. The supplemental examination of Fish was irregular. The Speculation, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 293. 2. Cullen, the shipper, is a British subject. His allegiance to that government is, by its laws, inalienable. His naturalization, as a citizen of the United States, cannot extend beyond the limits of the United States. Cullen avows himself a British subject, for he says, "I ship in my own name, as British property." The Bernon, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 102; The La Virginie, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 98; The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 24; The Citto, Id. 38; The Embden, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 16; The President, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 277; [Baring v. Clagett], 3 Bos. & P. 207; The Herman, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 228; The Vigilantia, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 12; The Betsey, Id. 97; The Chester, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 42; Arnold v. United Ins. Co., 1 Johns. Cas. 363, 364, and note b.; Act March 27, 1804. 3. But, admitting Cullen to be an American citizen, yet having, as a British subject, engaged in a trade allowed to British subjects only, he loses the benefit of his American character, so far as respects such trade. 4. The property was taken in transitu. Whatever might have been done with it, if found in Jamaica upon a conquest of that island, may be done with it, when found on board an enemy's ship. It is true, that by the treaty, goods, &c., are not to be confiscated. But in this case, no process of confiscation is necessary. Bynk, 23, 25, 51, by Duponceau. 5. The captors are entitled to salvage, if the rum is restored. Had it gone to Canada, it would have been confiscated as enemy's property. The claimant therefore is benefited by the capture. The War Onskan, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 299. The rum is of the same value here as in New York. 6. The captors are entitled to freight. The Diana, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 64.

Jackson, in reply, for the claimants.

In this case, the claimants as well as the captors are to be favored, being both citizens of the United States. (As to Blake's first point, Story [Circuit Justice] told Jackson he need not insist). 2. Naturalization by our laws has all the effect of a naturalization by act of parliament in England. As to us, the original character ceases altogether. Cullen's house of trade in this country is enough to show him not a British subject. Between citizens, this is a question of municipal law; between a citizen and a foreigner, it would be a question of public law. 3. It is assumed that none but British subjects can ship on a British bottom from Jamaica to Quebec; the fact is otherwise. There is no case or statute to support this assertion, and the contrary appears from Mure & Co.'s letters. In The Princessa, [2 C. Rob. Adm. 49,] Sir W. Scott takes it for granted, that a Spanish subject only could ship specie, but he gives no authority for the supposition. 4. Bynkershoek, in the passages cited, speaks only of choses in action. An American army invading Canada, and finding my property there, could not take it as British property. The Packet De Bilboa, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 133. 5. The case of The Packet De Bilboa gives no salvage, but directs only the expenses to be paid. In this case there is no recapture. 6. No freight is due, unless the cargo is brought to the original port of destination. The Fortuna, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 278. By the appeal, the captor's right to freight is taken away, even if he had any before. The property is here as much beyond the reach of the owner, as it would be in some neutral country. It is in a foreign port. Carolina is foreign as to Massachusetts. So are England and Ireland foreign to each other, as to the same point. The freight from Boston to New York is now greater than from Jamaica to that city.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SHERBURN, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice, after a recapitulation of the facts. Such are the facts disclosed in the evidence; and various objections have been argued, and ingeniously argued, which I shall now proceed to consider. In the first place it is contended, that the supplementary examination of Mr. Fish, and the accompanying letters, ought to be rejected. It is undoubtedly the practice of the prize courts to confine the first hearing of the cause to the papers found on board of the ship, and the preparatory examinations. If they acquit or condemn, there is, in general, an end of the cause. If they present a case of doubt or difficulty, further proof is admissible, and this may either be by the common order for further proof, or the more solemn proceeding by plea and proof. But doubts either of condemnation or acquittal may sometimes arise from extrinsic facts presented by the claimant or the captors, and the discretion of the court is sometimes exercised in the admission or rejection of such facts. The prize courts are however very solicitous to preserve the simplicity of their proceedings, and therefore, if the case appear very clear and satisfactory upon the original evidence, they yield with great reluctance to the admission of extrinsic circumstances.

The evidence of papers invoked from other causes, and of papers found on board other ships, does not come within the restriction, and in other instances of pregnant suspicion, or reasonable doubt, the courts will not suffer a rule, founded upon the mere convenience of practice, to exclude the captors from the benefit of diligent inquiries. The Sarah, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 330; The Romeo, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 35; The Vriendschap, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 166. But it is a rule, which every principle of law and of policy requires should not be relaxed, that, as the evidence to acquit or condemn must, in the first instance, come from the ship's papers and preparatory examinations, no papers should be allowed, which are not produced at the first examination. What would be the consequence of a different practice? That parties would, at the first examination, make formal answers, and after full time was given to know the difficulties of the case, papers and evidence would be manufactured to meet them. Good faith on the contrary requires, that every paper should be disclosed at the first; that parties should tell the whole truth; and that every inducement to concealment or suppression of evidence should be completely discountenanced. And I wish it to be distinctly understood, that if parties will attempt to cover up the real transactions, or withhold them, until counsel can be taken, they can never be permitted in a prize court to supply the first defects. The Anna, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 331; The Speculation, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 293.

In the present case, I think the supercargo, Mr. Fish, has acted with very great impropriety. It is perfectly frivolous to pretend that he did not know but that the captors had these fifteen letters. Where was the ship's letter bag when the ship was captured? Was it given up to the captors? If it had been so, the whole papers would have been before the court; for the prize-master has sworn to the delivery of all ship's papers delivered to him. It is not even now pretended, that the captors had these letters; on the contrary, the evidence is, that they were in the ship's letter bag, and had always remained there on board of the ship. Where was the letter bag kept? No account is given of it; and to suppose that it was not concealed and suppressed, is to suppose that the captors voluntarily relinquished all benefit of evidence, which might go to the condemnation of the property. I have no doubt, therefore, that there was a premeditated suppression and concealment by the deponent, and that, at the time of his first examination, the letter bag was in his possession. Yet he has answered on the subject in a manner, which no honest man can approve. I regret to say, also, that the second examination proves incontestably, if it be credited at all, that Mr. Fish did not tell the whole truth at that time. How slight and vague are his answers to the interrogatories as to the property and papers! Yet, on his second examination, he has not only new knowledge of facts, but he states that he has no doubt that Messrs. Simond & Co. are the real owners of the rum, and that Cullen acted as their agent; and he relies upon circumstances within his knowledge at Jamaica, to corroborate the opinion. Now let me ask, why were not these facts and circumstances disclosed at the first examination? The witness does not pretend, that the light has just dawned upon him. I must conclude, therefore, that he did not choose to declare all that he had the means of knowing. If he has acted in so unjustifiable a manner, I do not think it any severity to receive his testimony with great hesitation.

I cannot, however, in this connexion, omit to remark, that with very few exceptions, the preparatory examinations are not taken with that fulness and exactness, which the interrogatories require. It is the duty of the commissioners, not merely to require a formal direct answer to every part of an interrogatory, but to require the witness to state the facts with all the minuteness and detail, which belong to them. The commissioners should not be satisfied with a general answer. They know the object of the examination, and it is their indispensable duty to procure a full and explicit and circumstantial answer to every question. If this were always done, much of the uncertainty which now is found in prize causes at a first hearing, would be completely obviated.

But to return. Though I directed this second examination to be admitted under the order for farther proof, it was not that I was satisfied with its legality; on the contrary, I then entertained and still entertain great doubts, if of itself it can be relied on for any purpose; certainly, if any material fact depended upon it, I should not feel safe in the admission. If I do not absolutely reject it, it is only in deference to the entire respect which I feel for the order of the district court. As a general rule, I should pronounce for the inadmissibility of the evidence. I shall leave it therefore where I find it, as it does not materially enter into the judgment which I have formed.

I come now to consider a second objection, which is, that the property must be considered as British property, because, taking the whole evidence together, Cullen was domiciled in Jamaica, and acting in the character of a British subject. It is certainly made out in the evidence, that Cullen has been for four years last past resident a considerable portion of his time at Jamaica; and his letter of the 7th of June shows, that he made the shipment as a British subject. As to the domicile, it is undoubtedly true, that length of time, connected with other circumstances, may go very far to constitute a domicile. "Time," says Sir William Scott, "is the grand ingredient in constituting domicile. I think that hardly enough is attributed to its effects. In most cases it is unavoidably conclusive." The Harmony, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 322. Upon a residence therefore for temporary purposes, there may be engrafted all the effects of permanent settlement, if it be continued for a great length of time, and be attended with conduct, which demonstrates that new views and new connexions have supervened upon the original purposes; but, on the other hand, mere length of time cannot of itself be decisive, where the purpose is clearly proved to have been temporary, and still continues so, without any enlargement of views; and even the shortest residence, if with a design of permanent settlement, stamps the party with the national character. The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 12; The Diana, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 60; The Boedes Lust, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 233. The question, after all, results in an inquiry into the intention and conduct of the party; and it is extremely difficult to lay down any general rule upon the subject. If Mr. Cullen were domiciled at Jamaica, at the time of the shipment, he would be liable to all the consequences of a British commercial character; for no principle is better settled, than that the property of a person settled in the enemy's country, although he be a neutral subject, is affected with the hostile character. It is quite immaterial in this view, what was the original or acquired allegiance of Mr. Cullen. A native American citizen is just as much within the scope of the principle as a foreigner. In examining the testimony however, I think it is difficult to resist the impression, that Mr. Cullen's absence was originally for temporary purposes. It is expressly shown, that he went out to collect the debts of the company, and there is no part of the evidence that points to a distinct trade disconnected with those debts. I admit that his connexion in a house of trade in New-York would not alone protect him; for he may at the same time possess the commercial character of several nations. The Jonge Klassina, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 297, and The Vriendschap, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 166, are full to this point. But when his original purposes are shown to be temporary, and the whole transaction was in a time of peace, I do not think the presumption from length of time so forcible.

It is said, that Mr. Cullen was originally a British subject, and that native allegiance easily returns; and La Virginie, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 98, is cited in support of the position. Without pretending to be satisfied with that decision, which with all possible respect for the learned judge, I must say upon the evidence furnished in the report, was rather strained, I accede to the doctrine, that fewer circumstances are necessary to constitute domicile in case of native subjects, than of foreigners: and that as native allegiance easily reverts, so the presumption against the party is much heightened by the shipment being made from a port of his native country. Still, however, it is but a presumption, and if clearly done away, I do not think that a single principle is overturned by a disregard of that circumstance. It is also said, that this shipment was made by Cullen in the character of a British subject, and that this furnishes distinct proof of his having returned to his native allegiance. I agree that such would ordinarily be the case; but a distinction has been taken in the authorities between a time of peace and of war. Much greater laxity is allowed to mercantile transactions in peace than in war. Disguises and covers are allowable in the former, which would not be tolerated in the latter. I do not know that a single case has been decided, in which the assuming a national character in time of peace, to avoid municipal duties or regulations, or to avoid the effects of impending war, has been held to bind the party, where it has not been in fraud of the belligerent who makes the capture. Now it is very clear, that Mr. Cullen did not assume the British character, to evade either the municipal or belligerent rights of the United States. We all know that the introduction of the produce of the British islands into the United States was prohibited. It could only go to British ports. A war was impending; and either to avoid alien duties or British captures, Mr. Cullen might have assumed the British character pro hac vice. Indeed, if the letters produced upon the supplementary examination were admitted to have full effect, this inference would be apparent from the language which is used. These letters are as merely colorable as any that could be offered. If Mr. Cullen had gone on, after the war, making shipments in the British character, I have no doubt that he would have been affected with its penal consequences. But the question now is, if the shipment made in a British character, without being engaged as a general merchant, and without the intention of evading any other but the municipal or belligerent rights of the enemy, shall conclude the party as to his domicile, I cannot say that where the proof is otherwise satisfactory, this circumstance alone ought to draw after it that consequence. I think that great indulgence usually is granted to neutrals and to citizens, as to transactions in time of peace, and at the commencement of a war; and if they contravene no municipal or national policy, I am not prepared to say that this indulgence is inconsistent with law. The Vrouw Elizabeth, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 2; The Vreede Scholtys, Id. 5, note. It is also said, that no claim ought to be admitted, which stands in opposition to the papers, and that Mr. Cullen stands in them as sole proprietor; and he traded as a British subject. The general rule certainly is, that no claim shall be admitted against the evidence of the ship's papers; and the reason of the rule is, that fraud may be suppressed and discouraged. If a party will undertake to cover his property with a particular character, he shall be bound to its consequences. But an exception as old as the rule itself is, that it applies to cases during open war, and not before the commencement of it, or in time of peace. Parties have been permitted to claim, who in time of peace, or even just before the commencement of war, to elude or deceive the enemy, have assumed neutral or even enemy's colors. It is a stratagem, which if practised in peace, to the injury of a foreign nation, no other thinks itself bound to redress; and if, on the eve of a war, to elude the enemy, it has not been deemed an infringement of national rights. I believe the cases are not uncommon in the books for the property under such circumstances to assume altogether a fictitious or hostile name. The Vrow Anna Catharina, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 15, 161; La Flora, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 1; The Vrow Elizabeth, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 2, 5, note.

But does this property stand altogether documented in opposition to the claim? I think not. It is claimed by the house of L. Simond & Co. and is documented in the name of one partner of that house; and this with a view not to defeat American but British rights. But even if it had stood documented as British property, I think it would be entitled to very favorable considerations. Its real character is now shown, and I entertain no doubt, that the property did belong to Messrs. Simond & Company. Its being found on board a British ship, even with British documents, does not prevent me from looking at the interest of the real owners, and decreeing under the circumstances of the case in their favor. The Vreede Scholtys, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 5, note. Very different considerations would have applied, if the shipment had been made after knowledge of the war. I think therefore that this part of the case has been fully answered, and that the facts disclosed show that Cullen was at Jamaica for a temporary purpose only, that of collecting debts, and that no act there done has impressed him with a renewal of British character.

Another objection of a more general cast has been urged. It is, that admitting that Cullen was domiciled in the United States, still the trade was hostile, and such as exclusively belong to British subjects, and therefore the property is confiscable. There can be no doubt, that a trade may be hostile, and affect the party with condemnation, although he be a neutral, or citizen of our own country. Such is the common case of a citizen engaged in trade with the enemy; and according also to British doctrines, a participation in the coasting or colonial trade of the enemy. To these doctrines, as to the colonial and coasting trade, I am not called upon to give any assent, and I by no means wish to be considered as acquiescing in them. Whenever Great Britain shall be a neutral, perhaps there will not be any hardship in enforcing her own doctrines against her;

but as to other neutrals, the question will deserve great consideration. But however it may be, as to the general colonial trade, I think that it may well be admitted as a principle of national law, that where a neutral is engaged in a commerce, which is exclusively confined to the subjects of a country, and is interdicted to all others, and cannot be avowedly carried on in the name of a foreigner, such a commerce is to be considered as so entirely national, that it must follow the situation of the country. The property is considered as so intimately incorporated into the commerce of the country, that it receives its character solely from that commerce. In this view, though the property may be neutral, yet the commerce, in which it is engaged, may be hostile, and induce a confiscation. Such I understand to be the opinion of Sir William Scott in The Anna Catharina, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 107, The Princessa, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 49, and The Rendsborg, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 121, and I am not disposed at all to question the sound policy or principle, which dictated those decisions: and I admit further, that in such a trade it is quite immaterial whether the shipment be in peace or in war. The question then will be, whether the trade between Jamaica and Quebec be such a trade; for if it be, then it must be followed with all the consequences, which I have stated. It is affirmed on one side, and denied on the other. I should have been glad that the learned counsel, who made this objection, would have furnished me any statutes or authorities of the British government in proof of his position. I am aware, that between British colonies the trade is confined in general to British ships. The statute of 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 22, prohibits in general the exportation of any goods or commodities from any British colony, except in British ships. But goods, which may be exported in British ships, may be exported from one colony to another. And by the St. 12 Car. II. c. 18, § 2, no alien, unless naturalized or a denizen, is allowed to exercise the trade of a merchant or factor in any British colony. These are the only provisions, which I have been able to meet with in those works, which seemed best adapted to convey the information, (Reeves, Shipp.; 6 Com. Dig. "Trade;") but they by no means establish the position in its full extent. They show extreme caution and jealousy as to the plantation trade, but by no means show that none other than a British subject would be allowed to export in a British ship from one colony to another. I do not understand, that the captors can produce any evidence to this effect; and certainly unless they do, no inference ought to be drawn against the claimants. If further proof on this point had been urged, I should have required it. As it has not been, and the cause has come to a final hearing, I feel myself bound to declare, that I have no evidence of such an exclusive trade, as affects with a hostile character the property in question. It has been further argued, that this capture, being made while the property was in transitu, and war intervening, it is to be considered as enemy's property, because it would have become such upon arrival at the port of destination; and at all events it would have been liable to seizure and confiscation. As to the fact that the property was taken in transitu, I do not perceive how of itself it can affect the rights of the parties either way; nor do I perceive how this property was to have become enemy's property on its arrival. The case proved is, that it was American property consigned for sale only, and not a consignment where the property was, at the time of shipment or of arrival, to belong to the consignee. The cases are, as I think, settled upon just principles, that decide that in time of war, property shall not be permitted to change character in its transit; nor shall property consigned, to become the property of the enemy on arrival, be protected by the neutrality of the shipper. Such contracts, however valid in time of peace, are considered, if made in war or in contemplation of war, as infringements of belligerent rights, and calculated to introduce the grossest frauds. In fact, if they could prevail, not a single bale of enemy's goods would ever be found upon the ocean. The Vrow Margaretha, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 336; The Carl Walter, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 207; The Jan Frederick, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 128; The Constantia, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 321; The Atlas, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 299; The Anna Catharina, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 107. Where however the contract has been made during peace, it has received a more liberal consideration; and the case of The Packet De Bilboa, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 133, so much relied on by the captors' counsel, clearly shows that the property, notwithstanding a consignment to a party, who afterwards becomes an enemy, if made at the risk of the shipper, in peace, will be protected. Indeed that case, in some respects, goes the whole length of the present.

As to the other suggestion, that the property would on arrival have become subject to confiscation, as American property; and therefore is to be considered precisely as if it had arrived and been confiscated, I certainly know no principle of law which would allow me to condemn in such a case. If an American vessel be captured and recaptured, the argument that it had become enemy's property, would be much stronger, and yet it has never been allowed to prevail. Even supposing that upon arrival this property would have been liable to confiscation, and certainly by the law of nations the government would have a right of confiscation, (Bynk. Ques. Pub. Jur. c. 7.) I am not aware how I can hold that to be done, which might by possibility have been done. It has not been the modern usage to extend the right of confiscation of enemy's property found in a country at the beginning of a war; and I may say, that in general it has been reluctantly admitted. That it would be insisted on in all its rigor, I shall not deem myself obliged to presume. As between Great Britain and the United States there is a stronger reason not to presume it, inasmuch as the 10th article of the treaty of 1794 prohibits it, as to debts and money in the funds and in banks, and declares it unjust and impolitic. But there is no necessity of adverting to this consideration, for I am well satisfied, that if upon arrival at Quebec, the property would have been liable to confiscation, that circumstance, so far from opening a ground of condemnation, would rather incline the other way. The argument on this head is therefore wholly inadmissible.

It has been next contended, that the captors are entitled to salvage, if the property is deemed American, because it has been saved from the grasp of the enemy; and The War Onskan, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 299, has been cited, to prove that salvage is due in all cases, where a benefit is conferred. I rather think that the position is laid down too broadly, for upon that footing a person giving information of the war might be entitled to salvage; yet no such claim has ever been admitted; and though rescue from the attack of an enemy, by approaching with a superior force, would be a clear case of salvage; yet it has been denied. In order to entitle to salvage, as upon a recapture or rescue, the property must have been in the possession, either actual or constructive, of the enemy. The Edward and Mary, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 305; The Franklin, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 147. There is no case where military salvage has been allowed, merely from stopping a ship going into an enemy's port: and the case of The Packet De Bilboa, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 133, 138, and The Franklin, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 147, are clearly the other way. I shall adhere to those decisions, because they are founded in fair and equitable principles.

It has been further contended, that at all events the captors are entitled to freight and expenses. The general rule undoubtedly is, that the captors are not entitled to freight, unless the goods are carried to their original destination, within the intent of the contracting parties. But it is argued that this is an intermediate case, and within the equity of the decision in The Diana, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 67. In that case, the goods were destined to Amsterdam, with an intention that they should, in specie or in proceeds, ultimately be remitted to England; and the court held, that as the goods were brought to London, to the port to which the claimant would have sent them directly, if he had not been prevented by the policy of the Dutch government, which refused the exportation of the produce of its colonies to any but the mother country, the freight was due. It has been argued on the other side, that the case is inapplicable, because New York would have been the port of destination, if the parties could have lawfully pursued their voyage thither; and that Boston being a port of another state, cannot be within the reason of the case, any more than any other foreign port. I readily admit that the cases do not run upon all fours, but the principle strikes me as fully applicable. The parties would have brought the property directly into the United States, if they could. They contemplated the remittance of the proceeds to the United States. I say to the United States, because it will hardly be contended that if the proceeds had been remitted to Boston for the use of the claimants, it would not have been as much within their intention, as a remittance to New York. In a commercial view, these cities must be considered from their proximity almost as one. Nor can I consider Boston as a foreign port in any view connected with this question. It is as much a port of the same country, as a port in Scotland is of Great Britain. And though Sir William Scott appears in The Diana to rely somewhat upon the circumstance, that London was the port to which the claimants would have pointed as the destination; yet in The Vrouw Henrietta, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 75, note, be held, that where the goods were unloaded at Plymouth, and the claimant resided at London, the freight was payable, and he overruled the distinction now contended for. For myself, I have no hesitation to declare, that independent of all authority, where the proceeds of the goods were ultimately intended for this country, and they had been saved from the grasp of the enemy by the capture, I should allow a full and complete freight. It is in vain to shut our eyes against the real benefit conferred on the claimants.

As to expenses, independent of all other circumstances, as this was a case of further proof, they ought to be allowed to the captors. The questions, too, which have been argued, were very properly brought before the court, and I am glad that the sum in controversy will enable the parties, if dissatisfied with my judgment, to apply to the highest tribunal. In allowing the expenses I have the authority of Sir W. Scott, if the allowance require any authority, in the case of The Packet De Bilboa. And I take a pleasure in declaring, that however lightly the English courts may affect to treat our decisions, I shall not hesitate upon this or any other occasion to acknowledge my obligations to the learning and sagacity of that eloquent and able judge. I affirm the decree of the district court, and order the freight, at the price in the bill of lading, and all the expenses of the captors, of both courts, to be a charge on the goods.

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 20, 1862.

PRIZE—ATTEMPTED VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—PROCEEDINGS SUSPENDED.

Condemnation withheld, and proceedings suspended for sixty days, to allow the libellants to produce testimony in support of the libel, there being no testimony from witnesses present at the capture.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The facts appearing upon the pleadings and proofs show that this vessel and cargo were captured April 29, 1862, off Mobile, by the United States war steamer Kanawha. The cargo was sent into this port as prize, on board the steamer Baltic, where it was libelled for condemnation July 17 thereafter, and the process of attachment thereon was filed August 5, 1862. The sloop was left at Ship Island, and it does not appear that she has been proceeded against further where she was arrested, or that she has since been brought within the territorial jurisdiction of the court.

Pursuant to the act of congress of March 25, 1862, the prize commissioners examined the above cargo in this port, and on the 12th of July reported to the court that it "was perishing, or perishable, or deteriorating in value," and recommended its sale. The court, thereupon, on the same day, on motion of the United States district attorney, made an interlocutory order, directing a sale of the cargo to be made by the marshal, under execution, and the proceeds to be deposited in court.

The alleged cargo of the vessel was thus duly arrested in this suit, and on the return day of the process, no party intervening, the United States attorney moved for the default of the cargo, and that the proofs in preparatorio in court be opened, and that the court proceed to render judgment of condemnation against the property arrested. Under these circumstances, the pleadings and proofs in the case are submitted to the consideration of the court.

There is in the case, as presented to the court, the absence of all proof showing a legal act of capture of the vessel. Such legal arrest cannot be implied from the mere fact of possession or from default in claiming the property on its prosecution before the court in this district. Preliminary to all right of prosecution there must be proof of the actual arrest of the res under color or claim of right; and this must be evidence given by witnesses to the act. Pratt's Prize Pr. 45, 46; 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] Append. 496.

The case of The Actor, [Case No. 36,] decided in this court in July term last, involves the principle presented in this case. Reasonable excuse was presented for the non-production of witnesses present at the capture, and the court ordered a respite of further proceedings in the cause for a year and a day, to enable the libellants to furnish the required evidence.

The present transaction occurred off Mobile, in April last, and all the evidence before the court indicates that the captured crew were at Ship island when the cargo was transmitted to this district. The active continuance of hostilities at that remote point has probably diverted the attention of the libellants from the posture of this case, particularly as no one has intervened to claim the cargo or vessel.

It is, therefore, ordered by the court, that proceedings in the cause be suspended for sixty days from this day, and that the district attorney take measures to produce testimony in this suit in support of the libel against the vessel, or show cause why it be not dismissed for want of prosecution.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

On further proof, vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. Further proofs are this day submitted to the court by the district attorney in the above cause, pursuant to the order made September 20, 1862. [See the Annie, Case No. 417.] The papers found on board of the vessel consist of a provisional register, executed by the British consul general in Cuba, to Alexander Borrowman, of Edinburgh, Scotland, presently residing at Havana, April 1, 1862, certifying the vessel to be of foreign build; a declaration, signed and sworn to the same day, before the said consul general, by the said Borrowman, that the vessel was built at Mobile, Alabama, her foreign name being Southern Republic, and that she is wholly owned by Borrowman; shipping articles with a crew, dated at Havana, April 1, and 5, for a voyage from that port to Matamoras and back to Havana; and numerous letters addressed from Mobile to Havana, some accompanying the present adventure, and others of general correspondence. All of these letters are dated immediately previous to the capture of the vessel, and all of them which relate to her or her business speak of the blockade, and of her being employed to run it out of that port, and of such being the usual course of navigation between Cuba and Mobile.

A witness present at the capture of the vessel and cargo testifies, on his examination in preparatorio, that the sloop and her cargo were seized on the 29th of April last, coming out of the port of Mobile, in a dark night; that she was bound to Havana, and was endeavoring to escape the blockading forces investing the port; that the cargo was owned by residents of Mobile; and that the captain of the vessel well knew of the blockade, and had previously run it in the same vessel. Letters and papers transmitted from the shippers of the cargo to the consignees speak unreservedly the same language, and show a full knowledge of the illicit employment of this vessel, and the active violation at that port and at contiguous places of the existing blockade as a regular pursuit.

This testimony having been supplied in the cause within the period limited in the former order, and being in no way refuted or discredited, a decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo, returned by the marshal as attached in this suit, must be entered against them.

PRIZE—ATTEMPTED VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The United States steamer State of Georgia seized this vessel and cargo February 24, 1863, at sea, near Little River inlet, off the coast of North Carolina. They were sent to this port for adjudication. A libel was filed, and a warrant of attachment and a monition thereon were issued and served on the same day. A regular default was moved in court, March 24, on the return of the above processes, for want of due appearance thereto.

The papers found on board of the vessel on her arrest were a certificate of British registry, issued at Nassau, N. P. December 30, 1862, to John Christopher Rehming, of the same place, as owner of the vessel, she being of foreign build, to wit, of Massachusetts, United States of America; an assignment of ownership indorsed upon the registry, January 25, 1863, by Joseph Roberts, of the same place, with a registry of Samuel Hawes as master, of the same date; a crew-list executed on the 20th of January by the said Hawes, as master and others named, for a voyage from Nassau to Philadelphia, and back to Nassau; and a clearance, on the same day, to the same master, from Nassau to Philadelphia, with a cargo of 2,200 bushels of salt and a package of tea. No other papers were found on board.

except a private letter of a family character, apparently addressed from Kemptville, January 27, 1863, to the care of Messrs. Sawyer & Menendez, Nassau, with the following paragraph in it: "I hope you will succeed in running the blockade." On filing in court an affidavit in the above suit, made by Isaac Halleck, an acting master's mate, attached to the United States vessel-of-war, State of Georgia, that he was present at the capture of the above prize, that persons on board of her, when she was being pursued by the State of Georgia, abandoned her before her arrest, and that no person was found on her when she was apprehended, and on motion of the libellants, the court ordered that the examination of the said master's mate, in preparatorio, should be taken by one of the prize commissioners. The testimony of Halleck having been thus taken and duly returned to the court, it is made satisfactorily to appear, that on the 24th of February last the above named schooner Annie and cargo were captured as prize by the United States steamer State of Georgia, the witness being present; that when first discovered from the State of Georgia, the schooner was steering about south-west, under way, with all sails set; that her course was altered to the west, on the appearance of the State of Georgia in sight; that her crew all abandoned her at anchor in a boat, into which they seemed to transfer trunks or luggage; that the Annie and her cargo were seized off Little River inlet, on the coast of North Carolina, about a quarter of a mile from the land; that that coast was under actual blockade; that none of the crew of the prize were afterwards apprehended, so as to be produced in court as witnesses; and that the lading was chiefly salt.

Most plainly the schooner was wide of the ordinary course from Nassau to Philadelphia, and was caught in the act of entering a blockaded port. There is not a shadow of proof that she was on an innocent voyage. On the contrary, the case is replete with violent presumptions that she was seeking an illicit trade with an enemy port, in evasion of a well known and efficient blockade of it by the United States naval forces. These presumptions of fact are also of judicial cognizance. The Apollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 374; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 342.

The vessel and cargo are, accordingly, condemned to forfeiture.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of the blockade.

BETTS, District Judge. The steamer Annie was sent into this port for adjudication, as prize of war, on the 9th of November instant, in charge of a prize-master. She was captured at sea, October 31, 1864, off the coast of North Carolina, by the United States vessels-of-war Wilderness and Nippon, and was libelled, as lawful prize, within this district, and attached on due process of law issued upon the libel filed against her, and made returnable before the court on the 22d day of November, 1864. On that day the warrant of attachment was returned by the marshal, in open court, as served upon the vessel and cargo, and, on motion of the United States attorney, proclamation was duly made in court of her attachment and seizure thereon, and, no one appearing thereupon, on like motion, a judgment, by default of all parties interested in the vessel and cargo, was declared and rendered, and a final decree was pronounced against the same, in due course of procedure, according to the rules and practice of the court. Thereupon, the preparatory proofs taken in the cause, and other documentary evidence found upon the prize vessel, or pertinent to the suit, were produced before the court by the United States attorney, and submitted to its consideration, with a prayer for judgment of condemnation and forfeiture against the said vessel and cargo as lawful prize of war.

The testimony so produced and submitted to the court was direct and satisfactory to the effect following: Albert Connop, examined in preparatorio before the prize commissioners, in this port, on the 14th day of November instant, testified that he was master in command of the ship, at the time of her seizure, on the 31st of October last; that she was captured off Cape Fear river, North Carolina, for having run the blockade of a Confederate port; that she attempted to escape the capturing vessels, the Wilderness and the Nippon, which fired at her twenty-five or thirty guns; that she was English built; that the voyage on which she was captured commenced at Halifax, and was to have terminated at Nassau; that the outward cargo consisted chiefly of provisions, and was discharged at Wilmington, North Carolina; that she had on board, when captured, 500 bales of cotton, 30 tons of tobacco, and 8 barrels of turpentine, all having been taken on board at Wilmington, and the cotton and tobacco having been shipped by a brother of the owner of the vessel to him at Nassau; that the previous voyage was from Bermuda to Wilmington, and thence to Halifax; that on that voyage she carried into Wilmington a general cargo, the particulars of which he could not state, and brought out cotton and tobacco, which she delivered at Halifax; that she was owned by Alexander Collie, of London; that he does not know who were the owners of the cotton and tobacco; that he himself owned the turpentine; that bills of lading covering all of the cargo, except $50,000 in specie, were thrown overboard during the chase of the prize; that he knew that Wilmington was under blockade when he entered and left that port; that the vessel had previously violated the blockade of Wilmington while under the command of the witness and her previous masters; that the specie was thrown overboard during the chase of the vessel, and that the vessel was built for Collie.

The first mate, Trehane Fickell, and the chief engineer, William Helme, of the prize vessel, were also examined in preparatorio, on the same day with the master, Connop. They substantially concur with him in the allegations that the vessel went into Wilmington, and came out of that port, in violation of the blockade on the voyage in question, with full knowledge of its existence and enforcement, and with intent to evade it. It would be a useless surplusage of details to recapitulate the proofs at large.

The only paper evidence of the ownership of the prize ship, secured and brought into court from the capture, is an English certificate of registry, issued from the custom house at London, January 14, 1864, to Francis Muir. The testimony in preparatorio proves that the vessel was under British equipment as to officers, men, and flag, and was sailed in the interest of British subjects.

The result is unequivocal, on the proofs, that the vessel was studiously and openly employed, at the time of her capture, in violating the blockade imposed by the United States government on enemy ports in the rebel states, and was captured in the act of evading the blockade of the port of Wilmington, North Carolina. It is accordingly adjudged that the vessel and cargo be sentenced to condemnation and forfeiture for such offence, and that a decree to that effect be entered.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured by the United States gunboat Seneca, off Charleston bar, November 20, 1862, as prize of war. The vessel, being unseaworthy, was appraised by the board of naval survey, and left at Port Royal, South Carolina, in charge of Admiral DuPont. The cargo was transported to this port for adjudication, and was here labelled, December 12, 1862, and, on the return of the attachment and monition in open court, a default and a decree thereon were, on motion of the United States attorney, duly entered in court against the cargo and the valuation of the vessel on such appraisal.

The master, the mate, and one seaman, captured with the vessel, were examined by the prize commissioners in preparatorio. No papers of the vessel were produced in court with the proofs. The master testifies that he is a native of England, but resides with his family, in Charleston, South Carolina. He was present at the capture of the vessel and cargo, on the night of November 20, 1862, about five miles from Charleston, while the vessel was coming out of Charleston. There were then in sight a large number of the United States blockading squadron. The witness does not know the names of the owners of the vessel, but was told that they reside in Nassau, New Providence.

He was appointed her master, November 2 or 3, 1862, by Mr. Johnson, her agent, at Charleston. The crew were all British subjects, and were all, except the mate, who belonged to the vessel, previously hired at Charleston. The voyage was to have ended at Nassau. The cargo consisted of 125 barrels of spirits of turpentine and 68 of resin. The master says that he has no papers relating to the vessel; that all of them were thrown overboard just previous to her capture; and that the bills of lading were thrown overboard also. He knew of the war, and that Charleston was under blockade at the time. The mate says that he is a native of Maryland, and a resident of North Carolina, and that when the vessel was captured she was endeavoring to run the blockade of Charleston.

This resume of the evidence placed beyond question the wilful and studied culpability of the voyage in question. The vessel and cargo were deliberately employed to violate the blockade of Charleston, and illicitly run a cargo of enemy products out of that port. Let there be a decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the cargo, and for the appropriation of the appraised value of the vessel.

DISAGREEMENT AMONG SHIP OWNERS — SALE OF SHIP ON APPLICATION OF HALF OWNERS—CHARACTER EVIDENCE—MORTGAGE.

1. The admiralty has jurisdiction to order the sale of a vessel on the application of the owners of one-half of her, in case of a disagreement between them and the owners of the other half. But such disagreement must be such as prevents the present employment of the ship, and the owners asking for a sale must either propose a different employment of the ship, or, if they merely object to the voyage or the master proposed by the other moiety, their objection must be based on reasonable ground.

[Cited in The B. F. Woolsey, 7 Fed. 116.]

2. The owners of half of a ship applied to the court for a decree of sale. It appeared that, at the time of filing the libel, the ship was loading in New York under a charter for San Francisco. Some of the owners of the vessel resided in New York and some in Maine, and, when she had been in New York before, some of her business had been done by S. & Co., who, together with the father of S., owned and controlled one-half of the ship. S. had accepted this charter while the vessel was yet at sea, after a conference with his father who was in Maine, and made some effort to consult with the Maine owners. After the charter had been accepted L., who represented the owners of the other half of the ship, came to New York and, having inquired of S. if she was chartered and received an evasive answer, then informed S. that, as representing the owners of the other half, he did not wish the ship chartered. S. then told him the ship was chartered. L. did not then repudiate the charter or take any steps to prevent the signing of the charter party by the master, which was done after the arrival of the ship in New York. There was dissatisfaction on the part of L. and those owners who acted with him as to the agency of S. & Co. or the father of S., and as to some previous transactions in reference to the ship; and after the vessel was partly loaded, L. and the other owners for whom he acted filed a libel against the ship and the owners of the other half to obtain a sale: Held, that, under the circumstances of the case, the libellants had not shown sufficient grounds to call on the court to exercise the discretionary power of sale.

3. That evidence tending to show that as to part of the vessel, to which L. held the legal title, the master of the vessel held an equitable interest by reason of which he had intervened in the cause and answered, opposing the sale, was admissible in order to show to the court all the circumstances in the face of which it was called to exercise its discretion.

In admiralty.

R. D. Benedict, for libellants.

W. W. Goodrich and W. R. Beebe, for respondents.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a suit of ligation and partition brought by the owners of a moiety of the ship Annie H. Smith, against the ship and the owners of the other moiety. The libel prays a sale of the ship under the decree of the court and the distribution of the proceeds among the owners. That the courts of admiralty have jurisdiction of such a suit, seems to be settled by authority, so far as this country is concerned. There are three reported cases in which the court has entertained such a suit, and granted the relief here prayed for. They are the case of The Hope in the district court of South Carolina in 1793, [Case No. 12,927,] the case of The Seneca in the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania in 1829, [Case No. 12,670,] and the case of The Vincennes in the district court of Maine, in 1851, [Case No. 16,944.] These decisions have received the emphatic approval of eminent text writers as being in accordance with the principles of the maritime law. Story, Partn. § 438; Ben. Adm. (2d Ed.) § 274; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 343; Dun. Adm. Fr. p. 67; 2 Kent, Comm. 370.

In the case of The Seneca, [supra,] Judge Hopkinson, of the district court, denied the relief on the ground that the court had not jurisdiction, and the English court of admiralty has also declined to exercise this power, but the great weight of authority is in favor of the jurisdiction; and in cases where the relief is shown to be necessary, the sale by decree of the court seems to be the only practicable means of restoring the ship to its proper use as a vehicle of commerce, and therefore highly beneficial to those public interests which are peculiarly the care of the admiralty. The fact that the power is not exercised in England may be accounted for, perhaps, by the well known restrictions to which the jurisdiction of the English admiralty courts was subjected in early times through the jealousy and the greater power of the other courts. This power of sale, so far as the cases have gone, has only been exercised where the owners are equally divided in respect to the employment of the ship or appointment of the master. Where they are unequally divided, the rights of the majority and minority owners respectively are for the most part well settled. The majority in interest have the right to employ the ship in navigation, notwithstanding the objection and protest of the minority and their refusal to join in the adventure, but in such a case the minority may require security for the safe return of the vessel. If the majority in interest unreasonably refuse to employ the ship, it has been suggested that a sale may be enforced. Willings v. Blight, [Case No. 17,765.]

Of the cases where a sale has been decreed upon a disagreement between equal moiety part owners, the case of The Seneca [supra] is the only one reported with sufficient fullness to show the particular circumstances under which the power was exercised, and the views of the court as to the reasons and grounds for the exercise of the power to decree a sale as between the equal part owners, which reasons and grounds must, of course, limit and control the action of the court, in ordering or refusing a sale in each case presented to it. In the case of The Seneca, [supra,] the respondent was owner of one-half of the vessel, was in possession of her, and had made several voyages in her as master, to the dissatisfaction of the owners of the other half, whose interest the libellants had purchased; and he had projected another voyage, and insisted on fitting her out at great expense, and upon going in her as master. The libellants on the other hand had refused to incur any expense for the outfit of the vessel for a voyage to be conducted by the respondent. They had appointed or attempted to appoint another master, and were ready and willing to employ the ship. It is obvious that the disagreement between the part owners in that case was such in its nature and effect, under the circumstances in which the vessel was placed, that it operated effectually to prevent the present use or employment of the vessel at all in navigation. The parties being equal in their right to control the employment of the ship and the appointment of the master, the effect of the disagreement was, as Mr. Justice Washington distinctly points out [Case No. 12,670] that "the vessel must remain unemployed, since neither owner can otherwise than tortiously send her to sea against the will of the other."

I think, also, that it is clear from the report of the case, that it was the opinion of that learned judge, that the power of the court to interfere and order a sale depends upon this as an essential and controlling element: that in the situation of the parties and the ship, as existing when the suit is brought, the ship cannot rightfully be sent to sea by either party. And it also appears from the authorities upon which he relies as supporting his opinion, that such is the ground or one of the chief grounds upon which the power to sell rests, as the same has been declared or recognized in the foreign maritime codes to which he refers. Thus he cites with approval, the following statement of the provisions of the Roman Marine Code: "(1.) That the opinion and decision of the majority in interest of the owners concerning the employment of the vessel is to govern, and, therefore, they may on any probable design, freight out or send the ship to sea, though against the will of the minority. (2.) But if the majority refuse to employ the vessel, though they cannot be compelled to it by the minority, neither can their refusal keep the vessel idle, to the injury of the minority, or to the public detriment; and since, in such a case, the minority can neither employ her themselves, nor force the majority to do so, the vessel may be valued and sold. (3.) If the interest of the owners be equal, and they differ about the employment of the vessel, one-half being in favor of employing her, and the other opposed to it, in that case the willing owner may send her out." He also cites the 6th article of the Marine Code of France, said to have been published as early as 1681, as follows: "No person can constrain his partner to proceed to the public sale of a ship held in common, except the opinions of the owners be equally divided about the undertaking of some voyage." And he also cites and accepts as just and reasonable, Vallin's commentary on this rule, as follows: "The case excepted in this article is where the opinions of the parties are equally divided on the undertaking of some voyage, upon which we may remark, that the question is not of two equal opinions, of which one is to leave the vessel without any kind of voyage, and the other to undertake such or such a voyage, there being no doubt in that case, that the opinion favorable to a voyage ought to prevail, saving the right to discuss the projected voyage; but solely of the case of two opinions equally divided upon the particular enterprise projected by one moiety of the persons interested, and rejected by the other moiety; whether that moiety proposes, on its part, another voyage, or confines itself to a disapproval of it, provided, nevertheless, that it gives plausible reasons for its conduct; otherwise this would have the air of an absolute refusal to permit the vessel to be navigated, which justice could not tolerate, being contrary to the object of the vessel, to the original intention of the parties, and the interests of commerce." The particular point of disagreement in the case of The Seneca, [supra,] was, as to who should go as master; and Mr. Justice Washington held that although not expressly mentioned in these foreign codes, the case was within their reason, because a disagreement as to the master operated as effectually as a disagreement as to the voyage to be undertaken, to prevent the ship from being sent to sea; and he held further, that if the moiety objecting to a master, honestly entertained an objection to him, on the ground of their want of confidence in his skill or integrity, they did assign a plausible reason for their conduct. From this case, therefore, and the authorities on which it rests, may be deduced these rules, as governing and limiting the exercise of this power of sale on the application of a moiety of the owners: First, that the disagreement must be such as prevents the present employment of the ship in navigation; and, secondly, that the objecting moiety asking for a sale, must either propose a different employment of the ship, or, if they merely object to the voyage or the master proposed by the other moiety, their objection must be based on reasonable grounds. And this result is entirely in accordance with the principles applied by courts of admiralty in dealing with the rights, duties and powers of part owners of ships, whether equally or unequally divided in opinion, and which are well expressed by Judge Peters, in the case of Willings v. Blight, [Case No. 17,765:] "It is a principle discernible in all maritime codes, that every encouragement and assistance should be afforded to those who are ready to give to their ships constant employment, and this not only for the particular profit of owners, but for the general interests and prosperity of commerce. If agriculture be, according to the happy allusion of the great Sully, 'one of the breasts from which the state must draw its nourishment,' commerce is certainly the other. The earth, the parent of both, is the immediate foundation and support of the one, and ships are the moving power, instruments and facilities of the other. Both must be rendered productive by industry and ingenuity. The interests and comforts of the community will droop, and finally perish, if either be permitted to remain entirely at rest. The former will less ruinously bear neglect and throw up spontaneous products; but the latter requires unremitting employment, attention and enterprise, to insure utility and profit. A privation of freight, the fruit and crop of shipping, seems therefore to be an appropriate mulct on indolent, perverse, or negligent part-owners. The drones ought not to share in the stores acquired and accumulated by the labor, activity, foresight and management of the bees. Although the hive may be common property, it is destructively useless to all if not furnished with means of profit and support by industry and exertion, which should be jointly applied by all before they participate in beneficial results. Nor should the idle and incompetent be permitted to hold it vacant and useless, to the injury and ruin of the industrious and active."

Turning now to the facts of this particular case, it will be seen that the libellants' case does not come in either particular within the rule thus established by the case of The Seneca, [Case No. 12,670.] the disagreement between these part owners does not operate to prevent the present employment of the ship, nor do the libellants, the party objecting to the employment of the ship proposed by the other moiety, either propose any other employment, or allege or show any plausible grounds for objection to that proposed by the other party. The libel alleges, as to the points of difference between the parties, as follows: "That the owners of said ship are unable to agree in reference to the business and employment of said vessel. That, while the vessel was at sea on a voyage to New York, the libellants notified the respondents that said vessel must not be chartered, and the said respondents agreed that some arrangement should be made between the owners of the vessel with reference to the employment and control of her after her arrival in the port of New York. That thereafter the said vessel arrived in this port, where she still remains, but that the respondents refuse to make any reasonable arrangements with the libellants as to the management of her. * * * That the master of the said vessel is acting with the said respondents, and that the respondents, with said master, intend to send the said vessel from this port on a voyage to the port of San Francisco, from which voyage these libellants have expressly dissented."

It will be seen that the averments of the libel are very indefinite as to the nature of the libellants' dissatisfaction. They express no want of confidence in the integrity and skill of the master, nor do they ask for his removal. They allege the prohibition by themselves of the chartering of the vessel, and the intention of respondents to send her to sea upon a voyage from which they have dissented; but they do not allege the grounds of their objection to the voyage proposed, nor allege that they intend to use her in any different employment. The libel, therefore, might be open to objection, under the rules above stated, as not making out a case; but the cause has been tried and argued, without reference to the sufficiency of the pleadings, and will be considered and determined, upon the evidence independently of any want of averment in the libel.

A brief statement of the history of the transactions between the parties in reference to this ship is necessary to the understanding of the points raised.

On the 10th December, 1875, Nickerson & Rideout, ship builders of Calais, Maine, entered into a written agreement with Capt. Bartlett, a shipmaster, to build a ship of certain dimensions, description and materials. The agreement was in form between Nickerson & Rideout of the first part, and Bartlett and the several "undersigned" of the second part. In point of fact, no subscribers were found to sign and become parties to it till long afterwards. Nickerson & Rideout agreed that the hull, spars and iron work should be finished and delivered at Calais on or before November 5th, 1876, free of all liens. The parties of the second part agreed to take the proportional parts set opposite their names, and to pay for the same at the rate of \$33 per ton in certain installments, the title to vest in the subscribers in proportion to the several interests and amounts paid. It also provided that Nickerson & Rideout should pay no commission for superintending the construction, and Nickerson & Rideout joined with Bartlett in a guarantee that the subscribers should not have to take any larger proportion of the vessel than that for which they signed. Capt. Bartlett signed the agreement without adding to his signature any amount. In fact this agreement was devised by Bartlett and the builders as a scheme for getting a ship built for Bartlett to command, and with the expectation that they would find other parties to join with them to take shares and thus furnish the means for its construction. The plan was for Capt. Bartlett to superintend the building of the ship without compensation, except such as should result to him from the success of the adventure in his employment as master, and in such interest as he should be able to take in the ship. In June, 1876, Capt. Bartlett interested in the enterprise F. H. Smith & Co., of New York, shipping agents and commission merchants, Wm. H. Smith, the father of F. H. Smith, a New York merchant and ship owner, and Chas. N. Lord, of Bangor, Maine, a banker. They were all personal acquaintances of Bartlett's and had all formerly lived at Bangor. The first to sign the contract was F. H. Smith & Co., who signed for 1-16. Then Lord signed for $\frac{1}{8}$, and Morse & Co., of Bangor, whom he brought in, for $\frac{1}{8}$. Then one Loughton for 1-32, and W. H. Smith for 3-16. These were all the parties that signed the contract, taking in all 3-64 of the ship. I think the evidence is sufficient to show that it was held out by Capt. Bartlett, as an inducement to F. H. Smith & Co., and to W. H. Smith, to sign, that the firm of F. H. Smith & Co. would be employed to attend to the business of the ship when she should be in New York, and that this was made known to Lord, Morse & Co. and Loughton when they signed the contract. Such employment was in the line of business of F. H. Smith & Co. These parties signed about the same time, about the 19th of June, 1876. The interest of $\frac{1}{8}$ each, taken by Lord and Morse & Co., was subscribed for by them in pursuance of the terms of a written agreement between them and Capt. Bartlett, executed on the same day with their execution of the building contract. This agreement recites that Lord and Morse & Co. "at the special instance and request, and for the special benefit" of Bartlett, had signed the building contract to take one-quarter of the said ship. By it Lord and Morse & Co. agreed that "after the performance of the provisions of the agreement on Bartlett's part, they would convey to him" whatever of said interest in said ship shall remain unsold, "and would reassign" all collaterals named in the agreement not appropriated by the terms and spirit of the agreement. It was then agreed, on Bartlett's part, to keep the interest insured, and to repay any taxes paid thereon by Lord and Morse & Co., and that, whenever Lord and Morse & Co. should sell said quarter, or any less portion, they should deduct from the sum received the following commission: from sale of a quarter, \$1,500; one-eighth, \$800; one-sixteenth, \$400; that commissions and interests on all moneys paid out by Lord and Morse & Co. were to be allowed to them as follows: $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the whole sum paid for the one-quarter, $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for advancing every six months, and 10 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually on all balance due, until paid, including in advances all sums paid for repairs and disbursements, and crediting earnings received. Bartlett agreed to pay one-half of all moneys paid out under the contract, with interest and commissions, within two years, and the balance within three years from the date of the contract. Bartlett then agreed to assign to Lord and Morse & Co., as security for his faithful performance of the agreement, all his interest in the estate of one Pollard, valued at \$3,400, and a policy of insurance on his life for \$3,000, which he agreed to keep in force. The agreement then provided that, if Bartlett neglected and refused to pay the interest semi-annually, except when he was at sea, and then within two months after his arrival at his next port of destination, then Lord and Morse & Co. should be entipled to hold the sum of \$4,000 of said collaterals as a forfeiture for the non-payment of interest. Upon the execution of these agreements, Bartlett transferred the collaterals mentioned to Lord and Morse & Co., and Lord and Morse & Co. made their first advances towards building the ship.

Some two months after these transactions Nickerson & Rideout failed. Meanwhile, some further interests had been taken in the vessel. W. H. Smith took a quarter, and there remained 9-64 not taken, on which, by an agreement between Nickerson & Rideout on the one side, and Lord and Morse & Co. and W. H. Smith on the other, these parties had advanced on the 9-64, leaving, however, in Nickerson & Rideout a right to redeem the interest on paying up the advances. The failure of Nickerson & Rideout made it necessary to make arrangements with other parties for completing the ship, and increased the cost of the ship to the subscribers. Proceedings were taken to enforce claims for liens by several parties who had furnished materials for the ship, among others by F. H. Smith & Co., who had an unpaid claim for hard pine, amounting to about $10,000. W. H. Smith acted in the matter of this claim for a lien for F. H. Smith & Co., and the asserting of this claim caused some dissatisfaction on the part of Lord and Morse & Co. with W. H. Smith. And, after some verbal agreement between them, and some misunderstanding as to what that agreement was, Smith agreed, in writing, not to enforce this lien against their quarter interest. Nickerson & Rideout finally went into bankruptcy, and their right to redeem the 9-64 passed to their assignee. From the time of this difficulty about the hard pine, Lord and Morse & Co. began to entertain some hostile feelings towards the Smiths, and were determined, if they could, to prevent the Smiths, who already owned one-half the vessel, from acquiring any further interest. W. H. Smith was desirous of keeping the whole or a part of the title to the 9-64, on which he, with Lord and Morse & Co., had advanced, but which stood in the name of W. H. Smith for 3-64, Lord for 3-64, and Morse & Co. for 3-64, and he took an agreement from Nickerson & Rideout, assigning him their right to redeem this interest, but never acted on it, probably because their bankruptcy made it evident that he could not get a good title in that way. There was some conversation between him and Lord about the matter, and Lord pretended to him that he would rather have his money, but afterwards, jointly with Morse & Co. and other Bangor owners acting with him, Lord procured one Wilson to purchase the right to redeem from the assignee, and then Wilson paid off the advances of Smith, Lord and Morse & Co., and held the 9-64 for the benefit of Lord, Morse & Co. and the others who joined them in the proportions in which they advanced him the money to purchase and redeem the interest. The result was that Lord and Morse & Co. prevented the Smiths from getting more than one-half of the ship, and they themselves got control of the other half, except one small interest in one Snow, which they purchased in July last to make their half complete. The proceedings of Lord and Morse to bring about this result as to the 9-64 were artful and cunning, and they outwitted Smith, but they are not chargeable in the matter, as alleged in the answer, with any legal fraud which taints their title. Their proceedings were secret, and it was not till shortly before the filing of this libel that W. H. Smith or F. H. Smith & Co. learned that this share or 9-64 was held in the interest of Lord and Morse & Co., although it was communicated confidentially by Lord to Capt. Bartlett.

The failure of Nickerson & Rideout led to a change in the agreement between Bartlett and Lord and Morse & Co. as to the one-quarter on which they were advancing for his benefit, and by subsequent agreements it was provided that additional sums which they should become liable to pay beyond the price stipulated in the original building contract should be first repaid to them before they should convey to him the quarter interest under the agreement of June 19, 1876.

These additional amounts have never been ascertained, and cannot be so till the lien suits still pending are brought to an end.

The ship was completed and sailed on her first voyage, under command of Captain Bartlett, on or about April, 1877, and she has continued under his command from that time to this, making several voyages. She has been very successful, netting in dividends to her owners $10,000, besides paying for her copper, which cost $5,000, all in the period of sixteen months. Her cost was about $75,000. Her first voyage was from New York, and she arrived in New York again on the 17th of August last. During these voyages Capt. Bartlett has generally acted as the agent of the owners in making charters, disbursing the ship, and generally in attending to her business.

The first charter, however, was made in New York, after consulting all the other owners, by F. H. Smith & Co., who signed the charter as "Agents for the Owners," and they have received and distributed at least one remittance and have attended to disbursing some of the ship's bills in New York, and in February, 1878, rendered an account to the owners. There was some delay in making this distribution by F. H. Smith & Co., owing to some unsettled bills being out, and this delay in the receipt of his dividend was made the ground of some complaint against F. H. Smith & Co. by Mr. Lord, in his confidential correspondence with Captain Bartlett, and he requested Captain Bartlett in future to remit the share of the Bangor owners to him (Lord) direct, and not through F. H. Smith & Co., stating that there would be no impropriety in his so doing, and that there had never been any agent of the ship appointed except himself, (Bartlett). Indeed, in his letters to Bartlett, Lord constantly recurred to this idea that there had been no agent appointed, and expressed himself dissatisfied with the existing state of things, and further expressed the hope that before long they might get an agent appointed.

By all this, taken in connection with what Lord knew of the understanding at the time of signing the building agreement, and with his conduct in New York with reference to the present charter hereinafter referred to and the power of attorney held by him as hereinafter stated, I understand that his meaning was that, notwithstanding that original understanding as to F. H. Smith & Co.'s doing the business at New York and the fact known to him that F. H. Smith & Co. had from the beginning acted as agent for the owners in New York, as occasion required, yet there was no permanent appointment of an agent and that nothing had been done to bind the owners to continue the business with F. H. Smith & Co. or to prevent their appointing another agent.

But this dissatisfaction, such as it was, was not communicated to the Smiths, although W. H. Smith knew that there was some hard feeling about the old hard-pine business.

In June or July, 1878, the ship was on her way homeward for New York, and it became necessary to make arrangements for a new voyage. On the 7th of July, the captain wrote to F. H. Smith & Co. from Dungeness recommending that she be chartered to arrive for San Francisco. On the 29th of July, F. H. Smith & Co., having obtained an offer from Sutton & Co. to take her for $16,000 for a voyage to San Francisco, wrote a letter to W. H. Smith, who was then at Bangor, stating the terms of the offer and that it must be closed by August 1, and asking instructions. On the 31st of July, W. H. Smith went to see Morse, one of the Bangor owners, and showed him the letter and asked his advice.

There is some conflict of testimony between Morse and Smith, as to what took place at this meeting, but I think Mr. Smith's account the more probable of the two. Mr. Morse's comment on the offer was, that he thought there was not much money in it, but he would talk with Lord and see him again. Smith waited till late at night, and hearing nothing further from Morse, telegraphed to F. H. Smith & Co. to do what they thought best with the ship. Lord at that time was not in Bangor, and was not consulted. F. H. Smith & Co., on receipt of this telegram, on the next day, Aug. 1, signed the charter on behalf of the owners, and it was executed by Sutton & Co. Sutton & Co. requested them to keep it secret till the ship's arrival.

On the 7th of August, Lord came to New York. He brought with him a power of attorney, executed by all the libellants, authorizing him, so far as their interests were concerned, to remove the captain, and to appoint a new captain in his place, and "to change the agency, management, and control of said ship, as seems to him to be for the interests respectively, and also to settle up the accounts of the ship with F. H. Smith & Co., who have assumed to act as the agents of the said ship heretofore, and to audit their accounts;" also to sell and convey their interests, provided the whole of their interest was sold together, "it being our intention to stand together in the matter of the ownership of said vessel." This paper shows conclusively, that up to that time, F. H. Smith & Co. were assuming to be, and had been suffered by the other owners to act as agents of the ship in New York, and that Lord's declarations in his letters, about there being no agent appointed, mean only what is above indicated. His conversation with F. H. Smith & Co. indicates the same thing. After some general conversation, he asked F. H. Smith if the ship was chartered, a question which he would not have asked except of one, who had, or at least was known to him to be assuming to have some authority to act for the owners in the matter of a charter. Smith, having regard to the request of Sutton & Co., gave an evasive answer, but said she was as good as chartered. Lord went out, and soon after returned with a witness, and said to Smith that they, i. e., the Bangor owners, didn't want the ship chartered till she arrived. Then Smith told him she was chartered, and stated the terms of the charter. Lord said he was sorry. It is insisted, on the part of the libellants, that though the charter is binding on the ship, because afterwards signed by the master, yet that it is not personally binding on them, because F. H. Smith & Co. had no authority to act for them, and because, before the master signed it, they prohibited the making of the charter so far as they were concerned, or, as it is expressed in the libel, they "expressly dissented from it." There is really no essential conflict of testimony as to what passed in the interviews between Mr. Lord, acting for the libellants, and F. H. Smith & Co. on the 7th of August, and afterwards between Mr. Lord and the respondents, and Captain Bartlett, after the ship's arrival, down to the time of the commencement of this suit. And the evidence does not show, in my judgment, that the libellants expressly dissented from the charter in any other sense than this, that they found fault with F. H. Smith & Co. for having made it without consulting them. The evidence does not warrant the conclusion that, when they found it had been made under an assumed authority to act for them in common with all the other owners, they sought or desired to undo or repudiate what was thus done in their behalf, or that they took the ground that they would not be parties in this new adventure. What they did and what they failed to do, what they said and what they failed to say, concur to this conclusion. In the first interview, Lord introduced the subject by asking Smith if she was chartered. Why did he ask that question, unless he thought F. H. Smith & Co. might have chartered her? If his pretence is true that he knew nothing about any understanding that F. H. Smith & Co. should be the agents, and that they had no existing authority as agents, he would naturally have asked him, "What shall we do with the ship?" but would not have asked him, "Is she chartered?" Again, when at the second interview he said, "Fred, we don't want the ship chartered," the language was only appropriate as addressed to one who had at least some color of authority to act for all the owners. And when, in answer, Smith said, "She is chartered," Lord's reply, which he himself testifies to, "I am sorry," was only appropriate as addressed to one who had some authority to do what was done. It expressed regret and dissatisfaction with what had been done, but recognized it as done. On his theory of total want of authority in Smith, his natural reply would have been, "Why, you can't charter the ship." Again, on the theory of the libellants that the charter became binding on the ship only because of its being signed by the master, the natural thing for the libellants to do, if they found that Smith had without authority signed a charter which was not yet binding, either on the ship or owners, was to have taken measures to prevent its becoming binding, either by instructing Smith that it should not be presented to the master for approval, or by leaving notice to be given to the master on his arrival prohibiting him from signing it. In fact, Lord did nothing of the kind. He knew that the master had not signed it, and that he was expected to arrive in a few days. Still further, if Lord either took the ground that the charter was not binding on the ship, or on the owners whom he represented, it is hardly conceivable that he should not have made some attempt to undo what had been done, at least to the extent of notifying the charterer, whose name was communicated to him, that the charter was void or not binding on his co-part-owners in order to avoid future complications and claims.

He did nothing of the kind, nor did he request Smith to do anything of the kind. The whole evidence tends to show that he acquiesced in what had been done as done, reluctantly, it is true, and with expressions of regret, but still that he acquiesced. It is true that he told Smith that the owners whom he represented had not been consulted, but this is not inconsistent with the intention so plainly appearing upon the other parts of the conversation. It was rather in the way of blame or fault-finding, that in so important a matter as the chartering of the ship he had not consulted all the owners, than as a distinct assertion that, for want of such consultation, what had been done was of no validity, or that he intended or felt that he had the right to repudiate it. They got into a discussion as to the respective interests which they severally represented. Smith was under the impression that he and his father and his sister held title to a little more than half the ship. Lord told him that he represented half. I see no reason to disbelieve Mr. Smith's statement that up to that time he did not know that the title to the 3-64 part of the 9-64 on which his father had advanced to Nickerson & Rideout, had been transferred by his father, and his impression that the Smiths controlled a little more than half was evidently based on the state of the title previous to that transfer. I see no reason to believe from the testimony that the action of F. H. Smith & Co. and W. H. Smith, in the making of this charter, was actuated by any other motive than that of doing what they thought was for the best interests of all concerned; nor do I see any evidence of a design in what they did unfairly to forestall the action of their co-owners, or to commit them to a charter that they did not approve. F. H. Smith & Co. acted under what they thought was the express authority of the majority interest. The occasion was pressing. Their letter to W. H. Smith at Bangor where the other owners principally were, did not request him to see the owners, but it may well have been within their expectation that he would do so, as in fact he did; and although it can be easily pointed out, that they might have done more to obtain the opinions of all, as by writing a letter to each owner, yet I can not find that what they did was not supposed by them to be a reasonable, fair, and proper attempt under the circumstances, to communicate with the other owners before closing with the offer for a charter which they believed to be a beneficial charter, as the market then was.

Now, I think in the circumstances in which Lord found that his co-part-owners were placed, when he learned that a charter had been made on the 7th of August, especially in view of the authority which, as appears conclusively by the power of attorney held by Lord, all the owners up to that time had permitted or suffered F. H. Smith & Co. to exercise—an imperfect and temporary authority, it may be, but one never up to that time revoked; I say I think that he was called upon as the representative of his co-part-owners to declare himself explicitly and in terms that could not be misunderstood as to whether or not he held the charter binding, and as to whether or not his co-part-owners would join in this new adventure projected on their behalf. Yet nothing that he said or did, conveyed or was calculated to convey to the minds of the respondents the idea that he held the charter to be void, or repudiated what had been done in their names, and on their behalf. He could not, as between himself and his co-owners, who had assumed to act in his behalf, lie by, and by the use of doubtful expressions as to his intention at that time, afterwards, in case of the success of the adventure, claim that he was entitled to share in the profits on the ground that he had bound himself, and in case of disaster defend against a claim for contribution on the ground that he had not bound himself. For aught that appears if he had declared himself not bound, his co-owners might then have procured from the charterer a release from the charter. Freights were still falling, and other ships could have been procured on terms as favorable for the charterer.

On the 17th of August the ship arrived. F. H. Smith & Co. presented the charter to the master, and he approved it. Afterwards, on the 22d or 23d of August, Lord came to New York again. He saw the master and the respondents. He offered to name a price at which he would buy or sell, and he offered that the Smiths should name a price at which they would buy or sell, but as regards the charter nothing occurred to alter the situation of affairs, except that he learned from the master, that the lay days under the charter would commence on the 25th of August, and he did nothing, but, so far as his action was concerned, allowed the business to proceed till the filing of this libel on the 20th day of September. In the meantime the loading of the ship had commenced, and her bills of lading were issued for about 200 tons of general cargo. The evidence is that freights have been falling ever since this charter was made; that the charter was the best thing that could have been done with the ship at the time it was made, and better than any charter that could be made now; that it is a good charter for the ship, and will bring her to San Francisco in time to avail of what seems to be a fair opportunity for business, in carrying grain from that port. Although in their conversation Lord and Morse have expressed doubt as to the charter being profitable and beneficial to the ship, they have not sustained these opinions by any evidence. The evidence is all the other way. The libel alleges that "while the vessel was at sea on a voyage to New York, the libellants notified the respondents that the vessel must not be chartered, and that the respondents agreed that some arrangement should be made between the owners of the vessel, with reference to the employment and control of her, after her arrival," and that "the respondents refuse to make any reasonable arrangement with the libellants, as to the management of her." As to the averment that the libellants notified the respondents that she must not be chartered, I find that it is not proved, but that at the time the libellants communicated their wish that she should not be chartered, the charter was then already made, in which the libellants afterwards acquiesced. As to the alleged promise to make some arrangement about the management of the vessel, the facts seem to be as follows: At the interview on the 7th of August, Lord said to F. H. Smith that he was not satisfied with the management or with the arrangements as to the vessel. He did not then explain in what particular he was dissatisfied with the existing management. It was not said in reference to the charter, or, if it was so intended, it was not so said as to convey the idea to Smith that he meant that he wanted any different arrangement made about this charter. Understanding him to refer to the general management of the vessel, Smith told him he didn't know of anything wrong, but did not see why arrangements could not be made if he wanted it. Again, when he saw the captain, Lord told him that he was dissatisfied with the management. With the light thrown on the case by Lord's letters to Bartlett, and especially by the power of attorney which he held, executed by the libellants, it is evident that what was referred to, and which Smith could only guess at, was the matter of the agency of the vessel, a point which Lord had long had in mind, but on which he had not declared himself, for obvious reasons, to the Smiths. Now, as to this matter of the agency of the vessel in New York, and especially as to the continuance of the existing agency, such as it is, of F. H. Smith & Co., which Lord received express power from his co-part-owners, so far as he could act for them, to put an end to by a new appointment of agent, it is to be observed that down to the time of filing the libel, it is not shown that the libellants, or Lord in their behalf, ever stated this point as a point of disagreement to the respondents, or to F. H. Smith & Co., or ever requested them to resign the agency, or ever proposed to the respondents to unite with the libellants in the appointment of a new or different agent; nor is there any evidence of any declaration of the respondents, or of F. H. Smith & Co. that they intend to hold on to this agency against the wishes of the libellants, or that they refuse or would refuse to join with the libellants in the appointment of an agent entirely impartial and satisfactory to both sides.

There has been, at no time up to the present, any dissatisfaction with the conduct of the master, Capt. Bartlett, on the part of any of the owners. There is no proof that the libellants have ever expressed a desire to the respondents to remove the captain, or to have a different captain appointed. The evidence is complete of his skill, and there is no proof of any want of confidence in his skill and integrity on the part of the libellants. No case is made which would justify his removal, and it is not claimed that there is. The ship was built with a view to his commanding her, as all the owners understood. He gave a year's time to superintending her construction. He has displeased the libellants by joining in resisting this application for the sale of the vessel, which would displace him from command as well as extinguish his right to become the owner of an interest under his agreement with Lord and Morse & Co., of June 19, 1876. But the libellants have suffered him to go on and sign the charter and receive cargo under it, and issue bills of lading, whereby he is personally bound, without any notice to him or the other part owners, of any dissatisfaction with him as master.

The libellants have not proposed to the respondents any different employment of the ship. So far as they have been shown to have expressed any intention as to what they would have done in place of making this charter, it is that they preferred to wait for freights to improve—to lay the vessel up till the fall.

It is proved that the market for ships is very dull, and at a forced sale they are likely to be greatly sacrificed.

The grounds of disagreement between these owners, as shown by the evidence, may be summed up thus:

(1.) They dislike Mr. W. H. Smith, because of his conduct in reference to the hard pine lien, and because they think he was unfair in regard to his agreement about not holding their interest for that lien; and their state of feeling towards him is such that they dislike to own in a ship with him, especially where he holds control of one-half the vessel.

(2.) They are dissatisfied with having F. H. Smith & Co. acting longer as agents of the vessel in New York, because they are identified in interest with W. H. Smith, because they were negligent in making a remittance, and because they made the charter without consulting the libellants, and because they (the libellants) prefer to have another agent disconnected from the Smiths—but this ground of dissatisfaction has never been made a subject of discussion between the parties, and before bringing this suit they never attempted to agree on any other agent.

(3.) The charter under which the vessel now is, was made without consulting all the libellants. The charter, however, is admitted to be binding on the ship, and has been shown to be binding on the libellants, by their acquiescence, and by their not expressly dissenting therefrom.

In any view that is taken of the charter, whether binding only on the ship or, by their acquiescence, on the libellants also, the disagreement as to the charter between these parties is not such as prevents the ship from going to sea under this charter. In the case of The Seneca, [Case No. 12,670,] neither party could, "otherwise than tortiously," that is, otherwise than by some act in violation of the rights of others, take the ship to sea.

In this case, neither party can "otherwise than tortiously" prevent the ship from going to sea. This is obviously so, if all parties are bound by the charter. It is equally so if the ship is bound to the charterer. The libellants may have their right to damages, but I do not see how they could now detain the ship. Again, these libellants, even if their right to separate themselves in this adventure survives their acts as above set forth, cannot, on the principles recognized in the case of The Seneca, [supra,] having no employment of the ship to propose on their part, and having wholly failed to show that the enterprise proposed by respondents is not what the ancient codes cited call "a probable design," that is, a well planned and proper enterprise, and one fit for the ship to undertake, are not entitled to prevent the use of the ship by the other half-owners.

As to the alleged dissatisfaction with the agency of F. H. Smith & Co., that clearly would not prevent the use of the vessel, so long as there is a competent master, and in this case it is no obstacle to her going to sea under this charter. And in point of fact, the parties have never disagreed about this matter, since there has been no attempt to agree, and the very point of dissatisfaction urged was never made known to the respondents so that they were called upon to take ground on the question.

As to the dislike of, and distrust towards W. H. Smith, this is not a disagreement as to the employment of the vessel, and though, if it continues to exist, it may be the cause of future disagreement, yet in itself, as a mere feeling, obviously it is of no account in this legal controversy.

It is, however, insisted, that the actual state of feeling between these parties is such, that a separation must be effected some time, if not now—that not to give them relief now is merely to prolong the controversy between them; that it will only compel them to apply to the court in California, or here again on the ship's next return to this port. The answer is obvious enough. This power to order a sale is a power to compel property owners to part with their property against their will. It is, therefore, an extreme resort justified by necessity only, from a regard, first, to the interests of commerce, and, secondly, to the relief of the parties from the distressing predicament which makes their property useless in their hands. The authorities cited above and the reason of the thing clearly show that this is the nature of the power. Now that necessity does not exist, either as to the relief of the public, or of the parties, till they have reached a point of actual present inability, by reason of the disagreement, to use the vessel. So long as that case of necessity is merely threatened, and lies in the future, it is as if it did not exist, and it may, in fact, never arise. Before this ship reaches San Francisco many things may happen to prevent this dead-lock occurring. The ship may be lost on the voyage. When she reaches there her true policy for the next voyage may be so obvious, that there will not be two opinions about it. The parties may reconcile their differences. It would seem that there ought not to be any great difficulty in disposing of what seems to be the principal point which the libellants insist upon, the establishment of an agency for the ship in which both parties can concur. A little more frankness and candor on the one side in dealing with the matter, and no great sacrifice of interest or feeling on the other, would save these former friends from further litigation and certain loss.

The libellants probably can, if they are bent upon doing so, at the end of this voyage, bring about a dead-lock which shall tie up the ship so that an admiralty court will have to do for the parties what they ought to do for themselves; but this court ought not to anticipate or attempt to provide against such a necessity.

Another question of very great interest, bearing on the nature of this action, was raised in this case. Upon the trial Captain Bartlett was admitted as a party respondent, and he joined in the answer denying the main facts on which the right to the relief prayed for was based. The respondents offered to show that Captain Bartlett had an equitable interest in the quarter of the ship held by the libellants, Lord and Morse & Co., being the same quarter taken in their names for $\frac{1}{8}$ th each, and subscribed for upon the building contract, in accordance with the agreement between Bartlett and Lord and Morse & Co., hereinbefore recited, and dated June 19, 1876.

It was not conceded by the learned counsel for the libellants that Bartlett had such an equitable interest in the quarter of the ship; but, on the contrary, it was claimed by him that the agreement of June 19 was an agreement to sell and convey an interest of Lord and Morse & Co. to Bartlett, on certain conditions, and not an agreement to hold as collateral and by way of security an interest belonging to Bartlett; and it was also claimed that, the time having expired within which Bartlett was to make his payment of one-half of the price, and notice having been thereupon given by Lord and Morse & Co. that his right under the contract was forfeited, such equitable interest had been cut off.

As to the question whether Bartlett has a redeemable interest in the quarter of the ship, it is only necessary for me to say that I have come to the conclusion, as well from the terms of the agreement of June 19, 1876, as from the other evidence of the understanding of the parties, their correspondence, their acts, and their testimony, that the relation between Bartlett, and Lord and Morse & Co. was that of debtor and creditor, and not that of vendee and vendor; that the interest was held as his, as collateral security for the debt, and therefore was not extinguished by the notice, but that there is no immediate right to redeem, because the amount of the debt cannot yet be ascertained, and his right to redeem is subject to be cut off by a sale under the power contained in the contract.

Aside from this answer made by the libellants' counsel as to Bartlett's interest, it was also insisted that the evidence was incompetent on the ground that in this action the court could consider and take notice only of the legal and record title to the ship; that as, in actions of possession, the court would take no notice of equitable interests, but would decree possession of the ship to those holding the majority of the legal title, so here those having a moiety of the legal title were entitled as of right to a sale, if the essential disagreement between the owners of the two moieties of the legal title existed. The evidence was admitted on the ground, that this power of the court is one to be exercised in its discretion, and with a regard to all the circumstances of the case, and with a view to the effect of the sale on the interests of all concerned, and that it is not a fixed legal right of moiety owners of the legal title, to have a sale decreed upon presenting to the court a case of disagreement as to the employment of the ship.

It is true the legal title to the major part carries with it the right to the possession of the ship, and that right must be recognized and enforced in suits for possession, and the rule is of great convenience and beneficial to commerce in the simplicity and ease with which it is applied. There seems to be no analogy, however, between a right to the possession as an incident of the legal title in a major part, and a right to have a court exercise a power of sale as an incident to legal ownership of a moiety. One is easily conceivable as a personal right; the other is not.

Moreover, if this were an absolute right inhering in a moiety ownership, to have the court order a sale, it is easy to see that it would be not beneficial but most injurious to the interests of commerce, from the ease with which it would be made the instrument of oppression. Thus, if the right is absolute and the court must order a sale, the court could add no condition which might defeat a sale. If it appeared ever so clearly that the libellants were rich and the respondents without means, except their interest in the ship, and the state of the market such that no other bidders could be found, and even that the libellants had brought about the disagreement to force a sale, intending themselves to buy for almost nothing, and thus drive the other party out of their property, yet, on the theory proposed, a sale must follow with all the absolute certainty with which possession follows the legal title, and the court could not even impose, except by consent of parties, as a condition of the decree, an upset price, since that would be to limit, restrict, and impair an absolute right. Unlike the rule that the right of possession adheres in the legal title to the major part, such an absolute right to a decree of sale would impair the value of all property in ships, by rendering insecure the owners' hold upon it. In truth, this power seems to be a power vested in courts of admiralty, from the necessity of the case, from a regard of the law as well to the public interest, that ships should continue to plough the sea, as to private interests that the parties may recover the beneficial use of their property. From the nature of the power, to be beneficial in its exercise, it should be used with discretion, with caution, and upon a careful consideration of all those interests, public and private, involved. It should not be tolerated that the power be invoked for purposes of oppression. It follows, that the court must receive evidence of all the circumstances that may possibly affect its discretion.

If it appears that the libellants really hold their moiety in trust for the respondents, owing them a duty to follow their directions in the management of the ship, it would hardly be a proper exercise of the power to grant the prayer of the libellants against the protest of the respondents; and in such a case, even if the public interests might suffer to the extent of having one ship idle, that would be more tolerable than to do so great a private wrong. Whether the protection of Captain Bartlett's interest from the ruinous effect of a sale, if his interest be such as he claims, would be a sufficient ground for withholding the decree, if the libellants were otherwise entitled to it, it is unnecessary to decide. But the evidence was properly received as evidence of circumstances bearing on the exercise of the discretion of the court. Libel dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 421.

The ANNIE LELAND.

[1 Lowell, 310.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1869.

SALVAGE—ABANDONMENT BY CREW—SALVORS FROM SHORE—AMOUNT.

1. A schooner laden with coal stranded upon the rocks and in a dangerous situation was got off and saved by salvors from the shore at their own risk and responsibility, while the crew were dismantling her by orders of the captain preparatory to abandoning her as a total loss. Held, that the salvors were entitled to a more liberal compensation than in many other cases where the property saved was of greater value; and that their merit was not diminished but increased by the fact of the incompetency and perhaps bad faith of the captain.

2. The service was performed by twenty salvors in a few hours and with no danger. On a value of $11,000 saved, $2,600 and costs allowed as salvage.

In admiralty. The schooner Annie Le-land, with a cargo of coal on board, and bound to Boston, went on shore on Nashawena rocks, in Vineyard sound, on the night of the 10th of September, 1863. The weather was thick, but not otherwise severe, and the vessel was discovered in the morning by the master of a fishing-smack, which had been anchored not far off; and he went on board, and found the master of the schooner determined to abandon her, and agreed with him to strip the vessel and take the rigging, sails, and other movables on board his smack, and carry them to the nearest port. Other persons came from the islands soon after, and among others, Captain Church of Cuttyhunk. To him the master said that his schooner was bilged, and that he was going to New Bedford to note a protest and communicate with the owners, but that he should be glad of assistance to save whatever could be got out of the wreck; and Captain Church returned to the island for shovels and other means of getting out the coal. The master soon after went to New Bedford, which was fifteen miles to leeward, and did not return until night, after his schooner was on her way to the same port. Presently after leaving his vessel, he engaged the services of one or two men connected with a schooner larger than the smack, to aid in the stripping and removal of the anchors, rigging, &c.; and when he arrived at New Bedford he telegraphed to his owners that the vessel was wrecked and lost. When Captain Church came on board again, he had a conversation with the mate, and induced him to sound the pumps, and finding that the vessel was not bilged, at once inferred that she might be got off at high tide. The mate declared that his instructions did not look to an attempt to save the vessel; and after some discussion it was agreed that Captain Church might make the trial at his own risk and expense, the mate proceeding, meanwhile, to dismantle the schooner in obedience to his orders. This agreement did not differ from an ordinary salvage undertaking, in so far as the payment depended on success; but it was understood that, in addition to this contingency, Captain Church was to make good any loss of anchors, chains, or cables, that might result from an unsuccessful endeavor to haul the vessel off. A good many persons had now arrived from the islands with three boats, two of them long-boats; and under Church's orders they got up the port anchor, and carried it out to the most available place at considerable trouble and some risk, one boat being somewhat injured by striking against the anchor. They then hauled taut on the line, and proceeded to shovel coal out of the after part of the vessel, which was the part that was resting on the rocks, and pumped the water out of the hold. All this time the crew and hired men were sending down the topmasts and unreeving the rigging; and the singular spectacle was presented of strangers busily working to save a vessel which her crew were as diligently rendering unseaworthy. After they had got out as much coal as the boats could safely and conveniently carry, some of the libellants went on shore for dinner, and, returning before the tide had fully risen, found that the remaining salvors and the crew had hauled the vessel off the rocks. They all then set to work and bent on the jibs, rigged a spar to the rudder, which had been unshipped and damaged, carried out a keedge to help sheer the schooner from the rocks, when she took the wind, and got her under weigh. Eight out of the twenty salvors remained on board for twenty-four hours longer, until the vessel arrived at New Bedford, two of whom were needed to steer her, and one to pump, and the others to help work the vessel, which steered very badly. The total value saved was from ten to eleven thousand dollars.

LOWELL, District Judge. The rule of court which was passed in the interest of all parties to salvage suits, that the value should be ascertained before the property is delivered, was not observed in this case; and though this happened through a misunderstanding, yet I remark upon it, that it may not occur again. In such a case, doubtful evidence will be construed most strongly against the owners, because they might have made the facts clear before executing their warrant to deliver.

In awarding the salvage in this case, I find it to be one for a proportionately larger compensation than many others in which the value saved has been more considerable. The owners were in great danger of losing their whole property. It is true, this was largely the fault of the master; but as there is no pretence of any collusion between him and the libellants, they are entitled to say that they have saved the vessel in spite of his incompetency or bad faith, against his instructions, at a very critical time, and by the exercise of the qualities which he should have supplied, as well as of the ordinary skill, labor, and energy expected of persons in their situation.

There is some reason to suppose that the master and his brother were considerable owners in the vessel, and that the master at least was insured against a total loss only. Whether this was the true motive of his conduct of not, it is certain that Captain Church assumed more than ordinary responsibility and incurred unusual liability in this case; and upon the principles of the admiralty law, he must be compensated for them. There is no probability that the mate and crew could or would have saved the property without the aid of the libellants. The only chance was of the vessel's floating in spite of them; and as she had already lain over one tide, this chance appears a very slight one. The place was rocky, and she had pounded hard and was found to be much chafed, and a hole might have been made in her planks at any moment. The libellants ask for four thousand dollars, the claimants are said to have offered five hundred: I award two thousand six hundred dollars and costs. The apportionment among the salvors is to be referred to the court before distribution is made.

Decree accordingly.

Case No. 422.

The ANNIE LINDSEY.

COLLISION IN THE SOUND—SAILING VESSELS MEETING—CLOSE-HAULED AND FREE.

1. A brig and a schooner came in collision in Long Island sound at night. The schooner was sailing to New York, and the brig was sailing from New York. The schooner saw the brig nearly ahead, and ported her helm. The brig saw the schooner nearly ahead, and first starboarded and then ported. There was a conflict of evidence as to the wind, the witnesses for the schooner claiming that it was nearly south, and those for the brig claiming that it was southeast. Each vessel claimed to have been close-hauled. The schooner had the wind on her port side. The brig had it on her starboard side. The brig struck the schooner on her port quarter. The brig alleged that she starboarded in obedience to a call from the schooner to "keep off." Held: That, on the evidence, the brig was close-hauled.

[See note at end of case.]

2. That, on the evidence of the brig, that she was heading east northeast and saw the green light of the schooner from half a point to a point on her port bow, the vessels were meeting nearly end on, and, under the 11th article, it was the duty of the schooner to port, which she did.

[See note at end of case.]

3. That, if the courses were crossing, there was risk of collision, as the brig was drawing a point on to the course of the schooner, and, under article 12th, the schooner, having the wind on her port side, was bound to keep out of the way of the brig, which she endeavored to do by porting.

4. That, if they were meeting, it was the duty of the brig to port, instead of first starboard-ing, as she did; and that the excuse which she set up for the starboarding was not established.

[See note at end of case.]

5. That, if the courses were crossing, it was the duty of the brig to keep her course; that, in either view, the brig was in fault, and liable for the damages; and that the schooner was not in fault.

[In admiralty. Libel by Daniel Brown and others, owners of the schooner Sallie Smith, against the brig Annie Lindsey, (Cornelius T. Tompkins, claimant,) for damages caused by collision. Decree for libellant. Affirmed by the circuit court, (not reported; see note at end of this case,) and also affirmed by the supreme court under title of The Annie Lindsey, 104 U. S. 185.]

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for libellants.
G. M. Speir, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libellants, as owners of the schooner Sallie Smith, and carriers of a cargo on board of her, bring this suit against the brig Annie Lindsey, to recover for the total loss of the schooner and her freight money and cargo, through a collision, which took place at about half past eight o'clock in the evening of the 7th of May, 1869, between those two vessels, in Long Island sound, off Eaton's Neck light, whereby the schooner and her cargo were sunk. The schooner was bound to New York from the Connecticut river. The brig was bound from New York to New Brunswick.

The libel alleges that the wind was south half west; that the schooner had her regulation lights set and burning brightly; that she was heading a little south of west, or about west; that the sails of a vessel were made ahead, or nearly so; but no light was discernible; that she was apparently bound in an opposite direction, and, after she was discovered, and when it was apparent there would be a collision unless something was done, the wheel of the schooner was ported, and she opened the other vessel until the red light of such other vessel was seen off the port bow of the schooner; that the wheel of the schooner was kept to port, and the approaching vessel, which turned out to be the brig Annie Lindsey, was hailed from the schooner to luff, but, instead of porting, she was kept away, and her stem struck the port quarter of the schooner, and crushed in her side, so that she sank, with her cargo, in a few minutes; that the wind at the time was free for vessels upon their proper courses bound to the east, but those going west were close-hauled; that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of those navigating the brig, in not keeping a lookout, in not having the proper lights set and burning, in not porting and keeping to the right, when meeting a vessel ahead and bound in an opposite direction, and in starboarding instead of porting; and that the lights of the schooner were seen at a sufficient distance, by those on board of the brig, for them to have avoided the schooner.

²[Affirmed by circuit court, (opinion not reported, and not accessible.) Also affirmed by the supreme court in The Annie Lindsey, 104 U. S. 185.]

The answer alleges that the wind was about southeast; that the schooner, when first seen by the brig, was steering a west by south course; that, just before the collision, the schooner suddenly changed her course to northwest, which brought her across the bow of the brig; that the wind was free for vessels bound to the west; that the brig was sailing close-hauled; that the collision was caused by the fault of those navigating the schooner; that the green light of the schooner was first seen on the lee bow of the brig; that the schooner, as she approached, was going to the windward of the brig, and hailed the brig to keep off, and the wheel of the brig was turned to keep off, and then the schooner suddenly changed her course to the northwest, and called out to the brig to luff; that the wheel of the brig was immediately put hard down, and she luffed, but too late, for the schooner kept off across the bow of the brig, and winged her foresail out, and the brig struck the schooner; and that the wind was on the port side of the schooner and on the starboard side of the brig.

The material points of difference raised by the pleadings are (1.) As to the wind. The libel alleges it was south half west; the answer, about southeast. (2.) As to whether the schooner, after getting to windward of the brig, kept away and crossed the bows of the brig. The testimony is all in the form of written depositions. The witnesses for the libellants are Chase (the master of the schooner), Logan (the mate), and Reed (a hand). There were but two persons on deck on the schooner, Logan, at the wheel, and Reed, forward on the lookout. The master was below.

The witnesses for the claimant are Parritt (the master of the brig), Nicholson (the second mate), and Davis (a hand). Nicholson was at the wheel, Davis was forward on the lookout, and the master also was on deck.

The deposition of Parritt was taken on the 30th of October, 1869. Then Reed and Chase, for the libellants, were examined in June, 1871, and Logan in October, 1871. Then Davis and Nicholson, for the claimant, were examined in October, 1871, and Parrit was, at the same time, examined again.

Reed was forward of the windlass, on the schooner. He says, that the wind was south by west; that the schooner was close-hauled; that he saw a vessel about dead ahead, but saw no light, and reported the vessel to Logan, and told him to swing her off, which was done, until the red light of the brig became visible to him, which was the first light he saw on her; and that he hailed the brig and told her to luff.

Logan, at the wheel of the schooner, says, that the wind was south; that the schooner was heading west by south; that Reed reported a vessel ahead and told him to keep off; that he ported; that, after that, he looked ahead and saw the red light of the brig; that he saw no other light, at any time, on the brig; and that Reed called to the brig to luff, and he also called to the brig to luff, after Reed had done so.

Chase, master of the schooner, says that the wind was south half west, and that the schooner was heading west half south.

It is to be noted, that neither Logan nor Chase says that the schooner was close-hauled in fact, or how her sheets were hauled. They leave it to inference, from the fact that, according to them, she was sailing only seven points off of the wind.

Parritt, on the deck of the brig, and her master, says, that he was bound east, but could not head his course, and was heading east northeast, and going about seven knots an hour; that he saw a green light right ahead; that, at the same time, his lookout reported a light right ahead; that he heard a man sing out from the schooner to hard up his wheel; that the brig was kept off one point, which opened the schooner's light broad on the weather bow of the brig; that the schooner kept off across the bow of the brig, and sung out for him to luff; that he luffed, by putting the wheel hard down, which caused the vessels to strike; that the schooner, when she kept off, winged her foresail out; that the brig was sailing close-hauled, and had her starboard tacks aboard; that the wind was southeast, and the brig was sailing as near to the wind as a square-rigged vessel could sail; that the schooner changed her course suddenly, from west by south to northwest, which brought her across the bows of the brig, and, when she saw there would be a collision, sang out to the brig to luff; and that, if the schooner had kept her course, there would have been no collision.

Davis was standing forward, on top of the fore-castle, on the brig, as a lookout. He says, that he saw a green light a little on his lee bow, a half a mile off, and approaching, and sung out, "Light ahead;" that he heard a cry from the schooner to keep off, and, directly afterwards, another cry to luff; that, when he heard the cry to keep off, the schooner was going to the windward of the brig, and she suddenly turned and kept off across the bow of the brig; that the brig was close-hauled, on her starboard tack; that, when he first saw the green light, it bore from half a point to a point on his lee bow, and was nearly ahead; that it afterwards got to be half a point on his starboard bow; that the schooner then kept hard off, and crossed his bow, and showed her red light; and that the vessels were very close together, when the cry came to luff.

Nicholson, at the wheel of the brig, says, that he heard Davis report a light ahead, and looked, and saw a green light about a point on his lee bow, and from a third to a half of a mile off; that the wind was east southeast to southeast, and the brig was close-hauled on the wind, and heading about east northeast; that he heard a man from the schooner, as she came up, sing out, "Hard up your wheel;" that Captain Parritt, at the same time, gave him orders to keep her off; that he started to do so, and turned the wheel, and just then heard a cry from the schooner to luff; that Captain Parritt, at the same time, gave him orders to luff, and assisted him at the wheel; and that he was steering full and bye, and not by the compass.

According to the story of the schooner, as her witnesses tell it, she was heading west by south, or west half south, and saw a vessel ahead, but saw no light on her, and, without knowing that the two vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on, ported. If the vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, it was the duty of the schooner to port. The brig, according to her own testimony, was heading east northeast, and saw the green light of the schooner so nearly right ahead that it was not more than from half a point to a point on the port bow of the brig, nearly ahead. I conclude, therefore, on this view, that, under the 11th article, the case was not one where the two vessels would, if both had kept on their respective courses, have necessarily passed clear of each other, but was one in which the vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision. It was, therefore, the duty of the schooner to port. According to her testimony, she did port, and did nothing else, and ported the moment the brig was seen, and swung off until the red light of the brig came into view. That the schooner did port, is testified to by the witnesses from the brig, it being contended by the brig, however, that this was not done until the green light of the schooner was seen half a point on the starboard bow of the brig.

Regarding the courses of the two vessels as crossing, they involved risk of collision, as the brig was drawing a point on to the course of the schooner. On the evidence, I conclude, that, without doubt, the brig was close-hauled and did not have the wind free, and that the schooner was not close-hauled and did have the wind free. Hence, under article 12, the schooner, having the wind on her port side, was bound to keep out of the way of the brig. She endeavored to do so by porting, and ported, as before stated, until she opened the red light of the brig.

As meeting the schooner end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, it was the duty of the brig, under article 11, as much as of the schooner, to port. It is very clear, that, at first, the brig did not port. On the contrary, she starboarded. Her master says that, by the starboarding, she kept off one point, until she opened the green light of the schooner broad on the weather bow of the brig. The starboarding is sought to be excused by the allegation, that it was done because the schooner hailed the brig to put her wheel hard up or to keep off. This is not confirmed by any witness from the schooner. It would have been a most extraordinary order for the schooner to give to the brig, when the schooner herself was porting. The proper order to be given, if the schooner was porting, was for her to order the brig to luff. The witnesses from the schooner say that they hailed the brig to luff. All the appearance of the green light of the schooner on the starboard bow of the brig that there was, was produced by the starboarding of the brig, the schooner having only ported and not starboarded. On this view, therefore, there was fault in the brig, in starboarding, which contributed to the collision.

As crossing, with her course, the course of the schooner, so as to involve risk of collision, it was the duty of the brig, under articles 12 and 18 (the two vessels having the wind on different sides, and the brig having the wind on her starboard side and not having it free, and the schooner having the wind on her port side, and not being close-hauled), to keep her course, and to permit the schooner to keep out of the way, and not to attempt to keep out of the way herself. It is manifest, that the brig, by attempting to keep out of the way, and by starboarding to do so, thwarted the efforts of the schooner, by porting, to keep out of the way of the brig. The excuse, of the hail from the schooner, to keep off, has been already referred to.

Again, the brig being close-hauled, and having the wind on her starboard side, it was her duty to keep her course, and not to starboard, whether the schooner was close-hauled or not.

In any view of the case, there must be a decree for the libellants, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by them by the collision.

[NOTE. On appeal to the circuit court, the judgment was affirmed, and that court found, inter alia, the following facts: "(5) When the brig was discovered from the schooner, the two vessels were approaching each other end on, or nearly end on, and on courses involving the risk of collision. The brig was close-hauled. The schooner had the wind a little free. (6) A short time before the collision, the lookout on the schooner discovered the brig about dead ahead. He saw no lights, but made out the vessel and her sails, coming, as he judged, from an opposite direction. He at once reported to the man at the wheel, who put the wheel to port and bore off until he opened the red light on the brig. (7) The schooner was not discovered from the brig until after the brig was discovered from the schooner. The lookout was the first to see schooner from the brig, and he called out, 'Light right ahead.' Almost at the same moment a hail was heard from the schooner. The brig's wheel was then put to starboard, and she swung off one point. As soon as this movement could be discovered, another hail came from the schooner to luff, and the wheel was put to port, but before it could materially affect the course of the brig the two vessels came together, the brig striking the schooner on the port quarter, the jib-boom of the brig passing through the mainsail of the schooner. The schooner sank in a very few minutes with her cargo, and was a total loss. (8) The starboarding of the brig was the direct cause of the collision." (The other findings, and the conclusions of law of the circuit court, may be found in the statement to this case. The Annie Lindsley, 140 U. S. 185.) The supreme court held that, as the circuit court did not find that the light seen upon the schooner before the collision was a green light, there was no occasion for the starboarding of the brig under the twenty-fourth sailing rule, (Rev. St. § 4233,) which permits a departure from the ordinary rules when necessary to avoid immediate danger, but that the case was within the sixteenth rule, (Id. § 4233,) which provides: "If two sail vessels are meeting end on, so as to involve the risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other,"—and consequently the brig was liable for having neglected to follow that rule. Case No. 423.

The ANNIE M. SMULL.

[2 Sawy. 226.]¹

District Court, D. Oregon. June 25, 1872.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION ON COLUMBIA RIVER—SEAMEN'S WAGES—DISCHARGE OF CARGO.

1. The U. S. district court for the district of Oregon has concurrent jurisdiction over the Columbia river.

2. A voyage is ended and a seaman's wages become due when the vessel is moored at her final port of destination, and if such wages are not paid within ten days thereafter, the seaman is entitled to admiralty process against the vessel.

[See Edwards v. The Susan, Case No. 4,299.]

3. A seaman is not bound to stay by the ship after her arrival at the final port of destination, and assist in discharging her cargo, unless the shipping articles contain a contract to that effect or the established custom of the port requires it.

[In admiralty. Libel by John Johnson and eight others against the Annie M. Smull for wages. Decree for libellants.]

John A. Woodward and David Goodsell, for libellants.

Theodore Burmester, for claimant.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a suit for the subtraction of wages brought by John Johnson and eight others to recover the sum of $578 alleged to be due said Johnson and others for services as seamen on a voyage in the Annie M. Smull from New York to Kalama, between December, 1871, and the latter part of May, 1872.

On June 5, process was issued upon the libel, upon which the ship was arrested the same day. Subsequently the owner, Charles Mallory, by the master, intervened for his interest and filed exceptions to the libel, which, by consent of counsel, were argued and submitted on June 17.

The first exception is in the nature of a plea in abatement, and alleges that the court has not jurisdiction of the suit, because it appears from the libel that the vessel is not within the district of Oregon, but at the time of filing the libel was and ever since has been lying in the Columbia river, off Kalama, in Washington territory.

The question made by this exception turns upon the construction of the constitution of the state and acts of congress defining its boundaries and establishing the judicial district of Oregon.

The constitution of the state (article 16, § 1) provides that its northern boundary shall commence one marine league at sea, "due west and opposite the middle of the north ship channel of the Columbia river, thence easterly to and up the middle channel of said river, and where it is divided by islands, up the middle of the widest channel thereof * * * including jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases upon the Columbia river * * * concurrently with states and territories of which this river forms a boundary in common with this state."

In admitting Oregon into the Union by the act of February 14, 1859, (11 Stat. 383, [Rev. St. § 4530,]) congress assented to this boundary, including the provision concerning concurrent jurisdiction on the Columbia river, and also enacted (section 2 of the act aforesaid) that, "the state of Oregon shall have concurrent jurisdiction on the Columbia and other rivers and waters bordering on the said state of Oregon, so far as the same shall form a common boundary to said state, and any other state or states now or hereafter to be formed or bounded by the same;" and that said river and other waters shall be "common highways" for all citizens of the United States.

By section two of the act of March 3, 1859, (11 Stat. 439), it was provided that: "The said state (Oregon) is hereby constituted a judicial district of the United States, within which a district court * * * shall be established."

In support of the exception, counsel maintains that the state of Oregon is bounded by the middle line of the Columbia river, and that the district of Oregon being in effect declared to be co-terminous with the state, it follows that the Annie M. Smull is without the district, and, therefore, not within the jurisdiction of this court; and that the clause in the constitution of the state and act of congress, giving the state concurrent jurisdiction over the whole river, does not affect or enlarge its boundaries, but is in the nature of a special reservation, or grant of power, to the courts of the state, which does not apply to or include this court.

In reply, counsel for the libellants maintain that the clause in question, by giving the state jurisdiction over the whole of the Columbia river does, in effect, make the north shore thereof the boundary of the state, and therefore of the district as well. No authority directly in point was cited on the argument, nor have I been able to find any.

As the law stands, it is admitted that the boundary of the state and district are identical. It is also clear that congress had the power to give this court jurisdiction, either concurrent or exclusive, over the whole river, of matters within the judicial power of the United States, and that the public convenience requires that it should have it. The only question then to be considered is, has congress done so? In my judgment it has. The argument of counsel for the exception, does not correctly state the terms or effect of the clause concerning the concurrent jurisdiction of the state. It is not merely a special grant of judicial power to the courts of the state over persons and things upon the river, but without the boundary of the state. It is a legislative declaration or enactment that the jurisdiction of the state—that is, its whole sovereign power shall extend to the whole river, subject to the qualification that the jurisdiction of the state or territory on its northern shore, shall in like manner extend to its southern shore. In effect, this makes the northern shore of the river the northern boundary of the state, for its territorial limits and jurisdiction are necessarily the same. Practically, then, so far as the Columbia river forms a boundary common to Oregon and Washington, it is within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of each. In the language of the act of February 14, 1859, aforesaid, it is the common property and "highway" of both. This being so, the river is also within the jurisdiction of the district of Oregon, and therefore this court has jurisdiction of this suit.

What is here said upon this subject is, however, only intended to apply to jurisdiction over matters and things actually arising or situate upon the river. The concurrent jurisdiction is not understood to extend over any islands or dry land within the river. As to such, and probably only such, the middle thread of the river is the absolute boundary line of both state and district.

It is also stated in this exception, that the vessel was "moored at the wharf at Kalama," a town on the Washington territory shore, and some reference was made to this fact in the argument. But I do not perceive on what ground it can be claimed that a vessel which is in fact floating or lying upon or in the river, is to be considered as without the district, because it may be fastened or moored to the northern shore of the river, or to any wharf or other structure erected thereon.

The second exception is a dilatory one, and alleges that process was issued on the libel prematurely, to wit, "before the said vessel was discharged of her loading and the voyage ended," contrary to the statute, etc. This exception is based upon section six of the act of July 20, 1790, (1 Stat. 133; [Rev. St. § 4530,]) which provides that "as soon as the voyage is ended, and the cargo or ballast be fully discharged at the last port of delivery, every seaman or mariner shall be entitled to the wages which shall then be due according to his contract; and if such wages shall not be paid within ten days after such discharge, or if any dispute shall arise between the master and seamen or mariners, touching the said wages, it shall be lawful," etc.

The warrant for the arrest of the vessel was issued June 5. From the amended libel which was filed the same day, it appears that the vessel arrived at Kalama, on or about June 23, when and where the voyage for which the libellants shipped was ended, but it does not appear that the cargo was discharged.

The allegation in the exception that process was issued before the cargo was discharged, and the voyage ended, does not conflict with the one in the libel, to the effect that the voyage was ended when the vessel was moored at Kalama; and for the purpose of the exception it was admitted on the argument that the voyage terminated at that place. But it is insisted by counsel for the exception, that under the act of 1790, supra, process against the vessel cannot issue until ten days after the discharge of the cargo as well as the ending of the voyage.

In The Mary, [Case No. 9,191.] it was held that the ten days "begin to run from the time when the wages become due, that is, from the day when the term of service is completed." In Granon v. Hartshorne, [Case No. 5,689.] it was held that when the ship had reached her port of final destination, and was safely moored at the berth, that the voyage was then terminated and all sea services on board connected therewith.

After some conflict of opinion the clause in the act, "and the cargo or ballast be fully discharged," has been construed by the courts as being applicable only "to those cases in which, either by express terms of the contract or by the established custom of the port, the crew are bound to stay by and unload the ship, and are actually retained in service for that purpose." But where there is no such contract or usage, the wages become due on the day of the termination of the voyage—the seaman's discharge—and he is entitled to process against the vessel on the eleventh day thereafter—the ten days being computed from the termination of the voyage, when the wages become due without reference to the discharge of the cargo or ballast. 2 Conk. Adm. 48.

It does not appear that there was any contract in this case, to stay by the ship until the cargo was discharged, or that there is any established custom requiring the seamen to do so, and ten days having elapsed from the ending of the voyage before the issuing of process, this exception is not well taken and must be disallowed.

The third exception alleges that the facts stated in the libel are insufficient in this, "that the libellants abandoned the said vessel before her cargo was fully discharged."

The ruling upon the second exception disposes of this one. If the voyage ended with the mooring of the ship at Kalama, the libellants were then entitled to their wages and discharge, whether the cargo was unladen or not.

Besides, this exception is not well pleaded, because, while taken to the sufficiency of the libel, it also sets up a new fact, to wit: that the libellants unlawfully abandoned the ship, and relies upon that rather than the insufficiency of the libel, as a defense to the suit.

Case No. 424.

The ANNIE SOPHIA.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas. 219.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 1862.

PRIZE—ATTEMPT TO VIOLATE BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel, laden with a cargo of salt, soap, &c., was captured on the 20th of August, 1862, at sea, off Florida or South Carolina, by the United States steamer R. R. Cuyler, and was sent into this port for adjudication. She was libelled for condemnation as prize, September 5, 1862, and, on the return of the motion against the vessel and cargo, September, 23, in open court, the defaults of both were duly taken, no one appearing or intervening for them and a formal decree of default was rendered by the court against them. The ship's papers and the proofs in preparatorio in the cause were submitted to the court, and the district attorney thereupon moved for judgment of condemnation and forfeiture in favor of the libellants against the vessel and cargo.

The vessel had on board, when arrested, a British certificate of ownership, dated December 2, 1858, certifying that she was British-built, and that her owner, Saunders, was a resident of Nassau, N. P.; shipping articles for a voyage from Nassau to Baltimore and back to Nassau, signed by the crew August 10, 1862; a clearance from that port for Baltimore, dated September 16, 1862; and a letter of consignment dated Nassau, August 14, from the owners to Montell & Co., designating the cargo consigned, and the articles to be returned therefor from Baltimore to Nassau. No manifest or bill of lading accompanied the shipment. The preparatory proofs show that the representation of the destination of the vessel and of the object of the voyage was simulated and false, and that the voyage was made up and despatched for any port of the Confederate States into which the vessel could be run. The master was a native of North Carolina, as were also some of his crew. He had a few weeks previously, in violation of the blockade, run a vessel out of Wilmington, North Carolina, to Nassau. He and the owners of this vessel knew all about the war and the blockaded ports. The vessel was not intended to go to Baltimore, and did not steer for that place, but for the blockaded coast, until the capturing ship was observed, and then the schooner shaped her course towards Baltimore. When the master discovered that he was chased, he threw some papers overboard, for fear they might be of injury to the vessel; and the steward testifies that the master, besides the papers, threw overboard a Confederate flag which the schooner had with her. That was done after the schooner was brought to by the steamer, and before the small boat boarded the prize. The two mates assert that they thought the schooner was going to Baltimore, and deny all knowledge that she was to run the blockade. The captain testifies that she was to break the blockade, and the steward says that the captain told the men so after the schooner left Nassau, and before the Cuyler came in sight.

The proof is very clear and satisfactory that the voyage was set on foot and prosecuted with the purpose to run into a blockade port, and the vessel and cargo are, consequently, lawful prize.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. This vessel was libelled in the district court of the United States for this district, as forfeited to the United States; for that certain goods of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of a colony or dependency of Great Britain, were laden on board the said vessel at the island of St. Croix, on the 1st day of June, 1811, "with intent to import the same into the United States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the several acts of congress in such cases made and provided, and with the knowledge of the master or owner thereof."

To this libel a claim and answer was filed by Elkanah Atwater, who owns the ship, and denies that the said goods were put on board with an intention to import the same into the United States. To this claim, there is a general replication on the part of the United States. After a hearing on the pleadings and testimony, the district court decreed the said vessel with her tackle, &c. to be forfeited to the United States, and the claimant to pay the costs of the libellants. From this sentence the claimant has appealed to this court. On the hearing of this appeal, two questions have been made, the one a question of fact, and the other of law.

It is denied on the part of the United States, that the Ann Maria left the island of St. Croix with innocent intentions; and that if she did, still it is contended that her arrival in the waters of the United States with a prohibited cargo, subjected her to forfeiture.

This being a libel under the 6th section of what is commonly called the non-intercourse act, passed the 1st of March, 1809, [2 Stat. 529,] and revived and continued by an act passed the 28th of June of the same year, [2 Stat. 550,] it must be constantly kept in mind that the actual importation of any of the interdicted articles into the United States on board of this vessel, would not have worked her forfeiture unless they had been put on board with intention thus to import them, and with the knowledge of the master or owner. The court has carefully examined the evidence which has been given in this cause, and feels itself impelled to come to the conclusion that the cargo in question was taken on board at St. Croix, not with the intention of importing the same into the United States contrary to law, but with a design of carrying it to Cadiz; touching off New-Haven in her way thither, for the purpose of obtaining a supply of provisions, and probably of terminating the voyage in the United States if by law it could be done. All the testimony whether documentary or parol, justify this belief—the markets at Cadiz—the conduct of the owner at St. Croix—his bargain with Smith—the clearance from that Island—the bill of lading—the manifest of the cargo delivered to the officer of the revenue schooner,—all speak the same language, and indicate nothing like an intention to violate any law of the United States.

But it is supposed that the arrival of this vessel in the waters of the United States, is not only conclusive proof of an original intention to import the goods on board into this country contrary to law, but is in point of fact such an importation of them, and necessarily renders the vessel liable to forfeiture. The court will not decide, for that question is not before it, whether the cargo of the Ann Maria might not be considered as sufficiently imported into the United States, to have rendered it subject to seizure and confiscation, because were that the case, it would not necessarily draw after it a condemnation of the vessel, whose fate must depend not on the importation of the goods, but on the intention which existed at the time they were taken on board. If at that time there was an intention to commit an offence against the non-intercourse act, the vessel might have been seized if she ever came to this country, although the cargo had been thrown into the sea, or disposed of in any other way.

The only use in the present case which ought to be made of the arrival of this vessel in our waters, is as proof of an original intention to import the cargo into the United States. In that point of view it has been fairly pressed on the consideration of the court, and has not been overlooked in deciding the facts of the case. Although a strong circumstance. It is sufficiently accounted for, without imputing to the master or owner any design of violating the laws of his country. It would hardly occur to any American abroad, who might have full knowledge of the non-intercourse act, that it would be unlawful to call on his way to a foreign port, at a port of his own country, to know whether the law were still in force, or for the purpose of getting provisions. Nor can it be supposed that any one would be so foolhardy, if he did know that such conduct was illegal, as to come into the waters of the United States in the public and open manner in which this ship came. But the true question here is, not whether these goods were illegally imported into the United States, but whether they were taken on board with such illicit intention. If the question of fact has been properly disposed of, then whatever in ordinary cases might amount to an importation, if it shall satisfactorily appear that the vessel came without an intention of landing the goods contrary to law, but merely for the purpose of inquiry, and having an ulterior destination in view, it is not perceived how she has committed the offence for which she is prosecuted. Her merely passing through our waters, if it be manifest that no design was harboured of landing her cargo, is an innocent act, and not prohibited by any law. It was the importation into the United States, and the consumption there of English goods, which it was the policy of the law to guard against; and therefore any vessel might take on board such goods, provided at the time no such intention existed; especially if her subsequent conduct did not show that every thing which had been done abroad was merely colourable. If then her conduct while in our waters consisted with the intention declared by her papers, and such is the opinion of the court, what right has the court to say that the ultimate destination of the voyage was not Cadiz? Or how can it be said that she came into the waters of the United States with an intent to import these goods, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of congress, when by the evidence it appears that no such intention existed, but that her coming here was altogether for other purposes, and among others for the purpose of leaving our waters immediately, if the act were still in force, and proceeding to a foreign port? The original intention then, which is fully established, as it is supposed to be here, must control what might otherwise be the conclusion of law on such an arrival. If that were innocent, no forfeiture attaches to the vessel.

Under these views of the subject, this court is of opinion that the district court erred in condemning the property. Its sentence must therefore be reversed, and a decree entered that the ship Ann Maria, her tackle, &c. be restored to the claimant.

WHARFAGE—DOUBLE RATES—JURISDICTION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LIEN.

1. The act of the state of New York, passed May 6, 1870, in relation to wharfage, fixed certain rates of wharfage, with the proviso that "all canal-boats navigating the canals of this state, and vessels known as North river barges, shall pay the same rates as heretofore." It further provided that if any vessel should leave a wharf, &c., without paying the wharfage due, after a demand of it, she should pay double rates: Held, that a canal-boat, which had been navigating the Erie canal, but was employed in making voyages about the harbor of New York and to Jersey City, was not within the exception as "navigating the canals of this state."

[Cited in Broeck v. The John M. Welch, 2 Fed. 369.]

2. That the act was not contrary to the constitution of the United States, as laying a tax upon tonnage, nor as being repugnant to the power of congress to regulate commerce, in the absence of any law of the United States upon the subject, nor as discriminating in favor of canal-boats owned by citizens of the state.

[Cited in The John M. Welch, Case No. 7,359; Broeck v. The John M. Welch, 2 Fed. 379.]

3. That the admiralty has jurisdiction of a claim for double wharfage under that statute.

[Cited in Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 76.]

4. That there is a lien on the vessel for such double wharfage.

Wilcox & Hobbs, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought by Henry D. Brookman and others, to recover double wharfage, which presents various questions as to the effect of the laws of the state of New York, upon the subject of wharfage, and in respect to the jurisdiction of the admiralty to enforce a demand like that of the libellant.

The general question as to the jurisdiction of the admiralty over demands for wharfage, I have heretofore examined at length in the case of The Kate Tremaine, [Case No. 7,622.] The opinion in favor of the admiralty jurisdiction expressed in that case, has since received strong support from the action of the court of appeals of this state, in the case of Brookman v. Hamill, 43 N. Y. 555, and I feel it to be unnecessary to say more upon the general subject. Some other questions are, however, raised by this case which have not as yet been considered.

The libellant has computed his wharfage at two cents per ton, according to the rate prescribed by the statute of the state of New York, passed May 6th, 1870. He bases his demand upon that act, and seeks a decree in this court for the double wharfage provided for in the last clause of section 1 of the state statute referred to.

To this demand it is objected, first, that if the state of New York can, by law, fix the rates of wharfage payable for the use of wharves in New York and Brooklyn, the vessel in question is not liable to pay at the rate fixed by the act of 1870, because she is an Erie canal-boat.

The state of New York has, by various statutes, from time to time regulated the rates of wharfage chargeable for the use of wharves in New York and Brooklyn, and by the act of 1870 again fixed those rates. This act, however, contains the following exceptive clause: "That all canal-boats navigating the canals of this state, and vessels known as North river barges, shall pay the same rates as heretofore."

The claimant insists that his vessel is within the above exception. But the evidence fails to sustain this position. It is true that the vessel proceeded against is a canal-boat fit to navigate the canals of this state, and that she has been at times engaged in that navigation; but it is conceded that at the time she used the libellants' wharf she was not engaged in that navigation, but was employed in making voyages about the harbor of New York, and to New Jersey. The exception in favor of canal-boats navigating the canals of this state, contained in the act of 1870, was to favor the canal navigation of the state, by keeping down, in the matter of wharfage, the expenses of voyages upon those canals. The exception is therefore limited, in terms, to canal-boats engaged in the employment of navigating the canals of this state.

The vessel here proceeded against, was not so employed, and, consequently, is not entitled to the benefit of the exception.

It is next contended that the statute of the state relied on is unconstitutional because in effect it is a tax upon tonnage. But charges for wharfage are not duties. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 314. They are, in the state of New York, port charges paid in consideration of the use of private property. Charges of this character are regulated by law upon considerations of public policy. The welfare of the community requires the prevention, by law, of extortionate charges for a service which, while it is a necessity for the ships, can be obtained only of the few persons who may be owners of the wharves. But the circumstance that the rate is regulated by law, does not change the character of the charge, nor bring it within the denomination of a tax upon tonnage.

Again, it is contended that the statute in question is repugnant to the clause of the constitution which declares that congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states.

It may be that a statute regulating the rates of wharfage, owing to the intimate and necessary connection of the subject-matter with navigation, is a regulation of commerce, but the character of the subject does not appear to be such as to require it to be considered to be within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the national government. On the contrary, owing to the differing necessities of the various ports, the varying extent of the demand for wharves, according to locality, and the absence of any uniform rate of cost or value of such property, it seems manifest that legislation of this character stands upon the same footing with the pilot laws; and state laws of that character, when not in conflict with any law of the United States, are upheld by reason of the character of the subject. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 314, approved in Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 35; Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 152.

In the absence, then, of any law of the United States upon the subject of wharfage, the statutes of the state regulating the rate of wharfage must be held to be not invalid as regulations of commerce.

It is further contended that the statute in question provides an unjust discrimination in favor of canal-boats owned by the citizens of the state, and for that reason is repugnant to the constitution of the United States. The act does make a discrimination in favor of the canal navigation of the state, but it makes none in favor of the citizens of the state. The discrimination is between the employment of the boats, not between the persons owning or navigating the boats. All persons, without regard to citizenship, are placed upon the same footing, and it cannot be said that the statute, either in its language, or its results, creates a discrimination in favor of the citizens of the state of New York.

The remaining question to be considered arises out of the last clause of the 1st section of the statute under consideration, which provides, "That any vessel that shall leave a pier, wharf, bulkhead, slip or basin, without first paying the wharfage or dockage due thereon, after being demanded of the owner, consignee or person in charge of the vessel, shall be liable to pay double the rates established by this act."

In the present case the libellant has proved a demand of single wharfage and a departure from the wharf without payment. He thereupon claims to recover the double wharfage prescribed by the statute. To this demand it is objected that although wharfage be a maritime demand cognizable in the admiralty, the charge imposed by the statute in case of a departure without payment of wharfage, is simply a penalty imposed by a state law, and not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States. But I cannot so consider it. The real effect of the statute is simply to charge vessels using the wharves of New York and Brooklyn with a liability for wharfage at certain fixed rates. If the wharfage be paid at one time it is to be calculated at one rate, if paid at another time at another rate. Whenever paid it is wharfage to be collected by the wharfinger for the use of his wharf. The object of fixing the two rates is to make it greatly for the interest of the vessel to pay her wharfage before she leaves, so that the wharfinger may seldom be driven to his action—a resort which will prove futile in many cases because of the departure of the vessel, and in all cases be barren of results, because of the smallness of this class of demands. But when driven to his suit, the demand is still wharfage, and recoverable as such in the admiralty.

In Brookman v. Hamill, [supra,] a demand of double wharfage was adjudicated by the court of appeals as wharfage, and so stated to be. Page 563.

But if the double wharfage prescribed by the statute were wharfage only in name, and in substance a statutory charge imposed by law upon the vessel in a certain event, for the benefit of the wharfinger, it would still be recoverable in the admiralty, for the jurisdiction of the admiralty to enforce a demand does not depend upon the origin of the demand but upon its nature—its maritime character derived from its relation to navigation.

The extra charge allowed by the statute arises out of the use of a wharf by a vessel in navigation—its amount depends upon the extent of that use, and the object of the charge is to insure payment for that use, and thus to facilitate navigation by encouraging the construction of wharves. It is, moreover, dependent upon the right to single wharfage. These features characterize the charge as maritime in character, and if maritime in character, a court of admiralty is bound to take cognizance of it. No valid objection to the jurisdiction of admiralty arises out of the mere fact that the right claimed is given by a state law, as has been expressly decided by the supreme court.

In the Case of McNiel, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 243, it was adjudged that the state law may give a substantial right of such a character as to place it within the jurisdiction of the admiralty.

The character of the demand in question appears clearly to be such as to require this court to take cognizance of it. As to the question of lien, the demand having been found to be in substance a demand for wharfage, the right to a lien follows of course. According to well settled principles and the rules of maritime law there is no necessity, therefore, to consider the effect of that feature of the state law which makes the double wharfage due from the vessel herself—that is to say, a lien upon the vessel. There must be a decree for the libellant.

Wm. Marvin, for libellants.

A. Gordon, for claimant.

WEBB, District Judge. From the testimony in this case, I am satisfied that important services were rendered in saving a portion of the cargo and materials of the ship Dorothea Foster, after she was wrecked, that their services were the sole means by which this property was saved from destruction, and that they were rendered under circumstances of much difficulty and some danger to the salvors. I therefore consider it a case of much merit on the part of most of the actors, and one in which they are entitled to a liberal reward as salvage. In relation to a few of them, however, I regret that the same favorable opinion cannot be entertained. The conduct of the libellant Bethel, of the schooner Amelia, and of the libellant Mott, of the schooner Single Sailor, was such, during a part of the transaction at least, as should deprive them of all compensation for their services in reference to this property. Independent of the allegation that they have not accounted for all the property taken by them from the ship, (and which they have not satisfactorily explained, it appears that they and the crews of their vessels refused, at an important moment in saving the cargo, to perform such labor as was deemed essential to its preservation, and pursued a course which was an embarrassment to those who were really engaged in rendering their services in good faith. These libellants, therefore, and the persons connected with them in their respective vessels, are adjudged to have forfeited all right to salvage in this case.

There are also other individuals who acted so badly as to affect their rights. Wm. Pratt, a seaman on board the sloop Brillant, by getting intoxicated and refusing to labor during a great part of the time that others were employed, and by interfering with and impeding their labors, has forfeited all right to compensation. And Silas Park and Thomas Roberts, also seamen of the Brillant, by getting intoxicated and declining to work a part of the time, have forfeited one half of the compensation to which they would otherwise have been entitled had they acted throughout with fidelity. The court regrets the necessity which impels it to inflict their forfeitures; but if those who make it a profession to save the property of others, when involved in peril, do not act with fidelity, they do an injury instead of conferring a benefit and are entitled to reprehension rather than reward.

There are two other individuals the investigation of whose conduct has produced still greater regret on the part of the court.—Those individuals are Captain Johnson of the schooner Hester Ann and Seaman Johnson of the sloop Thistle. They rendered their services faithfully it is true, so far as this court is informed, but have forfeited all right to compensation for their services by subsequently appropriating to their own use some of the property which they had been instrumental in saving. It is admitted, the value of the property thus appropriated was very small, consisting only of a few pounds of damaged sugar, and hence the court cherishes the hope that the act resulted rather from a want of reflection as to its consequences, than from wicked or depraved motives; still such acts cannot be tolerated or excused, however free the parties may feel themselves from intentional guilt; and the salvor who comes into court, with his hands thus stained, will invariably find his claims to compensation disregarded. On the part of Captain Johnson, the act is viewed in a much worse light than on the part of the seamen; because from his station as commander of the vessel better things were to be expected, and it is to his conduct that his men will be disposed to look as a guide for their own.

It appears also from the testimony that Capt. Brown of the schooner Caroline received on board his vessel a few articles, (of little value it is true,) which were not brought to this port, and reported the residue of the cargo. These articles he has since voluntarily produced and partially explained his previous neglect, and therefore has avoided a forfeiture of his claims; but the court must take this opportunity to remark that it is imperatively the duty of salvors when they have secured from a wrecked vessel, any property, however small its value, to account for that property without unnecessary delay. In this case, Capt. Brown might have produced the articles secured by him at an earlier period, and their small value affords no sufficient reason for his not having done so, as he could have forwarded them to Key West by the other vessels bound to this port with other portions of the cargo, and with which he was consorted, even tho' they were of too little value to justify his bringing them in his own vessel. His voluntarily accounting for them subsequently however, and his general good conduct throughout the whole transaction in saving the property taken from the ship, is sufficient to satisfy the court that this act proceeded from thoughtlessness rather than design, and therefore, in this case, his rights will not be affected.

The net value of the property saved from this wreck after the payment of duties is estimated by a sale of a part and an appraisalment of the residue to be $9,208.47. Salvage on that sum, say one moiety, which is the proportion deemed to be just under the circumstances, is $4,604.23½c. This sum, agreeably to articles of consortship entered into between the libellants, would be divided between nine vessels, to wit, the schooners Brillant, Caroline, Fair American, Hester Ann, Splendid, Citizen, Amelia, and Single Sailor, and the sloop Thistle, and their respective officers and crews, and under that division the proportion to which the schooners Amelia and Single Sailor, and their officers and crews, would have been entitled, is $966.97c., and the share of Pratt and half shares of Park and Roberts of the Brillant are $45.23, making the aggregate sum of $1,012.20c., which is forfeited for bad conduct, but as the cause of forfeiture has mainly been for a neglect of duty and in consequence of which the labors and difficulties of the other actors were increased, it is considered just that the sum of $1,012.20c. should be divided between them and the owners of the property, which being done will produce the sum of $4,098 and 12 cents, to be divided between the remaining seven vessels and their officers and crews, except as regards the shares of the two Johnsons, which are forfeited for an improper appropriation of the property to their own use, and will be paid to the owners of the ship and cargo. The clerk is therefore directed to make out a decree in conformity to this opinion, taking the following statement as his data:

Net amount of sugar, coffee and materials of the ship (duties and expenses of sale paid) is.....	$4,519 39
Net value of rum according to appraisement, after deducting duties..	4,689 08

Whole value of cargo and materials	$9,208 47
--	------------

Salvage on $9,208.47 at 50 per ct. is..	$4,604 23½
--	-------------

And if divided agreeably to articles of consortship between nine vessels and their respective crews, would give to schooner Amelia and crew $509.62, to Single Sailor and crew $457.35, to seaman Pratt $22.61½, and to seamen Park and Roberts each an equal sum, half of which is $22.61½. These sums, amounting in the aggregate to $1,012.20, are to be divided between the other salvors and the owners of the property, one half of which ($506.10) added to $3,592.01½, the salvage of the seven vessels not forfeited, is $4,098.11½, which is to be divided between the seven vessels as follows: To those representing the sloop Brilliant the sum of $668.55, to be divided between the owners of the vessel and the officers and crew except Wm. Pratt, who is to receive nothing, and Silas Park and Thomas Roberts, who are to receive only half shares each. To those representing the schooner Caroline $527 and 6c., to be divided between owners of vessel, officers and crew. To those representing the sloop Thistle, $566.52, less $23.60c. Seaman Johnson's share is forfeited; the residue to be divided between owners of vessel, officers and crew except Johnson. To those representing schooner Fair American $462.50c., to be divided between owners of vessel, officers and crew. To the owners of the schooner Hester Ann, officers and crew, (except Capt. Johnson, whose shares are forfeited,) $605.02c., less $90.75, said Johnson's part. To those representing the sloop Citizen $527.06, to be divided between owners of vessel, officers and crew. To those representing the schooner Splendid $723.41c., to be divided between owners of vessel, officers and crew. The residue of the cargo and materials of said ship, and the proceeds arising from the sales, say $4,604.22, being one moiety thereof, to which is to be added one half of the amount of salvage of Amelia, Single Sailor, and the shares of their officers and crews, and the share of Pratt and the half shares of Park and Roberts, which are forfeited, and also the entire shares of Capt. Johnson of the Hester Ann and Seaman Johnson of the Thistle, which are also forfeited, amounting in the whole to the sum of $620.45, making the aggregate sum of $5,224.67, will, after deducting so much as may be necessary to pay the costs and expenses of this suit, be delivered over to the respondent Tilly, the master of said ship, for and on account of all concerned and interested therein.

Adam Gordon, for libellants.

William R. Hackley, for respondent.

WEBB, District Judge. From the testimony adduced in this case, it appears most clearly that the property libeled has been rescued from inevitable destruction by the exertions of the libellant and those associated with him. The brig, after being relieved, was found to have sustained very great injuries by thumping upon the rocks, and to be leaking so badly as to make five feet of water an hour. Several of her timbers were broken, her false keel principally knocked off, her main keel split, some of her planks started, her rudder much injured and one of the pintles broken, and in the opinion of her mate, who has been sworn as a witness, she could not have remained six hours longer on the reef, without going to pieces. The mate also states, that her own crew could not have relieved her. And as her cargo was composed of quick lime, it will readily be perceived that all must have been lost, had she bilged while it remained in her hold. The cargo, by a sale of it, since brought into port, has been found to be of little value. The proceeds of that sale are small, and the brig, in her present condition cannot be worth much; the compensation, therefore, to those who have rendered this assistance, must necessarily be small when divided between two vessels and about twenty men; but there are no pecular circumstances attached to this case which would seem to require that it should be taken out of the ordinary rule; and as one moiety of the property saved under such circumstances, has been in this and other courts, the usual allowance for salvage, that proportion will be decreed in this case. It has been represented to the court that the seamen of the brig have been faithful in the discharge of their respective duties since she has been involved in this difficulty, and that they have performed much extraordinary labor in pumping the vessel to keep her free; and in other ways; and some compensation is asked for them, for that additional labor. I think it right that such compensation should be allowed, not only as a remuneration for their extra services, but as an inducement which may lead others to perform their duties faithfully, and to use every possible exertion to relieve property similarly exposed to danger and loss. Fifteen dollars to the mate, and ten dollars to each ordinary seaman, will be allowed for their extra services in this case. Whereupon it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the brig Sea Flower, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and boats, be condemned, and that after giving five days' notice of the time and place of sale, the marshal proceed to sell the same at public auction for cash, and that he pay the proceeds of said sale into the registry of this court. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the clerk of said court, after receiving the proceeds of said sale, pay one moiety thereof, and also one moiety of the money now in said registry arising from the sale of the cargo of said brig, to the libellant for and on behalf of all concerned, and interested as salvors in said case, and that he also pay fifteen dollars to the mate, and ten dollars to each ordinary seaman of said brig as a compensation for the extra labor performed by them, and that the residue of said monies, after paying the costs and expenses of this suit, be restored to Nathaniel Hartford, master of said brig, for and on account of all concerned and interested therein.

In this case, which was a question of the taxation of costs, SHIPMAN, District Judge, with the concurrence of Mr. Justice NELSON, held, that traveling fees to a witness were allowable only to the extent a subpoena would run; that is, for any distance within the district, but for not exceeding 100 miles from the place of trial, unless the distance was wholly within the district.

COSTS, FEES, AND COMPENSATION IN PRIZE CASES.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. Bills of costs are laid before me for taxation in behalf of the district attorney, the marshal, the prize commissioners, and the counsel for captors, made up in prize suits which have been adjudicated in the court. The following principles of allowance will be applied in the taxation of costs in prize cases:

1. No specific tariff of fees having been appointed to the suits by statute, the costs fixed by statute for similar services in admiralty will be allowed in this court, except as otherwise directed by acts posterior to the fee-bill of February 26, 1833.

2. The compensation directed to be made by the act of March 25, 1862, to the officers therein named, will be computed and adjusted, as nearly as may be, conformably to allowances by the laws of the United States to employes for like services under the government, or in accordance with established rules and usages of the courts in regard to their officers rendering like services. In cases of doubt or difficulty, evidence may be taken on the question of quantum meruit.

3. The gross costs taxed to any of the officers of court for services in prize cases will be, in collection or payment, subject to all limitations, as to amounts or periods of payment, under the acts of congress in force at the time of such taxation.

4. The method of ascertaining the compensation of any of the officers of court for their services in prize suits, by a percentage on the value of the property coming officially into their possession or under their charge, will not be adopted by the court without express authority of law, or the assent thereto, in writing, by the parties whose interests are to be affected thereby.

INTEREST—LIABILITY OF BAIL FOR.

In a scire facias against bail, interest is not allowed on the judgment rendered against the principal.

At law.

PER CURIAM. This is a scire facias against bail, and the plaintiff's counsel urges that he is entitled, against the bail, to interest upon the judgment against the principal. We are of opinion he is not so entitled; for the judgment upon the scire facias is that the plaintiff have execution against the bail of the judgment against the principal. The very same execution therefore issues against the bail as issues against the principal; and consequently damages arising after the judgment cannot be included. Cases cited, [Fanchaw v. AFFIDAVIT FOR CONTINUANCE — ADMISSIBILITY OF COUNTER-AFFIDAVITS.

After an affidavit in support of a motion for the continuance of a cause, on the ground of the absence of a material witness has been made, the opposite party may make a counter-affidavit stating any circumstances that render it impossible or improbable that the evidence of the witness can be obtained within a reasonable time; but such counter-affidavit must not deny the materiality of the evidence.

On motion for the continuance of this cause, the party made an affidavit stating the absence of Joseph Howland, Jr., a material witness, and that he hoped to procure the testimony of the witness at the next court. A counter-affidavit was filed, stating that Joseph Howland, Jr., was gone to foreign parts; that he expected to have no fixed residence, and that he did not expect to return within two or three years.

THE COURT would not continue the cause, and took the opportunity to observe that there was manifest utility in counter-affidavits, as was evident from the present instance. They said, however, that counter-affidavits should not deny the materiality of the evidence expected from the witness, but might state any circumstances that rendered it impossible or improbable that his testimony could be procured within a reasonable time.

EDWARDS, District Judge, said that the English practice was lame in this respect; that it threw great power into the hands of a party, and that this court was perfectly free to establish a better practice. He added that the whole English practice of admitting affidavits was modern.

BANKRUPTCY — FEES OF MARSHAL AS MESSENGER.

[1. The fees to be allowed to a marshal as messenger are those specifically enumerated by law, and such other fees as he shows himself to have earned, the items of which are determinable by analogy to the fees allowed the marshal for similar services.]

[2. Where a marshal sends a process by mail to his deputy in a distant county, he is entitled to be paid mileage on such process; but, where he sends a deputy from the court house to a distant county for service, he is entitled to the reasonable expenses of the deputy, but not to mileage.]

[3. A messenger cannot charge commission on his own cost bill.]

In bankruptcy.

Report of BALL, Register. This matter comes before the court on appeal from the decision of the register at Columbus, to whom this cause was referred, whereby he sustains the exceptions taken by the assignee to the bill of costs of the messenger. The messenger now seeks redress from the court, and the court by its special order, dated October 20, 1871, has referred the matter to me to examine the law and the evidence and report thereon; and having examined all the evidence submitted by each party, and the arguments of counsel for the assignee and of the messenger in person, I have now the honor to make my report.

The charges made by the marshal and accepted to, are as follows:

1st. July 28, 1870. Serving the original order in Mercer Co. with copies of the petition, and mileage.....	$ 37 75
2nd. July 28. Serving warrant at same time and expenses of deputy.....	78 90
3d. March 17. Serving copies of order and mileage	21 50
4th. March 18. Copy of warrant, mileage, and cost of advertising.....	12 60
5th. March 18. Notice to creditors by mail, service, postage and mileage..	12 90
6th. Apr. 21. Serving order in Mercer Co., copy and mileage.....	21 50
7th. Apr. 21. Copies of inventories, $5.76, commission for distributions, $5.56	11 32
8th. Apr. 8. Postage and materials..	1 30
9th. 1870. Two keepers' fees from February 2nd to May 2nd, 90 days, at $2.50 per day each.....	450 00
Expenses and keeping horses, not ascertained, in addition to these items, he claims in his reply to the assignee, "for care, trouble and responsibility incurred in this case," for 9 months, an allowance of.....	100 00

No affidavit showing the items of his disbursements, that the same were actually paid and were necessary and reasonable, is annexed by the marshal to his fee bill, but for the purposes of this examination, I will assume that the same has been filed. No evidence or statement has been furnished as to the nature of the services involving "care, trouble and responsibility," rendered by the marshal beyond the services necessarily attendant on the service of process, for which he claims an allowance of $100 beyond taxable costs, and therefore I am unable to express any opinion upon it.

In testing the amount of the costs taxable to the marshal as messenger, the court will be governed by the 47th section of the bankrupt act and by rule 12 of the supreme court, but it was evident that it was not the intention of congress to limit the fees of the marshal for all services which he may probably render to the four items enumerated in that section, because the section further provides "that for cause shown, and upon hearing thereon, such further allowance may be made as the court in its discretion may determine." In view of the statute and of the rule, and of the authorities cited, it seems to me clear, that rules to be observed in taxing costs to the messenger, are: First. To allow him such fees as are specifically enumerated by law, and secondly, such other fees not included in the enumerated fees as he may show himself to have earned; the items of which are to be determined by analogy to those allowed for similar services rendered by the marshal in this court, in cases at common law and in chancery. I think if he sends process by mail to his deputy in a distant county for service, he is entitled to mileage on that process, and if he sends a deputy from the court house to such distant county for service, he is entitled to be paid the reasonable expenses of such deputy, but in that event he is not entitled to mileage. Believing this to be a correct view of the law, and substantially the same as it has been administered by this court in this district, I now proceed to retax the cost bill under consideration, with this remark, that although the administration of the bankrupt law and its operation on bankrupts' effects are uniform in all the judicial districts of the United States, the duties imposed upon the officers acting under the law, and the taxation of their costs, are not. Neither section 47 nor rule 12 specifies all the services which the marshal as messenger may be called upon to perform, and, therefore, no tariff of fees covering all the acts which the messenger may be called upon to perform, has been prescribed, either by congress or the supreme court, but the taxation of such fees is left to the discretion of the court.

Cost bill as retaxed:-

Jan. 28. 1870. To serving five debts and parties in Mercer Co. with order	$ 10 00
Jan. 28. Three copies petition on debts. $6.00, copies. $2.25.....	8 25
Jan. 28. Warrant of seizure, $2.00; 1 copy, $1.50.....	3 50
Jan. 28. To expenses deputy sent to Mercer Co., $29.30, telegrams.....	31 90
Jan. 28. Wages, deputy in possession, 9 days after seizure, at $2.00..	18 00
Mch. 18. Serving order adjudication on two parties, $4; copy, 50c; mileage, $17.....	21 50
Mch. 18. Preparing notice publication, 40c; paid printers, $9.60.....	10 00
Mch. 18. Preparing notice 1st meeting, $7.60; services, $3.00; postage, $1.00.....	11 60
Apr. 21. Serving order on two keepers to deliver, $4; copy, 50c.....	4 50
Apr. 21. Copies of inventories.....	5 76
May 2. 90 days' keeper's fees, at $2.00 each per day.....	360 00
Total	$485 01

The messenger is also entitled to be refunded the sum paid for keeping horses, when ascertained.

There is no rule of law or practice, authorizing the messenger to charge a commission upon his own cost bill. There is no analogy between such a claim and a claim for two per cent. against the government allowed him by law, upon his disbursements for the expenses of the courts in the payment of jurors, witnesses and others, out of the funds placed in his hands for such purposes. The charge of $1.30 for postage and material is, I think, covered by the amounts which I have above allowed. If it should appear that the deputy who was sent to Mercer county, acted as one of the keepers of the property seized, then, inasmuch as such fees are already included in the item of $360, the item of $18 above allowed him for nine days should be stricken out, which would reduce my finding to $467.01. I have been obliged to consider this matter without having all the papers in the cause before me, and was, therefore, obliged to grope somewhat in the dark, and may, therefore, have made mistakes. It seems to be conceded on the part of the assignee, that the marshal performed his duty promptly and faithfully, and to the entire satisfaction of the petitioning creditors, and, therefore, if I have leaned at all it has been on the side of the marshal. His bill of costs, however, is too vague to serve as a precedent hereafter. He should have stated the kinds of processes served and also the number of notices sent by him, and also, what expenses were paid and to whom, so that the court could judge whether they were correct and necessary but it is a matter of long standing, and lapse of time increases the difficulties attendant upon the ascertainment of the exact amounts due him, with judicial certainty.

Respectfully submitted.

BANKRUPTCY—WHEN CREDITORS HAVING ADVERSE INTEREST MAY DEFEND.

A creditor or other person having an adverse interest to be affected by an adjudication in bankruptcy, may be admitted to defend. Practice when debtor denies that the requisite number and amount of creditors have joined. To charge suspension of commercial paper is not enough. It should be described or identified.

HAMMOND, J. The long disputed question, whether a creditor or other party having an adverse interest to be affected by an adjudication in bankruptcy, may be admitted to defend against the involuntary petition, has been settled in favor of that right. Bump. [Bankr.] (10th Ed.) 51, cites the cases. [In re Boston, Case No. 1,677; Id. 1,678; In re Heusted, Id. 6,440; In re Bush, Id. 2,222; Dutton v. Freeman, Id. 4,210; *Clin-ton v. The act, (section 5,021, [18 Stat. 181,]) provides that if the debtor denies that the requisite number and amount of creditors have joined, he shall file a list of his creditors, with their place of residence and sums due them; but it makes no provision for such a list where the debtor admits that fact. Indeed, it says, that if satisfied that the admission is made in good faith, the court shall so adjudge, and its determination shall be final, and the matter shall proceed without further steps on that subject. One of the creditors, who holds an attachment lien, which will be avoided by an adjudication, files a petition, asks to be permitted to defend, and, among other things, denies that the requisite number and amount of creditors have joined, and moves that the debtors be required to file a list of their creditors. I think the case stands as if the debtor himself had denied this fact, and that the alleged bankrupts may be required to file the list of creditors, and it is so ordered.

I am asked by the petitioning creditors to instruct the register whether or not both individual and partnership creditors are to be enumerated, or only partnership creditors; to exclude all secured creditors, except for supplies; to exclude all creditors who have had a preference or levied attachments, which will be avoided. I cannot adjudicate on these questions till they arise by presentation of the facts; and they are not now raised by the record. The case may be referred to the register to take proof and report whether or not the requisite number and amount of creditors have joined in this petition. He will report the facts and the proof he takes, along with his report. These questions, as they are raised before him, may be certified, or reserved and made by exceptions after his report comes in. The case is not before him as if an adjudication had been made, and perhaps the certification in the ordinary way would not be proper practice, but it can be done by agreement; or the parties can put all the facts in the proof, and bring the questions up by exceptions to his report. The single act of bankruptcy charged, is—suspension of commercial paper. It is well charged, except that the paper is not described as identified, as it should have been. Rump. [Bankr.] (10th Ed.) 35, 423, cites the cases. [In re Randall, Case No. 11,551; In re Hadley, Id. 5,894.]

JURY—IMPANELING—SPECIAL JURY—TALESMAN.

The court has power to order a tales in special jury causes.

[Cited in Hall v. Perott, Case No. 5,942.]

In a cause marked for trial by special jury, nine jurors only appeared; and the question arose, whether the court (who wished to consider it with a view to establish a precedent) could award a tales, on the application of the plaintiff.

Levy and Ingersoll suggested, that the supreme court of Pennsylvania had so construed the 12th section of the act of assembly (2 Dall. Ed. p. 265) as to exercise the power of ordering a tales in the case of special, as well as of common, juries, whenever the plaintiff required it, and also whenever the defendant required it, if he had a rule for trial by proviso. The same power is exercised in England on general principles. Sell. Pr. 476.

Lewis observed, that the supreme court held, that the Pennsylvania act, and not the English practice, must regulate the proceedings with respect to juries; and the case of a tales in trials by special jury, though admissible at common law, might not have been adopted by the legislature, on account of the inconveniences, which the practice tended to introduce. But whatever may have been the previous law, the legislative rule must be pursued; and expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Rawle conceived, that the 12th section of the judicial act, (1 Swift's Ed. p. 67, [see section 29, 1 Stat. 88,]) settled the question. In the first part of the section, the provision for empannelling juries in general, obviously including both special and common juries; and, as there is the same generality of expression in the latter part of the section, when provision is made for returning a tales, it ought also, by a parity of construction, to be extended to both cases.

PETERS, District Judge. I have no doubt of the power of the court to order a tales in special jury causes. It might have been done, I think, under the act of assembly; but unquestionably it may be done under the act of congress. There ought, however, to be such a discretion in using it, as to prevent any injury to either party; and, therefore, a trial should not be forced on, without a reasonable delay to bring in the jurors that had been regularly selected.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. The act of congress seems to remove every difficulty. It makes no distinction (and the court can, therefore, make none) between the case of a special and of a common jury. If this provision had not existed, the subject would have occasioned much doubt in my mind.

ADMIRALTY—PRACTICE—AMENDMENTS ON APPEAL.

1. The circuit court has authority to allow amendments in revenue causes or proceedings in rem, brought by appeal from the district court.

In admiralty.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question as to the right of this court to grant amendments, in cases of libels, or informations, in rem, for violations of municipal laws, brought by appeal from the district court to this court, has been argued several times, as a question of general importance, and the court will now deliver its opinion.

By the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, § 32, [1 Stat. 91,] it is enacted, that all the courts of the United States, may, at any time, permit either of the parties "to amend any defect in the process or pleadings, upon such conditions, as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion, and by their rules, prescribe." The language of this section is sufficiently comprehensive to sustain the application for amendments in any cases before the court; but it has been attempted to be restricted to causes of original, and not to be extended to causes of appellate jurisdiction. But we find no such distinction in the statute: and even in appellate courts, proceeding according to the course of the common law, defects apparent upon the record may be amended, when they come within the general purview of statutes. Indeed, in Rex v. Ponsonby, 1 Wils. 303, the rule is laid down rather more broadly: "that the superior court, where error is brought, may make such amendments, as the court below may; but that can only be done, when the superior court has the same matter to amend by, as the inferior has." See, also, Pease v. Morgan, 7 Johns. 468. There is then, in the nature of an appellate jurisdiction, nothing which forbids the granting of amendments.

2. It is said in the next place, that these proceedings in rem are of a criminal nature, and therefore not amendable. If they are of a criminal nature, the argument is by no means satisfactory; because, at common law, criminal proceedings are amendable in matters of form at all times, and in matter of substance also, while they are in paper. Queen v. Tuchin, 1 Salk. 51, 2 Ld. Raym. 1068; King v. Hill Darley, 4 East, 175. For as to amendments, at common law, there is no difference between civil and criminal proceedings. The statutes of jeofails were not originally extended to the latter; but this was grounded upon the peculiar wording in some of these statutes, and in others upon express exceptions. Amendments of informations, in personam, are now considered so much as a matter of course, that they are even made on application to the judges at chambers. Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burrows, 2527; Rex v. Holland, 4 Term R. 457; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, Indictment, § 97, p. 347. Yet, in these causes, the amendments are generally, if not universally, founded on the common law authority of the courts. But it is not true, that informations in rem are criminal proceedings. On the contrary, it has been solemnly adjudged that they are civil proceedings. Ketland v. The Cassius, Case No. 7,743; U. S. v. La Vengeance, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 297; U. S. v. The Sally, 2 Cranch,

[6 U. S.] 406; U. S. v. The Betsey and Charlotte, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 443. See, also, The Fabius, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 245.

As to the practice of amendments in proceedings in rem, we find a great variety of authorities. Baldwin v. —, Bunb. 49; Lock v. Williford, Id. 72; Kennet v. Lloyd, Id. 58; Edgell v. Decker, Id. 252; Brooke v. Day, Id. 334. And in Attorney General v. Henderson, 3 Anstr. 714, the court, upon inquiry, held, that the practice in revenue informations was, that the attorney general might, at any time, amend as of course. Now it will be found, that excepting under the statute 16 & 17 Car. II. c. 8, § 2, (which extends the benefit of that statute to all informations concerning customs and subsidies of tonnage and poundage, and purely applies to the curing of defects after verdict) these amendments are granted solely upon the footing of the common law. This objection, therefore, cannot prevail.

3. It is said, in the next place, that these causes are in the nature of proceedings, in rem, in the exchequer, and ought not to be varied by amendments, after they have become records of the court below, and can no longer be considered as proceedings in paper. Admitting that these proceedings are in the nature of exchequer informations, it may well be doubted, if the inference assumed be incontrovertible. By the appeal, the judgment and decree of the court below are suspended. [Penhallow v. Doane,] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 88, 118; Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 281. The whole cause is to be heard anew, both as to law and fact; and in these particulars is, it seems, a cause de novo in this court. One ground of allowing amendments in any court, is, that the parties are often surprised by new evidence, at the trial, which they could not have foreseen, and therefore, they are allowed to amend in furtherance of public justice. Now this principle applies as forcibly to this court, in the exercise of its appellate, as its original jurisdiction; for the new facts may entirely vary the former case: and if, upon the appeal, no amendment could be made, it would afford temptation to suppress all defence in the court below, and thereby to obtain an unjust advantage in this court, by surprise. But whatever may have been the rules prescribed as to process or forms of pleading, it is very clear, and has been too firmly settled to be shaken, that these proceedings are of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, (U. S. v. La Vengeance, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 297; U. S. v. The Sally, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 406; U. S. v. The Betsey and Charlotte, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 443;) and the principle of these decisions seems confirmed in the admiralty in England (The Fabius, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 245.) If then these are admiralty and maritime causes, the appeal must let in all the general principles, which govern such causes. Now, no principle is more exactly settled, than that upon an appeal in an admiralty cause, it is allowable, under certain restrictions, to allege what has not been before alleged, and to prove what has not been before proved. Clerke's Prax. tit. 54; 1 Brown, Civil & Adm. Law, 500; 2 Brown, Civil & Adm. Law, 436; Cod. lib. 7, tit. 63, §§ 1, 4; Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 281. And this right to allow new allegations, seems the natural result, from the introduction of new evidence on the appeal. The same practice is familiar in our state courts on appeals; and though it derives countenance from our statutes, yet I apprehend that the true ground why the practice has obtained is, that on the appeal the proceedings are considered as de novo in the appellate jurisdiction.

On the whole, we are well satisfied of our right to grant the amendments, which seem necessary, in the various causes before us, on appeal. But it is an exercise of sound discretion, in which the court will take care, that no unfair advantage shall be taken by one party, and no oppression practised by the other. Considering the nature of informations in rem, the countenance which has heretofore been allowed to amendments in the appellate courts, and the mischiefs which would arise from a sudden change of practice, we shall now allow the amendments asked for: But we do not mean to lay it down as a general rule, that such amendments will be hereafter allowed, as of course, in this court; on the contrary, having the authority, we shall probably limit the exercise of the discretion by general regulations.

Amendments allowed.

COSTS—REMEDIES—MARSHAL'S FEES—ATTACHMENT.

1. The marshal may have an attachment, to enforce the payment of his fees of office, against suitors in the court.

[Cited in Re Stover, Case No. 13,507.]

2. So against an endorser on the writ, who by the lex loci is liable to respond the costs.

J. T. Austin, for the marshal.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a motion made by the marshal for an attachment against the defendant, who is an attorney of this court, to compel the payment of his fees for the service of sundry writs brought in this court by Susanna Cunningham, a citizen of the state of New York, against Harrison G. Otis and others, which writs were endorsed by the defendant, and were dismissed at a former term of this court.

It has been contended, that this is not a proper process to compel payment of the fees due to the marshal. But on the authority of Caldwell v. Jackson, in the supreme court, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 276, we are satisfied, that an attachment may issue to compel the payment of the fees due to officers of the court for the performance of their official duties. And this seems reasonable, inasmuch as the marshal is compellable to perform these duties, and as an officer of the court, a similar process lies against him to enforce the performance. As the affidavits prove the substantial facts, which are not denied, the only remaining question seems to be, whether the same process, which would lie against the party to compel payment of fees, can be maintained against his attorney, who endorses the writ, and thereby becomes liable, under the statute of Massachusetts of 30th of October, 1784, § 11, (1 Mass. Laws, 206,) to the payment of the costs of the suit in case of the avoidance or inability of his principal. As the principal resides without the state, and due application has been made to his attorney in the suits, to obtain payment, it is a sufficient avoidance within the meaning of the statute, even supposing that such avoidance be necessary, where the party plaintiff is not an inhabitant of the commonwealth. We think also that this case is fairly within the equity of the statute, though perhaps not within its words, which seem confined to the payment of the costs of the defendant. The uniform practice of this court has been, to require an endorsement on the writ by the plaintiff or his attorney, if resident within the commonwealth, or by some other responsible person, if the plaintiff were resident without the commonwealth, according to the statute, and with the express understanding, that such endorsement rendered the endorser liable to the payment of the costs of the suit in default of his principal. Where the principal resides without the state, it must be considered, that the endorser makes himself directly responsible to the officers of the court for their official fees—and indeed in point of practice, unless in special cases, the officers of the court have looked to the attorneys upon record for the payment of the fees due for services performed at their request.

We certainly feel no desire to disturb this honorable confidence between all the officers of the court. And in the present case, as the attorney upon record is the endorser of the writ, and must from the non-residence of his principal be considered as making himself directly liable for the marshal's fees, upon this ground we hold, that the rule for an attachment ought to be made absolute. Rule absolute.

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. Sept., 1843.

CRIMES IN INDIAN COUNTRY—PLACES WITHIN EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES.

[1. The act of 1790, § 8, "for the punishment of certain crimes," provides among other things that murder or robbery committed on the high seas or on any river, etc., out of the jurisdiction of any particular state shall be punished with death. Other sections of the act provide for the punishment of crimes not including robbery committed within any place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The act of 1834, § 35, "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," extends to the Indian country so much of the laws of the United States as relates to the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Held, that since the rivers and other places mentioned in Act 1790, § 8, are not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, robbery committed in the Indian country is not punishable with death under that section, but as larceny under other sections of the act.]

[2. Under treaties with the Indian tribes securing to them local self-government the Indian country is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.]

[The following charge to the grand jury was delivered in response to a request for instructions as follows: "Is robbery, when committed in the Indian country, indictable as such, and punishable with death?"]

WELLS, District Judge. Is robbery committed in the Indian country attached to the district of Missouri a crime indictable as such, and punishable with death? The 25th section of the act of 1834, "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," provides, "that so much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall be in force in the Indian country." If robbery committed in "a place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," be punishable with death, then, if committed in the Indian country, it is also punished with death, and not otherwise.

The 16th clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution provides that congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may by cession of the particular states and the acceptance by congress become the seat of government of the United States, and to exercise the like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." Here is a grant of "exclusive legislation" which is jurisdiction, and here we are to look for the grant of sole and exclusive jurisdiction as to places, to the United States. U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 386. The 3d section of the act of 1790, "for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," (1 Stat. 112) provides, "that if any person or persons shall, within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of wilful murder, such person or persons, on being thereof convicted shall suffer death." Other sections provide for other offences committed in the same places, but nowhere provide for the crime of robbery committed in these places, that is, in "forts, arsenals, dockyards, magazines, or in any other place or district of country within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." Here is the exercise by congress of the grant of exclusive jurisdiction, "as to places," given by the clause of the constitution above cited; and the terms, "any other place or district of country," refer to territorial objects of a similar character to those enumerated. U. S. v. Bevans, supra.

The constitution (article 1, § 8) gives congress the power "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and other offences against the law of nations." Here there is no grant of sole and exclusive jurisdiction as to place; for everybody knows that the high seas are common to all nations, and that every nation punishes crimes committed thereon. 1 Kent, [Comm.] 186, 187.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Const. art. 3, § 2. Here is no grant of sole and exclusive jurisdiction as to place, although there may be as to certain crimes. U. S. v. Bevans, supra, is in point, and Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, says:—"Can the cession of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction be construed into a cession of the waters on which these cases may arise? This is a question on which the court is incapable of feeling a doubt. The article which describes the judicial power of the United States is not intended for the cession of territory, or of general jurisdiction. It is obviously designed for other purposes. It is in the 8th section of the 1st article we are to look for cessions of territory and of exclusive jurisdiction over this district, and over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

"In extending the judicial power in all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the 8th section of the act of 1790 provides, "that if any person or persons shall commit upon the high seas, or upon any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offence which, if committed within the body of a county, would by the laws of the United States be punishable with death; or if any captain or mariner of any ship or vessel shall piratically or feloniously run away with such ship or vessel, or any goods or merchandise, to the value of fifty dollars (the section enumerates other piracies), every such offender shall be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be a pirate and felon, and being thereof convicted, shall suffer death. And the trial of crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought." 1 Stat. This is the section which it is alleged is in force in the Indian country, and by the provisions of which it is said robbery there committed is punishable with death. If the places mentioned in this section be within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, then it is in force in the Indian country. But it is the place, and not the crime, which is required to be within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

If this 8th section be but the exercise by congress of the power of extending the judicial power to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the matter, as I conceive, is decided by the case of U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 386, above alluded to; for if, as shown, that grant of power was not intended to give exclusive jurisdiction as to places, then congress could not extend it to that length. And if it be not founded on that power, I confess I am wholly at a loss to know on what clause or provision of the constitution it is based; for, as already shown, if founded on the power to define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and other offences against the law of nations, it would be absurd to claim the sole and exclusive jurisdiction as to the place there mentioned, that is, the high seas. But I think it can be shown that the 8th section of the act of 1790 was not intended by congress to apply to any crimes but piracies; that none of the places mentioned in that section are within the sole and exclusive juris-isdiction of the United States, or so declared to be; and that the 25th section of the act of 1834 meant, by "any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and the laws for the punishment of offences committed therein," the forts, arsenals, magazines, dockyards, and other needful buildings, and the provisions of the act of 1790 applicable thereto.

The crime of robbery, as already mentioned, is not included in any of the provisions for the punishment of crimes committed in "any fort, arsenal, magazine, dockyard, or other place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." Larceny is included, and I presume every robbery includes a larceny. But larceny is not punishable by these provisions with death. In no part of the act of 1790 are "the high seas, or rivers, havens, basins, or bays, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," spoken of, considered, or treated as places within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; whereas the forts, arsenals, magazines and dockyards, places on land, are always enumerated and spoken of as the places within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Nor are the rivers, havens, basins, or bays, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, ever spoken of as including the internal watercourses of our territories, or of any country, but always as the seas or the high seas, which would wholly exclude the idea of their being internal waters. Thus the 6th section provides for the punishment of misprision of felony "upon the high seas, or within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or other place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." The 7th section provides for the punishment of manslaughter, when committed in any "fort, arsenal, dockyard, or other place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." The 8th section provides for the punishment of piracy, which includes murder, robbery, &c., "upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state." The 9th section provides for the punishment of any piracy or robbery aforesaid, or any act of hostility against the United States, or any citizen thereof, by a citizen of the United States, under color of a commission from a foreign state, &c., "upon the high seas." The 10th section provides for the punishment of accessories "upon the land or the seas." The 11th section provides for the punishment of accessories after the fact "upon the land or at sea." The 12th section provides for the punishment of manslaughter "upon the high seas." The 13th section provides for the punishment of maiming "within any of the places upon land under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or upon the high seas." The 15th section provides for the punishment of larceny and other offences "within any of the places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or upon the high seas."

It will thus be seen, the "rivers, harbors, basins, and bays out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," "the high seas," "at sea," &c., in all this statute, seem to mean the same thing. And this is the English statute law and common law. For rivers, harbors, basins, bays, &c. out of the limits of any particular country, are generally denominated "high seas" or "sea" (2 Chit. Crim. Law, 891, 1127; 2 Hale, [P. C.] 12, 16), and are within the admiralty jurisdiction. Not but that there is a distinction, correctly speaking, between "high seas" and "seas," but the distinction is nice, and not frequently attended to. The supreme court has decided, however, that manslaughter, committed in a foreign river above the forts, cannot be punished under the 12th section. Indeed to me it is manifest that congress so understood it, because if the terms "seas," "high seas," and "at sea," do not embrace the "rivers, harbors, basins, and bays within the jurisdiction of any particular state," then there is no punishment for many offences committed in those rivers, basins, harbors, and bays out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, which are yet punishable when committed at sea or on land. Thus it is with maiming, in section 13, which is punishable if committed "within any of the places upon land within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or upon the high seas;" so also of the offences specified in sections 10 and 11. The declaring an offence to be piracy, which is done in the 8th section, or robbery, would of itself show that it must be committed on the seas. "The word itself is derived from a Greek word which signifies to pass over the sea, and refers rather to a place than a specific crime." 2 Chit. Crim. Law, 1127; 3 Just. [Inst.] 113. And the crime, both by the laws of England and America, and by the law of nations, is defined to be "robbery, or forcible depredation on the sea, animo furandi." 4 Bl. Comm. 71; U. S. v. Smith, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 153; U. S. v. Furlong, Id. 184; 1 Kent, Comm. 183. In England, the mouths of great rivers without the limits of any county, where the sea ebbs and flows, are considered as part of the sea, and within the admiralty jurisdiction. 2 Hale, [P. C.] 12, 16.

I think it manifest, from what has been said, that the 8th section of the act of 1790, and which declares robbery, when committed on the high seas, or in any river, basin, or bay, without the limits of any particular state, to be piracy, applies only to the various parts of the sea, and not to any internal rivers or waters, whether in our own territories, the states, or foreign states. It may be said that the words of the act, "any river, haven, basin, or bay, without the limits of any particular state," would apply to a river and those waters within the interior of our territories, and so they would; and would also apply to those in the interior of any foreign kingdom; yet no person has ever contended that it was to be so construed. This is further illustrated by the act of 15th May, 1820, the 3d section of which provides, that if any person upon the high seas, or upon any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery in and upon any vessel, he shall be adjudged a pirate. This shows the sense of the legislature, as to the parts of a river in which piracy can be committed, that is to say, where the sea ebbs and flows. The courts of the United States have never claimed any sole and exclusive jurisdiction as to the place under the 8th section of the act of 1790, or under that clause of the constitution which declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, but, on the contrary, have expressly disclaimed. U. S. v. Bevens, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 386.

I need not cite authorities to show that the seas are not within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The observations made above are intended to show that all places named in the 8th section are parts of the sea, and consequently, as it regarded crimes committed thereon, the United States have no sole and exclusive jurisdiction. If the 8th section does not apply to places within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, then its provisions do not apply to crimes committed in the Indian country, as provided by the 25th section of the act of 1834 above cited. To me it is manifest that congress intended to make no distinction in punishment of offences committed on land; and when it provided for the punishment of offences committed in the Indian country, it had the same object in view. Hence it is provided in the 25th section of the act of 1834, that so much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall be in force in the Indian country. The places within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States are the forts, arsenals, dockyards, and magazines, so often mentioned in the act of 1790 as being places within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. In regard to offences committed on the seas, it was thought proper to make special provisions; and as piracy, which is robbery on the seas, is an offence against all nations, and is perhaps by all punished with death, on account of its enormity and the difficulty of suppressing it, it was thought proper to punish it by our Code with death. 1 Kent, [Comm.] 183. The act of 1817, "to provide for the punishment of crimes and offences committed within the Indian boundaries," contained a provision substantially like that in the 25th section of the act of 1834. After its passage, the supreme court in 1818 decided that robbery committed on land was not punished with death; but otherwise if committed on the sea. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 627. Indeed this was admitted by the United States counsel.

I have examined this case more at length than it might seem to require, because my brother judge decided at St. Louis, on application to be admitted to bail, that robbery committed in the Indian country was punishable with death. For the opinions of Judge Catron I have great respect; but the reasoning in his written opinion in this case does not satisfy me, and no authorities are cited. I will here copy that part of Judge Catron's opinion applicable to the point in which I consider the error to consist.

"The 8th section of the act of 1790," says he, "provides that if any person or persons shall commit upon the high seas, or on any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, such offender shall be deemed a felon and suffer death. The crime is to be committed, first, on the water, and second, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state. Suppose the crime of murder or robbery had been committed in a bay, or in a river of Florida, within the country belonging to the Creek Indians, after Florida had been acquired by the United States from Spain, then the murderer or robber would have been punishable with death, because the place where the crime was committed was not within the jurisdiction of any particular state, and because it had been committed in a bay or river. The act of 1817, c. 265, (3 Story's Laws, 1644, [3 Stat. 383,]) provides that if any Indian or other person shall, within the United States, and within any town, district, or territory belonging to any nation of Indians, commit any crime, which if committed in any place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States would, by the laws of the United States, be punished with death, the offender, on conviction, shall in like manner be punished with death. In the case supposed of the commission of murder or robbery on the water in the Indian country, it would clearly be a capital felony, committed in 'a place and district of country' under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and be punishable by the 8th section of the act of 1790. The act of 1817 is as broad as it well can be, when it extends the same punishment to the land. It declares if the crimes shall be punishable with death 'in any place or in any district of country,' &c., the offender shall be punished in like manner as if he committed the same crime on the land and in the Indian country."

The judge then proceeds to say that the offence with which the prisoner was charged, robbery, was committed in the Indian country attached to the state of Missouri; that he had confessed the robbery, and that the crime was therefore not bailable.

I will here remark that the 8th section of the act of 1790, recited by the judge, declares that the person who shall commit the offences therein named, among others robbery, "shall be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be a pirate and a felon," and not merely a felon, as set forth by the judge; and that it also enumerates other offences besides murder and robbery, such as piratically and feloniously running away with a vessel, or any goods or merchandise to the value of fifty dollars; and that the act of 1817 is repealed, and that of 1834 substituted.

The judge says:—"In the case supposed, of the commission of murder or robbery on the water in the Indian country, it would clearly be a capital felony, committed in a place and district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and be punishable by the 8th section of the act of 1790."

Now if he means that "any river, harbor, basin, or bay," in the interior of Florida, and to which the admiralty jurisdiction does not extend, is a place enumerated in the 8th section, and in which piracy may be committed (for all the offences in that section specified are declared to be piracies), then I am constrained to dissent. But if, on the contrary, he means that the mouths of the great rivers where the tide ebbs and flows, and the harbors, basins, and bays, within the admiralty jurisdiction, are the places in the 8th section mentioned, and where piracy may be committed, then I am constrained to deny that they are "places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," as to crimes. The reasons and authorities I have already given. In the territories of Florida and Louisiana, and perhaps others, certain laws, including the act of 1790, were declared to be in force. They are of course yet in force in Florida, and what remains of Louisiana, as purchased of France; and I presume in the other territories. Has any one ever heard of a prosecution for piracy committed in the interior waters of these territories, or of any person being hung for robbery, or running away with goods to the amount of fifty dollars? Certainly nothing of the kind ever took place in the territory of Missouri, where the law was in full force, nor have I ever heard of it taking place anywhere.

If, as declared by Lord Coke, the word piracy "refers rather to a place than a species of crime," and if, as I have already shown, the definition of the crime, both by the laws of England and America, and the law of nations, is "robbery" or forcible depredation animo furandi on the seas, it would look somewhat singular to be punishing persons as pirates for offences committed in our territories two or three thousand miles from any sea; for all the offenses in the 8th section, and many other offences, are declared to be piracies when committed on "any river, harbor, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state." The offence of larceny (which is included in a robbery) could clearly be punished by the provisions of the 16th section, if committed in any fort, arsenal, dockyard, or magazine, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and of course could be punished by the act of 1834 if committed in the Indian country; and, according to my brother judge, may also be punished under the 8th section. So we have two laws for the punishment of the same offence, and under each a different punishment. The crime of murder is declared to be punishable when committed in a place within the sole jurisdiction of the United States, and is again declared to be punishable when committed on "any river, harbor, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state." Now if rivers, harbors, basins, and bays, beyond the jurisdiction of any particular state, are places within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, this double enumeration of the places was both idle and mischievous:

Let it be remembered that the act of 1790 was enacted, not for the territories or the Indian country, but was subsequently introduced therein, as far as it was applicable. Now it may well be questioned whether the crime of robbery on the seas, or piracy, can be committed in the Indian country. The place enters essentially into the offence, and an aggravated punishment is annexed to it on that account. It may be likened to robbery on or near the highway, by certain English statutes, to which an aggravated punishment is annexed. The offence could be committed only on or near a highway. 1 Hale's P. C. 535. If we had such an act, and it was declared to be in force in the territories or Indian country, yet if there were no highways, the offence could not be committed there. Here we have the statute of 1790, which provides for the punishment of a great number of different crimes, and is if you please declared to be in force in the Indian country. Among them is robbery on the seas, or in rivers, harbors, basins, or bays, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, or in other words piracy. If there are no such places in the Indian country, then the offence could not be committed there; or if robbery is there committed on land, it would not be the offence declared in the statute. We have a code of criminal law for the land, that is, for forts, magazines, dockyards, arsenals, &c., which are under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. That these are applicable to the Indian country, no one questions. We have also a code of criminal law for the seas. Now, according to the ingenious reasoning of my brother judge, we are to have a part of those intended for the seas transplanted to the Indian country, which gives them two sets of laws on the same subject, and makes different criminal laws for different parts of the same country enacted by the same authority. Thus if robbery be committed in a fort, arsenal, dockyard, or magazine, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, it is punishable, as a larceny, by fine and imprisonment. But if committed in the Indian country, it is to be punished with death. If a person in the forts, arsenals, magazines, and dockyards run off with goods to the amount of fifty dollars, he is punishable by fine and imprisonment. But if he commit the same act in the Indian country, he is punishable with death. But a difficulty will arise, for as both codes are in force in the Indian country, by which shall we be governed? Crimes committed at sea have great and aggravated punishments denounced against them, because committed at sea. This is especially the case in regard to robbery on the sea, or piracy. 1 Kent, [Comm.] 183. And yet we are to punish them in the same manner, and to the same extent, when committed on land. These consequences must all follow, if my brother judge be correct in his opinion.

The act of 1790 was very unskillfully written. In some of its provisions, the words, if literally and strictly taken, go far beyond what could have been the intention of the writer; and the act has in some respects copied too closely the act of 39 Geo. III., without adverting to the difference in our constitutions. In but few of its provisions can it be taken literally. Thus section 8 provides for the punishment of all murders committed by foreigners within a foreign vessel, although upon the high seas; and so also of piracy. So it must also be in regard to piracy and murder committed on any river, &c., for this would lead us to the punishment of murders committed on rivers in the heart of foreign countries by their own citizens or subjects, where it would be absurd to claim jurisdiction. The act must be construed with an eye to the jurisdiction of the United States and the subject-matter, and then the 8th section will be construed not to apply to any place where the United States have not jurisdiction, nor to a place where piracy, from its nature, cannot be committed. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 631, 634.

I have referred to and examined the constitution and laws of the United States to show that the places "under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," mentioned in the constitution, the act of 1790, and the acts of 1817 and 1824, were the same, and were places purchased by the United States, with the consent of the legislatures of the states in which they might be, for forts, arsenals, magazines, dockyards, and other needful buildings; and that the high seas, and rivers, harbors, basins, and bays, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, were not places within the meaning of those acts, within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

I will now venture a step further. Judge Catron, in his opinion, says:—"In the case supposed of the commission of murder or robbery on the water in the Indian country, it would clearly be a capital felony committed in a place and district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and be punishable by the 8th section of the act of 1790." Now I deny that the Indian country, even technically, either land or water, is under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The United States have not, in any instance within my knowledge, exercised such sole and exclusive jurisdiction. By the acts of 1817 and 1834, above referred to, nothing of the kind is attempted. They both expressly except crimes committed by Indian on Indian, and confine their operation to regulating trade and intercourse, and preserving peace. A sole and exclusive jurisdiction would exclude all Indian laws and regulations, punish crimes committed by Indian on Indian, and regulate and govern property and contracts and the civil and political relations of the inhabitants, Indians and others, in that country. It would be wholly opposed to a self-government by any Indian tribe or nation. This self-government is expressly recognized and secured by several treaties between the United States and Indian tribes in the Indian country attached by the act of 1834 to Arkansas or Missouri District for certain purposes. This may be seen from the treaty with the Choctaws in 1830, and the treaty with the Creeks in 1832, and other Indian treaties. The United States could not, therefore, assume a sole and exclusive jurisdiction over the Indian country without violating their treaties, which treaties are the supreme law of the land. I conclude, therefore, that the Indian country is neither in fact nor in law under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Indeed if congress considered the Indian country as being under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, it was wholly unnecessary to extend to that country the laws for the punishment of crimes committed in places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

SEAMEN—ARTICLES OF SHIPMENT—CHANGE OF VOYAGE.

[1. The term "voyage" is a technical phrase, and always imports a definite commencement and end, and therefore the addition of the term "elsewhere" in shipping articles specifying a voyage from Baltimore to Curacoa does not authorize a voyage to St. Domingo, since such term must be construed as subordinate to the voyage specified, and only permits such a change of course as may be necessary to accomplish the voyage designated in the articles of shipment.]

[Cited in The Brutus, Case No. 2,060.]

[2. Cited in Magee v. The Moss, Case No. 8,944, and Brown v. Jones, Id. 2,017, to the point that the term "voyage" is a technical phrase, and always imports a definite commencement and end, and that the term "elsewhere" must be construed either as void for uncertainty, or as subordinate to the principal voyage stated in the preceding words.]

WINCHESTER, District Judge. In this case the libellant claims wages for services rendered in a voyage from Baltimore to St. Domingo, and back, and alleges that the voyage which he stipulated to perform was from Baltimore to Curacoa and back, and not to St. Domingo where the vessel did go contrary not only to the articles, but the express understanding of the parties, and the declaration of the libellant, that he would not ship on a voyage for St. Domingo. The articles exhibited specify a voyage to Curacoa and elsewhere; and under the latitude of the last general words the respondent contends that he was authorized to go to St. Domingo, without proceeding to Curacoa. Taking the fact alleged to be true, that the voyage in view and actually prosecuted, was from its commencement for St. Domingo and not the port of Curacoa; the objection to pay the libellant's wages comes with a very ill grace from the respondent, who shows and rests on his own deception and breach of faith as the foundation of his defense; and the court would reluctantly discover any rule of law so imperative as to compel the sustenance of such a justification.

The act for the government and regulation of mariners contemplates two species of contract between owners and seamen. 1. For a voyage or voyages. 2. For a term or terms of time. The latter is undoubtedly the proper form of articles where the destination of a vessel cannot be specifically known, and where the vessel is employed on what is called a trading voyage, or is in search of freight. The first, to wit, that in which the voyage or voyages are specified, applies to designated ports, or particular kinds of voyages known and understood to be governed in their extent and duration. The term "voyage," like the term "voyage assured," is a technical phrase, and always imports a definite commencement and end. Nomen loci ubi navis oneratur et nomen loci quo navis tendit. The voyage from Baltimore to Curacoa is therefore a specified voyage, the labor and hazard of which is known to all parties; and for that voyage the agreement is such as the statute requires. But the terms "and elsewhere" are added to this specification of voyage, and it is insisted by the respondent's counsel, that under these words he was authorized not only to invert the order of voyage specified in the articles, but to go to any other port, as to St. Domingo. If this construction was sound, the provisions of the act of congress, which require a specification of the voyage, when the hiring of seamen is not for a given time, become a dead letter; because there would be no terminus ad quem, which is essentially necessary to the legal sense of the term "voyage." The terms "and elsewhere" must therefore be construed as subordinate to the voyage specified, and can only authorize the pursuing such a course as may be necessary to accomplish the principal voyage, or in other words, to import no more than the law would imply as incidental to the main contract. All arguments which rested on the defendant's right to construe these articles as giving him the alternative of several ports, must fail of course. Indeed there is nothing in the words of the contract which, independently of the ground before taken, would warrant, by rules of law or grammatical construction, such an interpretation. The term and is properly conjunctive; and is never construed to be disjunctive unless when coupled with a manifest intent apparent upon the writing itself, that it was used in such sense and for such purposes by the parties. The only intent manifested upon the face of the articles before the court, is such as is fairly to be understood by the words from Baltimore to Curacoa and elsewhere; and it would be doing very great violence to these words to invert the order of ports; for if the respondent is once exempt from the necessity of proceeding to Curacoa, the specified voyage, there is nothing which would restrain his entering upon the most remote and perilous voyage the adventurous and enterprising spirit of commerce could suggest. I do not wish to be understood as giving any opinion, that it is essential to the validity of seamen's articles, that there should be an insertion of the name of every port to which a vessel may proceed in the course of trade; but that there must be some equivalent specification, such as to a port or ports, island or islands in the West Indies, or to the Mediterranean, or the like. The legal termination of such a voyage is ascertained by the most solemn decisions and able opinions.

But for a moment let us adopt the construction of the respondent's counsel, and admit the words "and elsewhere" to be understood in the alternative, as wished by the respondent, and apply the same rule in favor of the libellants. The clause in the articles runs thus: "We the undersigned have shipped as mariners on board the schooner —, master, for a voyage from the port of Baltimore to the port of Curacoa and elsewhere, at the monthly wages, &c." Admit that the respondent was not bound to proceed on the voyage to Curacoa by reason of the words and elsewhere, which shall be construed to give him an election to go to St. Domingo. The right then is commensurate with the whole case, and considering the word and in its disjunctive character and importing the same as or, it must be construed throughout as a disjunctive; and the articles must then be read thus, for a voyage from Baltimore or elsewhere, to Curacoa or elsewhere; for the port of Baltimore is not more positively described as the port of departure, than Curacoa is as a port of destination. The term voyage is the antecedent to which the disjunctive relates. It would then be open to the libellants to argue and prove that he did not mean to sail from Baltimore but another port, as New York for instance, and not to Curacoa but Cuba. This would be opening the door to all dangers and inconveniences so wisely guarded against by the act of congress, which requires an insertion of the voyage or voyages contemplated. And I would put it to the consideration of the respondent's counsel, whether, (supposing there was no rule of law binding in this case, and it rested upon the sound discretion of the court, and considering the characters who usually foment and conduct disputes in favor of seamen, and the character of the witnesses frequently produced to establish their claims when resting wholly on parol evidence,) the interest of merchants and ship-owners and public morals as well as private justice will not be more effectually subserved, promoted and secured, by the rule I have taken, than the one for which he has argued.

It was decided by my predecessor, that the words "and elsewhere," annexed to a specified voyage, did authorize the proceeding to one other port, but still that the ports must be proceeded to in the order of their specification. I never was satisfied with the first part of that opinion, as I have often incidentally mentioned, but the point has never been directly brought before me until in this case. I have long combated with my impressions on this question; but on the fullest consideration, I do hold myself bound to declare, that the words "and elsewhere," used as they are in this case, cannot authorize a new voyage, unless such an intent is fairly deducible from some relative expression, and that their true construction is subordinate to the principal voyage. It is due to the memory of Judge Paca, as well as myself, to state briefly the reasons of my opinion. It has been argued, that these articles are to receive such a construction as will comport with the usual course of the West India trade; which is stated to be, to seek the best market without regard to the particular ports specified. I do not know whether such be the usage, nor is it material to inquire, for as applied to the construction of a written contract, and to control legal rights, it is at direct war with every principle of law and policy. The argument from the admission of evidence to explain the course of a voyage does not justify the inference analogically drawn by the respondent's counsel. The duty of a captain is to proceed in the usual route of the voyage to his place of destination. There is a plain distinction between the voyage itself and the route of the voyage. The voyage is characterized by its termini. No evidence is admissible in any case to substitute other termini: but of two routes, it is lawful to show that either is equally safe and common. Distinguitur iter a viaggio. In the case before the court, the voyage, for which the seamen shipped, never had any commencement. The vessel sailed direct for St. Domingo, and not for Curacoa. In 2 Emerigon, 34, 35, the construction of these general and indefinite clauses is ably investigated, and unless I had found myself supported by very respectable authority, the decision of Judge Paca would have been adhered to by me until reversed by a superior court. This respectable author declares that these vague and indeterminate clauses are to be interpreted by the principal object spoken of, and in case of doubt are to be understood relatively to law and the usages of commerce. Thus an insurance for time, with permission to trade wherever the captain shall think fit, does not protect against a loss occasioned by smuggling. The assurers answer for no loss arising from the fault of the assured, although smuggling in a foreign court is not considered a crime or legal fault. These clauses, however general in their wording, are always expounded according to good faith, and admit neither of fraud nor surprise; *generaliter probandum est, ubicumque in bona fide iudicis confertur in arbitrium domini vel procuratoris ejus, conditio; pro boni viri arbitrio hoc habendum esse.*¹

In the opinion of the court, the words of the statute "what port, harbor or creek," were considered very express and equivalent to licensing for a voyage. If this determination does not exactly run on all fours with the case to be decided, its principles are so nearly similar as to render an accurate discrimination very difficult, if not impossible. The voyage or voyages for which seamen ship are required by the statute to be specified in their articles. The term voyage imports navigation from one port to another, and perhaps, if not otherwise expressed, back again. In the plural it imports, a commencing at more than one port, or in other words, at several specified places. The commencement and termination of a voyage or voyages are ascertained by the ports or harbors from and to which a vessel is destined. The terms, "to trade along the coast," or "to every port, harbor or creek," include all the ports, harbors and creeks of a nation, in which a vessel is licensed for coasting trade. But it is not a compliance with a statute which enjoins that the particular ports shall be inserted. To require the insertion of the voyage, is neither more nor less than the insertion of the ports or harbors from and to which the vessel navigates. Of consequence, the unqualified term "elsewhere," applied to a specified voyage, is not designatory of any port or place, nor is it relative to any voyage in the legal sense of the term; it has no specific relation to any port or place whatever; and to apply it to all ports or places in the world would be as inconsistent with justice, as it would be unauthorized by law. This decision is not different from old determinations. The rules, which apply to a right to a private way at land, cannot materially vary from those which are applicable to a contract for service in a voyage at sea. A prescription for a way is not good if it does not say a quo termino ad quem the way goes. Resolved [Alban v. Brounsall,] Yel. 164, and this not indefinitely but certainly, [Crossing v. Scudamore,] 2 Lev. 10. As from A to a rectory, the terminus ad quem is uncertain, for the rectory consists of glebe, tithe, parsonage, etc. So, that he is seised of B and has a way through the close of the plaintiff to the Thames, for he ought to say that he has a way from B through the close, etc., to the Thames. [Staple v. Heydon,] Mod. Cas. [6 Mod.] 3.

justice, Baron Eyre, on the construction of the tenth section of the stat. 24 Geo. III., c. 47, (Gossley v. Barlow, 1 Anstr. 23,) regulating the coasting trade, and licensing vessels, and providing that such license shall specify the tonnage, etc., of the vessel licensed, and for what port, harbor or creek, she is about to sail. A license was granted, "to be employed in the coasting trade," generally. In support of this license it was argued that it meant to include all the ports in England, which is the same thing as if it specified every one; and it was agreed that such was the common form of licenses to coasters.

If this case should still be considered doubtful, let the argument ab inconvenienti be applied, and what will be the result? The construction I have adopted can never produce inconvenience to the ship owner, since in almost every case he does order the route and destination of her voyage previous to her departure; and it is easy and just to make his agreement with the seamen conform to such orders. If there is a discretionary authority confided to the captain to proceed to other ports, such authority will at least be limited by some bounds; and the articles should be drawn to meet such an alternative voyage, and to conform to the real object of the owner; and this object, so far as the rate and wages would be influenced by it, ought to be communicated to the sailors; or if it is not thought expedient to do so, they should be hired for a term or terms of time, as authorized by the act of congress. While the ship-owners are thus fairly secured against inconvenience, no more than justice is secured to the seamen. Adopt a different rule, and they may unjustly be entrapped into voyages of greater length, more hazard, peril and labor, and of course for which they ought to receive greater wages and greater advance; and of which increased compensation they would be deprived under such general words, too often improperly and most frequently thoughtlessly introduced into their articles.

The considerations of policy and the general rules of law, before stated, have great weight with me. Indeed I think it more desirable, that the principles of mercantile law should be referred to general axioms, than to the unbending authority of particular decisions: and it is therefore my custom not to refer so much to cases or opinions, as to universal principles. But on this occasion I shall add the weight of some opinions from a source to which we resort habitually for our judicial direction. It is stated by Park (title "Deviation") "that it is necessary to insert, in every policy of insurance, the place of the ship's departure and also of her destination;" and in a preceding part of his work, (page 23, Ed. 1787,) when referring to the same rule, he remarks, "this has always been held to be necessary in policies, at least for upwards of two hundred years; and must be so, on account of the evident uncertainty which would follow from a contrary practice, as the insurer would never know what the risk was he had undertaken to insure." Molloy, 6, 2, c. 7, § 14, has laid down this doctrine, that if a ship be insured from London to —, (a blank being left by the lader of the goods to prevent her surprise by an enemy,) if she happen to be cast away, though there be private instructions for her port, yet the insured must sit down with his loss, by reason of the uncertainty." "Such also," says Park, "is now the law and usage of merchants." These opinions and principles are supported by the determination in Lava- bre v. Walter, 1 Doug. 284, in which the voyage insured was described in these words, "at and from port l'Orient to Pondicherry, Madras and China, and at and from thence back to the ship's port or ports of discharge in France, with liberty to touch, in the outward and homeward bound voyage, at the isles of France and Bourbon, and at all or any other ports or places whatsoever; and it shall be lawful for the said ship in this voyage to proceed and sail to, and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever, as well on this side as on the other side the Cape of Good Hope, without being deemed a deviation." The ship went to Pondicherry, whence she went to Bengal, back to Pondicherry and sailed thence for, and was captured on her return to l'Orient. Both going and returning she either touched at, or lay off Madras, Masulipatam, Visigapatam and Yanon, and took in goods at all those places. This was held to be a deviation. This case is also very accurately reported in Emerigon, who remarks on the policy, "that however general the words of the policy were, they could not be construed more largely than the specified voyage, which was for Pondicherry, Madras and China." These cases apply to the construction of the loose and indeterminate clauses of maritime contracts; and when fairly investigated will be found no more than a correct application of old and well established rules drawn from Roccus, Stympanus and Le Guidon le Mer to modern cases. But the case of Woolbridge v. Boydell, 1 Doug. 16, more immediately resembles the case now before the court in its facts and circumstances than any I have referred to. See Park, 260, S. C.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—ARREST OF APPLICANT —EXECUTION FOR DEBT.

[A voluntary bankrupt, under the act of April 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9,) cannot be arrested on an execution for debt before his final examination is passed.]

IRWIN, District Judge. By the English statutes of bankruptcy, the bankrupt is free from arrest or imprisonment by any creditor during the time allowed for examination, provided he was not in custody at the time of the surrender, and, if arrested, is entitled to be discharged; and the surrender, if voluntary, protects him from all arrests till his final examination is passed. Our statute of bankruptcy does not expressly confer this privilege on the bankrupt, but it was not necessary to be so conferred. The person and property of the bankrupt are, by the law, brought within the jurisdiction of the district court, and the court possesses an inherent power in all cases of which it has jurisdiction, to cause its orders and decrees to be respected and obeyed, and to protect its suitors from arrest.

FEDERAL AND STATE COURTS—CONCURRENT JURISDICTION.

[Where a ship is attached in a common-law suit in a state court by a lien creditor and is in possession of the sheriff, the subsequent filing of a libel in rem for materials furnished in building the ship does not work a conflict of jurisdiction between the state and federal courts, and the marshal has no power to disturb such possession, but by the statute of Maine, of August 10, 1848, c. 78, § 3, notice by the marshal to the sheriff that he has a warrant of arrest against such vessel operates as an arrest or attachment of the vessel, and the suits in the state and federal courts may be prosecuted concurrently to final judgment.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. This was a libel in rem for the purchase price of certain materials furnished for the construction of a ship, which was at the time of filing of libel in possession by the sheriff, by virtue of an attachment issued in a common law suit. Heard on plea to the jurisdiction. Overruled.]

WARE, District Judge. This was a libel in rem by a material man, for the price of material furnished for the building of a new ship, to enforce the lien given by a statute of the state. Before the filing of the libel, a suit had been commenced at common law by another lien creditor, on which the ship was attached, and was in possession of the sheriff.

The right claimed by the libellant is not paramount to that of the attaching creditor, but concurrent with it. The sheriff having the legal possession of the ship, has a right, and is bound to retain it, and the marshal has no authority to disturb him in the possession. Both creditors are prosecuting their rights at the same time, and each in a court having jurisdiction over the suit. There is no conflict of jurisdiction in the case. Each creditor had a perfect right to determine for himself in which jurisdiction he would seek his remedy. The difficulties supposed to arise, if in fact any exist, arise after the judgment and decree in enforcing them, and obtaining satisfaction. But if there were any difficulty in this respect as the law stood under the Revised Statutes [of Maine 1840, p. 558, c. 125, § 35] that is removed by the statute of [Maine, August 10] 1848, c. [78. See note at end of case.] The fourth section of that act provides that if there are several actions against the debtor of this privileged character, seeking to enforce a lien against the vessel, no satisfaction shall be made of any of the judgments obtained until there is a judgment in all, and that these shall be paid concurrently, without any preference of one over the other on account of priority of the attachment. This is precisely what would have been done by a court of admiralty, under the law as it stood in the Revised Statutes, without the supplementary act of 1848. All the creditors standing in the same rank of privilege would have been paid concurrently, and no preference would have been given to the creditor who first filed his libel, or commenced his suit at common law.

The act of 1848 (section 2) directs that all attachments of the ship shall be made by the same officer; and the next section provides that if he is disqualified from serving any writ, that any other qualified officer may serve it, and by giving notice to the attaching officer who has the possession, the same right is acquired against the vessel as if the writ had been served by the first officer. This provision of the law applies precisely to the present case. The attaching officer who had the possession of the vessel was not qualified to serve the libel by an arrest of the vessel; and notice to the sheriff by the marshal, that he had a warrant of arrest against the vessel, would operate as an arrest or attachment of the vessel. There is, therefore, no conflict of jurisdiction in the concurrent prosecution of the two suits in the state court and the admiralty, nor does there arise any conflict of authority for the possession after judgment is obtained in levying the executions. By the direct operation of the law, the possession of the sheriff, so far as is necessary to the satisfaction of a decree under the libel, becomes the possession of the marshal. He holds the vessel for the satisfaction of the creditor who obtains his judgment in the court.

The counsel for the respondent, in support of his plea to the jurisdiction of the court, is perfectly correct in the position taken, that a court proceeding in rem can only maintain its jurisdiction when it can reach and act directly on the thing. The object and end of the suit is to get satisfaction out of the res., and the judgment of the court is against the thing. Unless, therefore, the court can reach the thing, its judgment would be entirely illusory. But in the present case, the process of the court has reached the thing, or, at least, may reach it effectually by simple notice to the sheriff to hold the ship to respond to any decree the libellant may obtain. This objection, therefore, fails; nor can I see any of the practical difficulties and dangers of a collision of authorities, in carrying the law into execution, and giving to each party his remedy, that have been suggested by the counsel for the respondent. Plea to the jurisdiction overruled.

[NOTE. Rev. St. Me. 1840, c. 125, § 35, provides that material men and laborers shall have a lien for materials and services furnished in building a ship until four days after the launching thereof, and may secure the same by attachment, which shall have precedence of all other attachments. The act of August 10, 1848, c. 78, is as follows:

["Section 1. When any action shall hereafter be commenced to enforce the lien of a creditor upon a vessel for labor performed, or materials furnished for or on account of such vessel, the officer making the first attachment in such case, shall give notice thereof by filing a return of such attachment within twenty-four hours after making the same with the clerk of the town where such vessel shall be, and leaving a copy thereof with any one of the owners or of the master workmen upon such vessel; and it shall not be necessary at any time before the launching of a vessel, to place a keeper on board of the same for the purpose of preserving the attachment made to secure any such lien.

["Sec. 2. In all actions brought to enforce any such lien, as is mentioned in the preceding section, the service shall be made by a sheriff, deputy sheriff, or a coroner, and all subsequent attachments upon such vessel to secure a lien as aforesaid, made before the expiration of the time within which the first attaching creditor might have enforced his lien, shall be made by the officer who made said first attachment.

["Sec. 3. If the officer who made the first attachment as aforesaid shall be disqualified from serving the writ in any such subsequent action, any other qualified officer may serve such subsequent writ, and shall attach the vessel by giving notice thereof to the first attaching officer, and the claimant, in such case, shall have his judgment satisfied out of the proceeds in the hands of the first attaching officer, in like manner and proportion with the other creditors.

["Sec. 4. No satisfaction shall be made upon any execution that may issue in any of the actions aforesaid, until after final judgment has been entered in all of such actions; and said attachment shall be preserved until the expiration of thirty days after such final judgment; and the officer holding the executions issued upon such judgments for service, shall after final judgment in all of said actions, divide and pay over the proceeds in his hands arising from such attachment to the several judgment creditors aforesaid, in proportion to the amounts of the judgments recovered by them respectively, and not otherwise.

["Sec. 5. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed."

[The question of the conflicting jurisdiction of federal courts in cases similar to the principal case has been frequently before the federal courts. In Certain Logs of Mahogany, Case No. 2,559, (decided in 1827,) a replevin suit had been begun in a Massachusetts state court before the filing of the libel in the federal court, and from a decree in favor of the libellant an appeal was taken. Story, circuit justice, in rendering an opinion affirming the decree, held that the pendency of the replevin suit was no defense against the libel, for the two suits were not on the same cause of action, nor between the same parties, nor of the same nature; for replevin, though in form in rem, acts in personam as to the judgment. In this case the defense was lis pendens, and there seems to have been no objection made to the jurisdiction on the ground that the res was beyond the reach of the federal process while in the custody of the sheriff. When a vessel is in the hands of a sheriff under process from a state court, it is beyond the jurisdiction of a federal court sitting in admiralty, and this on the ground that the proceedings in admiralty are in rem, and those in state court in the nature of proceedings in rem, (the case arose in New York,) and therefore the right to maintain the jurisdiction must attach to that tribunal which first exercises it by taking possession of the res. The Robert Fulton, Case No. 11,890. This case was decided by Thompson, circuit justice, in 1826, and although its doctrine was questioned by Wells, district judge, in the case of Ashbrook v. The Golden Gate, Id. 574, it was cited with approval by Curtis, circuit justice, in The Oliver Jordan, Id. 10,503, (decided in 1855,) which was an appeal from the district court for the district of Maine, the circumstances being very similar to those of the principal case. The sheriff of Cumberland county had attached the Oliver Jordan, and thereafter a libel for materials under the Maine lien law was filed, and a warrant of arrest issued from the United States district court in admiralty. Objection to the jurisdiction was overruled by the district court, but on appeal it was held that, since the vessel was rightfully in the custody of the state court, the marshal could not lawfully execute the warrant of arrest, and this because the only mode of preventing a conflict of jurisdiction is "to consider persons and property which are in the custody of the law of a state to be withdrawn from the process of the courts of the United States," and vice versa, except where congress has specially provided for an exercise of the supremacy of the United States laws. An early decision by Ware, district judge, had asserted that this rule did not apply when one claim is privileged over another, and that an attachment under process of a state court created a lien subject to the prior incumbrance of a seaman's claim for wages, though the libel was filed after the attachment was made. Poland v. The Spartan, Case No. 11,246.

[The principle that, when the state and federal jurisdictions are concurrent, the court which first takes possession of the res has exclusive jurisdiction thereof until such possession is relinquished, was recognized by the supreme court in Hagan v. Lucas, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 400. In that case slaves had been levied on by a sheriff, but given up on defendant's bond, conditioned to return the property if judgment went against him. The trial court held that under the Alabama law the lien continues after such a bond is given during the pendency of the suit, and the question whether the suit was pending or not was submitted to the jury. Mr. Justice McLean, in affirming the judgment, said: "Had the property remained in the possession of the sheriff under the first levy, it is clear the marshal could not have taken it in execution. The first levy, whether it were made under federal or state authority, withdraws the property from the reach of the process of the other." This was followed in Pulliam v. Osborne, 17 How. (58 U. S.) 471, in which the property (slaves) had been sold by the sheriff, and then seized by the marshal. The court said: "In Alabama the bona fide purchaser at a judicial sale made to enforce a statutory lien takes the property discharged of liens of the same description, whether the subject of the sale be land or personal property. The propriety of this rule is fully vindicated by the statement in Hagan v. Lucas," supra. In a case arising in Mississippi the court reached an opposite conclusion, but only because by the law of that state a release of the property on the defendant's bond operates to suspend the lien, and a levy by the marshal on property so released was therefore lawful. Brown v. Clarke, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 4. In Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 612, a creditor made an attachment under process from a New Hampshire state court, and in bankruptcy proceedings thereafter begun in a federal court it was decreed that the attachment was not a lien, and the sheriff was ordered to deliver the property to the assignee. This decree was pleaded by way of estoppel in the state court, but the objection was overruled, and judgment given for plaintiff, which was affirmed by the state supreme court and by the United States supreme court, on the ground that neither state nor United States courts can take property from the custody of the other.

[An important case on this subject arose in Pennsylvania. A sheriff seized a vessel under a foreign attachment in a state court, and thereafter the marshal seized her under admiralty process, although he found the sheriff in possession. The ship was sold in the state court, then sold in admiralty, then replevied by the purchaser under the former sale. Thereupon the purchaser under the admiralty sale filed a libel to regain possession. A decree for libellant was reversed in Taylor v. The Royal Saxon, Case No. 13,803, by Grier, circuit justice, who held that the sheriff's possession was conclusive against the jurisdiction of the federal court, citing and distinguishing Certain Logs of Mahogany, supra. In the replevin suit the state court gave judgment for the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, and this was affirmed in Taylor v. Carryl, 24 Pa. St. (12 Harris,) 261, where it was held that the Pennsylvania foreign attachment procedure was in rem, and among equal jurisdictions that is exclusive which is first attached. The United States supreme court affirmed this decision on appeal. Id. 20 How. (61 U. S.) 583; Mr. Chief Justice Taney and Messrs. Justices Wayne, Grier, and Clifford dissenting. This case was followed in Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. (65 U. S.) 450, where it was held that property cannot be taken by a sheriff on a process of replevin out of a marshal's hands, although the latter had made the levy on goods not named in his writ. But the marshal would be liable in trespass in a state court. Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 334. The court, state or federal, which first gets jurisdiction, holds it, to the exclusion of the other, in criminal as well as civil cases. Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 366. This was a suit on a forfeited recognizance.

[It seems that a United States court may acquire jurisdiction without a seizure by the marshal. In Coggeshall v. U. S., 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 383, a revenue officer took possession of a slave ship which entered the port of Newport, and retained it until the marshal seized her. In the mean time a sheriff levied an attachment, but it was held that the vessel was in the custody and jurisdiction of the United States while in the hands of the revenue officer, and that the federal district court had jurisdiction. Where a defendant removes a cause from a state to a federal court, and the plaintiff files an amended petition, the cause is beyond the jurisdiction of the state courts, and plaintiff cannot get from an appellate state court a reversal of the order of removal. Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 214. After a lawful seizure of the res, it is constructively in the jurisdiction of the court until the determination of the cause, although actually wrongfully removed to another district. The Rio Grande v. Otis, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 458.

[The principle of Taylor v. Carryl, supra, does not apply to libels in admiralty by the owner of a vessel claiming the benefit of the act of congress of 1851, limiting the liability of ship-owners for cargo destroyed by fire, for the United States have exclusive jurisdiction under the act, (Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Gray dissenting.) But, in the absence of such statutory exclusive jurisdiction, the principle is applicable without distinction to seizures in admiralty and by execution or attachment, (Covell v. Heyman, 111 U. S. 176, 4 Sup. Ct. 355.) See Mr. Chief Justice Taney's dissenting opinion in Taylor v. Carryl, supra; also to property in the possession of one court for administration, (Tua v. Carriere, 117 U. S. 201, 6 Sup. Ct. 565.) And a seizure by a sheriff of property in the hands of a purchaser at a marshal's sale is void where the process under which the seizure was made was begun while the property was in the custody of the federal court.]

M. M. Budlong, for Sisson.
Stanley & Brown, for Colonel Howe.
Before BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

This is a proceeding by rival claimants to recover the informer's share of moneys paid into the United States court in settlement of a suit under the customs laws. It appears that in March, 1871, the store of Smith & Beare, importers at Nos. 88 and 90 Leonard street, was seized by Colonel Howe's special agents. The books and papers of the firm were examined, and goods of the value of $9,000 were seized and taken to the custom house. Colonel Howe's agents claimed to be the informers, and filed a claim for the informer's share in the value of the goods. In May, a Mr. Sisson was arrested by the special agents being suspected to have been concerned with Smith & Beare in the transactions. Sisson gave the agents certain information, which he claimed was the cause of the recovery of the money, afterwards received on compromise. Suit was then brought against Beare for $100,000, the supposed value of the goods supposed to have been smuggled by the house. He was arrested and held to bail in the sum of $50,000, and was also arrested criminally and held to bail in $15,000. While the proceedings were pending, Smith & Beare proposed settlement, and offered to pay $14,000 if the government would stop all proceedings. The offer was accepted by the United States district attorney under the advice of the secretary of the treasury at Washington, and the money was paid into court in November last. Sisson then filed a claim as informer, and petitioned to the court to be declared such, and entitled to the informer's share, which was $3,500. Colonel Howe's agents also claimed it, and Judge Blatchford referred the case to Commissioner Osborn to take testimony and report who was entitled to the informer's share. The commissioner filed his report in April, reporting in favor of the special agents. Sisson's counsel filed exceptions to the commissioner's report, and the case came on for argument on the exceptions. It was claimed by Colonel Howe's counsel that, assuming Sisson's information to have been important, Sisson being under arrest when he gave the information, was thereby disqualified and could not be adjudged the informer. It was claimed by the other side that the only question under the statute was who gave the information that led to the recovery and that if it was Sisson's that led to the payment of the money, he was entitled to the informer's share, even if he was under arrest at the time, which was denied. After lengthy argument, Judge Blatchford decided that the commissioner had erred on the law, and that Sisson was entitled to share equally with Colonel Howe's agency. Mr. Stanley, Colonel Howe's counsel, then took out a writ of error to the United States circuit court, but before argument it was amicably adjusted between Mr. Sisson and the special agents, and orders for the discontinuance of the appeal were filed in the United States circuit court this week.

[Under the first section of the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176,) a bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to order a sale of real property of the bankrupt free from incumbrances, which are thereby transferred to the proceeds of the sale, but an application for such an order should be denied when it does not appear who are the incumbrancers, and whether they have had notice of the application.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In bankruptcy. Application for an order to authorize the sale of the Brooklyn Hall and Market, at Fulton street and Myrtle avenue. Denied.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. I am of the opinion that under the first section of the bankrupt act [March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517, c. 176] the bankrupt court acquires jurisdiction to order a sale of incumbered property of the bankrupt free from the incumbrances, which incumbrances will be thereby transferred to the proceeds of the sale. I am further of the opinion, that upon the facts, so far as they have been made to appear in support of this petition, it will be for the interest of the estate to sell the real estate referred to, subject to the first mortgage and free from all other liens or incumbrances. But I am of the opinion that no such order of sale can be properly made without previous notice to all persons claiming to have liens, incumbrances or interests in said property, and that the present application must be denied, inasmuch as it does not appear what persons have liens, incumbrances, and interests in said property, nor that such persons have had notice of this application. Whether the relief in question can be granted on a petition in the bankruptcy court, or should be prayed for by a bill in equity, it is not necessary now to decide.

[NOTE. Act March 2, 1867, § 1, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176.) provides: "The jurisdiction hereby conferred shall extend to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties; and to the marshaling and disposition of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties and due distribution of the assets among all the creditors; and to all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy. The said courts shall have full authority to compel obedience to all orders and decrees passed by them in bankruptcy, by process of contempt and other remedial process, to the same extent that the circuit courts now have in any suit pending therein in equity."]

[3. Where no creditors have proved their debts, and there are no assets, an assignee should nevertheless be appointed, since creditors may appear and assets may be found.]

Where the petitioner in bankruptcy has no property except what he claims as exempt, and his creditors are all of one class, he is not required in making up his schedule to use the entire list of forms in bankrupt proceedings; he need use only such as are appropriate to and descriptive of the debts and property he is required to list.]

[7. Where a petitioner in bankruptcy has made advances as security for fees to the register, clerk, and marshal, he is not entitled to reimbursement therefor by the assignee out of the estate.]

In bankruptcy. In divers cases before J. Sayles Brown, register in bankruptcy, District of Columbia, the following questions arose, and having been certified to Judge Wylie, his opinion on each question is appended.

Of Notice to Show Cause Why Discharge Should not be Granted.

If at the time the bankrupt applies for his discharge no creditors have proved their debts, and no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, is notice to show cause required, and, if so, what notice?

WYLIE, J. In such case, the only notice which can be given is that by publication, and such notice is, I think, required by the law. The length of time, and the number of newspapers for the publication, have not been prescribed in the act, but are to be fixed by the court, according to its discretion in each case.

Disposition of Balance of Deposit of $50.

If a balance of the deposit remains in the hands of the register at the close of a case in bankruptcy, to whom shall he pay it? Is it the property of the assignee or of the bankrupt?

WYLIE, J. It would be part of the assets, and should be paid to the assignee.

Appointment of Assignee, No Debts Proved, and No Assets.

When no creditors have proved their debts, and there are no assets, should an assignee be appointed?

WYLIE, J. I think an assignee should be appointed, nevertheless. There may be creditors who have not proved their debts, and the assignee might find assets which the petitioner may have overlooked.

Judgment Debts Due Firms Need not be Scheduled to Individual Members of Said Firm.

When a petitioner owes a judgment debt, contracted with a firm composed of several individuals, should the debt be scheduled as due the firm under the name and style by which it is known, or should the individual names of the persons comprising the firm be set out as creditors; or should the individual names comprising the firm be given, and then add,—Partners comprising the firm of A. B. & Co. Which of these forms are admissible, and which is the best practice?

WYLIE, J. Either one of these forms would be good; but the first is the best, for the petitioner might be mistaken as to some of the members of a partnership, or might in fact be ignorant as to the membership of some of the partners. That is his risk, however. It is safest merely to return the partnership debt as due to the firm without naming the individual partners.

Service of New Notice in Cases of Defective Notice—Appearance of Creditor on Defective Notice—Waiver.

When in issuing the warrant or in serving the notices for the first meeting of creditors a mistake has been made in the name of one or more of the creditors, so that he is not addressed by his true name, and there is not time after the discovery of such defect to send notice, may such failure of notice be cured, and if not cured, will it be ground for denying the bankrupt a discharge from the debt due such unnotified creditor?

WYLIE, J. Every creditor must have notice served upon him in the manner prescribed by the act, otherwise he will not be bound by the proceedings. A notice not addressed to a creditor by his name amounts to no notice. The only way in which to cure such error is by issuing and serving a new and correct notice, unless the creditor will voluntarily appear and waive the notice, which, of course, will bind him.

Only Such Forms and Schedules as Are Requisite to Set Forth Assets and Liabilities Truly Need be Used.

When a petitioner in bankruptcy has no property except what he claims as exempt, and his creditors are all under one class,—as for example, creditors whose claims are unsecured,—is the debtor required, in making up schedules of his debts and estate, to use the entire list of forms in all cases laid down in the general orders and forms of proceedings in bankruptcy adopted by the supreme court of the United States, or shall he use such only of said forms as are appropriate to, and descriptive of, the debts and property he is to list?

WYLIE, J. The petitioner is required to use such only of the forms as are appropriate to and descriptive of the debts and property he is required to list. It would be absurd to require him to file in addition thereto a large mass of forms, all of which are simply blanks. He should state, however, the reason why these were omitted.

Payment of Fees by Voluntary Petitioner—Disbursement by Assignee.

When a petitioner in bankruptcy, who has assets, has made advances as security for fees to the register, the clerk, and the marshal, is he to be reimbursed by the assignee out of the estate for these expenses?

WYLIE, J. He is not. The money he advances is not his own, but should be returned as a part of petitioner's assets and handed over to the assignee. The assignee should be credited with the fees so paid, and not the petitioner.

BANKRUPTCY—WARRANT—SERVICE—ELECTION OF ASSIGNEE.

[1. The direction in a warrant in bankruptcy for service "either by mail or personally" does not confer discretionary power upon the marshal, who must serve all by mail unless the warrant directs him to serve personally certain specified persons; but the register may strike from the warrant the words "either," "or personally."]

[2. If but a single creditor proves his debt, and attends the first meeting of creditors, he is entitled to name the assignee.]

In bankruptcy. The district court of the southern district of New York has decided upon an application made to it under the provision of section 6 of the act, that the words in the warrant (form No. 6) "either by mail or personally," do not confer upon the marshal any discretion as to the manner of service; but, on the other hand, it is the duty of the marshal to serve all by mail, unless directed in the warrant to serve personally certain parties therein specified by name; and that it is competent for the registers, in their discretion, to strike out the word "either" and the words "or personally" from the warrant.

On the return of the warrant, at the first meeting of the creditors, let the creditors who wish to have a voice in choosing an assignee, appear a few minutes before the hour designated for the meeting, and make proof of their respective debts. The registers are furnished with blanks for this purpose, which conform in size and shape to the other papers, and which can readily be filled up and sworn to. It will be observed that it is the majority in number and amount, who, at or before the first meeting, prove their debts, that are entitled to choose their assignee. So that it would appear if but a single creditor attend such a meeting and prove his debts, he is entitled to name the assignee.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBTS—DISCHARGE—NOTICE.

[1. All proofs of debts are to be sent to the assignee, for him to register, as required by section 22 of the bankrupt act, and thereafter returned to the register, and filed in the clerk's office with the other papers, under general order No. 7.]

[2. If the bankrupt does not apply for his discharge within three months from the time of his being adjudged a bankrupt, the notice need say nothing about the second or third meetings of creditors, which should be left to be regulated by sections 27 and 28 of the act.]

In bankruptcy. The following questions were put by Register Gates:

Section twenty-two, general clause one hundred and five, requires register to mail proof of claims to assignee. General clause one hundred and nine, next section: "The court shall allow all debts duly proved, and shall cause a list thereof to be made and certified by one of the registers." What is to be done with this list after it is "made and certified?" and if it is to be sent to the assignee, need the proofs of claims also be sent to him?

If proofs of claims and depositions are to be sent to assignee, what is he to do with them finally? Are they not to be annexed to and filed with other papers at end of case? and if so, how is register to get them? Some have notes and other evidence of debt attached, and unless the parties choose to have copies made, as provided for by the act, these go into the hands of the assignee, with proof of debts. I would like to know what the practice is in these respects.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. All proofs of debt are, under section twenty-two, to be sent to the assignee for him to register them, as required by section twenty-two. The list to be made by the register, under sections twenty-three and twenty-seven, is the list shown by forms thirty-two and thirty-three, and is a list for a dividend. That list is to be given to the assignee. See Mem. at end of form No. 33. The list can be made from the register kept by the assignee, under section twenty-two. When the assignee has made his register he must return the proofs of debt to the register, and they must, under general order number seven, be filed in the clerk's office, with the other papers in the case.

The register replied: Suppose the second and third meetings of creditors have not been held, and no assets come into the hands of the assignee, and that after the expiration of three months from the date of adjudication the bankrupt applies for his discharge. Need notice make any mention of second and third meetings of creditors, or need there be any such?

To which the judge says: If the bankrupt does not apply for his discharge within three months from the time of his being adjudged a bankrupt, the notice need say nothing about the second or third meetings of creditors. Those meetings will be left to be regulated by the provisions of sections twenty-seven and twenty-eight of the act.

BANKRUPTCY—SCHEDULE OF CREDITORS—NEWSPAPERS.

[In a bankrupt's schedule of creditors containing debts owing to newspapers, the names of the proprietors of the newspapers should be given, and not the names of the newspapers only.]

In bankruptcy. Register Sprague, of the northern district of New York, stated that a petition has been presented to him for certification, and that the schedule of creditors contained the names of sundry newspapers to which the debtor was owing debts, but the names of the proprietors of the papers were not given, and he was in doubt whether he ought to grant a certificate.

HALL, District Judge, said he was of opinion that the names of the proprietors must be given in order to comply with the act; that the owners of the paper and not the paper were the creditors.

It was also questioned whether a schedule which gave the residence of creditors in abbreviations, as "Mich." for Michigan, "N. Y." for New York, could be certified. The judge remarked that he could not decide the points ex parte, but intimated that general order number fourteen did not allow of abbreviations or interlineations in the schedule.

EVIDENCE—PREFERENCE—PRACTICE.

1. An answer sworn to by a bankrupt in a suit in chancery, may be used as evidence against him in bankruptcy.

2. Where it appeared that the bankrupt had, prior to the passage of the act in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving preferences to certain of his creditors, confessed several judgments to a large amount, upon which executions were issued forthwith, in virtue of which all his property was sold. Held, that he was not entitled to a discharge and certificate without the assent of a majority in interest of his creditors, who had not been preferred.

3. It is not put upon the bankrupt to come prepared with such assent on the day to show cause.

In bankruptcy. This being the day to show cause against granting a discharge to the bankrupt, objections were filed by several creditors, charging him with having, on the 5th and 11th of January, 1841, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving a preference to certain of his creditors, confessed several judgments to a large amount, whereon he permitted executions to be issued forthwith, in virtue of which all his property was sold. For the purpose of establishing the truth of the objections, an exemplification of the sworn answer of the bankrupt to a bill lately brought against him in the state court of chancery, was offered in evidence, which answer it was insisted by the counsel for the objectors contained admissions fully demonstrating the truth of the objections and therefore rendered it unnecessary to take a rule for the examination of witnesses. The sufficiency of the admission contained in the answer was not denied by the counsel for the bankrupt; provided the answer was admissible in evidence.

Goodwin & Smith, for objectors.

Myers, for bankrupt.

CONKLING, District Judge. The admissions of the bankrupt in the answer in chancery, are unquestionably evidence against him; and if, as seems to be tacitly conceded, they establish the truth of the objections, no discharge can now be granted. But the preferences imputed to the bankrupt having been given before the passage of the act, are only a qualified bar to a discharge, which may be removed by the assent of a majority in interest of those of his creditors who have not been preferred. No period is fixed by the act within which such assent must be obtained; but from the nature of the case there must be some reasonable limit to this period. It was suggested by one of the counsel for the objecting creditors, that the bankrupt ought to be required to come prepared with the assent on the day to show cause. There is nothing in the terms of the act demanding so great strictness, and I am of opinion that such a construction would be unreasonable. The bankrupt ought to be allowed sufficient time after the decision against him on the objections, to ascertain the disposition of his creditors, and obtain the assent of such of them as are willing to give it. The length of time actually necessary for this purpose in any particular case, would of course depend on the circumstances of the case; and the absence or remote residence of creditors might require a considerable period. The act being unfortunately silent on the subject, it would seem from the necessity of the case to rest altogether in the discretion of the courts. They might prescribe a period in each case with reference to the circumstances pertaining to it. But this would be inconvenient; and it would therefore, I think, be better to fix a period applicable to all cases; and for the reasons already stated, this ought to be of considerable length. It was suggested, also, that no discharge ought to be granted on the assent of creditors, without previous notice to the objecting creditors. This seems to be reasonable, in order to afford them an opportunity to contest the existence and amounts of the debts claimed by the assenting creditors. It will therefore be necessary to frame additional rules to regulate the practice in this respect, and I shall accordingly direct my attention to the subject for that purpose.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE AND CERTIFICATE—JURY TRIAL—RIGHT TO BEGIN.

On trial by jury to determine the right of a bankrupt to a discharge and certificate, the opposing creditor has the affirmative of the issue, and has consequently the right to begin.

At the close of an argument, on a motion for a new trial by jury to determine the right of a bankrupt to a discharge, Mr. Myers stated to the court, that considerable doubt and some diversity of opinion and practice prevailed among the commissioners before whom trials of this nature had from time to time been ordered, upon the question, whether it was the right of the objecting creditor, or of the bankrupt, to begin; and he suggested that, as there were yet many trials to be had, an expression of the opinion of the court on this point, would be useful in relieving the commissioners from embarrassment, and in producing uniformity in the practice.

CONKLING, District Judge, said he had never entertained any doubt on the point, but had uniformly been of opinion that the opposing creditor was to be considered as holding the affirmative of the issue, and ought to begin. The granting of a discharge was a matter of course, unless objections were affirmatively interposed and affirmatively sustained by evidence. In such a proceeding, the objector was the actor, and the bankrupt stood on the defensive.

ALIEN—NATURALIZATION—RESIDENCE.

1. To entitle an alien to be naturalized, [Under Act April 14, 1802, (2 Stat. 153, c. 28,)] it is not enough that he should have been within the jurisdiction of the United States for more than five years; the act of Congress contemplates a territorial residence.

2. Where, therefore, an alien deserted from a ship of war and enlisted on board an American frigate in 1814, war then existing between the two nations, and continued in the United States navy throughout the war and for several years subsequently, and had since that time followed the seas constantly, sometimes in the merchant, and at other times in the United States service, but had had no residence within any part of the United States, other than by such employment on board American vessels. Held, that he had not been a resident, within the meaning of the act of congress, and was not entitled to be naturalized.

[In the matter of the application of an alien for a certificate of naturalization. Denied.]

BETTS, District Judge. Application is made by an alien to be naturalized upon these facts: The applicant deserted from a British ship of war, and enlisted on board an American frigate in 1814, war then existing between the two nations. He continued in the United States navy through the war and several years subsequently, and since that time has followed the seas constantly, sometimes in the merchant, and at other times in the United States service. He has had no residence within any part of the United States, other than by such employment on board American vessels. In 1832 he filed his declaration of intention to become naturalized. The point for decision, applying these facts to the law, is whether such residence has been shown as is required by the act of congress. When the applicant came within the jurisdiction of the United States in 1814, the laws in force made it necessary he should prove to the court a residence within the United States five years at least, and within the state where his application is made one year at least, in order to obtain his naturalization. Act April 11, 1802, § 1, art. 3, [Act April 14, 1802; 2 Stat. 153.]

It is plain these provisions demand more than that the applicant should be within the jurisdiction of the United States, and look to a territorial residence. The policy of the naturalization laws is to amalgamate immigrants with the resident population. This is ascertained, not only from our legislative and political history, but is distinctly indicated upon the face of every enactment on the subject. The act of March 26, 1790, [1 Stat. 103,] the first one on the subject passed under the federal constitution, required a residence of at least two years within the limits, and under the jurisdiction of the United States; and that the jurisdiction referred to is territorial, and inter fines, is made manifest by the addition that the alien is to make his application to a court in some one state wherein he has resided for the term of one year at least. At that day there were many military posts and stations still occupied by the British forces, which could not, until surrender or conquest be regarded as under our actual jurisdiction, and it might be questioned whether the Indian country in possession of the natives, but within the boundaries of the United States, might not be claimed as a place of residence, where a right to naturalization might be acquired, although not under the dominion of the laws of the United States. To mark, then, definitely, the policy upon which the privilege rests, that the foreigner should be intermingled and incorporated with citizens resident upon the soil of the United States, congress enacted that in addition to his coming within the limits of the country, the alien should place himself also under its laws and authority.

The act of January 29, 1792, (2 Stat. 446,) does not include the condition of jurisdiction required in the subsequent act of 1802, and that condition is only afterwards enjoined in relation to certain classes of residents. Acts March 22, 1816, [3 Stat. 258,] and May 26, 1828, [Act May 24, 1828; 4 Stat. 310.]

This applicant most clearly could not, under the laws then in force, have obtained a certificate of naturalization, if he had taken the earliest measures for it, after abandoning his country, without having first acquired a residence within some state or territory of the United States. An employment in the naval marine would not be a residence within any state, nor would sailing in merchant vessels gain an inhabitancy within this state, according to the local law of that period, or as it now prevails. Rev. Laws N. Y. April 8, 1813; 1 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 621, § 29. [See note at end of case.]

The laws of the United States were essentially modified with respect to the particular of residence by the act of March 3rd, 1813, the 12th section enacting, "that no person who shall arrive in the United States, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, who shall not, for the continued term of five years next preceding his admission as aforesaid, have resided within the United States without being at any time during the said five years out of the territory of the United States." 4 Stat. 514. The act commenced operation with the determination of the last war, (Feb. 1815,) but the facts agreed in this case, show that the applicant did not come within the territory of the United States until after that period. His being on board a public vessel would not constitute a residence, which would afterwards go on, because, as has been already indicated, under the act of 1802, the residence must have its commencement within the territory of the country. Probably after a domicile is acquired within the country, it might, under the act of 1802, be regarded as continuing so as to satisfy at least four of the five years required, although the applicant should be during that period engaged in the merchant or naval service, but the beginning must necessarily be his coming within the country, with intent to render this his only abode and home. There was, accordingly, no arrival of the applicant within the United States according to the intent of the act of 1813, until after that had gone into operation, and then in its terms it inhibits the grant of naturalization, when the applicant has been during any part of the five years out of the territory of the United States. This applicant had been, almost without intermission, out of the territory of the United States, following the seas as his sole occupation, and having no fixed home within this country. The act of March 3rd, 1813, whilst it declares a great principle in excluding foreigners from our national and merchant marine, and in bestowing the employment upon our citizens, must still be regarded as growing out of the relations notoriously existing at the time between the United States and Great Britain on that subject. The aggressions and outrages committed on board American vessels in searching for and impressing seamen, led to the declaration of war in 1812, and the remonstrances and recriminations which had been the chief theme in the diplomacy of the two governments for years antecedent to the war, were unquestionably intended to be afterwards avoided by the enforcement of the policy indicated by this statute. This enactment might probably be proffered by the United States, as a basis of negotiation with the English government, but although no concession of the controverted subjects was made by treaty on the part of Great Britain, yet this particular section has been allowed to stand as a solemn assurance that the privileges of naturalization, under our laws, would hereafter be restricted according to its provisions.

It is now, therefore, a part of the naturalization laws, applicable to all others as well as seafaring men, who have emigrated to the United States since 1815, and must supply the rule of decision in the case now submitted to the court. The application must be, therefore, denied.

[NOTE. The provisions of 1 Rev. St. N. Y. (1st Ed. 1829,) p. 621, § 29, are as follows: "Every person of full age, who shall be a resident and inhabitant of any town for one year, and the members of his family who shall not have gained a separate settlement shall be deemed settled in such town." Here follow provisions for minors gaining a settlement. This section is a part of chapter 20, tit. 1, "Of the Relief and Support of Indigent Persons."]

Case No. 466.

ANONYMOUS.

[1 Pac. Law. Rep. 173.]

District Court, D. California. May 6, 1871.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—FRAUD—SECRETION OF GOODS.

[1. The seller of certain goods, hearing of the probable insolvency of the purchaser, made an examination of the latter's stock, and found that a part of it had been secreted. The seller then induced the buyer to give up goods enough to satisfy the debt for which a receipt in full was given. The greater part of the goods so taken had been obtained from another seller. Held, that the transaction was a fraud upon the bankruptcy act, and that the assignee subsequently appointed could recover from the seller the value of the goods so seized.]

[2. The secretion of the goods by the purchaser to prevent their being taken on attachment amounted to an act of bankruptcy.]

In bankruptcy.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. A purchased goods for business purposes of B. and also of C. B., hearing of the probable inability of A. to pay, sent an agent to demand payment, which was done, and who saw the stock of goods was much reduced, whereupon he instituted search, and found some eight hundred dollars worth of goods secreted, chiefly the goods bought of C. Thereupon he induced A. to give him sufficient of the goods to satisfy his debt to B. Subsequently, on petition of C., A. was adjudged a bankrupt. A. contends that he did not consent to B. taking the goods, but it appears that he did receive a receipt in full of B. The goods left with A. were of little value and insufficient to meet the demands of C. and others. Held:—

1. In surrendering his property, the bankrupt intended what was the inevitable result. This is made more clear from the fact of his failure to apply for a month thereafter for a division of his property among his creditors.

2. The assignee of the bankrupt now sues B. to recover the value of such goods to the estate as were seized by B., and judgment in favor of the assignee must be entered.

3. That the defendant B. obtained a preference, and has procured a payment in full of his whole demand against the bankrupt, is indisputable.

4. It is urged that it is not shown that A. was insolvent at the time of the transfer. Whether or not the total value of his stock of goods had been converted into money may be doubtful. But he was unable to pay his indebtedness as it accrued, which it is said is the test of insolvency, under the bankrupt act. He had committed an act of bankruptcy by secreting his goods, to prevent their being taken on attachment. This the defendant well knew, and the knowledge of that fact induced him to adopt summary means resorted to by him to obtain a payment of his debt. The bankrupt declined to pay the debt when demanded, and suffered his business to be broken up and the greater part of his stock in trade to be carried away. "He has since been adjudged a bankrupt, and it is to be presumed that no assets sufficient to satisfy his other indebtedness have come into the hands of the assignee; for, otherwise, this suit, which has been instituted for the benefit of the other creditors, would not have been commenced." "Under these circumstances, I cannot but consider the fact of insolvency as clearly established, and it is equally clear that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be insolvent, and that the transaction whereby he sought to obtain a preference necessarily operated a fraud on the bankrupt act."

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 10, 1842.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—GENERAL ASSIGNMENT —VALIDITY.

A general assignment without preferences is valid, under the bankrupt law; and this, though the assignor have filed a petition to be decreed a bankrupt, provided, that a decree of bankruptcy have not yet passed.
[Cited in Sullivan v. Hieskill, Case No. 13,594.]

In bankruptcy. Breneman's Case, [Case No. 1,830,] having decided that a general assignment with preferences is an act of bankruptcy, and void under bankrupt law, the question was raised, in several subsequent cases, whether a general assignment without preferences is likewise void. It was admitted by those who maintained the validity of such assignments, that under the English decisions they were void; but it was asserted that these decisions had given dissatisfaction both in England and here; and that our courts being free to decide the question on principle, should not regard those decisions. It was a doctrine which had not proved satisfactory even at home. Eden spoke of it, as a doctrine "difficult to understand." Page 28. As one whose reasons, "are by no means satisfactory." Id. Lord Eldon had more than once expressed his disapprobation of the doctrine. [Ex parte Bourne,] 16 Ves. 148; [Dutton v. Morrison,] 17 Ves. 198. It got foot from a N. P. decision of Lord Mansfield, (Co. Bankr. Law, 100,) whose great name controlled subsequent judges against their own judgment. On principle, it was not easy to understand the doctrine. Such an assignment is good at common law, by the statutes of Eliz., and it is not declared by the bankrupt act to be void. Nor was such an assignment against the policy of the act. The policy of the act is, that creditors shall be paid alike; and the act has no further policy. Now, a general assignment, without preferences, did exactly this thing. It might not do it in the manner and through the same forms as the bankrupt law would do it; but the machinery of the act was no part of its policy. The court had no right to extend the policy of the bankrupt act, beyond the point that the bankrupt act had, itself, defined.¹ Since the decision in Bennett's Case, [Case No. 1,309,] confirmed in Ex parte Dudley, [Id. 4,114,] it was argued that if a debtor had no power to make a general assignment, then the effect of the bankrupt law was to assist in giving preferences. For as a voluntary petitioner in bankruptcy is bound to set forth in his petition "an accurate inventory of his property, &c. and the location and situation of each and every parcel and portion thereof."

On the other side, it was said that the question had been settled in England by a succession of her most able judges, including Lord Hardwicke, De Grey, and Mansfield. that there was nothing in the English acts, essentially to distinguish them on this point from ours; that the reasoning of the court in Breneman's Case, [supra,] led to the doctrine of the English courts, and that that doctrine had been judicially affirmed in this country. By Judge Concklin, in the western district of New York. See [Barton v. Tower, Case No. 1,085.] It was urged likewise, that though an assignment of the sort in question, did, to a certain extent, do what a decree of bankruptcy would do, yet that those assignments being regulated entirely by state laws, the property of the debtor, and the rights of the creditor, would be subjected to a control quite collateral to this court, and which might endanger both, and be at variance with the spirit of the bankrupt law. In Pennsylvania, to this day, the assignee was selected by the debtor, and until lately (14th April, 1828) gave no security for the performance of his duty. The federal legislature had provided for the whole subject of insolvent debtors; and it was not wise to allow other jurisdictions to interfere with what had been provided for by congress. The question was adjourned into the circuit court in the following form: "First—Is an assignment of all a debtor's property made since the passage of the bankrupt law, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, void as against the assignee under the bankrupt law, so that the latter may recover the property. Second—Can a petitioner for the benefit of the bankrupt law make a voluntary assignment of all his property for the equal benefit of his creditors, after filing his petition and before decree?"

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. Neither of these assignments is an act of bankruptcy as defined in the first section of the bankrupt act. There can be no pretence of their being fraudulent upon creditors, or a fraud on the policy of that act, inasmuch as the debtor voluntarily does the very thing, which it is the policy of the law to enforce—an equal distribution among all his creditors, of all his property, real and personal, without preference. The second section provides, "That all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, endorser, surety, or other person any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt, and all other payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by such bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person or persons whatever, not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon this act; and the assignee under the bankruptcy shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover, and receive the same as part of the assets of the bankruptcy; and the person making such unlawful preferences and payments, shall receive no discharge under the provisions of this act: provided, That all dealings and transactions by and with any bankrupt, bona fide made and entered into more than two months before the petition filed against him, or by him, shall not be invalidated or affected by this act: provided, That the other party to any such dealings or transactions had no notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, or of the intention of the bankrupt to take the benefit of this act. And in case it shall be made to appear to the court, in the course of the proceedings in bankruptcy, that the bankrupt, his application being voluntary, has, subsequent to the first day of January last or at any other time in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, by assignment or otherwise, given or secured any preference to one creditor over another, he shall not receive a discharge unless the same be assented to by a majority in interest of those of his creditors who have not been so preferred." A careful analysis of this section is necessary to its proper understanding in all its parts and their bearing on each other. Its first provision is "that all future payments," &c., made "by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any person any preference over his general creditors." The second is "and all other payments," &c., "made in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person not being a bona fide creditor, or purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, shall be deemed utterly void and a fraud upon this act, and the assignee shall be entitled," &c. Two classes of cases are contemplated: both are put on the same footing, the first is a payment, &c., made after the passage of the act, which must have two ingredients. 1. It must be made "in contemplation of bankruptcy," &c. 2. For the purpose of giving a "preference over general creditors." If either is wanting, the case is not within this provision. The second is, "all other payments," &c., made at any time, "in contemplation of bankruptcy," to any person "not a bona fide creditor," without notice: here are likewise two ingredients necessary to bring a case within this class, the contemplation of bankruptcy, and a payment &c., to a person not a bona fide creditor, &c., or who has notice. This part of the law is silent as to the subject of notice, but the intention is apparent by referring to the first ingredient, "made in contemplation of bankruptcy," as the subject of notice. This means without notice of the intention or design of the bankrupt having a contemplation of bankruptcy. This is the more apparent from the language of the second proviso, where the subject of the notice is thus defined: "No notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, or of the intention of the bankrupt to take the benefit of this act." Thus referred, the subject of the notice is perfectly appropriate to the respective provisions of this section. Should a question arise on the meaning of the words "all future payments," &c.—that is to say—whether this means from the passage of the act, or, the time when it takes effect, an answer is at hand. Laws speak from the time of their enactment, unless there be some prescribed limitation to control their effect. If a rule of conduct is prescribed, as it operates by mere force of the law, no other time than the passage of the law, can be taken as intended. Laws may be retrospective likewise, as is illustrated in the section under consideration. The expression, "all future payments," refers to those made after the 19th August, 1841, as clearly as if that day had been inserted; and there being nothing in any other part of the law, by which its operation in this respect is controlled, the law operates from that day.

The next clause is retrospective, providing that any assignment made after the 1st January, 1841, giving a preference to one creditor over another shall prevent a discharge, unless there be obtained the assent of a majority in interest of the non preferred creditors. These clauses manifest the intention of the legislature. The first annuls the prohibited payments, &c., made after August; the second does not invalidate the preference given after January, 1841, but imposes a condition on the bankrupt as a prerequisite to his discharge. These are the definite periods from which the respective provisions take effect on the act done by the bankrupt. There is also a third clause, which must be taken in connection with the others,—“and all other payments,” &c. which are indefinite as to time, operating alike on the prohibited acts, done before or after the passage of the law. So read, the whole section is harmonized. To so read it as to refer future payments, to any time other than the 19th August, would make it impossible to find out the meaning of “all other payments” in their reference to the time when the provision takes effect on the act done. The law clearly contemplates a difference in point of time, between the commission of the acts which are the ingredients of the two distinct classes of cases which are declared to be frauds upon it. If they are referred to the same time, the two classes of cases become confounded into one, which will be incapable of definition without judicial legislation. For instance, if all future payments, and all other payments, are referred to the 1st February, 1842, there is no clue by which to separate the two classes; the law must refer to that day in both clauses and make them read, all payments made after the 1st February, 1842, leaving the words all other payments wholly inoperative. Such a construction would be inadmissible for the reasons given in the case Ex parte Irwine, [Case No. 7,086,] and on general principles. This construction, or rather plain reading of the second section, is not inconsistent with the seventeenth section, which declares, “that this act shall take effect from and after the 1st February next.” This means that proceedings under the act may then commence and be carried on under and according to its provisions regulating the forms and modes of action to its close: that was the period at which the jurisdiction of the district court arose and might be exercised. But the fixing a time at which the power of that court came into existence; at which there could be judicial action on the various provisions of the law, presenting rules for the judgment of the court; or merely delineating a course for its proceedings, is wholly distinct from fixing a time at which certain defined acts of the debtor should be deemed frauds upon the law, and which the court should be bound to adjudge void. Judicial action under the law could not begin till the appointed time; but when it begins, the law has prescribed definite rules by which to judge of the validity of antecedent acts bearing on the policy of the law. It cannot be supposed that no provision was intended to be made for those acts of the debtor, done between the passage of the act and the time when proceedings might begin under it, which would contravene the whole object of the law, and defeat an equal, or any distribution of the debtor's property among his general creditors, by permitting preferences made in contemplation of bankruptcy, or assignments so made, to others than bona fide creditors without notice. Such an intention would be as inconsistent with the general policy of the whole law, as repugnant to the definite provisions of the second section. On the contrary, the intent of the law as expressed in plain language, the provisions to prevent frauds upon it, are too manifest to admit of a doubt. These considerations suffice to dispose of the first question presented. An assignment made after the passage of the bankrupt act, is within the second section, if made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any preference over the general creditors: it is void as a fraud upon the law; so if the assignee is not a bona fide creditor, or purchaser without notice. But an assignment for the equal benefit of all creditors, is not within the first clause as to all future payments,—a preference being an indispensable ingredient to make it void; and if the assignees fill the character of bona fide creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, a like ingredient is wanting to constitute a case of fraud upon the law within the second clause, as to all other payments, &c. It follows that such an assignment as stated in the first question being valid independently of the bankrupt act, and not invalidated by any of the provisions of the act, the assignee under that act cannot recover the property assigned.

The second question adjourned to this court, relates to a voluntary assignment, of all the debtor's property, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, after filing his petition. The foregoing remarks will apply, to this case, unless the law give some effect to the filing of the petition on the property of the debtor, before he is declared a bankrupt, by which he is prohibited from making any valid disposition of it, after the filing the petition and before a decree of bankruptcy, —in other words, unless the decree relates to the filing the petition, so as to act on an assignment otherwise valid. In Ex parte Dudley. [Case No. 4,114.] this court expressed itself fully on the effect of a decree on liens created after the filing the petition, and before the decree. In the reasons for the opinion then delivered, there will be found the grounds of the decision that the decree had no effect by relation, on antecedent judgments, executions, and levies on the property of a bankrupt; the same course of reasoning and the reference to authority in that case, will apply to an assignment such as stated in this question, and we think with greater force on the language of the third section taken in connection with the first.

By the first section it is provided, "That all persons whatsoever," &c. "who shall by petition," &c. "apply to the proper court," &c. "for the benefit of this act, and therein declare themselves to be unable to meet their debts and engagements, shall be deemed bankrupts within the provisions of this act, and may be so declared accordingly by a decree of such court." This is the definition of a voluntary bankrupt. The following of an involuntary one: "All persons being merchants," &c. "shall be liable to become bankrupts," &c. "and may upon the petition of one or more creditors," &c. "be so declared in the following cases, to wit," &c. These definitions must be carried into the third section, to explain the true meaning of its provisions, which are, "That all the property and rights of property, of every name and nature, and whether real, personal or mixed, of every bankrupt, except as is hereinafter provided, who shall by a decree of the proper court be declared to be a bankrupt within this act, shall, by mere operation of law, ipso facto, from the time of such decree, be deemed to be divested out of such bankrupt, without any other act, assignment, or other conveyance whatsoever; and the same shall be vested, by force of the same decree, in such assignee as from time to time shall be appointed by the proper court for this purpose; which power of appointment and removal such court may exercise at its discretion, toties quoties; and the assignee so appointed shall be vested with all the rights, titles, powers, and authorities to sell, manage, and dispose of the same, and to sue for and defend the same, subject to the order and direction of such court, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as the same were vested in, or might be exercised by, such bankrupt before or at the time of his bankruptcy declared as aforesaid; and all suits in law or in equity then pending, in which such bankrupt is a party, may be prosecuted and defended by such assignee to their final conclusion, in the same way and with the same effect, as they might have been by such bankrupt."

That the term bankrupt is used in a double sense in the first clause of the first section, is evident. A petitioner for the benefit of the act is deemed to be a bankrupt within its purview, from the time of filing his petition, and may be declared so by a decree:— in the second clause, a merchant is liable to become a bankrupt on the petition of a creditor, and may be so declared accordingly in the cases specified; thus discriminating between the person who is decreed a bankrupt in the one case, or liable to become bankrupt in the other, and those who are actually declared so by a decree. Having drawn this distinction in the first section, it cannot be supposed that it was lost sight of in the third, nor that in prescribing the time and the acts by which the property of the bankrupt should pass to the assignees, congress intended to use the term bankrupt, as denoting one who was not declared so, but was merely deemed so, or liable to become so. Such supposition is contrary not only to settled rules of interpreting law, but to the plain language of this section—"All the property and right of property," &c. of every bankrupt "who shall by a decree of the proper court be declared a bankrupt within this act, shall by mere operation of law, ipso facto from the time of such decree be deemed to be divested," &c.: not all the property of every person who is deemed to be, or liable to become a bankrupt, but of every one who is so decreed to be. It is only the decreed bankrupt whose property passes from him to the assignee by the decree: it is the property which is owned by him at that time, not what had been divested by legal process, or a previous valid sale or assignment, by which rights of property had become vested in others. The decree operates only on his property and rights of property. If this clause of the law stood alone, it would not admit of the construction, that the expression, a person who was deemed, or liable to become a bankrupt, meant the same thing as a bankrupt who shall by a decree of the proper court, be declared to be a bankrupt: That potential, was actual, adjudged, bankruptcy; and if this clause could be so tortured; if it were the only one in this section which bore on this subject, it would be in direct collision with the two following; "and the same (all property and rights of property) shall be vested by force of the same decree, in such assignee," &c. be "and the assignee so appointed," &c. "shall be vested with all the rights," &c. "and to sue for and defend the same," &c. "as fully to all intents and purposes, as the same were vested in, or might be exercised by such bankrupt, before or at the time of his bankruptcy declared as aforesaid." This clause points directly to the declared, and not the deemed or potential bankruptcy. It gives the assignee the same, and no other right or power, than existed in the debtor up to the decree. If the bankrupt had no power over his property after his petition was filed, or a merchant, &c. after an act of bankruptcy, this language is senseless; and congress must be deemed incapable of expressing their intention in intelligible terms, and not to have understood what they have said, in prescribing a rule of property. Had it been intended that any other act than the decrees should directly or by retrospection operate from the filing of the petition, or the act of bankruptcy, it was most easy to have said so, as in the tenth section of the act of 1800, 1 Story's Laws, 736, but this law has deliberately pointed to the decree as the only operative act, and by necessary implication from plain language declared, that it did not affect what was done before or at the time of the judicial declaration of bankruptcy. The property of the debtor passed from him to the assignee by the judgment of the court, and not the acts of the bankrupt previously, or by making the judgment so operate by relation.

The next clause is to the same effect—"and all facts in law or in equity then pending, in which such bankrupt is a party, may be prosecuted, and defended by such assignee to their final conclusion, in the same way and with the same effect, as they might have been by such bankrupt." Suits then pending, means, at and before the decree: Such bankrupt, means one so declared by a decree. Now if the decree operates by relation to the petition, on property which the bankrupt then owned, but of which he was divested by operation of law or his own act, it must have the same relation to suits then depending, and if the court may place in the hands of a receiver the property of a bankrupt before a decree, they may likewise appoint a prochein ami to prosecute and a guardian to defend all suits to which the bankrupt was a party at the time of filing the petition, or the act of bankruptcy. When it thus appears that congress has in each of these clauses, so expressly declared the decree to be the act which divests the bankrupt of all his property and rights of property—vested the same in the assignee precisely as it was in the debtor before and at the time of rendering the decree—and transferred to the assignee the management of all suits depending at that time, it seems impossible to give, by mere construction, the same effect to the filing the petition, or an act of bankruptcy, without the assumption by the court, of legislative power. A general view of the whole section, equally precludes all relation of the effect of the decree, to any antecedent act of either a petitioner for the benefit of the act, or a merchant, &c. who may be brought within it on the petition of a creditor.

It cannot be denied, that all the provisions of this section apply equally to cases of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcies, in respect to the operation of the decree, and to the term bankrupt throughout, while the first section discriminates between a petitioner for the benefit of the act; declaring that he shall be deemed a bankrupt, and the merchant, &c. who shall be liable to become a bankrupt, but is nowhere declared to be deemed or considered as one, in any part of the law, before a decree. Now if the term bankrupt refers to the petition in the one case, and the act of bankruptcy in the other, it includes the merchant who was not so at the time, but in the very words of the law was only liable to become a bankrupt, and could become one only by a decree; thus giving the same meaning to these two different phrases "shall be deemed bankrupt," and "shall be liable to become bankrupt," and making the third section declare a merchant to be by relation an actual bankrupt, when, by the first section he could not be declared one, unless he was brought within one of the defined cases. In our view of this whole section, it refers only to the bankrupt who is declared so by a decree; to his "bankruptcy declared as aforesaid," and to "every bankrupt alike," and to "such bankrupt," and such only as on their own, or the petition of a creditor, had been judicially determined to be such.

When an attempt is made to engraft the doctrine of relation on the provisions of this section, it is unsupported by any one title in the whole law, to justify it. As a matter of construction, it is a gratuitous assumption of an intention of the legislature, as repugnant to their words as to the general design of all the parts which constitute the system of bankruptcy which they have established. If the principles and rules by which statutes are expounded, will justify the insertion of a retrospective effect of a decree to any prior act, it may as well be applied to the passage of a bankrupt act, as a petition voluntarily filed under it, or an act committed which brings it to bear on a person against his will. The relation to an act of bankruptcy, was an express provision of the bankrupt act of 1800, and was from the first, a part of the English system of bankruptcy; but this furnishes no good reason for our adopting, by mere judicial power, a principle for which there is no colour in the act of 1841, and which was embodied in the act of 1800, only by the force of a legislative enactment, in language too plain for doubt, or even for argument. The reasons which induced the legislature to ingraft the doctrine of relation on a system of involuntary bankruptcy, can have no operation on the system of the present act, which introduces a new and anomalous feature, that of voluntary bankruptcy in which the debtor is the actor. In the former, the debtor was forced into the operation of the law: in the latter he comes voluntarily, at such time as he pleases; and as held by the learned judge of the first circuit, and by this court, can withdraw his petition at any time before a decree. If then the district court should assume the power of placing the property of a petitioner into the hands of a receiver, and appoint a person to conduct the suits to which he is a party, a withdrawal of the petition would restore his property, and give him the management of his suits; a consequence which would be unavoidable, thereby leaving the court nothing on which it could exercise any power, and enabling the petitioner to defeat what had been ordered, while there was a case for judicial action. It cannot be imagined that such was the intention of the legislature, or that it could have been their opinion, that the law would admit of such a construction, as to make a rule of property dependent on an act of a debtor which he could revoke and renew at his option. In denying the doctrine of relation, we run counter to no provision of the law. In adopting it, we should introduce a feature at war with its whole scope and policy, as well as repugnant to its plain language. It is therefore the opinion of the court that an assignment such as is stated in the second question is valid under the bankrupt act. The first question must consequently be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

SHIPPING—MATE BECOMING MASTER—LIABILITY ON CONTRACTS BY PREDECESSOR.

[A mate who, by the death of the master of a ship, becomes master for the rest of the voyage, is not responsible upon a contract for seamen's wages made by his predecessor in that office, and is a competent witness in a suit by such seamen against the owners.]

[See Atkyns v. Burrows, Case No. 618.]

[In admiralty. Libel for seamen's wages.]

In a late case, in the district court, a question was made as to the responsibility of a mate, who, by the death of a captain, became master, by succeeding to that berth on a voyage. One, under these circumstances, was offered as a witness, on the part of the owner, in a suit, by a mariner, against the ship and owner. It was said he was not answerable to the seamen for any wages; a liability for which, only attached by contract made with the late master; he was, therefore, disinterested in any event. On the other side it was contended, that by operation of law, the liability grew out of service, and not positive contract. If it did not reach farther than to the late master's death, it was operative for all wages accrued since that event.

BY THE COURT. I will not determine this point, so as to preclude further investigation, if it shall arise in a question directly. I will not refuse to admit the witness, if it is pressed. But there is other testimony, perhaps sufficient. I incline strongly to the opinion of the counsel for the owner. The necessary, but casual successor to the late master, is only accountable for his own transactions. Bills of lading signed by his predecessor, do not bind him, though he may be responsible for the goods, if on board, in their condition at the time he succeeds to the command. He must sue in the admiralty as mate; and his wages, as such only, are recoverable here. [The Favourite,] 2 Rob. Adm. Cas. 196, (Philadelphia Ed.) [2 C. Rob. Adm. 232.] His claim for services, as temporary master, either demanded as additional wages, or as a quantum meruit, must be agitated elsewhere.

Other testimony was produced, a compromise took place, and the point subsided.

ALIENS—NATURALIZATION—REGISTRATION—PROOF—ACT APRIL 14, 1802.

1. Under the act of April 14th, 1802, [2 Stat. 154.] the registry of aliens required by the second section of the law, must have been made five years before the application for naturalization.

2. The applicant must also prove the period of his residence in the United States, and also, the other matters required by the provisions of the section.

3. Parol evidence of the arrival of an applicant for naturalization, five years prior to the application, is insufficient.

Upon a motion to admit an application for naturalization, the court decided, that under the act of April 14th, 1802, [2 Stat. 154.] the registry required by the second section must have been made five years antecedent to the application. Because, as the term of the arrival of the alien is not required to be set forth in the report and certificate, and yet it is declared to be evidence of that fact, it can only be so by referring to the date of the report itself. Besides this, the party must exhibit common law proof of the length of his residence in the United States, as also of the other matters mentioned in the third condition of the first section. The applicant offered to prove, by parol evidence, that he arrived in the United States more than five years ago, but the court thought this insufficient.

QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS.

In a criminal case now on trial in the United States circuit court Chief Justice Taney has decided the following to be the proper qualifications for a juror to try the issue: "If the juror has formed an opinion that the prisoners are guilty, and entertains that opinion now without waiting to hear the testimony, then he is incompetent. But if from reading the newspapers or hearing reports, he has impressions on his mind unfavorable to the prisoners, but has no opinion or prejudice which will prevent him from doing impartial justice when he hears the testimony, then he is competent."

[The importation of articles of merchandise incased in boxes embellished with pictures and fancy drawings "too indelicate for family use," and of an indecent character, tending to the corruption of the public morals, come within the prohibition of the statute ordering the forfeiture of indecent and obscene articles.]

[Proceedings by United States against Amar Young, Bros. & Co. for the condemnation of certain articles of merchandise enclosed in boxes embellished with prints and pictures of an indecent and obscene character. Verdict of condemnation.]

Ethan Allen, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., for the government.

Webster & Craig, for claimants.

An important issue was tried January 8th 1865 before his honor, Judge Betts, in the United States district court, involving the right of merchants to import merchandise containing articles of an indecent character, which resulted in the forfeiture of the merchandise brought before the court. Messrs. Amar Young, Bros. & Co., of Philadelphia, imported from Liverpool in January last quantity of linen handkerchiefs and linen shirt fronts, valued at $10,000, which were contained in one hundred and sixty-five boxes, one dozen handkerchiefs in each box. Of these boxes about twelve were found to be embellished with pictures and fancy drawings, much too common in our shop windows, and known as "Susanna at the Bath," "Diana and her Nymphs," &c. &c. These goods were seized at the custom-house and brought into court for condemnation. It appeared from the evidence introduced for the defense that boxes, or cartoons, similar to those in question were imported and sold at this port by the first class mercantile firms as freely as were the linen handkerchiefs which they contained, which were usually of the best quality of linen goods imported. The very merchants who confessed so readily to buying and to selling these "fancy boxes," as they are styled, admitted that they were "rather indelicate" for family use, but as the "fancy prints" helped the sale, they considered themselves fully justified in dealing in them as they had for years. Mr. Ethan Allen, for the government, urged upon the jury that these articles were indecent, because they were, in the language of some of the witnesses, "too indelicate for family use;" that if they ought not to go into the family they ought not to be permitted to enter the community, which was happily an aggregation of families; that these things were none the less indecent, because they had been for a long time freely imported, and by the best and most immaculate of our mercantile firms. Neither time, nor the exalted character of the devotee, could purify debauchery, nor make indecency respectable. If the importation of such articles had become so common, that men of probity and high social position openly advocated the traffic, this fact of itself was an argument why the salacious, lewd current, which was setting towards our shores from Europe, and increasing in volume, should be stopped forthwith and forever.

The court charged, that if the jury found that the articles in question were indecent, so as to corrupt public morals, they were bound to condemn them; but if they found that the pictures were only of a coarse or vulgar nature, but insignificant in themselves and harmless, however reprehensible it might be to deal in them, still in this view they were not within the meaning of the statute that ordered the forfeiture of indecent and obscene articles. The jury were out about half an hour, when they returned a verdict for the government.

PETITIONS ARE NOT ALLOWED TO BE FILED WHERE THE WRITING IS ILLEGIBLE.

In bankruptcy.

HALL, District Judge, has refused to allow a petition to be filed on account of the illegible manner in which it was written. The names of the petitioner and his attorney are suppressed for obvious reasons. The judge said:—The clerk is directed not to file the foregoing petition, schedule and inventory, or any other so illegible. Looking to the petition alone, without some knowledge or information other than that to be derived from the marks intended for letters, no one can certainly determine the name of petitioner, or of the town or county of his residence, or the name of his attorneys; and the names and residences of many of the creditors are so illegibly written that, from the schedules themselves, no register could, without further knowledge or information, determine with anything like reasonable certainty, the name or address to be inserted in the warrant directing the notices to such creditors to be served by mail. In addition to these defects, a considerable proportion of the words really intended by the scrawls which disfigured the schedule and inventory, can be guessed at but not read. The 14th of the general orders promulgated by the justices of the supreme court of the United States requires that "all petitions and schedules filed therewith shall be printed or written plainly and without abbreviation or interlineation, except when such abbreviation or interlineation may be for the purpose of reference; and the utmost liberality that the district court can exercise, under such order, will fall far short of excusing the numerous and obvious defects in these papers. I think the register might properly have refused his certificate.

IN THE CASE OF THE CLERK'S FEES.

[Taney, 453.]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1841.

CLERK OF COURT—FEES—HOW DETERMINED.

1. The third section of the act of congress of 28th February, 1799, among other things, declares that "in case a clerk of a court of the United States perform any duty for which the laws of the state make no provision, the court in which such service shall be performed, shall make a reasonable compensation therefor." Held, that in order to determine what is a reasonable compensation, the court must look to what the law allows in similar cases.

[Cited in Jerman v. Stewart, 12 Fed. 275.]

2. That whatever the legislature allows to the officer in any case, it must be supposed, they considered a reasonable compensation, and meant a compensation at the same rate, when they referred it to the court to make a reasonable allowance.

3. That acting upon this principle, the fees allowed in the case of a seizure of goods in a river or creek, for a breach of the revenue laws, would seem to furnish the true rule of compensation to the clerk, in the case of a seizure upon land, for a similar breach of the revenue laws.

4. That as in cases of seizure within the admiralty jurisdiction, the clerk is, by the act of 18th April, 1814, allowed one-half of one per cent. commission on the money deposited in court, the same allowance may be deemed reasonable, in cases of seizure made upon land, where the property seized has been condemned as forfeited and sold, and the proceeds brought into court.

Quere? Whether the act of 1814 is confined to admiralty cases, or extends to others.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. In this case, a seizure has been made, on land, of goods to a large amount, for a breach of the revenue laws, and the goods seized have been condemned as forfeited and sold, and the proceeds brought into court to be distributed, after the payment of costs, according to law. A question has arisen as to a portion of the costs charged by the clerk; he claims one-half of one per cent., upon the amount of money deposited in court. If the seizure had been made upon water, within the jurisdiction of the admiralty court, the clerk would undoubtedly be entitled to the commission he claims. The act of congress of 1st March, 1793, (1 Stat. 332,) gave him one and a quarter per cent. on all money deposited in court, in admiralty and maritime cases; the act of 23th February, 1799, § 3, (1 Stat. 625, confirms the provision made in the act of 1793; and the act of 18th April, 1814, (3 Stat. 133,) reduces the commission allowed by the above-mentioned laws to one-half of one per cent.; so that, if this were a seizure within the limits of the admiralty jurisdiction, there could be no question as to the proper fee to be allowed. Some doubt, however, has been entertained as to the construction of the act of 1814, in relation to cases not within the admiralty jurisdiction; and it is suggested, that its only purpose was to lessen the fees before allowed in admiralty and maritime cases, and not to give compensation where none had before been provided. But from the rule upon that subject adopted by this court, in December, 1826, it appears, that a contrary opinion was, at that time, entertained; and it was held, that the statute not only lessened the fees in this respect, in admiralty and maritime cases, but also gave the commission thereby allowed in such cases, that is, one-half of one per centum, in all cases where money was deposited in court, whether they were of admiralty jurisdiction or not. It is not, however, necessary, in determining the present question, to decide upon the construction of the act of 1814; the point before us can be satisfactorily disposed of, under the third section of the act of 1799, giving either of the constructions above mentioned to the act of 1814.

The third section of the act of 1799, among other things, declares that in case the clerk performs any duty for which the laws of the state make no provision, the court in which such service may be performed, shall make a reasonable compensation therefor. Now, there can be no seizures in the state courts, in cases like this, and consequently, no money paid into court upon such a proceeding; the state law, therefore, cannot furnish the rate of compensation, according to the section of the act of 1799, above mentioned, but this court is required to make a reasonable compensation. In order to determine what is a reasonable compensation, we must look to what the law allows in similar cases; for, whatever the legislature allows to the officer in any case, we are bound to suppose they consider a reasonable compensation, and mean a compensation, at the same rate, when they refer it to the court to make a reasonable allowance. Acting upon this principle, the fees allowed in the case of a seizure in a river or creek, for a similar breach of the revenue laws, would seem to furnish the true rule of compensation. The proceedings are in all respects alike; the object is the same, and the same tribunal exercises jurisdiction. There can be no good reason for making a different rate of fees, or allowing a different commission to the clerk, merely because the goods are seized on land, instead of the water; when the proceeding is the same in every respect. And as it is admitted, on all hands, that the clerk is entitled to one-half of one per cent. upon money deposited, in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the same may be deemed reasonable in the case before us. In this view of the matter, it is immaterial whether the act of 1814 is confined to admiralty cases, or extends to others. Upon either construction, the clerk is entitled to the fees he now claims.

SEAMEN—IMPRISONMENT IN FOREIGN JAIL—CONSULAR CERTIFICATE.

[1. A master is not generally justified in imprisoning seamen in foreign jails as a mere matter of discipline, unless there is danger in keeping the offender aboard, or he has committed some great crime; and during such illegal imprisonment a seaman cannot be charged with his board nor with his wages given to another hand.]

[2. The fact that a master, in inflicting such illegal imprisonment, acted on the advice of the consul, goes to show the absence of malice, but cannot justify the illegal act, nor deprive the injured parties of their legal remedies.]

In admiralty.

HOPKINSON, District Judge, said the practice of imprisoning disobedient and refractory seamen in foreign gaols is one of doubtful legality. It is certainly to be justified only by a strong case of necessity; it is not among the ordinary means of discipline put into the hands of the master. I am inclined to think there should be danger in keeping the offender on board, or some great crime committed, when this extreme measure is resorted to; it must be used as one of safety rather than one of discipline, and never applied as a punishment for past misconduct. The powers given by law to the master to preserve the discipline of his ship and compel obedience to his authority, are so strong and full, that they can seldom fail of their effect; they should be clearly insufficient before we should allow the exercise of a power which may so easily be made an instrument of cruelty and oppression; and may be so terrible in its consequences. A confinement in an unwholesome jail, in a hot and pestilential climate, may be followed by death or some disabling disease. In this case the libellants were taken from the prison when the vessel sailed on her return, and although one of them was able to do duty, the other was prevented by sickness for the whole voyage. I would rather altogether deny a power, which can be so seldom necessary, than trust it in hands in which it is so likely to be abused, and so difficult to be regulated. The master may, without the aid of foreign police officers, and dungeons, which he cannot control, even if kindly disposed in the treatment of his men, take measures of great strength to enforce the discipline of his ship. He may there confine a refractory sailor; he may stop his provisions; he may inflict reasonable personal correction, according to the enormity of the offence and the obstinacy of the offender; and, if he be incorrigibly disobedient and mutinous, he may discharge him; and withal he incurs a forfeiture of his wages. A firm and judicious exercise of these powers can hardly fail of reducing the most perverse to obedience. Without deciding the general question, whether the master of a vessel may, in any case, imprison a seaman in the jail of a foreign port, under the control and discipline of foreign police and its officers, for the mere maintenance of his own authority, I will examine the circumstances of the case under the principles mentioned. The judge decided that the circumstances of this case did not warrant the imprisonment of the men; and proceeded:

If the imprisonment in this case was unauthorized, the men cannot be charged with the expenses attending it—especially with their boarding which the master was bound to provide; nor is it just to forfeit their wages, or what is the same thing, charge them with the pay given to another hand. They have been punished for their misconduct by their imprisonment, and it would be to double the punishment, if these penalties were inflicted.

I will take this occasion to notice an error which I fear, has frequently, as in this case, misled our masters of vessels. They seem to believe that they may do anything, provided they can obtain the consent of the consul to it; which consuls are apt to give on very little consideration. When the master, on his return, is called upon to answer for his conduct, he thinks it is enough to produce a consular certificate approving his proceeding, or to say he consulted the consul and acted on his advice. This is altogether a mistake. It is certainly a very prudent precaution to consult the consul in any difficulty; and if the case were fully and fairly stated to the consul, and his advice faithfully pursued, it would afford a strong protection on the question of malicious or wrongful intention, but it can give no justification or legal sanction to an illegal act, nor deprive those who have been injured by it of their legal rights and remedies.

BANKRUPTCY—OPINION OF COUNSEL—VOLUNTARY SETTLEMENT ON ILLEGITIMATE CHILD—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. The opinion of counsel not in practice, and given in a case other than that before the court, may, in the court's discretion, be quoted at the bar; not as authority, in a technical sense, but as calculated to assist the court in its researches and judgment.

2. A voluntary settlement in favour of an illegitimate child by a father in trade, and indebted, if clearly solvent at the time, is good against subsequent creditors; the settlement having been made without a fraudulent intent.

In equity. J. S. M. being the father of an illegitimate child by a former connexion, and now about to marry another woman, settled, in March 1833, of his own suggestion, $3000, personal estate, in trust for the child; himself retaining no interest in the property, which was transferred to the trustee and the possession of it surrendered. His whole estate, in round numbers, and beyond that settled, was $13000: his debts $1700: they were simple contract debts not specially secured. His marriage took place about a month afterwards. He was in trade at the time of the settlement; about half of his estate being thus invested. He continued essentially in this relation of debts, property and business up to January 1836; rather improving his concerns than otherwise; his debts frequently shifting, and all the persons who were creditors at the time of the settlement having been paid within nine months from the date of it. In that month he entered into a partnership, and by the advice of his partner, engaged in new and extensive speculations which proved disastrous. The concern having failed in July 1838, this suit was brought by a creditor whose debt arose November 10th 1837, to set aside the settlement as fraudulent against him.

The validity of the settlement was accordingly the point in issue. In the course of the argument, the defendant's counsel, having cited judicial authorities, offered to read a printed case and opinion upon it by Mr. Binney, of the Philadelphia bar, retired from practice. He said that it appeared to be an opinion drawn with more than usual care. This was opposed on the other side as irregular, but no authorities were cited against it. His honour, remarking that such citation was not very common, desired to take till the following day to consider of it; when he gave an opinion as follows:

THE COURT. It is clear that opinions of counsel cannot be considered as of authority in any strict sense of the word: but in this day when the limits of technical precedent have been a good deal broken down, they may be used by the court, at its discretion, to assist its researches and judgment. Lord Holt. Lord Kenyon and Chief Justice Marshall, all of them men of strict minds, have severally referred to the statements of counsel made arguendo. Fisher v. Wigg, 1 Ld. Raym. 622, 631; Sadgrove v. Kirby, 6 Term R. 483, 486; Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 229, 243. Lord Talbot in 1734, referring to a case decided by Lord Macclesfield, mentions it as a circumstance of weight that "Mr. Vernon had always grumbled at the determination of that case, and never forgave it to Lord Macclesfield." Jones v. Marsh, Cas. t. Talb. 64. Subsequently, as appears from the Reports of Sir John Comyns, an opinion of Mr. Vernon was read before the barons of the exchequer, and appears to have been heard respectfully; since the reporter notes that the decree was "agreeable to this opinion." St. Amand v. Countess of Jersey, 1 Comyns, 255, 256. In 1790 Lord Kenyon quoted an opinion of Mr. Fazakerley and D. Ryder, and spoke of it as containing as much good law as if it had the authority of all the judges in England. Alpass v. Watkins, 8 Term R. 516, 519. The work called "Cases and Opinions" was cited more lately, both before Sir T. Plumer and Sir Lancelot Shadwell, vice chancellors, (Simpson v. Gutteridge, 1 Madd. 609, 616, or Amer. Ed. 1829, pp. 327, 330; May v. Roper, 4 Sim. 360, 362;) in the last instance by Sir Edward Sugden: and in another case, before V. C. Sir John Leach, a detached opinion of Serjeant Hill was quoted at the bar, and is given at large by the reporter, (Forth v. Duke of Norfolk, 4 Madd. 503, 504, or Amer. Ed. 1829, pp. 266, 268.) In all these instances, however, with the exception of that in Comyns, (an exception which might be excused only in favour of so great an equity lawyer as Mr. Vernon,) the opinion was given on a case other than that before the court, nor were the counsel in practice. I think that if opinions of this sort are cited, it should be under these limitations: and, of course, the reception of them at all is matter of discretion for the court. It must be intended that the court is as well instructed in the law as the majority of gentlemen at the bar. You may read the opinion; but give a copy of it to the other side.*

In the argument of the principal subject, it was said, against the settlement: that sustaining it would be without any foundation in precedent. The settlement is voluntary: it is made by a person in debt: the debts are wholly unsecured either by the settlement itself, or by any lien independent of it: the settler was in trade: his bounty is in favour of a bastard child: he himself has failed, and the party opposing it is a creditor. No case has gone so far as to support such a settlement. In Holloway v. Millard, 1 Madd. 414, or Amer. Ed. 1829, p. 225, though a mother's settlement was upheld in favour of her natural child, there was no debt, nor was the settler in trade. In Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106, the settler was not in debt, and the beneficiaries of the trust were a wife and children. Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 229, was without debt, and in favour of a wife. And though in Stephens v. Olive, 2 Brown, Ch. 90, there were debts, yet it is made an important fact that they were secured by mortgage; and the settlement was in favour of a wife. Even in the case of C. F. R., on which counsel's opinion is quoted, (if such citation is to be answered,) existing debts were all secured, and the settler was neither in trade nor contemplating it. An examination of the cases subsequent to those here cited will prove, that although voluntary settlements have, at times, been sustained, they have never been settlements so surrounded with bad circumstances as this is. If the specific debts which existed at the date of this settlement, were yet unpaid, there is no doubt that the settlement could be set aside. Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 481, 494. The result ought not to be altered because the debts have shifted. There has been nothing beyond shifting. Payment there has been none. Creditors may have changed, but indebtedness has remained: and it carries along with it the original taint. Suppose that the existing creditors were the same persons as were creditors at the date of the settlement; holding mere renewals of their original debts;—renewals by successive notes, perhaps. Could not such creditors set aside this settlement? The character of the beneficiary of this trust is an argument. The consideration arises ex turpi causa. It is uncleanly. To sustain it is to encourage licentiousness and, indeed, to "render adultery respectable." Throw upon every part of such vice not only the stain of disgrace, but also the sting of disability, and you do much to prevent it. The less that is done to elevate illegitimate children to the rank of those born in wedlock, the better certainly for the cause of morals. Something was also argued from the settler's having been in trade; and reliance was had upon the remarks on this point of Judge Duncan in Thompson v. Dougherty, 12 Serg. & R. 448, 457, and of other judges in different cases; not of sufficient moment to be recorded.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. I was inclined, on first view, to connect this settlement with the marriage; but though we may perceive in the proximity of the two, a motive for the settlement, there is not enough in the case to prove that the transaction was in consideration of marriage. It must, therefore, be considered as a voluntary settlement; and if sustained must be sustained on the principle that it was made under circumstances which do not impair its validity when so considered. And, in the first place, I take it to be now settled, that the fact of a conveyance being voluntary is not, of itself, enough to impair its validity. Stephens v. Olive, 2 Brown, Ch. 90; Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106; Sexton v. Wheaton, [supra.] Points less settled in this country are those which arise from (1) the party's having been somewhat indebted at the time; (2) his having been in trade, and (3) from the beneficiary of the trust being a bastard child.

Let these matters be examined. The whole doctrine on the subject of voluntary settlements rests, I take it, on this principle: that a man being the absolute owner of what is his own, may do with it what he pleases, provided he does not injure the existing or expected rights of others. And hence with regard to debts created subsequently to the settlement, the matter must generally resolve itself into a question of fraudulent intent: This fact or that fact is accordingly unimportant except in so far as it bears upon this question of design. The common law being a system built up as cases arise which it is to settle, its principles are developed in so close connexion with facts, that we are apt to mistake for essential that which is but accident. Thus, advancing a step beyond first principles, cases say that a settlement by one indebted is good provided there be provision in it, or otherwise, for existing debts. (Stephens v. Olive, 2 Brown, Ch. 90, 92; George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. 194;) others rely on the fact that the settler was not in trade, (Holloway v. Millard, 1 Madd. 419, or Amer. Ed. 1829, p. 228;) others that the whole of the estate was or was not settled; others that debts were or were not contracted immediately after the settlement, (Walker v. Burrows, 1 Atk. 93;) and others upon facts of different sorts which I need not particularize. But in no case at all fully reported, (no case at least that I have been able to find,) are these facts relied on as facts, or otherwise than as shewing the intuitus. In this point of view they are indeed often significant:—as, for example, if a man settling his estate, provide effectually for all existing creditors; the presumption of fraud on those creditors, which, without such provision, would be violent, is repelled. As, on the other hand, if, having embarked all his estate in the risks of commerce, he privately withdraw it, and yet trade as he did before, and fail; or, if he put the whole of his estate, by settlement, into the keeping of others, and so “subject himself to his cradle;” or, if, immediately after a settlement, he contract large debts with persons whom he knows to be ignorant of what he has done, and who may have been dealing and deceived by a belief of his means: in these, and in many cases which might be put, a natural or even a violent presumption of fraud arises. It is however but a presumption, and as such, liable to be overcome by facts which control and break it down.

(His honour then examined the facts of the case, as already presented, and ended in a conclusion that actual fraud could not be presumed from them.) On the contrary, the motive of the settlement seems to have been a good one. The party was father to a bastard child. In this he had undoubtedly been guilty of an act both sinful and shameful. He was about to form a new and “honourable” connexion; but his former course of living had fastened upon him obligations easy to be perceived, and permanent both on his feelings and providing care; obligations which were all the more coercive over him because they would be rejected by every one besides. What then was more decent, or more according to the suggestions of an enlightened conscience or a refined mind, than to make some arrangement by which this offspring of a strumpet’s bed should not become a charge upon her whom he was about to make the wife of his bosom? There may, however, yet be some rule or principle of law which, superiour to the settler’s intent, subverts his act. Thus, it is urged that the party was in debt at the time, and that the taint of this indebtedness was not destroyed by specific securities as in Stephens v. Olive, [supra.] But if you are unembarrassed by the debt, considered as an evidence of fraud, (and as such we have already considered and disposed of it,) its effect, I think, is destroyed. Mr. M. was clearly solvent in the spring of 1833: that is enough. His debts, it is true, were not secured by specific pledge; but certainly they were secured; of which the best evidence is, that they have all, long ago, been paid.

In reply to this it is argued, that although creditors have changed, indebtedness has remained; an argument which, in connexion with the facts of the present case, is rather specious than solid. Suppose, that just before the settlement, and with a view to it, Mr. M. had run off $1700 of his property, and with the proceeds paid those debts which he then owed, or that he had transferred the property itself in satisfaction of those debts: it will be admitted that, on this score of indebtedness, the settlement would be free from objection. Yet he would only have credited one account by debiting another; discharging debts, but reducing assets in exactly the same amount. He might have gone into debt again, in the same hour in which he made the settlement; purchasing or taking back the same property, perhaps; and, may be, from the same person to whom he had transferred it, and for the same price, and the identical moneys. A matter so purely formal as this would be, a mere transposition of items in account, cannot be important in itself; nor important at all, except as evidence of fraud; a point of view in which we are not, here, considering it. Solvency, it must therefore be, which is of the essence of the inquiry, and so are the authorities. Lush v. Wilkinson, 5 Ves. 384, 387; Jacks v. Tunno, 3 Desaus. 1, 5; Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. 525, 548; Sexton v. Wheaton, [supra;] Hopkirk v. Randolph, [Case No. 6,698;] Van Wyck v. Seward, 6 Paige, 62, 68; and see, also, Huston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh, 136, 159.

The argument derived from publick morals, savours too much of severity. Would it not force us to avoid the contracts of these unfortunate persons? to place them under every disability? and to reduce them at once to the state of the ancient excommunicate? All their senses have but human conditions; and it is enough to leave upon them that stain of their birth, which neither their own innocence, nor a life of virtue, nor the compassion of society, nor any earthly law hath power to take away. Indeed, it would be quite as much against publick policy, in one way, to relieve a man against acts done according to his duty, as, in another way, it can be against that policy to sustain them. And a conscientious chancellor,³ in overruling the hard decree of one of his predecessors,⁴ said properly enough, that it is both reason and justice that a father provide for an innocent child, whom he has occasioned to be brought into the world in this shameful manner. Marchioness of Annandale v. Harris, 2 P. Wms. 432, 433. This sentiment is confirmed by other judges: “God forbid,” said Chancellor Desaussure, “that I should lend the sanction of the court to any thing which would shake or loosen those great moral ties which bind society together; but we must not permit our feelings and apprehensions to mislead our judgment. Although it is morally as well as legally improper to have illegitimate children, the law not only permits, but enjoins it on the father to maintain the illegitimate child: the immorality is in the act, not in the provision.” Harten v.

Finally, as to the settler's being in trade. Why shall this fact, as of any essential and inherent malignity, destroy the settlement? As proving a liahleness to failure, and thence as indicating intent or inferring fraud, the force of such a fact is sometimes considerable: but the question of fraudulent intent has been disposed of. No doubt at all, these settlements are made to guard against failure;—failure, not as certain, nor as expected, nor even as probable; but yet as within the chances of human life. And, such being the fact, there seems to be no good reason why such arrangements, if allowable to those who do not require them, should be disallowed if made by persons who, from the vicissitudes of their profession, peculiarly need them. No settlement has been upturned purely because the person making it was in trade: and there are cases which have been sustained where the settler was either in trade or contemplated it. Sexton v. Wheaton, [supra;] Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106, 110; Jacks v. Tunno, 3 Desaus. 1. Arguments are occasionally found against these settlements altogether, (Atherly's Treatise, pp. 230, 237;) and it is sometimes said that they are at variance with our republican manners and institutions. But I doubt whether these arguments have been well considered, or whether they would be confirmed by practical observation. If made in rightful subordination to the claims of others, at a proper time, with due reference to the amount of property unsettled, and, generally, under circumstances otherwise allowable, I confess myself unable to perceive how such settlements shall war against either our social interests or our republican manners. We have, it is true, no titled aristocracy, "and property does not, as in the land of our forefathers, accumulate in large masses, and descend undivided through a long line of expectant proprietors." But are we not endowed, like the people of other lands, with an appreciation of domestick stability and repose? with feelings of attachment to the order and comfort of families? And what is there inconsistent with the national duties of the merchant, if, in view of the vicissitudes of his profession, and in sight of the prolific materials for their activity and influence in the game of hazard every where playing in modern commerce, he shall, prior to engaging in these risks, make some provision by which they whom he has made helpless dependants upon him, shall not be brought into inevitable subjection to his disasters? some provision by which the peace, comfort, and habits, and settled pursuits of others shall not be all torn up, as by a whirlwind, from their base? The court would justify no career of ambitious splendour, nor contend for security to luxurious enjoyments or to vulgar magnificence. Far from it: and these, indeed, belong much less to settled sources of income than to the uncertain, more varying, less valued returns of adventuring enterprize. Family settlements, such as I have spoken of, have had a place in every nation advanced at all beyond primitive civilization; and cases in our highest court and in different states of the Union, have already placed their lawfulness, with us, beyond further question. The settlement, we think, having been made without a fraudulent intent, and by a person solvent at the time, is good against subsequent creditors, though it was made in favour of a bastard child and by a person in trade.

NOTE, [from original report.] The case and opinion referred to above are as follows:

On the 18th April, 1834, C. F. R. made a conveyance of all his real estate, to certain trustees, with power to let and demise the same, and to receive the rents, issues, profits and incomes thereof, and with the same to pay, in the first place, the taxes, ground rents, and all reasonable costs and charges, &c.; and further, from time to time, to pay over the surplus income, to him, the said C. F. R. on his own receipt, and in their discretion to pay and apply the same towards his maintenance and support, for and during the term of his natural life; but in such a way or manner, that the same should not be answerable for, or in any manner liable to the debts and engagements of the said C. F. R. contracted after the date of the execution of the said deed, nor be liable to any charges, incumbrance, assignment, or anticipation of him, the said C. F. R. and that from and after his decease, the trustees should hold all the trust estate in trust, to and for the only use and behoof of six certain natural children of the said C. F. R. And it was provided further, by the deed, that it might be lawful for the trustees, to sell all the trust estate, at public or private sale, or the whole or any part thereof on ground rent, and to pay out of the proceeds thereof, all and singular the debts owing and due by the said C. F. R. at the date of the execution of the deed; and to invest the surplus in good real security: with certain other provisos, &c. The deed was recorded in the usual way, April 21st, 1834. C. F. R. died Oct. 3d, 1836. After his decease, claims were made, and judgments obtained against his estate, and in July, 1837, a bill in equity was filed in the common pleas, &c. At the time of the deed of trust, the grantor was considerably indebted, and his assignees sold a considerable part of the assigned estate in 1834, 5, 6, and paid all the debts which were known, certainly, to be within the trust. The property sold, brought more than $30,000, and the debts paid exceeded $23,000. The balance was invested in different ways, and will be applied to any remaining debts, provided for by the trust. The debts of the grantor not paid, amount, the doubtful together with the debts not to be disputed, to a sum of $17,000 and upwards. They were contracted principally in the years 1835 and 1836, and very few of them, none to a considerable amount, in the year 1834. His debts were generally of small amount, contracted in the heedless way which was his practice. He was never in trade.

Is the deed fraudulent and void as to subsequent creditors? The bill, which set forth the deed, relied principally on the fact of debts at the time and afterwards, and of the children being illegitimate. It averred that C. F. R. left sufficient real and personal estate to pay the judgment which was the subject of the bill; that the real estate had been transferred in the way before stated; and that the personal estate had been removed and transferred without consideration, or concealed, and that by reason of such concealment, and such fraudulent transfer, the complainant was prevented from having execution of his judgment.

Opinion.

I have examined the deed referred to in the annexed case, and have considered the question submitted to me. The consideration of the deed 18th April 1834, was certainly not a valuable one. The deed was of that description which the law terms voluntary; and the question is, was it also fraudulent and void. So far as the object was to provide for natural children, the consideration was a moral one, because it was according to the grantor's duty; and although, in many respects, this class of children is not regarded by courts of law and equity with as much favour as children born in wedlock, I am not aware that any authoritative decision has attributed a greater degree of strength to a voluntary settlement for the protection of the latter than to a like settlement for the protection of the former. A voluntary settlement in favour of an illegitimate child has been sustained against subsequent creditors, the settler not being indebted at the time. Holloway v. Millard, 1 Madd. 414, Amer. Ed. Phil. 1829, p. 225. So a voluntary provision for natural children, has been enforced against the father's assets; he having defeated the settlement by a sale to a purchaser for a valuable consideration. Williamson v. Codrington, 1 Ves. Sr. 511. Atherly, in his treatise on Marriage Settlements, argues with great force against the existence of any distinction between a voluntary settlement in favour of a child and one in favour of a stranger. Ath. Mar. Sett. 223, I think it free from doubt that the circumstance of Mr. R——'s deed being in favour of his natural children, is not a circumstance which injures it. It is of equal validity as if it had been made under like circumstances in favour of lawful children. In either case the settlement would be a voluntary settlement, liable to all the objections to which such settlements are subject, and not more or less subject to them, the one than the other. I take it to be clearly settled at the present day, that a volunteer deed in favour of natural children, may be good against subsequent creditors if the grantor was not indebted at the time: that is to say, it is not in such a case fraudulent and void against subsequent creditors, by mere presumption of law, from its being voluntary; as is the case with such settlements if the grantor is indebted at the time. There must be, to make them void, some other evidence of fraud besides the mere fact of their being voluntary and there being subsequent debts. This is the doctrine to be collected from the modern cases. Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106; Sexton v. Wharton, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 229; Hinde v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 199; Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 481; Thompson v. Dougherty, 12 Serg. & R. 418. I regard it also as settled, that if the grantor is indebted at the time, but his debts are already secured or provided for by the settlement, then the presumption of fraud from the party's being indebted at the time, is repelled by these facts; and, unless there is other proof of fraudulent intention in regard to subsequent creditors, the deed is good against them. Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 481; Stephens v. Olive, 2 Brown, Ch. 90; Lush v. Wilkinson, 5 Ves. 384. In George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. 194, Lord Eldon says, the modern doctrine is, that a provision in a voluntary settlement, for existing debts, will support it against all future creditors. I understand this to mean, not that in such a case, no circumstance of intentional fraud upon subsequent creditors will weigh against the settlement, but that the presumption of fraud from being indebted at the time, is effectually repelled by the provision, and therefore that the settlement is as valid as if he had not been indebted at the time. In such a case, the question whether the deed be fraudulent against subsequent creditors depends upon other circumstances shewing a fraudulent intention at the time.

The circumstances shewing fraudulent intention whereby a voluntary deed by one who is not indebted at the time or has made provision for existing debts is nevertheless void against subsequent creditors, are stated to be of the following kind:—as the continuance of the grantor in possession; an unusual degree of secrecy in making the settlement; the reservation of a general power of revocation; and the like. It has been said in Fonblanque, 270, note a, that if a voluntary settlement includes the whole or the greater part of the grantor's property, this is a circumstance of fraud which will overthrow it; because the grantor must have foreseen that future creditors would suffer by it; and Judge Duncan, in Thompson v. Dougherty, [supra.] seems to have entertained this opinion. But I can find no other authority for this opinion; and if in the last case, his honour thought that Lord Northington's language in Partridge v. Gopp, Amb. 599, was an authority for it, it was, I apprehend, a clear mistake; for Partridge v. Gopp was a case of existing debts at the time of the advance to the children, and the language of the chancellor is to be applied to such a case. If the quantity of the grantor's property not conveyed is insufficient to pay all subsequent debts, it may in like manner be argued, that he must have foreseen that future creditors would suffer by it: and what is this but to say, that a voluntary conveyance is not good where enough is not reserved to pay all subsequent debts? or, in other words, that no such conveyance is good against such creditors? The circumstance which makes the amount of property conveyed material, would seem to be, the clear and certain intention to contract debts afterwards, and to leave them unprotected. This comes under another head to which I will advert; but in the absence of any such foregone purpose to contract debts, I am unable to perceive any objection against a conveyance of all the grantor's property which does not equally hold against the conveyance of any part of it. Among the circumstances inferring a fraud intended upon subsequent creditors, Lord Hardwicke, in Walker v. Burrows, 1 Atk. 94, has also stated, the becoming indebted immediately after the settlement. There certainly may be cases in which debts immediately following a settlement, might speak very strongly as to the intention with which it was made: but debts of small amount, debts of weakness and heedlessness, rather than of design, might immediately follow and yet infer no such previous intention. It remains, I think, to be considered by our courts, how far the universal recording of conveyances of land under our law, ought to affect this question. It is true, that recorded or not, a deed of conveyance may disappoint a creditor; but if in fact recorded, it may perhaps be thought in no slight degree to repel the presumption of intended fraud upon subsequent creditors. I cannot find that Lord Hardwicke's dictum has been acted upon, unless in the case of persons in trade, intending to go on contracting debts in trade, as in Thompson v. Dougherty. The circumstance is not perhaps very material in the present case.

To apply these principles to the deed of Mr. R——. Mr. R—— was indebted at the execution of the deed, and perhaps largely so. Had there been no provision for these debts, the deed would have been by force of the statute, and upon general principles of law, fraudulent and void against creditors subsequent as well as antecedent; for a voluntary deed, fraudulent and void against existing creditors, is so against subsequent creditors. But the deed does make a provision for all existing debts. It gives the trustees a power to sell, and declares the trust as to the proceeds of sale, for the satisfaction of all these debts in the first instance. It was therefore not fraudulent and void against existing creditors, and consequently if it is void against subsequent creditors, it is not so by necessary presumption of law, but in consequence of other circumstances. It is true, that previous to the power of sale in the deed, there is a power given to the trustees to let and demise the property and to pay over the nett rents to the grantor during his life, or to apply them for his maintenance in such a way that they should not be answerable for his debts subsequently contracted; and no express trust is declared as to these rents to apply them to the payment of his existing debts. But it is clear that there is no trust to apply them in defeat of existing debts, but only of subsequent debts; and taking the whole deed together, I am of opinion, that the duty of the trustees is to see to the satisfaction of existing debts in the first instance. By the acceptance of the trust, the grantees became trustees for these creditors, and were bound to exercise the power of sale for their satisfaction. The power of sale rides over the trust for the application of these rents. What they had power to do for these creditors it was their duty to do, and to do it immediately if this was necessary. I therefore regard the true interpretation of the deed to be, that the trust as to the rents is subject to the power for the benefit of the creditors; and that a payment of the rents to the grantor, if it impaired the security of existing debts, would have been a breach of the trust to sell: for the power was a trust, and of paramount obligation according to the clear intention of the deed. I am therefore of opinion that the deed makes a clear provision for the satisfaction of all existing debts; and the case shews that the trustees have sold parts of the estate, and have paid all debts that were known to be of this description. The presumption of fraud from the existence of these debts, is therefore repelled, and consequently, according to the cases I have cited, the deed is good against subsequent creditors unless there are circumstances shewing an actual intention in the grantor to defraud such creditors. Upon examining the papers, and the bill that has been filed in the common pleas, I perceive no evidence or allegation of such circumstances. The bill relies on the fact of debts at the time and afterwards. But the debts at the time were provided for and if subsequent debts are enough per se, no voluntary settlement can be good against subsequent creditors. It dwells also upon the circumstance that the principal objects of the trust were illegitimate children; but this, the cases adverted to shew, is not unlawful, but as good as if the objects were lawful children. By setting forth the whole deed, the bill necessarily sets forth the trust to the grantor for life, though it does not specifically notice it as a badge of fraud. The question in regard to such a trust is of great moment. If it is void then a man cannot protect himself against his own weakness. He may grant to his family, to a stranger, to any volunteer whatever, but he cannot grant for his own maintenance, so as to exclude his subsequent creditors, nor vest in his trustees a power to supply him in their discretion, so as to make his maintenance certain. I am not aware of any decision to sustain such an objection. The power of the owner of an estate so to settle it as to tie his own hands as to the time, manner and circumstances of his own disposition of it, is not to be denied since the case of Bath v. Montague, 3 Ch. Cas. 107-108. Lord Holt argued that there might be very good reasons for even a wise man to put such restraints upon himself to guard against rash and precipitate wills, settlements or gifts, to prevent inconveniences that might arise from an infirmity on his part, and that no court of equity, any more than of law, could relieve him from the restraints so deliberately imposed upon himself. The same is equally true as to voluntary settlements, providing for the certain maintenance of the grantor. They may be fraudulent against subsequent creditors for other causes: but are they so, because, instead of declaring an immediate trust for children, they declare a trust for the grantor himself during his life? I confess I do not perceive why they should be so, nor why, if the estate may go to a volunteer or stranger, so as to elude a subsequent creditor, it may not also go to the settler himself in such a way as to prevent creditors reaching it. Such a trust may, in connection with others, tend to raise a presumption of fraud; but by itself, I do not think it has ever been so held. The point yet remains to be settled. In like manner, the bill, by setting forth the whole deed, shews that it conveyed all the grantor's real estate; but it does not point it out as a specific objection. On the contrary, it alleges that which is adverse to the objection and might be fatal to it, namely, that the grantor had personal property also, which he left at his decease, but which had been removed or transferred without consideration, or concealed:—matters not charged nor chargeable upon the deed of April 1834, or the trustees. This objection, if made, ought, I think, to be over-ruled. As regards the grantor's becoming indebted immediately after the deed, and thus shewing a fraudulent intent, the case states the contrary. The great mass of subsequent debts does not shew fraud intended by the conveyance, so much as it shews a continuance of the weakness against which, as possible, though not as intended, he wished to guard his children and also himself. He was never in trade. He did not mean to go into trade. They were in general, debts of folly, committed upon a sudden temptation; not the result of previous purpose or design. There was no concealment. The deed was executed on the 18th of April, and recorded in Philadelphia on the 21st of the same month; and it contains no power of revocation, nor is there any evidence or allegation that the grantor continued in possession or in the exercise of any control or management of the property. My opinion upon the whole is, that the deed may be sustained against the subsequent creditors; not being fraudulent and void against them, though voluntary.

Case No. 475.

ANONYMOUS.

[1 Wash. C. C. 84.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1804.

STATUTES—EFFECT OF REPEAL—CRIMINAL LAW—PERJURY—ACT DEC. 19, 1803.

1. Indictment for perjury under the bankrupt law of the United States.

2. When a bill of sale is made fraudulently and colourably to the bankrupt, if he swears that the property mentioned in it belongs to him, it is perjury. But, if he swears to such ownership from mistake, resulting from a misconstruction of a paper, it would not be perjury.

[Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.]

3. If an offence be created by law, and before prosecution, the law be repealed, the offence cannot be punished, unless there is a reservation of jurisdiction over the offence, in the repealing law.

[Cited in U. S. v. Finlay, Case No. 15,099; Tinker v. Van Dyke, Id. 14,058; U. S. v. Barr, Id. 14,527; U. S. v. Van Vliet, 22 Fed. 643.]

[See note at end of case.]

4. Under the act of 19th December, 1803, [2 Stat. 248,] repealing the bankrupt law, [2 Stat. 19,] there is no reservation for such purposes; and it would only be for perjury committed after the repeal of the law, in cases, which, by authority of the repealing act, may be completed, that an indictment could be sustained.

5. Perjury committed in proceedings under the bankrupt law, cannot be prosecuted under the general criminal law of the United States, the 18th section of which applies to perjuries committed in judicial proceedings, whether orally or by deposition.

6. For a perjury under the bankrupt laws, an indictment will not be supported at common law; because, there must not only be a false oath, but it must be taken in some judicial proceedings, in a matter material to the issue.

[7. Cited in Henfield's Case, Case No. 6,360, to the point that there can be no indictment for perjury at common law in the courts of the United States.]

At law. The defendant was indicted for perjury committed before the commissioners of bankrupts, where, being asked, "at what time did you own the brig Abigail, and when did you cease to own her," answered, on oath, "I cannot tell exactly the time; I believe it was at the latter end of 1799 that I first owned her; I ceased to own her, I rather think, in the year 1800." Whereas in truth and in fact, the said defendant never did own the said brig at any time during the year 1799, or before or after. The first count laid the offence against the bankrupt law, and the second against the general criminal law of the United States. On not guilty pleaded, Mr. Rawle for the defendant stated, that he should endeavour to satisfy the court there was no law to support the indictment; and submitted whether this should be done before the jury were sworn, or after, and before a verdict were rendered; or in arrest of judgment, should the verdict be against the defendant.

The court thought it most proper to proceed in the ordinary way, leaving both law and fact to the jury, under the charge of the court; or to a motion in arrest of judgment, should the jury find the defendant guilty.

Byrd Wilson, the secretary to the commissioners, proved, that the question, as stated in the indictment, was asked the defendant, and that he answered it on oath as there stated; that the question was put, and the oath administered, in the presence of the commissioners and by their direction, on the 20th September, 1803. The question and answer were committed to writing by the witness, and was not signed by the defendant. Phineas Daniel proved, that he wished to purchase the brig; and, being an alien, he, with a view to give her the character and privileges of a vessel owned by a citizen, got the defendant to let the bill of sale be made to him; but that he, Daniel, paid for her, and to give colour to the cover, obtained a power of attorney from the defendant to manage the vessel, and also one charter party to Bristol for one voyage, and afterwards another for ten years. Both this witness and Williams, a partner of defendant, proved that the defendant never claimed or exercised any acts of ownership over the vessel, or made any demand for freights, profits, &c. In fact, the testimony on this point was complete.

There were witnesses examined to discredit Daniel, who said very hard things of his general character and credit, and some contradictions appeared in his testimony. But his evidence respecting the property in the vessel, was strongly corroborated, by Williams, Robert Whittle, and A. Brown; the power of attorney, charter parties, and the accounts kept by defendant.

Mr. Dallas, the district attorney, contended, that the defendant was indictable under the bankrupt law, although it was partially repealed before the prosecution, because the proviso saved from the operation of the repealing clause, all cases where commissions had previously issued; and that unless perjuries committed under such commission could be prosecuted and punished, it would affect the execution of the commission. To prove that the intention of the legislature is to prevail, cited Bac. Abr. 390; [King v. Harris,] 2 Leach, 800. He referred to many other repealing laws in the code of the United States, where savings had been made as to offences previously committed. 3 Laws U. S. 163; 6 Laws U. S. 80, 58, 3, 61; 4 Laws U. S. 456; 5 Laws U. S. 126; 3 Laws U. S. 88; 4 Laws U. S. 446. Second. That if this case be not within the proviso, still the repeal does not prevent the prosecution afterwards. The doctrine applies only to cases of treason and felony. 2 Hawk. [P. C.] 57; 1 Hawk. [P. C.] 306; 1 Hale, [P. C.] 291, 525; 2 Hale, [P. C.] 190. Third. Defendant, if not indictable under the bankrupt law, may be under the general criminal law; for in this case, the false oath was taken in a deposition taken under the authority of the United States, as expressed in the — section of that law. Fourth. If not indictable under either of those laws, he may be convicted at common law, though indicted contra formam statuti, (1 Hale, [P. C.] 525,) if the court should think the common law obligatory in the courts of the United States. He contended, under the first head, that the execution of the commission would not be completed as long as any thing might remain to be done, and this might happen in a variety of cases, even after certificate granted, as if an estate should afterwards vest in remainder, or descend to the bankrupt, &c., &c. Under the third head, that the general criminal law was not repealed by the bankrupt law, as to perjury; because not inconsistent with it, cited 1 Hale, [P. C.] 705; [Rex v. Wardroper,] 4 Burrows, 2026; [King v. Bass,] 1 Leach, 252; 1 Hawk. [P. C.] 306; [King v. Woodcock,] 1 Leach, 501.

Mr. Dickerson and Mr. Rawle, after arguing the matter of fact to the jury, addressed the court and jury on the law. They contended, first, that the false swearing must be material to the issue. 4 Bl. Comm. 136; 1 Hawk. [P. C.] 331; [Sharp's Case,] Cro. Car. 352; [Lane's Case,] Cro. Eliz. 148. It must be given with deliberation. [Rex v. Dummer,] 1 Salk. 374. So, too, if he swears under a false impression respecting the construction of a paper, or of his title, it is not perjury. [Rex v. Crespigny,] 1 Esp. 281. Now, in this case, the interrogatory and answer only applied to the time of his owning and parting with the vessel, which was entirely immaterial. The answer was made here immediately; the question was put without the defendant's taking time, and as the legal title was, by the bill of sale, in defendant, he might have naturally supposed that it made him the owner, particularly as the notes given for the vessel, were either signed or endorsed by defendant. As to evidence, there must, to convict in perjury, be one credible witness, and strong evidence besides, sufficient in the minds of the jury to establish the guilt. [Queen v. Muscot,] 10 Mod. 195. Daniel, the only positive witness, is not to be credited. Where a statute creates a new offence, and fixes the punishment, the prosecution must be against that statute. [Irex v. Dixon,] 10 Mod. 335; [Castle's Case,] Cro. Jac. 644; [Rex v. Sparks,] 3 Mod. 79; [Anon.,] 2 Ld. Raym. 991; [Rex v. Wright,] 1 Burrows, 543; [Rex v. Wardroper,] 4 Burrows, 2026; [Rex v. Jackson,] Cowp. 297; [King v. Bass,] 1 Leach, 252. The punishment being different under the bankrupt law from what it is under the general criminal law, and not cumulative, the defendant cannot be indicted under the latter—disqualification, under the general law, is to be part of the punishment. In other cases, it is not part of the sentence. [Rex v. Greepe,] 2 Salk. 513. Many parts of the laws of the United States referred to, showing the punishment of perjury in certain cases. 4 Laws U. S. 427, 102; 3 Laws U. S. 337; 2 Laws U. S. 21, 157, 193; 6 Laws U. S. 27.

The repeal of a law creating an offence, whether it be felony or misdemeanor, sweeps away all prosecutions against it, without a saving for the purpose. [Miller's Case,] 1 W. Bl. 451; 1 Hale, [P. C.] 309, 291. Instances where such savings have been introduced, 4 Laws U. S. 446, 523, 541, 202. So similar saving in the statute 6 Edw. VI. c. 12. As to the common law, Mr. Dickerson denied its validity in the United States courts, but his colleague, Mr. Rawle, admitted it.

[Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. As it is the opinion of the court, that the law is in favour of the defendant, I shall spare the jury and myself the trouble of going through the evidence. If, in the opinion of the jury, it is insufficient to establish the fact against the defendant, I would not wish to disturb that opinion; if it has a different operation, I shall not press it against him. But I must notice one of the observations made by Mr. Dickerson, lest those who heard it might suppose it had received the countenance of this court; and it is this, that the defendant, having a bill of sale for the brig, might, under the circumstances of the case, have taken an oath that he was owner of her, without committing perjury. It is true, that where a mistake is shown to be the result of a misconstruction of a paper, it is not perjury; but no such misconstruction could take place in a case like this. The oath must be considered in reference to the subject and occasion of it. It was taken for the purpose of disclosing the property and effects belonging to the bankrupt. The defendant, if Daniel's evidence is believed, was a mere nominal owner, made so with his own consent, and with a view, understood by him, to cover Daniel's property under his name. In no sense of the word could he suppose that he owned, or had a property in the vessel. Such a doctrine would defeat the important provisions of our navigation law, if a citizen might cover the property of aliens, and yet safely swear that he was the owner.

Every offence for which a man is indicted, must be laid against some law, and it must be shown to come within it. Such law may be the general unwritten or common law, or the statute law. The offence must not only come within the terms of such law, but the law itself must, at the time, be subsisting. It is a clear rule, that if a statute create an offence, and is then repealed, no prosecution can be instituted for any offence committed against the statute, previous to its repeal. The end of punishment is not only to correct the offender, but to deter others from committing like offences. But, if the legislature has ceased to consider the act in the light of an offence, those purposes are no longer to be answered, and punishment is then unnecessary. Perjury is said to be malum in se. False oaths of all kinds are prohibited by the divine law; but civil institutions punish them only in certain cases, and upon reasons of policy. A false oath taken before the commissioners of bankruptcy, was declared to be perjury, and subjected the offender to punishment; but, the moment the law was repealed, it remained a false oath, but ceased to be an offence punishable by municipal law. There are many offences that are mala in se, which are not prohibited by human laws; and, therefore, if in any case they should, by such laws, be deemed criminal and made punishable, the repeal of those laws places the acts committed under them, upon the same ground as they were before the laws passed.

As to civil rights, the rule is, that rights acquired under, or barred by an existing law, are not defeated by the repeal of the law. In short, the cases which were cited at the bar, and the language which the legislature of the United States has used in the cases cited, when it has intended to except out of the operation of the repealing law, prosecution for offences committed before the repeal, are conclusive to show that the above doctrine is not to be shaken.

The next question is, to what extent was the bankrupt law repealed by the act of the 19th of December, 1803? [2 Stat. 248.] Until we come to the proviso, it is a general and absolute repeal. Had it stopped here, what would have been the consequence? That all commissions then proceeded in, to various points of their execution, must have been arrested, and infinite mischief have been produced. A proviso is always intended to limit the generality of the enacting clause, or to save or except certain cases out of its operation. If the proviso be ambiguous, its explanation may best be obtained by understanding the scope of the enacting clause, and discovering the mischief to be remedied. Now, here the mischief would have been what I have stated, and the proviso applies precisely to, and remedies it. It declares, that "the repeal shall in no wise affect the execution of any commission of bankruptcy, which may have been issued prior to the passing of this act, but every such commission shall be proceeded in, and fully executed, as if this act had not been passed." The commissions then are still to go until finally executed. But what has the punishment of a perjury previously committed, to do with the progress of such a commission to its final execution? I have no doubt, though it is not now necessary to decide the point, that even in the defendant's commission, though he has obtained a certificate, yet if it be not to be considered as finally executed; and in all other commissions not so executed, should perjury be committed after the repeal, it may be punished; because if otherwise, it would affect the final execution. The difference is this: in the construction which I give to the proviso, I give it a prospective operation; that contended for by the attorney, gives it a retrospective operation, a construction not favoured in civil, much less in criminal cases. In the cases of future perjury, the not punishing them would affect the execution of the commission, but not so as to perjuries previously committed.

Upon the whole, if the legislature intended to except from the operation of the repealing clause all cases where commissions had previously issued, it was easy to have expressed such intention generally, and not confine the proviso to the execution of commissions; and in every instance where they did intend to leave open to prosecution, offences committed before the repeal, they have declared it in plain unambiguous terms.
