2. Held, also, that bankrupt courts, in considering transactions impeached under the 35th section of the bankruptcy act, look primarily to the policy of the law forbidding dealings with failing debtors; and, if such transactions fall within the conditions specified by the section, will annul them even though positive frauds be not proved upon the beneficiaries of them.

In equity. This bill is brought on the chancery side of this court [by Alderdice, assignee, against the State Bank of Virginia and D. C. Mayo, bankrupt] to set aside a deed of preference, made by said bankrupt to said bank within four months of bankruptcy, as void under the 35th section of the bankrupt act. [Decree for complainant.]

W. W. Crump and H. A. & J. S. Wise, for complainant.

John H. Guy and Ould & Carrington, for defendants.

HUGHES, District Judge. W. C. Mayo filed his petition against David C. Mayo, tobacco manufacturer, of the city of Richmond, on the 27th of November, 1872, containing the usual allegations, and praying that David C. Mayo might be adjudicated a bankrupt. No defence was made, and the adjudication went by default on the 7th day of December, 1872. The property surrendered by the bankrupt was a certain lot of ground in Richmond, on which was his tobacco factory, and the fixtures used in the same, and certain personalty and choses in action.

The leading facts bearing upon the question of solvency are as follows: The assignee has sold the real estate for $20,200; and the fixtures in the factory for $14,700. He has also realized from all the other assets surrendered the aggregate sum of $5,632.30. From the whole assets of every name, surrendered as of the 7th of December, 1872, there has been realized the total sum of $40,532.30. The bankrupt's schedules of debts show three debts secured by deed of trust, as follows, to wit: a debt due Douglas H. Gordon for purchase-money of the lot, $7357.50; a debt due Charles E. Whitlock for a loan of $10,000, at 12 per cent. interest, made in October, 1872; and a debt due to the State Bank of Virginia of $8280.66. These debts amount in the aggregate to $27,318.42. The schedules show other debts amounting to $40,836.28. Of this $40,836.28, all was contracted in 1872, except $6000, which grew out of a partnership account, with a partner since deceased, in 1868, of which $1000 was due in January, 1872, and the residue in 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882. The debts are generally an open account; the exact dates at which they were contracted do not reliably appear, except, as already said, that they were contracted in 1872. The number of creditors in the schedules who have proved their debts is over 50, besides a large number of employes. At the time of the proceedings taken in bankruptcy Mayo had discounts to the amount of $56,880.50. These were obtained on about 44 pieces of paper, on which others than himself were primarily bound, which were drawn on consignees of his tobacco, and which were discounted for him at various dates, from October 5th, 1872, to November 20th, 1872. The discounts had been given him mostly by the Richmond Banking and Insurance Company; the residue by several other lenders. Of these $56,880.50 of discounts, the sum of $35,097.77 was obtained after the 28th of October, 1872. Thus it would seem that the question of solvency was doubtful at any period as much as a month before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. One month before the commencement of those proceedings, namely, the 28th of October, 1872, the bankrupt made the deed of trust already mentioned, to secure the debt of $8280.66, due the State Bank of Virginia; conveying for that purpose his remaining interest in the factory lot, building, and fixtures, which were already incumbered by the two other deeds of trust from himself and wife; the first securing $7357.50 due to Gordon for unpaid purchase-money, and the other securing $10,000 of money loaned by Whitlock. The present bill in chancery is brought to impeach the validity of this third deed of trust, made in favor of the State Bank of Virginia, and to set it aside as void under the first clause of the 35th section of the general bankruptcy act. This deed was made on the 28th day of October, 1872, to secure a sum of money, all or most of which was found, on or about that day, to be due the bank from Mayo for money of the bank, which had been fraudulently obtained on overchecks, and used by Mayo for several months preceding, by collusion with its teller, and which, on detection, it would seem that Mayo could not pay.

I will assume that, but for the peculiar circumstances in which it originated, there would not be sufficient reason, to be found in the other transactions of Mayo, for invalidating the deed of the 28th of October, 1872. I will assume that although the bankrupt was in fact insolvent, and must have known his insolvency on the date of the deed, yet there was not, except in the circumstances out of which the deed grew, reasonable cause existing to bring a knowledge or belief of the insolvency home to the mind of the president of the State Bank, Mr. John L. Bacon. I will concede, what the high character of Mr. Bacon forbids me to question, that his action (which was that of the bank) in requiring and accepting the deed of preference from D. C. Mayo, was in fact honest, bona fide, free from all taint of moral fraud. I will concede, what was strenuously insisted by counsel for the bank, that courts of equity look primarily to the good faith of transactions, and are slow to set aside contracts made with honest intent and purpose. The validity of the present deed depends upon the meaning and intent of the first clause of the 35th section of the general bankruptcy act. The object of that section is to invalidate any deed of conveyance by which a debtor makes over property to a creditor, for the purpose of securing a pre-existing debt, in preference to other pre-existing debts, within the period of four months preceding the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, the debtor being insolvent or contemplating insolvency, and making the deed for the purpose of preventing that pro rata distribution of his effects which is contemplated by the bankruptcy act, under circumstances which constitute reasonable cause for the creditor to believe that he was insolvent or contemplated insolvency, and made the deed with such intent. There are many contracts which the law treats as void, however honest may be the intent with which they are made. It does so for sound reasons of public policy. Among such contracts are the five classes declared void by St. 29 Car. II., c. 3, which has been adopted in all the states of the Union, commonly called the statute of frauds. They are called fraudulent contracts, not because they are so in morals, mala in se, but because they were the source of frauds. The object of the statute was to prevent the many abuses which arose from the former legality of those contracts, and it was called the statute of frauds because it was rendered necessary by those abuses, and was enacted to prevent them. I mention this statute only for the purpose of illustration. So, contracts of infants and of married women are held to be invalid by the law, not because many of them may not be strictly honest and even commendable, but because it is against the policy of the law to uphold them. In like manner, such contracts as are declared void by the 35th section of the general bankrupt act, are so treated, not because they may not, as in the instance under consideration, be free from moral fraud on the part of the preferred creditor, but because it is against the policy of the law to allow preferences to be made of one creditor over others, by debtors, within four months of bankruptcy.

As it is the policy of the general law to forbid the making of contracts with minors and women under coverture, so it is the policy of the bankruptcy law to forbid interested persons from securing preferences or transfers of property from failing debtors. As it is the policy of the general law to ignore contracts of certain kinds not reduced to writing, so it is the policy of the bankruptcy law to set aside certain contracts with failing debtors made within certain periods of their bankruptcy. In construing these latter contracts, the bankruptcy court is not bound to search for badges of positive fraud, as the ground for setting them aside, but must look primarily to that just policy of the law which is intended to secure the equal right of all creditors against arrangements by debtors for the exclusive advantage of a few. In Buchanan v. Smith, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 301, the supreme court of the United States say, what the language of the law shews, that an "equal distribution of the property of the bankrupt, pro rata, is the main purpose which the bankrupt act seeks to accomplish," and it is in order to secure this purpose that the 35th section, rendering void certain deeds of preference, was made a part of it. But for the fact that the laws of nearly all the states permit, if they do not encourage, deeds of preference to be made by failing debtors, it is not probable that any national bankruptcy law would remain upon the statute-book a moment longer than should be necessary to subserve the immediate financial exigency in which each law usually originates. This 35th section of the present act having made a deed of preference, if executed and accepted under certain circumstances, void, it is not sufficient, as counsel for the defence insisted, for me to look into the bona fides of Mr. Bacon in deciding upon its validity. That section makes no use of the term fraud, except in a collateral expression, which refers merely to a contravention of the bankruptcy act, and refrains from treating a deed of preference as an act of moral delinquency.

The bankruptcy law takes the estate of the bankrupt into custody of its court, and transfers it to the assignee, subject to such liens by way of preference as existed more than four months (now two months) before the petition in bankruptcy, and subject to such transfers, other than those for securing pre-existing debts, as were made more than six months (now three months) before the petition. But it says to creditors and transferees: "You shall not take assignments from failing debtors within the respective periods of four and six months, in any case in which you have reasonable cause to believe that they were insolvent at the time of the assignment; you shall not do so, because such transactions contravene my policy of a pro rata distribution, which is a policy of justice." It so declares without any reference to the element of bad or good faith, except as the former may be necessarily involved in the acceptance of such assignments. Formerly, the bankruptcy law of England did not respect liens even older than four or six months, unaccompanied by actual transfers of title. It gave no more dignity to a judgment or a bond under seal than to a note or open account. It treated all these forms of indebtedness as of equal dignity, and distributed the assets in bankruptcy pro rata among these classes of claims. It was enacted in the spirit of the law merchant which treated debt as debt, and it did not give to a bond under seal or to the judgment of a court of record the sanctity of the Apostle's Creed, according to the old county court lawyer's idea. In this country the influence of the artificial distinctions and arbitrary priorities established by the old common law has dominated in our legislation, and our general bankruptcy law has been interpolated with provisions inspired by the reverence with which the old county courts of the rural districts regard the judgment lien. But this law, while respecting liens acquired beyond the period of four and six months before the bankruptcy, yet for sound reasons of justice and policy will set aside, under certain circumstances, assignments made within those periods, without special reference to the good or bad faith of the parties to them. I am not bound, therefore, to consider this deed with any reference to the moral good faith with which it was accepted by Mr. Bacon.

I am to consider, simply, whether it falls within the description of the first clause of the 35th section of the bankruptcy act. If it does, it is void; if it does not, it is valid. To be void under that clause, the deed must be liable to all the following objections: 1. It must have been made within four months of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. 2. It must be a deed of preference, securing and intending to secure a pre-existing debt over other pre-existing debts. 3. The grantor must have been insolvent at the time of making the deed, or have contemplated insolvency. 4. The beneficiary must have had "reasonable cause to believe" at the time of the deed, that the grantor was insolvent, and made the deed to prevent a pro rata distribution of his effects. It is useless to enter into any inquiry whether this was, and was intended to be, a deed of preference. The fact is patent, and cannot be denied. The deed was also made, not only within four months, but within one month of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy.

The only disputed questions, therefore, are as to the insolvency, and as to the existence of reasonable cause for Mr. Bacon's believing the insolvency and the illegal purpose of the deed. As to the first point, there is now no doubt that the grantor in the deed was, in fact, insolvent. His whole assets brought, at what are claimed to have been good sales, forty thousand dollars, and his liabilities were, one month after the bankruptcy, about fifty-four thousand dollars. There is no reason to believe that there was a change for the worse in his affairs in so short a period, or that his energy, skill, and credit could have made good the deficiency after the developments and occurrences of the 28th of October. A creditor, within one month after the deed, filed a petition charging bankruptcy, which was not contested. Mayo was insolvent in point of fact. The only question left, therefore, is whether Mr. Bacon had reasonable cause to believe that he was insolvent, and made the deed to prevent the equal distribution of his effects contemplated by the bankruptcy act. But for the transactions out of which this deed directly grew, I should strongly doubt whether Mr. Bacon did have reasonable cause to believe the two things mentioned. Looking at the condition of Mayo by the lights existing at the date of the deed, and not by those by which his then condition is now revealed, Mr. Bacon may not have had reason to believe that he was insolvent and made the deed as an insolvent, except for the especial facts out of which the deed directly grew. But those especial facts were sufficient beyond all doubt to create that "reasonable cause" of belief which the law makes requisite in such a case. Mayo had been clandestinely overchecking and fraudulently using the money of the bank for several months before the date of the deed, in collusion with the teller. The question for us is, why had he been thus fraudulently using these funds? His position in society and in business forbids the presumption that anything but necessity had driven him to such a course. We are obliged to conclude that he used the money of the bank because he could not meet his current obligations with money obtained in an honest manner. The Latin word "solvere," when used with reference to debt, means to pay, that is to say, to discharge with money. Insolvency means inability to pay with money. The fact that Mayo was unable to meet his debts with money honestly obtained, and had been so for several months, proves that he was insolvent, in the sense that any trader is insolvent in contemplation of law. Moreover, when his fraudulent dealing with the money of the bank was about to be publicly disclosed in October, any man of his position, pride, and character would have exhausted every effort to pay up all dues on the spot, to save both character and credit, and doubtless he did so exhaust every effort. But he did not pay up on the spot, and the conclusion is irresistible that he did not make his default good in cash, because he could not.

The insolvency which had been concealed by clandestine transactions for months was now developed and undeniably proved. None knew the facts which established it better than Mr. Bacon. The deed in question was taken because the grantor was unable to pay the money which it was given to cover and secure. The deed is itself, under these circumstances, the evidence of insolvency, and Mr. Bacon, in accepting it, accepted the most conclusive confession, proof, and notice of the insolvency which could have been brought to his mind. Being made by an insolvent man, being made to give a preference to Mr. Bacon's bank, it must have been made with the intention of intercepting from other creditors their pro rata share of the assets conveyed, for no principle has been more often decided, than that men must be presumed to intend the natural effects of their acts, and Mr. Bacon not only had reasonable but conclusive cause to believe that it was such a deed, made for such a purpose. As to the presumption of intention from the act itself, the authorities are too numerous to be cited. Some of them are in [Toof v. Martin,] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 40; 1 Low. 409, [In re George, Case No. 5,325;] 1 Dill. 115, [Giddings v. Dodd, Case No. 5,405;] 1 Dill. 203, [Martin v. Toof, Case No. 9,167;] [Wilson v. City Bank,] 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 473; Trader's Nat. Bank v. Campbell,] 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 87; 1 Abb. (U. S.) 440, [Driggs v. Moore, Case No. 4,083;] 2 Bond, 244, [Haughey v. Albin, Case No. 6,222;] 2 Bond, 287, [Ahl v. Thorner, Case No. 103.]

The peculiar circumstances out of which the deed in question arose, distinguish the case now under consideration from those of Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 40; Trader's Nat. Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 87; Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 244; Tiffany v. Lucas, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 411; Buchanan v. Smith, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 277; Wager v. Hall, Id. 584; Walbrun v. Rabbitt, Id. 577; Wilson v. City Bank, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 473; Bartholow v. Bean, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 635; Cook v. Tullis, Id. 332; Tiffany v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., Id. 375; and Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 360.

The condition of Mayo in respect to his circumstances and transactions other than those connected with this deed were elaborately discussed by counsel for the defence, and those circumstances were such, I admit, as were hardly sufficient of themselves to constitute reasonable cause to believe that he was insolvent, and that any deed of preference he might make to secure a pre-existing debt must be intended to defeat a pro rata distribution among his creditors. But the especial facts inducing the deed were too cogent to admit a doubt in any dispassionate mind of the insolvency and of the intent necessarily involved in the execution of a deed under these circumstances. I ascribe Mr. Bacon's failure to appreciate the reasonable cause which the facts of the occasion presented to the excitement necessarily controlling the presiding officer of a bank upon just discovering a heavy default, which is popularly reported to have been $30,000 or $40,000, in a trusted subordinate. The law does not require that the reasonable cause it specifies shall be perceived by the beneficiary of a deed of preference, but only that it shall exist. [Toof v. Martin,] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 40; [Wager v. Hall,] 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 584; 10 N. B. R. 21. [In re Clarke, Case No. 2,843;] 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 190, [Burpee v. First Nat. Bank of Junesville, Case No. 2,185.] That reasonable cause did exist in this case seems to me to be incontrovertible, and if such a case as the present one do not fall within the meaning of the first clause of the 35th section of the bankruptcy act, I can scarcely conceive how any case likely to be contested at all can be held to do so. I will give a decree setting aside the deed as void, and granting leave to the bank to appeal to the circuit court within ten days from its date.

Upon appeal the circuit court affirmed the decree in this case in the following opinion by the chief justice:

WAITE, Circuit Justice. We are entirely satisfied with the conclusions reached by the district judge in this case. His findings of the material facts are fully sustained by the evidence, and they need not be recapitulated. There can be no doubt of the actual insolvency of Mayo when he made his mortgage to the bank, though it may not have been generally known. His property, if converted into money, would have fallen far short of the amount necessary to pay his debts. While, therefore, he had not openly stopped payment, he was really unable to discharge his obligations in full. In our opinion, too, the bank had reasonable cause to believe him insolvent. It matters not what the bank officers actually did believe, or what others believed or had cause to believe. The question is, what ought the officers of the bank to have believed from the evidence in their possession? They knew that he owed their bank a debt which had been surreptitiously contracted by corrupting their teller, and they were told by his counsel, in the progress of their negotiations for the mortgage, that similar irregular transactions had been going on for many months previous. In fact they were told that a check for seven hundred dollars, found in the teller's cash drawer, dated a year and more before, was probably "Mayo's fee to the teller for using the bank." While others may have considered him solvent because his paper was not found on the street, they knew that to save his reputation upon the street he was dealing clandestinely with their teller, and obtaining through him accommodations which they were themselves unwilling to grant. This debt, when discovered, he did not offer to pay, but proposed to secure upon long time, and at a reduced rate of interest. They made no examination into his affairs themselves, but trusted entirely to the representation of his counsel. The mortgage was received without being executed by his wife, and there is some evidence to show that this was done because of a fear of the consequences of delay. No examination of the records was made to ascertain the condition of the title to the property, but in this, as in other things, the statements of Mayo's counsel were accepted as true. If an examination had been made, they would have discovered, that within less than a month before, he had obtained a loan of ten thousand dollars, at twelve per cent. interest and secured it by a mortgage upon the property. With even this extraordinary addition to his available capital, he was not relieved from the necessity of "using" their teller. They would also have discovered an unpaid mortgage of seven thousand dollars and more for purchase-money, which had not been disclosed to them. But there is no use in proceeding further, The evidence of insolvency was open to them in every direction, and they were certainly put upon inquiry. They are, therefore, chargeable with notice of all that, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, they could have known. No prudent business man, with the evidence before him which was within their reach, and which they ought to have considered, could possibly have come to any other conclusion than that Mayo's condition was utterly hopeless.

The mortgage, if sustained, will actually have the effect of giving the bank a preference. The secured debts, at the time the mortgage was executed, amounted to $17,500 or thereabouts, and the unsecured was $49,000. The total value of the assets was $40,500. After the secured debts were deducted, only $23,000 was left to pay $49,000. The debt to the bank was $8000, and when that was secured there remained only $15,000 to meet the $41,000. As every man is presumed to intend the necessary consequences of his acts, the presumption is that Mayo, by his mortgage, intended to give the bank the preference it apparently secured. This presumption continues until it is overcome by proof that he was ignorant of his insolvency, and that his affairs were in such a condition that he could reasonably expect to pay all his creditors in full. Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 40. There is no such proof. On the contrary, the evidence is all the other way. Within a month proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy were begun against him to which he made no defence, and the usual adjudication was entered upon default.

As the bank is charged with notice of his insolvency, they must also be charged with notice of his intention to give them a preference contrary to the requirements of the bankrupt law. It follows that under the operation of that law their security must fail. The bank officers have not been guilty of any moral wrong. Finding Mayo a debtor of the bank without their consent, they set about securing protection against loss. Although they knew, or had reason to believe, he was insolvent, they were under no obligation to put him into bankruptcy. A mortgage would be good as against everything but the contingency of his bankruptcy. They had the right to take their chances against the happening of such an event. If he escaped bankruptcy, the debt was secured. If not, what they did would be void. They took the risk, and have lost. A decree may be entered affirming that below.

ALDRICH v. EQUITABLE SAFETY INS. CO.

[1 Woodb. & M. 272.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1846.

MARINE INSURANCE POLICY TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—INSURABLE INTEREST.

1. Where an insurance was effected by the owner of a vessel "on account of whom it may concern," "loss payable to the order of H.," who made the insurance and owned the vessel, and a consignee, in Europe, had advanced money to buy all the cargo in India, under a contract to be interested one half in the proceeds, and have the bill of lading of the cargo assigned to him for security, and the insurance to be made by the consignor on the vessel and half the cargo, to be deposited with the agent of the consignee in America, which was done except on freight instead of the vessel; the court held, that the consignee had an insurable interest in the policy, independent of any assignment; and could recover on it in his own name.

[Cited in Henshaw v. Mutual Safety Ins. Co., Case No. 6,387; The Sidney, 23 Fed. Rep. 93; The Samana Co. v. Hall, 55 Fed. Rep. 663.]

2. The vessel being lost on her way back, but the cargo saved and received in Europe afterwards by the consignee, the latter was allowed to recover so much of the loss, as was necessary to pay the balance due to him in the transaction.

3. The remainder of the loss, H., the consignor, having become bankrupt, was allowed to be retained by the insurance office, in discharge of the premium note, and other demands against H. unsatisfied, and not proved before the commissioner of bankruptcy, a clause existing in the policy allowing the detention of enough of all losses to pay what was coming to the office from the person entitled to it.

4. Nothing could thus be set off against the consignee, except what he owed in his own right, or in equity, viz., the premium note, in this case, by which he had been benefited.

5. Had the consignee claimed under the assignment, and not as a party originally concerned or interested in the insurance, the result might have been different.

[At law.] This was assumpsit [by William L. Aldrich and another against the Equitable Safety Insurance Company] on a policy of insurance, made December 17th, 1841, on the cargo of the ship Neponset, to the extent of $15,000, on one half thereof, from Bremen to the coast of Sumatra, and thence to a port of discharge in Europe, with this provision, viz.: "The balance of this policy to attach to freight after covering property." The insurance was made to Mark Healy "on account of whom it concerns," "loss payable to the order of M. Healy." The plaintiffs claimed, as possessing an insurable interest in the cargo and freight under the following circumstances, and that the insurance was made with a view to cover it. Thus, on the 17th of November, 1841, Mark Healy, being owner of the above ship, and she being at Bremen to obtain employment, in charge of her captain, one Joseph Powell, a contract was entered into between him and the plaintiffs, that the latter should furnish $23,000 in specie, and four boxes of opium for the vessel to proceed to Sumatra for the purchase of pepper, and to return with it to Europe, the adventure to be on the joint account of Healy and the plaintiffs. It was further stipulated, that the port charges should be defrayed out of this money furnished by the defendants, and the bills of lading of the cargo be consigned to them for sale, they paying for freight of half thereof, one cent and a half per pound, and that the plaintiffs should remain in advance to Healy for half the specie on the same terms as in the last voyage on their joint account. Healy was left to make insurance, and in the event of making it, the policy for the vessel and Healy's half of the cargo, was to be deposited in the hands of Messrs. N. & P., who were agents of the plaintiffs. A loss of the vessel took place about March, 1843, at the Island of Mauritius, but the cargo was not injured over five per cent., and was obliged to be reshipped and carried to Europe in another vessel, and the freight therefor was paid by the plaintiffs; the Neponset losing her freight by the loss of the vessel before reaching Europe. Though the arrangement in the original agreement was for an insurance on the cargo and vessel, Healy made it on the cargo and freight, and lodged it with Messrs. N. & P. for the plaintiffs, and it was accepted by them. The whole loss for which the defendants are liable, exceeds, it is admitted, $3000, being about $1680 and interest, since April, 1843, for general average chargeable to the cargo, and about $1681 on account of freight. But it is contended by them, that Healy in this, insured only his own property; and the plaintiffs had no insurable interest therein; or if they had, that the policy was assigned to them by Healy without the consent of the office, and hence could not be recovered on by them, under an express provision in the following words: "It is also agreed that this policy shall be void in case of its being assigned, transferred, or pledged, without the previous consent in writing of the insurers." It was further agreed in the policy as follows: "And in case of loss, to be paid in sixty days after proof of loss and proof of interest in the said property, the amount of the note given for the premium, if unpaid, and all sums coming due being first paid or secured to the satisfaction of the said company, they discounting interest for anticipating payment." The defendants claimed under this, to set off not only the premium note of $526, which remained unpaid, but other large sums, due from said Healy to the insurance office, amounting in all to $5476. Healy had failed, since the insurance, and had taken the benefit of the bankrupt act; but neither party now claiming proved their debts under the bankruptcy. The amount due to the plaintiffs as the balance of their account with Healy, after selling the cargo, was, in August, 1843, at the time the business closed, $1727; for which, and interest since they commenced this action, April 9th, 1844, they seek to be indemnified. The case was tried here in April, 1846, at an adjourned term, and a verdict taken by agreement for the plaintiff in blank, to be filled up with such sum as the court, on examination, should deem proper, if the plaintiff was in law entitled to recover. Otherwise, the verdict was to be set aside, and a general verdict to be entered for the defendants.

Phillips, for plaintiffs.

Before WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. Most of the important facts in this case are embodied in the statement of it, and on these I shall now proceed to submit briefly my views of the law. The plaintiffs seem to me to have possessed an insurable interest in the cargo and freight, which are covered by this policy. They had agreed to advance $23,000 on account of the cargo and charges, and did do it, so as to render Healy indebted to them to the extent of $11,800, and interest thereon. How were they to be secured or paid for this? Clearly in the first instance by an insurance of the cargo and the ship, with a deposit for them of the policy with their agent, and a consignment to them of the bill of lading of the return cargo. This was the original agreement; but the insurance was altered to the freight, instead of the cargo; and the amount made so large as to cover both, and accepted by the plaintiff. Thus, virtually, the plaintiffs, so far as lenders of the $11,800, had for security a stipulation to consign the bills of lading of the cargo to them, and their own indebtedness to Healy of the freight of their half of the cargo. This would be an ample indemnity, unless the return cargo should, contrary to any fair expectation, sell for less than its cost, and indeed less, to the extent of all the freight on one half of the whole cargo. But should the cargo be lost, or the freight, they held as security the insurance by Healy to the amount of all his share in the cargo, and of his expected freight, an indemnity quite safe against any ordinary contingencies, and more than sufficient in this case, as the event will show, if the plaintiff recovers. The plaintiffs stood, then, in the position of mortgagees, or trustees, or consignees of the half of the cargo and the freight thereon, that belonged to Healy, in order to secure them for the advances they had made in behalf of Healy. This was an insurable interest, whether looking at it in law or equity. 1 Phil. Ins. 107, 114; 2 Phil. Ins. 601; 1 Mason, 127, [Seamans v. Loring, Case No. 12,583;] [Traders' Ins. Co. v. Robert,] 9 Wend. 404; [Ex parte Yallop,] 15 Ves. 60, and other cases cited in Phillips.

Was the fact of an interest in others than Healy as owner and mortgagor, or consignor of the cargo and freight, disclosed in the policy, sufficiently, to entitle others to recover? I think it was. The very terms of the policy being "on account of whom it may concern," distinctly apprized the office, that Healy intended to secure by it any interests of others as well as his own. He was principal for himself as mortgagor, and agent for the plaintiffs as mortgagees. 2 Phil. Ins. 153. He acted with express and previous wishes and authority for them as well as himself, and not without either, as in Foster v. United States Ins. Co., 11 Pick. 85. The plaintiffs also accepted or ratified the insurance after it was made, by taking it through their agent in this country. Under the form of expression used then, with the accompanying facts, no doubt exists that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover on their interest to the extent of their loss, without any assignment of the policy to them in the sense contemplated in the clause of it before quoted. The action can well be brought as now, or in the name of the person who appears on the policy to insure for others, and might be prosecuted for others in his name. Farrow v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 18 Pick. 53; [Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cothel,] 7 Wend. 82; [Pigott v. Thompson,] 3 Bos. & P. 149; [Sargent v. Morris,] 3 Barn. & Ald. 281; Hurlbert v. Pacific Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,919.] Their interest attached by the insurance itself, and not by any subsequent assignment; and the indorsement by Healy, and the deposit of the policy with their agent, were merely to authorize the payment of any loss to them, as originally interested, and in conformity with the provision in the policy requiring them to be made on his order, and also in compliance with the original agreement between him and the plaintiffs, that the policy should be deposited with their agent. Wiggin v. American Ins. Co., 18 Pick. 158. Their rights, then, having commenced with the policy itself, and arising in fact under the original insurance, as set out in the declaration, and not under any assignment of it, the case is not open to the objection, that it has been assigned to them subsequently, and without the knowledge or assent of the office, and is, therefore, void. These circumstances settle, also, the other objection concerning the set-off. One object of the provision against an after assignment without the consent of the office, doubtless, was to protect its interests by means of retaining the power, in case of a loss, to set off any demands the office possessed against the original holder of the policy. [Wiggin v. American Ins. Co.,] 18 Pick. 158. Here they have retained that power, so far as regards Healy and his original interests whether as mortgagor, or cestui que trust or consignor in the property insured. But they have not retained, because they never possessed, any such power against the mortgagee or trustee, beyond his own indebtedness, which was nothing in law or equity but the premium on the property. As to that, such would have been the case, even if the suit had been in the name of Healy for the plaintiffs. Hurlbert v. Pacific Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,919.] It is well settled, that a demand, held in autre droit, cannot be set off, nor one against a person suing in autre droit. Bull. N. P. 179; [Hammonds v. Barclay,] 2 East, 230, 235; Tidd, Pr. 605, and cases cited; [French v. Andrade,] 6 Term R. 582; [Slipper v. Stidstone,] 5 Term R. 493; 5 Mason, 205, [Greene v. Darling, Case No. 5,765.] The defendants, therefore, can set off against the plaintiffs, being originally parties in interest by virtue of what appears on the face of the policy, only what is due from them in law and equity, and not what is due from other persons alone. Indeed, if an insurer knows that the broker is insuring for a third person, he cannot set off a debt due from the broker. Gordon v. Church, 2 Caines, 299. The policy in that case was in the name of the broker, and the name of the principal was not disclosed. But "brokers" was inserted in the margin; and it was proved by parol, or admitted that the principals were well known. See also, Hurlbert v. Pacific Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,919.]

There is another question as to what should be done about the mode of deducting the premium note given for this particular insurance. Healy promised to pay it; but not having done so, it should be charged on the sum going to him after paying to the plaintiffs their dues. If there be not enough of that, it, of course, as before suggested, ought to be settled by those who derive the benefits from it, (who in this instance are the plaintiffs to the extent of the balance of their account against Healy.) There is no necessity, here, however, to apportion it, and charge a part to them and the residue to Healy; because the claim of the plaintiffs, though losers, being only a part of what is due on the loss, leaves the residue, being more than enough to pay the premium, for the mortgagor, and thus open to any set-off for this or any other premiums due from him to the defendants.

In many policies there is a special provision to deduct the premium from any loss; and, indeed, on re-examination, such is evidently the design in the present case, independent of the equitable reasons for such a course. Thus, in paying averages, it is to be done, "having been paid the consideration for this insurance by the assured," &c., and in paying a loss, "the amount of the note given for the premium, if unpaid," &c., "being first deducted."

There is another view presented, as to whether the plaintiffs should recover all the loss, and account for the balance, after deducting their debt, or recover only the amount of their debt. My opinion on this is, that the company should be permitted to retain and set off against Healy or his assignees, so far as he remained interested in the property insured as mortgagor, all which remains covered by the loss after paying the mortgagee, rather than that the plaintiffs should be allowed to recover the whole and pay over the balance left, after they are satisfied, to Healy's assignees. This does exact justice to all concerned—carries out the original intent, as well as the established law on set-offs generally, (Gordon v. Church, 2 Caines, 299,) and, at the same time, protects the office in the full enjoyment of their original lien on Healy's interests in any loss, so as to hold it subject to all their claims against him under a set-off of them, when the loss is called for, instead of driving them into a bankrupt court for merely a pro rata share with other creditors, who had not, like them, any specific lien on the balance, after paying the mortgagees. Hurlbert v. Pacific Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,919.] But though in this case the plaintiffs would be liable for the premium on this particular insurance, when not paid by Healy, who gave his note for it, and agreed to pay it; yet as there are funds enough left, belonging to Healy, for the loss, to pay this premium and all due to the plaintiffs, it ought to be charged on those funds. Whether this be done by deducting it from the plaintiffs' balance, and then recharging it as so much more due to them from Healy, or by leaving it to be paid out of Healy's share, is immaterial. Let the computations be made on these principles, and the blank in the verdict filled up for only the sum due the plaintiffs, leaving the residue to be held by the office towards their debts against Healy.

COLLISION AT SEA—STEAMER AND BARK—FOG—SPEED—WRONG MANŒUVRE.

1. The bark M. was sunk by a collision with the steamer A., on the 20th of April, 1871, off Boston harbor, in a thick fog. The steamer was bound from Boston to Liverpool, heading about east by south, and going at a speed of at least seven or eight miles an hour. The fog was so dense that objects could not be seen more than fifty yards, and the steamer was blowing her fog whistle at short intervals, and had a lookout stationed on each bow. They reported the bark right ahead, whereupon the steamer's engine was at once reversed, and her helm ported, till she headed southeast half east, when she struck the bark on the port side, cutting in to her main hatch. No sound from the bark was heard on the steamer till after the bark was reported, when the sound of a horn was heard. The bark was heading northeast half east. There was very little, if any, wind. The whistle of the steamer approaching was heard on the bark some fifteen minutes before the collision, and from that time two or three blasts of a fog horn were blown by the bark in response to each blast of the steamer's whistle. Her master, when he saw the steamer, called to her to starboard her helm, and the steamer's lookout also called out "Starboard." Held, that the bark was blowing a proper fog signal, and that the speed of the steamer was the cause of its not being heard till the collision could not be avoided.

[For instances of collision and the precautions necessary to be taken in foggy weather, see The Monticello, Case No. 9,730; The Blackstone, Id. 1,473; The Matteawan, Id. 9,233; The Hammonia, Id. 6,005; The Hansa, Id. 6,037.]

2. That the steamer's speed was too great, and was a fault causing the collision. That, if the steamer had starboarded her helm instead of porting, and swung in the opposite direction as much as she did under her port helm, her direction would have been east northeast, nearly parallel with that of the bark. And that, therefore, the order to port was a wrong one, and contributed to the collision.

J. C. Dodge and T. Scudder, for libellants.
D. D. Lord, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed by the owners of the bark Merrimac, and of her pending freight, and by the owners of property and cargo on board of her, and by her officers and crew, to recover the value of the said bark, and of such freight and property and cargo, and of the effects and clothing of the said officers and crew, and the amount of the wages lost by the said officers and crew, in consequence of the sinking of such bark with said cargo and other property, through a collision which took place between her and the steamship Aleppo, on the 20th of April, 1871, off the harbor of Boston, Massachusetts, in the day time, in a thick fog. The amount claimed by the libel is $134,720.39. About four o'clock on that morning, the bark, which was on a voyage from Montevideo to Boston, made Nansett lights. About half past eleven o'clock, A. M., she was becalmed, so as to lose her steerage way, and a thick fog arose, which continued until the collision. She kept all her sails up except her mainsail and her main-royal. Her yards were braced to the starboard, but there was no wind. When the wind died away it was from about west southwest. At one o'clock, P. M., by sounding, she found twenty-three fathoms of water, with a muddy bottom. Between that time and the time of the collision she did not change her course, and, at the time of the collision, which occurred at twenty-seven minutes past one o'clock, P. M., she was heading northeast half east. The steamer was on a voyage from Boston to Liverpool. The stem of the steamer struck the port side of the bark between the main and mizzen rigging, abreast of the after hatch, the direction of the blow being one point forward of square across, that is, in a direction southeast half east. The side of the bark was crushed in the width of the steamer's bow, and the cutwater of the steamer penetrated to the starboard curbing of the after hatch. The bark sank in from ten to fifteen minutes.

The libel alleges, that the place of collision was about four miles east of Minot's Ledge lighthouse; that the bark was lying dead in the water; wholly becalmed, heading about northeast half east; that the steamer was heading about east by south; that the steamer's whistle was heard for fully fifteen minutes before the collision, and the fog horn of the bark was sounded as required by law, and everything was done on board of the bark, to avoid the collision, that could be done under the circumstances; that the steamship, being under steam, was required by law to keep out of the way of the bark, a sailing vessel, and might easily have done so by observing the rules and precautions which the law and good seamanship required of her; and that the collision and loss were wholly caused by the negligence of the persons in charge of the steamship.

The answer avers, that the steamer left her dock at East Boston soon after eleven o'clock, A. M.; that, when she left her dock, the weather was somewhat hazy, but not so as to interfere in any way with her navigation until after passing the limits of pilotage waters; that, at about twenty minutes before one o'clock, P. M., she was obliged to stop to replace some packing in one of her engines; that, at one o'clock, P. M., she again proceeded on her voyage, steering about east three-quarters south; that, at that time the wind was light, and the fog, which had begun to thicken very perceptibly soon after she passed Boston lighthouse, became so dense that it was impossible to see objects more than fifty yards distant; that every precaution was taken to avoid accidents, two men were stationed on the lookout, one on each bow, a man was stationed at the steam whistle, which was blown at short intervals, two men were sent to the wheel, to assist the quartermaster who had it in charge, and another quartermaster was stationed at the con, to transmit orders from the bridge, where the captain remained, with the second officer, to see that all hands were attending to their duty; that, by an act of the congress of the United States, sailing vessels are required, whenever there is a fog, whether by day or night, to give warning of their positions by the use of fog horns; that it then was, and, for a long time before the passage of said act, had been, customary for all sailing vessels to blow horns during fogs, as signals of their positions; that the steamer proceeded at half speed, which would have enabled her, without difficulty, to avoid all vessels giving the statutory and customary signals before mentioned, but, although a careful watch was kept, no such signal was heard until a very short time, not three minutes, before the collision, when the lookouts on the forecastle reported a ship right ahead, and close at hand, whereupon the captain instantly ordered the engines reversed and the helm ported, but, before her headway could be stopped, she ran into the bark; that, immediately upon the collision, the officers and crew of the bark got on board of the steamer, and the steamer sent a boat to save what was possible, but the wreck sank before the boat could reach her; that, as the respondents are informed and believe, the steamer's whistle was distinctly heard on board of the bark several minutes before the collision, but no sound was heard from the bark until after she was reported by the steamer's lookouts, when a very faint sound of a horn was heard, mingled with the shouts of the bark's crew; and that the collision was caused by the neglect of those in charge of the bark, either in not having a proper fog horn, or in not blowing it at all, or in not blowing it with strength enough to make it available at the distance at which these horns can usually be heard. The answer denies that the collision occurred except as above stated, or that it was in any measure caused by, or attributable to, any want of good management or proper care on the part of those in charge of the steamer.

It is to be noted, that the answer gives the condition of the weather as a fog so dense that it was impossible to see objects more than fifty yards distant. It does not state the rate of speed of the steamer, but gives it as "half speed," which is shown by the evidence to be a term of art, not meaning half of the ordinary full speed of the vessel, as would naturally be supposed, but only indicating the point at which the throttle-valve of the engine was set, to give steam to the engine. It assigns, as a reason for maintaining whatever rate of speed the steamer did maintain, the fact that no signal of a fog horn from the bark was heard by the steamer. It states that no such signal was heard until a very short time, not three minutes, before the collision; that, when it was heard, the bark was reported as right ahead, and close at hand; and that, before the headway of the steamer could be stopped, by reversing her engines, the collision occurred. Farther on it states that no sound was heard from the bark until after she was reported, when a very faint sound of a horn was heard. The only excuse which the answer sets up, for the failure of the steamer to discharge the duty imposed upon her by law, of keeping out of the way of the bark, is an alleged neglect on the part of those in charge of the bark, in reference to a fog horn. But that excuse is set up in a very loose, indefinite and tentative form of expression. It alleges neglect, either, first, in not having a proper fog horn; or, second, in not blowing it at all; or, third, in not blowing it with strength enough to make it available at the distance at which these horns can usually be heard. What such distance is, is not averred. The entire purport of the answer is, that, as the sound of a fog horn from the bark was not heard on board of the steamer sooner than it was heard, it follows that the fog horn was not a proper fog horn, or was not blown, or was not blown with sufficient strength to make it heard at the distance at which these horns can usually be heard.

The proofs in the case show, satisfactorily, that, about fifteen minutes before the collision, the steamer's whistle was first heard on board of the bark; that, up to that time, no fog horn had been blown on board of the bark; that, as soon as the whistle of the steamer was heard, the mate of the bark procured the bark's fog horn, and blew it, facing with it towards the direction whence the sound of the whistle came, and which turned out to be the direction from which the steamer afterwards came in sight; and that the mate stood, while so blowing, on the port side of the bark, at first on the poop deck, and afterwards on the top of the after house, and blew two or three blasts of the horn in response to every blast of the steamer's whistle, continuing to so blow until after the steamer came in sight, and until almost the instant of collision. The sound of the fog horn was not heard on board of the steamer until the bark was seen. But, on the evidence, it was the usual fog horn, and was blown in the usual manner, and with customary and proper force. There is nothing to show that its sound was not heard on board of the steamer at as great a distance off as it could be, in view of the speed at which the steamer was going, and the state of the atmosphere and the wind and the fog. A southeast swell was rolling, into which, some three points on her starboard bow, the steamer was plunging at the rate of at least from seven to eight knots an hour, and it is not at all strange that the sound of the fog horn was drowned by the sound of the waves, and of the steamer's motion through the air and through the water, and by the other noises inseparable from the movement, by steam machinery, of a large vessel. The fact that the fog horn was, under all these circumstances, heard when it was heard, and was then heard by a man on the bridge of the steamer, as well as by men on the bow of the steamer, shows that it was a proper horn and was properly blown.

On the evidence, the collision was due to the immoderate speed of the steamer. If her speed had been less, she would have had more opportunity and time, after hearing the fog horn, to take measures to avoid hitting the bark. Her speed was, at least, from seven to eight knots an hour, at the time of the collision, and, I think, was more. She was navigating at that speed, in a dense fog, of the character described in the answer, in a thoroughfare for vessels, some twenty miles only from Boston harbor, and about half that distance from Boston lighthouse. I have considered this question of speed recently so fully in the case of The Hansa, [Case No. 6,037.] in which the same views were urged and considered which have been advanced by the counsel for the claimants in this case, that I deem it unnecessary to add anything to the views contained in the opinion in that case. Here was a bark, becalmed, in a dense fog, within twenty miles of her destination, properly blowing a proper fog horn, and blowing it precisely in response to blasts of a steamer's steam whistle, and yet the steamer, with all the precautionary measures set up in her answer, was going through the fog at such a rate of speed, that she heard nothing from the bark till the bark was seen, and then it was too late, even with the utmost expedition used in stopping and reversing her engines and porting her helm, to avoid the bark, and the speed was so great, that the bark was severed more than half in two. It would seem to be only necessary to state these premises to reach the conclusion that the steamer was in fault, and solely in fault. Yet, the argument on the part of the claimants advances the proposition, that, even if no fault is imputable to the bark, the collision was the result of an inevitable accident. It was inevitable, probably, at the rate of speed maintained by the steamer. She did not avoid the accident. She probably would have avoided it if she could have done so. In that sense it may have been inevitable. But, in the sense of the rule of law on the subject, this collision was not an inevitable accident. The claimants insist, that the collision was the result of such an accident as could not be avoided by such vigilance and good management as were required by the circumstances of the case. But this proposition is not established by the evidence. On the contrary, it satisfactorily appears, that the collision would have been avoided if the steamer had been going only at such a rate of speed as would have enabled her to stop and reverse, after hearing the fog horn of the bark, or seeing the bark, in season to so check her headway as to put it within her power to stop short of the bark or to turn aside from her.

It is contended, on the part of the libellants, that there was fault on the part of the steamer, contributing to the collision, in porting her helm, when she discovered the bark, instead of starboarding it. The steamer was on a course east three-quarters south. The bark was heading northeast half east. The direction of the blow of the steamer was towards southeast half east, while she was swinging under a port helm. This would show that she had, by her porting, swung two points and three-quarters to starboard. If, by starboarding, at the time she ported, she had swung to port two points and three-quarters from east three-quarters south, it would have brought her to east northeast, at the time of the blow, and she would have been within a point and a half only of being parallel with the bark. I think it is demonstrated by the evidence, in connection with the foregoing facts, that the order to port on the steamer was a wrong one, that the better order would have been to starboard, and that, by starboarding, the collision would probably have been less disastrous. The master of the bark, and the lookout on the steamer, concurred in the conclusion, from their several points of observation, that starboarding was the proper manoeuvre for the steamer, and both of them expressed such conclusion, by shouts to that effect. Yet, the steamer ported. There must be a decree for the libellants, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner, to ascertain the damages.

COLLISION—RULE OF DAMAGE—COST OF CARGO AT PLACE OF SHIPMENT—INTEREST.

1. The barque M., bound from Montevideo to Boston, was sunk in a collision with the steamer A. about twenty miles from Boston harbor. The steamer was held liable for the loss. The commissioner, to whom it was referred to compute the damages, having made his report, both parties filed exceptions to it, bringing up the question, what was the true rule of damages for the loss of the cargo, and as to the allowance of interest: Held, that the true rule of damages in such a case, is to allow the cost of the cargo at its place of shipment, with expenses and charges, and insurance and interest.

2. That, where the contract price at which cargo was purchased included the expenses of putting it alongside the vessel, charges for brokerage and commissions and counsel's certificates in purchasing and shipping, if paid, and usual and necessary, are to be allowed, as part of the cost.

3. On cargo bought generally, charges for putting the cargo alongside are allowable also. Charges for putting money at the purchase place to pay for the cargo are not allowable. Interest on the purchase price paid, from the time it was paid, is allowable, and also interest on all other allowable items. But the rate of interest allowed is six per cent.

In admiralty.

T. Scudder and J. C. Dodge, (of Boston,) for libellants. D. D. Lord, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The bark Merrimac was, on the 20th of April, 1871, in daylight, in a thick fog, run down and sunk, with her cargo, by the steamer Aleppo, at a point about twenty miles from Boston harbor, and about half that distance from Boston lighthouse. She had come, with her cargo, from Montevideo, and was bound to Boston. On a libel filed by the owners of the bark, and of her pending freight, and by the owners of property and cargo on board of her, and by her officers and crew, to recover the value of the bark, and of such freight and property and cargo, and of the effects and clothing of the officers and crew, and the amount of the wages lost by the officers and crew, in consequence of the sinking of the bark, with said cargo and other property, this court held [The Aleppo, Case No. 157] that the steamer was solely in fault for the collision, and rendered a decree that the libellants recover against the steamer the damages sustained by them by reason of the collision, and that it be referred to a commissioner to ascertain and compute the amount of such damages. The report of the commissioner has been made. It is not questioned in any particular by either party, except as to its conclusions respecting the amount of damages by the loss of the cargo, and respecting interest.

The commissioner reports that it was contended on the part of the libellants, owners of cargo, that they are entitled to be paid the market value thereof in Boston, at the time when it was lost, less duties, freight and charges for landing, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the loss, being the sum of $112,147.76, as shown by schedule No. 1 annexed to the report. He further reports that the claimants insisted that the damages should not exceed the actual cost of the cargo at its port of shipment (part having been shipped at Colonia and part at Montevideo), with expenses of lading, and that the interest should not exceed 6 per cent. per annum from the time of the loss, being the sum of $68,558.34, as shown by schedule No. 2, annexed to the report. He further reports that he has refused to adopt either of the rules above stated, but has allowed to the libellants the actual cost of the cargo, with expenses of lading on board, and such increase in the market value at the port of shipment as occurred previous to the loss of the vessel, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the time of the loss, being the sum of $81,378.46, as shown by schedule No. 3, annexed to the report.

The libellants except to the report, because the commissioner refused to adopt the rule so contended for by them, and because he made the allowance which he did make. The claimants except to it, (1) because he has allowed for the value of the cargo more than its market value at the port of shipment, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum; and (2) because he has allowed to the libellants, in addition to the actual cost of the cargo, an increase in its market value occurring prior to the date of the loss; and (3) because he has allowed 17½ per cent. on the cost of the cargo belonging to three of the owners of cargo, without stating the ground on which such allowance is made; and (4) because there is no evidence to sustain such allowance of 17½ per cent.; and (5) because he has allowed 2½ per cent. on the cost of the cargo belonging to another owner of cargo, for rise in value from the time of purchase to the time of loss; and (6) because he has allowed premiums of insurance in addition to cost and increase in market price to the time of loss; and (7) because he has allowed, in addition to the cost of cargo and increase in market value to the time of loss, charges for purchasing and shipping cargo, expenses of classification, consul's certificates, commissions for drawing exchange, brokerage on sale of exchange, interest on cost between time of payment and reimbursement by exchange, London bankers' commission and premium of exchange, and because such items are especially improper if the libellants are allowed the market value at the time of the loss; and (8) because he has allowed on the cargo belonging to three of the owners of cargo, the difference between the purchase money and the whole cost of such cargo on board, and because such items are especially improper if the libellants are allowed the market value at the time of the loss; and (9) because he has allowed interest, and at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, on all the items allowed in his report, as well as on those found in schedule No. 3, no evidence having been given of payment, or loss, of interest, or of any other circumstances justifying the allowance of it, and also because the rate of interest in this court is only 6 per cent. per annum.

The report of the commissioner, in connection with schedule No. 3, shows that he has allowed, as damages, to the four owners of cargo, the actual cost of the cargo, with the expenses of lading on board, and such increase in the market value thereof at the port of shipment, as occurred previous to the loss of the cargo, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. The cargo was wool. As to each one of three of the owners, schedule No. 3 shows that the mode adopted of arriving at the amount reported was this: Set down the cost, in gold, of the purchase of the wool, "without charges of shipment or other expenses;" to this add 11½ per cent. thereon, for gold premium; to the resulting sum add 17½ per cent. thereon (for what, is not stated in the schedule); to the resulting sum add an item as "difference between cost of purchase and whole cost of wool on board in currency," and an item as "cost of insurance," and an item as "interest from April 20th, 1871, at 7 per cent." This mode produces allowances to the three owners, severally, of $17,501.65, and $20,038.18, and $29,207.62. As to the fourth owner, schedule No. 3 shows that the mode of arriving at the amount reported was this: Set down the cost, in Montevideo paper currency, of the purchase of the wool; to this add 2½ per cent. thereon, as "rise in value from time of purchase to time of loss," and 1 6-10 per cent. thereon, as "commissions, &c.," and an item as "cost of shipment;" to the resulting sum (which is put down as "total cost, in Montevideo currency") turned into gold at 92 97-100 per cent. thereon, add an item, as "insurance paid, in gold;" to the resulting sum add 11½ per cent. premium thereon; to the resulting sum (which is put down as "total in United States currency") add "interest from April 20th, 1871, at 7 per cent." This mode produces an allowance to the fourth owner of $5,541.01.

The exceptions raise the question, whether the allowance for loss of cargo ought to be the market value of it in Boston at the time of the loss, less freight, duties, and charges for lading; or, whether it should be only the actual cost of the cargo when on board of the vessel at the port of shipment (including expense of lading), which may be regarded as its market value when on board, at such port, without any addition for any increase in the market value of like cargo at such port, occurring prior to the time of the loss; or whether it should be what the report allows, namely, the actual cost when on board of the vessel, at the port of shipment (including expense of lading), with the addition of the increase in the market value of like cargo at such port, occurring prior to the time of the loss. The cases in which the question is considered are few in number. The general rule, in cases of collision, is easily stated. In The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. [Adm.] 279, it is said, that "the right against the wrong-doer is for a restitutio in integrum," and that the suffering party must be put "as nearly as possible in the same situation in which he would have been if no collision had taken place." In Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, it is said: "It is the actual damage sustained by the party at the time and place of the injury, that is the measure of damages." In Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101, 110, it is said: "The general rule regulating damages in cases of collision is to allow the injured party an indemnity to the extent of the loss sustained. This general rule is obvious enough; but there is a good deal of difficulty in stating the grounds upon which to arrive, in all cases, at the proper measure of that indemnity." But the question remains—what sum of money, in the given case, will be a restitutio in integrum, a replacing of the actual damage, an indemnity to the extent of the loss. Whatever that sum is, it must be fixed, as nearly as may be, as of the time and place of the loss.

The general principle, in cases of cargo lost or damaged by collision, is thus stated in Lowndes on Collisions (page 157): "If, by reason of collision, the cargo on board is lost or damaged, the owner of it is entitled to compensation for his actual loss; that is to say, to the sum for which such cargo would have been sold had there been no collision, minus such expenses as must, in that case, have been incurred in order to realize the proceeds, and deducting also the sum for which it may have actually been sold."

In Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 64, in 1804, which was the case of a seizure of a vessel and cargo, by a United States frigate, as forfeited for a violation of a non-intercourse law, the supreme court, in declaring the seizure to have been illegal, and holding the owner of the vessel and cargo to be entitled to damages for the seizure (the cargo having been procured at St. Thomas, and the vessel and cargo having been seized at sea, and carried into Martinique, and the cargo having been sold at Martinique, by the captain of the frigate, and the vessel having been brought into Philadelphia, and there libelled), decided that the damages for not restoring the vessel and cargo at Martinique should be the actual prime cost of the vessel and cargo, with interest thereon, including the insurance actually paid and such expenses as were necessarily sustained in consequence of bringing the vessel into the United States.

In the case of The Lively, [Case No. 8-403,] in 1812, Judge Story says, that "in cases where the vessel and cargo have been captured, and afterwards lost to the owner, the supreme court of the United States have confined themselves to the prime value thereof, and interest thereon, to the judgment." He also says: "I am not aware of a single authority in the higher courts of admiralty, in which supposed profits have formed an item of damage in cases of restitution. * * * I have not been able to trace in later reports a single instance where loss of profits has been allowed." He then examines the question upon principle, and comes to the conclusion that an allowance of damages upon the basis of a calculation of profits is inadmissible, and says, that such a rule has been rejected by the courts of law in ordinary cases, and that, instead of deciding upon the gains or losses of parties in particular cases, a uniform interest has been applied, as the measure of damages for the detention of the property. Much of his reasoning applies as well to the loss of cargo in a case of collision as to a case of illegal capture, which was the case before him. A calculation of profits involves uncertainty, and proceeds upon the contingencies of the market, and is a calculation upon conjecture, and would work injustice if applied to the case of a bad market and a loss thereby, and would be a rule which would always work substantially one way, and would fall heavily on the innocent owner of a colliding vessel held in fault for the negligence of her master. All these considerations lead to the conclusion that profits, on the supposition of the prosperous termination of the voyage, ought not, in any case, to constitute an item of damage.

The case of The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 327, in 1817, was one of marine trespass by a privateer, where a vessel and her cargo were unlawfully captured and sold. The supreme court awarded, as damages, the value of the vessel, and the prime cost of the cargo, with all charges, and the premium of insurance, if paid, with interest.

The case of The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546, in 1818, was one of marine trespass by a privateer, in the seizure and detention of a vessel and her cargo. In rejecting an item for the loss of the supposed profits of the voyage on which the vessel was bound, the supreme court say: "The probable or possible benefits of a voyage as yet in fieri, can never afford a safe rule by which to estimate damages in cases of marine trespass. There is so much uncertainty in the rule itself, so many contingencies which may vary or extinguish its application, and so many difficulties in sustaining its legal correctness, that the court cannot believe it proper to entertain it. In several cases in this court, the claim for profits has been expressly overruled; and in Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 333, and The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 327, it was, after strict consideration, held, that the prime cost or value of the property lost at the time of the loss, and, in case of injury, the diminution in value by reason of the injury, with interest upon such valuation, afforded the true measure for assessing damages. This rule may not secure a complete indemnity for all possible injuries, but it has certainty and general applicability to recommend it, and, in almost all cases, will give a fair and just recompense." In allowing interest in this case, the supreme court fixed the rate at six per cent.

The case of Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, in 1843, was one of a collision between two American vessels in the port of Liverpool. The injured vessel had a cargo of salt, and was ready to sail for the United States. She offered to prove that, if she had not been prevented from sailing by the injury complained of, she would have arrived at her port of destination with her cargo in season to have obtained more for it than she received. The evidence was rejected. The supreme court say: "It has been repeatedly decided in cases of insurance, that the insured cannot recover for the loss of probable profits at the port of destination, and that the value of the goods at the place of shipment is the measure of compensation. There can be no good reason for establishing a different rule in cases of loss by collision. It is the actual damage sustained by the party at the time and place of the injury that is the measure of damages."

In Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101, in 1851, the court considered the question, in a collision case, of the allowance to the injured vessel of compensation, during the time necessary to repair her and fit her for business for the loss of what she would have produced by chartering her to run in the business in which she had usually been engaged. The court followed the principle of the decision in the case of The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. [Adm.] 279. It conceded that the earnings of a vessel not under a charter party must, in some measure, depend upon the contingency of obtaining employment for her, but it held that the market price of her hire afforded a proper rule for estimating the damage sustained on account of the loss of her service. Three of the judges dissented, holding that the case fell within the rule, that, in cases of marine torts, no damages could be allowed for the loss of a market, or for the probable profits of a voyage. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson.

The case of The Ocean Queen, [Case No. 10,409,] in this court, in 1866, was one of collision, where a schooner on a voyage from Baltimore to Providence, with a cargo, was, with such cargo, sunk at sea, by a collision. The commissioner, in assessing the damages to the cargo, took the price it would have brought at the port of destination, instead of the price paid at the port of shipment. The claimants excepted to the report. This court (Shipman, J.) said: "I think the exception on this point is well taken. It is open to the objections stated by Mr. Justice Story, in the case of The Lively, [Case No. 8,403.] Though that was not a case of damage by collision, it was a case of damage by another kind of tort. His remarks are, therefore, apt and to the point. To estimate the damages by what the cargo would have sold for, if it reached the port of destination, partakes, in some measure, of conjecture, and assumes that for certain which is, after all, contingent. The schooner, in this case, might never have reached her port of destination, even if she had not collided with the Ocean Queen. She was exposed to all the ordinary perils of navigation—collision, fire, and the numberless dangers which attend vessels on the sea. I understand the correct rule to be laid down by the supreme court of the United States, in Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, which is, the value of the goods at the port of shipment. To this should be added the expense of navigating the vessel to the place where the collision occurred, including also the lading of the cargo on board. On this amount, the libellant is entitled to interest at six per cent. from the time of the collision." On appeal to the circuit court by the claimants, that court (Nelson J., 5 Blatchf. 493, [The Ocean Queen, Case No. 10,410,]) in 1867, said: "The only question worthy of notice is that of damages in respect to the cargo. The owners of the cargo claim that they are entitled to the market value of the cargo, consisting of flour, corn and feed, at the port of destination, Providence, or, at least, to the general increased market value that took place between the time of the shipment at Baltimore, and the time of the collision. The court below held, that the damages should be ascertained from the value of the goods at the port of shipment, including all expenses of transportation to the place of collision, and of the lading of the cargo on board, &c., together with interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time of the collision. This is the rule, substantially, as settled in the case of The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 327, and in Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, 35, as governing in all cases of marine torts. See, also, The Lively, [Case No. 8,403.]

The case of The Vaughan and The Telegraph, in this court, [Case No. 9,217,] in 1867, was a case of the loss of a cargo of barley, on the Hudson river, between Newburgh and Cold Spring, by a collision, the barley being in transit on a canal-boat from Canada to New York. The commissioner, in computing the damages for the loss of the barley, took, as its value, the price at which other barley, on another boat in the same tow, was sold at New York, a few days after the collision, deducting therefrom the commission for the sale, and the freight on the barley, and adding interest on the remainder at seven per cent. per annum. The claimants excepted to the report, on the grounds that the commissioner should not have taken the value at New York, or at the place of collision, but should have taken it at the place of shipment, and that the proper rate of interest was six per cent. per annum, and not seven. In disposing of the case, I referred to the authorities above cited, and said: "The law is well settled, that, in case a contract to deliver goods is broken, the party is entitled to recover the full value of the goods at the place of delivery. * * * But in cases of loss of cargo by collision, or other tort, the rule is equally well settled, that the value of the lost property at the time and place of its shipment is the measure of damages." I held the commissioner to have erred in not adopting, as the measure of damages, the value of the barley at the port of shipment, and in allowing interest at seven per cent. and not at six. The circuit court, on appeal, (Nelson, J.,) concurred in the view, that the proper rule of damages, in respect to the cargo, was its value at the port of shipment. The supreme court, in its opinion in the case, on appeal, (14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 258, 267,) says: "In the district court, it was held, that the proper rule of damages where a cargo is lost in transitu by a collision, or other tort, is the value of the goods at the time and place of shipment. It was conceded, that, upon the breach of a contract for the delivery of goods at a particular place, the measure of damages is the full value of the goods at such place. Both propositions are correct and are well settled in our jurisprudence."

The libellants, in supporting their exception, contend that the proper measure of damages is the market value of the wool in Boston, on the day of its loss, less duties, freight and charges for landing, and less, also (an item not referred to in their exception, or before the commissioner) the reasonable cost of insuring the cargo from the place of loss to Boston. They insist that this would give the value of the cargo at the time and place of its destination, and would be in accordance with the rule laid down in Smith v. Condry, [supra.] But this construction of the rule would fritter it away altogether. The value at Liverpool, of a cargo lost by collision in the port of Liverpool, bound to Boston, would be ascertained by taking its market value at Boston, and deducting duties, freight, expenses of landing and insurance. This might give the very profits which were refused in Smith v. Condry.

It is urged for the libellants, that this cargo was lost but a few miles from Boston. But it was lost at a point where, as the facts show, there was greater peril than in the whole voyage. If the barque had not been run down by the Aleppo, she might have been run down during the same fog by some other vessel, nearer to Boston. If she had collided one mile further from Boston with some other vessel, in a fog, and her cargo had been lost thereby, its owners might, with equal force, have contended for the rule they now contend for. Yet it is shown that equal peril exists one mile nearer Boston, in a fog. The contingency of a safe arrival at Boston, in a case like the present, is purely a matter of conjecture.

It is contended, by the libellants, that Smith v. Condry, [supra.] is overruled by Williamson v. Barrett, [supra.] if the former case is to be considered as laying down the rule, that increased values or expected profits or earnings can never be allowed as damages in collision cases. It is sufficient to say, that the supreme court and the judges who concurred in the opinion of the court in the latter case, have never regarded the latter case as overruling the former. Mr. Justice Nelson, who delivered the opinion of the court in the latter case, cites the former case, in The Ocean Queen, [supra.] as settling the rule which is to govern on like questions in all cases of marine torts. In the case of The Vaughan and The Telegraph, [supra.] the supreme court sanction the rule which, in the same case, I had, on the authority of Smith v. Condry, [supra.] adopted; and, in the very next case in the same volume, (The Cayuga, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 270,) the same court maintain the doctrine of Williamson v. Barrett, [supra.] that reasonable demurrage, for unavoidable detention while repairing an injured vessel, is a proper charge in all suits for damages by collision.

It seems to me impossible, either on principle or on authority, to admit the rule of damages contended for by the libellants. That rule was not departed from in the case of The Russia. [Case No. 12,169.] where the value at New York, of a cargo which had arrived from a foreign port, and was damaged by a collision on board of a vessel at her anchorage in the harbor of New York, less freight and duties, was allowed; or in the case of The Alabama, [nowhere reported,] in this court, where the value at New York, of a vessel which had arrived from a foreign port, and was owned there, and was damaged by a collision in the harbor of New York, off Staten Island, was allowed. The principle of these allowances was, that the property was not in transitu, but was, substantially, at New York, as a market.

It is equally impossible to sustain the rule of damages adopted by the commissioner. The general increase in market value, between the time of shipment and the time of the collision, was claimed and disallowed by the circuit court for this district, in the case of The Ocean Queen, [supra.] I should feel bound by that decision, so long as it was not overruled, even if I did not concur in its propriety. But it seems to me a correct decision. No principle of restitution in integrum, or of putting the suffering party as nearly as possible in the same situation in which he would have been if no collision had taken place, or of giving him the actual damage sustained by him at the time and place of the injury, or of giving him indemnity to the extent of the loss sustained—as the general rule is thus variously expressed—requires or admits an allowance made on the principle adopted by the commissioner in this case. It is true, that the place of the loss was not Montevideo, and that, at the time of the loss, like wool with that composing this cargo may have been worth more in the market at Montevideo than it cost the libellants to buy this wool. In a strict sense, there was no market, at the place of the loss, for the sale of the wool, but it had for the libellants the value of the money which they had expended upon it, in procuring it and lading it and transporting it to the place where it was lost, with interest. It had, however, no further value to them, at that place, and their actual loss was nothing more than such money, with interest. Restoring to them that money, with interest, restores all they actually lost. All beyond that was expected profits. The wool was not in Montevideo, so as to have applied to it any increase in market value, after it left there, which might have applied to it if it had remained there and been sold. The increase in value after it left there, and while it was on the voyage, based on an increase in the value there of like wool, is as much contingent as an increase in its value based on a price of like wool in Boston, at the time of the loss, higher than the price paid in Montevideo. The value of the wool to these libellants at the time and place of the loss, was only what it cost them to buy it and convey it to the place of loss, with interest. So, too, they cannot be allowed for any increase in market value at Montevideo or other place of purchase or shipment, between the time of purchase and the time of shipment. The rule is one which must operate uniformly in all cases. If there had been, between the time of purchase and the time of shipment a fall in the market value of the wool at the foreign place, it would be unjust to deprive the libellants, for that reason, of a part of the money they had actually expended on the wool. The risk of a bad market, whether at Montevideo or Boston, is one which the law will not throw on the libellants, so as to make them suffer by it; and, on the same principle, the owners of a vessel whose master, by an act of negligence, makes such vessel or her owners responsible for a marine tort, ought not to be compelled to pay the profits or increase which a good market might have afforded, if the tort had not been committed. It was the force of these principles, which led the supreme court, at an early day, to adopt the rule of prime cost of cargo, and expenses, and charges, and insurance, and interest, in cases like the present, and has induced it to adhere to such rule.

The item of insurance paid on the cargo is a proper item to be allowed, if properly proved. It is a part of the cost of the cargo, on board of the vessel, at the place and time of the loss. On wool, where the contract price included the expenses of putting the wool alongside of the vessel, charges for brokerage and commissions and consul's certificates, in purchasing and shipping, if paid, and if usual and necessary expenses, are proper, as part of the cost of the wool on board. On wool bought loose, the above charges are proper, and also charges for receiving and shipping, baling, cartage and lighterage, labor, custom house duties and charges, stamps, and classification, if paid, and if usual and necessary expenses. Charges for placing money at the purchase place to pay for the wool are not proper—such as commission for drawing bills of exchange, and London banker's commission, and brokerage on sale of exchange, and premium of exchange. Nor is the item of interest on the cost of the wool between the time of paying for it and the time of reimbursement by exchange, allowable, in that shape. Interest, however, on the purchase price paid, from the time it was paid, is allowable. So, also, interest is allowable on all other allowable items proved and paid. But such rate of interest on all the items in regard to the cargo must be six per cent., and not seven.

The claimants except because the commissioner has allowed interest on all the items in his report, as well as on those relating to the cargo, and also, because, in allowing it, he has taken seven per cent., and not six. I do not see why interest should not be allowed from the time of the loss on the value of the vessel, and of her net freight, and of provisions, and of the chronometer, and of the clothes, money and effects of the officers and seamen, and, from May 16th, 1871, on the amounts allowed in the nature of wages to the officers and seamen. But the rate of interest must be six per cent., and not seven.

As to interest on money paid out by the libellants, there can be no proper objection to its allowance. As to interest on the other items above referred to, interest is not allowable as a matter of law, except in cases of contract, or the unlawful detention of money. In cases of tort, its allowance as damages is a matter of discretion. Lincoln v. Claffin, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 132, 139. It seems to me a proper allowance in this case on the items referred to. Allen v. Mackay [Case No. 228;] Egbert v. Baltimore & O R. Co., [Id. 4,305.]

In admiralty, in cases of collision, where interest is allowed, it ought to be a uniform rate, and not one varying with the laws of the states. Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 255, 259. Such rate of interest, in collision cases tried in this court, has been and is six per cent., except, that, on money paid out here, for repairs made here, interest according to the law of this state has, in some cases, been allowed. This rate of six per cent. was fixed at an early day, in analogy, perhaps, to the rate fixed by act of congress as the rate on bonds for duties to the United States. Act March 2, 1799, § 65, 1 Stat. 677. It is the rate which the supreme court has allowed in cases of this kind.

The third exception of the claimants is technically correct and must be allowed. The other exceptions of both parties are disposed of in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed, and the case must be referred back to the commissioner to be adjusted accordingly.

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION—POWER OF ATTORNEY.

Creditors of a bankrupt, who offered terms of composition, gave a power of attorney to T., which stated that the composition was not to be accepted if made for less than 20 per cent., 10 per cent. to be paid in six months, and 10 per cent. in twelve months, from February 16th, 1875. T. signed a composition which provided for the payment of 20 per cent. in six and twelve months from March 16th, 1875: Held, that this difference in time was fatal to the proceedings.

the proceedings in the composition in this matter. The composition provides for the payment of 20 per cent. in two equal payments at six and twelve months from March 10th, 1875. It is signed by nearly all the creditors [of Joseph Alexander, the bankrupt,] through Mr. Tappen as attorney, under a power of attorney which states that the composition is not to be accepted by the signers of the power of attorney, or either of them, if made for less than 20 per cent., 10 per cent. thereof to be paid in six months, and 10 per cent. in twelve months, from February 16th, 1875. This is not a clerical error, because the paper in confirmation shows that the word "March" was written in after the word "February" had been written in and erased.

Independently of this excess of authority by the attorney, it is more than questionable whether, on the developments in the evidence, the composition is one which ought to be sanctioned, or one which the creditors themselves would approve, if called upon now to sign it in person.

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1869.

CIRCUIT COURTS — APPELLATE JURISDICTION IN BANKRUPTCY CASES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. The jurisdiction of superintendence conferred upon the circuit court by the second section of the bankrupt act, must be exercised over proceedings in bankruptcy already pending in the district court, and it seems to be a reasonable interpretation that it does not extend to decisions of the district court from which appeals may be taken.

2. By the eighth section of the bankrupt act appellate jurisdiction is given to the circuit court in four classes of cases: 1. By appeals in cases in equity decided in the district court, under the jurisdiction created by the act; 2. By writ of error in cases at law decided in the exercise of that jurisdiction; 3. By appeal from decisions rejecting wholly or in part the claims of supposed creditors; and 4. By appeal from decisions allowing such claims.

[Cited in Knight v. Cheney, Case No. 7,883.]

3. The suits belonging to the first two classes of cases seem to be those of which concurrent jurisdiction is given to the circuit and district courts by the eighth section; for no jurisdiction of cases at law or in equity relating to the estate, rights, or liabilities of the bankrupt is expressly given to the district court elsewhere than in the third clause of the second section; though this jurisdiction may be well enough held to be included in the general grant of the first section.

[Cited in Re Norris, Case No. 10,304; In re Brinkman, Id. 1,884; Goodall v. Tuttle, Id. 5,533; Johnson v. Price, Id. 7,407.]

4. The appellate jurisdiction, strictly so called, conferred upon the circuit courts, is limited to controversies between assignees and the claimants of adverse interests, and to controversies between assignees and creditor-claimants, touching the allowance of claims.

[Cited in Norton v. Barker, Case No. 10,349. Followed in York's Case, Id. 18,139.]

5. The right of appeal, as given by the statute, can neither be enlarged nor restricted by the district or the circuit court. The regulation of appeals is a regulation of jurisdiction. The circuit court has no jurisdiction of any appeal, in any case, under the bankrupt act, from the district court, unless it is claimed, and the bond is filed at the time it is claimed, and notice of it is given, as required by the eighth section of the act, within ten days after the entry of the decree or decision appealed from; or unless it is entered at the term of the circuit court first held within and for the proper district next after the expiration of the ten days from the time it was claimed.

6. The only construction which gives due effect to all parts of the act relating to revisory jurisdiction seems to be that which on the one hand excludes from the category of general superintendence and jurisdiction of the circuit court the appellate jurisdiction defined by the eighth section; and, on the other, brings within that category all decisions of the district court or the district judge at chambers, which can not be reviewed upon appeal or writ of error under the provisions of that section.

In bankruptcy. John D. Alexander was duly adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition, and filed the usual schedules of his debts and assets. Among the debts was a judgment due Bagley, which judgment had been duly docketed under the law of Virginia in the counties where the real estate of the bankrupt lay, and thereby became a lien on such real estate. With a large number of other debts, was one due Miller, by three bonds, each for seventeen thousand dollars, dated December 24, 1864, and payable from five to six years after date. These bonds were endorsed by John Alexander, the son of the bankrupt, and were secured by a deed of trust on a plantation sold by Miller to Alexander, which deed was of even date with the bonds, and was given simultaneously with the sale, and of course were the first lien on the property. John Alexander had a lease of this plantation from his father, which would expire, if proper notice was given, on the first day of January, 1870, six months' notice being necessary to oust this tenant. The assignee of the bankrupt filed a petition to sell the real estate, free and discharged from all encumbrances. On this petition Bagley showed cause against granting it until the bonds held by Miller were scaled down to their alleged proper value in legal money, they having been executed December 24, 1864, at a time when one gold dollar was worth sixty dollars of Confederate currency, and when the bonds would fall due, that currency would be utterly worthless. He claimed that the bonds must be either reduced to their gold value as of the date of their execution, or else must be considered as payable in a worthless currency, and therefore be now adjudicated as having no value, and therefore constituting no lien on the plantation covered by the deed of trust. If this was established, of course Bagley's judgment would become valuable as a valid lien on valuable property. John Alexander also showed cause, and claimed that the bonds held by Miller, and endorsed by him, should be scaled according to Bagley's contention—whereby he either would be relieved from all responsibility on them, or that by the great reduction they would undergo by the scaling process, the property would produce more than enough to pay them, and thus relieve him. It was shown that at the present or any past value of the plantation it would not bring more than twelve thousand dollars, never having brought or been valued at more than that in gold times. Alexander also claimed that any order of sale ought expressly to reserve his rights under the tenancy, or that he ought to be compensated for ousting him therefrom, out of the first proceeds of the real estate, before Miller's deed of trust.

Miller, on the other hand, appeared and consented to the sale, but claimed to have the first lien under his deed of trust for fifty-one thousand dollars, and interest from December 24, 1864, in lawful money of the United States. It was admitted that the value of the plantation before or during the war never exceeded twelve thousand dollars on a gold standard; but he contended that the purchase of the plantation at that price, payable at rates so far in the future, was a contract of hazard, in which he took the chance that the currency in existence when the bonds became payable would be more valuable than it was when they were made, and that the Alexanders, father and son, assumed the hazard that it would be less so. He claimed that the bonds were payable in the currency in existence when they fell due.

The district judge refused to scale the bonds, and on March 16, 1869, passed an order directing a sale of the estate, allowing Miller to bid and pay his bonds at their full value on account of the purchase money, in case he purchased it, as it was almost certain he would do. From this order the assignee appealed, on the solicitation of Bagley and Alexander, who gave him security against costs of the appeal, and agreed to furnish also the appeal bond required by law. Not having been able to do so within the ten days required by the statute, these proceedings having taken place at Alexandria, in chambers, while they were all required to be entered in the clerk's office in Richmond, while the estate and the parties were in and near Lynchburgh, the district judge extended the time for filing the bond, and it was duly approved and filed within the time thus extended. Bagley and Alexander were thus satisfied that their rights were perfectly protected by the supersedeas of the bond and by the appeal which would ensue on adjudication by the circuit court, then about to meet.

After that court had been in session several days, the parties always considering themselves as the parties prosecuting the appeal, and substantially interested in it, after the court had adjourned one day, and the appeal was to be heard the next, the assignee informed them that he had authorized the counsel for Miller to move in his (the assignee's) name for the dismissal of the appeal. Thereupon they prepared a petition, setting forth the facts that the time for appeal had expired, and they were helpless unless the circuit court would supervise these proceedings under the power given in the second section of the bankrupt act.

For the petitioners, Bagley and Alexander, Bradley T. Johnson moved for leave to file this petition, and for an order restraining the district court from proceeding further in the matter until this court had heard and determined the cause. He urged that the petitioners had been taken by surprise, and if they were obliged to wait until this court issued an order commanding the assignee and Miller to appear and answer the charges in the petition—the assignees would in the meantime act in concert with Miller, as they had done before; would sell and convey the property to Miller, under the unrescinded or unsuperseaded order of the district court—and the supervision of this court be thus rendered nugatory.

L. H. Chandler and Charles Dabney, for Miller, showed cause why the petition should not be filed.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. A petition has been presented to the court by P. C. Bagley and John Alexander, for the revision of an order of the district court. It appears that among the assets of the bankrupt was a tract of land, encumbered by a deed of trust, executed by him on December 24, 1864, in favor of William D. Miller, to secure the payment of three bonds, each for seventeen thousand dollars, payable in four, eight, and twelve years from date, respectively; that the petitioner, Alexander, is tenant of the tract, under the assignee, claiming a term which will not expire until January 1, 1870; and that the petitioner, Bagley, holds a judgment, which is a lien on the real estate of the bankrupt, and is claimed to be the next lien after the deed of trust. On March 16, 1869, the district court made two orders, one directing the assignee to sell the land, and the other directing that Miller might become the purchaser, and that the assignee should receive the amount of his bid in the trust bonds at par. The petitioners as soon as these orders came to their knowledge prayed an appeal in the name, and with the approval of the assignee, and immediately notified Miller and the clerk of the district court of their appeal. The time for filing the bond on appeal was extended by the order of the district judge until April 13, and on the 14th an order was passed showing that the assignee had filed his bond in the penalty of ten thousand dollars. On May 6, the assignee informed the counsel for the petitioners that he would not allow the use of his name in the prosecution of this appeal. The petitioners, therefore, ask in consideration of the surprise occasioned to them by this information, and also upon the ground that an appeal from the order of the district judge in such a case as that before him is not allowed by the act, that the court will give them leave to file their petition now presented and grant them appropriate relief. The petition invokes the exercise of the jurisdiction of superintendence, conferred upon the circuit courts by the second section of the bankrupt act, which provides that "the several circuit courts within and for the district where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act; and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as a court of equity."

In the consideration of this petition it becomes necessary to ascertain, if possible, the nature and extent of the jurisdiction thus conferred. It is clear that it must be exercised over proceedings in bankruptcy already pending in the district court, and it seems to be a reasonable interpretation that it does not extend to decisions of the district court from which appeals may be taken. By the eighth section, appellate jurisdiction of such decisions was conferred upon the circuit court in four classes of cases: 1. By appeal in cases in equity decided in the district court, under the juris-isdiction created by the act; 2. By writs of error in cases at law, decided in the exercise of that jurisdiction; 3. By appeal from decisions rejecting wholly or in part the claims of supposed creditors; and, 4. By appeal from decisions allowing such claim. In the first two classes of cases, the appeal or writ of error is given to the unsuccessful party to the suit, whether in equity or at law; in the third class it is given to the dissatisfied creditor; in the fourth to the dissatisfied assignee. The suits belonging to the first two classes of cases seem to be those of which concurrent jurisdiction is given to the circuit and district courts by the eighth section; for no jurisdiction of cases at law or in equity relating to the estate, rights, or liabilities of the bankrupt is expressly given to the district court elsewhere than in the third clause of the second section; though this jurisdiction may be well enough held to be included in the general grant of the first section.

If this view is correct and the jurisdiction of the district court under the act spoken of in the eighth section is the jurisdiction defined by the third clause of the second section, the appellate jurisdiction by appeal and writ of error, from decisions in the exercise of that jurisdiction, must be regarded as limited to suits at law, or in equity, by assignees against persons claiming adverse interest, or by such persons against assignees. From these premises the necessary deduction is that the appellate jurisdiction, strictly so called, conferred upon the circuit courts, is limited to the controversies between assignees and the claimants of adverse interests and to controversies between assignees and creditor-claimants touching the allowance of claims. But there must be, obviously, numerous decisions by the district courts and district judges sitting at chambers, which are not included in either of these categories.

The order complained of in the petition is an example: It is not a decree in equity; nor a judgment at law; nor a rejection of claim in whole or part; nor an allowance of a claim. From this order, then, it is clear no appeal could be taken. On this point there seems to have been a misapprehension both of counsel and of the district judge; for an appeal was allowed, though not in time; and afterwards the time for filing the appeal bond was extended. Of this nothing more need be said now than that the right of appeal as given by the statute can neither be enlarged nor restricted by the district or the circuit court. The regulation of appeal is a regulation of jurisdiction. The circuit court has no jurisdiction of any appeal in any case, under the bankrupt act, from the district court, unless it is claimed and bond is filed at the time it is claimed, and notice of it is given, as required by the eighth section of the act, within ten days after the entry of the decree or decision appealed from; or unless it is entered at the term of the circuit court first held within and for the proper district next after the expiration of the ten days from the time it was claimed. This is mentioned here only to correct the misapprehension which seems to prevail, concerning the jurisdiction of this court upon appeals. Returning, then, to the order mentioned in the petition, and finding it as already stated to be one from which no appeal can be taken, the conclusion is inevitable that it is one which may be reviewed in the exercise of the power of general superintendence, or that it cannot be reviewed at all.

It may be said that the superintending jurisdiction does not extend to decisions of the district court, or of the district judge at chambers; and, certainly, if it does not extend to both, it extends to neither; for the first section of the act gives the same jurisdiction to the district judge at chambers as to the district court. This construction would limit the revisory jurisdiction of the circuit court to that given in the eighth section. But it is plain that this construction is not the correct one. It would, indeed, nullify the operation of the most important clause of the second section; for it would limit the superintending jurisdiction to the proceedings of assignees and registers; and these seem to be already placed by the first clause under the supervision of the district court. The better, and indeed as it seems to me the only construction which gives due effect to all parts of the act relating to revisory jurisdiction, seems to be that which on the one hand excludes from the category of general superintendence and jurisdiction of the circuit court the appellate jurisdiction defined by the eighth section; and on the other, brings within that category all decisions of the district court or the district judge at chambers, which cannot be reviewed upon appeal or writ of error under the provisions of that section. The exercise of this general jurisdiction is not placed by the act under specific regulations and restrictions like the proceeding by appeal on writ of error. It was doubtless thought most advisable to leave its regulations to the discretion of the court and to the rules to be prescribed by the supreme court. As yet, the supreme court has prescribed no rule concerning it; nor has this court. In the case before us, its exercise must depend on the sound discretion of this tribunal. Unreasonable delay in invoking the superintending jurisdiction should certainly not be allowed. Nor, on the other hand, should such excessive rigor be exercised that the ends of justice will probably be defeated. Leave is given to file the petition, and other questions are reserved until the coming in of affidavits; and in the meantime let further proceedings under the order of the district court be suspended.

BANKRUPTCY—SECURED CREDITOR—GIFT TO WIFE
—LAND IN DEBTOR'S NAME—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. One who holds the note of the bankrupt not yet due, has a good petitioning creditor's debt.

2. A creditor who holds security from the supposed bankrupt may petition for adjudication against him, if the security falls short of the debt by two hundred and fifty dollars or more.

[Cited in Re Stansell, Case No. 13,293; In re Jaycox, Id. 7,240; In re Crossette, Id. 3,435; In re California Pac. R. Co., Id. 2,315.]

3. It is no defense to a petition in invitum that the petitioning creditor is the only creditor of the supposed bankrupt.

4. A gift of all a debtor's property to his wife is an act of bankruptcy.

5. If land stands in the name of the debtor and is conveyed by him for the apparent purpose of avoiding attachments, it is doubtful whether parol evidence ought to be received that the land was held only in trust.

6. It seems, that a creditor of a bankrupt holding security on the property of a third person, may prove for his whole debt without renouncing such security.

In bankruptcy. These petitions for involuntary bankruptcy against the several defendants were tried together by consent of the parties. The defendant, James F. Alexander, bought out the stock in trade of the petitioner, O'Connell, in February, 1869, for about twenty-four hundred dollars; of which five hundred dollars was paid down, and for the remainder the two defendants gave their joint and several promissory notes on one, two, three, and four years, with interest at eight per cent. a year, payable semiannually, secured by a mortgage on the stock in trade. William B. Alexander, the father of the other defendant, had no interest in the purchase, but joined in the notes for the greater security of the petitioner, and, as between the two defendants, was a surety only, [and is so alleged in that petition.]¹

In February, 1870, the first note became due and was paid, together with the interest on the whole debt. The next note will be payable in February, 1871. On the thirteenth of February, 1870, the father conveyed his dwelling-house and land at East Boston to his wife. He was not and never had been a trader, and he had no other estate or effects liable to seizure on execution, and owed no debts excepting to this petitioner. In March the son conveyed to his wife a dwelling-house and land which had stood in his name for about two years. Evidence was admitted, de bene, to show that he held the house by gift from his father-in-law, upon an oral trust or understanding that it should be used, enjoyed, and conveyed for the benefit of the grantor's family, including the defendant's wife. The conveyance to the wife was made without the consent or knowledge of the father-in-law, who heard of it but lately, not long before this petition was filed, and testified that he acquiesced in the arrangement. This defendant owed no debts of any consequence, excepting the mortgage debt, and one to his aunt, of whom he borrowed the five hundred dollars paid out in the first instance towards the purchase of this stock. The evidence tended to show that this debt would not be pressed against him.

LOWELL, District Judge. Several points of law have been ably discussed before me, and I will consider them in their order.

1. The fact that the petitioner's debt is not yet payable is not a valid answer to this proceeding. By section 39 all creditors whose debts are provable under the act may petition; and by section 19 debts existing, but not payable until a future day, are provable. [This is decisive. But I may add, that such has been the decision of the only court whose opinion I have seen.]³ It was so under the act of 1841. Barton v. Tower, [Case No. 1,085.] And the practice has always been so under the insolvent law of this commonwealth. It would be a sad defect in a bankrupt law if the rights of creditors depended on the time at which their debts matured.

2. The next objection is that a creditor who holds security cannot petition. Here an important distinction is to be noted. This creditor has no security upon the property of W. B. Alexander, and the language of section 20 is that a creditor who holds security upon the property of the bankrupt, shall be admitted to prove only for the balance, &c. This would seem to show that the petitioner has a provable debt for the full amount against the estate of the father, because his only security is on the estate of the son. Such has always been the practice in England, and I am much inclined to think it the true practice. If the surety pays the debt, he may be entitled to the benefit of the collateral security. But in bankruptcy it seems more just and equitable that the creditor should have the benefit of all his remedies, so that he may obtain his whole debt, if possible. If he is obliged to realize his security, and prove only for a balance, he will be losing the advantage for which he has stipulated, of the full credit of the surety. A contrary doctrine appears to have prevailed in Massachusetts. Lanckton v. Wolcott, 6 Metc. 305. But I am not prepared to say that I could follow that precedent, nor that the statutes are precisely alike on this point. Judge Fox has ably vindicated what I believe to be the true doctrine under the bankrupt law. It is not necessary to decide the question in this case, for reasons which will presently appear.

3. The next question is whether a creditor who holds a mortgage upon the property of his debtor, can proceed against that debtor himself by petition in bankruptcy. By section 20 such a petitioner can be a creditor only for the balance, after deducting the value of the property, which value is to be ascertained by agreement with the assignee, or by a sale under direction of the court. The argument is that until an assignee is appointed it cannot be legally ascertained whether such a mortgagee is really a creditor or not. This appears to me too strict and literal a construction. Take the case of an admitted act of bankruptcy, and of creditors whose security is plainly inadequate. Are they to be without remedy? No better illustration than this case affords could be desired. If this creditor cannot petition there is no other person who is interested to do so, and after the six months have passed he is without remedy. I have known a case in which all the creditors were secured, and none of them adequately. The true intent and equity of the statute will be met by holding that when the security falls short of a full indemnity, by two hundred and fifty dollars, or more, thus leaving the amount of a petitioning creditor's debt practically unsecured, the debt is sufficient. This will be a question of fact like any other, and no more difficult to decide than such as often arise on a disputed account or other debt sufficient in kind. This is the law of England by the express words of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, § 97. I do not wish to be understood that a creditor holding collateral security may not petition, if he offers to surrender and cancel his security, nor that any security by attachment or other lien created by law would usually be a bar; but my opinion is that full and adequate security created by contract, must be abandoned, and that if inadequate it must be so to the extent above mentioned. [Nor is it to be understood that it is any defense in bankruptcy that the petitioner is the only creditor, or that he has an adequate remedy at law or in equity in the state or federal courts. The bankrupt law protects all creditors, and is additional to other remedies in all cases to which it applies.]⁴

4. It is no defence in bankruptcy that the petitioner is the only creditor, nor that he has an adequate remedy at law or in equity in the state or federal courts. The bankrupt law protects all creditors, and is additional to other remedies in all the cases to which it applies. This creditor alleges in his petition, and has proved to my satisfaction that his security falls short by more than two hundred and fifty dollars, and I must hold him entitled to proceed.

5. Have the acts of bankruptcy been established in evidence? It appears that W. B. Alexander has conveyed a homestead of some considerable value, and which was his whole property, to his wife. The effect necessarily is to delay creditors, and the intent ought to be presumed. The defendant testifies that his only purpose was to give his wife a home, and that the petitioner's debt was not in his mind at the time. But he was not in trade; there was no one but this creditor against whom the homestead needed protection, and the intent to give his wife a clear homestead necessarily involves the intent that this creditor should not reach it. I have often decided that the conveyance of the whole property of a trader to a pre-existing creditor affords a very violent presumption of a fraudulent intent. And a gift of the whole estate of any debtor is per se fraudulent. In the case of the son the evidence is not so clear that he had anything to convey. But considering that by the statute of frauds of the commonwealth parol evidence could not be admitted to prove such a trust as is here relied on, so that in case of attachment before the conveyance was made, the beneficial interest would be conclusively held to be in the defendant, I doubt if he ought to be admitted to show these alleged facts, even on the question of intent. But if the evidence is received, still the peculiar circumstances of the case seem to show that the defendant may have had some beneficial interest which he intended to withdraw from the grasp of his creditors; such seems to be a fair inference from the time and mode of the conveyance. The father and son made their deeds near about the same time, which was soon after the payment of one of the annual notes, and it must then have been evident to them that the stock in trade had been reduced in value below the amount of the mortgage debt; there were no other creditors and no apparent adequate motive for the acts, excepting the wish to confine the mortgagee to the property secured to him, and I cannot but think it a fair inference of fact, independently of legal presumptions, that the real intent was to delay and hinder the petitioner.

6. It was shown that the petitioner had acted in a harsh and even oppressive manner towards the defendant James, in respect to the foreclosure of the mortgage. This evidence was admitted only for its bearing upon the credibility of the petitioner, who was a witness in the case. It cannot affect the merits of this petition. I may, however, be permitted to observe that this seems to be a case in which the parties would do well to compromise the matter, by giving the petitioner adequate security for his debt. It is unfortunately true that the expenses in bankruptcy bear a large proportion to that part of the petitioner's debt which remains unsecured. Still it is not a matter of discretion but of strict right that he should be permitted to proceed here if he chooses to do so. Adjudication ordered.

CRIMINAL LAW—VENUE—WARRANT FOR REMOVAL

Habeas corpus. The district attorney applied for a warrant to send the defendant [J. H. Alexander] to the district of Louisiana for trial on a criminal charge. The defendant was brought before a commissioner on a complaint, and the only evidence of probable cause was the certified copy of an indictment returned to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana. No evidence was offered by the defendant. By consent of both parties, the facts were brought before the judge, and spread upon the records of the court, in order to a decision whether the course pursued by the government in the case was the true one, and whether the defendant ought to be held for trial in the district of Louisiana. [Warrant allowed.]

LOWELL, District Judge. When an indictment has been found in one judicial district of the United States against a defendant not then within the jurisdiction, it has been much doubted whether the court in that district can issue its warrant to arrest the defendant wherever he may be found within the United States. The late Chief-Justice Taney, when attorney-general, gave it as his opinion that the power was possessed by the courts. 2 Op. Attys. Gen. 564. And this appears to be still the opinion of the office. 11 Op. Attys. Gen. 127. I am not aware of any decision of a court or judge upon the point, and it is not necessary to decide it now. That course not having been pursued, the next question is whether a copy of the indictment is sufficient evidence to authorize a committing magistrate out of the district to cause the accused person to be bailed for trial in the district in which the indictment was found. The point taken by the defendant is, that he ought to be confronted with his witnesses before the magistrate, as well as at the final trial. The law of Massachusetts seems to require this, (Gen. St. c. 170, §§ 10, &c.) and it is copied from Rev. St. c. 135. I have been unable to trace it further back than the Revised Statutes, and I am informed that the practice both here and in Maine is, and so far as is known, always has been, to receive affidavits and other written evidence in proper cases on these preliminary hearings before commissioners. Such a course was sanctioned by the supreme court of the United States in Bollman's Case, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 128; and this decision was acted on and explained by Chief-Justice Marshall in Burr's Trial, pp. 11, 15, 97, [Case No. 14,602.] Judge Conkling, in his Treatise, p. 631, represents this to be the true practice, and it has been usually followed, I believe, in the several circuits, as appears by the following cases. In re Clark, [Case No. 2,797;] U. S. v. Shepard, [Id. 16,273.] So, too, in extradition between the several states under the constitution and act of congress, such evidence is admitted. The precise question undoubtedly is, what evidence was admitted in such cases in Massachusetts in 1789. U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 361. But the law of Massachusetts may be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been the same with that of New York and Virginia, and with the common law of England, of which the cases cited are evidence; and the practice conforms to this view. Although it has been usual both in England and America to examine witnesses before the committing magistrate in the presence of the accused, yet this has never been an essential prerequisite to holding an accused person for trial. He might always be arrested on the warrant of a coroner or of a court upon an ex parte examination before a coroner's jury or a grand jury. The indictment in the district in which it is found is an ex parte proceeding, but since it is found upon oath, and after the examination of witnesses, it has a presumption of validity. Before the commissioner it is only a piece of evidence, to be sure, and may be met and controlled, but when it stands by itself, and uncontradicted, it seems to be enough according to our practice to authorize the warrant. Warrant to issue.

A certificate of the correctness of petition and schedules in bankruptcy may be regarded as a question certified to the court under Bankrupt Act 1867, § 4; and as such the register has a right to charge a fee (one dollar) therefor, as provided for by rule 30. Such rule, however, does not allow separate fees for issuing order of adjudication and certifying same, but one fee (one dollar) for both; and under the same section and rule he is entitled to a fee for a certified copy of the petition and schedules which he is required to furnish the assignee.]

[6. Although rule 14 requires the register to keep a docket of his proceedings in each case, yet there is no authority for his charging anything therefor, but he is entitled to fees for certifying copies of such proceedings to the clerk.]

[7. Where, under an order of court not properly a "special order," although so regarded when made, services are performed by the register not specifically required by the law and general orders, and for which no compensation is provided, he will be allowed compensation therefor, under Bankrupt Act 1867, § 47, allowing him not exceeding five dollars for each day's service under special order of the court. But such order will not justify an increase of the fee for services at a creditors' meeting, fixed by section 47.]

[8. The register is entitled to a fee for taking the marshal's affidavit on returning the warrant in bankruptcy, as for a deposition; and so as to an affidavit to an order calling a meeting of creditors, and an affidavit to the assignee's report.]

[9. When it appears from the bankrupt's schedules that there is a certain amount of assets, sufficient to justify a creditors' meeting, and the application for such meeting is made more than a month before the assignee's report, a fee of three dollars should be allowed to the register for the meeting.]

[10. The marshal is not entitled to charge for constructive mileage in serving a warrant in bankruptcy. Actual personal service, under order of court, is necessary.]

[11. The register and messenger cannot resort to the fee bill of 1853 for services rendered by them, respectively, which are not directly provided for by the bankrupt act and general orders.]

[In bankruptcy. Certificate to district judge by register of questions arising in the taxation of fees of clerk, register, and marshal in the bankruptcy of Alexander Alexander, upon exceptions by the bankrupt's counsel to certain items of fees charged.]

DUVAL, District Judge. Upon motion of the bankrupt's counsel, the officers of the court were required to tax their costs in this case, and this having been done the following items were objected to, and the opinion of the court sought thereon, viz.:

Of the Clerk's Costs.

- 1st.—Filing, certificate and entry of order to record assignment.... 40c.
- 2d.—Filing, certifying and entry of assignment $1.05

The objection made to these two items, if I understand it correctly, is predicated upon the idea that the register has no authority to order the clerk to record the deed of assignment required to be made by the 14th section of the bankrupt act, and that in fact it is not intended by the law to be recorded. Thus, as it seems to me, is a mistake. The section above referred to, according to my understanding, contemplates that the original deed of assignment, after being recorded by the clerk, shall be given to the assignee, who is required to have the same recorded in the different counties, &c., wherein the bankrupt may own real estate. It provides that "a copy duly certified by the clerk of the court, under the seal thereof of the assignment, made by the judge or register, as the case may be, to him as assignee, shall be conclusive evidence for such assignee to take, hold, sue for, and recover the property of the bankrupt." If the original deed is to be delivered to the assignee, and not recorded by the clerk, I am at a loss to know how he could, if called upon, comply with this provision of the law. Moreover, if the original deed is not to be entered of record by the clerk, and the same should be lost or destroyed before the assignee could have it recorded in the proper registry offices, then no copy of it could be had. In such case, the only mode for supplying its loss would be for the judge to order the register to make another deed nunc pro tunc, and this the law does not seem to contemplate. From a careful examination of section 14, my construction is that it not only intended, but that substantial reason requires, that the clerk should record the original deed of assignment. This being so determined, the two charges above made by the clerk are unobjectionable, unless it be as to their amount, and to this I do not understand the bankrupt as excepting.

- 3d.—Certified copy of deed of assignment $1.00

It results from the views expressed by me in regard to the two foregoing items that the clerk has no authority to make out and charge for a certified copy of the deed of assignment unless it is demanded by the assignee. Until it was otherwise ordered by the court the practice here was to file the original deed of assignment in the clerk's office, and deliver a certified copy to the assignee. I presume this was done in the present case, and hence the charge was made. Believing that such a mode of proceeding is incorrect, I sustain the exception taken to this item, unless it should appear that the certified copy was made at the request of the assignee.

The next charge objected to is:

- 4th.—To issue warrant in bankruptcy $1.50

This charge, as I am informed by the clerk, is composed of the following items, viz.: Warrant, $1; certificate of the clerk of the date of its issuance endorsed, 15 cents; entering on docket, 15 cents, and certificate of filing same when returned, being 10 cents for filing and 15 cents for certificate, making an aggregate of $1.55, 5 cents more than the amount charged. This item is taxed under the fee bill of 1853. The objection taken to it is that it is the duty of the register to issue the warrant, and that he having charged a fee therefor in this case, the clerk can make no charge for the same act. It is true that section 11 of the bankrupt act, provides that the "judge or register shall issue a warrant to be signed by such judge or register directed to the marshal, &c. But this is qualified by rule 2, of the general orders, which requires that all process, summons, and subpoenas shall issue out of the court, under the seal thereof, and be tested by the clerk; and blanks with the signature of the clerk and seal of the court, may, upon application, be furnished to the registers." Section 10 of the bankrupt act makes it the duty of the justices of the supreme court of the United States to frame general orders for the following purposes, among others, viz.: "For regulating the fees payable, and the charges and costs to be allowed, except such as are established by this act, or by law," &c. So I take it that for all necessary services performed by the clerk of the court in proceedings in bankruptcy, the fees for which are not provided for by the act or general orders, but are provided for by the fee bill of 1853, that they may rightfully be taxed and allowed under the latter. That this is so is rendered still more obvious by the 47th section, which enacts, "that in each case there shall be allowed and paid in addition to the fees of the clerk of the court, as now established by law or as may be established by general orders, &c., the following fees, &c." Thus clearly recognizing the right of the clerk to charge according to the fee bill of 1853, for services required by the bankrupt act, and not otherwise provided for. My opinion is that the warrant is a process within the meaning of general order No. 2, and that in being tested by the clerk under seal of the court he is entitled to charge therefor as for issuing a warrant under the fee bill of 1853. In one respect the warrant may be regarded as being issued by the register, for after it has been tested by the clerk under the seal of the court it is countersigned by the register, who inserts therein the names of creditors, the time appointed for their meeting, &c. My conclusion is that the clerk is entitled to the fees as charged, and that the exception taken thereto should be overruled.

Next, as to the register's bill of costs. The items excepted to are:

1st.—To filing three papers, (petition, order assignment, order reference) 75c.

I can find no warrant for this charge, inasmuch as the register is not required nor does the law seem to contemplate that he shall, technically speaking, file any papers in his office. But I think it is right that he should endorse upon each paper that comes to his office the time at which it was received. The charge made is therefore allowed, as for a certificate of this character. This, as it seems to me, is authorized by a just construction of the 30th rule. The charge made is therefore allowed to the extent of 45 cents.

2d.—Certifying correctness of petition and schedules..... 55c.

Rule 7 makes it the duty of the register to examine the bankrupt's petition and schedules, and to certify whether the same are correct in form. This is a duty of some trouble and importance. Rule 30 allows him for every certificate of question to be certified to the district judge, under the 4th and 5th sections of the act, one dollar, while the certificate of the register as to the correctness of the petition and schedules is a certificate of a question which ought to be made to the court. I do not believe it is that character of certificate contemplated by the fifth section. But it seems to me it may be properly regarded as a certificate of a question arising under the fourth section, while the register is sitting in chambers, and despatching there the administrative business of the court. If this be not so, I am at a loss to conceive under what other part of the 4th section any question could be certified. Regarding it, then, as a question properly certified under the 4th section, I suppose the register would be entitled to charge $1 therefor. But if incorrect in this, I think he might certify to the correctness of the petition and each schedule separately, and as these would ordinarily constitute several papers, the charge would usually exceed that now made in this case. The exception to his item is overruled.

3d.—Issuing order of adjudication.. $1.00

4th.—Certifying same to clerk..... 1.00

For performing both the services mentioned in these two items the register is authorized under rule 30 to charge one dollar. The above charge, therefore, is double what it should be, and the exception taken thereto is sustained.

5th.—Entering case and proceedings in docket $1.00

6th.—Certifying abstract of same to clerk 25c.

By section 14 the register is required to keep a docket in which to make short memorandums of his proceedings in each case, and by rule 11 he is to furnish the same to the clerk to be entered on the minutes book of the court. While the law imposes on the register the duty of keeping this docket, and it is obvious he ought to be paid for it, I can find no authority for his charging any fee therefor. But he is entitled to charge for certifying copy of these proceedings to the clerk. The exception to the 5th item is therefore sustained but overruled as to the 6th.

7th.—Certified copy of petition and schedules for assignee..... $6.50

According to my understanding, a copy of these papers is required to be furnished to the assignee by the register, under section 4, and he has the right to charge for it under rule 30. Whether the charge is too much or not I am unable to say, as this would depend upon the number of folios.

8th.—One hour's employment, calculating interest 40c.

This is a service necessary in many instances to be performed, in order to determine the amount of indebtedness due from or to the bankrupt. Still, it is one not specifically required by the law, nor is any provision made to pay for it. On the 15th of October last an order was entered by the court, which, though not properly a special one, was regarded as such at the time, and may, I think, be so considered in so far as it authorized and provided for the performance of any service by the register not specifically required by the law and general orders, and for which no compensation was provided. By section 47, the register is entitled to not exceeding $5 for each day's service under special order of the court. This, taken in connection with the order of the court above referred to, seems to me to authorize this charge. If so, and one hour's service in calculating interest be regarded as one-sixth part of a day's service, the same charge ought to be made, and that of 40 cents is little enough. The exception to this item is overruled.

10th.—Oath upon return of warrant 50c.

11th.—One day's actual service, meeting of creditors..... $5.00

By the 47th section of the act a fee of $3 is allowed to the register for each day on which a meeting is held. It was supposed by the register, that the order of this court of 15th of October last, before referred to, justified the above charges of $5, but upon mature reflection and careful examination I am satisfied such is not the case. The fee for service rendered by a register at a meeting of creditors is fixed by the 47th section. It cannot be increased by means of an order designed to be special. Such seems to be the opinion of both Judges Ballard and Blatchford, and in this I concur with them. The exception, therefore, to the 9th and 11th items, is sustained. The charge in each case should be $3. The exception taken to the fee of 50 cents, is overruled. This item has reference to the marshal's oath on return of the warrant. It is in effect a deposition, and under section 47 the register has a right to charge for it as such. Whether the amount is correct or not, I have not the means of determining.

12th.—Issuing order appointing assignee $1.00

13th.—Certifying same to clerk.... 1.00

For reasons stated in regard to the 3d and 4th items a charge of but one dollar should have been made for both these services. The exception is therefore sustained.

14th.—Entering proceedings on docket 10c.

15th.—Certifying same to clerk.... 25c.

For reasons already given the exception is sustained as to the first of these two charges, and overruled as to the latter.

16th.—Application for general meeting of creditors..... $1.00

17th.—Issuing order and calling same 1.00

18th.—Certifying same to the clerk.. 1.00

The exception to the 16th item is overruled. The charge is expressly authorized by the 47th section. The exception to the two remaining items is sustained; the fee for both should be $1.

19th.—Entering proceedings on docket 50c.

To this item the exception is sustained.

20th.—General meeting of creditors $3.00

The ground of objection to this item, in connection with the 16th, seems to be that under the 27th and 28th sections of the act a meeting of creditors ought not to be held in cases where there were no assets. This is probably the correct practice, but then I do not think these meetings can be dispensed with except by an order of court, predicated upon a report of the assignee, showing that there are no assets. In this case it appears from the bankrupt's schedules that he showed about $2,500 of assets, and the application for meeting of creditors was made more than a month before the assignee's report. I think this charge is correctly made, and the exception to it is overruled.

21st.—Affidavit to order calling said meeting 50c.

22d.—Affidavit to assignee's report.. 50c.

I regard both these as depositions. The exception to them is overruled.

23d.—Entering proceedings in docket 25c.

24th.—Certifying proceedings to clerk 25c.

To this charge the exception is overruled.

25th.—Filing order calling general meeting 25c.

Marshal's Costs.

Exception is taken to the 2d item thereof, being mileage on 200 miles, for service of warrant of bankruptcy, $20. The 11th section of the act provides the mode by which the warrant shall be served, and I do not think it authorizes any charge for constructive mileage. There must be actual personal service under order of the court to authorize it. The exception to this charge is sustained.

As an act of justice to the officers of the court I will here say that until my attention was called specially to the matter of costs by the exceptions taken in this case, my impression was that for any service rendered by them respectively, not directly provided for by the bankrupt act or general orders, they could resort to the fee bill of 1853, and this they understood from me in conversation. That such is the case, so far as the clerk is concerned, there can be no doubt, but, upon mature investigation I am inclined to the opinion that the register and messenger are not embraced in this rule. It is proper, also, that I should say in justification of the register that in making the charge of $5 for each of two days' service, he supposed that he was authorized to do so by the order of this court of 15th October last. He was further misled in making the charge, embraced in items 3d and 4th, 12th and 13th, 17th and 18th, by the fee bill of the register, as published in Rice's Manual, page 231. The clerk will certify this opinion to the register, W. D. Price, Esq.

PRIZE — TRADING WITH ENEMY AFTER DECLARATION OF WAR — CONFISCATION OF VESSEL — EVIDENCE OF CAPTURE.

1. If, after a knowledge of the war, an American vessel go to an enemy port, and take in a cargo there, the vessel and cargo are liable to confiscation for a trading with the enemy. 2. What constitutes a capture. If there be an animus capiendi, and a submission on one side, and a possession on the other, it constitutes a capture, although no prize crew be put on board.

3. A prize crew not necessary to navigate a captured ship, so as to preserve the possession of the captors, if the captured crew agree to navigate her.

4. But the captured crew are not by law compelled to navigate her.

5. Where, on the original preparatory evidence, the fact of capture is admitted, further proof ought not to be admitted, to create doubts, as to the fact of capture.

Cummings & Sprague, for captors.

F. Blake and R. G. Amory, for claimants.
George Blake, for the United States.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The brig Alexander and cargo, owned by Messrs. John and Samuel Welles, (who are American citizens,) was captured by the privateer America, John Kehew, commander, on the 2d of June, 1813, on the high seas, for an alleged illegal traffic with the enemy. From the preparatory evidence and papers, and the affidavit of the claimants, (which as to these facts does not seem controverted,) it appears, that the brig sailed from Boston, in December, 1811, on a voyage to Naples, where she safely arrived and took on board a cargo of brandy, wine, and cream of tartar, with which she sailed from Naples, on the 22d of June, 1812, having on board a British license to protect the same on a voyage to England. The claimants assert, that when the brig sailed from Naples, it was the intention of the master to land his deck load of brandy at Gibraltar, and to proceed with the residue of the cargo directly to Boston, and that the British license was intended as a protection of the brig and cargo until they had passed the Straits of Gibraltar. The brig accordingly stopped at Gibraltar, discharged her deck load, and sailed for Boston with the remaining cargo. In the course of the voyage, about the 3d of August, the master received information of the war, and immediately, and with a view to avoid British capture, changed his course for England, and on the voyage thither, the vessel was captured by two British cruisers, carried into Cork, and, after a detention of seven months, was, on trial, finally restored. The cargo was unlivered and sold at Cork, and the vessel then proceeded in ballast to Liverpool, where an attempt was made to sell her, but without success. Mr. Samuel Welles (one of the claimants) being then in England, thereupon purchased, with the funds of the partnership, the present cargo, consisting wholly of British manufactures, with a view to withdraw these funds from Great Britain, and on the 9th of May, 1813, the brig with the said cargo on board, sailed from Liverpool, on a voyage to Boston, for which place she was steering at the time of the capture. The brig arrived in Boston harbor on the 5th of July, 1813. The master immediately went on shore, and delivered all the invoices and letters respecting the cargo to the claimants, and they have never been since produced in the cause. At the time of the capture by the privateer America, a prize-master only was put on board; and a question having been made at the first hearing, as to the fact of capture, the district court directed further proof to be made on that point. Upon the further proof, a variety of affidavits were produced by each party, and also a paper signed by the master on the day of the capture, of which duplicates were made, one for the prize-master, and another for the privateer. The paper is as follows: "June 2d, 1813. I hereby certify, that I have this day been captured by the private armed ship America, of Salem, John Kehew, master, and that John Hooper, the 5th, has been put on board as prize master." It further appeared, and indeed was admitted by all parties, that the prize-master took possession of the ship's papers, at the time of the capture, and held them until the 13th of June, when a vessel, supposed to be a British cruiser, was descried, and the papers were handed to Captain Picket, in order to prevent any suspicion of the vessel's being a prize. The vessel turned out not to be a British cruiser, the prize-master demanded back the papers, which Captain Picket peremptorily refused. Subducted from the ship's letter bag a letter addressed to his owners, and held the same and the ship's papers in his own possession, until he delivered them to his owners, as I have before stated. The supplementary proofs, introduced on the part of the claimants, are intended to show, that the brig and cargo never were intended to be captured as prize; but that a prize-master was put on board merely to secure to the captors the property of British subjects, if any, which should be found on board. On the other hand, the proofs of the captors are intended to show an absolute and unqualified capture of the whole property, as prize, and an agreement with Captain Picket, that a prize-master only should be put on board, in order to elude, for the common benefit, the vigilance of the British cruisers. And among the proofs of the captors, the privateer's instructions are introduced, which authorize a capture of American vessels coming from Great Britain.

I do not think it necessary to discuss the statements contained in the affidavits on each side in these supplementary proofs. There are many discrepancies, which it is difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile; and as my judgment is not influenced by a balance of their comparative credibility, I shall not attempt to conciliate their apparent discords. Upon the general complexion of the cause, there can be no doubt, that this vessel was engaged in an illegal traffic with the public enemy. She proceeded to England with a full knowledge of the war, and almost a year after the declaration of war, received a cargo of British manufactures of a very recent purchase, and was captured on her return to the United States. After the solemn decisions in the admiralty, and the courts of common law in England, (The Hoop, 1 C. Rob. [Adm.] 196; Potts v. Bell, 8 Term R. 548,) which have been repeatedly recognized and enforced in this court, I did not think the general doctrine open to discussion, and so at the argument I stated to the counsel of the claimants. Until I shall be taught a different rule by the supreme court, I shall continue to hold, that trading with the enemy is an offence against the laws of war, and subjects the property engaged in the traffic to confiscation. Admitting this doctrine, the defence at the trial turned upon two points. First, that there was no actual capture; and second, that if there was an actual capture, it was illegal, and in express contravention of the instructions of the president of the 28th of August, 1812.

As to the fact of capture, upon the preparatory examinations and papers no possible doubt could arise. In answer to the usual interrogatory, the master and mate explicitly admit the capture, without any qualification or exception. The doubt, if any, must be sought aliunde, in the further proof admitted on behalf of the claimants, after the real pressure of the cause was fully known. The captors contend, that such further proof was, in point of law, inadmissible because no ground of doubt was laid in the original evidence, and because the claimants stand in the character of parties affected with the imputation of illegal traffic; and I think that both objections are of great weight. In general the prize court is solicitous to preserve the simplicity of its proceedings, and will not engage itself in inquiries, which do not spring from difficulties or suspicions attached to the original evidence. It applies this rule to the captors; why also should it not apply to the claimants? I do not say that the court will, in no case, go into collateral inquiries, to satisfy doubts arising from extrinsic sources. We all know, that the invocation of papers from other prize causes is an admitted exception. But if the evidence of facts, which the parties could not but know with precision, be clear and indisputable upon the preparatory examinations, the court will not encourage ingenious subterfuges and new pretensions, not dreamed of in the first instance, to be ushered into the cause. Any other course would be destructive of all simplicity, and lead to endless litigation. It would be setting up false lights, to allure and delude the court into inextricable quicksands. The rule, therefore, is in the highest degree salutary, not to admit, in general, collateral evidence to create doubts, but only to admit it to remove them. And, in a more enlarged view, it is of the utmost consequence to discountenance attempts to foist into a cause supplementary affidavits of the parties examined in preparatory, to explain away or contradict their former solemn statements: Let the parties learn that truth has but one face, and that at their peril they must declare it, in its full extent, in the first instance, and that if they then conceal, they must take the consequences of their own misconduct. So much I have thought it proper to say in vindication of the general rule. In the present case I cast no imputation upon the parties.

The second objection is still more decisive against the admission of further proof. The claimants were avowedly engaged in a trade with the enemy, under circumstances, which, in the prize court, not only prohibit them from the benefit of further proof, but which stamp them and their property with the hostile character, and induce the penalty of confiscation. I speak now of the character of the transaction, not of the character of the parties. The Messrs. Welles are known to me to be very respectable gentlemen, but I am bound to consider this cause, in point of fact and law, exactly as if they were utter strangers, and without excuse or apology for their conduct. In a case then of clear illegality, I would beg to know what right they can have to the benefit of further proof? Their claim must be rejected in limine. Further proof is an indulgence granted to legal innocence and unavoidable error, but never to illicit or hostile conduct. Under such circumstances, as Sir W. Scott has observed in The Walsingham Packet, 2 C. Rob. [Adm.] 77, the claimants can have no right to moot difficulties in this court, as to the final disposition of the property, or to throw doubts in its path, where none before existed.

There is yet another fact, which is in general so material that I cannot pass it over. It is, that all the letters and papers respecting the cargo have been excluded from the view of the court. The master delivered them to his owners, and the latter have not yielded the custody of them to the court.³ I advert to this fact, as deserving great consideration in ordinary cases, where further proof is asked for, and I think it will be difficult to show, that it ought to be allowed where there is a voluntary suppression. In the present case the fact becomes altogether unimportant.

With this weight of objections, I have been pressed to overrule or reject the further proof admitted in the district court. I am free to confess, that I cannot surmount the difficulties presented by the objections. My entire deference for the learned judge, who ordered the proof, is a strong inducement not to shut my eyes against evidence, which he deemed material; and as I can satisfactorily to myself dispose of the cause, without rejecting the further proof, I shall not disturb the place, which it occupies in the papers. And I am entirely convinced, that there was an actual capture of the vessel and cargo, whether the original or the supplementary proofs are examined. The written acknowledgment of the master would, of itself, seem decisive. It was written at the time of the capture, when there was no motive to disguise or suppress the real character of the transaction. This acknowledgment and the ship's papers were delivered into the custody of the prize-master. If a capture was not really intended, I should be glad to learn why this was done; and if a capture was intended, I should be glad to find the evidence that limits its extent. Even if the ship's papers had not been put into the possession of the prize-master, it would not have materially affected the case: it is sufficient if they remain on board. It is said that no prize crew was put on board, that the navigation was left to the ordinary crew of the vessel. This objection proceeds upon the supposition, that to constitute a capture as prize, the vessel must be navigated by a prize crew. The supposition is not founded in law. It is true, that the master and crew of a prize ship are not compellable to navigate her, but if they voluntarily engage so to do, it is a legal waiver of the prize crew; and the parties are bound by their engagement, and the capture stands absolute. Such was the express decision of Sir William Scott in The Resolution, 6 C. Rob. [Adm.] 13, a case which, as to the fact of capture, strongly resembles that before the court. This doctrine has also been fully recognized in the courts of common law, and does not seem to admit of any reasonable doubt. Wilcocks v. Union Ins. Co., 2 Binn. 574. Now, upon the further proof, it is quite impossible not to believe, that the master of the Alexander entered into such an engagement. His whole conduct evinces it, and he must be now estopped in reason and equity from asserting an objection, which he must be held to have waived.

What indeed is necessary to constitute a capture? In ordinary cases the fact admits no doubt, and in point of law, nothing more is necessary, than an intention of capture, followed up by an actual or constructive possession of the property. Force and violence, or physical superiority are not required. It is sufficient, if there be a deditio or submission on the one side, and an asserted possession on the other. In the present case, the animus capiendi must be inferred from the instructions of the privateer, the detention of the vessel, and the subsequent prize proceedings. That there was an actual possession combined with this intention of capture, as conclusively follows from the possession of the ship's papers, the putting on board of a prize-master, and the acknowledgment of the master of the vessel. It is not required, that superior force should be exerted during the whole voyage, to maintain that possession; the acquiescence of the master and crew in the terms of the captors is a full equivalent. In my judgment, the case scarcely furnishes the slightest pretext for a denial of the fact of the capture. Was then the capture legal? This depends on the construction of the executive instruction of the 28th of August, which is as follows: "The public and private armed vessels of the United States are not to interrupt any vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, coming from British ports to the United States, laden with British merchandise, in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council; but are, on the contrary, to give aid and assistance to the same, in order that such vessels and their cargoes may be dealt with on their arrival, as may be decided by the competent authorities." The captors have argued, that this instruction is illegal and void; in the first place, because congress, to whom the exclusive power of declaring war is confided, have declared it in the most general terms, and it is not competent for the President, by a mere instruction, independent of law, to limit the rights of our citizens under the act of congress. (Act June 18, 1812, c. 102.) In the next place, they contend that no such authority has been delegated by congress. The act of the 18th of June, 1812, c. 102, authorizes the president of the United States to issue letters of marque and reprisal, in such form as he may think fit, against the "vessels, goods, and effects" of the British government and its subjects. The authority, as to the form, does not authorize the president to vary the substance of the commission; and if it did, he has not done it, for the present commission is as broad in this respect, as the act itself. The act of 26th of June, 1812, c. 107, § 9, is the only other act which can be relied on. That authorizes the president "to establish and order suitable instructions for the better governing and directing the conduct" of privateers; which can only mean instructions for the internal discipline and management of privateers, but not for the abridgment of the rights of captors under the general act. Much less could it be admitted, that he might, under the act, suspend, by an instruction, the war, as to hostile property, or property which by the laws of war is deemed hostile, and confiscable as such, and is necessarily included in the general provisions of the act declaring war. The Elsebe, 5 C. Rob. [Adm.] 173. This argument, as to the powers of the executive, is certainly entitled to great consideration, and in a proper case would deserve the grave examination of the court. But I shall waive all discussion of it in this place, as this cause may be well decided without touching the legality of the instruction. Admitting its legality in the broadest extent, the instruction cannot, by any reasonable intendment, protect the present case.

It will be recollected, that by the act of the 2d of March, 1811, c. 96, the president was authorized to suspend the operation of the revived sections of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, c. 91, upon the revocation of the edicts of Great Britain, which violated our neutral rights. The celebrated orders in council which were supposed to violate those rights were, by a declaration of the British government made on the 23d of June, 1812, revoked after the first day of the ensuing August. The knowledge of this fact reached the United States in August, although not officially communicated to our government until the 30th of September. As the declaration of war was not known in Great Britain at the time of the revocation of the orders in council, it was immediately foreseen, that American merchants in that country, and British factors having American orders, would act upon the presumption, that the president would exercise the authority of suspension, which had been confided to him. Shipments of goods to an immense amount would therefore be made on the faith of that repeal, before a knowledge of the war could be had, and countermanding instructions given. To prevent merchants from suffering ruin, by a confidence which they reposed in the government of the United States, (a confidence, which congress have amply and liberally redeemed; see act of the 27th of February, 1813, c. 175.) the precautionary instruction of August was issued by the executive. It carries in its language the most clear and satisfactory evidence of being a temporary measure. Its object was to protect American ships laden with British merchandize and coming from British ports, on the faith that the repeal of the orders in council had extinguished the great controversy between the two nations. But it could avail only, while both countries were in ignorance of the existence of the war. The instruction directs the public and private armed vessels of the United States not to interrupt any American vessels coming (not which at any time afterwards during the war should be coming) from British ports to the United States, laden with British merchandize, (not, with property of British merchants or of public enemies,) in consequence of what? of the war? No; in consequence of the alleged repeal of the orders in council. It does not, therefore, purport to be an order or indefinite future operation, to license and protect a trade with the enemy, or cover the property of enemies, after a knowledge of the war. It extends, in terms and in spirit, to a protection of property shipped in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, before any other impediment to the trade could be known to the shippers. Upon any other construction, what would be the unavoidable result? By the declaration of war, all future trade between the hostile countries became illegal, and tainted the property engaged therein with the polluting leaven of illegality and confiscation. Yet, upon the construction of the claimants, this instruction not only suspended these legal results of the war, but gave to the trade directly from British ports a perfect and yet unterminated license. War would exist every where, except as to the trade from this favored island, and there an immunity from capture would invite the enure intercourse of peace. British manufactures, even on British account, might be introduced into the United States, to an unlimited extent, in proud defiance of the non-importation act and the laws of war, and the fundamental policy of the government be uprooted. Yet to this extent must the doctrine reach, in order to support the defence of the claimants. If such a doctrine could be engrafted on the instruction, it would strike deep into the very vitals of the country. "Haeret lateri lethalis arundo."

When, by the act of the 6th of July, 1812, c. 129, congress prohibited all trade with British ports under licenses, could it have been imagined, that the president had already a power to grant licenses for the trade, to an unlimited extent, by laws enacted by them almost in the same breath? When by the act of the 27th of February, 1813, c. 175, congress refused to restore the property of British subjects, which since the war had been shipped to the United States, could they have imagined that a subsisting order of the executive exempted all such property from capture on the high seas, and gave an implied invitation to the trade? When by the act of the 2d of August, 1813, c. 56, congress declared as prize of war all vessels and cargoes covered by a British license, however in other respects the voyage might be legitimate, could they have once thought, that a power was lodged in the president, and then in full exercise, which exempted from capture all American vessels and cargoes coming from British ports? That it was a greater offence to accept a license, than to do the acts, which a license authorized? I admit that congress can only declare what the law shall be for the future, not what it was in times past; but it seems to me, that the whole current of legislation to which the president himself is a party, indicates a policy entirely the reverse of that imputed by the argument to the administration. I do not feel at liberty to strain language in support of such extraordinary pretensions. It has been argued, that the proviso to the first section of the act of the 13th of July, 1813, c. 10, recognizes the legality of this construction: if it does, I think it as clearly carries with it the implication, that the instruction has had its full effect, and is no longer operative. Upon what pretence then can the purchase and shipment of the present cargo be argued to have been made "in consequence of the alleged repeal of the orders in council?" That repeal was itself conditional, and to be void, unless the American government, after notification, revoke the non-intercourse. It refused so to do, and that refusal was known as well in Great Britain, as in the United States, several months before this shipment. In no sense, therefore, could this shipment be referred to that repeal. Besides, a new state of things, a state of absolute hostility, had intervened, and extinguished all peaceable relations, as to commerce as well as to the governments. How then could it be possible, that a shipment, which either party might seize, as prize of war, could be founded on a measure, which was exclusively adapted to peace? In my judgment, there is no ground for protecting the Alexander and cargo from confiscation, as prize of war, under the instruction of the 28th of August. The claim of the Messrs. Welles must therefore be rejected; and that of the United States, as I have repeatedly held, cannot be sustained. I therefore condemn the vessel and cargo, as good and lawful prize to the captors, on account of the illegal traffic with the enemy, and reverse the decree of the district court in all respects, wherein it differs from this decree.

SLAVE TRADE—FORFEITURE OF VESSEL

The first section of the slave trade act of 1800, c. 51, [2 Stat. 70, § 1,] prohibits not merely the transportation of slaves, but the being employed in the business of the slave trade; and therefore a vessel caught in such trade, though before she has taken slaves on board, is liable to forfeiture.

[Cited in The Porpoise, Case No. 11,284.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

In admiralty. Libel of seizure [against the brig Alexander, William Booth, claimant,] founded on the slave trade act of 20th of April 1813, c. 86; the act of 22d March 1794, c. 11; and the act of 10th May, 1800, c. 51.

At the trial the only count, which was sustained by the evidence, was founded on the first section of the act of 1800, c. 51.

Upon the evidence, Blair, for the claimant, contended, that there was no offence within the act of 1800, even supposing the vessel was engaged in the slave trade, because no slaves had been taken on board or were on board during the voyage, for transportation, which was necessary to bring the case within the act.

Blake, Dist. Atty., contended, that the employment in the slave trade was the thing prohibited by the act, and slaves were not necessary to be taken on board to complete the offence. He cited The Plattsburg,² before Judge Van Ness at New York, and The Fortuna, 1 Dod. 81.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first section of the act of 1800, c. 51, [2 Stat. 70, § 1,] on which alone this prosecution can be maintained, declares, "that it shall be unlawful for any citizen &c. directly or indirectly to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country to another, under the penalty of forfeiture." The question is, whether the penalty is affixed to the mere employment of the vessel for the business and for the purpose of transporting slaves, or whether actual transportation is necessary. My opinion is, that the former is the true construction of the act. We often speak of vessels "employed in the coasting trade and fisheries," and the acts of congress use the same language, when actual transportation and actual fishing are not intended; but the purpose and business of the voyage are the coasting trade and fisheries. And it has never been doubted, that a vessel licensed for the coasting trade and fisheries, and on a voyage for that purpose, was truly employed in such trade or fisheries, although no goods were in the course of actual transportation, and no fisheries had been yet attempted. Let us look then to the other clauses of the statute, and see whether they do not afford means to ascertain the true sense of the legislature. The second section declares it unlawful for any citizen, &c. "to serve on board any vessel of the United States employed, or made use of, in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign port to another," on the penalty of fine, not exceeding 2000 dollars, and imprisonment, not exceeding two years. The language of this section is substantially like that of the first. The third section, however, is different. It declares, "that if any citizen, &c. shall voluntarily serve on board of any foreign ship or vessel, which shall hereafter be employed in the slave trade, he shall, on conviction, be liable to, and suffer the like forfeitures, fines," &c. Here the phrase used is, "employed in the slave trade," which shows, that it was the employment in the traffic or business, and not merely the actual transportation, which is the object of the prohibition; and yet it must be almost an irresistible inference, that the legislature had the same general intent in all these three sections. The fourth section still more strongly demonstrates the construction. It declares, "that it shall be lawful for any commissioned vessels of the United States to seize and take any vessel employed in carrying on trade, business or traffic, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or of the said act, to which this is an addition." The words here clearly indicate a legislative intent to reach the case of vessels, whose business, employment, or traffic was slave voyages. Now it appears to me, that every vessel fitted out for the purpose of the slave trade may be truly and accurately said to be employed in that business, and carrying it on, as soon as she has sailed on the voyage. It matters not at what point of the voyage she is captured, her enterprise is the slave trade, and every act done on such a voyage is an act of carrying it on. In the case of The Fortuna, 1 Dod. 81, 86, Sir William Scott adopted a similar doctrine. "It matters not," says he, "in my opinion, in what stage of the employment, (i. e. the slave trade), whether in the inception, or the prosecution, or the consummation of it," the vessel is seized. I interpret the language of the first section of the act of 1800 by that of the third and fourth, and I think, that the legislature intended the same thing in all; and that is, that the employment in the business and for the purposes of the slave trade, and not merely the actual transportation of the slaves, should be prohibited and punished. Decree of condemnation affirmed.

RAILWAY MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—PARTIES.

1. A provision in a railway mortgage, authorizing the trustee, on default of the company to pay interest, to take possession of the road, operate it and receive its income, and upon notice, to sell it, is a cumulative remedy, and does not affect the right to foreclosure by bill in equity.

[Cited in Guaranty Trust & Safe-Deposit Co. v. Green Cove Springs, etc., Co., 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 514, 139 U. S. 137. Distinguished in Stern v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., Case No. 13,378.]

2. The special provision of the deed of trust in question, held not to require a majority of the bondholders to unite in a suit to foreclose for interest, or request the trustee to bring such suit.

[Distinguished in Stern v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., Case No. 13,378.]

3. If a trustee improperly refuses to bring such suit, an individual bondholder may bring it for himself and others, and make the trustee a party defendant.

4. On a dismissal, by the plaintiff, of the bill as to the trustee, the court has a discretion to allow the trustee to file a bill for the benefit of all the bondholders.

[In equity. Suit by Charles Alexander and others against the Central Railroad of Iowa and another for foreclosure of mortgage. On demurrer to bill. Demurrer overruled.]

This is a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage made by the defendant on its railroad and property. The bill is filed by the plaintiffs as bondholders, who allege that they bring it for themselves and all other bondholders who are similarly situated. It charges default in the company to pay interest. It alleges that the plaintiffs have made a demand on the trustee in the mortgage, viz., the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company of New York, to bring the suit, and its refusal, and the said company is therefore made a defendant. There is no averment in the bill that a majority of the bondholders unite in bringing it, or united in the request to the trustee to bring it. The trustee appears and files an answer, setting up that a majority of the bondholders have never demanded action on the part of the trustee, and that it is willing to submit to the direction of the court as to its duty in the premises, and to become plaintiff if the court so orders. The railroad company demurred to the bill, on the ground that under the provisions of the deed of trust there could be no foreclosure by bondholders, or by the trustee, unless a majority of the bondholders so desired, and there was no such averment. The following are the provisions in the deed of trust relied on in support of the demurrer: "And the said party of the first part (the railroad company) doth hereby covenant, promise and agree, for itself, its successors or assigns, to and with the said trustee, its successor or successors, that the said company will well and truly pay each and every of said bonds issued by them, and secured by this mortgage, together with the semi-annual interest to become due thereon, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, at the times, in the manner, and at the places specified therein, in United States gold coin. And that in case said company shall, for the space of six months, make default in the payment of said semi-annual interest to become due upon any, either, or the whole of said mortgage bonds, then, after the expiration of twelve months from the time it became due, and without demand or notice, at the election or option of a majority of the holders of said bonds, the whole principal sum mentioned in each and all of the said mortgage bonds then outstanding shall forthwith become due and payable, and the lien or incumbrance hereby created for the security and payment thereof may at once be enforced. And it is agreed, in case of the default of the payment of the semi-annual interest, as above provided, that said trustee, or its successors, is hereby expressly authorized and empowered, upon the request in writing of a majority of the owners or holders of said bonds, to enter into and upon, and to take actual possession of all the property, real and personal, and rights, franchises and privileges of the premises hereby conveyed, and each and every part thereof, and by their agents or attorneys, have, hold, use, and enjoy the same, and from time to time make all repairs and replacements, and all useful alterations, additions and improvements thereto, as fully as the parties of the first part might have done before such entry; and to collect and receive all tolls, freight, incomes, rents, issues, and profits of the same and of every part thereof, and the said trustee, and its successors, shall and may, and hereby is expressly authorized and empowered to sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, the entire property, real and personal, rights, franchises, and privileges herein conveyed. Said sale shall be either in the city of Marshalltown, Iowa, or in the city of New York."

Platt Smith and J. F. Duncombe, for plaintiffs.

Boardman & Brown, for railroad company.
Grant & Smith, for trustee.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. 1. The authority in the deed of trust to the trustee, on default of the payment of interest, and upon the written request of a majority of the bondholders to take possession of the road, to operate it and receive its income, and on three months' notice to sell the same, and divide the proceeds of the sale pro rata among the bondholders, is a cumulative remedy for the benefit of mortgage creditors, and does not exclude their right to resort to the judicial tribunals for a foreclosure. Especially is this so, as the laws of the state of Iowa forbid sales under powers of this character by proceedings out of court.

2. Provisions in an instrument of this character limiting the right of a mortgage creditor to resort to a court of chancery to foreclose his security, are not to be extended beyond the fair meaning of the language used; and it is our opinion that there is no restriction in the deed of trust before us, upon the right of the coupon-holder to foreclose for interest upon default, although a majority of the bondholders do not unite in the suit, or request the trustee to bring it. The provision in question gives a majority of the bondholders, on default of the payment of interest, the option or election, after the expiration of a year from the default, to have the whole principal sum become due at once, and the mortgage security enforced accordingly. This is not inconsistent with the unbridged right of any coupon-holder to foreclose for interest, in the manner sought in the present bill, and it was not necessary that a majority of the coupon-holders should unite in bringing the bill, or in a request to the trustee to bring it.

3. As the bill alleges that the trustee refused to bring suit, the bill was properly brought in the name of the plaintiffs, for themselves and the other coupon-holders, making the trustee a defendant.

4. If the plaintiffs elect to dismiss the bill as to the trustee, we will allow the trustee to become a party plaintiff, and to file a bill for the benefit of all the bondholders; but it would be anomalous to have the trustee on the record both as defendant and plaintiff in the same proceeding. The de-murrer of the railroad company to the bill is overruled.

Ordered accordingly.

SEAMEN — FORFEITURE OF WAGES FOR THEFT OF CARGO—ACQUITTAL IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS.

1. The theft of a portion of a cargo, by a mariner, works an absolute forfeiture of wages. [See Mariners v. The Kensington, Case No. 9,085.]

2. The fact that the seaman has been acquitted on a criminal trial for the larceny of a part of the cargo, is not conclusive to rebut the charge when set up as a defense against his suit for wages.

[In admiralty. Libel for wages. Dismissed.]

This was a libel in personam, by William Alexander against Joseph Galloway, master of the ship Columbia, to recover seamen's wages. On the hearing of this cause, the libellant having proved his employment on board of the Columbia by the respondent, and the earning of wages, as alleged in the libel, the respondent put in evidence tending very strongly to show that, on the arrival of the Columbia at this port, the libellant stole from the cargo, with connivance of the second mate, a bale of cotton, which he took on shore for sale. This act was relied upon by the defence as a forfeiture of wages. To rebut this defence, the libellant introduced the record of his trial and acquittal in the New York court of sessions on the charge of the alleged larceny.

J. Murroughs, for libellant.

Burr & Benedict, for respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. The defence establishes a case of unqualified plunder and purloining of a part of the cargo by the libellant on the arrival of the ship in this port; and the circumstances afford strong reason to believe that the theft was committed with deliberation, and in pursuance of a pre-considered arrangement. Such gross dereliction of duty to the ship completely annihilates all claim to wages, without regard to the value of the property stolen. Cons. del Mare, cc.

167, 173. The mere embezzlement of cargo, or the improper use of it, or the doing an injury to it through fraud or negligence, is cause of forfeiture of wages, although it is ordinarily visited only by an abatement of wages to the amount of the ship's loss. Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 267; Abb. Shipp. 652. See, also, the case of Scott v. Russell, [Case No. 12,546.] But a case of premeditated thieving draws after it the forfeiture of all wages due the mariner upon the voyage. This penalty is no more severe than is appropriate to the offence. The wrong is one for which the master would be fully justified in discharging the seaman from the ship during the voyage; and offences of that class may always carry with them a forfeiture of wages. Abb. Shipp. 652. Libel dismissed with costs.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Youngs, for the landlord, moved for judgment for double rent, under the statute of Virginia. Old Rev. Code, p. 165, § 15.

E. J. Lee and Swann & Jones, for the tenants, contended that no instance has occurred in which judgment has been given for double rent. The jury have not found that the whole amount of rent distrained for, namely, $141.67, was due. The avowry is

The court is bound by the evidence given at the trial, and cannot now, after verdict, go into new evidence. It is not necessary that the avowry should pray judgment for double rent, but if it concludes, "prays judgment for a return, &c.," and for the damages and costs, according to law, it is sufficient to support the judgment for double rent.

ery, etc.; that pursuant to the terms of the decree, the company executed an assignment of all its property and assets to the receiver, and by the terms of the same decree the corporation was dissolved. The bill alleges further, that on the twenty-ninth of November, 1872, the defendants were "indebted" (it is not alleged this indebtedness was for a stock subscription or how it arose) to the Mound City Mutual Life Insurance Company in the sum of $5,830, for which sum they made their notes, payable to the company, and secured the same by deed of trust on lands in Arkansas; that the name of the last-mentioned corporation was changed successively, to Mound City Life Insurance Company, to St. Louis Life Insurance Company, and lastly to Columbia Life Insurance Company, but the corporation continued the same; that the company was insolvent on the twenty-third of November, 1875, and for some time prior to that date, and so continued until it was judicially declared to be insolvent; that on the twenty-third of November, 1875, a combination was entered into between Alfred M. Britton and George J. Davis, both of whom were directors in the life insurance company (the former its vice-president and acting president and the latter an attorney for the company) and the Life Association of America, to get possession of the assets of the life insurance company by fraudulent means; that in execution of this fraudulent scheme, Britton, Davis, and the life association, in December, 1875, obtained possession of the notes of the defendants and the deed of trust given to secure the same, and cancelled and delivered them to the defendants; that the life insurance company received no consideration from Britton, Davis, or the life association for these notes, and that the defendants paid nothing for their surrender, but only gave in exchange therefor shares of stock in the company, which were worthless, because the same had never been paid for and because the company was insolvent; and that defendants had notice of these alleged facts. Horner and Horner, the makers of the notes, and who are citizens of Arkansas, and Britton, the trustee named in the deed of trust, and who is a citizen of Texas, are made defendants. Davis and the Life Association of America are not made defendants, because they are, as the bill alleges, beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and cannot be joined without ousting the jurisdiction, being citizens of the same state as the plaintiff. Prayer for decree for amount of notes and foreclosure of deed of trust.

The defendants, answering, say the notes were given by them in payment for $5,000 subscription to the capital stock of the company; that the stock issued to them was full paid stock; they deny all knowledge of the insolvency of the company, or of any conspiracy or fraud on the part of Britton, Davis and the Life Association of America to obtain possession of their notes; and allege that in the month of November, 1875, they were advised by another stockholder, residing in Helena, that Britton, upon whose representations they subscribed for the stock, and in whom they had confidence, was about to retire from the directory of the company; that they could then sell their stock for par, or possibly something more, to parties who were buying it up; that, after consultation, the Helena stockholders reluctantly agreed to sell their stock, because they believed it was actually worth much above par if the true condition of the company could be known, and they only consented to sell for the reason that they could not be on the ground personally to ascertain and look after their interests, and believed if they did not sell some means would be resorted to to crowd them out; that thereupon they sent their certificates of shares of stock in the company, indorsed in blank, to Herman & Rainey, their correspondents in St. Louis, and authorized them to sell the same, but in no event for a less sum than would be sufficient to pay off their notes then held by the company; that their correspondents afterwards advised them that they had sold their stock to George J. Davis, and taken in payment their notes due to the company and $176.80 in money, and inclosed a check for that sum, and their notes duly assigned by the company to Davis, and by him cancelled, and also a deed of release of the deed of trust, executed by Britton, the trustee; that they never heard of George J. Davis until they saw he was the assignee of their notes, and were informed by their correspondents that he had purchased their stock; that they believed the company was solvent, and would not have sold their stock for less than par; that they acted in good faith, and had no suspicion of any fraud, or that fraud was charged upon any one in connection with the transaction, until the filing of the bill in February, 1878, more than three years afterwards; and these allegations of the answer are well supported by the evidence.

It is shown by the evidence that on the twenty-third of November, 1875, the Life Association of America entered into a contract with George J. Davis, by which the former agreed to purchase from the latter nine thousand four hundred shares of the capital stock of the St. Louis Life Insurance Company, and as much more, up to ten thousand shares (the whole capital stock of the company), as Davis might transfer and deliver within thirty days. Contemporaneously with the delivery of the stock of the insurance company, Davis was also to deliver to the life association certain other stocks and securities mentioned in the contract, then owned by the insurance company. Davis was to receive for the nine thousand four hundred shares and other securities $1,215,000, and par value for all shares delivered in excess of that number. The mode of paying Davis for this stock and securities was prescribed with some detail, the substance of which was, that about ninety per cent. of the sum was to be paid in the draft of Hough, president of the life association, on the life association, and accepted by it, payable at one day's sight, and the remainder in cash, on delivery of the stock and other securities mentioned in the contract. Having made this contract with the life association, Davis resigned as a director of the insurance company, and on the thirtieth of November, 1875, made a proposition to the life insurance company to purchase from it the securities mentioned in his contract with the life association at prices stated in his proposition, and at a meeting of the board of directors of the life insurance company on that day, the record shows the following proceedings were had:

"Mr. Davis then submitted a list of securities belonging to the company which he desired to purchase, the price being satisfactory, and for payment of which he would give the draft of H. W. Hough, president, on the life association to his (Davis') order at one day's sight, and accepted by said life association. After an examination of the list and full discussion thereof, the following resolution, offered by Mr. Bogy, was adopted:

"Resolved, that the vice president be authorized to sell and deliver to Mr. George J. Davis the following securities, or any one or all of said securities, at the price named in the list hereto appended, and that the vice president be authorized to receive in payment for the securities so sold and delivered, the draft of H. W. Hough, president, drawn at one day's sight, to the order of G. J. Davis, and by him indorsed, on the Life Association of America, and by said life association accepted." Then follows a list of the securities sold (which are the same mentioned in the contract between Davis and the life association), with prices annexed to each, amounting in the aggregate to $1,111,898.34. Among the securities thus sold to Davis were the notes of the defendants, which were afterwards duly indorsed by the insurance company and delivered to him. Davis having delivered the stock and other securities to the life association under the contract of November 3, 1875, received in payment some cash and the draft of the life association for $1,111,898.34. This draft Davis indorsed and delivered to the insurance company on the tenth of December, 1875.

In the proceedings of the board of directors on that day, it set forth that the president of the company stated to the board for its information, "that Mr. G. J. Davis had tendered him this day the draft as specified in the resolution of the board, passed November 30, in the sum of $1,111,898.34, and that in accordance with the authorization of said resolution he had sold and delivered to Mr. Davis the securities named." At the conclusion of this transaction the directory of the insurance company resigned, and the life association, now the holder of the stock of the former company, elected a directory composed mainly, if not altogether, of the same persons who constituted the directory of the life association. In 1876, by an amendment of its charter approved by the superintendent of the insurance department of the state, the name of the company was changed to the Columbia Life Insurance Company, and it was authorized by a two-thirds vote of its board of directors to reduce the capital stock of the company, then ten thousand shares of the par value of $100 each, to any amount not less than $100,000. To effect this reduction, the surplus assets of the company might be used to purchase in the stock of the company. Under this authority the directory resolved on a reduction of nine thousand shares of the capital stock, and to effect the reduction, set aside $900,000, alleged surplus funds, and afterwards purchased that number of shares at par—$900,000—from the life association, and paid therefor by cancelling that amount of the draft of the life association given by it to Davis, and by him indorsed to the life insurance company under its contract for the purchase of its securities. The balance of that draft, viz.: $211,898.34, was liquidated by cash payments and other transactions between the companies. The life insurance company continued to be a going concern until it was adjudged to be insolvent. The evidence is conflicting as to whether it was, in fact, a solvent institution in December, 1875, but it was reputed solvent and to be doing a profitable business, and its stock was then worth par in the market. The life association is still a going concern. The superintendent of the insurance department, in the proceedings in which the company was adjudged insolvent, made no complaint against the reduction of the stock of the company nor the sale of its securities to Davis; nor has the company or any stockholder or creditor, or the receiver, had these transactions annulled by a direct proceeding for that purpose, or taken any steps to that end, so far as this record shows. The bill does not allege, nor do the proofs disclose the condition of the company, otherwise than generally that it is insolvent; nor are the equities of any of the creditors disclosed; nor does the bill offer to surrender up to defendants the shares of stock they sold to Davis, or make any suggestion in relation thereto, other than that it is worthless. [Bill dismissed.]

W. W. Smith and Smith & Collins, for plaintiff.

Tappan & Horner, for defendants.

CALDWELL, District Judge. The board of directors of the insurance company had an undoubted right to sell the defendants' notes and other securities to Davis, and authorize its secretary to indorse them as was done. Banks, insurance companies, and other like corporations, have the power to take and hold negotiable notes and other securities in the general conduct of their business, and this includes the power to negotiate them. Hardy v. Merriwether, 14 Ind. 203; McIntire v. Preston, 5 Gil. [10 Ill.] 48; Nicholas v. Oliver, 36 N. H. 218; Spear v. Ladd, 11 Mass. 94; Northampton Bank v. Pepon, Id. 288; Lester v. Webb, 1 Allen, 34. The notes were negotiable, and their assignment and delivery invested Davis with the legal and equitable title to them and the right to receive payment and cancel them. He did receive payment from the makers—the defendants—in shares of stock in the company, then worth par in the market, and cancelled and surrendered up the notes to them.

The amended answer and the deposition of J. J. Horner make it certain that the defendants, in this case, had no knowledge or suspicion personally, or through their agents, that Davis had obtained their notes by fraud, or that there was any infirmity in his title; and, having paid the notes in good faith to Davis, the indorsee and holder, the plaintiff cannot compel the defendants to pay the notes a second time, even if Davis was a fraudulent holder. Payment to the thief or finder himself, of a negotiable note transferable by delivery, will discharge the maker, provided such payment was not made with knowledge or suspicion of the infirmity of the holder's title, or under circumstances which might reasonably awaken the suspicions of a prudent man. Byles, Bills, 213. Nothing short of fraud, not even gross negligence, if unattended with mala fides, will invalidate the payment so as to take away the rights founded thereon. Story, Bills, § 416; Edw. Bills, § 537. The bill counts upon the notes exclusively; it does not seek a recovery upon a stock subscription, nor does it even allege that the notes were stock notes. The answer discloses that the notes were given for a subscription to the capital stock of the company, but that fact did not render the notes any the less negotiable, or prevent the company from negotiating them, or excuse the defendants from paying them to the indorsee and holder; and when paid in good faith to the holder, the company can have no claim against the makers, either upon the notes or for the original consideration.

It is not true the defendants paid nothing of value for the notes. The shares of stock owned by the defendants were issued as full paid shares; the stock was then worth par in the market; the defendants refused to sell it for less, and Davis agreed to give par for it. The test is its then market value, and not what it was really worth in the light of subsequent events. The company having indorsed and transferred the notes to Davis, it is not open to it to object that he discharged the debt for an inadequate consideration, if the defendants had no notice of the alleged fraud and acted in good faith. If Davis had been a bona fide holder of the notes, he could not successfully maintain that they had not been fully paid, and no more can the company.

The bill is fatally defective for want of proper parties. The gravamen of the plaintiff's bill is that Davis and the life association, acting in concert, fraudulently procured the assignment and transfer of the defendants' notes from the company to Davis. It is not alleged in the bill, nor was it claimed in argument, that defendants were parties to that fraud; it is claimed that their agent only had notice of it before paying the notes. Obviously the plaintiff has no case unless he can impeach and set aside the sale and transfer of these securities to Davis. Davis ought to be a party to any bill seeking to do this. He is entitled to an opportunity to repel the imputation of fraud and protect himself from liability if he can do so; the defendants are entitled to his aid in defending the action; and as he would be liable over to the defendants, in the event of the plaintiff's recovering, he must be made a party for the protection of the defendants, and to avoid multiplicity of suits. Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 94. The defendants have a right to insist that Davis shall be brought in; and on the averments in the bill the life association also, because if they are compelled to pay their notes a second time they are entitled to an action over against these parties, to be reimbursed the amount paid them or Davis in satisfaction of their notes, which would be the par value of their stock, that being the market value as well as the agreed value between Davis and the defendants. But as Davis and the life association are not made parties, it would be open to them in any suit that the defendants might bring against them to be reimbursed the amount of plaintiff's recovery, to contest the question of fraud in the transfer of these securities to Davis, and it might result that the court or jury trying that issue would find the transfer was not fraudulent, and thus the defendants would be wronged in a mode that would leave them no redress. Equity will not permit a plaintiff to put a defendant in this predicament. The rule is well settled that where, in the event of the plaintiff's succeeding, the defendants will be subjected to undue inconvenience, or to danger of loss or to future litigation, or to a liability under the decree more extensive and direct than if the absent parties were before the court; or will thereby acquire a right to call upon the absent parties either to reimburse him the whole or a part of the plaintiff's demand; then such absent parties must be brought before the court in order that the rights and liberties of all may be settled by one proceeding and a multiplicity of suits avoided, with a possible different determination of the same issue, to the irreparable injury of the defendant sued. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 136, 138; 1 Daniel, Ch. Pl. & Pr. 281, 282; Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 94; Milroy v. Stockwell, 1 Cart. (Ind.) 35.

Anticipating this objection, and with a view to avoid it, the plaintiff alleges in his bill that Davis and the life association are beyond the jurisdiction of the court and citizens of the same state as the plaintiffs, and cannot therefore be made parties without ousting the jurisdiction of the court. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs argued earnestly that these averments, under the act of congress of February 23, 1839, (section 737, Rev. St.) and the 47th equity rule, dispensed with the necessity of making these parties defendants. This argument has often been made before, and always unavailing in a case like this. The supreme court of the United States have divided parties to suits in equity into three classes: (1) formal; (2) necessary or proper; and (3) indispensable. The first two classes may be dispensed with; the third, never. The absent parties in this case are indispensable parties, as that term is defined and applied by the supreme court. The act of congress and the 47th rule effected no change of the law on this subject of parties to suits in equity. In the leading case upon this subject the supreme court say: "The act of congress does not affect any case where persons are not joined because their citizenship would defeat the jurisdiction; and so far as it touches suits in equity it is no more than a legislative affirmation of the rule previously established by the decisions" of that court. "And the 47th rule is only a declaration for the government of practitioners and courts, of the effect of this act of congress and of the previous decisions of the court on the subject of that rule. It remains true, notwithstanding the act of congress and the 47th rule, that a circuit court can make no decree affecting the rights of an absent person, and can make no decree between the parties before it, which so far involves or depends upon the rights of an absent person that complete and final justice cannot be done between the parties to a suit without affecting these rights, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience." Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [53 U. S.] 130. And in a late case the court say: "The act of congress of 1839, and the rule of this court upon the subject, give no warrant for the idea that parties whose presence was before indispensable could thereafter be dispensed with." Ribon v. Railroad Co., 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 450; and the rule established in these cases has been affirmed, illustrated and applied in many other cases. Kendig v. Dean, 97 U. S. 423;

Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 508; Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 115; Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 284; Florence Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co., [Case No. 4,884;] Tobin v. Walkenshaw, [Id. 14,068;] Litchfield v. Register, [Id. 8,388.] The ruling in Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 94, is directly in point in this case, and concludes the question.

Counsel for plaintiff urge that the rules as to parties in equity are somewhat flexible; that the 47th rule in terms empowers the courts to dispense with "necessary or proper parties, in their discretion;" and attention is called to the case of Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 152, where it is said the objection for want of parties does not affect the jurisdiction, but addresses itself to the policy of the court, and is subject to its discretion. Neither the rule nor the case cited touch the question of indispensable parties; the term itself implies they can never be dispensed with. And the absent persons in this case belong to that class, and not only cannot be brought in on account of their common citizenship with the plaintiff, but they would not be permitted to come in; and in all such cases the court cannot act at all, but will leave the parties to terminate their dispute by other means. Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 508; Florence Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co., [Case No. 4,884;] Kendig v. Dean, 97 U. S. 423. And if the absent persons were not indispensable parties but only "necessary or proper," and if the 47th rule invested the court with the discretion to proceed or not with the case in the absence of such parties, there is nothing in the case calling for an exercise of that discretion favorable to the plaintiff, but the reverse, as will be seen from a brief resume of the case.

The bill only seeks to set aside the contract between Davis and the company so far as it concerns the defendants' notes; it does not seek to set aside the contract as to the other securities embraced in it; nor does the plaintiff offer to repay what the company received in cash on this sale of its securities or any part of it; or to surrender back to defendants their stock; or to place any of the parties in statu quo, nor does it seek to annul the subsequent action of the company by which it blotted out of existence nine-tenths of its capital stock, including the shares formerly owned by the defendants, and which reduction was effected by using as cash the draft received from Davis on the life association. The validity of the company's action in reducing its stock $900,000 by the purchase of nine thousand shares from the life association and its cancellation ought to be determined before any relief is granted; for if that action was valid, it amounted to a ratification of all that had gone before, and the company ought not to be heard to assert that Davis did not pay value for securities transferred to him when it appropriated and used the draft received from him as money. But that transaction cannot be inquired into in this case, because the bill does not attack, or even refer to it; and if it did the indispensable parties to its determination are not before the court.

Passing by the originators, actors and participants in the alleged fraud, all of whom are citizens of the same state as the plaintiff, and solvent, so far as the record discloses anything on that subject; affirming the sale of the company's securities to Davis, so far as it profited by it; keeping all that was obtained by that transaction and the subsequent operations based on the fruits of that transaction; the plaintiff seeks a recovery against defendants, admittedly innocent of any participation in the alleged fraud, by proceeding in a mode that would deprive them of that sure recourse on the actual parties to the alleged fraud, to which they would be entitled, and in a mode that would probably result in exempting the actual perpetrators of the fraud from liability altogether.

A plaintiff occupying this attitude has no claims to the favorable exercise of an equitable discretion on the subject of parties, if such discretion exists, which is not decided. Objection for the non-joinder of necessary parties need not be taken by demurrer, plea or answer; it is open to the defendant to make it any time; and it may, and in a clear case ought to, be raised and acted upon by the court on its own motion. These conclusions render it unnecessary to decide whether the transactions between Davis and the life association and the life insurance company were or not fraudulent, or to rule upon the other questions presented at the hearing.

Case No. 170.

ALEXANDER v. KNOX.

[6 Sawy. 54.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Sept. 3, 1879.

-JUDGMENT ROLL-CLAIM-DONATION-WIFE'S SHARE.

1. A county in Oregon is a body politic, and may, in the exercise of the powers given it by statute, take a note or bond and mortgage, and enforce the same by the ordinary legal proceedings in the courts.

2. In 1858, the only fund which a county treasurer was authorized by law to loan was the common school fund in his custody arising from the sale of sections 16 and 36, and in doing this he was the agent of the territory,—the trustee of the fund,—and not the county, and a suit to enforce the obligation of such note and mortgage should have been brought in the name of such treasurer.

3. A suit brought in the name of a plaintiff, who is neither a natural nor an artificial person, is a nullity; and therefore a suit by the "board of county commissioners of Lane county," in 1863, to enforce a note and mortgage given to the treasurer of that county upon a loan of school funds, was a nullity, and could not support a decree for any relief.

4. The judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is presumed to have been rightly given, upon sufficient pleadings and process, until the contrary appears; and therefore, where it appears that a decree might have been given, either in a suit which was a nullity for want of a real plaintiff, or in another which was not, this presumption is sufficient to sustain the validity of the same.

5. The certificate of the clerk is not evidence of the character or legal effect of the paper to which it is appended,—as, for instance, that it is a copy of judgment roll,—but only that it is a true copy of the original, on file in his office; and as to what it is, it must speak for itself.

6. The boundaries of a claim, under the donation act, are a part of the public surveys of the country; and a description of a tract of land as a claim, number 70, in township 20 south, of range 3 west, is sufficiently certain in a decree, or elsewhere.

7. Where a claim was taken up by a married settler, under section 5 of the donation act, after January 20, 1852, and the wife died before January 30, 1854, and before the completion of the residence and cultivation required by the act, her share of the donation was, by virtue of the act of January 20, 1852, (Sess. Laws, 64.) her separate property, and upon her death descended to her heirs unaffected by any claim of the husband on account of the marriage, as directed by the common law.

At law. This action is brought by the plaintiff, [Robert Alexander,] a citizen of California, against the defendant, a citizen of Oregon, to recover the possession of a half section of land situate in Lane county, the same being the donation claim of Robert Alexander and Sarah, his wife, numbered 70, and lying in sections 35 and 36, in township 20 south, of range 3 west, of the Wallamet meridian. The action was commenced against the tenant, George T. Sears, when, on his application, the landlord, Samuel B. Knox, was made defendant in his place. In the pleadings, each party alleges that he is the owner of the premises, and the other is not. The case was heard by the court without a jury. [Judgment for defendant.]

Addison C. Gibbs and W. Scott Bebee, for plaintiff.

Rufus Mallory and Horace Knox, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. From the evidence it appears that the plaintiff went on the premises on September 1, 1852, as a married settler, under section 5 of the donation act, and resided upon and cultivated the same for four years, as required by said act; and that his wife, Sarah, died thereon in 1853; that on September 27, 1867, the officers of the proper land office issued a patent certificate to said plaintiff and his wife for said premises,—the north half to the husband and the south one to the wife,—and that on June 14, 1877, a patent for the premises issued in pursuance of said certificate; that on November 17, 1858, said plaintiff made his promissory note to the treasurer of Lane county for the sum of eight hundred dollars, payable three years from date, with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum, and to secure the payment of the same, together with his then wife Susannah, on the date last aforesaid, executed and delivered to said treasurer a mortgage of said premises; that on October 8, 1863, a suit was commenced against said plaintiff and wife in the circuit court for said county to enforce the lien of said mortgage by filing a complaint therein, in the name of the "board of county commissioners of Lane county," and on the same day a summons likewise entitled was placed in the hands of the proper officer who, on October 16, 1863, returned thereon that he had duly served the same on said plaintiff on October 9; that on October 30, 1863, for want of an answer, a decree was given in said court entitled "Lane County, Plaintiff, v. Robert Alexander, Defendant,"² directing the sale of said mortgaged premises, and that the proceeds be applied to the payment of the costs and expenses of the suit and one thousand seventy nine dollars and fifty cents paid to the complainant, with interest from date; that on September 1, 1866, in pursuance of said decree, said premises were duly sold to one J. W. Matlock for the sum of one thousand two hundred dollars, and on October 25, 1866, said sale was duly confirmed; that on July 27, 1867, in pursuance of said sale and confirmation, said premises were by the sheriff duly conveyed to said Matlock, who, afterwards, on June 22, 1867, in consideration of the sum of one thousand and fifty dollars, conveyed to the defendant, Samuel B. Knox, all the interest of the plaintiff therein on September 1, 1866; and that afterwards, on March 20, 1867, said defendant, Knox, by means of proper conveyances, acquired all the interest in the premises of the six children and heirs to plaintiff's deceased wife, Sarah. The plaintiff puts his right to recover upon the ground that the decree upon which the premises were sold to Matlock is void, because: 1. The county of Lane had no power or authority to loan money or to take or own a mortgage. 2. The decree was given in a suit in which "Lane county" was the plaintiff, while it appears from the records that the only suit then pending upon said note and mortgage in said court for Lane county was one in which the "board of county commissioners of Lane county" was plaintiff. Before considering those questions, it may be well to state the right of the plaintiff in the premises at the date of this mortgage, a point upon which there was some conflict and uncertainty in the opinion of the counsel. The donation act made no provision for the descent or disposition of the wife's share of the donation in case of her death before the completion of the residence and cultivation required by the act. At the death of Sarah, 1853, she was seised of an estate of inheritance,—a conditional fee in her share of the donation,—the condition being, that her husband should complete the necessary residence and cultivation thereon. There being then no statute in force in Oregon regulating descent of real property, the subject was regulated by the rules of the common law. According to these, the property descended to her children, as her heirs, to the exclusion of her husband. Neither did the latter acquire a life estate in the premises as tenant thereof by the curtesy. For by the act of January 20, 1852, (Sess. Laws, p. 64,) it was provided that "all right and interest of the wife" in the donation "be and is hereby secured to the sole and separate use and control of the wife." The share of the wife, Sarah, in this donation, was acquired after the passage of this act, and by the necessary operation of it the husband was precluded from taking any interest in it by virtue of the marriage. And although this act was repealed on January 30, 1854, and section 30 of the act of January 16, 1854, in relation to estates, (Gen. Laws Or. p. 588,) gave the husband an estate for life in the inheritance of the wife, of which they were both seised in her right "as tenant thereof by the curtesy," whether they had "issue born alive or not," still in this case, the wife having died before such repeal and enactment, and her inheritance having in the mean time descended to her children without any interest therein on the part of the husband, their rights could not be affected thereby. Fields v. Squires. [Case No. 4,776;] Wythe v. Smith, [Id. 18,122.] It follows from these premises that the plaintiff never had any interest in the wife's donation, and is, therefore, not entitled to the possession of the same, and that the defendant, having acquired the interest of her heirs therein, is the owner of the same, independent of the sheriff's deed.

As to the remaining quarter section, the husband's share or the donation, the case will now be considered upon the plaintiff's objections to the validity of the decree. By the laws of this state each county therein "is a body politic and corporate," for the purpose, among other things, of purchasing and owning property, real and personal, for the use thereof, and of making "all necessary contracts," and doing "all other necessary acts in relation to the property and concerns of the county." (Gen. Laws Or. p. 535;) and the county court, as the representative of the county, has the power to provide, among other things, for the erection and furnishing of all necessary public buildings, bridges, the maintenance and employment of the poor, the management of the county property, funds, and business, and to compromise for any debt or damages due the county, (Civil Code Or. § 870.) The county sues, and is sued, in its name under the direction of the county court, (Id. § 871,) and may maintain an action upon a cause of action accruing to it upon a contract made with it, (Id. § 346.) From this summary of the powers of a county, it is apparent that it must have the authority in many instances to take notes and mortgages, and enforce them by the usual and proper legal proceedings. To show this, it is only necessary to suggest a few cases. For instance, the county may let a contract to construct a building or bridge, and may therefore take a note or bond and mortgage as security for the due performance thereof; it may compound a debt due the county by the sureties of a defaulting officer, and may, of course, take a note and mortgage for the sum accepted in lieu of the whole debt; it may also accumulate a fund by a limited tax, during a period of years, wherewith to construct an expensive bridge or building, and may in the mean time loan the fund as it is collected upon the note and mortgage. These acts are necessarily incidental to the powers expressly granted to the county. Indeed, the last instance is probably included in the express power to manage and care for "the county property, funds, and business."

From the complaint in the case of Board of Com'rs of Lane Co. v. Alexander, it appears that the note and mortgage sued on were given to the county treasurer. By section 20 of the act of August 14, 1848, (9 Stat. 323,) it was provided that sections 16 and 36 of the public lands of the territory should be "reserved for the purpose of being applied to schools" therein. By the act of January 7, 1856, (Sess. Laws, p. 69,) it was provided that the school lands in the various counties should be disposed of by the county superintendents of schools, and the proceeds deposited with the territorial treasurer; and by the act of January 30, 1858, (Id. 43,) that said proceeds should be paid into the county treasury, and it was also thereby made the duty of the respective county treasurers to loan the same under certain regulations therein prescribed, upon note and mortgage, for a period not exceeding three years.

The only money which a county treasurer was authorized by law to loan at the date of this note and mortgage was this school fund, and the reasonable inference is that such was the character of the money loaned to Alexander. These funds belonged to the territory in trust for the benefit of the common schools of the country, and in fact that the legislature employed the county superintendents to dispose of the lands, and the county treasurers to keep and loan the funds arising therefrom, did not make them the property of the county, or authorize it to bring suit upon a note and mortgage made to the county treasurer therefor. In the absence of any statute to the contrary, the suit upon this Alexander note and mortgage should have been brought in the name of the county treasurer. But the validity of this note and mortgage, and the right of Lane county to sue upon it, was necessarily involved in the decree of the circuit court, and is therefore conclusively determined by it, whenever the question arises collaterally. Semple v. Bank of British Columbia, [Case No. 12,659;] Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 352. In the former case the court said: "The court, even if there had been no defense interposed, must, in giving its decree, have determined that the bank had capacity to sue, and that the note and mortgage were valid. This much at least was necessarily included in the decree, and, without determining these two questions in this way, the court could not have pronounced it." During the territorial government, the county was represented and its business transacted by a board, called "the board of county commissioners;" but by the constitution of the state government this tribunal was superseded by the county court. At the date, then, of the commencement of the suit against Alexander in the Lane county circuit court, there was no such person, either natural or artificial, as the "board of county commissioners of Lane county," and therefore the suit commenced in its name was without a plaintiff, and a mere nullity. Proprietors of Mexican Mill v. Yellow Jacket S. M. Co., 4 Nev. 42. Of course, if the decree enforcing the lien of the mortgage, although entitled Lane County v. Alexander, was actually given in the suit, entitled Board of County Com'rs of Lane Co. v. Alexander, then it is null and void also.

The only question, then, open to consideration in the case is, whether the decree was given in such suit or not. The decree and suit, being in favor of different plaintiffs, are not presumed to be a part of the same proceeding, although the subject-matter appears to be the same. For aught that appears, the suit by the board of commissioners may have been dismissed or abandoned as a mistake, and another one brought in the name of the county in which this decree was duly given. The circuit court of Lane county is a court of general jurisdiction, and therefore the presumption is in favor of the regularity of its proceedings. In such a court all things are presumed to have been rightly done. Miller v. U. S., 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 299. Therefore, the presumption is that the decree in question was duly given in a sufficient proceeding; and if from the records it appears that such decree might have been given in either a suit by the Board of Com'rs of Lane Co. v. Alexander, the presumption is that it was given in the latter, rather than the former, because that would be legal, and the other not. But the plaintiff contends that it appears affirmatively from the record that this decree was given in the suit of the Board of Com'rs of Lane Co. v. Alexander. The ground of this claim is that the clerk of the circuit court of Lane county has appended to a copy of the complaint, summons, and return thereon in said case and the decree in Lane County v. Alexander an official certificate of the date of April 14, 1879, to the effect that he has carefully compared said copies "with the original judgment roll in the suit of Lane County v. Robert Alexander," then on file in this office, and that they are correct copies of the whole thereof; and, further, that, according to the records and files of his office, no other paper than these "was ever filed or made in said suit." In this certificate the clerk does impliedly assert that there is in his office a judgment roll constituted by the papers of which these are copies, and the argument from this fact is, that it is conclusive evidence that the decree entitled Lane County v. Alexander was really given in the suit of Board of Com'rs of Lane Co. v. Alexander, and is therefore void, such suit being a nullity for want of a plaintiff. But can the clerk certify that there is or is not a judgment roll on file in his office, or that any given number or kind of papers therein constitute such a roll? It is clear in my judgment that he cannot. The only fact of which his certificate is evidence, is that the paper to which it is appended is a true copy of the original then on the files or records of his office. Being the custodian of the original, he is authorized to make a copy thereof, and his certificate is proof of that fact. Civil Code Or. §§ 568, 720, 738. But with this his power ends; and whether the paper is a judgment roll or not, must be determined by itself. If a clerk certifies, that a paper is a true copy of an entry in the records of his office, and that the same is a judgment in a particular action, the latter part of such certificate is extra-official, and of no effect. For whether such an entry is in law a judgment in the particular action mentioned, or at all, is a question of law to be determined by the court when and where it may arise, and not the clerk.

What constitutes a judgment roll, and when and by whom it shall be made, is set forth with particularity in section 269, Civil Code Or. It provides that the "clerk shall prepare and file in his office the judgment roll" before the next term of the court after docketing the same. The power of the clerk to make this roll does not extend beyond the next term, unless perhaps upon an order of the court allowing the same to be done thereafter. When the complaint is not answered the roll is made by attaching together the complaint, summons, proof of service, and a copy of the entry of judgment. But such papers do not constitute a judgment roll, unless they have been identified and attached together by the clerk as the complaint, summons, and judgment in a particular case. But this is not all. These papers, when so collated, must be marked as the judgment roll, by being inclosed in a blank sheet of paper, with "the name of the court, the term at which judgment was given, the names of the parties to the action, and the title thereof, for whom judgment was given, and the amount or nature thereof, and the date of its entry and docketing," indorsed thereon; and then the roll, being prepared, must be filed by the clerk as such. But the judgment existed before the judgment roll, and is valid without it. Tried by this statute there is no judgment roll, so far as appears, in either Board of Com'rs or Lane Co. v. Alexander. There are copies of some papers here from both cases, but there is no judgment roll in either of them. Neither is there any sufficient evidence that there never were any other papers on file in either case. The certificate of the clerk is not, and could not be, absolute on that point, but is only according to the present records and files of this office. Further than this the clerk could not certify. But the present absence of a complaint, summons, and proof of service in the suit of Lane County v. Alexander from the files of Lane county court is not sufficient evidence that they were never there, in the face of the presumption to the contrary, arising from the fact that there is a final decree in that suit of record. The presumption being that this decree was rightly given, until the contrary appears, it follows that it must have been given upon proper pleadings and process. And the mere fact that the clerk of the court, after the lapse of sixteen years, is unable to find such pleadings or process on file in his office, or any evidence, from the records and file thereof, that they ever were there, is not sufficient to neutralize or overcome such presumption.

Objection was also made to this decree for want of certainty in the description of the premises directed to be sold and the amount to be paid the plaintiff therein. The description of the premises is as follows: "Claim No. 70 in T. 20 S., R. 3 W., of the Wallamet meridian." The survey of a donation claim is a part of the public surveys of the country, and therefore a description of a tract of land, as claim No. 70 in a certain township and range, is just as certain as a description by reference to a certain section in said township and range. The word "claim" in the surveys under the donation act is used to designate a tract of land claimed by a settler under such act—a donation claim. The premises are so described in the patent certificate and patent; and it is equally as certain as one by the section or subdivision thereof. The decree directs that the premises be sold, and that out of the proceeds the plaintiff therein be paid one thousand and seventy-nine dollars and fifty cents, with interest from date. There is no uncertainty in the decree in this particular. There must be a finding for the defendant, that he is the owner of the premises.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 338.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1806.

CONTINUANCE—DEATH OF PARTY.

The defendant is not, of course, entitled to a continuance, upon the death of the plaintiff.

[At law. Application for continuance. Denied.]

The plaintiff died since the last term, and the administrator appears at this term. The issue was made up at the last term.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, contended that he was of right entitled to a continuance. By the act of assembly of Virginia, (P. P. [1 Rev. Code 1803,] p. 110, § 20,) all suits abate by the death of a party, unless there has been a verdict or interlocutory judgment. But the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73) provides that the suit shall not abate, but that the defendant shall answer thereto.

THE COURT refused a continuance as a matter of right under the act of congress, which was admitted by all the bar to be in force in such a case, as it provides for a case different from that in the Virginia act. The court referred to the case of Codman v. Wilson, [Wilson v. Codman, 3 Cranch, (7 U. S.) 193,] in the supreme court, where the point was decided.

[In equity. Bill by George Alexander against Jacinto Rodriguez, Rensselaer E. Steele, Isaac C. Steele, Edgar W. Steele, and George Steele to redeem certain land which had been conveyed to Rodriguez. Bill dismissed.]

J. B. Harmon and Paterson, Wallace & Stow, for complainant.

Williams & Thornton and Wilson & Crittenden, for respondents.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This was a bill in equity, filed to redeem a certain estate conveyed to the defendant Rodriguez, by a deed absolute on its face, but alleged to be a mortgage. The general and undisputed facts of the case are as follows:

On the 13th April, 1852, Jose Maria Villavicencia, the grantee of a rancho known as the "Corral de Piedra," conveyed to his children all his right and title in the rancho. His claim had not then been confirmed, but a final decree of a confirmation was subsequently obtained, the lands surveyed, and a patent issued in November, 1867. In 18—, Jose Maria died, leaving surviving him the grantees named in the deed, who were his heirs at law, and his widow, Rafaela Rodriguez de Villavicencia. On the 4th day of December, 1860, the widow and Jose Ramon, Fulgencio, and Ascencion Villavicencia executed to the defendant Jacinto Rodriguez, who is a brother of the widow, a mortgage of the lands, to secure the payment of the sum of four thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of two per cent. per month compounding semiannually, and for such other advances as might be made by the mortgagee for the payment of any taxes, assessments, or other charges which might be imposed on the land. On the 29th April, 1864, there was due to Jacinto, for principal and interest of the moneys loaned by him, the sum of $8,610, and for moneys advanced to redeem the premises from a tax sale the sum of $1,172.33. As the family was in needy circumstances, and no interest had been paid on the mortgage, Jacinto desired a settlement, which he was further induced to demand by the fact that, under the laws of California, taxes were assessed against the mortgagors upon the value of the land, and against the mortgagee upon the amount of the mortgage. The family therefore determined to convey in fee the premises to Jacinto, which conveyance was executed on the 29th April, 1864, by the widow Rafaela, Jose Ramon, Fulgencio, Ascencion, Jose and Ramona. On the 17th day of February, 1865, Antonio Villavicencia, who had then come of age, and who had full knowledge of the original transaction between the other heirs and Jacinto, executed to the latter a conveyance of all his right, title and interest in the rancho, for the nominal consideration of $100. On the 20th day of May, 1865, Jose Ignacio Villavicencia, with like knowledge of the conveyance by his mother and the other heirs, executed to Jacinto a deed in fee simple for all his right, title and interest in and to the premises. On the 27th July, 1866, Jacinto Rodriguez executed to the defendants Edgar W. Steele, Isaac C. Steele, and Rensselaer S. Steele a lease of the premises, with certain covenants on the part of the lessees for the payment of rent and the erection of improvements, and on the part of the lessor for the conveyance of the title at the expiration of the term for a specified sum.

On the 16th December, 1867, the widow, Jose Ramon, Jose Antonio, Ascencion and Ramona executed to Fulgencio a conveyance of all their right, title and interest in the rancho. This conveyance was made without consideration, and in order that Fulgencio might enter into arrangements with other parties for the assertion of their rights. Fulgencio accordingly, on the 26th December, 1867, conveyed to the complainant all his right, title and interest. The consideration stated in the deed is the sum of thirty-five thousand dollars; the actual amount paid was one thousand dollars; but it was agreed that a further payment of $35,000 was to be made, in case the complainant should succeed in the suit. By what writings this obligation is evidenced, or what security has been given for its fulfillment, does not appear. It is alleged in the bill that the conveyance to Jacinto was executed in order to avoid the double taxation referred to; that it was intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of the moneys due the latter; and that it was understood that upon repayment of such moneys, with interest, Jacinto would reconvey to the grantors the premises. These allegations of the bill are positively denied in the answer of Jacinto Rodriguez.

The equitable rule which treats every conveyance of land which is in fact a security for an antecedent debt or contemporaneous loan, as a mortgage, which the debtor is entitled to redeem and demand a reconveyance of the estate on payment of the debt, is firmly established in the jurisprudence of both England and the United States. This doctrine is not confined merely to cases where the deed fails to express the real intention of the parties through fraud, accident, or mistake, but it is applied where the parties have attempted, by express agreement, to convert what is in fact a security for a debt into an irredeemable conveyance, or even to qualify in any manner the power of the mortgagor to exercise himself the right to redeem, or to transfer it to another. "The principle is well settled," says Savage, C. J., in Clark v. Henry, 2 Cow. 324, "that chancery will not suffer any agreement in a mortgage to prevail which shall change it into an absolute conveyance, upon any condition or event whatever." An estate cannot at one time be a mortgage, and at another time cease to be so, by one and the same deed. Howard v. Harris, 1 Vern. 190. "Once a mortgage, always a mortgage;" and the grantor may redeem at any time consistent with the general rules of equity, notwithstanding the most express stipulation that the instrument shall not operate, or be considered, as a mortgage; and that, if the money be not paid at a day certain, the estate of the grantee shall be forever absolute. Rankin v. Mortimere, 7 Watts, 372; 3 [White & T.] Lead. Cas. Eq. 624. The inquiry, therefore, whether a deed absolute on its face is to be regarded by equity as a mortgage does not depend so much upon the agreement of the parties as upon the circumstances of the case, and the real nature of the transaction; and whenever it is made to appear, by proof oral or written that the transaction was a loan and the deed given as security for a debt due by the grantor, the latter will, on payment, be entitled to redeem. Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 118; Taylor v. Luther, [Case No. 13,796;] Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 289; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 139, Jenkins v. Eldridge, [Case No. 7,266;] 3 [White & T.] Lead. Cas. Eq. 625, and cases cited.

The familiar expression that a deed absolute on its face will be treated in equity as a mortgage, if so intended by the parties, is defective as a statement of the doctrine, for the right to redeem is not only independent of the agreement or intention of the parties, but paramount to it, and may be enforced in opposition to the terms of the conveyance. "The policy of equity," says the learned author of the American notes to 3 Lead. Cas. Eq. 627, "forbids the creditor to speculate on the necessities of the debtor, by the creation of an unredeemable mortgage, as the policy of the law, though from different reasons, forbids the creation of inalienable estates, in fee or entail. The rule overrides the agreement and intention of the parties, and cannot be evaded by any contrivance which cupidity may employ or necessity submit to." Upon this principle, the whole system of equity, with regard to mortgages, rests.

In the case of the ordinary bond and mortgage, the writings themselves disclose the fact that the relation of debtor and creditor exists, and that the conveyance is a mere security for a loan. When the conveyance is on its face absolute, or in the form of a condition, the same facts may be established by parol; and they are allowed to be proved, not for the purpose of varying or contradicting the terms of the written contract, but to establish the existence of the paramount equity of the mortgagor, by which the operation of the deed is controlled. Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 289; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 139. "Whether a particular deed, absolute on its face, should be regarded in equity as a mortgage, will depend upon all the circumstances of the case,—the relations between the parties, the object they had in view, the purpose for which the conveyance was executed, the means employed to obtain it, or any other fact or circumstance may be shown, of a nature to control the deed, and establish a right of redemption paramount to and independent of its terms." 3 [White & T.] Lead. Cas. Eq., ubi supra.

The principal evidence on the part of the complainant in this case, is the depositions of the widow and heirs who united in the conveyance. They all assert that the deed was made at the solicitation of Jacinto Rodriguez, and with the understanding that it was to be merely a security for the debts due him from the family. Rafaela states that a few days before the execution of the deed, her brother Jacinto had a conversation with her, in which it was agreed that she and her children should execute a conveyance to him, as a security for the debt due him; that he begged her not to distrust him, and assured her that all he wanted was to secure his money. This conversation she communicated to her children, and on this understanding the deed was signed by them, and also the separate deeds afterwards executed by Antonio, on coming of age, and by Jacinto, who was then absent. The testimony of the other grantors is substantially to the same effect. They all swear to assurances given by Jacinto, that he wanted nothing more than his money, and that the deed was given as a security. Mr. C. W. Dana, county clerk of San Luis Obispo county, who took the acknowledgments of the execution of the deed by the widow and her children, states that, before the deed was translated and read over to them, the widow inquired of Jacinto if it was in strict accordance with the agreements and understanding between them. Jacinto replied that it was. It was then translated and read in the presence of all the family. The witness also states that in a conversation between himself and Jacinto, on their way back to San Luis, the latter said that his object in getting the Villavicencia family to execute the deed was to secure the money which he had loaned or advanced to them, and to save the property for the benefit of his sister and her family; while, if it remained in their hands, he might lose his money, and his sister and her children would lose the whole property. He said they had done wisely in trusting him, as he intended to deal justly by them. A similar conversation between Jacinto and William J. Graves is testified to by the latter. If its purport is accurately given, Jacinto would seem to have acquiesced in the opinion expressed by Mr. Graves, that the deed to him should be regarded as a mortgage. It is objected that parol testimony as to the motives and understanding with which the instrument was executed, as also evidence of the admission of Jacinto, cannot be received to vary or contradict the terms of the written instrument. In 4 Kent, Comm. 143, it is declared that "a deed absolute on its face, and though registered as a deed, will be valid and effectual as a mortgage between the parties, if it was intended by them to be merely a security for a debt. And this would be the case, though the defeasance was by an agreement resting in parol; for parol evidence is admissible to show that an absolute deed was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance was omitted by fraud or mistake." To this Story, Circuit Justice, in Taylor v. Luther, [Case No. 13,796,] adds: "It is the same if it be omitted by design upon mutual confidence between the parties, for the violation of such an agreement would be a fraud of the most flagrant kind, originating in an open breach of trust against conscience and justice." These passages are cited with approval by the supreme court in Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 299.

But to establish the fact that the conveyance was intended as a mere security for a debt, something more than parol evidence of an agreement to that effect will be required. Facts and circumstances must be shown dehors the instrument, such as will give rise to an equity paramount to the agreement of the parties, or by exhibiting the real nature of the transaction expose the attempted fraud. On such an inquiry, the whole range of parol proofs is open. The relations between the parties; the consideration actually paid; the means employed to obtain the conveyance; the object in making it; the origin of the transaction; whether the parties originally met on the footing of borrower and lender; conversation and correspondence between the parties; and, in general, every fact or circumstance of a nature to disclose the real nature of the transaction. Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 218; Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 117; Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 132; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 154; Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 289; Taylor v. Luther, [Case No. 13,796,] 3 [White & T.] Lead. Cas. Eq. 630-633, and cases cited. But when these or similar circumstances are not shown to take the case out of the statute of frauds or the rules of evidence, parol evidence is as inadmissible to show that an absolute deed was made subject to an understanding that it should be redeemable, or that a conditional deed was intended to be susceptible of redemption without strict compliance with the condition, as if it were offered to contradict or vary the instrument in any other particular." 3 [White & T.] Lead. Cas. Eq., ubi supra; [Elliott v. Maxwell,] 7 Ired. Eq. 246; Webb v. Rice, 6 Hill, 219; Cook v. Eaton, 16 Barb. 439; Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 218. In the present case, the evidence under consideration, when taken in connection with the other testimony adduced, is addressed not merely to the contract of the parties. The real nature of the transaction is sought to be exposed by showing the relations between the parties; the ignorance and confidence on one side—acuteness and capacity for business on the other; alleged inadequacy of consideration, and the conversation which occurred, and the inducements held out at the time of the execution of the conveyance. It has been held that the facts out of which the alleged equity arises may be shown by the admissions of the grantee, though such evidence should be received with caution. 2 Black, fol. 101, 4-67. And the motives of the parties, the means employed to obtain the deed, and the purpose for which it was executed, may be shown by the conversation which preceded or accompanied the execution, and which form a part of the res gestae of the transaction. Morris v. Nixon, [1 How. (42 U. S.) 132.] I think, therefore, that the evidence offered is clearly admissible.

Much testimony was taken to show that the consideration given for the land was inadequate. I have attentively considered it, but have not been able to find any satisfactory proof of any such gross inadequacy of consideration as to justify the conclusion that the deed must have been intended as a mortgage, or that undue advantage was taken of the necessities and distress of the grantors. In view of the recent extraordinary rise in the value of lands in the southern portion of this state, it is, no doubt, difficult for witnesses to recall how greatly in 1864, the year of drought, its value was depressed, and how difficult it was to find a purchaser for an extensive rancho. The arguments and representatives made by Mr. Van Ness to Jacinto Rodriguez, when two years later he was endeavoring to induce the latter to sell this very estate, are, unless they were entirely disingenuous and inconsistent with notorious facts, more reliable evidence of what was then, and for two years had been, the value of the land, than any opinion he may now express under the perhaps unconscious influence of the recent advance in values. The fact, too, that Jacinto, who, in any view of the facts of this case, must have desired to have obtained the largest possible price, was able in 1866 to obtain only $20,000, payable at the expiration of five years, is inconsistent with the supposition the lands could have a much greater cash value than the consideration mentioned in the deed. The witness who attaches the highest and in fact the extravagant value to the land is Mr. McReilay, and yet in March, 1866, he communicates, as a friendly office to Jacinto, an offer of $12,000 for the land, and reminds [the latter] that no less than nine ranchos, which he enumerates, are for sale, and that there are no purchasers. The letters of the widow show that she was by no means destitute of intelligence. But the family was illiterate and unfamiliar with business affairs. They were poor, and had no other resources than the rancho, and they felt confidence and affection for their uncle. But these facts, though under some circumstances they might have great weight, are, in my view of this case, of subordinate importance.

The account of the transaction given by Jacinto himself is as follows: He was the holder of a mortgage executed nearly four years previous by the widow and three of the children, for money furnished for their support, and advanced to redeem the land on a tax sale. No interest had been paid, and the indebtedness was rapidly accumulating. He therefore wrote to his sister that it was time to come to a settlement, as the mortgage could not last a lifetime. She told him to come to see her whenever convenient. He accordingly did so, and, finding the family assembled, was told by them that they had consulted together, and were determined to sell him the rancho on account of the money due on the mortgage. They said they had come to this determination, because, it was put up for sale, some other person would certainly buy it, and they would never get it again; and they preferred that he should finally be the owner because he was the one who saved them on a former occasion when they were about to lose the rancho on another mortgage. To this he replied, that if they were all agreed to sell the rancho, he would accept the proposition with pleasure, and would take no steps to foreclose the mortgage. After some further consultation, and after obtaining from Antonio a promise to unite in the conveyance when he became of age, he informed them that he would cause the conveyance to be made out, and would bring it to the house for the recorder to take their acknowledgments. They again informed him that they would comply with their agreement. Whereupon he told them that he did not wish to speculate upon them, because they were his relations, and they had treated him well, and that, if he could sell the rancho for enough to reimburse him for his outlays, he would return the surplus, if any; and also, if he could sell a portion of the land for enough to reimburse himself, he would reconvey the unsold portion. But if he had bad luck and could not sell he would lose his money. At the time of the execution of the deed, he informed them that it had been prepared in accordance with what passed in the conversation, and with what they had promised; and he asked if they were willing to sign. They declared themselves ready, and the deed was executed. The witness adds that his offer to restore the surplus of the land, or the price he might obtain, after reimbursing himself, was purely spontaneous, and made after they had agreed to sell.

I have no doubt that this was the true nature of the transaction. It is consistent with the conversations reported by Mr. Dana and Mr. Graves, and it is not irreconcilable with the statements of Rafaela and the family. It is true that they testify that the conveyance was made as a security for the debt due Jacinto. But it is to be remembered that these witnesses testify under the pressure of poverty and interest. Except the insignificant sum of $1,000 already received, their future hopes depend on the result of this suit. They are, therefore, under great temptation to shape their testimony so as to promote their interests,—see opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell in Babcock v. Wyman, [19 How. (60 U. S.) 289,]—and the adoption by all of them of the very phrase of the books, that the deed was given as security for a debt, suggests the suspicion that they have been thoroughly apprised what facts it would be necessary to establish. Both Rafaela and her daughter admit that Jacinto was to endeavor to sell the land, or find a purchaser. They assert, however, that the family were to be consulted, and, if satisfied with the price, to execute the conveyance. It will presently be shown that the family were fully advised of the negotiations with the Steeles, and offered no objection; but the statement that they were to unite in the deed to the purchaser is inconsistent with their own account of the transaction, for why should an absolute deed be made to Jacinto, in order that he might sell and reimburse himself, if the final deed to the purchaser was to be made by themselves?

But the most important corroboration of the testimony of Jacinto is found in the letters written by or at the dictation of Rafaela. In her letter of March 4th, 1865, she says: "He (one Goldtree) also told me to ask you if you wished to exchange a piece of land of your rancho. He says he will give you, from the road," etc., etc. "I know that you will not like this, but he has pressed me so that I promised to write to you to see if you were willing to do so or no. About the amount I owe him, I said to him that, if he wished the interest I have in the rancho of San Ramon, I would give it to him for that which I owe him." In her letter of March 13th, 1865, she informs him that she, and all of her sons and daughters, had been sued, and the rancho attached, for a debt due to one Buzzolano, and adds: "I do not know if that gentleman will tell you of the attachment or not, but I think, from what some disinterested friends of ours have told us, that there is some trap well laid here, not against me, because I have nothing, but against the rancho, that is against you. * * * I would like to see Mr. Murray, that he may defend our part; but, of course, without your consent, nothing will be done. The fact is that their object, according to my sure and truthful information, is to nullify the sale of the rancho to you, upon the grounds that when that sale was executed the debt had already accrued, or at least that it was about accruing, and under some other requisite, of which we are ignorant, to the end that, in this manner, the debt shall fall upon the rancho. You will see from this that it is of the greatest importance you should come," etc. "I am very much cast down. They seek to collect not only the debt, but the interest." In her letter of July 23, 1866, she says: "I have received your esteemed letter of 22d inst., respecting matters in relation to the rancho,—that Mr. Van Ness has spoken to you of the sale of the rancho, and also of renting. You also tell me that another gentleman, who is a business agent, tells you that he can find a customer to buy the rancho or rent it, paying him his five per cent. commission, assuring you that he can sell the whole of the rancho for $20,000, or rent it for $1,000 per year, the lessee paying the taxes, and at the end of the term taking the whole of the rancho, if it be convenient for him to do so. You tell me that it is impossible to reserve a piece of land with the house; do not think that I did not know this. I have always said that it is impossible for you to find a customer for the sale of the rancho except for the whole. You should do what is most convenient for you. They tell me that there is in San Francisco a gentleman who wishes to buy the rancho, but I have not seen him. I do not know if he be not the same whose agent you say was in this place on Monday last. I wrote you a letter respecting the taxes on the rancho. Cappe sent word to me to write that you should come here to attend the Board of Supervisors. I think you have to pay $500 taxes; and perhaps if you were here it would not be so much. Don Thomas Pollard desires to rent the ranch to put sheep on it. He told me he would wait two weeks, but I think he went above. It may be that he will go to see you about the rent of the rancho. Answer me whether you will come or not, and what will be the result of all this. Rafaela Rodriguez." On August 8, 1866, she writes: "I have before me your esteemed letter of the 30th ultimo, in which you tell me that you have rented the rancho for five years, at the rent of $1,000 annually, and that the said gentleman has the privilege, at the end of the five years, of buying the rancho at the price of $20,000. If, as you tell me that you had rented the rancho, you had told me that you had sold it, it would have been better than renting it in this manner, because of what use is it for us to occupy the house and sowing grounds for one year, as you have contracted? We cannot plant next year, because when the 1st August comes they will say to us 'Away!' And as the harvest is from September to October, to be dependent upon whether the lessees will or will not allow me to remain longer, is, in fact, to be obliged to leave. Finally, it being already done, no matter how, it is well. I think you will remember that Ramona has a piece of ground on the rancho, which I and my children gave her some years since. I do not know what arrangement you will make with her. You tell me to write to you that you may see if we are angry. Why should we be angry? I think it would be nonsense, and at the same time unjust, to be angry about a thing which is past. I cannot be. Tell me when you will come with those gentlemen to deliver the rancho. I think you ought to come yourself to give the possession, for if they come alone I do not know one of them, and I do not know what they will do. * * * Your affectionate sister, Rafaela Rodriguez." In her letters of September 18th, 1866, December 19th, 1866, August 8th, 1867, and September 26th, 1867, Rafaela speaks of having been looking for a piece of land from the time the rancho was rented, and of Antonio's application to Mr. Branch for this purpose; of the refusal by the Steeles to allow them to occupy more than 12 acres of the planting ground; of her regret that Jacinto had not reserved the small piece of ground belonging to Raimunda, (Ramona); of her depression of spirits as the time for leaving approached; of her application to Mr. Steele to rent the house for another year, and of his willingness to do so at the rate of $120 per annum. The testimony shows that this arrangement was, in fact, made. In none of these letters is there the slightest intimation of any interest in the land retained by the family, or of any violation by Jacinto of any understanding or trust by which he was bound.

It will be remembered that at the time the deed was signed by the other members of the family, Ignacio was absent. On the 16th March, 1865, he writes as follows to Jacinto: "I have received your esteemed letter of the 14th of the present month, in which you say to me that you hope that I will transfer by sale to you my right in the rancho of 'Corral de Piedra,' as all the rest of the family had transferred by sale their rights to you. I assure you that I will do the same as the rest of the family so soon as I see you, which I think, at the latest, will be in April or May, at the place—since here nothing can be done for want of a notary public; but if there were a notary public here, I would with all my heart transfer by sale my right to you, like all the rest of the family. Do not think that I would sell to any one else, although the whole world were offered me. * * * Your affectionate nephew, Jose Ignacio Villa." Certainly no one would suspect that the writer of this letter intended to offer to execute merely a mortgage, or that he was driven by necessity and the exactions of a rapacious creditor to assent to an unconscionable bargain. These letters disclose the real nature of the transaction. They dispel all suspicion as to fraud, accident, or mistake, in the execution of the deed. It was intended to operate according to its terms, and from the moment of its execution Jacinto is treated as the owner of the land, with the absolute right to dispose of it. If, as Ramona testifies, it was understood that the family were to be consulted before the sale was concluded, that understanding was fulfilled, for Rafaela was apprised of the offer of the Steeles before the lease was made, and informed of its execution three days after the papers were signed. She makes no objection, either that the signatures of the family were necessary, or to the terms of the contract, except only to that part which provided for her residence on the place for one year. Had they both been aware that Jacinto was fraudulently violating the agreement upon which the deed was made, it is difficult to account for the entire absence of concealment on his part, or of complaints and reproaches on her's. But her conduct and that of the family was as significant as the language of the letters. The Steeles were suffered to take possession without a word of protest, or any intimation of the rights now set up. They were permitted to make the valuable improvements required by the lease, (amounting in value to about $5,000 a year.) Several of the sons entered into their employ, and a lease was finally procured from them for the house and grounds the family were occupying. For more than a year the rights now set up were either concealed or unsuspected. When and by whom they were first suggested, and what was the origin of this litigation appears from Rafaela's letter of November 19, 1867: "I will now tell you what there is in relation to the rancho. Do not be alarmed; there is nothing done yet; and I will inform you of what they wish to do." "The owner of the rancho of Guadalupe came yesterday to make me a proposition. He tells me that if I am willing to give him my signature and those of my children, selling all the rights we have in the rancho of Corral de Piedra to him for a much better price than that which Mr. Steele pays you, paying you all the money you have given for the rancho, and the interest of the money from the time you have loaned money on the rancho. They say I can do this. They have looked at the record of the deed which we gave you, and the lawyer, Van Ness, says that the deed which we made to you is only to secure your money, and not to pay my interest on the money which you had on the mortgage, and that I, having the money, can pay the same and the property remain in my hands. They also say that if this is done you will have no responsibility. They only desire to do so out of consideration for the family. This business is between Cappe, the owner of the Guadalupe, Van Ness and another lawyer. These gentlemen have made me this suggestion that the money which you have given on the rancho is $10,000 or $12,000, and that at the end of the five years of the contract with Messrs. Steele, it is very likely the interest of the money will amount to the $20,000, and then that the family will be left to perish. Recently a gentleman offered Steele $50,000 for the rancho, which he refused to accept, and as time passes these lands increase value on account of the immigration of the people who are to come. This is the reason why they say that for so small a sum Steele will remain with the rancho when you and we might enjoy $40,000 or $50,000, which is what he proposes to pay me,—the said gentleman who desires to buy the rights to the rancho. Mr. Van Ness also says that, according to the contract you have with Steele, the rancho will remain with him in any event. That it will matter little to him whether he fences the rancho or not within the time he has for buying it, and that you have no right to refuse to fulfill the contract, although Steele should refuse to comply with the terms of the same. But in all this they tell me, what can I do? I said that I believe we had no right, and if we had any, to do that which they wish, I have to advise with you in relation thereto; and according to your opinion, if you asked me to do it. Well, and if not, I did not wish to do anything without your approval. All this is under much secrecy, and according to what you think of the same you will answer me whatever it be. Do not think that we will do any unless you should wish it. * * * Your sister, Rafaela Rodriguez." This letter not only shows when and how the idea first entered the mind of Rafaela, that the deed to her brother could be made out to be a mortgage; it also contains the expression of her disbelief in the existence of the rights which were attributed to her. It cannot be said that she was ignorant and illiterate, for her correspondence shows her to have possessed unusual intelligence for a person in her condition. The question was one of fact and not of law, and had she known that the deed was executed merely as a security for the debt due her brother, as she would now have us believe, some allusion to or recognition of that fact must have fallen from her. Certainly she did not then dream of charging her brother with having fraudulently, and contrary to his agreement, disposed of property as his own, which he held only as a security. The overture thus made to Jacinto to unite in a scheme to avoid the fulfillment of his contract with the Steeles, he seems to have declined. From all this testimony, the facts of the case clearly appear.

The deed was executed, not as a mortgage, but in payment of the debt due to Jacinto. It was executed voluntarily, and as the best, if not the only means, of preventing the property from being sold under the hammer, but with the expectation that, if more could be realized for it than was necessary to repay Jacinto, the surplus would be given to the family. But, if additional evidence were wanting to show that the deed was not intended as a mortgage, it will be found in the fact that the previous indebtedness was paid and extinguished.

In Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 218, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall says: "But as a conditional sale, if really intended, is valid, the inquiry in every case must be, whether the contract in the specific case is a security for the repayment of money, or an actual sale. In this, the form of the deed is not in itself conclusive either way. The want of a covenant to repay this money is not complete evidence that a conditional sale was intended, but it is a circumstance of no inconsiderable importance. If the vendee must be restrained to his principal and interest, that principal and interest ought to be secure. It is, therefore, a necessary ingredient in a mortgage that the mortgagee should have a remedy against the person of the debtor. If this remedy really exists, its not being reserved in terms will not affect the case. But it must exist in order to justify a construction which overrules the express words of the instrument." This decision has been followed in numerous other cases. Glover v. Payn, 19 Wend. 521; [Holmes v. Grant,] 8 Paige, 243. See cases collected in 3 [White & T.] Lead. Cas. Eq. 336 et seq. "It necessarily follows," says the learned editor, "that when a conveyance is in satisfaction of a precedent debt, it cannot take effect as a mortgage, although containing a clause for redemption, because the previous debt being extinguished, and no new one created, one of the essential attributes of a mortgage is wanting." And for this he cites numerous authorities.

In the case at bar, the deed, after reciting the note, and other indebtedness in consideration of which it is made, further recites: "And in further consideration that the party of the second part cancel and discharge said note and mortgage herein before referred to, and the parties of the first part from any and all the liabilities, debts, and sums of money hereinbefore mentioned as having been paid or advanced by the party of the second part, the parties of the first part have granted, bargained, sold," etc., etc. The proof shows that the mortgage was cancelled of record on the following day. The note does not seem to have been demanded or surrendered, but all liability upon it was extinguished by the recitals in the deed and the cancellation of the mortgage. It was retained probably in order that, if Jacinto should be called on to fulfill his promise to give to the family any surplus over and above the debt due, he might have the means of establishing its amount. From the date of the deed the debt appears to have been treated by all parties as extinguished. No payment of principal or interest was made or demanded, and no reference to it is contained in the correspondence until the letter of November 19th, 1867, nearly four years afterwards. My conclusion from all the evidence in the case is, that the deed and the testimony of Jacinto disclose the true nature of the transaction, viz., that the land was conveyed not in security for, but in satisfaction and extinguishment of, the precedent debt, but under the expectation founded on Jacinto's assurances that any surplus of the price at which it might be sold, over and above the amount necessary to reimburse Jacinto, would be, by the latter, appropriated to the benefit of the family. Whatever trust, therefore, was created referred to the proceeds. It did not attach itself to the land or in any way impair the right of Jacinto to dispose of it.

In the view I take of the evidence it is not necessary to consider at length the title or right acquired by the Steeles. That they contracted without notice of the alleged equities in the grantors of the complainant, and on the faith of the recorded title, is beyond controversy. The attempt to fix on them a constructive notice, by evidence of loose rumors and conjectures, was wholly unsuccessful. "Vague reports and rumors from strangers," says Story, Circuit Justice, "are not a sufficient foundation on which to charge a purchaser with notice of a title in a third person." Blagg v. Mann, [Case No. 4,847.] In Wilson v. Wall, [6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 91.] says the supreme court: "The question, then, when it is sought to affect a purchaser with constructive notice, is not whether he had the means of obtaining, and might by prudent caution have obtained, the knowledge in question, but whether the not obtaining it was an act of gross or culpable negligence."

As the Steeles, by the contract to sell, merely acquired an equitable right, it was conceded at the argument that they were not within the general rules which protect bona fide purchasers, without notice. It may deserve consideration, however, whether under the recording statutes of this state he who has acquired the right to demand the conveyance of the legal title on the payment of a sum of money, by a contract entered into with the apparent owner, is not entitled to the same protection as he who has actually obtained a deed. The effect of those statutes is not merely to affect all persons with notice of every recorded deed and to avoid as against subsequent incumbrances. They also operate as a designation of a place, to which all the world is invited by law to resort, for complete and reliable record evidence of the titles to estates. Whoever, therefore, voluntarily and with full knowledge of its purport executes a deed, knows that it will necessarily be placed on record, and he authorizes the grantee to proclaim himself, in the most emphatic manner, to the world as possessed of the estate which the deed purports to convey. If, in fact, the real title, or right of ownership, is in the grantor, the latter consents to the proclamation of a falsehood, and the making of a deceptive record; and, as between himself and any person who, on the faith of the recorded title and without notice, has dealt with the apparent owner, it seems most agreeable to justice and the analogies of the law to hold the former bound by the acts of the agent or trustee to whom he has furnished the means of deception. A contract for the sale of land is by the same statutes regarded not merely as a personal contract on the part of the contractor, but as a covenant attached to and running with the land; and, if recorded, it will bind the land, and may be enforced against any subsequent incumbrance. He who has entered upon land under a contract for the conveyance of the title, is popularly considered the real owner as much as if he had obtained a deed and paid the purchase money; and there would seem to be no good reason for refusing the protection which equity would unhesitatingly have afforded him had the transaction assumed the latter form. Nor are his rights fully secured by exacting from the owner of the latent equity a return of whatever of the purchase may have been paid or money expended in betterments. He may have fixed his home upon the land, and it may have acquired for him a pretium affectionis, or it may have risen greatly in value, as in the case at bar, and this increase is the fair and legitimate fruit of his sagacity or his good fortune, to which he is justly entitled. To allow the equitable owner to lie by, and at his will to enforce or avoid the contract, as his interest may dictate, is to give him an unjust advantage to which his own negligence or blind confidence, in suffering a person not the true owner to appear as such upon the records, does not seem to entitle him. It is not necessary, however, to pass upon the point, as, for the reasons already stated, I think the bill must be dismissed.

[NOTE. This decree was reversed by the supreme court in Villa v. Rodriguez, 12 Wall. (79 U. S.) 323. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion, said: "The lessees and their assignees insist that they are bona fide purchasers without notice. This proposition cannot be maintained. * * * The doctrine invoked has no application where the rights of the vendee lie in an executory contract. It applies only where the legal title has been conveyed and the purchase money fully paid. * * * To give validity to such a sale by a mortgagor, it must be shown that the conduct of the mortgagee was, in all things, fair and frank, and that he paid for the property what it was worth. He must hold out no delusive hopes; he must exercise no undue influence; he must take no advantage of the fears or poverty of the other party. Any indirection or obliquity of conduct is fatal to his title. Every doubt will be resolved against him. Where confidential relations and the means of oppression exist, the scrutiny is severer than in cases of a different character. The form of the instruments employed is immaterial. That the mortgagor knowingly surrendered and never intended to reclaim is of no consequence. If there is vice in the transaction, the law, while it will secure to the mortgagee his debt, with interest, will compel him to give back that which he has taken with unclean hands. * * * The terms exacted for the loan by Rodriguez were harsh and oppressive. The condition of the widow and orphans might well have touched his kindred heart with sympathy. It seems only to have whetted his avarice. Two per cent. a month—and this, if not paid as stipulated, to be compounded—was a devouring rate of interest. It was stipulated that the further advances should bear interest at the same rate. He demanded an adjustment when, from the failure of the crops and other causes, the property was greatly depressed, and he knew the widow and her children had no means of payment. The alternatives presented were an absolute conveyance of the property or a foreclosure and sale under the mortgage. He was anxious to procure the deed, and exulted when he got it. The debt and advances, with the interest superadded, were much less than the value of the property. * * * The testimony of Rodriguez alone is sufficient to turn the scale against him. He cannot repudiate the assurances upon which his grantors were drawn in to convey. To permit him to do so would give triumph to iniquity. The facts indisputably established bring the case clearly within those principles by the light of which, in determining the rights of the parties, the judgment of this court must be made up. The complainant stands in the place of those from whom he derives title. He is clothed with their rights, and is entitled to redeem six-sevenths of the premises upon paying that proportion of the mortgage debt and interest. The former must be held to include the amount advanced, as well as that represented by the note, and the latter be settled by the terms of the contract and the law of California."]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1830.

DOWER—DEATH OF HUSBAND NOT SEIZED — DAMAGES FOR NONASSIGNMENT—EQUITY.

If the husband does not die seized, the widow is no more entitled to damages in equity for the nonassignment of her dower than she is at law.

In equity. Bill in equity by the administrator of the widow Frances Alexander, against [Wilson C. Selden et al.] the heirs at law of her husband, [Charles Alexander, Sr.,] for an account of the rents and profits of her dower, from the time of demand until her death. Her husband in his life time had conveyed the lands to his son, Charles Alexander. Mrs. Alexander died in 1823.

Mr. Hewitt, for the plaintiff, cited Curtis v. Curtis, 2 Brown, Ch. 620, and contended that the plaintiff might recover damages in equity, even if she could not at law.

Mr. Taylor, contra. By the statute of Merton, the widow is not entitled to damages unless her husband died seized; but here her husband had in his life time conveyed the estate to his son; so that the husband did not die seized. Co. Litt. 32b; [Anon.,] 3 Dyer, 284a; Embree v. Ellis, 2 Johns. 124; [Humphrey v. Phinney,] Id. 484; Shaw v. White, 13 Johns. 179; Act Va. Dec. 6, 1792; 1 Rev. Code, 1803, p. 170, § 4.

Mr. Hewitt, for complainant, cited Herbert v. Wren, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 370; Mundy v. Mundy, 2 Ves. Jr. 122; 1 Co. Litt. 588, note; and contended, that courts of equity are not confined to the legal right of dower, but may give the same damages from the time of demand of dower where the husband did not die seized as the statute of Merton gives where the husband died seized.

THE COURT was of opinion that damages cannot be given in equity which could not be recovered at law.

ALEXANDER v. TODD et al.

[1 Bond, 175.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1858.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—WHAT CONSTITUTE—CONSIDERATION—POSSESSION.

1. A conveyance of real estate, by a debtor, is clearly fraudulent if, at the time of its execution, no consideration is paid and no security or evidence of indebtedness is taken.

2. Such a conveyance is also impeachable on the ground of the falsity of an admission contained in it, that the whole amount of the consideration had been paid.

3. The presumption of fraud, arising from the non-payment of the consideration and the failure of the vendor to take from the vendee any evidence of indebtedness for the property sold, may be rebutted, if subsequently, and in pursuance of the understanding of the parties at the time the deed was executed, the consideration is paid in good faith.

4. Proof that a full consideration for the property sold was paid, does not decisively negative the presumption of fraud, for the intention of parties, and not the fact of payment, is the test by which the transaction is to be judged.

5. A transfer of property, with an intent to defraud or defeat creditors, will be void, although there may be, in the strictest sense, a valuable and adequate consideration.

6. Where defendants are apprised, by a bill in equity, that a deed executed by them is to be impeached, it is incumbent on them to contradict and explain every fact tending to cast suspicion on it.

7. Possession of land, and receipt of the profits after an absolute conveyance, is evidence of fraud, unless such possession be consistent with the terms and objects of the deed, or the character of it be openly and explicitly understood.

8. It avails nothing that the parties to a sale insist or swear that it was made in good faith, if their declarations are outweighed by the facts and the necessary inference of law.

[In equity. Suit by Robert J. Alexander against Martin L. Todd and Alfred W. Woods to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent. Decree for plaintiff.]

D. Peck, for plaintiff.

G. E. Pugh, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, prosecuted by the plaintiff as the assignee in bankruptcy of the defendant

¹Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Woods, to set aside, as fraudulent and void, a conveyance of real estate by him to the defendant Todd. The allegations of the bill are substantially that in April, 1838, the defendant, Woods, having a title in fee to a tract of nearly forty acres of land, on the Ohio river, in Belmont county, in this state, opposite the lower part of the city of Wheeling, then valued by Woods at twenty-five thousand dollars, and having no other property of any considerable value, and being at the time indebted on his own account and as a surety to the amount of nearly twenty thousand dollars, conveyed the said real estate to the said Todd, his brother-in-law, with the intent to defraud his creditors and evade the payment of his debts. The bill charges that Todd was privy to the fraud, and received the deed really as a trustee for the benefit of Woods, and that no consideration was paid by Todd, and that the possession remained virtually in Woods after the conveyance. The prayer is, that the deed may be set aside as fraudulent, and that Todd shall account for any moneys received by him for any part of said property sold; and that such part as is unsold be now sold and the proceeds paid to the plaintiff, for the benefit of the creditors of Woods. The defendants were not required to answer under oath, but have filed answers, not sworn to, denying the fraudulent purpose alleged in the bill, and asserting that the sale and purchase of the property were in good faith, and that the consideration named in the deed was paid. As the answers are not evidence, it will not be necessary to refer specially to the facts stated in them. The deed, which is impeached as fraudulent, is among the exhibits in the case. It bears date April 28, 1838, and appears to have been executed and acknowledged according to the requirements of law; and was left for record in the office of the recorder of Belmont county, by the grantee, on the day of its execution. It purports, in consideration of twenty-five thousand dollars, paid by Todd, to convey to him in fee the tract described, together with all the ferry rights and privileges pertaining to it. It is not signed by Mrs. Woods, the wife of the grantor; but it appears that, some time after its date, she released her right of dower.

The only evidence which relates directly to the execution of the deed is before the court in the deposition of the defendant Woods, who, by his own consent and the consent of the counsel for the plaintiff, has been examined as a witness. He is therefore a competent witness, and entitled to credit, so far as his testimony is not contradicted or weakened and rebutted by the probabilities of the case. He states that the sale and purchase of the real estate had been a subject of conversation between him and Todd for some time prior to the execution of the deed, but no written agreement had been signed, and the terms of the sale do not appear to have been specifically settled. He also states that he lived on the property at the date of the deed and had occupied it for many years before, and that Todd resided about a mile from it. On April 28, 1838, the parties went to the town of St. Clairsville, the county seat of Belmont county, distant about twelve miles from their homes, where they procured an attorney to write the deed, which was signed, acknowledged, and put on record as before noticed. No money was paid at that time, nor was any note or other writing given by Todd, evidencing his liability to pay the consideration named in the deed or any other sum. Woods says, in his deposition, that there was a verbal understanding that the purchase money was to be paid as he might require it in his business, except sixteen hundred dollars, the payment of which was to be deferred until it could be made from the sale of the property conveyed by the deed. He also testifies, and it is otherwise proved, that in the summer of 1838, some twenty acres of the tract was laid off in town lots and called West Wheeling, a plat of which was made and entered of record in Todd's name. No part of the money, according to the evidence of Woods, was paid to him until August 8, 1839, when he received from Todd twenty-three thousand four hundred dollars. As something will be said hereafter concerning this payment, it will not be noticed further in this place.

Before proceeding with this investigation, the inquiry is suggested, whether from the facts connected with the execution of this deed, apart from the alleged payment at a subsequent day, such indications of fraud are found as will invalidate it. Thus considered, it is clearly a mere voluntary conveyance, and void as impairing the rights of creditors. It is too clear to admit of doubt, that Woods was not in a position to make a legal transfer of this property for any other purpose than the benefit of his creditors. His debts at that time exceeded fifteen thousand dollars, and he possessed no property of any value except the real estate conveyed to Todd. If, therefore, the evidence fails to establish the fact of a bona fide payment of the consideration money, the deed is void as a fraudulent conveyance to the injury of creditors. But, without further remarks on this view of the case, I will notice some of the facts in relation to the transaction in question which justify a strong suspicion, if not the positive conclusion, that it is infected with fraud. There are circumstances in proof, relating to the conveyance in question, which are hardly accordant with an honest purpose in these parties. Without noticing all the facts inducing the suspicion of fraud, there is one, so marked in its character and so widely variant from the usage of the country in such cases, as to be significant, if not conclusive. It will be readily seen that the amount involved in this transaction, especially in reference to these parties and the time it occurred, may well be regarded as large; and, on the supposition that the sale was a real one, and free from any taint of a fraudulent intent, would have induced great caution and vigilance in its consummation. But the remarkable fact appears, that although the sale had often been a subject of conversation prior to the execution of the deed, and the terms had been, to some extent, settled between the parties, nothing had been put in writing respecting it. It is, however, still more remarkable, and wholly without explanation, that Woods executed the deed containing an acknowledgment, in the most solemn form, that the entire sum of twenty-five thousand dollars had been paid by Todd, when in fact no part of it had been paid, or any promise or security given that it would be paid. It seems incredible, that any man of sane intellect, intending to make a bona fide sale of real estate of large value, should neglect to take even the written acknowledgment of the party, in the form of a promissory note or otherwise, as evidence of the indebtedness. It is usual, in such cases, for the purchaser either to give the vendor a note with undoubted personal security, or a mortgage, to assure the payment of the purchase money. In this case, on the theory that the payment was made, nearly sixteen months elapsed from the date of the deed, during which time Woods was in possession of no evidence of Todd's liability to pay. The payment, therefore, if made, was wholly voluntary on his part, and without any pretense that interest on the amount was either demanded or paid. In the case of Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch. 283, the learned Chancellor Kent held that a conveyance was impeachable for fraud, where the consideration was large, on the ground that the vendor had taken the promissory notes of the vendee payable on time, without security. After stating that for the remainder of the consideration, amounting to $221,793, notes were taken, payable in one, two, three, four, and five years, the chancellor remarks, "that the whole of this immense debt, created by the sale of the real estate at its fair value, was thus left to rest on the personal promise of H. F., without any other security, real or personal." It is true, in the case referred to, there were other indications of fraud, but great stress was laid by the chancellor on the fact above stated. He remarks: "It is contrary to the ordinary course of dealing, and repugnant to the maxims of common prudence to alienate such an immense real estate without payment or security."

The conveyance from Woods to Todd was clearly fraudulent at the time of its execution, for the reason that no consideration was paid, and no security—not even the promissory note of the purchaser—was taken. It is also impeachable on the ground of the falsity of the admission contained in it, that the whole amount of the consideration had been paid. In the case of Watt v. Grove, 2 Schoales & L. 501, the lord chancellor says, that "solemn instruments, duly executed, are prima facie conclusive on the parties. Where they state truly the transactions on which they are founded, they are binding in equity as well as at law, if the consideration stated is sufficient for the purpose. But, if it appears that transactions are not truly stated, the instruments may lose all their binding quality in equity, even if conclusive at law." But it is insisted, by the counsel for the defendants, that the consideration stated in the deed, though not paid or secured at the time of its execution, was paid some fifteen months after; and that, conceding the instrument to have been void at its inception, the subsequent payment purged from all taint of fraud. It is a grave question, perhaps, whether a transaction clearly fraudulent in law, at the time it took place, can be relieved from the imputation by any subsequent act. It is not proposed to consider this question in its application to this case. It is, however, proper to remark that the presumption of fraud arising from the non-payment of the consideration, and the failure of the vendor to take from the vendee any evidence of indebtedness for the property sold, may be rebutted, if subsequently, and in pursuance of the understanding of the parties at the time the deed was executed, the consideration is paid in good faith. It is, therefore, a proper subject of inquiry, in this case, whether the payment was made, as asserted by the defendants. But, before considering this question, it is proper to remark, that proof that a full consideration for the property sold was paid does not decisively negative the presumption of fraud. The intention of the parties, and not the fact of payment, is the test by which the transaction is to be judged. Judge Story has clearly stated the law on this subject. He says, the consideration must be valuable, and must also be bona fide; and that if there is an "intent to defraud or defeat creditors, it will be void, although there may, in the strictest sense, be a valuable, nay, an adequate consideration." And he remarks further, that "cases have repeatedly been decided, in which persons have given a full and fair price for goods, and where the possession has been actually changed; yet, being done for the purpose of defeating creditors, the transaction has been held fraudulent, and therefore set aside. Thus where a person, with knowledge of a decree against the defendant, bought the house and goods belonging to him, and gave a full price for them, the court said, that the purchase, being with the manifest view to defeat the creditor, was fraudulent, and, notwithstanding the valuable consideration, void." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 369.

But was the consideration stated in the deed paid by the defendant Todd? The evidence on this point is that contained in the depositions of the defendant Woods, his brother Andrew Woods, and Richard Miller. A proposition, it would seem, was made by the plaintiff that the defendant Todd should be examined as to the payment, but it was declined, and his statement is not before the court, except as it is contained in his answer, not verified by oath. The defendant Woods swears positively that twenty-three thousand four hundred dollars was paid to him by Todd, in August, 1839, in bank-notes, in the presence of his brother Andrew. Andrew Woods testifies that he was present, and assisted in counting the notes; and that the amount was as above stated. The witness Miller says he was in the room, and saw a large pile of bank-notes on the table, but does not know the amount. If these witnesses are entitled to credit, the fact of the transfer of bank-notes by Todd to Woods, amounting to $23,400, is proved. But, the question still remains, was this a bona fide payment of the consideration expressed in the deed? Without referring to the mass of evidence bearing on this point, I can only notice some of the more material facts sustaining the conclusion that this payment was not made in good faith, but was a device intended to give an appearance of fairness to the sale, when, in fact, it was the intention of the parties to place the property beyond the reach of the creditors of Woods.

1. There can be no question as to the fact that Andrew Woods was largely indebted in April, 1838, when the deed was executed. It does not change the legal aspect of the subject, that the larger part of his indebtedment was as surety for other persons. Nearly all these debts were due to banks, for which all the parties were held as principal debtors, with warrants of attorney to enter up judgments at their maturity. The defendant, therefore, was liable to judgment and to execution for these debts at the date of the execution of the deed. And it is not controverted that if the persons for whom he was surety were not then insolvent, they were known to be so shortly after.

2. It is a significant fact that, although the sum alleged to have been paid by Todd to Woods was large, no evidence is offered to prove from whom, or in what manner, Todd obtained it. The defendant Woods and his brother Andrew Woods say, in their depositions, they do not know where he procured this money. Nor does Todd, in his answer, give any information on this point. There is evidence that for many years prior to his removal to Ohio, in the year 1832, he had been a physician at Wheeling, and, in connection with his profession, was also interested in a drug store in that city. It is the opinion of the witnesses who have testified as to this point that his business was lucrative; and it appears that he was the owner of real estate in Wheeling of considerable value. But, as negating the fact of his having in his possession nearly twenty-four thousand dollars in August, 1839, it is in evidence that he disposed of no real estate about that time, and that he had no deposits, to any considerable amount, in any of the banks at Wheeling, or that vicinity. And there is also evidence, in regard to some of his pecuniary transactions, showing that his cash means were quite limited. Now, as, upon the theory on which the defendants attempt to sustain the deed in question, it was obviously important to prove, not only the payment of the consideration, but that the purchase by Todd was free from all imputation of fraud, or covinous purpose, their failure to adduce any proof as to the source whence the large sum in question was obtained, may well excite suspicion as to the character of this transaction. And this suspicion is certainly in no degree weakened by the omission of the defendant Todd to state the facts, which were within his knowledge, relating to this point. The defendants were apprised by the bill that the deed was to be impeached; and it was incumbent on them to contradict or explain every fact tending to cast suspicion on it.

3. In addition to the facts that no note or other writing was given when the deed was executed, as evidence that the consideration money was due, and that for more than fifteen months the business remained in this uncertain and perilous position, the still more extraordinary fact is developed that when the money was paid no receipt or other written evidence of payment was required by Todd, or given by Woods. In a transaction of so much importance to these parties, it is almost incredible that they should be content to leave it resting in the knowledge or memory of a single witness.

4. In the next place, the conclusion is irresistible from the evidence before the court, that no satisfactory account is given of the application of the money alleged to have been paid by Todd to Woods. After a rigid examination, the statements of Woods in his depositions are, in some particulars, vague and unsatisfactory, and as to others, in direct conflict with the reliable evidence of other witnesses. I do not propose to notice the evidence at length on these points. It is remarkable, however, that Woods produces no book or voucher showing the payment of a dollar of the funds received from Todd in extinguishment of his debts. He states that he paid to different persons, to whom he was indebted, some thirteen thousand dollars, and that he lost largely by investments in steamboats. The accuracy of these statements is seriously impugned by the evidence of other witnesses, proving that at least two debts of considerable amounts were paid prior to August 8, 1839, and could not, therefore, have been paid out of the funds received from Todd.

5. There is still another view of this transaction which, in my judgment, exhibits its real character in a light that clears it of all doubt, and forces on the mind the conclusion that it is infected with legal, if not actual fraud. I refer to the fact established by the proofs that there was no real change of possession after the alleged sale to Todd. Chancellor Kent, in the case of Hildreth v. Sands, before referred to, says that "possession of land, and taking the profits after an absolute conveyance, is evidence of fraud within the statute of frauds, unless such possession is consistent with the terms and object of the deed, or the character of it be openly and explicitly understood." 2 Johns. Ch. 46. There is no pretense that the deed to Todd contains any reservation of the right of possession in Woods. Nor is there any evidence conducing to prove, in any legal sense, that Woods was the agent of Todd, and retained the possession and exercised acts of ownership in that character. Several of the persons who purchased lots after the town was laid out state that they were not aware of any conveyance to Todd, and supposed the title was in Woods until they received their deeds from Todd. It is true, that in some instances Woods professed to act as Todd's agent in the sale of lots, and after receiving payment procured the deeds to be made in his name. Woods received in cash and otherwise more than four thousand dollars for lots thus sold, and there is no evidence that he ever paid this sum, or in any way accounted for it to Todd. In one case it appears that as late as the year 1842, subsequent to the discharge of Woods under the bankrupt law, he received pay in part for a lot sold in work on a ferry-boat. And it is also proved that he offered to pay a debt due from him by the sale of a lot in the town, and with this view procured Todd to execute a deed to his creditor. There is one fact bearing on the question of Woods' possession after his conveyance to Todd that seems to be conclusive. It has been already noticed that some months after the date of this conveyance, some twenty acres of the land described in it were laid off in town lots, leaving about seventeen acres not included in the town plat. This part of the tract was mostly a hill-side, in which there was a valuable coal-bank that had been worked for many years before the conveyance to Todd. On this seventeen-acre tract was situated a dwelling house, in which Woods had long resided, and where, without any change and without any lease from Todd, he continued to reside, and perhaps yet resides. It also appears that the ferry, which was an appendage of the property, has been ever since carried on by Woods, the license therefor always being in his name. It is also in proof that he has continued to take coal from the coal-bank for the use of his ferry-boat, and that he has also sold large quantities of coal taken from that bank. It is true the defendant Woods says in his deposition that he agreed to pay Todd three hundred dollars a year for the ferry and for the coal required for the use of the ferry-boat; and was also to account at a price agreed on for the coal sold by him. No written agreement to this effect is exhibited; nor is there any evidence of any agreement by parol or otherwise, except what is contained in the deposition of Woods. It is obvious from the position he occupies in reference to this case, that his testimony must be received with great caution. He testifies under the influence of a strong desire to sustain the fairness of this transaction, and thus vindicate his character from the imputation of fraud. In reference to facts of such materiality as those now under consideration, it is most reasonable to require that his testimony should in some way receive confirmation. If he was bona fide the tenant of Todd, and in that character retained the possession and use of the dwelling house, the ferry, and the coal-bank, it may be well asked why some proof of the fact beyond his own statement is not adduced? It is strange, indeed, that this arrangement should be allowed to continue for many years without some note or memorandum in writing of its existence. There is not only the absence of such proof, but the statements of Woods as to his being bona fide the tenant of Todd, are strongly impeached by facts drawn from him in the progress of his examination. Although he states that he settled with Todd for the rent of the ferry and the use of the coal-bank, he admits that he kept no account in any form of their dealings, and does not exhibit any book or voucher showing the payment of anything to Todd on account of rent. He also states that he does not know that Todd kept any book showing the state of their accounts. It would certainly require a great stretch of credulity to believe that if the relation of landlord and tenant existed between these parties in good faith, there would be such looseness and carelessness in the transaction of their business. And I can not resist the conclusion that in reference to the dwelling house, the ferry, and the coal-bank, the possession remained unchanged in Woods after the conveyance to Todd; and that he enjoyed all the benefits and advantages of that part of the tract not included in the town plat, on which was situated the dwelling house with its appendages, as also the coal-bank, as fully as before the alleged sale to Todd. This remark would seem also to apply to the ferry and the privileges connected with it. It is also worthy of notice, as an indication of the real character of this transaction, that while it is alleged in the answers of both the defendants that it was verbally agreed that Woods should act as the agent of Todd in the sale of lots, and while Woods stated in his deposition that such was the agreement, and that he sold lots and received payment as an agent, there is no satisfactory evidence that any accounts were kept between them showing the existence of the relation of principal and agent. Woods states distinctly that he kept no account of sales made or moneys received, and that he does not know that Todd had any books or papers showing these facts. The omission to do this, and the vague and unsatisfactory statements as to the settlements between these parties, involving large amounts of money, are certainly indications of the real character of the conveyance to Todd. Men of ordinary intelligence and prudence do not conduct their business in this loose manner. The instincts of self-interest usually induce all men, in their business transactions, to make full and exact entries of moneys received or paid. And the mind is forced to the conclusion, in the absence of any proof that this was done, as between a principal and agent, that the parties did not recognize the existence of the relation. In this case, there is no book, voucher, or paper of any kind showing any receipts of moneys by Woods as the agent of Todd, or any payments to the latter in that capacity. This is not accounted for by the lapse of time since these alleged transactions took place. The deposition of Woods was taken within less than ten years from the date of their occurrence; and it is not reasonable to suppose that within that period the written evidence of what passed between the parties could have been lost or destroyed. There is no pretense in this case of such loss or destruction.

Without further remarks or comments, I am obliged to say, that looking to the conduct of these parties from the first to the last of their transactions, it seems irreconcilable with the supposition that the transfer of the property in question was made in good faith. I cannot doubt that it was a mere device to put the property of Woods beyond the reach of his creditors; and viewed in this light, it has the infection of legal fraud. That both the parties are implicated in it seems hardly to admit of doubt. It is indeed insisted that there is no proof that the defendant Todd had any knowledge of the embarrassment of Woods at the time of the execution of the deed. There is no such direct evidence; but can it be doubted, considering that the parties were brothers-in-law, living near to each other, and were on terms of intimacy and friendship, that he had such knowledge? Todd was then an aged man and in infirm health; and it is altogether improbable that he would have purchased this property under such circumstances at a price greatly beyond its real value, with the purpose of laying off a town and making profit by the sale of town lots. While it is quite conceivable that he may have been influenced by a benevolent desire to shield his brother-in-law from impending pecuniary ruin, and for this object was willing to place himself in the position of a purchaser of the property, yet, in a legal aspect, he was a mere trustee for the creditors of Woods. And it avails nothing that these parties insist or swear that the sale was in good faith. In the case of Hendricks v. Robinson, before cited, Chancellor Kent remarks: "It is indeed true, that the purchaser and the vendors say that this was an honest and bona fide sale, but do not the facts, which they all admit, outweigh the declaration? And can a mere assertion be compared to the unequivocal language of facts and the necessary inference of law?" It results from these views that a decree must be entered for the plaintiff. It must declare the conveyance from Woods to Todd fraudulent and void; but as it is admitted by the plaintiff's counsel that those who have purchased lots in the town are purchasers for a valuable consideration and without notice of any fraud in the sale to Todd, their rights are not to be affected by the decree. The decree must also direct that the unsold portion of the tract be sold for the benefit of the creditors of Woods. And so far as Todd has received moneys for the sale of lots or the rent of the dwelling house, coal-bank, and ferry, he must be held to account for the same. This will involve the necessity of a reference to a master, who will be authorized to examine the defendant Todd on oath and report to this court.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1802.

LANDLORD AND TENANT — DISTRESS FOR RENT — PAYMENT BY ACCEPTED BILL.

An acceptance by the tenant of a bill drawn by the landlord for the rent is no bar to a distress, if the bill be not paid.

At law. Replevin [by Alexander against Turner, as bailiff of Patten.] Cognizance, as bailiff, for rent arrear. Plea, "No rent arrear," and issue.

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiff, moved for leave to withdraw the plea of "No rent arrear," and file a new plea setting forth that Patten had drawn an order on the plaintiff, for three quarters' rent, which the plaintiff had accepted to pay; and that, as to the fourth quarter's rent, he tendered it before the distress was made.

THE COURT refused the motion. The cause was then tried on the issue joined, and the court instructed the jury that the acceptance did not destroy the debt due for the rent, and that it was no bar unless it had been paid.

CHOATE, District Judge. Exceptions to the report of a commissioner on the amount of the damages sustained by the libellants in a case of collision. One of the items allowed is demurrage, or an allowance for the loss of the use of the libellants' vessel while being repaired. It was agreed between the parties that the fair rate of demurrage was sixty dollars per day, making this item $1,- ²Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Reni. L. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

920. The libellants claimed interest on this item, which was refused by the commissioner, to which refusal the libellants except. It seems to me that the libellants are entitled to interest on this item from the date of the commencement of the suit. The item itself is allowed because it is a loss directly caused by the collision, and sustained by the libellants. That loss had been sustained prior to the commencement of the suit. They have been kept out of it since that time by the defense interposed in the suit. Their indemnity obviously will not be complete unless interest is allowed. The case comes within the principle of the case of The America, [Case No. 285.] In the case of Mailler v. Express, etc., Line, 61 N. Y. 316,³ it was expressly ruled by the New York court of appeals that interest should be allowed on an item of damages of this character. It seems to have been once the rule of the common law that interest will not be allowed on an unliquidated claim for damages, even in cases sounding in the contract, but this rule has been greatly modified. In the case of Foster v. Goddard, [Case No. 4,969,] tried in the circuit court of the United States in this district, before Judge Blatchford and a jury, the case being assumpsit for services of a mercantile agent on a quantum meruit, the jury were instructed that having found the value of the service, they should add interest from the commencement of the suit. The case went to the supreme court, and the judgment was affirmed. This ruling seems not to have been questioned there. Goddard v. Foster, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 123. The disallowance of interest in the present case is said to be in accordance with the practice in this court; but I am referred to no case where the court has actually passed upon the question. Damages in collision cases in the courts of admiralty are, in general, to be estimated "in the same manner as in other suits of like nature for injuries to personal property." The Baltimore, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 385.⁴ It cannot be claimed, therefore, that the disallowance of this claim for interest can rest on any principle as to computing damages peculiar to this court as a court of admiralty. This exception is therefore allowed. The commissioner rightly held the claim for damages, by reason of the prolongation of the subsequent voyage, too remote and speculative to be allowed. He also correctly held upon the testimony that the sum allowed for the care and custody of the cargo was a reasonable compensation therefor. So, also, he properly disallowed the claim for interest on the cargo during its detention. Full damages were allowed for the injury to the cargo with interest. Libellants' 1st exception sustained, [Facts Found by the Court.*

[(1) At about five o'clock in the morning of the 19th of May, 1876, the barkentine C. L. Pearson, owned by the libelants, and laden with a full cargo, started on a voyage from New York to Japan. She was of 664 tons burthen, and her length over all was 165 feet. Her draft was about sixteen feet. A tug took her below the Narrows. The pilot left her about 9:30 in the forenoon after she got out into the open sea. The wind was light from the westward, but so long as she had the ebb tide with her she made a little headway. About 1 P. M. the captain, observing that she was drifting with the flood tide, which had then made, and that the wind had all died out, let go his kedge anchor, and, paying out forty or fifty fathoms of lawser, lay at anchor waiting for wind. Some of the sails remained set, but hanging loose against the masts, and the yards were properly braced. She lay with her head out to sea, and against the tide, which was running to the northward and westward. Her position was a very little to the southward and eastward of the fairway buoy in Gedney's channel, which is a little to the southward of the middle of the channel, and in the deepest water. The channel is about 1,200 feet wide, and the water where the vessel lay was more than 21 feet deep at mean low tide. The day was clear, and the vessel was distinctly visible many miles away in every direction. The weight of the kedge was not far from four hundred pounds. It was sufficient to hold the vessel in position as the wind and tide then were.

[(2) A little before four o'clock in the afternoon, a light breeze sprang up from the southwest, and the captain set about getting under way again. For this purpose he properly trimmed the sails that were set, and began heaving on the anchor. The tide was the last quarter of the flood, and still setting pretty strong to the northward and westward. Soon after they commenced heaving on the anchor, and when they had got twelve or fifteen fathoms of the hawser inboard, the barkentine was struck by the steamship Alexandria in her stern, a little to the starboard of the stern port, and cut into about eleven feet, and down to the water's edge, a line but slightly angling across the keel to port.

[(3) The Alexandria was a steamship of 1,623 tons burthen, about three hundred feet long, and drawing 21 ft. 6 in. She left New York at ten minutes past two that afternoon, with a full cargo, bound for Glasgow. She had a pilot on board, who continued in charge of her navigation until after the collision. The captain and pilot were on the bridge, and the second mate near by, where he could pass the orders from the bridge to the wheel. There was no lookout specially assigned to duty, but the first mate was on the fore-castle, so situated that he could look out, though he was also engaged looking after his watch, who were at the time employed in cleaning up and getting the ship ready for sea. Just before the ship turned the tail of the Roemer, so as to pass from the Swash into Gedney's channel, the captain discovered the barkentine apparently at anchor. He gave her no special attention at the time, and did not speak to the pilot about her. The vessels were then about a mile apart, and the steamer going at her usual speed of about ten knots an hour. After getting out of the Swash channel, the ship was put on a course of east by north, and this brought the barkentine a little off her starboard bow, and about three quarters of a mile away. The captain and pilot then saw the barkentine, and judged she was a little to the southward of the buoy. It is usual in going out through Gedney's channel to pass as near as is consistent with safety to the buoy. The course taken was intended to carry the ship somewhat to the northward of the buoy and of the barkentine. When the vessels were about half a mile apart the captain observed the barkentine drawing a little ahead, and her bow falling off somewhat to the eastward. No attention was paid to this movement, but when the vessels were only a quarter of a mile or thereabouts apart, and when the barkentine appeared to be drifting to the northward and westward, the helm was starboarded, still with the intention of passing her to the north. A little later, when the barkentine seemed to be drifting further across the bow of the steamer, the wheel was put hard to starboard, and the engine stopped and backed. When this last movement was made the vessels were not more than five hundred feet apart, and the collision could not in that way be avoided. The steamer could not have been stopped in going less than nine hundred feet.

[(4) Had the wheel been ported, instead of starboarded, when the change in the position of the barkentine was first discovered, or had the engine been stopped until the actual movement of the barkentine was ascertained, the collision would not have occurred.]

for this collision. It happened in broad daylight, when there was no wind, and nothing to prevent her keeping out of the way, as it was her duty to do, if those in charge of her navigation had acted with ordinary prudence and foresight. The fact that the barkentine was lying at anchor in such a place, with her sails set, was evidence to the mind of a skilful navigator that she was waiting for the wind, and would be likely to get under way as soon as she could. The tide was running to the northward and westward, so as to carry the drift in that direction. The wind also, which met the steamer just before she came out of the Swash channel, was from the southwest. Under these circumstances any one at all acquainted with navigation ought to have known that, when the barkentine did attempt to get under way, she would almost necessarily drift somewhat in the direction of the wind and tide before her sails could draw so as to take her ahead. When, therefore, the captain of the steamer, half a mile away, saw the barkentine first heaving ahead, then swinging her bow off to the northward, and finally drifting bodily somewhat in the same direction, he ought to have known she was getting under way, and governed himself accordingly. Had he, when he first discovered that the vessel was in motion, ported his wheel, stopped his engine, or even slackened his speed, there probably would have been no collision. Instead of that, he starboarded, and kept on at full speed, until it was impossible to keep the vessels from coming together. It needs no argument to show that this was the very worst thing that could have been done, if, as the captain of the steamer says, the barkentine was drifting rapidly to the northward and crossing his bows. In this, however, I think he is mistaken, and that the collision actually occurred by reason of an attempt on the part of the steamer, when she set her course originally, to pass too near. Undoubtedly the barkentine drifted somewhat to the northward, but it could not have been far. Between the time the captain first discovered her in motion and the collision was not to exceed three minutes. The steamer, going at ten knots an hour, only went half a mile. The drawing ahead which was first seen undoubtedly began with the heaving on the anchor. As soon as the hawser shortened, so as to weaken the hold of the anchor, the drift may have commenced under the combined action of the wind and tide, but the movement could not have been very great, for so long as the anchor was on the ground, while it might not keep the vessel in place, it would to a greater or less extent retard her progress. That it was on the ground is shown by the fact that the hawser was cut when the steamer took the barkentine in tow. Under such circumstances the drifting of the vessel ought not to have embarrassed the steamer, and it is clear to my mind that the collision was caused alone by her unskillful and careless navigation. The kedge anchor, though light, was sufficient to hold the barkentine in place with the wind and tide as they were. It was, therefore, not a fault to put that out instead of a heavier one. It was only when they commenced heaving the anchor in, that the drift commenced, and that ought to have been allowed for by the steamer when she made her calculations for passing. There was plenty of room on both sides, and a prudent navigator would have gone far enough away to have avoided all chances of danger by any movement of the vessel while getting under way.

No objection is made here to the amount of the decree in the district court. That, therefore, may be taken as the basis of the decree here, adding interest from the date of that decree only on the amount of the damages, exclusive of the interest allowed below. A decree may be prepared for the libelants.]¹

ALEXANDRIA v. BOWNE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1803.

PLEADING—ISSUE—INFORMALITY.

If in an action of debt upon a bond with collateral condition, the entry of the pleadings be "covenants performed," "joined," the court will send the cause back to the rules as not being at issue.

At law. Debt on auctioneer's bond, for the penalty of $10,000, with a profert. On the back of the declaration is an indorsement in these words: "The plaintiff assigns for breach of the condition of the said bond in the declaration mentioned, this, to wit, that the said M. F. Bowne," &c., "have failed to pay to a certain Thomas Patton, the administrator of S. Wallace, deceased, £15. 9s. 8d. due and owing from them as vendue masters to the said Thomas Patton, as administrator as aforesaid, for the sales at vendue, of certain goods, wares, &c., deposited with the said Bowne, &c., in the year 1795, by the said S. Wallace, deceased, and by them sold at vendue as aforesaid." "Declaration filed April, 1802—May, rule plea—June, oyer of the bond and covenants performed, joined." The plea is not filed, but only noted on the minutes. There was no replication.

THE COURT sent the cause back to the rules after striking out the entry of issue joined.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1808.

EVIDENCE—WITNESS—COMPETENCY—PLEADING.

1. Citizens of Alexandria are not competent jurors in an action of debt for the penalty of a by-law of the corporation, but are competent witnesses.

[Followed in Pomery v. Slacum, Case No. 11,262.]

2. A by-law, approved on the 27th of March, will not support an averment of a by-law passed on the 26th.

At law. Debt for the penalty of a by-law of the corporation of Alexandria, against burning oyster-shells on a brickkiln, without a license.

Mr. E. J. Lee, for defendant, objected to the jurors, because they were citizens of Alexandria, and the penalty enured to the benefit of the corporation; and cited Hanson v. Peircy, 1 Morgan, Essays, 280; Rex v. Carpenter, 2 Show. 47; City of London v. Unfree Merchants, Id. 146; 3 Bac. Abr. 252, tit. "Jurors E;"; Co. Litt. 154, 156, 157, 158a; Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Saund. 344.

Mr. Swann, contra, observed that in the case from Morgan's Essays, the litigation was between the corporation and a stranger, but here it is between the town and one of its citizens.

THE COURT overruled the objection, and also an objection by the defendant to the admission of J. Mandeville, a citizen of Alexandria, as a witness for the plaintiffs. 1 Lofft's Gilb. Ev. 240; Rex v. Mayor, etc., of London, 2 Lev. 231; Bull. N. P. 290; Trials per Pais, 385.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court, upon the competency of George Deneale and Joseph Mandeville, two of the citizens of Alexandria, as witnesses for the plaintiffs.

THE COURT, upon consideration, granted a venire facias de novo, upon the ground of the incompetency of citizens of the town as jurors; but were of opinion that they were competent as witnesses.

THE COURT also (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to suffer a by-law, approved by the mayor of Alexandria on the 27th of March, to go in evidence to support the averment of a by-law passed on the 26th, which was the day on which it was passed by the common council.

INSTRUCTIONS—MATTER IN ISSUE.

When the issue is joined upon a matter of law, the court will not, at the prayer of either party, instruct the jury upon the matter of law submitted to the jury by the pleadings.

At law. Debt for the penalty of two hundred dollars under a by-law against burning oyster-shells in Alexandria.

The defendant pleaded that the penalty of the by-law was not a reasonable penalty, upon which the plaintiff took issue.

Upon this issue the plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury that if they should be satisfied that in the year 1803 (the year the by-law was passed) the yellow fever prevailed in the town, and was generally supposed to have been caused by burning oyster-shells, then the penalty was reasonable.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to give any instruction to the jury upon the subject, the parties having by their pleadings put the reasonableness of the penalty in issue to the jury. If the party offers an issue as to matter of law, the other party may demur; if he joins issue, he cannot afterwards submit the matter of law to the court.

The surety in an official bond, conditioned that the principal shall faithfully execute the duties of his office, is not liable for the honest error, in judgment or want of skill, of the principal. But gross negligence is want of fidelity.

At law. Debt, against the surety of one Talbot, an inspector of fish, upon his official bond faithfully to execute the duties of the office.

Mr. Mason, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury that the defendant was not liable upon this bond, for honest error in judgment, or want of skill; and cited [President, etc., of Union Bank v. Clossey,] 10 Johns. 271.

THE COURT, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) at the prayer of the defendant's

But the court, at the prayer of the plaintiff's counsel, further instructed the jury, that if the inspector was guilty of gross negligence in examining the fish, he did not faithfully execute the duties of his office in that respect.

1. It is not necessary that an order of the common council for the pavement of any particular street should be passed as a by-law and submitted to the mayor for his approbation.

2. Upon a motion for judgment against a proprietor of lots, liable for the expense of paving the street opposite the lots, the court will not receive evidence that the pavement was badly done.

This was a motion by Mr. Taylor, attorney for the common council of Alexandria, for judgment against Joseph Mandeville, for his proportion of the expense of paving Pitt street, between Cameon and Queen streets, the recovery of which, by motion, is authorized by the amended charter of the 25th of February, 1804, § 11, (2 Stat. 255.)

By the by-law of the 7th of September, 1802, the proprietor of a lot is liable to a tax of $1.32, on every front foot of his lot on a street sixty-six feet wide, which should thereafter be ordered by the counsel to be paved. The street in question had been ordered to be paved, the tax had been demanded, and payment refused, and due notice given of the present motion.

Mr. Swann, for defendant, offered to prove that the order for the paving of Pitt street, between Cameron and Queen streets, was not passed as a by-law after three readings, agreeably to the rules adopted by the common council.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to permit such evidence to be given, deeming it irrelevant and immaterial.

He also offered evidence that the pavement was badly done. But the court rejected the evidence; and in the case of Common Council v. Swann, [Case No. 3,066,] at the same term, decided (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) that it was only competent for the defendant to show that the contract made by the common council for the pavement was not fairly made, or fraudulent, or not with good faith.

At law. Debt on an auctioneer's bond; plea, general performance; special replication, that Moore, the auctioneer, had not paid money to Archer and to Vowell, which he had received as auctioneer.

At the first term after office-judgment, and to set it aside, Mr. C. Simms, for defendant, Patten, (one of the sureties,) offered a rejoinder that Archer and Vowell respectively had not proved, by a suit and judgment, that the money was due from Moore to them.

Mr. E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, objected that it is not pleading to issue within the meaning of the act of Virginia, 12th December, 1792, § 28, p. 78, and that it will drive him to a special demurrer.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) admitted the replication, because it was an issuable plea, and if bad it is bad on general demurrer.

TAXES—LIABILITY OF LOTS IN ALEXANDRIA.

The lots lying west of West street, in Alexandria, are liable to be taxed like other lots in the town.

This was a motion for judgment for taxes on a range of lots lying on the west side of West street, in Alexandria. The question was whether the jurisdiction of the corporation extended over those lots.

The act of assembly of Virginia of the 10th of December, 1796, recites that, "Whereas several additions of lots, contiguous to the town of Alexandria, have been laid off by the proprietors of the land in lots of half an acre each, extending to the north, to a range of lots on the north side of a street called Montgomery; upon the south to the line of the District of Columbia; upon the west to a range of lots on the west side of West street, and on the east to the river Potomac; that many of the lots in these additions have already been built upon, and many more will soon be improved:—And whereas it has been represented to the general assembly that the inhabitants residing on the said lots are not subject to the regulations made and established for the orderly government of the town, and for the preservation of the health of the inhabitants by the prevention and removal of nuisances, upon which their prosperity and well-being does very much depend;—Section 1. Be it therefore enacted, that each and every lot and part of a lot within the aforesaid limits on which at this time is built a dwelling-house of at least sixteen feet square, or equal thereto in size, with a brick or stone chimney, and that each and every lot within said limits which shall hereafter be built upon, shall be incorporated with the said town of Alexandria, and be considered as part thereof." The 2d section provides for the removal of nuisances from any lots, within those limits, which were not incorporated within the town; and by a subsequent act the unimproved lots within the same limits are "incorporated with," and to be "considered as a part of, the said town of Alexandria, and subject to the same regulations as the other parts thereof."

E. J. Lee, for defendant, contended, that the lots were to be considered as contiguous to the town, not in the town; and that they were subject only to the regulations respecting nuisances, and not liable to taxes.

THE COURT, however, (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent,) was of opinion that the jurisdiction extended over the range of lots west of West street; and that, by the acts of Virginia, those lots were incorporated with, "and to be considered as part of, the town, and subject to the same regulations as the other parts thereof." ALFONSO v. UNITED STATES.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1843.

EVIDENCE — EXPERT TESTIMONY — COMPETENCY — ESTOPPEL — CUSTOMS DUTIES.

1. Where, in a writ of error, exception was taken to the admission by the judge of the testimony of merchants and appraisers in Boston, in respect to the market value of sugars in Cuba, it was held, that the market value being a question of opinion, as well as of fact, such testimony was admissible, as being in the nature of evidence by experts, and of the same degree as the evidence of merchants in Cuba.

[Cited in Chaffee v. U. S., 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 542; U. S. v. 146,650 Clapboards, Case No. 15,935.]

2. Exception being, also, taken to the admission of certain evidence, as to prior fraudulent shipments to other parties, made by B., the shipper of the sugar for the claimants, the judge refused to affirm, that the evidence was improperly admitted.

[Cited in U. S. v. 146,650 Clapboards, Case No. 15,935.]

3. Exception being, also, taken to the admission of other invoices of shipments in July and August, (this shipment being made in May,) to show the market value of sugar, it was held that they were properly admitted.

[Cited in U. S. v. 146,650 Clapboards, Case No. 15,935.]

4. The phrase "actual cost" in the revenue act of 1799, c. 128, [1 Stat. 677,] means the actual price paid in a bona fide purchase, and not the market value.

[Cited in U. S. v. Twenty-Six Cases Rubber Boots, Case No. 16,571; U. S. v. 150 Bales of Unwashed Wool, Case No. 15,932b.]

5. Where a bill alleged that certain sugars were fraudulently invoiced at a sum less than "their actual cost and fair market value," which question was directly put in issue by the pleadings, and the judge charged the jury, "that if the goods were found to be invoiced below their fair market value, with intent to defraud, &c., they should find a verdict for the government," to which instruction exception was taken by the plaintiff, it was held that the instruction was proper.

6. Held, also, that the agent of the claimants, having assumed, in his oath to the invoice or entry of the shipment, the position of a purchaser, he could not avail himself of the defence that he was not a purchaser, but a producer or manufacturer.

[Cited in Locke v. U. S., Case No. 8,442.]

7. It seems, that the revenue act of 1799, c. 28, only applies to cases where an actual purchase has been made.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

[At law. Libel of seizure for forfeiture of certain sugar, (Gonzalo Alfonso, claimant.) Judgment of forfeiture to United States. Claimant appeals.]

Writ of error to a judgment rendered in the district court. The original suit was a libel of seizure of 100 boxes of sugar for an alleged forfeiture under the 66th section of the revenue act of 1799, c. 128, [3 Bloren & D. Laws, 198, 1 Stat. 677,] because "the actual cost of the said sugars at the place of export was not, nor was the fair market value thereof the said sum of three reals for each arroba, (at which they were invoiced,) but that the said sugars were so invoiced falsely and fraudulently, and with a design to evade a part of the duties, payable thereon to the United States, and that the actual cost, or fair market value, of the said sugars at the place of export was a much larger sum, to wit, the sum of four reals and a half for each arroba;" contrary to the statute, &c. The claimant, in his plea and answer, averred, that "the said merchandise was not imported contrary to law, and because," he says, "that the actual cost and fair market value of the same at the place of export, was the sum of three reals for each arroba, and no more, and that the said merchandise was not invoiced at that rate falsely and fraudulently, and with design to evade the payment of a part of the duties payable thereon to the United States, as in the said libel is alleged." The replication puts the matter of the plea and answer in issue, denying their truth. The cause was heard by a jury, who found a verdict for the United States. At the trial, a bill of exceptions was taken by the claimant, which was as follows: "The libellants offered to prove by the testimony of appraisers of the custom house and merchants resident in Boston, engaged in the importation and sale of sugars, and who derived their knowledge on the subject from letters and invoices received by themselves in the usual course of their business, and from inspection of the sugars in question, or samples of them, and from their general knowledge of the business, what was the market value of these sugars in Matanzas at the time of exportation. The claimant objected to the competency of this evidence, there being in the case the deposition of witnesses, taken by the claimants, resident in Matanzas at the time of exportation, as to the market value of these sugars; but the objection was over-ruled and the evidence admitted. The government, in order to show a design to defraud in the present case, offered to prove by the appraisers, that, on one former occasion, they thought an invoice of sugars shipped by one Burnham, by whom this lot was also shipped in behalf of the claimant, and by whom it was invoiced, to be rated below the market value: though no information of such opinion was given to the importer or exporter; and that, on one other occasion, said appraisers had put up an invoice, sent by the same person, believing the same to be rated too low, and the consignee had paid the advance, without making any objection; it not appearing, in either case, that the claimant was interested therein, or had any knowledge thereof. The claimant objected to this evidence as incompetent, but the objection was over-ruled and the evidence admitted. The government, in order to show that these sugars were invoiced below the market value at the time of exportation, which was in April, offered invoices of sugar, some of which were shipped in July and August, it being in evidence that the market fluctuated, and what was the extent of such fluctuation according to the demand and supply. The claimant objected to this evidence, but the objection was over-ruled and the evidence admitted. On the whole evidence, it appeared that these sugars were the produce of a plantation belonging to the claimant, in the island of Cuba, and sent by him to this country for sale: no evidence was offered to show what was the actual cost, and thereupon the claimant prayed the court to instruct the jury that the statute on which this information was founded did not apply to articles belonging to the producer or manufacturer, so as to render them liable to forfeiture if invoiced below the market value; or, at least, not unless it was also proved that the actual cost to the producer or manufacturer was higher than the valuation of the invoice. But the learned judge refused so to instruct the jury, and instructed them that if they believed the goods to be invoiced below their fair market value, with intent to defraud, &c., they should find a verdict for the government." Judgment having been rendered for the United States, a writ of error was brought by the claimant, and was argued at the present term.

Francis C. Loring, for claimant.

Franklin Dexter, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I cannot but regret that the revenue laws have not undergone a thorough revision and consolidation since the act of 1799, c. 128, [3 Bioren & D. Laws, 198; 1 Stat. 677,] so as to cure the numerous defects, and supply the obvious omissions (not to speak of the repugnances of the later legislation), which experience has demonstrated to exist in that act. Instead of a plain and uniform statute to regulate this whole matter, we are now driven to an examination of numerous laws, which have been since passed upon the same subject, the provisions of which are not always easily reconcilable with each other, and which present almost endless embarrassments and questions, in their actual application. It is a matter of surprise, that congress should have left this whole system in such an imperfect state, after the experience of nearly a half century has shown its inadequacy, and have rested satisfied with occasional amendatory laws, which have covered a few blots only, and introduced many new controversies as to their true interpretation and extent. The court, however, must act upon the system as it is, with a consciousness, however, that, in many cases, it is obliged to rely upon a measuring cast of opinion, without being able to resolve many difficulties to its own entire satisfaction.

I shall consider the objections, in the order in which they stand in the bill of exceptions, as at once natural and convenient, premising, however, that upon the state of the pleadings, the true issue before the jury was, whether the sugars in question were invoiced at the port of export, according to their "actual cost and fair market value," to wit, three reals and no more, without any design falsely and fraudulently to evade the payment of the proper duties. The issue was not, whether they were invoiced according to their "actual cost" alone, but according to their "actual cost and true market value," coupling them together, and using them apparently as equivalent expressions. This is a most important consideration to be borne in mind in examining the argument, which has been addressed to the court, upon the charge of the district judge, and to which I shall have occasion hereafter to refer. The first exception is to the admission of the evidence of the appraisers, and of merchants in Boston engaged in the importation and sale of sugars, as to the market price thereof at the port of export. The objection seems to be founded upon this, that it is, (1) not the best evidence that the nature of the case admits of; (2) that it is mere hearsay. But it appears to me, that the objection is not supportable, upon either ground. In the first place, the market value is necessarily a matter of opinion, as well as of fact, or rather of opinion gathered from facts. How are we to arrive at it? Certainly not by the mere purchase made by a single person, or by purchases made by a few persons; for in either case, they may have purchased above or below the market price, or the market price may be fluctuating, and the sales too few to justify any general conclusion. Buyers may refuse to buy at a particular price; sellers may refuse to sell at a lower price. In this state of things, we must necessarily resort to opinions of merchants and others, conversant in trade, for their opinions, what, under all the circumstances, is the fair market price or value of the goods. The market price or value, therefore, must in most cases, if not in all, be a matter of fact mixed up with opinion, for it must necessarily include a general price or value in the market, deducible from various averages, and approximations, and the different qualities of the same class of goods. In the next place, the knowledge of the market price being thus, at least in part, a matter of skill, judgment, and opinion, it is in no just sense mere hearsay; but it is in the nature of the evidence of experts. If the evidence of merchants at the port of export might be taken in the case, because of their actual experience and information, that of merchants and appraisers having equal means of knowledge or information from their actual trade and business, would be equally evidence. Each is evidence in the same degree, and not the one secondary to the other, even if each were not intrinsically of equal value under all circumstances. Indeed, I can conceive of cases where the evidence of Boston appraisers, or Boston merchants, might be of higher value in the estimate of a jury, than that of any foreign merchants at the port of export, from the nature or importance of the case, or different interests of the witnesses. This objection, therefore, is not sustainable. And the same answer may be given to the second objection, which supposes that the testimony of witnesses at Matanzas as to the market value was of a higher degree than that of witnesses in Boston. It might weigh more or less with a jury, according to circumstances, than the testimony of the Boston witnesses. But the evidence would not be higher in its nature, character, or degree, in a technical sense. It might have more or less weight; but that would not degrade it to an inferior class of evidence.

The next objection is to the admission of the evidence of the appraisers, as to prior shipments by Burnham (the shipper of these sugars for the claimant), and of invoices accompanying the same, being, in their judgment, invoiced below the market value, the other shipments not belonging to the claimant, nor he being shown to have any knowledge thereof. I confess, that I have felt some difficulty upon this point; and I should have been glad that the original bill of lading of the present shipment, and the invoice thereof, and the entry thereof at the custom house, had been put into the case, so that it might have been shown, in what precise manner the bill of lading and invoice were made out; whether Burnham appeared thereon solely as the shipper, or whether it was added, that the shipment was on account and risk of the claimant, and also what the entry and oath administered on the occasion purported to state. As I understand the case, however, Burnham made out the invoice as the agent of the claimant in the shipment; and, therefore, the invoice value of the sugars must be understood as the value put upon the same, with the full assent of the claimant, as the actual cost to him. We must then, as it seems to me, treat Burnham as the general agent of the claimant in this matter. And the question comes shortly to this, whether an agent employed in other transactions of a similar nature for other persons, whose conduct is open to suspicion, as to his readiness to cooperate in a fraudulent evasion of duties in those cases, may not, in the claimant's case, be equally open to the like suspicion, so as to let in his conduct as in some degree affecting the bona fides of his invoice for the claimant. I confess that the fact, per se, would not alone have much weight; but, combined with other circumstances, inflaming the suspicion of fraud, I am not entirely satisfied that it was not admissible in evidence, although the claimant is not shown to be directly privy to it. Suppose the argument at the bar to be urged, that the agent ought to be deemed as acting bona fide, for as a mere agent, he could have no motive to deceive or aid in a fraud, would not the argument be met and overturned by showing, that no scruple of this sort had been seen in his prior shipments? Without, therefore, saying that I feel free from all doubt on this point, I cannot affirm that there was error in the learned judge in admitting the evidence, valere quantum valere possit.

The next objection is to the admission of the evidence of other invoices of shipments in July and August, 1842, (the present shipment having been made in the preceding May,) in order (as I understand it) to show the market value, at those times, of like sugars at the port of export. I see no reason to exclude this evidence; although it would not and ought not ordinarily to be decisive as to the market value in May. There may be fluctuations in the market during the intervening period between May and August; and, indeed, there was evidence (it seems) in this case to show, that such fluctuations actually existed. Still, however, upon a question of market value—a subject, in its nature, somewhat indeterminate, and of opinion—it appears to me, that evidence of this sort is admissible, as affording the means of approximation to the true market value at the time. Its weight would depend upon other circumstances, which might enhance or diminish it.

Having disposed of these minor questions, we come, in the last place, to the main question in the case, which is as to the ruling of the learned judge in refusing the instruction prayed for on behalf of the claimant, and the actual instruction given by him to the jury, "that if they found the goods to be invoiced below their fair market value, with intent to defraud, &c. they should find a verdict for the government." Now, upon the actual issue before the jury, the real question was, whether the sugars were invoiced at their actual cost and fair market value; and I do not, therefore, well see how the learned judge could otherwise have instructed the jury on that point. The main objection that exists is to the instruction prayed and refused by the court. And this involves several important considerations. In the first place, as to the construction of the 66th section of the revenue act of 1799, c. 128. I adhere to the doctrine laid down in the cases cited at the bar, U. S. v. Sixteen Packages of Goods, [Case No. 16,303,] and Tappan v. U. S., [Id. 13,749,] that "actual cost" in that section means the actual price paid for the goods by the party in the case of a real bona fide purchase, and not merely the market value of the goods. But then the market value may be and often is justly resorted to as a means of ascertaining the actual cost in doubtful and suspicious cases, for it may be fairly presumed, in ordinary cases, that the market value, and no more, and no less, is generally given for the commodity. The terms, however, are not identical in their meaning, nor is the one necessarily the true interpretation of the other.

It is observable in the present case, that, in the pleadings and issue, the parties have used the words as exact equivalents, and treated the fair market value as the actual cost, and the actual cost as the fair market value.

In the next place it must be taken also, upon the pleadings and evidence, as a clear concession, that the goods were invoiced at their actual cost and fair market value by the shipper, the agent of the claimant, with the consent of his principal; and thus he has placed himself in the invoice and entry, in the predicament of a purchaser, and not in that of a producer or manufacturer of the article. If the invoice and entry purport to state the actual cost, or the market value of the sugars, as a purchase, is it competent in point of law for the claimant now to set up a different case, and to avail himself of the defence, that he was not a purchaser, but a producer or manufacturer? Now, in this view, it is most important to consider that the act of the 1st of March, 1823, c. 149, has in the 4th section prescribed the different oaths to be taken in the entry by the consignee or importer, or agent, and by the owner of the goods, and also by the manufacturer or owner, who has not purchased the goods,² when he enters the same. Where the goods are entered by the consignee or importer, or agent, he is required to swear that the invoice exhibits the actual cost, if purchased, or the fair market value if otherwise obtained. Where the owner enters the goods, he is to swear to their actual cost, including all charges; and where the manufacturer or owner, who has not purchased the goods, enters the same, he is to swear that the invoice contains a just and faithful valuation thereof, at the fair market value. Now, as the invoice and entry, in the present case, are not before me, I cannot say which of these oaths was taken by the consignee. But, regularly, it ought to have been, and, therefore, I presume it was, that the invoice exhibited the actual cost, if purchased, or the fair market value, if otherwise obtained. If the consignee made the entry, referring to the invoice of the sugars, as exhibiting their actual cost, then it seems to me, that he cannot now be permitted to make a different case for the claimant, and insist, that it was no purchase, but a manufacture by the claimant. In the next place, the instruction asked and denied, requires the court to ascertain and decide, that the sugars in controversy were the produce of a plantation belonging to the claimant in the island of Cuba, and sent by him to this country for sale. Now, the court had no right to assume this, unless it was admitted on the part of the United States; and although stated in the exception, there is no admission, and no evidence of the fact on the record.

²See, also, act of 14th July, 1832, c. 224, § 15, [chapter 227, 4 Stat. 593.]

In the next place, it may be true, that the 66th section of the act of 1799, c. 128, in that part which declares, that if goods are not invoiced according to the actual cost, with design to evade the duties, then only they shall be forfeited, does not apply to cases, where the goods belong to the producer or manufacturer, and are invoiced below the market value, if that market value be not below the actual cost; and yet upon an issue like the present, the court might not be bound to give that instruction, as not being relevant to that issue. Indeed, with reference to such an issue, the point might be purely an abstract point. But what could seem to be decisive is, that it is plain, that such an instruction could not be asked of the court, unless the claimant could show, that by his invoice and entry, he put his case upon the allegation, that the valuation was the fair market value of the goods, and did not put it upon the ground that the valuation was the actual cost of the goods. I very much incline to hold the opinion, that the 66th section of the act of 1799, c. 128, so far as it inflicts a forfeiture, does not apply, except to cases where an actual purchase has been made, and of course where the invoice ought to be of the actual cost upon such purchase. Still, however, I do not decide the point, because in my view of the present case, it is not fairly presented upon the pleadings and evidence, in such a manner as to call upon the court to decide it. In this view of the whole matter, my opinion is, that the learned judge was right in refusing the instruction in the terms and under the circumstances in which it was prayed. The judgment of the district court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

TUG AND TOW—NEGLIGENCE—NOTICE OF DANGER.

Where a canal-boat, while being towed through a channel before the ice was all out of it, struck the shore ice and sank, the master of the boat having known in advance of the danger, and the tug having refused to take pay or be responsible for damage, held, that there was, under the agreement, no negligence on the part of the tug in undertaking the service at a time when it was necessarily hazardous; and that on the evidence there was no negligence in the performance of the service sufficient to make the tug liable.

[Distinguished in The E. A. Packer, 22 Fed. Rep. 670.]

In admiralty. In March, 1873, the canal-boat Mohawk was towed from Passaic, N. J., to Port Johnson, the master of the canal-boat knowing that the ice in the channel was strong and the passage dangerous. The owners of the tug were unwilling to have her undertake the work, because of the danger, and because they did not tow for hire; and had refused to take any pay for the service, or to be responsible for damage. The trip was made safely, and the boat got a load of coal. The charterers of the canal-boat went several times to get them to tow the boat back loaded; and, finally, the owners of the tug agreed to do so on the same conditions; and the Mohawk came out from Port Johnson to intercept the tug on her way to Passaic, and was taken in tow. When near the mouth of Passaic river, the Mohawk struck the shore ice, was cut open and sank. Her owner libelled the tug, claiming that the injury was caused by negligence on the part of the tug. This the claimants denied, and they set up as defenses, their refusal to incur responsibility, the bad condition of the Mohawk, and the inefficient handling of her while in the tow.

R. T. Wild, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. Upon examination of the pleadings and proofs in this cause, I am of the opinion that the loss of the libellant's boat was not caused by any negligence on the part of the tug in her management of the tow, but arose from perils necessarily incident to an attempt to tow the boat in a channel made narrow and dangerous by ice. The nature of the service to be performed, and the character of the risks attendant upon its performance, were known at the time when the tug was employed. Under such an employment as the evidence discloses, the tug cannot be chargeable for negligence in undertaking the service at a time when it was necessarily hazardous to the tow; and, upon the proofs, the service, when undertaken, was performed with all the regard for the safety of the tow that circumstances would permit. The libel must, accordingly, be dismissed, with costs.

COLLISION AT SEA — STEAMER AND SCHOONER MEETING—CHANGE OF COURSE BY SCHOONER.

1. A steamer, steering south half west, off Cape Hatteras, in the night, made a schooner's green light one and a half or two points on her starboard bow, and changed her course to south-southeast, which she kept for ten or twelve minutes, the position of the light remaining about the same, and then changed her course to south, and ran on that course for fifteen minutes, the light remaining in about the same position, and the green light then went out of sight, and a red light came in view, whereupon the steamer's helm was at once ported, and her engine stopped and reversed, but too late to avoid the collision. The schooner, sailing north by east, with the wind south by east, made the steamer's light directly ahead, and being uncertain whether she was a steamer or a sailing vessel, ported her helm, and changed her course to northeast by north, and kept that course till she saw that the vessel was a steamer approaching on a course which would run her down, when she put her helm hard a-port, and changed her course to east by north. The speed of both vessels was about six or eight miles an hour, that of the schooner being a little the greater. Each vessel had her lights properly set and burning. The schooner was struck amidships on the port side, and sunk instantly. Held, that, on this state of facts, the 15th and 18th articles of the act of April 29th, 1864, prescribed the rules for the navigation of the vessels.

2. That it was a fault in the schooner to port her helm when she did so first, especially when she was uncertain whether the approaching light was that of a steamer or sailing vessel.

3. That that fault did not contribute to the collision.

4. That the fact that the position of the light ahead did not change after the steamer had changed her course to the eastward, ought to have been a clear indication to her that the schooner was proceeding in such a direction as to involve a risk of collision, and, under those circumstances, it was her duty to keep out of the schooner's way.

5. That the steamer ought to have ported before she did, and ought to have stopped and backed before she did.

6. That the last change of the schooner's helm to port, being made in the heat of danger, did not cause the collision, nor was it faulty.

In admiralty. This was a libel filed to recover damages for a collision, which took place between two and three o'clock A. M. on the 26th of June, 1865, about fifty miles to the northward of Cape Hatteras, between the steamship Alhambra and the schooner Wonder, by which the schooner was sunk and totally lost. The schooner was owned by Kinney and Smith. Smith was her master. He lost his life in the collision. The schooner was on a voyage from Nuevitas, in Cuba, to Philadelphia, and had a crew of seven men, namely, her master and Kinney who was on board as supercargo, and a mate, a cook, and three men before the mast. She also had two passengers. They were lost in the collision. The mate was so injured that he afterward died. The mate and McLean, one of the seamen, were the only persons on deck on the schooner at the time of the collision, and for some time before, except two men, who were asleep in the boat. The schooner had her proper green and red lights burning. The wind was fresh, and about south by east. The schooner had eight sails set. The steamer was bound from New York to Charleston. The libel averred, that the course of the schooner was north by east; that the mate, who was on the lookout on the schooner, saw the lights of a vessel several miles distant, and directly ahead; that, until the vessels approached each other, it was uncertain to the schooner whether the vessel approaching her was a sailing vessel or a steamer; that, when the steamer's lights were discovered ahead, the course of the schooner was changed, by porting her helm, from north by east to northeast by north; and that she steadily kept on that course until after it was discovered that the approaching vessel was a steamer, and until she had approached so near as to make a collision imminent, and until it was found that the steamer was steering a course which would carry her against the schooner, when the wheel of the schooner was put hard to port, and she swung around to east by north, when the steamer, at full speed, and without slowing, stopping, or backing, struck the schooner on her port side, about amidships, and cut her in two and sunk her. The libel also averred, that the lights of the schooner were made by the steamer nearly or quite ahead, when the vessels were several miles apart, the course of the steamer being at the time south half west; that, upon discovering the lights of the schooner, the course of the steamer was changed to south-southeast, which brought the schooner more upon the starboard bow of the steamer; that the mate of the steamer supposed the schooner to be a steamer; that the steamer ran for several minutes on a south-southeast course, the schooner retaining her relative position to the steamer, which was an indication that their lines were crossing; that the course of the steamer was then changed to the south, which brought the lights of the schooner dead ahead; that the steamer continued that course for a short time, when she found herself rapidly nearing the schooner, and her wheel was put hard to starboard, which brought her directly across the schooner; that the order was immediately given to port the steamer's helm, but, before her wheel had reached amidships, she struck the schooner, the speed of the steamer

not being diminished, nor any signal given by her until after she had struck; that the collision was the fault of the steamer, in not having a proper lookout, in not porting instead of starboarding her wheel when she made the schooner's lights ahead, in not keeping still farther away after she had changed her course back to south and had made the schooner's lights ahead, in putting her wheel hard to starboard when she found herself approaching the schooner, in not blowing her whistle, in not slowing, stopping, and backing, and in not avoiding the schooner; that the schooner had a good lookout, and good and sufficient lights; and that her course was proper in changing to the right when she made the steamer's lights ahead, and in keeping to the right until the collision. The answer averred, that the steamer had the proper lights set, and had a proper lookout; that, at about ten minutes past two o'clock, the lights of the schooner were seen from the steamer, in proper time, about from one-half of a point to two points on the starboard bow of the steamer, showing a green light; that the helm of the steamer was starboarded, and she was kept on a south-southeast course for ten or fifteen minutes, which brought the schooner about two and a half points on the starboard bow of the steamer, a green light only being in sight to the steamer all the time; that, if the schooner had kept her course, as she should have done, the steamer would have cleared her by from 300 to 500 yards, but that the schooner wrongfully suddenly changed her course to cross the bows of the steamer, her green light passed out of sight, and her red light came in view, so near as to show the schooner, when the steamer's helm was immediately put hard to port, and her engine was at once stopped and backed, but it was not then possible to avoid the schooner on the course she had thus suddenly taken; that the schooner had no proper lookout, and did not have the proper lights set, and did not pursue the course prescribed by the rules of navigation, in altering her course instead of holding her course and passing on the starboard side of the steamer; and that the collision was wholly caused by the violation, by the schooner, of such rules and law, and by her altering her course and crossing the bows of the steamer.

Benedict & Benedict, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is clear, on the testimony, that each of the vessels had the proper lights set and burning, from the time the lights of each were discerned on board of the other, until the time of the collision, and that there was nothing but negligence or willful inattention that could prevent either of the vessels from reading correctly the language spoken by the lights of the other. The schooner knew, or was bound to know, that the other vessel was a steamer. The steamer knew, or was bound to know, that the other vessel was a sailing vessel. On this state of facts, the rules of navigation are clearly prescribed by statute. Article 15 of the act of April 29, 1864, (13 Stat. 60.) provides as follows: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship." Article 18 provides, that where, by article 15, the steamship is to keep out of the way, the sailing ship shall keep her course. The libel avers, that the course of the schooner was north by east when she made the lights of the steamer, the wind being south by east; that the schooner made the lights of the steamer directly ahead; that, for some time after the discovery by the schooner of the lights, and until the vessels had approached one another, it was uncertain whether the vessel approaching the schooner was a sailing vessel or a steamer; and that, when the lights were discovered ahead, by the schooner, that is, when the vessels were several miles apart, and while those on the schooner were uncertain as to whether the vessel approaching from directly ahead was a sailing vessel or a steamer, the schooner changed her course, by porting her helm, from north by east to northeast by north, a change of two points, and kept steadily on the latter course until after she discovered that the approaching vessel was a steamer and was on a course that would run down the schooner, when the schooner's helm was put hard to port till she headed east by north, in which position she was struck on her port side. The only person now living who was on the deck of the schooner at the time, and saw anything of the collision, was McLean, who had the wheel, the mate being on the lookout. McLean has been examined as a witness for the libellant. He says, that he was standing on the starboard side of the wheel when he first saw the approaching lights; that they were on the starboard bow, right ahead, his attention having been called to them by the mate; that the lights bore north by east from him; that, about a minute after seeing the lights, he, on an order from the mate, ported his wheel, and brought the schooner up to the northeast point; that, when that change had been made, it caused the lights to bear a point and a half or two points on the port bow of the schooner; that he ran on the northeast course a minute or a minute and a half and then changed to a course northeast by north; that, just at the moment of being struck, he put his wheel hard to port; and that it was from twenty-five to thirty minutes from the time he first saw the lights until the time of the collision. The testimony of McLean is explicit that, for full twenty minutes, he kept the northeast by north course. Now, by law, it was clearly the duty of the schooner to keep her course, as against the approaching steamer, and it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the schooner. It was, therefore, bad navigation in the schooner to port her helm, when she saw the lights right ahead, and change her course first to northeast and then to northeast by north, the approaching lights being those of a steamer. Especially was it wrong in the schooner to make this change of course when, as appears from the libel, she was uncertain whether the lights were those of a steamer or of a sailing vessel. I am not satisfied, however, that this fault in the navigation of the schooner makes her chargeable with the collision.

The steamer made the schooner one and a half to two points on her starboard bow, and, acting on the indications that the approaching vessel was a sailing vessel, did not port her helm, but starboarded it, in order to keep out of the way of the schooner. The change by the steamer was from a course south half west to south-southeast, a change of two and a half points towards the east. The change made in the course of the schooner on sighting the steamer, was a change of from two to three points towards the east. The speed of each vessel was about the same—say six to eight knots an hour, that of the schooner being, perhaps, a little the greater. Now, on this state of facts, each vessel making the other nearly ahead, but a little on the starboard bow, one heading south half west and the other north by east, and each then changing to and running on a course about two and a half points further to the eastward, we should expect it to follow that, from the former vessel, the lights of the other vessel would, after the last change, take a bearing which would be preserved substantially unaltered during the running of the vessels on their several new courses. This result did follow. The testimony of Newbegin, the mate of the steamer, taken on the part of the claimants, shows that, while the steamer was running on her south-southeast course, which course she continued for ten or twelve minutes, the schooner continued all the time to bear about two and a half points on his starboard bow; that he then changed to a south course, and ran on that for fifteen minutes, and that the schooner still continued to bear not more than from two and a half to two and three-quarters points on his starboard bow; that the united speed of the two vessels was from sixteen to eighteen knots an hour; and that he first made the schooner's lights when she was about seven miles off. In twenty-five minutes, the vessels, at a united speed of sixteen knots an hour, would approach six miles and two-thirds of a mile nearer to each other. This approach of the schooner, without the bearing of her lights being substantially altered, while the course of the steamer was first south-southeast for ten minutes, and then south for fifteen minutes, ought to have been a clear indication to the steamer that the schooner was proceeding in such a direction as to involve a risk of collision. Under these circumstances, it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the schooner. The schooner, after she took a northeast by north course, kept it up to the very jaws of the instant peril. Her change to a northeast by north course from a course north by east did not contribute to the collision. It was wrong in the steamer to persist in starboarding her helm, and running on a course which, from the bearing of the schooner's lights, and the freshness of the wind, it ought to have been evident, would soon bring the two vessels into peril of collision. The steamer ought to have ported her helm before she did. If she had done so, she would have cleared the schooner, as the movement which the schooner made in the heat of danger in putting her helm hard to port, favored the chance that the steamer would, by porting, clear the schooner. Such movement of the schooner did not, on the evidence, cause the collision, nor was it faulty. The steamer ought to have kept out of the way. The schooner kept her course, and there was no special circumstance making it necessary for the steamer to take and keep the course she did. Moreover, the steamer did not soon enough slacken her speed, or soon enough stop and reverse. If she had done so at an earlier moment, she would have gone under the stern of the schooner, and so she would if she had ported at an earlier moment. There must be a decree holding the steamer liable for the collision, and for the damages caused by it, with a reference to ascertain and report the damages.

PRIORITY OF LIENS—MARITIME OR STATE LIENS TO BE PAID BEFORE MORTGAGE LIENS, WHERE BY GENERAL MARITIME OR LOCAL LAW A LIEN IS GIVEN.

A mortgage lien upon a vessel has no priority over maritime claims of any class for which either the state or maritime law gives a lien, but is postponed to those liens.

WITHEY, District Judge. Exceptions to the clerk's report as to the order in which creditors of the "Getty" are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds have been filed, and present questions which, in part at least, were passed upon by this court in The St. Joseph Case, [Case No. 12,229.] The tug belongs at Muskegon, in this state, and most of the libels are for supplies, repairs, etc., furnished in Michigan. She was accustomed to take tows across the lake, and there is one libel for supplies furnished in Chicago, besides several for seamen's wages. The original libellant's claim is for necessaries furnished the tug in Michigan. For this claim a decree was obtained and the tug sold. A number of intervening libels were filed before sale, and a number of creditors asserted their liens after sale upon the proceeds. Besides these, Rogers petitioned to have the proceeds applied upon two mortgage liens. The filing of his mortgages in the custom house antedated nearly all the other lien claims. The clerk's report gives priority to the strictly maritime liens, viz.: seamen's wages and the claims for supplies furnished out of the state. After satisfying these and the costs there is a surplus. Then preference is given to liens under the state law asserted before sale of the tug. There is still a surplus, and this is given to the mortgage claims to the exclusion of domestic liens after sale against the proceeds. These latter creditors except to the report because they are postponed to the mortgage creditor, and the mortgage creditor excepts to the report because his lien is postponed to those domestic liens which were asserted by intervening libels before sale. Rogers, the mortgagee, insists that he is entitled to rank next to those liens established for seamen's wages and the foreign creditors.

The court held in the St. Joseph case that the mortgage liens do not have priority over maritime claims of any class for which either the maritime law or the state law gives a lien. We have repeatedly affirmed that view, and so far as we are advised neither the circuit court of this circuit nor the supreme court has held a contrary rule to govern as to priorities. In the northern district of Illinois it was decided that a mortgage lien outranked domestic liens. 2 Biss. 131, [The Grace Greenwood, Case No. 5,652;] 6 Biss. 367, [The Kate Hinchman, Case No. 7,620.] In the last named case, (6 Biss., [Case No. 7,620,]) it seems to have been the opinion of the learned district judge that The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [8 U. S.] 558, had settled this question in favor of the priority of a mortgage lien over those liens created by state laws, but this we think is a misapprehension as to what was there decided. We do not know what bearing the Illinois statute may have had in determining the priorities in the cases in the district court of Illinois, if any. The Michigan statute giving the lien on domestic vessels, fixed their priorities over mortgage liens, sections 6678, 6679. If the state may give the lien, we do not see why it may not fix the rank as between the several domestic and mortgage lien creditors. But we are of opinion that if the statute be silent on the subject, the principles of the maritime law would postpone mortgage liens to all maritime claims where by the general maritime law or by the local law a lien is given. It would not be claimed that a purchaser of a vessel could successfully assert a claim to proceeds against either class of maritime claims. Viewed in the proper light, a mortgagee is a purchaser subject to a condition, the performance of which condition by the mortgagee will defeat the mortgagee's title. Now, nothing is better settled than that a mortgage on a vessel creates no maritime claim; on the contrary, the mortgage represents an ordinary debt to which we attach no maritime rights whatever, and can no more be enforced in admiralty courts than can a judgment or execution lien in favor of a creditor, who has, through proceedings in a state court, levied on the vessel. The mortgage gives a lien and so does the levy, but neither can operate to deprive maritime claims, for which the local or maritime law gives a lien, of superior rank and claim to priority, and this rests upon that measure of public policy in favor of those who supply vessels with necessary things to enable them to proceed on their voyage, without which marine commerce could hardly be sustained, and because the supplies are supposed to be to the advantage of both owners and creditors of the vessel.

The only standing a mortgagee can obtain in a proceeding in admiralty is against the remnant in the registry, and this only by petition under the 43d admiralty rule. We understand the Lottawanna Case to have settled nothing on the question whether a mortgage lien outranks a lien for supplies given by the local law. In that case it was held that liens asserted under the law of Louisiana had never been perfected and therefore had no standing before the court; this left the mortgagees at liberty under the 43d admiralty rule to come forward and claim what was left of the remnant in the registry of the court as against the owner of the boat. We regard that case as supporting in very many points what we have said. If a mortgagee wishes to avoid claims arising against the mortgaged vessel, he should take possession and avoid debts, but if he lets her sail, he understands the necessity which may arise for supplies and repairs on the credit of the ship, and he can no more defeat those debts by asserting his mortgage than could a purchaser. He is benefited by any repairs and may be by ordinary supplies, which enable the ship to proceed on her voyage and thus save her freight. We entertain no doubt upon the subject, and sustain the exceptions by those having liens under the state law, whose libels were filed subsequent to the sale of the vessel, and direct that the decree be entered so as to give them priority over the mortgaged liens. We overrule the exceptions filed by Rogers, the mortgagee.

MARITIME LIENS—SUPPLIES—HOME PORT.

A bark owned by American citizens, resident in New York, was put into the name of a British subject and under a British register, after which she was sold by the American owners to a firm, also resident in New York, one member of which was an Austrian subject, but neither of the members was a British subject, the title, however, being put into the name of another British subject. This firm kept possession of the vessel for some time, and finally sold her. During this period C. furnished supplies to the vessel, on the order of her master, in New York, whom C. had known a long time. C. did not know who owned the vessel, and made no inquiries. He afterwards filed a libel against the vessel, to recover for the supplies. Held, that the vessel was really in her home port when the supplies were furnished, and was not really a foreign vessel, as regarded the rights of the libellant, and that he had no lien on the vessel for the supplies.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by James E. Chase against the bark Alice Tainter for supplies. Libel dismissed with costs. Affirmed by the circuit court in The Alice Tainter, Case No. 195.]

Scudder & Carter, for libellant.
Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libel in this case alleges, that, between the 24th of October, 1867, and the 26th of December, 1867, while the bark Alice Tainter was lying at the port of New York, she was in want of certain supplies and provisions, to enable her to proceed upon any voyage and earn freight; that her master applied to the libellant, and requested him to furnish to the bark such supplies and materials as she stood in need of; that thereupon, and between the dates before named, at the city of New York, the libellant furnished to the bark materials and supplies of the value of $1,938.50, all of which were necessary for the bark; that bills therefor were rendered to the master and approved by him, but no part of the sum has been paid; and that the libellant has a maritime lien on the vessel therefor. The libel does not allege that the vessel was a foreign vessel, or a vessel in a foreign port, at the time the materials and supplies were furnished, or that they were furnished on the credit of the vessel. It alleges that the vessel is a foreign vessel, speaking as of the date the libel was sworn to and filed, which was the 11th of December, 1869.

The answer admits, that, during the times mentioned in the libel, the libellant furnished certain supplies and provisions, and that the same were necessary for the bark. It sets up, that the bark is an American built bark, and has been, at all times, in truth, owned by American citizens; that, at the times mentioned in the libel, Slocovich & Smith, residents of the state of New York, and merchants doing business in the city of New York, were the real owners of the bark; that that fact was well known to the libellant, and the supplies and provisions were furnished upon their credit; that the bark was sailing under a British register; that, to give her nationality, she was nominally placed in the name of the claimant, one Armstrong, a British subject, then and ever since residing and doing business in the city of New York; that, since the furnishing of the supplies and provisions, and before the commencement of this suit, the bark had performed a voyage to Europe, Japan, back to Europe, and thence back to the United States; and that this court has no jurisdiction of this suit.

The history of the bark, as shown on the trial, was this: She was built in New York for the firm of Smith & Dunning, a firm doing business in New York, and whose members resided there or in Brooklyn. They owned the bark, the title to her being in the name of Mr. Smith, of that firm. That firm continued in possession of her until they actually sold her, October 22d, 1867. Meantime, and on the 21st of April, 1863, Mr. Smith, of that firm, conveyed her, by bill of sale, to one Duck, a British subject, residing in New York, and she was put under the British flag, and furnished with a British register. Smith & Dunning sold her, on the 22d of October, 1867, to the firm of Slocovich & Smith, a firm composed of two members, both of whom resided in New York. That firm carried on business in New York. They negotiated for her purchase with Smith & Dunning, and accounted to them for her purchase money. None of the members of the firms of Smith & Dunning and Slocovich & Smith were British subjects. Slocovich was an Austrian subject. On the purchase by Slocovich & Smith, Duck, on the 22d of October, 1867, by a bill of sale, executed by Smith, of the firm of Smith & Dunning, as his attorney, the power of attorney from Duck to Smith being dated September 21st, 1864, conveyed the vessel to the claimant, Armstrong, who was a British subject, residing and doing business in New York. At all times after such conveyance, until February 11th, 1870, when Slocovich & Smith sold the vessel, she continued in their possession, employed by them in trade. They sent her on a voyage to Rotterdam, thence to China, Japan, Cork, Amsterdam, and New York. On the 11th of February, 1870, they sold her, and Armstrong conveyed her, by bill of sale, to one Adey, a British subject.

The only testimony as to the furnishing of the supplies to the vessel is that given by the libellant himself. He says that he was not on board of her, and did not know by whom she was owned; that he supplied the goods to her by the order of her master, with whom he had been a long time acquainted; that the master happened in at his, the libellant's, store, and told him, the libellant, that he, the master, was appointed to the command of the vessel, and thought he could give him, the libellant, the order for fitting her out; and that subsequently the master gave him, the libellant, the order, and he filled it.

It is impossible, on the facts in this case, to hold that the libellant has any lien on this vessel, which can be enforced in a suit in admiralty against her, in rem. She was, in fact, in her home port, when the supplies were furnished, and not in a foreign port, nor was she then really a foreign vessel, as regards the rights of the libellant in reference to her in respect of these supplies, however it might be necessary to regard her as a British vessel in respect of any rights claimed by her as against the United States, as a sovereign power. Nor is this a case where she was held out by her real owners as a foreign vessel, or a vessel in a foreign port, in such wise as to deceive or mislead the libellant to his prejudice. He does not testify that he supposed she was a foreign vessel or a vessel in a foreign port, or that he furnished the supplies on the credit of the vessel, or gave credit for them to the vessel. On the contrary, he says that he did not know by whom she was owned. He does not show that he inquired of the master, or of any other person, where or by whom the vessel was owned, or whether she was in her home port or in a foreign port. The master did not come to him as a stranger or a foreigner, in command of a foreign vessel. On the contrary, he had been acquainted with the master for a long time. Moreover, the fact that the master, happening in at the libellant's store, told him that he was appointed to command the vessel, and thought he could give him the order for fitting her out, must be regarded as a sufficient indication that he had been appointed master then recently by parties at hand, to put the libellant to inquiring, at least, from the master, where the vessel really belonged and who were her real owners.

There is not in this case the slightest indication that the libellant had any idea that he was furnishing the supplies to a foreign vessel, or to a vessel in a foreign port, or on the credit of the vessel, or that he was obtaining a security on the vessel by furnishing them. I must, therefore, dismiss the libel, with costs.

SHIPPING—LIEN FOR SUPPLIES—HOME PORT—FOREIGN REGISTRY.

An American built vessel, really owned by residents of New York, was put under the British flag by a formal transfer to a British subject, and was registered in a British port. Afterwards, supplies were furnished to her in New York, by a person who was not misled as to her character: Held, that there was no maritime lien on the vessel for the supplies.

Welcome R. Beebe, for claimant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The controlling question in this case is, whether the fact that this vessel was put under the British flag by a formal transfer to a British subject, recorded at the British consulate in New York, and by being registered at Hamilton, in the island of Bermuda, although she was really owned by Smith & Dunning, her original owners, and continued to be controlled by them until they sold her to Slocovich & Smith, just before the supplies in question were furnished, converted her into a foreign vessel, so as to subject her to a maritime lien for supplies. That the vessel lost her right to the protection of the government of the United States, by the transaction stated, and that, so far as the revenue laws are concerned, she had no longer any claim to be considered an American vessel, is quite clear. But all this may be without her being subjected, as a foreign vessel, to a maritime lien for supplies. In respect to that question, the residence of the owners, and not the place of registry or enrolment, controls. The Plymouth Rock, [Case No. 11,237.] I do not find, upon the evidence, that the libellant was misled in any way in respect to the character of the vessel. He seems to have known her history very well, except that he did not know her owners at the time, nor did he make any inquiry about them. He knew Captain Nichols, who used to come into his office, and who, when he got charge of this vessel, told the libellant that he thought he could give him the order for her supplies, and subsequently did so. The libellant testifies that he knew she was under the British flag when he furnished the supplies, and that he furnished them on the credit of the vessel. But this neither makes out that the vessel was not in her home port, nor that he was misled about her in any respect, unless it was in the idea that this change of her colors had caused New York to cease to be her home port. I do not find that the cases to which I am referred support the libellant's view of the law. In most, if not in all, the question presented assumed the vessel to be in a foreign port, and then the inquiry was whether the other circumstances would support a maritime lien. This was clearly so in The Patapsco, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 329, in The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129, in The Guy, Id. 758, in The Lulu, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 192, and also in The Walkyrien, [Case No. 17,092; Id. 17,091.] In the latter case, the attempt was, though the vessel was foreign, to defeat the maritime lien on the ground that the foreign owner was a resident of New York, and this the court refused to do; while, on the other hand, in the early case of The St. Jago De Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, it was held, that, even in a home port, a vessel may be subjected to the liabilities of a vessel in a strange port, by being falsely held up as foreign by her owners, but that, in such a case, the question is, whether there was an imposition practised, under circumstances calculated to deceive and mislead men of ordinary vigilance.

Entertaining these views of the law, I think the decree of the district court in 5 Ben. 391, [The Alice Tainter, Case No. 194,] was correct, and that the further testimony presented in this court has not altered the position of the case in any material and controlling respect. The decree must be affirmed and the libel dismissed.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 18, 1877.

ADMIRALTY—COSTS—FEES OF CLERK.

1. Where a note of issue, on an appeal in admiralty, is delivered to the clerk, under rule 55 of this court, with a view to his putting the cause on the calendar of causes to be tried, for a particular term, a fee of $1 to the clerk for the service is a lawful and proper fee, and, if paid by a successful party, can be taxed against his adversary, as costs in the cause.

[Cited in The Siren, Case No. 12,910; The F. Merwin, Id. 4,893.]

2. It is proper for the clerk to charge for including the evidence, in a suit in admiralty, in the final record, on final decree, notwithstanding the provision of section 1 of the act of February 16th, 1875, (18 Stat. 315,) in regard to appeals in admiralty to the supreme court.

In admiralty.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.
Scudder & Carter, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Rule 55 of this court provides as follows: "When a cause is noticed for trial or argument for the first day of the term, a notice thereof, with a note of the issue, and of the pleadings, and of the attorneys' names shall be delivered to the clerk at least eight days next preceding the term, and the clerk shall, as early as the following Thursday, have the calendar of causes to be tried, made up, arranging them according to the dates of their issues; and no cause shall be put upon the calendar, without the special order of the court, unless the note of issue shall be furnished as is hereby required." A rule like this, in substance, has been in force since 1838. Such rule was made under the authority contained in section 7 of the act of March 2, 1793, (1 Stat. 335,) which provides, that "it shall be lawful for the several courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts, directing the returning of writs * * * and otherwise, in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States, to regulate the practice of the said courts respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings." This enactment is embodied in section 918 of the Revised Statutes, which provides, that "the several circuit and district courts may, from time to time, and in any manner not inconsistent with any law of the United States, or with any rule prescribed by the supreme court" under section 917, "make rules and orders directing the returning of writs * * * and otherwise regulate their own practice, as may be necessary or convenient for the advancement of justice and the prevention of delays in proceedings." The practice of making up, for the use of the court, a calendar of causes, from time to time, sometimes every term, sometimes not so often, such calendar to be composed only of causes specified in notes of issue delivered to the clerk of the court by one or the other or both of the parties to the cause, and of confining the action of the court, in trying and hearing causes, to the causes which are upon such calendar, is a practice which has always existed in the state courts of New York, of all grades; while, in some of the states, such practice is unknown, but the clerk of the court makes up a trial list from his own scrutiny of the papers on file. In the courts of New York, and in the federal courts in New York, the payment of a fee to the clerk, on the delivery to him of the note of issue, has always been required.

In the present case, on an appeal in admiralty from the district court, the libel was dismissed, with costs, by this court. In taxing the costs the clerk allowed and taxed the following item: "8 notes of issue, $8.00." The cause was upon the calendar each one of eight terms, and, on each one of the eight occasions, the claimant delivered to the clerk a note of the issue and paid him the sum of $1. It is contended, for the libellant, that this charge of $1 on each occasion is unlawful, unless it is found to be specifically provided for in section 828 of the Revised Statutes; that the only provision on the subject in section 828 is this one: "for making dockets and taxing costs, in cases removed by writ of error or appeal, one dollar;" and that, under this provision, there can be but one charge of one dollar.

It is to be noted, that the rule does not require that the note of issue shall be filed in the court or with the clerk, or shall become part of the files of the court. It is only to be delivered to the clerk for his use in making up the calendar. The clerk makes the calendar for the convenience of the court, and a copy of it is always made for the use of the bar. The service is not one which it is contemplated by section 828 that the clerk shall perform, and it is not covered by any item in that section, nor does any fee prescribed in that section apply to it. In the rule, it might as well have been provided that the marshal or a commissioner should perform the service, as the clerk. It is not reasonable that the service should be performed without compensation. As it is for the benefit of suitors, it is reasonable that suitors should pay for it. It is as reasonable that they should pay for it as it is that they should pay the expense of printing papers which the court requires to be printed. It is for the court to say who shall ultimately pay such expenses; and the court has the power to say that the losing party shall ultimately pay them, by refunding them to the party who pays them in the first instance. Whether they are paid in the first instance to a printer or to any other person who is designated by the court to perform the particular service, is immaterial. In Neff v. Pennoyer, [Case No. 10,084,] the circuit court for the district of Oregon held, that, under section 918 of the Revised Statutes, that court had the right, either by general rule or by special order in a particular case, to require parties to a cause submitted to it for decision to file printed briefs, and to tax the reasonable expense of printing the brief of the prevailing party against the losing party, as a necessary disbursement. Under the same authority, this court made a rule, on the 1st of July, 1876, requiring the cases and points and all other papers in certain calendar causes to be printed, and providing that a party recovering costs should be allowed his disbursements for the printing required of him by such rule. A like practice and rule as to printing papers exists in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts. See Jordan v. Agawam Woolen Co., [Case No. 7,516.]

The remaining question is, as to whether the charge of $1 for the service is a reasonable one. It has for many years been the standard charge for the service in both of the federal courts for this district. It has not, it is believed, until now, been ever questioned. In the years 1852 and 1853, as appears from the records of this court, the usual charge for the same service, paid without question, was $4.75. The charge of $1 seems reasonable, in view of the nature of the service, and of the fees allowed in section 828. Long acquiescence by the court and the bar go far to establish that the fee is a reasonable one.

As to the clerk's costs on final decree, no objection is made to any specific item, although the items are stated in detail by the clerk, except to the charge for making the final record, which, it is contended, ought not to include the evidence in the cause, because, by section 1 of the act of February 16th, 1875, (18 Stat. 315,) the review, by the supreme court, on an appeal in admiralty, is limited to a determination of the questions of law arising on the record, and the circuit court is required to make a finding of facts, as part of the record. But, rule 52 in admiralty, prescribed by the supreme court, requires that the record transmitted to the circuit court, on an appeal by the clerk of the district court, shall contain, among other things, the testimony on both sides. The record so transmitted to the circuit court becomes part of the record of the cause in that court, and, if there be an appeal to the supreme court, such record must, as a whole, be transmitted to that court. There is nothing in the act of 1875 which varies this practice.

The question as to the copy of the apostles has been heretofore disposed of. The taxation is affirmed.

ALICE v. MORTE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 485.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Columbia. May Term, 1824.

SLAVERY — LOST MANUMISSION — EQUITABLE RELIEF.

A slave who has been manumitted, and lost her deed of manumission, may have relief in equity.

In equity. The complainant, Alice, was a mulatto woman, who was claimed by the defendant Peter Morte, as his slave, and who was about to be carried away into the southern states, when she claimed her freedom, and complained to Mr. Hoffman, a justice of the peace, who, under a statute of Virginia, in force in the county of Alexandria, detained her, and committed her to the marshal for safe keeping, until her complaint could be heard by the court; the defendant, Morte, having refused to give security for her forthcoming to prosecute her claim at court. Having been brought before the court by habeas corpus, and having filed her petition to be permitted to sue in forma pauperis, Mr. Mason was assigned by the court as her counsel, who reported in favor of her claim in equity; whereupon she filed her bill in equity, in which she stated that she was formerly held as a slave in Maryland, by one Samuel Edelin, in whose family she continued till she was sixteen years of age, and where she was kindly treated. That Edelin was an unmarried man, and about five years ago gave her what she supposed was a deed of emancipation, and was suffered by him to go at large, as a free person, which she did for some time, in his immediate neighborhood, with his knowledge and approbation. That, with his knowledge, she then went and resided in Washington, D. C., where she continued unmolested until the year 1819. That she lost her paper which was given to her by Edelin, when she was discharged from his service, and which she is informed and believes was a full and sufficient deed of emancipation. That she was lately seized, thrown into jail, and sold to the defendant, Peter Morte, who was informed of her claim to freedom, and who is about to remove her to some part of the southern or western country. This bill was sworn to by the complainant. The defendants demurred "as to so much of the complainant's bill as seeks to charge them with a knowledge of her right to freedom, or as seeks to compel the defendants or either of them to make any discovery touching the same, or any of the matters relating thereto, in the bill suggested or alleged;" "and for cause of demurrer show, that they ought not to be compelled to discover any matters whereby they may impeach or accuse themselves of an offence or crime for which they may suffer corporal punishment, or be grievously fined."

THE COURT, at May term, 1824, after argument, overruled the demurrer, and ordered the defendants to answer on or before the first day of the next term. Not having done so, and the complainant having filed the deposition of John B. Edelin, fully confirming the facts stated in the bill, it was taken for confessed, and the court decreed that the complainant should be emancipated and set free, and that the defendant Edelin should make, execute, and deliver to her a proper and full deed of emancipation, duly prepared for record; and that the defendant Morte should be perpetually enjoined from exercising, or in any manner setting up, any claim to the complainant.

MARITIME LIENS — STATE LAW — DISCHARGE OF LIEN—CONTRACTS.

1. The libellant, a blacksmith, solicited the engineer of a domestic steamboat running daily between New York and Albany, to employ him in making such repairs as should be required during the season by the boat, in the line of his trade. The engineer promised this, and the libellant was called upon to make, and did make repairs upon the boat at various distinct times, sending in his bills monthly. Held—1. That these facts did not constitute an employment for the season, but that the libellant had a right of action for each distinct job when it was completed. 2. That libellant's lien upon the boat, if any, under the provisions of 2 Revised Statutes, p. 405, § 2, for each item of service rendered by him, was discharged on the lapse of twelve days after the departure of the boat from Albany for New York next following the rendering of such service.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The court affords a remedy against domestic vessels for labor, supplies, &c., furnished, only where the vessel is subject by the local law to a lien therefor; and the privilege is enforced subject to every qualification or limitation attached to it by that law.

[3. Cited in The Albany, Case No. 131, to the proposition that a lien attaches to a foreign ship by the general maritime law, and that the different states of the federal union are, in regard to this question, regarded as foreign states to each other.]

[In admiralty.] This was libel in rem, by James O. Haight against the steamboat Alida, to recover for repairs made upon that boat. [Libel dismissed.]

The facts out of which this action arose were as follows: During the navigation season of 1847, the steamboat Alida, being then wholly owned in this state, was employed in running between New York and

Albany, making regular passenger trips daily, Sundays excepted. The libellant was a blacksmith, residing at Albany, and he solicited the engineer of the boat to employ him in doing such jobs of work as should be required in the line of libellant's trade during the season. The engineer promised to do so; and at various times when the boat was at Albany, from August 4 to September 24, the libellant was called upon to make repairs upon the engine and other parts of the boat, and he supplied, during that time, all labor and materials within the scope of his trade which the boat required. These services were rendered by the libellant on the 4th, 6th, 13th, 18th, 20th, 22d, and 27th days of August, and on the 1st, 8th, 13th, 15th, 17th, 20th, 22d, and 24th days of September. The Alida changed owners in New York, September 21st; her down trip from Albany was on the 25th, and no work was performed on her by libellant subsequently. She was attached, on her arrival in New York, on other demands, but afterwards continued her trips as before. The engineer who employed the libellant left the boat on the 27th. There had accrued during the month of August, upon the libellant's account for services, charges amounting to $80.95, and the bill therefor was presented on the 1st of September. On the 20th of September, $50 was paid the libellant, and was credited on the August account. Early in October, the bill for the September work, including the arrears on the August bill, was presented to the owners in New York. The book-keeper of the libellant testified that it was his course of business to present the libellant's shop bills for payment on the first of each month. The libel was filed on the 7th of October.

John Cochrane and S. P. Staples, for libellant.

Smith & Woodward, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The present action was commenced within twelve days after the libellant ceased working on the boat; but if each job created a debt by itself due and payable when such job was completed, all the items, excepting the last one, $13.43, had been due more than twelve days when the vessel was arrested, and more than that period would have elapsed after the work was finished, and after a departure of the vessel from the port of Albany to the port of New York. To sustain the action upon the facts shown, the libellant must maintain one or two propositions: that his employment was for the season, and that accordingly he had no right to arrest the boat until his contract was terminated by the expiration of the running season, or by the act of the owner of the boat; or that, in order to bar his remedy in rem, the boat must have left Albany and have remained absent for more than twelve days continuously, after each particular indebtedness accrued.

In my opinion, the evidence in no way authorizes the assumption that the hiring of the libellant was for the entire season. The nature of the employment clearly indicates that it was merely for piece or job work, and that, in each instance, the libellant had a right to demand payment when the particular job was completed. It was the usage of his shop, indeed, to render bills to customers monthly; but that usage in no way affected the legal right of libellant to withhold the indulgence and exact ready pay, nor did it put him under obligation to proceed, and supply material and labor on credit throughout the season. Such usage could only tend to raise a presumption in favor of such credit; but this presumption, if unsupported by other proofs, would be of too slight a character to postpone his right to collect his charges, because it would be balanced if not indeed countervalled by another implication, that each piece of work or article of manufacture furnished by a mechanic, completes his obligation to his employer as far as that item of employment is concerned, and has no connection with or dependence upon other services, similar in character, rendered between the parties. This is the well-understood relation of employer and employed, in all cases of mechanical services; and there is no stronger inference in favor of a continuing credit where the employment is for a series of independent repairs to a single steam-engine, than where it is for the original construction of several different engines. In the absence of stipulations between the parties, the law assumes that a mechanic is entitled to compensation for his job when finished, (Story, Bailm. §§ 425, 426,) and the job must, in ordinary acceptance, be regarded as finished when all the material or labor demanded has been fully supplied. This is as true in relation to small items of mechanical labor and supplies, as it is in respect to those of the greatest magnitude and expense. The job of the block-maker is to all legal intents completed when he has finished the particular tackle ordered, as clearly as is that of the shipwright when the ship is launched and fully sparred; and either is then entitled at law to demand compensation for his labor and materials. If, then, the employment proved in this case were to be regarded as a contract for hire and materials, I should think it amounted to nothing more than an engagement by the libellant to answer such calls or orders as should be made upon him in his line of business, leaving his right to recover compensation therefor to stand upon the ordinary legal footing. In my judgment, however, the understanding between the libellant and the engineer constituted no agreement obligatory on either party. It was no more than the customary good-will solicited by tradesmen and mechanics, and promised by those to whom application is made. These friendly assurances secure no right to either party which can be enforced against the other, as arising upon an agreement of legal obligation.

The question then arises, under the second point, whether the lien, if originally existing in favor of the libellant, was discharged by the departure of the boat from Albany, twelve days or more before the suit was brought. Where services or supplies are rendered to a foreign ship, a lien attaches by the general maritime law; and the different states of our Federal Union are, in regard to this question, regarded as foreign states to each other. The nature, extent and character of the lien, in such case, are to be determined, not by the local law of the particular state, but by the general principles of the maritime law applicable to the case. Zane v. The President, [Case No. 18,201.] The Nestor, [Id. 10,126;] The Chusan, [Id. 2,717.] But against domestic vessels the court affords a remedy only where they are subject by the local law to a lien for work done, or for articles or materials furnished in building or repairing the vessel, or for provisions or stores furnished within the state, and fit and proper for the use of the vessel when furnished; and accordingly the privilege is enforced, subject to every qualification or limitation attached to it by the state law. The case is governed altogether by the municipal law of the state, and no lien is implied, unless it is recognized by that law. The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; The Robert Fulton, [Case No. 11,890;] The Jerusalem, [Id. 7,294;] The Hull of a New Brig, [Id. 11,609;] The Bark Chusan, [Id. 2,717;] Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324; Harper v. The New Brig, [Case No. 6,090;] [Buddington v. Stewart.] 14 Conn. 404; Davis v. The New Brig, [Case No. 3,643.]

The statute of the state of New York under which this lien must be supported, if at all, contains a provision that when the ship or vessel shall depart from the port at which she was when the debt was contracted, to some other port within the state, every such debt shall cease to be a lien, at the expiration of twelve days after the day of such departure; and in all cases the lien shall cease immediately after the vessel shall have left this state. 2 Rev. St. p. 405, § 2. The act preceding this, (Laws 1830, c. 320, § 50,) and the antecedent one, (Laws 1817, c. 60, § 1,) have always been held in this court to bar the arrest of a vessel after twelve days subsequent to her leaving (provided her departure is not clandestine or fraudulent) the port in which the lien was incurred, and going to another port in this state, without regard to the time during which she might remain away from the port where the debt was contracted. Jenkins v. The Congress, [Case No. 7,264;] The Joseph E. Coffee, [Id. 7,536.] I am satisfied that the state act demands that exposition, and should now only refer to the former decisions in this court upon the subject, had it not been earnestly contended in this case that the meaning of the provision was clearly different from that of the former acts upon the same subject, and that it requires, in order to discharge the lien, a continuous absence of the vessel for more than twelve days from the port where the debt was contracted, and that she remain for that length of time in some other port or ports within the state. It was urged that any other construction would render the lien fallacious and worthless, for the reason that the creditor could never know when it was intercepted or destroyed. Stress was also laid upon the decision of the supreme court of the state of New York, in Denison v. The Appellonia, 20 Johns. 194, as determining that the vessel must remain more than twelve days in the port to which she is removed, in order to divest the lien. And in view of this construction of the statute, it was further contended that the boat, having returned to the port of Albany on every day succeeding the one on which she left it, had never departed from that port within the intent of the statute. I think there is but slight call for construction in this case, as the words of the statute (2 Rev. St. 405, § 2) fix the meaning of the legislation with a clearness not to be strengthened by explanatory comments. The day of departure is the point from which the limitation commences running, and it becomes final at the expiration of twelve days after that day.

The reasons upon which the legislation on this subject rest also demand this construction of the law, in so far as it applies to cases not constituting maritime liens to be enforced by admiralty courts under their general jurisdiction. Those courts take no cognizance of such claims against domestic vessels in their home ports, excepting in execution of the local law. It is accordingly the lien of the artisan or furnisher, as recognized at common law, that the legislature had in contemplation and sought to extend. The Marion, [Case No. 9,087;] Moore v. Hitchcock, 4 Wend. 292. See, also, Harper v. The New Brig, [Case No. 6,090.] The common-law lien was dependent upon the actual holding in possession of the thing to which it attached, and any surrender, however brief, of such possession, divested or discharged the lien. So, when actual possession of the thing was not acquired, the lien never attached. Story, Bailm. §§ 440, 588; Ex parte Foster, [Case No. 4,960;] Meary [Meany] v. Head, [Id. 9,379.] This rule of law manifestly left mechanics, material-men, and others who furnished stores to vessels while anchored in port or moored at the dock, yet remaining in possession of their owners, masters, and crew, without other security for their claims than the personal responsibility of their agents or owners. This mischief is remedied by a statutory liability, having all the virtue of a common law and maritime lien, not only while the vessel is under the hands of her creditors, but for twelve days after she departs from the port where the debts were contracted, to any other port within the state.

While there is an impressive equity in affording to creditors some means of protection against the sudden removal of vessels from under their hands, thus cutting off their security, it is plain that the legislature meant also to guard the public against prejudice from these tacit and secret claims. They are permitted, accordingly, to continue in existence for a short period after the vessel has gone from their quasi occupancy and possession. It is proper that sufficient time be allowed to enable the creditor to enforce his right; but no reason demands that these liens should be allowed to float with the vessel, going out of the port and coming back with her to it, so long as she may continue to revisit it, without her absence exceeding twelve days. On the contrary, this would tend to mislead and prejudice subsequent purchasers and creditors, as such prior lien, if sustained, would hold its preference against all subsequent claims, (Rankin v. Scott, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 177,) and thus would be withdrawn all the protection which the limitation of time prescribed by the statute was designed to secure.

The supreme court of this state have evidently so understood the provisions of this act in Hancox v. Dunning, 6 Hill, 494. They preserved the lien in that case only because the vessel had not left the port or state within the meaning of the act. She had only gone out on an experimental trip to try her boilers, and it was held that the touching at a New Jersey port, while on such an excursion, did not divert the lien. The language of the court suggests that the present case would be regarded as coming within the limitation. The court say: "The reasonable construction is, that the lien ceases when the vessel departs from the port where the repairs were made, or leaves the state, upon a voyage or trip in the pursuit of some kind of trade or business." The boat in this case was running in steady employment as a passenger vessel, loading and unloading daily at the port of departure and destination, and completing her voyage on her arrival at the latter.

The case of Denison v. The Appellonia, 20 Johns. 194, relied upon on the argument, turned upon the language of the state act of 1817. Laws 1817, p. 49, c. 60, § 1. This provision is not incorporated in the Revised Statutes, and it is exceedingly difficult to comprehend what is intended by it. There is probably a misprint in the proviso; but as the decision of the court was upon a point of pleading, the only inquiry was whether the pleading had stated the case provided for by the act, and no attention seems to have been paid to the import and effect of the clause itself upon the rights and remedies of privileged creditors. The proviso was, "that the said lien shall in no case endure beyond twelve days after such ship or vessel shall leave the port in which the same may have been arrested." The plea in bar to the proceedings was, that the vessel left, and for more than twelve days continued absent from the port where the supplies, &c., were furnished before her arrest. The court held the plea bad, because it did not state the cause which exonerated the vessel from the lien;—that is, her arrest, before her removal, and then her continuing absent more than twelve days after the arrest. No principle is settled by that case which is applicable to this.

I am, accordingly, of opinion, that any indebtedness to the libellant, which was a lien upon the boat, ceased to be so after the expiration of twelve days from her leaving Albany, and subsequent to the time the debt was due.

The last charge made against the boat by the libellant, September 24, being for less than $50, no lien arises in his favor for it, and upon the considerations stated, he cannot maintain the suit for the antecedent credit. Libel dismissed with costs.

MARITIME LIENS—SUPPLIES—CONTRACTS.

1. Where a writing, although embodying an agreement, is manifestly incomplete, and not intended by the parties to exhibit the whole agreement, but only to define some of its terms, the writing is conclusive as far as it goes; but such parts of the actual contract as are not embraced within its scope, may be established by parol evidence.

2. The owner of a steamboat, and a corporation engaged in the business of supplying coal to steamboats, had for some months been accustomed to deal with each other for the supply of coal required by the boat; the requisite supply for her wants upon each trip being furnished her on each arrival. Under these circumstances the owner executed a written memorandum, acknowledging that he had purchased 1500 tons of coal at a specified price per ton; which was, however, silent as to time and mode of delivery and payment. Held.—1. That the previous course of dealing between the parties might be shown, to establish their intention in regard to these points. 2. That upon this evidence the contract must be construed as intending a delivery of the coal from time to time as it might be ordered to meet the wants of the boat, and as creating an obligation to pay for each parcel of coal as delivered

3. A steamboat is subject to a lien under 2 Rev. St. p. 493, [1st Ed., pt. 3, c. 8, tit. 3,] for fuel furnished her for the purposes of her navigation.

4. The lien for labor, supplies, &c., furnished to vessels, given by 2 Rev. St. p. 493, takes effect from the time when the benefit is actually conferred, not from the date when it is engaged or contracted for.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, by the president, managers, and company of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, against the steamboat Alida, to recover for supplies of coal furnished that boat. [Decree for libellants.]

The action arose out of the following facts:—The libellants' corporation were the owners of the Lackawanna coal beds, and were engaged in supplying coal extensively to steamboats. Their course of business was, to deliver the coal in carts from the yards of the company as it was required for use, and to render bills therefor regularly about once a month, to those receiving the supplies, and to collect the amounts within a few days afterwards, allowing a reasonable time for the examination of the bills. The Alida was built during the winter and spring of 1847, and was employed during the navigation season of that year, in running between New York and Albany as a passenger boat. She was accustomed to leave New York on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays of each week, returning the alternate days; and she usually, on her arrival down, received coal sufficient to supply her run up the next day. The libellants were accustomed to supply her with coal; and it was proved by the books of the libellants, which were put in evidence by the claimants, that the libellants supplied the boat, in this city, on March 19, 1847, with four tons of lump coal, at $5.50 per ton; on April 10th, with ten tons at the same price; and on alternate days during the residue of the same month, with 141 tons, generally furnishing a little more than twenty tons per day, at $5 per ton. In like manner the boat received in May, 245 tons in New York; eight tons at Kingston, at $4.50, and at Rondout 349 tons, at $4; the latter quantity being delivered together. In the same manner she received, in New York, during the month of June, 303 tons, at $4.50 per ton; and in July, up to and including the 10th, 123 tons, at the same price. The total price of these supplies was $4,537.70. Payments were made on June 23d, of $782, and June 30th, of $2,858.70, leaving a balance which remained due up to July 12th, of $917. On the last-mentioned day, William R. McCullough, of New York city, then the owner of the boat, made an engagement with the libellants' corporation for further supplies of coal. The only direct agreement proved was a memorandum in the following words, written by McCullough, in the books of the libellants:—Steamboat Alida. I have purchased this day of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, five hundred tons of lump coal, to be delivered at Rondout, at $4.62½ per gross ton, less 12½ cents per ton for cash, to August 1st. Also, one thousand tons of lump coal, to be delivered from yards in New York, at $5 per net ton, to be delivered by carts. Wm. R. McCullough. New York, July 12, 1847."

From this time the delivery of the coal continued in the manner practised theretofore. On each arrival of the boat in New York she received almost uniformly twenty-four tons at a time; the smallest quantity being once twenty tons, and the largest twenty-five tons three times. On August 2d, the sum of $1,363.50 was collected by the libellants, and on August 31st, $2,145. The collecting agent of the libellants was accustomed to present the bills to McCullough, throughout the season, for each month's delivery of coal, and he also used to call a few days after the presentation of the bills, when he received the payments as credited. When he presented the bill for September, McCullough promised to pay the amount due in a day or two. On Monday, September 20th, McCullough transferred the boat to another person in trust; but the custom-house officers refusing to register that conveyance, a regular bill of sale to E. Stevenson, was executed on the 21st, and on the 27th, Stevenson conveyed her to Orvin Thompson. The failure of Stevenson was publicly known in the city on the 21st of September. It was on that day, also, that the vessel was attached on the libel filed in this cause. The action was now before the court for hearing on the pleadings and proofs, and was heard at the same time with the action by James O. Haight against the same boat, a report of which case immediately precedes this. [Case No. 199.]

William H. De Forest and S. P. Staples, for libellants.

Smith & Woodward and Mr. Crist, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. I am of opinion that the evidence offered of the course of dealing between the parties during the early part of the season is proper and relevant, to show the relation in which the parties stood to each other, and the character of their mutual dealing, and that it affords a safe guide to the intention and meaning of the written memorandum of July 12th. That agreement, as reduced to writing, most manifestly does not represent the entire bargain and understanding between the parties. It is not to be supposed that either of them contemplated an instant sale of fifteen hundred tons of coal, which the libellants could at once deliver and compel payment, or require payment in advance, or which McCullough had a right to demand. In toto, on the signature of the paper, or on any day he might designate. The obvious purpose of the parties was to arrange the prices which should be paid for the coal, and to fix the quantity which should be supplied at those prices, and accordingly a mere note or memorandum was made of those particulars, leaving the mode of supply, in respect to time, amount, &c., to continue as theretofore. A stipulation between vendor and vendee, circumstanced as these parties were, if intended to contain the whole contract, would naturally, if not necessarily, define with precision the rights and obligations of each under it, specifying the periods and quantities of delivery, and the terms of payment. The parties to this agreement had been, at its date, engaged in dealing together for more than three months, in the very matter to which the agreement related, and they both perfectly understood the general usage of that branch of trade, and their own respective means and wants. The libellants knew that McCullough was running a day boat on the river, which consumed more than twenty tons of coal on each trip; and McCullough well knew that they had command of the fuel usually required and obtained for the use of steamboats, and there was an established usage between them to furnish and receive a daily supply at the current market prices, payable on delivery. Both were willing to make an arrangement which should relieve this trade between them from the uncertainty of price to which coal is subject in the general market, and which the proofs show had occurred within the previous three months, to the advantage and disadvantage of each, compared with the standard adopted in the agreement. Thus the circumstances under which the agreement was made have a most important bearing in determining the actual intention of the parties, if the court is not required, in determining that construction, to lay out of view every thing extraneous to the writing itself.

It is very clear, upon the authorities, that this agreement, being manifestly incomplete and intended to define not the entire contract but only one or two of its terms, the circumstances of the case, and especially the previous course of dealing between the parties may be resorted to, in order to supply those parts of the contract which are not within the scope of the memorandum, as well as in determining the sense of uncertain or ambiguous words. Had this writing been a formal obligation under seal, the circumstances in proof might rightfully be noticed in ascertaining the meaning of the parties; and a mere parol memorandum, not amounting to a complete agreement, can incontestably be construed with reference to extraneous facts which tend to determine the motives and intentions governing its adoption. Thus it is said that the rule which forbids the admission of parol evidence to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument, is directed only against the admission of any other evidence of the language employed by the parties making the contract than that which is furnished by the writing itself. But the writing may be read by the light of surrounding circumstances, in order more perfectly to understand the intent and meaning of the parties. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 274, 277, 287, 288; Chitty, Cont. 24, 25; [Hodges v. King,] 7 Metc. [Mass.] 583.

The supreme court of this state, in 1815, in McMillan v. Vanderlip, 12 Johns. 165, held that the rule governing the construction of contracts ought to be discharged of all subtlety, and that they should be expounded according to the real intention of the parties. So, in South Carolina, it is distinctly held that loose memoranda, not containing a complete agreement, are open to explanation by parol proof. Stone v. Wilson, 3 Brev. 228. So, in Missouri, the court holds the rule to be that parol evidence is admissible to show the time, place, and manner of performing a written contract which is silent upon those subjects. Benson v. Peebles, 5 Mo. 132. So, also, the supreme court of New York, in Farmers' & Manufacturers' Bank v. Whinfield, 24 Wend. 419, admitted parol evidence where the agreement was in writing, to show the nature of the transaction, and the object and purpose of the parties. The case of Potter v. Hopkins, 25 Wend. 417, decided in the New York supreme court in 1841, is a clear authority upon this point. In that case, the contract between the parties was originally in parol, but was in part expressed in a receipt given for the first payment made under the agreement. The receipt being put in evidence on the trial, an objection was taken, that the party could not be allowed to prove the previous parol agreement, because such proof amounted to the contradiction of the writing; but the court held that the instrument in question did not purport, on its face, to be a complete arrangement between the parties, but was obviously given as an acknowledgment of part execution of a contract, referring to some of its terms. It was held that the instrument was binding as far as it went, but that, as to such parts of the contract as were not embraced within the writing, parol evidence was admissible. There are many other cases which sustain this doctrine. See Hunt v. Adams, 6 Mass. 519; Barker v. Prentiss, Id. 434; McCullough v. Girard, [Case No. 8,737;] Mead v. Steger, 5 Port. (Ala.) 505; Commissioners v. McCalmont, 3 Penn. R. 492, [Pen. & W. 122;] Sharp v. Lipsey, 2 Bailey, 113; Knapp v. Harden, 1 Gale, 47; Reay v. Richardson, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 427; Ingram v. Lea, 2 Camp. 521; Hall v. Mott, Brayt. 81; Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 12.

The case of Jeffery v. Walton, 1 Starkie, 267, is perhaps more analogous to that now before the court than either of those yet mentioned. That case was assumpsit for damages received by a horse hired by the defendant from the plaintiff. At the time of the hiring the plaintiff told the defendant's agent, who applied for the horse, that if he took him on hire he must be liable for all accidents. The agent engaged the horse on this condition, and the following memorandum of the terms was made in writing:—"Six weeks, at two guineas. William Walton, Jun." The counsel for the defendant contended on the trial, that this memorandum was to be considered as the real contract between the parties, having been made according to the evidence immediately upon the close of the agreement, and that it was not competent to the plaintiff to engraft upon it a further term by means of parol evidence. And, consequently, that this was nothing more than an ordinary case of hiring, in which accidents of this nature were to be borne by the person who let the horse. But Lord Ellenborough said: "The written agreement merely regulates the time of hiring and the rate of payment, and I shall not allow any evidence to be given by the plaintiff in contradiction of these terms; but I am of opinion that it is competent to the plaintiff to give in evidence suppletory matter as a part of the agreement."

In my judgment, therefore, this memorandum, if read in view of the proofs in the case, did not in any way vary the relation of the parties in their dealings in the matter, excepting in respect to the prices chargeable for the coal. The libellants were bound under it to deliver the coal as before, from time to time when it might be demanded, and only in the quantities required at each time; and McCullough was bound to pay for each parcel of coal on delivery. Each delivery created a debt to the value of the coal delivered, and that debt was payable immediately. The acts of the parties after the agreement are, moreover, fully in accordance with this exposition of their meaning, derived from their previous usage. Coal was supplied to the boat at each trip, and only enough to meet her consumption on the run. The bills were rendered as they previously had been, and collections were made upon them as being then due and payable. It is plain that McCullough so understood the rights of libellants and his own obligations, because he promised their collector, in September, to make immediate payment of the balance in arrear.

It appears to me, also, that the words themselves of the memorandum may reasonably be considered to coincide with this interpretation, collected from the course of dealing between the parties, and that they by no means import a contract of sale of fifteen hundred tons of coal as an entirety. Five hundred tons are deliverable at Rondout, at $4.62½ per ton, less 12½ cents per ton for cash, to the 1st of August. This latter provision fairly implies an understanding that a part only of the stipulated quantity might probably be called for before August. It seems to me the meaning to be attached to the clause, construing the memorandum by itself alone, is that whatever part of the five hundred tons McCullough chose to take from Rondout, between July 12th and August 1st, he should receive at $4.50 per ton, paying cash on delivery, while that taken afterward should be at $4.62½ per ton; and that, consequently, it was at his option to order the whole or none on the lower terms. There is no indication in the memorandum that it was the duty of the libellants to make immediate delivery, or that they had a right to deliver the whole five hundred tons at their election immediately after the signature of the agreement. The one thousand tons contracted for in New York were to be delivered from the yards and in carts. This manifestly contemplates a delivery in parcels, and at distinct times. If lump coal from yards is an article different from and superior to coal brought to market in barges and in bulk, and the contract can only be satisfied by supplying coal of that description, there could still be no reason for defining the method for transportation other than this, that the understanding between the parties contemplated the furnishing the coal in small lots when called for, according to the known usage of the trade, and the particular wants of the libellants. I should have no difficulty, accordingly, in holding the agreement, even as evidenced by the memorandum itself, to be that the libellants should furnish the stipulated quantity of coal as it might be ordered by McCullough, and that they were entitled to payment upon each order as it was fulfilled.

The cases cited to show that this contract must be construed as an entire one, under which the libellants had no right to demand any payment from McCullough, without showing either full performance on their part or a legal excuse for non-performance, do not, in my opinion, exclude the construction which I have placed upon the memorandum. In McMillan v. Vanderlip, already cited, (12 Johns. 165,) the plaintiff had hired for ten and a half months, under an agreement to receive wages upon a certain mode of computation, based upon the amount of work done by him; and he left his employer before the completion of the term agreed for. The court held that the engagement of the plaintiff to work out the whole period was a condition precedent, necessary to be performed before the defendant could be held liable for his wages. The principle of that decision does not, however, reach this case, for here is no agreement to deliver the whole fifteen hundred tons of coal before the price is payable. The analogy would have been a strong one had the stipulation been to deliver the fifteen hundred tons at or within a certain time, and for a specified amount of money, in gross or per ton. The case of Champlin v. Rowley, 18 Wend. 187, was an analogous case to McMillan v. Vanderlip, and the decision there was only that an agreement to deliver a particular amount of hay, at a given time, must be performed entirely, or that no liability upon it accrued to the vendor against the purchaser.

The case of Waddington v. Oliver, 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 61, was a case of like description. The agreement there was to deliver a hundred bags of hops before the first of January. A part were delivered in December, and immediate payment for them was demanded, and on refusal to pay, suit was brought for their value forthwith. It was held that the action would not lie for two reasons: first, because the plaintiff had not performed the whole of his contract; and second, because the time in which the contract was to be completed on both sides, had not arrived when the suit was commenced. The supreme court of this state held, in McMillan v. Vanderlip, that the first reason is a legal and satisfactory one. It is manifest, however, that the agreement in that case stipulated for a complete execution upon the part of the plaintiff by a given day, and accordingly gave an element of entirety to the contract which is not found in the one now before the court.² The contract in the present case is destitute of that ingredient. There is no time stipulated at or within which the coal must be delivered, either at the beginning or close of the season, or within one or several seasons. That circumstance, it seems to me, is significant to show that the parties never contemplated a purchase or sale of fifteen hundred tons of coal as an entirety. That would have placed the purchaser who required a daily supply of fuel sufficient for his boat, quite at the discretion of the vendors, who would be in no way bound to furnish it with reference to the wants of the boat, but might follow their own convenience. And, accordingly, to uphold and carry into effect the plain meaning of both parties, the memorandum must be regarded as fixing only that term of the contract which was loose and indefinite before, namely, the price to be paid; and all else must be regarded as intended to be left upon its former footing. If the memorandum imports an entire agreement, then the libellants could rightfully perform the whole at once, (except, perhaps, delivering the five hundred tons at Rondout,) and as no time was fixed for the delivery, they might have elected to make it after the navigation of the river had closed for the season, and indeed without any reference to the wants of the boat during the season. No court would close its eyes to the manifest purpose of the parties in the agreement, and to all the concomitant facts tending to establish that purpose, so as to sustain a mode of execution which might wholly subvert its object, and the motives of the parties making it. If, then, under the general phraseology of the memorandum, there is to be implied, in behalf of McCullough, a right only to the delivery of coal when ordered, because that construction only is consonant with the relations of the parties and the plain object of the bargain, though not expressed upon its face, the like reason exacts in behalf of the libellants that the implication should be raised to protect them, in parting with so large an amount of property, from being compelled to rely solely on the personal credit of the purchaser—an obligation not assumed by them in the agreement, and which had never attended similar transactions between the parties. These views in relation to the memorandum rest upon the assumption that it is to be regarded a contract on the part of McCullough, and as thus creating, by implication, corresponding engagements on the part of the libellants, so as to have the same effect as if it expressed a stipulation by them to deliver to him five hundred tons of coal at Rondout, and one thousand tons at their yards in New York.

But the circumstance should not be overlooked, that the memorandum may reasonably be understood as no more than an admission on the part of McCullough, that he had purchased such a quantity of coal at the prices stipulated; and as not meant to fix the terms of his contract beyond that, much less to regulate the manner of performance on the part of the vendors. He takes no assurance or engagement from them. There is not the mutuality essential to a contract to render it obligatory to both parties. Chitty, Cont. 3, 108. And this admission of purchase by him, not asserting any condition of credit or entire fulfillment of the sale by the vendors, would place him on the footing of an ordinary purchaser, who is bound to pay for the article bought on its delivery. Com. Cont. 182. So he understood his own obligation, and both parties having throughout acted upon that, as the true meaning and design of their arrangement, and it being no way inconsistent with what is stated in the memorandum, I hold that the libellants were entitled to demand payment on each delivery of the several lots or quantities of coal ordered by McCullough.

A steamboat is subject to a lien under the state statute for fuel furnished her for the purposes of her navigation. 2 Rev. St. p. 493, § 1. In the case of Johnson v. The Sandusky, 5 Wend. 510, which was decided in the New York supreme court, in October, 1830, it was held that a party who had furnished wood to a steamboat, to be used as fuel for the purpose of propelling her, was not entitled to a lien therefor. The supplies contemplated by the act, it was said, "must be such as to enter into the construction or equipment of the vessel and become part of her, and not such articles as are daily consumed and constantly replaced. They must be such as go towards the building, repairing, fitting, furnishing and equipping a vessel." That case was decided under the act of 1817. In the case of Crooke v. Slack, 20 Wend. 177, the same court held that the word "stores," introduced into the Revised Statutes on the subject, embraced fuel furnished to a steamboat as a particular now entitled to a lien. This court, in the case of The Fanny, [Case No. 4,637,] followed the construction of the statute given by the state court in the case of the Sandusky, although not satisfied with that exposition. I now readily conform to the later interpretation of the statute by the local court, without inquiring whether there is any essential difference in the provisions of the two statutes. The lien, however, upon the principles laid down in the case of Haight v. The Alida, [Id. 199,] heard at the same term with this cause, is available to the libellants to the extent of such amount of coal only as was delivered to McCullough within twelve days before this suit was brought and after the departure of the boat on her regular trip to New York. This would include the coal delivered from September 9th to the commencement of the action, being one hundred and twenty tons, at five dollars per ton, amounting to $600. For the residue of the quantity delivered the libellants have lost their remedy against the boat.

²The cases upon the general subject of the dependence or independence of contracts, may be found examined in the note of Sergeant Williams v. Peeters v. Opie, 3 Wms. Saund. 352, note 3, and in the note of Mr. Wendell in the case of Champlin v. Rowley, 18 Wend. 194.

It is contended for the claimants, that any lien which might have existed for the balance of $600 is discharged; because, by the act, it arises at the time the debt is contracted, and within the purport of the statute the debt was contracted on the 12th of July, after which day the boat continued to depart from New York for the port of Albany every alternate day, until September 21st, following, and a period exceeding twelve days after every such departure had elapsed before the institution of this suit. It is manifest that the provision of the statute has relation to subsisting debts due and payable for supplies, materials, and labor furnished vessels, and not to initiatory and executory bargains out of which a debt may arise. A different construction of the statute would subvert the whole purpose and policy of the privilege, which is intended to give security for labor and materials actually furnished to vessels, and not for the mere contract or stipulation to supply them. These contracts are, probably, in most instances, entered into in anticipation of the time when the vessel is to receive the repairs or supplies, and she often continues her business, leaving the port where the contract is made and returning again, until the period arrives for its fulfillment. The anchors, spars, rigging, cables, sails, &c., which she requires, must often be in course of preparation by the furnishers, under their contracts, for considerable periods of time, during which she awaits their completion or pursues her employment. After she has received supplies, under such circumstances, to hold her discharged from liability on the ground that more than twelve days had elapsed after her departure from the port since the contract was entered into, would render the assurance held out by the act to creditors a sheer delusion. I cannot perceive the slightest color for such interpretation of its enactments.³

The cases cited upon the argument in support of that construction—Moss v. Oakley, 2 Hill, 265; Moss v. McCullough, 5 Hill, 131—relate to subjects widely different and distinct in principle from this class of liens or charges, and have very slight, if any, analogy to the point in controversy here. They apply to the obligation of a stockholder in an incorporated company to pay the debts of the company, contracted whilst he is a corporator, and only touch this case in so far as the inquiry when a contract is considered in law to be made and obligatory. The act of incorporation in those cases made every stockholder liable for debts incurred by the corporate body while he was a stockholder. Those cases were claimed to fall within the purview of the statute; and in each the court decided that the debts sued for had been contracted by the corporation within the period the defendants were stockholders. The first case turned upon a question of pleading,—whether it was necessary to aver that suit had been brought while the defendant remained a stockholder, and the other upon the effect of a judgment obtained against the company, as evidence to charge an individual stockholder with the debt. The principle involved in that statute, as expounded by the court, was, that the stockholder was surety for all debts of the company, and that of course his liability would attach concurrently with that of the company at the time the debt was contracted. But neither case turns upon the point, or even adverts to it, whether conditional contracts, before fulfilment of the condition on the part of the creditor, come within the privilege. That question could hardly become a practical one under that statute.

It has already been sufficiently shown that no debt subsisted against McCullough on his undertaking until the libellants had delivered coal to him; the liability of the boat is incident and consequent only to the debt when it has been thus created and perfected. This was so in this case, on September 21, 1847, for the value of the quantity delivered that day. Decree for the libellants for $600, and interest from that day, and costs to be taxed.

³The same view was taken by the New York court of appeals in Veltman v. Thompson, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 438. It was held, on the authority of the decision in our text, (which was cited in MSS.) that "the statute has relation to a subsisting debt for supplies, materials or labor furnished vessels, and not to the initiatory bargain out of which the debt may arise."

District Court, E. D. New York. Dec., 1869.
COLLISION IN NEW YORK HARBOR—TOW-BOAT—VESSEL AT ANCHOR—SUDDEN GALE.

A tow-boat, with thirty canal-boats, four barges, and a sloop in tow, was bound down the North river, with an ebb tide. In passing a large steamer, which lay at anchor, the hawser struck the steamer, and two of the canal-boats were sunk. The defence set up was, that a sudden squall of wind struck the steamer, as the tow was passing at a proper distance, and drove her into the tow: Held, That the defence had not been made out, but that the collision was occasioned by lack of precaution on the part of the pilot of the tow-boat.

[In admiralty. Libels for collision. Decrees for libellants.]

T. E. Stillman, for libellants.

O. Van Santvoord, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These two actions, which have been tried together, were brought to recover the amount of the injury caused to the cargoes of two canal-boats, the Emma Davis, and the William Burr, by a collision, which occurred in the North river, on the 16th of September, 1869, between the steamship Borussia, and the steamboat Alida and her tow, of which the canal-boats named formed a part. It is not contended by either party, that the collision was caused by any fault on the part of the canal-boats. The sole question is, whether it was caused by negligence on the part of the Alida, which was, at the time, towing the boats. The tow of the Alida consisted of two barges on each side, and a hawser tow of thirty canal-boats, arranged in six tiers of five boats each—astern of which, were a sloop and two barges, on a stern hawser some 220 fathoms long. The tow was bound down the North river, upon an ebb tide, and the Borussia, a large sea-going propeller, was lying at anchor, near the middle of the river, off the dock of the Hamburgh steamers.

As the Alida and her tow came down to the Borussia, she determined to pass to the eastward of the steamer—that is, between the steamer and the New York shore—and she did, herself, so pass in safety; but, in passing, her hawser tow came in contact with the bows of the steamer, and the canal-boats Emma Davis and William Burr brought up heavily upon the Borussia, and her chain, and were so injured that their cargoes were totally destroyed. The defence of the Alida, as now made, is that the collision was occasioned by an event purely fortuitous, namely, a sudden squall of wind, which struck the Borussia, as the Alida was passing at a proper distance, and drove her to the eastward and into the tow.

fence, a mass of testimony has been taken, which is noticeable for its bold and inexplicable contradictions. It has all received my best attention, aided by the careful briefs of the respective advocates, and it has failed to satisfy my mind that the disaster was caused as claimed by the defence. On the contrary, I can entertain no doubt, after weighing the evidence with care, that, if that precaution had been exercised by the pilot of the Alida, which the circumstances required, and which the law imposed upon him, he would have avoided the vessel at anchor, and the collision would not have occurred. I must, accordingly, hold, that the collision was occasioned by the fault of the Alida, in not avoiding the Borussia, as she was bound to do.

I content myself with this announcement of the result of my examination and comparison of the testimony, not deeming it necessary to spread out, in a lengthy opinion, the various portions of this mass of evidence, which have led me to the conclusion arrived at, as all of it, I am glad to believe, will be placed before the appellate court, and my error, if I have fallen into one, then corrected.

The decrees will, therefore, be in favor of the libellants, with orders of reference to ascertain the amount of damage.

[Betts' Scrap Bk. 101.]

District Court, S. D. New York.¹

AND 1824—MINORS.

[1. The naturalization act of April 14, 1802, § 1, (2 Stat. 153, c. 28.) required five years' residence in the United States. Act March 3, 1813, § 12, (2 Stat. 809, c. 42.) provided that an alien must have a residence of five years, without being for any part of that time out of the territory of the United States, in order to become entitled to naturalization. Held that, under the act of 1802, "residence" meant domicile, and that said act did not require that the alien remain constantly in this country for five years.]

[2. Act May 26, 1824, (4 Stat. 69, c. 186,) provided that any free white alien, under 21 years of age, who shall have resided in the United States three years next preceding his arriving at the age of 21 years, and who shall have continued to reside therein until the time of making application to be admitted as a citizen, may be naturalized after arriving at the age of 21 years, and after he shall have resided in the United States five years, including the three years of his minority. Held that, so far as concerns minors, this repealed the act of 1813, and required merely a domicile in the United States under the prescribed conditions.]

[3. A person who serves an apprenticeship in the United States, and thereafter is in constant service as a sailor, and spends the short intervals between his voyages with his mother, who resides in the United States, is himself a resident of the United States, within the meaning of the act of May 26, 1824, (4 Stat. 69, c. 186,) and is entitled to naturalization.]

[In the matter of an application by an alien for a certificate of naturalization. Certificate granted.]

BETTS, District Judge. The applicant came to the United States in the year 1832, being then a minor. His surviving parent, his mother, still resides in this state, where he served his time as an apprentice, and he now makes his home with her, when not engaged in his present pursuit. For several years past he has been a sailor, being constantly engaged in that employment, except the short intervals between ending one voyage and going out upon another. These periods are passed at the house of his mother, he having no family of his own.

Two questions are presented by these facts: First, whether the act of 1813, March 3, § 12, [entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen," (2 Stat. 809, c. 42,)] applies to this case, and, if it does not, whether the residence of the applicant has been such as to satisfy the existing laws on the subject. The act of [April 14.] 1802, § 1, [2 Stat. 153, c. 23,] required a residence within the United States of five years. Residence, in its legal acceptation, is the place of a party's home or domicile, and not merely the spot occupied by him for the time being. This may be constantly varying; but every change of abode is not regarded as constituting a new residence, without the accompaniment of an intention to abandon the former for the purpose of taking up another. The act of 1802 therefore could not prevent an alien who had come into the United States, and acquired a domicile there, with intent to make it his permanent home, from obtaining his naturalization, although he had not stayed uninterruptedly in the country the full period of five years.

The act of March 3, 1813, § 12, confirms this construction of the previous laws, by declaring that, after the war, aliens coming to this country shall reside therein five years without being at any time during that period out of the territory of the United States, in order to be entitled to the privilege of naturalization. Congress very distinctly signifies that such uninterrupted continuance was not required to constitute the residence demanded by the laws before in force.

On the 26th of May, [1824,] it was enacted [4 Stat. 69, c. 186] that any alien, being a free white person and a minor under the age of 21 years, who shall have resided in the United States three years next preceding his arriving at the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have continued to reside therein to the time he may make application to be admitted as a citizen thereof, may, after he arrives at the age of 21 years, and after he shall have resided five years within the United States, including the three years of his minority, be admitted a citizen, &c. Section 1. Congress in this act reverts again to the use of the term of residence in its general sense, without the specification of a restriction as to the mode of its exercise or enjoyment. It is to be a residence of a continuous character; but absence from a domicile in the regular prosecution of a man's vocation or business does not divest his residence, and is entirely compatible with the demand of this section, because a residence, when obtained, in judgment of law continues to the party until a new one is acquired by him. The act of 1824, therefore, by re-enacting in respect to minors the provisions of the act of 1802 regarding residence, by implication of law dispenses with and supercedes the restrictions of the act of 1813 in that behalf. This case is, therefore, to be considered as if the act of 1813, in its application to minors, had been expressly repealed by the posterior act of 1824, and the applicant is accordingly entitled to his certificate of naturalization upon these proofs, under the act of 1802.

ENJOINING COLLECTION OF ASSESSMENT—LIEN OF GOVERNMENT—FORFEITURE.

1. Allegations in a bill, that an assessment made by the commissioner of internal revenue, is irregular, and in violation of law, and void, do not constitute ground for an injunction to restrain the collection of the assessment.

[Cited in Kensett v. Stivers, 10 Fed. Rep. 526; Snyder v. Marks, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160, 109 U. S. 193.]

2. Statements by a collector of internal revenue, to the effect that the government has no claim upon distillery property for unpaid taxes, do not affect the right of the government to assert an existing lien for taxes upon such property.

[Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

3. The remedy by bill in equity to collect assessments, conferred by section 3207, Rev. St., is cumulative.

4. Section 3224, Rev. St., is not limited in its application to the party taxed. A purchaser of distillery property upon which there is an existing lien for taxes due to the government, cannot acquire the same freed from such lien, though he purchase in good faith, for value, and without notice of the lien.

5. In a case where proceedings were instituted, for forfeiture of a distillery, followed by seizure and subsequent release of the property on bond under section 3331, Rev. St., but which were afterwards discontinued by the government without any judicial declaration of forfeiture, a lien for unpaid taxes is not lost or affected by such bonding and release of the property in the forfeiture proceeding, and a subsequent purchaser from the former owner takes the property incumbered by the lien.

In equity.

[Heard on motion to dissolve a temporary injunction that had been granted at the time of the filing of complainants' bill. Injunction dissolved.]

The bill charged, that the defendant, Bean, was collector, and that the defendant, Buckley, was deputy collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of Wisconsin; that the complainant, Alkan, was the owner of certain premises described in the bill, upon which was situated a distillery with all the distilling apparatus appertaining thereto. That these premises were conveyed to Alkan, October 12, 1875, by Lewis Rindskopf and wife; that on the 13th of October, 1875, he leased the property to the complainant Swenger, for the term of two years, at the annual rent of $2,500; that Swenger thereupon took possession of the premises and then began and thereafter carried on the business of distilling spirits thereon; that he executed the proper bond as a distiller, which was accepted by the officers of the United States; that he had paid all taxes upon all distilled spirits made by him, and complied with the laws relating to the distillation of spirits; that previous to the purchase of the property by Alkan, the business of distilling had been carried on by Rindskopf upon said premises; that on the 7th day of October, 1875, the premises, distillery and apparatus were seized by the collector for alleged infractions of the laws of the United States relating to internal revenue; that Rindskopf, as claimant, intervened, applied for the appointment of appraisers and release of the property, pursuant to section 3331, of the Revised Statutes; that appraisers were appointed, an appraisal made, and a bond given; that the distillery premises were released from seizure, and that the bond is still outstanding and in force; that afterwards an information was filed against said property, which recited the seizure, and prayed condemnation, but the prosecution thereof was afterwards abandoned by the United States, and was regularly dismissed. The bill further alleged that prior to the purchase of the premises and property by Alkan, he informed the collector and deputy collector of his contemplated purchase, and desired to know whether the United States had any claim against the property, and whether there were any unpaid taxes thereon due to the United States; that he was informed by the collector and his deputy that there were no such unpaid taxes, and that the United States had no claim against the property; that relying upon such statements and information he purchased the premises in good faith, and paid $15,000 therefor. That about Nov. 1, 1875, the commissioner of internal revenue assessed a tax upon or against said Rindskopf for $49,427.45, as being due for spirits distilled upon said premises, by Rindskopf, in the months of December, 1874, and January, February, March, April, May and June, 1875. The bill charged that this assessment was made irregularly, and in violation of law, and was void; and alleged further, that this assessment was certified by the commissioner to the defendant collector about Nov. 6, 1875; that the collector issued a warrant under which the premises in question were advertised for sale, to satisfy such assessment, which sale was thereafter abandoned; that on the 19th of May, 1876, the United States filed a bill in equity in this court against Rindskopf, the complainants in the present bill, and others, to subject said property, with other property, to sale, to satisfy said assessment, which bill in equity was still pending; that the property sought to be subjected to sale by that bill, aside from the premises owned by complainant, Alkan, consisted of three distinct parcels, of more value than the whole amount of the alleged assessment. The bill further alleged, that on the 10th of January, 1877, the defendant, Bean, as collector, issued a warrant to the defendant Buckley as deputy collector, for the collection of said assessment, under which warrant a seizure and levy were made upon the premises and distillery in question, and the same were advertised for sale; and the bill charged that such sale would be inequitable and unjust, and would create a cloud upon the title, and destroy the business carried on at the distillery. The prayer of the bill was for a perpetual injunction restraining the proposed sale, and any interference by the defendants with the property and business there carried on.

On filing this bill, a temporary restraining order was granted. The bill was demurred to, and on hearing, the demurrer was overruled. It was at the same time considered by the court that the temporary injunction previously granted should stand until the filing of an answer, when the defendants would be at liberty to move to dissolve that injunction. Subsequently an answer was filed and this motion was made.

The answer admitted the conveyance of the premises by Rindskopf to the complainant, Alkan, and the leasing of the same by the latter to the complainant, Swenger, but denied that these transactions were in good faith. It alleged that the premises, with the distillery thereon, had been for a long time in the occupancy of, and owned by, Rindskopf, and had been operated by him as a distillery, and various allegations were made in the answer, impeaching the good faith of the alleged purchase and ownership of the premises by Alkan, and the occupancy and possession of the same by Swenger. The answer admitted that the distillery premises were seized, October 7, 1875, by the collector; that the same were appraised and a bond given therefor, and that they were released from such seizure. But it was denied that the bond was outstanding, and it was alleged that the United States took no steps in said proceedings after such release, beyond the filing of an information, and that thereafter and before the issuance of the warrant for distraint and sale of the property, the proceedings were abandoned and notice of discontinuance was filed, and the same were regularly discontinued. It was also admitted that about October 12, 1875, the complainant, Alkan, inquired of the collector if the United States had any assessment against the distillery premises, and stated that he was talking about buying the property; that the deputy collector stated that the collector had no notice of any assessment against the premises, but that he could not tell when or how soon they might have such notice, and that they could give no guaranty against any assessment which might be made. The answer further admitted that the commissioner of internal revenue assessed the tax for $49,427.45, mentioned in the bill, alleged that such assessment was duly and regularly made, and what were claimed to be the facts and circumstances of the assessment were set forth, that the defendant, Bean, on the 10th of January, 1877, issued a warrant for the collection of said assessment, by virtue of which a seizure of the premises was made, and the same were advertised for sale. It was also admitted that on the 6th day of November, 1875, a warrant was issued for the collection of the assessment, and the premises were under that warrant advertised for sale, but that subsequently those proceedings were abandoned. The filing of the bill in equity, May 19, 1876, by the United States against Rindskopf and others, as alleged in the present bill was further admitted, but it was denied that the property sought to be subjected to sale by that bill, aside from the distillery premises, was of sufficient value to pay and satisfy said assessment. The answer also alleged that the present suit was brought to restrain the collection of a tax, within the meaning of section 3224 of the Revised Statutes.

J. P. C. Cottrill and J. C. McKenney, for complainants.

G. W. Hazelton, for defendants.

DYER, District Judge. By section 3251 of the Revised Statutes, the tax imposed by law on distilled spirits produced from any distillery, is a first lien on such spirits; the distillery used for distilling the same, the stills, vessels, fixtures and tools therein, the lot or tract of land whereon the distillery is situated, and any building thereon, from the time the spirits are in existence as such until the tax is paid. Section 3224 provides that "no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax, shall be maintained in any court."

The distillery premises in question, as appears by the bill, were conveyed to complainant, Alkan, October 12, 1875. The assessment by the commissioner was made in November, 1875, but it was for and on account of spirits distilled in December, 1874, and in January, February, March, April, May and June, 1875. So that the tax thus assessed, if legal and valid, was a lien on the property when the spirits came into existence, and unless this lien was subsequently lost, it continued and was in force at the time Alkan took his conveyance from the former owner.

The allegations in the bill that this assessment was made irregularly and in violation of law, and is therefore void, do not furnish ground for the intervention of the court by injunction to restrain the collection of the alleged tax. Upon this point I adopt without hesitation the language of the court in Howland v. Soule, [Case No. 6,800.] "The object of the statute is to prevent the assessment and collection of the public revenue from being hindered or delayed by judicial proceedings, at the instigation and upon the representation of parties interested, to avoid or resist the payment of taxes. The statute would be wholly inadequate to that object if such parties were allowed to maintain suits to enjoin the collection of a tax because, as they say, the proceedings in the revenue department were erroneous or illegal.

"The statute prohibits all suits to enjoin the collection of a tax, and leaves the person who considers himself aggrieved by the collection thereof to the ordinary and usual remedy—an action at law to recover back the amount paid.

"This is a tax within the meaning of the statute. It has the form and color of a tax. It was assessed upon manufactured articles liable to a duty, by a person in office and clothed with authority over the subject matter. The tax has come to the defendant for collection in due course of office, and from the proper authority. The defendant is the person authorized to collect such taxes and by the means proposed—the seizure and sale of the complainant's property."

The lien in favor of the United States could not be waived or affected by any statements made by the collector or his deputy to the complainant, Alkan, to the effect that the government had no claim against the property, and that there were no unpaid taxes thereon. No such statements or representations could estop the government from asserting any claim [it actually had,]² or any lien existing in its favor for unpaid taxes. And the complainant could not acquire the property divested of any such claim or lien because he may have relied upon such statements as are alleged in the bill to have been made by the collector prior to his purchase. If such representations or statements were made, they could not bind the government nor affect its rights.

Nor does the fact that at the time the proceedings against this property now sought to be restrained were instituted, there was pending a bill in equity previously filed by the United States under section 3207, to subject this distillery and other property to sale to satisfy the assessment, preclude the government from enforcing its alleged lien or claim by the statutory methods now pursued. The remedies given by the statute are concurrent. No one of them is exclusive. Section 3207, which authorizes the filing of a bill in chancery, does not declare that remedy exclusive, while section 3253 evidently contemplates concurrent remedies.

But it is contended upon other grounds that section 3224 ought not to be enforced against complainants' alleged equities. It is said that the complainant Alkan was a purchaser in good faith without notice of any claim by the government for unpaid taxes upon the distillery premises, and that the statute was not intended to forbid a suit by such a party to restrain the collection of a tax. This position is untenable unless the court can by construction properly add to this section what does not appear by its express terms. The language of the section is plain and comprehensive. "No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court." No exception is here stated. The scope of this section is not limited in terms to the party taxed. The evident purpose of the section is, as was held in Delaware R. Co. v. Prettyman, [Case No. 3,767,] "to prevent any interference with the prompt and regular collection of the revenue;" and where the commissioner of internal revenue, in making an assessment, acts within the limits of his jurisdiction, so that his acts cannot be treated as nullities. I am of the opinion, as was held in the case just cited, "that the purpose of the law was to prevent any person disputing by injunction process the validity of a tax assessed under the authority of an act of congress."

The lien of the government attaches under section 3251, as we have seen, from the time the spirits came into existence. This being so, how can a person subsequently purchase the property upon which the lien is by law imposed, and which is then existing, freed from the lien and its consequences, though his purchase may be innocent and without actual notice? In the case of U. S. v. Turners, [Case No. 16,548,] Mr. Justice Swayne held that the provisions of the statute then in force, that the tax shall be a lien on the interest of the distiller in the tract of land whereon the distillery is situated, from the time the spirits are distilled until the tax shall be paid, is absolute and unconditional, and secures to the government a lien upon the distillery premises as against innocent purchasers without notice.

In that case the tax accrued while the Turners were owning and operating the distillery. Subsequently they sold the distillery, and ultimately Stoltz became the innocent owner for value, and as such claimed to be protected. But the court granted a decree in favor of the government for sale of the property upon bill filed to subject the distillery to payment of the tax.

In connection with section 3224, the provisions of section 3226 may be noticed as bearing upon the evident object of the legislation on this subject. That section provides that no suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any internal tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected until appeal shall have been made to the commissioner of internal revenue, and his decision shall have been had thereon. The purpose of the legislation on this subject plainly is to prevent any interference by suit against the officers of the government with the collection of the tax. As Judge Shipman says, in U. S. v. Black, [Case No. 14,600,] "by the provision that no suit can be maintained for the purpose of restraining either the assessment or the collection of the tax, the statute has in fact provided that payment must be made at all events whether the tax was justly or unjustly levied, and that redress for an unjust exaction must be sought subsequently. The distiller is thus obliged to pay his taxes as they are assessed, and when they mature. If he neglects to pay, payment can be enforced by distraint, in which event his remedy is to pay the tax and appeal to the commissioner. If the appeal is denied, he can then resort to the courts to obtain repayment."

In conclusion, upon this question my view is, that where the assessing officer has jurisdiction to make the assessment, and a tax is assessed, inasmuch as the lien exists from the time the taxable articles come into existence, there cannot be incorporated into section 3224 an exception in favor of a subsequent purchaser of the property to which the lien is affixed, though such purchaser may have acquired the same innocently and without notice. To hold otherwise would, I think, be to disregard the plain and explicit inhibition contained in that section.

the learned counsel for complainants. The scope of the decision in that case is not to be enlarged beyond what is actually decided. The ruling there is not [and I conceive it cannot be construed to mean]³ that the distiller could have maintained a suit to restrain the collection of the tax, notwithstanding the prohibition of section 3224. Certainly this is not its effect, unless it be determined that the assessing officer in that case was wholly without jurisdiction to make the assessment for the period in question, and so that his act was a nullity. In that case the government attempted the collection of the alleged tax, not by distraint, but by action of debt upon the distiller's bond. The court held that the illegality of the tax could be set up as a defense to the action. Against this position were invoked the provisions of the statute, which declared that no suit shall be maintained for the recovery of any tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, until appeal shall have been made to the commissioner, and his decision had. And the court, in construing that section, held it inapplicable, because "the suit thus prohibited is a suit brought by the person taxed to recover back a tax illegally assessed and collected." Mr. Justice Bradley says further: "This is different from the case now under consideration, which is a suit brought by the government for collecting the tax, and the person taxed (together with his sureties) is defendant instead of plaintiff. No statute is cited to show that he cannot, when thus sued, set up the defense that the tax was illegally assessed, although he may not have appealed to the commissioner." From this language [in the opinion which expresses the reason for the conclusion reached]³ it seems clear that if the suit had been one brought by the distiller to restrain the collection of the tax, the court would not have hesitated to say that it was within the prohibition of the statute, and could not be maintained. The closing remarks of the court in the opinion clearly indicate this. "When the government elects to resort to the aid of the courts, it must abide by the legality of the tax. When it follows the statute, its officers have the protection of the statute, and the parties must comply with the requirements thereof before they can prosecute as plaintiffs."

But it is alleged in the bill that on the 7th day of October, 1875, proceedings were instituted by the United States, for the forfeiture of this distillery, on the ground of alleged infractions of the law, and that a seizure of the same was made; that Rinds-kopf, then the owner, intervened, and procured the appointment of appraisers, and a release of the property on bond, pursuant to section 3331, of the Revised Statutes, which authorizes such proceeding where there is live stock depending on the products of the distillery for feed, and which would suffer injury if the business of the distillery should be stopped. Further facts [in that case appear by the bill and answer to have been]³ that subsequent to the seizure, an information was filed, and thereafter the proceedings were abandoned and discontinued, and notice of discontinuance was given. It is contended, on the part of complainants, that the release of the distillery on bond, in the forfeiture proceeding, operated as a release of the property from any lien for unpaid taxes; and that the government is now estopped to assert such lien, and must pursue its remedy on the bond. In support of this position, the case of U. S. v. Mackoy, [Case No. 15,696,] has been confidently submitted as a conclusive authority. It is important, therefore, that the case cited be particularly and closely examined.

Mackoy purchased a distillery, and subsequently Mackoy & Co. began the business of distilling and continued the business [for a few months and]³ and until the distillery was seized by the collector for violation of the revenue laws. An information was filed and the property was released to Mackoy & Co., upon bond given as required by law, which bond was conditioned to the effect, that if the property should be condemned as forfeited, the obligors would thereupon pay into court the appraised value thereof. Pending the proceedings to have the property declared forfeited, Mackoy & Co. were adjudicated bankrupts. Subsequent to the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, a trial was had in the forfeiture case, and a judgment of forfeiture and condemnation was entered, which was followed by judgment against the sureties on the bond which had been given for the release of the property. The sureties then moved that the property be ordered to be sold under the judgment of condemnation, and that the proceeds be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment rendered against them. The assignee in bankruptcy also filed a petition for an order authorizing him to sell the property under section 25 of the bankrupt act. The motion made on behalf of the sureties was overruled, and the court directed the marshal to sell the property and return the proceeds into court for future order. Accordingly the property was sold by the marshal to one Mageath, which sale was confirmed, and a deed was executed to the purchaser. Subsequently an action was commenced by the government on the distillery bond to recover taxes assessed against the distillers and unpaid. A bill in chancery was also filed on the part of the United States, reciting the proceedings in the district court, making the assignee in bankruptcy, various lien creditors of Mackoy & Co., the sureties on the bond given on release of the property from seizure, and the purchaser of the distillery, defendants, and asserting a lien on the property for unpaid taxes, and asking to have the property subjected to the payment thereof. The question was, whether upon the facts so appearing, the bill could be sustained; and it was held that all of the interest of the United States in the property sold, passed to the purchaser, that the United States was estopped to set up as against the purchaser any lien thereon for taxes in existence, and known to it at the time the order for sale was made, and the bill was dismissed.

Now, in this case, there were certain distinguishing features, which clearly controlled the disposition made of it, and which are not to be overlooked.

First—The forfeiture proceedings were prosecuted to judgment of condemnation, and there was a full judicial declaration of forfeiture to the government. By the judgment it was necessarily determined and decreed, that the alleged causes of forfeiture existed, and that the acts had been committed which produced a forfeiture, and in consequence vested the ownership of the property in the United States, at the time of the violations of law.

Second—The liability of the sureties on the bond for release became fixed, and judgment was rendered against them for the amount of the appraised value of the property.

Third—The purchaser acquired his title, not from the original owner, but under a judicial sale, which was confirmed by the court, and which was followed by a marshal's deed to such purchaser, who at once made large improvements upon the property.

Fourth—The United States consented to the sale ordered by the court, and at that time, its bill asking to have the taxes declared a lien upon the distillery property, was pending. In his opinion, Judge Dillon expressly says, that the sale was made with the consent and for the benefit of the United States, and that it was plain upon the evidence: "That it was the intention to sell, to whomsoever should purchase, a clear and perfect title, and that the parties interested should litigate thereafter over the proceeds of such sale." Further, the court says: "There is no evidence to show that the United States intended to keep alive a tax lien upon the property. On the contrary, there is evidence that it abandoned the proceedings by which the property had been seized to secure the taxes now sought to be enforced, and the district attorney was instructed to commence suit on the bond."

Under the circumstances, the judgment of Judge Dillon was, [and he expressly rested his judgment on the circumstances] that the marshal's deed passed and conveyed to the purchaser all of the interest of the United States in the property, and that the United States was estopped to set up as against the purchaser any lien thereon for the taxes claimed to be due.

The case, then, was such as has been stated. Does it rule the case at bar? In my opinion it does not. The cases are dissimilar in essential particulars. Here, although forfeiture proceedings were begun, they were never prosecuted to judgment. There was no judicial declaration of forfeiture. There was no judicial ascertainment of the facts necessary to exist as the basis of a forfeiture and the existence of which was essential in order to vest the title of the property in the United States at the time of any violation of law. The proceedings were discontinued. Necessarily the bond fell with the proceedings, because necessarily the terms of the bond and the obligations of the sureties must have been, that the principal should answer and perform the ultimate decree of the court; and if no decree should be rendered because of a discontinuance of the cause, the bond would cease to have any effect and its life would then terminate. Here, too, the sale was by the original owner. The United States was not a party to it; it did not consent to it. It was not a sale for its benefit as in U. S. v. Mackoy, [supra.] The United States did not act evidencing an abandonment of any lien for taxes upon the property.

It is true that in the opinion of the court in the case referred to, it is stated that "the effect of a release of the property on bond is that it may be sold bona fide, and give the purchaser a good title, or liens or rights may be acquired after such release, which will be protected." But this enunciation should be considered in connection with the facts of the case then before the court, and with which the court was dealing. And the scope of the decision is not to be enlarged beyond what is necessary to decide upon the case presented. In that case the proceeding being prosecuted to judgment of condemnation, and the liability of the sureties being fixed by the adjudication of the court, undoubtedly the effect of the release on bond was such as the court pronounced.

Further, the court, in its opinion, speaks of the property as owned by the United States at the time of the violations of law for which it was seized. It must be borne in mind that there was a judgment of forfeiture and condemnation, and, therefore, it was judicially ascertained that the facts existed, that the violations of law had transpired which, eo instanti, divested the title of the original owner.

In the case at bar there was no such ascertainment of facts, but a discontinuance of the forfeiture proceedings, the bond, in consequence, then and thereafter, ceasing to have any force or effect.

In the case of U. S. v. Turners, supra, the spirits upon which the tax was unpaid were removed upon transportation bonds and sold in the market. It was claimed not only that

[From 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 351.]

Stoltz was an innocent purchaser for value without notice, but that the lien of the United States upon the distillery was discharged by taking the transportation bond. But Mr. Justice Swayne, as we have seen, held the lien upon the distillery premises valid [notwithstanding] as against an innocent purchaser, without notice, for value. And in that case as in this, the title of the purchaser had its source in the former owner.

Considering this case upon all the points presented by the bill and on the argument, I have been unable to reach any other conclusion than, that to continue the preliminary injunction granted in this cause, would be to disregard a statute which forbids any such restraint upon the collection of a tax in favor of the government.

Mr. Van Vleck, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Judge. The libel in this case was filed to recover for materials furnished and labor done as plumber and coppersmith, upon, and in the construction of, the ship Francis A. Palmer. The materials were furnished and the work done at the request of William Perrine, the builder of the vessel, and who had charge of her at the time. The F. A. Palmer is described in the libel as a domestic vessel, and owned by persons resident in the city of New York. The libellant claims $782.79.

The principal question argued in the case was, whether or not Perrine, the builder, and at whose request the materials were furnished and the work done, was owner at the time; so as to bring the case within the statute of New York giving a lien to material men and laborers in the construction and equipment of vessels. It was insisted, on the part of the claimant, that he was not the owner, but that the title and the ownership were in Post, the person for whom the vessel was built, under the peculiar wording of the contract. This question has become immaterial since the decision of the case of the People's Ferry Co. of Boston v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, 402. It was held that the admiralty jurisdiction did not extend to cases of liens claimed for work done, or materials furnished in the construction of ships; that the contract for building was not a maritime contract; nor did it involve rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation, in the sense of the law giving jurisdiction to the admiralty. This case was decided after full argument and a careful consideration of the question; and we must regard it as settling the point of jurisdiction in the case before us. For, if the court had no jurisdiction of the principal contract, for building the vessel, and this, on account of its nature and character, not being a maritime contract, it had not of the collateral or incidental contracts arising out of the construction. They must be regarded as partaking of the nature of the principal one; certainly, of no higher character in this respect. It may be said, however, that the statute of New York gives a lien to the material man and workman in this case, which distinguishes it from the case referred to. It is true that there was no statute in the state of New Jersey, where that vessel was built, giving a lien to the builder, but that circumstance in no way influenced the judgment of the court. The result would have been the same if a local lien had been given by the state law. The local lien attaches in no case within the admiralty law as heretofore expounded by the courts of the country, except where the contract is maritime in its nature and character. This was so decided soon after the courts recognized the local liens, and enforced them to the admiralty. It was so decided in the case of a libel by the master of a ship for his wages. [The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. (36 U. S.) 175.] The lien was denied, though given by the local law. This question, as to the effect of local lien, will not be material hereafter, as the supreme court have decided not to recognize or adopt it in any cases arising or suits commenced, after the first of the present month. The rule of the court recognizing it was repealed, to take effect on that day. The decree of the court below is reversed, and the libel dismissed, for want of jurisdiction.

The ALLEGHANY.

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Sept. Term, 1865.²

DUTY OF PROPELLER ENTERING HARBOR—DUTY OF TUG MEETING.

1. A steam vessel entering a harbor is bound to observe the utmost vigilance to avoid collision with other vessels, and a propeller is negligent in entering the harbor of Milwaukee at the rate of eight miles an hour.

2. Having exchanged signals with a tug towing out a schooner, she is bound to keep the side of the channel agreed upon. If she sheers or refuses to obey the helm it becomes her duty to stop.

3. The tug is entitled to half the river, and is not bound to keep close to the pier.

4. The tug with her tow had the character of a steamer going out on her own course, agreed upon with the propeller, which course she was bound to keep, and had the right to, exclusive of the propeller.

5. If she had attempted to cross the channel on seeing that the propeller sheered, and did not obey the helm, she would have done so at her own risk, and there is no obligation upon her to maneuver in reference to the course of the propeller.

[In admiralty. Libel for collision. Decree for libellant, affirmed by circuit court in The Alleghany, Case No. 205, and that decree affirmed by supreme court, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 522.]

The libellant, Bernard Goldsmith, shipped on board the schooner Henry C. Winslow a cargo of oats, at Milwaukee, to be carried to the port of Buffalo. On the 7th of May, 1864, the schooner left her dock in the Milwaukee river, in tow of the steam tug W. K. Muir. It was broad daylight and clear, wind from the southwest. Shortly after leaving the dock, the captain of the tug, seeing the propeller Alleghany coming inside the piers, signaled her by one whistle to keep the starboard or right side, the usual signal, in like cases; the propeller replied by a like signal: the tug signaled a second time, when the propeller was about ten rods distant, which was replied to as before; the propeller struck the schooner on her port cat-head, cutting her nearly to her keel, so that she sunk within fifteen minutes. The answer admits the signals, from the tug by one whistle, to keep to the starboard side, the tug then being above the piers, which was answered by a like signal; the second signal, when the propeller was about ten rods off, is also admitted. It is also admitted that the propeller and schooner collided between the harbor piers, and that the propeller struck the schooner, and cut into her, so that she sunk as charged in the libel. It is also admitted in the answer, "that the propeller proceeded up about the center line between the piers; that in proceeding so far to the starboard side of such channel, the propeller, drawing eleven feet two inches of water, dragged the bottom, so that she would not mind her helm; that the propeller proceeded up about the center line between the piers, gradually losing her speed." The proof was that, on account of her speed and draught of water, the propeller steered wildly, sheering from side to side, and not answering her helm. The propeller Alleghany came up to the piers from the south, having run from Chicago at the rate of about ten or eleven miles an hour; and on a strife with the propeller Maine coming in from the north, she entered the piers ahead. The rate of speed of the Alleghany entering the piers was eight miles an hour. The piers are eleven hundred and fifty feet in length, extending east and west, and about two hundred and sixty feet apart. The length of the schooner was about one hundred and thirty-seven feet. The collision occurred about two lengths of the schooner from the mouth of the river, between the piers.

MILLER, District Judge. There is the usual conflicting testimony in collision cases. Several persons who were on board the propeller as passengers and otherwise, in a set of stereotyped answers, testify that at the time of the collision she was nearer the north pier than the south. This is in contradiction of the answer and the other evidence. The answer states that the propeller kept in the center between the piers; and the proof is that at the time of the collision her bow was fifty feet south of the center, heading southwestward. It is satisfactorily shown that immediately before the collision the engines of the propeller were reversed. It is not necessary to a correct decision of the question of fault, on the part of the propeller, to examine at length the volume of evidence submitted. The facts above stated from the pleadings show satisfactorily that the propeller was in fault. The well-established rule, that a steam vessel entering a harbor is bound to observe the utmost vigilance to avoid collision with other vessels, was not observed by the propeller in the following particulars:

1. The propeller entered the harbor from the lake at too great speed. The rate of eight miles an hour is not allowable. A steam vessel entering between the piers from the lake, even on slackening her speed by shutting off steam when inside, may not be in condition to stop or reverse in time to avoid collision with vessels under way out. "There being no usage as to an open way, the vigilance is thrown upon the entering vessel. Ordinary care under such circumstances will not excuse a steamer for a wrong done." The length of the piers is too short and the space between them too narrow to admit the ordinary maneuver of vessels in the open sea to avoid collisions. The collision occurred about nine hundred and thirty feet from the outer end of the piers. At the rate of eight miles an hour, the propeller would reach that point in less than one minute. If checked in speed one-half on her way up, she would reach that point in one minute and one-half. By running in at that rate, and a tug with a schooner in tow in full view of meeting her, the propeller must take the responsibility.

2. The signal was given the propeller in due time to keep to the right side, which was answered in like manner. It then became the duty of the propeller to keep the right or north side of the center between the piers, which she did not; and at the moment of the collision her bow was about fifty feet south of the center, heading into the schooner.

3. When the propeller sheered, and did not answer her helm to the starboard, steered wildly and was unmanageable, it was the duty of the master to stop her until the tug and schooner had passed. The propeller had full power to stop at any time, and to reverse. She did not stop in time to avoid the collision.

It is alleged that the tug was in fault for not keeping close to the south pier, and out of the way of the propeller. The tug was entitled to one-half the channel or space between the piers. The signals settled that matter between the propeller and the tug. The captain of the tug even on seeing that the propeller sheered, and did not answer her helm a-starboard, would have risked collision at his expense by running the tug in reference to the course of the propeller, or to have steered towards the north pier. There was no obligation upon the tug so to maneuver at its own risk of condemnation in case of collision. The tug was on its own course, and had the right of it, exclusive of the propeller. It is true that the tug was not in the range of a sailing vessel, requiring steamboats to keep out of the way. The tug had the character of a steam vessel, going out of port, on its own course, agreed upon with the propeller, which it was bound to keep. The wind being from the southwest, although not very strong, yet striking the schooner on her starboard, it is not probable that she would be a-starboard of the tug. It would require a quick movement on the part of the tug to bring the schooner into line at the point of entrance into the piers. The tug at the time of the collision was heading south-eastward, and could not have advanced much further on that course without running on the south pier. In this movement the tug was making way for the propeller.

In the answer it is stated, "that the master of the propeller saw the schooner descending the river in tow of a tug. He immediately caused the steam to be shut off entirely from the engine of the propeller, in order that the schooner might get between the harbor piers before he met her. And that when the schooner had got within five hundred feet of the propeller, the master of the propeller saw that the vessels, if they proceeded at the speed at which they were going, and upon the same courses, must meet in the bend of the river where it turns out of the old channel to come into the straight cut between the piers, gave the order to the engineer to reverse the engines of the propeller, and that thereupon the engines were immediately reversed." The tug and schooner being in the bend of the river where it empties into the straight cut between the piers, and the captain of the propeller, knowing that to be a difficult point of navigation, particularly for a tug with a vessel in tow, and requiring an effort at that point on the part of the tug to keep its tow in line, preferred meeting them inside the piers, where there was less danger of collision. Whatever fault there was, consisted in the propeller running up too far. The tug was running at a rate of between three and four miles an hour, and if the propeller was then running at four miles an hour, it is evident that a collision must occur before the propeller could assume a backward movement. It was also argued, that the tug was in fault for allowing the men on board the schooner to be setting sails coming down the river. It was a matter of duty and of necessity to prepare the vessel for navigation and protection, before passing out into the open lake. In less than two minutes, if the collision had not occurred, the schooner would have been cast loose from the tug in the lake. It was alleged that the master of the tug, seeing the unmanageable condition of the propeller, in not answering her helm, should have stopped. If the tug could have stopped, what would have become of the schooner?

She could not be stopped short of being turned completely around in the way of the propeller, and with greater certainty of collision. From examination of the pleadings and evidence, my opinion is, that the propeller is in sole fault of the collision, and a decree is ordered accordingly.

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court against the propeller Alleghany for the loss of a cargo of oats shipped by the libellant, Bernard Goldsmith, on board the schooner Henry C. Winslow, which was sunk by collision with the Alleghany. The facts are fully stated in the case in the district court. 1 Biss. 497, [The Alleghany, Case No. 204.]

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. This case was at the last term argued with great ability and earnestness, but for want of time to consider it, was not decided. I have recently read the evidence and briefs with care and examined the authorities referred to, and am prepared to announce the conclusion at which I have arrived. The testimony is, in a large degree, conflicting, and in many respects irreconcilable, but there are certain leading facts established, as I think, clearly by the evidence, on which, in my opinion, the case turns. The tug Muir left her dock in the harbor of Milwaukee about 7 o'clock on the morning of the 4th of May, 1864, with the schooner Winslow in tow for the purpose of towing her out into the lake. The propeller Alleghany was near the mouth of the straight cut, making for the harbor, and being seen by the tug, was signalled to keep to the right, which signal was accepted. It is uncertain at what point in the river the tug sounded her first whistle, but it is not material, as the notice which the signal gave to the propeller, was in proper time. The tug and tow proceeded down towards the lake, and the propeller up the straight cut, until she struck the schooner in her port side, cutting down several feet below her water line so that she sunk within fifteen minutes. There can be no dispute that this collision was inexcusable, for it occurred on a bright clear day, with nothing to obstruct the view of the approaching vessels, the peculiarities of the navigation well known, and the wind not unfavorable. The important subject of inquiry is to ascertain who is to blame for it. In order to do this, it is not only necessary to consider the conduct and condition of the boats, but also whether the passage up and down the river and cut was beset with difficulties which all mariners accustomed to the port were presumed to know. The evidence shows where the Milwaukee river empties into the straight cut is a difficult point of navigation, difficult for even ascending boats to get the right turn into the river, and requiring a tug towing a vessel out into the lake to use care and skill to get the vessel properly straightened up between the piers. There is also near the inner end of the north pier shoal water, which causes heavily loaded vessels with large draught to sheer off if they go too near it. In the view I take of this case, it is not necessary to determine the exact place where the collision took place. The evidence leaves it uncertain—it is strange that it is so, with so many persons witnessing it—but if not at the entrance of the piers, it was not far inside of them, and at all events the tow was not fairly straightened up in the cut when it happened. Did the captain of the propeller do all he could under the circumstances to avoid this collision? I think not—he knew he had to take the starboard side of the channel, and yet the answer says he kept only as far over to the starboard as he was able and not go aground, and that in proceeding as far as he did to starboard, his boat dragged the bottom, so that she would not mind her helm, and the evidence sustains the allegation of the answer that she would not mind her helm. Did not these considerations point out to the captain his clear line of duty? Having accepted the signal of the tug to go to the right of the channel, if, for any cause, he found himself unable to do so, he should have waited until the tug and tow passed. Pursuing the center of the channel was certainly not taking the starboard side of it, and going ahead at all after these warnings was experimenting in the face of danger. Besides, the tug had the right to full half the channel. The necessity for haste is not apparent, and it will be conceded that a good seaman would always act as if apprehensive of danger when meeting a tug and tow in a place no wider than the straight cut of the Milwaukee river, and with similar difficulties of navigation.

It is said, it was as much the duty of the tug to have stopped as it was of the propeller. I do not think so. The propeller could stop at any time and reverse, while the tug could not without throwing the schooner around. If the critical point of navigation and the shoal water were equally known to both, yet the master of the propeller knew, better than the master of the tug, the unmanageable condition of his boat and the reasons for it. The tug could not know why the propeller was not under control, and had a right to presume that no boat liable to sheer because of too great draught of water would venture the ascent of the cut with a tug and tow approaching, when a detention of two minutes at the farthest would relieve her of all trouble. The tug having signalled that she would keep to the south, it was her duty to do so, and if she had altered her course for any reason, she would have been properly chargeable in case of collision. As she could not stop without turning the schooner around, it was her duty to go ahead. The dangers of collision are greater in narrow rivers than in the open lake because vessels, in times of peril, cannot be so readily manoeuvred in the river, and the interests of commerce imperatively require that all boats propelled by steam, in entering a harbor, should check down their speed so as to be under easy control. The Alleghany was in fault in not doing this. Some of the witnesses testify that four miles an hour is the usual rate of speed with which steam vessels enter the Milwaukee harbor, and that they can steer better while running at that rate than if the speed is less or greater. It is certain the Alleghany entered the cut running much faster—how fast it is not easy to tell, but the speed was not less than six miles an hour, and probably higher. Whatever the exact rate of speed, it was too fast, as is proved by her bad steering and inability to mind her helm. It would seem that the master, in his hurry to reach her dock, did not appreciate the responsibility of his position, nor apprehend danger until it was too late. If he misapprehended the speed of his boat or its effect before he entered the cut, as soon as he entered and saw she sheered badly, it was his duty to have checked down to a point that would have enabled him to have readily stopped her when he found difficulty in going to the starboard of the center of the channel. It is true, the engines of the propeller were reversed before the collision, but it was then too late, for the movement did not succeed in stopping, in time, the headway of the boat. That the propeller was in considerable motion at the moment of collision is demonstrated by the character of the injury which the Winslow suffered. The fault was in not doing sooner what was left undone until the peril was imminent. I do not interpret the evidence so as to charge the tug or tow with fault. It is said they did not keep to the south of the channel, but the evidence which has weight with me, proves the contrary.

It is proper to state that I place slender reliance upon the testimony of the passengers on board the Alleghany who swear she was nearer the north than the south pier when the vessels collided. They mean to tell the truth, but I distrust very much their ability to judge of courses and distances on an element to which they are not accustomed, and this distrust is increased when I find they are contradicted by the weight of the remaining evidence in the case. Besides there are too many of them who swear too nearly alike. It is insisted the tug and tow could with safety to themselves have gone further south. This may or may not be true, but if true, it was not a fault, for they left plenty of room to the north for any vessel that would mind her helm and would not sheer, and they were not required to go further south to accommodate a vessel in the predicament of the Alleghany. The decree of the court below is affirmed.

[NOTE. This decree was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion, reviewed the facts involved, and remarked that, as the master of the propeller knew the difficulties of the channel, it was "his duty to avoid the meeting in that part of the cut where the propeller could not go to the north side, and to make no attempt to pass until the tug could straighten out her tow. He had it in his power to select the place for passing. If it be, as is now contended, that the propeller could not at that part of the cut go nearer the north pier, in consequence of the bar, she was not the less in fault. She ought not to have been there. She ought to have foreseen the difficulty, and guarded against it; and this fault is closely connected with another. The propeller entered the cut at too great a rate of speed. This increased the danger. It brought her to the place of greatest difficulty at the most unfavorable time for passing it, besides making her unmanageable. * * * It is thus manifest that the collision was caused by the misconduct of those in charge of the propeller." The Alleghany, 9 Wall. Case No. 206.

[1 Hughes, 115; Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 206.]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. 1871.

TRADE-MARKS — WHAT WILL BE PROTECTED — "EUREKA" AS A NAME.

The word "Eureka," first used by complainants in a compounded fertilizer which they call the "Eureka Ammoniated Bone Superphosphate of Lime," and have used for several years, is a trade-mark, in the exclusive use of which they have the right to be protected by the courts.

In equity. The complainants, a Boston company, are the manufacturers of a fertilizer to which they have given the name of "Eureka Ammoniated Bone Superphosphate of Lime." The defendants manufacture a fertilizer which they call the "Baltimore 'Eureka' Ammoniated Bone Superphosphate of Lime." At a former hearing the court had refused the complainants' application for a preliminary injunction, because the defendants, in their answer, denied that the appropriation of the name as a trade-mark was original with the complainants. The testimony, however, proved conclusively that the name originated with the complainants in 1865, and that its use by them had been continuous and exclusive to the present time, and under that name the fertilizer manufactured by them had become widely known. [Injunction granted.]

S. T. Wallis and T. W. Hall, for complainants.

J. H. B. Latrobe and J. A. Preston, for defendants.

GILES, District Judge. The natural or proper designation of an article can never become a trade-mark, because anybody making the article has a right to call it by its proper name. Upon this ground, in a previous case, the court had refused protection to the name "Balm of a Thousand Flowers" as a trade-mark, because it had been proved that it was a common designation among perfumers, having its correlative in various European languages, e. g., the French "mille fleurs," Italian "mille fiori," etc. But a purely arbitrary or fanciful appellation, for the first time used to distinguish an article to which it has no natural or necessary relation, does, by virtue of that very appropriation, and subsequent use, become a trade-mark. Such was the Greek word "Eureka," applied to a fertilizer. The same might be said of a symbol or sign, such as a cross, a star, or lion, which, when stamped upon a particular article, may become its distinctive mark, and will be upheld as such so soon as the article becomes known and distinguishable by that mark. But the words "ammoniated bone superphosphate of lime" being the proper name of an article which anybody may make or sell, by themselves could never constitute a trade-mark. "Eureka" was, therefore, for the purpose, and in the connection in which it was used, the complainants' trade-mark. By it the fertilizer manufactured by them became known, was bought and sold, and acquired its reputation. Persons at a distance desiring to order it wrote to their merchants, "Send me ten, twenty, or thirty tons of 'Eureka.'" Even in the trade it was far better known by this name, as the testimony showed, than by the name of the manufacturer or place of manufacture. The name was, therefore, valuable to the complainants, and they were entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of it as their trade-mark. To deny this protection would be a reproach to the law or to a court of equity. If it was not valuable, why did the defendants seek to appropriate it, when all the languages of the earth were open to them from which to make their selection? If it had no value in their eyes, why did they take the advice of counsel as to their right to use it? This very conduct of the defendants proved that, in their estimation, it was a thing of value to the complainants. But it was argued the name adopted by the complainants did not sufficiently indicate "origin and ownership" to be regarded as a trade-mark. This was a mistake. It served to distinguish the complainants' manufacture quite as effectually as names ever serve to distinguish things. The doctrine contended for would invalidate ninety-nine in a hundred of the trade-marks which had been upheld by the courts. It was also said that no violation of the complainants' rights had been attempted by the defendants, inasmuch as they did not profess to sell their fertilizer as the manufacture of the complainants, but the contrary, and their advertisements in the newspapers had been read in proof of this fact. This was also illusory. They had attempted, by the appropriation of the complainants' trade-mark, to profit by the reputation their fertilizer enjoyed in the market, with the value of which they were well acquainted, having been for several years the complainants' agents in this city. Besides, the fertilizerwas widely sold in different portions of the south, where the defendants' advertisements might never be seen. It was in evidence that persons had been deceived, that a farmer in Virginia, wishing to buy the article he had used and tested for several years, which was the complainants', had bought the defendants' instead, misled by the name. This was all wrong, and whatever the intentions of the defendants might be, it was a fraud in law, which it is the duty of this court to prevent. Nor was it necessary that the defendants should have copied the entire trade-mark of the complainants, or that the verbal or physical resemblance of the two marks, placed side by side, should be complete. They had taken the essential part of the complainants' mark when they took the word "Eureka."

Judge Giles referred to various authorities in support of the views he had expressed. He read with particular approbation the opinion of Lord Cranworth in the case of Seixo v. Provezende, reported in [L. R.] 1 Ch. App. [192], as containing the clearest exposition of the law of trade-marks he had found; also a recent decision of the supreme court of Missouri, reported in the July number of the American Law Register for 1869, [Filley v. Fassett, 44 Mo. 169, 100 Amer. Dec. 275.] in which the name "Charter Oak," as applied to a stove, had been upheld as a trade-mark, and which, the learned judge said, fully covered the ground of the present case. The conclusion of the whole matter, in his opinion, was that, when the right of a manufacturer or dealer to a particular trade-mark had, by priority of appropriation, been once established, no rival manufacturer was at liberty to use the same mark for the same purpose, even in connection with his own name and place of manufacture. He would, therefore, sign a decree in the present case perpetually enjoining the defendants from any use of the complainants' mark.

[NOTE. Arbitrary words used for the first time to distinguish the productions of one person from those of another may become a valid trade-mark, and will be protected by injunction; such, for instance, as the "Star Shirt," (Morrison v. Case, Case No. 9,845;) "Anti Washboard" soaps, (O'Rourke v. Central City Soap Co., 26 Fed. Rep. 576;) "Chatterbox," as applied to a series of juvenile publications, (Estes v. Williams, 21 Fed. Rep. 189;) "Good-year," as applied to manufactures of rubber, (Goodyear Rubber Co. v. Goodyear's Rubber Manuf'g Co., 21 Fed. Rep. 276.) To the same effect, see Roberts v. Sheldon, Case No. 11,916; Shaw Stocking Co. v. Mack, 12 Fed. Rep. 707; Kinney v. Allen, Case No. 7,826. The limitations upon the use of devices as trade-marks are well defined. The object of the trade-mark is to indicate, either by its own meaning or by association, the origin or ownership of the article to which it is applied. Manufacturing Co. v. Trainer, 101 U. S. 51. This object of the trade-mark and the consequent limitations upon its use are well stated in Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 311.

by Mr. Justice Strong,—that "no one can claim protection for the exclusive use of a trade-mark or trade-name which would practically give him a monopoly in the sale of any goods other than those produced or made by himself. If he could, the public would be injured, rather than protected, for competition would be destroyed. Nor can a generic name, or name merely descriptive of an article of trade, of its qualities, ingredients, or characteristics, be employed as a trade-mark, and the exclusive use of it be entitled to legal protection." Consequently the use of a geographical name as a trade-mark will not be protected if naturally applicable to the article to which it is applied, such as "Pennsylvania Wheat," "Kentucky Hemp," "Virginia Tobacco," "Sea Island Cotton," (Canal Co. v. Clark, supra;) but where the geographical name is used in a manner calculated to deceive, as "St. Louis Lager Beer," applied by a New York brewer to his own production, such illegitimate use will be enjoined in favor of a brewer in St. Louis who had established a trade and reputation as a manufacturer of "St. Louis Lager Beer," (Anheuser-Busch Brewing Ass'n v. Piza, 24 Fed. Rep. 149.) So, also, it was held that the use of words calculated to deceive will not be protected, such as "straight cut" arbitrarily applied to tobacco to which it is not applicable, (Ginter v. Kinney Tobacco Co., 12 Fed. Rep. 782,) or "Mason's Patent, Nov. 30, 1858," or "Mason Jar of 1858," when in fact the jar was not patented, (Consolidated Fruit-Jar Co. v. Darfinger, Case No. 3,129.) See, also, Seabury v. Grosvenor, Id. 12,576, and Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436, 108 U. S. 218. The word "Centennial" is an example of a word which has by general use become common property. Hartwell v. Viney, Case No. 6,173a. For a summary of the law of trade-marks, see *Columbia Mill Co. v. The ALLEGIANCE.

SALVOR, UNDERTAKING OF—DUTY OF TOW—SALVAGE BY STEAM TUG—COMPENSATION.

1. A salvor does not undertake to succeed in saving the property in peril, but only that he will exercise ordinary skill and diligence in the use of the means or machinery with which he undertakes the salvage service.

2. It is the duty of the vessel in tow to keep in proper trim and tack, to follow the tug, and steer accordingly; and, if injury results to the tow from negligence or mistake in these respects, the tug is not responsible.

3. Owing to its comparative independence of the winds and currents, a steam tug may perform a salvage service with comparative safety to herself, and therefore the matter of risk to herself and crew is to be estimated accordingly, in fixing the value of such service.

4. A steam tug of three hundred and four horse-power left Baker's bay, and overtook an iron ship of one thousand two hundred and thirty-five tons, worth forty-seven thousand dollars, drawing twelve feet of water, in ballast, drifting onto the west end of Chinook spit in seventeen feet of water at flood tide, near two hours before high water, with the wind blowing about eight from the south-east, and took her hawser and towed her under the lee of the east of Sand island, where, owing to the strength of the wind, which had increased to ten and veered to south-east by south, she was compelled to let her go in comparatively safe anchorage in twenty-three feet of water; but the ship, only letting go one anchor, dragged on to the spit, where she lay until next morning in about four or five feet of water at low tide, when the tug, and three others of near the same power, and working under the same management, returned to her, and pulled her off about two hours before high water, with a light breeze from the east by south, and the ship heading south and west, without any serious risk to the tugs or actual injury thereto. Held, that the service was a salvage service, and the compensation therefor fixed at five thousand dollars.

Ellis G. Hughes and William H. Effinger, for claimant.

DEADY, District Judge. A. D. Wass and George C. Flavel bring this suit against the British ship Allegiance upon a cause of salvage, civil and maritime, for salvage service rendered by them to said ship with the aid of the steam tugs Brenham, Astoria, and Columbia, and their officers and crews, on January 10 and 11, 1879, in and near the north channel of the Columbia river, between black buoy No. 5 and the east end of Sand island. Upon due process and proceedings the vessel was seized and appraised at forty-seven thousand dollars, and delivered to the owner, David Morgan, of Anglesea, Wales, upon a stipulation in the sum of thirty thousand dollars. The answer of the claimant denies that the service rendered to the Allegiance was a salvage service, and avers that it was only a towage service, worth not to exceed two hundred dollars. Afterwards, upon the stipulation of the libelants and claimant, A. M. Simpson, George Flavel, and A. D. Wass, as owners of the tugs, and E. Johnson, A. Malcolm, and D. M. McVicker, as part of the crew of the Brenham, were admitted to intervene herein as joint salvors with the libelants, and to become parties to the libel. The testimony is somewhat voluminous, and upon some material points conflicting. The master, mate, and two pilots of the Brenham, the master of the Astoria, the master of the light-house tender, the Shubrick, and of a merchant vessel, the McNear, were examined as witnesses by the libelants; and the master and two mates of the Allegiance, the master and two lieutenants and the boatswain and carpenter of the revenue cutter, the Corwin, for the claimant. After an extended examination of the testimony, and a careful comparison of the disputed points with the known circumstance of the channel, spits and tides of the locality, and after weighing well the intelligence, means of knowledge, candor, and credibility of the witnesses, I find the material facts of the case to be as follows: On the evening of January 9, 1879, the Allegiance, an iron ship of one thousand two hundred and thirty-five tons burden, two hundred and twelve feet in length, and drawing twelve feet of water, made the mouth of the Columbia river in ballast, on her way to this port. She stood off and on until morning, when getting pretty close to the breakers, and no pilot coming to her aid, she crossed the bar at a quarter past ten o'clock, with a fair wind from the southwest, under her topsails, foresail, foretopmast staysail, and jib, and passed red buoy No. 2 on the starboard tack, about eleven o'clock, nearly one hundred and fifty yards to the eastward of the channel, with a whole-sail breeze from the south by east, her course being about north-east by east. The master of the Allegiance had never been in the Columbia river before, but the mate had once, and told the master, as an inducement to come in without a pilot, that they would certainly find the steam tug and pilot in Baker's bay. At this time the tug Brenham was lying at anchor near the wharf at Fort Canby in Baker's bay, well around the point of the cape, and the revenue cutter Corwin was at anchor in the same bay, about two hundred yards to the north-north-east of her. The officers of the tug had known from early morning that the Allegiance was outside the bar, but had not gone out to give her a pilot or a tow because of the roughness of the bar. When the Allegiance passed the red buoy No. 2 the weather was getting thick, and she had not yet made out the entrance to Baker's bay, and the master probably thought it was ahead of him in the direction in which he was sailing. Soon after the Allegiance passed the red buoy No. 2 she was sighted by the cutter, and it appearing to the master of the latter that the former was out of the channel, he gave the alarm by blowing his whistle. This attracted the attention of the Allegiance, and she at once commenced to shorten sail, luffed up to the wind, and checked her way, but drifted on before the wind and tide in a north-east direction. The tide was flood and lacked about two hours of high water. The current was running in at the rate of three or four miles an hour, while the wind had a velocity of about eight, and was increasing.

As soon as the Allegiance passed the cape, the tug called her pilot from off shore, got up her anchor, set her flag, and started after the Allegiance, to save her from being lost or going ashore, and overtook her about one and a half miles from the cape, beyond the black buoy No. 5, in seventeen feet of water, with her foretopsail and staysails and fore and main lower topsails set, her yards braced sharp up, on the starboard tack, drifting, without headway, and within two hundred yards of the breakers on the west end of Chinook spit. Here the Allegiance signified that she wanted the services of the tug, when the latter passed her a line, and took the ship's hawser, of about forty fathoms, on board, and commenced towing her out into the channel. By this time the wind had veered to about southeast by south. The tug put her helm hard a-port, and tried to haul the ship around against the wind, to take her back into Baker's bay; but owing to the strength of the wind upon her starboard bow, and the fact that her sails had not all been taken in and were aback, the tug was unable to do so, and then she commenced towing the ship in the channel towards Astoria. After towing her in this direction from three fourths of an hour to an hour under the pressure of seventy-eight pounds of steam, and making from three-fourths of a mile to a mile, the wind increased to ten, and the tug was unable to tow the ship any further, and both were drifting by the force of the wind and tide in the direction of the breakers on Chinook spit, whereupon the tug blew her whistle and signaled the ship to let go her anchor. The port anchor only was let go, and it was let go foul, the chain being around the stock, and when thirty fathoms of chain had run out and the anchor had bit or taken hold, the tug cut the hawser—it being unsafe to attempt to back and cast it off—and proceeded to Astoria for assistance. At this time the ship was on the lee side of the channel in three and one half fathoms of water, with some of her sails not yet wholly furled. She paid out forty fathoms of chain on her port anchor, but it was not sufficient to hold her, and she dragged to the northward on the sands about two hundred yards. The starboard anchor, being on the rail, was not let go at the signal from the tug, but was let go about the time the ship got on the sands, and lay near her forefoot until night, when it was hove up for fear the vessel might float upon it on the next high water. Between three and four o'clock in the afternoon the tug Brenham returned from Astoria, accompanied by the tugs Astoria and Columbia, and found the Allegiance on the sands, and two or three feet out of the water, and, being unable to render her any assistance at the time, proceeded with the Columbia to Baker's bay, while the Astoria remained in the vicinity for an hour and a half, and then joined her companions at the cape. On the morning of the eleventh the three tugs went up to the relief of the Allegiance about nine o'clock, going within about one hundred and seventy-five yards of her. The weather was fair, with a light breeze from the east by south, and a considerable swell from the incoming tide. The pilot of the tug Brenham, E. Johnson, boarded the ship, and attempted to negotiate with the master for a tow. The latter said he wanted a pilot and a tow, but declined to make any specific terms for compensation, and the result was that the Brenham and Astoria put their hawsers on board the ship, while the Columbia was ahead with her hawser fast to the Brenham. The pilot, Johnson, remained on board the Allegiance, and with the assistance of a portion of the cutter's crew, who had been put on board for the purpose, got in the anchor, which had then about fifteen fathoms of chain out. The ship was lying in a bed which she had made for herself in the sand, in about four or five feet of water, and as the tide rose and her sails more or less filled, she rolled in her bed, but did not move forward. The anchor came in through the sand without materially affecting the position of the ship. The tugs commenced pulling on her at about half past ten, and she came off at nearly twelve o'clock, and about two hours before high water; when she was towed to Astoria by the tug Brenham, assisted by the Columbia as a matter of convenience, and not because such assistance was absolutely necessary.

At the time the Brenham first took hold of the Allegiance, the latter was in great danger of grounding in the breakers just to the northward of her, and must have done so, unless she had let go her anchors, only one of which was ready to let go, and probably then, as she was exposed to the whole force of the wind and tide setting her in that direction; and if the ship had been properly handled at the time the Brenham took hold of her, it is probable that she could have been then turned around and taken in safety to Baker's bay. When the tug left the Allegiance inside of Sand Island, she left her in comparatively a good anchorage, by reason of the protection from the wind and tide by said island; and being unable to tow her any further or to turn her round and take her to Baker's bay, she did the best that could be done under the circumstances, by letting her go when and as she did; and it is very probable that if both her anchors had been let go at once she would have not dragged as she did on the sands. The Allegiance sustained no appreciable injury between the bar and Astoria; the tug Brenham incurred no extraordinary risk or danger in going to the Allegiance on the tenth, and towing her as she did; but both she and the Astoria did incur such risk and danger in pulling her off the sands on the eleventh, by touching the bottom on account of the swell and depth of water; but neither of said tugs sustained any appreciable injury therefrom. On the morning of the eleventh, when the tugs came up to the Allegiance, she was lying hard aground, heading about south by east, thus showing satisfactorily that she did not ground simply by the ebbing of the tide, but that she dragged on to the sands in high water. She was in no immediate danger; but as the tide rose and she commenced to float in her bed, and pound the bottom with the rise and fall of the sea, she would be in danger of springing a leak, and at high tide, if the wind had increased, as was probable, she would have gone farther up on the spit and beyond the reach of assistance, and ultimately been lost. Nor is it at all probable that the vessel could have been sailed off at high water. The tide, while it might lift her out of her bed so that she could float, would tend to set her higher on the spit, while the wind, being about southeast by south, would have the same effect, until she had steerage way, which it is almost certain she could not obtain, under the circumstances, in time to get off.

As to the value of the tugs there is no direct evidence. They are probably worth over one hundred thousand dollars. At the date of this occurrence there were four men employed on the tug Brenham, at the aggregate monthly wages of three hundred and fifty dollars, and found; besides which she carried two Washington territory pilots, E. Johnson and A. Malcolm, who were in the employ of the owners of the tug, and turned over their pilot fees to the manager of the same, Captain George Flavel, and received from him monthly wages for their services. George C. Flavel was master of the Brenham, and D. M. McVicker, the mate. A. D. Wass was master of the Astoria. The three tugs employed an aggregate of twenty-six men, including six pilots, whose monthly pay amounted to two thousand two hundred dollars, and found. The Brenham is of three hundred and four horse-power, the Columbia two hundred and thirty-eight, and the Astoria three hundred and ninety-two but practically the Brenham is the most powerful. The tug Astoria was owned by the libelants, A. M. Simpson, George Flavel, and A. D. Wass, and the Brenham by said Simpson and Flavel, and the Columbia by said Simpson. The ordinary charge for towing a vessel from outside the bar to Astoria is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars, and the time usually occupied in such service is from four to eight hours.

The principal point made by the claimant to the contrary of these conclusions is, that the tug was in the wrong in not taking the Allegiance back into Baker's bay, when she first took hold of her on the ninth. But assuming that this could have been done under the circumstances, it was certainly the fault of the ship that it was not done. When the tug put her helm hard a-port, and turned her head to the south-west, with the intention of making Baker's bay, the Allegiance would not come around, and the only alternative was to proceed up the channel for Astoria, and at least make an anchorage under the lee of Sand Island. The reason the Allegiance did not come around was, that a portion of her sails had not been taken in, and, as soon as her head came up to the wind, were aback; and that she was without steerage way. The tug is not responsible for the steering or sailing of the tow. It was the duty of the latter to keep in proper trim and upon the right track, to follow the former, and to steer accordingly. If there was any negligence or mistake in any of these particulars the tug is not responsible for the consequences. The Merrimac, [Case No. 9,478.] Neither did the tug undertake that it was capable of towing the Allegiance under the circumstances, but only that it would try, and that it would exercise ordinary skill and diligence in so doing. The tug took hold of the vessel in an extraordinary emergency, with a view to save her from what appeared to be an impending peril, and therefore did not engage to do anything more than she could do with the aid of ordinary skill and diligence on the part of her master and crew. A salvor's compensation depends upon the success of the undertaking, but there is no implied obligation that he will succeed or that he is capable of so doing, and therefore he is only responsible for the exercise of ordinary skill and diligence in the use of the means or machinery with which he undertakes the salvage service.

The case is not like a mere contract for towage, where a tug meets or finds a vessel in a place of ordinary safety, and offers and agrees to tow her to a certain other point or place, as a mere business transaction. In such a case, undoubtedly, the master of the tug undertakes that his boat is properly equipped, and of sufficient capacity and power to do the service in question at the time and under the circumstances proposed. The Merrimac, supra.

Upon this state of facts the libelants are entitled to recover as and for a salvage service, and the only question is as to the amount. There is no standard by which the compensation for such service can be absolutely measured. In each case the amount to be allowed must depend largely upon its own circumstances, varying from one half the value of the property saved to something more than a mere compensation for towage. Where the service is rendered by a steamer to a sailer, it often happens that a material service is rendered to the latter by which it is rescued from a serious and impending danger with very little risk or trouble to the former or to its crew. A vessel propelled by steam has a command over its motion and direction comparatively independent of the winds and currents, and may therefore approach a vessel in danger, and take her off with comparative safety to itself. In such cases, an important element in the value of the services, namely, the risk to the vessel and lives of the salvors, is more or less wanting, and they must be estimated accordingly. The services rendered the Allegiance, both on the tenth and eleventh, by the tugs, were, in my judgment, timely and material. She was rescued on each occasion from an impending peril, and probably saved from becoming a total loss. But at the same time this service was accomplished with little more than the ordinary risk attendant upon a towage service to the tugs and their crews. Under those circumstances it is my judgment that five thousand dollars is a fair compensation for the services rendered, including a counsel fee in this suit to collect the same.

[21 Betts D. C. MS. 89.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April Term, 1843.

COLLISION—VESSEL LYING IN TRACK OF NAVIGATION—IGNORANCE OF THE LANGUAGE.

[1. A vessel taking an anchorage so near a pier as to hinder the movement of other vessels cannot recover for damages received in a collision when she has failed to sheer on her anchor out of the way of the other vessel, that being the measure usual and proper under such circumstances to avoid danger.]

[2. It is no excuse that the vessel at anchor is foreign, and has no one aboard who understands the directions given by the approaching vessel.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Vicenzo Allegro against the steamboat Niagara (Thomas C. Durant and others, claimants) for collision. Decree for respondents.]

BETTS, District Judge. The brig Time was anchored in the East river, opposite pier

8, not exceeding a distance of 200 feet from the piers, on a strong ebb tide. The steamboat was taking a tow of barges and boats from about pier 8 in the daytime, and gave notice to the brig to go into her berth or anchor further off to enable the steamboat and tows to get out. This is the usual course for vessels anchored near the slips to take to aid towing vessels, etc. The brig not being moored, she was requested to port her helm and sheer off to starboard, and she did so sufficiently to enable the steamer and her tows to pass ahead of her. The steamer was only able to go far enough ahead, for her barge towed astern, to go clear of the brig, and to her starboard side, being stopped by the other vessels at anchor ahead. Orders were then given to the brig to starboard her helm, and sheer back toward the dock to open room for the barge in tow to pass out. She continued her helm hard down, and the drift of the tide drove the stern barge against the starboard bows of the brig, and considerable damage was done her.

It was the duty of the brig, without notice or orders being given her, in her position and [considering] that of the steamer and her tows and the state of the tide, to have sheered upon her anchor in aid of the navigation of the steamer and her tows. Upon the evidence the collision could have been avoided by so doing. A vessel taking an anchorage in a place of frequent resort of other vessels, and in such a way as to impede their movements, or conduce to collisions with them, or if a vessel neglects applying the obviously proper and usual means of avoiding danger to herself or inflicting injury upon another vessel, approaching her, she cannot in either case cast upon the other vessel the consequences of that collision. Strout v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 92; Crockett v. Riley, [Case No. 3,402a.] The brig can claim no exemption from liability to all the rules of navigation because she is a foreign vessel, and that no one on board her at the time understood English, so as to comprehend the orders or notice given her. It was a fault of her owners not to have her provided with mariners so important to her own and the safety of the other vessel.

The action cannot be maintained, and a decree must be rendered for the claimants, with costs.

[3 App. Comr. Pat. 388.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ANTICIPATION—APPEAL FROM COMMISSIONER—MOWING MACHINES.

[1. A patent was issued for a device for raising by leverage the finger bar of a mowing machine to a perpendicular position, and holding it at rest there until reached by the hand for folding. Thereafter application was made for a patent for a device to raise the finger bar to an angle of 45 degrees, and hold it in suspense until reached by means of a long handle, and folded by hand. Held, that there was an anticipation, and the second device was not patentable. Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. (41 U. S.) 336, distinguished.]

[2. When the court is in doubt, the decision of the commissioner of patents in an interference case should be affirmed.]

Appeal [by A. B. Allen] from the decision of the commissioner of patents for refusing to grant letters-patent to him for his improvement in mowing machines. [Affirmed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The claim, as stated by the appellant, is: "In mowing machines provided with but a simple lever arrangement for partially folding the finger bar by means of the same, I claim in combination with the track-board K, the long handle L, when so mounted and arranged in relation to the driver's seat, that on the outer end of the finger bar being raised partially up by the hand-lever or foot lever arranged on the machine, the driver is enabled to reach the end of said handle for the purpose of turning over the finger-bar in the manner substantially as specified. Also I claim the combination and relative arrangement of the outer shoe D, pivoted track-board K, and stop F, the whole being constructed substantially as set forth."

On the 26th of June, 1860, the commissioner ratified and confirmed the report of the board of examiners refusing to grant a patent. From which decision the following reasons of appeal were filed:

1st. That the references cited by the commissioner do not present an anticipation of the invention covered by the first clause of the claim.

2. That the commissioner erred in basing his opinion as to the admissibility of the first clause of the claim upon the general ground that the references cited illustrate arrangements for lifting and folding the finger-bar, whereas the appellant claims only his specific arrangement of means for lifting and folding the finger-bar, which arrangement is not shown in any of said references.

3. That the commissioner erred in refusing the second clause of the claim without qualifying his action by referring to a similar combination of all the elements constituting the particular combination claimed in and by said clause as the invention of the appellant.

4. That the commissioner, in his consideration of the second clause of the claim, wholly disregarded and ignored the difference existing between the operation of the combined elements, as well as the advantages and improved results thereby obtained, as compared with any of the arrangements cited as references; and therefore his decision was erroneous; as the difference in the result * * * produced is evidence that the means employed are not mechanical equivalents.

5. That the commissioner having to show and establish that the subject-matter of invention as covered by and claimed in the appellant's application was void of novelty and utility, his action in refusing the patent was erroneous, and ought to be reversed.

The substance of the commissioner's report in reply to the reasons of appeal. He says: "The reasons of appeal are based on the insufficiency of the references alleging that they do not present the specific arrangements claimed by the appellant, or an equivalent combination of all the parts that go to make up his invention, nor do they anticipate the operation of the combination claimed,—in all of which the office was in error. The first clause of appellant's claim is limited to the combination of a long handle with the track-board, so that when partially raised the hinged finger-beam can be brought up and turned over onto the machine by the driver's taking hold of the handle when it comes within his reach. Now, there is no combination here, inasmuch as the track-clearer contributes nothing to the operation of the handle, which for all practical purposes of raising the finger-beam might just as well be attached to the end of the beam itself or to any part of it more convenient than the end. The references show with sufficient clearness examples of such an attachment of some means to some part of the finger-beam for raising it out of, and letting it back into, position, and even the handle to the hinged track-board on the hinged cutter-bar, is shown in Aultman & Miller's patent of June 17, 1856. This clause leaves but the matter of arrangement of the handle by appellant to sustain his claim, and I am wholly at a loss to perceive any invention in this, or indeed any thing more than would form itself an obvious suggestion to one accustomed to use such machines, if indeed the attachment of the handle to this part of the machine deserves to be regarded as in any degree an improvement. In operation there is no marked difference. The device of the appellant but serves to aid the driver in lifting the cutter-bar, and this is the case with the references. So of the second clause of the claim the references present an equivalent mechanism for effecting the same result as the appellant and by the same mode of operation, and this by a combination almost identical. A patent can only be granted for 'an arrangement' when such an arrangement involves invention, and is in itself new and useful; but it is not perceptible to me that the appellant in this case has presented even an arrangement of the well known parts of the mowing machine that meets the conditions, as the references will be necessarily consulted," &c. &c.

Such is the case as laid before me with all the original papers and documents by the commissioner according to previous notice duly given of the time and place of hearing, when and where the appellant appeared by his attorney, and filed his argument in writing, and submitted the case. The claim has been rejected upon the ground of its having been anticipated, as shown by sundry references to patents embracing the same invention in both branches of it. The appellant denies the application of them, and has shown his grounds and reason in a strong and clear discriminating argument, the force of which has been felt. He rests his claim on a specific technical combination of devices involving a specific arrangement and specific functions. He admits that the parts considered separately are not new. The three elements of his arranged combination are: The outer shoe, the track-board, and the stop. His argument is that "it cannot be met by any arrangement of two of the same elements although arranged in the same way; nor can it be met by any equal number of elements when arranged in a different way, and more especially when the functions discharged are different. To sustain the position he cites the rule of law as laid down by the court in the case of Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 336." The patent is for a combination, and the improvement consists in arranging different portions of the plough, and combining them together in the manner stated in the specification for the purpose of producing a certain effect. None of the parts are new, and none are claimed as new, nor is any portion of the combination, less than the whole, claimed as new, or stated to produce any given result; the end in view is proposed to be accomplished by the union of all arranged and combined together in the manner described, and this combination, composed of all the parts mentioned in the specifications, and arranged with reference to each other, and to other parts of the plough in the manner therein described, is stated to be the improvement, and is the thing patented; the use of any two of these parts only, or of two combined with a third which is substantially different in form or manner of its arrangement and connection with the others, is therefore not the thing patented. It is not the same combination, if it substantially differs from it in any of its parts. Proof was offered of its utility, but it was admitted and waived.

The question in the case just recited was whether the use of any one or more of the parts was an infringement of a patent for an invention claimed upon the ground of a combination of old parts, and the court decided that the plaintiff could not recover for less than an infringement of the whole. It can therefore only be authority in this case to define the character of such a combination. Upon a comparison of the references to the Dodge invention with the first branch of the appellant's improvement, there appears to me to be a very strong resemblance; it appears to be embraced substantially within it. It is admitted that the two are alike in the operation by leverage and the second half by hand. In the case of the appellant's means, the finger-bar is raised from the ground to an elevation of forty-five degrees, held in suspense until brought within reach of the hand by the long handle. In the case of Dodge it is by its levers brought by the first operation to a perpendicular position and at rest, and within reach of the hand. The principal purpose and object of both is that of folding the finger-bar and this seems to be the same after so reached by hand. Dodge's is performed much more perfectly than appellant's, and I think is at least an equivalent. The result of appellant's contrivance may be said to have been produced in a cheaper way, but there is no evidence to show that it was enough so to amount to a sufficient test of patentable invention. That of Dodge's is to be preferred as being scientifically effected, that of appellant's—rather of the backward order.

With respect to the second claim, I am not free from doubts, and feel, therefore, that I should yield to the commissioner's decision on the point.

My opinion is that the decision of the commissioner ought to be affirmed, and the same is accordingly affirmed.

CONTEMPT — REFUSAL TO OBEY ORDERS OF REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY — JURISDICTION—HABEAS CORPUS—ARREST IN ANOTHER STATE.

1. An uncontested order, made by a register in bankruptcy, in Vermont, that a bankrupt produce certain books and papers relating to his business, was disobeyed by him. On proof thereof, and on service of notice on the bankrupt, the district court for Vermont adjudged him to have been guilty of a contempt, and ordered that he deliver up the books and papers to the marshal, and pay the costs, and that, in default thereof, he be arrested by the marshal, or his deputy, and committed to jail to be safely kept until discharged by order of said court. The deputy of the marshal demanded the books and papers and costs from the bankrupt, in New Hampshire, which he refused to deliver or pay, and then the deputy arrested him in New Hampshire, and committed him to jail in Vermont. On a habeas corpus sued out by the bankrupt: Held, (1.) The order of the register was the order of the court, and, when it was disobeyed, it was proper to institute proceedings for contempt directly on such disobedience.

[Cited in Fischer v. Hayes, 6 Fed. Rep. 74; U. S. v. Anon., 21 Fed. Rep. 770.]

2. That it was proper to direct that the bankrupt be committed until discharged by order of the district court.

3. That the arrest in New Hampshire was illegal, and the imprisonment in Vermont, in pursuance of such arrest, was, therefore, illegal, although the warrant of arrest was valid.

[Application by Horatio N. Allen for a writ of habeas corpus.]

Romeo H. Start and Levi Underwood, for relator.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. From the return of the jailer it appears, that the relator, Horatio N. Allen, is held in custody upon a warrant which issued from the district court of the United States for the district of Vermont. The warrant or order of commitment recites, that the relator is a bankrupt, and was legally notified to appear, and did appear, before a register in bankruptcy, to submit to an examination under the provisions of the bankrupt act; that said examination disclosed that Allen had kept entries of his business transactions upon "diaries," which diaries and other memoranda and papers relating to his business it was necessary should be in the possession of the assignee, in order that he might obtain a full knowledge of the property of the bankrupt; that the assignee demanded said papers and books from the bankrupt, and procured an order to be made by the register, commanding said Allen to produce said papers and books, which order he neglected to obey; that, thereupon, the assignee brought a petition before the district court, praying that the bankrupt be proceeded against for contempt, and be ordered to surrender said books and papers to the petitioner; that an order was issued from the district court to said Allen, directing him to show cause why he should not be dealt with for contempt, and should not surrender said papers; that said order to show cause was duly served, and, said petition having been continued from time to time, at the request of the bankrupt, or by agreement of the parties, on the last adjourned day the petitioner appeared and the bankrupt appeared not; and that, upon the hearing, the bankrupt was adjudged guilty of contempt, and was commanded to deliver up the books and papers to the marshal, and pay the costs, and, upon neglect or refusal to comply with said order, the marshal or his deputy was commanded to take the body of said Allen, and him commit to the keeper of the jail in Chittenden county, to be safely kept until discharged by order of said court. The return of the deputy marshal upon the warrant is to the effect, that he demanded of the said Allen, in the state of New Hampshire, said books and papers, and said costs, which he refused to deliver or pay, whereupon he was arrested and committed to the jail in Chittenden county, in the state of Vermont.

It is contended that the return of the jailer is insufficient, upon three grounds: 1st. It appears upon the face of the warrant or order of commitment, that the contempt of which the relator was adjudged guilty, consisted in not obeying an order of the register, which order was not an order of the court; 2d. That the warrant directed that the bankrupt should be imprisoned until he should be discharged by order of court, and that his imprisonment does not expire by effluxion of time, or upon the performance of any act, but is limited only by the pleasure of the court; 3d. That the relator was unlawfully arrested in the state of New Hampshire, by a Vermont officer, and was thence taken to jail in Vermont.

(1) Upon the first point it is urged that the statute of the United States (Rev. St. § 725) defines contempt to be misbehavior in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the court in their official transactions, and disobedience or resistance to any lawful order or command of the court; that an order of the register is not an order of a court; and that, prior to the adjudication for contempt, no order had been made by a court in the premises. By the bankrupt act, the several district courts of the United States are constituted courts of bankruptcy, and it is the duty of the judges of the district courts in the several districts to appoint registers in bankruptcy to assist the judge in the performance of his duties under the act. The register is empowered to despatch such part of the administrative business of the court, and such uncontested matters as shall be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct. The register has all powers vested in the district court, for the summoning and examination of persons and witnesses, and for requiring the production of books, papers, and documents, except the power of commitment. It is impossible that the laborious administrative business of a bankruptcy court can be performed by one judge. The intricate work connected with the settlement of bankrupt estates requires the time and attention of other persons. The statute has, therefore, empowered him to appoint persons, styled registers, to assist him in the performance of his duties. The powers of the register consist, in general, in the discharge of the administrative business of the bankruptcy court, and in passing such orders relative to the settlement of the estate as may be uncontested. Within the scope of their authority, the registers are not only officers of the court, but, in uncontested matters, act in lieu of the judge. Within this scope their acts are the acts of the bankruptcy court, and their uncontested orders are the orders of the court. Whenever, therefore, a bankrupt violates an order which the register has the power to make, and the making of which the bankrupt has not contested, and in regard to which he has not desired a reference to the district judge, a violation of such an order is a violation of the order of the bankruptcy court. The register cannot punish for a violation of his order. That power is reserved to the district judge. But it cannot be implied that, for a noncompliance with the uncontested order of the register, there is no power of punishment, and that the only course is to obtain a re-enactment of the order from the district judge, for a violation of which second order a punishment may be inflicted. The statute which placed so large a part of the details of the settlement of estates in the hands of the registers, evidently intended that their uncontested acts in reference to these details were the acts of the court of bankruptcy. Under this theory of the law the practice of the district courts has been to enforce the unbowed orders of the register by proceedings in contempt, which are instituted directly upon a neglect to comply with his order. In re Gettleston, [Case No. 5,373;] In re Speyer, [Id. 13,239.]

(2.) When the contempt consists of a violation of the order of the court, and is a contempt not committed in its presence, and the statute does not prescribe the form of the order of commitment, the defendant may be imprisoned until he be discharged by order of court, or until further order of court. Green v. Elgie, 8 Jur. pt. 1, p. 187, per Denman, C. J.; opinion of Ch. J. Kent in Re Yates, 4 Johns. 317; [Yates v. Lansing.] 9 Johns. 395.

(3.) The arrest of the relator by the deputy marshal was without his precincts and within the state of New Hampshire. The language of the officer's return is: "At Carroll, in the district of New Hampshire, I served this warrant by demanding, &c., whereupon I arrested his body, read the warrant in his hearing, and, on the same day, I committed him to the keeper of the common jail at Burlington, in the county of Chittenden, in the district of Vermont." The arrest in New Hampshire was not justified by the order of the district court, and, the arrest having been illegal, the subsequent imprisonment in the state of Vermont, in pursuance of the original arrest, cannot be justified. When the original arrest is unlawful, the detention is improper, although the warrant under which the improper arrest is made, is valid. The fact that the officer had power to arrest the bankrupt, after he was brought within the state of Vermont, is immaterial, inasmuch as that power was improperly obtained. The principle is thus declared by Lord Holt, in Luttin v. Benin, 11 Mod. 50: "If a man is wrongfully brought into a jurisdiction, and there lawfully arrested, yet he ought to be discharged, for no lawful thing, founded upon a wrongful act, can be supported." The general subject of the validity of the acts of sheriffs over persons or property, in cases where the possession of the person or property was improperly obtained by the officer, is very elaborately discussed in Hooper v. Lane, 6 H. L. Cas. 443, and in Ilsey v. Nichols, 12 Pick. 270. In the latter case, Ch. J. Shaw, after reviewing the authorities, concludes as follows: "These cases seem to establish the general principle, that a valid and lawful act cannot be accomplished by unlawful means, and, whenever such unlawful means are resorted to, the law will interpose and afford some suitable remedy, according to the nature of the case, to restore the party injured by means of these unlawful means, to his rights." I refer also to Percival v. Stamp, 9 Exch. 167; Barratt v. Price, 9 Bing. 566; Mandeville v. Guernsey, 51 Barb. 99; Hill v. Goodrich, 32 Conn. 589. The relator having been improperly arrested by the deputy marshal beyond his precincts, although upon a warrant which was valid authority for an arrest within his precincts, the detention is invalid, and the relator is entitled to a discharge.

District Court, N. D. New York.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION — CONFIRMATION BY COURT.

[The court must confirm a composition agreed upon by the requisite majority of the creditors where they are not shown to have some other motive than the desire to promote their own interests, as well as those of the other creditors, and where the composition will actually benefit all, though the bankrupt has made an assignment to a favored creditor, procured the petition in bankruptcy to be filed against himself, and taken proceedings to effect the composition solely in his own interest.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of the confirmation of a resolution of composition by the creditors of Anson C. Allen, Daniel Straus, and Solomon Straus, bankrupts.]

WALLACE, District Judge. The requisite quorum of creditors having assented to the resolution for composition, confirmation is opposed by dissenting creditors, on the grounds that the interests of creditors will not be promoted by the composition. The evidence presented discloses the common case of a composition conceived in the interests of the bankrupts. When insolvency was apprehended, the bankrupts began paying themselves and their favored creditors out of the firm assets, then attempted to compromise with their creditors; failing in this, made an assignment to a favored creditor; and shortly afterward procured a petition in bankruptcy to be filed against themselves, and thereupon took proceedings to effect a composition. In the mean time the bankrupts have had charge of their property ostensibly as agents for the assignee and the purchaser from the assignee. The attorneys who advised the assignment, and prosecuted the petition in bankruptcy, now represent most of the creditors. From the beginning to the end of the transactions, not one step has been taken to protect the interests of the creditors. It shocks the moral sense to assist this dishonest scheme by judicial action. But this court is only an instrument to administer the law as it finds it. The bankrupt law permits just such schemes as this, and, if the requisite number of creditors consent, the court is powerless, unless it shall appear that the interests of the creditors will not be promoted by the terms of the composition. If, looking at the assets of the estate in their present condition, it is apparent that the pecuniary interests of the creditors will be better promoted by the composition than by administering the estate in bankruptcy, there is no alternative but to confirm the resolution of composition. I am constrained to agree with the register, that the interests of the creditors here will be promoted by confirming the resolution. I cannot say that there are any circumstances to show that the assenting creditors have been actuated by any motive other than to promote their own interests, as well as those of all the creditors. All the assets of the estate rest in litigation, and it seems to me a prudent consideration of the contingencies dictates the acceptance of the offer of the bankrupts. It is probable the bankrupts will profit by the composition, but this by no means proves that it will not be advantageous to the creditors.

When insolvency was apprehended, the bankrupts began paying themselves and their favored creditors out of the firm assets, then attempted to compromise with their creditors; failing in this, made an assignment to a favored creditor, and shortly after procured a petition in bankruptcy to be filed against themselves, and thereupon took proceedings to effect a composition. In the meantime the bankrupts have had charge of their property ostensibly as agents for the assignee and the purchaser from the assignee. The attorneys who advised the assignment and prosecuted the petition in bankruptcy now represent most of the creditors. From the beginning to the end of the transactions not one step has been taken to protect the interests of the creditors.

It shocks the moral sense to assist this dishonest scheme by judicial action. But this court is only an instrument to administer the law as it finds it. The bankrupt law permits just such schemes as this, and if the requisite number of creditors consent, the court is powerless, unless it shall appear that the interests of the creditors will not be promoted by the terms of the composition. If, looking at the assets of the estate in their present condition, it is apparent that the pecuniary interests of the creditors will be better promoted by the composition than by administering the estate in bankruptcy, there is no alternative but to confirm the resolution of composition. I am constrained to agree with the register that the interests of the creditors here will be promoted by confirming the resolution. I cannot say that there are any circumstances to show that the assenting creditors have been actuated by any motive other than to promote their own interests as well as those of all the creditors. All the assets of the estate rest in litigation, and it seems to me a prudent consideration of the contingencies dictates the acceptance of the offer of the bankrupts. It is probable the bankrupts will profit by the composition, but this by no means proves that it will not be advantageous to the creditors.

ALLEN v. ALLEN'S EX'RS.

JURISDICTION—ORPHANS' COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The fact that by the laws and customs of Pennsylvania, the orphans' court of the county, as a special court of equity, has jurisdiction of the accounts of executors, &c., is no bar to the federal courts exercising jurisdiction over exactly the same subjects;—other things allowing, and the orphans' court not having at the time actual possession of the case or parties.

In equity. This was a suit in equity at Pittsburgh, Allegheny county, in which the complainants set forth by their bill that one Allen, of that county, the testator of the defendants, being owner of a large real and personal estate, died, having made by his last will certain annuities, bequests and devises, some out and out, and several in trust. Then averring themselves to be interested under the will, and showing that they were on the grounds of alienage, &c., entitled to sue in the federal courts, they prayed that the rights of themselves and all parties might be ascertained and declared by a decree of this court; that an account of the personalty might be taken under the direction of this court; that after payment of debts, &c., the residue of the assets might be marshalled and applied to the exoneration of the real estate from the annuities; or if insufficient so to do, to do relief so far as it would go; praying further, a discovery of the personal assets, and how they had been applied, and whether the defendants meant to charge the realty with the payment of the annuities. To this part of the bill there was a plea, that "this court has no jurisdiction over the matters and things, &c., because the same are by the laws and customs of Pennsylvania within the exclusive cognizance of the orphans' court of Allegheny county, and are impleadable and ought to have been impleaded in the said court, &c., and not elsewhere; the said court being the only proper jurisdiction, and being, moreover, competent to administer a complete and adequate remedy in the premises." The plea did not allege the pendency in that court of any litigation between the parties on the same subject matter.

The question, therefore, now before this court was the sufficiency of the plea: a point on which, after arguments by Mr. Shaler and Mr. Loomis, for the complainant, and by Mr. Williams, for the respondent, the court's opinion was thus given by

GRIER, Circuit Justice. It is not disputed that the plaintiffs have a right under the constitution and laws of the United States to come into this court for relief, nor that the relief sought is such as a court of equity administers; but it is alleged that by the law of Pennsylvania, the orphans' court having exclusive cognizance of these matters, the defendant could not be impleaded, except before the judge of that court. This is no doubt true as between the various courts of Pennsylvania. Their courts of common law jurisdiction, whether criminal or civil, could not give the remedy sought for in this bill, for the reason that a special court has been constituted with chancery powers, having jurisdiction of the accounts of executors and administrators, the care of the persons of orphans, power to order the sale of the real estate of a deceased person, to pay his debts, and many other matters. But it by no means follows that by such a distribution of the judicial powers of the state courts, the courts of the United States can be ousted of the jurisdiction conferred on them by the constitution and laws. The court of common pleas is the only one that can give a remedy by action of ejectment or debt, but it does not follow that because no other court in Pennsylvania can give such a remedy and the jurisdiction of the common pleas is consequently exclusive on the subjects, that foreigners and citizens of the other states of the Union may not have their remedy in courts of the United States. A party who has a right to sue in the courts of the United States cannot be divested of that right by the laws of any state. The relief sought by this bill is within the well established boundaries of the jurisdiction of a court of chancery. No other court has obtained possession of the subject matter or the parties. The action of this court cannot affect in any way the settlement of any amount by the executors in the orphans' court. It will produce no conflict of jurisdiction. In the case of Aspden's Estate, [Case No. 539;] (and see 1 Wall. Jr. 217, [White v. Brown, Case No. 17,538,]) which we decided in 1853 at Philadelphia, the orphans' court of that city settled the account of the executors whom Aspden had appointed, then removed them and appointed others, and had the whole care of the personal estate, while the various claimants under the will were contesting their rights in the court of the United States for twenty years. When money was ordered by the circuit court to be paid out of the fund by the executor, such order was a sufficient voucher for his settlement in the orphans' court; while the circuit court held the parties concluded as to amount and credits by the accounts settled in the orphans' court. The orphans' court of Pennsylvania is a court of chancery of limited jurisdiction, and is no more exclusive of the United States courts than is any other court in the state. There will be no necessary conflict of jurisdiction; and the plaintiff has an undoubted right to the relief prayed for in this bill. The plea to the jurisdiction is, therefore, overruled, and the clerk of this court is appointed master to state an account as prayed for in the bill, and the decision of other questions suspended till the coming in of the account.

Case No. 212.

[3 App. Comr. Pat. 322.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 18, 1860.

INTERFERENCE—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

[1. Letters patent issued April 27, 1858, to David Alter and Samuel A. Hill, for a retort revolved horizontally so as to subject its contents to a uniform heat, and for use in the distillation of coal oil, does not cover a retort which is merely oscillated, instead of revolved, and the invention is prior to that of Franklin W. Willard, with which it interferes.]

[2. Where a witness in an interference case, before the commissioner of patents has been examined by both parties, objection to his competency cannot be first made on appeal.]

[On appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

[Application by E. G. Allen, assignee of F. W. Willard, for letters patent for a process of distilling the liquid products from coal. An interference was declared with letters patent issued April 27, 1888, to David Alter and Samuel A. Hill, and Allen's application was rejected by the commissioner. Applicant appeals. Affirmed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The appellant claims as his invention the process thereinbefore described for extracting the liquid products from coal, the same being effected by combining a retort so constructed and operated as to have a rotary or other equivalent motion for agitating its contents, and exposing all portions of the charge equally to the heat, with the use of a low red heat of about 850° Fahrenheit, as before set forth. The commissioner adopts for his decision the report of the examiners, dated 13th February, 1860, the substance of which is that "on the 1st of June, 1857, David Alter and Samuel A. Hill presented an application for letters patent for an improvement in retorts for obtaining the volatile products from coal, shale, &c., by dry distillation. The invention consisted in giving a continuous rotary motion to metallic retorts of a cylindrical shape for the extraction of the volatile products of coal for the purpose of subjecting the contents of the retort to a more uniform heat than can be obtained where the retort is stationary, and also greatly expediting the process without in any way diminishing the amount of product from a given quantity of coal. This retort revolved upon an axle, resting on masonry. To the axle at the front end is attached a large cog-wheel, which is turned by a wheel and pulley arrangement on the application of power. At the rear end of the retort, the axle is made hollow, forming a tube which communicates with the inside of the retort, and forms the means by which the volatile products are removed as they are distilled. The retort is kept in motion from the commencement to the close of the distillation of the coal contained within.

The patentees do not claim the use of the retorts so constructed as to be capable of being shifted on their axis from time to time, so as to expose a different portion of the retort to the action of the fire at each successive charge, but assert "that what we do claim as our invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the use of retorts so constructed, as hereinbefore described, as to revolve continuously on their axis during the process of distillation substantially in the manner and for the purposes set forth." This claim being admitted, letters patent were issued to Alter and Hill dated April 27, 1858. On January 27, 1859, this patent was reissued, having the following claim. "The destructive distillation of coal or other bituminous substances for obtaining the liquid products thereof in the form of what is known as coal-oils by the process hereinbefore described, viz. combining the use of a low temperature not exceeding a low red heat, say about 850° Fahrenheit, with the use of retorts so constructed as to have a rotary or other equivalent motion for the purpose of agitating their contents substantially in the manner and for the purposes hereinbefore set forth." On June 24, 1850, Franklin W. Willard completed an application for letters patent for a method of obtaining volatile liquid products from coal, which invention involved the use of a revolving retort, and the temperature at which the distillation was to be effected was indicated as about 850° Fahrenheit. Willard claimed the process herein described for extracting the liquid products from coal, the same being effected by combining a retort so constructed and operated as to have a rotary or other equivalent motion for agitating its contents, and exposing all portions of the charge equally to the heat, with the use of a low red heat of about 850° F. as set forth. The commissioner then proceeds to state the testimony on the part of the appellees, upon which testimony he says: "By the foregoing testimony the invention of the patentees is shown to have been fully made out, as far back as the fall of 1855, either the month of September or October, and the invention as then seen by experiment was substantially that described in the patent of Alter and Hill. It was the distillation of coal in a cylindrical metallic retort, which revolved over the fire for the purpose of moderating the heat; it was not oscillation or agitation of the retort, it was revolution, which was practiced." The commissioner next proceeds to state the testimony on the part of the appellant.

The commissioner thinks the experiment of September or October, 1855, made by Willard, as testified by Conklin and Willard, is not the same invention with that of the patentees. That invention, he says, as shown, is not agitation or oscillation of a retort, but revolution upon the long axis of a cylindrical metallic retort with a low temperature; for long before this coals had been agitated in retorts and oscillation of retorts had been practiced, and even partial revolution of a retort had been many years patented abroad; so that mere agitation of the coal by other than by complete revolutions forms no part of this invention, to which must be added the exhibition of a low degree of heat.

Now, if we compare this experiment of Willard's with this statement of the true invention, we will find that it is not substantially the invention in question. In the first place, the heat was a very dull cherry-red, says Conklin, and he stirred up the fire and turned the retort. A vey dull cherry red, seen by day light is above the temperature claimed by both parties; and from the shape and form of the retort, which was like model F, it was more probably turned on its bottom rather than on its inside. This is shown to be actually the case by referring to F. W. Willard's deposition, (answer 25,) where he records his experiment made about 1855, when he says Mr. Conklin was present. Willard says he hung the retort so that it could be rotated perpendicularly, end over end. This is obviously not the invention of Alter and Hill, nor is it the invention claimed by applicant himself. This was not the earliest experiment of Willard. According to his statement, he was thus engaged from the month of July, 1853; his experiments were tentative and unsatisfactory. In April, 1855, having experimented several times, he came to two conclusions: 1st, that a low degree of heat was a sine qua non, and, secondly, that some method of agitating the coal would be desirable. Now, agitation merely is not the invention in dispute; it is agitation by horizontal revolution, and this was not known to Willard, up to April, 1855. How much later it was before he attained the conception of revolving the retort we have already shown by the experiment of September, 1855, in which Willard was assisted by Conklin; that the retort was rotated, but not revolved horizontally, which is the true invention. A bare inspection of the glue-pot retort, (Exhibit O,) in which the experiment of May, 1855, was performed, shows that revolution of the retort was not contemplated. It was simply an action of oscillation, for the retort cannot be made to revolve except by inverting its head at the same time, which it is hardly probable Willard intended should occur. Willard states that about the last of March, 1856, he altered the construction of his retort (answer 32) so that the retort might lie horizontally over the fire, made his vessel tight, and rotated the retort horizontally by a monkey wrench, and the temperature was not over 800° Fahrenheit. Exhibits E, G, D, Y, represent this retort. This is the true invention, the one in dispute, and this appears to be the earliest date to which it can be traced as Willard's idea; the subsequent operations of Bradford are not of importance in this connection. Inasmuch then as the last of March, 1856, is the earliest period to which Willard can refer the date of his invention, and inasmuch as the evidence of Moorhead carries back the invention by Alter and Hill to September or October, 1855, it is obvious that priority of invention belongs to Alter and Hill.

The commissioner notices the testimony in relation to the various declarations of Willard respecting the time to which he could carry back his invention, and then says:

"Admitting, then, this as the date of the invention of Willard, and seeing that the application of Willard for a patent was made in the latter part of June, 1859, it appears that three years and nearly three months elapsed between the discovery or invention and the application to this office for a patent. The reason assigned by Willard is want of means, but it appears from his own evidence that prior to his meeting with Mr. Allen he was offered the means of placing his claim before the office. If priority of invention had been proved by Willard, the question of abandonment might be urged with considerable force against him on account of this delay, but as he has not succeeded in establishing priority, the consideration of that question does not rightly belong here. In view, therefore, of the facts proven by the testimony showing that Messrs. Alter and Hill anticipated Mr. Willard in the invention in dispute by a period of nearly six months, thereby proving priority of invention, it is recommended that this interference be dissolved, and that the application of F. W. Willard be refused." Which report was confirmed by the commissioner, adjudging priority of invention to Alter and Hill, and disallowing a patent to the appellee, February 14th, 1860.

From this decision Willard's assignee hath appealed, and filed sixteen reasons of appeal. They are full and sufficient specifications of the three general heads, assigned as errors: First, as to the nature and character of the invention; second, respecting the evidence on behalf of Alter and Hill, and their assignees, the patentees and appellees in this case; third, respecting the evidence on behalf of F. W. Willard's assignee, the appellant and applicant in this case. The reasons will have their due consideration.

To these reasons the commissioner filed his reply by way of report. This document refers to the report just recited, and is in substance very nearly the same. It states additionally that, when Alter and Hill obtained their original patent, it was not broadly for the distillation of coals in a revolving retort, nor for any mode which would agitate the coal during distillation, for these points were described in patents to which the two parties were referred, and who thereupon disclaimed such, and confined their invention to retorts so constructed as hereinbefore described as to revolve continually on their axes during the process of distillation, substantially in the manner and for the purposes set forth. The term "so constructed" involved the idea of a metallic retort, capable of continuous revolution, and the manner of distillation described a low red heat. When the patentees reissued their patent, they narrowed somewhat their claim by expressing the conditions of manufacture more fully, specifying in the claim the use of a temperature about 850° of Fahrenheit in retorts capable of distillation, and having rotary or other equivalent motion during the distillation. The phrase "or other equivalent motion" has been dwelt upon by appellant as evidencing the claim, and thereby admitting his earlier experiments as coming within his scope. But when the history of this art is known, one may ask, what is the other motion equivalent to a rotary one? Agitation of the contents of the retort was patentable, as also rotation of the contents of the retort. The retort was fully rotated on its axis during distillation by Belslay and Rowen, and particularly so by Lahon and Gingembres. But with these was the exhibition of the high degree of heat, of these existing patents; as the patentees were aware when they obtained their reissue, and when the words "or other equivalent motion" was subjoined. Common phrases and forcible ones as they are in many patents, they had no meaning here, since every other motion like it was already described; and since Alter's and Hill's invention was thus narrowed, no wider construction must be allowed for Willard's experiments.

Upon this state of the case, the commissioner laid before me all the original papers and evidence with his decision, the reasons of appeal and his report according to law, and to previous notice given of the time and place appointed for the hearing of said appeal, when and where the parties respectively appeared by their advocates who filed their arguments in writing, and submitted the said case.

And first as to the question of competency of Willard as a witness for appellant on the ground of interest. The objection does not appear to have been regularly made, and both parties having examined him, the objection must be considered as waived.

I proceed therefore to consider the case upon the merits. The parties in this case must be looked upon as original, independent, meritorious inventors of a peculiar process for the distribution of coal-oil. They both accomplished the purpose of their invention as stated in their specifications. The inventions are substantially the same. The one has already obtained a patent; the other is an applicant for a patent, contending that he is the prior inventor, and this is the issue. The thing in issue is substantially this: Practically extracting oil from bituminous coal by subjecting the coal equally to a moderate heat while undergoing a constant or continuous agitation. The appellant contends that by his proof his invention dates back to early in May, 1855. For this he principally relies upon the testimony of Willard, who says that by his experiment in April and May, 1855, he ascertained that by a low degree of heat, say about 800° Fahrenheit, he obtained the largest quantities and best qualities of oil; that he likewise, in the course of his experiments spoken of, came to the conclusion that some method of agitating the coal whilst undergoing the process of distillation would be desirable. This conclusion he came to in April, 1855. In May, of the same year, he constructed his glue-pot contrivance, and when he had adjusted it to suit him he would screw the union-joint tight, for the purpose of saving his vapor, and preventing its leaking, and having the coal, in this way, he found he had obtained the object he was seeking for; that is, to expose as much surface of the coal as was possible to a slow fire, and obtaining the results of distillation at a low degree of heat, and at the same time agitating the coal inside of the retort, producing a less destruction of the vapor, and getting a larger and better product of oil. Upon the end of the gas pipe, projecting through the side of the glue-pot, into the inside of the retort, he screwed a nut, for the iron of which the glue-pot was composed was too thin to hold his gas-pipe with safety. He says that he afterward redistilled and purified the oil produced by this and other experiments made with the same apparatus, and as described above. Is there a sufficiency in this evidence to show that Willard had any fixed, regular idea of the invention at the time of this experiment? With respect to the machine used by him; he says that he connected his gas pipe by an union-joint with a condenser; he commenced an occasional turning of the glue-pot over the fire. When he had adjusted it to suit him, he would screw the union-joint tight, for the purpose of saving his vapor and preventing it leaking, but when he wanted to alter the position of the retort he unscrewed it. According, then, to this operation, when screwed, the retort could not turn at all; when unscrewed he altered the position of his retort to another angle, and screwed the joint again, and so on. No witness corroborates him as to the fact of rotation at this experiment, and he has shown inconsistencies in statements about the date. The relation in which he stands, the nature of the operation, with these circumstances, tend to impair the credit of his testimony; but even if unimpaired, it fails to show the existence of an essential feature, the continuous revolution and agitation for the purpose of exposing the charge of coal equally to the heat.

The commissioner says the invention is very much narrowed down by the English patents, which he says were very well understood by the parties, by which oscillation and agitation of the contents of the retort were patented, also rotation of the contents of the retort. The retort was fully rotated on its axis during distillation by those patents. The invention, he goes on to say, was confined to retorts so constructed as to revolve continuously on their axis during the process of distillation. Thus, it must plainly appear that the appellant's invention cannot date from the month of April or May, 1855.

The next experiment made by him was in September or October of the same year. He then made a pattern for a larger retort that would hold some seven or eight pounds of coal, which he set into an oval upright stove made of sheet-iron, and lined with fire bricks. He says: "I hung the retort into the stove in such a manner as to be rotated perpendicularly or end over end;" and he then proceeds to state particularly the manner of hanging, &c. The result of the above experiment, he says, "I found, was more successful in attaining the desired product than the first experiment." Conklin says Willard (in the experiment just alluded to) took four or five pounds of coal, put it into an iron retort, about fourteen or fifteen inches long, about six inches at the bottom, about eight inches at the top, with a flange in the top. The lid was put on a strap across the top, with a set screw in it, to hold it down tight. He then placed it over the fire, and made oil. He stirred the fire up, and turned the retort. He gave it a rotation of probably three times in a minute. He thinks that, in the course of ten or twelve hours, they got from a pint to a quart of oil, on this occasion; also the glue-pot retort with the union screw was used. According to a particular description of it by one of appellant's witnesses, its contrivance was to oscillate perpendicularly; by "oscillate" he means a movement of the retort backwards and forwards. He says that he presumed that Willard did not think it necessary that it should be revolved all around; that any common mechanic might know from the construction of it, that such was not the intent. I think the testimony of this witness must be considered correct. Of course, therefore, there is no sufficient evidence that Willard had attained to the idea at that period, nor do I think Alter and Hill had.

The next period was in March or April, 1856. The commissioner thinks that the evidence shows that at this period Willard completed his invention, and I concur with him. But on the 19th of February, in the same year, Alter and Hill had made the discovery, and of course they must be considered as the prior inventors. There are parts of the testimony which prove that they were joint in the invention. Upon the whole, the decision of the commissioner ought to be, and is hereby, affirmed.

LEASE—CONDITION AGAINST ASSIGNMENT—BREACH—BANKRUPTCY.

This was a bill in equity brought by an assignee in bankruptcy to enjoin one who had leased a store to the bankrupt from disturbing the petitioner's possession. The lease stated that the store was to be used by the bankrupt as a dry goods store, and provided for a forfeiture in case of an assignment without the written consent of the lessor.

The court (SHIPMAN, District Judge) held that the assignment to the petitioner, being the act of the law, did not work a forfeiture; and that an assignment by him, as the agent of the law, to a purchaser of the leasehold interest, would be equally without the proviso.

CIRCUIT COURTS—JURISDICTION—SUBJECT MATTER—INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—SERVICE OF WRIT—ACTION ON JUDGMENT.

1. In actions arising under the patent laws, the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States does not depend upon the citizenship of the parties, but upon the subject matter.

2. The 11th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, (1 Stat. 79,) does not make it necessary, in such actions, that either the defendant or the plaintiff should be an inhabitant of the state where the suit is brought.

the defendant in the district in which the suit is brought.

[Cited in Thayer v. Wales, Case No. 13, 572.]

4. On an injunction bill to restrain the infringement of a patent, where there is no dispute as to the title, the circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction, under section 17 of the patent act of July 4th, 1836, (5 Stat. 124.) to refer the case to a master, to take an account of the profits of which the plaintiff has been deprived by reason of the infringement.

[Cited in Hoffheins v. Brandt, Case No. G, 575.]

5. A. filed a bill in equity against B., in the circuit court of the United States in Massachusetts, for the infringement of a patent: the bill was taken pro confesso, and a decree rendered against B. for a large amount, he not appearing in the case. Afterwards, A. brought an action of debt in this court against B., on the decree: Held, that A. could not recover, because it did not appear affirmatively on the face of the Massachusetts record, that B. was personally served with process in that district.

At law. This was an action of debt, brought [by Ethan Allen] upon a final decree of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, made in a suit in equity in that court founded upon letters patent granted to the plaintiff on the 3d of August, 1844, [No. 461,] for an "improvement in the method of constructing locks for fire-arms." The bill was filed on the 24th of June, 1846, against Orison Blunt and one William I. Syms, for an injunction, and for an account of the profits derived from an alleged infringement of the patent. It was taken pro confesso against Blunt, and a reference had before a master to take and state an account of the profits of which the plaintiff had been deprived by the infringement. The report of the master was confirmed, and a final decree entered for the sum of $11,700, being the amount of the profits reported, and for $397.84, the taxed costs. On the trial here, before Mr. Justice Nelson, in November, 1848, a certified copy of the record of the proceedings and decree in the suit in Massachusetts was produced on the part of the plaintiff, proving the above facts. But, it appeared from recitals in the record, that Allen was a citizen and resident of Norwich in the state of Connecticut, at the time the bill in equity was filed, and that Blunt and Syms were then citizens and residents of the city and state of New-York. The subpoena to appear and answer, which was set forth in the record, was directed to the defendants, and to it was subjoined the memorandum required by the twelfth rule in equity. The return by the marshal of the service of the subpoena was also set forth, in these words: "United States of America, Mass. Dist., ss: Boston, June 24, 1846. On this twenty-fourth day of June, 1846, I gave to the within named Orison Blunt, in hand, a true and attested copy of the within notice. I have made diligent search for the within named William I. Syms, and cannot find him within my district, so that I can notify him of the within process. Isaac O. Barnes, Marshal." The plaintiff rested his case on the record, and the defendant objected to a recovery on the grounds: 1. That the court in Massachusetts had no jurisdiction of the suit in equity there, inasmuch as it appeared on the face of the record that neither Allen nor Blunt were citizens or inhabitants of Massachusetts when that suit was commenced. 2. That the damages in the suit in equity were assessed by a master of the court, and not by a jury. The court overruled the objections, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for $12,097.84 debt, and $786.25, interest thereon at six per cent., by way of damages. The defendant now moved for a new trial, on a bill of exceptions.

Francis B. Cutting, for the plaintiff

I. The circuit courts of the United States have original jurisdiction of all suits arising under the patent laws, as well in equity as at law, with authority to grant injunctions according to the course of courts of equity, and with capacity to compel an account and to grant any ancillary relief necessary for the full protection of a plaintiff's rights. I. The acts of congress, in reference to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, give them no jurisdiction in equity, except where a plain, adequate and complete remedy cannot be had at law. Article 7, Const. Amend. U. S.; Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2; 3 Story, Comm. §§ 1757-1762, for the history of this article and of the amendment; Judiciary Act Sept. 24, 1789, §§ 9, 12, 13, 16. (1 Stat. 76, 79, 80, 82.) The general jurisdiction clause of the 11th section of the act of 1789 is controlled and restricted by the other sections above cited. II. In this case there was such remedy at law. The complaint was for a tort, and for damages, which belong to a jury exclusively. III. If the jurisdiction in equity attaches for any purpose, the extent and nature of its exercise depend on the character and object of the suit. If the aid of equity be required only as preliminary or auxiliary, its power ceases when that object is effected. Baker v. Biddle, [Case No. 764.] IV. The patent act of July 4th, 1836, (5 Stat. 117,) does not confer jurisdiction to assess damages in equity without a jury. Sections 14 and 17 of that act restrict the jurisdiction in equity to the injunction, and the remedy stops there. V. The remedy and the wrong, in this case, being both creatures of the statute, must follow the statute, and cannot be extended by the rules applicable to courts of chancery in England and in this country. Hinsdale v. Larned, 16 Mass. 65; City of Boston v. Shaw, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 130; Moncrief v. Ely, 19 Wend. 405; 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 829; Baker v. Biddle, before cited. VI. There was a fatal defect of jurisdiction in the suit in Massachusetts, by reason of a want of citizenship; neither the plaintiff nor the defendant being a citizen of the state where the suit was brought. Kitchen v. Strawbridge, [Case No. 7,854;] Shute v. Davis, [Id. 12,828;] 1 Pet. C. C. 431, [Craig v. Cummins, Case No. 3,331;] Judiciary Act 1789, § 11.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. 1. Article 1, § 8, Const. U. S. provides, among other things, that congress shall have power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries"—and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

The first act of congress carrying into execution the above power was passed on the 10th of April, 1790, (1 Stat. 109,) the fourth section of which provided, that if any person should make or vend within the United States any art, manufacture, &c., the exclusive right of which should have been granted by patent to any person, every person so offending should forfeit and pay to the patentee such damages as should be assessed by a jury in an action on the case. This act was repealed by Act Feb. 21, 1793, (1 Stat. 318,) the fifth section of which enacted, that the party infringing should forfeit and pay three times the price for which the patentee had usually sold the article, which might be recovered "in the circuit court of the United States, or any other court having competent jurisdiction." The act of the 17th of April, 1800, (2 Stat. 37,) repealed the fifth section of the act of 1793, and provided, that the party infringing should pay to the patentee a sum equal to three times the actual damage sustained by him, which should be recovered in an action on the case, "in the circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof." The present act, passed July 4, 1836, (5 Stat.

123, § 14,) provides, that the court may increase the damages, not exceeding three times the amount of the verdict, and that such damages may be recovered by action on the case, "in any court of competent jurisdiction." Section 17 of that act provides, that all actions, suits, &c., in cases arising under the patent laws, shall be originally cognizable "by the circuit courts of the United States, or any district court having the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court."

It will be seen, by this brief reference to the acts of congress, that the remedy prescribed in behalf of the patentee, to enable him to recover damages for the violation of his right, is limited to a circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the case, leaving the question as to the appropriate circuit in which to bring the action in any given case, to be determined by the existing provisions on that subject. But the remedy is given to any patentee, against any person who has been guilty of an infringement, without any restriction as to the parties.

By the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, (1 Stat. 78,) it is provided, that the circuit courts shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and (1.) "the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners; or" (2.) "an alien is a party; or" (3.) "the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state."—"But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another, in any civil action before a circuit or district court. And no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ." In actions commenced under the first branch of this section, where the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the citizenship of the parties, it has been held, that the suit must be brought in the state in which the party plaintiff or defendant was at the time a resident or inhabitant. Kitchen v. Strawbridge, [Case No. 7,854;] Shute v. Davis, [Id. 12,828;] Craig v. Cummins, Id. 3,331.] And the citizenship must appear upon the face of the record. Bingham v. Cabbot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382; Abercrombie v. Dupuis, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 343; Wood v. Wagon, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 9.

Upon this clause of the section, and the authorities, it is contended on the part of the defendant, that the circuit court in Massachusetts had no jurisdiction over the suit in equity, inasmuch as it did not appear upon the record that either of the parties was at the time a citizen or resident of the state of Massachusetts, but the contrary; the one being a citizen and resident of Connecticut, and the other of New-York. But we think the objection not well founded. The object of the clause is an enumeration of the classes of cases in which the jurisdiction of the court is made to depend upon the character of the parties; and it is founded upon section 2 art. 3 of the constitution. It has no bearing upon cases arising under the patent laws, where jurisdiction rests upon the subject matter, irrespective of parties or amount. The parties may be citizens of the same state, and the amount may be large or small.

The latter clause of the section referred to is general, and applies to all suits commenced in the circuit or district courts. A defendant cannot be arrested in a district other than that in which the suit is brought, nor can the suit be commenced against an inhabitant of the United States, by original process, in any other district than that of which he is an inhabitant, or in which he is found at the time of serving the writ. These are the only restrictions that apply to the power or right of the court to exercise jurisdiction over the person, in the present case.

2. The seventeenth section of the act of July 4, 1836, gives jurisdiction to the circuit courts of the United States, in all cases arising under any law of the United States granting or confirming to inventors the exclusive right to their inventions or discoveries, "as well in equity as at law;" "which courts shall have power, upon bill in equity filed by any party aggrieved, in any such case, to grant injunctions, &c." The jurisdiction thus conferred upon the circuit courts in patent cases in equity, is as broad and general in the terms of the grant, as is found in respect to the particular cases of jurisdiction enumerated in the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, and in reference to which it has been repeatedly held, that jurisdiction exists independently of the local laws of the states; and is the same, in its nature and extent, as the equity jurisdiction in England, from which it was derived. Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, 221; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 433, 447; Gordon v. Hobart, [Case No. 5,609.] The following cases will show that it is the settled practice of the English chancery, on injunction bills filed by the patentee, when there is no dispute about the title, to refer the case to a master, to take and state an account of the profits which the defendant has made by the use of plaintiff's invention, instead of sending it to a court of law to assess the damages. The defendant is regarded as having been in the use and enjoyment of property that belonged exclusively to the patentee, and as being bound in equity to account for the profits. Crossley v. Derby

Gas Light Co., Webst. Pat. Cas. 119, 3 Mylne & C. 428; Hind. Pat. 354, 355, 361, 363; Bacon v. Jones, 4 Mylne & C. 433, 436; Pierpont v. Fowle, [Case No. 11,152;] Curt. Pat. §§ 346, 348; Ogle v. Ege, [Case No. 10,462.]

The question before us is one of power, not whether the case was one fit and proper to be sent to the master, nor whether his report was properly confirmed. If the circuit court in Massachusetts had jurisdiction over the subject matter and parties, the correctness of the decree cannot be called in question collaterally.

3. But, on looking into the record, we find a defect, not noticed on the argument. That is, the omission to set forth, with reasonable certainty, the service of the subpoena upon the defendant in the district of Massachusetts. As the subpoena was doubtless thus served, and as that fact is also strongly inferable from the record, it was assumed both at the trial and argument. But, as the fact is vital to the jurisdictional question, it should have been stated upon the record made up and now before us, with strict certainty, and not have been left to implication or intendment. There is no averment whatever to be found in it, of service of the writ of subpoena. The only evidence of the fact is the return of the marshal upon the writ, which is set out; but that does not state where the service took place. There is, indeed, a strong implication arising out of the return as to Syms, namely, that he could not be found to be personally served in the district. But it does not necessarily follow from this, that the service upon Blunt was there. As the jurisdiction of the court over him rests altogether upon this fact, it should not, as before stated, have been left to doubtful implication.

The fact of the service upon the defendant in the district of Massachusetts resting wholly upon the subpoena and return as set forth, they are also subject to remark. The writ of subpoena is not directed to the marshal, for anything that appears in the record; and the return speaks of the service of a notice upon Blunt, which might very well refer to the memorandum accompanying the subpoena, directing that the appearance of the defendants must be entered on or before the return day of the writ, or the bill would be taken pro confesso. The return is vague, even as it respects the proper service of the writ; but the insuperable objection is, that it does not show affirmatively, that the service was made in the district of Massachusetts.

For this reason, a new trial must be granted, with costs to abide the event.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REISSUE—DECISION OF COMMISSIONER—EXPERT TESTIMONY—EQUITY—VERDICT OF JURY.

1. The decision of the commissioner of patents is conclusive as to the law and facts arising under an application for a patent, unless it be impeached for fraud or connivance between him and the patentee; or unless his excess of authority be manifest on the face of the papers.

3. A verdict upon an issue, ordered by a court of equity, is not final upon the facts it finds, nor binding upon the judgment of the court, unless it is sanctioned and adopted by the court upon the subsequent hearing on the merits. Quere—Whether a verdict in a suit at law is evidence of anything but the fact that it was rendered, unless a judgment be duly rendered thereon.

4. The patent act contemplates two classes of persons, as peculiarly appropriate witnesses in patent cases, viz.—1st, Practical mechanics, to determine the sufficiency of the specification as to the mode of constructing, compounding, and using the patent. 2d, Scientific and theoretic mechanics, to determine whether the patented thing is substantially new in its structure and mode of operation, or a mere change of equivalents; and the second class is by far the higher and most important of the two.

[At law. Action on the case by Ethan Allen against Orisson Blunt and others] for infringing patent [No. 461] for "an improvement in the method of constructing locks for fire arms." Plea the general issue, with a special statement of matters of defence. At the trial it appeared that the original patent was granted on the 11th of November, 1837, and was surrendered for some imperfections in the specifications, and a new amended patent was taken out on the 15th of January, 1841, which was again for a like defect, surrendered, and a new, amended patent was taken out on the 3rd of August, 1844.

Upon the opening of the defence, Gray (with whom was Dexter), for the defendants, took a preliminary objection, that the last (the present) patent was not good as an amended patent, for the specifications attached to the three patents were for different things, and not for one and the same invention; and that consequently the commissioner of patents had exceeded his authority in granting the present patent, and he cited the 13th section of the patent act of 1836, ch. 357.

B. R. Curtis and R. Choate, for the plaintiff, contended, that the present patent was for the same invention as the two former; and they also insisted that the commissioner of patents was the proper judge of the matter, and his decision, in granting the patent, was conclusive.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The 13th section of the patent act of 1836, c. 357, enacts, that whenever any patent shall be inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention, more than he had, or shall have a right to claim as new, if the error has or shall have arisen by inadvertency, accident or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, and the payment of the further duty of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued for the same invention for the residue of the term then unexpired, for which the original patent was granted, in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specification. Now the specification may be defective or insufficient either by a mistake of law, as to what is required to be stated therein in respect to the claim of the inventor, or by a mistake of fact, in omitting things which are indispensable to the completeness and exactness of the description of the invention, or of the mode of constructing or making or using the same. Whether the invention claimed in the original patent, and that claimed in the new amended patent, is substantially the same, is and must be in many cases a matter of great nicety and difficulty to decide. It may involve considerations of fact as well as of law. Who is to decide the question? The true answer is, the commissioner of patents; for the law entrusts him with the authority, not only to accept the surrender, but to grant the new amended patent. He is bound, therefore, by the very nature of his duties, to inquire into and ascertain, whether the specification is definite or insufficient, in point of law or fact, and whether the inventor has claimed more than he has invented, and in each case, whether the error has arisen from inadvertency, accident or mistake, or with a fraudulent or deceptive intention. No one can well doubt, that, in the first instance, therefore, he is bound to decide the whole law and facts arising under the application for the new patent. Prima facie, therefore, it must be presumed that the new amended patent has been properly and rightfully granted by him. I very much doubt whether his decision is or can be re-examinable in any other place, or in any other tribunal, at least, unless his decision is impeached on account of gross fraud or connivance between him and the patentee; or unless his excess of authority is manifest upon the very face of the papers; as, for example, if the original patent were for a chemical combination, and the new amended patent were for a machine. In other cases, it seems to me, that the law, having entrusted him with authority to ascertain the facts, and to grant the patent, his decision, bona fide made, is conclusive. It is like many other cases, where the law has referred the decision of the matter to the sound discretion of a public officer, whose adjudication becomes conclusive. Suppose the secretary of the treasury should remit a penalty or forfeiture incurred by a breach of the laws of the United States, would his decision be re-examinable in any court of law upon a suit for the penalty or forfeiture? The president of the United States is, by law, invested with authority to call forth the militia to suppress insurrections, to repel invasions, and to execute the laws of the Union; and it has been held by the supreme court of the United States, that his decision as to the occurrence of the exigency is conclusive. Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 19. In short, it may be laid down as a general rule, that, where a particular authority is confided to a public officer, to be exercised by him in his discretion upon an examination of the facts, of which he is made the appropriate judge, his decision upon these facts is, in the absence of any controlling provisions, absolutely conclusive as to the existence of those facts. My opinion, therefore, is, that the grant of the present amended patent by the commissioner of patents is conclusive as to the existence of all the facts, which were by law necessary to entitle him to issue it; at least, unless it was apparent on the very face of the patent itself, without any auxiliary evidence, that he was guilty of a clear excess of authority, or that the patent was procured by a fraud between him and the patentee, which is not pretended in the present case.

The defence upon the merits turned upon two points: (1) That the defendants did not use the same combination as the plaintiff, and consequently there was no violation of his patent. (2) That the invention patented did not belong to the patentee, he not being the first inventor thereof. In the course of the trial, the counsel for the defendant, in support of their defence, offered in evidence the record of a suit in equity between the same parties in the circuit court of the United States, for the district of New York, in which the court had directed an issue upon the same points, which were now in controversy, and the jury found a verdict upon those points in favor of the defendants. But it further appeared upon the record, that no further proceedings were had upon the verdict, and no hearing was had upon the merits of the case by the court; but the plaintiff, by the leave of the court, was allowed to dismiss his own bill without any final hearing thereon.

Curtis and Choate, for the plaintiff, contended that, under these circumstances, the record was not admissible as evidence. Gray and Dexter, for the defendants, contended that it was, being a verdict upon the very points now in controversy.

STORY, Circuit Justice. My opinion is, that the record is not admissible as evidence. No hearing was ever had by the court subsequently to the verdict, and no decree rendered upon the merits of the case. A verdict upon an issue ordered by a court of equity is, in no just sense, final upon the facts it finds, or binding upon the judgment of the court. The court may at its pleasure set it aside, and grant a new trial, or, disregarding it, may proceed to hear the cause and decide in contradiction to the verdict; or it may adopt the verdict, sub modo, and give it a limited effect only. But it can never be known what effect is given to the verdict, or whether any is given to it, until the subsequent hearing upon the merits, and a decree rendered thereon by the court. Under such circumstances, it is plain to me, that this verdict is not admissible in evidence, for it has not been sanctioned or established by the court, and without such sanction it is no proof of any fact, but that it was actually rendered in the case, and not proof of the facts found thereby. Indeed, I entertain great doubts, whether a verdict given in a suit at law is ever evidence of anything, but the fact that it was rendered, unless a judgment has been duly rendered thereon; for judgment may have been arrested therein, or a new trial granted; and then the verdict would become a nullity. Phil. & A. Ev. (Ed. 1838,) pt. 2, c. 3, § 1, p. 618. See 3 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H.) note 729, p. 1070. But in a court of equity, the verdict, independent of the adoption and sanction of it by the court, can establish nothing in the case.

The cause was afterwards argued to the jury upon the facts.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up to the jury, said: There is one consideration applicable to the evidence, which has been much discussed by the learned counsel, and upon which it is proper that I should say a few words. It is as to the relative weight of the evidence of persons practically engaged in the trade, employment or business of the particular branch of mechanics to which the patent right applies, and the evidence of persons who, although not practical artisans, are thoroughly conversant with the subject of mechanics as a science. It appears to me, that the patent acts look to both classes of persons, not only as competent, but as peculiarly appropriate witnesses, but for different purposes. Two important points are necessary to support the claim to an invention: First, that it should be substantially new, as, for example, if it be a piece of mechanism, that it should be substantially new in its structure or mode of operation. Secondly, that the specification should express the mode of constructing, compounding and using the same in such full, clear and exact terms, "as to enable any person skilled in the art or science, to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound and use the same." Now for the latter purpose, a mere artisan, skilled in the art with which it is connected, may in many cases be an important and satisfactory witness. If, as a mere artisan, he can, from the description in the specification, so make, construct, compound and use the same, it would be very cogent evidence of the sufficiency of the specification. Still, it is obvious, that although a mere artisan, who had no scientific knowledge on the subject, and who was unacquainted with the various mechanical or chemical equivalents employed in such cases, might not be able to make or compound the thing patented, from the specification; yet a person who was skilled in the very science on which it depended, and with the mechanical and chemical powers and equivalents, might be able to teach and demonstrate to an artisan how it was to be made or constructed, or compounded or used. A fortiori he would be enabled so to do, if he combined practical skill with a thorough knowledge of the scientific principles on which it depended. But upon the question of the novelty of an invention, and in reference to this, the identity or diversity of two or more machines, or compounds, it is obvious, that mere artisans, however well skilled in the mere details of their art, might be wholly incapable of giving a satisfactory answer; when a person trained in the science to which it belonged, would, at a glance, ascertain whether the mechanical apparatus or chemical compound was identical in its composition and structure or not, or whether the differences consisted in the mere change of one known mechanical equivalent for another. In short, science alone would be able to answer the question whether or not a particular machine was substantially in its mode of operation new, or identical with another, although with apparent differences of form and structure, which might mislead the unscientific mind. The like considerations would apply to a chemical compound; Sir Humphrey Davy, for example, might, from his vast knowledge of the chemical affinities of different substances, be able to tell, what must be the effect of the combination thereof from their known qualities, and what would be a mere change of known chemical equivalents without any exercise of the inventive powers, although he might never, perhaps, have made the particular compound then before the court. I should, therefore, say to the jury that each of these classes of witnesses was important and competent for different purposes in causes respecting patents for inventions. But that the very highest witnesses to ascertain and verify the novelty of an invention, and the identity or diversity of mechanical apparatus and contrivances, and equivalents, were, beyond all question, all other circumstances being equal, scientific mechanics; that they were far the most important and most useful to guide the judgment, and to enable the jury to draw a safe conclusion, whether the modes of operation were new or old, were identical or diverse.

The judge then proceeded to sum up the facts, and left them to the jury. The jury, not being able to agree upon a verdict, were discharged.

[NOTE. This case was again tried by a jury in June, 1846, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $1,200 damages. ALLEN v. BLUNT.

[2 Woodb. & M. 121; 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 530.]
Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1846.

EVIDENCE — OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE — RES GESTÆ — RES JUDICATA — DEPOSITION — PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — RENEWAL — NOVELTY — PRIOR USER — DAMAGES — JURY — NEW TRIAL — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. In a motion for a new trial; because an official letter from the commissioner of the patent office on an official matter was admitted as evidence, tending to prove the time of making the invention, there is some analogy to justify its admission after proving its signature as official correspondence, and also as a declaration made at the time containing [concerning] a particular act, as part of the res gestæ; and though its competency may be questionable,

if subsequent evidence in the progress of the case rendered it unnecessary to prove the fact for which it was offered, a new trial will not be granted on account of its admission.

[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,232; Carr v. Gale, Id. 2,435; Jewett v. Cunard, Id. 7,310; Richelieu & O. Nav. Co. v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 26 Fed. Rep. 601.]

2. So it will not be granted, where parol evidence was offered of the contents of a former letter, and rejected, because no satisfactory proof was first furnished to the court of the loss of that letter, or its having come to the possession of the opposite party. Courts will receive the affidavits of either party, to establish or rebut such preliminary facts, to be proved to them.

[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,232; Carr v. Gale, Id. 2,435; Richelieu & O. Nav. Co. v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 26 Fed. Rep. 601; Richardson v. Hicks, Case No. 11,783.]

3. Letters put in the post-office are not of course in all cases, and under all circumstances, presumed to have been received, though putting them in, may be using due diligence as to notice by the holders of negotiable paper. But in questions of fact addressed to the court, to lay the foundation of secondary evidence of a written paper, such a letter will not be presumed to have been received, merely from putting it in a post-office, if no answer was returned, and the party, to which it was addressed, makes affidavit it never came to hand.

4. A former verdict between these parties on an issue out of chancery in a bill in which an injunction was prayed for against the further use of a patent, and a trial of an action for damages for its violation, and on an amended specification, seems not to have been a trial of the same matter, and if it was, the former is not a bar when no judgment was ever rendered on that verdict, or on the merits of the bill, praying an injunction, the bill having been dismissed on the plaintiff's own motion.

5. A deposition should not be taken during the session of the court, at which the case is to be tried, except by its order or consent of parties, or taken merely de bene esse in case of death or absence abroad.

6. When counsel have acted publicly in former trials of a like cause, between these parties, and are still employed, though not one of the counsel, whose name appears on the record, if living within a hundred miles of the place where the deposition was taken, he ought to be notified.

7. It is doubtful whether a caption is not insufficient by describing the action as against one, when it was against two, and so entered and defended, though with service since only on one. If the ruling had been erroneous, no new trial is proper when no injury resulted, as the minutes of counsel containing the testimony of the witness on a former trial went to the jury, and, for aught which appeared, contained all that was material in his deposition.

8. A renewal of a patent by the commissioner with an amended specification, is presumed to have been made legally, that is, to correct a mistake or inadvertence, and for the same invention.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Edwards, Case No. 18,014; Morris v. Royer, Id. 9,835; Aultman v. Holley, Id. 656.]

9. But this presumption may be rebutted by evidence, and if so, it should be submitted to the jury when requested to decide as a fact, whether the last letters issued for the same invention.

[Cited in Morris v. Royer, Case No. 9,835; Aultman v. Holley, Id. 656.]

10. Under the acts of 1836 and 1839, the earliest invention is to prevail over any subsequent one, unless it was allowed to go into public use, or be on sale for two years before taking out a patent, in all trials where no point is made of a subsequent inventor having perfected and patented his invention, while the other neglected to use due diligence to complete his.

11. An invention, to be valid as the first, must be seasonably reduced to practice, and put in use.

[Cited in Wood v. Cleveland Rolling Mills, Case No. 17,941.]

12. A patentee, who uses certain words in his specification, and then takes out an amended one, omitting them, is not estopped by those words, after being thus withdrawn.

13. Where the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case for the violation of his patent, and then the defendant goes forward to prove his special defence under a notice, that the invention had been known and used at divers places by divers persons, it is right to instruct the jury, that on this defence it is the duty of the defendant to turn the scales of evidence in his favor.

14. To indemnify a patentee in damages, the jury may allow actual cost in suits relating to it, and also counsel fees, if reasonable in amount; and this court, under the act of congress, will award treble what is found by the jury as damages, if deemed proper to protect useful inventors from combinations and ruin.

[Cited in Parkhurst v. Kinsman, Case No. 10,761.]

15. If one of the jury, before retiring, publicly inquire as to a particular fact on the records of the court, and no objection being then interposed by counsel on either side, it is publicly answered by the clerk, it cannot be taken advantage of by a motion for a new trial after a verdict is returned.

[Cited in Parkhurst v. Kinsman, Case No. 10,761.]

16. Damages in cases of this kind and of torts, where the jury passed on them fairly and legally, will not be considered excessive, unless they clearly exceed what is necessary to indemnify the patentee; and a court will not set aside a verdict for such excess, unless large and palpably unreasonable. When a motion for a new trial is not drawn up for some weeks, and the counsel disagree as to some of the rulings made, the court must settle the differences, and will not award a new trial on account of them if no injustice seems on the whole case to have been done by the verdict.

[Cited in Jay v. Almy, Case No. 7,236.]

17. Nor when such is the result will the court allow a new trial, if the counsel believe that in his argument he expressed a wish for the court to instruct the jury on some points, and it was not done, but furnished no written list of the instructions desired, nor stated verbally, after the charge was through, and before the jury retired, that any point had been omitted, or any further directions were desired.

18. It is not the duty of the court to instruct the jury on abstract or irrelevant questions, but only such as arise on the evidence in the case; and though, as general rules, new trials are granted for the admission of evidence not competent, or the rejection of what is legal, or for a misdirection in point of law, yet by well established exceptions, in the exercise of a sound discretion, this is not to be done, if in the course of the trial the evidence became immaterial, or on the whole case, notwithstanding some erroneous ruling or instruction, the verdict does not seem to have been influenced by them, or to be against the justice of the cause.

19. A motion for an allowance of a bill of exceptions, under the authority given by the patent act to this court in all cases under it, where it seems "reasonable," in order to enable the parties to carry questions contained in it to the supreme court, when the damages are less than $2,000, ought to be granted in the exercise of a sound discretion, as to cases involving points, which arise in the construction of the patent law itself, where those are important in their character and really doubtful, but as to no cases involving points of a different character.

[21. Cited in Aiken v. Bemis, Case No. 109, to the point that the damages allowed by the jury must be plainly exorbitant to require the interference of the court.]

At law. This was an action on the case [by Ethan Allen against Orson Blunt and others] for a violation of a patent right for a self-cocking pistol. The suit was instituted September 2, 1844, and counted on a patent [No. 461] issued for the last time on the 3d of August, 1844, but which had originally issued, November 11, 1837, and been surrendered and cancelled for a defective specification, January 15, 1844, as well as again August 3, 1844. The plea was not guilty, accompanied by notices of a prior knowledge and use of the same modes of constructing locks to fire-arms, in various places and by various persons, that need not be recapitulated. The writ was served on Blunt only, and the cause came on for trial here in June, 1845, when the jury disagreed. It was tried again in June, 1846, and after ten days spent in putting in the testimony, and in arguments of counsel, was submitted to the jury, and a verdict returned for the plaintiff for $1,200 damages. In the progress of the trial, several rulings were made of disputed questions on the admission of evidence, and the jury were instructed on certain points of law connected with the case. But a bill of exceptions was not then filed by the counsel for the defendant, from an impression that, as the damages were less than $2,000, the case could not be carried up to the supreme court by a writ of error.

A motion for a new trial, however, was made, and the reasons assigned for it were filed, July 14, 1846, a copy of which follows: "And now, after verdict, defendants move the court here for a new trial, and assign the following causes. 1. Because the court, notwithstanding the objection of defendants, allowed the plaintiff to read in evidence a certain letter, purporting to have been written and addressed by one Ellsworth, assuming to be commissioner of patents, bearing date the 15th July, 1837. 2. Because the court refused to allow defendants to read in evidence and exhibit a portion of the deposition of one William H. Elliot, in relation to his said Elliot's having transmitted to plaintiff a certain letter and certain drawings of pistol locks, copies of which were annexed to said deposition, on the ground that the plaintiff by his affidavit denied the receipt of any such letter and drawings. 3. Because the court refused to permit defendants to give in evidence the record of the proceedings, verdict and final disposition of a suit in equity between the plaintiff and defendants in the state of New York, touching the same subject-matter, which is at issue in this suit. 4. Because the court refused to permit defendants to read in evidence the deposition of Samuel Colt, taken by said defendants in and for said suit. 5. Because defendants' counsel having insisted that the first letters patent were for another and different invention from those claimed in the second and third letters patent, the court ruled as a matter of law, that the re-issue by the commissioner of patents to plaintiff of the two letters by him obtained upon surrender of his first and of his second letters patent, was conclusive that all said letters were for one and the same invention. 6. Because the court, having permitted the plaintiff to introduce evidence as tending to show that plaintiff, several years prior to his first application for letters patent therefor, did invent and put in use the invention claimed by him and set forth in said letters patent, did thereupon rule that although the same invention had subsequent to plaintiff's making his said invention, and before his making his said application, been made and put in use by Elliot or any other persons, yet the plaintiff's patent would still be valid. 7. Because the court, although requested by defendants' counsel, omitted to instruct the jury as matter of law, that unless they should find that plaintiff had not merely first discovered, but first reduced to practice, and put to use his said invention prior to the discovery, and putting in use by others of the same invention, the plaintiff's patent would be void. 8. Because the court did not instruct the jury as matter of law, though requested by defendants' counsel, that plaintiff was estopped as against defendant and the public by his first letters patent from asserting that the mode of disengagement of the slide trigger does not constitute a substantial difference between the lock of plaintiff and a lock disengaged in the mode of detaching such slide trigger. 9. Because the court omitted to instruct the jury, though requested by defendants so to do, that if plaintiff made his said invention in 1833, and reduced the same to practice, yet if he concealed the same, and did not apply for letters patent until July, 1837, the letters patent thus obtained would be void in case of a subsequent similar invention reduced to practice, and put in use prior to said application for letters patent; but instructed the jury that if they should be satisfied that plaintiff made his said supposed invention in the year 1833, and reduced it to practice, but did not apply for letters patent therefor until July, 1837, yet that plain-tiff's patent was valid. 10. Because the court instructed the jury, that if plaintiff had made out a prima facie case of originality of invention, and of a violation of his patent by defendants, the evidence on the part of defendants to entitle them to a verdict, must be sufficient to turn the scale; that if defendants impugn the originality of the invention, or the similarity of the instruments, they must offer such evidence as shall render it probable that plaintiff was not the first inventor, or that the machines are not similar. 11. Because the court instructed the jury in relation to damages, that they were at liberty to include therein the costs and expenditures of plaintiff in conducting this suit, other than and besides the costs by law taxable therein. 12. Because the jury were permitted, upon the question of damages, to inquire of the clerk and ascertain what damages had been given in two other patent cases that had been tried in said court. 13. Because the damages assessed by the verdict were without evidence, against the evidence and the weight of the evidence, and are also excessive."

At the adjourned session of the court, held in September, 1846, the new motion was made for leave of the court, then to file a bill of exceptions, embracing some of the causes assigned for a new trial, in order to carry the case up by a writ of error under the special provision as to the subject of allowing writs of error in all patent cases when deemed reasonable by the court under the 17th section of the patent act of July 4, 1836. This motion was made without abandoning that for a new trial, in case it should not succeed; and both were argued at the September session. [Motions refused, and judgment entered on the verdict.]

Bartlett and C. G. Loring, for the motions.
B. R. Curtis and Choate, opposed.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The counsel for the defendants have assigned reasons for these two motions, which undoubtedly seemed to them well founded in fact, as well as sufficient in law. But the trial having ended June 24, 1846, and these reasons not having been filed till July 15, 1846, twenty-one days after, and when the court was not in session, they are open to greater chances of mistake, and cannot so easily and satisfactorily be corrected, if erroneous, as when filed near the time of the trial. The reasons for the delay, however, are satisfactory; but do not lessen or remove at all the difficulties produced by it. These have still got to be met, and having listened to the respective views of the counsel on both sides as to the facts and the law involved in these motions, I shall now proceed to perform my further unpleasant portion of duty in respect to them, by deciding first, what it appears to me actually took place at the trial in connection with each point, and next, whether it furnishes a reasonable ground for a new trial, or the allowance of a bill of exceptions under the special provision of the 17th section of the patent act. There are thirteen reasons assigned for the new trial, and it will be more convenient, intelligible, and useful in examining so many, to consider them in relation to a new trial, separately from the motion for a bill of exceptions.

1. The first one is the admission of a letter from the commissioner of patents, which was objected to by the defendants. There is no difference of views between the counsel as to the ruling of the court on this point having been as stated. But the letter was admitted merely as evidence to prove that as early as the 15th of July, 1837, the day of its date, the plaintiff had made this discovery in fire-arms, and applied to the patent office for a patent for it. This letter was an acknowledgment of such an application. I entertained doubts at the trial whether the letter must not be regarded like that of any third person not a party, and hence was not so good evidence as his statements under oath as a witness. But it may be, that coming from a public officer under an official oath and on official business, it is competent as an official act and document of a public officer in relation to such a subject; and being duly proved as to its signature, there is some analogy for making it competent evidence for the jury to weigh in deciding whether the invention of the plaintiff had not at that time been completed. If copies are admissible in such cases on general principles, a fortiori are the originals. The rules as to admitting official correspondence to prove official facts in this manner in certain cases may be seen in 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 359, 554; [Hatten v. Speyer,] 1 Johns. 38-41; [Talbot v. Seeman,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 1, 37, 38. Another principle, urged at the hearing, though not at the trial, in support of the admission of this letter is, that it was a part of the transaction, when the plaintiff applied for a patent. And being made at the time and in relation to that subject is a competent declaration, as a part of the res gestae and explanatory of what took place. [Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson,] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448; [Rawson v. Haigh,] 2 Bing. 102; [Forman v. Jacob,] 1 Starkie, 46; 1 Greenl. Ev. 120, 122. This is certainly plausible as to any letters then written by the plaintiff, or declarations then made by him. But whether these should not be proved by witnesses, may be questionable, and if the person with whom he was thus dealing is a competent witness, as Mr. Ellsworth is, for aught which appears, it would seem that his testimony is more proper evidence of what the plaintiff said or did than his letter, unless, as before remarked, that letter coming from a public officer, and under oath in respect to an official matter, be legal evidence as to that matter, in the light of a public document or record to prove it, and not as mere private letter admitted for being a part of the res gestae. But there is another circumstance connected with this testimony, which seems decisive against the objection to its admission. It is to be remembered in considering both of these motions, that they are not matters of right as to being granted, but the discretion of the court is to be exercised; and if, in the hurry of a trial, a dictation was erroneous, but afterwards became immaterial or unnecessary in consequence of other evidence, a new trial ought not to be granted. See on this, Greenleaf's case v. Birth, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 132; Thorndike v. City of Boston, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 242. Now it is certain, that the letter of the commissioner was admitted to show an invention of this lock by the plaintiff, he having applied for a patent for it as early as July, 1836. But in the chain of proof on this subject, evidence was subsequently offered, proving an invention of it by the plaintiff by having made arms, or caused them to be made with this lock on them, several months earlier. By that, therefore, the date of the application, as shown in this letter, became of no importance for this purpose, and there is no pretense or suggestion that the date was in truth erroneous, and would not be sustained by the commissioner as a witness, if placed on the stand. This ground for a new trial, therefore, cannot be sustained.

2. The next objection relates to the ruling of the court, that a portion of a deposition by Wm. H. Elliot, as to the contents of a certain letter, could not be read. It is alleged to have been excluded on the ground of the plaintiff's denial that he received any such letter. But there is a mistake in part as to this. It is true, that the court decided against the competency of a portion of Elliot's deposition, but it was because it went to prove the contents of a written paper and drawings of pistols, which paper and drawings were not first shown to be lost, nor in the possession of the plaintiff with notice to produce them. The fact, that he wrote letters to him at a particular time, and on the subject of pistols, was not ruled out, as may be seen by looking at the deposition filed in the case, and the marks now existing on what was deemed inadmissible. They were only as to the particular contents of the letter and drawings. These were ruled out till the usual previous proof was given of the loss of the originals, or of their being actually in the possession of the plaintiff, and notice given to produce them. The correctness of such a ruling is sustained by all the books on evidence, and rests on the familiar principle, that a resort will not, as a general rule, be allowed to parol or secondary evidence of a fact, when written, or higher evidence exists and may be obtained. The defendant then gave notice to the plaintiff in court to produce the letter and drawings, and the plaintiff thereupon filed his affidavit, that no such letter had ever been received by him. Another question thus arose and was decided by the court, whether the defendants had offered to the court, not the jury, satisfactory proof to justify it in point of law in the admission of parol evidence to the jury of the contents of that letter and drawings. Nothing had been offered to the jury to weigh on this point, and nothing could be by law, except the original letter itself and the drawings, until proof was furnished to the court that they had been lost or had gone into the plaintiff's custody. [Tayloe v. Riggs, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 597; [Page v. Page], 15 Pick. 374; [Jackson v. Frier], 16 Johns. 193; Woods v. Gassett, 11 N. H. 445; Schermerhorn v. Schermerhorn, 1 Wend. 123. Nobody testified to these last facts. The deponent swore he sent the letter, rather than delivered it. If sent by a private hand, then the person carrying it could testify whether it was delivered or not to the plaintiff. If sent by mail, then, where notice is to be brought home to the correspondent, the letter must be shown to have been received, and the more especially, where the correspondent denies under oath to the court that it ever was received. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 185.

It is a mistake to suppose that in case of letters, put in the mail to give notice of demand of commercial paper and non-payment, the law considers it sufficient on the presumption that the letter is always received. But it is on the fact, that writing and doing so are using due diligence to give notice. If such a presumption of the receipt of letters put in the post-office, is to be made in all cases, it is a presumption, contradicted daily by the immense dead letter collections never received by correspondents, and requiring the constant employment of several clerks to overhaul and dispose of, in our own general post-office alone. But however that may be, this letter was not proved to have been put in the post-office at all, and the proof addressed to the court, and the contradiction by the oath of the plaintiff's and Elliot's own testimony, that he never got any reply, failed entirely to convince me that the letter was ever received by Allen. That a party, before being allowed to give secondary or parol evidence of the contents of a writing, supposed to be in the possession of the opposite party, must first prove to the court the possession of it as well as the notice, may be seen in the following books. 1 Greenl. Ev. 597; [Henry v. Leigh], 3 Camp. 499; [Jackson v. Frier], 16 Johns. 193; [Tayloe v. Riggs], 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 597. This may be done by the affidavit of the party, and be disproved by like affidavits of his opponent, and interrogatories be put in the discretion of the court, to each by the other, if desiring it and pertinent. Woods v. Gassett, 11 N. H. 447. For it is all addressed to the court and not to the jury, and it is weighed under liberal views rather than technical scruples, and in connection with all the other evidence and circumstances bearing on the point. Tayloe v. Riggs, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 596; Schermerhorn v. Schermerhorn, 1 Wend. 123. Were it necessary to go farther on this objection, it would be seen that the evidence thus rejected became, likewise, immaterial; because it related to a communication of certain drawings by Elliot to Allen at a particular date in the summer of 1837, in order to show that Elliot was then the inventor before Allen; whereas Allen afterwards proved that on two occasions, both some time previous to that date, he had caused locks of this kind to be made.

3. The next ruling of the court was, not admitting in evidence the former verdict and proceedings between these parties in New York. My predecessor, on a former trial of this cause, considered this question, and gave an elaborate written opinion against the admission of this testimony. 3 Story, 742, [Allen v. Blunt, Case No. 216.] I have examined it with care, and feel satisfied it is correct, unless in point of fact the judgment of the court in New York, dismissing the bill, was a judgment made on the merits, and grounded on this very verdict. That court on its law side may not have saved questions, or ordered a new trial as to that verdict. But something still more than that fact is necessary to give it "vitality and finality," and that is judgment, actually rendered upon and enforcing the verdict. [Hopkins v. Lee,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 113. The bill in chancery, to aid which this verdict was taken, was dismissed. But that is an equivocal act unless explained. Dismissing bills is sometimes done for want of prosecution, and is then like a nonsuit in a court of law, which is of course no bar, nor competent evidence to affect a subsequent suit. Sometimes it is by agreement, without any examination or action on the merits by the court itself. Jenkins v. Eldredge, [Case No. 7,266.] Sometimes it is done to enforce an order or rule of the court, and not to bar the party from a subsequent prosecution, and sometimes it is a judgment on the whole case, and is then meant to settle fully the rights of the parties. Sibbald v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 492; [Martin v. Hunter's Lessee,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 355; Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 113-116. When it is of the latter character, it is usually pleaded in bar to a subsequent proceeding, and averments are made, that the dismissal was on the merits. But if it is not so pleaded and averred, and is only offered in evidence, then the evidence dehors the record, if not in it, should accompany the record, and prove all which is proper to show that the dismissal was the result of a judicial inquiry and disposal of the rights of the parties involved in the proceedings and verdict. See Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 467, especially cases cited in the arguments. See Burnham v. Webster, [Case No. 2,179.] But aside from these principles, it appears in this case, that before any judgment was rendered on or against this verdict, the plaintiff, on his own motion, had his bill dismissed without any decision on the verdict, or the merits of the case. A mere verdict in any suit does not, as a matter of course, settle the right of the parties. Butler v. Stephens, Walk. [Miss.] 219. It is open, as the verdict in the very case now under consideration strongly illustrates, to numerous exceptions growing out of rulings on evidence that was offered, and opinions or principles involved in the merits, and is open to be set aside for various errors in them, or for misbehavior of the jury, and, as the counsel for the defendants contend in this very case, ought in law and justice often to be set aside, rather than stand and be given in evidence to control or influence other trials between the same parties. But after all the objections to such a verdict have been weighed by the court deliberately, and the court proceeds to pronounce judgment on it, and does pronounce one sustaining it, then it should put an end to further litigation between the parties of the same points involved in that case. It is for public quiet, the interests of the republic to do this, but not to prevent one full decision on the merits between the parties. Again, if the same merits or points once decided are not again agitated in the second suit, then of course the principle in question does not make or allow the first decision, being on different matters, to bind or control the second. [Towns v. Nims,] 5 N. H. 262; Burnham v. Webster, [Case No. 2,179;] Bank of U. S. v. Beverly, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 148, 149. Accordingly, it is further contended in this case by the plaintiff, that if a judgment had been rendered in the first proceeding in New York on the merits, it did not involve the points here agitated. That was an application in equity for an injunction. This is a suit at law for damages for a violation of a patent right. An injunction will not always be granted, though the patent be a valid one. So the specification in the patent then relied on, was not the same as now, and hence that proceeding may have failed on the very objection since obviated by a correction of the specification. There should have been further evidence and explanations on both of these questions before that verdict could safely or properly be allowed to go to the jury. These views are sustained not only by sound reason, but various authorities cited in Aspden v. Nixon, [supra.] and by Judge Story in the present cause; and I do not regard the remarks of 1 Greenl. Ev. § 510, as sustaining a contrary doctrine when applied (as they are understood by me to be) either to the necessity not existing of any judgment at law on verdicts found on issues out of chancery, but leaving the necessity of judgments on them in chancery as imperative, as principle and the precedents just cited require. But it must appear of course.

that the court decided the merits, relying on that verdict, in order to show that the question involved in that verdict has been settled or adjudged on once by a proper tribunal. That is the gist of the principle in its ever being a bar or possessing weight. Bul. N. P. 234; 1 Story, 166, [Magoun v. New England Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 8,961;] [Perkins v. Knight,] 2 N. H. 474. Hence in Willes, 367, note, it is said, there must be a decree in chancery; and that is evidence that the verdict is in force. Gres. Eq. Ev. 109; 1 Grah. N. Tr. 596; 1 Newl. Ch. Pr. 353.

4. The fourth reason assigned for a new trial is the exclusion of Colt's deposition. It will be recollected that this deposition was taken without giving any notice to the opposite party or his counsel, and during the sitting of this court at which the cause was to be tried. Such depositions, if admissible at all under the act of congress, are very dangerous in their ex parte character, for the fair trial of the final merits of a cause, and according to the views of this court expressed with much deliberation, are to be very closely scrutinized. Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. [23 U. S.] 356. It is there settled, that no presumptions are to be made in aid of evidence taken contrary to common law principles. See, also, [The George,] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 287; [Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 604; 1 Gall. 488, [U. S. v. Coolidge, Case No. 14,857;] 3 Wash. C. C. 408, [Evans v. Hettick, Case No. 4,562;] 1 Brock 367, [The Thomas and Henry v. U. S., Case No. 13,919.] My own opinion is, that when taken during the session of the court, though over a hundred miles distant, whether with or without notice, they are entirely inadmissible. The admission of depositions, taken in perpetuum rei memoriam, under authority from the United States courts, and those authorized by some states by express statutes in cases of sickness, or going abroad, or old age, are to be used only in case the witness dies, or has not returned; and often in the states notice in these cases must be given to the party likely to be affected by them. See Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 30. See statutes in New Hampshire and Massachusetts. It is held in Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 616, that when taken de bene esse under the United States statute, as here without notice, they cannot be used, if the disability is removed. But when the witness lived over one hundred miles distant at the time taken, the opposite side must show the witness to be now nearer, and that this provision applies to cases of over one hundred miles distant out of the district, as well as within it. 3 Wash. C. C. 409, [Evans v. Hettick, Case No. 4,562.] 3 Wash. C. C. 531, [Bleecker v. Bond, Case No. 1,534,] is against this, and in my view on the soundest reasons, though the other decision being by the supreme court must govern till altered by that court. Here, however, a new principle interposes as to a deposition taken while this court is in session.

The party and his counsel, (getting express notice from the other side, or getting none in that way, but learning as they may accidentally when and where the deposition is to be taken, and) anxious as they may be to attend and cross-examine, have a prior and paramount legal duty to perform here in court to attend and be ready for the trial here. This is a duty enjoined by law, and not to be neglected. By a rule in the English courts counsel cannot be required to attend elsewhere during the sittings at Westminster. 1 Tidd, Pr. 57. In Maine the courts usually will not allow depositions to be used, taken during the session of the court, unless in the same place, and when the court is not in actual session, &c. Wyman v. Wood, 25 Me. 439. So, not the day before the court sits. [Ulmer v. Hills,] 8 Greenl. 326. Sed quaere, [Wymau v. Wood,] 25 Me. 440, as to the last. It is only by consent of parties, or discretion of the court under peculiar circumstances, that in ordinary cases of taking depositions, this prior and paramount duty in court should be required to be neglected or suspended, by absence in attending on the taking of depositions. They ought to be all taken, and the case prepared before the term begins. But beside this, the plaintiff had counsel in this case, residing in the very city where this deposition was taken, and though his name was not entered on the record here, he had acted in the former trial, and this was known to the defendants. Furthermore, the names of the parties in this suit are not given correctly in the caption, being described as a suit against Blunt, when it is against Blunt and Simmes, though not served on the latter. It is entered against both, and both plead and defend. Whether for such a variance the witnesses would be exonerated or not, if indicted for perjury, it is an objection, when the proceedings are to be strictly scrutinized as here, not without some weight. The exceptions to the admission of this deposition are the more readily sustained also; because, instead of a continuance to take it over again, the testimony of the witness was still allowed to go to the jury, as given in a previous trial, and contained in the minutes of the counsel on both sides; and if the deposition varied from that, by containing any material and new facts, it was not stated, either at the trial or in the argument of these motions, that in truth it did so vary. My predecessor, in one district of this circuit, made it an invariable rule, if depositions were taken without notice, to allow a continuance to enable the other party to cross-examine the witness, or repel his testimony; and such I understand to be the practice of most of the judges of the supreme court in their circuits. The 68th rule of this court in equity virtually does the same.

5. In respect to the next objection, a supposed ruling by the court, that the different letters patent to the plaintiff for his lock, must in point of law be regarded as conclusively for one and the same invention, the counsel for the plaintiff contend, that no such ruling was made by the court. My own minutes and recollection are, that the plaintiff's counsel in the opening, stated something as to the opinion of my predecessor about the binding force of the doings of the commissioner, unless it was set up and proved that fraud had been practised in procuring the last letters from the commissioner; and that the counsel on the other side expressed doubts as to the correctness of this doctrine. But no attempt was made during the trial to offer any evidence to show that these last letters were not for the same invention, or to show fraud practised on the commissioner in obtaining the last letters, and I can find no minute that my own views on this point were expressed at all. Indeed, in the closing argument for the defendants on this motion, the counsel admit that the court made no such charge or ruling. No doubt, however, exists in my mind that if any direction had been required by the evidence and given, I should have said that in point of law the jury ought, until the contrary was shown, to presume the commissioner, in issuing new letters, had discharged his duty faithfully and correctly. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 458. This involves the idea, that he issued them on account of mistake or inadvertence in the description or specification of the invention attached to the first letters. And therefore that he issued the new ones, as a matter of course, with a different amended description or specification, but for the "same invention," as he is expressly required to do by the thirteenth section of the act. But this prima facie inference or presumption in respect to the identity was open to be contradicted by proper evidence, though if none had been offered, it should stand as a fact, that the invention meant to be described in both, was the same. I entertain the same impressions now, and the correctness of them is fortified by my view of the decision of the supreme court in Stimpson v. Westchester R. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 404. See, also, [Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson], 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 458.

Probably my predecessor deemed the decision of the commissioner binding or conclusive farther than I should, and not, as I am informed, to be overturned, either as to the question of mistake in the specification, or as to the identity of the patent, unless fraud was shown, or an error by the commissioner was apparent on the face of the paper. Allen v. Blunt, [Case No. 216.] It is not extraordinary, that no such attempt at counter proof was made; because it is now stated in the argument, that the counsel for the defendant then considered the question of identity as a question of law merely for the court, and asked a ruling of the court on that point, whether as a question of law, after examining the descriptions in the two specifications, the new letters were or were not for the same invention. If I omitted, then, to give such a ruling, which is all contended for in the closing argument, the omission seems to have been right. But had I done what the defendants' counsel now say they wished, that is, given a ruling on the identity as a question of law, and looking to the specification alone, it would have been then, as it is now, against the defendants. On the face of the two specifications, without other evidence, neither a court nor a jury could much hesitate to believe the renewed letters and the original ones were for the same invention. So the commissioner must have meant, and so only had the plaintiff any motive to make them. Because new letters could then with equal ease have been taken out for any new invention; and its use for fourteen years from that date protected by them, instead of only for the residue of the term as in the renewed letters. These last, also, could not operate back on violations any more than new letters. To be sure he uses in the renewed letters words somewhat different from those in the old ones. That he might do this, was doubtless one of the very reasons for obtaining the renewed letters. But it was different language to describe more correctly the same invention, and this was proper. A part of the opinion of my predecessor on those specifications illustrates this point also. Allen v. Blunt, [Case No. 216;] Woodworth v. Stone, [Id. 18,021.] The whole mistake on this matter is perhaps in the defendant's supposition, that the commissioner's renewal was held by me to be conclusive in law as to the identity; because he understood my predecessor to have thought so, unless fraud was shown, or an error on the face of the papers. But from what has been said, it does not appear that the defendant is likely to have suffered from his mistake as to this, so as to justify a new trial for it.

6. The next ruling involves the question, whether under the act of 1836, when the inquiry is, which is the original invention, the earliest is not to prevail over a succeeding one, though a succeeding one may be made, and used before letters patent are taken out for the first. There is no doubt it must prevail as a matter of historical or chronological truth. It is, in truth, the first invention. Is there then any provision in the patent laws which contradicts or annuls this truth? Whatever may be the law abroad, or whatever it may have been here under the act of 1793, or whatever may have been the speculative opinions of writers as to what seems most appropriate, it is clear now, that no act of congress makes delay in taking out a patent fatal to the earliest or first inventor, unless he abandons his discovery to the public, or, by his "consent," allows it to be put in "public use or on sale" for two years before taking out a patent. Then he forfeits his right in it. See Patent Act July 4, 1836, § 15; (5 Stat. 123;) Act March 3, 1839, (5 Stat. 353.) The plaintiff's patent would be good under the above qualification or the above statutory provisions. The great contest in the present case was, which person in point of fact first invented this kind of self-cocking pistol. There was no pretense that Elliot, the rival inventor, ever actually took out any patent for his supposed invention, or that either of them made, except one or two experimental pistols, or put any others in "public use," or on sale, till the year previous to the patent of the plaintiff, when several were made under the direction of the plaintiff, and not of Elliot. The plaintiff's invention then and thus, if not earlier, became perfected prior to Elliot's completing his. Allen's was also first patented, being the only one patented. Elliot sleeping twenty years after, and taking out no patent, is strong presumptive evidence against him as inventor. 3 Story, 171, [Woodworth v. Sherman, Case No. 18,019;] 3 Story, 754, [Same v. Stone, Case No. 18,021;] 1 Story, 336, [Alden v. Dewey, Case No. 153.] Again, though I have referred to all the statutory provisions now governing this point, there may, under former statutes, have been established a principle like the following. That is, notwithstanding priority in date of an invention, the party must proceed to perfect and patent it, with due diligence, otherwise a succeeding inventor, who is more diligent in perfecting his, though not getting out a patent, may prevail against or defeat him. But there was no attempt here to offer evidence, that Allen was not employed after his invention till his patent, or the year previous, in perfecting and improving his invention, or that he ever dedicated it to the public or meant to; or allowed it to be in "public use" without any patent "for more than two years prior to such application for a patent." See section 7, Patent Act of March 2, 1839. The laws were different in phraseology before these last acts, and the construction of them may be seen in 4 Mason, 108, [Mellus v. Silsbee, Case No. 9,404.] By the act of February 1, 1793, the invention must not have been "known or used before the application" for a patent. They were not so strong as now for the patentee, being now "not known or used" "before the discovery." Yet, under the old law, Judge Story held, "that the first inventor has a right to a patent, though there may have been a knowledge and use of the thing invented by others before his application for a patent, if such knowledge or use was not anterior to his discovery." Mellus v. Silsbee, [Case No. 9,404;] Washburn v. Gould, [Id. 17,214;] Pierson v. Eagle Screw Co., [Id. 11,156.] This he conceded was different from the English decisions on their patent law. But the language and design of their law in this respect were not like ours. See Hall R. 58; Davies, Pat. 429. He held, that there the use must be such as to show a dedication to the public, (1 Gall. 482, [Whittemore v. Cutter, Case No. 17,601;]) that the use must have been a public use, (Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 292; 1 Wash. C. C. 440, [Russel v. Union Ins. Co., Case No. 12,147;]) and with his knowledge, (Whitney v. Emmett, [Id. 17,585;] [Pennock v. Dialogue,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 12, 20.) See, also, [Grant v. Raymond,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 248; [McClurg v. Kingsland,] 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202. Hence, whatever may have been thought on this in England, as in Dollond's Case, in the special language of their law, (2 H. Bl. 487,) or by Phillips here, (Ev. p. 395,) before the act of 1839, it is clear under that act and the act of 1836, the intervening use, in order to defeat a prior invention, must be public, and with consent of the inventor, and continue two years. Reed v. Cutter, [Case No. 11,645.] Again, through the whole trial, as well as in his notice, the defendant denied that the plaintiff had made the invention earlier in time than Elliot, and went on the ground, that prior in tempore, potior in re. Hence he could not, without an absurdity, have insisted at the same time, that Allen had invented it first, but abandoned it afterwards to the public. The instruction then, as given, was correct upon the point raised, and on which it was given, and which alone was then under consideration. And no instruction should be given on any other points than such ones. The court, though seasonably requested, is not bound to instruct the jury on points not arising in the case, or on abstract and irrelevant propositions, points not raised by the evidence. [Van Hoesen v. Van Alstyne,] 3 Wend. 75; [U. S. v. McLemore,] 4 How. [45 U. S.] 289; [Doe v. Garrison,] 1 Dana, 35; [Sodousky v. McGee,] 4 J. J. Marsh. 194; [McNiel v. Holbrook,] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84.

7. This disposes also of part of the seventh objection. The counsel for the plaintiff think an instruction was given, such as was desired under that head with the above explanation, and such is my own impression; and, on the second argument the counsel for the defendant waived this exception.

8. The eighth objection is overruled, because if the law allows a party to withdraw expressions, used in his first specification by inadvertence or mistake, and he does withdraw them, it would involve no little absurdity for the law afterwards to estop him in consequence of the very words which have been withdrawn or cancelled under its permission. The case of Kimball v. Belows, 13 N. H. 58, is very analogous to this view. It was a case of words, struck out of a count in a declaration, and afterwards attempted to be proved against the plaintiff, as his admissions and refused.

9. The next objection is a supposed omission by the court to instruct the jury, that if the plaintiff made his invention in 1833, and reduced it to practice, and concealed the same till he applied for a patent in July, 1837, the letters would be void in case that a similar invention was subsequently made, reduced to practice and put in use before he applied. It will be seen, by what has before been remarked under another head, that no question was made at the trial in relation to an use by the public of the plaintiff's patent for two years before he applied for it; and that there was no evidence whatever offered of such a "public" use of any other patent like his. It is also equally certain, that no evidence whatever was offered, or point made, that the plaintiff had invented, and improperly concealed his invention, till another person made and perfected a similar one. But, on the contrary, as before remarked, the contest was, whether he had invented it at all first, and this was inconsistent with any position, that he had invented but concealed it. The latter clause of this objection as to the instruction which was actually given, has before been considered, and, as before explained and limited, was the instruction proper on the evidence.

10. The next objection relates to that part of the charge to the jury, where the court stated, that if they believed in the first instance on the paper evidence, that the plaintiff had made out a case, he was entitled to recover, unless the defendant had in his defence rebutted or overcome it, or, in other words, turned the scales. The sentence, which follows in this objection, shows how the remark about turning the scales of evidence was applied and intended to be understood. It was thus. The plaintiff having made out his case, he stopped, and then the defendant went on and tried to make out a special defence, to overcome the right which the plaintiff had proved prima facie to recover, that is, he tried to "impugn the originality of the invention, or the similarity of the instruments," and of this, as a special defence, notice had been given on the record. It was observed on this by the court, that the defendants, to support that special defence, must, in the language of this objection, "offer such evidence as shall render it probable that the plaintiff was not the first inventor, or that the machines are not similar." The burthen of proof was on him to turn the scales in respect to this new matter which he had attempted to prove under his special notice. All remarks, like this now questioned, are right or wrong as applied or not to a particular state of pleadings, or particular course of trial and evidence. So far as regards these, the notice here was like a special plea in bar, the support of which belongs to the defendant in all cases. He must, in relation to that, after the plaintiff has gone far enough to make out a prima facie case, turn the scales in his own favor, or, in other words, take on himself the bur-

then of proof and discharge it. Thus one of the defences set up in the notice was a use of a like lock abroad in England before the plaintiff's supposed invention, and another was the use of such a lock previously in Westchester county in the state of New York. The idea intended to be inculcated was that the defendant, in respect to these particulars, must render them probable, he must turn the scales, the burthen was on him. If there could be any doubt of the correctness of such a direction in point of law, it will be removed by reading the case of Powers v. Russell, 13 Pick. 76. There is still another view of this matter. If some points in the declaration or claim by the plaintiff were contested, on which the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case, or offered enough evidence to turn the scales in his favor, it may have been suggested that then the defendant must offer enough, standing by itself, to render his position probable, or turn the scales as to that in his favor, else there would not be sufficient to overcome the balance already proved for the plaintiff. But it never was intended, and nothing is offered to show that the jury understood, they were on all controverted points in the declaration, which were common to that and the defence, not to compare in the end all the evidence on both sides, and find for whichever party the whole appeared to preponderate.

11. The next objection is, that the court instructed the jury, they might allow to the plaintiff in damages his actual costs, as well as any taxable cost he had paid in consequence of any violation of his patent, which the defendants had committed. I think so still. The fees of counsel were specially authorized to be allowed by my predecessor, (2 Mason, 119, [Boston Manuf'g Co. v. Fiske, Case No. 1,631,]) though at first he thought differently, (1 Gall. 482, [Whittemore v. Cutter, Case No. 17,601,]) Of course they must be reasonable fees. In cases of actions for breaches of covenants of seizin, where the object is an indemnity for the injury sustained, costs in former suits are not only allowed, but "reasonable counsel fees" beside. Staats v. Ten Eyck's Ex'rs, 3 Caines, 111; Kingsbury v. Smith, 13 N. H. 122; [Pitcher v. Livingston,] 4 Johns. 1; Swett v. Patrick, 12 Me. 9; Beale v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & P. 407; Pitkin v. Leavitt, 13 Vt. 379. The "actual damages" sustained, include all necessary and proper expenses in protecting one's violated rights. And though they should not include "smart money," or what is proper merely for example, they may well embrace everything really suffered by the wrong. 1 Baldw. 328, [Whitney v. Emmett, Case No. 17,585;] Gray v. James, [Id. 5,718;] Whittemore v. Cutter, [Id. 17,601;] Washburn v. Gould, [Id. 17,214.] In the admiralty courts, counsel fees are allowed by way of damages, and in one case $500. The Apollon. 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 379. There is no exact measure of damages, except in cases founded on contracts; and unless patentees are to be fully indemnified for injuries inflicted on them, they are destined in all valuable patents to be broken down by litigation alone. If they can escape that untoward fate now, from which Arkwright and Watts suffered so much at first, and by which Oliver Evans and many others have been ruined, and which the very importance and worth to the world of the property their genius has created, exposes them to only the more, it will be effected solely by giving to them an ample indemnity, a real and substantial, and not a mere technical one for rights, which are sacredly recognized both by the laws and the constitution. Indeed I am prepared, in all cases of wanton and persevering encroachments on the fruits of their honest inventions and labors, to go further, and do what congress, doubtless for this useful purpose, empowered this court to do, and that is, treble the damages, if required for the full indemnity and protection of any wronged patentee. See section 14, of Patent Law of July 4, 1846. This, I understand, has been done here on some former occasions.

12. The next objection on account of the damages is, that the jury were permitted to inquire of the clerk, and ascertain what damages had been given in two other patent cases recently tried here. I am surprised at this objection, when the inquiry was made by one of the jury in the box, in the presence of the court, counsel, and parties, and no objection raised to it at the time, nor any pretence now set up, that the reply of the clerk did not correspond with the record. The proper time to object to the admission of such a question and reply, is that which is conformed to in all other cases of testimony, where the parties and counsel and court are present, and is the time when the question is asked. It is not permissible to acquiesce then by silence, and take the chance of a favorable verdict on the sums stated in former trials, they both having been in this instance comparatively small, and make the objection for the first time after the jury have returned a verdict for a larger sum. It is well settled, that a new trial should not be granted for a cause existing at the trial, but which was not stated or excepted to then. Davidson v. Bridgeport, 8 Conn. 472; Nichols v. Alsop, 10 Conn. 263; Torry v. Holmes,] Id. 499; [Alsop v. Swathel,] 7 Conn. 500; State v. Hascall, 6 N. H. 352; 1 Wash. C. C. 440, [Russel v. Union Ins. Co., Case No. 12,147;] [Jackson v. Jackson,] 5 Cow. 173; [Wait v. Maxwell,] 5 Pick. 217; [Rice v. Bancroft,] 11 Pick. 469; [Ritchie v. Putnam,] 13 Wend. 524; [Den v. Geiger,] 4 Halst. [9 N. J. Law,] 225; [Worford v. Isbel,] 1 Bibb, 247; [Cannon v. Alsbury,] 1 A. K. Marsh. 76; [Pennock v. Dialogue,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 15. The more especially is this so, when any wrong or misleading of the jury was likely to flow from the objection not being then made. [Train v. Collins,] 2 Pick. 145; [Brazler v. Clap,] 5 Mass. 1, 4; [Newhall v. Hopkins,] 6 Mass. 350. New evidence may be admitted after a case is closed, and even after a jury has gone out, if no objection is taken at the time. [Jackson v. Tallmadge,] 4 Cow. 451; [Hutchins v. Childress,] 4 Stew. & P. 34; Parish v. Fite, 1 Law Rep. [Car. Law Repos.] 238.

13. The last objection is, that the sum returned by the jury as damages, was excessive. The court, from what had been noticed in respect to the probable damages, did not anticipate so large a sum. But it must be a very aggravated and oppressive case, where the court would feel justified in setting up its own opinion, even if decidedly different from that of the jury as to the true amount of damages in an injury in practical life, and as to business not susceptible of exact proof in its details, but peculiarly lying within the range of the experience and observation of a jury. It must stand, notwithstanding such difference, if the matter was submitted to their "fair judgment." Alden v. Dewey, [Case No. 153.] So nothing was left to the jury to be weighed in estimating the damages which the court, on reconsideration, deems to have been improper. Indeed, my predecessor was inclined to leave a very wide range to the jury on this subject, and hardly exclude any thing at all bearing on it from their consideration. Earle v. Sawyer, [Id. 4,247;] Pierson v. Eagle Screw Co., [Id. 11,156.] Retiring then with what is proper, or not objected to at the proper time, if in weighing all that is pertinent, the jury give more damages than any one witness testified to, it has been considered to be no ground for a new trial, as being excessive. [Brewer v. Inhabitants of Tyringham,] 12 Pick. 547; [Thompson v. Porter,] 4 Bibb, 70; [Tarlton v. Briscoe,] 1 A. K. Marsh. 67. The being excessive, is the last branch of this exception. If damages are slightly more than the court deem proper, they are not to be regarded as a ground for a new trial. [Luckett v. Clark,] Litt. Sel. Cas. 178; [Caldwell v. Roberts,] 1 Dana, 355; [Smith v. Carr,] Hardin, 317; [Van Slyck v. Hogeboom,] 6 Johns. 270; Stanley v. Whipple, [Case No. 13,286.] Some cases hold, that they must be extravagantly excessive, ([Worford v. Isbel,] 1 Bibb, 247; [North v. Cates,] 2 Bibb, 591; [Roberts v. Swift,] 1 Yeates, 209;) unless some exact measure of damages exists in the case, as it does in suits on some contracts, (5 Mason, 497, [Thurston v. Martin, Case No. 14,018;] [Coffin v. Coffin,] 4 Mass. 1, 11; [Com. v. Justices of the Court of Sessions,] 5 Mass. 435.) Others, that they must be unreasonable. Sampson v. Smith, 15 Mass. 365. Or, in torts, flagrantly excessive. [Vanzant v. Jones,] 3 Dana, 464; [Outton v. Barnes,] Litt. Sel. Cas. 136; [Respass v. Farmer,] 2 A. K. Marsh. 365; [Webber v. Kenney,] 1 A. K. Marsh. 345; [Owings v. Ulory,] 3 A. K. Marsh. 454; [Vunck v. Hull,] 2 Penn.

It is true in this case as stated by the counsel for the defendant, the evidence as to damages on either side was general and somewhat loose. This arose from the fact, that the contested right was the main question. But the objection is not well founded, that nothing was submitted to the jury which justified any damages, or anything like the sum given. 1 Baldw. 328, [Whitney v. Emmett, Case No. 17,585.] For it was certainly shown, that the respondents made and sold pistols similar in principle to the plaintiff's, that the improvement in them was a valuable one, that there had been a long and expensive trial between these parties on the subject in New York, and another here before the present one; and every man fit for the jury box could, from all this, without having the particulars in bills of cost, form a general opinion, likely to be very sound and not unjust, as to the sum in damages which would probably indemnify the plaintiff. Washburn v. Gould, [Case No. 17,214.]

Having gone through with the specific reasons assigned for a new trial, and come to a conclusion against their sufficiency, it seems proper now to advert to some other considerations of a general character, connected with several of the objections that might in some cases operate in favor of a new trial. They are, that the counsel on the part of the defendants, and those on the part of the plaintiff, do not always agree in respect of what was in fact done or omitted to be done at this trial; and that some requests to the court, made in the argument of the cause as to charging the jury, were not complied with when the charge was finally given.

I can readily conceive of cases, where the differences in recollection between the counsel were so great after the lapse of several weeks, and the point so material, about which they differed, that the court might deem a new trial necessary to a right disposal of the case. But here, the court feels satisfied, where they differ on what is material, and it is for the court in such case to decide on these differences. (Bond v. Cutler, 7 Mass. 205; [Inhabitants of the First Parish in Brunswick v. McKean,] 4 Greenl. 508.) that, looking to its own minutes and the leading points made on each side, the course pursued at the trial was such as it has just explained under the different objections; and in respect to the merits of the case, as tried and settled in the end, that no injustice is likely to happen from coming to the conclusion, not to disturb the verdict. Again, I can conceive of cases in the hurry of a trial at nisi prius, and one like this of ten days' length, where some omission of the court or counsel must have had such an influence on the verdict as to require a new trial. For there may be mistakes, not to say sins of omission as well as commission, in all concerned in administering the laws. But the omissions, supposed to have occurred here in charging the jury on particular points, are not admitted by the counsel on the other side to have happened in some of the cases supposed; and, in the others, they related to questions as before shown, which did not arise on the evidence, and on which instructions ought not to be given. It is well, also, in all cases to remember, that after a judge has charged the jury, in a written list of the points, on which instructions are requested by either party, has not been handed to him in conformity to the practice in most of the states south of us, it is their duty after the charge is closed, to call his attention to any point which has been omitted, as some oversights are likely to happen where the points are numerous, and the evidence to be commented on to the jury is very abundant and complicated. Stanton v. Barrister, 2 Vt. 464. If the counsel do observe such omissions at the time, and do not mention them, so that they may be corrected and supplied at once, before the jury go out, it would be a very dangerous practice to let his client take the chance of a verdict, before naming them, and then, if losing the verdict, for the first time proceed to suggest the omission as a ground for a new trial. On the contrary, if counsel do not at the time observe any omissions, it is pretty conclusive evidence, that the points omitted were not then deemed very material, since they did not make so much impression on their minds as to cause them to notice that instructions had not been given concerning them.

My own opinion as to the importance of any points omitted, which were relevant, corresponds with this supposition, that they were of little weight, and did not alter the verdict in any respect. There are some cases on this point not uninteresting. Thus it has been settled, that it is no ground for a new trial, if the judge omitted to charge on some points, unless the omission probably influenced or changed the verdict. [Grimes v. Coyle,] 6 B. Mon. 301; Grah. N. Tr. 273; [Morrison v. Muspratt,] 12 Moore, 231; Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 277; Calbreath v. Gracy, [Case No. 2,295;] [Den v. Sinnickson,] 4 Halst. [9 N. J. Law,] 149. And that it is too late to remind the court of any omission after the jury have retired. State v. Catlin, 3 Vt. 534. In fine, the general rule as to new trials throughout is not to disturb the verdict, if it appears to be according to the justice of the case, and the ruling is only doubtful in point of law. [Rodgers v. Page,] Brayt. 169; [Breckinridge

v. Anderson,] 3 J. J. Marsh. 710. Though, if the ruling be clearly wrong, it will be, as a general rule, a good ground for a new trial. [Doe v. Buford,] 1 Dana, 481, 502; [Gillespie v. Gillespie's Heirs,] 2 Bibb, 89; [Wardell v. Hughes,] 3 Wend. 418. But in examining the elementary books and cases on this subject, it is highly important to discriminate what are the exceptions from what is the general rule on this last point. Thus, as a general rule, though it will be a ground for a new trial, if illegal testimony is admitted, ([1] Grah. N. T. 236, 237, and cases cited; 2 Wash. C. C. 276, [Stevellie v. Read, Case No. 13,389]; [Walker v. Leighton,] 11 Mass. 140,) yet it is equally well established as an exception, not to grant a new trial if it be manifest that the illegal evidence has not prejudiced the case, ([Winchell v. Latham,] 6 Cow. 682; [Tullidge v. Wade,] 3 Wils. 18; [Horford v. Wilson,] 1 Taunt. 12; [Strange v. Wigney,] 6 Bing. 681.) Or if the legal objection is merely technical, e. g. as to admitting a printed statute when an exemplification is proper; and when on a new trial the same result will probably happen. [Ackley v. Kellogg,] 8 Cow. 223; [Watkins v. Towers,] 2 Term R. 275; [Norris v. Badger,] 6 Cow. 449. Or if the evidence became immaterial, and the jury did not rely on it probably. [Marquand v. Webb,] 16 Johns. 92; [Osgood v. Manhattan Co.,] 3 Cow. 621; [Preston v. Harvey,] 2 Hen. & M. 55. Or if there was enough to justify the verdict without it, on examining the report of the case. [Doe v. Tyler,] 6 Bing. 561. Or if the rejection was right, but on a ground different from that assigned. [Lessee of Ludlow's Heirs v. Park,] 4 Ham. [4 Ohio,] 5; [Longes v. Kennedy,] 2 Bibb, 608. So, if incompetent evidence be admitted, the court will not grant a new trial if it was not material. [State v. Chesley,] 4 N. H. 369; [Bunce v. Wolcott,] 2 Conn. 31; [Jewett v. Stevens,] 6 N. H. 80, sed quaere; [Prince v. Shepard,] 9 Pick. 176. Or if no injustice appears to have been done by it. [Brown v. Wilde,] 12 Johns. 455; [Den. v. Vancleve,] 2 South. [5 N. J. Law,] 765; [Barney v. Goff,] 1 D. Chip. 304; [Thurlow v. Massachusetts,] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 509; [Hamblett v. Hamblett,] 6 N. H. 333. Or if cumulative merely. [Lessee of Allen v. Parish,] 3 Ham. [3 Ohio,] 107; [Stone v. Stevens,] 12 Conn. 219. Or if not controverted. [Crosby v. Fitch,] Id. 410. Or if the fact was proved also by other evidence. [Norris v. Badger,] 6 Cow. 449. So, [Horford v. Wilson,] 1 Taunt. 12, and [Nathan v. Buckland,] 2 Moore, 153; [Prince v. Shepard,] 9 Pick. 176; [Supervisors of Chenango v. Birdsall,] 4 Wend. 453; [Stiles v. Tilford,] 10 Wend. 338. Again, it is a general rule to grant a new trial if there was any misdirection on the law to the jury. [1] Grah. N. T. 262, cases cited; [Boyden v. Moore,] 5 Mass. 365. But it is an exception, if no injustice seems to have been done by it, as if it was on a trifling or immaterial point; or did not affect the verdict; or if justice appears to have been done. [Johnson v. Blackman,] 11 Conn. 342; [Olmsted v. Hoyt,] Id. 377; [Lee v. Chambers,] 3 J. J. Marsh. 506; [Dole v. Lyon,] 10 Johns. 447; [Woodbeck v. Keller,] 6 Cow. 118; [Hoyt v. Dimon,] 5 Day, 479; [High v. Wilson,] 2 Johns. 46; [Boyden v. Moore,] 5 Mass. 368; [Dudley v. Sumner,] 5 Mass. 438, 487; [Estwick v. Caillaud,] 5 Term R. 425; [McLanahan v. Universal Ins. Co.,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 183; [1] Grah. N. T. 301, 341, 342, and cases cited; [Smith v. Frampton,] 2 Salk. 644; [Deerly v. Duchess of Mazarine,] Id. 646. Or the objection was only technical. [Edmondson v. Machell,] 2 Term R. 4; [Cox v. Kitchin,] 1 Bos. & P. 338, and note; [Robinson v. Cook,] 6 Taunt. 336; [Springer v. Rowdoinham,] 7 Greenl. 442; [Haynes v. Jenks,] 2 Pick. 177; [Baylies v. Davis,] 1 Pick. 206; [Hoyt v. Dimon,] 5 Day. 479; [Brown v. McConnell,] 1 Bibb, 265; [Owens v. Conner,] Id. 606. It is an exception, too, if the point was frivolous or litigious. [Coit v. Tracy,] 9 Conn. 1; [Aylwin v. Ulmer,] 12 Mass. 22; [Tyler v. Ulmer,] Id. 163; [Hyatt v. Wood,] 3 Johns. 239; [Jaques v. Todd,] 3 Wend. 83; [Goodrich v. Walker,] 1 Johns. Cas. 250; [Hunt v. Burrel,] 5 Johns. 137; [Robbins v. Treadway,] 2 J. J. Marsh. 546.

Furthermore, if I could find errors in the instructions to the jury, not specified, which led or were likely to lead to injustice, such as my remarks, that the improvement was useful in itself, though in fire-arms or instruments of war and death, because increasing the powers of high civilization over barbarism, and thus tending to preserve and perpetuate all the benefits of the former from the destruction which, in former ages, often assailed it from rude force; and my other remark, that if this invention was not useful to the community in making pistols, the defendants would not be likely to use it; or if other presumptions of error existed, because the finding for the plaintiff by the jury was unexpected and strange, when in fact the plaintiff alone had taken out any patent for this improvement, and had first brought it into general use, and the defendants had not pretended themselves to have invented it; or because the giving so much damages for a violation of so useful a patent, was matter of surprise, when the whole amount was not likely more than to indemnify him for all his costs and expenses in so protracted and severe a litigation, and much less all his losses of larger sales and profits. I say, if injustice was thus apparently stamped on any part of the proceedings by observations not objected to, or by occurrences, which the court is now conscious were wrong, it would make me hesitate in refusing another trial. But when the whole aspect of the case is the other way, it seems to be my duty, in the exercise of a sound discretion, not to disturb what the jury have decided.

The second motion for the allowance of a bill of exceptions to be now filed, so as to embrace these reasons assigned for a new trial, in order to bring a writ of error on them, involves several considerations, different from those in the naked motion for a new trial. This second motion is founded upon the special proviso to the seventeenth section of the patent act of July 4, 1836. That section allows a writ of error and appeals "to the supreme court of the United States in the same manner and under the same circumstances as is now provided by law in other judgments and decrees of the circuit courts, and in all other cases in which the court shall deem it reasonable to allow the same." This presents a novel question. I am not aware of any case, and none is referred to on either side, where this portion of the patent law has received a construction in any court during the ten years since its passage. In the absence of any decision, I am inclined to the opinion, that however anxious my wishes are to facilitate attempts of parties to have a revision of the decisions of this court whenever dissatisfied with them; yet I am limited by congress in my power to allow it, and must confine the indulgence to cases where it appears to the court to be "reasonable," looking to the subject-matter of this provision, and the general law as to appeals. Opposing parties, also, have an interest in this matter against further delay and expense; and the public has a policy as to limited jurisdiction in suits, which is to be respected; and, therefore, without yielding to my own wishes to permit a writ of error or appeal in all cases, I must execute the act of congress as it exists in regard to the public interest and the convenience and rights of parties.

What then is reasonable as a general rule in respect to this request? Adverting to the manifest policy of the law as to appeals and writs of error, independent of this particular provision, it will be seen, that most cases are to be disposed of finally, in the states where one of the parties resides, as less expensive and more convenient, unless the amount in controversy be as large as $2,000, or unless the judges disagree in their opinions. There is nothing in the public policy as to the sum being now too large, which limits appeals, and hence causing a disposition to carry up cases of smaller pecuniary importance. On the contrary, two thousand dollars was regarded as high here in 1789, as three or four thousand would be now. The necessary delay of justice in the supreme court, beyond what once existed before the country grew to be so much larger and wealthier, increases the grievance of being compelled to go there unless required by strict law. I regard these objections more than any additional expense in further hearings there, at such a distance, instead of nearer home, as the attendance of witnesses and parties is not required there. But they all show, that in a case where the amount, as here, is little over half of what was required in 1798 to carry a case up, it should not be deemed reasonable to aid in doing it, unless to promote some great end or interest, not involved simply in the payment of the sum, found as damages in this particular case. One of those ends undoubtedly is, uniformity in the construction of our great system of patent laws throughout the United States, and because questions connected with the patent laws themselves, when decided, govern numerous other cases and much larger amounts than are disclosed in any one verdict.

These considerations show that the exceptions to be allowed, using a reasonable discretion, ought to relate to constructions of the patent laws. If not to be confined to these, why limit the indulgence to patent cases? There is no reason why, as to the other incidental questions, not relating to patents, the parties in these suits should enjoy privileges concerning their decision, not enjoyed by other suitors as to such questions. Why should it be permitted, then, as to matters casually connected with suits upon the patent acts? Why, if adverting to the public interests, or the rights of opposing parties, prolong litigation on such points at great inconvenience, delay, and expense? So it is discreet and reasonable to confine the appeals, even on patent questions under the patent laws, to such as involve important and not trifling matters, connected with those laws, not mere technical difficulties; also to such as involve questions really doubtful. If the discretion concerning what is "reasonable," which is to be exercised by the court, is not to extend to a selection of cases having questions, that really relate to the patent laws, congress would have provided, that appeals should exist in respect to all patent actions without distinction. Looking to the first test, none of the causes assigned for a new trial, are to be considered in deciding as to a bill of exceptions, but the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 9th, as none others relate to the construction of the patent laws. Now the fifth, as it will be seen, if allowed in any form, must be in one already substantially settled by the supreme court in Stimpson v. Westchester R. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 380, before cited; and one, probably not controverted by the defendant, when explained as it is understood by the court. The sixth, as has been shown, either attempts in its present form to raise a point about a "public use" of the plaintiff's patent, which was not made at the trial; or if it merely relies on the position, that a prior invention is not valid when a subsequent one is made, but not patented, before the first one is patented, it seems too clear against the defendant to hang a doubt on. The seventh is now abandoned. The eighth is for a supposed omission to instruct the jury on particular points, and not for mis-instructions, and of course cannot be ground for a bill of exceptions independent of what has before been said against the intrinsic character of the rulings desired upon it. The case does not, therefore, seem to contain matter to make it a reasonable one for granting this privilege. Both motions are refused; and judgment must be entered on the verdict.

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. July 12, 1871.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INFRINGEMENT BY BOARD OF EDUCATION—LIABILITY OF CITY.

The city of Brooklyn is not liable to the patentee of a patented seat, for the use thereof in the public schools of the city, under the direction of the board of education, which purchased and owns the seats, the corporation of the city not using the seats, and having no power, by law, to direct the discontinuance of their use.

[In equity. Bill by Aaron H. Allen against the city of Brooklyn to enjoin infringement of letters patent No. 12,017. Injunction refused.]

William C. De Witt, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I am of the opinion that this action cannot be maintained against the city of Brooklyn—not, however, by reason of any exemption from liability secured by the act of 1862, (Bliss v. City of Brooklyn, [Case No. 1,544,]) but because the use of the complainant's patent seats in the public schools of the city, under the direction of the board of education, to which body the seats belong, does not create a liability on the part of the corporation of the city of Brooklyn to pay the complainant for the use of his patent. The injunction prayed for, if granted, would be of no effect, as the corporation of the city has no power, by law, to direct the discontinuance of the use of the seats. The seats are not used by the corporation of the city, but by the board of education, the purchaser, and any injunction, to be effectual, must issue against that body.

SALVAGE SERVICE — WHAT CONSTITUTES — COMPENSATION.

1. Compensation granted for keeping company with the distressed vessel, at the earnest request of her captain.

[2. Cited in The Williams, Case No. 17,710, as authority for remedy in rem for services not upon or in contract with the ship, nor upon which the salvation of the vessel depended.]

[In admiralty. Libel for compensation for services. Decree for libelants.]

From the pleadings and evidence it appeared that the Canada, [John] Sewall, master, on a voyage from Jamaica to England, having lost her rudder, and sprung her foremast in a storm, was obliged to bear away for the first port. She came to anchor off the bar of Charleston; when the captain came ashore for assistance, and returned with a new rudder, six fresh hands, and a pilot. The ship, in another storm, parted her cables, and was driven out to sea. After several days she fell in with Allen's brig, bound from New York to Charleston, and entreated Allen to stay by the ship, and assist, if necessary, in conducting her back to the bar. With this he readily complied; kept company all day, and carried a light through the night. The next day they made the lighthouse; and, the wind being more moderate, the brig towed the ship towards the bar for two or three hours; after which the ship anchored, and the brig came up to Charleston. The ship arrived, without further assistance, on the following day; and the present suit is brought for compensation. Salvage was claimed in the libel, but that ground was abandoned. Though the captain of the ship had expressed great solicitude to have the brig in company, yet the pilot and others from Charleston, who went to her assistance, concur in saying that the ship was in no immediate danger. She carried sail, notwithstanding the injury done to the foremast, and was manageable, notwithstanding the loss of her rudder. Though leaky, she was cleared of water by pumping half an hour in every hour, and that with a single pump; the cargo was not at all damaged. The crew of the ship, however, acknowledge that they derived much comfort from the presence of the brig, as they could rely upon her aid in case of greater danger. The two vessels were together a day and a half; but the brig never went out of her course, nor did she receive the least damage. Three hundred dollars had been offered by way of compensation, but refused.

The judge decreed four hundred, and ordered the defendant to pay costs of suit.

ALLEN v. CROGHAN.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 517.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1838.

JUDGMENT — EXECUTION — GARNISHMENT — INTEREST.

When the judgment against the principal is for a larger sum than the real debt, to be released on payment of the real debt, with interest until paid, upon which judgment an attachment is issued by way of execution, under the Maryland act of 1715, c. 40, § 8, and judgment of condemnation is rendered of the effects in the hands of the garnishee, and execution is issued thereupon, the marshal may levy the whole debt and interest to the time of payment, if there are effects of the principal to that amount in the hands of the garnishee.

This was an attachment issued by way of execution under the Maryland act of 1715, c. 40, § 8, to condemn the effects of Isaac S. Nicholls, in the hands of George Croghan, his garnishee, upon a judgment obtained against Nicholls for $1,000, damages and costs, to be released on the payment of $560, with interest thereon from the 7th of April, 1832, until paid.

Judgment of condemnation having been obtained, Mr. C. Cox, for the garnishee, contended that the marshal could not levy interest upon the debt accruing after the day upon which the judgment of condemnation was entered up.

But THE COURT decided and said, that as the original judgment was for a larger amount than the real debt, to be released upon payment of the real debt, with interest from a certain day until paid, the interest may be levied up to the day of payment, if there are sufficient effects in the hands of the garnishee.

ALLEN v. DALLAS & W. R. CO.

Circuit Court, W. D. Texas. Aug., 1878.

RAILROADS — BONDS AND MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — RECEIVERS.

1. Service of notice or process upon the officer of a railroad company, authorized by its charter or the law to receive service, is good, although such officer may fraudulently conceal the fact of such service from other officers of the company.

2. But where such officer fraudulently conceals the service upon him of a motion for the appointment of a receiver of the property and effects of the railroad company, and by means of such concealment the company fails to resist such appointment, and claims that the same is an invasion of its rights, and ought not to have been made, the court will re-open the case and allow the company to move to vacate the appointment.

3. An unreasonable delay in making the motion to vacate the appointment of the receiver will be regarded as an acquiescence in such appointment.

4. Persons who hold negotiable railroad bonds as collateral security for the payment of debts due them by the railroad company, are bona fide holders for value, and are entitled to enforce the payment of the bonds as long as the debts for which they were hypothecated remain unpaid.

5. Where a deed of trust executed by a railroad company mortgaged its income and profits, as well as its railroad and other property, to secure the payment of the principal and interest of its bonds, and authorized the trustees, in default of the payment of the interest, to take possession of the mortgaged property, and apply the income to the payment of the interest: Held, upon the application of the trustees, that such default was a sufficient ground for the appointment of a receiver.

6. In such a case, the appointment of a receiver should not be denied because it is not shown that the property mortgaged is insufficient to pay the mortgage debt, or that it is in jeopardy, or that the company is insolvent, or because the amount due on some of the bonds is in dispute.

7. The charter of a railroad company conferred on it a large grant of land, but provided that unless twenty miles of its road were completed and in order for use before a date named, both the charter and the land grant should become forfeited. The company had issued and sold 250 bonds of $1,000 each, which were secured by a deed of trust on its road and other property. The company was insolvent. About two miles of the twenty miles of its track remained to be built, and little over one month of the time limited for the completion of the twenty miles remained. The company was unable to procure the means to build the remaining two miles, the contractor for building the road had failed and had abandoned his contract, and there was imminent danger of the forfeiture of the charter of the company and of its grant of lands. Held, that under these circumstances, it was the duty of the court, upon the application of trustees of the bondholders, to appoint a receiver, with authority and orders to complete the twenty miles of road within the time limited by the charter.

8. Where a contractor for constructing a railroad was entitled, under his contract, to the possession of the road until his contract was completed, and he received from the railroad company a large number of bonds which were secured by a trust deed on the road, which authorized the trustees to take possession of the road upon default in the payment of the interest on the bonds, and the contractor transferred the bonds for value: Held, that his right to the possession of the road, under his contract with the company, was subordinate to the right of the trustees to the possession upon default in the payment of interest on the bonds.

[In equity. Suit by Thomas Allen and George H. Nettleton against the Dallas & Wichita Railroad Company for foreclosure of mortgage.] Heard at chambers, on motion of defendants to vacate order for appointment of receiver. [Motion overruled.]

On May 24, 1878, the complainants filed their bill, and moved at chambers, before the circuit judge, for the appointment of a receiver of the property and effects of the defendant railroad company. Counsel appeared for the railroad company and the defendant Malcolm Henderson, who was a contractor for the construction of the railroad, and was alleged to be in possession of its track and other property, and, upon the showing made by the bill and the testimony submitted, the court appointed a receiver, the defendants' counsel making no opposition. The receiver took possession of the property of the defendant railroad company on May 27, and proceeded, under the authority of the orders of the court, to expend about $5,000 thereon. Afterwards, on June 26, a notice was served on complainants that, on July 8, the defendant railroad company and Silas Reed, also a defendant, would move the court to vacate the order for the appointment of a receiver upon the answers and affidavits on file. Complainants and defendants being both represented by counsel, the motion of the defendants was heard upon July 8, the day named in the notice.

The bill was filed by Thomas Allen and George H. Nettleton, citizens of Missouri, as trustees named in a deed of trust executed by the defendant railroad company to secure its first mortgage bonds. The bill averred, in substance, that the Dallas & Wichita Railroad Company was duly incorporated by the state of Texas to construct and use a railroad from Dallas, in said state, northwestwardly through the town of Denton to any point on the waters of the Red or Canadian rivers, within the territory of Texas. That the company had constructed a railroad from Dallas to an unnamed point about 18 miles distant, in a northwestwardly direction, and was maintaining and using the same. That the legislature had granted to the railroad company sixteen sections of land, of 640 acres each, for every mile of railroad constructed by it, in accordance with the provisions of the act making the grant, and that the company had received a portion of said lands. On June 5, 1877, as the bill alleged, the railroad company had constructed ten miles of its road, and for the purpose of securing 1,250 bonds, of $1,000, each, to be issued by it, in order to raise money thereon to complete its line of road, did, being duly authorized so to do, execute and deliver to complainants, as trustees, a deed of trust upon all the right and title which the company had or might thereafter acquire in lands granted to it by the state of Texas by act approved May 24, 1873, and also upon the railroad of said company then or thereafter to be constructed from the city of Dallas, for the distance of one hundred miles in a northwestwardly direction, and all its equipments then owned or to be thereafter purchased, and "all the income, revenue and tolls of said railroad and property and all the franchises and rights" of said company, and all property of any description acquired and to be thereafter acquired by it.

The bonds were made payable to complainants as trustees, or bearer, on July 1, 1897, at the office of the Union Insurance Company in New York, with interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable semi-annually at the place aforesaid, on the first days of January and July of each year, and as the bonds declared, "on the presentation and surrender of the annexed coupons as they severally fall due;" and in case of default in the payment of any semi-annual installments of interest which had become due and had been demanded, and in case such interest should remain unpaid for three months after such default and demand, then the principal of the bonds might be declared and made due in the manner provided in the deed of trust. The deed of trust also provided that upon default in the payment of the principal or interest, and a continuance of such default for the period of three months, then all of said bonds should immediately become due, and it should be competent and lawful for said trustees to enter upon and take possession of the premises and property conveyed by the trust deed, and upon the written request of the holders of one-tenth of said bonds, at any time outstanding and unpaid, it was made the duty of said trustees to enter upon and take possession of all the trust property, and to have, use and employ the railroad and all its appurtenances and property thereto belonging and proper for its use, and to manage and operate the same, and to apply the proceeds thereof pro rata to the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds outstanding and unpaid, for all which they were to receive a reasonable compensation. Or they might cause the trust property, or so much as might be necessary to pay the amount due and unpaid on said bonds, to be sold after ninety days' notice, and upon such sale to make and deliver to the purchaser a deed in fee simple for the same, and to apply the proceeds of such sale, after paying the costs and expenses of the sale, to the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds. The deed of trust further provided that it should be lawful for the railroad company to manage and use said railroad and property, and to receive and dispose of the current revenues thereof until default in the payment of the principal or interest of said bonds, or some of them. After the said deed of trust had been duly executed and recorded, the railroad company, according to the averments of the bill, executed and sold in the market, for a valuable consideration, its two hundred and fifty bonds of one thousand dollars each, all dated July 5, 1877, payable, both principal and interest, as above stated, and the bonds are all outstanding, and are now owned by bona fide purchasers for value. The railroad company made default in the payment of the interest due on said bonds on January 1, 1878, and payment thereof was demanded, and such default continued more than three months after such demand, and it was therefore claimed and averred that all said bonds, both principal and interest, had become due, and it was averred that all the holders of the bonds had united in a request to the complainants, as trustees, to enforce the said deed of trust and the trust thereby created.

The bill further alleged that the defendant Malcolm Henderson was and had been in possession of the company's railroad, receiving the tolls and profits thereof ever since the execution of said mortgage, under a contract whereby he was to construct said railroad for a certain consideration, and in the mean time, and while such construction was going on, to possess and use the same, and said Henderson had not only failed to provide for and pay the interest on the bonds issued by the company, but had stopped the further construction of the railroad. The charter of the railroad company, and the acts of the legislature amendatory thereof, declared that unless twenty miles of its railroad should be fully completed and in operation by the first day of July, 1878, the charter, with the land grant thereto attached, should become forfeited, whereby the security of the bondholders would be wholly lost. Henderson, in the construction of the eighteen miles of said railroad, had contracted many debts for labor and materials; suit had been brought on the same against the railroad company, and judgment obtained thereon against the company, although said debts were the debts of Henderson, and executions had issued on the judgments, and the railroad had been levied on and advertised for sale. The complainants further alleged that they were apprehensive, not only that the charter of said railroad company would become forfeited, but that the income and tolls of said railroad would be wholly diverted from the payment of the interest on the bonds, and applied to the payment of said judgments and other unsecured claims against said Henderson and the railroad company. Henderson, Silas Reed and other persons, who, it was alleged, had, or claimed, some interest or lien upon the railroad, were made defendants to the bill, and the bill prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the railroad and other property of the railroad company, and to manage and use the same, and for a foreclosure and sale of the property covered by the deed of trust. This bill was verified by the oath of Geo. H. Nettleton, one of the complainants, who swore that he had read and knew the contents thereof, and that he believed the same to be true.

Upon the statements of the bill, and the production of the coupons due January 1, 1878, with the protest of the notary showing demand of payment on that day and non-payment, and proof that the holders of all the bonds had united in a request to the trustees, complainants, that they should enforce said deed of trust and the trusts thereby created, and no objection being made by either the railroad company or the defendant Henderson, the court appointed Ira Harris, the secretary of the Kansas Rolling Mill, receiver of the said trust property.

The grounds of the motion to discharge the receiver were: 1. That the railroad company was not served with notice of the motion to appoint a receiver, and the appointment, so far as it was concerned, was ex parte. 2. That the railroad company had never negotiated any of its bonds, and that there had been no default on its part. 3. That there was, in fact, no necessity for the appointment of a receiver, and upon all the facts of the case one should not have been appointed.

Alexander White, for the motion.

J. Brumback and C. W. Blair, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. 1. The facts concerning notice to this company, of the motion for the appointment of a receiver, were these: A notice was served on J. W. Calder, the vice-president of the company, on May 18, 1878, in the city of Dallas, Texas, where the principal office of the defendant railroad company was, during the absence from the city of W. H. Gaston, the president, and Calder authorized counsel to appear for the railroad company. The service of a notice upon the vice-president of the company, under these circumstances, was a good service upon the company, according to the statutes of Texas and the by-laws of the company. No objection was made by Calder to the form of the notice or the manner in which it was served on him. Neither the complainants nor their counsel were responsible for what Calder did after this notice was served on him. He was the representative of the company, appointed by it, and if he was an unfaithful agent, the principal of the agent, according to the general law, and not other parties, must suffer by his neglect or misconduct. There is no proof and no claim that either the complainants or their counsel were in any complicity with Calder to prevent notice of the motion for a receiver from coming to the knowledge of other officers of the company. The proof shows that Calder was acting as agent for one of the bondholders, and that he did not communicate the fact that a motion was to be made for a receiver to any other officer of the company. There is no doubt, also, that if the president and other agents of the company had received notice of the motion, the company would have resisted it, and there is little doubt that Calder purposely kept them in ignorance of the fact that the motion was to be made. This is the conviction left on my mind by all the evidence. Waiving for the present any consideration of the delay of the defendants in giving notice of their purpose to make the present motion, under the circumstances of the case, if now, any of the defendants in interest can make it appear that the appointment of a receiver by the court was an invasion of their rights, that the facts did not justify such an appointment, and that the same was unadvisedly and improvidently made, I think they ought to be heard and the appointment revoked, and the condition of things before the appointment, as far as possible, restored. The question, therefore, is presented whether, in view of all the facts now made to appear, the court should in the first instance have appointed a receiver. To sustain its side of this issue, the railroad company has filed its own answer, sworn to by W. H. Gaston, its president, the answers of Silas Reed, A. T. Obenhain and Jules Schneider, and the affidavits of W. H. Gaston, president, and Geo. Shields, secretary of the railroad company, and W. M. Johnson, engineer. The complainants, to sustain the appointment of the receiver, offer the bill verified, as before stated, by one of the complainants, and the affidavits of Wallace Pratt, C. W. Blair, J. W. Calder, Ira Harris, W. L. Doane, J. Brumback, J. B. J. Fenton and C. F. Stevens. They also again produce 250 coupons due January 1, 1878, cut from the first mortgage bonds of the railroad company, with evidence of their presentation for payment and of their non-payment.

2. The claim that the railroad company has never issued its bonds and that no default has been made in the payment of the coupons is entirely unsustainable. On the contrary, the proof is conclusive not only that the bonds were issued by the company, but that it received full value for every bond issued. The facts, as shown by the testimony, are as follows: One Alexander Calder was a creditor of the railroad company to the amount of twenty thousand dollars, for which he held the obligation of the company, secured by a mortgage duly recorded on February 12, 1876, on the company's road and property; and that, to secure a release and cancellation of this mortgage, the railroad company caused to be transferred to him sixty of the first mortgage bonds in suit, to be held by him as collateral security for the payment of his claim. This stipulation was carried into effect. The sixty bonds were delivered to W. E. Hughes, as trustee for Alexander Calder, who thereupon dismissed a suit which he (Calder) had commenced in this court to foreclose his mortgage, and entered a release of the mortgage on record. Afterwards, about April 1, 1878, the railroad company having failed to comply with the stipulations which said bonds were pledged to secure, the same were, in strict conformity with the terms of the contract of pledge, sold in New York city after due notice by an auctioneer, and bought in by said Alexander Calder, who thereupon became their absolute owner. As to the remaining one hundred and ninety bonds, the proof shows that they were delivered by the railroad company to Malcolm Henderson, the contractor for the construction of the railroad, in payment of the work done and to be done by him, and to enable him to procure materials to carry on and complete his contract for the construction of the railroad, and that by the assent of Henderson and of the railroad company, the one hundred and ninety bonds were transferred to Ira Harris, the agent of the Kansas Rolling Mill, as trustee, to hold as collateral security for the payment of certain notes given by Henderson to the Kansas Rolling Mill Company, for iron furnished for the railroad, and which had been laid down in the track, and with power to sell said bonds at public or private sale in the event the said notes of Henderson were not paid at maturity, the proceeds of the sale to be applied to the payment of Henderson's notes. In fact, all the iron used in laying the track of the railroad was furnished by the Kansas Rolling Mill Company, and it has received nothing therefor except the notes of Henderson, secured by the transfer of the said one hundred and ninety bonds. Henderson paid nothing on his notes to the Kansas Rolling Mill Company, and on May 3, 1878, the one hundred and ninety bonds were sold to one W. L. Doane, who claimed to be the holder and in possession of the same. There is nothing in the record to show that, while Alexander Calder and the Kansas Rolling Mill Company held these bonds, they were not holders for value without notice, nor is there anything in the record tending to show that there are any defenses whatever which the railroad company could set up, even as against Henderson, the first transferee of the bonds. On this state of facts, which is clearly shown by the proof, and which there is no satisfactory evidence to contradict, it is hard to conceive on what grounds the railroad company can claim that it never issued or negotiated its bonds. Even if the bonds were still held by Alexander Calder and the Kansas Rolling Mill Company as collateral security, they would be bona fide holders for value and entitled to enforce the payment of the bonds, as long as the debts for which they were hypothecated were unsatisfied: Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392; Alexandria, etc., R. Co. v. Burke, 22 Grat. 254; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 343. The claim is further interposed by the railroad company that there was an understanding that the coupons due January 1, 1878, were to be cut from said bonds delivered to the Kansas Rolling Mill Company before the same were so delivered. The proof utterly fails to sustain this claim. The agent of the Kansas Rolling Mill, who was engaged in transacting this business, swears that they never heard of any such understanding until it was set up in the answer of the railroad company, and the joint written order of Henderson and Gaston, the president of the railroad company, dated November 2, 1877, is produced, directing the trustees of the trust deed to deliver to Harris, trustee for the Kansas Rolling Mill Company, the one hundred and ninety bonds in question, "to be held by him as collateral security for the payment of iron delivered in Dallas to the said company, pursuant to contract." In this order nothing is said about detaching the coupons due January 1, 1878, and the proof shows that the rolling mill company was entitled to the possession of one hundred and twenty-five of these bonds as early as May, 1877. As to the sixty bonds held by Alexander Calder, it is not claimed that the coupons due January 1, 1878, were not properly transferred with them. I conclude, therefore, that the 250 bonds of the railroad company were issued and put in circulation, that they are held bona fide and for value by either Alexander Calder and the Kansas Rolling Mill Company or those to whom they have been transferred, and that default has been made by the company in the payment of the interest due January 1, 1878.

3. It remains to consider whether there was any necessity for the appointment of a receiver, and whether, under all the circumstances as they now appear, a receiver should have been appointed. In my judgment, independent of any necessity for the appointment of a receiver to protect and preserve the trust property, it was the right of the bondholders, under the terms of the trust deed, to have a receiver appointed to take possession of the trust property. The rights of holders of negotiable bonds issued by a railroad company and secured by a mortgage on its property are not to be measured by the same rules as are applied to an ordinary mortgage of a farm or house and lot, to secure one or two notes held by one mortgagee. In this case the trust deed pledged the receipts and income of the railroad property for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds. It declared that after three months' default in the payment of the principal or interest on the bonds, or any part of either, upon the written request of one-tenth of the holders of the bonds, it should be competent and lawful for the trustees to enter upon and take possession of the trust property, and upon the written request of one-tenth of the holders of the bonds, it should be the duty of the trustees to enter upon and take possession of the trust property, and to use and employ the said railroad and the property and appurtenances proper for its use, to make all necessary repairs, pay all proper expenses of the management thereof, including taxes, and to apply the proceeds to the payment, pro rata, of the principal and interest due on the bonds. In short, it was made the duty of the trustees, in the contingency named, to exercise the rights and perform the duties of receivers appointed by the court. These provisions were inserted in the deed of trust to give credit to the bonds, to enhance their value and induce capitalists to purchase them. They constituted a part of the consideration which the railroad company offered to purchasers of its bonds: State v. Northern Cent. R. Co., 18 Md. 193; Dumville v. Ashbrooke, 3 Russ. 99, note. A mere default in the payment of the debt is no ground for the appointment of a receiver, but this is not true where there is a stipulation in the mortgage that the mortgagee shall have the rents: Whitehead v. Wooten, 43 Miss. 523; Morrison v. Buckner, [Case No. 9,844.]

Are all these provisions of the deed of trust to be disregarded? If not, are the rights of the bondholders impaired by the fact that the trustees, instead of taking possession of the trust property, as they had a right, and it was their duty to do, have applied to this court to assist them in the execution of the trust whose duties they had assumed. These trustees might, as is sometimes done, have first taken possession of the trust property, under the authority of the trust deed, and upon written demand of one-tenth of the bondholders, and afterwards filed their bill asking the court to protect their possession and aid and instruct them in the discharge of their trust. Such a course would have been perfectly proper and competent. But having chosen to file their bill in the first instance, neither they nor any bondholder has lost any right, and it is the clear duty of the court to give them all the rights conferred by the deed of trust. By the terms of this trust deed the bondholders, upon default in the payment of interest, are entitled to have the income and profits of the trust property applied to the payment of their debt. This can be done only by possession taken of the trust property, either by the trustees or a receiver. By a failure to take possession the bondholders are in danger of losing their right to the income and profits: American Bridge Co. v. Heidelbach, 94 U. S. 798. It is evident that the rules applicable to the appointment of a receiver upon an ordinary mortgage do not apply here. The bondholders are not precluded from the appointment of a receiver because it is not shown that the property is insufficient to pay the mortgage debt, that the mortgagee [mortgagor] is insolvent, or that the trust property is in jeopardy, or because the amount due is in dispute, etc. For instance, are the rights of Alexander Calder to proceed on his sixty bonds, no part of which are in dispute, to be affected because some unfounded claim is set up, that some of the coupons due January 1, 1878, held by the Kansas Rolling Mill Company, are not justly due? The rights of one holder of bonds are not to be impaired because some dispute may be started affecting the rights of another holder: High, Rec. § 387. The value of railroad bonds, as commercial paper, depends in large degree upon the punctual payment of the interest as it falls due. The trust deed has therefore provided not only a pledge of the income and profits of the trust property to pay the interest and principal of the bonds, but has pointed out the method by which, in default of the company to pay the interest, the bondholders may compel the application of the issues and profits to its payment as it matures. Therefore, under the terms of the trust deed, I should feel compelled, upon demand made upon the trustees by one-tenth of the bondholders, to appoint, upon a bill filed for that purpose, a receiver, through whose agency the bondholders could enjoy all their rights, and it would be no answer to such an application to say that the trust property was sufficient to pay all the bonds, or that some of the bonds were in dispute, or that the corpus of the trust property was in no danger. Regarding, therefore, only the terms of the trust deed, upon proof of a three month's default in the payment of interest, and of a written request made by one-tenth of the holders of the bonds upon the trustees, that they exert the powers conferred upon them by the trust deed, it would be the duty of the court, without further showing, to appoint a receiver, so that the value of the bonds, as commercial paper, might be preserved, and all the rights of the bondholders secured.

But independent of the peculiar terms of the trust deed, the situation of the trust property, as shown by the evidence, was such as, in my judgment, to justify and require the appointment of a receiver at the time when the application was first made. It sufficiently appears that the main reliance of the railroad company for means to construct its road, was on the sale of its first mortgage bonds. It is true, it had a land grant from the state, but this could only be secured as the sections of the road were completed, and could only be used as a means of affording additional security and value to the bonds. The condition of the railroad company on May 24, 1878, the date at which the receiver was appointed, appears by the proof to have been as follows: The company had issued its bonds to the amount of $250,000, on which the coupons due January 1, 1878, were unpaid, and the bonds held as collateral security had been sold in New York city, at fifty cents on the dollar. The company had allowed judgments to be recovered against itself, on which executions had been issued and the company's property advertised for sale, and on one judgment a sale had been actually made. In short, the company was insolvent, and without means either to pay the interest on its bonds, or to construct its road. Malcolm Henderson, with whom the railroad company had contracted for the construction of its road, had failed, and had abandoned the work of construction. Reed, who appears to have been a subcontractor under

Henderson, or in some way connected with him, was in possession of the railroad, about eighteen miles of which had been completed, and was receiving its issues and profits. As already stated, if twenty miles of the railroad were not completed by July 1, 1878, the charter of the railroad company and its land grant would become forfeited, and the security of the bondholders be entirely lost. There was not sufficient iron on hand to complete the road for the remaining two miles, necessary to be completed to save the charter and land grant. This was the condition of affairs when the application for the appointment of a receiver was made and granted. It is true, that after the appointment of the receiver, and before the order of appointment had reached the city of Dallas, the defendant Reed, who, according to the answer of the railroad company, was engaged in the construction of the railroad under a contract with Henderson, had, as he alleges, entered into a contract with a competent engineer to complete said railroad a distance of nineteen and a half miles by June 7. But by the showing of the railroad company and of Reed, no such contract had been made when the receiver was appointed. The significant and unexplained fact remains, however, that even this contract did not provide for the completion of the road for the distance of twenty miles in due time to avoid the forfeiture of the charter and the land grant. It is true that the railroad company, speaking by Gaston, its president, says that it had no doubt that Reed would have completed the road for the distance of nineteen and one-half miles by June 10, and upon information and belief, that he could have completed the road for the distance of twenty miles by July 1, and that the president of the railroad company had received assurance and ample indemnity from Reed that he would have finished the road the distance of twenty miles by July 1, and Reed declares in his answer his purpose to have finished the road the distance, and within the time necessary to save a forfeiture of the charter. In what shape the assurances [were] received by the president from Reed, whether verbal or in writing, is not shown. What the ample guarantee was is not stated. Could it be expected that a court, where interests amounting to more than $250,000 were depending, should be satisfied with such a showing as that? If Reed intended, in good faith and without seeking any undue advantage, to construct the twenty miles of road by July 1, why did he not contract with competent engineers to construct the road to the twenty mile point, and not to the nineteen and a half mile point? If he intended to allow the use of the road which was in his possession to carry the iron necessary to lay the last half mile, why did he decline to enter into a contract to that effect, as required by the city council of Dallas? Stevens, who was the engineer with whom Reed contracted to build the road to a point nineteen and one-half miles distant from Dallas, swears that Reed would not contract for laying the track to the twenty-mile post, and refused to provide the necessary material for that purpose.

The condition, in short, was this: the railroad was insolvent and its property under execution; it was unable to furnish means to complete the twenty miles of its road in time to save the forfeiture of its land grant and charter. Henderson, the person with whom the company had contracted for the construction of its road, was insolvent and had abandoned the work. When the receiver was appointed there was no provision made by contract for completing the twenty miles, and it was three days after the appointment of a receiver that Reed, a subcontractor under Henderson, entered into a contract with Stevens for the completion of the road for the distance of nineteen and one-half miles. It seems to me that, under this state of facts, when such fatal consequences to the interests of the railroad and bondholders were threatened, it was the duty of the court to interfere by the appointment of a receiver, and that it would have been an indefensible trifling with the rights of others if the court had refused the application, relying on the assurance, fairly presumed to be verbal, which Gaston says he received from Reed that the latter would complete the road twenty miles by July 1, and on the guarantees which Gaston says he received from Reed, but whose nature he does not reveal.

It is urged in behalf of the possession of Reed, which was displaced by the receiver, that Henderson's contract for construction antedated the deed of trust and provided that Henderson should retain the possession of the road and receive its issues and profits until the completion of the contract of construction, and that Reed had all the rights of Henderson, and his right to possession and use and enjoyment of the railroad under the construction contract was older and better than the rights of the trustees named in the trust deed. Conceding that Reed stands in the shoes of Henderson, what were Henderson's rights under the facts? He transferred, as collateral security to the rolling mill company, one hundred and ninety bonds secured by a deed of trust which, on a certain default, gave the trustees the right to take possession of the railroad company's property and receive its rents and profits. As between him, therefore, and the trustees, he would be estopped from asserting his right of possession under his contract for construction. The transfer of the bonds, secured by such a deed of trust, was a clear waiver of his rights under his contract. So that neither Henderson nor Reed can be heard to claim possession as against the trustees of the deed of trust.

road company that the plaintiff is never entitled to a receiver when the equities of the case are fully and fairly denied by the sworn answers of the defendant. This is true when the motion for a receiver is heard on bill and answer only. But when there is other evidence besides the bill to support the application, the court will consider whether the evidence adduced in support of the bill does not overcome the denials of the answer, and if they do, the receiver will be appointed, notwithstanding the denials of the answer: Thompson v. Diffenderfer, 1 Md. Ch. 489; Simmons v. Henderson, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 493; Henn v. Walsh, 2 Edw. Ch. 129; Buchanan v. Comstock, 57 Barb. 568; Fairbairn v. Fisher, 4 Jones Eq. 390; Callanan v. Shaw, 19 Iowa, 183; Rhodes v. Lee, 32 Ga. 470. It is in all cases a question of evidence. If on a consideration of all the proof, the court thinks a case is made for the appointment, a receiver will be appointed, notwithstanding the denials of the answer. In this case, it seems to me that the proof to justify the appointment was ample. But in the view I have taken of the case, the answer does not deny the equities of the bill. On the contrary, enough is admitted fully to warrant the appointment, namely, the terms of the trust deed, the issue of at least $125,000 in bonds with all coupons attached, for a valuable consideration, default in the payment of the interest for three months, and the demand of the bondholders on the trustees that they should execute the powers conferred by the trust deed.

It has been ably insisted that the interests of the railroad company and of the people of a large part of the state of Texas will be injured by the action of the court, and that these considerations ought to aid the discretion of the court in coming to a conclusion adverse to the appointment of the receiver. These considerations cannot weigh when the rights of creditors are involved. But so far as the railroad corporation is concerned, it cannot justly complain. And as to the people of Texas, it seems clear to me that they are interested only in the railroad, and are not at all concerned about the railroad company. The appointment of a receiver does not put an end to the construction of the railroad. It only takes it from the hands of an incompetent and insolvent corporation and gives it to other and more vigorous agencies.

My conclusion upon the whole subject is, that if on May 24, when the receiver was appointed, the same evidence had been presented and the same arguments made as have been on this hearing, I should have felt constrained to appoint a receiver according to the prayer of the bill. Finally, a sufficient reason why the order appointing the receiver should not be revoked is, that the motion for that purpose comes too late. The receiver appointed by the court went forward promptly and vigorously in the discharge of his duties, and within the time limited he completed the railroad to the twenty-mile point, and thus saved the forfeiture of both the railroad charter and land grant. In doing this he expended the sum of five thousand dollars. The iron necessary to complete the track was furnished by the Kansas Rolling Mill Company. The receiver took possession of the railroad on May 29, of course with the full knowledge of the railroad company and of Silas Reed, who, up to that time, had been in possession. It was not until June 26 that notice of the present motion was given. The officers of the railroad company, as soon as the receiver took possession of the road, learned how the notice of the motion to appoint the receiver had been served, to wit, on Calder, the vice-president. If they intended to claim that the notice was insufficient and defective, it was their duty to move at once. The delay of nearly a month, while the receiver was going on with the construction of the road and expending money and materials, furnished certainly not by the railroad company, but by others interested in its prosecution, was an acquiescence in the action of the court, and they are estopped now from making objection. It was not until the receiver had completed the railroad to the twenty-mile post and secured the railroad charter and land grant from forfeiture that notice of this motion was given. On the whole case, I am well settled in the opinion that the motion to vacate the appointment of the receiver should be overruled, and it is so ordered.

Case No. 223.

ALLEN v. HALLET.

[Abb. Adm. 573.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1849.
SEAMEN — SECRETED ON VESSEL — LIABILITY TO PERFORM SERVICE.

1. The master of a vessel is entitled to call upon the ship's cook to perform service as a seaman, so far as he possesses the requisite experience and ability.

2. Where a seaman deserts from the vessel while in port, and another hand is shipped in his place, and he afterwards returns and secretes himself on board, and is discovered by the master after the ship has left port, the master is entitled to call upon him to perform any service as seaman which may be within his ability but is not entitled to assume that he is an able seaman, and to require him to do duty as such.

3. In an action brought against a master by a seaman found secreted on board and ordered to do duty and punished for refusal, to recover damages for the punishment inflicted, it is imperatively incumbent on the master to prove, in order to justify the punishment, that before giving the order he informed himself as to the seaman's experience and capacity, and ascertained that he was able to perform the work required of him.

In admiralty. This was a libel in personam filed by James Allen against Franklin Hallet, master, and George Gibson, first mate of the packet-ship Queen of the West, to recover damages for ill usage inflicted on the libellant, on board that vessel. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court. [Decree for libellant.]

O. Sturtevant, for respondents.

BETTS, District Judge. This is an action of tort against the master and first mate of the packet-ship Queen of the West, for confining the libellant in irons in a painful position and posture on board the ship, and putting him on insufficient allowance of food, on her voyage from Liverpool to New York. The libellant shipped at New York as cook on board. His conduct in that capacity was unexceptionable. At Liverpool he had no duty to perform as cook, and he was ordered by the mate, and the order was confirmed by the master, to go over the side of the ship with others of the crew, and standing on a staging prepared for the purpose, or on the dock against which the ship rested, to assist in scrubbing down her sides. This was a necessary service to be performed by the crew. The libellant refused to obey the order, alleging it was not his duty. He stated his willingness to perform any seaman's duty on deck. He was ordered to perform that particular service or that he should not be fed by the ship. He and the second cook thereupon went ashore; the second cook deserting the vessel, and the libellant remaining ashore without leave until the ship sailed.

Just before the ship sailed a first and second cook were shipped in the places of the others. When the ship got out to sea the libellant was found on board. The answer alleges that he entered surreptitiously without the knowledge of the officers. No proof is made of the fact, nor does the libellant show when or how he returned to her. His place was, however, occupied by another cook, and he does not appear to have been at first recognized or admitted by the officers as one of the ship's company. When four or five days out from Liverpool he was ordered with other men to go over the side of the ship, in fine weather, and scrub her. This order is alleged, by the libellant, to have been given by way of punishment, and was only applied to him and one other man. On that point the testimony is in discord; some witnesses swearing that only one man was put to the duty, and others, that two or three men were so employed. So the answer asserts, and the fair weight of evidence may be regarded as supporting it, although the point is not clear, nor is it of sufficient importance to render its particular examination and discussion necessary.

The libellant refused to obey the order. This he did peremptorily to the captain, and with coarse and insulting language, and therefore he was gagged for a few moments, and handcuffed, and so kept for several days; during the daytime, when fair, on the after-deck, and at nights in the wheel-house; and until, as the answer asserts, he submitted, and consented to go to duty on board. On the second day after he was handcuffed, a bolt was put in his mouth as a gag. The witnesses saw it there for a few minutes, but were unable to say who put it in or for what cause. After his confinement terminated the libellant was restored to his place, and performed the duty of cook to the arrival of the ship here.

It seems to me that the case, stripped of the inflated and reproachful terms in which the parties speak in their pleadings, is to be disposed of upon these considerations:—Was the libellant, after placing himself in the ship without the authority of the master, entitled to claim his former position? and if so, was he bound to do ordinary ship's duty when not on service in the capacity of cook? If the order of the master to the libellant to perform that duty, was a recognition of him as one of the crew, was any inexcusable violence or severity applied by his orders, in bringing the libellant to obedience? In respect to the first mate, Gibson, there is no color of evidence implicating him beyond the act of applying the handcuffs on the libellant, under the orders of the master. This was not done with harshness, or so as to cause needless pain or suffering to the libellant. In that, and in confining the libellant subsequently, he only pursued the directions and orders of the master, which were a sufficient justification for his acts. Butler v. McLelland, [Case No. 2,242.] The libel, therefore, as to him, must be dismissed with costs.

Had the master, then, rightful authority to impose those services on the libellant, and compel his submission to them? I perceive no reason to question his power in respect to the orders given at Liverpool. 2 Pet. Adm. 368, [Bond v. The Cora, Case No. 1,620;] The Elizabeth Fritz, [Frith,] [Id. 4,361.] His command is supreme in the navigation and management of the ship at sea. This necessarily includes the employment of the crew, subject only to his responsibility to the men for any tortious or oppressive conduct towards them. A cook ships and rates as a seaman, except as to wages. He signs the articles, and designates himself as such; he commonly is a sailor, and not unfrequently acts in the double capacity of sailor and cook on the voyage, being only rated at higher wages because of that quality. He has also the privileges of a seaman, as to remedy against the ship for his cure in case of sickness, and his protection abroad if left by the vessel. Turner's Case, [Case No. 14,248;] The Louisiana, [Id. 1,461.] And he may be removed for reasonable cause, from the particular employment of cook and assigned to the common duties of a sailor. This is so even in respect to subofficers. Shermond [Sherwood] v. McIntosh, [Id. 12,778;] Mitchell v. The Rogambo, [Orozimbo,] [Id. 9,667;] The Mentor, [Id. 9,428.] And the cook, if he is entitled to any special designation of rank or privilege distinguishing him from a common sailor, he can be only so upon the terms of his contract, limiting his obligation to perform that particular service. The law will secure him the benefit of such special agreement, so long as he observes it with fidelity and intelligence, subject always to the rightful authority of the master to regulate the discipline and service of the ship at his discretion. When the orders were given at Liverpool directing him to do other duty, the libellant was not acting as cook; there was no duty for him to perform in that capacity; this employment was not taken from him; but when idle, and the state of the ship required his assistance, he was directed to aid the crew in a piece of seaman's work about the ship. He did not question his obligation to obey any order to render services on deck, but puts his refusal on the assumption that he could not be required to go over the ship's side. I see no reason for this distinction. He does not show he would be exposed to risk, in standing on the staging or the dock, nor that he was to be placed in a situation requiring experience and skill he did not possess. Whether the labor of scrubbing was then to be done on the deck or sides of the ship, in the dock, cannot, in this case, make any distinction as to his obligation to perform it. I hold, under the facts in proof, that the libellant was bound to obey the orders given him in Liverpool, and that his refusal was refractory and mutinous, and would have justified his punishment by forfeiture of wages, or by personal coercion.

The libellant then abandoned the ship. The manner of his getting on board and to sea is not disclosed by the proofs. It is manifest, however, that he did not come back to her with a claim to his place of cook, rendering himself to the officers to perform that duty. The place had been filled by another person. The first time when he appears to have been noticed on board by the officers, was when the order was given him to go over the side and assist one or more of the men in scrubbing the ship. The ship was then some days out; according to some of the testimony two days, to others, four or five days. The relationship between the respondent and libellant was never changed. It has been held in this court, that a seaman who had abandoned his ship in a foreign port, could not, by joining her clandestinely after his place on board had been supplied, acquire the right to restoration to it or to wages. The Philadelphia, [Case No. 11,084.] If any new agreement is to be inferred from his being in the ship and the exercise of authority over him by the master, it is, that he should render such services as might be demanded of him and what he was capable of performing. The master would have no right to assume from his acting as cook on board that he was an able seaman, and compel him to go aloft, or take the wheel, or engage in work requiring professional skill and involving personal hazard. He must first inform himself of the libellant's capacity, and then most properly he might expect of him any reasonable service within his ability to render. The libellant proves, that when he refused to go over the sides of the ship on the staging, he offered to do any work on the ship's deck. The master gives no evidence that his experience or capacity qualified him to venture safely on a staging at sea whilst the ship was under way. I think it was incumbent on him in order to justify such order and the infliction of punishment by way of close confinement on board for disobedience of it by libellant, to prove the man possessed experience and capacity enabling him to fulfil the order with safety. In my opinion, the master in this act transcended his reasonable and rightful powers. He could no more enforce the orders against the libellant, on the facts in evidence before the court, than he could have done to any man found on board not shipped as one of the crew. And even if he claimed authority over him under his broken contract, he was bound to inform himself whether a man who shipped as cook, and had only served with him as such, was also competent to perform the duty of a seaman, before imposing on him any service apparently hazardous, and which might involve danger to his life. The wrongful conduct of the libellant at Liverpool, no doubt conducted to the harsh proceedings adopted by the respondent at sea. The libellant was afterwards restored to his first position as cook on board, and spoke to his companions of this transaction as of no importance, and said he should take no further notice of it; and though the court is compelled to pronounce in his favor that a tort has been committed, yet it cannot be regarded as one aggravated by any manifestation of vindictive feelings or cruel purpose on the part of the respondent.

In view of the antecedent misconduct of the libellant in the same particular, and the apparent reconciliation between the parties, in his restoration to his former place, and it is to be assumed the payment of full wages to him out and home, as he claims no balance of wages, I shall decree him damages against the respondent, Hallet, only to the amount of fifty dollars and costs, for the improper imprisonment and treatment to which he was subjected. Decree accordingly.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a decree of the district court,³ in a cause of subtraction of wages, alleged to have been earned on board the bark Belle, on a whaling voyage. That court made a decree in favor of Hitch, the libellant, for the sum of $490.93. The respondents appealed. At the hearing they have not denied the title of the libellant to wages, but insist that his just claim amounts only to a lay of 1-165. The district court allowed the libellant 1-145, and the difference in money between these two lays is only about sixty dollars; a sum which both parties agree would hardly afford prudential grounds for an appeal to this court. But it was considered by the counsel on both sides that something of importance, beyond this sum of sixty dollars, was involved in the appeal. The libellant's counsel desired to claim and insist upon greater damages than were allowed below. But no appeal appears to have been claimed by the libellant, and, as I have had occasion repeatedly to declare, a party who has not appealed can claim here nothing more than an affirmation of the decree below, with reasonable damages for the delay. Counsel have been often misled on this subject by the practice of the state courts, and by the loose manner in which appeals from the district to the circuit courts in admiralty cases have sometimes been spoken of in books of practice. But I consider the point free from all doubt. Not to advert to the nature of an appeal, as considered by courts of admiralty, and to the rules requiring reasons to be assigned, it is sufficient to refer to two decisions of the supreme court which are in point. In Stratton v. Jarvis, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 4, the court say: "The district court decreed a salvage of one-fifth of the gross proceeds of the sales; from this decree an appeal was interposed, in behalf of all the owners of the goods and merchandise, to the circuit court; but no appeal was interposed by the libellant. The consequence is the decree of the district court is conclusive upon him as to the amount of salvage in his favor. He cannot, in the appellate court, claim anything beyond that amount, since he has not, by any appeal on his part, controverted its sufficiency." In Canter v. American Ins. Co., 3 Pet. [23 U. S.] 307, the circuit court had decreed restitution of property to the claimant, but the decree was silent as to damages. [Case No. 302a.] The libellant only, appealed.* It was held that the silence of the decree respecting damages was a virtual denial of them; that if the claimant meant to rely on his claim for damages, he should have entered a cross appeal; and that his omission to do so was a final waiver of his claim. These cases show that the appellate court will neither increase the amount awarded below, nor consider a subject of claim there decreed upon and denied, unless the party who desires a reversal of the decree take an appeal. See, also, Airey v. Merrill, [Case No. 115.]

The counsel for the respondents in this case has prayed the opinion of the court upon the question, whether the court, in fixing the reasonable wages of the libellant upon a quantum meruit, will take into account certain circumstances which I will now state. It appears that the libellant shipped at Fairhaven, on board the bark Belle, on the 10th of December, 1844, as cabin boy, for a whaling voyage, then expected not to exceed four years in duration. In point of fact, instead of pursuing the usual course of whaling voyages, the catchings of the Belle were sent home from time to time, and her voyage was protracted, so that she did not return home until the 10th of September, 1852, after an absence of nearly eight years. The libellant was about thirteen years of age when he shipped. After the expiration of about four years, the libellant did seaman's duty; and it is not denied by the respondents that he is entitled to a reasonable compensation therefor. But they insist that this did not exceed a lay of 1-165. And they do deny that in fixing his compensation the court can take into consideration any wrong done to the libellant by his detention from home, and his consequent deprivation of the means of education, by reason of the protraction of the voyage for about four years beyond the time for which the libellant shipped. Viewed as a breach of contract, laying a foundation for a claim of damages, it is true the court cannot consider this subject-matter; for there are no allegations in the libel upon which to rest such a claim. But in determining what wages the respondents are reasonably entitled to recover, all the circumstances bearing on that question are to be considered. The service, for which this compensation is to be awarded, began about four years before the return of the vessel. She was then in the Indian ocean, or perhaps at Sidney, or one of the islands in that part of the world. Her men were all entitled to leave her, and most of them did leave her during the voyage. The difficulty of obtaining good hands to supply their places considerably enhanced the value to the owners, of the plaintiff's services. On the other hand, the long protracted absence of the libellant from home, and the disadvantage to him of remaining still longer, would naturally render him unwilling to serve for the same compensation as he might accept under other circumstances. To fix the lay at what it would have been in a port where seamen are obtainable in great numbers, as wanted, and for an ordinary voyage, would be manifestly wrong. It cannot be doubted that the owners would be obliged to pay a higher price, and that the service would be reasonably worth a higher lay, if one, who had already been absent four years from home, were required to remain four years longer, and serve and take his ay on board a vessel, which had already cruised four years, and whose crew, by desertions, absences, and other causes, had been so changed, and so filled up, as it appears this crew had been. The staunchness and consequent safety of the vessel, the completeness of her fitting and finding, and the efficiency of her crew, are circumstances in which the seamen on board a whaleship have a direct and substantial interest; and I do not consider it improper for the court below, in fixing a quantum meruit, to take into consideration, upon this libel, the circumstances of the protraction of the voyage, and the great length of time the libellant was detained from home. The decree of the district court is affirmed, with costs, and damages at the rate of six per centum per annum from the date of its decree.

[At law. Action by John Allen against William M. Hunter for damages for infringement of letters patent No. 8,621, granted to J. Allen, December 23, 1851. Tried by jury. Verdict for defendant.]

[Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Stanbery, Coffin & Newton, for plaintiff.
Mr. Matthews, for defendant.

Instruction of the Court.

This, gentlemen of the jury, is an action for the infringement of a patent. The plaintiff, who is the patentee, "claims to have invented a new and useful mode of setting mineral teeth on metallic plates," and he describes as follows the composition and mode of application: "The cement may be formed of any of the known fluxes, combined with silix, wedgewood and asbestos intermixed with gold and platinum scraps, which form a metallic union with the plate upon which the teeth are set. The compound which I prefer is composed of silix 2 oz., white or fluid glass 2 oz., borax 1 oz., wedgewood 1½ oz., asbestos 2 drms., feldspar 2 drms., haolin 1 drm. This compound should be intermixed or underlaid upon the plate, with gold or platinum scraps. The gum color consists of feldspar ½ oz., white glass 1 oz., oxyd of gold 1½ grs.: moisten and apply with a brush." After describing how the application is to be made, the patentee says: "I claim as my invention, and desire to secure, by letters patent, a new mode of setting mineral teeth on metallic plates by means of a fusible silicious cement, which forms an artificial gum, and which also unites single teeth to each other, and to the plates on which they are set." "I also claim to be the inventor of said cement or compound, a full and exact description of which is herein given." "I also claim the combination of asbestos with plaster of paris, for covering the teeth and plates for the purpose of sustaining them in their proper position, while the cement is being fused."

A caveat was entered by the plaintiff, in the office of the commissioner of patents, the 29th of April, 1851. This notice to the office that the plaintiff was the first inventor, for which he claimed a patent, was to answer a double purpose. First, to give notice of his claim as inventor, and, second, to prevent a patent from issuing to another for the same thing. The patent issued to the plaintiff bears date the 23d of December, 1851. Under the law, before this patent could be issued, a thorough examination of the claim was made by examiners of the patent office, who were appointed, it is to be presumed, on account of their knowledge and experience in matters of science, mechanism, chemistry and natural philosophy, which enables them to judge of the feasibility and utility of inventions and discoveries made, and for which the inventors or discoverers apply for a patent. A claim which has thus been examined and sanctioned by the granting of a patent, gives to the patentee a prima facie right to the invention or discovery claimed. And the individual who disputes the right must produce evidence to counterbalance the legal presumption of right in the plaintiff from his patent. On the subject of patents.

we are governed by the law, and not by our own notions of policy. Some individuals who prefer their own theories to the practical results of society, which have been established and sanctioned by the wisdom of ages, hold that there can be no property in a discovery or an invention. And these notions may have an influence on their judgment, when they are called to act on the subject of patents. Such an influence should be regarded as unjust and against law. You are sworn, gentlemen, to act on the subject before you according to the law and the evidence.

The defenses made to the right claimed by the plaintiff are: 1. That the patent is void upon its face, for want of certainty in its specifications. The law requires "every inventor to swear that he does verily believe that he is the true inventor or discoverer of the art, machine, or improvement for which he solicits a patent; and he shall deliver a written description of his invention, and of the manner of using or process of compounding the same, in such full, clear and exact terms as to distinguish the same from all other things before known, and to enable any person skilled in the art or science of which it is a branch, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, compound and use the same." In requiring this particularity, the law has two objects in view: 1. That the invention or discovery claimed may be clearly distinguished from all other inventions or discoveries. 2. That when the patent shall expire and the invention or discovery shall become public property, any one skilled in the art or science may construct or compound it.

Patentees are not monopolists. This objection is often made, and it has its effect on society. The imputation is unjust and impolitic. A monopolist is one who, by the exercise of the sovereign power, takes from the public that which belongs to it, and gives to the grantee and his assigns an exclusive use. On this ground monopolies are justly odious. It enables a favored individual to tax the community, for his exclusive benefit, for the use of that to which every other person in the community, abstractly, has an equal right with himself. Under the patent law this can never be done. No exclusive right can be granted for anything which the patentee has not invented or discovered. If he claim anything which was before known, his patent is void. So that the law repudiates a monopoly. The right of the patentee entirely rests on his invention or discovery of that which is useful, and which was not known before. And the law gives him the exclusive use of the thing invented or discovered, for a few years, as a compensation for "his ingenuity, labor, and expense in producing it." This, then, in no sense, partakes of the character of monopoly. Inventors are often great benefactors. And how ill are they generally rewarded! If the invention or discovery be of great value, a system of piracy is commenced, not so much to injure the patentee, as to benefit the actors. And it cannot be denied that this course of action is made popular in the community by the charge of monopoly against the patentee, and his realization of large profits. His expenses are not considered, the benefit he has conferred on society, nor the shortness of seven or fourteen years, to which his exclusive right is limited. For the maintenance of his right he is subjected to legal controversies, which, not unfrequently involve him in an expenditure beyond the amount of his profits. Inventors and discoverers are proverbially poor. It is said that the man, by the operations of whose genius the streets of the city of London were first lighted, was a wanderer and a beggar in those streets. The gas company, who were made rich by his invention, eventually made some provision for him. What have inventors done for our country? The application of steam to the propulsion of vessels upon the water, and carriages upon the land, have advanced our country a century in commercial intercourse, in civilization and in everything which constitutes a great nation. And look at the numberless labor-saving machines, the cotton gin, the planing machine, the reaping machine, and many other machines and inventions, which by the force of machinery accomplish wonderful results. It then appears that patentees, so far from being monopolists hanging as dead weights upon the community, are the benefactors of their country.

By the law an extension of a patent can be given only where it is made clearly to appear that by the profits from the term of the grant the patentee has not been remunerated for his ingenuity, labor and expense, in bringing his invention into operation.

In this case the patentee says that the cement may be formed of any of the known fluxes; and it is argued that as this includes all fluxes, "if there be any which cannot be so used, the patent is void." The words of the specifications are to be taken together, and they are to be so construed as to give effect to the meaning and intention of the person using them. Words are not to be distorted from their meaning, so as to effect what may be supposed to have been the intention of the person using them. But they are to have a reasonable construction, as connected with the sentence in which they are used. The words, "known fluxes," belong to chemistry, and none but those who understand the science of chemistry should have weight as experts on this subject. A dentist who extracts and fills teeth, or who sets teeth, may be expert in what he professes, and yet be ignorant of chemistry. This has been verified in the present case. As the invention is claimed to be a new and useful mode of setting teeth, &c., it seems to be supposed that dentists are proper experts to define the meaning of chemical terms. But if they have not a scientific knowledge of chemistry, they are not experts in the application of chemical terms. The law says the description shall be such as to enable any person skilled in the art or science, of which it is a branch, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, compose, and use the same. If the person called be not skilled in chemistry, he cannot be considered as an expert in regard to chemical affinities. A mechanic may as well be called as an expert on this subject, as a practical dentist who has no knowledge of chemistry. The same may be said in regard to the term borax. The making up of the compound or the manufacture of teeth is not necessarily connected with dentistry. The specifications must be so full and clear as to enable a competent person to make the compound without experiment. And the enquiry for the jury is, has this been done in the plaintiff's patent? In passing upon this point, the jury will be governed in matters of science by the opinion of experts.

Doctor Clark, of New Orleans, has practiced dentistry fourteen years, and now has the largest practice in that city. He has received his composition for setting teeth from Doctor Allen. He says he could make the compound from the patent. Dr. Samuel Hazlett, of New York, says he could make the compound and the teeth from the patent. Dr. Stockton says a dentist properly informed would be at no loss to make the compound from the formula of Dr. Allen. Doctor Barlow says that Dr. Allen's plan requires mechanical skill. He has made the compound and set the teeth under Dr. Allen's direction. Doctor Chapman says, from Doctor Allen's formula, he constructed the work. And Dr. Kingsly, who is a dentist, says a manufacturer of teeth would know borax cannot be used in a crude state, but must be fritted before use under Doctor Allen's plan. Doctor Wardle manufactures teeth, and he put up the work by Dr. Allen's plan; and he thinks that a man of ordinary skill could make the gum from the directions given. Professor Silliman says borax is usually prepared, which is done easily.

Several witnesses in behalf of the defendant were examined. Doctor White, a manufacturer of teeth, says, without the knowledge he now has, he would have been at a loss how borax was to be used according to Doctor Allen's formula. Doctor Semple, dentist, purchased a right of Doctor Allen, with special instructions how to use the compound. Doctor Rochart made an experiment on Doctor Allen's formula, put the teeth in eleven times in all. Doctor Babcock made the experiment on Doctor Allen's formula, but could not make the compound, and he considers the recipe of no practical utility. Doctor Porter says the formula of Doctor Allen is not practicable. Doctor Smith tried the formula of Doctor Allen, and found it impracticable. Doctor How purchased a right of Doctor Allen, but could not set the teeth, to do well, without back plates. Doctor Doughty tried Doctor Allen's formula without success, on a gold plate or silver. Doctor Talbert tried Doctor Allen's formula without success. Doctor Maine says, from Doctor Allen's specification, he would have used, in making the gum, the borax of commerce. And Doctor Hays says that from the specifications to Doctor Allen's patent he could not make the compound of Dr. Allen. This is substantially the evidence in regard to the specifications of the plaintiff. Whether they are sufficient is a mixed question of law and fact. The opinions of the experts who have been examined are in conflict; and so far as my personal knowledge goes, this has been uniformly the case where experts have been examined. This may show, however honestly witnesses called by the respective parties may swear, that slight circumstances, imperceptibly or otherwise, influence the opinions of men, even in matters of science. The fact to be established by the plaintiff was whether his compound and the setting of teeth were so described as to enable a person of competent knowledge to make the compound and set the teeth.

In regard to the compound, no one can be competent to testify as to it, who is not acquainted with chemistry. He must know something of the affinities of the constituent parts of the compound, and of its strength and durability. A mere mechanical dentist is no more competent to judge of this matter than the ordinary mechanic whose skill consists in applying the materials made ready to his hands, for the structure of a machine, without knowing by what process these materials were formed. It is, therefore, gentlemen, your duty, in considering the testimony, to give weight to it in proportion to the competency of the witnesses to judge of the matters sworn to. In this view, no one may be supposed to have misrepresented the facts, speaking from the lights of his own knowledge; and yet the statement of one witness who has a thorough knowledge of chemistry, and speaking on that subject, should be relied on more than the statement of any number of witnesses, who speak without the requisite knowledge.

Some of the witnesses say that, in making the compound by the formula of Doctor Allen, they would use borax in its crude state, or what is called the borax of commerce. The most, if not all of these witnesses do not profess to have a knowledge of chemistry; while other witnesses say, who are acquainted with the science, they would know that borax was not referred to by Doctor Allen in its crude state. And these are the men who can be confided in as experts, and to whom, under the patent law, the specifications are addressed. The description must be such, the law says, as "to enable any person skilled in the art or science of which it is a branch, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, compound, and use the same." The objection that, as all the fluxes are claimed in making the compound, if any one can be found which cannot be used for that purpose, the patent is void, cannot be sustained.

The word "flux" is derived from the Latin word "flus," to flow, and is applied in chemistry to substances which are in themselves very fusible, or which promote the fusion of other bodies. Any substance or mixture used to promote the fusion of metals or minerals, as alkalis, borax, tartar, or other saline matter, are called fluxes. Now, in the first place, it is not shown that there is any one flux which may not be used to make the compound; and if this were made to appear, it could not affect the validity of the patent, as the reference to fluxes was general, and should be held to include those which are in general use, and which will overcome, by their chemical attractions, the opposing powers of the other ingredients of the compound. This, all chemists would understand, and to such persons is the description addressed. Formerly, a strict construction was given in this country and in England to the claims of a patentee, but a more liberal and favorable view is now taken of his claim. He must describe it within the law; but courts do not go beyond the law for technical objections to defeat it.

The next question for your consideration, gentlemen of the jury, is whether defendant has infringed the plaintiff's patent. An infringement consists in constructing a machine, or making a compound, substantially in the same mode as that for which a patent has been obtained. Certain publications have been made in the "Dental Recorder," in New York, and the "Dental Register," in this city, which show the formulas, the plaintiff alleges, are claimed by the defendant, and which are similar to those claimed in the patent. Doctor Slack, one of the oldest and most experienced chemists in this country, says that the formula of defendant is in substance the same as that claimed by the plaintiff. And he strongly illustrates his opinion by saying "they are as much so as two and two make four, or that three and one make four." Doctor Locke, Jr., who is a professed chemist, and who analyzed the formulas of Doctors Allen and Hunter, says there is no substantial difference. Other witnesses called by the plaintiff corroborate the statement that the two formulas are substantially the same. But on the part of the defendant several witnesses have been examined, who give their opinion that the formulas are different. This with most of them is supposed to consist in the mode of combining the ingredients, that the finer particles of the pulverized ingredients were separated by a sieve, by the

It will be for you, gentlemen, to determine the fact of infringement, from this conflict of testimony. I have only to refer you to the rule before stated, of giving weight to such witnesses as were best qualified to judge of the matter about which they have testified. A further remark on this point is not only justified, but called for by the justice of the case,—that one of the two chemists who have sworn that the formulas were in substance the same, has analyzed the ingredients of both, and he finds them substantially the same. His testimony then is given, not as matter of opinion, but as a fact clearly demonstrated. This is the only mode by which the human judgment can rest upon absolute certainty. There are but few questions which may be decided by the power of analysis, chemically or mathematically. But where this is done satisfactorily, truth is attained. An unsubstantial or colorable alteration in a machine or a compound does not protect an individual from the character and consequence of an infringer. Where the machine is constructed, or the compound formed, on the same principle, however varied in form, there is an infringement. In a machine where the same powers are employed, with only formal alterations as to the size or position of the machinery, to produce a certain result, the principle of the machine remains the same. And so of a compound, where the ingredients are the same, and the change is merely in the mode of combining them. Or where there is a substitute of one ingredient, having the same qualities and producing the same result, being within the scope of the claim.

The next point for your consideration will be whether the discovery was useful. Of this there can be no doubt, if the claim of the plaintiff shall be sustained. Doctor Jobson, of London, England, considers the improvement the greatest in dentistry of the present age. He is corroborated by many other witnesses who speak from experience. It is unnecessary to advert to the testimony on this point, as there is no conflict in it. Every invention or discovery must be useful, to entitle the party to a patent.

Whether the plaintiff was the first and original inventor of what he claims is the subject of your next inquiry. To sustain his patent, the plaintiff must show that he was the first and original inventor or discoverer. That he was neither is strongly urged in the defense. It is contended that a work published by Doctor Fitch, of New York, on dental surgery, which was a translation from a French work by Delabarre, was substantially the same as the plaintiff's. If this be so, it bars the plaintiff's right. So cautiously does the law guard the public rights, that if the thing invented or discovered has been described in any foreign publication, it is declared to be fatal to the patentee. This provision goes upon the presumption, if such foreign publication has been made, the patentee may have acquired a knowledge of it. And this presumption is not rebutted by proving, as far as a negative can be proved, that the inventor had no knowledge of it. The publication may be proved, as to its contents, and the fact of publication by the production of the book, or by parol testimony. Doctor Clark, of New Orleans, says that Delabarre's formula was somewhat like that of the plaintiff's, but that it was different, and was impracticable, and has been long since abandoned. Doctor Fitch, the translator, says Delabarre's system was never brought, into practical use. Doctor Jobson, evidently eminent in his profession, was personally and intimately acquainted with Delabarre, in Paris. And while in France, the Doctor became acquainted with the most eminent dentists in Paris, and he says that they all considered the plan of Delabarre as a failure, and that it had been abandoned by him; but although abandoned, yet if he published substantially the formula of the plaintiff, it is fatal to his right. Several other witnesses speak of Delabarre's formula, as having been abandoned in this country. On the part of the defendant, a set of teeth was given in evidence to the jury said to have been made on Delabarre's plan, and which were worn by the famous Aaron Burr. The teeth in this specimen were very irregular, some inclining one way and some another, so as to form no continuous and even circle. Doctor Jobson, on examining it, said the teeth may have been set on Delabarre's plan, as their irregularity was the defect in his system. Several of the witnesses called by the defendant considered the plan of Delabarre as similar, or very much like the plaintiff's. To defeat the plaintiff's patent on this ground, Delabarre's plan must be shown to be substantially the same as Doctor Allen's.

It is further alleged that Steamer communicated to the plaintiff his alleged discovery. If this be true, the plaintiff's right cannot be supported, as he could not, if the supposition be true, be the original inventor or discoverer. Steamer states that he was employed by the plaintiff, and sold to him, in 1851, a formula for an enamel; and also, that he prepared in Allen's laboratory the gum used by him, for which he agreed to pay thirty dollars. This witness seems to have been a worker in metals. It is proved, however, that he took back the facts stated, in a publication under his signature. The equivocations and inconsistencies of the witness, do not recommend his statements to the confidence of the jury. Mr. Thonin, who is a manufacturer of porcelain teeth, says, that Doctor Allen proposed to pay witness what Steamer owed him, if he would procure Steamer's signature to a certain paper. At the same time Doctor

Allen observed that he had paid Steamer a hundred dollars for his services. It does not appear, however, what the paper was, which Doctor Allen was anxious Steamer should sign. Doctor Darling is a dentist, and he says that Doctor Allen called on him, and advised him not to purchase a formula for setting teeth from Steamer, as the Doctor alleged Steamer procured it from his laboratory, and he threatened to sue Steamer. Elias Wildman, who has been a dentist since 1836, considers the formula of Delabarre sufficient, and that it is substantially the same as Doctor Allen's. Doctor Lane says, that in 1845 he became acquainted with a continuous gum for setting teeth, as practiced by Doctor Dodge of New York, who not long afterwards died, and no further account of his plan has been given.

These facts, disconnected and certainly not very satisfactory from their nature or the manner of relating them by the witnesses, are left with the jury, with the remark that the plaintiff's patent ought not to be avoided in this particular, except on clear and undoubted evidence.

But the defendant claims to have discovered the same thing as contained in the formula of the plaintiff, before he made the discovery. If this be so, the plaintiff cannot recover. Mr. Aldrich states that Doctor Allen, in the fall of 1847, made an upper set of teeth with the gum, for his wife. Witness is the brother-in-law of Doctor Allen, who, to the knowledge of the witness, has been engaged, for several years in making experiments on the subject of setting teeth. Mrs. Aldrich says she wore the set of teeth first made by Doctor Allen, four or five years. Then a full set were made, which she now wears alternately with another set. Doctor Wickersham knows, that in April, 1847, Doctor Allen was experimenting to find how to set teeth by a continuous gum on a platinum plate. Doctor Curtis states, that Doctor Allen made for him a full set of teeth in 1849, having the continuous gum. These lasted until 1853, when a new set was made, which the witness now wears. He thinks, in 1843 Doctor Allen informed him that he was experimenting to fasten teeth on a plate. The last set of teeth made for the witness had a back plate. This was done at his own request. Doctor Ward: Ten years ago Doctor Allen was working night and day, to make an improvement in setting teeth. Doctor Bacharjin, is a manufacturer of teeth, and he says that Doctor Allen was experimenting to set teeth by a continuous gum on a plate, in 1843. The witness saw a specimen similar to what is called for in his patent. Doctor Taylor, was at the convention in Louisville in September, 1851. Several specimens of Doctor Allen's work were presented to the convention. In April, 1851, a paper was published in Cincinnati, in which the editor speaks of the improvement of Doctor Allen, which will supersede block work. In July,

1851, Doctor Allen showed witness a specimen somewhat improved from the one he had before seen, and of which he spoke in terms of high approbation in the dental paper of which the witness was editor. He says that Doctor Allen, some two years before his patent, exhibited to him a specimen of work similar to the one described in his patent. He saw Doctor Hunter's improvement, which he supposed was block work, in April, 1852. The work of Hunter is like that of Allen's in many respects. He says Hunter's work was block work, up to 1851, and he supposed Hunter's work was intended to be an improvement on block work. He thinks, in principle the improvement of Hunter, as claimed, and Allen's, are the same; Hunter's mode of fastening is different from Allen's. The report of the convention of physicians at Louisville, in the fall of 1851, spoke in high terms of the improvement of Doctor Allen, and the convention voted him a gold medal. Hugh McCullum says, two or three years after 1841, Doctor Allen said he was making improvements to fasten teeth on a plate with a continuous gum, but that he had not yet perfected his improvement. Professor Wood states that in the college session of 1851-2, Doctor Allen made a specimen in which the teeth were fastened to the plate by a continuous gum. Several unavailing efforts were made to break the teeth from the gum; at length one of the teeth was broken. Mr. Colburn, dentist, says, that Doctor Allen's method of setting teeth is the best, and that the old plan has been abandoned. The platina plate is used. Peter Van Emmon, dentist, was eleven years in company with Doctor Allen, and he says the improvement of Allen has superseded the other modes of setting teeth. Between five and six years ago, he saw the first specimen. A dentist accustomed to block work could make the work of Doctor Allen, and would know how to use borax. Doctor Putnam is a dentist, has manufactured teeth, made fluxes, &c., and practiced under Doctor Allen. Doctor Robinson, of London, England, has been a dentist twenty-three years, and he considers Doctor Allen's plan as new and useful. Doctors Stockton, Chapman, Barlow, Kingby, Harlet, Wilson, Halman, Shope and Smith, all speak of Doctor Allen's plan as the best, &c. Mrs. Bartlett, lives in Covington. In 1846 or 7, Doctor Allen made for her a temporary set of teeth, then a set with springs, at her request, with a gum like the set she now wears, which was within five months of the time her teeth were taken out. C. E. Allen, is not the inventor; he heard Steamer say that he regretted injustice had been done to Doctor Allen through his instrumentality. C. Buchart regrets that Doctor Allen was unjustly dealt with. Mr. Monter, dentist, was employed by Doctor Allen in 1852. Was acquainted with Steamer, who had no knowledge of dentistry. Doctor Darling says, Steamer's enamel was of no value for dental purposes. Has been working on Doctor Allen's plan three years and finds it good. Dr. Irwin: Allen's plan is new and very useful. Doctor Miller, has treated between two and three hundred cases on Doctor Allen's plan, which is best; thinks Hunter's plan would be better for block work. Doctor Wardle, says he is a manufacturer of mineral teeth. He makes the compound from Doctor Allen's formula; thinks a man of ordinary skill could make the gum by the formula.

Defendant's evidence as to his priority of invention or discovery.

Mrs. Guilford: In January, 1851, Doctor Hunter made her a set of teeth which she has worn ever since, and on which the continuous gum was used. In 1848 he made a set for her, somewhat different. Her present teeth are better than the natural teeth. Doctor King, in November, 1850, saw a specimen of upper teeth which Doctor Hunter said he had prepared for the World's Fair. Mr. Toland: Doctor Hunter frequently purchased teeth of him. In the fall of 1850, he showed the witness specimens which he intended to send to the World's Fair. This was three months before the fair. The witness saw the teeth after they were returned from the fair. Mr. Jones says, prior to 1848, in 1846 or 7, Hunter stated to him his object was to set teeth on a plate by a continuous gum. In the fall of 1850 he saw the experiments, now exhibited, three or four months before the World's Fair. Doctor Crane has known Doctor Hunter for twelve years, and knows that he was experimenting on continuous gum work. In 1847 Doctor Hunter said he had succeeded so far as to convince himself that he would succeed in setting a full set of teeth in a continuous gum. In the fall of 1850 he saw the specimens now exhibited. Mr. McKinney saw at the Crystal Palace in London the specimens before the jury, connected together. Doctor Lesley: In 1846 he knew that Doctor Hunter was making experiments to overcome shrinkage. He stated his object was to unite the teeth singly on a plate by a gum. At the Louisville convention, being one of the committee to whom the paper presented by Doctor Allen was referred, in regard to his invention, he differed from the other members of the committee, and made a counter report to that which was made by the other members of the committee. Doctor Locke, sen., says, in 1844 or 6, he knew that Doctor Hunter was experimenting, and about a year before October, 1851, Doctor Hunter said to him that he had succeeded in making a gum in which to set teeth. Doctor Tallafarro has known Doctor Hunter ten years, and knows that he experimented to improve teeth. In 1848, he made a set of teeth for witness, perhaps block work. The teeth were soldered to a back plate. Mr. Wayne says, in 1847 Doctor Hunter was experimenting,—object was to make a compound to fasten teeth. Doctor

Maise says, in 1846 a lady got him to insert a tooth in an artificial set, and the teeth appeared to have been set in a gum body. The witness saw the work of Doctor Dodge in New York, could see no other fastening than the gum. This was prior to July, 1850. Doctor Brown says, in the fall of 1850, Doctor Allen enquired of the witness what kind of work Hunter was getting up. Witness replied that he was getting up a gum work. Doctor Hamlin says the teeth in Hatch's mouth looked like Levatt's enamel; but Allen showed a plan with a gum that adhered to it. Doctor Crane says, five or six years ago, Levatt's enamel was the same as Doctor Allen's work in Hatch's mouth. That a gum body cannot be made out of it. In Doctor Hunter's specifications, he says, "the teeth are first arranged on the plates according to the knowledge of the manipulator and state of the patient, after which the gum is applied, which does not shrink in the fire, and the whole brought up to the proper degree of heat in a muffle, and suffered to cool, when they will be ready for soldering to the plates, without having changed by working or otherwise in the fire, thereby enabling any dentist who cements single teeth well, to make block work with a greater degree of certainty, and much more accuracy than by carving, and without that act."

In the Dental Register of the West, published in this city, October, 1852, there was published a "new method of supplying artificial teeth and gums," by Doctor Hunter, parts of which were read as rebutting evidence by the counsel. He says, 15th page, "Where is the new principle in the patent claim now made? A flux is combined with what is technically termed a body or base, and the application is in every respect similar." "I stand upon the ground that I have perfected a body, (as applied to certain bodies and enamels made into artificial teeth, by Jones, White and McCurdy,) which does not materially contract in the fire, and possesses more strength than any other body known to me, and which, with skillful handling, requires but one heat, independent of the soldering of the teeth to the plate, to make perfect work." "It is applicable, he says, to the ordinary gold plate as used by dentists, generally, in the form of block work, and is made by me in continuous arches where a full denture is required, and it is equally applicable to cases where a few teeth are required, and can be fastened to the plate by soldering, riveting, or any other known method now in use."

In regard to the first inventor, gentlemen, it is not sufficient to defeat a patent that another person has conceived the possibility of effecting what the patentee has accomplished. To constitute a prior invention, the party alleged to have made it must have proceeded so far as to have entitled himself to a patent in case he had made an application. And you will apply this test to the work of the defendant. The caveat of the plaintiff was filed in the patent office the 29th of April, 1851, and bears date at Cincinnati, 7th of April, 1851. In this paper the plaintiff says, "What I claim as my invention is a fusible cement of which an artificial gum is formed, applicable to artificial teeth, by means of which mineral teeth are firmly united to each other, and also to the metallic plate upon which they are set." And he says, "The mode of applying the cement is as follows: When the teeth and plate are properly arranged upon a cast of plaster of paris, and the teeth covered with the plaster, I use the cement under, between, and around the teeth. This cement is composed of silic, oxide of tin, oxide of lead, manganese, potash and wedgewood. The teeth, being thus arranged, are put into a furnace, and other cement is used; the cast is then removed, and when cooled, the outside plaster is taken off. I then use a preparation of the oxide of gold, so combined with the cement and so applied, as to produce, when finished, a true gum color. Again the cast is put into the furnace until the latter preparation flows; it is then removed, cooled slowly, and is ready for the mouth."

The caveat, which is in evidence, shows beyond controversy how far the plaintiff had progressed with his invention on the 29th of April, 1851. when the caveat was filed in the patent office; and as it bears date, at Cincinnati, on the 7th of that month, it may be presumed that it was prepared at that time to be forwarded to Washington. This peculiarity of the plaintiff's invention and discovery [is] supposed to exist [consist] in the mode of fastening his teeth on the plate, with or without back straps and without rivets, by the consistence and strength of the paste he uses, which keeps the teeth firmly in their places, and lessens the weight and size of the work in the mouth. The patent of the plaintiff bears date the 24th of December, 1851. From that time his specifications became public, and every one had a right to inspect them, and for proper purposes to obtain a copy of them.

The question arises under the caveat and the patent of the plaintiff, whether he is protected from the experiments and invention of the defendant. He is protected by the law, unless the defendant's invention entitled him to a patent before the plaintiff applied for his patent. If both the plaintiff and defendant are inventors of the thing claimed by them respectively, the one who perfected his invention first is protected by the law. A general remark that he had accomplished his object, without particularizing what he had invented or discovered, is not satisfactory. But a statement of the thing invented or discovered should be considered as evidence, so far as it agrees with the patent subsequently obtained, or with the work claimed to have been perfected. One of the specimens exhibited by the defendant in the fall of 1851, and which he expressed an intention of sending to the great Fair, was block work; the other is alleged to be a continuous setting of the teeth, to fit the mouth, and not consisting of parts put together, as block work. These specimens, or at least one of them, some of the witnesses saw at the World's Fair, in 1852. The defendant has made no application for a patent; and it would seem, from his publication in the "Dental Register" above referred to, he contests the fact of any discovery having been made by the plaintiff. In page 14, he says, "to Delabarre must be given the credit of having first conceived and executed the union of artificial teeth already baked, with an artificial gum and plate." "To Adibran," he says, 15th page, "must we give the credit of having first made the claim, so far as I am informed, of having overcome the shrinkage of material, which claim was made in his published work, and was contested twenty years after [by] Lefoulon, but which principle is claimed by no other author." "Desirabode and Lefoulon both gave Delabarre credit for having done this kind of work, and published his formula, the principle of which consisted in uniting a flux with the material used as an ordinary base or body, that it might fuse at a less heat than the teeth then in use." And the defendant then asks, "Where is the new principle in the patent claim now made?" This publication, as before stated, was made in October, 1852.

Several witnesses have been examined by both parties, to show that each, for a number of years, has been experimenting to obtain what both of them, as they allege, have accomplished. The caveat and the patent show what the plaintiff has attained, and the defendant's work is shown by the evidence. The evidence of the plaintiff has shown the work done by him on his principle before his patent was obtained. The acrimony excited in the course of this controversy, as shown by the testimony, is much to be regretted. The subjects involved are interesting to the cause of science and the arts, to the public at large, and especially to the parties in this suit. The plaintiff claims no more than nominal damages, as he is desirous only of sustaining his claim under his patent. Neither the court nor the jury can enter into the feelings of the parties in any cause. It is their duty to consider and decide every case on its merits, as the law requires. There should be no other solicitude felt than to attain this result. And having attained this, in the careful exercise of their best judgments, they have nothing to apprehend.

After being out a short time, the jury returned with a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made, which remains undecided.

[At law. On motion for new trial. Motion overruled.]

Joy & Porter, for plaintiff.
Mr. Fraser, for defendant.

THE COURT. This action was brought to recover a balance which the defendant owes to the plaintiff, for goods, wares, and merchandize, purchased. A draft, payable in four months, drawn by Harleston, on N. G. Ogden, of New York, and indorsed by King, was procured by King and handed to the counsel of the plaintiff, with the view of paying, when the proceeds should be received, so much on account. This draft was forwarded and accepted, but was eventually protested for non-payment. It seems that due notice was not given to the drawer and indorser, and that was made the principal ground of defense. The trial took place in the absence of the circuit judge, and now a motion is made for a new trial, on points stated, before a full court. The jury found for the defendant.

A new trial is asked—

1. Because the court rejected Harleston, the drawer of the draft, who was offered as a witness, to show that the remedy against him has not been lost, as the drawer of the bill, for want of strict notice.

2. Because the jury were instructed that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the draft had been presented for payment at maturity, at the place where payable, and that it had been regularly protested for non-payment, and notice to the drawer and indorser given.

3. Because, in the instruction, a decision in 2 Wash. C. C. 191, [Gallagher v. Roberts, Case No. 5,195;] 2 Wash. C. C. 157, [Webster v. Massey, Case No. 17,336,] was not followed, on which the plaintiff relied.

4. Because the court refused to charge the jury, upon the request of plaintiff's counsel, that unless the jury are satisfied, from the testimony, there was an express agreement by the plaintiff to take the thousand dollars' draft in payment, and at his own risk; that the plaintiff was but the agent of King, for the collection of said draft; and that the draft remained his property, and at his risk; and that although the draft was not presented for payment, at maturity, and no notice of non-payment given, yet that constitutes no defense to this action.

5. That if the draft was not taken in payment, although no notice was given, if thereby the amount of the draft, or any part were lost, by reason of such neglect, it was a ground of action for damages he thereby sustained, against the plaintiff, by the defendant.

6. Because the court charged the jury that by failing to make the demand and give notice, the plaintiff made the bill his own, and that the remedy against the defendant upon the open account, was consequently lost.

Other causes were assigned, but which are substantially embraced in those above stated.

There can be no doubt, that where a bill has been received payable on time, that it is no discharge of a pre-existing debt, unless there be an agreement to that effect. Nor would a draft payable on presentation, be a payment, unless it was agreed to be so received. Until the money on a bill is paid, it is at the risk of the drawer and the holder of the bill, whether he be entitled to the money, or a mere agent for the drawer, he is bound to make the demand, and give notice of nonpayment, and if he fail he will, in many cases, be responsible to the drawer or indorser for damages.

The damages are not to be estimated by the face of the bill, in regard to the drawer, he having no effects in the hands of the drawee, but by the actual damages suffered by him. It is true, when the holder of a bill, regularly negotiated, neglects to make a demand at its maturity, and give notice, he loses his recourse against the names on the bill, who are entitled to notice.

There is no evidence to show that the bill in question was taken in payment. It must then have been received, for the purpose of applying the proceeds when paid, to the payment of the balance due by the defendant to the plaintiff. [Frier v. Jackson,] 8 Johns. 396; [Tobey v. Barber,] 5 Johns. 69; [Olcott v. Rathbone,] 5 Wend. 492; [Johnson v. Weed,] 9 Johns. 310; [Muldon v. Whitlock,] 1 Cow. 306; 4 Mason, 248, [Franklin

Fire Ins. Co. v. Lord, Case No. 5,057.] If it be agreed to receive the bill in payment, the rule is different. [Tobey v. Barber,] 5 Johns. 69; [Rowley v. Ball,] 3 Cow. 303; [McNair v. Gilbert,] 3 Wend. 344; [Peter v. Beverly,] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 532. In all cases the plaintiff may produce the note at the trial to be cancelled. [Pintard v. Tackington,] 10 Johns. 104; [Burdick v. Green,] 15 Johns. 249; [Hughes v. Wheeler,] 8 Cow. 80. And the court will require the bill to be produced.

The holder of the bill, being an agent merely, is not considered a party to it. As, where a bill is forwarded to a bank for collection, and demand or notice is neglected, the bank is responsible only for the damages sustained, and they are to be ascertained by a jury. The same principle, it is contended, applies where a bill is received, the proceeds of which, when received, are to discharge a debt. Until the proceeds shall be received, the risk is the drawer's, and if there be a failure, the agent is responsible to the extent of the damages suffered. This, it is argued, is under the law of agency. Story, Ag. 217; [Smedes v. Bank of Utica,] 20 Johns. 384; [Bank of Utica v. Smedes,] 3 Cow. 662. "The drawer of a bill, or the indorser of a note, is not discharged by the omission of the holder to make presentment or demand, or to give notice of non-acceptance or non-payment, where it is clearly shown that he has sustained no damages in consequence of such omission." Commercial Bank of Albany v. Hughes, 17 Wend. 94.

Where this duty of an agent has been neglected, damages are presumed, but this presumption is rebutted by proof of the entire want of effects in the hands of the drawee continually, from the time of drawing the bill, until and after the day it fell due, and this, under such circumstances, as to show that the drawer had no right to expect payment. In Dennis v. Morrice, 3 Esp. 158, an action was brought by an indorser against the drawer; it appeared that no notice had been given to the defendant, of non-payment by the acceptor, to excuse which, the plaintiff offered to prove that in fact the defendant had not been prejudiced by the want of such notice. But Lord Kenyon said: The only case in which notice is dispensed with is, where the drawer has no effects in the hands of the drawee. The rule is, that every person is entitled to notice whose name is on the bill, and who has any recourse against some other person or persons. On this ground it was held by Lord Kenyon, in 1 Pardess, 459, in an action against the indorser of a bill, drawn by Vaughan on Eustace and Holland; it appeared that notice had not been given to defendant, upon which plaintiff offered to show that Vaughan had no effects in the hands of Eustace and Holland; but the court said that the want of effects in the hands of the drawee by the drawer, will not avail the plaintiff, and that the rule extends only to actions brought against the drawer; the indorser is in all cases entitled to notice, for he has no concern with the accounts between the drawer and the drawee. "The plaintiff then proved a letter from the defendant, acknowledging the debt, and promising to pay, and upon that he had a verdict." Now, if the plaintiff in this case was strictly a party to the bill, his recourse against King, the indorser, was lost, by not giving him notice. For it seems he has nothing to do with the matter of account, between the drawer and drawee. From the statement of the drawer, there can be no doubt that King had his recourse against the drawer of the bill, who admitted his liability continued. From this, it would seem that he could have had no effects in the hands of Ogden, or any just expectation that any one would honor the bill. But still the question recurs, did the plaintiff, by failing to give notice to the indorser, release him from responsibility. And if he did, can the fact be set up in defense to the present action? Although the bill was not received by the plaintiff in payment, yet he cannot be treated as a mere agent. The proceeds of the bill, when received, were his, to be applied in part payment of the balance due him. He was a holder of the bill, and neither the drawer nor indorser had a right to withdraw it, nor take any steps in regard to it, which might in the least degree be prejudicial to the interest of the plaintiff. Now this is not the case with a mere agent, who has no interest in the bill, and the owner of it has a right to withdraw it, or appropriate the proceeds of it as may suit his convenience. In this view, it is difficult to distinguish between the rights and duties of the plaintiff in regard to the bill, and those which appertain to the holder who has received the bill in the ordinary course of business. It is his property, and he has a right to negotiate it if he shall choose to do so. He may receive payment of it in property, and make any other disposition of the bill that may be convenient for him. He is then, more than an agent. He is the holder of the bill, and has recourse against the indorser, on condition of demand and notice. The drawer may be responsible, but the question here is, whether the indorser is responsible, no notice having been given to him of the non-payment of the bill? He was entitled to notice, and the fact, that the drawer still acknowledges himself responsible, does not, as regards the indorser, affect the question. In failing to give the notice, the plaintiff made the bill his own, and his recourse against the indorser is lost. He received the bill, and was bound, by the commercial law, to demand payment, and give notice. Whatever recourse the plaintiff may have against the drawer, he can have none against the indorser, as such. And if he can not recover in this form, by reason of his negligence, it is a good defense against an action on the original consideration. Had the plaintiff given the notice, he might have had his choice, whether to proceed against the defendant, as indorser, or on the original ground of action. The evidence of the drawer was rightfully rejected, as his admission of liability on the bill could not affect the rights of the defendant in this action. And this was the object for which tife witness was offered. Upon the whole, the motion for a new trial is overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Jan., 1811.

EJECTMENT—TITLE TO SUPPORT—ORPHANS' COURT—JURISDICTION—WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—LATENT AMBIGUITY.

1. In an ejectment against any other person than the proprietor, or one claiming under him, it is not necessary to prove the title out of the proprietaries of Pennsylvania, if a right of entry is proved.

2. The orphans' court, established by the laws of Pennsylvania, has a general jurisdiction, as to intestates' estates, and to direct a sale of real property for payment of debts; and it is not competent for this court to examine the order of that court, whilst it remains in force.

3. The jury, after forty-eight years since the order of the orphans' court, and a conveyance under it, without any pretence of an opposing title in all that time, may presume one dead, intestate, and without issue, alleged to have been so at the time of the proceedings of the court.

4. When, in a will, a devise was of a house and lot in Fourth [Third] street, Philadelphia, and the testator had no property in Fourth [Third] street, but he had a house and lot in Third [Fourth] street, it is a latent ambiguity, and may be explained by parol testimony.

[At law. Action of ejectment. Tried by jury. Verdict for plaintiff.]

dated April 1733, granting a rent charge out of this ground, being a lot in Philadelphia; a deed from R. to Benjamin Clark, of the fee simple of the lot, charged with the rent, in 1738: the will of Clark, devising this lot to his wife for life, and to his seven children: deed from the widow and five children to Thomas Campbell, of five-sevenths of the lot: an order of the orphans' court, authorizing the administrator of William Clark, (the son of Benjamin Clark,) to sell the remaining two-sevenths, being his own one-seventh, and the part of a deceased sister, who, it was alleged, but not proved, died without issue, by which William Clark became her heir, dated in 1762: the return and report of the sale, confirmed by that court, and a deed founded thereon in 1762, for the other two-sevenths to Thomas Campbell: the will of Thomas Campbell, by which he devises his lot on Third street, in the occupation of R. H., to his daughter, the lessor of the plaintiff. This property lies on Fourth street, and it appeared from the tax-books, and accounts of the executor of Campbell, that the lot in question, about the time of the making of Thomas Campbell's will, was in the occupation of R. H., and that the rents were received for Sarah, the lessor of the plaintiff, down to 1771. In 1781, this property was confiscated, as belonging to Mr. Allen, the husband of the lessor of the plaintiff, and he is now dead.

The defendant's counsel objected, first; that the plaintiff should show the title to be out of the proprietaries. Secondly; that it did not appear that the orphans' court were authorized to direct a sale of William Clark's share. Thirdly; that it did not appear that he was heir to his sister of her one-seventh. Fourthly; the devise is of a lot on Third street, and this lies on Fourth street; and parol evidence is inadmissible to explain it.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. The case of Hylton v. Brown, [Case No. 6,980,] is express, that in an ejectment against other than the proprietor, or one claiming under him, it is not necessary to show the title out of him, if a right of entry is proved. Secondly; the orphans' court has a general jurisdiction, as to intestates' estates, and to direct a sale for payment of debts, which it appears was necessary in this case, and it is not competent to this court to examine the order of that court, which remains in full force. Thirdly; whether William Clark was the heir to Elizabeth, and became entitled to her one-seventh, is a fact proper for the jury. It is forty-eight years since this order was made by the court, confirmed by them, and the conveyance to Thomas Campbell, in all which time, no pretence of title, adverse to William Clark's, and those claiming under him, has been set up; and in this case, the plaintiff and defendant both claim under his title. In such a case, the jury may presume that Elizabeth Clark died intestate, and without issue, by which William became entitled to her one-seventh. Fourthly; the ambiguity in the case of Thomas Campbell's will is latent, and may be explained by parol evidence. It does not appear that he had any lot on Third street, but he had one on Fourth street, and that was in the occupation of R. H. If the jury are satisfied that this was the lot intended, and are also satisfied upon the third point, their verdict ought to be for the plaintiff. Verdict for the plaintiff.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Walter Allen and others, owners of the barque Hindoo, against R. C. Mackey and others, respondents, and owners of the ship John Quincy Adams. Decree for libellants.]

This was a cause of collision. The libellants were the owners of the barque Hindoo, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, which sailed from Liverpool, in January, 1851, on a voyage to Aden, in the Red Sea, with a cargo of coal. On the 24th of March, 1851, at about one o'clock at night, the Hindoo being then in lat. 5° 22' S., and lon. 25° 17' W., the wind being the south-east trade, and blowing about S. S. E., the Hindoo being close-hauled on the larboard tack, with all plain sail set, and going about five knots, the watch on her deck saw a large ship bearing down towards them, with all sails set, including studding-sails aloft and aloft, and going dead before the wind, at about nine or ten knots. The ship proved to be the John Quincy Adams, of Boston, owned by the respondents. The captain of the Hindoo was called, came on deck, and corrected his reckoning; supposing, as he testified, that the ship intended to speak him. Finding, however, that she was coming too close, he hailed her to port her helm, as did also the mate and all the watch. The helm of the Adams, however, was put first to starboard and then to port; but at what precise time these orders were given, and whether her course was changed essentially, or not, from the time she was first seen, was disputed. The master of the Hindoo testified, that he saw the Adams obey her helm, when it was put to starboard, and that he then perceived that a collision was unavoidable, and gave orders to put up the helm of his own vessel, and square her after-yards, in order to diminish the force of the shock. This order was given and obeyed, but the Hindoo had not time to get round, when the Adams struck her, just aft the mainmast, and cut her down to the water's edge, so that she sunk in fifteen minutes, or less, the officers and crew saving themselves by the bowsprit of the Adams. Much conflicting evidence was given, as to the state of the atmosphere on the night of the collision, whether clear or hazy; as to whether the vessels respectively pursued the proper course, and as to the state and condition of the Hindoo.

S. Bartlett and E. D. Sohler, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. Some of the leading facts in this case are not disputed; the total loss of the Hindoo, by collision with the John Quincy Adams; the time and place where this disaster happened; the tacks on which the vessels were sailing. There is no doubt that the sea was smooth, and the night fair, with a moon, but whether there was any, and if so, how much haze or fog, is in controversy. Upon this point, the evidence satisfies me that there was not so much haze, as to make this a case of inevitable accident. It is certain, that the Adams was seen a mile and a half, some witnesses say two miles, off. And I am satisfied that the Hindoo might have been seen from the Adams, at least three-quarters of a mile. This is the testimony of Captain Nickels, the master of the Adams. The collision, then, ought to have been avoided. One or both of the parties must be in fault. If both, the loss must be divided; this is the settled rule in admiralty. The Rival, Case No. 11,867. Some doubt has been expressed on this point, at the bar, but it is the established doctrine of this court.

1st. Was the Adams in fault? It was her duty to clear the Hindoo, because she was going free, and the barque was close-hauled. The vessels were approaching each other, nearly at right angles, and it was the duty of the Adams to go under the stern of the Hindoo. It has been said at the bar, that there is no general rule, and experts have so testified here, but this is a mistake. There are general rules, and it is very important that they should be known, in order that when vessels meet each other suddenly, each may at once adopt the proper measures. These rules are, of course, liable to exceptions and modifications. Thus, if the vessel which is bound to give way, or to take a particular direction, cannot do so with safety, by reason of the proximity of the shore, or of other obstructions, the rule does not apply; but, subject to such variations as peculiar circumstances of this sort may impose, there are general rules, which should be known and adhered to. See 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 202, note 3. In this case, the ship should have gone under the stern of the barque, because, by doing so, the vessels would be constantly increasing their distance from each other, and because this course would not require, on her part, any calculation of the rate of speed at which the other vessel was going. The Adams had ample time to do this, for she might have seen the Hindoo at the distance of three-quarters of a mile, as I have already observed; and if she had attempted to do so, when within half a mile, or a quarter of a mile, with a smooth sea, and with the headway which she had, there is no doubt that she would have cleared the barque. It is so testified by the experts called by the respondents. She did not do so, and the inference is that she must have been in fault.

A good deal has been said about the lookout kept on board the Adams. The build of the ship, and the position of her sails, were such, that from the quarter-deck, those on board could not see much, if at all, forward of the beam, nor could the men of the watch, excepting from the topgallant-forecastle. Some doubt has been raised, as to the number of men on the topgallant-forecastle. I am satisfied that there was but one person there; he was seventeen years old, and rated as a boy. I do not think that this was a sufficient lookout. The respondents ought to have had a man there; one who, if any emergency arose, would be able to give the proper order. In this very case, the boy cried "starboard," which was wrong. The moment the captain came on deck, he at once gave the order to "port" the helm, although from the quarter-deck he could not see the Hindoo; but he says that he knew that any vessel, which they should meet in that place, would be sailing in the direction which the Hindoo actually was taking, in which case the order should have been to port the helm. And he was right. The Adams, then, was to blame for not seeing the Hindoo sooner, and for taking the wrong course after she was seen.

2d. The next question is, was the Hindoo to blame? It is said that she intended to speak the Adams, and that she ought, therefore, to have shown a light, and none was shown. But if she did nothing to carry out this intention, did not alter her course, nor deaden her way, she is not to be accounted blameworthy for a mere intention. The Hindoo was justified in presuming that the Adams would keep out of the way; she had a right to keep her course. It is contended that she deadened her way, first, by backing her topsail, secondly, by taking in her gaff-topsail. It is doubtful whether she did take in her gaff-topsail; and the only two witnesses who speak of it, do not say when it was done. The evidence, as to the main-topsail, is quite clear, that it was not backed till just before the collision, when there was great danger, and then she had a right to do it, in order to try to evade or diminish the imminent shock. If the gaff-topsail was taken in, or let go, it was probably done at the same moment. I do not think, therefore, that the Hindoo was in fault, and the decree must be for the libellants. The case was sent to an assessor, and upon the report made by him, several questions were argued.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The Hindoo is to be paid for, at her value when lost. The master reported her value, at the port of departure, to be £3500, and he has, upon a rehearing, decided that he can ascertain no diminution of value, from the time of her leaving Liverpool, up to the day of her loss. In his estimate, he has deducted £500 from the value which the witnesses affixed to the vessel, because he was satisfied from the testimony, as to the leak, that she could not have been so well repaired after her former voyage, as those witnesses have supposed.

The respondents contend, that the leak was a great and increasing one, and that the vessel would have been obliged to put into Rio for repairs; and experts were called to show, that the repairs at Rio would have been very expensive. The evidence is very contradictory. I do not think it proves that the leak was an increasing one; the weight of testimony is the other way. Then, as to the testimony of the experts, they were asked what they should judge, from the whole evidence, would be the expense of repairs at Rio. This was not the proper mode of examining witnesses. The evidence was contradictory and voluminous; and instead of thus asking them, in the first place, to judge of the result of the evidence, and then their opinion, as experts, upon that result, a suppositious case should have been put to them, for their opinion, and the court would have judged whether that case existed. It is no part of the duty or power of experts, to decide upon conflicting evidence. The Clement, [Case No. 2,879; U. S. v. McGlue, Id. 15,679.] And I cannot tell what evidence they adopted; certainly not that of the captain and mate, who testified that there was no leak. There does not appear to be any evidence in the case, from which any one can say what the cause of the leak was; and therefore I cannot adopt these opinions of the experts, nor could they, with any certainty, estimate the amount of repairs required, nor the sum which they would cost.

The libellants, on the other hand, think that too much has been allowed for the leak. I am convinced, by the whole evidence taken together, that the vessel leaked a good deal, and I cannot disturb the master's report, as to the allowance to be made for it. Assuming the master to be correct in his estimate of the value, at the port of departure, I think it is for the respondents to show a deterioration, or depreciation, after the vessel sailed. This they have not done. I have already considered the evidence concerning the leak, and it does not show that the leak increased, or that anything occurred to injure the vessel, from the beginning of the voyage. I think, therefore, the value at the port of departure, must be taken to be the value at the place of the disaster.

Another question, of considerable interest, has been raised and discussed; whether, under the statute of the United States, (1851, c. 43, § 3; 9 Stat. 635; [Rev. St. § 4283,]) limiting the liability of ship owners to the value of the vessel and freight then pending, the freight of the Adams is to be brought in; the same persons owning the vessel and cargo. This is a new question, so far as I know. No cases have been cited at the bar, and I suppose there are none. Under the English statute, the question cannot arise, as it is provided for in terms. It is argued, that no freight was to be paid in this case, and therefore, that none was pending. I think, however, that "freight" is often used in a sense broad enough to cover this case. The old maxim was, "freight is the mother of wages." If you take this literally, and extend to it the rule contended for here, it would exclude the sailors from wages, where the owner carries his own goods. I think the expression "freight pending," is perhaps a little broader than that of the English statute, "freight due or to grow due;" and it may fairly cover the increased value of goods conferred on them by their carriage, which is just as real a gain to the owner of the vessel, and just as real a payment by the owner of the goods, in the one case as in the other. I take into consideration, also, that this statute limits a responsibility which existed at common law, and therefore must not be extended beyond the fair import of its language. I think that the earnings of the vessel, in transporting the goods of the owner, may well be deemed "freight," within the meaning of this statute, and the amount will be what would have been a fair compensation for transporting the same goods, had they belonged to other persons.

Decree for libellant, for £3500, the value of the Hindoo, and for £900 freight. Total, £4400, or $21,315.36, with interest from the date when the vessel would have arrived at her port of destination, in the ordinary course of such a voyage, $3408.84.

NOTE, [in 16 Law Rep. 692.] A separate libel was filed for the cargo, and interest was allowed on its value from the date of the loss.

Case No. 229.

ALLEN v. McKEAN.

[1 Sumn. 276.]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1833.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS
—CORPORATE FRANCHISES—COLLEGE CHARTER
—ASSUMPSIT.

1. A college, merely because it receives a charter from the government, though founded by private benefactors, is not thereby constituted a public corporation controllable by the government; nor does it make any difference, that the funds have been generally derived from the bounty of the government itself.

[Cited in Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 220.]

2. The visitatorial power is a mere power to control and arrest abuses, and to enforce a due observance of the statutes of a charity; it is not a power to revoke the gift, to change its uses, or to divest the rights of the parties entitled to the bounty.

3. The visitatorial power is an hereditament founded in property, and valuable in the intentment of law; and where it is vested in trustees, there can be no amotion of them from their corporate capacity, and no interference with the just exercise of their authority, unless it is reserved by the statutes of the foundation or charter. The trustees are, however, subject to the general superintendence of a court of chancery for any abuse of their trust.

4. Bowdoin College is a private, and not a public, corporation, of which the commonwealth of Massachusetts was founder, and the visitatorial and all other powers, franchises, and rights of property of the college are vested in the boards of trustees and overseers, established by the charter, who have a permanent right and title to their offices, which cannot be divested, except in the manner pointed out in the charter. In the charter of the college, (section 16,) it is declared, that the legislature "may grant further powers to, or alter, limit, annul, or restrain any of the powers by this act vested in the said corporation, as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interest of the college." Under this clause the authority of the legislature of the state of Maine is confined to the enlarging, altering, annulling, or restraining of the powers of the corporation, and does not extend to any intermeddling with its property, or extinction of its corporate existence.

[Cited in Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 220.]

[Distinguished in Lothrop v. Stedman, Case No. 8,519.]

5. By the act of separation of Maine from Massachusetts, the powers and privileges of the president, trustees, and overseers of the college, are guaranteed under the charter, so that they cannot be altered, limited, annulled, or restrained, except by judicial process, according to the principles of law, unless that act has been modified by the subsequent agreement of both states. Afterwards the legislature of Massachusetts passed a resolve, "that the consent and agreement of this commonwealth be, and the same is hereby, given to any alteration or modification of the above-mentioned clause or provision in said act, relating to Bowdoin College, not affecting the rights or interests of this commonwealth, which the president, and trustees, and overseers of the said college, or others having authority to act for said corporation, may make therein, with the consent of the legislature of said state of Maine; and such alterations or modifications, made as aforesaid, are hereby ratified on the part of this commonwealth." This resolve does not authorize the legislature of Maine to make alterations in the college charter, which shall divert the funds of the founder from their original objects, or vest the visitatorial power in any other bodies, or persons, than the trustees and overseers, marked out in the original charter; and, a fortiori, it does not justify the transfer of these powers from the trustees to any other persons not in privity with them.

6. According to the foregoing resolve, the alterations and modifications are to be made by the boards of the college, or by their agents, with the consent of the legislature, and not by the legislature, without their consent.

7. The terms of ratification in the foregoing resolve, being in presenti, it seems that they cannot be applicable to all possible alterations in all future times.

8. By the terms of the act of separation of Maine from Massachusetts, no modification of it can be made, except by the subsequent agreement of the legislatures of both states. To effect this agreement, there must be a concurrence of the legislatures of both states ad idem, that is, an express assent to some specific proposition. Therefore the act of Maine of the 16th March, 1820, which was never responded to by the legislature of Massachusetts, and which in its terms does not look to any antecedent resolve of Massachusetts, (though the foregoing resolve of Massachusetts was passed four days previous,) but expressly looks to some future act or assent of Massachusetts, is not a sufficient compliance with the articles of separation.

9. By the act of Maine of the 16th of June, 1830, it is enacted, that "the president, and trustees, and the overseers of Bowdoin College shall have, hold, and enjoy their powers and privileges in all respects, subject, however, to be altered, restrained, or extended by the legislature, &c., as shall, &c., be judged necessary to promote the best interests of said institution." This cannot be construed to include an authority to annul the charter, or the corporation created by it, or the institution itself, or to create new boards, in whom the corporate powers and privileges may be vested; or to transfer to other persons the powers and privileges of the old boards; or to add new members to the board by the nomination of the legislature, or by that of the governor and council of the state. The act of the 19th of March, 1821, enlarging the boards, the act of the 27th of February, 1826, making the governor, ex officio, a member of the board of trustees, and the act of the 31st of March, 1831, declaring, that no person holding the office of president in any college in the state, should hold his office beyond the day of the next commencement of the college, and altering the tenure of their offices, are therefore unconstitutional.

10. Where the boards voted, that they "acquiesced" in an act of the legislature, it was held, that this did not import an assent on their part; and, farther, that their approval could not give effect to an unconstitutional act.

[Cited in Carr v. Hilton, Case No. 2,437; Slocomb v. Lurty, Id. 12,949.]

11. Where a person holds an office during good behavior, with a fixed salary and certain fees annexed thereto, the tenure of the office cannot be altered without impairing the obligation of a contract. Therefore, the act of the legislature of Maine of 1831, removing President Allen from the office of president, and establishing a different tenure for the office, is contrary to the constitution of the United States.

12. Where one man receives money, which ought to be paid to another, or belongs to another, an action of money had and received, will lie in favor of him, to whom of right the money belongs; and this, notwithstanding it may involve a trial of the title to an office, if the party has once been in possession.

[14. Cited in Sala v. City of New Orleans, Case No. 12,246, to the proposition that a charter grant to a bank is a contract, the obligation of which cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation.]

[At law. Action of assumpsit by William Allen against Joseph McKean. Verdict for defendant, taken subject to opinion of the court, set aside, and verdict for plaintiff entered.]

This was an action of assumpsit for money had and received, brought by the plaintiff, who claimed to be president of Bowdoin College, against the defendant, who was treasurer of the college, for the recovery of the salary and perquisites of the office of president of the college. The following is an outline of the material facts of the case.

Bowdoin College was established in Brunswick, in the present state of Maine, by an act of the legislature of Massachusetts, passed on the twenty-fourth day of June, 1794. The act or charter of incorporation, after providing, that there should be erected and established a college, &c., to be under the government and regulation of two certain bodies politic and corporate in the act mentioned, proceeds in the second section to enact that certain persons, (naming them,) eleven in number, together with the president and treasurer of the college for the time being, be created a body politic by the name of the president and trustees of Bowdoin College, with perpetual succession. The third section declares, that the corporation so created, for the more orderly conducting the business thereof, shall have full power and authority, from time to time, to elect a vice-president and secretary of the corporation, and to declare the tenures and duties of their respective offices; and also to remove any trustee from the same corporation, when in their judgment he shall be rendered incapable, by age or otherwise, of discharging the duties of his office, or shall neglect or refuse to perform them, and to fill up all vacancies in the corporation, &c.; provided, that the number of trustees, including the president and treasurer, shall never be greater than thirteen, nor less than seven. The fourth section confers on the corporation the usual powers of corporate bodies, and among others the power to hold real estate, the clear annual income of which shall not exceed £10,000. The fifth section authorizes them to elect a president, treasurer, professors, and trustees, and other college officers; to purchase lands, erect colleges, &c., and to make all reasonable regulations and by-laws, not repugnant to the laws of the state; and to confer degrees. The sixth section declares, that the clear rents, issues, and profits of all the estate, real and personal of which the corporation shall be seised or possessed, shall be appropriated to the endowment of the college, in such manner as shall most effectually promote virtue and piety, the knowledge of languages, and the useful and liberal arts and sciences, as shall be directed from time to time by the corporation. The seventh section proceeds to declare, that the acts of the corporation respecting elections, the purchase and erection of houses, the duties, salaries, and tenures of officers, the appropriation of moneys, the acceptance of conditional donations, the conferring of degrees, the making and altering of the rules and orders, &c. &c., shall not have any force or validity, until agreed to by the board of overseers created by the same act. The ninth section proceeds to appoint certain persons by name, (in number forty-three,) together with the president of the college, and the secretary of the corporation, the board of overseers of the college, creating them a body corporate with the usual powers, and among others with the power of amotion of the members of the board, and providing, that the board shall never be greater than forty-five, nor less than twenty-five. The sixteenth section provides, "that the legislature of this commonwealth may grant any further powers to, or alter, limit, annul, or restrain any of the powers by this act vested in the said corporation, as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interests of the said college." The seventeenth section grants to the college five townships of land, of the contents of six miles square, to be laid out and assigned from any of the unappropriated lands belonging to the commonwealth, in the then district of Maine, the same to be vested in the trustees of the college and their successors for ever, for the use, benefit, and purpose of supporting the college, with power to dispose of them, &c., and subject to certain conditions of settlement.

Such are the most material clauses of the charter. The lands so granted by the commonwealth have been vested in the corporation; and other donations have from time to time been received by it from the munificence of private individuals. The college boards, soon after the grant of the charter, were duly organized under the charter, and suitable arrangements were made, so that the college went into operation in the year 1801, and has ever since continued to perform the functions, for which it was established, in the promotion of sound literature, and the liberal arts and sciences. No alteration was ever proposed, or made to the charter, during the union of Massachusetts and Maine. But upon the separation of the latter, as an independent state, from the former, it was provided by the act of separation of the 19th of June, 1819, (which was incorporated into the constitution of Maine, which went into effect on the 15th of March, 1820,) among the fundamental articles, that "all grants of land, franchises, immunities, corporate, or other rights, &c., which have been or may be made by the said commonwealth before the separation, &c., shall continue in force, after the said district shall become a separate state. But the grant, which has been made to the president and trustees of Bowdoin College out of the tax laid upon the banks, &c., shall be charged upon the tax upon the banks within the said district of Maine, and paid according to the terms of the grants. And the president and trustees, and the overseers of the said college shall have, hold, and enjoy their powers and privileges in all respects, so that the same shall not be subject to be altered, limited, annulled, or restrained, except by judicial process according to the principles of law." And the ninth article of the same act declares, that the fundamental article shall be incorporated, ipso facto, into the state constitution, "subject, however, to be modified or annulled by the agreement of the legislature of both the said states; but by no other power or body whatsoever." With a view, doubtless, to meet the special security thus given to the rights and privileges of Bowdoin College, another article (the 8th) of the constitution of Maine declares, "that no donation, grant, or endowment, shall at any time be made by the legislature to any literary institution, now established or which may hereafter be established, unless at the time of making of such endowment, the legislature of the state shall have the right to grant any further powers to, alter, limit, or restrain any of the powers vested in any such literary institution; as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interests thereof."

By a vote passed by the trustees of the college in July, 1801, and duly concurred in by the board of overseers, the salary of the president of the college was fixed at $1,000 per annum, (an addition of $200 was afterwards made in 1805,) to be paid in quarterly instalments, and to commence, when he shall enter on the duties of his office; and it has accordingly been constantly so paid by the treasurer, without any further order of either board, from time to time, to the president for the time being, without objection. By another vote of the college boards of November 4th, 1801, the tenure of the office of the president was declared to be during good behavior. By the by-laws of the institution, every candidate for a degree was required to pay five dollars to the treasurer for the president; and a like fee was subsequently required for every medical degree. Dr. Allen, (the plaintiff,) was duly elected president of the college in December, 1819; and in May, 1820, he was inaugurated, and assumed the duties of the office under this known tenure of office, and the salary and perquisites annexed thereto. In the same month, with the zealous co-operation of President Allen, the college boards passed a vote, which, after reciting the clause of the constitution of Maine as to endowments, already referred to, declared, that the consent of the boards be given, that the right may be vested in the legislature of the state of Maine, (that is, the right to enlarge, alter, limit, or restrain the powers given by the college charter,) and that a committee be authorized in behalf of the institution to take such measures as may be necessary to vest such right in the said legislature, so as to enable them to make the endowment thereby prayed for, or any further endowment, which they in their wisdom might be disposed to make. President Allen was appointed one of this committee; and accordingly application was made to the legislatures of Massachusetts and Maine for their assent to such modification of the college charter, as should enable the college constitutionally to receive patronage and endowments from the legislature of Maine. The legislature of Massachusetts accordingly passed a resolve on the 12th June, 1820, and the legislature of Maine one on the 16th of the same month, on this subject, the terms of which were fully discussed by the court. The legislature of Maine, supposing that by the conjoint operation of the state legislatures, all restraint upon their constitutional authority to alter the charter was removed, in March, 1821, passed an act providing, that the number of trustees of the college, including the president, should never be less than twenty nor more than twenty-five, and a quorum to be thirteen; and the number of overseers should never be less than forty-five nor more than sixty; that the governor and council should appoint twelve persons as trustees, and fifteen as overseers, &c. &c.; that the boards respectively should thereafter fill all other vacancies. Other acts were passed in June, 1820, in February, 1822, and in February, 1826, respecting the college, upon the terms of which it is unnecessary to dwell. On the 31st of March, 1831, the act was passed, which has given rise to the present controversy. The first section declares, "that no person holding the office or place of president in any college in this state" (and there were at that time, and are now, but two colleges in the state,) "shall hold said office or place beyond the day of the next commencement of the college, in which he holds the same, unless he shall be re-elected. And no person shall be elected or re-elected to the office or place of president, unless he shall receive in each board two thirds of all the votes given in the question of his election. And every person elected to said office or place after the passing of this act, shall be liable to be removed at the pleasure of the board of trustees, or board of trustees and overseers, which shall elect him." The second section provides, "that the fees paid for any diploma, or medical or academical degree, &c., shall be paid into the treasury for the use of the college, and no part shall be received by any officer, as a perquisite of office." At the annual meeting of the boards of the college in September, 1831, they passed a vote, "that they acquiesce in said act, and will now, &c., proceed to carry the provisions thereof into effect." The board of trustees then proceeded, (after having given due notice to President Allen,) to an election of president; but no candidate having a majority of votes, no choice was made, and the college has ever since remained without any acknowledged president. The present action has been brought by Dr. Allen, against the defendant, who is treasurer of the college, for the salary and perquisites of office due to him (as he contends) as president of the college, de jure, notwithstanding his ejection from office in September, 1831.

Greenleaf, for plaintiff.

The corporation of Bowdoin College is in its nature a private eleemosynary corporation. This is manifest from the terms of the charter; the legislature having reserved to itself the right to alter or annul the powers therein granted. If it were a public corporation, such reservation would be superfluous. It was so treated in the separation act, and in the constitution of Maine, by which the rights and privileges of this college were placed beyond the reach of the legislature. The purpose of general education did not make it a public corporation. [Dartmouth College v. Woodward,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 631, 667. The charity of almost every hospital and college may be public, while the corporation is private. 2 Kent, Comm. 222, 223; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 634; Phillips v. Bury, 2 Term R. 346, note. The great object of an incorporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collective and changing body of men. [Providence Bank v. Billings,] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 562. And wherever the acceptance of the charter is necessary to give operation to the act of the government, it is a private corporation. Ang. & A. Corp. 46. Such acceptance created a contract between the state and all parties interested in the college. Lincoln & Kennebec Bank v. Richardson, 1 Greenl. 81. The property granted to the college became private property, out of which any judgment against the corporation might be satisfied; and which the state could not resume, nor again acquire, but for public uses, and upon the payment of compensation. And the contract thus created could not be rescinded, nor the rights vested under it be divested, by any act of the legislature. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 87; New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 164; King v. Dedham Bank, 15 Mass. 454; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 7 Pick. 344; Society for Propagation v. Wheeler, [Case No. 13,156;] Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477; Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 43. The college thus erected consists of two distinct corporations; namely, the president and trustees, and the board of overseers. The latter is, in the sixth section, styled "the supervising body," having a negative on the acts of the president and trustees, and possessing all the essential attributes of visitor of the college. The right of visitation is evidently granted away by the state to the board of overseers. The two corporations are empowered, by the charter, to elect a president and other officers; "and to determine the duties, salaries, emoluments, and tenures of their several offices aforesaid." The power of annulment, for just cause and in a legal manner, may be considered as granted by necessary implication; such power being one of the incidents of every corporation. Per Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Richardson, 1 Burrows, 539; Lord Bruce's Case, 2 Strange, 819; Rex v. Lyme Regis, 1 Doug. 149; Ang. & A. Corp. 410, 413, 246. In the exercise of these powers, the college declared the tenure of the office of president to be during good behavior; and fixed his salary; and the invariable usage, proved in the case, and amounting to a contemporaneous practical exposition of the vote, has been to pay it quarterly; generally without demand, and always without any special order of the corporation or its officers. Certain perquisites also were directed by the by-laws to be paid by candidates for degrees, "to the treasurer for the president." This office, moreover, being of the essence of the corporation, the incumbent had a franchise in it. Dighton's Case, 1 Vent. 77, 82. The place also of trustee, which he held virtute officii, though no emoluments were attached to it, is a franchise. And in either case the party unlawfully put out may be restored by mandamus Fuller v. Trustees of Plainfield

Academic School, 6 Conn. 532. From these premises it results, that the acceptance of the office of president created a private contract of service between the plaintiff and the college, which neither party, nor the legislature could annul or impair. He was an officer of private instruction; as truly so as the principal of a private academy, and his rights were as absolutely vested. Having been thus elected, and having performed the duties of his office, the plaintiff is entitled to his salary and perquisites; for the recovery of which the proper remedy is by action against the treasurer, for money had and received. It is in evidence, that the treasurer had in his hands sufficient funds for this purpose; that the salary was payable quarterly; and that by the usage of his office, and the practice of the college, no special order was required for the payment. It was therefore, at the end of each quarter, the money of the president, in the hands of the treasurer, who became his trustee for the sums he was entitled to demand, whenever they became payable. And the payment to the president would have been a conclusive answer to any action brought by the college against its treasurer for the same money. It is simply the case of money deposited with A, to be paid over to B; who may always recover it of A, in this form of action. Scott v. Surman, Willes, 404; Com. Cont. 270; Heard v. Bradford, 4 Mass. 326; Oliver v. Smith, 5 Mass. 183; Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575; Eagle Bank v. Smith, 5 Conn. 71; Arris v. Stukely, 2 Mod. 260; Boyster v. Dodsworth, 6 Term R. 681; Hearsey v. Pruyn, 7 Johns. 179; Sadler v. Evans, 4 Burrows, 1984. The authority of Maine to modify the college charter, upon which the defence in the present case is understood to be founded, is supposed to be derived from the transactions of the corporations, and of the two states in the year 1820; but upon an examination of those acts, no such authority will be found to have been given. Massachusetts, by its resolve of June 12th, 1820, consented to such alterations of the charter, not affecting the rights and interests of the commonwealth, as the president and trustees, and the overseers, or their agents might make, with the consent of the legislature of Maine. It contemplated specific alterations, to be originated from time to time, by the college or its immediate agents, remote from the influence of popular excitement and the strife of party; which, being submitted in a matured form to the legislature of Maine, might with its approbation, become a law. But, instead of this, the corporations were understood by the legislature of Maine to have sold out to this state the whole trust confided to them, with the right to originate and establish alterations at its pleasure; thus exposing the college to all the storms of political and sectarian violence in a legislative assembly. Under this impression, and without acting on the proposal of the parent state, Maine passed the subsequent act of June 16th, 1820, taking to itself the right to modify the charter at its pleasure, and making the act to take effect, provided Massachusetts shall consent thereto. This consent never has been given; and as no provision is made for securing the rights or interests of Massachusetts, its consent is not to be presumed. Its plain intent, in the resolve of June 12th, has evidently been disregarded; and neither state has acted on the proposition of the other. Hence all the subsequent legislation of Maine in relation to the college is merely void, and the college still enjoys the immunity secured to it by the constitution.

The assent of the plaintiff is, in this view, of no importance. It could not give to the state a jurisdiction, which the constitution had inhibited; nor surrender the rights of Massachusetts, over which he had no control. But if the law of 1820 were a valid act, it would not justify the ulterior proceedings of Maine. It gives authority to "alter, limit, and restrain, or extend the powers and privileges" of the corporations. The powers of a corporation are those things which it may lawfully do; its privileges are those things which it may lawfully enjoy. Hence the legislature could only modify the capacities of the corporations. It could not do corporate acts in their stead. It could neither make by-laws, nor create trustees nor overseers, nor displace any member of the corporation. If it might limit powers, it could not assume to exercise them. If it might invigorate the arm, it could not cut it off. Therefore the act of March 19th, 1821, authorizing the governor and council to appoint twelve additional trustees and fifteen overseers, and to fill certain vacancies, is void; it being not within the authority professedly granted, and being also a direct exercise of corporate powers. And the subsequent acts of the corporations are vitiated by the votes of these newly appointed trustees and overseers, unless it is made apparent, that such votes could not affect them. Nor can the defence be supported by the statute of 1832, c. 517; for this act also is in violation of the constitution, both of Maine and of the United States. Its provisions are obviously pointed at President Allen, since the language cannot apply to the other college in this state, which has no board of overseers. It is, in effect, an act to remove him from office. It destroys his vested right in the office, and violates the contract of his election, by creating a new tenure of the office, which, till then, was held during good behaviour. It places the contract wholly in the power of one party. It is an exercise of the power of amotion; and this, too, without notice or judgment of law. But even the corporation could not remove from office till after notice to appear and show cause. Ang. & A. Corp. 244; Fuller v. Trustees of Plainfield, 6 Conn. 532. And the notice should specify the charges preferred against the incumbent. Exeter v. Glide, 4 Mod. 33, 37. It ousts the plaintiff from his franchise, as a trustee and overseer, without judgment of law, and without any offense on his part. Com. v. St. Patrick's Benevolent Soc., 2 Bin. 449, 450; 2 Kent, Comm. 239; Ang. & A. Corp. 244; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 518. It is a direct and original exercise of corporate powers. And it transcends even the limits of the act of 1820, which permits the legislature to modify the powers of the corporation, but not to annul them. Yet this statute annuls the powers of the college to grant fees and perquisites to the president, and to fix the tenure of his office; which were secured to the corporations by the original charter. In fine, constituted as this college was, with duties so important, and privileges so valuable, the right of control, reserved to the legislature, should be exercised with extreme caution; and should be so limited as to promote the original and peculiar objects of the foundation, and to enlarge rather than restrain the benefits of its relation to the public.

Longfellow for defendant.

The preliminary inquiry in this case is, whether the action can be maintained against this defendant. He is charged, it is true, as the treasurer of the college; but this is merely descriptio personae. He is not the corporation, but its agent; receiving its money in that character alone. His exhibits show, that the sums he received were "for the corporation," and not for the president. He has charged himself with the amount, and is liable to the corporation alone. The privity of contract, on which this action is to be maintained, if at all, is between the plaintiff and the college. If the treasurer had wasted the moneys in his hands, will it be contended, that the plaintiff would have no remedy against the college? On the other hand, if the corporation were insolvent, is the treasurer therefore liable de bonis propriis to the plaintiff? His situation involves no other responsibilities than those of the cashier of a bank, having received the amount of a note left in the bank for collection; in which case the remedy of the depositor would be against the corporation, and not against its servant. The moneys received "for the president" went into the common mass of the college funds, the legislature, by the act of 1831, having repealed the by-law by which he formerly had received them. And in this act both the corporations had acquiesced, and were therefore bound by its provisions, which they had in fact attempted to carry into effect. The authorities cited by the plaintiff in support of the action, may be answered by the single remark, that they all are cases of money received by the party in his private capacity, and not by virtue of any office, like that of the present defendant. They therefore furnish no support to this action. But if this action would lie, under other circumstances, yet this plaintiff cannot maintain it, not being the president of the college. He was removed from office by the operation of the act of 1831; which it was the constitutional right of the legislature to pass. For the college is in every respect a public institution. It was originally established and endowed by the state; the legislature reserving the right to modify and even to annul its charter. In each of these essential particulars it differs from Dartmouth College; and therefore the case of that college furnishes no analogy for the decision of this. Bowdoin College, it is true, has received munificent donations from the Bowdoin family; but these gifts were made to an institution already established by the public, and do not, in any degree, make it a private corporation. Neither is it private because trustees have been appointed to manage its concerns. This power must be vested somewhere; and the effect is the same whether it is exercised immediately by the legislature, or more remotely by agents of its appointment. Every institution, whether hospital or college, created and endowed by the government, as this was, for purposes of general charity, is a public corporation. The subsequent gifts of private benefactors, without statutes directing their employment, are engrafted into the original foundation, but do not change its character. The state, as the founder, still retains the visitatorial power; and may restrain and control the trustees, should they abuse their trust. St. John's College v. Todington, 1 Burrows, 200. This power of the state may be farther argued from the patronage it has bestowed; the visitation always following the patronage. [Dartmouth College v. Woodward,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 675. In the present instance it has also been expressly reserved.

It is conceded, that the legislature has not the right to "annul" the corporation; but it may take away any of its powers, and substitute others, whenever it may deem the interests of the institution to require it. Or it may lawfully resume to itself the power of appointing to office, fixing tenures, and filling vacancies in the corporations. Of the expediency of such a measure, it is not necessary now to speak; but the existence of the power, and the right to exert it, are clear. It was to an office subject to this legislative control, that the plaintiff was elected. Though a provision for the immunity of the college was inserted in the act of separation, yet he was aware that its effect might be done away by the joint power of the two states. And if, by a joint act, they have modified the condition of the college, pursuant to such known powers, he has no right to complain. Nay more, it is proved that he himself procured the passage of the act of 1820, of which he was strongly in favor; and his assent being, not merely his official, but his private act, he is subject to all its consequences. The argument against the binding force of the act of 1820, founded on the supposed want of assent on the part of Massachusetts, proceeds on a construction altogether too narrow. The meaning of all parties was, only that the power of control should not be assumed by Maine, without the consent of Massachusetts. Whether the restriction was expressed by the words "shall agree," or "shall have agreed," is wholly immaterial; as is farther evident from the fact, that Massachusetts, in the same statute, engaged to ratify whatever arrangements should be made between the corporation and the new state. And the corporation having instructed its committee to vest the power of control in the legislature of Maine, and this state having accepted and exercised the power thus granted, it has therefore been ratified by Massachusetts, and the act is binding. If it be true, that alterations should originate with the president and trustees, this has been done. The committee, who addressed the legislature of Maine, communicated the terms of a modification originally proposed by the corporations of the college. The condition of the college, after the passage of the act of 1820, was the same as it was under the original charter, and before the separation, excepting the power to annul. Hence the enlargement of the two boards, under the act of 1821, was within the purview of the terms of the surrender in the preceding year. The legislature might lawfully have gone farther, and assumed to itself the right to fill all vacancies. But if this power were doubtful, it has been ratified by the college; and the right can no longer be questioned. Had either corporation been disposed to resist, its dissent should have been expressed at the time. Instead of which, the members newly admitted have been tacitly recognized by each board, as legally entitled to their seats; and twelve years of profound acquiescence by all parties have already elapsed, affording the strongest presumptive proof of assent to the statute. This is one of the arrangements to which the ratification of Massachusetts is to be extended. If, however, these members were not legally appointed, it would not follow, that their votes vitiated the subsequent transactions of the boards, unless it should appear, that such measures were actually decided by their votes. And the burden of this proof is on the plaintiff, the legal presumption being in favor of their validity. The act of 1831 is nothing more than a legitimate exercise of the powers vested in the state by the statute of 1820. It violates no vested rights of the plaintiff, for he accepted the office of president, subject to the legislative right of modification. To this right he personally assented. The statute does not remove him from office; but merely declares, that no president shall hold his office unless re-elected. The motion resulted from the act of the trustees and overseers, under the statute. But whether it resulted from a corporate or a legislative act, it is legal, being only an exercise of visitatorial power. And no notice was necessary, it being a public and not a private corporation. Neither is this statute void, as impairing the obligation of a contract. All presumptions and doubts must lean in favor of its constitutionality. It would be dangerous to presume otherwise. The unconstitutionality of any statute must be clearly manifest, to justify any court in so pronouncing it. Is such the character of this statute, so solemnly enacted, and so deliberately assented to, by those whose obedience was required to its provisions?

Greenleaf, in reply. The treasurer, in his exhibit, states, that the perquisites were received "for the corporation;" but the law says, he received them "for the president." If the latter is entitled to them, he may recover them in this action. They were originally paid to him by the persons graduated; and afterwards, from motives of convenience and decorum, were paid to the treasurer for his use. For the salary, at least, the plaintiff has a double remedy; either against the corporation, as the contracting party, or against the treasurer, as trustee to his use. The supposed acquiescence of the corporation in the act of 1831, was merely a silent submission to superior force. However mistaken the policy which dictated this submission, it was nothing more than the bending of the rush before the tempest. It can never amount to a deliberate and voluntary adoption of the extraordinary enactments of that statute, as a lawful amendment of the college charter. The state is not the visitor of this corporation. All the attributes of a visitor are, by the sixth and seventh sections of the original charter expressly vested in the board of overseers, as "a supervising body." The legislature reserved no such right to itself, nor has it ever been withdrawn from the overseers.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause has been argued with a degree of learning and ability proportionate to its importance. I have taken time to consider it, and propose now to deliver the judgment, which, upon mature deliberation, I feel bound to adopt.

Two questions have been made at the bar. First, whether the present action is maintainable against the defendant, as treasurer, supposing the plaintiff still to be rightfully in office. Secondly, whether the plaintiff is rightfully in office, notwithstanding the act of 1831, and the proceedings of the board thereupon; so that he is entitled to recover the amount of his salary and perquisites, or either, against the college.

A strong desire has been expressed at the bar in behalf of the parties, that the court would not, even if it might, confine its judgment to the first question; but that it would proceed to decide the whole merits of the controversy, as essential to the good order and prosperity of the college, as well as to the rights of the defendant. Under these circumstances, although I am conscious of the delicacy and difficulty of the task, (a task, from which I would gladly have been spared,) I shall express the opinion, which I have deliberately formed upon both the questions in the case without hesitation, but at the same time with all the diffidence, which the magnitude of the interests involved in them cannot fail to create. For the present, I shall pass the question, whether the action is maintainable against the present defendant, and proceed at once to the main points upon the merits. And the first point naturally arising upon the discussion is, in what light the original charter granted by Massachusetts for the establishment of Bowdoin College, is to be viewed. Is it the erection of a private corporation for objects of a public nature, like other institutions for the general administration of charity? Or is it, in the strict sense of law, a public corporation, solely for public purposes, and controllable at will by the legislative power, which erected it, or which has succeeded to the like authority? The former is asserted by the plaintiff's counsel to be its true predicament; the latter is as strenuously contended for on the other side.

That a college established for the promotion of education, and for instruction in virtue and piety, and in the liberal arts and sciences, is in some sense a public institution or corporation, cannot well be denied; for it is for the benefit of the public at large, or at least for all persons, who are suitable objects of the bounty; and this is the popular sense, in which the language is commonly used. And in this sense an institution founded exclusively by private donors for purposes of general charity, such as a hospital for the poor, the sick, the disabled, or the insane, may well be called a public institution. But in the sense of the law a far more limited, as well as more exact, meaning is intended by a public institution or corporation. Upon this subject, however, I may well spare myself from any elaborate exposition, since it was fully considered in the great case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 518, from which I will make a quotation, contained in the opinion of one of the judges, which it is well known had the approbation of the court: "public corporations," says the opinion, "are generally esteemed such as exist for public political purposes only, such as towns, cities, parishes, and counties; and in many respects they are so, although they involve some private interests. But, strictly speaking, public corporations are such only, as are founded by the government for public purposes, where the whole interests belong also to the government. If, therefore, the foundation be private, though under a charter of the government, the corporation is private, however extensive the uses may be, to which it is devoted, either by the bounty of the founder, or the nature and objects of the institution. For instance, a bank created by the government for its own use, whose stock is exclusively owned by the government, is, in the strictest sense, a public corporation. So is a hospital created and endowed by the government for general charity," (meaning, as is obvious from the context, a hospital like the Navy Hospital, or the General Marine Hospital, established and supported by the United States out of its own funds, and over which it retains the entire government.) "But a bank, whose stock is owned by private persons," (and it might have been added, partly by private persons and partly by the government.) "is a private corporation, although it is erected by the government, and its objects and operations partake of a public nature. The same doctrine may be affirmed of insurance, canal, bridge, and turnpike companies. In all these cases the uses may, in a certain sense, be called public; but the corporations are private; as much so, indeed, as if the franchise were vested in a single person." "This reasoning applies in its full force to eleemosynary corporations. A hospital, founded by a private benefactor, is in point of law a private corporation, although dedicated by its charter to general charity. So is a college, founded and endowed in the same manner, although, being for the promotion of learning and piety, it may extend its charity to scholars from every class of the community, and thus acquire the character of a public institution. This is the unequivocal doctrine of the authorities; and cannot be shaken, but by undermining the most solid foundations of the common law." It is afterwards added: "The fact, then, that the charity is public, affords no proof, that the corporation is also public; and consequently the argument, so far as it is built upon this foundation, falls to the ground. If, indeed, the argument were correct, it would follow, that almost every hospital and college would be a public corporation, a doctrine irreconcilable with the whole current of decisions since the time of Lord Coke." And it is further stated, that no authority exists in the government to regulate, control, or direct a corporation, or its funds, "except where the corporation is in the strictest sense public; that is, where its whole interests and franchises are the exclusive property and domain of the government itself." See [Dartmouth College v. Woodward.] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 603-672.

That a college, merely because it receives a charter from the government, though founded by private benefactors, is not thereby constituted a public corporation, controllable by the government, is clear beyond any reasonable doubt. So the law was understood by Lord Holt, in his celebrated judgments in Phillips v. Bury, 1 Ld. Raym. 8, 2 Term. R. 346. Lord Hardwicke, in Attorney General v. Pearce, 2 Atk. 87, said: "The charter of the crown cannot make a charity more or less public, but only more permanent than it would otherwise be." And the decision of the supreme court, in the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, is direct to the same purpose.

Nor does it make any difference, that the funds have been generally derived from the bounty of the government itself. The government may as well bestow its bounty upon a private corporation for charity, as upon a public corporation; and its funds once bestowed upon the former become irrevocable, precisely in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if they had been bestowed upon an individual. The government cannot resume a gift, once absolutely made to a private person; neither can it resume a like gift to a private corporation. It is true, that the government may reserve such a power in granting a charter, if it chooses so to do; but, then, the power arises from the very terms of the grant, and not from any implied authority derived from the bounty being for general charity, any more than it would from its being for private charity. The government may reserve a right to revoke at pleasure even its private gifts; but certainly the law will not imply such right without some positive expression of such an intention. Mr. Chancellor Kent has stated the true principles of law on this subject, with his usual accuracy and clearness: "An eleemosynary corporation," (says he) "is a private charity, constituted for the perpetual distribution of the alms and bounty of the founder. In this class are ranked hospitals for the relief of poor, sick, and impotent persons, and colleges and academies established for the promotion of learning and piety, and endowed with property, by public and private donations." 2 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) Lect. 23, p. 274. To be sure, where the government is the founder of a college, it has certain rights and privileges attached to it in point of law; but in this respect it is not distinguishable from any private founder. Every founder of an eleemosynary corporation, (that is, the fundator periciens, or person, who originally gives to it its funds and revenues,) and his heirs, have a right to visit, inquire into, and correct all irregularities and abuses, which may arise in the course of the administration of its funds, unless he has conferred (as he has a right to do) the power upon some other person. This power is commonly known by the name of the visitatorial power, and it is a necessary incident to all eleemosynary corporations; for, these corporations being composed of individuals, subject to human frailties, are liable, as well as private persons, to deviate from the end of their institution; and therefore ought to be liable to some supervision and control. 1 Bl. Comm. 480. But, what is the nature and extent of this visitatorial power? Is it a power to revoke the gift, to change its uses, to divest the rights of the parties entitled to the bounty? Certainly not. It is a mere power to control and arrest abuses, and to enforce a due observance of the statutes of the charity. Lord Holt, in Philips v. Bury, 2 Term R. 352, says: "The visitatorial power is an appointment of law. It ariseth from the property, which the founder had in the lands assigned to support the charity; and, as he is the author of the charity, the law gives him and his heirs a visitatorial power, that is, an authority to inspect the accounts, and regulate the behavior of the members, that partake of the charity; for it is fit the members, that are endowed, and that have the charity bestowed upon them, should not be left to themselves, (for divisions and contests will arise amongst them about the dividend of the charity,) but pursue the intent and design of him that bestowed it upon them."

But the founder may part with his visitatorial power, and vest it in other persons; and when he does so, they exclusively succeed to his authority. No technical terms are necessary to assign over, or vest the visitatorial power. It is sufficient, if, from the nature of the duties to be performed by particular persons under the charter, it can be inferred, that the founder meant to part with it in their favor; and he may divide it among various persons, or subject it to any modification or control by the fundamental statutes of the foundation.² Now, it is a general rule in the construction of charters, that if the objects of the charity are not incorporated, but certain trustees are incorporated to manage the charity, the visitatorial power is deemed to belong to such trustees in their corporate capacity.³ And so the law is laid down by Lord Holt in Philips v. Bury, 2 Term R. 352, 353. This visitatorial power is an hereditament, founded in property, and valuable in the intendment of law; and where it is vested in trustees, there can be no amotion of them from their corporate capacity, and no disturbance or interference with the just exercise of their authority, unless it is reserved by the statutes of the foundation or charter. But, still, as managers of the revenues of the charity, they are not beyond control; but are subject to the general superintendence of a court of chancery, for any abuse of their trust in the management of it. If, with these principles in view, we examine the charter of Bowdoin College, we shall find, that it is a private and not a public corporation. It answers the very description of a private college, as laid down by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 640, 641. It "is an eleemosynary institution, incorporated for the purpose of perpetuating the application of the bounty of the donors to the objects of that bounty. Its trustees were originally named by the founder, and invested with the power of perpetuating themselves. They are not public officers; nor is it a civil institution; but a charity school, or a seminary of education, incorporated for the preservation of its property, and the perpetual application of that property to the objects of its creation." The commonwealth of Massachusetts is its founder, having given it its original funds. But it is made capable of receiving, and has actually received, funds from the bounty of private donors. As founder, the commonwealth of Massachusetts would have possessed the visitatorial power, if it had not intrusted that, and all other powers, and franchises, and rights of property of the college, to the boards of trustees and overseers established by the charter, and in the manner therein stated. As soon as that charter was accepted, and carried into operation, by the trustees and overseers named in it, they acquired a permanent right and title in their offices, which could not be divested, except in the manner pointed out in that charter. The legislature was bound by the act; they could not resume their grant; and they could not touch the vested rights, privileges, or franchises of the college, except so far as the power was reserved by the 16th section of the act. The language of that section is certainly very broad; but it is not unlimited. It is there declared, that the legislature "may grant further powers to, or alter, limit, annul, or restrain any of the powers by this act vested in the said corporation, as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interest of the college." Whatever it may do, then, must be done to promote the best interest of the college. It is true, that it is constituted the sole judge, what is the best interest of the college; but still it cannot do any thing pointedly destructive of that interest. Its authority is confined to the enlarging, altering, annulling, or restraining of the powers of the corporation. It cannot intermeddle with its property; it cannot extinguish its corporate existence; it cannot resume all its property, and annihilate all its powers and franchises. The legislature must leave its vitality and property, and enable it still to act as a college. It cannot remove the trustees, or overseers, though it may abridge, as well as enlarge, their powers. At least, any argument, which should attempt to establish a different doctrine, must proceed upon the difficult assumption, that a power "to promote the best interest of the college," included a power to destroy all its interests, nay its very existence. But it is unnecessary to enlarge upon this topic, since the present case does not rest upon the effect of this clause of the original charter. The act of separation, which is constitutionally binding upon the legislature of Maine, gives, as we have seen, a complete guaranty to the powers and privileges of the president, trustees, and overseers, under the charter; so that they are incapable of being altered, limited, annulled, or restrained, except by judicial process according to the principles of law, unless that act has been modified by the subsequent agreement of the legislatures of both states.

The next inquiry naturally is, whether any such modification has been made, as is contemplated by the act of separation. If it has, another inquiry will be, what is the true extent of the modification actually made and authorized. The resolve of the legislature of Massachusetts was passed, as we have seen, on the 12th day of June, 1820. After reciting the clause in the act of separation, above referred to, and the petition of the trustees and overseers of Bowdoin College for such a modification of that clause, as would enable the legislature of Maine to make donations, grants, and endowments to the college, it is resolved, "That the consent and agreement of this commonwealth be, and the same is hereby, given to any alteration or modification of the aforementioned clause or provision in said act relating to Bowdoin College, not affecting the rights or interests of this commonwealth, which the president and trustees, and overseers of the said college, or others having authority to act for said corporation, may make therein with the consent of the legislature of said state of Maine; and such alterations or modifications, made as aforesaid, are hereby ratified on the part of this commonwealth." Now, whether this resolve is exactly in conformity to the petition of the trustees and overseers, and carried into effect their objects, or not, is a point wholly unnecessary to be here discussed; for the state of Massachusetts had a right to prescribe such terms, as it pleased; and was not bound to grant what was asked, but what it deemed in its discretion fit to be granted. We must, then, construe the resolve, as we should any other solemn act of legislation, according to its true intent to be collected from its terms. Now, it is very clear, that Massachusetts was not willing to make an unconditional surrender of all rights and interests under the charter to the legislature of Maine; for an express exception or reservation is made of alterations or modifications "affecting the rights and interests of the commonwealth," under the clause of the act of separation. The very exception or reservation supposes, that there are some rights and privileges and interests of the commonwealth, arising under the charter; for otherwise the language of the exception or reservation would be useless, if not absurd. Nor is it difficult to perceive, that the commonwealth of Massachusetts had rights, privileges, and interests, which might be affected by certain alterations of the charter. In the first place, the commonwealth was the founder of the college, and had given certain lands to be appropriated to the uses of the charity. It had a right and interest in having these funds perpetually applied to the original objects of the institution. As founder, too, it was entitled to the visitatorial power over the college; and having delegated that power to certain trustees and overseers in perpetual succession, as its chosen, substituted agents and visitors, it had also a right and interest in having that power perpetually exercised by the very bodies, and by none others, which it had constituted for this purpose. Nothing is clearer in point of law, than the right of a founder to have his visitatorial power exclusively exercised by the very functionaries, in whom he has vested it. It is the very substratum of his dotation.

This is not all. The founder has a right to have the statutes of his foundation, as to the powers of the trustees, strictly adhered to, except so far as he has consented to any alteration of them. But an authority to alter or modify those powers can never be fairly construed into an authority to take them away from his trustees, and confer the same powers on other persons. My view of this resolve, therefore, is, that it authorizes no alterations or modifications of the college charter, which shall divert the funds of the founder from their original objects, or shall vest the visitatorial power in any other bodies, or persons, than the trustees and overseers marked out in the original charter; and a fortiori, that it does not justify the transfer of these powers from the trustees to any other persons not in privity with them. It does not authorize the legislature of Maine to assume to itself the powers of the trustees, or overseers, or either of them, or to appoint new trustees or overseers; for that would affect the rights and interests of the founder, who has a right to select his own administrators of his own bounty in perpetuity. I do not say, that the legislature of Maine might not have authorized an increase of the number of both boards, leaving the appointment to be made by the existing boards; for that would still leave the funds to be administered by agents selected by the proper visitors of the founder. Upon that point I give no opinion. What I do mean to say is, that the legislature of Maine was not authorized by this resolve of Massachusetts to affect the rights and interests of the latter state, by making appointments of trustees and overseers of the charity through its own agency, and independent of the agency of the charter trustees, and overseers. Massa-

But this is not all. The language of the resolve is, that Massachusetts assents and agrees to any alteration and modification, "which the president and trustees, and overseers, of said college may make therein, with the consent and agreement of the legislature of said state of Maine; and such alterations or modifications, made as aforesaid, are hereby ratified on the part of this commonwealth." Now, I confess, that I think there is great force in the argument, that this resolve had in view certain alterations and modifications, then to be made, uno flatu, and not any subsequent alterations and modifications, which might from time to time, and in all future times and ages, be made in the charter. It is scarcely conceivable, that Massachusetts should use terms of ratification in present, as applicable to all such possible alterations in all future times. That was not necessary to accomplish the objects of the petitioners. A single alteration or modification, which should confer upon the legislature of Maine the authority required by the constitution to authorize any donation, grant, or endowment of that legislature to the college, would have been sufficient, without any general and sweeping authority for unlimited changes. But, be this as it may, it is very clear, that Massachusetts has not assented or agreed to any alterations or modifications, which the legislature of Maine might in virtue of its own sole authority make, but to such only, as the president and trustees, and overseers, of the college may make with the consent and agreement of the legislature of Maine. The alterations and modifications are, then, to be made by the boards of the college, or by their agents, with the consent of the legislature, and not by the legislature without their consent. It short, the alterations or modifications are to originate with the boards, and to be made by them; but they are inoperative, unless ratified by the legislature. If, therefore, the legislature of Maine has undertaken to make laws, altering or modifying the charter of the college, without making the validity of such laws dependent upon the adoption of the boards before or after their passage, I have no hesitation in saying, that such laws have never been assented to by Massachusetts, and are, consequently, unconstitutional and void.

But let us see, whether the legislature of Maine has adopted this resolve of Massachusetts; for there must be a concurrence of the legislatures of both states ad idem, to repeal or modify the clause in the act of separation. It is very certain, that the legislature of Maine has passed no correspondent resolve or act, in totidem verbis, nor has it in terms assented or agreed to the resolve of Massachusetts. How, then, can the resolve have any operation? The act of separation declares, that the fundamental articles, the terms and conditions of the separation, shall be, ipso facto, incorporated into the constitution of Maine, "subject, however, to be modified or annulled by the agreement of the legislatures of both the said states." To constitute such an agreement, both parties must assent to the same thing. The whole proposition must be adopted, or nothing. From the very nature and force of the term, an agreement can be but one thing; and in that one thing, both parties must concur. If, then, Massachusetts and Maine have not agreed to the same identical thing, the casus foederis has not arisen. Indeed, I am inclined to go much farther. I do exceedingly doubt, if any modification or amendment can be made in any of these fundamental articles, without the specific modifications or amendment being drawn out, and expressly assented to by both states. I do not think, consistently with the letter or spirit of the qualifying or enacting clause, that the legislature of either state can delegate to other persons its authority to assent to, or frame, any such agreement. It cannot agree, ab ante, to any modifications or amendments, which third persons may make. It must agree to some specific proposition, purporting to be its own final act in the premises.

But, it is argued, that the act of Maine of the 16th of March, 1820, (which was passed four days after the Massachusetts resolve,) contains a virtual assent to that resolve, and that therefore there has been a sufficient compliance with the requisites of the articles of separation. Let us see, then, what the purport of that act is. It is entitled "An act to modify and limit the terms and conditions of the act of separation, relative to Bowdoin College, and encourage literature, and the arts and sciences;" and it enacts, "that, provided the legislature of Massachusetts shall agree thereto, the president and trustees, and the overseers, of Bowdoin College having already assented thereto, the terms and conditions mentioned in the act of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, passed on the 19th of June, A. D. 1819, entitled, &c., be and the same hereby are so far modified, limited, or annulled, as that the president and trustees, and the overseers, shall have, hold, and enjoy their powers and privileges in all respects, subject, however, to be altered, limited, restrained, or extended by the legislature of the state of Maine, as shall by the said legislature be judged necessary to promote the best interests of said institution." Now, it seems to me, that this act is precisely in the form contemplated by the act of separation, in order to justify a modification of the charter. It presents a specific alteration for the consideration and agreement of Massachusetts; and thus affords a very strong confirmation of the view, which has been already taken of this point by the court. The act is to take effect, and the modification is to be incorporated into the charter, provided the legislature of the commonwealth of Massachusetts shall agree thereto, that is, to the specific modification proposed in the act. Now, it is certain, that the act of Maine; or the specific modification of the charter therein proposed, has never been agreed to by the legislature of Massachusetts. The act has never, as far as any of us know, been laid before the legislature of Massachusetts, either for consideration or for confirmation. The act does not look to any antecedent resolve of Massachusetts, and dispense with any farther assent; but it expressly looks to some future act or assent of Massachusetts. The language is, provided the legislature shall agree thereto, not has agreed thereto. Nor is this a mere matter of form. It is, in my judgment, a matter of substance, and was so rightly understood by the legislature of Maine, as indispensable to the constitutional efficacy of the act of 1820. In no just sense can this act be construed to be an adoption of the Massachusetts resolve. The terms are not the same; the objects are not the same; the limitations are not the same. Massachusetts signifies her assent to any alteration or modification "not affecting the rights and interests of this commonwealth." No such qualification or limitation is to be found engraved on the act of Maine. The latter saves no rights and no interests of Massachusetts. Massachusetts signifies her assent to any alterations, &c., which the president, trustees, and overseers, &c., may make in the charter, with the consent and agreement of the legislature of Maine. The act of the latter assents to no such general authority; but confines itself to a single proposition; and that conceived almost in the very terms of the eighth article of the constitution of the state. It is impossible, therefore, in an exact and legal sense to assert, that the resolve of Massachusetts, and the act of Maine, speak ad idem. The proposition of neither legislature has been specifically acted upon by the other. There has been a miscarriage of the parties, unintentional, in all probability, but not, in my judgment, the less fatal on that account.

But although I am clear in this opinion, it is not my intention to rest the present case upon this ground alone, though it seems to me impregnable. There is another point of view in which the constitutional doctrine is equally clear, and equally fatal. Let it be conceded, that the act of Maine of the 16th of June, 1830, is constitutional, and has become incorporated into the charter of the college, and there yet remains a very important inquiry; what is the true extent of the authority of the legislature conferred by that act over the college? The words are, that "the president and trustees, and the overseers, of Bowdoin College shall have, hold, and enjoy their powers and privileges in all respects, subject, however, to be altered, limited, restrained, or extended by the legislature, &c., as shall, &c., be judged necessary to promote the best interests of said institution." In the first place, it is clear, that this language can by no reasonable, indeed, I may say, by no possible interpretation be construed to include an authority to annul the charter, or the corporation created by it, or the institution itself. The word "annul" is not in it, as it was in the sixteenth section of the original charter of 1794; but the other words of that section are retained, except that the word "extend" is substituted for the word "grant." This alone would furnish an almost irresistible argument, that the authority to annul was intended to be withheld from the legislature. But the words of the section in their actual connexion exclude any authority to annul the charter. It would be utterly repugnant to all common sense to say, that an annihilation of the college would be an act to promote its "best interests." The authority is also limited in other respects. It is not an authority to alter, limit, restrain, or extend the charter generally; but only to alter, limit, restrain, or extend the powers and privileges conferred by the charter on the president, trustees, and overseers, as may be judged necessary to promote the best interests of the institution. The act, then, does not authorize the creation of new boards, in whom the corporate powers and privileges may be vested; nor any transfer whatsoever to other persons of the powers and privileges of the old boards. The powers and privileges of the existing boards may be extended or restrained, limited or altered; but they cannot be transferred over to other persons; for that would be an act of a very different character. Whatever powers and privileges are allowed by the legislature to be exercised for the promotion of the best interests of the institution, are to be exercised by the charter boards. No authority is conferred upon the legislature to add new members to the boards by its own nomination or by that of the governor and counsel of the state. That would be an extension not of the power and privileges of the boards, but of the legislative action over them. If the legislature could add one new member of its own choice or appointment, and not of the choice or appointment of the charter boards, it could add any number whatsoever, five, or fifty, or five hundred. It could annihilate the powers and privileges of the charter boards, under the pretence of alteration or extension. It will hardly be contended, that the legislature possesses a right to substitute itself in the management of the college and its interests, for the charter boards; and if not, how can it confer such an authority upon other persons? The president, trustees, and overseers are to "hold and enjoy their powers and privileges in all respects, subject," &c. &c. But how can they hold or enjoy any such powers or privileges, if these are liable to be transferred to any other persons, and taken from themselves? If such had been the intent of the parties, other language would have been used; the charter, the college, and the boards would have been made subject to the pleasure of the legislature. The power to annul and transfer the powers and privileges would have found its way into the act in a clear and determinate manner. I agree, that the legislature might authorize an enlargement of the boards, by the appointment of new members to be nominated by the boards; for it would be but an enlargement of the powers and privileges of the existing boards. But it is morally impossible, as I think, to ingraft upon the terms of the act an authority in the legislature to make, of itself, new boards, or to change the whole organization of the old boards, by the addition of members not chosen by those boards. I am not prepared, therefore, to admit, that the act of the 19th of March, 1821, enlarging the boards, or the act of the 27th of February, 1826, making the governor, ex officio, a member of the board of trustees, can be maintained as constitutional exercises of authority. I do not say, that the proceedings of the boards, as actually constituted since the passage of those acts, are void. That is a very different question, turning upon very different considerations. There is a marked distinction in the law, which allows the acts of many officers de facto to be good, although they may not be officers de jure, or regularly elected. The present case is quite enough loaded with difficulties for the court not to desire to plunge into that point, although, from the strong desire expressed, and the discussions pressed at the bar for an opinion upon this point, it has not been very easy wholly to avoid it.

Let us see, then, how far the act of the 31st of March, 1831, is affected by any of these considerations. It is in its terms an act of positive and direct legislation. It legislates the existing presidents of Bowdoin and Waterville Colleges (the only colleges in the state) out of office from and after the next annual commencement of the colleges. It is a direct exercise of the power of annihilation from office by the legislature itself. That very power was expressly and exclusively conferred upon the college boards by the original charter. Massachusetts has never consented, that it should be taken away from those boards, and be exercised by the legislature of Maine; for it is an alteration or modification "affecting the rights and interests of that commonwealth," in regard to those very boards. The act of Maine of June, 1820, has not conferred this power on the legislature; for that act authorizes no transfer of any of the powers of the boards to the legislature, or to any other persons. It would have been quite a different question, if the legislature had undertaken merely to alter the term of office of the future presidents chosen by the boards, with a grant of power to remove such future presidents at the pleasure of the boards. The wisdom of such a provision might be more than doubtful. The authority to make it, might perhaps be more clear. But it is said, that the boards have assented to the act, and have adopted it; and it has, therefore, become binding upon the college. I think, that the argument is not correct. The boards have not adopted it; they have merely "acquiesced" in it, a phrase evidently chosen, ex industria, by the boards, as expressive of mere submission to the legislative will, and not of approbation; a course, which might naturally be adopted to avoid a direct collision with the legislature, and as a respectful appeal for a future revision of the act by the legislature itself. But if the acquiescence of the boards could be construed into an approval of the act, (as, I think, it ought not to be,) still, that approval cannot give effect to an unconstitutional act. The legislature and the boards are not the only parties in interest upon such constitutional questions. The people have a deep and vested interest in maintaining all the constitutional limitations upon the exercise of legislative powers; and no private arrangements between such parties can supersede them. Independent, however, of this general ground, there is another of great weight and importance; and that is, that President Allen was in office under a lawful contract made with the boards, by which contract he was to hold that office during good behavior, with a fixed salary and certain fees annexed thereto. This was a contract for a valuable consideration, the obligation of which could not, consistently with the constitution of the United States, be impaired by the state legislature. The act of 1831 directly impairs the obligations of that contract. It, ipso facto, takes away from President Allen the tenure by which he held his office; and removes him from it. Now, it was as little competent for the legislature to exercise this authority, as it was for the boards of the college. The president, holding his office during good behavior, could not be removed from office, except for gross misbehavior; and then only by the boards, in the manner pointed out in the original charter. It is no answer to say, that the president personally assented to the proposition to clothe the legislature with an authority of this sort, in futuro. However indefensible any act might be on his part, by which he should surrender for all his successors the tenure of office during good behaviour, which he should yet retain for himself, (a design which I am very far from imputing to him;) still the act of June, 1820, could in no legal sense be construed to apply to past contracts. It could operate only in relation to powers to be exercised by the boards, in futuro. And, at all events, he has not assented to the act of 1831; and has resisted it, as in his opinion oppressive, vindictive, and unconstitutional.

In every view, therefore, in which I have been able to contemplate this subject, it seems to me, that the act of 1831 is unconstitutional and void, so far as it seeks to remove President Allen from office. The legislature could not constitutionally deprive him of his office, or of his right to the salary and perquisites annexed thereto.

The other question in the case is of minor importance to the parties; but still in a legal point of view it is entitled to grave consideration. From what has been already stated, President Allen is de jure in office; and as there is no pretence to say, that he has not always been ready to perform the duties of his office, he is entitled to recover against the corporation the entire emoluments, annexed by his contract to the office at the time, when he accepted it, or which have since been annexed to it. But the present suit is not brought against the corporation. It is against the treasurer of the corporation personally, as having received money for the use of the plaintiff. To justify a recovery, then, it must be clearly made out, that there is in his hands money, which has been specifically appropriated to, and belongs to the plaintiff, as president of the college. As to this part of the case, there may arise a distinction between the salary, and the fees of office. Since the college commencement in 1831, no money has come into the hands of the treasurer, which by any order of the board has been specifically directed to be paid to the president of the college, eo nomine, or to the plaintiff. Before that period the salary was payable quarterly, and was accordingly paid by the treasurer, under the general vote of the board already stated. It was a duty incumbent upon him so to do, in order to carry that vote into effect; and if funds existed in his hands sufficient for the purpose, there was an implied appropriation of those funds for that purpose. But the acquiescence of the boards at that period in the act of the legislature of 1831, and their information to the plaintiff of that acquiescence, and their proceeding to elect a new president, (though ineffectual,) amounts, as I think, to an implied revocation of the authority to pay over any future salary to the plaintiff, as president. They treated him, as no longer in office, and had a right to take from their treasurer (who is but their agent) the authority to pay to the plaintiff any farther salary, and to assume upon themselves all the consequences of a breach of their contract. But as to the fees for academical and medical degrees, the posture of the case is somewhat different. It is true, that the act of 1831, in the second section, declares, that the fees paid for degrees shall thereafter be paid into the treasury for the use of the college. But, so far as regarded the plaintiff, who, by his contract and the by-laws, was entitled to those fees, the act was inoperative. Besides, the boards have never acquiesced de facto in this part of the act. On the contrary, in September, 1832, there was an express refusal to change the former by-laws, by which "candidates for either degree shall pay five dollars each to the treasurer for the use of the president;" so that those by-laws, at least so far as the plaintiff is concerned, remain unrepealed; and the fees received by the treasurer for such degrees, have been expressly received by him for the use of the president. They are strictly money had and received for his use; and as the plaintiff still continues de jure president, he is entitled to them, unless there is some stubborn rule of law, which stands in his way.

It is a very clearly established principle of law, that if one man receive money, which ought to be paid to another, or belongs to him, this action for money had and received will lie in favor of the party, to whom of right the money belongs. So it is laid down by Lord Chief Justice Willes, in Scott v. Surman, Willes, 400;⁴ and the doctrine has ever since been adhered to. Nor is there any difficulty in maintaining such a suit, simply because it involves a trial of the title to office, if the party has once been in possession. Upon this point nothing more is necessary than to refer to Arris v. Stukely, 2 Mod. 260, and Boyer v. Dodsworth, 6 Term R. 681.⁵ It seems to me, therefore, that, as to the fees actually received for degrees by the treasurer for the president, the suit is maintainable, and, as to the salary, not.

I have now finished all that is necessary to be said for the decision of this cause. But I cannot dismiss it without expressing my regret, that it has ever come before the court, and that I have been deprived of the assistance of my learned brother, the district judge, in deciding it. If this court were permitted to have any choice, as to the causes, which should come before it, this is one of the last, which it would desire to entertain. But no choice is left. This court is bound to a single duty, and that is, to decide the causes brought before it according to law, leaving the consequences to fall as they may. It is impossible, in any aspect of the case, not to feel that the decision is full of embarrassment. On the one hand, the importance of the vested rights and franchises of this literary institution has not been exaggerated; and on the other hand, the extreme difficulty of successfully conducting any literary institution without the patronage and cordial support of the government, and under a head, who may (however undeservedly) not enjoy its highest confidence, is not less obvious. But these are considerations proper to be weighed by others, who possess a discretion and voice in a fit adjustment of controversies of this sort. To the court is left the humbler, but unenviable task of pronouncing a judgment, such as a just reverence for the law, and a conscientious discharge of its duty, impose upon it.

The verdict taken for the defendant must, pursuant to the agreement of the parties, be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiff, for such a sum, as shall be ascertained by an auditor to be appointed by the court, as due to him for the fees for degrees, received by the defendant for the use of the president.

Case No. 230.

ALLEN v. MAGRUDER.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

ESTOPPEL BY RECORD—PLEADINGS—AMENDING ANSWER.

1. In an action upon a prison-bonds bond the defendant is estopped to deny that there was such a judgment as that recited in the bond; and the plaintiff is not bound to produce the record of the judgment.

2. The court will not, at the trial, permit the defendant to amend his pleadings unless they are satisfied of the justice of the defence intended to be made by the new pleas.

At law. Debt on a prison-bonds bond. Breach, that the defendant departed, &c. Plea, payment. Replication, non-payment, and issue.

R. S. Coxé, for defendant, objected to the bond, because he said that there was no such judgment as that recited in the bond.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that upon this issue the defendant was estopped by his bond to deny that there was such a judgment; and that the plaintiff was not bound to produce the record of the judgment.

Mr. Coxé then moved to amend the pleas.

But THE COURT said that they must be satisfied of the justice of the defence intended to be made by the new pleas.

Mr. Coxé did not show that the proposed amendment was necessary to the justice of the case.

Verdict for plaintiff. Motion for new trial, and in arrest of judgment, overruled.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. Where household furniture in a dwelling inhabited by the owner and another person, was transferred by the owner to such other person, by bill of sale, and pointing out the property, but without any other circumstances to indicate an actual change of possession, and the parties continued to dwell together and to use the furniture, as before,—Held, the transfer was void against creditors, and under the statute of the state (Missouri) against fraudulent conveyances, as it had been construed by the supreme court of the state.

In bankruptcy. This is an appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri. The plaintiff, as the assignee in bankruptcy of William Downing, filed his petition in February, 1870, in the said district court, against the defendants, representing that in October, 1868, the said bankrupt executed a bill of sale to Eliza A. Massey of certain household furniture in the possession of the bankrupt; that the property was never actually delivered to her, but the same has ever since been in the residence and possession of the bankrupt; that by reason thereof the bill of sale is void by force of the statute of Missouri relating to fraudulent conveyances, and the prayer is that an order may be entered declaring the sale to be fraudulent and void, and the property delivered by the defendants to the assignee.

The answer admits the execution of the bill of sale as alleged; denies that the property was never delivered to the said Eliza A., and alleges that the same was purchased by her in good faith of the said Downing, and that the same has ever since been and now is in her actual possession. The evidence adduced in the court below consisted of the bill of sale and the deposition of Downing. The bill of sale, acknowledged but never recorded, is dated October 31, 1868, and by it Downing, for the recited consideration of $3,645 sells and conveys to Eliza A. Massey "the following furniture and other personal property now owned by me and being in my residence, situated on the north side of Washington avenue, being No. 1,347, in the city of St. Louis"—here follows a detailed description of the furniture in library, parlor, and bed-rooms, consisting of chairs, sofas, books, carpets, pictures, mirrors, etc.

The deposition of Downing, the bankrupt, disclosed the following facts:—That he had lived in house No. 1,347, on Washington avenue, above mentioned, for five years or more, and still lived there; that the house belonged to him; that Mrs. Massey was his sister-in-law, and that she and her husband, John Massey, had lived with him and his family for over fifteen years, the two making from time to time an amicable adjustment of expenses. Downing's name was on the door-plate of the house, and the house and establishment were known as his. The furniture and property in question were his prior to the alleged sale to Mrs. Massey. Downing was engaged largely in business, but in October, 1868, his partner allowed a note of the firm to go to protest, and fearing the consequences and desiring to secure his sister-in-law $3,645 which he owed her, he made to her the bill of sale above mentioned, she being at the time in the house and living with him in the manner before stated. An inventory seems to have been taken of the property; no separate valuation was, however, affixed to the different articles, but the whole was sold for the sum named. It is shown that the chief purpose of the inventory or list of the articles was to enable the property to be described in the bill of sale, which it was in contemplation to have drawn. No act of delivery is testified to, except that the bankrupt says he took Mrs. Massey around and showed the property to her. It is admitted that the parties continued to live together as before in the house; that no change was made; that the property continued to be used as it previously had been; and that Downing's name still continued on the door-plate, etc. On the hearing before Treat, [District Judge,] the district court found that the bill of sale was void, and ordered the defendants to deliver the property therein described to the assignee.

From this order or decree the defendants appeal.

Hitchcock & Lubke, for appellee.

I. The assignee had a right to the relief sought in his petition. Hill. Bankr. pp. 134, 135, § 43.

II. The bill of sale was fraudulent and void in law under the statute of Missouri. Gen. St. Mo. 1865, § 10, c. 107, p. 440; Clafflin v. Rosenberg, 42 Mo. 439, 43 Mo. 593; State v. King, 44 Mo. 238.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.—I. Neither in his petition nor in argument does the assignee base his right to the relief demanded upon the ground that the bankrupt did not in fact owe Mrs. Massey the debt which the bill of sale was made to pay or secure, nor upon the ground that the sale was fraudulent, because made to hinder and delay the creditors of Downing, the vendor. The assignee places his case solely upon the statute of the state of Missouri relating to fraudulent conveyances, the tenth section of which is in these words: "Every sale made by a vendor of goods and chattels in his possession or under his control, unless the same be accompanied by delivery in a reasonable time (regard being had to the situation of the property), and be followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things sold, shall be held to be fraudulent and void, as against the creditors of the vendor, or subsequent purchasers in good faith." St. Mo. 1865, p. 440, c. 107.

The sale by the bankrupt to Mrs. Massey is within the statute. It was an absolute sale of goods in the possession of the vendor. There was no delivery of the property, or, if any, but a momentary one, and it was not followed by any actual or continued change of possession. This being so, the statute enacts that the sale "shall be held to be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the vendor, or subsequent purchasers in good faith." With the policy of a statute which, irrespective of the fact of fraud or the intention of the parties to defraud, inexorably denounces as fraudulent per se all sales not accompanied by the required delivery and by actual and continued change of possession, the courts have nothing to do, and it does not become them to question the legislative wisdom.

The purpose of the statute is to prevent the vendor from acquiring a false and delusive credit, and to prevent purchasers from being ensnared by means of secret sales. Hence, the provision that the sale shall, as required, be accompanied with delivery, and this by an actual and continued change of possession. The purpose of the enactment being to protect the public from deception, the indicia of a change of owners should be such as to accomplish this end. The new owner should fly his own, and not his vendor's flag. This is the construction which the statute has received from the supreme court of the state. In Claffin v. Rosenberg, 42 Mo. 439, speaking of this statute, Wagner, J., remarks that "the vendee must take actual possession, and the possession must be open, notorious, and unequivocal, such as to apprise the community, or those who are accustomed to deal with the party, that the goods have changed hands. . . . This necessarily excludes the idea of a joint or concurrent possession." On a critical examination of the case just cited, it will be seen that the exact point of the decision is that the possession of the vendee must, as against the vendor, be actual and exclusive. This is the leading case upon the statute in question, and it has been subsequently reaffirmed and followed. Claffin v. Rosenberg, 43 Mo. 593; State v. King, 44 Mo. 238; Lesem v. Herriford, Id. 323. See Twyne's Case, and American Notes, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 33.

We deem it prudent to observe that in the case at bar, it is not necessary to go so far as to say that in no case can a sale be upheld where the vendor is in possession concurrently with, or rather subordinate to, the vendee or his agent. This may depend upon the existence of circumstances of a nature fairly to put the public upon notice. In this case there was no actual delivery, no continued change of possession, no circumstances of any kind, whereby either creditors or purchasers could know that any change of owners had taken place.

II. The defendants make a point that the situation of the parties to the sale and property was such that no delivery and change of possession other than such as were made was practicable, and hence more ought not to be required. The statute refers to "the situation of the property," not of the parties; but, without emphasizing this suggestion, it seems to us that the statute has reference to property so situated as not to be at the time capable of immediate actual delivery and change of possession, such as growing crops, bulky articles, &c., and not to cases where the property is present and capable of being delivered to the vendee and retained in his possession and control. Since, in a case like the present, this court will follow the construction given to the local statute by the highest court of the state, it is not deemed to be necessary to follow the appellant's counsel into an examination of the decisions under the statute of Elizabeth or the statutes of other states.

III. The defendants also contend that even if such be the construction of the statute, the assignee has no right to impeach the sale and have the property delivered to him. This view cannot be maintained. If Downing had not gone into bankruptcy, any creditor of his could have subjected the property to the payment of his debt. In this respect the assignee represents the creditors. In consequence of Downing being adjudicated a bankrupt, his creditors are precluded from proceeding against him, and hence the assignee has the right given to him in terms by the bankrupt act, to proceed in the way which the present plaintiff is pursuing. Carr v. Hilton, [Case No. 2,436;] Hill. Bankr. 134, § 43, and cases cited; Bankrupt Act 1867, §§ 14, 35. The result is that the order of the district court must be affirmed.

KREKEL, District Judge, concurred.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court the above decree of the circuit court was affirmed. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The sale of Downing to Mrs. Massey was, within the terms of the statute, fraudulent and void as against his creditors. It was not accompanied by any delivery of the property, and was not followed by any change of possession. * * * There was no outward sign manifested, nor indicia exhibited, nor notice given, which could apprise the community of any change of ownership. * * * The assignee of Downing's estate was authorized by the express terms of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act (14 Stat. 439) to pursue the property thus attempted to be transferred, and, as auxiliary to its recovery, to ask that the sale of the bankrupt be annulled." Allen v. Massey, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 351.]

city, and were used in such schools, such board being a corporation created by the state, having exclusive charge of such schools: Held, that the city, in its corporate capacity, was liable, in a suit in equity, for the infringement of the patent.

3. The board of education is a proper party to the suit, and is also liable for the infringement.

In equity. This was a suit in equity [by Aaron H. Allen against the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York and the board of education of the city of New York for infringement of] re-issued letters patent [No. 1,126 of patent No. 12,017,] granted to the plaintiff for "improvements in seats for public buildings." [Decree for complainant.]

Andrew J. Todd, for plaintiff.

Frederic H. Betts, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This suit is brought upon reissued letters patent No. 21,² granted to the orator, for "improvements in seats for public buildings;" on the 15th day of January 1861, for the term of fourteen years from December 5th, 1854, and extended for the term of seven years from the 5th day of December, 1868, to the date of its expiration. The defences are that the patent is void because the reissue is for a different invention from that covered by the original; that the invention was anticipated by a stove-door, a carriage-seat for a child, an opera-board to a carriage, and a description in a patent to one Eliaers, dated November 28th, 1854; and that the city of New York is not liable for any infringement shown. Other defences were set up in the answer, but have not been relied upon at the hearing. The improvement described in the patent consists in making the seats so they may be turned up out of the way when not in use. In the original patent, they were to be turned up by weights when not held down by being sat upon. In the reissue, the weights may be dispensed with, and the seats moved upward otherwise, or retained. It is argued that, so far as they are dispensed with, one element of a combination is removed, and a different invention produced. This, if well founded, might be fatal to the patent; but the weights have nothing to do with the capability of the seats for being turned up out of the way. They were means only for putting them out of the way. They were one part of the invention when arranged for that purpose; the construction of the seats was another. The reissue divided the invention into its two parts. When divided, the parts together were the same as the whole before, and separately were the same as the parts were before. The contrivances, relied upon as anticipations, each turn down to a horizontal position when so wanted, and are stopped and held there substantially as these seats are, and are likewise turned up out of the way when not so wanted; and, if the use made by the orator is merely a new use, they are clearly anticipations; but it seems quite clear that it is not. The stove-door was arranged with the front of a stove or furnace, the child's seat with the dash-board of a carriage and the opera-board with the rear of a carriage. These seats are arranged with the standards of seats in public halls, and are so described as arranged. Those other things could not be arranged as seats in such halls without contriving the alterations and additions necessary by the exercise of inventive faculties. They are not the same things, but are different. Although the patent to Eliaers is prior in date to this, the application for this is prior to that, and shows this invention prior to the description of it there. He did not have a patent for this invention, so there was no patent, as such, for the orator to overcome. The evidence furnished by the description was all that was to be met, and the prior application accomplishes that object.*

The proof in respect to infringement is to the effect, that seats embodying this invention were bought by the board of education of the city of New York for the use of the schools of the city, and have been in use in those schools under the direction of the board of education, and the department of public instruction which has superseded the board of education. It is argued, that, upon this proof, the city is not liable in this suit, for two reasons—one is, because these instrumentalities having charge of the schools are corporations themselves, over which the city has no control; the other is, that the use is under sovereign authority, delegated by the state of New York in its sovereign capacity, for which the city or the board of education, or the department of public instruction, can no more be held liable to suit than the state itself. It is understood that the board of education was, and that the department of public instruction is, a corporation under the laws of the state, recognized and treated as such by the courts of the state, and having exclusive charge and control of the schools of the city, without whose action the city cannot be made liable for anything connected with the schools, and for whose contracts the city cannot be held liable otherwise than through proceedings against them. Ham v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 70 N. Y. 459; Dannat v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 6 Hun, 88. But still, the schools are the schools of the city, the board of education or department of public instruction takes charge of them for the city, they are paid for with the money of the city, and whatever is saved in providing for them is to the advantage of the city. The corporation which that department or board constitutes is within that of the city, and is an instrumentality through which the educational interests of the city are cared for, the same as if done by officers having the same powers, except that the officers could have only a personal and official period of existence, while that of the corporation is, under the law, theoretically perpetual. One principal ground of a suit in equity for the infringement of a patent is, to compel an account of the gains or profits accrued to those proceeded against, by means of the infringement. Obviously, the proper party to proceed against is the one that has received the profits or to whom the gains have accrued. If any party has saved or made anything by this infringement it is the city, and the city seems clearly to be a proper party to account for these savings or profits. The board and department are proper parties, also, for they have been directly engaged in the infringement. It is argued, that the city, as such, could not stop the infringement nor control it, and, therefore, could not be guilty of any tort by which to acquire profits to account for. Probably, the city could not, independently of this board or department, stop the infringement; but that is on account of the mode in which the law requires the educational matters of the city to be attended to, and not because the city has any just right to advantages which the wrongful acts of its board or department may acquire. Officers might be able to do the same, but, if so, the city would not be shielded.

That the acts constituting the infringement were committed in the exercise of authority derived from the state, cannot shield the defendants from liability. The grant of the exclusive right to this invention came from the sovereign power of the general government, and the right is a species of property secured to the inventor by law. It is not subservient to public uses without just compensation ascertained and furnished, upon being taken in a regular and lawful mode, any more than other property of any kind is. It has not been taken by any regular proceeding, but only by mere wrong doing, which could, of itself, furnish no legal right. Cam-meyer v. Newton, 94 U. S. 225, 234.

Let a decree be entered, that the patent is valid and that the defendants have infringed, and for an account, according to the prayer of the bill.

[Cited in Guntton v. Nock, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 332.]

At law. The case will appear in the charge of the court.

WASHINGTON, [Circuit Justice.] This is an action of trover and conversion, for forty-one tons of pig iron. John Davis, in January 1802; being possessed of a quantity of pig iron, at different places, and amongst others, the quantity in question, it being in Swartout's yard, in New-York, rented by Davis as a place of deposit for that article; empowered a Mr. Champless, in New-York, in writing, to sell the same for the highest market price in cash; or if this could not be done, to offer the same to the defendant, at the market price, on condition that he should pay down 6000 dollars, and that the residue might go to the credit of Davis, against a demand which Ogden had in his own right, or as agent against Davis. The offer was made to Ogden in February, but he took time to consider, and never afterwards gave an answer to that proposition. Champless sold the iron to Watkins; but afterwards, upon receiving a letter from Davis, informing him that he had sold all the iron to the plaintiff, he, Champless, cancelled the sale he had made. The sale to the plaintiff was made on the 6th of February, at 25 dollars a ton; which, with the expense of removing a great part of it, was supposed equivalent to the market price in New-York, and the amount was to go to Davis's credit, against a demand of the plaintiff; and if the iron should be sold for more than the 25 dollars, and expenses, the excess was also to be placed to the credit of said Davis. On the 19th of February, a bill of parcels was delivered to the plaintiff, on which day, the credit was entered on the plaintiff's books. The sale to the plaintiff, is proved by Davis, to have been real and bona fide. Late in February, Champless being alarmed by a letter from a Mr. Bond, stating, that unless a note of Davis's for 600 dollars was paid, the iron would be sacrificed, thought he would benefit Davis by selling it to Ogden, provided this could be done. The subject was proposed to Ogden, and the original power to Champless laid before counsel; and the sale to the plaintiff revealed both to the defendant, and his counsel. The counsel thought the sale to the defendant might nevertheless be valid, and in consequence of this, the sale was made, on the 1st March, for $2 50 cts. less than the market price; and the whole amount was agreed to be put to the credit of Davis, against the claim of defendant, as before mentioned. The defendant paid the rent due to Swartout, and removed the iron from the yard. The defendant informed one of the witnesses, that the plaintiff had claimed of him the iron, and that there would be a suit about it. The defendant also said he would retain the iron. Upon this case, if the witnesses who prove it on the part of the plaintiff, (for the defendant has called none,) be believed, one thing is clear, and that is, that whether the plaintiff has a right or not, the defendant most clearly has none. The authority to Champless was special, and therefore he had no power to sell the iron to the defendant, upon any other terms than receiving 6000 dollars in cash; yet it was sold on terms very different. Where a power is general, the attorney may do any thing to bind his principal, which is within the scope of his authority. But if it be special, every thing is void, if he does not act in strict conformity to his authority. But, if the power had been general, still, every thing done under it, after it was revoked, and this made known to the defendant, (as in this case it was,) was void.

As to the plaintiff's title, it is complete, if the witnesses are believed. The moment the sale took place, Davis was receiving credit for the amount; as much so, as if he had received so much money: delivery of the iron then was not necessary. Two objections were made to the plaintiff's right of recovery; first, in the form of a motion for a non-suit, and then before the jury. First, that a conversion is not proved. It is proved that the iron had been demanded, and the defendant said he would retain it, and that a suit would be brought. This is evidence of a conversion. Secondly, that the plaintiff ought, before he brought his suit, to have tendered the money paid by defendant, for the rent of the yard. No case can be produced, in which it is necessary to do this, where the defendant acts under a claim of property, adverse to the plaintiff's right. Here, Ogden, without a shadow of title, interferes with the plaintiff's property; removes it from the place where he had deposited it; and now claims what he had officiously paid, in order to give him possession. Liens depend upon contracts, express, or implied; and none can be implied, where the defendant acts adversely to the right of the person, for whom he has paid the money.

Verdict for plaintiff.

NOTE, [from original report.] He who has an absolute or general property, may bring trover, though he never had the actual possession; for property, in personal things, draws to it the possession, to enable him to bring trover or trespass against a stranger who takes it away; but, he must have a right of possession. Yet, if a person having a special property as a bailee, sells and delivers the goods to another as his own, bona fide, and without notice; the general owner cannot bring trover, or any other action, against the vendee; for, by the sale, his property is altered. So, possession, with an assertion of title, or even possession alone, gives such a property, as will enable a man to bring this action against a wrong doer; for possession is prima facie evidence of property, sufficient to put the defendant upon proof of property. So, the finder of a thing, may bring trover against a stranger, who converts it. If the goods come to the defendant by delivery or finding, the plaintiff must demand them; and refusal is evidence of a conversion. But, it is not evidence of a conversion, where it is obvious that the defendant has made no conversion; as if he has cut down trees, and left them lying there; nor in the case of a carrier, &c. where the goods were lost through negligence, or were stolen; but action on the case is the remedy: but, if it does not appear that they were lost, or if the carrier had them, when he denied to deliver them, it is a conversion. Bull. N. P. 44. Nor where that carrier has a lien on the goods for a debt due him, which is not paid, nor tendered; but trover will lie, if the carrier breaks open the box containing the goods, or sells them, or has them in possession when the demand is made. Not only claiming the property as one's own, but asserting the right of another over it, is, upon demand and refusal, evidence of a conversion. Denial to one who has a right to demand goods, is an actual conversion, and not merely evidence of it; for the assuming upon one's self the property in, and right of disposing of, another's goods, is a conversion. So, where one intrusted with the goods of another, puts them into the hands of a third person, without orders, it is a conversion. Making up of a thing found, or delivered, is a conversion; so is a misuse of it. So, taking and carrying away is a conversion, without demand or refusal. Wilbraham v. Snow, 2 Saund. 47, note 1; [Doe v. Richards,] 3 Term R. 357; [Baldwin v. Cole,] 6 Mod. 212; 6 Bac. Abr. 679. In [Green v. Farmer,] 4 Burrows, 2213, Lord Mansfield lays it down, that courts are disposed to maintain liens: 1. Where there is an express contract. 2. Where it is implied from the usage of trade. 3. Where it may be implied from the manner of dealing between the parties, in the particular case. 4. Where the factor claims it, for the balance of his general accounts.

LIABILITY OF BANK—EXECUTORS.

[1. Deposits in a Pennsylvania savings bank made by a citizen of New Jersey, since deceased, are not subject to the collateral inheritance tax of Pennsylvania, and the executors can recover them, although they must come to Pennsylvania to reduce their right to possession.]

[2. The state cannot sustain a claim for the tax against the bank, but must look to the estate in the hands of the legal representatives after they have reduced it to possession.]

[See Kintzing v. Hutchinson, Case No. 7,834.]

[At law. Suit by executors of M. A. English to recover a deposit in a savings bank. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. The plaintiffs, citizens of New Jersey, and executors of Mary Ann English, deceased, who, at the time of her death, was a citizen of New Jersey and domiciled in said state, filed a copy of the book of deposit of their decedent with the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society, the defendants, showing a balance due decedent of $800. The defendant filed the following affidavit of defense:

"William Purves, secretary and treasurer of the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society, being duly affirmed according to law, saith as follows: 1. That defendants admit that the copy of the deposit book of Mary Ann English with the said society, is correct. 2. That the defendants submit to the court that there is a defense to the demand of the plaintiffs as follows: The said Mary Ann English, as defendants are informed and believe, died without leaving father, mother, husband, children or lineal descendants, by reason whereof, under the statutes of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in such case made and provided, all the personal property of her, the said testatrix, within said commonwealth, including the balance due of the said amount so deposited with defendants, became subject, after payment of debts, to a tax of five per cent. on the net amount thereof to the said commonwealth, which tax has never been paid. 3. The defendants further submit to the court that letters testamentary granted to foreign executors, if they authorize them to sue in the courts of the United States, a debtor of their testatrix can give no higher power or authority for collecting the assets of the estate in this commonwealth than is given by the law thereof to domestic executors. (Signed,) William Purves."

Counsel for the rule cited Kintzing v. Hutchinson, [Case No. 7,834] and argued that it did not lie with defendants to set up the non-payment of the collateral inheritance tax, and that at all events, under the ruling of Kintzing v. Hutchinson, the tax was not due upon the choses in action in question.

E. P. Allinson and Dallas Sanders, for plaintiffs.

Henry Wharton, for defendants.

BUTLER, District Judge. The plaintiffs, citizens of New Jersey, and executors of the will of M. A. English, who was also a resident of New Jersey at the time of her death, sue the defendants, the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society, to recover a debt of $838.90, with interest. The affidavit of defense admits the existence of the debt; but avers that M. A. English died "without leaving father, mother, husband, children or other lineal descendants;" that the money due is, therefore, subject to collateral inheritance tax, under the statutes of Pennsylvania, and sets this averment up as an answer to the suit. No other defense is presented, and no other can therefore be considered. That this is insufficient, cannot, we think, be seriously doubted. In Kintzing v. Hutchinson, [Case No. 7,834,] Oct. 19, 1877, Judge Strong, sitting in the circuit court for the district of New Jersey, held that the statutes referred to have no application to choses in action here, belonging to one domiciled in another state at the time of his death, though his legal representatives may have to come here to reduce them to possession. Even if this were in conflict with the construction put on these statutes by the courts of this state it would bind us. The learned judge, however, on careful review of the cases, concludes that it is not.

If the law were otherwise, the result would be the same; the averment still would not constitute a defense. If the plaintiffs based their right to sue on letters issued here, the contrary would not, we presume, be suggested. But if they may sue here on the letters issued elsewhere, (and the defendant has not questioned this,) their right to recover is precisely the same as if the letters had been issued here. If the state can sustain a claim for the tax, as suggested, it cannot sustain it against the defendant, but must look to the balance of estate in the hands of the legal representatives of the deceased, after they have reduced it to possession and paid the debts. When necessary it may raise an administration for this purpose. Judgment must therefore be entered for the plaintiffs notwithstanding the affidavit of defense. We desire it distinctly understood that the defense set up by the affidavit and urged in the argument, does not, as we understand it, involve the question whether the plaintiffs can sue for the debt on the letters issued in New Jersey. That question was not presented in any form.

ALLEN v. RYERSON.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ACT OF JULY 27, 1866, CONSTRUED.

1. A cause removed from the state to the federal court, under the act of July 27, 1866, will not be remanded to the state court, merely because the petition for removal does not appear to have been verified.

2. Under the act of July 27, 1866, the non-resident defendant may remove the cause, as to him, where there can be a final determination of the controversy without the presence of a resident co-defendant.

3. In this case it was held that there could be such a final determination.

4. Where a case is made for removal of a cause, under the act of July 27, 1866, the petitioner therefor is not obliged to make an affidavit, such as is required by the act of March 2, 1867.

On motion by plaintiff to remand the cause to the state court.

The material facts are as follows: The plaintiff, B. F. Allen, is a citizen of Iowa. The defendant, Joseph T. Ryerson, is a citizen of Illinois. The other defendant is the sheriff of Polk county, Iowa. The plaintiff brought this suit in one of the state courts of Iowa. The defendants pleaded, and, before the final hearing, the defendant Ryerson filed an application, under the act of congress of July 27, 1866, (14 Stat. 306,) to have the cause, as to him, removed into the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa. The application was not verified, but stated the citizenship of the parties, and that the action was to enjoin the defendants; that there could be a final determination of the controversy as to Ryerson without his co-defendant, and offered the requisite security for filing copies of pleadings, etc., in the federal court. The state court made an order transferring the cause to the circuit court of the United States, and now motion is made by the plaintiff to remand the cause to the state court, for the reason that the petition for removal was not verified, and also, among other reasons, that the controversy as to Ryerson could not be determined without the presence of the sheriff, his co-defendant, and that the application does not state that there is any prejudice or local influence, as required by the act of March 2, 1867. From the bill, it appears that the plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of the "Des Moines Iron Works," had purchased certain real estate belonging to said company, sold on execution, and claimed to have taken with the realty certain machinery, as fixtures. The defendant Ryerson, a junior judgment creditor of said company, claiming that the machinery was not fixtures, and did not pass with the realty, ordered an execution upon his judgment, and caused the same to be levied by the sheriff, his co-defendant, upon the machinery, as the property of the Des Moines Iron Works. Plaintiff's bill was to restrain the defendant from selling, or in any way interfering with, said property, and for injury for the seizure of the same, alleges irreparable damages, etc., and asks that the injunction be made perpetual at the hearing. Defendants, in answer, deny the substance of the bill, and the damages, and ask that the injunction be dissolved.

John D. Rivers, for the motion.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—1. The motion to remand is made upon three grounds. The first ground is that the petition for the removal, upon which the state court acted, was not verified. The removal was applied for and ordered under the act of July 27, 1866. This act does not, in terms, require the petition to be verified (see Sweeney v. Coffin, [Case No. 13,686;]) and we do not think the cause should, for this reason, be remanded. The plaintiff is not concluded, by the petition for removal, as to the citizenship of the defendant Ryerson, but may contest that matter in this court, by a plea in the nature of a plea in abatement.

2. The substantial controversy, as disclosed in the plaintiff's bill and in the pleadings, is one between him and the defendant Ryerson. The plaintiff is a citizen of Iowa, and Ryerson is a citizen of Illinois. Judging of the case as made by the pleadings, we think there can be a final determination of the controversy without the presence of the sheriff. If the plaintiff maintains his bill, the decree will restrain the defendant Ryerson, and his agents and attorneys, which will include the sheriff, from further interference with the plaintiff's property; and the court may, if ground of equitable jurisdiction exists, also ascertain and award the plaintiff damages caused by the acts of the sheriff, under Ryerson's direction. If such a decree be satisfied, this will end the case as respects the sheriff. If not satisfied, the plaintiff can proceed, in the state court, against the sheriff, for as to the latter the cause still remains in that court. If Ryerson shall succeed in this court, and the bill be dismissed on the merits, this will dispose of the plaintiff's case against the sheriff in the state court.

3. It is our opinion, that where a case is made for the removal of a cause under the act of July 27, 1866, the petitioner for removal is not obliged to make an affidavit of the existence of prejudice or local prejudice, such as is required in applications under the act of March 2, 1867. Motion denied.

SALE—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS—PLEADING—IMPLIED WARRANTY—AGENCY.

1. S., acting for parties at Amsterdam, put into the hands of a broker in the city of New York a sample bottle of a quantity of madder, to negotiate a sale. The sale was made in Rhode Island, by the broker, in the name of S., the foreign principal not being disclosed, under an oral contract to A., upon the inspection of the sample bottle, which he refused to open on account of the instructions of S. The madder was, at the time of the sale, in barrels, in a vessel at the port of New York. After the contract was made, a bill of goods was furnished to the purchasers, with a clause, that "no claims for deficiencies shall be allowed unless made within seven days from receipt of goods." The madder in the casks proving inferior to its apparent qualities in the bottle, an action on the case was brought against S., by the purchasers, for damages. Held, the oral contract made in Rhode Island, where the statute of frauds does not prevail, can be enforced here, although the contract, if made in the same manner in New York, would have been void. The fact that the merchandise was in New York does not affect the question.

2. The action on the case is a proper remedy, and it is not necessary to aver a scienter.

[See note at end of case.]

3. The sale was by sample, and there was an implied warranty that the merchandise should correspond with the apparent qualities of the sample.

[See note at end of case.]

4. The clause in the bill of goods respecting deficiencies, is inoperative, as the contract was previously complete.

5. S., not having disclosed his principals, is personally liable.

At law. [Action by Phillip Allen and others against F. Schuchardt and others for damages for breach of warranty. Judgment for plaintiffs.]

The sample of a quantity of madder was put into the hands of a broker in the city of New York, by the defendants, to make sale of it for them. A sale was made accordingly to the plaintiffs, in the state of Rhode Island, upon an inspection of the sample bottle, which the broker refused to open on account of instructions from his principals. The sample bottle had been forwarded from Amsterdam to the defendants, previous to the shipment of the bulk, and was the only sample of the goods, as none accompanied them. The madder was in barrels, in the vessel, which had arrived in New York, about the time of the sale. The sale was made in the name of the defendants, their principals not being disclosed.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I. The contract of sale in this case was made in Rhode Island, and, though verbal, is there valid, as no sale note is required, as in our statute of frauds. The madder, the subject of the sale, being in New York, or elsewhere, at the time, does not affect this question.

II. The action on the case for a false warranty, is certainly a somewhat antiquated remedy, the action of assumpsit having taken its place; yet we cannot say that it has been abolished or modified on account of the substitution, by the profession, of the new remedy. There are certain advantages to be gained by the adoption of the one or the other, which are not common to both, and, in a count upon a false warranty, the pleader need not aver the scienter any more than in that of assumpsit. 1 Wheat. Selw. N. P. p. 486; [Williamson v. Allison,] 2 East, 446; 2 Chit. Pl. p. 101, note pp. 276, 277; 1 Chit. Pl. 139.

III. The sale of the madder was a sale by sample, where the purchaser had no opportunity to examine the bulk; and where he was prohibited by the vendors from opening the sample bottle for the purpose of examining the article, by which act we are inclined to think they assumed the responsibility of maintaining that the bulk was equal to the quality of the article as it appeared to the eye in the bottle. The sale was not only by sample, but was obviously intended to be such by the vendors, as the sample of the madder preceded the arrival of the bulk from abroad, and no sample accompanied it. The sample thus previously forwarded was put into the hands of the broker to sell the one hundred barrels subsequently shipped. This sample thus forwarded was the only one furnished representing this quantity of madder.

IV. The sale being a sale by sample, there was an implied warranty that the bulk was equal to the sample in quality, which, upon the evidence in the case, it clearly was not. All agree that, from an inspection of the sample, the madder appeared to be pure and unadulterated. From a careful analysis of the bulk by chemists, there was an adulteration, by sand and other foreign substances, exceeding thirty per cent. This evidence preponderates over the weight of the testimony abroad, taken on commission. There was no analysis of the article abroad.

V. The note at the head of the bill of goods rendered "no claims for deficiencies or imperfections allowed, unless made within seven days from receipt of goods," was not binding upon the purchasers. The contract was complete and binding upon both parties before this bill was delivered. The case is an unfortunate one, as both parties are innocent, the fraud having been perpetrated abroad before the goods were shipped to the defendants, who were mere consignees. The question is, which of these innocent parties, under the facts disclosed, should suffer the loss? The question turns upon a dry rule of law, and, according to my idea of it, the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment.

The verdict of $10,000 was taken by consent, subject to adjustment and the opinion of the court upon a case made. I shall deduct thirty per cent. from the price paid for the madder, as furnishing the amount of damages in the case, and give judgment for plaintiff for that sum.

NOTE, [from original report.] The familiar principle in this class of cases is, "that so much of the law as affects the rights and merits of the contract, is adopted from the foreign country; so much of the law as affects the remedy only, is taken from the local law of the country where the action is brought." Does the statute of frauds affect the contract or the remedy? It has been held in England, after an extended and elaborate discussion, that the fourth section of the statute affects the remedy, and consequently that an oral agreement within that section, made in France, and valid there, cannot be enforced in England. Leroux v. Brown, (1852.) 12 C. B. 801, 14 Eng. Law & Eq. 247. The court rests its decision upon the special language of that section: "No action shall be brought upon any agreement which is not to be performed within a year, &c., unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing," &c. The construction placed upon this language was, that the words, "no action shall be brought," evidently regarded the remedy, and the alternative clause showed that the writing was required only for the purposes of evidence. There were dicta to the effect that such a construction would not be given to the seventeenth section, regarding sales of goods. These dicta were followed in 1855, by the supreme court of Missouri, in Houghtaling v. Ball, 20 Mo. 563. The court expressly decides that an oral contract for the sale of goods, made in a state where the statute of frauds does not prevail, can be enforced in Missouri, where the statute exists substantially in the language of the English seventeenth section. Browne, in his work on the Statute of Frauds, (2d. 1857,) p. 140, note 5, disapproves of the distinction, citing dicta in Carrington v. Roots, 2 Mees. & W. 248; Reade v. Lamb, 6 Welsby, H. & G. 130. The Missouri case, however, was not before him, and the principal case is in the same direction. There is no distinction in the present New York statute of frauds, between the two classes of subjects, and the decision would embrace all the sections. In Dacosta v. Davis, 4 Zab. [24 N. J. Law,] 319, the authorities are collected in reference to the question whether the absence of the goods affects the law of the place of contract. In this case a contract was made in New Jersey, for the sale of goods at the time in Pennsylvania. The court arrived at the conclusions reached in the present case.

(2.) The old rule was that all actions upon a warranty, whether express or implied, were actions on the case. As to implied warranties, see Keilw. 91. Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Williamson v. Allison, 2 East, 446, (1802,) says, that the form of declaring in assumpsit cases of warranty, had not then prevailed above forty years, and was adopted in order to add the money counts to the declaration. The right to declare in assumpsit on an express warranty, was first discussed and decided in [Stuart v. Wilkins,] 1 Doug. 18, (1778.) The distinction as to the necessity of alleging a scienter is that if the action is on a warranty, it is not necessary, but if it be in the nature of an action of deceit, without any warranty, scienter must be alleged and proved. Note to Williamson v. Allison, supra; Stone v. Denny, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 151; [Freeman v. Baker,] 5 Barn. & Adol. 797; Bayard v. Malcolm, 1 Johns. 453. The right to bring an action on the case, for breach of warranty, is fully recognised in this country, among other cases, in [Hillman v. Wilcox,] 30 Me. 170; [Beeman v. Buck,] 3 Vt. 53; [Bartholomew v. Bushnell,] 20 Conn. 271; [House v. Fort,] 4 Blackf. 293. An important advantage may sometimes be secured in joining a count for fraudulent misrepresentation with the count on an express warranty, and a recovery thus may be had in accordance with the evidence. A judgment will, it seems, be a bar to an action of assumpsit on the warranty. [Salem India Rubber Co. v. Adams,] 23 Pick. 256.

(3.) In determining whether a sale is by sample or not, a material inquiry is, whether the article is open for inspection. It is a reasonable rule, where it is not present and a sample is exhibited, that the sale should be treated as being by sample. The correspondence of the sample with the article, is the essence of the contract, and the purchaser may say, if this correspondence does not exist, "non in hæc foedera veni." Boorman v. Jenkins, 12 Wend. 576; Salisbury v. Stainer, 19 Wend. 159; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 77; note to Chandelor v. Lopus. This principle is in like manner true of a written contract for articles of a particular name not open to inspection: Wieler v. Schilizzi, 17 C. B. 619. When the article and sample are both open to the purchaser, the same principle does not necessarily prevail. There must be an agreement to sell by sample, or at least an understanding of the parties that the sale is to be a sale by sample: Waring v. Mason, 18 Wend. 434. The question can only be answered by a view of all the circumstances of each case, and the intention of the parties must be gathered from their acts. It is a question of intention, and must be submitted to the jury. The evidence must be sufficient, from which the jury can find that the sale was intended to be a sale by sample. Beirne v. Dord, 1 Seld. [5 N. Y.] 95; Hargous v. Stone, Id. 73. An exhibition of a sample in such case, without anything more, is only a representation that it has been taken fairly from the bulk of the commodity: Id. In case of a technical sale by sample, if the article is not equal to the sample, the contract may be rescinded or the merchandise may be retained and an action for damages be brought. 2 Kent, Comm. 481; Story, Cont. § 540; authorities collected by Jewett, J. 1 Seld. [5 N. Y.] 99. The question decided in this case, that the merchandise must, under the facts proved, correspond with the appearance of the sample, and not simply with its real qualities, is of the first impression. The vendor may be regarded as estopped from denying that the apparent and actual qualities of the goods were different.

(4.) The defendants were liable, not having disclosed their correspondents, on well settled principles of law. If they had disclosed their principals, the question would have been raised, whether, as foreign factors, the presumption of law is that the dealing was exclusively with them. This doctrine, which was advanced by Judge Story, (Ag. § 268, and note 290. 423,) was combated, 2 Kent, Comm. 630, 631; [Kirkpatrick v. Stainer.] 22 Wend. 244; disapproved and discarded in Green v. Kopke, (1856,) 18 C. B. 549, and in Oelricks v. Ford, (1859,) 23 How. [64 U. S.] 49, Nelson, J., delivering the opinion of the court. The question is one of intention, to be gathered from surrounding circumstances, such as usage, &c. The fact that the principals were foreigners, might be an element in reaching the conclusion. Jervis, C. J., in Green v. Kopke; Coleridge, J., in Mahony v. Kekule, [Lennard v. Robinson.] 5 El. & Bl. 125, 130. See Heald v. Kenworthy, 10 Exch. 739. "The question is one of fact and not of law," Parke, B. The doctrine itself was only extended to goods sold by oral contract. Bray v. Kettell, (1861,) 1 Allen, 80, per Bigelow, C. J. Where there is a written contract, properly executed by an agent, as if signed "A. B., principal, by C. D., agent," and the language is unambiguous, a foreign factor is no more liable than a domestic factor, S. C.

[NOTE. This judgment was affirmed by the supreme court in Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall. (38 U. S.) 359. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion, said: "The ancient remedy for a false warranty was an action on the case sounding in tort. Stuart v. Wilkins, 1 Doug. 18; Williamson v. Allison, 2 East, 447. The remedy by assumpsit is comparatively of modern introduction. In Williamson v. Allison, Lord Ellenborough said it had 'not prevailed generally above forty years.' In Stuart v. Wilkins, Lord Mansfield regarded it as a novelty, and hesitated to give it the sanction of his authority. It is now well settled, both in English and American jurisprudence, that either mode of procedure may be adopted. Whether the declaration be in assumpsit or tort, it need not aver a scienter; and, if the averment be made, it need not be approved. * * * One of the considerations which led to the practice of declaring in assumpsit was that the money counts might be added to the special counts upon the warranty. Williamson v. Allison, 2 East, 447. If the declaration be in tort, counts for deceit may be added to the special counts, and a recovery may be had for the false warranty or for the deceit, according to the proof. Either will sustain the action. * * * At the time of the sale the agent produced a sample bottle. There was but one for the one hundred casks of madder. It was usual to have one for each cask. The broker was instructed by his principals not to allow the bottle to be opened, because the contact of the atmosphere would injure the appearance of the sample which it contained, and he acted accordingly. The arrival of the sample preceded the arrival of the casks from abroad. The sale was to be made, and was in fact made, by that sample. The agent says in his testimony: 'The sample was very handsome to look at.' 'The conversation carried the idea that it was very handsome madder.' There was no sand in the bottle. The sale was made at Providence, Rhode Island. The casks were at that time in New York, and, it seems from the evidence, still on shipboard. The plaintiffs had no opportunity to examine their contents. The transaction was a large one. The vendees had no means of forming a judgment of the quality of the madder in the casks but from the appearance of that in the bottle, which they were not allowed to open. From these facts we think the jury were well warranted in drawing the inference that it was the understanding of the vendees that they were buying under a warranty that the quality of the madder in the casks was equal to that of the sample in the bottle, and that the agent of the vendors intended to be understood as giving such a warranty. It is hardly credible, in the presence of such facts, that the understanding and intention of the parties could have been otherwise. But it is not necessary that the state of the evidence should have been such as necessarily to lead to this conclusion. It is enough that there was evidence upon the subject proper to be left to the consideration of the jury. If the jury erred, the remedy was by a motion for a new trial, and not by a writ of error. This part of the case was argued as if such a motion were before us. The rules of law which would be applicable in that event are very different from those which apply as the case is presented. A motion for a new trial in the courts of the United States is addressed to the sound discretion of the tribunal which tried the case, and to grant or refuse it cannot be made the subject of exception. Brown v. Clarke, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 15. Here the question is whether the court erred in refusing to make the case from the jury. Upon that subject we concur in the opinion of the learned judge who tried the cause. If a motion for a new trial were before us, we should overrule it. In our opinion, right and justice have been done."]

In equity. The opinion of the court contains a full statement of the case.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and FITMAN, District Judge.

late of the city of Providence, deceased, intestate; that at the time of his decease the intestate was lawfully possessed of, and well entitled to, certain personal property, consisting of a newspaper establishment, together with the good-will of the newspaper called the Republican Herald; that since the 27th day of June, 1829, the apparent title to the property in question had stood in the name of William Simons, Jr., the eldest son of the deceased, and the business of the newspaper had also been conducted in his name; but that, in point of fact, he held the property, and transacted the business, during the lifetime of his father, only as an agent, or trustee; that William Simons died intestate, on the 6th of March, 1845, and thereupon William junior, and the other children of the deceased, agreed that the establishment should be conducted as before; and it was so conducted until the death of William junior, in 1849. The bill makes the widow and administrator of William junior parties, and also joins as defendants the three other children of William senior, and prays that the documents, whereby title was conveyed, or pretended to be conveyed, to William junior by his father, may be cancelled; that an account may be taken of the property of William senior, and of the profits of the business while conducted by, or in the name of William junior; that it may be declared that the complainant, Agatha, as one of the children and heirs at law of William senior, is justly entitled to her share of the property and proceeds, according to the statute of distributions of Rhode Island; that a commission of partition may issue to divide the property into five equal parts, and that one of those parts may be allotted to the complainants, and for further or other relief.

The answers of the widow and the administrator of William junior deny the title of the complainants, and of William senior, and assert that William junior held and owned all the property which was in his possession at his decease in his own right, and not as a trustee, and that the business, conducted in his name, was on his own account solely. The answers of the other four children of William senior confess the substance of the bill, but no decree is sought against them, it not being alleged that either of them is in possession of any property of which an account is asked. This statement of the outline of the bill and answers presents the nature of the title made by the complainants. Many allegations are inserted in the bill in support of this title, which are denied by the answers of the widow and administrator of William junior, and much evidence has been taken in reference to these contested facts. The subject in controversy is personal estate.

decease. The rule of the common law laid down by Lord Coke, (Co. Litt. 8 a,) that a man, by the common law, cannot be heir to goods or chattels, for haeres dicitur ab haereditate, is in force in Rhode Island, and upon the decease of any one having personal estate, his children do not become its owners. They acquire only that qualified equitable right to distributive shares of what shall remain after payment of the just debts and funeral charges of the deceased, and the expenses of settling his estate, which is conferred upon them by the statute of distributions. Pub. Laws, p. 239. This qualified equitable right can only be worked out through a settlement of the estate by an administrator, appointed according to the laws of the state, who alone has the title to personalty cast on him by those laws, and who alone is competent to sue, either at law or in equity, to reduce the personal property and rights of the intestate to possession. It is true that, after an administrator has been appointed, if he colludes with a debtor to the estate, a court of equity will allow a distributee, having an interest in the estate, to sue the administrator and the debtor, and compel the latter to pay the debt. Calv. Parties, 157. But these, and similar cases of collusion, do not trench at all on the general rule that the executor, or administrator, being entitled to the personal estate, is the proper party to sue. Jones v. Goodchild, 3 P. Wms. 34. In these cases of collusion, the purpose of the suit is to bring the executor, or administrator, and the debtor before the court, and cause the former to assert his title, and thus do his duty as a trustee. And I believe we should look in vain for a case, in which a child of an intestate has been allowed, either at law or in equity, to sustain a suit in the character of heir, or distributee, to recover personal estate of the deceased.

The complainants' counsel has endeavored to overcome this difficulty by the argument that at the decease of William Simons senior, there was a mutual agreement among all his children, that no administration should be taken on his estate, that the property should remain undivided, and that the newspaper should continue to be published for the joint benefit of all the children, and that this constituted William Simons junior a trustee for the others, and so his representatives are estopped to deny the title of the complainant, and this court will decree the execution of the trust. This ground requires a careful examination. It must be observed that the bill asserts the title of William senior, and claims that his children, at his decease, became entitled to this property; that it was then in the possession of William junior, and ostensibly his; that the effect of the agreement with him was, to allow the property to continue in his possession, as if he were its owner, instead of going into the hands of an administrator. If it were true that the children of William senior, at his decease, became justly entitled to this property, and that only some legal formality was necessary to clothe them effectually with the title, a mutual agreement to dispense with that formality would be enforced, and a court of equity would not allow a party to the agreement, in possession by virtue of it, to set up the want of that legal formality as a bar. His conscience would be bound by the agreement, and the title would be treated substantially as it would have been treated if the legal formality had been complied with. But these complainants do not show themselves justly entitled to any particular part of this property. As has already been stated, the title of a distributee, under the laws of Rhode Island, is only to such surplus as shall remain after the payment of all just debts and charges.

Creditors have the first and best right to the whole extent of their just debts; non constat, therefore, that either of the parties to this agreement would be justly entitled to any thing from this estate, if it had gone into the hands of an administrator; and to hold that the agreement should itself make a title, would put the complainants in a very different situation from what they would have been in if administration had been taken; for it would enable them to call for an account of the property, and take one fifth of the whole to their own use, when they were equitably entitled only to one fifth of what might remain after paying all just debts and charges. It is clear, also, that the whole of this property, if it belonged to William Simons senior, now stands charged with his debts. The statute of Rhode Island, concerning the settlement of intestate estates, (Pub. Laws, p. 239, § 2,) contains an express provision: "When any person shall die possessed of any chattels, or personal estate, the same shall stand chargeable with the payment of all the just debts and funeral charges of the deceased, and the expenses of settling his estate." This charge is one which the agreement among the children, now in question, cannot in any way affect. And I apprehend it is not consistent with the principles upon which a court of equity proceeds, to decree an account among distributees of the property of the deceased, before an administrator has been appointed to represent creditors, when the bill shows that the deceased was indebted, and by law the property is charged with those debts, whatever agreement the distributees may have made among themselves. I am not aware that such a bill was ever maintained, and the reasons against it are very strong. In the first place, the distributees have no right whatever to intermeddle with the personal property of the deceased, for any other purpose than to do such acts as may be necessary to preserve it, until an administrator can be appointed. Any other acts of control, by any person, constitute him an executor de son tort, and subject him, as a penalty, to the payment of the debts of the deceased. When, therefore, this bill shows that the children of William Simons senior, instead of subjecting this property to the payment of his just debts, in a due course of administration, made an agreement that no administration should be taken, that they would wholly disregard the rights of creditors, and treat the property as their own, it shows an agreement which a court of equity cannot enforce. It is not based on any equitable right of the parties; it is a violation of the common law; it tends to defraud creditors; it is plainly forbidden by public policy; and is inconsistent with that system of statute law providing for the just and orderly settlement of intestate estates, which has been enacted by the legislature.

It is said by Lord Redesdale, (Eq. Pl. 164,) that "it is the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit, to make the performance of the order of the court perfectly safe to those who are compelled to obey it, and to prevent future litigation." From this principle most of the rules, concerning parties to suits in equity, spring; and it imperatively demands that an administrator of William Simons senior, as the representative of his creditors, should be a party to this bill. The property in question stands charged with all his just debts. An account and distribution which should disregard this charge would scatter the property into different hands, and thus endanger the rights of creditors, and render it more difficult to enforce them; it would increase litigation; it would take from the possession of William junior's representatives four fifths of the property, without rendering it safe, as against the creditors of William senior, for them to part with that possession; and it would give to each of the children one fifth of the whole property, when their only equitable claim is to one fifth of what may remain after payment of all just debts.

It is urged that it does not appear there are any just debts due from the estate of William senior. But the bill shows that for many years before his death he was greatly embarrassed by debts; that this property was originally placed in the name of his son, "for the sole and only purpose of enabling him to carry on and conduct the business of said establishment, and to publish the said Herald without being subjected to legal process, arising from any liabilities to which he then was, or might become liable, as former partner of the greatly insolvent firm of Jones & Simons;" and no reason, other than his apprehension of legal process by creditors, is suggested, why the property was continued and the business transacted in the name of William Simons junior, down to the time of his father's decease. Upon these allegations in the bill, it is impossible for the court to assume there are no creditors to be protected. It is true no one of them has taken administration. But this may be because they are ignorant that William senior owned any property, or because they have become satisfied that this property justly belonged to William junior, and that any attempt to disturb his title would be fruitless, or for other reasons, which do not appear. The court cannot, in their absence, act as if they had no rights, or, in face of every reasonable presumption, presume they do not exist.

The complainants' counsel also relies on an agreement, made on the first day of February, 1840, between Aaron Simons and Charles F. Tillinghast, as the administrator of William Simons junior, as dispensing with the necessity of making an administrator of William senior a party. But I find nothing in that agreement which can affect the title of any party to this property. Its purpose was to provide temporarily for the custody and management of the property until the title could be settled, and not to create any new title, or waive any objection to the claims asserted by either party, and I find no language in the instrument inconsistent with this leading purpose, or which can properly aid the complainants in making out their case. There is, however, one mode in which the complainants may place themselves in a position to obtain whatever may be their just rights in this property. Mr. Allen, in right of his wife, can apply for, and I presume obtain, letters of administration on the estate of William Simons senior, and, by a supplemental bill, bring before the court this new title, with proper prayers for relief. I am disposed to grant leave to file such supplemental bill, because I think it just that the expense already incurred in this cause should not be fruitless, and because the evidence already in the cause has been taken by and between the same persons, and upon the same contested facts and in support and denial of the same titles which will be then before the court. But to prevent misapprehension it is necessary for me to state, that I have not thought it proper, in the absence of a necessary party, to examine the merits of this controversy, nor to ascertain whether, if the property was held by William Simons junior, upon a secret trust, it was a trust created for the purpose of defrauding or delaying creditors. In determining whether to take administration, and file a supplemental bill, the complainants must be governed by their own views, and those of their legal advisers, and not by the assumption that the court has formed any opinion respecting the trust asserted in the bill.

[1 Blatchf. 567; 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 388.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1850.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INFRINGEMENT — INJUNCTION — ORIGINALITY — PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. The re-issued patent to Ethan Allen of the third of August, 1844, for an "improvement in the method of constructing locks for fire-arms," is for the same invention as that described in his original patent of November 11th, 1837.

2. Where, on a motion for a provisional injunction in a patent suit, the originality of the invention was strongly denied by affidavit, and it appeared there had been three trials at law on the question of the originality, in the first of which the jury found against the patent, in the second did not agree, and in the third found in its favor, this court suspended a decision on the motion, and ordered the case to be tried by a jury, directing an account to be kept by the defendant in the meantime, and to be reported monthly under oath to the clerk.

3. The question of infringement was also ordered to be tried by the same jury.

In equity. This was a suit in equity [by Ethan Allen] for the infringement of letters patent. [No. 461. See note at end of case.] The bill prayed for an injunction, an account, &c. The patent was for an "improvement in the method of constructing locks for fire-arms," and was originally granted to the plaintiff on the 11th of November, 1837. It was re-issued on an amended specification on the 3d of August, 1844. The plaintiff now moved for a provisional injunction. The opinion of the court states the points involved in the motion.

Francis B. Cutting, for plaintiff.

Seth P. Staples, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. 1: We hold that the patent granted to the plaintiff on the 3d of August, 1844, upon his amended specification, is for the same invention as that described in the patent of the 11th of November, 1837; and that the objection taken that the commissioner of patents had no authority to accept the surrender, and to re-issue the patent, is not well founded.

2. The originality of the improvement is denied, and the denial supported by several affidavits, going to show that it had been known and in public use before the discovery by the plaintiff. There have been, it seems, three trials at law upon this question — one in this circuit in April, 1843; and two in the first circuit, one in May, 1845, and the other in June, 1846. The trial in this circuit was on an issue out of chancery; and one of the questions was, whether the plaintiff was the original inventor of the improvement as set forth in his patent. That trial was under the patent of November 11th, 1837. The jury found for the defendants. In respect to the trials in the first circuit,

it appears that in the first one the jury did not agree, and in the second the verdict was for the plaintiff. Those two trials were under the patent of August 3d, 1844. As the case stands, therefore, we can hardly regard the question as settled at law. There is a verdict in favor of each party, and a divided jury on a third trial. It is true the trial in this circuit was under the first patent, which has since been surrendered. But, both the old and the new patent are for the same improvement, as clearly appears on comparing the two specifications, the only defect in the first being in the claim; and it does not appear that the cause turned upon this defect. The nisi prius record is before us, and from that it would appear, that there was a very full trial upon both issues presented. Some sixteen witnesses were examined, and two days were consumed in the examination and the arguments of counsel. If the case turned upon a technical objection, not involving the merits, that should have been made to appear on this motion. Upon the whole, considering the result of the trials heretofore had on this patent, and the strong denial, in the affidavits before us, of the originality of the invention, we feel bound to send it to another jury, and to suspend the decision on this motion, directing an account of the manufacture and sales of the locks by the defendants to be kept in the meantime, and to be reported monthly under oath to the clerk.

3. An issue will also be made up and presented for trial before the jury, on the question of infringement in the manufacture of the defendants' locks. We might not have directed this issue if that question were the only one contested on this motion; but as it is a mixed question of law and fact, and the case is to be sent to a trial at law, it is proper that it should form one of the issues.

[NOTE. Patent No. 461, for gun locks, was granted November 11, 1837, to Ethan Allen; reissued (No. 60) January 15, 1844. For other cases involving this patent and reissue, see Allen v. Blunt, Case No. 215; Id. 217.]

But THE COURT said that if a decree is to be final by a certain day in the next term, unless, &c., and cause be shown after the day during the term and before any other order is made, it is well. The answer, however, not being sufficient, the decree was made final.

JUDGMENTS—OPERATION AND EFFECT—DECREE IN ADMIRALTY—RES JUDICATA.

1. In a suit, instituted by the United States in the district court, upon a bond given by the owners and master of an American vessel, under the seventh section of the act of 31st December 1792, conditioned for the proper use and delivery up of the certificate of registry granted to such vessel under that act, the breach relied upon was, that subsequently to the granting of such certificate, the vessel was sold to a foreigner, at Havana, but that the obligors in the bond did not deliver up said certificate of registry, as required by the act of 1792. The defendants, in rebuttal, offered in evidence the record of a proceeding in rem, instituted by the United States against the vessel, in the district court for the southern district of New York, in which her condemnation was sought, for a violation of the acts of congress in relation to the slave-trade; by this record it appeared that the libel was dismissed, upon the ground, "that it appeared that the said vessel, when arrested, was not employed, or made use of, as a vessel of the United States, in transporting or carrying slaves from one foreign country or place to another, within the meaning or intent of the act of congress of May 10, 1800;" and she was accordingly ordered to be delivered up to the claimant, who, by the record, appeared to be a citizen of the United States, residing at Havana.

2. This record was excluded by the district court, as inadmissible in the suit upon the bond: held. 1. That the record of the suit in rem, if admissible at all, for the purposes for which it was offered, must be conclusive; the act of assembly of Maryland of 1813, c. 164, restricts only the conclusive effect of sentences in rem of foreign tribunals, and its application must be confined to them. 2. The record was properly excluded by the district court; the doctrine, that sentences of this kind are evidence against all the world, and binding, even upon those who are not parties, has been confined to civil cases, and even in them it is confined to those parties who have a direct or incidental interest in the suit; it has never been applied to criminal proceedings, or to suits for the recovery of penalties. The present suit, though a civil one in form, sounding in contract, is, in substance, an action for the recovery of a penalty, and has no connection with the proceeding in the admiralty.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

[At law. Action of debt by the United States against Robert W. Allen, John Henderson, and James Swedge on a bond. Judgment in district court for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.]

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This case is brought here by writ of error from the district court. It appears by the record, that an action of debt was brought in the district court, by the United States against the plaintiffs in error, upon a bond for $1200, dated 20 May 1839, given by them, under the act of December 31, 1792, § 7, for the proper use and delivery up of the certificate of the registry of the schooner Catharine, built in Baltimore in the year 1839, of which Robert W. Allen and John Henderson were the only owners, and James Swedge was, at that time, master. The defendants pleaded, by consent, nil debent, upon which issue was joined, with leave to either party to give the special matter in evidence. The breach relied on at the trial, in behalf of the United States, was, that after this certificate of registry was given, the vessel was sold at Havana, in the Island of Cuba, and was there purchased by a foreigner; that the master afterwards returned to the United States, in June or July 1839, but that the certificate of registry had not been delivered up, according to the directions of the act of congress. The suit was instituted on the bond, on the 12th October 1839, and the case was tried in the district court, at March Term, 1840. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff for the penalty of the bond, and the judgment entered accordingly.

The defendants, in the district court, in order to rebut the evidence offered by the United States, and to show that the Catharine was not purchased, at Havana, by a foreigner, offered in evidence the record of a proceeding in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York; by which it appeared, that an information had been filed in that court, on the 30th of December 1839, against the Catharine, and her condemnation prayed for by the district attorney of the United States, for a violation of the acts of congress in relation to the slave-trade. The libel charged various offenses under the act of 22 March 1794, and it also charged that the said vessel, being wholly or in part the property of citizens of the United States, or of persons residing in the United States, was, on or about the 1st July 1839, employed by some person residing in the United States, in the transportation and carrying of slaves from some foreign country or place, to some other foreign country or place, contrary to the act of congress of 10 May 1800, which subjects vessels so employed to forfeiture. To this libel an answer was put in, on the 27th March 1840, by Charles Ting, a citizen of the United States, residing at Havana, claiming the Catharine as his property, under a transaction at Havana, with the agent of the American owners, which he particularly details; and denying that the vessel, at the time of her arrest on the high seas (which he states to have been on the 8th of August 1839, after he had become the owner), was engaged in the transportation of slaves, as charged in the libel. The case was submitted to the court upon this libel and claim, and after hearing counsel on both sides, the court adjudged "that it appearing that the said vessel, when arrested, was not employed or made use of as a vessel of the United States, in transporting or carrying slaves from one foreign country or place to another, within the meaning and intent of the act of congress of 10 May 1800," it was therefore ordered, that the libel be dismissed, and that the vessel be discharged from arrest and delivered to the claimant.

The counsel for the United States objected to the admission of this record in evidence, and the objection was sustained by the court; whereupon the defendants in the court below excepted, and have brought the case to this court by writ of error; and the only question presented here is, whether the district court erred in refusing to admit this record, or any part of it, in evidence. The counsel for the plaintiffs in error contend, that the proceeding in the district court of New York, being a proceeding in rem, the sentence of the court is evidence of the matters decided by it, when the same points arise in other courts; that the court expressly grounds its sentence upon the fact, that the vessel, at the time of her arrest, was not employed in the slave-trade, as a vessel of the United States; and that the sentence, therefore, decides her national character, as well as the nature of her employment. And it is insisted on the part of the plaintiffs in error, that this sentence is admissible, for the purpose of rebutting the evidence offered on the part of the United States; and in order to show that the Catharine had not been sold to a foreigner, at Havana, before she sailed on the voyage in which she was arrested, but was the property of the claimant, Charles Ting.

It is proper here to remark, that if this evidence is admissible at all, to prove the facts above mentioned, it must be conclusive. This principle has been settled by repeated decisions in the supreme court, as the general rule of law in relation to sentences of this description; and the act of assembly of Maryland of 1813, c. 164, (if it could, upon any ground, affect the rule, where two courts of the United States are concerned), is confined to the sentences of foreign tribunals, and restricts their conclusive effect, but does not propose to change the law in relation to the decisions of our domestic courts. Now, the sentence relied on, as conclusive evidence, to show that the Catharine, when arrested, still retained her American character, is a sentence of acquittal. But yet it is evident, that a sentence of condemnation would have implied her American character far more strongly than a sentence of acquittal; for although it was certainly necessary, in order to condemn her, that the court should have been satisfied that she was owned by an American citizen, or by some person residing in the United States, yet it was by no means necessary to establish such ownership to entitle her to acquittal; and the argument on the part of the plaintiffs in error, if successful, would prove that the sentence of the district court of New York, whether it condemned or acquitted the vessel, necessarily involved and decided her national character, and showed it to be American. There must obviously be some fallacy in an argument which would lead to this result, and which would show that upon such a libel, and such a claim, the sentence of the court (no matter whether it was given the one way or the other) established conclusively, against all the world, that she was a vessel of the United States, so as to preclude inquiry upon that subject in any other court. But the court thinks it very clear, upon the face of the proceedings and sentence, that the court of New York did not acquit the Catharine, because it was satisfied that she was an American vessel; but because, in the judgment of the court, she was not engaged in the transportation of slaves. Indeed, from the language of the sentence, it might, perhaps, be inferred that she was acquitted upon the ground that she was not an American vessel. The language of the sentence is, that she was not employed, or made use of, "as a vessel of the United States," in the transportation of slaves; and this language may be understood to imply that she was made use of for that purpose, but not as a vessel of the United States. The court may have been of opinion that, under the transaction stated by Ting, she had lost her American character, and become Spanish property, and therefore, not liable in our tribunals on account of her employment in the slave-trade. But whether the acquittal was upon the ground that she was not a vessel of the United States, or was not engaged in the slave-trade; yet, if she was not liable to condemnation, she would, of course, be delivered up to Ting, as no other claimant appeared before the court; and it appeared that the vessel, when arrested, was in his possession, and under his control and direction, either as owner or as agent for the owners. The sentence of acquittal, and the delivery to Ting, do not, therefore, affirm the property to be in him, nor the vessel to be American.

But, if the American character of the vessel was necessarily involved in, and expressly affirmed by, the decision, yet, it could not have been received as evidence in the case before the court. The doctrine that judgments of this description are evidence against all the world, and are binding even upon those who were not parties to them, has always been confined to civil cases; and in civil cases, the rule is not universal, but is confined to those who have a direct or incidental interest in the condemnation or acquittal of the vessel libelled, and who may, therefore, if they choose, make themselves parties. In the case of The Mary, 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 144, the supreme court (speaking of such sentences) have said: "they bind the subject-matter, as between parties and privies;" and this, it seems, upon principle, must be the true application of the rule in civil suits. But the rule has never been applied to criminal proceedings, nor to suits for penalties; and it has been decided by this court, in the case of U. S. v. Montell, [Case No. 15,798,] that a suit upon a bond of this kind, though in form, a civil suit and sounding in contract, is yet, in substance and reality, a suit for a penalty inflicted for an offense against the law; for which penalty surety is taken in advance from those whose misconduct may render them liable to punishment. In the case of The Mary, above referred to, the sentence of the court of admiralty would not have been conclusive in a civil case, except between parties and privies to the suit against the vessel. But the case before the court is a suit to recover a penalty against the plaintiffs in error; and if the sentence of the district court of New York had declared that the Catharine, at the time of the arrest, was a Spanish vessel, owned by a subject of the queen of Spain, and therefore, not liable to condemnation under our laws, though actually engaged in the transportation of slaves; would any one suppose that such a sentence would have been conclusive upon the plaintiffs in error, and have compelled them to pay this bond, without an opportunity of proving that the vessel had never been sold to any one after she had obtained her certificate of registry? Such a proposition would hardly be seriously pressed upon the court, yet the rule must be reciprocal; and if the present sentence (supposing it to be a direct affirmation of American ownership) would conclude the United States upon that point, a contrary affirmation would be equally conclusive upon the obligors in the bond. But the suit on the bond has no connection whatever with the proceedings in admiralty, in the district court of New York; nor is the matter in controversy here, in any respect, connected with, or dependent upon, those proceedings. It is a suit for a penalty, and the United States must, by testimony adduced here, prove that the penalty has been incurred; the parties charged have, undoubtedly, the right to adduce testimony, and to be heard in their defence; and are not and cannot be concluded by any decision made elsewhere, to which they were not parties, and in the issue of which they had no interest. The decision of the district court of New York, upon a proceeding against the vessel, for a violation of the law in relation to the slave-trade, cannot be evidence in a suit between different parties, brought to recover a penalty inflicted by a different act of congress, for the misconduct of the master in not delivering up her certificate of registry, as required by law. The judgment in this case must, therefore, be affirmed.

ALLEN v. WHITTEMORE.

[8 Ben. 485; 14 N. B. R. 189.]

District Court, D. Vermont. June, 1876.

RESIDENCE OF BANKRUPT—BILL OF SALE RECORDED UNDER STATE LAW.

1. Where a bill of sale of certain property was recorded in the clerk's office in the town where the purchaser, at the time, represented that he resided, according to the law of the state of Vermont, and the purchaser became bankrupt before the conditions of the bill of sale were fulfilled:

Held, That the assignee of the bankrupt cannot set up, as against the holder of the bill of sale, that the bankrupt actually resided in another town, where the bill of sale was not recorded, and therefore the condition is void.

2. That the property having been sold, and the proceeds collected by the assignee, he must pay the balance remaining due on the bill of sale.

[In bankruptcy. Action by Alonzo W. Allen against A. G. Whittemore, assignee, to enforce the collection of a promissory note secured by a conditional bill of sale.]

SMALLEY, District Judge. In this case it appears that J. E. Came & Co. were manufacturers and vendors of billiard tables in the city of Boston, and commonwealth of Massachusetts; and on the 31st day of July, 1873, sold to Adoniram Austin, who set himself up as of Burlington, in the state of Vermont, five billiard tables and their appurtenances, and conveyed them to him by bill of sale thereof dated Boston, July 31, 1873, conditioned that said Austin pay the said Came & Co., or their assigns, five promissory notes, therefor, amounting in all to one thousand and seventy dollars and ten cents. The bill of sale states that Austin lives in Burlington, and that said Austin stipulated that he would keep said billiard tables insured at his own expense and the policy be made payable to said Came & Co. or their assigns, in case of loss. Said bill of sale, with the conditions thereon, was duly recorded in the city clerk's office, in the city of Burlington, on the 3d day of September, 1873. All said notes were paid except the last one; the last one became payable and remained unpaid, and said Came & Co. sold and transferred the same with all their title to the property to the said A. W. Allen, the petitioner. The said Allen then demanded payment thereof or the property, which said Austin refused to make or to deliver the property. Soon after said Austin went into bankruptcy and said Whittemore was duly appointed his assignee. Said Allen then demanded of said Whittemore the amount due on the note or the said property, which Whittemore wholly refused, alleging that said Austin lived in the town of Colchester and not in the city of Burlington, and according to the statute of the state of Vermont passed at the session of 1872 (Laws Vt. 1872, p. 90,) the bill of sale not being recorded in the town of Colchester, according to said Act, the condition was void and the property became absolutely said Austin's. But the court holds, that inasmuch as said Austin represented himself to reside in the city of Burlington, he could not take advantage of his own fraud, and thus deprive the said Came & Co. or their assigns of the title to said property, as at common law the property remained theirs until all the conditions were complied with and the notes fully paid. And it appears that the said Whittemore had sold the said tables and collected the money therefor. It is ordered that the said Whittemore, as assignee, pay the said Allen the amount now due on the said last named note, and the costs of this proceeding; and it be referred to B. B. Smalley, as Master, to ascertain and report to this court the amount thereof.

MARSHALING OF ASSETS—SUBROGATION.

Where an annuity left by will is charged "on real and personal estate," and legacies are also given, but are not charged on any special fund; equity will, as against heirs who are not at the same time devisees, order the annuity to be paid out of personalty, if there be personalty enough to pay both annuities and legacies; or if there be not enough to pay both, and the annuity has been already paid out of personalty, will subrogate the legatees to the annuitant: Aliter, as is said, though not decided, if the parties claiming the realty are devisees, and if the personalty has been exhausted by creditors.

In equity. Allen, by his will, ordered that "first and foremost there be secured to my dear wife" on my real and personal estate, an annuity "of $1,200 a year, to be punctually paid semiannually during her lifetime, and that my executors pay all taxes on the premises occupied by my wife during her lifetime." Then followed numerous legacies to individuals, to corporations, and for pious uses, exceeding in amount the whole personal estate, but not charged, like the annuity, on the realty. The will made no disposition of the realty, and consequently it descended to the heirs, the present complainants. There was enough of personal property, and enough of realty, to answer the annuity, independently of each other. And the questions now before the court were whether the annuity should be paid out of personalty exclusively, or out of realty exclusively, or if out of both jointly, in what proportion, and out of what fund the "taxes" should be paid?

GRIER, Circuit Justice. This annuity being the first and only charge on the whole estate, real and personal, the widow may have it satisfied out of either or both, at her election. But if paid in the first place out of the personalty, will not equity so marshal the assets as to substitute the legatee's to the annuitant's security on the realty?—or, what would amount to the same thing, order that the annuity be paid in the first place from the rents and profits of the realty? We must observe that the complainants claim as heirs, not as devisees; they are not objects of the testator's bounty. In such a case if a creditor, by bond or covenant having a right to satisfaction out of both, be paid out of the personal assets, so as to leave nothing to satisfy the general legacies, equity will not marshal the assets and pay the legacy out of the land devised; nor even, it is said, against a residuary devisee of realty. But the heir is not so favored. As against him the court will so marshal the assets, that the general legatee shall be substituted to the right of bond debtors against the realty, to the extent to which the personal fund has been diminished, by his election of his satisfaction out of it. It is settled, also, that where one legacy is charged both on realty and personalty, and the others are not, if the personal estate be insufficient to pay all the legacies, a court of equity will marshal the assets; and if the legacies charged on the real estate are paid out of the personalty, it will substitute the legacies not so charged to that amount, as against the realty. The courts also have in some instances compelled legatees whose legacies were charged on real estate, to resort to this estate for payment. Ram, Assets, c. 28, § 3, and cases cited. These principles dispose of the case. As against heirs (the complainants in this case), the general legatees have a right to require that the annuity be satisfied out of the rents, or by sale of the realty, and so far as the personalty has been applied to the payment of this annuity, they have a right to be substituted against the realty. The taxes which the executors are ordered to pay for the widow are not made a charge on the realty, and must therefore be charged to the account of the personalty. Decree accordingly.

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri, 1874.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—MISLOCATION OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—ESTOPPED.

The town of Cameron was duly incorporated, but if it were not, the town having, as a corporation, voted and issued the bonds, it would be estopped in favor of a bona fide holder thereof for value to set up that it was not incorporated.

[Cited in Hill v. City of Kahoka, 35 Fed. 35.]

[At law. Action by H. M. Allen against the town of Cameron. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Action on negotiable coupons originally attached to bonds issued by the town of Cameron under the corporate seal thereof to the Chicago & Southwestern Railroad Co. or bearer, upon a vote of the people of the town. It appeared on the trial that the town of Cameron was platted on part of section 23, and the plat was so recorded. In 1867, the people living on the ground thus platted presented, under the statutes of Missouri, a petition to the county court to be incorporated as a town, and their prayer was granted; but the order of the county court in incorporating "the town of Cameron," by mistake described it as in section 24, instead of section 23. Section 24 is a farm owned by Mr. Shirts. The town has grown to have 2,000 people; and ever since its incorporation it has maintained a municipal organization, and as such voted, and in February, 1871, issued the bonds in suit. It defended against the bonds, on the ground that it was not incorporated, or rather upon the ground that the legal corporation was in section 24, and that it—i. e., the corporation de jure—did not issue the bonds. There had never been any municipal organization in section 24.

Mr. Merryman and Mr. Hall, for plaintiff.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This is certainly a novel case, but we are of the opinion that the defense to the coupons in suit must fail—

1. Because, taking the petition for the incorporation of the town of Cameron in connection with the plat of the town to which it refers, and which correctly describes the location of the town, and the law which authorizes the incorporation of a town, and not of a farm upon which there is no population, the order of the county court should be construed to refer to the town, which was well known by its designation as the town of Cameron, and not to the land upon which there was no population. In other words, as either the congressional description or the reference to the town is erroneous, the court, to effectuate the intention of the petitioners and the county court, and to prevent the mischief which would result from holding invalid all that has been done by the corporation since 1867, should reject as false the congressional description, and adopt the boundaries as given in the plat to which the petition referred—this being the construction which has ever since been put by the people of the town upon the action of the county court, and the construction declared to be correct by the county court in its subsequent order in 1872, correcting the record of its action in 1867.

2. We think, also, that the town, having ever since acted under this incorporation, and as such voted and issued the bonds in suit, by its officers and under its seal, it is estopped in favor of the plaintiff, or holder for value, to set up that it is not a corporation, and that the true corporation is upon the farm of Mr. Shirts, in section 24. Judgment for plaintiff.

PRIZE—SALE OF PROPERTY PENDING HEARING.

Motion founded on the report of the prize commissioner for an order to sell the cargo, pending the hearing, denied, the proposed sale being earnestly opposed by the claimants, and there being a strong preponderance in the number of witnesses against the necessity of the sale, and the report not being founded on the personal inspection and judgment of the commissioner.

[In admiralty. Heard on motion for an order to sell the cargo, pending a hearing on the merits. Motion denied.]

BETTS, District Judge. In this suit, application was made to the court, on written notice to the proctor for the claimants, and on the report of the prize commissioners recommending such order, for an interlocutory order directing a sale of the cargo above mentioned, or for such other or further order as to the court may seem just and proper. The motion was further supported by affidavits made by Edward W. Blackwell, a gauger of spirits of turpentine, John Camerden, a merchant and wholesale dealer in resin, turpentine, and other naval stores, and Benjamin Bateman, a broker in turpentine, resin, and other naval stores, who all testify that the condition of the cargo and the state of the market are such as to render an immediate sale of this property needful and proper. In reply to these representations, the claimants file affidavits of Charles W. Blossom, William H. Kerr, Call J. Turner, F. A. Blossom, James B. Barney, and John Van Alen, merchants, and others, of this port, conversant with this property, who dissent directly and pointedly from the opinion and statements in favor of the libellants, and assert that the property is not in a condition demanding an immediate sale, and that a sale at this period of the year will be prejudicial to the interests of all concerned in the cargo.

The vessel and cargo were brought into port on the 13th of May last, and no reason is assigned for not previously proceeding to trial and decision in the suit.

Considering, therefore, that the proposed sale is opposed earnestly by the claimants of the property, and by a strong preponderance in the number of witnesses on the question of its necessity, and that there remains no cause, on the evidence for extraordinary dispatch in making such sale previous to the regular condemnation of the property, I shall decline granting the interlocutory decree called for.

The report of the commissioners, when founded upon their personal inspection and judgment in respect to the propriety of the measure, will generally be conclusive with the court.

That I shall be inclined to regard as meant by the act to guide the discretion of the court. But when the decree asked for rests upon "other evidence" than the official finding of facts by the report itself, I must be governed by the evidence conflicting with it, when that has a reasonable preponderance. Motion denied.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—CONTRABAND
GOODS—MILITARY EQUIPMENTS.

1. Vessel and cargo seized in the harbor of Beaufort, N. C., on its capture; condemned for these reasons: 1. For violating the blockade in entering Beaufort. 2. For taking on board there an enemy clearance and a cargo with intent to evade the blockade in coming out, and attempting to come out. 3. For carrying into Beaufort a large supply of military equipments.

[Cited in The Gondar, Case No. 5,526.]

2. The illegality of sailing under an enemy license is legal cause for the forfeiture of a neutral vessel.

[In admiralty. The decree in this case was afterwards reversed by the circuit court. See The Gondar, Case No. 5,528.]

BETTS, District Judge. The vessel and cargo seized in this case were libelled May 17, 1862. A claim in the name of the registered owners, with a test oath made thereto, was filed on the 17th of June thereafter. The defence set up in the claim is an alleged neutral ownership of the vessel and cargo by the claimants, and a denial that the seizure was a lawful capture.

The facts gathered from the ship's papers and the preparatory proofs show that the vessel was of an American build, and was conveyed to and registered in the names of the claimants, British subjects, at Liverpool, February 11, 1861. The vendors to the British owners were Ferguson & Co., a mercantile firm resident in Charleston, S. C., and the vessel had, previous to this sale, been employed by that house in trade to and from Charleston at different periods. One of the members of the firm of Forbes & Co. was also a member of the firm in Liverpool, who acted as agents of the house in Charleston in making the transfer of the vessel to the claimants, and the claimants had been previously clerks in the employ of the vendors; but the sale of the vessel preceded the existing war so long a time as not to expose it per se to the presumption claimed by the libellants, that it was made colorably, and in fraud of the belligerent rights of the United States.

The voyage on which the Alliance was seized commenced at St. John, New Brunswick, in August, 1861. Her destination was first to Beaufort, North Carolina, and thence to Liverpool, England. The vessel arrived at Beaufort, laden with a miscellaneous cargo, consisting of quantities of tins, various denominations of iron, mackerel, castor oil, two trunks of percussion caps, (about 200,000,) fish, quicksilver, &c., entered that port, and discharged there in the latter part of August, 1861. She took on board a cargo of cotton, turpentine, and other produce of the country, in return, destined for Liverpool, to the owners of the vessel. The master testifies that nothing contraband was on board on the voyage. The vessel cleared at Beaufort, for Liverpool, in September, 1861, but was arrested before her departure. A person from Nassau joined the ship at St. John, as supercargo, and delivered and disposed of the cargo at Beaufort, and did not rejoin the vessel afterwards. The master says that he believed that the cargo taken on board at Beaufort was destined for the owners of the ship, and would have been their property on its arrival at Liverpool. The ship was seized May 2, 1862, in the harbor of Beaufort, North Carolina, by the United States naval forces, after the capture of the place by the army of the United States. The master knew of the war when he sailed for Beaufort, and that Charleston and the southern coast was under blockade. He says he did not know, until the 6th or 7th of September thereafter, that Beaufort was blockaded. The cargo was taken on board at Beaufort, for Liverpool, on the 14th of September, and the vessel took on board, during the same month, at Beaufort, a clearance, export certificates, and a bill of health, from the authority of the secession government, and was moored in that port, ready to sail, and having attempted to do so, and being detained only by the weather or the blockading squadron. On the 27th of May, 1861, a boarding officer of the United States, off Charleston harbor, had indorsed a warning on the ship's papers, that the port of Charleston was under blockade, and the notice, it is testified, might have included all the ports of the southern states. The notice was left in England.

Various facts transpire on the proofs unmistakably condemnatory of the vessel and cargo. First. Prior to this voyage, she had been warned and turned away from the port of Charleston, May 27, 1861, by a United States ship-of-war. The warning was indorsed on her papers and entered in her log, and gave her notice that the coast south of Maryland was under blockade. Second. Notwithstanding such notice, she entered the port of Beaufort, North Carolina, on the 22d of August, 1861, on a pretended voyage from St. John, New Brunswick, to Havana, with a quantity of articles contraband of war on board. Third. She was reladen, at Beaufort, with a full cargo of the produce of that section of the country, and attempted, unsuccessfully, to get out of port with such cargo; and when she was afterwards captured there, she had on board a letter from the British consul at Charleston, dated September 11, 1861, to the British secretary of foreign affairs, apprising that officer that the vessel and cargo were destined to Liverpool, England, and also enemy documents authenticating her right to leave the port, &c. The illegality of sailing under an enemy license is legal cause for the forfeiture of a neutral vessel. The Julia, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 181; The Ariadne, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 143, and notes in Appendix.

The violation of the blockade of Beaufort, in entering that port, the taking on board therein an enemy clearance and a cargo, with intent therewith to evade the blockade, and the attempting to carry that design into execution, with the higher and more injurious act of positive hostility against the government of the United States, in carrying into port a large supply of military equipments, afford abundant grounds for the condemnation of the vessel and cargo as prize of war, without adverting to various other facts disclosed in the evidence.

¹ NELSON, Circuit Justice. The Alliance was captured on the 2d of May, 1862, while at anchor at the dock of Morehead City, opposite Beaufort, North Carolina, by United States troops, and was subsequently delivered to Commander Lockwood. She is a vessel of over 600 tons burden, and was built in Portsmouth, Maine, some twelve or more years ago. She was owned by Razer and others, of Charleston, South Carolina, down to February, 1861, when she was purchased in Liverpool, by J. R. Armstrong and H. Gerard, British merchants of that city. S. De Forest, an American citizen, was master. He was appointed by the owner, at Liverpool, and then took possession of her. Her last voyage was from St. John's, N. B., to Beaufort, North Carolina. She left St. John's in August, 1861, with an assorted cargo, and arrived at Beaufort on the 22d of the same month. There were no blockading vessels at Beaufort when she entered, and none arrived until several days afterwards. Her cargo was there discharged, and another was put on board, consisting of resin, pitch, and spirits of turpentine. She had no arms or ammunition on board, on her voyage to Beaufort, nor any cargo contraband of war. She was laden with a full cargo about the 14th of September, and remained in port, awaiting the removal of the blockade, from that period until the 2d of May, 1862, when she was captured by the troops that took Fort Macon and the town of Beaufort. She was bound from Beaufort to Liverpool, with the cargo that was on board at the time of capture. The above is, I think, the fair weight of the proofs that are entitled to credit.

Some of the facts are sought to be impeached by the testimony of two of the seamen, Stevens and Thompson. One of them is an Italian, and unable to speak or understand English, and both of them were discharged from the Alliance while she was lying at Beaufort, one of them as early as February previous to the capture, and were not of the crew or on board of the vessel at the time of the capture. Why these witnesses were selected and examined in preparatorio, in place of some of the crew on board at the time of the capture, who were in number eleven, has not been explained. It was a great irregularity, which cannot be overlooked or disregarded in a consideration of the proofs. The examination should have been confined to persons on board at the time of the capture, unless upon special permission of the court first obtained.

I am satisfied, upon a very full consideration of the proofs, that there was no actual blockade of the port of Beaufort at the time of the entry therein of the Alliance; and, further, that no intention existed on the part of the master, after such entry, and the establishment of the blockade, to break it, and that no act was done by him with such intent, while the vessel remained in the harbor previous to her capture. I think, also, that the vessel belonged to British owners bona fide, and even before the breaking out of hostilities. But I am not entirely satisfied that the goods on board of the vessel at the time of capture were the property of British owners, as claimed. Upon this ground, I shall send the case for further proofs on this point, to be presented at the next term of this court; and as the claim of property in the vessel and the cargo is made in behalf of the same party, or one of the same parties, further proofs may be taken as to the proprietary interest in the vessel, as well as the cargo, by either or both of the parties to the suit.

In this case the brig was arrested, and in the custody of the marshal. Without notice to the libellant's proctor, the clerk, at the instance of the claimants, proceeded to nominate an appraiser; the notice of the appraisement was posted up, and the vessel appraised. The libellants thereupon moved to set aside the proceedings as irregular.

BY THE COURT. The rules in respect to the appraisement of the property under arrest all plainly contemplate a common action of the parties interested, or an opportunity to act together. The 61st rule permits proceedings instant for appraisement in suits by the United States in rem, if the district attorney and claimants are in presence of the court. In individual actions, either party may have an order entered of course for appraisal, or it may be done by mutual consent, and if the parties do not agree in writing upon the appraiser, the clerk shall name him, each party having a right to appeal instant. Rules 62-69. These regulations imply that both parties are made cognizant of the action taken for the discharge of the property arrested. Betts, Adm. Pr. 43. The 40th rule expressly directs notice to be given libellant's proctor of applications for delivering up property on stipulation which is under arrest. The proceedings in this case must therefore be regarded as irregular, and the appraisement be set aside.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was an action to recover damages occasioned to the schooner Jerry Fowler by a collision with the Morning Light, which occurred on August 5, 1855, just about day-break, near Martha's Vineyard. Both vessels had been going eastward through the night, the brig in the rear but gaining on the schooner, and both were on the starboard tack. The night was dark and rainy, and about 4 A. M. the Jerry Fowler undertook to tack, her master thinking her so near the Cutterhunk Shoals as to render it proper to change her course; and while tacking she was run into by the Morning Light. The libellant, having paid the loss to the owners of the schooner, now sues to recover it back. The testimony as to the darkness was conflicting.

Held by THE COURT, that the evidence shows a case of inevitable accident between the two vessels, or, if there was a fault, it was one common to both, arising from the obscurity of the weather and want of extreme vigilance on both vessels, and the uncertainty, from that cause, as to what was the proper course for either to pursue; that each party must therefore be left to bear his own loss.

Libel dismissed. Question of costs reserved.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for appellees.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The collision in this case occurred between the brig Morning Light and the schooner Jerry Fowler, on the morning of the 6th of August, 1855. Both vessels were going eastward, and were in Block Island channel, beating into Vineyard sound, the Fowler in advance; both had their starboard tacks on board, the wind easterly, about north by east. The vessels had been beating into the sound most of the night. Between three and four o'clock in the morning, the Fowler, having run out her tack, called all hands on deck to change her course. For this purpose her head was thrown into the wind, and while in that position, with sails aback, and under no headway, she was struck by the Morning Light on her starboard quarter, a little forward of the main rigging, and sunk. The night was dark and rainy, accompanied with fog, and the weight of the evidence pretty clear that the Fowler could not be seen, even with proper lookouts on the Morning Light, in time to have avoided the disaster. Both vessels appear to have been well manned, and navigated with accustomed care, and had proper lights. Of course, the hands on board the respective vessels, as usual, impute faults to each other, but each maintain the due and skillful navigation of their own vessel.

Mutual admissions of fault also are proved by witnesses from the respective vessels, to which we pay very little credit.

The state of the weather during the night and at the time of the collision is generally agreed by the witnesses on both vessels, though those on the Jerry Fowler attempt to modify somewhat the darkness. The second mate of the Fowler, Weston, says at 12 o'clock it was dark, foggy, and rainy, and at 1 o'clock fog cleared away; rain continued till 3 or 4 o'clock. When he called watch at 4 o'clock, he could see a good distance on the water,—three quarters of a mile, he supposes; could not fix the distance, but a good way off. The master, Lovejoy, says it had been raining the fore part of the night, but was partly cleared up at collision. The concurrent proof on the part of the witnesses from the Morning Light is, that the weather during the night was thick fog and raining; rain came in fog showers. The court below came to the conclusion that the disaster was the result of inevitable accident, and dismissed the libel. We concur in this conclusion.

Decree affirmed.

ADMIRALTY — PRACTICE — DELIVERING PROPERTY ON BAIL.—SUMMARY JUDGMENT ON BOND.

1. The district court, by virtue of its general admiralty jurisdiction, may deliver property on bail. Whether the security be taken by bond or stipulation is not material. On such security a summary judgment may be rendered.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The brig Alligator is libelled, 1. for that on the 15th of Feb. 1810, she sailed from Portsmouth in New-Hampshire, bound to a permitted port, to wit, St. Bartholomews in the West-Indies, without giving bonds pursuant to the 3d section of the act of 28th June, 1809, c. 9. There are other counts, which are not now material to consider. The claim admits the facts stated in the information; but denies, that the brig was originally bound to St. Bartholomews; and declares, that the voyage there was occasioned by inevitable necessity. From the depositions in the case it appears, that the vessel sailed from Portsmouth in New-Hampshire, on the 13th of Feb. 1810, with a clearance and ostensible destination to Norfolk in Virginia. The cargo was extremely well adapted, and is admitted to have had a contingent and ultimate destination for the West-India market. A few days after their departure, heavy gales came on, the brig was greatly strained, and finally disabled from pursuing her voyage; and the crew and captain determined for the preservation of their lives and property, to bear away for some port in the West-Indies, and accordingly arrived at Tobago, on the 14th of March, 1810, where she was examined and repaired in her upper works and bends; from thence she proceeded to St. Vincents, leaking very much during the passage; and here all the lumber was taken out and sold, and the vessel repaired. On the 28th of April, 1810, she sailed for St. Bartholomews, where the residue of her cargo was sold; and she returned from thence to Boston, about the 29th of May, 1810. It appears, that during the gales on the coast, some considerable part of the deck load was thrown overboard; and the vessel is stated to have been consigned to Moses Myers & Son of Norfolk. As in this case, the vessel proceeded to St. Bartholomews, which was a permitted port, the presumption is, that such was her original destination. The proof of the contrary, is necessarily thrown on the claimants, who are bound to make out a clear and decisive case of necessity. I admit, that if the original destination was not to the West-Indies, no subsequent irregularity of conduct can affect the brig under the 3d section of the act of 28th June, 1809, c. 9. But unless strong reasons appear to rebut it, the presumption of such original destination must remain. It will be recollected, that at the time of sailing from Portsmouth, the non-intercourse, as to Great Britain and her dependencies, was generally supposed to have been revived by the president's proclamation of the 9th of August, 1809. This accounts for the omission to give bond; for if the vessel had been really bound for a permitted port, and that only in the West Indies, there could have been no reason to withhold the bond required by law.

The case, as made out on the evidence, presents many improbabilities, and some omissions, which materially affect its purity. I will not say, that these are badges of fraud, but I will say, that they are badges of illegal destination.

1. In the first place, upon examining the log book, as has been stated by an intelligent witness, the brig appears, from the beginning of the voyage, to have held a course for the West-Indies, and not for Norfolk; although, from the winds stated, she might certainly have hugged the coast, and hauled more to the westward.

2. The brig, although in such a forlorn state and utter distress, run down the principal Caribbee islands; yet with her winds and course, she might have reached any of them.

3. No correspondence is produced with Messrs Myers, although in cases of consignments in this country, where the mails pass so rapidly, it is usual in transactions of real business.

4. No particulars of the injuries received by the vessel are given. No survey under the care of intelligent and disinterested men is produced from the West Indies; although this, in ordinary cases, is the invariable custom. Nor is the deficiency supplied by the testimony of respectable merchants at the ports of St. Vincents and Tobago.

5. The testimony comes altogether from interested sources, mingled with the strongest biases of personal interest; and under circumstances which render it impossible to testify with safety, but on one side. This in ordinary cases would throw a shadow over its current. Nevertheless, unless it were combined with evident improbabilities, I should not feel at liberty to act against the force of its uniform direction.

I cannot but notice also, although it does not govern my opinion, that the decision of the court below, connected this case with that of The Struggle, [Case No. 13,550,] as belonging to the same owners; and that, with a view to defeat that inference, the claimant has obtained leave to vary his claim in this court, and to show other owners. This is a very extraordinary occurrence; and though, so far as counsel are concerned, it has been explained to my entire satisfaction, the claimant himself does not seem so easily to be justified.

A careful examination would present farther grounds for doubt; but as these are peremptory in my mind, I affirm the decree of the district court with costs. Decree affirmed.

After the decree of condemnation in the district court was affirmed in the circuit court, the property having been delivered to the claimants by order of the district court, upon a bond being given to respond the appraised value, in case of final condemnation,—

G. Blake, attorney for the United States, moved for judgment on the bond, and for execution for the appraised value and costs, and founded his motion: 1. On the act 2 March, 1799, c. 128, § 89, (4 U. S. Laws 429, [1 Stat. 695.]) 2. On the general course of the admiralty in proceedings where the property had been delivered on bail.

S. Hubbard for the claimant objected, that the prosecution in this case was grounded on the act of 28th June, 1809, c. 9, [1 Stat. 550.] and therefore there was no foundation for the application under the 89th sect. of the act of 1799. And he further contended, that the court had no authority to deliver the property on bond in a case of this nature; and the circumstance, that statute provisions were made in certain specified cases, showed the non-existence of the authority in all others.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I understand, that in all proper cases of seizure, under whatever statute made, the invariable practice in the district court has been, to take bonds for the property, whenever application has been made by the claimant for this purpose. No doubt has hitherto existed, respecting the right of that court to take such bonds, or to grant judgment and award execution in the summary manner stated in the 89th sect. of the act of 1799, and now moved for on behalf of the United States. That practice I understand has been recognised and sanctioned by my predecessors in this court; and I should not now feel at liberty to disturb upon slight grounds a practice so well settled, whatever might be my own impressions as to its regularity. The practice has been of great public convenience, and to claimants in particular, it has been peculiarly beneficial. The present claimant made a voluntary application for a delivery of the property, and obtained it by an order of the court, upon giving a bond to respond the appraised value, according to a practice of the court, of which he could not be ignorant. The effect of that bond he well knew, and he admitted, by his own course of proceeding, that the court might apply its general practice in summary cases to the present. Whether there be any statute existing, which authorized the delivery on bond or not, is not in my judgment material. This cause was a civil cause, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and nothing can be better settled, than that the admiralty may take a fidejussory caution or stipulation in cases in rem, and may in a summary manner award judgment and execution thereon. The district court possessing this jurisdiction, and being fully authorized to adopt the process and modes of proceeding of the admiralty, (Respublica v. Lacaze, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 118. See, also, [Brymer v. Atkins,] 1 H. Bl. 164.) had an undoubted right to deliver the property on bail, and to enforce a conformity to the terms of the bailment. In what manner this security is taken, whether by a sealed instrument, or by a stipulation in the nature of a recognizance, cannot affect the jurisdiction of the court. Without doubt, unless a different rule were prescribed by statute, the best course would have been to take an admiralty stipulation. But a bond, even supposing it were void, as such, which is not admitted, might yet be good as a stipulation. In all cases of this nature, the security, whatever may be its form, is taken by order of court upon the voluntary application of the party, and therefore is apud acta. Having jurisdiction of the principal cause, the court must possess jurisdiction over all the incidents, and may by motion, attachment or execution, enforce its decrees against all who become parties to the proceedings. As the district judge concurs in this opinion, let judgment for the appraised value and costs be entered against the parties to the bond. See [Smart v. Wolff,] 3 Term R. 323; [King v. Perry,] 3 Salk. 23; [Brymer v. Atkins,] 1 H. Bl. 164; 2 Brown, Civil & Adm. Law, 96.

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1871.

STRUCTED.

1. Where the plaintiff, being a citizen of the states, brought ejectment in the usual form, in the state court, against the defendant, also a citizen of the state, who pleaded to the merits, and a third person, a citizen of another state, was, on his own application, made a co-defendant, but filed no plea; and both joined in a petition for the removal of the cause to the federal court, stating no facts in relation to the ownership of the land, or their relation to each other, and the court ordered the removal: Held, that the cause was improperly transferred; and the same was remanded.

[Cited in Case v. Douglas, Case No. 2,491.]

2. Whether the non-resident landlord may, in such case, where the title is in dispute, and the resident defendant is a mere tenant, have the cause removed on proper petition under the act of July 27, 1866, quere.

[Motion to remand cause to state court.
Motion sustained.]

Allin commenced in one of the courts in Missouri, and pursuant to the statutes of the state, an action of ejectment against Robinson. In form the action is possessory, the petition alleging that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property (which is described), and that the defendant wrongfully detains the same from him. Robinson was served and filed an answer denying the allegations of the petition, and claiming the property in his own right. Subsequently, one Prince appeared, and stating to the court that he was the legal owner of the land, asked to be made a co-defendant, and the court granted his application. Prince has no answer or other pleading on file. In this condition of the case Robinson (both he and the plaintiff being citizens of Missouri), and Prince, who is a citizen of Illinois, joined in an application to the state court to have the cause removed to this court. The petition for the removal stated only that the value of the land exceeded $500, and that Prince was a citizen of the state of Illinois. It contained no statement concerning the ownership of the land nor the relations which Robinson and Prince sustained towards each other in respect thereto. On this petition the state court made an order, removing the whole cause as respects both defendants, to this court; and here the plaintiff now moves that the cause be remanded to the state court, on the ground that it was improperly transferred.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT and KREKEL, District Judges.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The defendant's counsel in argument seeks to support the order of removal on the ground that Prince is the real owner, and Robinson but his tenant, and that the action, though in form possessory, is in reality brought to try the title which is in dispute between the plaintiff and Prince; and he claims that under such circumstances, Prince, as a non-resident, had, under the act of July 27, 1866, (14 Stat. 306,) a right at all events, to have the cause removed as to him, and that if remanded it should be remanded only as respects Robinson. Prior to the act of 1866, just mentioned, it is clear that Prince having been admitted as a co-defendant, and standing on the record as such, could not have the cause removed, since it was not removable as to Robinson, he being a citizen of Missouri. Torry v. Beardsley, [Case No. 14,104.] Title may be tried in this form of action as was adjudged by the supreme court of the United States, in Miles v. Caldwell, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 35; and if in this case Robinson had filed an answer disclaiming all title or right, or claiming under Prince, and the latter had shown in his petition that he was a citizen of Illinois, that he owned the land, that the action involved his title thereto, that its value exceeded the sum of $500, and asking a removal as to him, we would have then presented for decision the question which the defendants' counsel has argued, but which does not arise upon the record of the proceedings in the state court. On the face of those proceedings the order for the removal was erroneously made, both as respects Robinson and Prince, and the cause as to both must be remanded. Motion sustained.

nix Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff.]

This is an action on a fire policy to recover $2,000, the amount insured by the defendant upon the plaintiff's stock of goods. The written portion of the policy, which was dated February 7, 1870, and expired in one year, is as follows: $2,000 on his stock of dry goods, boots and shoes, and groceries; $200 on his household goods and furniture, in a one story wood building, 20x52, on lot 1, blk. 18, town of Ogden, Iowa. On the 13th day of June, 1870, the agent of the defendant indorsed on the policy: "Permission is hereby given by the Phoenix insurance company to B. F. Allison to transfer his stock of goods and furniture to Grand Junction, Iowa, to be kept in a one and a half story wood building, 22x36 feet, detached." The transfer was made accordingly. The defendant's policy contains the following provision: "If any other insurance has been or shall hereafter be made upon the said property and not consented to by this company in writing hereon, this policy shall be null and void." On this provision a special defense was made by the company which set up (4th count of answer) that the plaintiff, without its consent, had procured "other insurance," to-wit: "$200 in the Hawkeye company," on his household furniture, being part of the property covered by the defendant's policy. The facts in this respect appear in the special verdict, hereafter set forth. The jury found against the company, on the other defenses, and rendered a general verdict for the plaintiff for $1,500 (the value of the stock of goods consumed), subject to the rights of the parties on the facts found in the special verdict, which is as follows:

Special verdict.—"We find that the foregoing verdict for the plaintiff is subject to the right of the parties upon the following special verdict as to the defense set up in the fourth count of the answer in respect to other insurance, to-wit: After the policy in suit was issued, and before the fire, to-wit, on the 29th of November, 1870, and after the property mentioned in the policy in suit was removed to Grand Junction, under the permission indorsed on the policy, the plaintiff herein applied to the Hawkeye insurance company for insurance, and on November 29, 1870, the said Hawkeye company issued to the plaintiff a policy of Insurance of that date for one year, whereby, in consideration of $12.50, said Hawkeye insurance company insured the plaintiff against loss or damage by fire, as follows: "$500 on his frame store and dwelling house in Grand Junction, and $200 on his household furniture, and $75 on his general library contained therein," and delivered said policy to the plaintiff and said policy remained in force until after said house and furniture and library were destroyed by fire. The said store and house thus insured by the Hawkeye company are the same building into which the defendant gave the plaintiff permission to move the goods and household furniture mentioned in the policy in suit. Said store and dwelling house were all under one roof, and so was the "one story wood building," at Ogden, mentioned in the policy in suit. Said policy issued by the defendant, and said policy issued by the Hawkeye company, and the respective applications by the plaintiff for insurance to the said companies are annexed as part of this special verdict. The same fire totally consumed the building, the stock of goods therein, and all the household furniture. When plaintiff removed to Grand Junction he took his stock of goods and most of his household furniture with him, but after such removal and before taking out the said policy in the Hawkeye company, he had made some additions to his household furniture. (In the written application to the Hawkeye company, the plaintiff, in answer to a question, said there was no insurance on the building or household furniture.) The jury submitted to the court, as a question of law under the pleadings, whether the above facts constitute a defense to an action on the policy in suit for the value of the stock of dry-goods insured in said policy? If they do, then the jury find for the defendant, if not, they find a general verdict for the plaintiff, for the amount named therein, to-wit, $1,500."

The application for insurance in the Hawkeye company stated incorrectly that there was "no other insurance on the household furniture." The Hawkeye policy contained a condition "that any other insurance on the property hereby insured, or any part thereof, not notified to the company, should avoid the policy." The Hawkeye company had no notice of the prior insurance in the defendant company on the furniture; nor did the defendant company have notice of the subsequent policy in the Hawkeye company. The stock of goods and the household furniture, and the house at Grand Junction, were destroyed by a fire having a single origin. The plaintiff, after the fire, compromised his loss under the Hawkeye policy with that company. The defendant now moves to set aside the general verdict, and for judgment in its favor on the special verdict; and, on the other hand, the plaintiff moves for judgment on the verdict of the jury. It is on these motions that the cause is before the court. The action was only for the value of the goods destroyed by the fire.

Phillips & Phillips, for plaintiff.

Gatch, Wright, & Rannels and Austin Adams, for the company.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. There are two questions here. One is whether the subsequent policy on the furniture in the Hawkeye company, supposing it to be a valid and binding insurance, avoids the policy in suit as respects the stock of goods, which was separately valued, there having been no notice to the defendant of the Hawkeye policy.

The other is whether the subsequent policy in the Hawkeye company was such "other insurance" as contravenes the provision in the defendant's policy in that regard, the Hawkeye company having been informed by the plaintiff's application that there was no other insurance on the furniture, but after the loss, having compromised with the plaintiff in respect to its policy, not having had before the fire any knowledge of the policy issued by the defendant or ratifying its own policy with knowledge of the prior policy. The Hawkeye company insisted that its policy was not binding on it because of the misrepresentation as to prior insurance, but the policy covered other risks and the controversy was closed by the payment to the plaintiff of a sum less than the sum insured.

Under these circumstances it is clear that the second policy, as respects the furniture, at all events, could not have been enforced against the Hawkeye company, and, if not, can it be set up by the defendant as constituting other or additional insurance in violation of the condition in that respect, contained in the policy now in suit?

The general, but not uniform, opinion of the courts is, that to avoid the first policy the second policy must be valid, that it must constitute an effectual insurance; and we are inclined to so hold, if this can be done consistently with Carpenter v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 495. The case last cited has been subjected to much criticism (see Clark v. New England, etc., Ins. Co., 6 Cush. 342, 350; Hubbard v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 33 Iowa, 325; May, Ins. § 365, and the authorities there collected;) and, it may be conceded that, though not unsupported, it does not, at least in its reasoning, accord with the prevailing view. But if the case at bar falls within its principle, it is our duty implicitly to apply that principle to it. That case holds that the company which issued the second policy (the Providence company) was entitled to notice of the prior insurance in the American company, though the policy in that company had been "procured by misrepresentation of material facts"—and the reason given (which has been criticised and its soundness denied) is, that such a policy is not "to be treated, in the sense of the law, as utterly void ab initio, but merely voidable, and as one that may be avoided by the underwriters upon the proof of the facts, but until so avoided, to be treated for all practical purposes as a subsisting policy."

The decision would make it the duty of the plaintiff to have disclosed the prior insurance in the defendant company to the Hawkeye company, and if he did not, but stated that there was no such prior insurance, the policy in the Hawkeye company, if not ratified, would be void. And it does not establish that the policy in the Hawkeye company is to be considered as in all respects a valid policy unless avoided by that company before the loss.

We are therefore of the opinion that the policy in the Hawkeye company, so far at all events, as respects the furniture, was invalid, that it did not in fact and in law constitute any insurance, and therefore the defence based upon the ground that other insurance was procured contrary to the provisions of the policy in suit, fails. This view is, in our opinion, consistent with the real point in judgment in the case of Carpenter, though it may not consist with all the reasoning of the learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court.

This makes it unnecessary to decide whether if the Hawkeye policy had been valid as respects the furniture, this would have avoided the defendant's policy as respects the stock of goods. On this point the cases cannot be reconciled. That it would not thus avoid the policy as to the goods, see Loehner v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 17 Mo. 247, affirmed 19 Mo. 628; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 9; Clark v. New England, etc., Ins. Co., 6 Cush. 342, explained, May, Ins. § 278, note on page 303; Trench v. Chenango, etc., Ins. Co., 7 Hill, 123, (compare Wilson v. Herkimer Co. Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Seld. [6 N. Y.] 53;) Sloat v. Royal Ins. Co., 49 Pa. St. 14; Davis v. Boardman, 12 Mass. 79; Howard Ins. Co. v. Scribner, 5 Hill, 298.

But on the other hand, that it would avoid the policy entirely, see Smith v. Empire Ins. Co., 25 Barb. 497, 504; Kimball v. Howard, Ins. Co., 8 Gray, 33, 38, compare with Clark v. New England, etc., Ins. Co. supra; Associated Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Assum, 5 Md. 163; Barnes v. Union M. F. Ins. Co., 51 Me. 110. In this last case, where there was the usual provision against alienation, or material change of title, and an insurance was effected by the plaintiff on an undivided half of a dwelling house, and afterwards on the petition of his co-tenant, a partition was decreed, this was held to be equivalent to an alienation and purchase, and avoided the policy as to the building, and it was further held that the policy being void as to the building, the plaintiff could not recover for the loss of furniture therein insured in the same policy, and separately valued, the ground of decision being the supposed entirety of the contract, as that if it became void in part it was void in toto. I doubt the soundness of this decision, as to the furniture, but as it is not essential, the court gives no opinion as to the point whether a second valid insurance of furniture, there being no fraud, would avoid the first policy, as to the other and distinct property, separately valued.

PRIZE—RELOCATION OF BLOCKADE—HOSTILE VESSELS.

1. The president's proclamation of 14 May, 1862, "relaxing the blockade" of Beaufort, N. C., and opening it to trade under regulations of the treasury department, the port being in our military possession, must be construed, so far as neutrals are concerned, as having entirely raised the blockade; and neutral vessels bound there, in violation of the regulations of the treasury department, are not guilty of an attempt to break the blockade.

2. Vessel and cargo condemned for breach of blockade, the evidence showing an actual hostile destination.

In admiralty.

R. H. Dana, Jr., U. S. Atty., for the United States and captors.

SPRAGUE, District Judge.—This vessel was captured on the 2d May last, by the United States brig Perry, off the coast of North Carolina, within four or five miles of the beach, and near New Topsail Inlet. The master, mate, and all the crew were brought here in the prize, and their evidence has been taken. No claim has been put in for either vessel or cargo, although the master and mate both testify that they owned portions of the cargo, and that the vessel and rest of the cargo belonged to one James B. Heyl, a merchant in Bermuda, who appointed and employed the master. There were found on board the vessel a certificate of registry in the name of J. B. Heyl, shipping articles which described the voyage as from Bermuda to Beaufort, N. C. (a port now in our military possession), and back, a certificate of clearance for the same voyage, a manifest representing the same voyage, and a letter from Mr. Heyl to one W. I. Potter, at Beaufort. The log-book seems to have correctly described the vessel's course, though imperfectly, to the day of the capture.

It appears, from the evidence of the master and crew of the Alma, that she first sailed from Bermuda on the 6th March last, and put back from heavy weather, leaking, repaired damages, made some changes in her cargo, and sailed again on the 22d April. Her capture was eleven days afterwards. It appears, from the same evidence, that the schooner made the land the afternoon before her capture, stood off again to sea, and stood in again the next morning. Her position was then about thirty-five miles to the southward of Beaufort, and about twenty miles to the northward of New Topsail Inlet. The wind was in a northeasterly direction, being ahead for Beaufort. She stood in on the starboard tack, until she was very close to the beach, and then kept off and stood down the coast in a southerly direction, and then hauled up, on the port tack, and stood out to sea. One witness says that their reason for wearing round, instead of tacking, was because the vessel worked badly. No other witness says this, and no attempt seems to have been made to put her in stays. The reason they give for keeping off and running free, when Beaufort was to windward, is, that they saw the United States brig-of-war Perry, and wished to speak her. One witness however, says that the schooner did not keep off for the Perry, but stood out to sea, close hauled on the port tack. No reason is given why they should wish to speak the Perry. It is not clear how long they ran down the coast, but only that they did so. The reason assigned is, that the master did not know precisely where he was. It seems, however, that he got an observation that day at noon. It is a circumstance of suspicion that the register of the vessel, in the name of this owner, bears date the very day that the vessel sailed from Bermuda, when all her cargo was on board, and that the letter to Mr. Potter is of the same day. No bills of lading or invoice, and no documentary evidence whatever of title to the cargo, were found on board, and the master admits there were none. The letter to Mr. Potter is written as to an entire stranger, and would be as useful to one stranger as to another. Mr. Heyl says, "I send you a cargo at random," and gives Mr. Potter free leave to sell as he pleases, and send a return cargo of pitch-pine lumber. It gives no measures or quantities of the cargo, nor could the consignee ascertain these by any papers on board, except by such a manifest as the master might choose to make. The clearance describes the cargo as solely spirituous liquors, and there is no invoice and no bills of lading to ascertain the truth. The outward cargo was salt and rum, not a cargo likely to be sent from Bermuda to Beaufort, a port in our military possession, where the landing of rum is under strict police control, and where salt is nearly as cheap as in New York, while both these articles would bring extraordinary prices at any port under rebel control. In the captain's venture was some naval clothing, not a profitable investment for Beaufort. Nor is it likely that Beaufort, at this time, would furnish a profitable return cargo of pine lumber. The mate of this vessel is a citizen of North Carolina, well acquainted with that coast, having been long engaged in its coasting-trade, and fitted to act as pilot there, and had been in the rebel army (as appears by evidence to be hereafter alluded to). It is not probable, therefore, that he would desire to go to Beaufort, placing himself within reach of our troops. This is the state of the preparatory proofs. They raise great doubts of this being a bona fide voyage in British ownership, to Beaufort, with a cargo actually consigned and destined to that port; and the conduct of the vessel, on the morning of her capture, is hardly consistent with the notion that she was beating up to Beaufort, but is much more consistent with her having made out her position, and run down for the inlet, until she found herself cut off by the Perry, and then attempting to escape her by standing out to sea.

In this state of evidence, I have admitted further proofs by the captors. This consists of the depositions of the prize master, an acting ensign in the Perry, and two petty officers of the Perry, who came here in the prize. They testify that the Perry saw this schooner in the morning, and that she ran in very close to the shore, at a point about thirty-five miles south of Beaufort, and then kept off, in the direction for New Topsail Inlet; that the Perry stood so as to cut her off, and, when it became evident that she was cut off, she came close on the wind, and stood out to sea, but was outsailed by the Perry, and brought under her guns. The two petty officers testify that the mate and crew of the Alma, on the passage home, freely admitted that they were running for the inlet; and the mate said he got too far to the northward, and tried to run down and get in before the Perry cut her off. It is also testified that the Alma worked well, and was in good trim. I have so far treated the case as if a destination to Beaufort, N. C., was an innocent destination at this time. That port was placed under blockade by the proclamation of April 27, 1861, and was under actual blockade until it was taken by our troops. On 12th May, 1862, the President issued a proclamation declaring that, as to the ports of Beaufort, N

C., Port Royal, S. C., and New Orleans, "the blockade may now be safely relaxed," and declaring the blockade so far to cease as to allow commercial intercourse with those ports, "subject to the laws of the United States, and to the limitations and in pursuance of the regulations which are prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his order of this date." This order gives notice that to vessels clearing from foreign ports to the "ports opened by the proclamation," licenses will be granted by the United States consuls, upon evidence that the vessels will deal in no contraband persons or property, which licenses shall be exhibited to the collectors of the ports, and to the blockading vessels, if required. It then declares that "in all other respects the existing blockade remains in full force and effect as hitherto established and maintained, nor is it relaxed by the proclamation, except in regard to the ports to which the relaxation is, by that instrument, expressly applied." [12 Stat. 1263.]

It is suggested by the United States Attorney, that the proclamation merely relaxes the blockade of these ports so far as to let in vessels so licensed. But although the language is not clear, I think that, on general principles of the laws of war affecting neutrals, I must hold that the proclamation entirely raises the blockade of these ports as to neutrals. The proviso respecting the license is a regulation of trade with a place in our military possession; and whatever might be the effect, in another proceeding, in case a vessel should enter one of these posts without a license, or should violate the license, it would not make her a prize of war for breach of blockade. Otherwise, I should be obliged to hold that the obstacle of a blockade, as to each neutral vessel, depended upon the decision which the several consuls of the United States, at the several neutral ports over the globe, might make in the case of every vessel applying for a license, while our own vessels, sailing coastwise, are to apply for licenses to the Department of the Treasury. But while the absence of any license to this vessel from the American consul at Bermuda does not make Beaufort a prohibited port to her, it is corroborative evidence that she was not bound there. This proclamation and order must have been known in Bermuda for nearly ten months before this vessel sailed; and it can hardly be supposed that a British merchant, sole owner of vessel and cargo, would have sent her to Beaufort without a license. The vessel and cargo are to be condemned for an attempted breach of blockade.

SEAMEN—WAGES—FORFEITURE FOR MISCONDUCT—SHIPPING ARTICLES IN DEROGATION OF LEGAL RIGHTS.

1. A justifiable discharge of a seaman by the master, for bad conduct, will work a forfeiture of the wages previously earned.

2. Courts of admiralty will not [wholly] forfeit a seaman's wages for a single act of disobedience, however [if] trivial or provoked.

3. A stipulation in shipping articles in derogation of the general rights of seamen, as established by the maritime law, is void, unless it was fully and fairly explained to them, and additional compensation allowed them, adequate to the restrictions and risks imposed thereby.

In admiralty.

O. P. Mason, for libellants.

W. W. Page and W. W. Thayer, for claimants.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a suit in rem for seaman's wages. The defence set up in the answer is desertion and disobedience of orders, whereby the libellants forfeited their wages. The material facts are as follows: The libellants, George Mills, Albert Miller, Frank Stizleye, Nels. Nelson, William Nelson, Henry Nelson, Howell Lewis and John Lewis, between the fourteenth and twentieth of August, 1868, shipped as seamen on the Almatia, then lying at the port of San Francisco, for a voyage to the port of Portland-on-Wallamet, and thence back to the port of departure. The bark sailed from San Francisco on September 1, and made the dock at Portland on the thirtieth of the same month. Upon reaching the latter port, the first mate was immediately paid off and discharged, but for what reason does not appear. The second mate then acted as first officer, and proceeded with the discharge of cargo. The libellants were the only seamen on board. On Sunday morning, October 4, the second mate called the men out about six o'clock, and set them to doing the ordinary work about ship. They washed down the decks, and furled four sails which had been loose since the Tuesday previous. The weather was calm and dry. When this work was done, the second mate ordered the libellants to loose and unfurl the foresail. This sail had been furled the Tuesday previous by the order and under the direction of the first mate. It was then half-past eight o'clock, and the custom was to have breakfast on Sunday morning at eight. There was no necessity of unfurling the sail at that time. To this order the men replied that it was after eight o'clock and they wanted their breakfasts. The officer immediately reported this answer to the master, who had the men called aft. On coming aft, the master asked the men what was the matter? They answered that they wanted their breakfasts. To this the master replied—You want your breakfasts, do you? The master then asked if they would furl the sail; they replied that it was after eight o'clock, and they wanted their breakfasts. The master then said—You refuse duty then; mind, you got nothing coming to you. The men replied—We don't refuse to do our duty, but we want our breakfasts. The master then ordered the second officer to go ashore and get men to furl the sail. The officer did so, but none were obtained, and the sail was not refurled until the following Monday evening. No more notice was taken of the men.

By the direction of the master, the cook allowed them breakfast, dinner and supper on Sunday. The men slept on board, but were not called to turn out on Monday morning. About half-past seven, they applied to the cook for breakfast, but he refused them, as the master had given him orders not to let them have any. About this time a gang of longshoremen came on board and commenced to discharge cargo. The libellants then went to the master on the wharf, and asked him what he was going to do with them. The master said he didn't know them; that they took charge yesterday morning, and he would have nothing more to do with them. The men said they had not "taken charge." The master replied—You refused to work. Then the men asked if they could go ashore. The master answered—I don't tell you to go ashore. The men then asked him if he would pay them. The master at first said he might, if anything was coming to them; and then said no, get it out of the ship, if you can. Thereupon the libellants left the bark, and brought this suit for wages.

Upon this state of facts, the defence of desertion must fail. The libellants remained on board the vessel for twenty-four hours after their qualified refusal to furl the foresail, ready and willing, so far as appears, to do duty whenever called upon. During all this time no attention was paid to them, or orders given them by the officers; and finally, by direction of the master, they were denied their usual food. On Monday morning, when the libellants finally applied directly to the master for orders, he said that he did not know them, and in effect that he was done with them. This was a discharge by the officers, and not a desertion by the crew. Desertion by the maritime law is a quitting the ship and her service without leave, and against the duty of the party, with no mind to return again. Cloutman v.

Tunison, [Case No. 2,907.] These libellants left the vessel with no mind to return, but not until they were in effect bidden to do so, by the language and conduct of the master and mate.

It being ascertained that the libellants did not desert the vessel, but were discharged therefrom at an intermediate port, it remains to be considered whether the discharge was justifiable or not. A justifiable discharge of a seaman by the master, for bad conduct, will work a forfeiture of the wages previously earned. This is a rule of justice and policy which pervades the maritime law. 3 Kent, Comm. 198. But it is not every trivial act of disobedience or neglect of duty that will justify the discharge of a seaman, or work a forfeiture of his wages. In the case of The Mentor, [Case No. 9,427,] Mr. Justice Story discusses this question at great length. He says: "There must be a case of high and aggravated neglect or disobedience, importing the most serious mischief, peril or wrong; a case calling for exemplary punishment and admitting of no reasonable mitigation; a case involving a very gross breach of the stipulated contract for hire, and going in its character and consequences to the very essence of its provisions." And again, he says: "I should be very sorry, indeed, to lay it down as a general proposition, that any act of disobedience by a seaman, however slight, is, of course, to be visited with a forfeiture of wages, or will justify a master in dismissing him in the course of the voyage. Such a principle, it seems to me, would be very disastrous to the commercial interests of the country, and would involve so many difficulties in the application, that the denial of wages would soon, from the necessities of the case, with reference to the ordinary habits of seamen, introduce an essentially different contract into maritime employment. My opinion is, that the disobedience must either be an act of very gross nature, involving serious danger, a mischief or malignancy; or it must be habitual and produce such a general diminution of duty as goes to the very essence of the contract." To the same effect is 3 Kent, Comm., supra. The case of The Mentor, supra, involved the consideration of the consequences of an attempt to create a revolt on ship board. The learned judge, in the course of his opinion, declared that even the commission of such an offence is not "in all cases, to be visited with a total forfeiture of wages;" and by way of illustration adds, "Cases may easily be conceived, where the seamen have, in a legal sense, committed the offence, and yet under such circumstances of gross provocation and misconduct on the part of the master, as to form a very strong excuse, addressing itself to the conscience and mercy of the court."

Taking these rules and principles as a guide for the decision of this case, it is plain that the discharge of the libellants was not justifiable, and that they ought [not] to forfeit their wages for the single act of the qualified refusal to refurl the foresail on Sunday morning. The first mate had been discharged and the second mate had taken his place. It is quite probable that the libellants, in feeling at least, in this matter, took part for the first mate and against the second one. It is equally probable and even more so, that the second mate regarded the crew with disfavor and intended to hector them out of the vessel and get rid of them. There was no trouble on board with the libellants, until he became first officer. The libellants have been before the court and four of them were examined as witnesses. They appeared very well for men in their station of life, and those of them who were upon the witness stand gave their testimony intelligently and candidly. One of them had been on the ship for three years continuously. The testimony for the claimants, consists of the depositions of the master and second mate, and a third person who appears to have been idling on the dock at the time of the altercation between the men and the officers on Sunday morning, and overheard and saw a part of what was then said and done. The cook was the only person on board who was not an actor in the scene of Sunday morning. His testimony has not been offered. No reason is given by the claimants for not producing him or his deposition. For aught that appears he is still on board the bark and within their control. The circumstance must have some weight against the claimants upon the questions of fact in dispute between them and the libellants. The mate testifies that it was necessary to the safety of the vessel to refurl the foresail on that Sunday morning. The sail had been furled under the direction of the first mate and had been in that condition since the previous Tuesday, and so remained until the evening of the following Monday. The vessel was fast alongside the dock, one hundred and twenty miles from sea, and the weather was and had been calm and dry. This statement of the mate's is incredible and it cannot be supposed but that he knew better. Its falsity is evident to any one, and is shown by the testimony of the libellants and that of the ship-masters, Smith and Freeman. These circumstances are enough to throw discredit upon the testimony of the mate.

The force of the master's testimony is impaired by the fact that he was intoxicated on Sunday morning, when the affair took place, which was made the occasion for discharging the libellants, without paying their wages. It is altogether probable that the mate took advantage of his condition to bring about a dispute between the crew and him. So soon as the men said they wanted their breakfasts, when ordered to refurl the foresail, the mate immediately, without a word of explanation, hurried off to the master with a complaint of disobedience of orders, and the result was that the men were called aft and practically discharged. On the other hand, I do not think the libellants are wholly without fault. Although the refurling of the sail was not necessary to the safety of the vessel, it was proper and right that it should be refurled, if the officer in charge thought so. He had a right to have the sails furled to please his eye, and in accordance with his notions of what was professional and seamanlike. Some one must give the law upon these matters, and the general rule is, that the seaman must obey what his superiors command. Of course there is a limit, beyond which a seaman need not endure the caprices and persecutions of his officers, but may leave the ship and demand his wages. But this order was not an extreme one. Fifteen minutes at the farthest would have sufficed to refurl the sail; and although the libellants may have felt (as was probably the fact), that the order was given to punish and annoy them more than any thing else, yet they should have obeyed it after the master required them to do it, before breakfast. It also appears probable that the crew on Sunday morning were disinclined to work under the mate, and held back in the discharge of the morning's work, so that they furnished some excuse if not provocation for keeping them at work after the usual hour without their breakfasts.

In any event the order was not so unreasonable or oppressive as to justify the libellants in refusing to obey it, either absolutely or unqualifiedly. Nor was their qualified refusal, under all the circumstances, sufficient to justify their discharge, or work a forfeiture of their wages; particularly as they remained ready to go to work, until the master discharged them the next morning. I shall deduct one month's wages from the compensation due each of the libellants for his misconduct in this particular.

Counsel for the claimants also insist that the wages of the libellants are forfeited by virtue of a clause in the shipping articles which reads "that if any of the said crew disobey the orders of master or other officer of the said vessel, or absent himself at any time without liberty, his wages due at the time of said disobedience or absence shall be forfeited; and in case such person or persons so forfeiting wages shall be reinstated and permitted to do further duty, it shall not do away such forfeiture." This stipulation or clause is in derogation of the general rights of seamen as established by the maritime law, which does not allow a single act of disobedience, however trivial or provoked to work a total forfeiture of a seaman's wages. Such stipulations are held void by courts of admiralty "unless two things concur: first, that the nature and operation of the clause is fully and fairly explained to the seaman; and secondly, that an additional compensation is allowed entirely adequate to the new restrictions and risks imposed upon them thereby." Brown v. Lull, [Case No. 2,018.] The burden of proof is upon the claimants to show both these things. No attempt has been made to prove either of them. Tried by this test, this stipulation is void. "Courts of admiralty are accustomed to consider seamen as peculiarly entitled to their protection;" and it is against the operation of such unjust and one-sided stipulations as this, obscurely placed among the many long lines of a closely printed formula at the head of the articles, that this protection is most required and given.

It only remains to consider the compensation which the libellants are entitled to receive. The general rule, when a seaman is wrongfully discharged during a voyage, is to allow him wages up to the termination of the voyage. But to this there are exceptions. In some instances the compensation given by this rule would be too great and in others too small. The damages in all cases should be equal to the real loss or injury of the party. Emerson v. Howland, [Case No. 4,441.]

The wages agreed upon were $35 per month for the round voyage. From the evidence it cannot be certainly known what time it will take to complete the voyage. On the argument it was admitted that the vessel was still in this port. The run from San Francisco here occupied just one month. The vessel has been in this port another month discharging and taking on cargo, and how much longer she may remain is not known. From what is known, it may be safely assumed that the return to San Francisco will occupy another month. The libellants shipped on the 14, 17 and 20 of August. This would make the duration of the voyage about three and a half months. If the discharge was wholly wrongful and without fault on the part of the libellants, the latter would be entitled to recover the stipulated rate of wages for this time, and also the sum of twenty dollars each, the price of passage from here to the port of shipment. From this must be deducted as to each of them the sum of one month's wages for misconduct, and also the advanced wages received by two of them. The articles do not specify what kind of money the wages were to be paid in. The usage is to pay in coin, and the money advanced to Nelson and Mills, was coin. In all probability it was the mutual understanding that the wages should be paid in coin. But the contract is for so much money, and it may be satisfied by the payment of any lawful money of the United States. Under these circumstances the court cannot decree that the wages shall be paid in coin, or that a greater sum per month than that agreed upon shall be paid in currency. However, the wages have been allowed for the round voyage. It is probable that the libellants might have returned to San Francisco, in a month less time, if they had availed themselves of the opportunities that offered, immediately upon their discharge. Supposing that this decree would be paid in currency, I have upon this point, in the absence of testimony, presumed in favor of the libellants, and given them wages for three and a half instead of two and a half months. Decree for the libellants accordingly.

[NOTE. Wages of seamen will not be forfeited for slight faults; the disobedience must be of a very gross nature, involving serious danger, or it must be malignant or habitual, such as goes to the very essence of the contract. Case No. 255.

ALMEIDA v. CERTAIN SLAVES.

District Court, D. South Carolina. July, 1814.

SLAVES—PRIZE—PRISONERS OF WAR.

1. Slaves captured in time of war, cannot be libelled as prize, nor will the district court of the United States consider them as prisoners of war.

2. The court considers the disposition of them as a matter of state [policy,] in which it is not fit that the judiciary should interfere.

[Libel by Joseph Almeida, captain of the American privateer schooner Caroline, against certain slaves. Dismissed.]

DRAYTON, District Judge. The libel in this case alleges, that during the cruise of said privateer, on the high seas, she captured certain slaves, "the property of the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof; or, of the subjects of the said king." That in and by a certain act of the congress of the United States, passed the 26th June, 1812, entitled "An act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," it is among other things enacted, that all captures of vessels, and property, shall be forfeited, and accrue to the owners, officers, and crew of the vessels, by which such prizes shall be made; reserving to the United States, two per centum, on the net amount of the moneys arising from such captures, and concludes with the regular prayer of condemnation.

In behalf of the United States, a claim was interposed by the district attorney, for the said slaves, as prisoners of war, or otherwise, to them the said United States belonging; denying the right of the said Joseph Almeida, to the said slaves, as prize of war; and concludes with praying, that the said slaves may be adjudged and delivered to them as prisoners of war, or otherwise, and that the costs of their claim be allowed. This is one of the new and important questions, arising from the present war in which the United States of America are engaged with Great Britain. The court has, heretofore, not proceeded to condemnation of slaves, brought in as prize of war; but, has ordered their confinement as prisoners. And in some cases, they have been received as such, by the British authorities resident in this city. The interest of parties, however, require at this time, a formal decision on the point of prize; to obtain which, the libel, in this case has been filed.

It is contended by Hayne, for the libellant, that by a true construction of the rights of war, and particularly in pursuance of the prize act of the United States, specially referred to in the libel, all captures and prizes of vessels and property, shall be forfeited and accrue to the owners, officers and crews of the vessels making such captures. That negroes and persons of color, held in slavery by the British are as much slaves, as those held in slavery by our own citizens. That they are not real, but personal property; considered as assets in sales, and in distribution of estates. And therefore, they come within the meaning of the word property, as mentioned in the fourth section of the said act; (2 Laws U. S. 240, [2 Stat. 759:]) and, consequently, are liable to condemnation as prize. That the law must be so construed, not only as respects the public interests, and the intention of congress in passing the prize act; but, as protecting the rights of all concerned in privateering; and, as encouraging the exertions of our citizens to attack and injure the enemy. And more particularly so, in retributive justice; as the enemy have taken so many slaves belonging to our citizens, and have appropriated them to their own use, as prize of war.

On the part of the United States, it is insisted, by Parker, (district attorney) that the right of condemning the slaves as prize of war, does not attach in favor of libellants; but, that they must be considered as prisoners of war or otherwise, in behalf of the United States. Because other than such a construction would be at variance with the act of congress, passed on the 2d of March, 1807, prohibiting importation of slaves. 8 Laws U. S. 262, [2 Stat. 426.] That slaves cannot be considered as property, under that term, in the prize act; because, it could not have been the intention of congress to consider them as prize, springing out of the events of the war. For, were this the meaning of the legislature, the act prohibiting the importation of slaves would have been repealed, so far as it had any collision with the war or the prize acts. I have never had any doubt on this subject. But, as those interested in such captures appear not satisfied, by a non-judicial divestment of what they claim as a right, it is better that the question should be, at length, seriously brought before me.

Did the question turn upon the meaning of the word property, as relating to slaves, something might be said in support of such doctrine; not only, upon the principle of the civil law which considers slaves not as persons but as things (1 Brown, Civil Law, 100, 101, 103,) but also, from the custom, usage and meaning in law, of those of our states, possessing this property. But, as only one portion of our union, permits this property in slaves, it cannot be supposed the other would in a general law, intend it was to be considered as prize. These two different interests are represented in congress; it is the united votes of that body, which have passed the prohibitory act. And it is but reasonable to believe those not permitting slavery, did not, and would not, concur, in such a construction, as is contended for, by libellant. But there are stronger reasons why a condemnation in favor of the captors, should not be decreed. In the first place, the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, was made by congress, with the evident intention of forever thereafter preventing this importation. This act was passed to take effect at the earliest period (1st January, 1808,) at which the constitution of the United States permitted congress to prohibit their importation. For until that time, the states interested in negro importation would not have been controlled but by their own acts. And congress having so early used such prohibitory power evinces their disapprobation of such commerce, and of adding to the number of slaves in the Union; and of course, their determination to maintain such prohibition strictly. It is true, this law was made in time of peace, it is not a war measure. But, it does not thence follow that it is to be superseded or repealed by a declaration of war; or by the passage of a prize act. It does not follow that an act passed as a general and standing municipal law shall be repealed by a prize act, brought into existence for the purposes of a particular war, unless such repeal manifestly appears. It would argue a want of caution in our legislature, which ought not to be supposed. It enacts "That from and after the 1st day of January, 1808, it shall not be lawful to import or bring into the United States, or the territories thereof, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to hold, sell, or dispose of such negro, mulatto, or person of color, as a slave, or to be held to service or labor." This section, therefore, is general; it applies to all vessels, whether of war or otherwise. For, "ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus." It is also imperative, being without any condition, or exception. This further appears by perusing the different sections of the act—as where the public interests required, the general bearing of the first section should be controlled or mitigated, there the act is not silent, but declares in what manner it shall be done. So by the 7th section permitting the capture, and bringing in of any ship or vessel hovering on our coasts, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves; or with the intent to land the same, in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States. 8 Laws U. S. 266, [2 Stat. 428.] But even in this case, those persons are not to be sold; they are to be disposed of otherwise, as therein is directed. The party capturing receives nothing from the proceeds of such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color; his emoluments arise only from the proceeds of the ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods and effects on board; and this under a special proviso, that to entitle him to such reward, he shall "keep safe every negro, mulatto or person of color, found on board of any ship or vessel, so seized, taken or brought into port for condemnation, and shall deliver every such negro, mulatto or person of color, to such person or persons as shall be appointed by the respective states, to receive them, etc." Hence, as respects the rights and interest vested by the prize act, congress has legislated with caution. When to give energy to that act, that body meant former acts, or parts of acts to be repealed, the same has been expressly enacted; it has not been left to a court, to advance one step farther than was intended by its decreeing a virtual repeal. For, it is only under such a decree, or by such a construction, that the cause of the libellant can be sustained. This is evident, by referring to the 14th and 16th sections of the prize act; which for the purpose of giving free scope to its operations, expressly repeal so much of the non-importation and embargo laws as relate to prize goods, or private armed vessels; but, nothing is said as to the prohibitory slave act. It follows then, that congress did not intend to repeal such act, as relating to prize of war; as "Exceptio probat regulam, in non exceptis." And slaves are not considered therein under the term property, or as goods and effects as is evident by the remunerating clause of the prohibitory slave act, (section 7,) before mentioned. Congress has therein clearly expressed its opinion on this point; and it is not then for this court to suppose a different construction. I am, therefore, of opinion, the negroes or persons of color, so libelled, cannot be condemned as prize to the captors.

The only question now remaining for consideration, is whether the claim in behalf of the United States, for the same as prisoners of war or otherwise, shall be sustained, or, if not sustained, whether this court will in any, and what manner, pronounce judgment in the premises? As to the claim of prisoners of war, I do not think it proper to decide thereon. It appears to me, as the laws of the United States are silent on the subject, it becomes a matter of state; respecting which it is not for the judiciary to determine—the right to do so remaining with the government of the United States. Because these persons may have been heretofore informally considered as prisoners, it is no reason this court should now decree them to be prisoners of war. And on this point there is much similarity, with the reasoning and cases in law, respecting head money. In which the court of admiralty pronounces not whether due, but only the number of men taken; leaving the remuneration to the sovereign power. [Le Francha.] 1 C. Rob. Adm. 157.

Under these impressions, I do adjudge and decree, that the libel be dismissed with costs. And that the claim of the United States be sustained, so far as to detain the said negroes, mulattoes or persons of color, in the possession and custody of the marshal; subject to such disposition and uses, in favor of the United States, whether as prisoners of war, as prize to the United States, or otherwise, as shall lawfully be declared, and directed in the premises. And lastly, I adjudge and decree that the libellant pay also the costs of the claim in this case.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1846.²

EQUITABLE MORTGAGES — FRAUDULENT TRANSFER OF PROPERTY BY MORTGAGOR — CONVERSION — RUNNING OF STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. Where A. promises B. to buy machinery of C., and let B. have it to use at an agreed price per yard for cloth made by it at B.'s factory, A. to furnish the raw cotton, and credit B. towards payment for the machinery, with what the cloth sells for beyond that price and expenses; it is not at law a mortgage of the machinery by B. to A., because the title did not come from A. to B., and their agreement was not made at the time A. got his title; but if an absolute debt from B. to A. existed, to be secured by a mortgage, and a memorandum at the bottom of the contract called the machinery collateral security for the money paid for it by A., and in the contract it was said to be security for the advance made, it may be deemed in equity a debt, though B. was said to be "at liberty" to pay the money advanced.

[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,233; Carr v. Gale, Id. 2,435.]

2. This contract may be deemed a mortgage of the machinery to B. in equity, and A. afterwards could not sell it legally to D. until he had paid B. all the debt; so that D., knowing the circumstances, or knowing enough to put him on inquiry, could not hold the machinery without paying B. the balance due.

[Cited in Bentley v. Phelps, Case No. 1,331; Tufts v. Tufts, Id. 14,233; Carr v. Gale, Id. 2,435.]

3. Such a contract, though a mortgage, need not be recorded in order to be valid between the parties to it, or those having notice of it. Possession by A. of such property, which had not been his before the mortgage, is not within the policy of the law as to its being evidence of fraud, either if a mortgage or not. Nor is the machinery under such a contract in the control and disposition of A. so as to render it liable for his debts to others, like property of third persons, in the power and disposal of bankrupts under the special provisions of bankrupt acts.

[Cited in Carr v. Gale, Case No. 2,435.]

4. A bill in chancery, asking D. to account for such machinery, and its rents and profits, may not be sustained on that ground, though it may be, when asking also, as here, a discovery also, which succeeded in developing facts important, and requested that D. should redeem the property mortgaged, or restore it, and the rent from it.

[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,233.]

5. The statute of limitations pleaded to it was held not to run till the demand by B. on D. and a refusal to return the machinery; the possession having been given to D. by one having the right to it, and no tort or conversion was elected to be considered as committed by D. till the demand and refusal.

6. A. or D. have a remedy against B. to perform his contract on tendering the balance due, and B. may have relief in chancery from his contract to convey, unless A. or D. will, within a reasonable time, pay the balance due to him.

7. If the statute of limitations run long enough to bar a debt secured by a mortgage, and has not barred a bill or suit as to the property, the debt is protected by the mortgaged property, and will not be barred till a suit for that is.

In equity. The first case was a bill in equity, [by Samson Almy against Peleg Wilbur,] filed, and notice served on the respondent, 17th October, 1842. It alleged, that, March 7, 1828, Rowland G. Hazard & Co. entered into an agreement with Christopher Lippitt to assume the payment of five hundred spindles, then purchased or contracted for by Lippitt, and to buy three hundred more, receiving from the vendors bills of sale for all of them, as security for the amount loaned, not to exceed $10,000; that Lippitt, on his part, agreed to use said machinery in his factory, at Jewett City, Conn., in making 4-4 brown sheeting, from thread 16 to 18 in numbers; receiving the cotton and delivering the goods at Providence, R. I., at three and a half cents per yard. It was further agreed that Hazard & Co. should perform all the services on their part, in purchases and sales, &c. without any charge of commissions, except in case of special guarantees; that the profits arising from this business should be equally divided between them and Lippitt; that it should begin immediately, and continue till 25th March, 1830; that if Lippitt's part of the profits and interest thereon should not be sufficient at any time to pay the money advanced by Hazard & Co., and to which it was to be applied, Lippitt was to be at liberty to continue the business in this way till it did pay the amount, or to have the privilege to pay the balance in two years, with interest; that on all moneys advanced by either party, except for the original purchase of the machinery, six per cent. interest was to be allowed, and settlements made semi-annually; that the machinery was to be held by Hazard & Co. only as collateral security for the money advanced and given up to Lippitt, on payment thereof, and till then to be kept insured by Lippitt for Hazard & Co. The bill next averred, that Hazard & Co. did assume the payments for the machinery, and for it and for what they purchased did advance $9,567.48, and took bills of sale of it in their own names; and immediately, viz. 7th March, 1828, began to supply Lippitt with cotton under the agreement, and to receive manufactured goods; that they failed in business 30th May, 1829, and assigned to T. B. Hazard and Charles Low, for the benefit of creditors, all their property in trust, including this machinery and contract. It was next averred, that, in the year 1829, the complainant agreed with R. G. Hazard, as agent of the assignees, that he, the complainant, would supply Lippitt with cotton, under and on the terms of said contract, and that he supplied it accordingly, and made sales, &c. until the 9th March, 1830, when he purchased of the assignees of R. G. Hazard & Co. all their interest in said machinery and contract; but Low and Fenner, named in the assignment or bill of sale, never re-deemed their half of the contract, as provided, or paid any part of the expense, or furnished any cotton from 1829 to 1832; and thus, by their neglect and refusal, made the complainant, or acquiesced in his being solely interested in said contract and machinery. The bill further averred, that the complainant continued to furnish cotton and make sales under this contract till Sept. 11, 1832, from which time Lippitt refused and neglected to apply for any more cotton and to go on further under the contract, though he, the said Lippitt, had agreed to the assignment of the machinery and contract to the complainant, and had gone on with him under it since the assignment. The bill further averred, that the complainant, on the 18th of August, 1831, at the request of Lippitt, bought a double speeder, at the price of $550, for use in Lippitt's mill, being necessary for its successful operation; and on the 11th of September, 1832, there was due to the complainant $5,405.87 under the contract, and for which the machinery was pledged; yet Lippitt has paid no part thereof, nor delivered the machinery to the complainant, but transferred the same to the respondent, Peleg Wilbur, who now professes to hold it exonerated from any lien or claim by the complainant. It next averred, that Wilbur knew at the time of the transfer that the machinery was pledged to the plaintiff, and ought to pay him the balance due, and account for the use of the machinery and speeder, but refuses to do either; that on the 26th of November, 1836, he the plaintiff, demanded the machinery of Wilbur, who refused to deliver it up; and states that Lippitt would be made a party to this bill, but residing in the state of Connecticut, this court would have no jurisdiction over him in such case. Several special interrogatories were then propounded to Wilbur, and the bill concluded with a prayer that Wilbur be made to account for the value of the machinery and interest, and for the use of the machinery since Sept. 1832; or pay the balance due the plaintiff, including the $550 advanced for the double speeder, with interest; or restore the machinery and speeder, and pay reasonable rent since Sept. 1832.

The answer of Wilbur admits several of the allegations in the bill, such as the failure of Hazard & Co.; their agreement, as set out, with Lippitt; the furnishing of cotton and the double speeder by the plaintiff; and the demand made on him by the plaintiff's agent about Nov. 25, 1836, to return the machinery. But it denies any knowledge of the original agreement and its terms, till after a mortgage of the machinery, which he avers was made by Lippitt, to himself and others, Dec. 8, 1835. He further denies that he then knew of any assignment to the plaintiff, or any refusal by Lippitt to go on with the contract, or any assent by Lippitt to the above named assignment, or to the complainant's holding said machinery pledged to pay his claims, or any interest by the plaintiff in the machinery itself, except on account of the double speeder. The answer further alleges, that Dec. 1, 1837, the respondent, for himself, and as attorney to the rest, conveyed all his interest thus acquired in said machinery to Morgan & Fanning; that the complainant stated to him, while furnishing cotton to Lippitt, that only a small sum remained due to him; that the mortgage to Wilbur conveyed other estate, and the debt thereby secured to him was bona fide; that from September, 1832, till the mortgage to Wilbur, Lippitt held and used the machinery as his own; and the respondent believed, and had reason to believe, that all the complainant's claims had been satisfied. That after the mortgage to him, he understood that claims existed by Hazard & Co. and the plaintiff on said machinery; but Lippitt denied their validity on the ground they were mortgages, and had never been recorded, and hence were invalid as against the defendant; and that the defendant received for his own interest in said mortgage only $407.54, but as attorney for others and himself received, in all, 1726.25, after deducting rent, $10.40.

An amended answer was filed by Wilbur, which did not differ materially, except setting out some points more in detail, and pleading that no cause of action had accrued to the plaintiff within six years. The evidence in the case will be stated in the opinion of the court so far as material, except the original contract, a copy of which is annexed, marked (A.)

"(A.) This agreement made and entered into, between Christopher Lippitt, of Jewett City, Connecticut, of the one part, and R. G. Hazard & Co., of Providence, Rhode Island, on the other part, witnesseth,—that the said Hazard & Co. do hereby agree to assume the payments of certain parcels of machinery, amounting to five hundred spindles and preparation, now purchased or contracted for, by said Lippitt, and also for three hundred spindles and preparation, to be hereafter contracted for by him, the said Lippitt, they receiving bills of sale of the same, as security for the amount advanced, the amount not exceeding ten thousand dollars. And the said Lippitt, on his part, agrees to run the said machinery in his factory at Jewett City, for the benefit of the contracting parties, in manufacturing cotton into 44 brown sheetings, the yarn to be spun from No. 16 to No. 18, well woven and well manufactured in all respects, and pay all proper and necessary attention to the business of said mill, to receive the cotton in Providence, and deliver the goods there; for and in consideration of which he is to receive three and one half cents, cash, per yard, which is to be in full for the manufacturing of said goods. The said Hazard & Co. further agree to pay all proper and necessary attention to purchasing the stock, disposing of the goods, negotiating drafts, and any and all other business which it may be requisite for them to attend to in Providence, and charge nothing for the same, unless they guarantee sales; in that case, the usual guarantee commissions to be allowed them. It is further agreed, that the profits arising from said business shall be equally divided between the contracting parties. This agreement to commence immediately, and continue until the 25th day of March, 1830; and if, at that time, the said Lippitt's part, or one half of the profits with the interest thereon, which are to be applied to the payment of the money advanced, should not be sufficient to pay said advance, he is to be at liberty to continue until it shall be paid for in this way, or to have the privilege of paying the deficit with the interest, from that time in two years from the termination of this contract. It is also understood, that interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, is to be allowed on all amounts received or paid by either of the contracting parties, (except the advance, on account of purchase of machinery,) from the time at which it was received, or paid, to the time of settlement, which is to be semi-annual, and balances then due, to the time of final settlement. The account with the factory, in consequence of this agreement, is to be kept with the Griswold factory, and all just charges against said factory, to be as binding on the contracting parties, as if entered in their names.

"Providence, March 7, 1828."

In the written arguments by counsel it is stated, that an action at law of trover is also pending for this machinery in this court between these parties; and that if the complainant on the facts in this case should appear to be entitled to recover either in this bill, or that action, judgment is to be rendered for the plaintiff. The action of trover is the second one at the head of this report.

Rivers and J. Whipple, for plaintiff.

Potter, A. Greene, and R. Greene, for respondent.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. This case has some features rather novel. No fraud or mistake is charged in the bill; no papers are asked to be given up or cancelled; nor any request made of an account of profits and receipts, which grow out of any general copartnership, or which are very intricate and difficult either to estimate or ascertain; nor is any specific performance desired of a contract made between these parties, that has been fulfilled on the part of the plaintiff, and not on the part of the respondent. But the complainant asks us to compel the respondent to pay for machinery, which is alleged to belong to the plaintiff with interest for the use of it since Sept. 11, 1832. Had the bill stopped here, our jurisdiction over it in chancery could not probably be maintained. But it goes farther, and, averring that said machinery had been pledged to R. G. Hazard & Co. by Lippitt, and by them assigned to Almy, the complainant, and having afterwards by Lippitt been transferred to the respondent, the bill asks that he be made to pay the balance of the sum advanced for said machinery, and for a double speeder since, with interest on the same; or to deliver up the machinery and speeder in good order, and pay rent and account for profits for them since Sept. 11, 1832.

This, though rather inartificially set out, as an application to compel the holder of mortgaged property to redeem or surrender the possession and account for profits, is probably the object contemplated, and is within the power of a court of chancery. Nor does any objection seem to be taken to this, as a proceeding in chancery, by the respondent; and this perhaps arises from the circumstance, that a suit at law in trover is pending for the machinery, and is to be considered by agreement in connection with this, and that the plaintiff is to have judgment. If, in the opinion of the court, entitled to recover in either.

It would have been better that this agreement about those suits had been printed with the record, and some particulars presented as to what is claimed in the suit at law, whether including the speeder or not, the time when the action was brought, the damages demanded, &c. But I now am informed that it embraces all the machinery, and was brought at the same term, and is for $10,000 damages. On the aspect of the whole case as now exhibited in the bill, answer and evidence. It must be confessed that not much reason is seen why ample redress may not be had at law; and when it can be, this court will not usually sustain proceedings in chancery to obtain relief. See Carpenter v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 185. But on proper averments, giving to this court jurisdiction in equity, it can, in proper cases, and will sustain proceedings once duly begun there, though a good remedy exists at law. Much more will it be done if the relief here is more full or appropriate. See Foster v. Swasey, [Case No. 4,984;] Pierpont v. Fowle, [Id. 11,152.]

A discovery here was first asked of facts useful in a trial at law or equity, and the bill may have been necessary to compel it. After having failed to elicit any thing material, or having succeeded, a court of chancery frequently dismisses the bill, and lets the party use the evidence at law which he has thus obtained; but this will not always be done where the discovery has succeeded in material respects. Especially will it not be, if the lapse of time, or some other circumstance, would now render relief at law impracticable or defective, or so difficult as to justify this court in continuing its jurisdiction in equity over the case, having once legitimately got possession of it. It may be for a disclosure as well as for the payment of a mortgage of personal property by the holder of it; or it may be for a restoration of it specifically; and if not doing that, by being compelled to pay its value.

A bill in equity lies to get possession of a pledge, so as to sell it and pay the debt, or foreclose redemption, unless payment is soon made. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1008. Equity alone at first allowed redemption after the day of payment had passed, and thus got jurisdiction over mortgages, (Id. § 1014;) and sometimes perhaps on the ground that accident prevented payment, or a mistake, or that a trust existed. A pledgee may force payment in equity, or get the article, and has a right to sell. Id. § 1032. Sometimes without suit, if the pledgee is in possession, a pledgor cannot regain possession unless tendering the balance due. Id. § 1033. As to mortgages and pledges, the suits are usually between the original parties; but here the plaintiff, as a good assignee, may enforce the contract, and the defendant, as a second mortgagee in possession, may well be held liable to pay the first mortgage, or surrender the property, to be sold and applied first to discharge the first lien. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 484, 486.

I say nothing farther, as to the accounting here, or a special partnership giving jurisdiction, as this bill is not to settle the quasi partnership concern or its accounts, but rather in that view the title to some of the property one of the partners put in. There may have been some idea here that chancery had jurisdiction of the matter, because, if not a mortgage, there was a trust connected with the delivery of the machinery to Lippitt under the contract, that he might have a conveyance of the same, on paying the amount advanced; or that, in such an event, Lippitt might be entitled to a specific performance of the contract, and have a written transfer to himself of the machinery. And there is little doubt there was such a trust, if not a mortgage, evidenced in some degree by the possession of the machinery, and making part payments towards the money advanced; and such a contract as this could be enforced so as to compel the holder of the property to convey to Lippitt on a tender of the amount, if the want of mutuality should not appear and defeat it,—that is, the want of a mutual imperative obligation on Lippitt to pay and buy. But, notwithstanding such a trust or contract here, they were in favor of Lippitt, and not the complainant, and are not, and could not be set out by the latter as any ground for his recovery of the property. The only use he can make of such a trust or contract is by way of evidence; furnishing some reason or excuse why Lippitt was allowed under them so long to have possession of the machinery, and thus rebutting the inference from that possession, that any absolute title existed in Lippitt.

But one prayer in this bill may be deemed a request to enforce the payment of a mortgage of personal property; and though not against the mortgagor, yet it is against his assignee, claiming a right and title to the mortgaged property, and hence in equity bound to pay the balance due or surrender the mortgaged property, or, if that is destroyed and lost, to pay its value. This, and the material disclosures asked, do, in my view, give to us jurisdiction in equity. This is more important to the defendant than the plaintiff, as the latter has a suit at law, in which he can recover, if not in equity and with less embarrassment than in equity; and the jurisdiction is therefore retained on this side of the court, rather than the other alone, because it gives the defendant certain equitable benefits he would not enjoy at law in converting his contract into a mortgage, and also in obtaining allowances as to the debt of the plaintiff, and his own responsibilities for the machinery, which could not be given to him in the suit at law. Having jurisdiction then in this way, I shall proceed to submit some views on the further merits of the case, as they strike my mind after a careful examination; and shall grant redress to the plaintiff, if he seems entitled to any, on all the facts and equities of the case.

It is the better view of the facts at law, that the interest in the machinery, originally purchased by Lippitt and that purchased by Hazard & Co. became, by the bills of sale of it from the makers or former owners to Hazard & Co., and by their payment of all the consideration, vested absolutely in them. Their interest also became, by the transfer of their assignees, duly vested in the plaintiff, as likewise was vested the interest in the double speeder, which the plaintiff alone bought, and never conveyed to any one. They both stood as his in Sept. 1832, when Lippitt stopped taking cotton of the plaintiff. The objections to this view arise from two sources, and will be considered before examining the transactions subsequent to 1832.

The first source of exception is in the original contract, under which Hazard & Co. advanced the consideration, and took a conveyance of the title from third persons. That is a written contract with Lippitt, and is a part of the evidence in the case. But in considering the objection resting on a part of this contract, it is to be remembered, in the outset, that the title of Hazard & Co. to the machinery was not conveyed to them in it by Lippitt, though it is singular that this important fact is not distinctly set out in the bill; nor is it pretended that the consideration of that conveyance came from Lippitt at first. Theirs was then a perfect and absolute title at law from a third person, and obtained by acts and writings and payments, sufficient to vest and complete it in Hazard & Co. entirely, without any aid from the contract with Lippitt. But that contract led to it, and was connected with it, and therefore must be considered. It could, however, hardly change that conveyance at law to a conditional title or a mortgage, as the parties to it were not the same.

In the next place, it was not made at the time of the bills of sale to Hazard & Co. Now at law a defeasance, to make an absolute deed of land a mortgage, must generally run to the grantor, and be of the same date. See Shapley v. Rangeley, [Case No. 12,707.] But such a contract might create duties and obligations between the parties to it, in trust or otherwise, which at law as well as in equity courts would go far to protect by damages or enforce specifically, whenever an equitable ground for interference was established. How is that here? The contract stipulated, that after Hazard & Co. should take conveyances of the machinery and pay for it, limiting their advance to $10,000, Lippitt might run it in his factory on the terms which are detailed in the statement of the case from the bill. The parties seem to have expected, that in about two years, i. e. by March 25, 1830, half the profits might enable Lippitt to pay for the machinery. But if they did not, he was at liberty to pay for it from other sources in two years more, or proceed further with this arrangement. Interest was not to be paid on this advance; but probably the half profits were allowed to Hazard & Co. instead of that and their commissions for sales. Here the body of the agreement closes, and standing alone, except for one expression as to the bill of sale to H. Hazard & Co., being "security for the amount advanced," would leave little doubt that the matter was a mere special contract by Hazard & Co. to buy the machinery of others, and lease it to Lippitt on certain terms. By those terms Lippitt might earn money and pay Hazard & Co. for it, or might abandon that interest and never pay for it, at his option, but be liable for rent or interest, unless these were compensated by the rate at which Lippitt let Hazard & Co. have the cloth, while Lippitt continued to carry it to them. But unfortunately, after the body of the contract closes, and after the signatures and attestation of witnesses, a memorandum is made and signed, which has created much of the difficulty as to the true construction of it. It is in these words:—"It is understood, that the machinery, mentioned in the foregoing instrument, is only to be holden by the said Hazard & Co. as collateral security for the money advanced, and that it is to be given up to said Lippitt on his refunding said advance, until which time the said Lippitt hereby agrees to keep it insured." Now the impression, that this made the bills of sale from third persons to Hazard & Co. a mortgage, or that it converted the title of Hazard & Co. into that of mere pawnees, is probably not tenable at law, however it might be in equity. I entertain no doubt, that the parties regarded it in effect as a mortgage or pledge, though flung into the form of a mere special contract, either for greater security to those advancing the money, or to save writing two instruments. Both parties seem at times to have talked of the machinery as pledged or mortgaged to secure the original sum paid. In another view it might not be a mortgage at law, as it is doubtful whether any debt existed in favor of Hazard & Co. against Lippitt which he was bound to pay, and to recover which they could bring against him a separate suit. Such is not the express language of the contract. But a debt must exist in order to sustain the position, that this was a mortgage, there being generally no mortgage without a debt, if connected with money. Here Lippitt was "at liberty" to buy the machinery on paying the original price. But he was not expressly bound in any clause for that purpose, to buy and to pay. He seems rather to have been left at liberty to do as he pleased. Conway's Ex'rs v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 218, 237; [Porter v. Nelson,] 4 N. H. 130.

Even in equity there must generally be mutuality to constitute a mortgage, or trust, or any thing tantamount to either; that is, there must be an imperative obligation to pay, on the one hand, or have been an actual payment or good consideration passed from the cestui que trust, or no good foundation exists for a promise or obligation to convey on the part of the trustee. See cases collected in Tufts v. Tufts, [Case No. 14,223;] Brashier v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 528, 539; Delane v. Delane, 7 Brown, Parl. Cas. 279; [Guest v. Homfray,] 5 Ves. 818; [Shaftesbury v. Ar- rowsmith,] 4 Ves. 66. But going to the other words used, as to the machinery being held as "security for the amount advanced," and in the memorandum, being promised "to be given up" on Lippitt's paying the advance, a debt is perhaps sufficiently recognized and implied in the contract itself, and could be enforced as a debt in equity, if not at law; and it seems to me, that I should not do justice between these parties, unless I held this to be a mortgage at least in equity, and took jurisdiction in the case in equity on the grounds before named, in order to enforce what is legal and moral as to all. The cases in equity have gone so far as to consider that a mortgage, which is in form absolute, but where the relation of lender and borrower had existed, or great inequality of consideration was paid, or possession long left in the mortgagor, or a defeasance promised, and a variety of other circumstances, detailed in Hunter v. Marlboro', [Case No. 6,908,] and Bentley v. Phelps, [Id. 1,331,] and cases there cited. See, also, Porter v. Nelson, 4 N. H. 130. But still the idea of a debt due runs through most of the cases, deemed to be mortgages there; and it probably existed here, a debt to be paid in a peculiar manner, but still a debt.

The whole object in the purchase, and all the relations of the parties to the subject, show the advances made by R. Hazard & Co. were to be considered by them in substance as a debt,—a debt to be paid in a special way, if the debtor pleased, till 1832; but a debt in the outset as well as afterward, and secured by letting the lenders take the original title from the vendors, rather than the latter conveying to the debtor, and he to the lenders. So the memorandum manifestly intended to compel Hazard & Co. to give up the machinery to Lippitt, if he paid for it, and in that way to hold it only as security for the sums advanced, as is mentioned in the body of the instrument. And if Lippitt had at any time paid the amount advanced, a court of law in an action against R. Hazard & Co. would give ample damages for a refusal to release the title to Lippitt, and a court of chancery would, in that event, probably compel a specific performance of this branch of the agreement. Burnham v. Rangeley, [Case No. 2,176;] Bentley v. Phelps, [Id. 1,331.] Surely they would, unless it was void for the want of a mutual obligation on the part of Lippitt to pay for and buy this machinery. The question, whether this was a mortgage or not at law, is very important; as the party has a suit at law, and may yet abandon this bill, and rely on that suit. And if not a mortgage at law, the contract, as a mere agreement about personal property, need not be recorded probably in any state. Swift v. Thompson, 9 Conn. 63; Talcott v. Wilcox, Id. 134. Every one knows that such contracts, when not mortgages, are never required either to be recorded or brought to the knowledge of subsequent purchasers, as mere contracts about personal estate.

There would be no harm to Lippitt in viewing this contract as a mortgage, and hence as a debt by Lippitt, except it would extend the original liability of Lippitt to pay for the machinery otherwise than by profits on the contract. That is of no consequence in this suit, unless being deemed a mortgage in equity, as it must then be, it need not, under the Connecticut statute, be recorded in order to be valid. Transactions are deemed mortgages in equity, which are not always in law. Flagg v. Mann, [Case No. 4,847;] [Lupton v. Cornell,] 4 Johns. Ch. 189. The statute of Connecticut appears to relate to mortgages in law, and must be so construed of course, where not otherwise reasonable. But more of this hereafter, and on it I shall give no decisive opinion, none being found to be necessary; and though recording, or a change of possession, or notice of a mortgage, may usually be proper, yet it may not be so necessary to prevent frauds on purchasers and creditors of the mortgagor in cases like this, as in others, where he had before the mortgage owned and controlled the property. First, then, was a change of possession necessary? and next, was recording? It was not necessary, under 13 Eliz., made to protect creditors, or 27 Eliz., made to protect purchasers, unless the vendor was the debtor, or the prior seller was. Where A. is a debtor, and sells property or mortgages it, then the possession ought to accompany the title, as a general principle; but if it does not, that circumstance alone does not vitiate the sale. Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 434; Portland Bank v. Stacey, 4 Mass. 662. I am aware that some cases hold, if the possession be not then changed, it is conclusive evidence of fraud, or per se fraud. Swift v. Thompson, 9 Conn. 63; Talcott v. Wilcox, Id. 134. While others consider it so as against subsequently attaching creditors, but not against purchasers. But the better doctrine seems to be as to a case like this, even if it be a mortgage, that, at common law, ([Bissell v. Hopkins,] 3 Cow. 166; [Badlam v. Tucker,] 1 Pick. 389; [Homes v. Crane,] 2 Pick. 607,) in case of a mortgage of personal property, if possession be not changed, it is not even prima facie of fraud. Ash v. Savage, 5 N. H. 547; 4 Masson, 534, [De Wolf v. Harris, Case No. 4,221;] [Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co.,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 449; [Holbrook v. Baker,] 5 Greenl. 309. See Leland v. The Medora, [Case No. 8,237;] [Bucklin v. Thompson,] 1 J. J. Marsh. 223; Lewis v. Stevenson, 2 Hall, 82. Certainly possession retained by the mortgagor is not per se fraudulent, but may be honest, and so explained satisfactorily. De Wolf v. Harris, [Case No. 4,221;] 4 Masson, 537, [Phettplace v. Sayles, Case No. 11,083;] Bissell v. Hopkins, 3 Cow. 166, 189, note; [Bartlett v. Williams,] 1

Pick. 288; [Badlam v. Tucker,] Id. 389; [Dawes v. Cope,] 4 Bin. 258. It is some evidence of fraud, but not conclusive. 1 Baldw. 533, 534, [Merrill v. Rinker, Case No. 9,471;] Smith v. Acker, 23 Wend. 653; 1 Gall. 419, [Mecker v. Wilson, Case No. 9,392.] In the present case the conveyance was from a third person, while in [Swift v. Thompson,] 9 Conn. 63, it was from a former owner and possessor still retaining it. Colby v. Cressey, 5 N. H. 238. In these cases of an absolute sale, possession so retained is, as in Twyne's Case, [3 Coke, 80; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (Amer. Ed.) 33,] a badge of fraud, but not conclusive upon it, unless it be admitted there is a trust, or it cannot be explained without a trust. Coburn v. Pickering, 3 N. H. 424; Parker v. Pattee, 4 N. H. 178; Trask v. Bowers, Id. 309; Haven v. Low, 2 N. H. 13; [Worseley v. Demattos,] 1 Burrows, 474, 477. In all these cases, the true inquiry is, where no statute exists, what was the intent in not changing the possession? If it was to benefit the vendor, to give him a secret trust or advantage or interest not parted with, and not appearing on the face of the contract, the jury should hold it satisfactory evidence of fraud. But if it was a part of the contract, as it usually is in mortgages, and more especially so in those of real estate, if it was consistent with the situation and rights of the parties, was open, public and honest, it should not be satisfactory evidence of fraud. See Leland v. The Medora, [Case No. 8,237.] It is not evidence of fraud if a mortgagor retains possession by the terms of the contract. U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 75; [Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co.,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 449.

By the principle of the civil law the mortgagor retains the use of the thing pledged, unless there is a special agreement to have it go to the mortgagee to be used for the interest. Kaufman's Mack, 383. The mortgagor may then alienate the article mortgaged, but it passes subject to the prior mortgage, and if aliened without the consent of the prior mortgagee, it is by the civil law regarded as a species of theft. Id. The first mortgagee may enforce his right against every subsequent possessor. Id. 384. He who is prior in tempore is potior in jure in all these cases, unless the subsequent mortgage or lien is of a higher grade, or made to preserve the thing mortgaged. Id. 392. Such as the prior lien of the government for debts or taxes, and the bottomry subsequently made of a vessel in order to repair her. Id. 388, 389. See Leland v. The Medora, [Case No. 8,237.] Several of the decisions, which are supposed to conflict with these views, have been caused by an inadvertent conformity to the words and principles of the English bankrupt laws and the adjudications under them, when they are not at all in force here.

Lippitt to the plaintiff, nor any previous title having been in him, none of these cases are in point, which arise at common law, or under the statute of Elizabeth; and the only question is, whether Hazard & Co., by merely allowing him to have possession of the machinery under the contract till Sept. 1832, were per se guilty of a fraud; not whether buying of him and leaving him in possession would be evidence of a fraud. The act of 21 Jac. I., as to bankrupts, makes any property left in their possession and control, by the true owner, or with his consent, liable to be retained and go to the creditors of bankrupts as a part of their assets, on the ground that they were enabled thereby to obtain new and additional credit. [Gordon v. East India Co.,] 7 Term R. 228; [Darby v. Smith,] 8 Term R. 82; [Lingham v. Biggs,] 1 Bos. & P. 82; [Walker v. Burnell,] 1 Doug. 317; [Ryall v. Rowles,] 1 Ves. Sr. 348, 369; [Ryall v. Rolle,] 1 Atk. 166; [Francis v. Wyatt,] 3 Burrows, 1502; [Read v. Burley,] Cro. Eliz. 550, 596; 1 Hals. 260. But a power to dispose of or sell must be allowed or given by the true owner to bring a case within this statute. Jarman v. Woolloton, 3 Term R. 622; Collins v. Forbes, Id. 322. The language of 21 Jac. I., is: "If any person shall become bankrupt, and at such time shall by the consent of the true owner have in his possession, order and disposition any goods whereof he shall be the reputed owner, and take upon him the sale, alteration or disposition as owner," the commissioners on his estate may sell the same, &c. [Jarman v. Woolloton,] 3 Term R. 622. In this case there is no pretence, that the true owner consented or gave authority that Lippitt should dispose of or sell this machinery. So, if the bankrupt is in possession for a specific purpose of goods of another, his assignees cannot hold them. Cooke, Bankr. Laws, 320, 321; [Flynn v. Mathews,] 1 Atk. 185; [Walker v. Burnell,] 1 Doug. 317; [Collins v. Forbes,] 3 Term R. 316; [Salte v. Field,] 5 Term R. 212. Such as to manufacture or use for a particular object, as here; for he then has not the right to sell as in case of goods, and the bankrupt law applies to merchants and selling and buying, and not to other claims. Not if possessed as debtor, or in right of a wife, her separate estate, or as factor. This was also a peculiar provision of the bankrupt system, not existing at common law, and of course was not applicable under that system even in England, except to merchants and others coming within its provisions. Nor is a mere temporary possession for a special purpose considered there within this principle as the taking possession is not then an act done to appear as owner. [Copeman v. Gallant,] 1 P. Wms. 318; [Godfrey v. Furzo,] 3 P. Wms. 185. So in Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 434, though that was not the case of a bankrupt. Collins v. Forbes, 3 Term R. 316, was like the present case.

I am not aware, that the statute of James can be considered as in force, without the express enactments of the bankrupt system, which do not now exist here. Nor is there any analogy, which justifies their adoption, unless in point of fact the evidence shows that a person, becoming an insolvent, was allowed by the true owner to have possession and control of property, which he had not bought, and have it for the purpose of getting credit and to mislead others. Portland Bank v. Stacy, 4 Mass. 663; [Craig v. Ward,] 9 Johns. 197; Bac. Abr. "Bankrupt," F. There is no pretence that this was the design here. Most of the cases reported in England are under this special bankrupt act; and even that never could apply where the possession was given not to dispose of the article but for honest purposes and conformed to them, as to a written contract or deed. J. Buller, in [Haselinton v. Gill,] 3 Term R. 621, note. As if, on a quasi lease, or a contract to apply half the profits of its use towards the purchase; or wool to be manufactured, &c. Otherwise the principle would be, that every possessor of property could pass the title, whether he had any or not beyond mere naked possession, which has never been the law in this or perhaps any other country. Spring v. Coffin, 10 Mass. 33; Jarman v. Woolloton, per Ld. Kenyon, 3 Term R. 620. And though in such case, as in many others, the public might mistake where the real title was, and the possession for a length of years might induce the world to think the title had gone with it, yet every purchaser, if not every creditor, must run some risk as to title when he buys, beyond mere possession, and must inquire at his peril into the real truth as to ownership. "Caveat emptor" is the common law-maxim.

The original insurance showed, also, that Lippitt admitted the title to be in Hazard & Co.; and it was continued for them by Lippitt from 1828 to 1830, the year after their failure. After that Lippitt seems to have insured in his own name, though it is not pretended he got any new title or power till 1832 or 1835. It is possible, that in some cases the possession of property may be such by a bailee, or conditional owner or mortgagor or consignee, as to get credit on them, and bind them for the debts of the holder of the property in possession. Hussey v. Thornton, 4 Mass. 407. Such as the case of a sale and actual delivery under it, but void for fraud practised, yet till avoided, a purchaser from the occupant without notice of any original fraud will hold; for the former owner has allowed him not only to appear as owner, but to act so, and sell if he pleases. So in Rhode Island by statute, the consignor is deemed owner, to be liable for advances in case of consignments of goods to sell, (Rev. St. 1844, p. 279,) if the consignee be not aware he was not owner. So of an agent to sell in possession of them, he is deemed owner to cover new advances, not for old debts. But here

It is hardly possible to suppose there was not notice enough to put Wilbur on inquiry, and even to be satisfied of the main facts. Or that Lippitt had any right, as agent, to sell this machinery like merchandise, or as a consignee, when he merely had it to use as a mechanic till paid for or returned.

A change of possession not being required by law in this case, or that possession should accompany the title of the mortgagee, how is the law as to the necessity of recording the mortgage? The requirement as to that is by statute alone. By the statute of Connecticut, (Ed. 1839,) tit. 2, mortgages of chattels or machinery, if recorded as mortgages of real estate, are good, though possession be not taken by the mortgagee. And page 391, tit. 57, deeds of real estate are not good, except against the grantor and his heirs, unless recorded. It is by no means certain, that the not recording of a mortgage of machinery renders it void, if the possession be not changed, when by the terms of the mortgage the possession was to be retained for use. Id. But if it was, the mortgage here was known by Wilbur to exist, and this both in law and equity has long been deemed equivalent, or a substitute for recording. For where by statute a mortgage must be recorded, notice of a prior mortgage to put a party on inquiry, is sufficient, though the mortgage be not recorded. [Porter v. Cole,] 4 Greenl. 27; [Rogers v. Jones,] 8 N. H. 264; [Kendall v. Lawrence,] 22 Pick. 544; Stow v. Meserve, 13 N. H. 50. A second mortgagee with notice of a prior one is barred by it. [Jackson v. Van Valkenburgh,] 8 Cow. 260. So an assignee. [Lewis v. Stevenson,] 2 Hall, 63; [Stroud v. Lockart,] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 153. There is no reason why this principle should not apply to mortgages of personal property as well as of real. Again, whether an equitable mortgage like this need be recorded or not, I do not find it necessary to decide; but the following cases throw some light on the question: [Le Neve v. Le Neve,] 1 Ves. Sr. 64; [Berry v. Mutual Ins. Co.,] 2 Johns. Ch. 603; [Jackson v. Sharp,] 9 Johns. 163; [Dunham v. Dey,] 15 Johns. 555; [Jackson v. Burgott,] 10 Johns. 457; [Wiseman v. Westland,] 1 Younge & J. 121; [Davis v. Earl of Strathmore,] 16 Ves. 430; [Le Neve v. Le Neve,] 3 Atk. 650; [Bushell v. Bushell,] 1 Schoales & L. 100; [Doe v. Allsop,] 5 Barn. & Ald. 147. It is very doubtful, whether equitable mortgages, as liens, unless maritime ones, can be allowed to prevail against third persons, unless recorded, or notice of them otherwise exists. [Hodgson v. Dean,] 2 Sim. & S. 224; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 615.

Having disposed of these questions, it is next contended, that other grounds should defeat a recovery by the plaintiff. Some arguments and authorities have been submitted to show, that the business between Hazard & Co. and Lippitt was that of a copartnership business, and is to be governed by the rules applicable to such transactions. It may have been a quasi partnership under the contract, so far as regards what was to be done in making and selling cloth, and dividing and applying the profits. But that arrangement was a matter distinct from the title and interests of the parties in the capital and machinery which was to be furnished and employed. As to this, which is the main question here, Lippitt was to furnish the building, water power, and labor in manufacturing, &c.; and Hazard & Co. to furnish the machinery, not costing over $10,000, and buy the cotton, and sell the cloth without commissions, except paying three and a half cents per yard for making, and keeping half the profits, and applying the other half in Lippitt's behalf, towards paying Hazard & Co. for the machinery. But all this, it will be seen, does not change the title of Hazard & Co. to the machinery till paid for by Lippitt, any more than it changes Lippitt's title to the mill he was to furnish. If, however, either party afterwards neglected to fulfill his portion of the special contract or partnership, if any one pleases to call it so, that would give a remedy for redress on the contract. But it would not affect the title to what was owned by each, and would furnish no set-off as to either party in actions between either of them and other persons, to enforce their rights and titles in their own property. Hence if Lippitt suffered, as he pretends, by cotton not being furnished longer to him by the assignees of Hazard & Co., Lippitt had his remedy against them in an action if they violated the agreement; but he did not thereby become entitled to mortgage or sell their machinery, or convert it to his own use, until he had paid all they had advanced on account of it for him. So in respect to the possession being calculated to mislead, the point that it was held under a quasi partnership might be important to rebut any inference of fraud from such a possession, but would not otherwise bear on the title. It would explain the possession as honest and necessary to carry out the partnership, and would repel any intention to give credit, or enable Lippitt to get credit by possessing and using as his own what was not his own. In that view, this idea of a partnership in the use of the machinery might be very important, if the case otherwise looked like one fraudulent and deceptive, so as otherwise to be void. But this view would not subject the machinery to be taken for a private debt of one of the partners, much less subject it to be sold or mortgaged by one for his separate debt, when it was not, like merchandise, possessed even for partnership purposes, with a view of being sold at all. Rogers v. Batchelor, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 221; [Ex parte Hamper,] 17 Ves. 403, 404; Story, Partn. 41. The other source of objection, that the title of the plaintiff is not clear and perfect, exists in the claims set up by Low & Fenner to some interest in the machinery, in conjunction with Hazard & Co., or as a portion of their assignees.

Low & Fenner seem to claim an interest in the original contract, by some arrangement other than the assignment, to them and others, of Hazard & Co.'s estate. But it is proved so imperfectly, and was repudiated by them so absolutely at first, and is so clearly shown to have been never fulfilled by them, that I find judgment has once been rendered in this court against their claim under any such contract. Kendall v. Almy, [Case No. 7,690.] In respect to the claim of Low & Fenner, merely as being one of the assignees of Hazard & Co., it is to be presumed they declined to act under that assignment, and acquiesced in the other assignees taking the control of all Hazard & Co.'s interest and conveying it to Almy. They assented to Almy's holding the whole, 2 Sum. 294. [Kendall v. Almy, supra.] It was an assent or ratification of what had been done by Almy. Such seem to be the facts as now developed; and it cannot be permitted to them, or their assigns, to blow hot and cold as to the same transaction; and at one time disclaim all interest, and refuse to go on; and at another to insist on an interest, when it is likely to prove advantageous. In answer to another objection, that the assignment to Almy, the plaintiff, is not proved to have been made at all, and hence that his right to recover fails, it is sufficient to say, that the bill affirms it was made before the mortgage to the defendant; and the answer does not deny this averment, but merely denies any knowledge of it before the mortgage.

Another objection still is, that the assignment to the plaintiff, though produced, is not proved to have been, in fact, executed at its date.

But the execution of it being established, it must be presumed to have taken place at its date, until the contrary appears. See Best, Pres. 116; U. S. v. Libby, [Case No. 15,597.] The date was four or five years previous to the mortgage. Besides this, all the evidence shows that Almy proceeded to furnish cotton under it, as if owner of the machinery, and even to purchase more machinery at Lippitt's request before the mortgage to the defendant. It appears, further, that Lippitt was informed by Almy and Hazard the day after the assignment, that Almy had become the owner, and Lippitt so treated him afterwards. Whether the defendant had notice of this or not, is of no consequence in respect to the title having thus become actually vested in the plaintiff. I should not be surprised if Almy took the conveyance to oblige Lippitt, as well as secure his own claim, and that R. G. Hazard, as he swears, was to render future assistance in prosecuting the business. This will account for much in the case, otherwise extraordinary, e. g. the continued interest and future active part taken by R. G. Hazard; also the willingness of Almy to consult the Hazards before buying more machinery, and his anxiety to have Lippitt buy the machinery and pay the balance; and Almy's reluctance to go on longer, when Low began, in 1832, to set up claims to the property, which he had before repudiated, and to speak of his (Almy's) own interest, (that is, probably independent of what had been assigned,) as small, it being only the cost of the double speeder. The real beneficial interest seems chiefly to have been in R. G. Hazard, the original advancer of the money for the machinery, and then in Almy only as his assignee, except for the double speeder. R. G. Hazard, wishing to pay his own debts, would be most anxious naturally for Lippitt to go on and pay this money; and when Lippitt suspended or stopped doing it, R. G. Hazard, had his interest not been assigned and in other hands, would probably himself never have permitted matters to sleep as these did; and had Almy owned all the machinery in his own right, and not felt bound to consult R. G. Hazard, as being chiefly interested, and he often absent, would himself probably have taken earlier and more decisive steps about it.

Thus matters stood, when in September, 1832, Lippitt, ceasing to apply to the plaintiff for cotton, or to insure the property for him, or to bring cloth to him for sale under the contract, a condition of things new in some respects began; the time for paying for the machinery otherwise than with cloth had just expired. But there is no pretence in any of the evidence, that Lippitt had then paid the original advance by means of half the profits, or in any other way, except some confessions of the plaintiff sworn to by C. L. Lippitt, the son of Lippitt; nor is there any pretence from any quarter that the title was then released to him, or was asked to be released, or in any way became invested in Lippitt, except as inferred from other acts. It happens that their intercourse then ceased, and that Lippitt continued to use the machinery alone and independent of the contract, and insured it for himself. Almy ought then, for any thing which appears, to have instituted proceedings to recover his machinery, or enforce a collection of the balance of the debt still due to him. But that this change of conduct by Lippitt did not happen, in consequence of the advances having been all paid by Lippitt to Almy, is very clear from the account now exhibited by Almy and annexed to his bill, and the balance not pretended by Lippitt, who is a witness, ever to have been paid. In March, 1830, he seems in a letter to concede that something like $8000 was still due; so in 1830 and 1831 that a considerable debt still existed. Indeed, he annexes a correspondence with Low, in 1832 and 1833, after the breaking off with Almy, from which it seems that Low, though before denying he was interested, then set up to Lippitt some rights under the contract, but did not comply with the terms of the assignment by paying half of the advance. In that correspondence he speaks of Lippitt's paying the balance to him in February, 1832; then more in detail in October, 1832, and November of the same year; and April 20, 1833, it seems to be still unsettled, and a balance recognized by Lippitt as due. In 1835, also, it is testified by T. R. Hazard, that Lippitt and the defendant both admitted money to be due for the original advance. But the difficulty as to the part interest, set up by Low, probably was one cause, beside others before adverted to, which prevented the going on longer with Almy, and delayed a settlement of the balance, till the conflicting rights of Almy and Low were adjusted. It seems that, in 1835, a suit was instituted by T. C. Kendall, as assignee of Low & Fenner, v. Thomas R. Hazard et al., which brought in question the title of Low to half the profits received by Almy, and it turned out to be defective, and he could not recover them. The cotton, in the mean time, was bought by himself, (Lippitt,) the defendant being his indorser.

Another reason for not going on under the contract, though the machinery remained not paid for, as stated in another affidavit by Lippitt, was the advice of Almy, not to do it, as Almy probably had got nearly enough to pay his own advance for the double speeder, (and that may be what he referred to in talking with Lippitt's son) and advised Lippitt that the other parties being bankrupt, he (Lippitt) might lose the cloth or the profits on what he let them have. But Lippitt did not pretend, then, that any more of the original advance had been paid, than is now admitted by the plaintiff. Perhaps Lippitt could have sued R. G. Hazard or his assignees, had he wished them to go on and furnish cotton and he furnish cloth on the terms of the contract; and possibly they might have been able to have compelled Lippitt to work up their cotton on those terms; or if not, to exonerate them from liability longer, to convey to him the machinery, and to let them retake it, and therefore lose the use of it, or the interest or its value. Neither, however, seemed to move in that direction, and hence some countenance is given to the idea that the payment had been completed; and, without the counter admissions and confessions concerning this, the rest might be sufficient to show it after so long a lapse of time. The defendant avers in his answer, also,—but it is supported only by the general facts just named, and C. Lippitt's evidence,—that little remained due to the plaintiff, and that C. Lippitt therefore informed the defendant, in Dec. 1835, when the mortgage was executed to him, that the original advance had been paid, and the title became good in Lippitt. But from other averments in his answer it would seem, that he and the other mortgagees rather supposed that the plaintiff had forfeited or lost any title he otherwise might have had, by not recording what was regarded by them as a mortgage to him by Lippitt. That is the chief reliance in the argument as well as answer; and, from other facts in the case, it would be probable that they knew the claim of Hazard & Co. still to be due, and found, from the abrupt departure of one of the firm, who came to see about it, that a suit would be commenced for the machinery. Hence they had executed the mortgage of this and other estate in haste to the defendant, a brother-in-law, and to others, in order to give them preferences in his expected failure, and secure the property from the assignees of Hazard & Co., if they could, on the ground of so long possession undisturbed, or the invalidity of what they were advised was in law a prior mortgage, unrecorded. However the real truth may be as to the motives, that prompted to the mortgage to the defendant and others, by Lippitt, it is certain that, for any evidence which appears in the case, the plaintiff, as assignee of Hazard & Co. still had the legal title to the machinery, and that Lippitt's interest at law was merely an executory right, under a contract to have the machinery conveyed to him after paying the balance due for the original consideration advanced for it; or, in equity, the rights of a mortgagor—a balance still unpaid. He or Wilbur, his assignee, must prove such a payment or tender of it before having any right, even in equity, to the title. In law, Lippitt could have no real title till an actual conveyance from Almy; and, instead of the weight of evidence on this point being in favor of the defendant, even if his answer on it be responsive to the bill, which is questionable, it is the other way; and the presumption, as just shown, from several leading facts conceded, as well as positive evidence, is, that the debt had never been fully paid. As this then is deemed to be a mortgage in equity, and mortgages must be recorded in Connecticut if the mortgagee be not in possession, it becomes material whether Wilbur then knew of these facts as to the title or not. His knowledge is controverted in the evidence, and denied in his answer. I have before suggested that he had notice of it. All the circumstances of the relationship, which existed between Wilbur and Lippitt, the consulting with him at first and throughout in respect to his business; Wilbur being his indorser and taking this mortgage soon after Hazard claimed the machinery, and urged a settlement; and the reasons set up at first for avoiding Hazard's title; that his was a mortgage, but had not been recorded; all turn the scales in favor of the probability of knowledge, sufficient at least to put him on inquiry, and bind him by any lien or title then outstanding.

We have before shown that such a mortgage is good against all having notice of it. In all cases in England and in this country, where there is a general provision, that a conveyance not recorded is void, it is either by a settled construction or express words, made void only as to third persons, i. e. subsequent purchasers or creditors, without notice of the first conveyance. [Berry v. Mutual Ins. Co.,] 2 Johns. Ch. 603; [Bumpus v. Platner,] 1 Johns. Ch. 216; Colby v. Keniston, 4 N. H. 262. In France it was otherwise. Co. Litt. 290b, Hargrave's note; Wyatt v. Barwell, 19 Ves. 439. Having such knowledge, then, as to the existence of a mortgage, Wilbur cannot then, in law or equity, object to its not being recorded, and is bound by it and all its incidents and consequences, as if it was recorded. Hence he has only Lippitt's rights or interests, if he had this knowledge; or if he had not, and notice or knowledge was not necessary, he obtained merely Lippitt's interests.

Next, what was that interest? It was a right under the contract to use the machinery in conformity to the contract, and to have it conveyed to him on payment of any balance due on the advances made for it by Hazard & Co., and the plaintiff. In December, 1837, without any evidence of any increased title or power over the machinery, except an increased lapse of time from three years to five since the machinery had been run under the contract towards paying the advances by half the profits, and which had conferred no additional title, nor created any bar or estoppel, the defendant undertook to sell the machinery outright to Morgan & Fanning. And he did this though notified in November, 1836, by R. G. Hazard, of the plaintiff's claims from him by assignment to the machinery, and refused to deliver it up on this notice. This sale was a tort or wrong, which would render him liable to an action of trover for the value, as did the refusal, on a demand made by the agent of the plaintiff, to deliver up the property in November, 1836.

The rule of damages in trover would be the true value of the machinery when sold, and interest thereon given in the nature of damages, whether the value was more or less than the machinery sold for, or the interest more or less than any rents or use. But in equity the rule is, treating the matter as a mortgage, to require Wilbur to pay only the balance due; and hence, if less than the value of the machinery and interest since 1835, to let him have the benefit of it; but if not less, to return the machinery itself; and if destroyed, then to pay its value and interest, unless Wilbur did not own the whole, or have the beneficial interest in the whole. In the supplemental answer in this case the statute of limitations is pleaded, and must be considered. It could properly begin to run only from the demand and refusal or from the time of the sale, if the plaintiff choose to and legally could treat that as a tort. But the plaintiff does not choose to regard any prior act as a conversion, without any removal of the machinery, or refusal to deliver it; and there is no evidence of any prior tort; the possession taken by Wilbur under the mortgage of Lippitt's interests not being necessarily a tort, but rightful, if meaning to use and account for it under the contract, or pay the balance and keep it, and which was not rebutted to a certainty till the demand in 1836. The demand and refusal, therefore, are the first clear evidence of a conversion. St. John v. Standing, 2 Johns. 470; [Vincent v. Cornell,] 13 Pick. 294; [Strickland v. Barrett,] 20 Pick. 415; [Oriental Bank v. Tremont Ins. Co.,] 4 Metc. (Mass.) 6; [Vasse v. Smith,] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 226; [Dench v. Walker,] 14 Mass. 499; [Melville v. Brown,] 15 Mass. 82; Ang. Lim. 327, 328; [Callis v. Tolson,] 6 Gill & J. 81; [Slaymaker v. Wilson,] 1 Pen. & W. 216. It was not six years from this demand till the service of notice of the filing of the bill, and hence the plea of the statute fails. It is very extraordinary that such delay should have occurred after the demand and refusal, there having been four years previous, and then nearly six following it before suit; and no intimation transpired of any intervening claim, except a letter by the plaintiff in 1840, stating he was advised to sue. Persons who sleep over their rights in this way must expect embarrassment and doubts; and if they succeed at all, it will be only because the law and the evidence seem to require it, though always clouded and uncertain by such unusual procrastination. One may hold possession of mortgaged property so long, being the mortgagor, as to raise a presumption that the debt has been paid; but in case of real estate, it must be twenty years. Ang. Lim. 490; [Trash v. White,] 3 Brown, Ch. 291; [Marquis Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton,] 2 Jac. & W. 179; [Christophers v. Sparke,] Id. 234; [Jackson v. Wood,] 12 Johns. 242; [Hughes v. Edwards,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 497; [Monell v. Monell,] 5 Johns. Ch. 283; [Giles v. Baremore,] Id. 545. So if a mortgagee is in possession twenty years, the mortgagor cannot redeem, unless a clear admission is proved that it is held for a debt still, and is not foreclosed. [Elmendorf v. Taylor,] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 152; Ang. Lim. 448, 449; [Marks v. Pell,] 1 Johns. Ch. 594; [Jackson v. Shearman,] 6 Johns. 21; [Barron v. Martin,] 19 Ves. 327. So if a debt be barred by the statute of limitations, it is still in existence to uphold a pledge, if the claim be not barred as to that. [Belknap v. Gleason,] 11 Conn. 160; [Thayer v. Mann,] 19 Pick. 535; [Vice v. Thomas,] 2 Cox, Ch. 123; [Colby v.

Everett,] 10 N. H. 429; Ang. Lim. 77; [Spears v. Hartly,] 3 Esp. 81. So a debt may be barred by the statute of limitations, though secured by a pledge, so as not to sue for that debt, and be still good for the pledge. Slaymaker v. Wilson, 1 Pen. & W. 219. (Semb.) The better view perhaps is, that the debt itself is not barred if the mortgage is not. Heyer v. Pruyn, 7 Paige, 470; [Jackson v. Sackett,] 7 Wend. 94. Where tort will not lie on account of a shorter statute of limitations, assumpsit will, if the sale of the article was within six years, or an account has been rendered within that time; as the last takes it out of the statute. Ang. Lim. 76; [Hony v. Hony,] 1 Sim. & S. 568; [Willet v. Willet,] 3 Watts, 277; [Lamb v. Clark,] 5 Pick. 193, 285; [Martin v. Mayor, etc., of Brooklyn,] 1 Hill, 545.

I have spoken of Wilbur's being liable in trover at law, for converting this property, and of the rule of damages. But whether he could be adjudged in chancery to pay the balance of the debt due to the complainant from Lippitt, or restore the property, might in one view be questionable, if the debt is barred, as it would seem to be, independent of the mortgage, by the statute of limitations. The general rule however is, as just stated, that a debt secured by mortgage is not barred by the statute of limitations, if the remedy on or for the article mortgaged be not barred. See Ang. Lim. 490, 500, 501. Here the remedy for the machinery is not barred, though it would clearly be for the debt, except for the circumstance just named, and on that see cases already cited. There doubtless are cases where in equity, if the circumstances and responsibilities of parties have changed essentially by delay, though not long enough to bar a recovery under the statute of limitations, it might show any relief in chancery to be inequitable, even if jurisdiction was otherwise clear in it over the case; and if inequitable, that the case should be left as at law where we find it. Mason v. Crosby, [Case No. 9,234;] Tufts v. Tufts, [Id. 14,233;] Ang. Lim. 170. A court of chancery, or the court acting on its chancery side, would say in such a case, it declined to interfere with extraordinary equity powers, in behalf of one who had slept over his rights so long as to render the enforcement of them in equity not equitable. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 771, 776; [Heaphy v. Hill,] 2 Sim. & S. 29; Newl. Cont. 242. But, declining here to dispose of this case in chancery would have been injurious to the defendant, in having his question considered and decided for him, that the contract between Lippitt and R. G. Hazard & Co. was a mortgage, and would have made him liable at law absolutely for the whole value of the machinery and interest since the conversion. Whereas now if going on in chancery, and if held liable there, as seems on the whole case proper, it subjects him to pay only the balance of the debt, which may be less than the value of the machinery; and, if not less, subjects him only to return the machinery, and if that cannot be done, to pay only its value when converted, and interest since. Let a master then be appointed to ascertain the amount of debt due, and the value of the machinery when sold.

The balance due to the plaintiff is to be ascertained first, casting interest only after Sept. 1832, when Lippitt refused longer to go on under the contract. The repairs devolved on Lippitt and Wilbur, and the surplus of rents over what is allowed the plaintiff as interest, till 1836, belong to the respondent. In a bill in equity to compel the redemption of a mortgage on personal property against one who held possession of and claimed it, I see no objection to his being required to pay in damages the value of the property, if it has been destroyed, and he does not prefer to pay the balance of the debt charged upon it. [Wills v. Stradling,] 3 Ves. 378; [Clinan v. Cooke,] 1 Schoales & L. 41; Warner v. Daniels, [Case No. 17,181.]

But I do not propose now to settle the form of the final decree. Let one be entered on the points decided; and, after the report of the master, the rest of the remedy can be given in the shape of a specific performance of the original agreement required of Wilbur as assignee of Lippitt with knowledge, or to restore the property held in trust, which belongs to the plaintiff; or to account for its value, if not choosing to discharge the balance of the debt which is an incumbrance upon it.

[NOTE. This case was reversed, under title of Wilbur v. Almy, 12 How. (53 U. S.) 180, on the following grounds: (1) The assignment under which complainant claims was executed for the assignees of Hazard & Co. by R. G. Hazard, and was ratified by only one of the assignees, and there was nothing to show that Hazard had authority to act for the assignees, who must unite to pass any title to the property jointly held by them. (2) The evidence tended to show that the assignment to Almy was as collateral security for a debt due him by Hazard & Co., which debt had been fully paid by the profits on the contract before the commencement of this action.]

District Court, D. Maine. Jan. 1869.²

SHIPPING — CARRIAGE OF GOODS — UNCERTAIN AMOUNT — BURDEN OF PROOF — BILL OF LADING — DEMURRAGE.

1. Upon the charter of a vessel to carry a cargo of coal at a stipulated price per ton, the burden rests upon the carrier to prove the quantity carried, and for that amount he is entitled to freight.

2. The master should tender the shipper customary bills of lading when the cargo is on board.

3. The master is not bound to sign bills of lading stipulating freight on a fixed number of tons where the quantity is uncertain.

4. He should tender the shipper the usual bills of lading specifying the quantity of cargo when uncertain, as more or less.

5. If the shipper refuses to take such bill, the master may deposit the same for him and sail, and upon arrival at the port of destination, after reporting to the consignees, may recover freight and damages, as demurrage, for any delay caused in discharging cargo for want of proper bills of lading to enter the same at the custom-house.

In admiralty. Libel in personam by the owner of the vessel [the Alonzo] against [the Montreal Ocean Steamship Company,] shipper of the cargo, to recover freight and demurrage. The respondent by answer disputed the amount of freight demanded, and denied all liability for demurrage.

Almon A. Strout and George F. Shepley, for libellant.

Edward M. Rand and John Rand, for respondent.

FOX, District Judge. This is a libel instituted by the owner of the barque Alonzo of Halifax, to recover from the Montreal Ocean Steamship Co. the freight on 1,034 tons of coal, brought for said respondent from Pictou to Portland, in Oct. last, at the rate of three dollars per ton, and also for ten days' illegal detention of the vessel at Portland, at the rate of fifty dollars per day. The answer admits the delivery of 955 tons of coal and the price per ton for the freight as set forth in the libel, but alleges that the quantity was to be estimated by the weight as shipped from the mines at Pictou, and that only 955 tons were so delivered, according to the mines' weight, and that they paid for no greater quantity. The evidence, as to the agreement made at Pictou for the transportation of the cargo, is nearly all in depositions, and having carefully read the same, I do not find that any such agreement was made as is stated in the answer, and the owners are not by any contract restricted to the quantity as estimated at the mines. The broker, who effected the charter of the barque on the part of the respondent, states that at the time of the contract nothing was said about the mines' weight. The general rule is, that the carrier is entitled to pay for the quantity received on board and delivered, and that rule must govern in the present case.

It does appear that the coal company at Pictou charged the steamship company for only 955 tons as put on board the Alonzo, but there is no positive testimony from any witness as to the exact quantity in fact shipped. No account is produced of the quantity delivered from day to day to the ship, nor has any one testified positively of his own knowledge of the quantity so put on board, but admitting that the agents of the coal company charged the respondents with only 955 tons, the manner, in which the quantity was arrived at, is not very certain and satisfactory. The agent of the coal company says, there were no large scales for weighing coals at the mines, but that the government furnished the cars for transportation of the coal from the mines to Pictou over the government road, receiving a certain rate per ton for transportation, and also a royalty for the coal per ton. The cars were estimated to contain each five gross tons of coal, when loaded even with the top, and as a test of their capacity, the agent states that he once weighed out on a small scale five tons of coal at the mines, which just filled one of the cars level with the top; that the company is now building a scale for the purpose of weighing coal and other matters; that he saw a large number of the cars loaded with the coal, which was part of the Alonzo's cargo, and that the same were only filled even with the top of the car, and not heaped. There were sixty-one cars employed in transporting the coal from the mines to Pictou. The libellant states in his testimony, that he saw many of the cars so loaded, and that the same were heaped up with coal above the top of the car. It appears that the price of coal was only $2.25 per ton, and that one of the owners of the steamship company is a director in the coal company. Under these circumstances I do not apprehend the agents of the coal company would be very particular and exact in their loading of the cars. At best, this mode of ascertaining the quantity is a mere approximation, and should not be conclusive upon the libellant, but must be weighed in connection with the other evidence in the case, and it is in testimony, that before the barque left Pictou, this estimate was not satisfactory to the libellant, but was disputed by him, he claiming that there was a larger quantity on board, and this claim was admitted to be correct by some of those acting there in behalf of the respondents. The vessel, when she left Pictou, drew 18 1-12 feet of water. On a previous voyage, as testified by the master, he had carried a cargo of this same coal to Boston, the vessel being in the same condition and then drawing only 17 9-12 feet. That cargo, he swears, was all weighed out in Boston, and the vessel delivered 1,050 tons, and there is no contradiction of this testimony.

The Alonzo arrived in Portland on the 25th of October, but did not commence discharging until the 4th of November. The customs officers took an account of the coal as it was delivered, weighing every day sixteen tubs. The whole number of tubs according to the inspector's returns was 7,389, of which 160 were weighed, giving an average of 313½ pounds per tub, making an aggregate of 1,034 tons; and for this amount the libellant claims to recover the freight at $3.00 per ton.

It is claimed by the respondents that this mode of determining the quantity is alike uncertain, and but a mere approximation to the truth. To a certain extent this is so, but after all, it is the mode the government has adopted for ascertaining its duties on articles such as coal, salt, &c. The whole of such cargoes are never weighed by the government officers, but from time to time, tubs full of these articles are weighed, and an average taken, a sufficient number being weighed to insure substantial accuracy. In the present case double the usual number of tubs was weighed. It is well understood, that by this course the importer at least is not defrauded. The customs weigher in this case states, that he always makes a liberal allowance to the importer, deducting from five to ten pounds from the actual weight per tub as indicated by the scale, on account of what may adhere to the tub. The government favors the importer, and does not receive the entire duty on any single pound. I believe no one in purchasing foreign coal would for a moment hesitate to take it at the government weight, rather than have it weighed over by a city weigher.

The minute book kept by the weigher of this and other cargoes of coal received that season by the respondent from Pictou is in evidence; and although the tubs vary in weight, as some tubs were in themselves heavier than others, yet, on the whole, there is not a greater difference than was to be expected, and on looking at the returns of various other cargoes of this coal in this book, I find that the average weight per tub of nine cargoes was 312 1-5 pounds, and of the present cargo was 313½, showing that the weight and account must have been extremely accurate. This mode of determining the quantity of such cargoes, having been thus adopted by the government without any complaint from importers, so far as appears, is to my mind much more satisfactory than that resorted to at Pictou, and when considered in connection with the amount of the other cargo weighed out at Boston, and also the offer proved to have been made by the libellant to the agents of the respondent, to have this cargo of coal all weighed by a city weigher, the respondent to pay the expense if the quantity overrun 955 tons, and the libellant if it fell short, which was declined by the respondent. I can have no doubt that the quantity was in excess of that amount, and well-known to be so by the agent of the respondent. The burden of proof is on the libellant to establish the quantity, and upon a careful examination of all the evidence, I am satisfied that at least 1,034 tons of 2,240 lbs. were delivered to the respondent.

After the vessel was loaded at Pictou, the agents of the respondent proposed bills of lading and presented them to the master for his signature, and he declined to sign them, for the reason that the quantity of coal on board was stated at 955 tons, the words "more or less," which immediately followed in the printed form, being erased. The master under direction of the owner of the vessel, who was present, declined to sign them, they supposing that they were concluded by the recital of the quantity in the bill of lading, and that they could not recover for any greater quantity, even if delivered by them at the port of destination. The agent after this, presented to the master another set of bills of lading, describing the quantity on board as "955 tons more or less," but with a marginal note, "that the coal was to be weighed at Portland at ship's expense." This set, the master also refused to sign, as such a condition as that in the margin was not customary at Pictou. It was the duty of the master to ascertain the quantity of coal he delivered at Portland, but I think a clause of this kind is not usual, especially in a bill of lading of coal subject to duty, and of which the government without expense to the importer ascertains the quantity, and I do not think that the company had a right to require any such condition to be inserted in the bill of lading.

A bill of lading is not conclusive as to the quantity of goods on board; it is a simple receipt, open to explanation as between the master and the consignee, if owner. The master may, as against such consignee, ordinarily show any mistake as respects the quantity shipped, but in the present case, if the master had executed the first set of bills, which were presented to him, I apprehend he would not have been at liberty to have shown on his arrival, that there were more than 955 tons on board, and he could not have received freight for all he should deliver.

Having decided that there were more than 955 tons on board, I think the master had a right to have his bills of lading so drawn, that they should not be evidence against him, that he had not any more on board, and I therefore think that the more correct bill of lading under all the circumstances was one in the form adopted by the master, and which was executed by him and left at Pictou before the ship sailed, with the agents of the respondent, describing the cargo as "955 tons more or less." That amount was the quantity which respondents' agent claimed to be on board. On the other hand, the master claimed a greater quantity, and as it has turned out, his claim was well founded. A bill of lading reciting that quantity, but so qualified as not to throw the burden of that amount, on the respondent, but leaving it to be determined by the result, was all that the respondents had a right to require, unless it should turn out there was exactly that precise amount on board, or the master had agreed to be bound by the mines' weight; and I am of the opinion that the master, in executing the bills of lading as he has testified, did all that could be fairly required of him. He thereby furnished the respondents with as accurate a document as he well could, and one which was in accordance with the contract of affreightment. He was entitled to demand freight on all he carried and delivered, and the respondents' agents had no right to insist on a bill of lading evidencing any different agreement. If the master had been truly informed of the precise quantity on board, it would have been his duty to have so stated, but he was not; on the contrary the respondents insisted on there being a much smaller quantity, and that he should so certify by his bill of lading, and that it should be so worded as to conclude him on this question of quantity. They demanded of him a written contract entirely different in its legal effect from that which the original contract justified; they were in my view clearly in the wrong, endeavoring to bind the master to carry 1,042 tons, as and for 955, and to receive pay only on the smaller quantity, which he had never agreed to do.

The bills of lading, executed by the master and left by him with the respondents' agents at Pictou, were all they had a right to require, and it was their duty to have received them and forwarded them to the respondents at Portland. They were the true evidence of the contract as made, allowing the master to receive, and binding the respondents to pay for all the coal shipped and delivered; and they were in such a form, as would at once have been received at the custom house in this city, as the proper ship's document to accompany an entry of the merchandise. The bills of lading, so executed by the master, were not forwarded to Portland, but the two, which the master had declined to execute were forwarded to the respondents' agent here, and when he was notified by the master of his arrival and readiness to deliver the cargo, they were presented to him for signature, and he was required to execute one of them, which he again declined. I think he was fully justified in so doing, and that this demand was quite unreasonable. The cargo was not entered at the custom house until the 4th of Nov., and of course no permit for its discharge could be obtained until that time. The excuse is, that the respondents had not the proper documents with which to enter the cargo, not having any bill of lading executed by the master. If so, whose fault was it? The master, before he sailed, had executed bills in such a form as they had a right to require of him, and they should have been sent to Portland instead of those which were not executed. The master is under no obligation to execute more than one set of bills of lading. It is not only unusual for him to do so, but is quite improper on account of their negotiable character, and danger attending their transfer. The master, notwithstanding the neglect of the respondents to be provided with one part of the bill of lading which he had executed, offered to furnish the respondents' agent with the master's part of the set which he had retained, that they might use it in entering the cargo; but this was unreasonably refused. The difficulty in this case has partly originated from a phrase which has been frequently used in this trial, "the shipper's bill of lading," and which is in a legal point of view quite incorrect. There is in law no such document as a "shipper's bill of lading." No doubt the shipper frequently fills up the blank bill of lading for the master, but it is the master's bill, and not the shipper's, and in law it is presumed to be the act of the master; if accepted by the shipper, then it is of course evidence of the contract as against him; but it is never signed by the shipper, and he had nothing to do with its preparation. It is a document which is required of the master as evidence of his contract, and if it is in accordance with the contract, the shipper is bound to receive it. It is no part of the shipper's duty to prepare it for the master.

The delay in this case from Oct. 25th to Nov. 4th was unreasonable, and without excuse, and I think the respondents are answerable for damages. They, however, should be allowed a reasonable time for entry and payment of duties after the vessel was reported to them. The master made report on Monday, Oct. 26th. I think that they should have been in readiness for discharging the vessel on the morning of Thursday, and I shall allow damages from that time. The permit was obtained the next Wednesday. I allow five days' detention at $50 per day, $250, and balance of freight on 79 tons at $3 per ton, $237; the respondent having brought into court the freight due on 955 tons, which was received by the libellant without prejudice. Decree accordingly.

G. F. Talbot, for libellant.

J. H. Drummond, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. The schooner Alonzo, of about 295 tons burthen, sailed from Cardiff, in Wales, in the early part of December, 1864, with a crew of ten men all told, that is, a master, two mates, a steward and cook, and six men before the mast, for Nassau in the West Indies (to any port in the West Indies), or any port of America, and to his final port of discharge in any part of the British Provinces in North America, the whole term not to exceed twelve months. Bush sailed in her as cook and steward at four pounds per month, wages, and joined the vessel on the 7th of December. On her passage out to the West Indies, the vessel had an unusually rough time. There was a constant succession of heavy winds, amounting often to gales and squalls. This kept the sea exceedingly rough, and the vessel being of small size, she of course partook of the motion of the water and was continually tossed in every direction, keeping everything on board in constant agitation, and sometimes shipping water to an inconvenient extent. Her sails were some of them rent and her hull strained so that she leaked considerably, and she was at this time short of provision, so that on the 5th of February, being then near Havana, and that port more accessible, she bore away for it and finally succeeded in reaching it in safety. After she had discharged her cargo and repaired damage, she went to Tampico, back to the West Indies, and finally to Portland, where Bush left the vessel, and now sues for his wages. On the 7th of January, about one month after she left Cardiff, Bush was disrated from the office of cook and steward for which he shipped, put out of the galley, and another person appointed in his place, and it appears from the master's account, that at Havana he applied to the British consul, at that port, to dismiss him from the ship; but was informed that he must carry him on the voyage and not dismiss him but within the British provinces. During the whole voyage to Havana, after he was disrated, to Tampico, back to the West Indies and to Portland, where he finally left the vessel, Bush did, and was required to do, duty as a common seaman on board the vessel. He did not ship as a seaman and did not pretend to understand the duty of a seaman. Personally he was under size, weak, partially deformed, and incapable of the hard duties of a seaman. Accordingly he was put to various service. Sometimes he did duty as a seaman, sometimes worked in the galley and performed such service as he was put to, nor was there any complaint made that he did not usually do willingly what he was ordered to.

On the arrival of the vessel near Portland, he was told by the master that he must run away. The master, by his own account, was told by the British consul, that he could not legally discharge him but in the British provinces. And this information was accompanied by threats of personal ill usage, even to that of taking his life if he continued in the vessel. This was done when two of the seamen were near enough to hear him, and their testimony fully confirms Bush's statement, and Bush solemnly declares that he was afraid to remain from an apprehension of what the master might do. Taking this order, with the threats with which it was accompanied, and the master's severity during the voyage, for he had been particularly severe to this man, and, on one occasion, was punished for a slight fault or, according to Bush, for none at all, with such severity that he did not get over it for two or three weeks; with his habitual strictness, and great strength compared with the feebleness of Bush, it cannot be said that his fears were altogether groundless. The master says that this order to abandon the vessel was revoked, but he admits that it was given, and adds that he offered to pay his passage to St. John. Admitting it to be so, this would not diminish the fears of Bush, and the master well knew that, by deserting the ship, Bush would forfeit all claim to wages during the voyage. Under all the circumstances, I think Bush had just cause for leaving the vessel and demanding his wages at this place. For one month, when he served as cook, I shall allow him, at the contract price, four pounds and for the residue of the time when he served as a seaman at three pounds. The master has an undoubted power of disrating a seaman. Every man engages for his own ability to do the duties for which he contracts. The master of the vessel is necessarily the judge of his competency in the first instance, but he decides, subject to have his decision reviewed by the proper authorities on shore. The master, without doubt, was dissatisfied with the cooking; at the same time it is true, according to all the proof, that while Bush was cook the weather was extremely tempestuous. The vessel being small had much motion, and the cook had hardly a fair opportunity of doing his business satisfactorily. But, allowing him to be disrated reasonably, there is no reason that he should not be paid for the actual service he performed in the ship during the residue of the voyage, while he remained in the vessel. Decree for libellant accordingly.

Debt; plea, payment; replication and issue. The defendant Slater only was taken. The penal bill upon which the action was brought, was signed "David Slater & Co." and a seal.

Gantt, for defendant, moved for leave to withdraw his plea of payment, and demur to the declaration; because a seal affixed for David Slater & Co., by one only of the partners, is the seal of him only who affixed it.

THE COURT refused.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY — ADJUDICATION — COMPOSITION.

Where a petition in voluntary bankruptcy was filed, and the debtor thereafter, before an adjudication, began proceedings for a composition under the Act of June 22d, 1874, an adjudication ought not to be made merely because certain creditors ask for it, if the debtor does not ask for it.

In bankruptcy. Albert Alsberg and Joseph Jordan had filed a petition in voluntary bankruptcy. Before an adjudication of bankruptcy was made, they commenced proceedings for a composition under the act of June 22d, 1874, [18 Stat. 178, c. 390; repealed June 7, 1878, 20 Stat. 99.] Certain creditors applied to the register to make such adjudication. The debtors opposed it. The register decided that he had the right to make such adjudication and that it was his duty to do so, if the proof before him was sufficient. Before he did so, the question was certified to the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. While there is no want of power, perhaps, to make the adjudication, I do not think it ought to be made unless the debtors ask to have it made, this being a voluntary case, if proceedings for a composition have been commenced by the debtors, under the act of 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — NONDISCHARGEABLE DEBTS — ARREST OF BANKRUPTS — CONFLICTS WITH STATE COURTS — EVIDENCE

[The bankrupt, who had failed as a dry-goods merchant in 1873, settled with his creditors, and resumed business in September, 1875, when he purchased about $9,000 worth of goods. In January, 1875, he sold a house for $1,500; and in June, 1875, he sold another, and took $3,000 cash, and a mortgage for $500, which mortgage he subsequently sold. March 4, 1875, he sold another house to one Rehuss, and took $2,500 cash, and a mortgage for $2,000; and on March 25, 1876, he sold his last house for $1,242 cash. When purchasing in July and September,

1875, and in April, 1876, he made certain representations. By making large sales, paying all bills in 10 days, and obtaining discounts, he re-established his credit, and purchased closely till April 24, 1876, when he began to purchase freely and even recklessly. He failed July 12, 1876, and a meeting of his creditors was called for July 18th, at 3 P. M. In September, 1875, the bankrupt gave his mother-in-law, Rosa Buxbaum, a judgment bond for $4,200, which was entered the day of his failure, and on which execution was issued, and placed in the hands of the sheriff, at 10 A. M. on July 18, 1876. The report of the bankrupt to his creditors showed his liabilities to consist of book debts, $13,094.90; and Buxbaum judgment, $4,200. His assets consisted of accounts due, $4,000; the Reffuss mortgage, $2,000; and stock on hand, $8,000 or $9,000. No arrangement having been made at the creditors' meeting, the bankrupt continued to sell until the sheriff took possession, in October. The goods were sold in bulk by the sheriff on October 20th to Albert Alsberg, for $3,500; and he resold them the same day to the bankrupt's wife for the same price, and took seven promissory notes from her in payment.]

BRADFORD, District Judge. The petitioner, Martin Alsberg, in this habeas corpus case, has been imprisoned in the common jail of New Castle county, on certain writs of capias ad respondendum issued out of the superior court of the state of Delaware, at the instance of creditors of the said Alsberg in Philadelphia, Pa. Under a late act of assembly of the state of Delaware, abolishing the use of these writs in civil actions generally, the exception is made when the plaintiffs file written affidavits of fraud, stating, in the language of the act, "that to the best of his or their belief the defendant had absconded, or is about to abscond, from the place of his usual abode, or that the defendant is justly indebted to the plaintiff in a sum exceeding fifty dollars, and that he verily believes the said defendant has secreted, conveyed away, assigned, or disposed of either money, goods, chattels, stock securities for money, or other personal estate or real estate of the value of more than one hundred dollars, with intent to defraud his creditors, and shall moreover in such affidavit specify and set forth the supposed fraudulent transactions." After Martin Alsberg (the petitioner for discharge under the writ of habeas corpus) had filed his voluntary petition as a bankrupt, and the jurisdiction of the United States district court for this district had attached to all persons, matters, and things having any relation to the estate of the bankrupt, he was taken on these writs, issued under the authority aforesaid, and grounded on the affidavits required by law which justified their issuance. Under these circumstances, the petitioner has invoked the aid of this court to release him from imprisonment, on the ground that he would have a right to be discharged from these debts under his certificate of discharge in a court of bankruptcy, and that to permit his imprisonment, after the jurisdiction of the bankrupt court had attached, would be unjust to the petitioner, and defeat the purpose for which the bankrupt law was enacted, and in violation of the following, viz.:

Section 5107, tit. 61, Bankruptcy Revised Statute of the United States: "No bankrupt shall be liable, during the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to arrest in any civil action, unless the same is founded on some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not release him." We turn to another part of the act, and we find the character of the debt which will not be discharged, in these words: In section 5117, tit. 61, c. 5, Rev. St., it is provided: "No debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character, shall be discharged by proceedings in bankruptcy, but the debt may be proved and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt." So that we are brought directly to the question, Were these debts on which these capiases have been issued "created by the fraud of the bankrupt," or not? There is no proof going to show embezzlement or abuse of a fiduciary trust, either public or private, and as these are all the delinquencies enumerated in the statute which give the debt such a character as to forbid its discharge, we must confine ourselves to that simple investigation—fraud in the bankrupt in creating the debt. If there was such fraud, then a certificate of discharge will not free him from the debt, and by the terms of the bankrupt act (section 5107, above quoted) he is not freed from arrest by the state courts in civil suits. If there was not such fraud, then he will be discharged, for it is then such a debt as would be discharged by the certificate of discharge granted finally to the bankrupt.

Were these debts created by the fraud of the bankrupt? There is no principle of law or equity more universally acceded to than "that fraud is never to be presumed." It must always be proved, and when the matter of a man's personal liberty is in issue, it ought to be convincingly proven. And yet fraud is of such a character, lies so buried up in a man's secret intentions, as to be inaccessible to ordinary observations. It would defeat its own purposes were it outspoken, and hence secrecy is its favorite hiding-place. Fraud is a deceit practiced to another man's disadvantage; there must be an intent to mislead, carried into operation by some act, on which the deceived party rests to his own detriment. Human courts do not attempt to punish men for wicked intentions which have never been acted on. Such sins of intent are reserved for punishment by a High Tribunal, of greater justice and penetration than earth can furnish. There is no distinction between a fraud proven in a court of law and a fraud proven in equity. For while courts of equity furnish greater facilities for discovering and uprooting fraud than courts of law, yet when once proven in a court of law, it is equally damaging to the perpetrator. Now in proof of fraud, as its essence is in the "scintilla," the "animus," the "evil intentions," things that cannot be seen or heard and are not cognizable by the senses, we are to take into consideration the declarations and conduct before, at the time, and after the alleged fraudulent act (and a wide latitude of investigation is to be allowed), and from these declarations and this conduct we are to draw our inference as to the existent or non-existent fraud at the time of the purchase of the goods in question. Slight evidences of fraud will not suffice. They must be convincing.

It is contended by the creditors that the bankrupt contracted these debts by practicing two distinct forms of fraud: 1. By false representation of his available means to pay any indebtedness he might incur, which operated on the vendors as inducement to make the sales, and without which they would not have made them, and 2. By fraudulently intending, at the time of these purchases, not to pay them in whole or in part.

It is not pretended that false representation of means for the payment of debts were made to more than three creditors, viz.: Hood, Bonbright & Co., Langfeld, Lichten & Co., J. T. Way & Co. And were this the only form of fraud practiced, I should discharge the petitioner, from arrest in all cases except in those above named. Now, how far have false representations of available means made to these creditors induced them to sell the goods for the price of which they have brought suits in the superior court? The first statement of this kind was made to Mr. Crow, between the 1st of April and May, of the year 1876, in the railroad cars, between this place and Philadelphia. Mr. Crow was the traveling and selling agent of this firm. Alsberg said "he could pay two dollars to every one he then owed." In July, 1875, Alsberg said to Benj. H. Cregor, who had charge of the credit department of this firm, that "he held real estate worth near twenty thousand dollars." Mr. Cregor said that his credit was based on this representation then made. About two months before the failure, Alsberg said to Robert Mills, salesman for Langfeld, Lichten & Co.: "You ought to sell me cheap, for I (referring to the failure of Mr. Wainright) am worth two dollars for every one

I owe." About this time, as it appears, he stated to Henry M. Rosenbaum, the financial manager of the last-mentioned firm, that he was worth twenty-five thousand dollars, "you need have no fear of me" (commenting on Wainright's failure), and stating that he had a couple of properties in Wilmington. Witness then stated that he would have sold if he had stated nothing about his property. Witness afterwards modified this statement and said: "The effect of this statement as to property then made prevented me from making future inquiry, which if I had made and had found his statements false I would not have given him the subsequent credit I did." He further said: "I cannot say that I mentioned this conversation as to the property to any member of the firm. I understood the two properties to be part of the twenty-five thousand dollars." He said on one occasion that he had a property on King street worth twelve thousand dollars. The exact date of this conversation is not on my notes—he said this to William Marter, salesman for J. T. Way & Co. Marter says his line of credits was due altogether to his statements—he did not after modify them.

These by my notes constitute all the cases of false representations as to the value of his property. It is true that these statements are materially untrue. They doubtless assisted the vendors in making up their minds to give the credit they did, in cases where the information had before been communicated to them. But when the purchaser had for a considerable period of time bought freely, and commended himself to their confidence by extraordinary promptness of payment (as is testified to on all sides), would they have refused these last credits, if they had heard nothing of Alsberg's property? The fact is, Alsberg had gained the trust of these creditors by his prompt payments, and they solicited his purchases (as was most natural and legitimate). Mr. Rosenbaum said he would have sold if he had heard nothing of Alsberg's property, and this is inconsistent with the attempted modification of that answer, to wit: that without this statement he would have started an inquiry as to Alsberg's means. This could not be, for if he had sold, he would have given the credit, and it would have been too late. Nevertheless, whatever may be our opinion as to the desire of these firms to sell to Alsberg, two of these witnesses for the two firms of Hood, Bonbright & Co., and J. T. Way & Co., viz.: Cregor and Marter, explicitly say that the line of credit of these firms was due to, and based on Alsberg's statements as to his property—and on this testimony we must rest as true and say that fraud in the shape of false representations in these cases has been proven—false representations to the financial member in the one instance and to the salesman in the other—and were this the only fraud the petitioner would be discharged from arrest in all but these two suits. But on a careful examination of the testimony, I am compelled to decide as a fact proven convincingly, that the petitioner for discharge intended at the time he purchased these goods, for the price of which the arresting creditors have brought suit, not to pay for the same, either in whole or in part, it is immaterial which.

I shall not enter into the testimony in detail, but shall speak of the prominent facts, which, taken altogether and in their natural relation to each other, have produced this conviction.

1st. The greatly increased later purchases in the months of April, May, and June, 1876, by which he stocked his store to repletion, which cannot be accounted for by any ordinary hypothesis of the necessities and demands of the trade. It is in evidence that business was materially falling off; ordinary prudence and commercial integrity should have induced diminished instead of increased purchaser's obligations.

2d. The whole manner, demeanor, and conduct of Alsberg to his creditors was indicative of fraud perpetrated and fraud intended.

It is true, by the proof in this cause and Alsberg's own confession, that he was much more than solvent when he offered the forty per cent. to his creditors. He stated that his stock was worth eighteen thousand dollars to one witness. He stated to another that it was worth fifteen hundred dollars. Mr. Albertson, an exceedingly careful and reliable witness, said that on the 18th of July, at the meeting of creditors, the stock in store was worth fifteen thousand. Freeman, Alsberg's clerk, placed it from thirteen to fifteen thousand. Mr. Crow also placed it about fifteen thousand shortly before the creditors' meeting. Now place this stock at the lowest figure, two thousand lower than the estimate of Albertson, say . . . $13,000
 Then add 2,000 bond.
 (Returned as assets) due him per J. Buxbaum 2,500 bond.

And we have the total 17,500
 The creditors' debts were but . . . 13,000

Leaving a balance of $4,500 in Alsberg's favor. No wonder the creditors would not accept an offer made under such an exhibit.

3d. There is a manifest disappearance of a large mass of valuable merchandise, between the failure, 18th July, 1876, and the day of sale, 20th October, which is utterly unaccounted for. Now there is just the difference between fifteen thousand, as estimated by Albertson and others as its value at 18th July, and two thousand, as valued on the day of sale by Mr. Meehan, an experienced and skillful merchant, viz.: the sum of thirteen thousand—a difference of sixteen thousand, if estimated at eighteen thousand—the value admitted by Alsberg on one occasion. Now, it must be remembered that, from the time of this failure, none of these many creditors ever received one cent on their claims. He then owed no other debts, except two or three hundred dollars, which he paid off. What has become of these goods; and, if sold, what has become of the money—where is it, who has it? Mr. Alsberg can explain, and he does not offer to do so. He sits by, day by day, and hears himself denounced for vile fraud, and he opens not his mouth in his own defense. He has a right to demand to be sworn to vindicate his character. The United States, with liberal policy, in furtherance of justice, permits all persons to be witnesses in their own favor except in criminal cases. What would a man, conscious of rectitude, do in defiance of a battery of sharp cross-examining and torturing lawyers? There is only one inference to be drawn from this silence, and that is fraud.

4th. The circumstances connected with the execution of the judgment bond to Rosa Buxbaum, and the consideration therefor, are, to say the least, suspicious. The levy on the goods before petition in bankruptcy, and without making a trust for the benefit of his creditors, shows shrewd management to defeat the rights of creditors, in which Alsberg was certainly engaged as a party. From these and other considerations which might be mentioned, I believe that Alsberg, when he bought these goods, did not intend, either in whole or in part, to pay for them. And if such be the fact, what is the law arising on that fact? The conclusion to which I arrive, from reason and the slight examination of authorities I have been enabled to make, is that when A, at the time he purchases a stock of goods of B, intends either in whole or in part not to pay for them, he commits a fraud, and in the language of the act of congress has "created" a "debt" by "fraud." B certainly understands that A means to pay for his goods. He promises to do so. This promise is of the essence of every such contract. B would not think of selling if he supposed that A had not made a bona fide promise to pay, and he parts with his goods on the strength of this promise. He acts on a promise made. It is not false representation by words, but it is deception by concealing an intention he entertains, which, if communicated to the seller, would at once determine him not to part with his goods. The law on this subject is laid down by the supreme court of New Hampshire, from which I will quote. Stewart v. Emerson, 8 N. B. R. 462. Under this impression of the facts of this case and the law arising thereon, I must remand the petitioner to the custody of the sheriff of New Castle county.

BRADFORD, District Judge, [on petition for rehearing.] I have given attentive consideration to the arguments on a rehearing of the habeas corpus case hitherto decided by me. The grounds urged by the petitioner's counsel for the discharge of the prisoner, and an injunction against all proceedings against him until the question of his discharge in bankruptcy shall have been determined, were twofold.

1st. That the court could inquire into no other question than the provability of the debt, that there was no doubt of that fact, and therefore that the court erred in refusing to discharge the prisoner.

2d. That if the prisoner was liable to arrest under § 5107, Rev. St., there was no such legal proof of that fact adduced before the court as to justify it in remanding him. This is the substance of the objection to the act of the court expressed in a few words.

In Re Robinson, [Case No. 11,930,] Judge Nelson decided that the various sections of the Bankrupt Law must be construed together; that by the 21st section of the bankrupt law, (corresponding to 5105, Rev. St.) standing alone, one who had proved a debt was denied the right of maintaining a suit at law or equity for the same against the bankrupt, and waived all right of action and suit against him, and all proceedings and judgments begun should be deemed discharged. But, says he, this section must be construed in connection with the 33d section, (section 5117, Rev. St.) making all debts contracted in fraud binding on and unreleased against the bankrupt, notwithstanding his discharge. Under the one section, if the creditor has proven his debt, his debt is discharged and any judgment obtained thereon. Under the other, the debt being provable, and, in the case reported, actually proved, it having been contracted in fraud, is not discharged; and where bankrupt was in prison on an arrest for such a debt, the court refused to discharge him or to release the bail. Says Judge Nelson: "The 33d section (section 5117, Rev. St.) must be regarded at least as taking a debt of this character out of the 1st clause of the 21st section (i. e., section 5105, Rev. St.), and hence that the judgment in question is not discharged or surrendered, nor is the bankrupt entitled to be released from the arrest or his bail from the bail bond, if the debt was one created by fraud." Now, this reasoning will apply a fortiori to creditors not having proved their debts (though provable); for they shall only be "stayed" to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge, and are not held to have waived all rights from suits and unsatisfied judgments. I consider this as high authority, 1st, on the point: that a debt contracted in such fraud as is mentioned in section 5117, Rev. St., is taken out of the scope and operation of section 5106, Id., so far as to prevent the discharge of a bankrupt from imprisonment under the state laws on such debt. This court also approves the position taken in the court below—that where the record disclosed a case of fraud, the court would not inquire beyond the record to call in question its verity in a bankrupt court.

Martin Alsberg was arrested by virtue of the state law, which authorized capiases ad respondendum in certain cases, that is, under circumstances of fraudulent and improper conduct on the part of the debtor mentioned in the act, and sworn to by the plaintiff. The affidavit required by the law to be made as the foundation of the right to arrest is as follows: "That to the best of the plaintiff's belief, the defendant has absconded, or is about to abscond, from the place of his usual abode," or "that the defendant is justly indebted to the plaintiff in a sum exceeding fifty dollars, and that he verily believes the said defendant has secreted, conveyed away, assigned, settled or disposed of either money, goods, chattels, stock, securities for money for other personal estate, or real estate, of the value of more than one hundred dollars, with intent to defraud his creditors." The plaintiff is moreover to specify and set forth in his affidavit the supposed fraudulent transactions. It is provided that this act shall not apply to cases for libel, slander, or injury to the person or property, accompanied by violence, if any affidavit of the cause of action be filed with the praecepe. This act was passed at Dover, 1875, and was a modification of the law as it formerly stood, allowing a capias ad respondendum in all actions at law upon contracts, without any affidavit of fraud. The capiases in these suits against the bankrupt were in due form. They did not allege and swear to debts contracted in fraud, or under any of the circumstances of fraud mentioned in section 5117, Rev. St. They could not do so, for the grounds of arrest under the state law were not for such fraud as discharged the debts, yet in point of fact the debts may have been of that character. The arrests in these cases, then, supposing there had been no act of congress granting immunity to certain persons from such arrests, would have been in all respects legal and regular.

Section 5107, Rev. St., on bankruptcy, is in these words: "No bankrupt shall be liable, during the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to arrest in any civil action, unless the same is founded on some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not release him." His privilege, or immunity, or exemption from arrest depends upon the fact of the debt being released by his discharge. If it is unreleased he is without the immunity from arrest as provided for in this section as completely as if there had been no such provision in the Bankrupt Law. It must be kept in mind that the power of arrest is a state power, a power not conferred by act of congress, and that the bankrupt act has conferred no such power, but has only interposed its shield to protect the bankrupt from arrest by state authority for a dischargeable debt, no matter how many fraudulent circumstances otherwise may surround it.

When the bankrupt is thus arrested by the authority of the state law and claims the immunity and privilege aforesaid, he must make it appear to the satisfaction of the court that his case comes within the exemption or privilege granted. If he does, he is discharged from arrest. If he does not, he is remanded to prison. If he makes it appear that his debt is dischargeable, that is, that it is not tainted with any of the kinds of frauds enumerated in section 5117, Rev. St., which prevent its being released by the discharge of the bankrupt, he is within the exemption or privilege extended by section 5107, Rev. St. If he cannot do this, he is not within the privilege or exemption aforesaid, and must be remanded.

In connection with this fraud the counsel for the petitioner who has been heard on this reargument has cited the following cases: In re Rosenberg, [Case No. 12,054;] In re Migel, [Id. 9,538;] In re Duncan, [Id. 4,131;] In re Schwartz, [Id. 12,502.] In Re Rosenberg, the bankrupt had been arrested, but was out on bail, and it was no part of the proceedings to have the bankrupt discharged from arrest, or his bail discharged; but it was to have the other proceedings of the suit, looking to the obtaining of a fraudulent judgment, stayed until the question of discharge in bankruptcy was settled. Hitherto it had been thought by some, among whom was Judge Blatchford himself, that the provisions to stay suits on provable claims did not apply to claims which were not released by discharge. Now this decision simply reverses that opinion, and permits a stay of proceedings. But the judge, in the close of his opinion, says: "I think it proper to say that this construction of the 21st section has no application to the last clause of the 26th section in regard to the liabilities of a bankrupt to arrest. By the specific provision of that clause (section 5107, Rev. St.) the bankrupt is entitled to be relieved from arrest if the arrest is founded on a debt from which his discharge, if granted, would release him, and this court is required, so long as the question of a discharge is undetermined, to inquire if the arrest is founded on such debt." So that this case is a clear authority against discharging the prisoner when arrested under section 5107, and the fact of the inability to be released from the debt is proven. It is also authority as to the duty of the court to inquire into the latter fact "so long as the question of a discharge is undetermined." In re Migel sustains precisely the same legal positions, with the exception that there was an express refusal to discharge the prisoner bankrupt. It is direct authority against the discharge of prisoner when arrested under section 5107, and proof of the character of debt which prevents his release. In re

Duncan [Case No. 4,131] has no bearing whatever on the right of the prisoner to immunity from arrest during proceedings in bankruptcy. In re Schwartz [Id. 12,502] has no application to this case, touching the right of arrest.

In fact, no case has been adduced, and I doubt whether any case can be, restraining from arrest under section 5107, Rev. St., where it is proved that the debt was not released by the discharge of the bankrupt. But repeatedly such bankrupts have been remanded to prison. The general order of the supreme court of the United States, prescribed for the government of proceedings in bankruptcy, has been cited as settling this question of immunity from arrest in favor of the prisoner. It is claimed that it amounts to an authoritative construction of the supreme court of the disputed provisions of the bankrupt act. I do not think so. Judge Blatchford and Judge Nelson did not think so, and they decided that the rule was not intended to apply to cases where a bankrupt was arrested for a debt not discharged under section 5107, Rev. St. Indeed, this is the only rational construction which I think can be given to these apparently conflicting provisions. The result is that all parts of the act have efficacy given to them. The result of the authorities is that, when a debt is provable, all actions against the debtor, pending proceedings in bankruptcy, shall be stayed, including arrests, with the exception that if the bankrupt has been arrested on a debt not dischargeable, he shall not be released from arrest by the bankrupt court. We consider then that it is established beyond a doubt, that a bankrupt prisoner who has been arrested, pending proceedings in bankruptcy, for a debt contracted in fraud, cannot on a habeas corpus be released from such imprisonment.

The next question to be settled (and it was the second point made by the counsel for the petitioner) is: How is the court to determine the question of fact on which the petitioner's right to discharge, or the creditor's right to continue the imprisonment, depends? What is the evidence by which he is to be governed? It will be seen that section 5107, Rev. St., prescribes no rule of evidence by which the court of bankruptcy shall be guided in determining the fact of the release of the debt on which the arrest is made. Upon some reflection, I have come to the conclusion clearly in my own mind, that it is the duty of the court to examine diligently all legal evidence brought before it from any quarter whatever, tending to show that a debt not dischargeable by the discharge of the bankrupt has or has not been contracted.

There is an apparent conflict of authority on this point. For limiting the scope of inquiry may be cited Judge Blatchford and Judge Nelson, in Re Robinson, [Case No.

11:30,] already cited; Blatchford, in Re Vaik, [Id. 16,814.] In Re Kimball, [Id. 7,768,] Judge Blatchford goes so far as to say: "This court only passes on the question whether the state court has founded its arrest on a claim, which, on the face of the papers which were filed before it as the foundation for the arrest, is a claim from which the debtor would not be discharged in bankruptcy." Lowell, in Re Devoe, [Id. 3,843,] is for confining the evidence. In Re Migel, [Id. 9,538,] Judge Blatchford takes the same view, and also in Re Kimball, [Id. 7,767.] In Re Glaser, [Id. 5,474,] Judge Blatchford thinks the case should be investigated by the court. He says, "It is a disputed case, which cannot be decided on ex parte affidavits," and offers, "if the bankrupt desires it, to take testimony before a referee." In Re Williams, [Id. 17,700,] Judge Drummond, circuit judge for the western district of Wisconsin, says: "This objection seems to proceed on the theory that the complaint and facts stated therein, i. e., in state proceedings, bound the bankrupt court. This is not correct, though it is true that the bankrupt law declares that the proceedings in bankruptcy shall not affect debts of a certain character, and among others those which have their origin in fraud, and further, the discharge of the bankrupt shall not operate as a release. It is to be observed that this is a question which the bankrupt court has a right to determine, and that a statement in a declaration or complaint made by a party in a state court does not bind the bankrupt court." So that I consider this question an open one, to be decided on those principles which shall be in harmony with the intent and purpose of the bankrupt law. The bankrupt law was meant to be uniform in its operation. Privileges are not to be accorded to either creditors or bankrupts in one district which are not equally extended to creditors and bankrupts in other districts.

The liability to imprisonment, or immunity from the same, depends on a fact. That fact is whether the debt for which he was arrested by state authority was dischargeable, or not, by the discharge in bankruptcy. I think it has nothing to do with the reasons or grounds of the arrest given in the affidavits upon which it was granted. It is manifest that congress intended to punish this fraud where in fact it existed, and to prevent an arrest of the bankrupt for such debt not created in such fraud. If the position be correct, that the liability to arrest or discharge depends on the reasons given by the state authorities for the arrest, then there is no mode by which the creditors of the bankrupt can claim the benefit of the arrest granted by the act of congress, unless the reasons filed for the arrest consist of such acts of fraud as would, under the act of congress, prevent a discharge of the debt, and as in this state no such reason can be filed (as may also be the case in many other states), it follows that here (and in other states having like civil process) a bankrupt may not be imprisoned during proceedings in bankruptcy for a debt which is not discharged in bankruptcy, in defiance of section 5117, Rev. St., which permits it. Creditors over the district border, where reasons for arrest such as will discharge the debt can be filed, can have a hearing and continue the arrest if they prove their debt not dischargeable; while no such privilege can belong to the creditors in this district, because by the law of the state no such reasons or grounds of arrest can be sworn to, as will discharge the debt. So, too, if this theory be correct, bankrupt prisoners in different districts may enjoy exemption from arrest, not as they prove their debts, on which they are imprisoned, are dischargeable in bankruptcy, but as their creditors may or may not be able to file reasons for their arrest which would, if true, make their debts undischARGEABLE in bankruptcy.

I think no such inequitable and partial results could have been contemplated by the framers of the bankrupt act, and hence conclude that when the liberty of the bankrupt is at stake, or the right of the creditor to arrest for a debt contracted in fraud, the question of discharge from arrest depends upon the determination of the act of fraud, and not upon the reasons which may have been filed in the state courts for the arrest. Where the liberty of the prisoner depends upon the fact that his debt is dischargeable by his discharge in bankruptcy, and he tenders proof to maintain the allegation, is it not a strange proposition that he shall be denied the right to prove his right to release from imprisonment because an ex parte affidavit had been made in the state courts that he had contracted the debt under such circumstances of fraud as that his debt would not be released by his discharge in bankruptcy? This appears strange, because it affects the personal liberty of the bankrupt. But the rights of the creditors to arrest for debts not dischargeable in bankruptcy are equally sacred, and the proposition to me is equally strange that they should be denied the power to hold under arrest one legally arrested for other reasons filed than those which will release the debt, when they make the allegation, and offer to sustain it by proof, that the petitioner cannot bring himself within the exemption from arrest granted by congress, by reason of the fact that the debt on which he was arrested was contracted in fraud. And I think this view of the law is made apparent by the provisions of sections 760, 761, Rev. St., in relation to the writ of habeas corpus.

Now, in the absence of directions as to the specific evidence required in the provisions of the bankrupt law, these sections appear to me to be conclusive on all questions of prima facie evidence made out by state proceedings—or the absence of evidence as to the sufficient grounds of arrest in the state proceedings. "The petitioner may deny any of the facts set forth in the return, or may allege any other facts that may be material in the case." Surely he may deny that he has been arrested for a debt contracted in fraud, no matter what affidavits may have been made by state authority to the contrary, and surely he may allege that he has been arrested for a dischargeable or releaseable debt, though it does not appear from the state proceedings that he was arrested by reason of the debt being contracted in fraud. These sections render clear the duty of the court to hear all legal testimony in the cause, and go further; they permit "the return and all suggestions made against it" to be amended by the leave of the court, so that thereby the material facts may be ascertained. The question of fact as to the creation of a debt not dischargeable by the discharge of the bankrupt, having been already passed on, it only remains for the court to say that the motions to discharge and enjoin against any further proceedings are refused. As a stay of proceedings is not desired unless in connection with the discharge of the prisoner, no order is made in reference to that matter.

Thereupon the bankrupt applied to the United States circuit court for the district of Delaware, to have said proceedings and orders supervised and set aside, and the bankrupt discharged from imprisonment, and for injunctions to restrain the plaintiffs in said writs from prosecuting their actions until the final determination of proceedings in bankruptcy. The case was argued before Hon. William Strong, Justice of the supreme court of the United States, who rendered his decision, June 29, 1877, as follows:

STRONG, Circuit Justice. After argument and consideration, it is ordered that the action of the district court be approved, and this petition is dismissed.

Case No 262.

ALSOP v. COMMERCIAL INS. CO.

[1 Sumn. 451.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1833.

MARINE INSURANCE—WAGER POLICY—OVER-VALUATION—NEW TRIAL—CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE—CROSS-EXAMINATION

1. A policy of insurance underwritten for $10,000 on profits on merchandise on board the brig Leonora at and from Callao to Baltimore, free of average and salvage, and the policy to be the only proof of interest required, is not in our law to be deemed a wager policy, where the assured had property on board, and neither he nor the underwriters intended to insure upon a wager policy, but intended it as a policy on interest.

[Cited in Merrill v. Arey, Case No. 9,468.]

2. There cannot, strictly speaking, be a gaming policy under our law, unless both parties intend to game or wager.

[Cited in Merrill v. Arey, Case No. 9,468.]

3. If one party intending a gaming or wager policy, procures it to be underwritten by the other, as a policy substantially on interest, and thus designedly misleads the latter, the policy is void for fraud.

4. But, if both parties intend a policy on interest, and the assured has a substantial interest in the property on board, and there is an over-valuation of the property made bona fide, and not with an intention to mislead or defraud the underwriter, the policy is good.

[Cited in Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., Case No. 2,829.]

5. If an over-valuation of the property insured be made with an intent to defraud or mislead the underwriter, the policy is void. But if it be bona fide made, and without any intention to defraud or mislead the underwriter, and the party has a substantial interest, the policy is good. In the latter case, if the underwriter agrees to the valuation, he is estopped to go into the consideration of the actual value.

[Cited in Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., Case No. 2,829.]

6. If a party insures property, expected to be on board a ship to a large amount, upon a valued policy, and much less is in fact shipped, he is entitled to recover in case of a loss a proportion pro rata only, notwithstanding the valuation.

[Cited in Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., Case No. 2,829.]

7. In what cases the court will interfere with a verdict upon matters of fact, and especially where fraud in fact is in issue, by granting a new trial.

8. A new trial will not be allowed merely to let in new cumulative evidence to points made at the trial.

Jacobs, Id. 1,520; Vose v. Mayo, Id. 17,009. Followed in Fuller v. Fletcher, 6 Fed. 129. Approved in Hunt v. Pooke, Case No. 6,895.]

9. An objection was taken to a direct interrogatory, and the answer to it, at the time of taking the deposition, which was supported by the court at the trial, and the answer ruled out; held, that the answers to the cross interrogatories, which did not on their face purport to be asked in consequence of the direct interrogatory, and were not made dependent upon it, are admissible as evidence.

At law. Action upon a policy of insurance, underwritten by the defendants, dated the 19th of August, 1831, whereby the plaintiff by his agent, Zebedee Cook, Jr., was insured "ten thousand dollars on profits on merchandise on board the brig Leonora, at and from Callao to Baltimore, free of average and salvage, and the policy to be the only proof of interest required," at a premium of one and a half per cent., the profits being valued at $20,000. There were shipped on board the Leonora at Callao, for the account of the plaintiff, bullion of the invoice value of $11,821, and California hides of the invoice value of $7,765. The Leonora is admitted to have sailed on the voyage and to have been lost by the perils of the seas, she never having been heard of since her departure from Callao. At the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff for the whole amount insured. A motion for a new trial was made for several reasons stated in a written application to the court. Those that were finally insisted on will appear in the opinion of the court.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This case has been argued upon a motion for a new trial, for reasons stated in the written application to the court, upon which I have no more to observe, than that it is not to be taken for granted, that they present a full and accurate view of the whole case, or of the principles of law involved in the charge of the court. They are to be taken merely as suggestions, which, according to the practice of this court, counsel are authorized to make for the purpose of bringing the matter in review before the court. If there has been any material mistake in point of law, prejudicial to the defendants, they are entitled to a new trial to correct it. If, on the other hand, there has been a failure to try the cause upon its fair merits in point of fact, and there has been a clear miscarriage by the jury, the same result will follow.

The first point now insisted upon for a new trial, (for several of those which are stated in the written motion have been waived,) is, that the court permitted certain parts of the deposition of Edwin Bartlett, which were objected to by the defendants, to be read in evidence to the jury. In the direct examination of Bartlett the plaintiff put the following interrogatory: "Did, or did not, the house of Alsop & Co., in the month of March, 1831, inform said Richard Alsop, that they intended to make shipments to him on account of those funds? If so, by what opportunity or vessel?" Upon an objection taken by the defendants to this interrogatory, and the answer to it, at the time of taking the deposition, and now insisted on, upon the ground, that the one asked, and the other stated the contents of written correspondence, which ought to have been produced, as the best evidence, the court sustained the objection, and overruled the interrogatory and answer. In the cross examination the defendants put the following interrogatories: (1.) "What was the nature of the orders of Mr. Alsop to remit funds in your hands? Annex such orders, or state their contents." (2.) "Had the said Richard Alsop given any orders or instructions for the purchase and shipment of said hides? or were they purchased by the house to be sent to him in payment of the balance due him?" (3.) "Were any letters written by you, or any members of the firm of Alsop & Co., to Mr. Alsop concerning the proposed shipment by the Leonora? If yea, annex copies thereof, or state the contents, as accurately as possible." These cross interrogatories were fully answered by the witness; and the plaintiff proposed to read these answers to the jury, to which the defendants objected, upon the ground, that they were asked de bene esse only, upon the supposition, that the direct interrogatory and answer might be ruled in as evidence by the court. The court overruled the objection, and admitted these answers in evidence. And this ruling now constitutes the material point of this exception of the defendants.

The argument now is, that the objection was well taken at the trial; that the defendants had a right to ask the questions conditionally; and that the answers could not be admissible evidence against them, unless the objection to the direct interrogatory had been overruled. And it is urgently pressed, that otherwise the defendants would be put in peril, by being compelled to make an election at the time, when the deposition is taken, whether to rely upon their original objection, or to insist upon the cross interrogatories being answered. This exception is confessedly new in its form and presentation. No authority is adduced in support of it; and it must, therefore, be decided upon principle. I have reflected much upon it, and am perfectly clear, that it has no solid foundation in the law of evidence, as administered in this country or in England. In the first place, there can be no doubt, that generally the answers to cross interrogatories are admissible evidence in favor of the other side. If a party chooses to ask questions, and the answers are unfavorable to him, he cannot insist upon removing them out of the cause; and, if they are in his favor, insist upon them, as evidence. The law knows of no such principle of evidence, and it would, if adopted, be most pernicious in the administration of justice. There is no more reason, that the answer should be excluded, if asked upon the cross examination, than there would be to exclude it upon the direct examination. The plaintiff might with quite as much justice insist, that an answer to a direct interrogatory should not be evidence, because it was to meet some expected evidence on the other side, and happened to be unfavorable to him, as the defendants might insist, that the answers to their cross interrogatories should, under like circumstances, be suppressed. The law recognises no such principle. Each party asks all questions at his peril; and he must take the answers, if they respond to the question, for good or for evil. They are in the cause; and it is not for the party, who brought them there, to insist upon their incompetence.

But, in the present case, the foundation, on which the argument rests, does not sustain it. Suppose the direct interrogatory had been originally suppressed, and never answered; could there be a doubt, that the answers to the cross interrogatories would be good evidence, if these interrogatories had been retained in the cause? I think there could be no doubt in such a case, without disturbing the first elements of evidence. Now, in point of fact, the present cross interrogatories were never withdrawn, before the answers were given, or afterwards. They do not on their face purport to be asked in consequence of the direct interrogatory, or the answer to it. They have no reference whatever to that interrogatory or the answer. They are not in their form put de bene esse, or hypothetically. They are not (as they ought to have been, if intended to be so put,) drawn in a form, which would exclude them from the deposition, if the direct interrogatory should be suppressed. They are not, directly or by consequence, attached to or dependent upon it. On the contrary, they are independent, substantive interrogatories, which the defendants had a right to put, whether the direct interrogatory were in or out of the deposition. Suppose the answers had been favorable to the defendants, I should be glad to know, upon what plausible ground the court could now exclude them. Could the court have said; You probably intended to put these cross interrogatories, only because the plaintiff had asked the direct interrogatory; and as that is excluded, you shall not have the benefit of your cross examination? Certainly not. The defendants, not having in terms so limited the application of their interrogatories, and not having in terms made them dependent upon the direct interrogatory, could not have been shut out from the evidence of the answers elicited upon their cross examination. And if the defendants could not, how can the court, consistently with any principle, shut them out from the plaintiff? If the answers would be evidence for either party, they must be for both. The competency of the evidence depends upon its nature, and not upon the side, in whose favor it makes, after it is introduced. Judicially, it is impossible for me to say, that the defendants did ask these interrogatories solely on account of the direct interrogatory. They are perfectly pertinent to the cause, if that be struck out; and indeed, in my humble judgment, of just such a nature, as ought to have been asked, not de bene esse, but absolutely, to eviscerate the very truth upon a point important to the defence. But it is sufficient for me to say, that the cross interrogatories, not being in fact made in the record dependent upon the direct interrogatory, they stand, like all other cross interrogatories, upon the general principles of evidence. There is no peril or mischief to the party in this result. If he chooses, he may make his cross interrogatories dependent; and then, whether favorable or unfavorable, the answers follow the fate of the direct interrogatory. And I cannot but think, that a different decision in this case would exceedingly perplex and impair the due administration of justice. It would enable a party to ask all sorts of questions in a general shape, relative to any matters in any antecedent objectionable interrogatory, and then to use them as evidence, if in his favor; and if otherwise, to exclude them from the use of his adversary. It would compel the court to search out the motives of all the cross interrogatories, and conjecture their object, instead of acting upon their terms and import. If a party, by cross examination of an incompetent witness on the general merits, after his incompetency is known, makes him a good witness, a fortiori a party asking a competent witness a general independent question, makes him a witness to that point.²

The next point is, that the court instructed the jury, that the representation made by the plaintiff to the defendants was sufficient to put them upon inquiry as to the time of the arrival of the Benezet, and that having other means to inform themselves, they were bound to make use of those means, if they thought the fact material; and that by omitting to do so, and underwriting the policy, they waived the right to receive information. Now, in order to understand the proper bearing of this exception, which does not fully and correctly state the charge of the court, it will be necessary to state some of the facts and proceedings at the trial, and the charge of the court upon this particular point. The policy was procured to be underwritten through the instrumentality of Mr. Cook, an insurance broker, who at the time of procuring it showed the underwriters a copy of his letter of instructions, and said he knew nothing more. It was in these words: "Zebedee Cook, Jr., Richard Alsop of Philadelphia. $10,000 on profits on merchandise on board the brig Leonora, (Weighmar master,) at and from Callao to Baltimore, free of average and salvage; and the policy, in the case of loss, to be the only proof of interest required. The Leonora sailed about the 12th of April, supposed direct for Baltimore. The ship Alfred sailed, ostensibly for New York direct, some days before the Leonora, and has not yet arrived.

The Benezet arrived at New Bedford, and sailed after the Leonora. The Leonora is a small brig, and not old,—I believe not five years,—and is considered in excellent order." In point of fact, the Leonora sailed on the 15th of April, three days later than was here supposed; and the Benezet arrived at New Bedford on the 15th of July, 1831; and her arrival was reported in the Boston Commercial Gazette, a newspaper taken at the insurance office, on the 18th of the same month, as follows: "Arrived at New Bedford, 15th, the brig Benezet, Sherman master, Callao, April 20th. Brig Leonora, &c., sailed about a week previous." Now, upon this posture of the facts, it was contended by the defendants, first, that there was a misrepresentation of a material fact, namely, the arrival of the Benezet, which was represented by the letter as having recently arrived, whereas she had been in port thirty-three days; secondly, that if not so, there was a concealment of a material fact, namely, the time of arrival of the Benezet. Upon these points the court directed the jury as follows: That a misrepresentation or a concealment, to avoid the policy, must be of some fact, material to the risk, and important to guide the underwriter, not only as to the premium he should ask, but also whether he should underwrite at all. In regard to a concealment, there was this additional ingredient, that the fact must be of such a nature, as that the underwriters must be presumed to trust to the assured for information respecting it; and the concealment must be of facts not equally open to the knowledge of both parties, but peculiarly or exclusively within the knowledge of the assured. Facts of a public nature, such as the length of voyages, the course of trade and navigation, the chances of peace and war, the different effects of different seasons of the year on the risk, and other circumstances of a political or general nature, however material they might be to the risk, were supposed to be equally within the reach of both parties; and therefore the assured, even if he had superior skill, was not bound to disclose any thing respecting them. The underwriters are not presumed to trust him in such matters, but to rely on their own means of information and judgment.

Then, as to the first inquiry; Was there any misrepresentation, as to the fact of the Benezet's arrival? The words of the paper of instruction are: "The Benezet arrived at New Bedford, sailed after the Leonora." The argument insists, that the meaning is, that the Benezet has recently arrived; and it is this recency of arrival, that constitutes the very gist of the misrepresentation; for unless it is contained in the instructions, directly or by implication, so as to lead the underwriters to that conclusion, as a matter of affirmation by the plaintiff, the objection is gone. Now, it is most material to state, that there is no such word as "recently" in the paper of instructions. The words are not, "The Benezet, recently arrived at New Bedford, sailed," &c.; but "The Benezet arrived at New Bedford, sailed," &c. So that there is no pretence of an express averment of the recency of her arrival. Is it implied in the language? I cannot say, that it is. She had actually arrived; and it is quite consistent with the other parts of the paper, that it should intend no more than to refer to the fact of her arrival, as one either actually or presumptively within the knowledge of the underwriters; and that it was introduced, not for the purpose of referring to the true time of her arrival, but for another fact, which might not be as well known to the underwriters, namely, that she sailed after the Leonora. It ought to be a very strong case, which should induce either a court or a jury to interpolate a word in a sentence, which is not necessary to make it sensible, or which is not fairly and clearly implied by the nature of the terms used. It should also be considered, that the plaintiff is resident in Philadelphia; and New Bedford is in the immediate neighborhood of Boston, and there is a daily mail between these latter places, and a daily report in the newspapers of both places (as the evidence shows) of all arrivals at the respective ports; and that it is usual for the presidents of insurance offices to examine the newspapers for this purpose. And in point of fact, the daily newspaper, taken by the defendants, did contain the very information, as to the time of the arrival of the Benezet. What could be more natural, then, for a person desirous of procuring insurance in Boston, than to presume the underwriters acquainted with arrivals at Boston, and the neighboring ports, it being usual to publish such facts, and for the underwriters to take notice of them? Under such circumstances, I put it to the jury to say, whether the plaintiff did intend to affirm any thing by implication as to the arrival of the Benezet being recent, or whether he only referred to the fact of her arrival, as being within the knowledge or means of knowledge of the underwriters, as well as of himself, for the purpose of stating that the Benezet sailed after the Leonora. If they should think that there was an averment, that the Benezet had recently arrived, and that the fact thus stated was material to the risk, then their verdict should be for the defendants; if otherwise, then there had been no misrepresentation affecting the policy.

Then, as to the concealment, the charge was to this effect: The concealment, as had been already stated, must be of a material fact, peculiarly within the knowledge of the party, and in respect to which the other party may be presumed to trust him; and not of such public facts as may be presumed to be equally open to both parties. Now, there was clearly no concealment of the fact, that the Benezet had arrived, or of the port (New Bedford) at which she had arrived, which is in the neighborhood of Boston, and much nearer to that place than to the plaintiff's residence. And in this part of the case, then, there is no room for any argument about recency of arrival. The concealment is argued to be of the fact of her having arrived thirty-three days before. In the first place, was not this a fact, under the circumstances, equally open to the inquiry and ascertainment of both parties? Was it not a fact of general notoriety, and capable by the slightest diligence of being as easily ascertained by the underwriters, as by the plaintiff? The information given was sufficient to put the defendants upon inquiry, if they had chosen to do so. They asked no farther information of the fact, and they made no farther search. If the time of arrival was at all material, was it not their duty then to make it? I think it was. The notice to them was sufficient to put them upon inquiry; and they must be presumed to have notice of all facts, which under such circumstances they might reasonably know. In the next place, was the fact of such a nature, as that the defendants could be presumed to trust the plaintiff in regard to the fact? Or could he fairly be presumed to believe, that they trusted him in regard to it? Did the plaintiff intend to put them upon inquiry, or to give them notice to rely upon their own knowledge of the time of arrival of the Benezet, by the ordinary means, by which such arrivals are usually known? If so, it does not seem to me, that the defendants can now fairly turn round, and accuse him of a material concealment of a fact open to both parties, and as to which they did not trust to his knowledge, but relied upon themselves. But was the fact itself material? And if material, how far was it material? The representation was, that the Leonora sailed on the 12th of April, which was three days earlier than the time of her actual sailing. So that at the time of insurance she was represented as being out 129 days, whereas she was out only 126 days. Now, the time of the arrival of the Benezet could be no otherwise material, than with reference to the fact, whether the Leonora was out of time or not. This was a matter upon the facts so disclosed perfectly open for both parties to consider and decide upon. The underwriters are bound to know the ordinary length of passages and voyages, the seasons of the year, and the common causes, which may retard or accelerate a voyage. When the facts are given, they are bound to know, and decide for themselves, whether the vessel is out of time or not. The assured is not bound to disclose to them his opinion upon that matter. Mr. Cook stated at the trial, that he did not think the Leonora out of time, and that the ordinary passage is from 120 to 130 days; other witnesses think the ordinary passages somewhat less; and one in particular says, that it is from 110 to 120 days. The only bearing of the time of the arrival of the Benezet was, as a collateral fact aiding or repelling the conclusion, as to the length of common voyages, and as to the Leonora being or not being out of time. For, as she sailed after, and not with, the Leonora, there was no necessary connexion in regard to winds, and weather, and passages, between them. Under such circumstances, it seems to me, that there was no concealment on the part of the plaintiff, which could affect the policy. The defendants were fairly put upon inquiry and the exercise of their own judgment; and they cannot now complain, that they did not examine or inquire farther. Their conduct amounted to a waiver of it.

Such was the substance of the charge on this point; and upon mature deliberation, I adhere to it. No case has been cited, which propounds a different doctrine; and it seems to me, that it stands confirmed by the general principles of the adjudged cases on the subject of notice, and especially by those, which have been decided in regard to concealment in cases of policies. The doctrine in Fort v. Lee, 3 Taunt. 381, is far more strong; for there it was held, that it was not necessary for the assured to discover to the underwriter, whether a vessel, sought to be insured at and from a port, had sailed or not. The court said: If the underwriter had wanted to know the fact, he ought to have inquired. I am, therefore, of opinion, that this exception ought to be overruled.

The next exception is, that the court instructed the jury, that there could not be a gaming policy within the meaning of the law of Massachusetts, unless both parties intended it as such. The charge of the court upon this point was to the following effect:—There cannot, strictly and abstractly speaking, be a gaming policy or other gaming contract under our law, unless both parties concur in the object. For if one intends to game, and the other does not, they do not, strictly speaking, come ad idem; and to form any contract, there must be a deliberate assent by both parties to the same thing. In the present case it is agreed on both sides, that the defendants never intended to enter into a gaming policy; and therefore it seems to me, that in a strict sense it cannot be treated as a gaming contract. But I do not think this is of any real importance in the cause, because if, as is conceded, the defendants did intend only to underwrite a policy substantially on interest, and they have been misled by the plaintiff to underwrite one not upon interest, it is in construction of law a fraud upon them, and the policy is void. On the other hand, if both parties intended bona fide a policy on interest, and the plaintiff had a substantial interest on board, and the overvaluation was bona fide made, and not with an intention to defraud or mislead the defendants, then the policy is good, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The question, then, in this aspect, resolves itself into two points; first, whether there has been a great over-valuation of the profits upon the property on board; and if so, secondly, whether it was bona fide made, or for the purpose of fraud or deception. If the plaintiff intended it to be a gaming policy, and concealed it from the defendants, it is void, not as a gaming policy, but as a fraud. Such was the charge.

Was the court wrong, then, in saying, that the policy was not a gaming policy, in a strict sense, under the law of Massachusetts? It is clear, that the law of this state must govern in this case; and I confess, that I am unable to perceive any error in this part of the charge. To form a contract, both parties must concur in the same purpose. A gaming contract ex vi terminorum is a contract, in which both parties agree to game. And here both parties never intended to game. This is admitted. How, then, could the court hold a different language, without overturning the first element of all contracts, mutual consent in the same thing? But let us see, what contracts are deemed by the law of Massachusetts gaming contracts. The statute of March 4, 1786, (St. 1785, c. 58,) declares, "that all notes, bills, bonds, judgments, mortgages, or other securities or conveyances whatsoever, given, granted, drawn, entered into, or executed by any person or persons whatsoever, where the whole or any part of the consideration shall be for any money or other valuable thing whatever, won by gaming, or playing at cards, dice, or any other game or games whatsoever, or by betting on the side or hands of any person gaming, or for the reimbursing or repaying any money, knowingly lent or advanced at the time and place of such play to any person or persons so gaming or betting, or that shall during such play so play or bet, shall be void, and of no effect." It afterwards provides for the recovery back of money lost at play; and also inflicts penalties on the winner or person taking such security. Now, it is most manifest, that a policy of insurance entered into without interest is not a gaming contract or security within the purview of this act. It is neither within the words nor within the intent. And there is no statute of Massachusetts, which does prohibit gaming policies in terms. If prohibited at all, they are prohibited solely by the common law. And so was the doctrine of the supreme court of the state, in Amory v. Gilman, 2 Mass. 1.

It is true, that, in a loose sense, a policy underwritten knowingly by both parties without interest, is among us sometimes spoken of, both at the bar and on the bench, as a gaming contract. But this is not perfectly correct in legal language. It is more properly called a wager policy, at least in the sense of our law, where the word "gaming" has a limited and distinctive sense in the statute book.⁴ And accordingly in Amory v. Gilman, 2 Mass. 1, the court uniformly treat a policy without interest, as a wager policy, and give it that appropriate appellation. Nor is this a mere criticism upon language; for no one could pretend, upon sound reasoning, that a wager did not purport a unison of opinion and agreement of both parties to the same thing. A wager on one side would be a novelty in jurisprudence. The very form of a declaration on a wager demonstrates the truth, that the contract must involve a mutuality of consent, as to the wager and the risk run.⁵

If we pass to the jurisprudence of England, we shall find the same distinctive appellation applied by elementary writers, by the bar, and by the bench, to characterize policies without interest.⁶ Gaming is a species of wager; but in a strict sense all wagers are not gaming contracts, though they are often figuratively so called. Marshall and Park entitle their chapters on policies without interest, as wager policies.⁷ The statute of 19 Geo. II. c. 37, after reciting, that policies without interest have been productive of pernicious practices, and have introduced "a mischievous kind of gaming," proceeds to declare, "that no insurance shall be made on any ship, &c., or any goods, &c., interest or no interest, or without further proof of interest than the policy, or by way of gaming or wagering, or without benefit of salvage to the insurer; and that every such insurance shall be void."⁸ But the statute does not apply to insurances for foreigners. It is doubtless with reference to the very language, as well as the objects of this statute, that the bar and bench sometimes speak of policies without interest, as gaming policies. But (as I have said) the general and more exact appellation is wager policies. Thus, in the case of Kulen Kemp v. Vigne, 1 Term R. 304, where the policy was without interest, Lord Mansfield said: "This is a wagering policy." Mr. Justice Ashurst used similar language. And Mr. Justice Buller said: "Policies are of two sorts, either upon interest, or by way of wager." "This is a wagering policy." And again in Da Costa v. Firth, 4 Burrows, 1966, 1969, which was a policy not within the statute, Lord Mansfield said: "It is a mixed policy, partly a wager policy, partly an open one; and it is a valued policy, and fairly so, without fraud or misrepresentation. Therefore, the loss having happened, the insured is entitled to recover, as for a total loss. The insurer agreed to the value, and is concluded to dispute it."⁹

I do not mean to deny, that policies not on interest are sometimes called gaming policies, though they are more generally called wagering policies.¹⁰ But what I do mean to assert is, that, whether the one phrase or the other is used, it imports the same thing, that is to say, that the parties mutually and knowingly consent to the gaming or wager; and that there cannot be a gaming or a wagering policy without such mutual consent. In all the cases in England on the subject of wager policies it will be found, that the contract either included in its terms the prohibited stipulations of the statute of Geo. II. c. 37, as to interest, or no interest, &c.; or that other equivalent words were used in the policy. The principle of law in England is, that every policy is to be deemed a policy on interest, unless it appear otherwise on the face of it. Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, in delivering the opinion of the court of exchequer chamber, in the case of Cousins v. Nantes, 3 Taunt. 513, 523, said: "Every policy must be taken to be a policy on interest, unless something be stated showing the contrary." There is this difference between policies in America and policies in England, containing stipulations, like those in the present policy, "interest or no interest," or "without farther proof of interest than the policy," that in the latter country, such policies being prohibited as wager policies, the insertion of the prohibited words in the policy is proof de facto, that they are mere wagers; whereas in America such policies are not treated as necessarily purporting to be wager policies; but they are deemed policies on interest, if the parties so understood, and agreed. So it was held in Amory v. Gillman, 2 Mass. 1, and in Clendinning v. Church, 3 Caines, 141. Prima facie they so import; but the implication may be rebutted by proofs or admissions.

Now, in the present case, it is (as I have already stated) admitted, that the defendants meant to enter into a policy on interest, and not into a wager policy. They did not intend to wager or game, but to insure substantive interests. Whatever, then, the terms used are, the policy is to be deemed in point of law an interest policy. The plaintiff insists, that he meant it to be an interest policy; and if he had a substantive interest on board the ship, capable of being insured, I cannot perceive upon what principle the defendants can now treat it as a gaming policy. The policy was a wager policy, as to both parties, or as to neither party. It has not a double character, as a policy on interest as to one, and not as to the other. If it be a policy on interest, then undoubtedly the plaintiff cannot recover, unless he shows an interest; for, in Massachusetts, at least, the doctrine of Goddart v. Garrett, 2 Vern. 269, is in full force. But, whether the court were in a strict and technical sense right in this view of the matter or not, I still think, that the court did put the law applicable to a case of this sort correctly to the jury. The court said, that if the defendants meant to insure on interest, and the plaintiff meant a gaming policy, it was void; so that the point as to the gaming was put as favorably for the defendants, and as directly to the jury, as it could be.

The next exception is, that the court instructed the jury, on the point of valuation, that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, unless there was an over-valuation made by the plaintiff fraudulently, and with a design to deceive the defendants. To understand this exception fully, it is proper to state, that the line of argument of the counsel for the defendants on this point was, that if there was a designed gross over-valuation of the profits by the plaintiff, (whatever might be the moral character of the transaction,) it was in point of law a constructive fraud upon the defendants, which avoided the policy; and that a trivial interest would not save the policy. And the court expressly gave the same opinion to the jury. No point was made or argued, as to any over-valuation by mistake. But after the close of the argument, the counsel for the defendants requested the court to instruct the jury, that if the plaintiff expected a larger shipment of goods than was actually shipped, and made his valuation of profits upon that basis accordingly, then, that he was entitled to recover only pro rata, as the actual shipments bore to the expected shipment. And to this doctrine the court assented; and instructed the jury accordingly.

The charge of the court is now complained of, because it put the case of gross over-valuation, as a question of fraud, solely to the jury. Now, in so doing, it did no more than repeat the very doctrine asserted by the defendants' counsel; and it was no part of its duty to suggest any other points, which in certain postures of the case might possibly have been urged by counsel. But I am yet to learn, that the law is otherwise than it was stated by the court. By the law of Massachusetts valued policies are valid in general; and certainly valued policies on profits fall within the same rule.¹¹ What then is the effect of the valuation in point of law? It is, that it shall, in all cases of total losses, where there is a substantial interest, and bona fides, be conclusive in respect to the value. It is true, and it was so stated by the court, that a trivial interest will not save the policy. Neither will a substantial interest, if there is an intent to deceive or mislead the underwriters. And a gross over-valuation affords a presumption of fraud. But if the policy is procured in entire good faith; if there is no intent to deceive; and if there is a substantial interest; then the over-valuation, whatever it may be, is unimportant. The assured is entitled to recover upon general principles of law. And, indeed, under such circumstances, the underwriters are estopped to press the inquiry.¹² And in the very policy before the court, the defendants not only agreed to the valuation, and received the premium for it; but they expressly stipulated, that the policy should be the only proof of interest required. Upon what ground, other than fraud, are they entitled to escape from such a stipulation? If the policy is upon interest, and the valuation fairly made, and they agreed to be bound by it, and they have not been deceived; what right can they have to insist, that they ought not to perform their agreement?

No case has been cited, which affirms a different doctrine; and there are many, which inculcate this doctrine in cogent terms. In Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burrows, 1171, Lord Mansfield said: "It is settled, that upon valued policies the merchant only need prove some interest to take it out of the statute of 19 Geo. II., because the adverse party has admitted the value; and if more was required, the agreed valuation would signify nothing. But if it should come out in proof, that a man had insured £2,000, and had an interest on board to the value of a cable only, there never has been, and I believe there never will be a determination, that by such an evasion the act of parliament may be evaded. There are many conveniences from allowing valued policies. But where they are used merely as a cover to a wager, they would be considered as an evasion." Lord Mansfield, in the case of Da Costa v. Firth, 4 Burrows, 1969, in the passage already cited, held the same doctrine. I am not aware, that a different doctrine has been anywhere established.¹³ If the over-valuation be bona fide and innocent, the policy is good; if fraudulent, it is void.

Then, as to the other point, in which the defendants' counsel prayed the instruction of the court on the effect of an expected shipment and an actual shipment, complaint is made, that it was not made sufficiently intelligible to the jury. How that matter was, I cannot say. But I am bound to presume, that they understood the point. Certainly, if it had been deemed very material in the actual posture of the case, it might have been commented upon by the counsel for the defendants; and the court would have made any further explanations, which they should have requested. But the truth is, that in the actual state of the evidence there were no facts to raise the point; and so the evidence was stated to the jury at the suggestion of the defendants' counsel. At the time of the insurance, the plaintiff had a perfect knowledge of all the shipments addressed to him by the Leonora; and if so, there was no ground to say, that he then expected none.

The next exception is, that the verdict is against evidence, or at least against the weight of evidence. The argument is, that the evidence in the cause established, that the over-valuation was so gross, that it was necessarily presumptive of fraud; that it could not enter into the reasonable expectations of any man to make such profits on such a voyage; and that the jury have been wholly mistaken in their verdict. In considering questions of this nature, I confess myself among those judges, who are very reluctant to intermeddle with the verdicts of juries in mere matters of fact. There was a time, when courts were disposed to go an extravagant length on this subject, and to set aside the verdict of the jury, merely because, in the opinion of the court, the weight of evidence was on the other side. This was, indeed, substituting the court for the jury in trying the credibility of testimony, and the weight of evidence. For one, I am not disposed to proceed far upon this dangerous ground; and in matters of fact, I hold it to be my duty to abstain from interposing with the verdict of a jury, unless the verdict is clearly against the undoubted general current of the evidence, so that the court can clearly see, that they have acted under some mistake, or from some improper motive, or bias, or feeling.¹⁴ I adopt the language of Lord Ellenborough, in Carstairs v. Stein, 4 Maule & S. 192, 199: "The question before us is not, whether the verdict given in this case is such, as we should ourselves have given; but whether, having been given by a jury, to whom the whole case was fully left in point of fact, and to whom the law upon the subject was distinctly stated, it ought to be set aside, upon the grounds of the argument now suggested to us, namely, that they have drawn an erroneous conclusion." And upon a question of fraud in fact, which is made up of so many ingredients, and is so peculiarly within the province of a jury, I do not hesitate to say, that I should

Now, upon the evidence, it was clear, that there could not be any profit upon bullion; for it was said, that none is ever made or expected. Upon the hides, according to the calculations, variously made by the plaintiff, there might be a profit from $1700 to $2500. On the other hand, by the calculations offered by the defendants, and supported in a good measure by the evidence, there might under some aspects be even a loss, and at all events there could not be a profit exceeding $100 or $200. These calculations were submitted to the jury; and the question was left to them in this way, whether the over-valuation of the profits was designed to mislead the defendants into underwriting a policy not in fact on interest. If they thought it was, then, the policy was void. Their verdict in effect was, that the over-valuation was not fraudulent, but bona fide. And if the court now sets aside their verdict, it must be, because the court now clearly sees, that the jury ought upon the evidence to have found the over-valuation fraudulent. If it was a measuring cast, then, as the onus probandi was on the defendants, the verdict ought not to be disturbed. Now, certainly, I have a good deal of difficulty upon the evidence in seeing, how such an over-valuation could have been reasonably made. But, on the other hand, I have a good deal of difficulty in imputing fraud to the plaintiff. I do not know, that any over-valuation, however great, if it steers wide of a wager and a fraud, can be otherwise impeached. There is something, too, in the nature of an insurance on profits, which distinguishes it from any other insurance, whether on ships, or on goods, or on freight. The latter are generally susceptible of an exact valuation. But profits are not. In their very nature they are contingent and speculative; and upon them men's judgments, as well as their imaginations, run wide from each other. It has been truly said at the argument, that there can be no standard of valuation of profits. They are matters of expectation. A policy on profits is not an insurance upon results, but upon expectations. The party insures, not what profits he would actually make, but what he expected to make. It is difficult to measure men's expectations. There are complexional differences of mind on such subjects. There are vast distances between the moderated views of the timid and cautious, and the high-colored views of the sanguine and enterprising.

It is not sufficient to justify the court in setting aside the present verdict upon this ground, that it should doubt whether the over-valuation was innocent. It must clearly see, that it was fraudulent. Suppose the verdict should be set aside, and upon a new trial the jury were to find for the defendants, would that be entirely satisfactory? Might not the plaintiff fairly contend, that it was only verdict against verdict on a question of fact; and, therefore, that there should be a third trial to settle the controversy? I am not insensible of the force of the defendants' argument on this point. But after all, it turns upon this, that the court must find the fraud, which the jury refused to find. In Coolidge v. Gloucester Ins. Co., 15 Mass. 341, 344, the freight was valued at three times its real value; and yet the court refused to open the policy. In the case of Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Coulter, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 222, which was upon a policy on profits, valued at $20,000, the supreme court held, that it was not necessary to show, that any profits would have been made. Now, this must have proceeded upon the ground, that, if the valuation was bona fide, however great, it was of no consequence, whether it could or could not be shown, that profits would have resulted from the voyage. The court asked, what human calculation or human imagination could have furnished testimony on a fact so speculative and fortuitous? Upon the whole, upon this point, whatever might be the scruples of my own mind upon the evidence, if I were sitting in the jury-box, I cannot say, that it clearly appears to me, that the jury were wrong in finding, that the over-valuation was not fraudulent. I am not bold enough to disregard their judgment in a case fairly before them, upon a matter of fact purely and fitly within their province.

I come, then, in the last place, to the new evidence, discovered since the trial; and that is, that a prior policy was underwritten at New York on profits valued at $10,000, on the same voyage and risk, which has been paid. This is perfectly consistent with the plaintiff's case, and furnishes no new matter of defence; since in the present policy the profits are valued at $20,000; so that the amount is sufficient to cover both policies. It is, therefore, at most, the case of newly discovered evidence to an old point of defence. Now, the objections taken to it, as a ground for a new trial, are, in the first place, that the defendants at the trial made the point, that there was in all probability another policy on profits, and yet that they used no diligence, though they were thus put upon inquiry, to ascertain the fact. And what is still more strong, that having a clear right in this court upon motion to have compelled the plaintiff in this very cause to disclose the fact, whether there was any prior policy or not, they chose to go to trial without making the inquiry, though it is plain, that ordinary diligence would have brought it out. There is great force in this reasoning; and no answer was given to it at the argument, which entirely satisfied my mind. To set aside a verdict under such circumstances, on account of such newly discovered evidence, would be to encourage laches, and want of diligence, in regard to matters manifestly open to inquiry, under the common priority clause in our policies. It would enable the party to take a double chance for a verdict. But what is the nature of the new evidence? It is said, that it is not merely cumulative, because it shows that the plaintiff had already received $10,000 profits on the same voyage. But what has that to do with his title to recover $10,000 more, if the profits are bona fide valued in the second policy at $20,000? It is, therefore, merely as it bears upon the point of over-valuation, that it has any relevancy to the cause. And I cannot say, that I see much in it, in a legal sense, even under this aspect; for, the valuation being $20,000, the argument as to the over-valuation is precisely the same in form and pressure, in point of law, (whatever it may be as matter of remark to a jury,) whether the plaintiff stood underwriter for the remaining $10,000 or procured it to be insured. In either view, the valuation must stand or fall, as a valuation for $20,000 and not for $10,000. If, indeed, there had been expected shipments not actually put on board, and so an apportionment might have been required, then it might have become more material. But this, as I have already said, was excluded by the state of the facts. I can contemplate this evidence, then, in no other light, than as cumulative evidence. Now, it has been long established, as a just and reasonable practice, not to grant a new trial to introduce new witnesses, or new evidence, to points before in controversy. And there would be no safety in trials upon any other doctrine. Steinbach v. Columbian Ins. Co., 2 Caines, 129; Smith v. Brush, 8 Johns. 84, and Williams v. Baldwin, 18 Johns. 489, are directly in point. The cases of Gardner v. Mitchell, 6 Pick. 114; Inhabitants of Yarmouth v. Inhabitants of Dennis, Id. 116, note; Chatfield v. Lathrop, Id. 417, and Baker v. Briggs, 8 Pick. 122, adopt the same principle.¹³ And it seems also to prevail in England.¹⁴

I have thus gone over all the grounds urged with so much earnestness and ability in favor of a new trial. The conclusion, to which my mind has arrived, is, that the jury have not been misdirected in any matter of law; and that as to the matter of fact, it was fairly open before them, and peculiarly within their province; and I cannot judicially say, that the conclusion, to which they have come, is clearly erroneous, and must have arisen from some unquestionable mistake, or some improper motive or bias. In my judgment, therefore, the motion for a new trial ought to be overruled.

New trial denied.

[See, also, Alsop v. Maxwell, Case No. 264; Grant v. Maxwell, Id. 5,699; Fiedler v. Maxwell, Id. 4,760.]

At law. This was an action [by Joseph W. Alsop, Jr., and Henry Chauncey] against [Hugh Maxwell,] collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duties paid him. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.

J. Prescott Hall, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The plaintiffs, in May, September and November, 1851, made four several entries, at the custom-house in New-York, of merchandize imported from Valparaiso and Coquimbo, in Chili, and invoiced at those ports in the months of January, February, May and June, 1851, made up in the paper currency of the country. Each invoice was accompanied by a consular certificate stating the specie value of the currency in which the invoice prices were exhibited. The collector exacted duties upon the nominal value of the merchandize, which was paid by the plaintiffs under written protests against the legality of the demand. The plaintiffs also proved, on the trial before the jury, that the currency was debased or depreciated to the amount of the reduction demanded on the entries. It is unnecessary to detail the reasoning in support of the justness of this claim. It is sufficiently set forth in several cases recently decided by this court. I find, also, that the circuit court in Massachusetts coincides with these principles. I have been furnished with an opinion given by Mr. Justice Curtis, in that court, in October last, in which he holds the collector responsible to an importer for an excess of duties exacted on goods imported from Chili, on facts very analogous to those proved in the present case. Judgment is, therefore, rendered for the plaintiffs, with costs.

NOTE, [from original report.] In the case of Riley v. Maxwell, [Case No. 11,838,] decided at the same time, the same doctrine was applied to importations from Peru and Bolivia, and to invoices made up in the depreciated paper currency of those countries.

Where, on an importation of copper from Chili, the invoice and entry were made out in dollars, in the currency of Chili, and were accompanied by a consular certificate, which showed that the Chili dollar was worth but ninety cents in United States currency, but the collector assessed duties on the invoice as made out, without allowing for the depreciation: Held, that the depreciation should have been allowed for, and that the excess of duties paid could be recovered back.

At law. This was an action [by Joseph W. Alsop, Jr., and another] against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an excess of duties paid by the plaintiffs on a quantity of copper imported by them from Chili, in January, 1851.

John S. McCulloch, for plaintiffs.
Benjamin F. Dunning, for defendant.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. The original invoice of the copper in this case, was made out in the currency of Chili, which was depreciated about 10 per cent.; and a consular certificate, which accompanied the invoice, showed that the currency in which the invoice was made out, was so depreciated. The invoice, with the consular certificate attached, was presented at the custom-house, upon the importation of the copper. The entry was made out in conformity with the invoice. In Chili the doubloon, worth in fineness and weight, in the United States, only about sixteen dollars, is a legal tender at seventeen dollars and one quarter; and accounts and purchases in Chili are settled and paid for in doubloons, and are stated in dollars at the rates at which doubloons there pass current in commercial transactions, which is about 10 per cent. depreciation from the value fixed by law. The consular certificate shows that, in Chili, the true value of eight reals, or one dollar, of the currency of Chili, is ninety cents, estimated in Spanish or American dollars. The value of the copper, as set down in the invoice, was $21,957 07, as made out in Chili currency. The plaintiffs claimed that the duties to be paid in American or Spanish milled dollars, should be paid on the value of the invoice in American or Spanish dollars, and not on the value of the invoice in the currency of Chili. This claim of the plaintiffs the collector disregarded, and charged and collected the duties in American dollars, upon the invoice as made out in the currency of Chili.

It was decided by this court, in the case of Craig v. Maxwell, [Case No. 3,334,] that, upon a state of facts such as exists in this case, the plaintiffs could recover. The object of the tariff law was, that upon goods of the kind imported by the plaintiffs, a certain ad valorem duty should be paid upon their value in the country from which they were imported. The collector disregarded the consular certificate, and, by the rule adopted by him, a greater ad valorem duty has been exacted than was authorized by law. Judgment must be rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, for the excess, with interest, to be adjusted at the custom-house.

In equity. Submitted on demurrer to the bill for want of equity.

Jos. P. Carr, for complainant.
W. H. Hull, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The bill alleges in substance that complainant is the widow of Joseph Alston, Jr., formerly a citizen of South Carolina, but at his death a resident of New York, who died in April, 1861, intestate, seized and possessed of a large real and personal estate, and leaving his aunt Sarah, wife of John Izard Middleton, his aunts Charlotte M. Alston, Anna L. Alston, Mary Ashe, wife of Leaman Deas and the complainant, as his next of kin and distributees. That by the law of South Carolina, upon the death of said Joseph Alston, two-thirds of his real and personal estate descended to complainant and the remaining one-third was divisible among the said aunts of the deceased. That said John Izard Middleton took out letters of administration on the estate of Alston in Georgetown district, South Carolina, took possession of the same and paid all the debts. That in the spring of 1863, Leaman Deas and Mary Ashe, his wife, brought their bill in equity in the Charleston district against John Izard Middleton and Sarah his wife and the other distributees, except complainant, praying an account, sale, partition and distribution of the said estate. That the court made an order in 1863 directing a sale of all the personal estate of said Joseph Alston. That James Tupper, one of the masters of the court, in pursuance of said order, on November 25, 1863, sold certain bonds and shares of capital stock particularly described in the bill. That defendant became the purchaser thereof for the price named in the bill, and took possession of and appropriated the same to his own use.

The proceeds of this sale were divided among the other heirs and distributees to the exclusion of the complainant, or invested in bonds of the Confederate States which have become wholly valueless, and are now in possession of said master or his successor in office.

Complainant claims that as she was in no way a party to the said bill, her right to a share of the bonds and stocks can in no way be affected by the decree, that the master could only by the sale transfer the right, title and interest of the parties before the court, and that the purchaser became a tenant in common with complainant, or by taking possession of the bonds, has become a trustee for complainant, and is bound to account to her therefor.

The bill prays that defendant may be required to transfer to complainant two-thirds of the bonds and stocks so purchased by him, or to account for two-thirds of their value. The defendant has filed a demurrer to the bill for want of equity. I think the demurrer is well taken.

The question to be solved is this: Was the complainant bound by the proceedings and decree in the case in equity in the Charleston district? If she were a proper and necessary party she is not bound, but if otherwise, if her interests were represented by a party before the court, she is.

The general rule is, that inasmuch as the executor or administrator is the trustee and proper representative of all persons interested in the personal estate, and has a duty cast upon him of protecting it against improper demands, it is not necessary or proper to join either a pecuniary or residuary legatee or the next of kin as a party to a bill against an executor or administrator for an account of the personal estate, however interested such person may be to contest the demand which has occasioned the suit. 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 1729; Brown v. Dowthwaite, 1 Madd. 446. Until the final distribution of an estate, the administrator has both the legal and equitable title to the personalty. If therefore, the administrator is a party to a bill asking a sale and distribution which is ordered, the purchaser at the sale takes the title of the administrator.

The administrator of Alston was a party to the bill before the Charleston chancery court. He held the title to the personal estate, and was the proper representative of all persons interested therein. A decree to which he was a party ordering a sale, and a sale made in pursuance of such decree therefore, conveyed his title to Cohen, the purchaser. If Cohen acquired title the complainant has no claim upon him, either as tenant in common with her or as trustee.

Case No. 266.

ALSTON v. MANNING.

[Chase, 460.]¹

COURTS—FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE — SUMMONING JURY.

1. The practice of the state courts in relation to summoning juries, whether statutory or otherwise, does not become the practice of the United States courts until expressly adopted by the latter.

[Cited in U. S. v. Richardson, 28 Fed. 69.]

2. A jury was summoned according to what had for a long time been the practice of the courts, and the statutory requirements of the state of South Carolina. But before the summoning of the jury, those statutory requirements and the practice of the state courts had been materially modified. The jury is properly summoned.

Motion for continuance. Under the laws of South Carolina prior to 1861, the juries in the state courts were required to be white persons owning a certain amount of property.

The circuit court of the district of South Carolina made a rule regulating the summoning of juries in conformity with that law. This rule was modified subsequent to 1866, so as to strike out all distinctions on account of race or color, but retained the property qualification for jurors after the modification of the rule of court. The state of South Carolina passed an act in 1868, abolishing all distinctions on account of race, color, or property qualifications, as to jurors in the state courts, and provided a method of selecting them in each county, whites and blacks to be summoned in proportion to the population of the races in the respective counties.

The venire for the jury to this term of the circuit court ran in accordance with the modified rule of 1866, directing the sheriff to summon persons having the stated property qualifications, without regard to color. On the return of the writ executed, and the assembling of the jury summoned under it, the defendant moved the court to continue the cause until the next term. 1. Because the rule of court under which the jury was summoned did not conform to the law of the state in existence at the time the rule was made, in that the law required white persons alone to be summoned, while the rule required them to be summoned without distinction on account of race or color. 2. Because the said rule did not conform to the law of the state in existence at the time the rule was executed. The state law having abolished property qualifications, while the rule maintained it.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. The answer to the application for continuance, made in behalf of the defendant, must depend on the construction of the acts of congress relating to juries. If the proposition maintained by him is correct, that the jury now in attendance upon the court is not constituted in conformity with those laws, he can not be required to submit his cause to its determination.

The only act which it is now necessary to consider is that of July 20, 1840. This act provides that the qualifications and exemptions of jurors in the courts of the United States shall be the same as in the highest courts of the state in which trials by jury are held, and that they "shall be designated by ballot, lot or otherwise, in the mode practiced in such courts, as far as practicable, by the courts of the United States and their officers." The act of the state, in accordance with which was the mode of designating jurors practiced in the state courts when the jury now here was selected, was passed in 1859. The rule of this court conformed to that act as far as practicable. It had been modified only so far as to strike out distinction on account of color. It retained as the law of the state and the practice of the state courts, a property qualification.

It is not denied that the jury was constituted according to the law and practice of the state until last year. Then the property qualification was abolished; and later, within the last two or three months, a rule has been prescribed for the selection of juries in the several counties, from the white and colored voters in the proportion of their respective numbers. And the question is, did these late laws become at once the rule of this court so far as to make void the designation of the jury selected in conformity with the prior law and the existing rule? It is only necessary to look at the act of congress to determine this question. That act does not make the acts of the state legislature alone, but those and the practice of the state courts the guides of the United States courts in this matter. That practice, of course, is presumed to be in conformity with these acts, and is most readily ascertained by reference to them. But neither the state law nor the state practice has instantaneous operation in the courts of the Union. The state practice can only be introduced as far as practicable, and rules are necessary to determine how far it is practicable, and to introduce it to that extent. Accordingly the act provides that "the courts of the United States shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impanelling of juries, in substance, to the laws and usages now in force in such state." This was done by the rule in conformity with which this jury was designated and impanelled. In order that future changes in state law and practice might be incorporated into the practice of the national courts, the act proceeds to provide: "And further shall have power, by rule, or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which may be hereafter adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts." Under this provision, this court has power to provide, and will doubtless recognize the duty of providing, by rule, for the future designation of juries in substantial conformity with the recent legislation. But, until some rule or order has been made to that effect, that legislation has, and under the act of congress can have, no operation here. It follows that the present jury was lawfully designated and impanelled, and is not affected by the legislation referred to.

The existing rule rejects distinction on account of color. The law now rejects, also, distinction on account of property. It will be the duty of the court to provide, by rule, for the selection of impartial, intelligent and upright—in one word, competent—jurors without regard to either of these adventitious distinctions. The motion for continuance must be denied.

Subsequently, the following rules were adopted by the court, CHASE, Circuit Justice, presiding:

To conform the manner of designating the juries, in substance, to the laws and usages now in force in the state of South Carolina, ordered,

1. That the clerk of the circuit court, and the marshal of the United States for the district of South Carolina, do make up a jury list from the state at large, of three hundred names of citizens, qualified under laws of the state of South Carolina to serve in the highest courts of the state, in which juries are used, in the following manner, to wit: they shall call upon the several collectors of internal revenue of the several collection districts in the state of South Carolina to furnish each, from the several counties in their respective districts, the names of one hundred citizens, to be selected by them, and such as they think well qualified to serve as jurors, being persons of good moral character, sound judgment, and free from all legal exceptions. Provided, if any one of the said collectors of internal revenue shall, after thirty days' notice in writing from the clerk and marshal, neglect or refuse to furnish the list of names as hereinbefore provided, then the clerk and marshal shall proceed to select a list of jurors from the several counties in the collection district of the collector neglecting or refusing to furnish a list as aforesaid.

2. Of the lists made up as aforesaid, the clerk and marshal shall cause the names to be written, each one, on a separate paper or ballot, and shall roll up or fold the ballots, so as to resemble each other as much as possible, and so that the names written therein shall not be visible on the outside, and they shall place the ballots in a box to be kept by the clerk for that purpose. This box shall be securely locked and sealed, and only opened at the time and for the purpose of drawing jurors. The list of jurors and the box as thus made up shall be the list and box out of which jurors shall be drawn for the year ensuing.

3. When jurors are to be drawn, the clerk and marshal shall attend at the clerk's office or some other public place appointed for the purpose by a judge of the court. The ballots in the jury-box shall be shaken and mixed together, and the clerk or the marshal, in the presence of a judge of the court, unless necessarily absent, without seeing the names written thereon, shall openly draw therefrom the number of jurors required. If a person so drawn is exempt by law, or is unable by reason of sickness or absence from home to attend as a juror, his name shall be returned into the box and another drawn in his stead.

4. A jury-list shall be made up in the manner herein indicated, during the months of April and May, annually; provided, that the jury-list for the present year shall be made up as soon as practicable after the passage of this order.

5. Grand jurors shall be drawn and summoned in the same manner as jurors for trials; and when drawn at the same time as jurors for trials, the persons whose names are first drawn, to the number required, shall be returned as grand jurors, and those afterwards drawn shall be jurors for trials.

6. Grand and petit jurors to serve at any stated term of the court, whether at Charleston or at Columbia, shall be drawn, and summons therefor issued, at least fifteen days before the commencement thereof.

7. No more than thirty-one persons to serve as petit jurors, or nineteen to serve as grand jurors, shall be drawn and summoned to attend, at one and the same time, any court, unless the court shall otherwise order.

8. When by reason of challenge or otherwise, a sufficient number of jurors duly drawn and summoned can not be obtained for the trial of any cause, civil or criminal, the court shall forthwith cause jurors to be returned from the bystanders to complete the panel. The jurors so returned from the bystanders shall be returned by the marshal or his deputies, and shall be such as are qualified and liable to be drawn as jurors according to the provisions of law.

9. No person shall be liable to be drawn and serve as a juror oftener than once in two years; but he shall not be so exempt unless he attends and serves as a juror in pursuance of the draft.

10. The jurors in attendance at any term of the court shall be empanelled in the same manner as provided by the laws of the state of South Carolina.

11. The rules heretofore passed relative to designating, drawing, and empanelling jurors, are hereby rescinded.

Case No 267.

[1 Brock. 266.]

JUDGMENT AGAINST DECEDENT — SCIRE FACIAS AGAINST HEIRS—ERROR OF CLERK — RES JUDICATA—GUARDIAN AND WARD—SPECIFIC LEGACY —MARSHALING ASSETS.

1. It seems, that the fifth section of the act of Virginia of 1792, which limits the right of reviving judgments by scire facias, or action of debt, to the period of ten years, applies as well to those judgments which had been rendered at the time of the passage of the act, as to those rendered afterwards; but if a creditor, who had obtained a judgment against his debtor, in the life-time of the latter, has been employed in pursuing the personal estate in the hands of the executor, or if a court of equity has enjoined him from exhausting the personal estate, and so the delay has been produced, the act ought not to be so construed as to bar a scire facias against the heir, after the lapse of ten years.

2. An action of debt is brought on a bond; the verdict, as rendered by the jury, is for the penalty to be discharged by the sum expressed in the condition, with interest till paid; but by the misprision of the clerk, the verdict is entered for the smaller sum as damages, without interest, and the judgment is entered for the penalty to be discharged by those damages without interest. It seems, that for this misprision, the judgment might have been reversed by writ of error, coram vobis.

3. In such case, if the misprision occurred in a suit against the executor, and a subsequent suit be brought against the heir, he cannot avail himself of the error in the judgment, (even if it is not amendable,) but is liable for the whole amount due. As the judgment could not be given in evidence against the heir, so neither can it be given in evidence in his favour.

4. If a suit in chancery is brought against an heir, to subject him to the payment of an old bond, and the defence of the heir is the length of time, the court will, if the heir require it, direct an issue, to ascertain whether it has been paid or not.

5. A foreign bill of exchange, protested, does not bind the heir of the drawer.

6. If A be the executor of B, and testamentary guardian of C, the daughter of B, and the testator give a bond as a specific legacy to his daughter, and A receives the bond, and charges himself, in his executor's account, with the amount thereof, "to be paid to his ward," and writes to the obligor, in the bond, that he shall make himself debtor to his ward for the legacy, and hold the obligor as bound to himself. Held: 1st. That this is an assent of the executor to the legacy, and a payment of it to the guardian, as much as if the two characters were not united in one person. 2d. That the sureties of A, in the executor's bond, (as well as the executor,) are discharged from liability for the legacy under the executor's bond. 3d. That A was chargeable, as guardian, but as he gave no bond in that character, his heirs, on his death, are not bound, though the debt remains one of the first dignity against his personal estate.

[Cited in McLaughlin v. Bank of Potomac, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 229.]

7. If there be four testamentary guardians, one of the four has a right to receive a legacy for the ward, from the executor, and to give a receipt to him for the same, and the acquittance to him is good, without requiring the joint receipt of all. And on the same principle, if the characters of executor, and of receiving guardian, be united in the same person, the guardian who charges himself, discharges himself as executor.

8. The principle of marshalling assets, is this. A creditor having the choice of two funds, ought to exercise his right of election in such a manner as not to injure other creditors, who can resort to one only of those funds; but if he, in the exercise of his legal rights, exhausts that to which alone other creditors can resort, equity will place them in his situation, so far as he has applied their funds to his claim.

9. In the application of this principle, simple contract creditors will be substituted for specialty creditors, but not for judgment creditors: that is, the simple contract creditors cannot charge the lands for so much of the personal fund as has been applied to the payment of debts due by judgments obtained against the ancestor. The reason is, that the writ of elegit, by virtue of which the land is charged by judgment against the ancestor, does not issue singly against the land, but against all the chattels, (save oxen, and beasts of the plough,) and if the chattels be sufficient, the land ought not to be extended. The judgment creditor, therefore, has not the election between two funds, (as the specialty creditor has,) and the principle on which assets are marshalled, does not apply to the case.

10. Upon this principle of marshalling assets, where payments have been made by an executor, to the vendor of land purchased by the ancestor, and not conveyed to him, the lien of the vendor will be marshalled.

[11. Cited in Backhouse's Adm'r v. Jett's Adm'r, Case No. 710, to the point that chancery does not make an heir responsible for profits accrued before the filing of his bill.]

In equity. George Alston and others, of the state of North Carolina, executors of Thomas Mutter, late of the said state, exhibited their bill in this court, against William Munford, heir at law, and devisee of Robert Munford, deceased, Anne Munford, his widow, and Anne Byrd, widow of Otway Byrd, and Richard Kennon, and Elizabeth, his wife, which Anne Byrd and Elizabeth Kennon were children of the said Robert Munford, and all of the state of Virginia.

The bill sets forth, that Robert Munford was, in his lifetime, indebted to Thomas Mutter, in a certain sum, by a writing, (a copy of which is filed among the exhibits, and appears to have been a note, without seal,) on which writing a suit was instituted in North Carolina, by the said Mutter, against the executors of the said Robert Munford, and judgment obtained against them: that Robert Munford, by his will, appointed Otway Byrd, and Richard Kennon, his executors, of whom the former only, qualified, and after possessing himself of the testator's property to a very great amount, died intestate, and Anne Byrd, his widow, administered on his estate: that no person has taken administration on the estate of Robert Munford, since the death of Otway Byrd: that the said Robert Munford died seized in his own right, of large tracts of land in North Carolina and Virginia, and the plaintiff calls on William Munford, his eldest son and heir at law, to discover where those tracts are situated, and to what amount: that the said widow and children are next of kin to the said Robert Munford, and will be entitled, under his will, to any surplus which may remain of his personal estate, after debts paid: that they have frequently demanded payment of the judgment aforesaid, from Otway Byrd, the executor, and from the defendants, but have never obtained it. The bill, therefore, prays, that the above mentioned parties may be made defendants; that an account of the real and personal estate of the testator, Robert Munford, may be taken, as well as the administration of it by Otway Byrd; that the assets may be marshalled; that if the personal estate is insufficient to pay all the debts, the testator's lands may be sold to satisfy them; that the plaintiffs may, if necessary, be substituted in the room of any creditor, or creditors, who may have already received satisfaction; and for general relief. This suit was commenced in July 1803. At the May term of the court 1804, the court ordered one of the commissioners of the court to examine, state, and settle all matters and accounts between the parties in this cause, and to report to the court, what estate the said Robert Munford died seized and possessed of, real and personal, and in what manner the said personal estate has been administered, stating such special matters as either party may require, or he think fit. At the same time, William & Peter Murdock, surviving partners of W. Cunningham & Co.; and James Jameson & Richard Cameron, surviving partners of Buchanans, Hastie & Co.; were respectively, on their bills filed, made parties plaintiffs in this cause. The claim of the first was founded on a bill of exchange drawn by Robert Munford, in February 1776, on William Cunningham of Glasgow, in favour of William Cunningham & Co., which was protested for non-acceptance; and judgment when assets on this protested bill was rendered in favour of the said Cunningham & Co., against Otway Byrd, the executor of Munford in this court, in December 1798. The other claim was founded on a bond, in the usual form, binding his heirs, executed by the said Munford, to Buchanans, Hastie & Co., dated 22d May, 1772, in the penalty of £1166 7s., current money of Virginia, conditioned to pay in October following, the sum of £566 3s. 6d. On this bond, suit had been brought, and a verdict was rendered in this court, in December 1798. In the verdict, as recorded, the jury assessed the plaintiff's damages to $1220 58 cents, thus giving no interest on those damages, and that the defendant had fully administered. The verdict, as actually rendered, was for the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged by $1220 58 cents, with interest from the last day of October 1780, till paid. The judgment was for the penalty as a sterling debt, but to be discharged by the damages aforesaid assessed, (that is by $1220 58) without interest; and was rendered of the assets, quando acciderint. In May 1805, William Munford, the heir, filed his answer, in which he states, inter alia, that he is the son and residuary devisee of Robert Munford, who died in January 1784; that he is willing to render a just account of the lands which were devised to him, and that a commissioner may make a fair statement of the sales which he made of the said lands, and of the payments which he made to the creditors; that part of the Oconeechee tract is yet unsold, and that the Richland tract, which was devised to the widow for life, is now held by the defendant, the widow being dead: that these tracts lie in Mecklenburg, on Roanoke River. He states, that Otway Byrd, the executor, placed in his hands as attorney, sundry bonds belonging to the estate, for which he will be ready to account, as soon as an administrator, with will annexed of said estate, shall be appointed: that as to the administration of the personal assets, however, the claims of the plaintiffs are of inferior dignity to that of Conway Whittle, in whose favour a decree of the high court of chancery of Virginia has been rendered, and which will absorb all the money in the defendant's hands: that claim, he alleges to be of the first dignity, it being due for a legacy bequeathed by a certain Theodorick Munford, of whom Robert Munford was executor, to Frances, the wife of the said Conway Whittle.

The defendant admits, that as devisee of Robert Munford, he is bound to pay the bonds in which the said Robert bound himself and his heirs, to the value of the real estate devised to him, but he alleges that the claims exhibited by the surviving partners of W. Cunningham & Co., and by the executors of Thomas Mutter, are founded on writings, in which Robert Munford did not bind himself and his heirs, and, therefore, they are not entitled to recover against him as heir, or devisee, except by marshalling the real and personal assets, which cannot be done, until the account of Otway Byrd, the executor of Robert Munford, shall have been settled: that the defendant is not responsible for the transactions of the executor, nor can he be required to settle the account current; that when an administrator, with the will annexed, shall have been appointed, the account may be legally settled between such administrator, and the administratrix of Otway Byrd, the executor. The defendant also demurred, to so much of the bills as prayed, that the lands left by the said Robert Munford, may be sold for the payment of their claims, on the ground, that the law does not direct lands under no mortgage, or other incumbrances, to be sold for the payment of debts. The defendant, Anne Byrd, administratrix of Otway Byrd, also filed a plea, and answer, and Richard Kennon, also answered. It is deemed unnecessary, to make a statement of their respective defences.

The commissioner made a report of the several matters referred to him, in November 1806, to which both Mutter's executors, and Munford's heir excepted; and in December 1807, the court made an interlocutory order, recommitting the report to the commissioner, with further instructions. It is unnecessary to state the substance of that report, of the exceptions, or of the decree. On the 11th June, 1808, John Peirce, surviving executor, and trustee of Samuel Beall, deceased, was made a party plaintiff in this cause, and filed his bill, which alleges, that the estate of the said Robert Munford, is indebted to that of his testator, by judgment of the general court of Virginia, bearing date on the 20th day of October, 1783, rendered against the said Robert Munford, in his lifetime, for 66,883 lbs. tobacco, with lawful interest, from the 14th day of May, 1782, till payment, on which judgment, a large balance is still due; that the said plaintiff had been enjoined by the chancellor of Virginia, from proceeding on the said judgment by a bill of conformity, filed by Otway Byrd, the executor, who alleged that by paying creditors without an account, he might be subjected to a devastavit. The plaintiff prayed, that satisfaction of his said judgment-debt might be secured to him.

The defendant, William Munford, to this bill, filed his plea and answer. He pleaded, 1st. That the judgment is now no lien on the land of which Robert Munford died seized, if there was ever a lien, being lost through length of time, the said judgment bearing date in October 1783, and no writ of elegit or scire facias having ever been issued, for the purpose of subjecting the said lands to satisfy the same; he, therefore, prayed the benefit of the act for limitations of proceedings upon judgments: 2d. For further plea, he said, that if the said plaintiff hath at this time, any lien on the said lands, by virtue of the judgment, his remedy is at common law, and not in chancery, and he, therefore, pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court. In his answer the defendant says, that Samuel Beall, in his lifetime, revived his judgment, either by scire facias, or action of debt, in the court of Charles City county, against Otway Byrd as executor of Robert Munford; that he, together with other creditors, was enjoined from proceeding on his judgment, until the nature and dignity of their various claims could be ascertained; that on the 2d of October, 1797, a decree was entered directing the executor to go on, and pay the creditors of Robert Munford in the manner therein directed, which decree the defendant conceives to be equivalent to a dissolution of the injunction: that other creditors (such as Buchanan, Hastie, & Co.) proceeded to enforce their claims at law by obtaining judgments: that the plaintiff has been guilty of neglect in not moving to dissolve the injunction, if it was still tied up by injunction: that Otway Byrd died in September 1800, and that the said suit was entered, abated by his death in September 1802. By reference to the decree of October 1797, mentioned in the above answer, it appears that the injunction was not dissolved. It was abated by the death of Otway Byrd on the day mentioned. The claim of Conway Whittle is sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the court, without making any farther statement.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. So far as these suits affect the heir, it becomes material to distinguish those claims which may at this time be asserted against the real estate, and then to inquire what claims may be supported upon the principle of marshalling assets. The first claim which has been discussed, is that of the executors of Samuel Beall, deceased. This was a judgment obtained by Samuel Beall in his lifetime, against Robert Munford in his lifetime, which was revived after the death of Munford, to wit, in 1784 or 1785, against his executors. The great objection to this debt is, that the judgment as against the real assets, is barred by the act of limitations.

By an act passed in 1792,² it is declared that judgments in any court within this commonwealth may be revived within ten years next after the date of such judgment, and not after. The words of this act taken in their strict literal sense, certainly extend to this case; but it is contended that this strict construction must yield to one more favourable to the creditor, and Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 125, has been cited in support of this position. In Eppes v. Randolph, the obligation of a judgment of much older date was unquestionably admitted without controversy, but in that case, the point was not made at the bar nor decided by the bench, and the claim was asserted within less than ten years after the passage of the act. In the construction of this act, some difficulty is produced by the circumstance, that the draftsman has omitted to change the phraseology where a new provision was introduced, so as to adapt the language of the act to the subject. Actions had been previously limited, and this act of 1792, does, in general, only re-enact what was law before, and therefore it would have been improper, in most of its provisions, to give time for the institution of a suit subsequent to the passage of the act. For example: the first section gives a right to sue forth a writ of formedon, within twenty years after the cause of action accrued, and not after. If the whole twenty years had elapsed before the passage of the act, the action would be barred; or if nineteen years had elapsed the action must be brought within one year, or the action would be barred. This is very proper, and was undoubtedly within the intention of the legislature. Previous acts of limitation, which were repealed by this, had created the same bar to this action, and if a time for bringing it had been given after the passage of this act, it would have exempted from the operation of former acts, claims which had already been barred by them, or might have given to the claimants a much longer time to assert those claims than they would otherwise have been entitled to. It was the intention of the legislature merely to bring all former acts into one, and not to change the rights or situation of parties so far as former statutes had provided for the case.³ But no former act of limitations had extended to judgments. Had the legislature adverted to this circumstance, it is probable that a certain time would have been given, after the passage of the act, for the revival of judgments previously rendered. Not advertent to this circumstance, they have employed terms which, strictly interpreted, must bar immediately any action on judgments of more than ten years standing, unless they be so construed as to exclude those judgments entirely from their operation. There is a peculiar degree of carelessness in the phraseology of the two sections on this subject. The first, which is the fifth section of the act, uses the appropriate terms for those judgments only, which had been actually rendered when the act passed, and would, therefore, justify the idea that the act speaks as at the point of time when the scire facias issues; but the succeeding section applies itself expressly, both to judgments which had been rendered before the passage of the act, and to those which might thereafter be rendered. This produces the necessity of applying the preceding section to the same judgments.⁴

² Rev. Code 1792, c. 76, § 5. The same provision re-enacted, 1 Rev. Code 1819, c. 128, § 5.

Whether the state courts would, in the construction of this law, supply words which would give those entitled to judgments before its passage, time to revive those judgments by scire facias, is rendered, by the length of time which has already elapsed, a question of not much consequence. The same principle may, however, arise in the case of a judgment on which an execution has issued, or which has been enjoined, where, after the lapse of ten years from its rendition, one of the parties dies. I shall not inquire what would be the law in such a case, but think, that in general, where, after the passage of the act, ten years have passed away without a scire facias, it is too late to sue out that writ.⁵ If, then, in this case, there had been no scire facias against the executor, nor injunction on that judgment, I should think it too late to proceed against the heir. But those circumstances change the nature of the case, as will, hereafter, be more particularly noticed.

The next claim to be considered, is that of Buchanan, Hastie & Co. In this case, judgment was rendered in this court, on a bond carrying interest, for a specific sum, although the verdict on which that judgment was rendered, found the penalty of the bond to or an action of debt brought thereon, within ten years next after the date of such judgment, and not after; or where execution hath issued, and no return is made thereon, the party in whose favour the same was issued, shall and may obtain other executions, or move against any sheriff or other officer, or his or their security or securities, for not returning the same for the term of ten years from the date of such judgment, and not after." "6. Provided, That if any person or persons, entitled to such judgment, where execution hath not issued, or where execution hath issued and no return made, (in either case,) shall be or were under the age of twenty-one years, feme covert, non compos mentis, imprisoned, or not, within this Commonwealth, at the time of such judgment being awarded, whether execution hath issued thereon or not, every such person, his or her heirs, executors, or administrators, shall and may, notwithstanding the said ten years are or shall be expired, have the benefit, where no execution hath issued, by reviving the same by scire facias, or by action of debt; and where execution hath issued, and no return made, every such person or persons, his or her heirs, executors, or administrators, may have the benefit of other executions, or may move against any sheriff or other officer, or his or their security or securities for the same, within five years after such disabilities removed, and not after." Rev. Code 1792, c. 76, §§ 5, 6, re-enacted 1 Rev. Code 1819, c. 188, §§ 5, 6. The court of appeals of Virginia have decided, that this fifth section was prospective only, and did not apply to judgments existing when it took effect. Lyons v. Gregory, 3 Hen. & M. 237; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.

⁵ In Gee v. Hamilton, 6 Munf. 32, where an execution was issued within the year, and returned nulla bona, it was conceded by the appellant's counsel, that the lapse of ten years was no bar to a scire facias: and it seems that where a party is delayed by injunction, he is not put to his scire facias, but he may sue out his execution within a year after the injunction is dissolved. Noland v. Seekright, Id. 185. And so where there is a stay of execution. Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 186.

be discharged by a less sum, with interest. It is apparent, that the entry of the judgment, which appears to have been the act of the clerk, deriving no sanction from any act of the court, is a clerical misprision, and such a judgment must have been reversed on writ of error. But without inquiring whether it is not amendable, and whether, in making out a record of the cause, it ought or ought not to be considered as the real judgment,⁶ I think it perfectly clear, that the heir cannot take advantage of it. A verdict can never be given in evidence in favour of a party, if it might not be given in evidence against him. The heir cannot, therefore, avail himself of this judgment.

The claim of John M'Rae, is on a bond, dated in April 1776. The objection to this is the length of time which has elapsed since its date. If it be the wish of the heir, I shall direct an issue to be tried at this bar, to ascertain whether the bond has been paid or not.

The claim of William Cunningham & Co., being on a bill of exchange, does not bind the heir.

The claim of Conway Whittle, is for a legacy given to his wife by Theodorick Munford, one of whose executors Robert Munford was. The principal objection to this claim is, that Robert Munford, as executor of Theodorick Munford, paid this money to himself as the guardian of his ward, and that, as testamentary guardian, he gave no bond, and, consequently, his heirs are not bound. The legacy is a specific legacy to Frances Munford, the wife of Conway Whittle, of a bond of John Bannister, amounting to £1809. This bond was delivered to Robert Munford, on the 2d of January, 1777, by Archibald Carlos.

On the same day, Robert Munford, in his account with the estate of Theodorick Munford, charges himself with this bond. On the credit side of that account is the following entry: "To John Bannister's bond, to be paid to Frances Munford, £1809." This last entry is under date of the 12th of July, 1778. A letter appears to have been written by Robert Munford to John Bannister, on the 13th of June, 1780, in which he speaks of having received from Mr. Bannister, a payment of £1000, in paper money, intrinsically worth only £200; and after ex-

Pennell*, 2 Rand. [Va.] 174. Where the object is to correct clerical misprisions, this writ has been superseded by the practice of giving notice to the adverse party, and amending upon motion. 1 Rev. Code, 1819, p. 508, § 77, (passed originally in 1792,) and 1 Rev. Code, 1819, p. 512, § 88; [Coghill v. Coghill], 2 Hen. & M. 477; Halley v. Faird, 1 Hen. & M. 25; *Beatty v. pressing his confidence that Mr. Bannister would not avail himself of that payment, adds: "Agreeable to your request, I shall make myself debtor to my niece, for the amount of her pecuniary legacy from her father, and consider you as debtor to me for the bond and interest enclosed in your letter." I do not know what other construction to put upon this entry, than to consider it as the consent of the executor to the legacy, and a payment of that legacy to the guardian. The terms of the entry show that the bond was no longer to be considered as a subject on which the executor was to act. It was to be paid to Frances Munford, and in his executor's account, he takes credit for it. This credit is entered among his payments, and bears date more than twelve months after the executor debits himself with the bond.⁷ It has been contended, that this transaction, were it even unequivocal, could not discharge the executor, because there were four testamentary guardians, and they must act conjointly. Whatever force might be allowed to this argument, as applicable to the commutation of the bond, which seems to be alluded to in the letter of the 13th of June, 1780, I cannot admit its validity, when applied to the payment made by the executor to the guardian. When there is more than one testamentary guardian, it may be necessary that they should unite in any act which disposes of the property of the ward; but I cannot conceive that the absence of one, disables the other from collecting a debt due to the ward. I cannot conceive that a joint receipt is necessary to the discharge of the debtor. This would be extremely inconvenient, and I should require an express authority to the point, before I could admit the principle. Whether the principle, laid down in 3 Ba. 407, [3 Bac. Abr. (1st Amer. Ed. Phila. 1811) *407, tit. "Guardian by Statute," par. 9.] that, from the nature of the thing, the authority of guardians must be joint and several, be true, in all cases, or not, I think it must be true in the case of receiving the money of a ward. To me, then, it appears that Robert Munford was chargeable with this bond in his character of guardian, and as he gave no bond in that character, his heir is not bound. The debt remains a debt of the first dignity against the personal estate. 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 389; Id. p. 408, § 12.

⁷ The principle seems to be well settled, that where an executor, or administrator, having assets in his hands, is also guardian of a legatee, or distributee, he can elect to hold the share of that legatee, or distributee, in his character of guardian, and thus, exonerate the sureties in the administration bond, and charge the sureties in the guardian's bond. But there must be some act, from which the election to hold the property in a different character from that in which it was received may fairly be inferred, before the responsibility can be shifted from one class of sureties to another. Taylor v. Deblois, [Case No. 13,790;] Pratt v. Northan, [Id. 11,376;] Myers v. Wade, 6 Rand. [Va.] 444.

The extent to which the heir is directly liable, being stated, with the exception of Beall's judgment, it remains to inquire how far he is to be made liable, on the principle of marshalling assets. The principle on which the court proceeds in marshalling assets, is discussed very much at large in a case reported in 8 Ves. 382, (Aldrich v. Cooper.) The principle is, that a creditor having his choice of two funds, ought to exercise his right of election in such a manner as not to injure other creditors, who can resort to only one of these funds. But if, contrary to equity, he should so exercise his legal rights as to exhaust the fund, to which alone other creditors can resort, then those other creditors will be placed by a court of equity in his situation, so far as he has applied their fund to the satisfaction of his claim.⁸ In the application of this principle, no doubt can exist, so far as respects creditors by specialty, in which the heir is bound. Such a case is precisely within the principle, and is the case to which the principle has been most frequently applied.⁹ It has been contended by the heir, that moneys applied by the executor in payment for lands purchased by the ancestor, and not conveyed to him, are not to be considered as being now chargeable on the real estate. But, in such case, the creditor had his election to proceed by way of ejectment, and if the heir should enjoin, and call on the executor to satisfy the debt out of the personal estate, a court of equity would certainly not decree such satisfaction to the injury of simple contract creditors: such a case, therefore, seems to come precisely within the general principle, for the creditor had his election of two funds at law. But this question came on to be considered in Trimmer v. Bayne, reported in 9 Ves. 209, where the decision was against the heir.¹⁰

The question, about which I have felt most difficulty, is, that which relates to the claims

of simple contract creditors, founded on payments made on judgments obtained against the testator in his lifetime. On this subject, I have searched every book of chancery reports to which I have access, and can find nothing completely satisfactory respecting it. In the case of Finch v. Earl of Winchelsea, reported in a note in 3 Peere Williams, 399, it was contended by counsel at the bar, that simple contract creditors were entitled to take the place of judgment creditors, so far as the latter had exhausted the personal fund, and the court did not negative the doctrine; but the case was decided on another point, and the reporter adds a quaere.

In 4 Vesey, 538, (Sharpe v. Earl of Scarborough.) it is stated in the index, and in the marginal note, to have been expressly determined, that assets could not be marshalled in consequence of payments made out of the personal fund to judgment creditors; but on examining the case itself, the decision of the chancellor is not found to be so express as it is stated to be in the index and marginal note. The implication, however, is in favour of the opinion, that simple contract creditors are not permitted to take the place of judgment creditors, as against the real fund. It has considerable weight with me, that there is not a case in the books, nor a dictum from the bench, in which it is said, that simple contract creditors may stand in the place of judgment creditors who have exhausted the personal fund, although the principle of marshalling assets has been discussed, perhaps, as frequently as any other on which a court of equity acts. That principle is continually stated, as applicable to payments made out was devised. Many observations have, in subsequent cases, been made with a view to reconcile the dictum and decree of Lord Hardwicke; but I must admit, without success. In the case of Coppin v. Coppin the purchased estate was not devised by the purchaser, but descended to his heir, and the question there was between the heir and legatees; and the court refused to marshal the assets in their favour. In the case of Trimmer v. Bayne, Sir William Grant, after referring to the dictum of Lord Hardwicke in Pollexsen v. Moore, and stating that he had been much perplexed by that case, comes to a conclusion directly opposed to that dictum, and expressly states that the lien of a purchaser is within the common principle of marshalling assets; that a person having power, to resort to two funds, shall not, by his election, disappoint another having one fund only. The purchased estate had in that case descended to the heir; but it does not appear by the report with what class of claimants the heir was contending—whether with simple contract creditors, or with legatees." In Selby v. Selby the contest was between the devisees of the purchased estate and simple contract creditors, and the master of the rolls said, that the established rule being that simple contract creditors are, as against a devisee, to stand in the place of specialty creditors who have exhausted the personal assets, because the specialty creditors had the two funds to resort to, so in that case the simple contract creditors were entitled to stand in the place of the vendor against the devisees, because the vendor had equally a charge upon the double fund of real and personal estate.

of the personal fund to specialty creditors and mortgages, but never to judgment creditors. There being no express authority which is satisfactory, the question was to be considered on principle. In taking this view of the subject, it became necessary to inquire, whether the judgment creditor possessed, at law, his election of two-funds, or was under the necessity of pursuing the personal fund in the first instance. The oldest case that I have seen on this point, is that in 2 Dyer, (Bricknold v. Owen, 208 a.) which was cited by the counsel for the plaintiff. In that case, an elegit appears to have been awarded against the terre-tenants, and it is to be presumed, that no previous scire facias issued against the executor. But the question was not made, and the reporter adds a quaere, whether there ought not to be first a scire facias against the executor, and on nihil returned, then a scire facias against the terre-tenant, as was decided in 7 Hen. IV. But as such a scire facias on a recognizance is given in the judicial register, he doubts if the law be not the same as to judgments. In a note to the same report, it is said to have been afterwards stated in another case, to have been the course of the exchequer, not to charge the lands in the hands of the heir for the debt of the king, until the personal estate be exhausted. In [Panton v. Hall.] Carthew, 107, it is stated expressly by counsel, to be admitted law, that a scire facias cannot issue against the heir until the personal estate shall have been exhausted. In support of this position, many decisions from the year-books are cited, and it is not contradicted by the court, or by the counsel. This position is introduced into Bacon, and stands in the new edition as law, nor is any opposing principle laid down, or any contrary authority cited. In 14 Vin. Abr. tit. "Heir," letter R, § 2, it is stated, that an application was made to the king's bench, for a scire facias against the heir before process against the executor, which was refused. The weight of authority, therefore, appears to be decidedly in favour of the opinion, that the judgment creditor cannot proceed against the heir until he has exhausted the personal estate. I am the more satisfied with these authorities, because they appear to me to lay down the positive rule in strict conformity with principle.

The writ of elegit, in virtue of which the land is charged by a judgment against the ancestor, does not issue singly against the land, but orders the sheriff to deliver all the chattels, (oxen and beasts of the plough excepted,) and a moiety of the lands, to the creditor. In his commentary on this statute, 2 Inst. 95, Lord Coke says, that if the chattels be sufficient to satisfy the debt, the land ought not to be extended. Upon viewing the writ of elegit, given by our act of assembly, I have no doubt but that the same rule would regulate the conduct of the shea-iff.¹¹ Since then, upon an elegit issued on the judgment against the ancestor, the personal estate is first liable, it would seem to be reasonable that the same judgment would, after his decease, affect his estate in the same order, and that the personal fund should be applied first to its discharge. If this be the law, then the judgment creditor has no election. He is under the necessity of proceeding, in the first instance, against the personal estate, and the principle on which assets are marshalled, would not apply to the case.

If there be two mortgagees, A, the prior mortgagee, upon two tracts, and B, the subsequent mortgagee, on one only of those tracts; if A should appropriate to his debt the land mortgaged to B, then B would be permitted to take the place of A, with respect to the other tract. But if, by the terms of A's mortgage, he was bound first to apply the tract mortgaged to B, then B would not be allowed to take the place of A. The reason on which he could, in the case first put, be permitted so to do, would cease. I am, therefore, of opinion, that in marshalling assets, simple contract creditors cannot charge the lands for so much of the personal fund as has been applied to the payment of debts, due by judgments obtained against the ancestor. It is very possible that this decision may, in this case, be extremely unfavourable to the heir.

If the personal estate must be exhausted before the judgment creditor can proceed against the real estate, so that the proceeding against the heir is dependent on the proceeding against the executor, it would seem to follow, that the act respecting the renewal of judgments, ought not to be so construed as to bar a scire facias against the heir, provided the creditor has been employed in pursuing the personal estate; and, especially, if a court of equity has prevented him from exhausting the personal estate. It is with regret I give gentlemen of the bar additional trouble. But I was, at the argument of this case, so satisfied that the judgment could not be revived against the heir, as ten years had elapsed since its rendition, and since the passage of the act, that I did not sufficiently advert to those other arguments which respected the claim of Beall's representatives. This opinion was not shaken until I considered that question in connexion with the right of the creditor to proceed immediately against the heir. It was then out of my power to recall the other points, on which the liability of the heir, for the balance of Beall's judgment, depends.

The arguments which have been urged at the bar, to show that the heir is not liable, on account of the payments made to the creditors of Theodorick Munford, are, in my opinion, conclusive. I do not think the devastavit fixed; nor do I think him bound by the report in chancery, as by an exhibit produced, and relied on, by him. That report is to be considered as an exhibit admitted by both parties, to be substantiated in the place of a report made to this court by one of its commissioners. It is, consequently, open to all the exceptions which might have been made to it, if returned directly to this court.

The objections made to the jurisdiction of this court, are not deemed sufficient to prevent a decree on the interests of all the parties. In addition to other considerations urged in favour of a decision of the whole subject, the argument founded on the bill for marshalling assets, is conclusive. The creditors, who have a direct charge on the lands, must come in on that fund before it can be touched by the simple contract creditors, and, consequently, the court must direct them to be satisfied, before it can apply the surplus to creditors by simple contract. The case, then, is like that of a subsequent mortgagee wishing to foreclose. All prior incumbrances must be brought before the court and satisfied, before he can obtain a decree.

NOTE BY THE CHIEF JUSTICE. This cause came on afterwards to be argued, on the question, whether the heir was liable for profits received before the filing of the bill: and the court determined that he was not: but that opinion is lost.

APPEARANCE—PROTEST.

A person named as a creditor in a bankrupt's schedule, but who does not appear in person or by attorney duly constituted, and has not proved any debt, cannot put on file a protest against being named as a creditor.

In bankruptcy. In this case, at the first meeting of creditors, an attorney appeared on behalf of a party named in the bankrupt's schedule as a creditor by virtue of a mortgage on certain real estate of the bankrupt, executed by a former owner thereof, and asked leave to put on file a protest on his part against being named as a creditor. The bankrupt objected, and the register held that, as the party did not appear in person or by attorney duly constituted, and had not

BOND—NEW BOND — PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE —RELEASE OF SURETY.

A. was surety for one S., as postmaster, on his official bond. On the 14th of September, 1861, a new bond, with other sureties, was accepted, whereby A. was, by statute, released from responsibility for all acts or defaults of S. committed subsequently. S. was afterwards removed from office, and at that time was a debtor to the United States. In a suit brought against A. on his bond, to recover such debt, it was not shown by the United States that S. had not in his hands, on the 14th of September, 1861, ready to be paid or applied, all the moneys of the United States with which he was justly chargeable: Held, that it must be presumed he had such moneys in his hands when the new bond was given; and that A. was not liable therefor.

John C. Hunt, for plaintiffs in error.

Richard Crowley, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The surviving defendants, with others, were sureties for one Sedgwick, as postmaster, upon his official bond. On the 14th of September, 1861, a new bond, with other sureties, which, in compliance with the requirement of the department, had been given, was accepted, and thereupon, according to the statute, (Act July 2, 1836; 5 Stat. 88, § 37,) and by force of its provisions, the sureties in the prior bond became released from responsibility for all acts or defaults of the postmaster which might be done or committed subsequently. Sedgwick was removed from office October 21st, 1861, at which time, by his own testimony, he was indebted to the government in $3,969 45. A treasury transcript showed, that, between September 30th and October 21st, 1861, Sedgwick had paid, in excess of the amount debited to him during that period, and was entitled to be credited with, $1,010 14. There also was given in evidence the quarterly return made by Sedgwick, covering the period from July 1st to October 1st, 1861, by which he appeared, at the latter date, to be indebted to the United States in the sum of $2,933 21. It was further shown, that the amount received at the Syracuse post office, from September 14th to October 1st, 1861, was $954 09. But, it was not shown that, on the 14th of September, he had not in his possession, ready to be paid or applied as might be lawfully required, all the moneys of the United States with which he was justly chargeable. No demand upon him at this period was proved, no failure to pay or apply any such money as he was lawfully directed was shown, nor did the period for rendering his regular account arrive until the 1st of October. Now, assuming that sufficient data are contained in the proof, to enable the exact amount to be ascertained which he had, or ought to have had, in his hands, belonging to the United States, on the 14th of September, the precise difficulty is, that no light is thrown on the question, whether, in point of fact, he had then this money in his hands, as his duty required, or whether, before that time, he had, by its misapplication, become a defaulter. If he was then a defaulter, the present defendants are liable. If, on the other hand, he then had the money, and subsequently misapplied it, these sureties are not liable, for, the default, in that case, did not occur in their day. In the absence of evidence from which an inference can be directly drawn, the presumption of fact which the law raises must control. That presumption is, that an officer has done his duty, until the contrary appears. It was Sedgwick's duty, under the law and the bond, to keep the money which should come to his hands safely, without loaning, using, depositing in the banks, or exchanging for other funds than as allowed by law, till it should be ordered by the postmaster-general to be transferred or paid out. This duty he is presumed to have performed, until proof is made to the contrary. If the present action had been against the sureties on the bond accepted September 14th, 1861, on the same proof, they would have been held liable, by reason of the same presumption. This was decided in Bruce v. U. S., 17 How. [58 U. S.] 437, 443. That was a case both of a new commission and a new bond. It was held, that, if a balance was due from an officer when reappointed, the presumption is, that it was then in his hands, and, if so, his sureties, on his re-appointment, are responsible for its due application. But they may relieve themselves, by showing that he was in fact a defaulter when they became his sureties; and Ch. J. Taney said, giving the opinion of the court: "No officer, without proof, will be presumed to have violated his duty; and, if Bruce had done so, Steele had a right, under the opinion of the circuit court, to show it, and exonerate himself to that amount; but it could not be presumed merely because there appears, by the accounts, to have been a balance in his hands at the expiration of his first term." According to the rule declared in this case, the presumption is, that Sedgwick, on the 14th of September, 1861, was not a defaulter, but that he then had in his hands, in accordance with his duty, whatever sum he was chargeable with in favor of the government. As the court says: "If it was not wasted or misapplied during his first official term, but still remained in his hands, to be applied according to his official duty, the sureties in his first bond would not be liable." A reversal must be adjudged on the ground thus far considered.

In respect to the other questions presented, and especially in respect to the claim for a set-off, I agree with the decision of the district judge, and substantially for the reasons assigned by him. The judgment of the district court² must be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Dec. 23, 1876.

ADMIRALTY — PLEADING — INSURER AGAINST CARRIER—LIBEL PROPERLY FILED IN NAME OF CARRIER.

1. Libel by insurer who has paid the loss, against carrier whose wrongful act has caused the loss. Respondent is not permitted to set up as a defense that he (the insurer) was not bound in law to indemnify the assured for the loss so occasioned.

[Cited in Standard Sugar Refinery v. The Centennial, 2 Fed. 412.]

2. It is proper to bring such libel in the name of the insurer, and not in the name of the assured, for the use of the insurer. This is the admiralty practice.

[In admiralty. Libel by the Amazon Insurance Company against the steamboat Iron Mountain and the barge Ironsides. Heard on exceptions to the libel. Exceptions overruled.]

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Moulton, Johnson & Levy, for libellant.

Hoadly, Johnson & Colston, for respondents.

SWING, District Judge. The libel filed in this case seeks to recover for the value of one hundred and twenty-five barrels of flour alleged to have been lost through the negligence or wrongful act of respondents, as owners of the steamboat Iron Mountain and barge Ironsides No. 3, on which flour libellant had insured the owner, to whom it paid the insurance; he having abandoned to it the property upon the happening of the accident entailing the loss. The bill of lading contracted to carry the flour from the port of Mt. Vernon, Ind., at which port it was shipped, to the port of New Orleans, La., and the insurance by libellant was upon the flour in transit between these points, to be transported by the boat and barge named, against the usual risks of river navigation, excepting, however, such losses for which the carrier would be liable to the owner of the insured property. The respondents—owners of the boat and barge—file exceptions to the libel, claiming, first, that the action should have been brought in the name of the owner of the flour; and, second, that the libel cannot be maintained by the insurance company in its own name.

The exceptions cannot be sustained. In The Monticello v. Mollison, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 152, the supreme court say: "It is true that in courts of common law the injured party alone can sue for a trespass, as the damages are not legally assignable, and if there be an equitable claimant, he can sue only in the name of the injured party, whereas in admiralty, the person equitably entitled may sue in his own name." In the case of The Manistee, [Case No. 9,027,] the libel was filed by the insurance company in its own name in an action similar to the present, and it seems to have been conceded that it was properly brought. To the same effect, see Insurance Co. v. The C. D. Jr., [Id. 7,051.]

The second exception to the libel is, that, inasmuch as the loss happened during an unlawful deviation on the part of the carrier, or was caused by improper conduct of the master, the insurance company was not legally liable to the insured for the loss, and the payment by it of the insurance was but voluntary; hence, subrogation to his rights to recover from the carrier did not arise, and consequently libellant has no remedy over against the owners of the boat and barge for the loss. The same objection was made, and the question expressly raised, in the case of The C. D. Jr., above cited, where Judge Woods summarily disposed of it in the following brief sentences: "Respondents further claim, that, having shown by the testimony, as they allege, that the insurance company was not legally bound to indemnify the insured for the loss the latter sustained by the collision, therefore the libellants have no cause of action against the respondents, although they have paid the loss. But I am of opinion that the authorities are adverse to this claim, and adopt the conclusion of the district judge, and refer to the case of The Monticello v. Mollison, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 152."

Respondents' solicitors, however, suggest that perhaps the point was not fully considered by Judge Woods; but it appears to me that the contrary inference can only be drawn from the report, as the learned judge states his opinion as the "result of the authorities," which must have been cited pro and con. by the counsel for the respective parties. Besides, it is evident that the question had been fully argued before the district judge, who had decided it in the same way, and the counsel for the respondents, in the case before me, have failed to cite any authority to sustain the opposite view, and I have not been able to find any which gives it support. In The Monticello v. Mollison, ubi supra, it was held that, while in courts of admiralty, in contradistinction to those at common law, "the person equitably entitled may sue in his own name, yet that the same reasons why the wrong doer cannot be allowed to set up as a defense the equities between the insurer and the insured, equally apply to both courts." "The respondent," the court proceed to say, "is not presumed to know or bound to inquire as to the relative equities of parties claiming the damages. He is bound to make satisfaction for the injury he has done. When he has once made it to the injured party, he cannot be made liable to another suit at the instance of any merely equitable claimant. If notified of such a claim before payment, he may compel the claimants to interplead; otherwise, in making reparation for a wrong done, he need look no further than to the party injured." Again, the same court, in Hall v. Railroad Co., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 367, pertinently say: "It is too well settled by the authorities to admit of question, that, as between a common carrier of goods and an underwriter upon them, the liability to the owner for their loss or destruction is primarily upon the carrier, while the liability of the insurer is only secondary. The contract of the carrier may not be first in order of time, but it is first and principal in ultimate liability. In respect to the ownership of the goods, and the risk incident thereto, the owner and the insurer are considered as one person, having together the beneficial right to the indemnity due from the carrier for a breach of his contract, or for non-performance of his legal duty. Standing thus, as the insurer does, practically in the position of a surety, stipulating that the goods shall not be lost or injured in consequence of the peril insured against, whenever he has indemnified the owner for the loss, he is entitled to all the means of indemnity which the satisfied owner held against the party primarily liable. His right rests upon familiar principles of equity. It is the doctrine of subrogation, dependent not at all upon privity of contract, but worked out through the right of the creditor or owner." In the case of The Manistee, [Case No. 9,027,] it was contended on behalf of the carrier, "that the insurance policy was void, because it was issued in disregard of the requirements of the laws of the state." But the learned judge held that, "in his opinion, the carrier should not be permitted to make that defense," adding, "that the shipper might have brought a libel for the use of the company (the underwriter), and if the use were not expressed in the record, the court would protect the company even after a decree in favor of the libellant." The result from these principles and authorities seems plainly to be that the carrier in this class of cases cannot set up any different defense against the underwriter than he could have against the owner of the goods lost, were the action brought by the latter. Substantially the action is to be considered and treated as though prosecuted by and in the name of the insured owner or shipper for the use of the underwriter, to be defended on the same grounds, and determined by the observance of the same rules, and the application of the same legal principles. It would be an anomaly indeed, if, in a case where it was admitted, the owner could recover against the carrier for the use of the underwriter, the latter having paid the loss, and suing directly in his own name in admiralty, as he may, thus standing, as we have seen, substantially in the place of the owner, could not recover. Such a result would be extremely inconsistent and illogical. The carrier has all the privileges and immunities to which he is justly entitled when he is allowed to interpose the same defenses against the underwriter which he could against the owner, no more nor less, however. No privity of contract existing, as has been shown, he cannot be permitted to inquire into the equities which may have existed between the underwriter and the owner, and thus divert the issue to be tried from the question of his unlawful acts or negligence to that of the liability or non-liability of the underwriter to the owner. What he must negate, is his liability to the owner, not that of the insurer to the owner. The exceptions will be overruled.

Case No. 271.

[8 Ben. 176.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1875.

PREFERENCE—TAXES—DEBT DUE TO A STATE.

A debt due from a bankrupt to a state other than the state in which the bankruptcy proceedings are pending, for taxes, is not entitled to a preference under the fifth subdivision of section 5101, Rev. St.

In bankruptcy. The register in this case certified to the court that, at a third general meeting of the creditors [of Andrew F. Ambler] herein, a deposition for proof of debt was presented in behalf of the state of Texas, amounting to $700.59, for taxes levied and assessed against the firm of Ambler & Mason, in accordance with the laws of the state of Texas; and that it was demanded that, in the order for a dividend, this claim should be admitted to a preference and be first paid in full, as a claim entitled to such preference under the fifth subdivision of section 5101, Rev. St. And the register certified the question to the court, with the following opinion:

"It is on the strength of the judgment of the court in U. S. v. Herron, [20 Wall. (S7 U. S.)

[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

251,] that it is contended that this claim is entitled to priority. The question in that case was, whether a debt due to the United States from the bankrupt on a bond executed by the bankrupt, as surety for a defaulting revenue officer of the United States, was discharged by a certificate of discharge of the bankrupt under the bankrupt act. The court holds that, the United States being the sovereign authority and not being named in any of the provisions of the act providing for the discharge of the bankrupt from his debts, nor in any of the required proceedings which lead to that result, a debt due to the United States is not within the operation of the act, and is not discharged by the discharge of the bankrupt in proceedings in bankruptcy. And the court, in discussing the question in the case, makes use of the following expressions: 'Attempt is made in argument to show that the preference given to debts of the United States does not exclude such debts from the operation of the certificate of discharge, because such debts are not named in the proviso annexed to the description of the fifth class of claims entitled to priority and full payment in preference to general creditors; but the court is not able to concur in the proposition, as it is quite clear that the proceedings in bankruptcy would very much embarrass tax-collectors without a saving clause in that behalf, and to that end it was provided that "nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the assessment and collection of taxes by the authority of the United States or any state." Consequently taxes, whether federal or state, may be collected in the ordinary mode; but if not collected, and the property of the bankrupt passes to and is administered by the assignee, the taxes are then entitled to the priority and preference provided in the same section of the bankrupt act. Nothing, therefore, can be inferred from that proviso inconsistent with the proposition that the sovereign authority is not bound by the provisions of the bankrupt act, unless therein named.'

It is on these expressions, that, on behalf of the state of Texas, reliance is placed that this claim for taxes is entitled to priority.

The register does not understand the language of the court as declaring, in the case where the state other than that in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending has failed to collect taxes due to the state from the bankrupt, that the proviso to the fifth sub-division of the section regulating these preferences, that nothing contained in the Act shall interfere with the assessment and collection of taxes by the authority of the United States, or of any state, creates a preference in favor of the state to which such taxes may be due. To go beyond giving a preference to taxes due to the state in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, might open the door to very numerous claims for preferences. The Act does not prevent the state to which the taxes are due from enforcing the claim of the state for taxes by levy or distraint, or by such other means or process as the laws of the state may provide; and this notwithstanding the debtor may have obtained his discharge in bankruptcy. To refuse to give the claim a preference is not to interfere with the collection of the tax. The debt may be proved in the proceedings in bankruptcy, but within the jurisdiction of the state it is not discharged by the certificate of discharge. But the only priority and preference in the distribution of the assets of the estate in bankruptcy of the bankrupt, given by the section in question of the statute, to taxes due to a state, is the priority and preference given by the third sub-division of the section, to taxes and assessments made under the laws of the state in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur in the conclusion of the register, that the claim in question is not entitled to a preference or priority in payment.

Case No. 272.

AMBLER v. CHOUTEAU et al.

[3 Cent. Law. J. (1876) 333.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri.¹

EQUITY PLEADING—MULTIFARIOUSNESS—JOINDER OF PARTIES—PARTNERSHIP.

[1. A bill by an inventor, alleging a fraudulent sale of his patent rights, which does not clearly show whether the relief prayed for is that the sale be canceled, and the patent restored, or that the sale be confirmed, and the buyer forced to account for the profits, is bad on demurrer.]

[2. Where a patent is issued to a partnership, one partner cannot maintain a bill against an alleged fraudulent purchaser of the invention without making the other partner a party to the record, although such other partner shared in the alleged fraud. Ambler v. Whipple, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 546, distinguished.]

[In equity. Bill by Augustine I. Ambler against Charles P. Chouteau, the Missouri Liquid Fuel & Illuminating Company, and others, alleging a fraudulent sale of complainant's invention to respondents. Heard on demurrer to the bill. Demurrer sustained. An appeal was subsequently taken to the supreme court, where this decision was affirmed. 107 U. S. 586, 1 Sup. Ct. 556.]

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

In this case there is a demurrer to the bill of complaint. The case is a very important one, if it is ever brought to a hearing on all the charges made in the bill. There is a demurrer on various grounds. One is, that the individual corporators, or certain individual corporators, have been joined as defendants, with the corporation, the "Missouri Liquid Fuel & Illuminating Co." Another is that it appears from the bill, that there was an agreement between the plaintiff, Ambler, and one Whipple, giving the latter the entire control of the patent, the complete, jus disponendi, and that what is charged as a fraud here, is simply acts that Whipple, by virtue of this contract, had authority to do, namely, to control and sell the patent in which the plaintiff claims an interest. Another ground is that, although the bill is based upon fraud, and is profuse in general charges of fraud, nevertheless the facts stated do not show fraud in the defendants. Another ground is that Whipple & Dickerson are necessary parties to the relief sought in this bill, and are not made parties, either complainant or respondents.

In 1869 the government of the United States, on the 13th of July, granted a patent, known as 92,687, jointly to the complainant, Ambler, and to one Whipple. It seems that Ambler, the complainant here, is the inventor, or claims to be the inventor, of the process mentioned in the patent, which is claimed to be very valuable, and that Whipple was to be the business manager of the concern. They formed a partnership, and their contract provides that Ambler shall go on and perfect his invention; shall get a patent; that all the improvements shall inure to their joint benefit; that Ambler shall keep his hands off when they get a patent, in the way of disposing of it to make it valuable; and, finally, that he shall confine himself to the work of invention, and that Whipple shall do the work of selling, to make it realize money gains. Accordingly that arrangement was made. That is the substance of the contract. Whipple had authority to sell and dispose of it, and was to account to Ambler for one-half the gains. According to the judgment of the supreme court of the United States, which has had before them a controversy between Ambler and Whipple, this man Whipple, believing this to be a very valuable patent, immediately conceived the idea of swindling Ambler out of it; and it does not stand alone in the history of inventions, that the man whose cunning, whose days and nights, are given to the perfecting of the patent, is often swindled out of the proceeds of it, by those more cunning than himself in the ways of the world. According to the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, Whipple, as I have said, conceiving this to be a very valuable patent, immediately set to work by a confederacy with one Dickerson to swindle Ambler out of it. They pirated from him an improvement on this invention, went to the patent office, made due application, and caused two patents to be issued, one 95,665, the other 102,662, although they were improvements simply, on Ambler's original patent. They caused those patents to be issued to Whipple and Dickerson, and not to Ambler, who was ignored in this transaction. Afterwards other proceedings were had—but not until after the transactions here in question took place—whereby another patent was issued to the plaintiff, as the sole and first inventor of the same improvements, which were embraced in the patent surreptitiously obtained by Whipple and Dickerson. Now, while Whipple and Dickerson hold the patents, which were procured, undoubtedly in fraud of the plaintiff's rights here, but while the original contract between Whipple and Ambler was in force, by which these patents were to have been turned into that partnership arrangement, Whipple and Dickerson come out west, and make a sale of this patent-right to Blunt and Insley, for thirty-five or seventy thousand dollars. Blunt and Insley come here and organize a company, on a grand scale of a quarter of a million, half a million, or a million dollars; sell out this patent to a company here, which is incorporated under the laws of Missouri, and commence operations. The supreme court of the United States, in the case between Ambler and Whipple, which was brought in January, 1870, and resulted in a decree in the supreme court of the United States in November, 1874, [Ambler v. Whipple, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 546; 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 278,] this litigation drawing its slow length along in the District of Columbia for four years, or nearly five, decided, that this was a co-partnership arrangement, originally between Ambler and Whipple; that all improvements made, and all subsequent patents issued, fell into this partnership arrangement; that the patents issued to Whipple and Dickerson were issued in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff; and that to one-half of all the gains under those patents Ambler was entitled.

That was not a bill, as the supreme court remarked, to dissolve the partnership between Ambler and Whipple, but a bill to account; and the supreme court held that there should be an accounting, between Ambler and Whipple, as to all gains which had been made under all these patents, one-half of which belonged to the Whipple side; it did not make any difference to the plaintiff whether to Whipple alone or to him and Dickerson. The supreme court, in deciding that, although they did not say anything about it, must have held, that a bill between partners for an account, would lie pending a partnership, for they say the partnership is not dissolved; they, therefore, must have held, if their attention was called to it, that a bill would lie pending the existence of a partnership, by one partner against another, for an accounting, and to restrain improper conduct, notwithstanding there was no dissolution, and no prayer for dissolution; in regard to which there has been a great deal of controversy. Lord Eldon, according to my recollection, has stated, several times, that such a bill would not lie, but the American courts have sometimes held otherwise, and perhaps with very good reason. Ordinarily if partners can not agree and there is a loss of confidence between them, the partnership had better be dissolved; but we can imagine a case where it would be, perhaps, to the interest of the parties to have an accounting, notwithstanding they do not want a dissolution. But no matter about that; the supreme court decided that there should be an accounting under all these patents and that Mr. Ambler was entitled to one-half of the gains, which had been made out of all of them, ordered an accounting accordingly, and remanded the case to the lower court. Such proceedings have been had; there has been an accounting between them, and Whipple has been found indebted to Ambler in some six or seven hundred thousand dollars, so stated.

Now, in this state of the case, Ambler comes into this court, exhibits his bill in his own name, not joining Whipple, not alleging that this partnership between him and Whipple is dissolved, but rather alleging that it is not dissolved; not alleging any fact showing that he has succeeded to the general rights of the firm composed of himself and Whipple; not alleging any dissolution; not alleging any succession to the rights of the two; not making Mr. Whipple a party either complainant or defendant, and exhibits this bill against the Missouri Liquid Fuel and Illuminating Co., which was organized here, and against certain of its stockholders or directors, and wants relief.

The bill is defective for two reasons. It is multifarious, but that is easily amended. It undertakes to join various matters which, in any event, this corporation has no concern in. It is defective, for instance, in this: that it is difficult to ascertain from it whether it is a bill on the part of Mr. Ambler, seeking to obtain those rights which were sold to Insley and Blunt, who are alleged to be mere men—Friday, stool-pigeons, or tools, for the company here; whether Ambler wants back his franchises, his rights which have been sold to them, on the ground of a fraudulent sale, and wants his patent to be restored and have that sale by Whipple cancelled; or whether he wants to confirm it and get the proceeds. He must do one thing or the other. He can not blow hot and cold. He can not say, "There is fraud here, and therefore I want my patent back," and at the same time say, "I waive the fraud and want the proceeds." He has to elect what he will do in this matter. I make these suggestions so that in case the bill is amended, it may state specifically what he wants. But the chief difficulty that the court perceives in the bill is this: that unless it can be alleged here that this partnership it at an end, and that Ambler has succeeded to the rights of the partners, certainly, in a proceeding in which his co-partner is not made a party, either complainant with him, or a party on the record as defendant, there can be no relief. Suppose he wants to have this arrangement set aside on the ground of fraud—a fraud committed by his co-partner, Mr. Whipple; to such a bill Mr. Whipple is a necessary party. Suppose he is willing to waive the fraud, and say, "I want to compel this company to account;" if, as it is said, they have not paid up fully for it, then if that partnership is still existing he can not bring his individual action himself; he must say that he has succeeded in some way to the rights of the two. That he has not done, and for that reason we must sustain this demurrer.

An argument was made here to sustain the right of Mr. Ambler to bring this bill in his own name, based on certain observations of the supreme court. In this suit of Ambler against Whipple and Dickerson, the supreme court held that, in this partnership arrangement, Ambler was entitled to one-half as against Whipple, and, they said, also as against Dickerson, because he had knowingly connected himself with Whipple, in the perpetration of the fraud. That has misled, as I think, the counsel for the plaintiff, into thinking that everybody against whom they can charge fraud, can be sued by Ambler in the same way that Ambler could sue, and did sue, his co-partner for an accounting; besides that, Dickerson in that suit, was one of the necessary parties, because two of the patents, which were issued, were issued to him and Whipple. To apply that observation of the court in respect to Dickerson, in that case would be to virtually overthrow all of the law applicable to partnership in this land.

The entry will be, "Demurrer sustained." The plaintiff can consider whether he can make a case, in view of my observations, so as to avoid these objections. He will have leave to amend, if he desires it, by June rules.

TREAT, District Judge, concurs in what I have said, and in the conclusion reached.

Ordered accordingly.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, this decision was affirmed. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The prayer is that the defendants may be enjoined from proceeding further with any dealings with the said partnership and trust property aforesaid," and "that the damages to your orator for the wrong and injury done in this behalf may be duly considered, and that an account be taken thereof before the master, * * * and that your orator, upon the final hearing, be allowed, adjudged, and decreed damages therefor." This is the substance of all there is material in the mass of irrelevant matter that incumbers the record, and fills the voluminous argument filed by the appellant in his own behalf. Upon full consideration, we have no hesitation in saying that it presents no case for such relief in equity as is asked. If, as is more than once distinctly alleged, the object of the suit is to recover damages for an unlawful and fraudulent conspiracy to cheat Ambler out of his interest in the original invention which is the subject-matter of the controversy, the remedy is clearly at law, and not in equity. If an account of profits is wanted, and an injunction against the further use of the patented inventions, under the transfers from Whipple & Dickerson, then the suit should have been against the Missouri corporation in its corporate capacity, and not against a part only of its stockholders and directors individually. If the object is to charge these defendants for the profits made by Whipple through his breach of trust, then he is a necessary party, and nothing can be done in his absence. In any event, these defendants are but purchasers from Whipple of specific interests in the property which he held in trust for himself and Ambler. While the allegations of fraud in their general terms are as broad as language can make them, specifically they are confined by other allegations to the use of the patented invention in Missouri by the Missouri corporation, of which the defendants are stockholders and directors. It is not in any manner alleged or claimed that the defendants have profited by what Whipple has done, except through the title acquired by the conveyance to Blunt & Insley, and from them, with the consent of Whipple & Dickerson, the faithless trustees, to the corporation. No effort is made to set aside these conveyances. It is conceded that Blunt & Insley actually paid Whipple & Dickerson $70,000 for the assignments which were made, and it is fairly to be inferred that in the accounting had under the decree of this court in Ambler v. Whipple, 20 Wall. (37 U. S.) 559. Whipple has been charged with the proceeds of this sale. But, whether that be so or not, no case has been made by the loose and general allegations in the bill for relief against these defendants." Ambler v. Choteau, 107 U. S. 586, 1 Sup. Ct. 556.]

Case No. 273.

BONDS—FORTHCOMING BOND—MARSHAL'S FEES.

1. It is not necessary that a forthcoming bond should recite the return of the execution, nor the certificate of the service, nor the name of the person by whom it was served; but it must state that the execution was served.

2. A mistake in calculating the marshal's fees may be cured by a release; and judgment may be rendered for the true sum.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a motion for an execution on a forthcoming bond, dated November 18th, 1799, which recites the amount of the execution on the judgment to be four hundred and sixteen dollars and sixty cents, including all legal costs attending the execution. The defendant opposes the award of execution on this bond. 1. Because it does not recite the service of the former execution, and, 2. Because it does not recite the amount due thereon. The words of the act of assembly (page 298, § 13,) are "a bond from such debtor and securities, payable to the creditor, reciting the service of such execution, and the amount of the money or tobacco due thereon, and with condition to have the goods and chattels forthcoming at the day of sale appointed by such sheriff or officer." And such a bond, when returned, is to have the force of a judgment; and thereupon the court, on motion, may award execution for the money and tobacco therein mentioned, with interest from the date of the bond, and costs.

The defendant produces the execution upon which the bond was taken, which appears to be for—

		Costs,		8.20
				398.51
Marshal's com's 5 per cent. on	$300.00	$15.00
2 per cent. on	98.51	1.97
Service,			16.97

The error of 49 cents, is the difference between 2 and 2½ per cent. on 98.51. The bond recites the service of the execution to have been made by James Campbell, deputy town-sergeant, whereas the execution appears to have been returned by C. Turner, the town-sergeant himself. In consequence of this variance, it is contended by the defendant's counsel, that the service of the execution is not recited in the bond. Upon this point, the court is of opinion, that the return by the principal sergeant is not conclusive evidence that the service was not made by Campbell, his deputy, as alleged in the bond.

The act of assembly which has been cited, (page 123, § 26,) and which requires the deputy to indorse his name as well as that of his principal, on the writ which he has served, does not make void the service if the deputy should fail to indorse his name on the writ. It only subjects him to a penalty; and the object of the law was to prevent disputes between sheriffs and their deputies. The act respecting the forthcoming bond, does not require that it should recite the return of the execution, nor the certificate of the service, nor the name of the person by whom the service was made; but it must recite the service of the execution; that is, as the court understands it, the bond shall aver that the execution has been served. This has been done, and therefore the court thinks the bond has satisfied the words and spirit of the act in this respect.

As to the other objection, that the amount due on the execution is not recited, because the sum stated in the bond includes the marshal's commissions, which are miscalculated, and are stated to be forty-nine cents too much, the court, at a former argument of the case, intimated to the counsel for the defendant, that the point was probably settled in the cases of Scott v. Hornsby, 1 Call, 41, and the three following: Bell v. Marr, Id. 47; Worsham v. Egleston, Id. 48, and Wilkinson v. McLochlin, Id. 49; and that, unless a distinction could be taken between this case and the principle on which those cases were decided, their authority was decisive. An attempt has been made to point out a difference. It is said that in the cases in Call's Reports, the amount due upon the execution was in every instance truly stated, but the bond contained an additional sum separate from the amount due on the execution; that the error existed in this separate sum; and that the bond contained in itself the data by which the amount really due upon the execution might be ascertained and the bond itself corrected. But upon an examination of those cases the court does not find the fact to be so.

In the case of Scott v. Hornsby, the sheriff took the bond, including his commissions. It does not appear that the amount of the commissions was stated in the bond. It rather seems, from the report of the case, that the principal, costs, and commissions were stated in an aggregate sum. Yet, the plaintiff having released those commissions, the court awarded execution for the residue. In the case of Bell v. Marr, 1 Call, 47, the forthcoming bond exceeded the amount of the execution by the sum of £23. 6s. 7½d. Execution was awarded on the bond for the whole sum, and three days afterwards the plaintiff released the excess on record, and the judgment was affirmed on writ of error. Here it is not stated whether the £23. 6s. 7½d. was part of a whole sum, or whether it formed a separate item in the execution; but the former seems the most probable conjecture. In Worsham v. Egleston, Id. 48, the bond recited the amount of the execution to be 7342 pounds of tobacco, including interest, costs, and the sheriff's commissions. The execution was only for 6940 lbs. tobacco. The court of appeals, reversed the judgment on account of the commissions being included, but gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the residue. Here the sum clearly was aggregate, and the commissions not specially stated in the bond. It was exactly the present case in that respect. So in Wilkinson v. McLochlin, Id. 49, the bond recited that the execution amounted to £195. 12s. 6d., including interest, sheriff's commissions, and all legal costs. But the execution was only for £187. 13s. 7d. The same judgment was entered by the court of appeals as in the last case, and yet there was nothing in the bond itself by which the error could be corrected. These two last cases are exactly in principle the same as that now before us, and are decisive that the plaintiff is entitled to his execution for the whole amount of the condition of the bond, excepting the 49 cents error in calculating the commissions.

The plaintiff had better release the 49 cents before the award of execution is entered. Execution to be awarded.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1872.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—CHARTER-PARTY—MARITIME LIENS—PLEDGE OF FREIGHT AS SECURITY.

1. The district court has full jurisdiction of all contracts of affreightment and of claims for indirect as well as direct damages for the violation of them.

[Cited in Paterson v. Dakin, 31 Fed. 684.]

[See Insurance Co. v. Dunham, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 1; The Alberto, 24 Fed. 379; The Volunteer, Case No. 16,991; The Pauline, Id. 10,843; The Dick Keys, Id. 3,898; Lowry v. Canal Boat, Id. 8,580.]

2. There is no lien upon a vessel for loans made on a pledge of the freight as security.

3. Where agents of a vessel, who were part owners, chartered the vessel to a creditor of their own, to enable him to repay himself out of the earnings.—Held, the charter-party was void as against the vessel and the other owners.

In admiralty. Affreightment.—Libel by A. S. Lewis and others, composing the mercantile firm of A. S. & W. G. Lewis & Co., against the schooner A. M. Bliss, alleging that they hired the vessel of Patton, Ginn, & Folger, of Boston, agents and owners, for six voyages to Hayti or other parts of the West Indies, or the Salt Islands, at $1,200 for each voyage, and that the vessel had performed only two of the voyages, and that her master and said agents refused to send her on the third voyage; that the libellants had advanced, on account of the freight, $2,200 more than had been already earned, which sum, with other damages, they sought to recover. An amendment was filed, by consent, averring that the libellants had settled the two voyages, and had, besides, advanced $3,000, by their acceptance drawn on account of the charter, which they were liable to pay at any time, and that other charges to the amount of $350 had accrued on the same account. The master appeared and claimed the vessel, and in his answer denied the authority of the supposed agents to make the charter, and set up that it was a fraud on the other owners, and that the libellants participated in the fraud; denied that he had absolutely refused to make the third voyage, but said that he offered to make it if the libellants would settle for the former voyages, and would pay the future freight to the owners. There was much conflict of evidence concerning the master's knowledge of the charter-party, the authority of the agents, and the good faith of the transaction; and there was some discrepancy and contradiction concerning the amounts, dates, &c., of advances said to have been made. The dealings were between Patton of the one part, and W. G. Lewis of the other; and there was some testimony from both of them that a considerable part of the charter-money was to be applied to liquidate old debts of Patton, or of his former firm of Patton & Ginn, to the libellants themselves, or to one of them. Patton & Ginn were now bankrupts. The charter-party contained several clauses that were commented on as unusual, and as showing fraud; among others, that a commission of five per cent should be payable to the charterers, and two and a half per cent to the agents "on the signing lost or not lost on any voyage," and that the agents agreed to sign charter-parties at the beginning of each voyage for such terms as Lewis & Co. might direct, without prejudice to any clause of the original charter-party; and that the charterers might cancel the charter-party at the end of any voyage. On the other hand, there was evidence that the right to cancel was not unusual in the Haytian trade, and was reasonable, owing to the peculiar vicissitudes of that business. The right to insert a different rate of freight in the voyage charters was said to be intended to enable the charterers to charge their correspondents abroad more than they really paid for the schooner, if the market rate of freights should advance.

J. W. Hudson, for libellants.

J. C. Dodge, for claimant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The arguments of counsel have turned so much upon the important matters of fact involved in the controversy, that they have almost overlooked the point raised by the answer, whether, upon the libellants' own case, they have a lien on the ship. The district court has full jurisdiction of contracts of affreightment, whether evidenced by charter-party or bill of lading; and though the damages may, in any case, be somewhat indirect, as, for instance, if they arise out of a jettison which requires contribution, or out of a fraudulent payment of salvage by the master, yet the mode in which the claim for compensation arises will not oust the jurisdiction: Dupont de Nemours v. Vance, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 162; Church v. Shelton, [Case No. 2,714;] The Panama, [Id. No. 10,703.] If, then, the fact were as is alleged in the libel, that an advance of the freight had been made by the charterers in accordance with the terms of the contract, the advance would, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, be recoverable of the owners, if the ship should, for any reason, fail to perform the voyage; and this right might be enforced against the ship: The Panama, ubi supra; The Pacific, [Case No. 10,643.] But I understand that the advances, so called, in this case, were not advances of freight, but loans on a pledge of the freight, which is a very different thing. In the one case, there could be no recovery, unless the voyage failed; and, in the other, the borrowers would be bound to repay the money in any event, and the lenders would have merely a right to security on the freight. Such a loan does not purport to pledge the ship, but only the freight; and there is no lien on the ship for its repayment, because the failure to pay is no breach, express or implied, of the charter-party, but only of a distinct contract of loan, in which the promise of the borrower is the principal obligation. In this respect the charterers are on no different footing from any other person who should lend money to the ship-owner on a pledge of freight. The ship is bound to the due performance of the contract of hiring, including, perhaps, the repayment of freight advanced on the charter; but it is not bound to the performance of a collateral agreement to repay money lent on the faith that all the covenants of the charter will be kept. The distinction may seem a nice one, but it appears to me to be plain and indisputable.

My duty, however, requires me to go further, and examine the legality of the contract itself; because I may have misunderstood the facts on which I decide that no privilege is held against the vessel, but more especially because some damages are testified to which do undoubtedly have such a privilege, if the charter be a binding contract. It is said, indeed, that the master never refused to perform his part of the charter, excepting upon terms, which he had a right to insist on, of a settlement of each voyage when it was ended; but his right to a settlement, or, at least, to any thing more than a mere statement of the account, depends on whether the charterers had already lawfully paid or lent to the authorized agents of the vessel much more than had been earned at the time of the dispute, which involves the whole merits of the case. I cannot understand the libellants' witnesses otherwise than that a great part of the very large sum which was to be lent or advanced was to go to pay the old debts of Patton & Ginn to the charterers, or one of them. Indeed, it is scarcely credible that so large an advance as is mentioned in the memorandum—more than twice what the libel alleges—could be made under any ordinary circumstances, especially on a charter which the lenders might wish to cancel at the end of some one of the voyages. That the amount was so large; that the agreement for it, which really preceded the charter, was not embodied in it; that some indefinite part of the money was appropriated to the old debts, and no definite part was testified to as having been applied to any thing else,—all lead me to the conclusion that this was the true intent of the transaction. The evidence certainly tends somewhat strongly to throw a doubt on any advances having been made at all, excepting of one sum of $350, which, perhaps, had been earned before it was paid, and was not truly an advance. But this is consistent with the other theory, for it shows that the parties intended to settle every thing by an adjustment of accounts; which, if Patton & Ginn had been the only owners of the schooner, would have been a very proper arrangement, but actually involved an abuse of the agency, which the libellants must be held to have known, for they were bound to inquire into the ownership of the vessel before undertaking to pay themselves out of the earnings. I have no hesitation in saying that the charter-party was void as against the vessel and all the owners excepting Patton & Ginn. Libel dismissed with costs.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—EQUITABLE TITLE—POSSESSION.

T. built the yacht A. for D., and thereafter accepted part of the purchase money, and was present when D. sold her to one H. by bill of sale, and performed other acts which indicated that he considered himself no longer the owner of the yacht; but the title had never passed from him by any instrument of transfer, or by absolute delivery, and he subsequently claimed the ownership. On suit brought by H. to recover possession, held, that the legal title had never passed from T., and, as against a legal title, an admiralty court will not undertake to enforce an equitable title.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The facts found in this case appear in the findings placed on file, and, so far as the material question is concerned, do not differ in substance from those which appeared in the district court. The legal title to the vessel did not pass from Towns, the builder, to Doncomb by any instrument of transfer, nor was there any absolute delivery of the yacht. It was part of the agreement that a bill of sale should be executed when the agreement on the part of Doncomb was fully performed, and this time never arrived. The case, therefore, is substantially, as it is stated in the opinion of the district court, an attempt to enforce an equitable interest as against a legal title. This the court of admiralty does not undertake. When it proceeds in a petitory suit, it proceeds upon legal title. Kellum v. Emerson, [Case No. 7,669;] the S. C. Ives, [Id. 7,958;] The John Jay, [Id. 7,352;] 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 237, note 2. I do not find, and have not been referred to, any case which has been decided in this circuit, or in the supreme court of the United States, which holds a different doctrine; and I should be very unwilling to undertake to introduce a new and, at the least, a doubtful rule, in a case where my decision could not be reviewed, and would be a controlling precedent. If such a rule existed there could not fail to be numerous cases in which it must have been acted on. In Ward v. Peck, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 267, the claimant's case depended on matters clearly within the admiralty jurisdiction,—the power of a master to sell the ship,—and the libelants had the legal title unless it had been divested by the master's sale; and their legal title was sustained. There are other cases of this class, but they are not thought to conflict with the views expressed in this case by the district court, and which I have adopted. The decree must be affirmed, with costs.

PRIZE—DISPOSITION OF CAPTIVES—NAVAL AND JUDICIAL COGNIZANCE.

[A prize master reported to the court that he had delivered the prize to the marshal of the district, and had permitted the persons found on board to go ashore, for their greater comfort, they "remaining willingly subject to the orders of the judge of this court." Held, that such persons were not subject to the order of the court, but were in custody of the naval captors, and that their detention or discharge was purely a matter of naval, and not judicial, cognizance.]

In admiralty. The following proceeding was had in the case of the Amelia:

Eastern District of Penn'a.

In the U. S. District Court.

To the Hon. John Cadwalader,

Judge of said Court:

The undersigned begs leave to report, that about one o'clock, P. M. of Saturday, 29th June, 1861, he gave the possession of the ship Amelia, of which he has been prize master, to the marshal of this district, and has since that time aided him in the custody and safe keeping of the said ship and her cargo; and that he has allowed all the persons sent with him on the ship to this port, viz., the captain, his wife, the cook and his wife and daughter, to go ashore, for their greater comfort, there being no conveniences for them on board the vessel; and each and all of them remaining willingly, subject to the orders of the judge of this court.

(Signed)

Acting Master, John W. Bentley,
U. S. Navy, and Prize Master of Ship Amelia.

Phila., 1st July, 1861.

BY THE COURT. The prize master is mistaken in supposing that the persons mentioned in the above statement are subject to the order of the court. On the contrary, they are in custody of the naval captors, unless they have been duly discharged. The court cannot interfere to direct their discharge. But if the commissioner of the court and the prize master concur in opinion that there is no reason for their longer detention, the court cannot perceive that their discharge would be censurable. This, however, is a matter for naval, and not for judicial regulation. The prize master, stating that his duties may require him to leave Philadelphia, the court add, that so soon as the persons in his custody shall have been discharged, or their custody otherwise regulated by the proper naval authority, the court perceive no necessity for his remaining here longer. But so far as naval duties may be concerned, the prize master will, in this respect, judge for himself what should be his course of conduct.

PRIZE—LAWFUL PRIZE—BOOKS FOR PUBLIC LIBRARY.

Books intended for a public library will not be confiscated in a prize court.

In admiralty.

And now, 26th November, 1861, this case was heard upon the claim of Mitchell King, of Charleston, South Carolina, for two cases of books, marked "The University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, care of Mitchell King, Esq., Charleston, South Carolina, Nos. 1 and 2," received and filed on the 14th instant, with the written consent of the District Attorney of the United States. And the affidavit of John Pennington, taken on the 16th instant, and this day filed, being read by consent, and the letter of the said claimant therein mentioned being put in evidence, and it appearing to the court that other parts of the said letter than are extracted in the said affidavit should be considered in forming an opinion as to the sufficiency of the authority conferred upon Mr. Pennington to receive the said two cases of books, the said letter is filed of record. And the said claim having been considered upon the above mentioned papers, and upon the documents on board of the captured vessel, the court said: Though this claimant, as the resident of a hostile district, would not be entitled to restitution of the subject of a commercial adventure in books, the purpose of the shipment in question, gives to it a different character. The United States, in prosecuting hostilities for the restoration of their constitutional authority, are compelled incidentally to confiscate property captured at sea, of which the proceeds would otherwise increase the wealth of that district. But the United States are not at war with literature in that part of their territory. The case of the pictures of the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts, liberated by a British colonial prize court in the war of 1812, the prior proceedings in France mentioned in the report of that case, and the French and other decisions upon cases of fishing vessels, are precedents for the decree which I am about to pronounce. Without any such precedents, I would have had no difficulty in liberating these books. Whereupon, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the said two cases of books be liberated from the custody of the marshal, and delivered to the said John Pennington.

SLAVERY—RESIDENCE ABROAD—FREEDOM.

A slave carried from Washington, in the District of Columbia, to Virginia, by her owner, for a temporary residence only, and brought back to Washington, and there sold to a resident of Washington, does not thereby become entitled to freedom under the Maryland act of 1796, c. 67.

[See note at end of case.]

This cause was submitted to the decision of the court by Mr. Key, for the petitioner, and Mr. Jones, for the defendant, upon the following case agreed: "In this case it is admitted that the petitioner was born in the state of Maryland, and became, by marriage, the property of one Henry O. Middleton, who resided in Washington county, in this district, until May, 1820, there keeping the said petitioner in his possession, as his slave. That the said Middleton then removed into the state of Virginia, to reside, and left the said slave in Maryland, with her former master. That on the 7th of December, 1820, the said petitioner was carried by the said Henry O. Middleton, to Fredericksburg, in Virginia, where he then resided and hath resided ever since, with an agreement and understanding between the said Middleton and the said petitioner, that if she did not like to continue in Fredericksburg, she should return and get a master, either in Maryland or the district, as she might choose. That after staying some time in Fredericksburg, the said petitioner became dissatisfied, and expressed her desire to return; in consequence of which, the said Middleton, on the 7th of December, 1821, gave her a pass authorizing her to proceed from Fredericksburg to Washington. That in some few weeks afterwards, the said Middleton came to Washington, where the petitioner then was, and sold her to the defendant. It is submitted to the court to determine, upon this statement, whether, by the law of Maryland, A. D. 1796, c. 67, the petitioner is or is not entitled to her freedom; with the privilege to either party to except to the judgment of the court.

F. S. Key, for petitioner.

W. Jones, for defendant.

THE COURT were of opinion that, upon the facts, as admitted above, the petitioner is not entitled, by law, to her freedom, and therefore give judgment for the defendant, "from which the petitioner prays an appeal to the supreme court of the United States."

[NOTE. Act Md. 1796, c. 67, (2 Maxcy's Laws, p. 351.) prohibits the importation of slaves for sale or to reside, and provides that it may be lawful for any citizen, "who shall come into this state with a bona fide intention of settling therein, to import or bring into this state, or within one year thereafter, any slave or slaves the property of such citizen at the time of his or her said removal." Further provisions are made in favor of owners of slaves traveling or temporarily sojourning abroad.]

COLLISION IN HUDSON RIVER—TOWBOAT—KEEPING TO THE RIGHT.

1. Where a steamboat was coming down the Hudson river, having boats in tow on each side, and having lights properly set, and kept close to the west bank of the channel, and, seeing the lights of an approaching tow, slowed and stopped, and the tug-boat coming up was also on the west side of the channel, and, seeing the other's lights, hauled out to the eastward, and then straightened up the river, and a collision occurred between one of the boats which she was towing astern, and the boat on the port side of the steamboat coming down: Held, That there was no fault on the part of the boat that was injured.

[Cited in McCoy v. The Carrituck, Case No. 8,730.]

2. That the steamboat going up was in default in not keeping to the east side of the channel, and that she either did not sheer far enough to the eastward, or straightened up the river too soon.

[Cited in McCoy v. The Currituck, Case No. 8,730.]

[See Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 441.]

3. That the steamboat coming down was not shown to be in fault.

In admiralty. This was a libel for a collision which occurred about 6 o'clock P. M., on the 25th of October, 1865, after dark, on the Hudson river, about seven miles below Albany, between the lake boat or barge Contest and a boat in tow of the steamboat America, whereby the Contest was badly damaged. The amount of damages claimed was $10,000. The Contest was one of seventeen boats, all of which were in tow astern of the steamboat New Haven, fastened in tiers by hawsers, there being five tiers, the boats in each tier being abreast of each other, and the Contest being the extreme port boat in the third or the fourth tier of boats, there being four boats in that tier. The New Haven was bound, with her tows, from New York to West Troy. The America was on her way down the river from Albany, with two boats lashed side by side to her starboard side, and two to her port side, and some others astern, all in tow. The port bow of the extreme port boat, on the port side of the America, struck the port side of the Contest about amidships, tearing off her chime plank, and cutting through her timbers, and causing her to leak badly, and injuring her cargo. The libel charged negligence on the part of both the America and the New Haven.

The answer of the America set up, that when the lights of the New Haven were seen from the America, at the distance of from a mile to a mile and a half, the America, with her tows, hauled close in to the westward, and near to a stone dike which forms the western bank of the river for a considerable distance; that the New Haven, still coming on pretty well in to the westward, the America was slowed; that the New Haven then sheered out to the eastward, far enough to herself clear the most easterly boat on the port side of the America, and in so doing, disclosed to the view of the America the boats towed astern of the New Haven; that the engine of the America was then stopped, and was shortly after backed, as soon as there appeared to be danger of a collision, and was backing, when a boat or boats astern of the New Haven, on the port side, were dragged across the bow of the extreme boat on the port side of the America, by the New Haven, which, after sheering out to the eastward, straightened up the river so close to the extreme boat on the port side of the America, as herself to pass within ten or fifteen feet, or nearer, off the port side of said boat; that, at the time of the collision, the extreme boat on the starboard side of the America was within about twenty feet of the dike on the west side of the river, and as far to the westward as it was safe for her to be, and the America had backed so that the boats towed astern of her were close upon her; that there was abundant time and room for the New Haven, with her tow, to have passed to the eastward of the America and her tow, and she ought to have passed so far to the eastward with her tow as to avoid all danger of a collision; that she did not do this, nor did she slow or stop before the collision; that the tide was flood, but not running strong; and that the collision was not the fault of the America.

The answer of the New Haven contained no statement of the particulars of the collision, or of the grounds assumed by the New Haven in defence. It consisted of a denial of all the material allegations of the libel, and of an averment that the New Haven was carefully navigated, and that the collision took place in consequence of the individual fault, or combined fault, of the Contest and the America, and was the fault of the agents and servants of the libellants, and not of the claimant.

C. Van Santvoord, for The America.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for The New Haven.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. There is no evidence showing any fault on the part of the Contest. The testimony is, however, satisfactory to show that the New Haven was in fault. She was violating the statute law of New York (1 Rev. St. pt. 1, c. 20, tit. 10, § 1) which required her to keep to the right or easterly side of the channel. Her pilot, Kane, who was at the wheel at the time of the collision, states that he was going along the dike till he got above the dam, and that he then sheered to the eastward, on seeing the America approach, till he got clear of the America's tow, and then straightened up the river. But either he did not soon enough sheer to the eastward, or else he straightened up too soon, after sheering. That the New Haven dragged the Contest into contact with, and across the bow of the boat lashed to the America, is shown by the fact, that the boats in front of the Contest, as well as she herself, and the boat behind her, struck against the boat lashed to the America, although none of them were injured to the extent that the Contest was. The theory on the part of the New Haven, that the America took a sheer to the eastward when the two steamboats were abreast of each other, is not supported by the evidence. The America came down as near to the dike as it was safe for her to go, and, if any thing, she sheered to the westward rather than the eastward, when she saw the near approach of the New Haven. She had a right to suppose that the New Haven would keep to the right of the channel, and would sheer out to the eastward in season, the lights of the America being plainly visible. Her speed was moderate, and she was slowed and stopped and backed promptly, and her forward motion was stopped at the time of the collision, whereas the New Haven and her tows were under headway at that time. No fault is shown on the part of the America.

The libel must be dismissed as to the America, with costs, and the New Haven must be condemned in damages and costs, with a reference to a commissioner, to ascertain the damages caused to the libellants by the collision.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for libellants.
B. D. Silliman, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel, filed by the owners of the steamboat Fairfield, against the steam ferry-boat America, to recover for the damages caused to the Fairfield by a collision, which took place between her and the America, on the 13th of December, 1867, [1868,] at about five o'clock in the afternoon, in the East river, between New York and Brooklyn, a short distance below the Brooklyn slip of the Fulton ferry. The Fairfield was going down the East river, having come from the Navy Yard at Brooklyn, and being bound into the North river, around the Battery. The America was a boat running on the Fulton ferry, from the slip at the foot of Fulton street, New York, to the slip at the foot of Fulton street, Brooklyn, and was at the time on a trip from New York to Brooklyn. The tide was strong ebb. The case made by the libel is, that the Fairfield was going down, at about the middle of the river, when the America left her slip on the New York side; that, as the vessels neared each other, a single whistle was blown by the Fairfield, to indicate her intention to go to the right, and the wheel of the Fairfield was put to port, and her head sheered angling towards the New York shore; that the America paid no attention to the whistle of the Fairfield, but continued to haul more up the river, and on to the Fairfield; that, as it was found that the America was rapidly hauling on to the Fairfield, and still continuing to head more and more up the river, and that a collision, if the America kept on, would probably happen, the bells of the Fairfield were rung to slow, stop, and back; that these orders were promptly obeyed, and the headway of the Fairfield was nearly, if not quite, stopped in the water; that, while the Fairfield was in that condition, the America blew two whistles, indicating her intention to go to the left; that, at that time, the America was so close to the Fairfield, that the Fairfield, her engine and way being stopped, could do nothing except continue to back her engine; that the America kept on, at nearly, if not quite, full speed, and struck the stem of the Fairfield, a little on the larboard side, crushing in her planks and timbers, and opening her forward; and that the Fairfield commenced to take in water rapidly, and was backed into a slip below the Brooklyn terminus of the Fulton ferry, and there sank in a few moments. The libel alleges, that the collision happened through the carelessness, negligence, and want of skill and management of those navigating the America, and, among other things, in not having good and sufficient lookouts, in not promptly answering the single whistle of the Fairfield, in hauling up the river in such a manner as to bring her upon the Fairfield, in not keeping to the right, in blowing two whistles, and attempting to go to the left of the Fairfield, when the Fairfield was lying dead in the water, and when she was so near to the Fairfield that a collision could not be avoided, in passing outside of the Fairfield, and then steering up the river and towards the Fairfield, and in not slowing, stopping, and backing before the collision was inevitable. The libel also avers, that the management and navigation of the Fairfield were correct and proper, as it was her duty to keep to the right, and to indicate her intention by a single whistle, and, when she found that the America disregarded her signals, and continued to sheer on to her, to slow, stop, and back. The answer alleges, that, when the America was within about 200 yards of the Brooklyn shore, and about 250 or 300 yards of her slip on the Brooklyn side of the river, and was heading up the East river, against a strong ebb tide, for the purpose of getting room to swing into said slip, her pilot discovered the Fairfield, under full headway, heading down the river, and towards the Brooklyn shore, on a course which, if continued, would have carried her in front of and past the America, on the side towards the Brooklyn shore; that thereupon the America kept steadily on her course up the river, in order that the Fairfield might keep her course, and pass in front of the America, as she could easily have done, without any collision; but the Fairfield, after continuing said course until within a short distance of the America, and when the Fairfield was under full headway, and when it was impossible for the boats to so change their course as to pass each other on the right without colliding with each other, blew one whistle, indicating her intention to pass on the right, and outside of the America, and simultaneously put her helm hard to port, and in that way steered directly towards the America; that, as soon as the Fairfield so sheered and blew her whistle, it was obvious that she would strike the America on the starboard side, unless the America could be so sheered as to receive the blow upon her bow, or as to admit of the Fairfield's passing on the opposite side of the America, or of striking her a quartering instead of a full blow on her side; that the only course which the pilot of the America could thereupon properly adopt, to prevent the America from being struck on her starboard side, and being cut through, was to give one whistle as a signal, so that the Fairfield might put her helm as hard a-port as possible, and to put the helm of the America hard a-port at the same time; that all this was immediately done by the pilot of the America, and she was immediately stopped, and her engines were backed, and she had stopped her headway by the land, when the Fairfield, continuing her course directly towards the America, struck her, the two vessels colliding head and head; and that the collision was caused wholly by the carelessness, negligence, and want of skill and management of the persons navigating the Fairfield, and, among other things, in not having a good and sufficient lookout, or a competent pilot, in blowing one whistle, and putting her helm to port, and attempting to pass the America on the right, when she had sufficient room to pass the America on the left, and when her course, if continued, would have taken her past the America on the left, and when it was plain that an attempt to pass on the right would probably bring about a collision, and in not slowing, stopping and backing before the collision became inevitable, or so as to lessen the force of the same.

In looking into the libel, the first thing that arrests attention is the fact, that it does not state how the two vessels bore from each other, or how they were approaching each other, when the Fairfield blew a single whistle, and put her helm to port. It only states, that, as the vessels neared each other, the whistle was blown by the Fairfield, and her helm was put to port, and her head was sheered angling towards the New York shore. This averment is entirely consistent with the statement in the answer, that the blowing of the whistle by the Fairfield, and the putting of her helm to port, and the sheering that followed, took place when the Fairfield was on a course heading towards the Brooklyn shore, which, if continued, would have carried her in front of and past the America, on the side towards the Brooklyn shore, without any collision. It is not pretended in the libel, that there was any risk of collision, when the Fairfield blew her whistle and ported, or that the vessels were then meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, nor have the libellants attempted to show by proof any such state of things. The whole case made by the libel is, that, inasmuch as the Fairfield blew a single whistle, and ported, it was the duty of the America to do the same; that the America failed to do so; and that, therefore, the America is solely responsible for the collision. The theory of the libel is based on the too prevalent and erroneous notion, that a steam vessel has a right, by the use of her steam whistle, to select for herself a particular course, and prescribe to another steam vessel a particular course, without regard to the provisions of the act of congress of April 29, 1864, (13 Stat. 58,) for preventing collisions on the water. If there was no risk of collision the moment before the Fairfield blew her whistle and ported, it was not her duty to port, and it was not incumbent on the America to port, and the Fairfield could not, by making a signal, impose any such obligation on the America. The libel makes out no case requiring the America to port her helm, under article 13 of the said act. That article provides as follows: "If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each shall pass on the port side of the other." This rule applies only to steamers meeting, and only to steamers meeting end on, or nearly end on, and only when there is risk of collision. It does not apply when the courses of the two steamers are such that there is no risk of collision. It does not apply to two steamers which must, if both kept on their respective courses, pass clear of each other. The only cases in which it applies are when each of the two vessels is end on, or nearly end on, to the other—that is, cases in which, by day, each vessel sees the masts, or the line of the keel, of the other, in a line, or nearly in a line, with her own masts, or the line of her own keel, and cases in which, by night, each vessel is in such a position as to see both of the sidelights of the other vessel. It does not apply to cases in which, by day, a steamer sees another steamer ahead, crossing her own course; nor, by night, to cases where the red light of one steamer is opposed to the red light of the other, or where the green light of one steamer is opposed to the green light of the other, or where a red light without a green light, or a green light without a red light, is seen ahead, or where both the green and the red lights are seen anywhere but ahead. No case is made by the libel, authorizing the Fairfield to port, or requiring the America to port. Nor does the testimony on the part of the Fairfield make out a case of meeting end on, or nearly end on, at the time the Fairfield blew her single whistle and ported. On the other hand, the answer, and the testimony on the part of the claimants, make out a case where the Fairfield was on a course that would have carried her between the America and the Brooklyn shore, and the America was on a course that would have carried her to the New York side of the Fairfield, and the courses of the two vessels were such, when the Fairfield blew her single whistle and ported, that there would have been no collision, if both vessels had kept such courses. I think that the weight of the evidence is decidedly in favor of the statement contained in the answer as to the positions and courses of the two vessels at the time the Fairfield blew her single whistle and ported. If so, it follows, that the Fairfield, by porting, and attempting to cross the bows of the America, from the starboard side of the latter to her port side, left a course where there was no risk of collision, and threw herself in the way of the America, so as to make a collision inevitable. Unless the story in the answer is true, the collision could not have happened as it did, and the two vessels could not have struck each other in the way they did. For, as the Fairfield ported, and sheered towards the New York shore, the America, which was farther towards the New York shore than the Fairfield was, ported and sheered towards the Brooklyn shore, so as to avoid being struck on her starboard side by the Fairfield, and so as to receive the blow nearly on her bow, which was done. On the testimony of the pilot of the Fairfield, the collision could never have happened as it did. The Fairfield could not have been as far over towards the New York shore as is claimed for her by him. For, if she had been, inasmuch as the tide was ebb, and the America had rounded up the river, and could not have done so, on an ebb tide, until she was well over towards the Brooklyn shore, the vessels could not have come together bow on, as they did, after the Fairfield had ported. On the whole evidence, the collision took place through the fault of the Fairfield, in porting and attempting to cross the bows of the America, when she had no right to do so. I see no fault in the navigation of the America. Her pilot heard the single whistle of the Fairfield when it was blown, and noticed her porting as soon as it took place, and he immediately stopped and reversed his engine, and ported his helm, to change the direction of the coming blow.

going at a proper speed, where the channel was wide and deep, she was struck under her bottom by something which made a hole in her, and caused her to sink. A libel to recover the damages was filed against the tow-boat: Held, That, on the evidence, it appeared that while being towed in the ordinary and proper channel, the boat was struck by something under water, whose presence could not be known by any care exercised by those in charge of the tow-boat.

2. That, when it was shown by the tow-boat, that all care was taken to avoid obstructions, and that this obstruction was unknown, the burden of proof was shifted to the libellants, and that, in order to recover, they must prove that the sinking was caused by negligence, on the part of the tow-boat.

C. Van Santvoord, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought by James McKeag, owner of the canal-boat A. W. Humphreys, to recover of the steamer America, the damages sustained by the canal-boat, while being towed by the America, from New York to Albany, on the night of the twenty-third day of August last. The evidence shows, that the canal-boat was properly placed in the tow, and that, soon after the tow was fully made up, and while proceeding up the river by New York, at a proper speed, this canal-boat was struck under her bottom by some hard substance, which, although it did not break her loose, or strike any other boat in the tow, made a hole in the bottom of this boat, which caused her to sink in a very short time. No one is called who knows what struck the boat. The channel was there very deep, and nothing was seen to cause danger. But it appears that off 59th street, in the river there was at this time an old sunken crib, which was well known, and on which the boat might have struck in passing over it, and much evidence has been taken, as bearing on the question whether the boat was off 59th street, or above that point when she struck. Upon this question my conclusion is that, as the evidence stands, it cannot be found that the cause of the injury was striking the old crib off 59th street. The case is then one where the tow-boat shows, that the boat was properly placed in the tow, and that, while being towed in the ordinary and proper channel, she was struck under water by something whose presence could not be known by any care exercised by those in charge of the tow. In such a case the towing boat cannot be held liable. When, on the part of the tow-boat, it was shown that all care possible was taken to avoid all obstructions, and that the obstruction which hurt this boat was unknown, the burden of proof shifted to the libellants, and in order to recover they must show that the sinking was caused by negligence on the part of the tow. There must therefore be a decree dismissing the libel with costs.

DAMAGE TO CARGO—BILL OF LADING—INHERENT DETERIORATION—BAD STORAGE.

1. Oranges and lemons were shipped on a steamship at Valencia to be brought to New York under a bill of lading exempting the vessel from losses by perils of the seas or from inherent deterioration. On the discharge of the cargo at New York the fruit was found to be mostly decayed, and a libel was filed against the steamer to recover for its loss: Held, that on the evidence the cargo had not been so stowed as to permit proper ventilation.

[Cited in The Portuense, 35 Fed. 671.]

2. That it was not incumbent on the libellants to prove that there was no inherent deterioration in the fruit.

3. That the rotting of this fruit was undoubtedly unduly hastened by the manner in which it was stowed; and that the libellants were entitled to recover.

Scudder & Carter, for libellant.

Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action upon a bill of lading to recover for the loss of a quantity of oranges. The oranges were shipped in Valencia, to be delivered in New York in like good order. The bill of lading is in the ordinary form. It states that the fruit was shipped in good order and condition, and it exempts the ship from liability for damages arising from perils of the seas or from "inherent deterioration." After the shipment of this fruit in Valencia, the steamer went to Malaga, where the position of some portions of the cargo was changed, and other cargo was shipped.

she proceeded to New York. Upon arrival in New York the fruit was found substantially destroyed by decay. All of it was more or less rotten and it was worth little or nothing. Whereupon this action was brought to charge the steamer with the loss. The evidence renders it necessary to consider only the question of stowage. Upon this point the contention on the part of the libellant is that the damage arose from the cargo being so stowed as to afford no proper ventilation. On the part of the steamer, the bad condition of the fruit on arrival of the steamer is admitted, but the liability of the steamer is denied, first, upon the ground that no uniform mode of stowing so as to secure ventilation in such a cargo exists, and that, by the mode adopted in this case, sufficient ventilation was secured; and, second, that the evidence leaves it in doubt whether the decay of the oranges did not arise from inherent deterioration.

Upon the whole evidence it appears quite plainly that, after the restowage of the cargo at Malaga, the fruit in question was not so stowed as to secure proper ventilation. The proximity of the engine bulkhead; the absence of a well hole in the cargo under the main hatchway; the stowage of a quantity of dried fruit between the oranges and the fore-hatch; the absence of a booby-hatch over the main hatchway, and the closeness of the stowage by the beams, are facts abundantly sufficient to make out a case of bad stowage in a cargo of this description. The natural result of this mode of stowage would be to cause the fruit to decay, and, in the absence of any other cause, the conclusion must be that the stowage did cause the extraordinary decay which took place.

It has been argued in behalf of the steamer that the fact, which was proved, that sometimes oranges do decay on a voyage of importation, from inherent deterioration, renders it incumbent upon the libellant, before he can recover, to prove that no inherent deterioration existed in this fruit.

I do not so understand the law to be. The bill of lading states that the fruit was shipped in good order and condition. No witness is called to say that any defect existed in the fruit; and it is going far to say that the possibility that there might be inherent deterioration must prevent the libellant from recovering.

All oranges will rot, but that fact does not prevent the conclusion that the rotting of these oranges was unduly hastened to the damage of the libellant by the manner in which they were transported. My opinion, therefore, is that the libellant has made out a case which entitles him to a decree. Let a decree be entered for the libellant, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount.

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAMERS—PORTING HELM—LOOKOUT.

1. A collision occurred in the East river, between a steamboat from the Wallabout to the North river, and a ferry-boat crossing from New York to Brooklyn, on the Fulton ferry route: Held, on the facts, that the ferry-boat was solely in fault.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Although, at the time, the steamboat was in the sole charge of her pilot, and the assistant engineer, and her master and engineer, and the rest of the hands, were in the cabin, at supper, and such inattention was inexcusable, yet it did not contribute to the collision.

3. The two vessels approached each other so nearly end on, as to require each to keep to the right. The steamboat did so, and the ferry-boat did not.

4. A vigilant lookout on ferry-boats crossing the East river is required.

Benjamin D. Silliman, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. It cannot be denied that it was unsafe and improper, on the part of the captain, engineer and hands employed on the vessel of the libellants, the steamboat Fairfield, to leave her in sole charge of the pilot and assistant to the engineer, at the time they went to their supper. She had been at the Wallabout, on the southerly or Brooklyn side of the East river, had left her tow, and had come thence out into the river, and swung around, taking her course down the river, to go around the Battery, to her slip on the North river. It was about five o'clock in the evening, on the 13th of December, 1866. The sun had set, and it was nearly dark, though the shores and objects at a considerable distance were still visible. The Fairfield was about to pass through a channel crossed by numerous ferry-boats, and ordinarily travelled by other craft, rendering it especially important that more than ordinary watchfulness and competent skill in navigation should be in constant exercise. That, in these circumstances, no lookout should be stationed, and the captain should relinquish all attention to the navigation of the vessel, and, with all hands other than the two above named, go to the cabin for supper, was extraordinary, and, as I think, inexcusable. Nevertheless, if this inattention on their part in no wise contributed to the collision, if, in fact, the pilot saw all that was material, which he could have seen, or of which he could have been informed, had a proper lookout been stationed, and others had been on duty, then the question ceases to be affected by the want of a lookout, &c., and becomes simply a question of proper navigation, in view of what the pilot saw and knew of the presence and course of the ferry-boat with which the collision occurred. The ferry-boat, the America, came from her slip at the foot of Fulton street on the New York side, bound upwards and across the river to her Brooklyn slip. The tide was ebb and running very strongly down the river, and, in order to make her passage with facility, it was necessary for her to swing around to port, on a starboard helm, head up the river against the tide, go above her Brooklyn slip, and then port her helm, and swing into her slip. According to the testimony of the witnesses she made a course, by this means, well described by the letter S, in which she would travel, at first, across, and more than half across, the river, swinging upwards, and then inclining towards the New York side, preparatory to her last manoeuvre, of swinging into her Brooklyn slip. The pilot of the steamboat, the Fairfield, saw her from the moment she came out of the slip, and watched her movements continuously to the moment of collision. If he had had the assistance of one or many on the lookout, he could not have been sooner apprised of her approach, and he conducted the navigation of the Fairfield with all the information they could have given him, and with the ferry-boat in full view. The responsibility of this navigation was upon him. He controlled the movement of the Fairfield, while the man in charge of the engine promptly obeyed his instructions, and slowed, stopped and backed at his signal. I cannot, therefore, discover that the absence of the lookout contributed, in any degree, to deprive him of information, or that his management of the Fairfield was in any manner affected by the absence of the others, master or crew, at their supper, until the danger of collision was imminent.

The question on the part of the libellants is, therefore, whether the Fairfield was, in fact, skillfully and properly navigated, with the ferry-boat in full view, and, on the other hand, whether there was fault in the navigation of the ferry-boat. To determine this, it is important to ascertain the location of the two vessels at the time when it became the duty of one or both to take measures to insure safety. The testimony of the pilot of the Fairfield, corroborated by the testimony of the master and crew as to her course and location, both when they went to, and when they returned from, the cabin, is distinct and unqualified, that she was coming down nearly in the middle of the river. This is, also, her probable course, when her destination is considered, she being bound around the Battery to reach her slip. She, coming from the Wallabout, and taking her course down the river, would be under a temptation to incline towards the New York shore, and the witnesses on her part all state that such was her inclination. Some of them clearly exaggerate that inclination, but on the fact they are all agreed. This is denied by the witnesses from the ferry-boat. They say that the Fairfield was, when they saw her, on a course tending towards the Brooklyn shore, and some of them represent her as coming from the foot of Market street, on the New York side, obliquely, across the river, towards Brooklyn, near the very slip to which the ferry-boat was bound—in itself, not only in conflict with the witnesses from the Fairfield, but a most improbable story, and yet easily accounted for without imputing intentional misstatement to any one. In the first place, the witnesses on the Fairfield know, better than the others could know, her destination and her course. Next, in the obscurity of the evening twilight, observation from the ferry-boat is far less reliable than it would be if made in open day. Again, the witnesses from the ferry-boat did not see the Fairfield until the former had passed out into the river and swung around, so as to be headed up the river, still under a starboard helm, or at about the time her helm was steadied on her course upward. In the making of this movement, to all eyes on the ferry-boat the Fairfield would seem to be on a reverse course, and, especially at that time, and in so imperfect a light, the Fairfield would seem to be moving from them, in the opposite direction. Very great precision is rarely found in the statements of witnesses on either side, in cases of this description, and the imperfect light may have made the estimates of the witnesses from the Fairfield in some degree inaccurate, but their statements are not overcome by the observations from the ferry-boat, under circumstances so clearly adapted to deceive the observers, and when the admitted movements of the ferry-boat would easily produce the impression to which they testify, and yet be in perfect harmony with the fact, as stated by the libellants' witnesses. It is, also, true, that the testimony as to the distance of the place of collision from the Brooklyn shore is in conflict, and yet a small allowance, due to the prejudice of the witnesses attached to either vessel, and, as to passengers, due to their observation, in which the motion of the ferry-boat was imputed to the Fairfield, leading them to the belief that the latter was moving in the direction of Brooklyn, removes this conflict from any great embarrassment. That the Fairfield was slowed, stopped and backed on the instant that the danger of collision rendered that proper, is very clearly proved. A main fact, which a just view of all the testimony seems to me to establish, furnishes to my mind the test of the responsibility for the collision; and this fact is not only supported by the witnesses for the libellants, as I have above stated, but is corroborated, not, perhaps, by the claimants' witnesses to their observation on the course of the Fairfield, but by their testimony to the course of their own boat. The fact is this. At the time when the two vessels gained such a position that precautions to pass each other in safety were proper, they were approaching each other so nearly end on, that the rule that each should keep to the right of the other applied to them.

Whatever be the rule respecting the duty of ferry-boats to keep a lookout from the forward deck, one thing is certain, that, in the navigation across this crowded channel, a most vigilant lookout from some place on the boat is required, and I can hardly conceive of any navigation in which, in view of the interests of life and property, and the dangers of inadvertence, it is more imperatively demanded. It is, also, clear, upon the proofs here, that the two men who are claimed to have acted as lookouts on the bow of the ferry-boat were wholly useless as such. They might as well have been in the cabin. They saw the Fairfield, it is true, before the collision, but made no report of her approach. Whether they even saw her before she was seen by the pilot, who was engaged in directing the boat out of her slip and into the river, and bringing her around to her course up the river, is, at least, doubtful, and, if they did, they gave no notice. It is, also, apparent, that the pilot himself did not see the Fairfield until he had accomplished all the manoeuvres last stated, and was near to the Fairfield, nor until she had obeyed the rule which, in the judgment of her pilot, required him to pass to the right, or port to port of the two vessels. The pilot of the ferry-boat was attentive to the endeavor to stem the strong ebb tide, and reach a point up the river at which he should make his final sheer into his slip, and he failed to discover the Fairfield, and learn her actual course and movement, so soon as it was the duty of either himself or some one who should inform him. He heard the one whistle of the Fairfield, but he was not at liberty to await that whistle, when the boats were approaching, as I think they were, so that each should keep to the right. This is easily accounted for. It was of importance to the ferry-boat that she should be kept up the river far enough, against the strong ebb tide, to enable her to swing readily around, so as not to strike below her slip. He was under a strong motive not to turn too soon to accomplish an entrance to his slip. Either because he did not see the Fairfield, and learn her true course, soon enough, or because he mistakenly persisted too long in keeping the ferry-boat up against the tide, he did not port his helm so soon as he ought. He did not do so till after the Fairfield had turned to the right, nor until, after that, she warned him, by her whistle, that she was acting in conformity with the rule which he also was bound to observe without such warning.

I cannot resist the conclusion, that the collision was due to the want of proper and seasonable observation on board the ferry-boat, to imperfect and mistaken observation when made in the dim twilight, to mistake, in imputing to the Fairfield an apparent motion due to the actual movement of the ferry-boat, to an over-anxiety to gain a distance up the river against the tide, to enable the ferry-boat easily to enter her slip, and, finally, to a neglect, from whatever cause, to turn to the right, as it was the duty of the ferry-boat to do, to avoid collision. These conclusions necessarily require that the libellants have a decree, to recover their damages and costs, and a reference to compute such damages must be ordered. 3 Ben. 424, [The America, Case No. 281.]

[NOTE. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, and the decree of the circuit court was there reversed. It was ordered that the damages resulting from the collision, and the costs of suit, be apportioned equally between the two vessels, on the ground that, if either had seasonably complied with the requirement as to the porting of her helm, the collision could not have occurred, and consequently both vessels were in fault. COLLISION—TOTAL LOSS—RAISING SUNKEN VESSEL—INTEREST.

1. Where a vessel is sunk by a collision, and a recovery is had by her against another vessel for a total loss of her, as the damages caused thereby, an item for the expense of raising the former vessel will be allowed, if it does not appear that more was done, in raising her, than to enable proof to be given that she could not be repaired without too great expense.

2. In such an action, interest on the items of damage allowed is proper, as an allowance, as being necessary to indemnity.

[Cited in The Alexandria, Case No. 178.]

[In admiralty.. Libel for collision by the Camden & Amboy Railroad Transportation Company, owner of the steam tug Fairfield, against the steam ferryboat America, (the Union Ferry Company, claimant.) The district court dismissed the libel, with costs, (Case No. 281,) but on appeal the decree was reversed by this court, and a reference ordered, (The America, Case No. 284.)² Heard on exceptions to the commissioner's report. Overruled.]

In this case, which was an action in rem by the owners of the steamboat Fairfield against the steamboat America, to recover for the damages sustained by the former by the sinking of the Fairfield through a collision between her and the America, the libellants had a decree, in this court. The commissioner, in his report, allowed for a total loss of the Fairfield, but, in addition, one of the items allowed by him was the expense of raising the Fairfield. Another item allowed was interest on the items of damage allowed. To the allowance of these items the claimants excepted.

Benjamin D. Silliman, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I think the exceptions filed in this case were properly overruled. There is nothing to show that the libellants did not exercise a just and wise discretion in raising the Fairfield. Until she was raised it was impossible to determine whether she could be repaired without too great expense. Indeed, had she not been raised, and the libellants had come into court claiming her value, the objection that they should have raised her, or proved that she could not be raised and repaired, would have been effectually urged by the claimants of the America. The libellants were at liberty, and, in fact, bound, to go far enough to enable proof to be given of the extent of loss; and the proof does not show that more than that was done.

As to interest, it has been often said, that, in actions of tort, where the damages are unliquidated, interest is not to be allowed as matter of law, but it rests in the discretion of the jury. The proposition is not unqualifiedly true, without exception. Thus, in actions of trover, which is an action of tort, the value of the property, with interest thereon, is held to be the rule of damages. Where the value of the thing lost, or the cost of repairs and the like, are the test or measure of recovery, and the amount of damages becomes mere matter of computation, interest is as necessary to indemnity as the allowance of the principal sums. But, if the allowance of interest rests in discretion, still, the indemnity of the party for injury from a collision occurring through the fault of another vessel, should be the object of the court in the allowance of damages. In this view, such allowance was, I think, proper. It is, in such case, not allowed as punishment. It is not like the allowance of punitive damages in actions of slander, assault and battery, and like cases. It gives indemnity only.

Let the exceptions be overruled, and a decree be entered for the amount reported.

SEAMEN—UNLAWFUL DISCHARGE—WAGES FOR ENTIRE VOYAGE.

Where a seaman is unlawfully discharged during a voyage, or is compelled, by the cruelty of the mates, to leave the vessel, from a regard to his personal safety, he is entitled to full wages for the entire voyage.

[Cited in Coffin v. Weld, Case No. 2,953; The Alvena, 22 Fed. 862. See Jones v. Sears, Case No. 7,494; Hunt v. Colburn, Id. 6,886; Page v. Sheffield, Id. 10,667. Affirming Sheffield v. Page, Id. 12,743.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem for wages. The defence was desertion and forfeiture of wages. It appeared that the libellant shipped for a voyage from Savannah to Liverpool, and thence to New York. At Liverpool he left the vessel, and the claim was for wages out and home. It was proved that the libellant, who was the carpenter, was severely and unjustifiably beaten by the mates, and that he left the vessel in consequence. The first mate, on the same day, stopped his board on shore, and, one or two days afterwards, when he came down to the side of the vessel, forbade his coming on board. The entries in the log, in regard to the libellant's going on shore, were interlined with the words "without leave," several days after they were first made.

BETTS, District Judge. The evidence in this case establishes, that the carpenter left the vessel at a foreign port, because of inhuman treatment. He was afterwards refused support by the ship, and forbidden to come on board, and was not logged in the way directed by the statute to establish the fact of desertion.

The amount which a seaman can recover for a wrongful discharge in a foreign port, will vary to some extent with the circumstances of each particular case; but, ordinarily, he is entitled to the full wages of the voyage. The suit is usually brought for wages, and, under that name, admiralty awards a compensation commensurate to the injury sustained. The libellant in this case claims wages for the voyage out and home. It appears that he was obliged to procure a passage home in another vessel, and that he earned no wages on the voyage back. The 42d article of the Laws of the Hanse Towns [Fed. Cas. Append., last volume] provides, that if the master discharges a seaman during the voyage, for no lawful cause given, he is bound to pay him his whole wages, and defray the charge of his return. So the Laws of Oleron, article 13, and those of Wisbuy, article 25, [Fed. Cas. Append., last volume,] provide, that a seaman unlawfully discharged may follow the vessel to her port of destination, and recover such wages as he would have been entitled to if he had remained by the ship until the end of the voyage. The conduct of the mates in this case amounted to such a discharge; and, even if it did not, the libellant was justified in leaving the vessel from a regard to his own personal safety.—Limland v. Stephens, 3 Esp. 269; Ward v. Ames, 9 Johns. 138; Relf v. The Maria, [Case No. 11, 692;] Rice v. The Polly and Kitty; [Id. 11, 754.]—and comes within the spirit of the articles which have been cited. See Emerson v. Howland, [Case No. 4,441.] He is entitled to full wages for the voyage out and home. Decree accordingly.

PRIZE—CARRYING FOREIGN GOODS WITHOUT MANIFEST.

If a coasting vessel arrive from one district at another district in the same state, having on board foreign goods exceeding $800 in value, without being provided with, or exhibiting a manifest of such cargo, it is not an offence for which the vessel is forfeited under the coasting act of the 18th February, 1793, c. 8.

[On appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

In admiralty. This was an information claiming the schooner America, as forfeited, 1st. because certain goods, to wit, 120 tons of plaster of paris, were imported in said vessel into the United States from some port in Nova Scotia, and being of more than $400 in value, were unladen in the night time without a permit, contrary to the collection act of 2 March, 1799, c. 128; 2d. because the same goods were, at some port of Nova Scotia, laden and put on board of said schooner, with the knowledge of the owner and master, with intention to import the same into the United States, contrary to the act of March 1, 1809, c. 91; 3d. because the said vessel, being a vessel duly enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and having on board foreign merchandize of a value exceeding $800, did arrive at the port and district of Boston from the district of Penobscot, without being provided with, or exhibiting a manifest of the cargo then on board of said vessel, or any manifest including said plaster, contrary to the coasting act 18 February, 1793, c. 8.

G. Blake, Dist. Atty., for the United States, in support of the first count, cited sections 27 and 28 of the act regulating the collection of duties; the first of which provides, that any foreign goods brought in from a foreign port, and unladen without a permit, unless in case of accident or distress, shall be forfeited; and the last, that the vessel which receives them shall also be forfeited. He also relied on the 50th section, providing that no goods brought from any foreign port or place shall be unladen but between sunrise and sunset, without a permit or license; and if so unladen, to be forfeited. And if the value at the highest market price be $400, then the vessel, &c. are to be forfeited. He contended that no distinction was here made, as to goods not liable to duties. In support of the second count, he referred to the 4th, 5th, and 6th sections of the non-intercourse act 1 March, 1809. In support of the third count, he relied on the 46th and 50th sections of the coasting act, requiring the exhibition of a manifest.

W. B. Bannister, for claimant, contended as to the first count, 1st. that no goods, but such as were liable to duties, were intended by the act. The plaster, which composed this vessel's cargo, was not liable to duties. He referred to the act regulating the collection of duties, and also to the 4th and 51st sections of the coasting act; 2dly, that the facts must show it to be imported from a foreign port in the same vessel, unladen in the night time, and of more than $400 in value. Without the papers, the evidence proves nothing of the quantity, nor whence it came. It only shows circumstances of suspicion. If the papers are resorted to, they must be taken for what they purport to be. They prove the schooner a coasting vessel, regularly enrolled, and the cargo cleared from Eastport. So also the depositions. The same facts form an answer to the second count. As to the third count, he contended that coasting vessels were not obliged to enter, or exhibit a manifest, unless required, and that the requisition was complied with in this case.

STORY, Circuit Justice.—To maintain the first count, it must be shown that the plaster was brought from a foreign port, but the whole evidence in the case shows that it was brought from a port within the district of Penobscot. To maintain the second count, it must, according to its allegations, be shown that the lading was at a port in Nova Scotia; and for the reason which I have already stated, this count also cannot be supported. I do not find that the third count alleges any offence, for the commission of which a forfeiture of the schooner would have been incurred. It is apparently founded on the 15th section of the coasting act, which certainly will not support it; and no other section of that or any other statute has been shown to the court, which countenances the forfeiture. I must, therefore pronounce also that the United States can take nothing by this count in the information.

Whether the facts in the case would have supported a prosecution for a forfeiture under other provisions of our statutes, it is not now necessary to consider. But I must say, that there have been great irregularities in the conduct of this vessel, which have not left her without heavy suspicions. I affirm the decree of the district court, but shall certify reasonable cause of seizure. Restored.

COLLISION—LIENS ON VESSELS—ORDER OF PAYMENT.

1. In a case of collision, the owner of a vessel injured has a maritime lien upon the offending vessel for the amount of the damages to which such owner is entitled in consequence of the collision; and this lien is of equal rank with those of material-men, bottomry-bond holders, and others, whose claims rest upon the necessities of the ship or the hazards of navigation.

2. A creditor holding a maritime lien, who proceeds in rem in a court of admiralty, and obtains a final decree in his favor, before another creditor, having a co-ordinate or equal claim, has instituted proceeding or intervened in the prior suit to enforce his lien, is entitled to be paid his debt in preference to the creditor who has asserted no right until after the entry of such final decree.

[Cited in The Lady Boone, 21 Fed. 732. Distinguished in The City of Tawas, 3 Fed. 173. Disapproved in The E. A. Barnard, 2 Fed. 719.]

3. Such final decree may, however, be opened on the application of the apparently dilatory creditor, if such application be made within a reasonable time, while the fund still remains in court, and under circumstances which would excuse a default, and induce the court to open a decree for the purpose of enabling a proper claimant to set up a meritorious defence to the demand on which the decree was made.

4. If no preference has been obtained by the actual making of a decree, as above mentioned, the maritime liens, of the same class, or rank of privilege, upon a ship sold under the order of a court of admiralty, should, as a general rule, be paid out of the proceeds in the inverse order of the dates of the creation of such liens.

5. Seamen's wages for the same voyage, and perhaps for the same season of navigation upon the great lakes, are, however, generally to be preferred to claims of material-men, &c.

6. Maritime liens arising out of contracts of affreightment, and other maritime liens not resting upon the necessities of the ship, or the hazards of navigation, should be assigned to a class different from that which embraces the claims of material-men, bottomry-bond holders, salvors, and collision claimants; and such liens should be postponed until all the liens belonging to superior classes, and arising at the same time, are paid.

In admiralty.

John Ganson, for libellant and petitioner.

E. Cook, T. C. Welch, I. T. Williams, and P. Hoffman, for sundry claimants opposing the petition.

HALL, District Judge. This is a cause of collision and damage. The libel was filed by De Witt C. Bancroft, on the 16th July, 1852; and on the 17th July the America was arrested on the warrant, issued in this suit, against the steamboat, her tackle, apparel and furniture. The collision occurred on Lake Erie, on the 12th July, 1852, during the last trip made by the America prior to her arrest. The office of the clerk of this court was then at Auburn, and there was consequently no unnecessary delay, on the part of the libellant, in instituting these proceedings; but the America, having been herself damaged by the collision, was on the marine railway, undergoing repairs at the time of her arrest. The vessel of the libellant was sunk by the collision, and totally lost. She was of the value of more than $23,000; but this court having determined that those in charge of her were not entirely free from fault, divided the damages sustained by the colliding vessels, and on the 14th December, 1852, awarded to the libellant the sum of $10,000 damages, and his costs. Pending the proceedings in this suit, and before any final decree therein, sundry seamen commenced original suits, or intervened in this suit, for the recovery of their wages as mariners on board the America; and sundry material-men instituted proceedings for the recovery of their respective claims. Proceedings were also instituted by Patrick Carroll, on the 2d October, 1852, to recover the damages sustained by him as the owner of a vessel which was injured by a collision with the America on the 11th July, 1852. The America was sold under an order of this court, on the 10th September, 1852. The proceeds of the sale, amounting to $10,950, were brought into the registry; and, soon after, applications were made for the payment of the decrees which had been rendered in favor of the seamen for their wages. These applications were not opposed. They were at once granted, and those decrees paid. Applications for the payment of several of the decrees obtained by material-men were subsequently made, and were opposed by the collision-claimants. After a slight examination of the questions involved in the applications, the decrees of the material-men whose liens attached subsequently to the collision with the vessel of the libellant, and who had either the possession of the America, and common law liens, or liens under the statute of this state, declaring that such liens upon a ship or vessel "shall be preferred to all liens thereon except mariner's wages," were also directed to be paid.—The claims of the other material-men having been held under advisement, the libellant in this case subsequently presented his petition, claiming the whole residue of the fund in court, upon the ground that he was entitled to a preference over all the other parties who had instituted original suits against the America, or intervened in this suit, for the purpose of obtaining payment of their respective claims.

The several questions raised in this case, in respect to the right of preference, or priority of payment, claimed by the respective parties, were elaborately and ably argued, and have been the subject of much examination and reflection. As questions depending upon the same principles are likely hereafter to arise in this district, it is deemed proper to express an opinion upon most of the questions argued, although some of them are not necessarily determined by the decision about to be pronounced. Some of these questions have not, it is believed, been directly and expressly determined by any court whose judgments are binding upon this; and in respect to some of them, apparently conflicting decisions have been made in different districts in the United States.—Under such circumstances, this court may, perhaps, be justified in attempting to establish, for its own guidance, some general principles in regard to the distribution of funds claimed by adverse parties under different maritime liens, until some authoritative adjudication in a higher court shall prescribe a different rule for its adoption, or until increased experience and more mature consideration shall produce a conviction that such principles ought no longer to be maintained. With these views I shall proceed to an examination of the questions arising in the present case.

The first question to be considered is, whether the libellant had, in consequence of the collision, a maritime lien upon the America; or, if he had not a technical maritime lien, such as exists in the case of contracts giving a lien under the general maritime law, whether he had a charge upon the America in consequence of the collision, similar in character and effect to such a maritime lien; giving him substantially the same rights and entitling him to substantially the same remedies.

The cases of The Volant, 1 W. Rob. [Adm.] 333, and of The Creole, Fland. Mar. Law, § 330, note, were cited by the counsel opposing the libellant's petition. In the case of The Volant, Dr. Lushington is reported to have said: "By the ancient maritime law, the owners of a vessel doing damage were bound to make good the loss to the owners of the other vessel, although it might exceed the value of their own vessel and the freight. For the purpose of enforcing this obligation, the owners of the damaged vessel might resort either to the courts of common law or to the court of admiralty; and if they preferred the latter, they had their choice of three modes of proceeding, viz: Against the owners, or against the master personally, or by a proceeding in rem against the ship itself. The court of admiralty has jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter of damage on the high seas, and the arrest of a vessel is only one mode of proceeding. The damage confers no lien upon the ship, but an arrest offers the greatest security for obtaining substantial justice in furnishing a security for prompt and immediate payment." "Looking to a proceeding by the arrest of the vessel, it is clear, that, if no appearance is given to the warrant arresting the ship, there can be no proceedings against the owners; for the court can not know who are the owners; and the court can not exercise any power over persons not before the court and never cited to appear: The decree must be confined exclusively to the ship." In the case of The Creole, the learned judge of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, said: "There is, properly speaking, no lien in a case of collision, and can not be, for the subject is tort. Yet the remedy, according to the ancient and practically approved opinion in this district, is not affected by a change of property in the thing: No one has contended here, that his vessel was free of liability for a collision, because he had purchased her after it took place." In each of these cases, the right to proceed in rem against the vessel, by whose fault the damage was occasioned, was recognized and enforced; and, in the latter, this right was declared to continue even against a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice. Other cases in the English and American courts of admiralty have sanctioned the same doctrines, and it has been declared that the rights of the collision-claimant should prevail over those of subsequent bona fide purchasers, and bottomry-bond holders, mariners and others, whose liens attached prior to the collision. It is, perhaps, not very material, after these decisions, to inquire whether the right of the collision-claimant, as recognized and enforced in these courts, gives a technical maritime lien upon the vessel by which the damage was produced; but I can perceive no impropriety in denominating the fixed and acknowledged right of priority of payment over the rights of general creditors, subsequent purchasers and others, which is given to the collision-claimant, a maritime lien. It has been sometimes so denominated by distinguished admiralty judges, as some of the cases hereafter referred to will abundantly show. In the case of Edwards v. Stockton, [Case No. 4,297,] Judge Randall, of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, declared it to be "the generally received opinion of courts of admiralty," that "whenever one vessel does damage to another, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the offending vessel becomes hypothecated to the vessel and cargo sustaining the injury to repair the damages occasioned by the collision and the injured persons have a lien, or privilege, upon the guilty party, by the general maritime law of nations, to the extent of the injury sustained." See, also, 3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 61. In the case of Boon v. The Hornet, [Case No. 1,640,] the late Judge Hopkinson declared: "There could be no suit in rem, unless there was a charge or lien upon the thing to answer for the debt;" and this, taken in connection with the acknowledged right of a libellant in a cause of collision and damage to proceed in rem, is an authority in favor of the existence of a maritime lien in behalf of a collision-claimant.

An able writer in the London Law Magazine, for February, 1853, whose article is published in the Law Reporter, for May last, (16 Law Rep. 1.) says: "Maritime liens, like all other obligations, arise either ex contractu and quasi ex contractu, or ex delicto and quasi ex delicto. In the first category are wages, pilotage, towage, salvage and bottomry-bonds. In the other is damage by reason of collision." Again: "In damage, which is a lien ex delicto," &c., "and as the law has made it a lien," &c. In the case of Harmer v. Bell,¹ (24th April, 1852,) Lord Chief Justice Jervis said: "A maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean, 'a claim or privilege upon a thing, to be carried into effect by legal process,'" and Mr. Justice Story, in 1 Sum. 78, [The Nestor, Case No. 10,126,] explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds, that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, that the admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only court competent to enforce it. "A maritime lien is the foundation of all the proceedings in rem—a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and, whilst it must be admitted that, when such a lien exists, a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true, that in all cases when a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon the thing, to be carried into effect by legal process." 15 Law Rep. 560. And see The Rebecca, [Case No. 11,619,] After a careful consideration of these and other authorities, I am unable to perceive any substantial difference between the settled right of the collision-claimant to enforce the payment of his damages by proceedings in rem, in disregard of the claims of subsequent bona fide purchasers without notice, prior bottomry-bond holders, and mortgagees of the offending vessel, and the right, which, in the case of material-men, &c., is constantly denominated a maritime lien. In neither case is there a lien in the common law sense of that term, as applied to personal property, but the term maritime lien has been long used, and its signification is well settled; as well, perhaps, as that of the term common law lien. It is constantly and legitimately used as expressing the existence of that privilege, or right of priority of payment, which seamen, pilots, material-men, and bottomry-bond holders, enforce in courts of admiralty, by proceedings in rem; and, in my judgment, there is manifest propriety, as well as convenience, in the use of the term to indicate the existence of the like privilege and right which accrues to the owners of vessels damaged by collision.²

Being satisfied that the libellant had a maritime lien upon the America, for the amount of damages to which he was entitled in consequence of the collision, or else a charge or privilege which gave him substantially the same rights and remedies, it becomes important to consider the claims of priority and preference which have been urged by the advocates for the respective parties in interest. The advocate for the libellant insisted, upon the argument, that his right of preference over all the other claimants, except seamen suing for their wages, was authoritatively settled by the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of The Globe, [Case No. 5,483;] but I do not so regard it. It is true that Mr. Justice Nelson, in that case, referred with approbation to the case of The Triumph, [Case No. 14,182,] decided in the southern district of New-York in 1841, and in which it was said by the learned judge of that district, "that maritime liens, or what are usually so denominated, are to be discharged and satisfied in the order in which the warrants of arrest were served upon the property, whether the vessel in kind or her proceeds in court; and that each action, with its appropriate costs, comes upon the fund, according to the period of its commencement." But this reference, by Mr. Justice Nelson, to the case of The Triumph, [supra,] is not of such a character as to make that case binding upon this court upon the ground that its doctrines were adopted and confirmed in the case of The Globe, [supra.] The latter case was an appeal from a decree of my predecessor; and in my judgment, the question was one of title only. The question of preference, or right of priority of payment, did not arise. The claimant in that case obtained his title to The Globe, [supra,] through a judicial sale, made in Ohio, and founded upon proceedings in rem, in one of the courts of that state. These proceedings were in accordance with a statute of Ohio, which gave material-men a right to proceed in the Ohio state courts, against the vessel itself, as a defendant, very much in the manner of the ordinary proceeding in rem in this court. The arrest and sale of the vessel, under the proceeding in Ohio, were subsequent to the creation of the debt or lien upon which the libellant proceeded in the district court; and if the proceeding in Ohio was a valid proceeding in rem, to which all persons having an interest in the ship were substantially parties, the right acquired by the claimant under a sale authorized by such proceedings was clearly good and available as against all parties whose rights accrued prior to such sale. In other words, the purchaser at a sale under such proceedings obtained the same title which is obtained by a purchaser under proceedings in rem in this court. All persons who had maritime or other liens on the property at the time of the sale, were therefore bound to look only to the proceeds of such sale, and were entitled to payment of their liens out of such proceeds, either pro rata, or in such order of priority as might be established by the court making the distribution. If the proceeding in rem, in the Ohio court, was valid and binding, the person took the property discharged of all liens, and the question of priority of lien was one which could only be raised by the different claimants of the fund produced by the sale. If the libellant in the district court had a lien upon the vessel at the time she was seized under the process of the Ohio court, he should have established his right in the latter court, and received his just share of the proceeds of the sale, and his failure to do so could give him no right against The Globe in the hands of the purchaser at the Ohio sale; nor would it invalidate the proceedings, in that state, under its statutes.

² Since this opinion was written, a report of the case of General Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sherwood, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 351, decided by the supreme court of the United States at its last term, has fallen under my observation. In that case, Sherwood, the owner of the brig Emily, brought his action against the insurance company, upon a policy of insurance, to recover the damages which had been decreed against the Emily by a court of admiralty, in consequence of a collision between the brig and the schooner Virginia, occasioned by the fault of those having the Emily in charge. Mr. Justice Curtis, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The loss was the existence of a lien on the vessel insured, securing a valid claim for damages, and the consequent diminution of the value of that vessel. In other words, the owners of the Virginia obtained a lien on the vessel insured, as a security for the payment of damages done to them for a maritime tort, whereby their property was injured." And see Harmer v. Bell, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 72. Also The New World v. King, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 469, where the vessel was made liable in Spain to a passenger injured by an explosion of a boiler through the negligence of the engineer.

Mr. Justice Nelson did not, therefore, necessarily consider the question of preference; and the case of The Triumph [supra] can not be regarded as conclusive authority binding the judgment of this court. It nevertheless demands that grave and respectful consideration which is always due to the decisions of the very learned and able judge of the southern district. Such decisions, when not opposed by decisions in other districts, or in the English courts of admiralty, I shall certainly deem it my duty to follow, until entirely convinced that they are inconsistent with well established principles; but the decisions hereafter alluded to, appear to me to authorize the adoption in the present case, of such rule as shall after mature deliberation, appear to be best sustained by authority, and by the principles of equity and commercial policy established and acted upon in the admiralty courts. It is understood that my learned predecessor uniformly adopted a different rule from that declared in the case of The Triumph, [supra,] and that, in cases of deficiency of proceeds, he ordered debts of the same class to be paid pro rata, without regard (so far as the clerk of the court can now recollect,) to the time when suits, pending at the same time, were commenced.³ In the cases of The Paragon, [Case No. 10,708,] and The Phoebe, [Case No. 11,065,] the very learned judge in the Maine district intimated that maritime liens of the same rank of privilege should be paid concurrently, without regard to the time the several claimants commenced their proceedings; and no case has been referred to in which the case of The Triumph [supra] has been followed by other judges of the district courts. The questions in this case can not therefore be regarded as settled by the cases cited, and they must be determined upon authority and principle, giving due weight and consideration to each. In examining the authorities, it has been my object to discover the principles upon which the several decisions were made, and, if possible, to extract from them some general rule decisive of the rights of the parties now before me.

It is first to be observed, that the parties opposing the libellant's petition had instituted their proceedings before the final decree in his favor. If it had been otherwise, they would be postponed to the libellant and excluded from a participation in the distribution; for the reason that the creditor who obtains his final decree, before other creditors having co-ordinate or equal claims have brought their actions, is entitled to be paid his debt in preference to those who do not assert their claims until after the entry of such final decree. This rule prevails both at law and in equity, as well as in the admiralty courts. The Saracen, 2 W. Rob. [Adm.] 451; 16 Law Rep. May, 1853, pp. 1, 2. In the courts of admiralty this would seem to result from the course of their practice and the peculiar nature of their proceedings. A ship is arrested at the suit of the party first proceeding against it, and the proceeding is in rem, against the ship itself, and against all persons having or claiming any right or interest therein. Hence all persons have a right to intervene for their interests, and the suit is, in substance and effect, against such persons, as much as though they were specially named as defendants. They are bound by the proceedings and decree; and by a sale of the res, under such proceedings, their rights therein are effectually extinguished. By their failure to intervene for the protection of their own interests, they tacitly assent to a decree which establishes the right of the libellant to enforce his lien upon the property seized, and effectually appropriates it to the payment of his claim. The case of The Triumph, [supra.] perhaps, proceeded upon this principle; and if the final decrees there referred to were successively obtained, each before the proceedings next commenced were instituted, the decision would be consistent with the rules of preference, on account of the priority of proceeding, which this court considers as established. In case of a final decree, in favor of one creditor, before another having an equal paramount claim commences proceedings or intervenes for the protection of his interest, such may be opened, on sufficient cause shown, for the purpose of allowing the apparently tardy creditor to assert his claim. The intervention of a creditor for the purpose of obtaining payment of his claim concurrently with, or in exclusion of, that of the libellant, is in the nature of a defence to the adverse claim of the libellant; and the same circumstances, which would induce the court to excuse a default and open a decree to let in a defence, will ordinarily induce it to open a decree for the purpose of allowing a creditor whose right would be barred by such decree, to appear and establish the right claimed. This will prevent the occurrence of gross injustice by reason of the application of a rule which favors a diligent creditor, and which courts of admiralty, from their peculiar practice and proceedings, must necessarily adopt. If no preference is obtained by the actual making of a decree. I am inclined to think that maritime liens of the same class, rank or privilege, existing upon a ship sold under the order of a court of admiralty, should, as a general rule, be paid out of the proceeds of such ship in the inverse order of the dates of their creation. The practical application of this general rule, to particular cases, may not be free from difficulty, and the rule itself must be subject to exceptions; but, in my judgment, it ought never to be departed from, except for cogent reasons. And it is believed that the principle of this rule will be found to be the basis upon which numerous decisions, both in this country and England, must rest. The adoption of such general rule is not inconsistent with that difference in rank and the classification of maritime liens, which have been recognized in the admiralty courts; and indeed the recognition of different classes of maritime liens is necessary to its just and successful operation.

Seamen's wages have almost uniformly been deemed to constitute a peculiar class, and claims for seamen's wages have been preferred to most other claims in all cases where there had been no unreasonable delay in instituting proceedings for their recovery. As between themselves, the wages of seamen for the last voyage have been preferred to those due for prior voyages of the same ship, and, it is believed, upon the general principle before referred to. In some cases, other claims, such as claims in causes of collision, and salvage, and bottomry claims, have been preferred to seamen's wages; but these cases proceeded upon the same general principle, the preferred claims having accrued subsequent to the claims for wages. Another, and perhaps the most numerous and important, class of maritime liens, are those which grow out of the necessities of the ship and the hazards of navigation. This class embraces the claims of salvors, bottomry-bond holders, material-men, and parties entitled to damages occasioned by collision. Pilotage, towage and wharfage, should also be included. For obvious reasons, the reports of the English admiralty do not afford any light in respect to the claims of material-men, and the order of their payment; but, in respect to the other claims of the character just alluded to, several reported cases may be found in the English, as well as in the American reports. It is, perhaps, not too much to say, that the reported decisions have not satisfactorily established any fixed rule inconsistent with, if they are not sufficient to sustain, the general rule under consideration. Before advertent to these decisions, it may be useful to refer to the reason and policy by which the maritime liens belonging to this class are upheld, and which favor the adoption of the rule proposed. And first, in respect to those which arise ex contractu.

By the general maritime law, these liens exist only where the credit was given to the ship, either alone, or in connection with her master, or owners, or both. If it appear that the credit was given to the master and owners, or either, exclusively, the ship is not liable. Whenever the lien attaches, credit is given to the ship, and this must necessarily be to the ship as she stands, for the credit is given in a foreign port, where the creditor can not ascertain whether any, and, if any, what, maritime liens are existing against her. Hence, where the necessity which upholds the lien is established, the lien created when the credit is obtained should bind all the interests which centre in the ship; to the preservation and success of which the credit is essential. These liens rest upon the necessities of the ship, and their creation is required to secure alike the interests of the owners, and those having prior maritime liens upon the vessel. Neither the bottomry-bond holder nor the material-man can enforce his claim without averring this necessity, and proving it, if it be denied by the other parties in interest. These liens, when large, are generally created in cases of accident or distress, and when the creation of such lien in favor of the material-men or bottomry-bond holders affords the only means of saving the ship from sacrifice, and enabling it to earn its freight; thereby preserving for the benefit of all, the property to which all must look for payment, according to their respective rights. Suppose a vessel on a voyage from Boston to Vera Cruz and back, should necessarily subject herself to liens of material-men, or take up money on bottomry, in the latter port, and, on her return voyage, should suffer damage in a storm, and find it necessary to subject herself to similar liens in Charleston, and again, in consequence of further accidents, at Norfolk and New-York: Is it not clear, (the necessity being conceded,) that these liens ought to have preference in the inverse order of their creation? and suppose that important salvage services were afterwards rendered her, ought not the salvage compensation to be paid in preference to the prior claims?

The maritime lien is founded in principles of international and commercial policy, and it is allowed for the purpose of giving credit to the ship, to enable the master to obtain, in a foreign port, the funds necessary to the safe and successful prosecution of his voyage, whenever those funds can not be obtained on the credit of the master and owners. It is therefore important that these questions of preference should be so settled as to maintain and secure this credit. The liens thus created are generally discharged by the earned freight, at the completion of the voyage; by freight which would, in very many instances, be wholly lost, and the ship itself sacrificed, if the necessary credit could not be obtained whenever the necessity for such credit might arise. If the last lien created under such necessity has a preference over every prior lien, except for seamen's wages, and if those, with the small claims, such as for pilotage, and towage, subsequently accruing, are all that are likely to take preference, the credit can generally be obtained; for the security will, in ordinary cases, be abundant, if the lien be enforced within a reasonable time after the voyage is completed. And this rule, while it will enable the ship to obtain the necessary credit, when in distress, without a stipulation for a ruinous premium, will also tend to prevent unreasonable delays in enforcing maritime liens, and their consequent unreasonable accumulation; and will, in most, if not all respects, best promote the interests of commerce. This rule has long been established between different bottomry-bond holders, and there is little substantial difference between the cases of material-men and lenders on bottomry. The latter, it is true, stand upon an express hypothecation, while the former rely on the implied hypothecation of the maritime law. But their claims are of equal validity, and should be subject to the same general rules of priority and preference, unless some other and more cogent reason to the contrary can be found. The material-man retains, and relies upon, the personal liability of the master and owners, while the bottomry-bond holder does not: The latter puts his money at hazard, and the payment of his debt is made to depend upon the safe arrival of the ship; but for each of these disadvantages, and the risk he assumes, he is allowed to reserve a fair and full equivalent in the marine interest for which he always stipulates. For this reason, the material-man, who secures to himself only common interest, and requires no extraordinary premium for the less but not inconsiderable risk which he necessarily runs, should, when the necessity which supports his claim is fully established, be placed upon the same footing, and entitled to equal equities, with the lender upon bottomry. Indeed, the money raised by bottomry is not unfrequently paid to the material-man, and it would be difficult to offer any substantial reason why the mechanic, or small dealer, who supplies labor and materials, should not be equally favored with the capitalist, or wealthy merchant, who lends money with a clear knowledge of the risk he assumes, and secures to himself an ample interest for his money, and a satisfactory premium for the hazard to which it is subjected. Neither of these differences, nor any others that, at present, occur to me, are of such a character as to require that there should be, so far as the question of preference is concerned, any substantial distinction made between the claims of material-men and lenders upon bottomry.

The privilege of a successful suitor in a case of damage by collision, rests upon other grounds. "It is given to the creditor because the law favors him over others for having suffered a wrong—a loss imposed by the delictum of others—the master and crew of the vessel in fault. The damage, when recovered, operates not only as a civil indemnification, but as a quasi penalty against the wrong-doer; and it is for the public weal that the penalty shall always be enforced, so that such wrong may not, by passing unredressed, incite others to a similar negligence in navigation."—16 Law Rep. 6. The creditor in damage has no option, no caution to exercise; the creditor on mortgage or bottomry, or whose claim is for materials furnished, has. He may consider all possible risks, and give credit or not, as he may think most advisable for his interest. He has an alternative; the suitor in damage has none.—The Aline, 1 W. Rob. [Adm.] 118. These, and other considerations founded in justice and a wise commercial policy, are sufficient to give to the successful suitor, in a cause of collision and damage, a lien of as high a rank as that conceded to lenders on bottomry; and the English admiralty has uniformly placed such suitor in at least as favorable a position as that occupied by the bottomry creditor. The claims of the libellants in the collision cases will therefore be considered as of equal rank with those of material-men, and the general rule of preference, before stated, will be adopted, as just in principle, as required by considerations of commercial policy, and as the best sustained by authority. Not having had leisure to digest and arrange the authorities which sanction the adoption of this general rule, and which give a priority to seamen's wages, I shall refer to but a portion of the cases, and shall not attempt their orderly arrangement. Seamen's wages are preferred to most other claims, in all courts of admiralty. They are hard-earned, and liable to many contingencies; and few claims are more highly favored, or more carefully and zealously protected by law. The sailor's claim is a sacred lien; and as long as a single plank of the ship remains, he is entitled, as against all other persons, to the proceeds, as a security for his wages; for by his labor the common pledge for all the debts is preserved. His demand for wages is preferred to all other demands, for the same reason that the last bottomry-bond is preferred to one of prior date. 3 Kent, Comm. 196, 197; Blaine v. The Charles Carter, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 328, 332; The Virgin, 3 Pet. [33 U. S.] 533, 553; Pitman v. Hooper, [Case No. 11,185;] The Madonna D'Ibra, 1 Dod. 37; The Sidney Cove, 2 Dod. 13.

Numerous cases have established the principle, that the last bottomry bond is entitled to priority over previous ones, as well as over prior mortgages; and such is the rule as universally applied in this country and in England. 3 Kent, Comm. 197; The Rhadamanthe, 1 Dod. 201; The Betsey, Id. 239; The Sidney Cove, 2 Dod. 1; The Eliza, 3 Hagg. [Adm.] 87; The Constanca, 4 Notes of Cas. 285. In the case of The Jerusalem, [Case No. 7,294,] it was held by Judge Story, that a sum due for repairs made subsequent to the execution of a bottomry bond, should be paid in preference to the claim of the bond-holder, because the repairs were necessary to the security of the ship, and increased her value. And he declared that the case was analogous to that of a second bottomry-bond, or the lien of seamen's wages, which had always been held to have a priority of claim, though posterior in time to the first bottomry-bond.* In the case of The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, Mr. Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, that certain questions arising in that case were "all solved by a reference to the nature, origin and objects of maritime contracts. The precedence of forfeiture has never been carried further than to overreach common law contracts entered into by the owner; and it would be unreasonable to extend them further. The whole object of giving admiralty process and priority of payment to privileged creditors, is to furnish wings and legs to the forfeited hull to get back, for the benefit of all concerned; that is, to complete her voyage. There are two considerations that fully illustrate this position. It is not in the power of any one but the ship-master—not the owner himself—to give these implied liens on the vessel; and in every case the last lien will supersede the preceding. The last bottomry-bond will ride over all that precede it; and an abandonment to a salvor will supersede every prior claim." In that case the court decided, "That the fair claims of seamen, and subsequent material-men," were not overreached by the previous forfeiture of the vessel, in consequence of a violation of the laws of congress relating to the slave trade; and it is presumed that the whole court concurred in the above dictum of Mr. Justice Johnson. In the case of The Paragon, ubi supra, Judge Ware said: "Among privileged debts against a vessel, after the expenses of justice necessary to procure a condemnation and sale, and such charges as accrue for the preservation of the vessel, after she is brought into port, (1 Valin, Comm. 362; Code de Commerce, 191,) the wages of the crew hold the first rank, and are to be first paid. And so sacred is this privilege held, that the old ordinances say, that the savings of the wreck, to the last nail, are pledged for their payment. Consulat de la Mer. c. 138; Cleirac sur Jugemens d'Oleron, Arat. 8, note 31." And this preference is allowed the seamen for their wages, independently of the commercial policy of rewarding their exertions in saving the ship, and thus giving them an interest in its preservation. The priority of their privilege stands upon a general principle, affecting all privileged debts, that is, that among these creditors, he shall be preferred who has contributed most immediately to the preservation of the thing. 2 Valin, Comm. 12, liv. 3, tit. 5, art. 10. It is upon this principle that the last bottomry-bond is preferred to those of older date, and that repairs and supplies furnished a vessel in her last voyage take precedence of those furnished in a prior voyage, and that the wages of the crew are preferred to all other claims, because it is by their labors that the common pledge of all these debts has been preserved and brought to a place of safety. To all the creditors they may say, "salvam fecimus totius pignoris causam." The French law (Ordonnance de la Marine, liv. 1, tit. 14, art. 16; Code de Commerce, 191) confines the priority of the seamen for their wages to those due for the last voyage, in conformity with the general rule applicable to privileged debts, that the last services which contribute to the preservation of the thing shall be first paid.⁵

The fact that Judge Ware said in the same case, "When all the debts hold the same rank of privilege, if the property is not sufficient to fully pay all, the rule is, that the creditors shall be paid concurrently, each in proportion to the amount of his demand," and also intimated in the case of The Phoebe, [Case No. 11,065.] that liens on the ship must be paid, "not in exclusion, but in concurrence with other liens, standing in the same degree of privilege," has not been overlooked, but considering the facts of those cases, and the language of the learned judge in the case of The Paragon, as first above quoted, it seems to be entirely clear that not only the character of the liens but the dates at which they attached, were, in the opinion of Judge Ware, to be taken into consideration in determining the order of preference, or "degree of privilege," of the respective claimants. In the case of The Paragon,

[supra,] the claims were three in number—two under bills of lading for the same voyage, and one for seamen's wages. The last was of course preferred, and the other two should, under the principles sought to be established in this case, have been paid concurrently, as directed by Judge Ware. The report shows that the different claimants in that case were not and could not have been held to be entitled to be paid concurrently, on the ground that their suits were simultaneously commenced.

In the case of The Phoebe, [supra,] the learned judge was speaking of a claim for wharfage, accruing while the vessel was under arrest; and this claim, as one of the expenses of the legal proceedings, should, of course, have been paid concurrently with the other expenses of such proceedings. It is also proper to remark in this connection, that the decisions of my learned predecessor, Judge Conkling, to which reference has already been made, may have been in cases where seamen were claiming wages for the same voyage; where materialmen had simultaneously given credit to the vessel, in furnishing materials for the same voyage or season; or where all the parties interested in the question of preference claimed under bills of lading for the same voyage. The cases referred to, as they were stated at the bar, may not have been inconsistent with the principles adopted in this case. In the case of The Aline, 1 W. Rob. [Adm.] 111, the successful suitor in the cause of collision and damage, was held to have a preferable claim to be indemnified, as against a mortgage or bondholder, prior to the period when the damage was done; but the court evidently entertained the most decided opinion, that if the repairs had been effected after the collision by a stranger, on the security of a bond of bottomry, the case would have been altogether different.⁶ In the case of The Sabina, 7 Jur. 182, it was held that subsequent salvage took preference of seamen's wages, as but for the salvage, the seamen's lien

would have been lost. In the case of The Exeter, 1 C. Rob. [Adm.] 173, 177, where three several bottomry-bonds had been executed for moneys advanced on the same general invitation for loans on the security of the ship, but one bond bore a date different from that of the others, the late Lord Stowell declared that it appeared upon the evidence that the parties acted in privity and in concert with each other, as the money was advanced on the same general invitation, for the same repairs, in which all were equally interested, and on the same terms; and therefore held that the payments should be pro rata, without any preference. And this was in a case where it appeared that one of the bond-holders had commenced his suit long before the others instituted their proceedings. Indeed, no reference seems to be made, in the English reports, to the date of the commencement of proceedings pending at the same time, as affording a ground for giving to one claim a preference over others of the same class, except in the case of The Saracen, 2 W. Rob. [Adm.] 451. See the first case in 1 Swab. Adm. [The Clara,] where this case of The Saracen is referred to and approved. In that case the second action was entered after the hearing, and on the same day, (the 6th May, 1845,) that the decree was pronounced in favor of the libellant in the first suit; and the two suits were brought to recover the damages sustained by the libellants, in each, in consequence of the same collision. If the two suits had been commenced at the same time, it is clear that the libellants would have been entitled to be paid concurrently; but the court held that the party who had obtained a decree establishing his rights, before the other, having a claim of precisely the same character, and arising at the same time, had entered his action, could not be compelled to surrender the benefit of his decree by sharing it with the less diligent claimant. If the second libel had been filed before the hearing of the first, the court would, doubtless, have directed the two claims to be paid pro rata. The language of Dr. Lushington, in delivering his opinion in that case, appears to warrant that conclusion.⁷ In the case of The Selina, 2 Notes ⁷The decree of the court of admiralty, in the case of The Saracen, by which the libellant in the second suit was denied a participation in the proceeds of sale, was appealed from. The decree was affirmed on the ground that the libellant in the first suit had obtained a preference by the decree pronounced before the second suit was instituted, and without any objection or claim on the part of the libellant in the second suit having been interposed in the first suit. During the hearing on appeal, Lord Campbell remarked: "This appeal must depend upon the question whether the judgment of May 1845, (the decree in the present suit establishing the libellant's right to recover, and referring it to the registrar and merchants to determine the amount of his damages,) was final, the proceeds of the ship still being in court." And again: "There is a judgment that of Cas. 18, Dr. Lushington held that seamen's wages which accrued after the salvage services in that case had been rendered, were entitled to a preference over the claims of the salvors, and that a bottomry-bond holder, where the money was properly taken up, on bottomry, after the salvage services, was entitled to a like preference. In respect to sums due for wages prior to the salvage service, he declared that he entertained some doubt; and yet it is quite clear that the inclination of his mind was strongly in favor of giving a preference to the salvors.⁸ In the case of The Constancia, 4 Notes of Cas. 285, 518, the last dated bottomry-bond was preferred; and two others, bearing the same date, were held to be entitled to be paid pro rata, without regard to the time when the bond holders severally instituted their proceedings. In this case, (page 518,) it appears that seamen's wages, earned both before and after the execution of bottomry-bonds, were preferred over them, and that subsequent towage and pilotage were also paid in preference to the bond holder's lien. In the same case, (4 Notes of Cas. 684,) Dr. Lushington held, that the lien of the bottomry-bond should not be defeated by a lien, prior in point of time, for goods thrown overboard for the safety of the ship. In the case of The Mary Ann, 9 Jur. 94, Dr. Lushington intimated a very decided opinion that seamen's wages on the outward voyage before a bottomry-bond was given, ought not to be preferred to the bond-holder's lien; but he declared that subsequent wages would have a preference. Subsequent salvage, seamen's wages, pilotage and towage, are entitled to a preference over a prior bottomry-bond. The Selina, 2 Notes of Cas. 18; The Favourite 2 C. Rob. [Adm.] 232; The Douthorpe, 2 W. Rob. [Adm.] 79.

An able writer upon the subject of mari-damages are to be paid. Does not that give the party a vested right?" 11 Jur. 255. The case on appeal is also reported in 6 Moore, P. C. p. 56, et seq., and this report shows that the effect of the prior decree, and not of the prior arrest, was the question upon which the case turned. Lord Campbell is reported to have said: "The principle of the common law is to give priority to a party obtaining a judgment." Again: "This appeal really resolves itself into the question whether the interlocutory decree of the 6th May, 1845, was a final decree." And again: "There is a judgment that damages are to be paid. Does not that give the party a vested right? The court below considered the ship and proceeds bound by the decree, the same as the land would be by a judgment at law." In delivering the opinion of the judges who heard the case on appeal, Lord Langdale said: "We are of the opinion that the sentence of the 6th May, 1845, is to be considered as a definitive sentence in favor of the defendants; and that the appellants, whose suit was not commenced till after the sentence was pronounced, are not entitled to participate in the proceeds of the ship in common with the respondents, by whose diligence, and at whose risk and expense, the damage has been pronounced for, the ship condemned, and the proceeds realized." 6 Moore, P. C. 75, 76.

time liens, in the very valuable article published in the Law Reporter, ubi supra, says, that "In liens ex contractu, this preference or right of priority, depends upon the dates at which the liens have attached. For the rule by which that priority is determined, requires that the demand or service for which that privilege is claimed, be posterior in date to other services or liens. The ground of this inversion of rule is just and obvious. In the hazardous trade of the sea, the services performed at the latest hour are the most efficacious in bringing the vessel and her freightage safely to their final destination. Each foregoing incumbrancer, therefore, is actually benefitted by means of the succeeding incumbrance, and the equity of the court of admiralty, in adjudicating cases of conflicting liens of this nature, takes that as the principle of its decisions." This writer states that, in the case of The Chimera, and other cases, seamen's wages were held not to take preference of the damages awarded in a cause of collision and damage, (see the article and cases cited in 16 Law Rep. 5, 9, 10,) but, after an examination of the cases of The Sidney Cove, 2 Dod. 13, The Louisa Bertha, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 665, and our own authorities, I am inclined to think that seamen's wages for the same voyage, and probably for continuous services during the same season upon our lakes, should be preferred to the claims of the suitor in damage; though seamen's wages for a former voyage, or a former season, should not be so preferred. In England it seems to be still undecided, (same article, p. 9,) whether salvage of a vessel subsequently to that vessel's occasioning damage, is absorbed by the latter lien or has preference over it; but I see no reason for doubt upon that question. The last lien should be preferred, whether it attaches by reason of salvage services, or a collision. If a collision-claimant does not enforce his lien until the vessel is wrecked, or in danger of loss, and she is saved by the efforts of salvors, those salvors should certainly have the preferable claim;⁹ and if after salvage services are effected, the vessel causes damage before the salvor's lien is enforced; the right of the salvors, like any other lien or proprietary interest, must be subject to the claims of the injured party.

In short, all parties, except seamen, holding ordinary maritime liens upon a vessel, are, to some extent, treated as though they had a proprietary interest in the ship; and their interests, whatever they may be, are subject to all liens which the necessities of the ship, or a collision caused by the carelessness or misconduct of those in charge, may subsequently impose. It can hardly be necessary to say that the order of preference, now indicated, will be followed only when the liens belong to the same class, and that it is not intended to decide that bottomry-bonds, executed by the owner, or claims under contracts of affreightment, are to be paid in the same order as though they were liens arising from, and founded upon, the necessities of the ship. Nor is it intended to declare that any difference will be made between seamen's wages for the same season of navigation upon the lakes or between the claims of material-men who are concurrently giving credit to a ship, or vessel, in fitting her out for a specific voyage, or in preparing her for business at the commencement of a season of navigation; or who keep, concurrently, open accounts with a vessel during such season of navigation. Their claims may, perhaps, properly be considered as accruing at the same time, and be paid concurrently, without any departure from the general rule we have been considering. For most purposes, a season of navigation, upon the great lakes and their connecting waters, may be assimilated to a voyage, as that term is frequently used in the admiralty reports; and to found distinctions and give preferences upon short inland voyages, occupying from one to ten days each, would, in many cases of seamen's wages, under shipping articles, for the season of navigation, for continuous services, and of several material-men keeping open accounts against a vessel, be impracticable, if not absurd. All these questions are, very likely, sooner or later to be presented for consideration, and the exercise of the admiralty jurisdiction upon our great inland lakes, will require a system of rules and a series of decisions quite different from those of the courts of admiralty sitting upon the seaboard, but consistent with, and founded upon, those great principles of commercial and international policy which have hitherto controlled the decisions of the courts of admiralty of the United States, and of the other commercial countries of the civilized world. It would be unwise to attempt to anticipate and decide these questions, or others of a similar character hereafter to arise; and, judging from the experience of the past, they are likely soon enough to be brought into litigation, and to demand the most careful examination and the most deliberate consideration. The general principle before stated, and its practical application in a case like the present, may be taken as the settled law of this court; but the other questions which have been suggested in the course of this opinion, will be still open to argument, and subject to future consideration, whenever suitors shall deem it for their interest to present and argue them.

⁹ In The Elizabeth and Jane, [Case No. 8,321,] Judge Ware said, in respect to the rights of a salvor of property found deserted: "The thing itself becomes bound to him for salvage, and he may retain it until he obtains satisfaction. This right of possession is necessarily exclusive of that of all other persons, because his interest in the thing takes priority of all other interests."

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—RULES—PILOT'S LIEN
GIVEN BY STATE STATUTE—ENFORCEMENT.

1. The admiralty has jurisdiction to enforce a lien against a vessel given by a state statute in certain cases to a pilot whose services have been tendered and refused.

[Cited in Flanders v. Tripp, Case No. 4,854; The California, Id. 2,312; The Williams, Id. 17,710; The George T. Kemp, Id. 5,341; The Kalmar, Id. 7,601; Joslyn v. Nickerson, 1 Fed. 134; The Alzena, 14 Fed. 175; The Edith Godden, 25 Fed. 511.]

2. The twelfth admiralty rule prescribed by the supreme court, which, as amended, prohibits the district courts from enforcing certain liens created by state statutes, has no application to pilots; for they come under the fourteenth rule.

[Cited in Flanders v. Tripp, Case No. 4,854; The George T. Kemp, Id. 5,341; The Edith Godden, 25 Fed. 511.]

In admiralty.

J. B. Richardson, for libellant.

T. K. Lothrop, for claimant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellant, William R. Lampee, is a branch pilot, duly commissioned and qualified for the port and harbor of Boston. He spoke the brig America outside the line prescribed for that purpose, and offered his services to pilot her in, and was the first pilot that offered; but the master refused to employ him. The brig was inward bound, and was of a size and class presumed by law to require such services. Under these circumstances the vessel is bound, by the laws of Massachusetts, to pay the usual pilotage fee; and the same law gives a lien on the vessel and her appurtenances, for the space of sixty days, "for all legal claims on account of pilotage, either rendered or offered." Stat. 1862, c. 176, schedule, cls. 4, 5, 10. All this is admitted, but the claimants insist that this court has not jurisdiction to enforce the lien. The states have power to regulate pilotage, in the absence of legislation by congress; and a regulation which gives to a duly qualified pilot a fee for services offered and refused is reasonable, and in accordance with the policy and practice of many commercial countries. Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Phila., 12 How. [53 U. S.] 299. A law substantially similar has been in force in this commonwealth from a period earlier than the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and has been often construed and upheld by the courts. It does not impose a penalty, but implies a debt which may be recovered by an action of contract. Com. v. Ricketson, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 412; Hunt v. Mickey, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 346; Winslow v. Prince, 6 Cush. 368; Hunt v. Carlisle, 1 Gray,

257. By the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts of 1836 (chapter 32, § 12.) the master only was liable to make this payment; but by the regulations of the commissioners, under authority and having the force of law, the responsibility of the owner was added: Hunt v. Mickey, supra. In this state of the law Judge Sprague decided that the statute did not contemplate a lien on the vessel, but a mere personal debt, and that he could not supply the defect. The Robert J. Mercer, [Case No. 11,891.] The law has now been changed, and it is highly probable that the change was suggested by this decision. The liability is now attached to the vessel, in terms, without mention of either owner or master. No doubt this language may well be taken to imply a liability of both master and owner; but it certainly is intended to hold the vessel, for it proceeds to give a lien in the words already cited. This brings the case directly within the fourteenth admiralty rule: "In all suits for pilotage, the libellant may proceed against the ship and master, or against the ship, or against the owner alone, or the master alone, in personam." This is a suit for pilotage, that is, for a pilot's fee; not indeed for services actually rendered in piloting a vessel, but for an offer which the law makes the equivalent of such actual service. If the justice of the case required it, the libellant might be permitted to allege that he had piloted the vessel; but it does not, for the contract to pay the pilotage is complete, and conclusively presumed by law from the demand and refusal. If this court has not jurisdiction, the lien cannot be enforced; because the state law provides no process in rem, but leaves the pilot to the remedy which Judge Sprague would have granted, as he says, if the statute then before him had been like the law now in force. And even if the state statute had undertaken to give a remedy, it is very doubtful whether it could have been availed of against this foreign vessel consistently with the constitution of the United States. The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 411.

The cases, People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393; Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 248; Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 132,—are cited as authority for the position that this court can never enforce a lien given by a state statute. [If this were so, there would seem to be no jurisdiction anywhere to enforce this valid and reasonable regulation.]² But these cases, and others like them, have been fully and carefully explained as announcing only a rule of practice in the matter of repairs and supplies to domestic vessels, and not a general principle of jurisdiction; and, accordingly, a libel brought to enforce such a lien was upheld after the twelfth admiralty rule had been changed, on the ground that the libel was filed before that time. Of course that decision settles the right of a state to create a maritime lien, and of the admiralty court to enforce it, in proper cases; and vindicates the uniform action of the district courts from the foundation of the government: The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 522. Whether the supreme court under its power to make rules, can lawfully oust the jurisdiction of the district courts in a case which is confessedly maritime, does not appear to have been very much considered by the court, and might be worthy of argument here after. Again: it has never been decided that, in the case of a contract [confessedly maritime and] which by the general maritime law would give rise to a lien, the remedy in admiralty would be taken away by the mere fact, that the duration and extent of the lien may have been lawfully regulated by state legislation. Such is the present case. The general maritime law, recognized in the fourteenth admiralty rule, gives pilots a lien on the ship; the state has the right to regulate the subject-matter, and declares that a pilotage contract is complete when a due demand has been made and rejected: can there be a doubt that the pilot thereupon has a lien upon the ship, by the general maritime law, to enforce this valid contract? If so, he surely does not lose it, because the state tries to help him to it. If he does, then he must equally lose his lien for pilotage actually performed; for they stand on the same foundation, and are given by the same clause of the statute. My opinion therefore is, that, as this case comes within the fourteenth rule, and not the twelfth, this court has jurisdiction to enforce a state lien; and if this were not so, that a lien is implied or results from a valid contract for pilotage, unless, as in the case before Judge Sprague, the law expressly or by implication denies it. Taken either way, there is a lien which gives the right to proceed here against the vessel.

INSURANCE—CONDITION OF POLICY—TITLE OF POLICY HOLDER TO ASSURED PREMISES—EQUITABLE TITLE.

[At law. Action of assumpsit by the American Basket Company against the Farmville Insurance Company, pursuant to the Code of Virginia, on a policy of fire insurance, claiming $1,750 damages. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.]

Plaintiffs are a corporation of the state of Connecticut. The defendants are a corporation of Virginia. The property insured and burnt was in the state of Delaware, at a place called Milford. Myers was a regular insurance agent in the state of Delaware, resident in Delaware City, and in this matter was the agent of the defendants. Williams was a resident of Milford, and a solicitor of insurance business for Myers. The property was insured through the agency of Myers; and the "application" of plaintiffs for insurance, which was signed by an officer of the plaintiffs, was a printed form of questions and answers, in which the answers were written in the hand writing of Williams. Evidence was given by the plaintiffs tending to prove that full explanations of the condition of the title of the property at or before the time when the application was written out were given. It was proved that the property was bought and paid for in full by the plaintiffs, and that they were in undisputed possession and use of it. But the record-title was in Orrin E. North, an officer of the plaintiff company, in consequence of a law of Delaware which forbade a foreign corporation from holding real estate in that commonwealth. In the application, in the answer to the question, "In whose name is the title to the property" insured? it was stated, in the handwriting of Williams, it was "in the name of the American Basket Company." In the "proof of loss," made out after the fire, and signed by an officer of the plaintiffs, in answer to the question, "Did the building stand upon leased premises?" the answer, written in Myer's handwriting, was "No—held in fee." The policy contained a clause of forfeiture in the event of false swearing in the proof of loss; another clause requiring a full disclosure of the ownership in the application; and the "entire, unconditional and sole ownership in the property insured for the use and benefit of the assured." It contained no clause of forfeiture by future incumbrances; but did contain a provision voiding the policy if "any change should take place in the title or possession of the property by voluntary transfer" or other specified methods. During the period of insurance, and some four months thereafter, the plaintiffs caused Mr. North to make a deed of mortgage of the property for securing a considerable debt. The plaintiffs' witnesses testified to the solvency of their company. These were the principal facts of the case, and upon them the counsel on both sides asked instructions. The court modified and condensed these, and gave a preliminary opinion as follows.

Judge Meredith and John A. Coke, for plaintiffs.

W. W. Henry, P. W. McKinney, and J. P. Fitzgerald, for defendant.

HUGHES, District Judge. Policies of insurance, like all other written contracts, must be construed and enforced according to their terms. If they convey a plain, practical meaning, that meaning must be carried into effect. Policies of insurance differ somewhat from other contracts, however, in respect to the rules of construction to be applied to them. They are unipartite. They are in the form of receipts from insurers to the insured, embodying covenants to compensate for losses described. They are signed by the insurer only. In general the insured never sees the policy until after he contracts and pays his premium, and he then most frequently receives it from a distance when it is too late for him to obtain explanations or modifications of the policy sent him. The policy, too, is generally filled with conditions inserted by persons skilled in the learning of the insurance law and acting in the exclusive interest of the insurance company. Out of these circumstances the principle has grown up in the courts that these policies must be construed liberally in respect to the persons insured, and strictly with respect to the insurance company. See Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 232.

Another rule of the law in regard to fire insurances is to discourage wager policies; that is to say, policies taken by persons who have no interest in the property insured, and in which such persons merely bet that the property will not be burned. Such insurances are contrary to public policy and promote fires. The law will, therefore, give force to all provisions in policies of fire insurance which require that the person who takes out the policy shall have an interest in the property, and shall disclose that interest with precision in his "application" for insurance. That is the purpose of the law, and is the object sought to be subserved by the insertion of clauses voiding them in cases where deception is practiced in regard to the real ownership of the property insured; and terminating them whenever, during the period of insurance, the person holding a policy ceases to own the property, and it becomes thereby a wager policy. Therefore, clauses in policies requiring a truthful statement of the interest of the applicant for insurance, and forbidding changes of ownership during the period of insurance, are to be construed not technically to the prejudice of the policy-holder, but rationally and fairly to protect the insurance company from the extraordinary risks, and from the certain and numerous losses which would fall upon them from insurance of property not actually owned by the persons insured.

In the case under trial there are two questions, which have formed the subject of contention between counsel, and upon which instructions are asked of the court.

I. The first is, whether plaintiffs' right to recover is defeated by the fact that the record-title could not be held by the plaintiffs under the laws of Delaware, and was therefore vested in Mr. Orrin E. North, if not made known to the defendant or its agent at the time of the insurance of the policy, considered in connection with the statement in the application for insurance that the title was "in the name of" the plaintiffs. I am of opinion that it is not defeated by that fact if the plaintiffs were the "entire, unqualified, and sole owners" of the property insured "for their own use and benefit." I do not think that the fact of the record-title being in Mr. North of itself defeats their right to recover, unless their statement in the application was made to deceive and mislead the insurance company. The evil sought to be avoided by those provisions of the policy requiring a correct statement of the plaintiffs' interest in the property was the insurance of property not owned by the holder of the policy, the destruction of which would not cause a loss to that holder equal to the value of the property destroyed. If the plaintiffs in the case at bar were the owners of the entire beneficial interest in the property at the taking out of the policy, and would have been losers to the full extent of its value if it had been destroyed, then this ownership fulfilled every purpose which the provisions of the policy in regard to a disclosure of interest were designed to secure, and, in the absence of fraud or fraudulent misrepresentation, a merely technical difference in the title, set out in the application, ought not in equity and good conscience to defeat the plaintiffs, if they are otherwise entitled to recover. The question for the jury in this point is, therefore, whether the statement in the "application" for insurance that the title was in the "name of the American Basket Company" misled the defendant or its agent, and was intended to do so. If they think not, it is my opinion that the fact of the record-title being in Mr. North does not of itself defeat the action, if the plaintiffs are otherwise entitled to recover. In this same connection I will consider the statement on oath in regard to the title made in the "proof of loss." The same rule of law as to the real ownership of insured property, which has been explained, applies here. If the person holding the policy swears that he was owner of property destroyed by fire, of which he was not in fact the full and sole beneficial owner, the fact that he was not owner proves that his policy, contrary to its carefully-expressed provisions, had been a wager policy, and defeats his right to recover; and this the more justly because he has practiced a fraud, and has added perjury to his fraud. It is for the jury to say from their view of the evidence whether the full beneficial ownership of the property destroyed in the case on trial was or was not in the plaintiffs; whether or not this ownership had been divested at the time of the fire by the mortgage deed of 18th of September, 1876, or by any other transfer, so as to render the statement on oath made by the plaintiffs' agent in the "proof of loss" that they were, such fraud or false swearing as is contemplated by the clause in the policy relating to that subject. Unless they believe that such fraud was practiced and such false swearing committed, the plaintiffs' action is not defeated by the statement in regard to the ownership and title in the proof of loss.

II. The second question of contest is in regard to the effect of the mortgage executed on the insured property by the plaintiffs on the 18th of September, 1876. The authorities on the subject are conflicting in cases where the policy does not provide against future incumbrances, the supreme courts of some of the states deciding that the execution of a mortgage deed of itself violates the provisions usually found in insurance policies as to transfer and alienation of property during the period of insurance, and those of other states deciding that it is only after divestiture of title and ownership by foreclosure or otherwise that such result occurs. I am not aware of any decision of the court of appeals of Delaware or Virginia, or indeed of the supreme court of the United States, determining the law of this subject, and must act in the case at bar upon my own views of the law and equity of the case. And it seems to me that the provision in the policy now sued upon, forbidding any change in the title or possession of the insured property during the period of insurance, should be construed with reference to the cardinal object sought to be subserved in all provisions designed to prevent persons not having an interest and ownership in property from taking out policies, and to prevent insured persons who cease to have an interest and ownership in property from continuing to hold such policies. So that the inquiry for the jury is whether or not the mortgage of September, 1876, operated to deprive the plaintiffs of their ownership in the insured property, so that, if it was burnt, their loss would be to the extent of the full value of the property destroyed. If, therefore, a person who is insolvent, and so much so as to be hopeless of reinstating his affairs, mortgages his property and thereby ceases to have any real interest in it as owner, so that his loss, if it is burnt, would be merely nominal; or if, after mortgaging, he makes default, and a foreclosure and divestiture of his title and beneficial interest ensues, there is, in either case, such a change in the ownership as renders the policy as to him a wager policy, and as defeats his right to recover in the event of fire. But if the mortgagor remains solvent and thereby remains the sole beneficial owner of the insured property, and would sustain a loss, in the event of fire, to the full extent of the value of the property destroyed, then such a mortgage does not work such a change in the "title or possession" of the property insured as to defeat the plaintiffs' action, if they are otherwise entitled to recover. In accordance with these views I have modified the instructions for the jury respectively asked for by counsel in the cause, and embodied them as follows:

I. If the plaintiffs were the entire, unconditional, and sole owners of the property insured, for their own benefit, and had undisputed possession of it at the date of the policy, then the fact that the record-title was in another person does not defeat their right to recover in this action, unless they concealed the condition of the record-title from the defendant company and its agents, and misled them by a contrary statement in their application for insurance, or unless they sought to deceive and mislead them in regard to the record-title and ownership at the time of the fire by false swearing in their proof of loss.

II. The execution of a mortgage by the plaintiffs, after taking out the policy of insurance, did not defeat their right to recover in this action, unless the mortgage, by reason of their insolvency or otherwise, wrought such a change in their ownership or interest in the property that their loss at any time before the fire would have been, or at the time of the fire was, less than the full value of the property destroyed.

The jury, after a short absence, brought in a verdict for the plaintiffs, with damages at $1,750 and interest.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOC. v. HOLMAN et al.
VAN NORMAN v. SAME.

[2 N. W. (O. S.) 245; 5 Reporter, 645.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. March, 1878.

FORECLOSURE.

Where a last will and testament provided that the "proceeds" of a certain mortgage should go to certain legatees named, and, prior to testator's death, such mortgage was foreclosed, and the lands purchased at the foreclosure sale for the benefit of, and the title thereto vested in, such testator: Held, that the fact of foreclosure was immaterial, and the proceeds of such mortgage existing at the time of the testator's death in the shape of lands that could be identified as such proceeds, would pass by the terms of the will.

In equity. These suits were brought to enforce the provisions of a will executed by Seth Holman, of Mass., November 16, 1860, by which he made the following bequest: "Eighthly. I bequeath and devise to the American Bible Society * * * one half of the proceeds of a mortgage given by Carlos Wilcox, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, to be disposed of by my executors to their best judgment. Ninthly. I bequeath and devise to the American Foreign Christian Union * * * one half of the proceeds of a mortgage given by Carlos Wilcox, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, to be disposed of by my executors to the best of their judgment." The complainant, Van Norman, is one of many persons who form a voluntary association under the laws of New York, called the "American Foreign Christian Union," and sued as well for his associates as himself. The "American Bible Society" is a charitable corporation, with power to take real and personal property by gift or otherwise. The Wilcox mortgage had been foreclosed by an agent at the time of the testator's death, and the lands covered by it had been purchased for his benefit, and a deed, conveying the same free from the equity of redemption, was executed by the sheriff in accordance with the laws of Minnesota, September 26, 1860. The testator died shortly after the execution of his will. It is urged on the part of the defendants, that by the foreclosure proceedings the mortgage was cancelled, and there being nothing upon which the bequests could operate, they were defeated.

Lochren, McNair & Gilfillan, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge. The intention of the testator must control in the construction of this will, and if possible be ascertained from the instrument itself. The bequests or legacies are specific, and in terms one half of the proceeds of the Wilcox mortgage was bequeathed to each legatee. The defence is that Holman, at the time of his death, having the title in fee to the lands by foreclosure, and there being no mortgage out of which "proceeds" could be realized, the bequests fail. The testator undoubtedly intended to make valid bequests, available for the purposes designated, and I am not required to give a narrow construction to the word "proceeds," when a fair and reasonable acceptance of the word used would sustain the bequests. These are charities, and should be upheld if possible; and it is not a strained interpretation to make the word "proceeds" comprehend and embrace the avails of the mortgage in whatever form they existed at the time of the testator's death; in fact, such was the intention as gathered from the language of the will. The testator did not give a sum of money and require the payment to be made out of the mortgage, nor did he bequeath a sum of money equal to the amount due upon the mortgage, but he gave the "proceeds" of the mortgage specifically, and whether a foreclosure had taken place or not is immaterial, as the "proceeds" of the mortgage existed at the testator's death and could be identified. BONDS—SIGNING ON CONDITION—FRAUD AFFECTING NOTE FOR INDEBTEDNESS ON BOND.

[1. Where the obligors upon a bond securing payment of debts of third parties sign a note for the amount due thereon, as a consideration for an extension of time for payment, they can avail themselves of any defense, as against the payee of the note and obligee on the bond which would defeat a recovery upon the bond.]

[2. The fact that two obligors signed the bond at the request of a third, and on condition that it should not bind them unless he obtained certain other signatures, which he failed to do, is a defense if the obligee knew of the condition, but not otherwise.]

[3. Where two obligors sign and deliver a bond to the general agent of the obligee, with a condition that it should not bind them unless certain other signatures are obtained, which is not done, they are not liable on the bond, nor on a note which they are induced to sign by a statement of the agent that it covers an indebtedness for which they are liable on the bond.]

[4. The fact that they were induced to sign the note by a statement that another person, who could not read nor write, had authorized his signature, and that his alleged signature was forged, is not a defense to an action on the note, for they should have ascertained whether his signature was properly on the note.]

At law. The facts sufficiently appear in the charge of the judge.

Wilson & Taylor and S. L. Campbell, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge. Charge to jury. This action is brought upon a promissory note for $770.68, dated March 23, 1876. Five defendants have interposed several defenses. One defendant, Murray, is in default, and submits to a judgment. Fraud and want of consideration are alleged by all the defendants answering, except Mullane, who claims the note never was signed by him, or by one authorized by him to do so.

The undisputed facts are briefly these: J. M. Murray had the exclusive right within certain territorial limits to sell sewing machines manufactured by plaintiff; and being supplied on credit, he was required to execute a bond, with good and sufficient sureties, for the payment of notes given on the purchase of the same. He delivered to plaintiff a bond purporting to have been executed March 17, 1875, by himself and defendants Byrnes and Dailey; and another on September 25, 1875, executed by himself and Harlan, Smith and Gregg. Some time in March, 1876, Murray was indebted to plaintiff on several notes which had matured, and was requested to pay, or suit would be commenced upon the bonds. An arrangement was made whereby the plaintiff agreed to extend the time for the payment of the amount due in case Murray would give it a note executed by himself and the sureties upon his bonds. There was due at that time $240, for which the sureties upon the bond executed Sept. 25, 1875, were liable, if at all. The sureties upon the first bond, executed March 17, 1875, were responsible for the payment of the whole amount claimed, $770.68, and this was the indebtedness upon which the plaintiff was willing to grant an extension. In view of these facts, the defendants contesting, with the exception of Mullane, who was not upon either bond, can avail themselves of any defense which would defeat a recovery upon the bonds. If you believe Mullane never authorized his signature to the note, no recovery can be had against him.

Byrnes and Dailey, who signed the bond executed March 17, 1875, claim that they signed it at the request of Murray, and upon the condition that it should not be obligatory upon them unless three additional responsible names should be obtained. This is a good defense if the condition was known to the plaintiff at the time, but if it was only known to Murray, the principal obligor, and the bond, perfect on its face, was accepted without knowledge of that condition, these defendants, Byrnes and Dailey, cannot say that they did not intend to be bound unless the names of three other persons, not on the bond when they signed, should be obtained. [Dair v. U. S.,] 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 1. See, also, article in [10] Alb. Law J. [257,] on liability of sureties. If this defense is not available to defeat a recovery upon the bond, it cannot be urged in this suit, for they were bound by their obligation to pay the amount due the plaintiff from Murray, and the execution of the note gave an extension of time for payment, and was no injury to them.

Smith and Gregg, sureties upon the bond executed Sept. 25, 1875, also allege that the bond they signed is void, for the reason it was executed at the request of Murray, and upon the condition that it should not bind them unless three other responsible sureties should be obtained, and that the plaintiff acquiesced in this condition. It is urged by them as a defense, also, that, when the note was signed, the agent of the plaintiff falsely represented that they were liable on their bond to the full extent of the note, whereas, if the bond could be enforced, the amount of their liability would be only $240, and that they declined to sign unless three responsible names were obtained in addition to the sureties on the bonds. It is conceded that their liability was for that amount only, and that when the note was afterwards presented for their signatures, in compliance with their request, it had the name of Mullane upon it, which the defendant Murray told them he signed by the authority of Mullane. They claim to have been induced to sign it by the fact that Mullane, who was a well-to-do farmer, had authorized his signature, and insist they are not liable if his signature is a forgery.

If you believe it is a forgery, and that Smith and Gregg refused to sign until some other responsible name was secured, but mentioned no person whose signature they required, still, as Mullane could not read or write, and his name appeared to be signed by some other person, they should have ascertained before signing it whether his signature was properly to the note, and are not discharged unless the plaintiff had knowledge of the forgery. And if Smith and Gregg, when they signed the bond, delivered it to the general agent of the plaintiff, and it was not to be considered obligatory until the names of three other persons were secured, then, as only themselves and one other appear to have executed it, the plaintiff cannot recover against them upon the note, for it was given on an indebtedness which the plaintiff's agent stated was covered by their bond.

Harlan urges that he signed the note upon the condition that Gregg and Smith would also sign it. Now, as he was only liable upon his bond to the extent of $240, if you believe a recovery cannot be had against them, the plaintiff cannot hold him, for the reason that his signature was obtained upon the condition known to it, that Smith and Gregg were to share the liability with him.

The jury gave a verdict against all the defendants except Mullane.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—LICENSE "TO USE ONCE ONLY."

1. When the proprietors of a patented article sell it for the purpose of allowing it to be used in the ordinary pursuits of life, and to pass into the market of the country as an ordinary article of commerce, and subject to unrestricted purchase and sale, he waives his right to affix conditions or restrictions to its use and sale, and consents that, after one sale and the payment of one royalty, it shall pass out of the limits of the monopoly. Hawley v. Mitchell, [Case No. 6,250,] distinguished.

The buckles had printed on them the words "licensed for one use only," and on the bill-head was a notice, either to the same effect, and that they were sold and purchased subject to the restriction, or, that the buckles were the property of the complainants, who reserved the right after such use to recover possession of them wherever found: Held, that the purchasers took an unrestricted title to the buckles without any reservation in the vendors, and that the case fell within the principles laid down in Goodyear v. Beverly Rubber Co., [Case No. 5,557,] and Washing-Mach. Co. v. Earle, [Id. 17,219.]

S. A. Duncan, for complainants.

B. F. Thurston, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The complainants are engaged in the manufacture and sale of a patented buckle for use in connection with an iron strap for a tie or fastening to cotton bales. There can be no reasonable doubt that cotton-ties sold by defendants are covered by the patents under which complainants claim. Nor does the evidence in this case leave any reasonable doubt that the buckles sold by the defendants are the identical buckles made and sold by the complainants under their patent. The complainants contend that they sold the buckles under a restriction which limited them to one use, and did not convey an unrestricted title, and that the buckles never passed out of the monopoly of the patent. The facts are that the complainants sold the patented buckles with the words printed on them, "Licensed to use once only," and that up to the season of 1876 on the bill-heads and invoices of all their agents were the words: "The cotton-ties sold by this invoice are licensed to be used only as bailing-ties, and are sold and purchased subject to this restriction." During the season of 1876 the following clause was printed on their bills: "The buckles accompanying these bands are the property of the American Cotton-Tie Company, limited, and are licensed to be used for one season only, the company reserving the right after such use to recover possession of them wherever found." The company clearly had the right, in selling a patented article, to put a restriction on its use or sale, and to convey only a restricted title, or to license only a restricted use, and the purchaser under such a restricted title could not convey a greater or better title than he had himself. The law upon this subject was fully stated in Hawley v. Mitchell, [Case No. 6,250,] and affirmed in the supreme court of the United States. 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 544. But when the proprietor of a patented article sells it for the purpose of allowing it to be used in the ordinary pursuits of life, and to pass into the market of the country as an ordinary article of commerce, and subject to unrestricted purchase and sale, he waives his right to affix conditions or restrictions to its use or sale, and consents that, after one sale and the payment of one royalty, it shall pass out of the limits of the monopoly. If a manufacturer of patented pins, or nails, or wood-screws, or any similar article, were to affix to his invoice of sale a condition limiting them to one use, and sell them in quantities to retail dealers to be sold again, he must know and intend that they are to pass into the commerce of the country and be sold over and over again, and sold only to persons who would not buy anything less than an unrestricted title. Shall the purchaser of a packing-box be treated as an infringer, and as pirating an invention, because he uses again and for another purpose the screws or nails which held the box together, and which he purchased when he purchased the box and its contents? May he not reasonably presume with regard to articles of this description, that pins, and nails, and screws do not go into the market with an incumbrance upon their title or a restriction on their use, and that he is not bound to trace the title to see if it be unrestricted, for the reason that he may well suppose no one would expect to affix a restriction on the use of such articles which would be operative, or, if he could do so, would ever find purchasers of them? The buckles sold by the complainants belong to this class of articles. They are sold for the purpose of being used to confine a bale of cotton, as a nail or screw confines a packing-box. It appears in evidence that when a bale of cotton is sold it is without tare, and consequently the buckle and the strap it confines are sold and resold with the bale of cotton to which they are attached. If the cotton takes fire or is otherwise damaged, and requires to be rebaled, must the owner put the same buckle back on the same bale, or be liable to the penalties of an infringer?

When the cotton bales are opened for use at the factories, the manufacturer who has purchased the ties and buckles with the cotton, having no further use for them, sells them to the junk-dealer. From the junk-dealer the defendants purchase them and repair them and sell them again. The vendor of the patented buckles sells them to be applied to the bales of cotton with the full knowledge that they will be sold and resold as often as the cotton is sold. They impliedly consent to these unrestricted sales. They cannot under such circumstances be fairly considered as retaining the title to the buckles in themselves, or as parting only with such a restricted title as would require each vendor of the cotton to sell it accompanied with a restriction on the title and use of the buckles. The very purpose of the original sale, with the knowledge of the subsequent use and sales necessarily incident, imply a parting with the unrestricted title, and a passing out of the limits of the monopoly of the thing sold, as much as it would if the vendor sold patented thread, nails, or screws, to be used in fastening packing-cases to be sold with the goods packed.

The facts in this case show that the owners of the patent buckle intended and contemplated that the purchasers should buy an unrestricted title, inconsistent with any reservation of title or use in the original vendors. Such a sale does not fall within the principle as stated in Hawley v. Mitchell, [supra,] but clearly falls within the language and principle of the decisions in Goodyear v. Beverly Rubber Co., [Case No. 5,557,] and Washing-Mach. Co. v. Earle, [Id. 17,219.] The case is very different from that of the sale of a machine easily identified, and to which a restriction may easily be attached, or where a license to use only may be sold unaccompanied with any title, or accompanied with a restricted title. But when pins, nails, screws, or buckles are sold, if some of them are sold with a restricted and some with an unrestricted title, there are no means of identification which enable the purchaser, after they have passed into the market and common use, to distinguish the articles licensed or restricted in their use from those absolutely sold. In the case of articles of that description, the patentee may fairly be presumed to have received his royalty when he parted with the possession of the articles and allowed them to go into common and general use. The public should not be vexed with litigation about reserved rights or conditions affixed to the title of such articles, or put upon the investigation of incumbrances or restrictions on the title of nails, screws, buckles or pins, before they can be safely used by a person who has bought them of parties who obtained them of the patentee with the right to sell them in the open market. It is more for the interest of inventors that they should obtain their royalty on such articles when they first put them upon the market, than to make the monopoly odious by the attempt to fix restrictions on the subsequent use. Bill dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, this decree was reversed, with an order that the circuit court enter a decree for plaintiffs for an account of profits and damages. Mr. Justice Blatchford, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A buckle without a band will not confine a bale of cotton. Although the defendants use a second time buckles originally made by those owning the patents, and put by them on the market, they do not use a second time the original bands in the condition in which those bands were originally put forth with such buckles. They use bands made by piecing together several pieces of the old bands. The band, in a condition fit for use with the buckle, is an element in the third claim of the Brodie reissue. That claim is for a combination of the open slot, arranged to allow of the sidewise introduction of the band: the link or buckle with the single rectangular opening arranged so as to hold both ends of the band and the band.

* * * Whatever right the defendants could acquire to the use of the old buckle, they acquired no right to combine it with a substantially new band to make a cotton-bale tie." American Cotton-Tie Co. v. Simmons, 106 U. S. 89, 1 Sup. Ct. 52. In the circuit court, southern district of New York, in action concerning these same patents, it was held that, the defendant having bought the buckles stamped "Licensed to use once only," and with new hoops, sold them as cotton ties, he had infringed the plaintiff's patents. American Cotton-Tie Supply Co. v. Bullard, Case No. 294.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—LICENSE "TO USE ONCE ONLY."

The plaintiff was the owner of patents covering improvements in metallic cotton ties, consisting of buckles and hoops, for compressing bales of cotton. Neither the plaintiff nor any prior owner of the patents had granted any licenses to make buckles or ties, but they had made and sold the ties. The buckles were stamped, "Licensed to use once only," and were sold with invoices declaring that the ties were licensed to be used once only, as baling ties. The defendant bought the buckles so once used, from cotton mills and junk dealers, and put up some with new hoops, and some with pieces of the original hoops pieced together, and sold them as cotton ties: Held, that the defendant had infringed the patents, and ought to be enjoined from further infringement.

[In equity. Bill to restrain the infringement of patents Nos. 23,291, and 31,252.² Preliminary injunction granted.]

S. A. Duncan and J. R. Beckwith, for plaintiff.

C. C. Beaman, Jr. and B. F. Thurston, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case sets forth that the plaintiff is "a joint stock company, duly and legally organized under the laws of the state of Louisiana, and having its principal place of business in New Orleans, in said state." It does not aver that the plaintiff is a corporation or that it is a citizen of the state of Louisiana. It avers that the defendants are citizens of the state of New York. The plaintiff is referred to in some of the affidavits as a corporation, and it is, doubtless, a corporation created by the state of Louisiana. This being so, the bill can be amended, and it must be, to show a capacity in the plaintiff to sue.

The bill is founded on re-issued letters patent No. 5,333, granted to James J. McComb, March 25th, 1873, for an "improvement in cotton bale ties," (the original patent having been granted to George Brodie, March 22d, 1859, and re-issued to him April 27th, 1869, and extended for seven years from March 22d, 1873,) and on letters patent No. 31,252, granted to J. J. McComb, January 29th, 1861, for an "improvement in iron ties for cotton bales," and extended for seven years from January 29th, 1875. The plaintiff is the owner of both of the patents.

The specification of No. 5,333, (called the Brodie patent,) sets forth that the invention is one of "improvements in cotton ties, or metallic bands and their connections, for baling." It says: "My invention relates to the combination with open slot ties of metallic bands having their ends free and held in position by the expansion of the bale. * * * Fig. 6 is a top view of the open slotted link, shown in Figs. 7, 13 and 14. * * * Figs. 6, 7, 13 and 14 show an open slotted link or tie. In Fig. 7 this is shown in connection with pins, and in Figs. 13, 14 and 15 in connection with the band alone, the ends being turned under the link and held in position by the pressure exerted by the expansion of the bale. In the latter mode of use, the slack may be readily taken up by forming the loop in the iron at the moment of making the fastening, and passing the end thus looped through the opening in the side of the link. The band is thus slipped sidewise through the opening into the slot, instead of thrusting it through endwise." The 3d, 4th and 5th claims of the patent are as follows: "3. The combination of an open slot for introducing the band sidewise, with a link having a single rectangular opening for holding both ends of a metallic band, and the band. 4. An open slotted link, when combined with metallic bands, the ends of which are turned under the link and held in position by the expansion of the bale. 5. The method of baling cotton with metallic bands, and of taking up the slack of the band, by bending the same at any desired point into the form of a loop, and passing such loop sidewise, through an open slit, into the slot intended to receive it, and over the bar of the clasp intended to hold it."

The specification of No. 31,252, (called the McComb patent,) sets forth that the invention is "a new and improved mode of fastening iron hoops on cotton bales." It says: "The nature of my invention consists in the use of a peculiarly shaped buckle, as a fastening or tie for the ends of the iron hoops which it is desired to substitute in place of the hemp ropes now made use of in baling cotton, said iron hoops being so much safer in case of fire. * * * The tie or buckle is a piece of wrought iron or other metallic substance, about the eighth of an inch thick, an inch and three-quarters wide, and two inches long, (the size being modified to suit the width of the hoop used,) with an oblong hole or aperture cut or punched through the centre. The diagram No.

1, lettered A, B, C, D, represents the exact size of one of the ties or buckles, with aperture cut to receive a hoop an inch wide. The sides A, B, and D, C, are equal and parallel, as are also the sides B, C, and A, D. The letters M, I, J, K, L, shows the shape of the aperture or hole which is punched or cut through the centre of the plate, the two longer sides, M, I, and K, L, being equal in length to the width of the hoop of the size above mentioned. In the side A, D, is cut a slot, which is indicated on the diagram by the letters E, F, and G, H, the side G, H, of the slot being turned outward the eighth of an inch, to facilitate the insertion of the end of the hoop." The buckle is of this shape:

The hoop and buckle are arranged as follows in use:

The claim is as follows: "Forming a link or tie with an oblong aperture, one end of which is arrow shaped, or, rather, presents two sides of an equilateral triangle, the design of this arrow shaped end being not only to force the hoop, or bend of the hoop, over the slot, which it does with unerring precision when the bale expands, after being released from the press, but also to secure an equal bearing upon the separated parts of the slotted side of the tie."

A patent was granted to Frederick Cook, March 2d, 1853, for an "improvement in metallic ties for cotton bales." This patent was extended for seven years from March 2d, 1872. As extended, it was assigned by Cook to James J. McComb. March 21st, 1872. In June, 1874, McComb assigned the Cook patent and the Brodie patent to a firm called "The American Cotton-Tie Company." In March, 1876, that firm assigned those patents to "The American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited," a corporation, and at the same time that corporation acquired the title to the McComb patent. From that corporation the title to the three patents passed to the plaintiff. Neither McComb, nor any of the subsequent owners of the patents, granted any licenses thereunder to make buckles or ties, but they retained to themselves the monopoly of manufacture, and made the ties and supplied the market with them, to an extent always equal to any demand. The tie mainly sold since March, 1872, by them, has been the "arrow tie" of the McComb patent. The bands have been cut to the length of eleven feet, bent over upon themselves once, and put up in bundles of thirty each, the buckles being strung upon one of the inner bands.

The defendants have used upon the cotton ties, which they have put up or sold, second-hand buckles, which they have bought from cotton mills and from junk dealers, and which were made and disposed of by the plaintiff, or its predecessors, under the Brodie and McComb patents. These buckles have had stamped upon them the words: "Licensed to use once only," and were formerly put upon the market by the plaintiff, or its predecessors, in the usual course of their business, with the following words printed on the bill-heads or invoices which went to the first transferee of the ties: "The cotton ties included in this invoice are licensed to be used once only, as baling ties, and are sold and purchased subject to this restriction," or the words: "Each bundle of cotton ties charged in this invoice consists of 30 bands. The buckles accompanying these bands are the property of The American Cotton-Tie Supply Company, (or, American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited,) and are licensed to be used once only, the company reserving the right, after such use, to recover possession of them wherever found." The first of the above forms of bill-head was used during the years 1873, 1874 and 1875, and the other one during the years 1876 to 1879 inclusive, except that, for a portion of the latter four years, such bill-head used the words, "for one season," in lieu of the word "once."

In this country, cotton is usually sold without tare, that is, the purchaser pays a certain price per pound upon the aggregate weight of the bale, which is made up of the bagging, the ties (bands and buckles) and the material which they confine. In England, cotton is sold with tare, that is, the weight of the ties and bagging is deducted from the aggregate weight of the bale, and the purchaser pays so much per pound for the cotton, net weight, but takes the ties and the bagging with the cotton which they confine.

The ties which the defendants have sold embody the principles of construction which are found in the inventions covered by the 3d, 4th, and 5th claims of the Brodie patent, and in the invention covered by the McComb patent. The defendants' ties, as sold, consist of bands eleven feet in length, put up in bundles, each band accompanied by a buckle. In regard to some of such ties, the buckles being second-hand buckles, the bands are entirely new. In regard to others, the buckles being secondhand buckles, the bands are not, as whole bands, the original bands, bought at second hand, but consist of pieces of such original bands pieced together to make the proper length.

The question presented for consideration is, whether, on the foregoing facts, the defendants may lawfully sell such ties, consisting of such bands and such buckles. This question has been before the courts. In August, 1876, the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, and others, brought a suit in equity, against one Chapman, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, on the Cook, the Brodie and the McComb patents. The defendant had procured second-hand buckles lawfully put into use on cotton bales, under said patents, and had put new bands with them, and sold the combination as ties. It appeared, in that case, that, at the cotton presses at New Orleans, when the bales bound with the plaintiff's ties, consisting of the bands and buckles, were ready to be compressed, the bands and buckles were stripped off from the bales, and thrown on one side in a pile promiscuously with others, and that, when the bales were in the press, they were fastened together by the first ties that might be reached by the pressman out of the pile, no care being taken to use the same ties upon the bale, when compressed, which were so taken off from it. The facts, before mentioned, were before the court, as to the sale of cotton in this country without tare, and as to the stamp on the buckles, and as to the contents of the original bill-heads. The buckle used by Chapman was that of the McComb patent. The case came before Judge Billings, the district judge, on a motion for a preliminary injunction, and he granted the injunction, in November, 1876, after hearing counsel for both parties, and after the defendants' answer and a replication thereto were filed. The decision of the court is embodied in the order for the injunction.³ It sets forth, that the Cook and the McComb patents secure the exclusive right to a cotton tie buckle having an open slot or slit, into which a flat iron band can be inserted sideways, known commonly as the open-slot buckle, and that the third and fourth claims of the Brodie patent secure the exclusive right to an open-slot buckle in combination with a flat band of iron, to be combined for and used as a tie for baling cotton or other compressible and elastic material; that the defendant had made and sold to be used a combination of a flat band of iron in combination with an open-slot buckle; that he had so combined and sold both the open-slot buckle in the exact similitude of the invention secured to the plaintiffs, as well as said open-slotted buckle combined with a flat band of iron, without any license, except such as was averred to have resulted from an alleged sale of said buckles by the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, to other persons than the defendant, whereby it was insisted by the defendant that he acquired the right, by purchase from said third persons, to combine said buckles with flat bands of iron, and sell the same; that the plaintiffs, in the protection of their rights, did not dispose of said buckles in full property, but with a condition that the same should only be used once for the purpose of baling cotton or other compressible material, and that the said condition was known to the defendant, it being stamped, in a permanent manner, on said buckles; that the contract by which said cotton ties and buckles were disposed of for use by the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, contained the same condition and stipulation as was stamped on said buckles; that said license to use said open-slot buckles, and a combination of the same with a flat band of iron, as a cotton tie, had, on the terms on which it was granted by the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, expired and been expended before the same came into the possession of the defendant; and that the sale of the open-slot cotton tie, known in the trade as the arrow tie, and the sale of the said open-slot buckles, in combination with a flat band of iron, to be used as a tie for baling cotton, or other compressible and elastic materials, was a substantial invasion and infringement of the right secured by said patents. It then proceeded to enjoin the defendant from using or selling for use any open-slot cotton tie buckle of the kind commonly known as the arrow tie, described and secured by any of said patents, upon the pretence that the same had, at any former time, been sold by the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, or its agents, and been once used for the purpose of baling cotton or other material before coming into the possession of the defendant, and from combining any such open-slot cotton tie buckles with a flat band of iron, to be used, or vended to others to be used, as a tie for baling cotton or other elastic or compressible material.

In January, 1877, the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, and others, brought a suit in equity against Grover, Stubbs & Co., in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Georgia,⁴ on the same three patents. The defendants set up that they had never made any ties, but had sold ties made by the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited. The ties they had sold were arrow ties. The facts of the stamps on the buckles, and of the contents of the bill-heads, before mentioned, were before the court. The ties were spliced. The case came before Judge Woods, the circuit judge, on a motion for a preliminary injunction, and he granted it, after hearing counsel for both parties. The order enjoined the defendants from selling ties known as the arrow tie, unless said ties should be purchased directly or indirectly from the plaintiffs, or their duly authorized licensees, or their vendees, or vendees of vendees, and from selling ties stamped with the words, "licensed to be used once only," or words of similar import, after said ties had been used once.

In January, 1877, the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, and others, brought a suit in equity against A. C. Wyly and others, in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia,⁴ on the same three patents. The defendants set up that they had bought and sold metallic cotton ties known as piece ties, made by taking ties that had been once used in baling cotton, and afterwards cut from the bales, and rejoining the several parts with rivets, retaining the same buckles. The buckles were arrow buckles. The facts as to the stamps on the buckles, and the contents of the bill-heads, before mentioned, were before the court. Judge Erskine, the district judge, in March, 1877, granted a preliminary injunction, in the same terms as in the said suit against Chapman.

In January, 1877, the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, and others, brought a suit in equity against C. W. Simmons & Co., in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Georgia,⁴ on the same three patents. The defendants had sold second-hand arrow buckles with pieced bands. The facts as to the stamps on the buckles and the contents of the bill-heads, before mentioned, were before the court. Judge Erskine, the district judge, in April, 1877, granted a preliminary injunction, after hearing counsel for both parties, restraining the defendants from making, using, or vending to others to be used, buckles for iron ties for cotton bales, known in the market as arrow buckles, or ties formed by the combination of an iron band with an open-slot buckle or arrow buckle, except the same should be purchased from or licensed by the plaintiffs, their assignees or their vendees or licensees.

In October, 1876, the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, and others, brought a suit in equity against Simeon W. Simmons and others, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, on the same three patents. There was an answer and a replication, and the case was heard, at final hearing, on pleadings and proofs, by the circuit judge, Judge Shepley. The defendants had procured from cotton mills second-hand buckles and second-hand hoops, which had been once used on cotton bales. The hoops were not of the original length, but were in cut pieces, and the defendants pieced them together, by riveting, to the proper length. The buckles and hoops had been put upon the market by the American Cotton-Tie Company, Limited, under the three patents in question. There was evidence as to the stamping of the buckles and as to the contents of the bill-heads, before mentioned. In June, 1878, Judge Shepley gave a decision dismissing the bill, 13 O. G. 967, [American Cotton-Tie Co. v. Simmons, Case No. 293.] He said: "The complainants contend that they sold the buckles under a restriction, which limited them to one use, and did not convey an unrestricted title, and that the buckles never passed out of the monopoly of the patent. * * * The company clearly had the right, in selling a patented article, to put a restriction on its use or sale, and to convey only a restricted title, or to license only a restricted use, and the purchaser under such a restricted title could not convey a greater or better title than he had himself. The law upon this subject was fully stated in Hawley v. Mitchell, [Case No. 6,250,] and affirmed by the supreme court of the United States, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 544. But, when the proprietor of a patented article sells it for the purpose of allowing it to be used in the ordinary pursuits of life, and to pass into the markets of the country as an ordinary article of commerce, and subject to unrestricted purchase and sale, he waives his right to affix conditions or restrictions to its use or sale, and consents that, after one sale and the payment of one royalty, it shall pass out of the limits of the monopoly. If a manufacturer of patented pins, or nails, or wood screws, or any similar article, were to affix to his invoice of sale a condition limiting them to one use, and sell them in quantities to retail dealers to be sold again, he must know and intend that they are to pass into the commerce of the country, and to be sold over and over again, and sold only to persons who would not buy anything less than an unrestricted title. Shall the purchaser of a packing box be treated as an infringer, and as pirating an invention, because he uses again, and for another purpose, the screws or nails which held the box together, and which he purchased when he purchased the box and its contents? May he not reasonably presume, with regard to articles of this description, that pins, and nails, and screws do not go into the market with an incumbrance upon their title, or a restriction on their use, and that he is not bound to trace the title, to see if it be unrestricted, for the reason, that he may well suppose no one would expect to affix a restriction on the use of such articles, which would be operative, or, if he could do so, would ever find purchasers of them? The buckles sold by the complainants belong to this class of articles. They are sold for the purpose of being used to confine a bale of cotton, as a nail or screw confines a packing box. It appears in evidence, that, when a bale of cotton is sold, it is without tare, and, consequently, the buckle and the strap it confines are sold and resold with the bale of cotton to which they are attached. If the cotton takes fire, or is otherwise damaged, and requires to be rebaled, must the owner put the same buckle back on the same bale or be liable to the penalties of an infringer? When the cotton bales are opened for use at the factories, the manufacturer who has purchased the ties and buckles with the cotton, having no further use for them, sells them to the junk dealer. From the junk dealer the defendants purchase them and repair them and sell them again. The vendor of the patented buckles sells them to be applied to the bales of cotton, with the full knowledge that they will be sold and resold as often as the cotton is sold. They impliedly consent to these unrestricted sales. They cannot, under such circumstances, be fairly considered as retaining the title to the buckles in themselves, or as parting with only such a restricted title as would require each vendor of the cotton to sell it accompanied with a restriction on the title and use of the buckles. The very purpose of the original sale, with the knowledge of the subsequent use and sales necessarily incident, imply a parting with the unrestricted title and a passing out of the limits of the monopoly, of the thing sold, as much as it would if the vendor sold patented nails or screws, to be used in fastening packing cases to be sold with the goods packed. The facts in this case show that the owners of the patented buckle intended and contemplated that the purchasers should sell an unrestricted title, inconsistent with any reservation of title or use in the original vendors. Such a sale does not fall within the principle stated in Hawley v. Mitchell, [Case No. 6,250,] but clearly falls within the language and principle of the decisions in Goodyear v. Beverly Rubber Co., [Id. 5,557,] and Washing-Mach. Co. v. Earle, [Id. 17,219.] The case is very different from that of the sale of a machine easily identified, and to which a restriction may easily be attached, or where a license to use only may be sold, unaccompanied with any title or accompanied with a restricted title. But, where pins, nails, screws, or buckles are sold, if some of them are sold with a restricted and some with an unrestricted title, there are no means of identification which enable the purchaser, after they have passed into the market and common use, to distinguish the articles licensed or restricted in their use from those absolutely sold. In the case of articles of that description, the patentee may fairly be presumed to have received his royalty when he parted with the possession of the articles and allowed them to go into common and general use. The public should not be vexed with litigation about reserved rights or conditions affixed to the title of such articles, or put upon the investigation of incumbrances or restrictions on the title of nails, screws, buckles, or pins, before they can be safely used by a person who has bought them of parties who obtained them of the patentee, with the right to sell them in the open market. It is more for the interest of inventors that they should obtain their royalty on such articles when they first put them upon the market, than to make the monopoly odious by the attempt to fix restrictions on the subsequent use." The proceedings in the four cases above mentioned, in which injunctions were granted, were put in evidence in the case before Judge Shepley.

In a like suit in equity, by the same plaintiffs, against Williams, Black & Williams, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina, in which the main issues were like those in the suit before Judge Shepley, the circuit judge, Judge Bond, followed the decision of Judge Shepley.

In view of these decisions, the question involved in this case may fairly be considered an open one, on authority as well as on principle. It is manifest, that the owners of the patents intended, by the stamps on the buckles and the imprints on the bill-heads, to grant a restricted license for the use of the ties and the buckles, and that the intended restriction was to a use of them once only, as baling ties. The words "licensed to use once only," stamped on each buckle, was notice to every one who handled it that there was attached to it a restriction in the shape of a license, and of a license merely to use, and of a license to use only once. This was a lawful restriction. The only question is, whether it was an effective and operative one, or whether it was strangled in its birth by the circumstances which attended the original putting of the ties and

The defendants do not deny that the owner of a chattel may dispose of the same with restrictions upon the title, and they concede that the owner of a patented article has a right to put a restriction on its use or sale, both as to the extent of the territory within which it can be used and as to a period of use within the term of the patent. But they contend that a restriction thus imposed may be waived by the party who has imposed it, and that such waiver may be the legal result of acts, and be, in fact, contrary to the purpose and intention which the party has in his mind. They further contend, that, notwithstanding any restriction imposed in this case, the planter sold the cotton, and the ties and buckles which bound it into bales, without any restriction, and that the same fact existed with respect to every succeeding sale of the bales, down to the consumer; that the plaintiff permitted the planter to sell the cotton baled with the patented ties which he had purchased by the pound or the bundle, and to pass the property in such ties from purchaser to purchaser in succession, without any restriction; and that all such unrestricted sales were made, by implication of law, with the authority and by the direction of the owners of the patents, and were not the illegal acts of persons having possession of the property without title to it, because such sales were contemplated by the plaintiff as a part of the business of providing the market with ties. They liken the case to that of the license of a machine with a restricted right under a patent, and a subsequent acquiescence by the licensor in the sale of the machine by the licensee in derogation of the restriction. They insist, that, as the original vendors of the ties knew and intended that the cotton, with its bagging, bands and buckles, would and should be sold, and pass from purchaser to purchaser, without restriction, and that the bands and buckles would and should be treated as and become the property of the several purchasers in succession, by either a purchase at a price per pound, or by being given to the purchaser as a perquisite, the price being included in the price of the cotton, each successive purchaser of the baled cotton became the owner of the buckles and bands, and that any owner of the buckles has a right to put them a second time to the use contemplated in the Brodie patent, if they have once paid a patent royalty.

It is difficult to see how, in view of the facts of the case, the owners of these patents can properly be said to have sold the buckles for the purpose of allowing them to be used in the ordinary pursuits of life and to pass into the markets of the country as an ordinary article of commerce. They put them forth with a restriction imposed on them, that they should be used "once only" as baling ties. The good sense of the words "once only" is, that they shall be used to confine the bale until it is opened for use by the consumer and until the cotton has thus ceased to need longer confinement in a bale. A fair and liberal construction, consistent with the necessary intention of the owners of the patents, permits, in the business of pressing, a buckle and a band to be transferred from one bale which is on its way from the planter to the consumer to another bale which is on its way from the planter to the consumer, and does not require that such use should be regarded as a use more than once of the buckle and the band. The original license is fairly a license to have the buckle and the band confine a bale until the consumer needs to confine the bale no longer, and a license for no longer time. There is no purchase of buckle and band by a purchaser of the baled cotton, except as he purchases them confining the cotton and to confine it till it reaches the consumer, and such purchase of buckle and band is, in effect, only a purchase of them subject to such original license. It is quite as reasonable to say that the purchaser of the cotton buys subject to such license as it is to say that the licensor, having imposed the restricted license, permits it to be instantly destroyed. The former view is consistent with the original intention, and the latter view is inconsistent with it. The fact, that, in this country the cotton, the bagging, the iron band and the buckle, which compose the bale, are weighed as a whole and paid for at so much a pound for each pound of the whole weight, cannot have the effect to change the fact that the purchaser buys subject to a restricted license to use the band and the buckle only to confine the cotton which he is buying. What he pays for other than the cotton or the bagging is paid for subject to such license, the price being computed in the particular way agreed upon.

The foregoing views apply to the use a second time of original buckles, by themselves, or to the use a second time of the original buckles and the original bands. But the use of a buckle without a band will not confine a bale of cotton, and, although the defendants use a second time the original buckles, they do not use a second time the original bands in the condition in which those bands were originally put forth with such buckles. The defendants use entirely new bands or bands made by piecing together pieces of the old bands. In doing this they infringe the 3d, 4th and 5th claims of the Brodie patent. When they combine the old buckle with the new band they make anew the combination. They do the same when they combine it with a pieced band. Piecing together the pieces of the old bands, after such bands have been voluntarily severed by the consumer of the cotton, is not a repair of the tie in any sense in which the right of repair attaches to the license. If a band were broken in transit, in an intermediate hand, the right of repairing it might exist. The defendants participate in combining the open-slot, the link and the band, as in the 3d claim of the Brodie patent, and in making the combination set forth in the 4th claim of that patent, and in practising the method set forth in the 5th claim of that patent, when they sell ties having the features set forth in those claims, and capable of the use described in those claims, and needing only the bale of cotton and the application of the tie to it to make the combinations set forth in those claims, and to produce the results there set forth by the means there set forth.

The question presented is one entirely of law. There is no disputed question of fact. There is nothing to be elucidated by testimony. The right of the plaintiff is regarded as clear. The validity of the patents and the identity of the defendant's articles with those of the patents is not disputed. There is as much ground, on the question of comity, for following the decisions of Judge Woods, Judge Billings and Judge Erskine, as for following those of Judge Shepley and Judge Bond, and, the question for decision in all the cases being one of law, on undisputed facts, a decision of it on a motion for a preliminary injunction is of equal weight, on a question of comity, as a decision of it on a final hearing.

The preliminary injunction asked for is granted, to be issued after the bill shall have been properly amended, as before suggested.

Injunction granted.]

S. A. Duncan, for plaintiff.

F. D. Sturges, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This bill is founded on two patents. One of them, No. 23,291, was granted to George Brodie, May 22d, 1859, for 14 years from March 22d, 1859, for "improvements in metallic bands for baling," and was re-issued to him April 27th, 1869, as re-issue No. 3,405, and was extended for seven years from March 22d, 1873, and was re-issued March 25th, 1873, as re-issue No. 5,333. The other patent, No. 31,252, was granted to James J. McComb, January 29th, 1861, for 14 years from that day, for an "improvement in iron ties for cotton bales," and was extended for seven years from January 29th, 1875. The plaintiff, a Louisiana corporation, is the owner of the patents. The validity of the patents and the right of the plaintiff to be protected by preliminary injunctions against infringements are not in question in this suit.

The charge of infringement made in the bill is, that the defendants, without license, have entered upon, and are now engaged in infringing upon, the rights of the plaintiff, by aiding and abetting various other persons, not licensees of the plaintiff, in making, selling and using iron cotton ties which embody the said patented inventions. The defendant McCready is the president of the Old Dominion Steamship Company, a Delaware corporation, the defendant Stanford is the secretary and general freight agent of the said corporation, and the third defendant is the assistant general freight agent of the said corporation. The bill alleges, that the defendants, as officers and agents of the said corporation, have been for some time past and now are actively engaged, without the license or authority of the plaintiff, and against the plaintiff's protest, in transporting cotton ties, embodying the said inventions, from the port of New York to various points in the south, and particularly to Norfolk, Petersburg and Richmond, well knowing that such ties are intended for sale and use in the cotton districts and in the cotton ports of the south; that the plaintiff has already suffered damage from such acts of the defendants; and that the defendants have been duly notified of the plaintiff's rights in the premises, and requested to desist from such acts, but refuse to do so, except as they shall be restrained therefrom by the order of this court. The bill prays that the defendants may account for profits and damages, and may be enjoined from making, using or vending the said inventions and from aiding others in so doing.

The bill is accompanied by an affidavit made by Frederic Cook, an agent of the plaintiff, on the 13th of October, 1879, setting forth that the said corporation has been engaged, without the license or authority of the plaintiff, in transporting from the city of New York to Norfolk and other places in the state of Virginia, iron cotton ties embodying the inventions covered by the 3d, 4th, and 5th claims of the Brodie patent, and the claim of the McComb patent; that, within the past two weeks, he has seen upon the pier of said corporation, various lots of said ties which he carefully examined and is sure were not of the manufacture of the plaintiff, but were unlicensed and infringing ties; that he has been unable to learn from the officers of said corporation who the actual shippers of the said infringing ties have been, although he has caused proper enquiry to that end to be made, the officers of the corporation declining to furnish the information, on the ground that the rules of the corporation forbid it; that he believes that other persons than those who have been restrained in suits brought by the plaintiff, in this court, against Bullard & Wheeler and John S. Long, V. Pugsley and G. P. Chapman, Earle & Perkins and Moses & Cohen, are making such shipments by the said line; that, on the 10th of October, 1879, there was received at the New York office of the plaintiff, a letter from its Norfolk agent, C. Phillips, enclosing a copy of a part of the manifest of the Old Dominion, one of the steamships of the said corporation, which lately arrived from New York at Norfolk, and which showed the shipment on that vessel of six lots of cotton ties consigned to different parties, none of whom are agents of the plaintiff; that such ties were described in said letter as arrow ties; that the writer of the letter went on to state that the large quantity of such ties brought into his territory from New York was seriously affecting his trade, and that, unless the further introduction of such ties could be prevented, his sales would not be one-half of what they would otherwise be; that a letter of similar import was written within a few days, and received from the Petersburg agents of the plaintiff, in which complaint is made of the large number of competing ties brought into the Petersburg market from New York; that the counsel for the plaintiff has caused the attention of the officers of the said steamship company to be called to the injury that is thus being inflicted upon the plaintiff, and has served upon said company and one or more of the defendants herein a copy of the restraining orders and injunctions which have been issued in the abovenamed suits, but that, while the officers of said company acknowledge their obligation to refrain from transporting ties for the special parties defendant in said suits, they do not feel that they are at liberty to decline taking similar freights from other persons; that the counsel for the plaintiff has caused to be represented to the officers of said company the difficulty which the plaintiff now finds in protecting itself against shipments of infringing ties by unknown parties, and that it may, therefore, become necessary to apply to this court, for an order restraining the said company generally from acting as carriers for parties who may offer such ties for shipment from the port of New York, and that the officers of said company have signified not only their willingness to yield a ready obedience to any such order, if obtained, but a disposition to abstain from any attempt to embarrass the plaintiff in securing such order; that he greatly fears that unless the said company be so restrained forthwith and before a motion for an injunction can be heard in the due course of practice, infringers will succeed in removing their ties to points in the south and outside of the jurisdiction of the court; that, should they succeed in this, it will necessarily result in irreparable damage to the plaintiff; and that this is the most critical period of the cotton tie season, and a few thousand bundles of infringing ties thrown into the market at this juncture will almost inevitably unsettle prices and greatly disturb the trade, and thus inflict an injury upon the owners of the patents for which there is no adequate remedy.

On the bill and such affidavit an order was made by this court, on the 13th of October, 1879, ordering that from and after the service of the writ of subpoena in this cause, and a notice of motion for an injunction pendente lite, to be heard on October 24th, 1879, with copies of the papers on which said motion is to be made, "the said defendants, and each of them, their agents, servants, attorneys, workmen and employees, and each of them, be and stand in all respects restrained and prohibited from receiving at the wharves or docks of the said Old Dominion Steamship Company, or from placing on board said company's steamships, or from shipping or transporting from any point or points within the jurisdiction of this court, under any pretext whatever, any cotton ties containing the features of invention, or any of them, which form the subject of the third, fourth and fifth claims of the said patent No. 5,333, or the claim of the said patent No. 31,252, and particularly ties composed of a flat band of iron and an open-slotted link or buckle, having a single central opening for receiving the band, unless such ties be offered for shipment or transportation by the said American Cotton-Tie Supply Company, or its duly authorized agents, and that they and each of them do stand so restrained and prohibited until the hearing of such motion, and until the same shall be by the court determined and decided."

The motion has been heard. It is opposed on the part of the defendants, by an answer to the bill and by affidavits. The defendant McCready, in an affidavit, says, that he is president of the Old Dominion Steamship Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of Delaware, and engaged in the business, as common carrier, of carrying and transporting freight and passengers between the ports of New York, Norfolk and Richmond, and having its general office in the city of New York; that said company owns many large steamships, by which it carries on its said business, which sail from the port of New York six times a week, laden with large cargoes of all kinds of merchandise; that said company receives upon its wharf, at pier 43, North river, from a very large number of persons, all kinds and descriptions of freight, in all quantities; that he is not acquainted with any of the details of such transportation, so far as the names of shippers and the different kinds of merchandise are concerned, his duties being confined to the general management of the business; that it would not be practicable for him to inform himself each day as to such details; that he has no knowledge whatever as to the claim of the plaintiff herein to the patents specified in the bill, nor to the articles claimed to be manufactured in accordance therewith; that it would be impossible for him, as president of said company, to inform himself, each day, or at any time, whether the articles received by the said company for shipment, are shipped by persons licensed by the plaintiff, or whether the articles have been properly purchased by the shippers from the plaintiff, or whether the articles themselves are infringements of the plaintiff's manufacture, or different from the same; that, with regard to the shipments heretofore made, he has been entirely ignorant in the respects above set forth, except so far as he has been informed by persons acting for the plaintiff, that the articles were infringements; that the business of said company is very large, and it would be impossible, in the proper conduct of the same, for the said company to inform itself of all the facts with regard to the articles shipped, to ascertain whether or not they were infringements of the plaintiff's manufacture; that it would necessitate the employment of experts to examine each and every one of the articles, out of many tons thereof, to determine whether or not they were infringements; that it would be necessary to employ persons to make enquiries as to the shippers of the articles, to learn, if possible, whether they had the right to ship the same; that all of this would seriously impede and delay the business of the said company, to its great and irreparable injury; that he has in no way infringed upon the rights of the plaintiff; that he has not aided or abetted any persons, whether licensees of the plaintiff or otherwise, in making, selling or using the articles claimed by the plaintiff; that he has no knowledge, nor any means of ascertaining, whether or not the said company is shipping or transporting cotton ties embodying the plaintiff's patented invention, shipped by persons without authority or license; and that neither he nor the other officers of the said company would hesitate to obey any proper order of this court, but the said company and its officers do most earnestly oppose the making of any order which would inflict any serious injury upon said company, as the order prayed for herein inevitably would.

The defendants Stanford and Guillauden, in a joint affidavit, state that Stanford is secretary and general freight agent of the Old Dominion Steamship Company, and that Guillauden is assistant general freight agent of said company; that they have read the affidavit of the defendant McCready, and the same is true in every respect; that the defendants are entirely ignorant of the matters in the bill and affidavit of the plaintiff set forth, with relation to the letters patent and the plaintiff's rights and acts thereunder, as alleged in said bill and affidavit, nor have they any means of informing themselves as to such matters; that they deny any individual connection with, or relation to, the acts charged against them in said bill and affidavit, and allege, that their only connection, directly or indirectly, with such matters is as officers and agents of the Old Dominion Steamship Company; that said company acts, in relation to the transportation of the articles alleged to be infringements of the plaintiff's invention, only as a common carrier for others, and that it has no other interest or connection with said articles; that the deponents are employed entirely in the office of said company; that they have never seen any of said articles; and that they have no power or authority to refuse to transport the same.

The defendant Stanford, in a separate affidavit, states that he is secretary and general freight agent of the Old Dominion Steamship Company; that, since the restraining order in this suit was issued, cotton ties have been offered to said company for shipment; that, by reason of said order, and the inability of the officers and agents of said company to ascertain and determine as to whether or not the said ties were infringements of the plaintiff's alleged inventions, or whether or not the persons offering the same were rightfully authorized to ship them, the said company was compelled to refuse to receive or transport the same; that the said ties were subsequently offered to another company, a competitor of the Old Dominion Steamship Company, which received and transported the same; that, by reason of being placed in such a position, the said company is sustaining and will continue to sustain very serious injury, not only with regard to the freight on said ties, but with regard to other freight; that such injury will amount to upwards of one thousand dollars a month directly, in addition to its liability to action by the parties offering said ties; and that the competitors of said company are thus greatly benefitted at its expense and to its great injury.

It is contended for the defendants, that the steamship company, as it acts solely in the capacity of common carrier of these ties, does not come within the meaning of the statute, as an infringer of the patents; that it has nothing to do with the rights of the plaintiff or the invasion of those rights by others; that it does not use, or aid others in using, the ties, because such use cannot be had until after transportation and delivery; that the company, by transporting the ties, does not sell them to others to be used, or aid in selling them to others to be used; that, as a common carrier, the company is bound to receive and carry all goods offered by any person; that it would be against public policy to restrain the company; that it would impede its business and inflict injury on the whole community; that the suit is improperly brought against the defendants and should be brought against the company; that the defendants are only officers of the company, with distinct duties, and have no control over the goods and no power to refuse to receive them; that the company ought not to be compelled, at its own expense, to protect the plaintiff's business; and that it owes no duty to the plaintiff, to answer for the diligence which the plaintiff ought to use in protection of its own interests.

It is entirely clear that the owners of infringing and unlicensed cotton ties, who are causing them to be transported by the vessels of the Old Dominion Steamship Company, are sending them for sale and use, and are employing said company and its officers as agents and servants in promoting and effecting such sale and use. It would seem, on principle, that there ought to be no difficulty in restraining by injunction all persons, whether officers of a corporation or not, who are aiding in the promotion of the infringing sale and use, whether such persons would be liable for profits or damages or not. It has been so held by this court. Goodyear v. Phelps, [Case No. 5,581;] Poppenhusen v. Falke, [Id. 11,279.]

In Hunt v. Maniere, 34 Law J. Ch. (N. S.) pt. 1, p. 142, a wharfinger received notice that certain wine, deposited at his wharf was marked with a fraudulent imitation of a trade-mark, and that the owner of the trade-mark was about to apply to the court of chancery for an injunction to prevent the wine from going on the market. After the injunction had been granted, but before the wharfinger had notice that it had been granted, he refused to deliver the goods to their owner. It was held by the master of the rolls, and, on appeal, by the lords justices, that he was justified, in equity, in such refusal, and that the owner of the goods would be restrained from suing him at law for a wrongful conversion of the goods. The master of the rolls observed, that the plaintiff acted rightly; and that, being in the possession of goods which he knew to be a fraudulent and spurious imitation of the manufacture or growth of other persons, and being informed that an injunction would be obtained, and being notified not to deliver the goods, he would have acted culpably if he had parted with the goods.

In Upmann v. Elkan, 7 Ch. App. 130, affirming the decision of the master of the rolls, (L. R. 12 Eq. 140,) a firm of forwarding agents in London received from correspondents abroad several boxes of cigars bearing forged brands, which were to be delivered to several persons in England. On application by the makers whose brand had been forged, the agents gave information as to the consignors, and offered either to send back the cigars, or to erase the brands. On a bill for an injunction, filed by the makers whose brands were forged, it was held that the fact that the agents were merely carriers was no defence to the suit, but that, as they had given sufficient information and had offered to erase the brands, they were not to pay costs. The defendants were forwarding agents, to whom the goods had been consigned to pay the duty on them and forward them to persons named. They were to be paid for so doing, but their profit did not arise from the sale of the goods. The master of the rolls said: "It does not, in my opinion, make any difference whether the goods are sent to a person who does not deal in the article consigned, and whose duty is simply to distribute the goods to other persons, or whether the goods are sent to him as consignee, for his own purposes. In either case they are sent to the dock to be at his disposal, and without his signature the goods cannot be disposed of. It will not do for him to say, as he does in this case, 'I know nothing about the goods sent. I do not know whether they have any, or, if any, what brand on them, or whose it is.' It is his duty to know this, and, if he receives notice that they bear a fraudulent imitation of another man's brand, he ought to ascertain this as speedily as possible after such notice, and to take the proper and necessary steps to prevent their being disposed of in that state. It may be, that, without notice, and when he sees the trade-mark, he does not know that it belongs to another. If so, he may deal with them innocently. But, as soon as he is informed of the fact, he should act at once, so as not to be, in any event, either from wilful or from accidental ignorance, made a party to the fraud committed by another; and, when he ascertains the fact, he should at once inform his correspondent abroad. If it be argued, that this imposes upon him serious inconvenience, and a duty which, by taking the order for goods, he never undertook, this may be admitted to be true; but it is only what would be the case in the event of the importation of prohibited articles, and it arises from the circumstance that he has not taken sufficient care to ascertain what sort of persons the correspondents are for whom he consents to act as agent." Lord Hatherley, on the appeal, said: "It has been argued, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction against the defendants, who had been guilty of no offence, being merely carriers receiving goods, which, though fraudulently marked, were not for their own use, nor to be sold by them for their own benefit, but were received merely for the purpose of transmitting them to the persons to whom they were consigned. I cannot conceive a doctrine more dangerous or mischievous, or more fatal to the authority of the court with respect to trade-marks. If that argument prevailed, any persons, being abroad, as was the case in this instance, and minded to commit frauds upon an English trade-mark, could easily do so by sending their different consignments together to persons in the position of the defendants, who appear to be respectable agents and warehousemen, thereby committing an injury in a manner most convenient for themselves, and very mischievous to the person entitled to the benefit of the trade-marks."

In Orr v. Diaper, 4 Ch. Div. 92, it was held that a bill would lie against ship owners who had shipped goods bearing counterfeits of the plaintiff's trade-marks, for a discovery of the names of the consignors from whom the goods had been received.

The doctrine of these cases in regard to trade-marks is entirely applicable to the case of the infringement of a patent. As the defendants have refused to disclose the names of the infringing shippers of ties, the plaintiff is without remedy by injunction, in respect of the infringing ties which the defendant's company transports in its vessels, unless it can obtain an injunction in this suit. It clearly ought to have such a remedy.

in which it is held that an injunction will not lie in a case like the present. The cases cited for the defendants are cases where it has been held that workmen and employees will not be held liable for profits and damages, in a suit for the infringement of a patent. Under section 4921 of the Revised Statutes, the authority of this court, in a case arising under the patent laws, of which it has jurisdiction, to grant an injunction, according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of any right secured by a patent, is entirely independent of the award of any other relief in the same suit.

The officers of the steamship company must have the same power to refuse to accept infringing cotton ties that they have to accept them. The defendant McCready does not disclaim such power to refuse. The cases of Lightner v. Kimball, [Case No. 8,345,] and Heaton v. Quintard, [Id. 6,311,] are distinguishable from the present case.

As to the suggestion of hardship to the defendants and to their company, there can be no difficulty in so framing the order of injunction, that, with the cooperation of the agents of the plaintiff, there will be but little practical difficulty in securing obedience to the injunction without serious practical inconvenience to the defendants. The defendants' company will be deprived of no more carrying trade in respect to infringing ties, than they would be deprived of if the shippers of such ties were enjoined, and it must be presumed that they would be enjoined, if their names were known. The defendants' company could have caused such names to have been disclosed, on enquiry, but it did not. The allegation that the information was asked and refused is not denied. The injunction asked for is granted.

E. J. Phelps and W. G. Veazey, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This suit is brought for relief against infringement of re-issued letters patent, No. 3,690, to Asahel J. Severance, as assignee of Rodolphe Leschot, October 26th, 1869, for an improved rock drill, and has been heard upon pleadings, proofs, and argument of counsel. The plaintiff shows title from Severance. The defendants claim that Severance had no title, and that, therefore, the plaintiff has acquired none, and is not the owner of the patent; that Leschot was not the first inventor of the invention patented; that the re-issue is for a different invention from that in the original patent and is, therefore, void; that the plaintiff is estopped from maintaining this suit, by a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, dismissing a bill brought by the plaintiff against the Sullivan Machine Co., of whom these defendants bought the machines claimed here to be an infringement of the patent, for an infringement there of this same patent; and that the defendants do not, in fact, infringe.

That the patent was valid, and that it was infringed by a drill then in use by the Sullivan Machine Co., was adjudged in favor of the plaintiff, in a suit in favor of the American Diamond Drill Co., from whom the plaintiff derives title to the patent, against the Sullivan Machine Co., from whom the defendants acquired title to the machines in question, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York. American Diamond Rock Boring Co. v. Sullivan Mach. Co., [Case No. 298.] That was a suit between privies to these parties, and would seem to settle those questions, as between them. And, if that judgment would not be technically conclusive, the authority of it would be sufficient ground for determining the same questions in the same way here, unless presented upon different facts; and there is nothing before the court here which was not produced there, that should vary the result.

An English patent to Robert Bearl, before Leschot's invention, is presented here, as showing an anticipation, and was not presented there; but, the devices described in that patent are not like Leschot's. It made use of water, but not in the same way, and did not have diamonds, as Leschot's has, nor anything equivalent to them, for the purpose for which they were used. Other things prior have been put in evidence, properly enough for the purpose of showing what was in existence at the time of Leschot's invention, to construe the patent by, but not pleaded, or stipulated about, so as to be properly in the case to be considered upon the question of anticipation of the entire invention. There are, however, none of them, as they have been viewed, which would appear adequate for that purpose, if properly set up in the answers. These matters are, therefore, left to stand as they were placed by that decision.

As the re-issue was granted to Severance, it is to be taken that he had title, unless the contrary is made to appear. The defendants have introduced an abstract of title, which shows that Severance acquired title from one Dow, and shows a contract between him and Leschot, upon which there is some question about whether it carries title or not. But, showing that title does not show that there is no other, and there is a lack of any competent evidence in the case to show that there is not, by some other line of conveyances, a perfect title. If the certificate to the copies could be said to imply that there was no other title of record, it would not be evidence of the fact. Such copies are evidence of what is of record, as the originals would be, but are not evidence of the fact that there are not other records. Rev. St. § 892; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 498. But, even if this was not so, the abstract produced shows that Dow had full title to one-half of the patent which would pass to Severance and to the plaintiff, and, as there has been no objection to any non-joinder of any other party, that title would be sufficient to maintain this suit, for the protection of that interest, at least.

The defendants set up the decree in the district of New Hampshire, as a bar, legal or equitable. The plaintiff traverses the answer, which makes it necessary for the defendants to make proof of that defence, because it is not responsive to the bill. The proofs do not at all show that the bill there was for the same relief as this one. The making and selling these machines to these defendants may have been long subsequent to the bringing of that bill, and even to the decree. If the bill had been for the same relief, and had been dismissed on its merits, it would have been entirely conclusive as between the parties to it and their privies, as to that cause of action, upon every question which might have been raised concerning it, whether actually made upon pleadings or evidence or arguments of counsel, or considered by the court, or not. But, where a judgment upon a different cause of action is relied upon as settling a question, it must be shown that the question was actually raised and decided. Cromwell v. Sac Co., 94 U. S. 351; Davis v. Brown, Id. 423. The record produced, and that is the only evidence upon this subject, fails to show that any question open here was, in fact, passed upon there. It shows that the bill was dismissed, with costs, but shows no ground upon which it was dismissed, except the want of appearance of the plaintiff; and a dismissal for that cause is not conclusive in favor of the defendant, even upon another suit for the same relief. Mitt. Eq. Pl. 238; Carrington v. Holly, 1 Dickens, 280; Rosse v. Rust, 4 Johns. Ch. 300; Badger v. Badger, [Case No. 717]; Porter v. Vaughn, 26 Vt. 624. That suit appears to have been, in reality, dismissed for want of prosecution, and, in effect, is like a nonsuit in an action at law.

This leaves the question of actual infringement, by the machines now in use by these defendants, to be determined here. This question was expressly left open and undecided by Shipman, J., in American Diamond Rock Boring Co. v. Sullivan Mach. Co., [Case No. 298.] before cited. The drill now in use is precisely like that adjudged to be an infringement in American Diamond Drill Co. v. Sullivan Mach. Co., [21 Fed. 74.] except that, in the latter, the diamonds at the circumference projected beyond it, while in the former the stock is enough larger than in the latter to fill out and be flush with the diamonds at the circumference. The diamonds themselves stand precisely as they did before, and the proof is quite full, especially that on the part of the defendants, that they operate precisely as they did before. It was supposed that, with the stock flush with the outer edges of the diamonds, there would not be room for the detritus to be carried up outside of the stock, even if the drill would penetrate the rock far enough to make any to be carried up; but it was found, on experiment, that the diamonds, when projecting, always cut a hole larger than the circle they would describe when centred accurately, and enough larger to permit the detritus to pass upward with the spaces between them filled, and that filling the spaces, by bringing the stock out flush with them would not interfere with their operation. The diamonds are the operative things, and the drill, with the stock flush with them at the circumference, has all the elements for cutting that one with the diamonds projecting there has, and operates in precisely the same way. The flush stock is better than the other, in some respects. Making it flush is, probably, an improvement upon the other, but, if so, it is an improvement, made by adding to the other, and not by altering its constituent parts or their mode of operation. As the use of the other without the addition to the thickness of the stock was an infringement, it would seem that the use of this in the same way, with the addition, would be.

Besides this, Leschot's patent was not merely for a drill with the addition of laterally projecting diamonds. It did not purport, on its face, to be for such an invention; neither is it necessary, on account of the prior state of the art, to construe it as being only for that, in order to sustain it at all. The patent was as much for the forward projecting diamonds and their mode of operation, as for any other part. No one before had ever made a drill, either annular or cylindrical, armed with diamonds, and worked by a rotary and direct forward motion communicated to it by power. Still less had any one ever invented such a drill, assisted in its operation by water carried in through a tubular bar and stock. The original patent did not cover the mode of using water, although the specification showed that to be a part of the invention. This made it a very proper case for a re-issue, to cover that part before omitted. It is, probably, true, as argued by counsel for the defendants, that the first re-issue was altogether too broad and could not have stood, which made it proper to have that corrected by another surrender and re-issue, as was done. The second re-issue was proper, as stated by Shipman, J., in the case before cited, and it would not be affected at all by the faults of the first re-issue, but would correct them. In Thomas v. Shoe [Machinery] Manuf'g Co., [Case No. 13,911,] Mr. Justice Clifford said: "Where the commissioner accepts a surrender of an original patent and grants a new patent, his decision in the premises, in a suit for infringement, is final and decisive, and is not re-examinable in such a suit in the circuit court, unless it is apparent upon the face of the patent that he has exceeded his authority, that there is such a repugnancy between the old and the new patent that it must be held, as matter of legal construction, that the new patent is not for the same invention as that embraced or secured in the original." "Inquiries in such a case are restricted to a comparison of the terms and import of the two patents, in view of the drawings and patent office model. If, from these it results that the invention claimed in the re-issue is not substantially different from the one described, suggested or indicated in the specification or drawings of the original patent or patent office model, the re-issued patent must be held valid, as all other alterations and amendments plainly fall within the intent and purpose of the provision in the act of congress, which allows a surrender and re-issue; or, in other words, if the re-issued patent does not, upon the face of the instrument, embrace anything not substantially described, suggested, or indicated in the specifications, drawings or model of the original, the defense that the re-issued patent is not for the same invention as the original must be overruled." Under this rule, upon this question in this case, there is nothing to do but to compare the re-issue upon which the suit is brought with the original patent, disregarding all else, to see if the new invention patented in this re-issue is the same that is in any manner described in any part of the original; not whether it was patented, or even thought or sought to be, there, but whether it appears, from what is there, that it might have been patented there if it had been thought of and desired. Upon such comparison, there is nothing in the re-issue which is not in the specification of the original distinctly mentioned, although, as argued, it is not all claimed. It is quite clear, upon principle and authority, as well as upon the former adjudication, that this re-issue is valid.

Upon the question of infringement, it appears that the defendants make use of as much of Leschot's invention as he would, in removing as much of the rock as he would remove, by cutting. By his method he would cut an annular hole and leave a core to be removed otherwise. They cut what would be the annular hole by the same means and in the same way. They have added, in the middle of their drill, enough similarly cutting material to cut away the core also, but they none the less cut away the rest by his method. This addition is an improvement, when it is not desirable to save the core, but Leschot's drill is made use of as a basis for the improvement, and the owners of the patent, as also held by Judge Shipman, in the former case, cannot be improved out of their right to it. The case, in this respect, is somewhat like Electric Telegraph Co. v. Brett, 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 347. That patent was for giving signals at distant places by means of electric currents sent through metallic circuits consisting of wires extending to the places and back. The defendants made use of the earth, to complete the circuits, in place of the returning wire, and claimed that this constituted the whole a different machine that was not an infringement. It was held, however, that they made use of so much of the patented invention as was involved in the wire which they did use and its operation, and they were made liable for that infringement.

It is stoutly insisted, in behalf of the defendants, that the invention was of, and the patent for, a mere tool, and not for any machine, combination or arrangement, and that the drill used by the defendants is a very different tool, especially in form and appearance. It is true, that the two do not at first, look alike, but that is not by any means a full or accurate test. The outward form of them is not at all material. Their operation and performances are what are important. In Machine Co. v. Murphy, 97 U. S. 120, Mr. Justice Clifford, in speaking of such a question, again said: "Except where form is of the essence of the invention, it has but little weight in the decision of such an issue, the correct rule being, that, in determining the question of infringement, the court or jury, as the case may be, are not to judge about similarities or differences by the names of the things, but are to look at the machines, or their several devices or elements, in the light of what they do, or what office or function they perform, and how they perform it, and to find that one thing is substantially the same as another, if it performs substantially the same function, in substantially the same way, to obtain the same result, always bearing in mind, that devices in a patented machine are different, in the sense of the patent law, when they perform different functions, or in a different way, or produce a substantially different result. Nor is it safe to give much heed to the fact, that the corresponding device in two machines organized to accomplish the same result is different in shape or form, the one from the other, as it is necessary, in every such investigation, to look at the mode of operation or the way the device works, and at the result as well as at the means by which the result is attained. Inquiries of this kind are often attended with difficulty, but, if special attention is given to such portions of a given device as really do the work, so as not to give undue importance to other parts of the same which are only used as a convenient mode of constructing the entire device, the difficulty attending the investigation will be greatly diminished, if not entirely overcome.

Here, the thing invented and the device which the defendants use are parts of machines. The operative things which do the work are the diamonds which abrade the rock, and the water which carries off the detritus. The stock merely holds the diamonds in place upon itself and imparts its motion to them. In each machine the diamonds work with their forward faces, by having a rotary and progressive forward motion given to them by means of the stock; and, in each, the water does its work by being injected through the stock and flowing out around it. The form of the stock is of no importance, further than to hold the diamonds and admit the flow, in and out, of the water. The flush stocks or heads do both of these precisely as the receding ones do. They, doubtless, hold the diamonds more firmly and better, because the diamonds are imbedded deeper in them, but not because they are held otherwise than by being imbedded in them. They cut more of the hole, but do it by the same means, operating in the same manner. The corresponding parts in each perform no different functions and produce no different results. It is quite plain, upon this comparison, in the light of the rule laid down in the case mentioned, that the defendants do make use of the patented invention, and thereby infringe upon the exclusive rights of the orator.

Let a decree be entered for an injunction and an account, according to the prayer of the bill.

[NOTE. The points decided in this case did not arise and were not discussed in the opinions subsequently rendered in the course of litigation, and reported in American Diamond Rock Boring Co. v. Sheldon, Case No. 297, 1 Fed. 870, 2 Fed. 353, and 24 Fed. 374. On final hearing this case was reversed, Wheeler, district judge, holding that the second, third, and fourth claims of the reissue were not infringed by defendants, and that "the first claim is not for a tool operating substantially as specified, as the claim of the original patent is, and does not therefore take in the operation including the means of operation, as that claim might, but is for the combination of any boring-head having projecting diamond points with merely a tubular boring-bar. It leaves out the injection of water through the boring-bar from the combination, which the claim of the original might cover, and leaves out the limitation of that claim to an annular boring-head, and extends the combination to that extent beyond what the original would cover. This enlargement of the claim, so long after the original, is not valid according to the series of later decisions upon reissued patents, as now understood. The combination is an entirety, not separable from what the original would cover. The statute in force when this patent was first granted, giving patentees the right to maintain an action for infringement of such parts of their inventions as were bona fide their own, as well as that in force when the reissue was granted and now, carefully limited the right to such material and substantial parts of the thing patented as could be definitely distinguished from the parts claimed without right. The part of this claim that might cover the infringement is blended with, and not separable or distinguishable from, the rest. There is no claim in the reissue, or set of claims, that covers the same invention as the original, and no more, and no claim of the reissue that is within the claim of the original and covers the infringement. These considerations lead to the same result that was reached upon the same patent in American Diamond Drill Co. v. Sullivan Mach. Co., 21 Fed. 74. A decree dismissing the bill of complaint necessarily follows." 25 Fed. 768.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—TIME OF EXPIRATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Letters patent for an invention were granted in England, dated September 3d, 1862. The specification was filed in the great seal patent office there, March 3d, 1863. Letters patent for the same invention were granted by the United States, July 14th, 1863, for 17 years. The date of the application for the United States patent was not shown: Held, that the date of the filing of the specification in England must be taken as the date of the patenting in England, for the purposes of section 6 of the act of March 3, 1839, (5 Stat. 353.)

2. The invention was, therefore, not patented in England more than six months before the United States patent was applied for, and so the act of 1839 did not apply, and the United States patent was valid for 17 years from July 14th, 1863.

3. The burden of proof is upon a party who claims that a patent should be limited in duration, to show the facts which would limit it.

Charles F. Blake, for complainant.

E. J. Phelps and W. G. Veazey, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been further heard upon a motion of the plaintiff for an injunction, which is opposed on the ground that the patent has expired. The patent was granted July 14th, 1863, for seventeen years, and would expire, according to its own terms, July 14th, 1880. English letters patent for the same invention were granted, dated September 3d, 1862, pursuant to which the specification was filed in the great seal patent office, March 3d, 1863. The act of July 4, 1836, § 7, (5 Stat. 119,) provided for issuing patents if the inventions had not been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, but, (section 8,) that nothing in that act should deprive an inventor of the right to a patent by reason of his having previously taken out letters patent in a foreign country, and the same having been published, at any time within six months next preceding the filing of his specification. The act of March 3, 1839, § 6, (5 Stat. 354,) provided that no person should be debarred from receiving a patent for an invention by reason of the same having been patented in a foreign country more than six months prior to his application, but that, in all cases, every such patent should be limited to the term of fourteen years from the date or publication of such foreign letters patent. Patents were, at that time, granted for fourteen years, and might be extended seven years more. By the act of March 2, 1861, § 16, (12 Stat. 249,) all patents thereafter granted were to remain in force seventeen years, without extension. In Weston v. White, [Case No. 17,458,] it was held, that the effect of the act of 1861 was to change the term of fourteen years to seventeen, as well in respect to patents limited by prior foreign patents, as in respect to others. The defendants claim, that, under these statutes and that holding, this patent is limited to seventeen years from the date of the English patent, which would expire September 3d, 1879, or, at least, to seventeen years from the filing the full specification of that patent, which would expire March 3d, 1880. The plaintiff insists that it is not limited by that patent at all. The act of 1839, by its express terms, applies only to patents for inventions patented in some foreign country more than six months prior to the application for a patent in this country. The date of the application in this country does not appear, but it must have been earlier than the date of the patent, or fully as early. Assuming that it was coeval with the patent, then the question arises whether the invention was patented in England more than six months before that. The English patent was dated more than six months before, but the full specification was not filed until within six months before. English patents are granted upon condition that a full specification shall be filed at some time within six months from the date. Agn. Pat. 322; Woodbury, J., in Hogg v. Emerson, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 479. As said by Grose, J., in Hornblower v. Boulton, 8 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 105, the English patent was nothing without the specification, and the patentee could gain no advantage by it. The question is, was it patented there before the specification was filed. In Howe v. Morton, [Case No. 6,769,] it was held, in an elaborate opinion, that an invention was not patented abroad until there was a full and perfected patent. And, in Smith v. Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co., 93 U. S. 486, the question seems to be settled, or treated as settled before, in the same way. Mr. Justice Strong said, page 498: "Of the English patent of Charles Goodyear it is enough to say, that, though the provisional specification was filed March 14th, 1855, the completed specification was not until the 11th of September following. It was, therefore, on the last mentioned date that the invention was patented." So, this patent does not depend at all upon the act of 1839. It was grantable under the provisions of the act of 1836, without resorting to the act of 1839, and does not come within the latter act. By the terms of the two acts, inventions patented abroad more than six months before were limited to fourteen years from the date or publication of the foreign patent, while those patented abroad within six months before were not affected at all by the foreign patent. This patent is one of the latter class, and, so far as now appears, is good for the term of seventeen years from its date, under the act of 1861. In Weston v. White, [Case No. 17,458,] the foreign patent was several years before the application in this country.

This case, as it now stands upon this question, is open to the further remark, that the act of 1839 applied only to patents for inventions patented in a foreign country more than six months prior to the application for the patent here. As the date of the application does not appear apart from the date of the patent, it does not appear that the date of, or the application for, the English patent was more than six months, or any other space of time, prior to the application here, unless the date of the patent is to be taken as the date of the application, upon this question. Upon a question of priority of invention, the presumption, in the absence of proof, would be, that the application was of the same date as the patent; but there the burden of proof would be upon the party claiming a prior application describing the invention, to show it. Here, the burden rests upon the party claiming that the patent should be limited, to show the facts which would limit it. This would include showing the application, and that the invention was patented abroad more than six months prior to it. These essential facts, necessary to limit this patent, are lacking, so far as the English patent is concerned; and, as that is the only foreign patent shown by the record, for this invention, they are lacking, so far as this question, as now presented, is concerned. These considerations obviate all necessity for considering the question as to whether the term of the patent would begin to run from the date of the English patent, or from the time of the filing the full specification under it, which would arise, if this patent came within the act of 1839, and was supposed to arise, until the connection and application of that act were particularly noticed. This objection is overruled, but the injunction is withheld to await the decision on a motion made by the defendants in respect to the French patent.

AMERICAN DIAMOND ROCK BORING CO.
v. SULLIVAN MACH. CO. et al.

[14 Blatchf. 119; 2 Ban. & A. 522.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 29, 1877.²

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—NECESSITY OF AFFIDAVITS.

1. The invention set forth in reissued letters patent No. 3,690, granted to Asahel J. Severance, assignee of Rudolph Leschot, October 26th, 1869, for an "improved rock drill," the original letters patent having been issued to said Leschot July 14th, 1863, defined, [and held valid.]

[Cited in American Diamond Rock Boring Co. v. Sheldon, Case No. 296, 1 Fed. 871, and 24 Fed. 374.]

2. It is not limited to an annular boring head, but covers a convex boring head.

3. A constructor of a machine infringes, if he makes his machine with express reference to a result which he knows will happen when the machine is put to its use, and which result, if originally introduced in the machine, is an infringement.

4. It is not proper to grant a motion for a preliminary injunction on a patent, on a theory which, although it may be true, is not supported by affidavits.

In equity.

Edwin T. Rice and Edward N. Dickerson, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendants from the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 3,690, [Patent No. 39,235,] issued to Asahel J. Severance, as assignee of Rudolph Leschot, and dated October 26th, 1869, for an "improved rock drill." The original patent was issued to Rudolph Leschot, and dated July 14th, 1863. The plaintiffs became the owners of said reissued patent on June 4th, 1875. The American Diamond Drill Company, the assignor of the present plaintiffs, brought in this court, in the year 1872, their bill in equity against the Sullivan Machine Company, one of the present defendants, for an injunction against an infringement of this patent, and, after a full hearing upon proofs, a decree directing an injunction was entered in April, 1875. The injunction was duly served upon said company. As no opinion was filed in that case, it becomes necessary to state briefly the facts which were found by the court in regard to the patent, the invention and the infringement, in order to a proper understanding of the questions which are at issue upon the present motion.

²[This bill was subsequently dismissed in American Diamond Drill Co. v. Sullivan Mach. Co., 21 Fed. 74. See note to American Diamond Rock Boring Co. v. Sheldon, Case No. 296.]

The invention and tool of Leschot are described in the reissued patent as follows: "This invention consists of a boring tool composed of a series of diamond edges, attached to an annular or tubular stock or crown, of steel or other metal, to which a rotary and a direct forward motion are given, and which is thereby caused to cut or bore an annular groove or hole, leaving a central core or kernel, which is easily detached by the subsequent operation of a gad or wedge. It also consists in the combination with the described boring tool, of a tubular boring bar or drill rod, whereby motion is imparted to the boring head, and through which a stream of water is forced, as hereinafter set forth. * * * A is the annular or tubular socket or crown, of steel or other metal; a, a¹, a², are edged cutters, composed of diamonds fitted and set firmly into suitable notches or mortices in the face of the crown or stock A. These diamonds are such as, from their color, are least valuable for jewelry. They are respectively so arranged in the crown or stock A, that the cutting edges of some project in a forward direction from the face or front end of the said crown or stock, as illustrated by a, a, while the edges of others project outwardly from the outward periphery thereof, as illustrated by a¹, a¹, and the edges of others project inwardly from the inner periphery, as illustrated by a², a². This crown or stock is secured by a bayonet fastening, or other means, to a tubular boring bar, of any suitable length, whose outer diameter is not greater than that of the said crown or stock, and whose inner diameter is not less than that of the said crown or stock, and this bar is arranged to form part of a machine of suitable construction, or otherwise furnished with suitable mechanical appliances, according to the nature of the work to be performed, by which it has imparted to it both a rotary and a direct forward or feeding motion, whereby it is caused to cut or bore an annular groove or hole in the rock or other hard body upon which it is employed. The operation of the tool will be greatly assisted by the injection of a stream of water through the tubular boring bar and crown or stock, for the purpose of washing out and carrying away the detritus which is produced, and which would otherwise choke up the annular opening and impede the action of the tool." The second and third claims of the reissued patent, which are, perhaps, the only claims which it is important now to consider, are: "2. The row of cutting edges a¹, when attached to a revolving boring head, so as to project beyond the circumference thereof, for the purposes specified. 3. In combination with a revolving and progressing boring head, having cutting points projecting beyond the periphery thereof, a hollow central drill rod, through which the water is forced or passed."

in controversy in the case of the American Diamond Drill Company, was a boring tool, consisting of a hollow boring head, convex upon its surface, having two holes extending from the cavity on the inside to the outside surface. The convex surface is armed with diamonds, which project from the surface, and a portion of which diamonds project outwards from the periphery. The only difference between the two devices is, that Leschot's drill abrades only a portion of the rock, the annular boring head acting upon the rock in such a manner as to enable an annular groove to be formed in the stone by the rotary and progressive motion of the boring head, and to leave a core within the groove. This core was subsequently removed by wedges. The defendants' tool abraded the entire surface of the rock through which it passed. Each instrument was provided with diamonds, the cutting edges of which extended outside of the periphery of the boring head, so that a larger hole was formed than the diameter of the boring head, and each was attached to a hollow bar, through which water was passed to wash out the detritus, the water being injected through the tubular boring bar and the boring head, and escaping, in the Leschot tool, through the annular boring head, and, in the defendants' device, through the two holes upon the convex surface of the boring head.

From an inspection of the defendants' drill and the reissued patent, it was obvious that the terms of the second and third claims of the patent were infringed. The defendants' drill was an exact imitation of the plaintiffs' device, with the exception, that, in place of the annular boring head, was substituted a convex boring head, with two holes in its surface. The annular head was partially plugged, so that the entire surface of the rock could be abraded. It may have been, and, perhaps, was, an improvement upon Leschot's tool, but an improvement which required little, if any, invention. It contained the principle of Leschot's invention, which was the effecting a clearance, by diamond points projecting beyond the periphery of a revolving and progressing boring head, so that the drill should not be clogged by the detritus, and the combination of the cutting mechanism with the hollow drill rod, into and through which, and through the orifice in the boring head, water could be injected, for the purpose of washing out the detritus. The distinctive features of the invention, as detailed in substance by the plaintiffs' expert, were, in combination, 1st. The boring head, adapted to being revolved and progressed or moved forward; 2d. Cutting points of diamonds, projecting beyond the periphery of the said boring head, so that they will cut a hole of larger diameter than the boring head, and so as to give a clearance; 3. A hollow drill rod or boring bar, adapted to connecting the boring head with mechanism for causing it to revolve and progress, and also adapted, by reason of its tubular form, to permitting the injection of a stream of water through the orifice in the boring head, for the purpose of washing out and carrying away the detritus which is produced by the abrasion of the stone by the diamond points. These distinctive features were all found in the defendants' drill.

An earnest attempt was made to avoid the effect of the infringement, by the claim that the reissued patent is for an invention different in kind and character from the one which was claimed in the original patent. It is not different from the one which was described in that patent. But it was contended that the original patent was for an annular tool and was confined to such a tool. That Leschot attributed importance to the annular character of his invention is plain, but that his invention was not limited to an annular tool is equally plain. He described fully the manner in which the diamonds were placed, whereby a larger diameter was given to the hole which was cut than the diameter of the boring head. The reissued patent embraces merely what was not only substantially but fully indicated and described in the original specifications, drawings and model.

It was also claimed, that there was no novelty in Leschot's invention, by reason of the prior French inventions of Georges Hermann and M. Fauvelle. Hermann's mechanism was originally for polishing a fashioning stone. His patent was subsequently enlarged, by a "certificate of addition," so as to include the cutting of stone by diamonds at the bottom of an annular head. It did not embrace all the features of Leschot's invention, and, especially, was not designed or adapted to make a clearance by projecting diamonds, and had not the hollow boring bar, for the introduction of water. The Fauvelle device was for an instrument which acted by percussion. The combination of a cutting or abrading tool with a hollow boring bar was novel.

A decree was passed which declared that the defendants' drill was an infringement of the second claim of the plaintiffs' patent. It was equally an infringement of the third claim, and a decree declaring that the third claim had been infringed would have been passed, if it had been desired, or if it had been deemed important.

Subsequently to the service of the injunction order, the defendants altered their drill, so that the diamonds were placed flush or even with the periphery of the boring head. The present bill was brought for the purpose of testing the question, whether or not the drills, as now used by the defendants, are or are not an infringement.

Upon the hearing of this motion, two affidavits were presented by the plaintiffs, to the effect that the defendants use, in a marble quarry in this district, boring heads or bits, on which the diamonds in fact project between 1-32d and 1-16th of an inch beyond the outer circumference of the drill heads. The plaintiffs, admitting that the diamonds may have been originally set flush with the circumference, say that the inevitable result of use is, that the steel head wears away by contact with the marble, and leaves the diamonds projecting; that the defendants intentionally placed the diamonds in such a position that use would inevitably cause a projection; and that such a construction is a mere evasion and an infringement.

It is true, that, "if a machine is constructed so as to conform in all respects to the description in a patent, except as to one particular, or as to one motion and effect, yet is so constructed and intended as to obtain that motion or effect in the usage of the machine, by the action or wearing of the parts, and it is so obtained, it is a piracy of the principle, and a violation of the patent." Page v. Ferry, [Case No. 10,662.] If the object, in placing the diamonds flush with the circumference, was, that, when put to use, they should inevitably become projecting, there is an infringement. A constructor of a machine infringes, if he makes his machine with express reference to a result which he knows will happen when the machine is put to its use, and which result, if originally introduced in the machine, is an infringement.

The defendants have presented thirteen counter affidavits, which are generally to the effect that a new flush-set diamond drill head performs its work in a marble quarry better than one which had become so worn by use that the diamonds project; that the new flush-set head makes a hole in marble larger than the diameter of the head; that this clearance is effected not by the cutting of the marble by the projecting diamond edges, but because the material of which marble is composed is crystalline, and, as the convex drill head advances into the marble, the crystals are fractured, and crumble for a little space exterior to the diameter of the head; that the steel circumference of the head is worn away by the attrition of the detritus as it is carried to the surface, and not by the attrition of the steel against the solid marble; and that it is not necessary that the metal should be worn away from the diamonds in order to make the drill operative, but that the wearing of the metal injures the head for boring purposes. If these affidavits are true and will endure the test of cross-examination and rebutting testimony, while the position of the diamonds was changed in order to avoid the charge of infringement, yet it cannot be found that the intent, in setting the diamonds flush with the circumference, was that they should speedily become projecting by wear and use, or that the object of the defendants was to have a projecting diamond drill.

The plaintiffs, in reply, urge, in argument, that the diamonds were so placed that the drill head must describe an eccentric movement, and that the effect of this construction is that the diamonds practically project. They say, "that the diamonds are so set on the conical head of the bit that they must cause the bit to revolve eccentrically, whereby a diamond on the periphery will describe a circle of larger diameter than the diameter of the metallic head in which they are mounted," and that this method of setting "is a mere mechanical equivalent for projecting the diamond radially outward from the head." No affidavits were presented from experts or others in support of this proposition. It is hardly proper to grant a motion for preliminary injunction upon a theory which, although it may be true, is not supported by affidavits. In view of the testimony now offered I think that the motion for an injunction should be denied, and that the questions which are at issue should be left to final hearing upon proofs.

The motion for a preliminary injunction is denied.

Case No. 299.

AMERICAN DREDGING CO. v. The BEDOWIN.

[37 Leg. Int. 52; 26 Int. Rev. Rec. 38.]¹

District Court, D. New Jersey. Dec. 10, 1879.

ADMIRALTY—PRACTICE—COLLISION—DREDGE AT ANCHOR.

1. Where a case turns upon the negligence of the respondent, and the negligence appears from the admissions of the answer, the libellant may ask for a hearing without further proofs.

2. Dredging machines lawfully engaged in improving navigation, have the rights of a vessel at anchor.

3. Where a collision occurs—one of the vessels being at anchor—the presumption is, that the other vessel is at fault; and must make full compensation for the damages, unless the accident was inevitable.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem for collision, by the American Dredging Company, owners of the steam dredge Baltic, against the steamship Bedowin, her engines, etc. On libellant's motion for an interlocutory decree. Granted.]

J. Warren Coulston, for libellant.

H. G. Ward and M. P. Henry, for respondent.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a motion for an interlocutory decree against the respondent, upon the libel and answer.

Although not according to the usual practice in the admiralty, the advocate for the libellant claims that where the case turns upon the negligence of the respondent, and the negligence clearly appears from the admission in the answer, it becomes not only the privilege, but the duty, of the libellant, to ask for a hearing without any further proofs. Such a course, doubtless, is sanctioned by the late Judge Conkling, in his Treatise on the Jurisdiction, Law, and Practice in Admiralty, (volume 2, p. 256,) where it is said: "If the answer of the defendant contains admission of the allegations of the libel to an extent sufficient, in the opinion of the libellant, to supersede the necessity of proof, he may at once have the cause set down for hearing upon the libel and answer alone. No good reason is perceived why such a practice should not be allowed. What the effect would be of finding against the libellant on the motion, need not be discussed or decided until the question arises.

The allegations of the libel substantially are, that the dredge "Baltic" is a floating vessel, supplied with steam power, machinery, and apparatus to dredge and deepen waters; that on the 17th day of July, 1879, about half-past three in the afternoon, she was anchored, with three anchors out and two spuds down, holding her firm and fast, and engaged at work in the business of dredging the channel of the Patapsco river, in the state of Maryland, below Hawkins' Point, under a contract with the government of the United States, to improve the navigation of the said river; that whilst thus engaged the steamship "Bedowin," loaded and bound out, was steaming down the river, and came into collision with the dredge, head on, and striking her with such force and violence as to do her considerable damage; that the collision occurred when the weather was fair and clear, in broad daylight, and with water of sufficient depth on all sides of the dredge to admit of the passing of vessels going up and down the river with absolute safety, and that it was caused solely by the negligence, carelessness, and want of proper skill and management of those in charge of the steamship.

The answer avers that the "Bedowin" is of 1,990 tons registered tonnage, 295 feet in length, and at the time of the collision was loaded with wheat for Havre, France, and drawing 21 feet and 9 inches forward, and 21 feet 11 inches aft; that she was in the charge of a duly licensed pilot, and had been going down the river at half speed, which was about five knots an hour; that just before she reached the dredge she put her helm a-port to clear some shipping in the river; that as there was not water enough in the channel to pass the dredge on the starboard, she put her wheel hard-a-starboard with the intention of passing the dredge on the port side; but that she was then sucking the bottom, and continued on her course without responding to her helm; that perceiving a collision was imminent, the engines of the steamship were stopped, and then reversed full speed astern; but that, notwithstanding the efforts of the pilot and those on board to prevent it, she struck the dredge, causing some damage, but not to the extent complained of. It denies the allegation of the libel that there was water enough on either side of the dredge for vessels to pass up and down the river with absolute safety, but admits that there was sufficient on the port side; and also denies that the accident was the result of any want of care on the part of the steamship, but attributes it to the narrowness and direction of the channel, and especially to the position of the dredge, which made safe navigation under the circumstances impossible.

The dredge was anchored, and therefore incapable of getting out of the way. An attempt was made on the argument to refuse to dredging machines the privileges of a vessel at anchor, but the supreme court has clearly recognized their right to occupy the channels of rivers when lawfully there to improve the navigation. See The Virginia Ehrman, 97 U. S. 309. The libellant's dredge was fixed in the channel, engaged in widening and deepening it under a contract with the government of the United States, as appears by the production of said contract to the court, by the consent of the parties in the hearing. Being lawfully there at anchor, and without fault, the libellant is entitled to full compensation for the damage received by the dredge, unless the collision occurred from inevitable accident. Id. 310. I think it is fairly to be inferred, from what is contained as well as from what is omitted in the answer, that the accident was not inevitable, and that the libellant is entitled to a decree without going to the proofs. In cases of collision, where one of the vessels is at anchor and the other in motion, the presumption always is that the latter is in fault. This is emphatically the case where the moving vessel is a steamer, which is more absolutely under control than a sailing craft. The burden of proof is therefore upon the respondent. What excuse does the answer make? The collision was in the middle of a pleasant afternoon. The dredge was in open sight, and the steamship was under the direction of a licensed pilot, whose profession and business it was to know the channel and the depth of the water, and to be in readiness for any emergency that might arise from the steamer "smelling the bottom." The answer admits that she was of heavy draft, and claims that the channel was narrow and the navigation difficult, and yet there seems to have been no exercise of carefulness or any request to the dredge to move out of the way, or any attempt to stop the steamer until the danger of collision was imminent. It was then too late to avert the accident, and I must hold the respondent responsible for the consequences of such want of care.

Let an interlocutory decree be entered for the libellant, and a reference be made to the clerk as commissioner, to ascertain and report the damage sustained by the dredge and her owners by reason of the collision.

Case No. 301.

The AMERICAN EAGLE.

The FOREST CITY.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1870.

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAMERS—SAILING WITHOUT LIGHTS—RULES BY SUPERVISING INSPECTORS OF STEAMBOATS.

1. The supervising inspectors of steamboats have power, by law, to make regulations not inconsistent with the general laws of navigation, for steamers passing each other.

[Cited in U. S. v. Miller, 26 Fed. 97.]

2. Rule one adopted by the inspectors, so far as it purports to authorize pilots to disregard the general law concerning vessels meeting end on, is void.

3. A pilot who obeys the inspectors' rule does so at his own risk, if it turns out that he has disobeyed the law.

4. If a vessel is sailing at night without lights she is prima facie in fault.

5. So if she has no lookout forward.

In admiralty. Collision. The libel first in date was brought by the owners of the steamer Forest City, a large coasting vessel which plies between Portland and Boston, against the steam-tug American Eagle, for a collision in the harbor of Boston, at a quarter before six o'clock on Christmas morning, 1869. In the other case the parties were reversed. The steamer was coming up the main channel towards East Boston, heading northwest, intending to sweep round near the Grand Junction wharves and proceed to her dock at India wharf. This is the usual course for large steamers when the tide is ebb. The tug was coming down from East Boston towards Dorchester, heading southeast, and was lashed to the port side of a schooner loaded with coal. Neither the schooner nor the tug had any lights, because the master of the tug, who had the entire control of the navigation of both vessels, thought they would be of no use in so light a night. The officers of the steamer saw the tug and schooner, but swore that they could not make out that they were in motion, and after they found out that fact, were uncertain in which direction they were moving. When they saw that the vessels were approaching each other, the steamer's men sounded their steam-whistle once, which is the signal to go to the right; and they all swore that they distinctly heard one whistle and only one from the tug; the steamer's helm was put to port, but they soon after discovered that the tug had starboarded, and was swinging in the same direction with themselves. They then stopped and reversed their engine, but the vessels came together, and the bow of the schooner struck the port side of the steamer about thirty feet from her stern. The place of meeting was a few hundred feet ahead of the school-ship. On the part of the tug, the evidence was equally clear and positive that she sounded her whistle twice, as a signal to go to the left, and heard no reply from the steamer, but discovered the mistake and stopped and reversed.

G. O. Shattuck, for the tug.

LOWELL, District Judge. By twenty-ninth section of the act of 30 August, 1852. (10 Stat. 72,) and the ninth section of the act of 1866, as amended by that of 1867, (14 Stat. 228, 411,) the supervising inspectors of steamboats are empowered to make rules, not inconsistent with the navigation laws of the United States, for the government of certain domestic steam vessels in passing each other; and the rules have been made and revised from time to time, and duly promulgated, and both parties in this case appear to have had these rules in mind and to have intended to follow them. Of the latest revision, that of January, 1869, the first rule is that where steamers are approaching each other head and head, or nearly so, it shall be the duty of each to pass to the right, and the pilot of either steamer may be the first to determine to pursue this course, and thereupon shall give one short and distinct blast of his steam-whistle, which the other pilot shall promptly answer. So far the rule is in accordance with the act of congress for preventing collisions, and seems well calculated to aid in its observance. It then proceeds: "But if the course of such steamers is so far on the starboard of each other as not to be considered by the pilots as meeting head and head, or nearly so, or if the vessels are approaching each other in such a manner that passing to the right, as above directed, is deemed unsafe by the pilot of either vessel, the pilot so first deciding shall immediately give two short and distinct blasts of his steam-whistle, which the pilot of the other steamer shall answer promptly by two similar blasts of his steam-whistle, and they shall then pass to the left, or on the starboard side of each other."

The attempt by the tug to carry out the second part of this rule was a prominent cause of the collision. It so happened that her pilot, instead of being the first to decide to go to the left, actually made the decision at the same moment that the steamer's pilot determined to follow the general rule, and so they both turned in the same direction and came together. It is argued very forcibly that here was an attempt by both parties, acting in good faith, and with equal diligence, to observe the same regulation, and that it cannot be imputed to either as a fault that the regulation failed to meet the case; but that the accident, humanly speaking, was inevitable. On the other side, it is urged that the rule itself is void, because the act of congress positively requires both vessels to go to the right. If the rule is to be construed to mean that when steam vessels are actually meeting end on, or nearly so, either pilot may decide to disobey the statute, and may thereupon compel the other to do so, it is null. But if it be intended, as the argument for the tug insists, only for those cases in which the vessels are not in fact meeting at all, but in a situation in which they would pass clear to the starboard of each other, and gives to the pilot who first discovers this to be so the power to notify the other not to go to the right, but to keep on or a little to the left, it may be a useful and proper regulation. But suppose the steamers are meeting, and do meet, notwithstanding that the two whistles are heard and acted on, it seems impossible to maintain that the pilot who notified and required a departure from the usual course did not do so at his own risk. The serious objection to the rule is, that it gives the decision to one vessel exclusively upon a point on which the law casts it upon both. Of course, there will remain the case in which the pilot who decides to go to the left finds some obstacle or danger in the other course, which is unknown to the pilot who is meeting him. This exceptional case excepted, it seems to me that he who deviates from the law must assume the responsibility. By making the decision he guarantees its propriety, that is, that the vessels are not meeting. The tug did not even obey the rules of the inspectors, of which the third is, that if the pilot of either vessel fails to understand the course or intentions of the other, whether from the signals being erroneously answered or from other causes, the pilot so in doubt shall immediately signify the same by giving several short and rapid blasts of the steam-whistle, and if the vessels shall have approached within half a mile of each other, both shall be immediately slowed, &c. The master of the tug did not give these short and sharp blasts, and the obligation rested upon him to do so, because he knew that his signal had not been answered, while the steamer's pilot had good reason to believe and did believe that his signal had been answered, and so was off his guard. He says there was no time; but the evidence on both sides seems to show that the vessels were more than half a mile apart when the signals were given.

The tug and tow had not the lights required by law. The witnesses on both sides say that the night was bright and clear, and that a vessel could be seen two or three miles off. But those of the steamer swear positively that they were for some time in doubt whether the schooner and tug were under way, and in what direction. If this is true, and I see no reason to doubt it, the want of lights contributed to the collision, because the steamer's whistle was sounded as soon as her pilot found that the other vessel was coming towards him, and it would probably have been sounded earlier had this fact been made out earlier. I cannot exonerate the party who has failed in a statute obligation, unless it is plain that the fault has had no effect on the disaster. Then, again, there is no evidence of a lookout on the forward part of the schooner. If there had been the tug might have whistled earlier. There appears to have been a series of unfortunate coincidences by which each vessel discovered the direction of the other at the same moment, and that, possibly, a somewhat late one. But one had the lights and the lookout, and the other had neither. I consider, therefore, that the latter must be held to be in fault, independently of any question of the course pursued after the danger was discovered. I do not choose to rest my decision upon the narrow ground that the tug did not, in fact, whistle first; because her pilot had no reason to know that; but I feel bound to hold that his want of lights and of lookout may probably have contributed to the accident by retarding the action of both parties; and if not, and the whistles were sounded in good season, then he disobeyed rule three, and neglected to give instant notice that something was wrong, a fact which the other pilot had not the same reason to suspect. Either way the tug is responsible. And I may add that if the time was so very short as not to admit of a correction of signals, I doubt very much whether the pilot could be justified in going to the left under rules which evidently contemplate a much earlier action. 3. The "public and common use" in the United States necessary, under the sixth section of the act of March 3, 1839, to invalidate a patent for an invention previously patented in a foreign country, is a common and general use by the community.

4. What would amount to such use depends upon the nature of the invention patented.

5. It is not necessary that the drawings of a patent should be capable of use as working drawings, or that a machine made according to the exact scale of the drawings should be an operative machine. It is sufficient that the invention be so described and shown that one skilled in the art to which it relates would be able, by the aid of the description and drawings, to embody the invention in an operative and efficient form.

6. Where, in a suit for infringement of a patent, no question is made by the pleadings as to the novelty and originality of the patented invention, and the prior use relied on in defence is a use by the inventor or under his license, it is not necessary to give notice of the persons so using the invention, or the places where it was used.

7. If an inventor has abandoned his invention to the public, his right to a patent therefor is irrevocably lost.

Francestown Soapstone Co., 2 Fed. 80, to the point that, to work a forfeiture of a patent by a sale more than two years prior to the application for the patent, the thing sold need not have been perfect in the mechanical sense, but only in that it embodied the completed invention in a form which would be operative.]

At law. This was an action on the case, tried by Judge Shepley and a jury, and brought [by the American Hide & Leather Splitting & Dressing Machine Company against the American Tool & Machine Company and George H. Fox] to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent for an "improvement in leather-splitting machines," granted to Joseph F. Flanders and his assignee, Enos G. Allen, August 14, 1860, [No. 29,649.] The patented invention was an improvement upon and particularly applicable to leather-splitting machines, in which was employed a "belt-knife," consisting of an endless band of steel having a cutting edge and made to run over two pulleys like a belt, which was the subject of invention described in letters patent granted to the said Joseph F. Flanders and one Jeremiah A. Marden, August 29, 1854. The nature of the invention set forth in the patent of 1860, in controversy, is indicated by the following language of the the specification: "In machines for splitting leather it has been found extremely difficult, on account of the varying thickness of the hide, to cut or split the grain of uniform thickness throughout, the tendency to form an irregular cut being increased by the weight of the split which drags the leather downward from the knife. The essential feature of my invention consists in a novel arrangement of devices whereby these objections are entirely obviated, the uniformity of the thickness of the grain being invariably secured, whatever may be the irregularities of the leather to be split. The desired result is effected by the use of a sectional roll, consisting of rings hung loosely upon a shaft immediately under the leather and made to have an upward bearing thereon by means of an India-rubber roll, or other suitable elastic bearing that presses upward against the rings. This arrangement constitutes in effect an elastic bearing to the leather, consisting of a series of separate and independent springs that possess all the necessary elastic force and yet are remarkably free to play, much more so than any ordinary arrangement of springs, thereby affording a yielding and elastic bearing to every inequality or indentation of the leather, and one that is peculiarly sensitive thereto. Although the sectional roll may be placed directly over the elastic roll, I prefer to place it a little to one side of the vertical axis thereof, as when placed in the same vertical line, the rings, by the motion of the rubber roll, have a tendency to crowd back and then to snap forcibly back against the leather, which prevents the cut from being uniform. What I claim as my invention, and desire to have secured to me by letters patent, is: First. The arrangement of sectional rollers for the direct or immediate support of the hide, or leather, at the delivery of the same to the edge of the circulating knife in combination with a roller located below the sectional roller and constructed as described with elastic surface and fixed bearings. Second. Placing the sectional roll to one side of the vertical axis of the elastic roll as described.

The evidence tended to show the following facts: This invention was made by Flanders as early as July, 1855, while endeavoring to improve the construction of a leather-splitting machine embodying the improvements secured by the prior patent of Flanders and Marden. In January, 1856, he and the other owners of that patent sold it to a corporation known as the American Leather Splitting Company, which proceeded to manufacture machines embodying not only the improvement patented to Flanders and Marden, August 29, 1854, but also the other improvements which afterward formed the subject matter of the Flanders and Allen patent of August 14, 1860. During the fall of 1856, one or two of these machines were publicly exhibited in operation at the factory of the Patent Tanning Company, in Newark, New Jersey, and were offered for sale to the public; and before April, 1858, the American Leather Splitting Company made the following sales of such machines, viz: one to the Chadwick Patent Leather Manufacturing Company at Newark, in December, 1856; one to Joseph Byron, at West Roxbury, Massachusetts, in March, 1857; one to J. H. and T. W. Dawson, at Newark, in the spring of 1857; one to Julius S. Shailer, at Roxbury, Massachusetts, in the summer of 1857; another to the Chadwick Patent Leather Manufacturing Company, at Newark, in February, 1858, and one to R. Ward & Co., at Newark, in March, 1858. All these sales were made with the full knowledge and consent of Flanders, who owned largely in the capital stock of the American Leather Splitting Company, and acted in its behalf to exhibit these machines and to procure the sale of them, and in fact set up and put into operation the four machines above mentioned that were sold at Newark. In March, 1858, Flanders procured Samuel Cooper, a patent solicitor of Boston, to solicit for him an English patent for a leather-splitting machine, containing the very improvements which were afterward set forth and claimed in the letters patent of the United States, granted to Flanders and Allen, August 14, 1860. This English patent was granted and sealed June 25, 1858, to one William Edward Newton, an English resident, who acted as Cooper's agent and who held the patent for Flanders' sole benefit. In July, 1858, Flanders sold another of these machines to William Pyle, of Wilmington, Delaware, and in October, 1858, he entered into a written agreement to sell such machines on commission for Pyle, who had then bought the exclusive rights under the Flanders and Marden patent for the states of Massachusetts, New York, and New Jersey. Before the year 1860, there had been in all about ten of these machines sold and put in operation, of which, at the date of this trial, two at least were still in use, and the remainder had been continued in use for different lengths of time from one to five years, and the machine sold by Flanders to Pyle, in July, 1858, was employed so constantly and efficiently that there were split by it on an average, from that time until July, 1861, some ten thousand hides per year. The machines made and sold prior to 1860 were, however, not well constructed nor well proportioned. They needed constant repair, and underwent many alterations in their working parts to improve their mechanical operation and means of adjustment; but, nevertheless, no substantial change was ever made in the arrangement and mode of operation of the sectional roller and the rubber roller upon which it rested, after the first machine had been exhibited in successful operation at Newark, in the fall of 1856. In 1860, George H. Fox & Co. bought of William Pyle the exclusive rights secured by the Flanders and Marden patent, within and throughout the state of Massachusetts, and a year or two afterward they also bought the exclusive rights under the same patent for the state of New York, all of which they at a later date sold and transferred to the American Tool and Machine Company, which further secured to itself the same rights under the extension of that patent; and the bell knife leather splitting machines that have been manufactured and sold into use by these owners—who are the defendants in this case—have been greatly superior to the earlier machines in their mechanical construction. There was also testimony that, at the time of the trial, there were about forty of these machines in operation within the United States; that they were expensive machines both to construct and to keep in repair; and that the number of places in the country where they could be employed to advantage was comparatively few. The date of Flanders' application for the patent granted to him and Allen was April 11, 1860.

George L. Roberts, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge, [charging jury.] This is an action brought by the American Hide and Leather Splitting and Dressing Machine Company, as plaintiff, against the American Tool and Machine Company and George H. Fox, as defendants, for an alleged infringement of letters-patent of the United States, granted Aug. 14, 1860, to Joseph F. Flanders, the alleged inventor, jointly with one Enos G. Allen, to whom Flanders had assigned one-half of his interest prior to the issue of the letters-patent, which, by mesne assignments, are alleged to have passed to the plaintiff corporation before the date of the infringement complained of. The defendants do not deny, and for the purposes of this trial it is admitted, that they made and sold one machine embodying the invention described and claimed in the letters-patent declared on; and that, therefore, they have infringed the plaintiff's rights, unless they have established by evidence one or more of the defences set forth in their special pleas, or have proved to the satisfaction of the jury one or more of the special matters in defence of which they gave notice under the statute. The principal grounds of defence relied upon in this case are: First, that the invention was in public use and on sale, with the knowledge and consent of the inventor, more than two years prior to his application for a patent; second, that he had abandoned the invention to the public prior to his application for a patent; and, third, that the same invention had been patented by him in England more than six months prior to his application for a patent in the United States, and had been introduced into public and common use within the United States prior to his application for a patent in the United States.

Now, as to the first of these three grounds of defence, the act of March 3, 1839, modified the law of patents as it existed under the act of 1836, and as it had previously existed with regard to the public use of the invention prior to the application for a patent. Since the act of March 3, 1839 (except in case of proof of abandonment to the public, or what perhaps would be a better term, dedication to the public, though I have used the words of the statute), no purchase, sale, or use of the invention invalidates a patent, unless such purchase, sale, or use has been for more than two years prior to the application for a patent; but a public use or sale of the invention, with the knowledge and consent of the inventor more than two years prior to his application, does invalidate a patent and make it void. The burden of proof is always on the defendant who sets up such prior sale or use; and he must show it to have been with the knowledge and consent of the inventor, and to have been public in the ordinary way of a public use or sale of a machine, and not to have been a use for the mere purposes of experiment. But if it is in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the inventor more than two years prior to his application for a patent, and not in use merely for the purposes of experiment, then, as I have already instructed you, the patent is void. I shall have occasion to call your attention more particularly to this matter hereafter, when I come to refer to the special instructions which have been asked for in relation to some of the questions arising with regard to public use and to abandonment. In this view of the law, gentlemen, what is the testimony in relation to the public use and sale of this invention more than two years prior to the application? The date of the application for this patent is April 11, 1860. About that, there is no controversy. The question, then, under the first branch of defence, for you to consider, is, whether this invention was in public use or on sale with the knowledge and consent of the inventor prior to April 11, 1858. Such public use, within the statute applicable to this branch of the defence, may be by the inventor himself, of one machine, or by any other person, with his knowledge and consent or approval. I do not instruct you, as matter of law, that such public use or sale of one machine would necessarily involve it; but I say the jury are authorized, if they find one machine to have been in public use or on sale, with the knowledge and consent of the inventor, more than two years prior to his application for a patent, to find that sufficient to make the patent void. This is distinguishable from the "public and common use," which I shall have occasion to refer to hereafter, and which makes a patent void if it continues for more than six months before the patent is applied for in this country after the inventor has taken out one in England. That "public and common use" is a different use from the "public use" referred to in the sixth section of the statute of 1839.

It is not my purpose or intention, gentlemen, to recapitulate to you the testimony in this case, but only to call your attention to enough of the evidence, on either side, to enable you to understand the application to that testimony of the principles of law which I shall state to you. The Flanders and Marden patent of Aug. 29, 1854, was obtained for the rotating knife, which has been explained to you and exhibited in the drawings and models. Under that patent, which passed through successive mesne conveyances into the possession of a corporation bearing the name of the American Leather-Splitting Company, to the titles of which the present plaintiff corporation is the successor, the first machine which was constructed by the inventor, Flanders, originally contained only the application of this rotating knife to an old machine which was then in existence; and this first machine, as he constructed it, contained apparently no new device except that of the rotating knife; but before he conveyed his interest in this patent and in the machine, which was then in the process of manufacture and perfection, to his sub-owners, and before they conveyed to the American Leather-Splitting Company, the device of the sectional rollers and the rubber roller, according to the testimony as I understand it, and as I understand it to be uncontradicted, was inserted in the machine which passed to them; and if I understand the testimony rightly, the American Leather-Splitting Company never made, never sold, never put on sale or exhibition, or had manufactured, any machine that did not contain this device of the sectional rollers and the yielding elastic rubber roller upon which they rested.

With the exception of the first machine which went into Sibley's shop, in Hawley street, and which was never sold to the public, but was only being manufactured for the purpose of experiment, some time in the year 1855, I have failed to see any evidence in this case (you will judge, gentlemen) that any machine was ever made by Flanders, by his grantees, or by anybody under that patent, or was ever put upon sale or upon exhibition, which did not contain the device of the sectional rollers and the rubber roller, substantially as set forth in the subsequent patent of Aug. 14, 1860; that is to say, according to the testimony of witnesses examined on the respective sides, the device of the sectional rollers, resting upon this rubber roller which had a fixed axis of revolution so as to embody the principle of adapting the under surface upon which the leather rested to the inequalities of the thickness of the leather to be split, so that, however unequal the under surface might be, the upper surface should always be in a line parallel with the gauge-roller above it, so that the knife should cut from the leather a slice or layer or stratum, which should be of uniform thickness. I say, there is no question in this testimony, so far as I have seen, that this device of the sectional rollers with the rubber roller, thus put in for that purpose, was in every machine that ever was held out here to the public as a leather-splitting machine under the Flanders and Marden patent. That does not make it certain that this device passed by title to the American Leather-Splitting Company, or that it ever came by mesne assignments down to the present company, who are the successors to the title of that company in the Flanders and Marden patent. It does not follow, because that device was in those early machines, that it ever came to the defendants, who own the rights under that patent in two states, or in the state of Massachusetts, which is enough for the present inquiry. These defendants have no record title. I instruct you that they have no record title to Flanders's invention of this device under the conveyances which have been read to you. Flanders did not undertake to convey to those under whom they claim title any thing; but what his patent of Aug. 29, 1854, described, and that was his rotating knife. But then, gentlemen of the jury, you are to inquire whether he did or did not at the same time convey to them a machine embodying this device, and whether he did or did not, as a stockholder in the American Leather-Splitting Company, and as their agent, under the patent and rights so conveyed to them, introduce to the public and put on sale and in public use a machine embodying this invention, which he has described in the patent of Aug. 14, 1860. And if you find that prior to April 11, 1858, that corporation, with his knowledge and consent or allowance, or that he himself, acting as the representative and agent of that corporation, sold one or more of these machines, embodying not only the invention which he had described in the Flanders and Marden patent, but also the device referred to in the first two claims of the patent of Aug. 14, 1860, and called here the sectional rollers and rubber roller; and if you further find that the machine thus put in public use and on sale prior to April 11, 1858, was, so far as the invention of that device was concerned, an effective, operative, and useful machine; that is, that the machine successfully, for practical use, split leather, holding it up to its proper position to be split by the operation of the devices described in the patent of Aug. 14, 1860, so as to retain the upper surface of the leather in a line parallel with the cutting knife and so as to cut the upper portion of the leather of a uniform thickness without regard to the inequalities in the thickness of the under portion: then the patent obtained by him afterward for the invention of this device was void; and it would be a fraud upon the public, to whom those machines had been sold, and a fraud upon that corporation whom he had thus allowed to incorporate and sell this device in those machines, for him to attempt to set up this patent against them.

Much has been said to you about the rights and claims of the inventors. An inventor has no right to his invention at common law. He has no right of property in it originally. The right which he derives is a creature of statute and of grant, and is subject to certain conditions incorporated in the statutes and in the grants. If to-day you should invent an art, a process, or a machine, you have no right at common law, nor any absolute natural right, to hold that for seven, ten, fourteen, or any given number of years, against one who should invent it to-morrow, without any knowledge of your invention, and thus cut me and everybody else off from the right to do to-morrow what you have done to-day. There is no absolute right, or natural right at common law, that I, being the original and first inventor to-day, have to prevent you and everybody else from inventing and using to-morrow or next day the same thing. But there is a statutory right, a public grant of a monopoly, which does enable you or me to do this. If we are the original and first inventors, the law secures to us a monopoly of the invention for a given number of years, upon certain conditions; and one of those conditions is, that we shall not put this invention on sale or in public use, and then, after the lapse of more than two years, treat as infringers everybody else who has it in public use or on sale, and who may not have it by grant from us. The condition is no more inequitable than the grant itself. The patentee gets his right to the patent, not on the ground of any inherent natural right which he has, or right at common law, but because he is entitled to it by the terms of the statute of the United States which gives it to him; and, therefore, he has no rights except in compliance with those terms and upon those conditions. Now, gentlemen, you will apply these principles to the consideration of the testimony in this case. You will consider, in the first place, whether these machines were put on sale or in public use prior to April 11, 1858; whether Flanders knew it, and allowed it, or consented to it. You will then consider whether the machines which he had in use and on sale, if any, or which were put on sale and in public use prior to April 11, 1858, with his consent or allowance, embraced and embodied the devices and the invention described in the letters-patent of Aug. 14, 1860. If you find they did, you will then consider whether those machines so put on sale or in public use were effective, operative, successful machines, competent to do the work which that invention was calculated and intended to perform; and then you will consider whether such machines were put on sale or into public use as matters of profit and gain, or whether it was for the mere purpose of experiment and perfecting the invention.

I instruct you upon this point that if Flanders, with the consent of those to whom he had sold the Flanders and Marden patent for the rotating knife, or with the consent of the purchaser from them of a machine embodying that invention, attached to that machine an invention which he had made separate and distinct from the invention described in that patent; and if he put it on for the mere purpose of experiment, to see whether it would work, and with the view of perfecting it as a separate invention, and not for the purpose of rendering the machine which had been sold perfect as an operative machine; that would not be such a public use or sale as would invalidate his patent, or deprive him of the right to a patent. In that view, gentlemen, you will take into consideration the testimony which has been introduced to you. Is there or is there not any evidence in this case, that when these machines were exhibited in the tanning company's office, in Newark, New Jersey, when they were sold to the Chadwick Company, to Dawson, and to Byron, any of these parties were informed by Flanders, who is testified here to have had intimate knowledge of all these sales and of the operation and working of these machines, that in purchasing them of the corporation which then owned the Flanders and Marden patent, they were not obtaining the right to use the whole machine and all the devices embodied in it, or that there was any particular device attached to the machine for the mere purpose of experiment and test? What was the operation which was going on when Flanders was endeavoring to perfect that machine in these different workshops and factories in which he had placed it in use and on sale? Has it or has it not, been proved here that those machines were sold, in some instances the sale not to take effect until the machine was an effective working machine? Was or was he not, laboring to make those machines under the Flanders and Marden patent operative and successful? And was he or not, experimenting with a view to make these machines under that patent successful; or was he experimenting with a view to perfect another device and invention, in which none of the owners of those machines, Chadwick, Byron, Dawson, Shailer, or any of those grantees, was to have any right or interest?

Language has been used by the court in regard to such use of a device, before the obtaining of a patent, which seems to me particularly applicable to this case. I refer to the case of Sanders v. Logan, [Case No. 12,295:] "It is clear, therefore, that assuming that Sanders was the sole inventor of the machine as perfected in 1845, with Justus's assistance, yet that he was not entitled to a patent for the same. The evidence established a clear case of abandonment; and, moreover, that the invention was publicly used, with the knowledge, consent, and approbation of the complainant more than two years previous to his application for a patent. The allegation that these machines were made and incorporated into so many mills all over the country for the purposes of experiment, is too absurd to be entertained for a moment." Now, is it or is it not true in this case, that wherever the Flanders and Marden machine was used, wherever it was exhibited, and wherever it was sold, there was attached to it the invention or device described in the patent of Aug. 14, 1860? I do not understand that there is any controversy on that point. I have not heard any evidence that any machine was ever set up, sold, exhibited, or put in use, which did not contain this device, with one single exception. It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff that all the machines did not contain this device in the manner referred to in the second claim of the patent of Aug. 14, 1860, because it is contended that a perpendicular plane which would pass through the axis upon which the rubber roller revolved would be coincident with the perpendicular plane which passed through the axis upon which the sectional rings revolved; while, on the part of the defendants, it is contended that in some of the machines, if not in all of them, which were thus sold, the perpendicular planes passing through the respective axes of the rubber roller and the sectional roller were not coincident. In the one case, the two cylinders would be the one directly over the other; in the other case, they would be at an angle, more or less. That is a question upon which you have testimony here from the different parties; it has been very fully and ably commented upon by the respective counsel, and therefore it is unnecessary for me to recapitulate.

Then the next question is: If these machines were thus put upon sale and into use, were they constructed so as to operate successfully? Mr. Shailer, one of the witnesses, for instance, testifies that he used one of them for a number of years; that it had everything in it which it has now, and was as good a machine as it is now; that he split leather with it for himself, and took leather in to split by it. He says: "When we first had it, the two axes were nearly in the same perpendicular plane. Afterward, we altered the axes toward an inch apart from each other; namely, the plane of the axis of the sectional roller an inch from the plane of the axis of the rubber roller. After exhibiting it several weeks, we sold one machine. After we made these alterations, the machine worked as well as the machine now does. The one sold to the Chadwick Company," he says, "worked admirably. Whenever the knife was in proper position, we did splitting as well as it could be done. The machine has been but very little improved since." Several other witnesses have testified as to the amount and quality of the work that the machine did. But there is another matter which it is proper for you to consider, as affecting the question whether this was a successful and operative machine, working well; and that is this: It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff, that, although these machines may have embodied the devices described in both these patents, the machines which were put on sale and in public use were not perfect machines; that perfection had not been attained; and that they were put on sale in a crude and unfinished condition, for experiment. It is not for you to consider upon this point whether this whole machine used for splitting leather was or was not a perfect machine in the sense in which "perfect" is usually understood. You are to consider whether the machine, so far as it covers these devices, was or was not a perfect machine, so far as these devices are concerned. You are to consider whether it was perfect in the sense that it embodied a completed invention, and not whether it was perfect in mechanical execution, as you might expect a machine to be in its most highly finished state of mechanical perfection. A perfect machine, in that sense of the word "perfect," means a perfected invention; not a perfectly constructed machine, but a machine so constructed as to embody all the essential elements of the invention, in a form that would make them practical and operative so as to accomplish the result. But it is not necessary that it should accomplish that result in the most perfect manner and be in a condition where it was not susceptible of a higher degree of perfection in its mere mechanical construction. If, therefore, you find that prior to April 11, 1858, this machine was put in public use and on sale, with the consent and allowance of Flanders; if you find that it did embody the devices and invention described in the patent of Aug. 14, 1860; and if you find that it embodied all of that invention in a form that was practical, operative, and useful: then it is a bar to this patent, and the patent is void.

The next ground of defence is an alleged abandonment to the public. That does not differ very materially, so far as its application to this case is concerned, from the question of public use and sale, except that the abandonment to the public, in the sense in which it is here used, need not be two years before the date of the application for the patent: it may be afterward, although the presumption always is against an abandonment to the public by a patentee after he has applied for his patent. But he can do so; he can do so within two years; he can do so at any time. It is a matter that may be proved, but it is never to be presumed. A person is sometimes said to have abandoned his invention when he gives up the idea; abandons it in the popular sense; relinquishes the intention of perfecting his invention, so that another person may take up the same thing and become the original and first inventor. But that is not the kind of abandonment that is referred to here. There is another kind of abandonment; and that is where a party, having made an invention, allows the public to use it, with his knowledge and consent; allows it to be incorporated into other machines with his knowledge and consent, and to be used by anybody without objection; as, for instance, if you should invent a machine, put it into public use and sell it to everybody who chose to buy it, and if you should attach to that machine another invention of yours, and allow everybody who chose to buy that and use it, without objection on your part, with your consent, with your permission, with your allowance, not for the mere purpose of experiment, but for the purpose of profit and gain, that would be an abandonment of it to the public; and you could not afterward rightfully, honestly, honorably, legally, take out a patent for that invention. "The question arises upon this provision, then, whether the particular purchase, sale, or prior use may of itself, under some circumstances, furnish proof of abandonment to the public, or whether such an abandonment must be proved by other cases, or by other evidence dehors the particular purchase, sale, or prior use, that happens to be in question. The obvious construction of the act is, that a purchase, sale, or prior use before the application for a patent, shall not invalidate it, unless it amounts to an abandonment to the public; a purchase, sale, or prior use shall not have this effect, per se, but, if connected with facts which show an abandonment to the public, or if it has been for more than two years prior to the application, it will have this effect." Curt. Pat. (Ed. 1867,) pp. 417, 418, § 393: I read this to you, because these are not merely the words of the text-writer, but the exact words of the decision of the court as to the construction of this clause of the act of 1839. The other ground of defence set up here is, that this invention had been patented in England more than six months prior to the application for a patent in the United States, and had been introduced into public and common use in the United States prior to that application. Upon that I am requested by the plaintiff's counsel to instruct you that "section 6 of the act of 1839 must be construed in connection with section 7 of the same act, and that the purchase, sale, or prior use named in section 7 differs from the public and common use named in section 6, or else the two are incompatible." That alternative I need not put in; but I give you the instruction, that the "public and common use" in the sixth section which has been read to you, and which applies to public and common use prior to the application for an American patent, where there is an English patent procured by the inventor more than six months prior to the application for an American patent, is a different use from the "public use" which I have already explained to you, and which, having obtained for more than two years prior to the application, voids the patent.

This "public and common use" prior to the application in this country, in the case of a foreign patent procured by the inventor more than six months before his application here, must be something more than the mere use of one machine or more by the inventor himself, in public, or by other persons with his consent and allowance. The invention must have passed into general use in the community. To invalidate a patent upon the ground of a prior English patent, the use of the thing patented must not only be public within the United States, but must be a common and general use by the community. There is an obvious reason in my mind for this distinction, which existed in the statute in force up to the act of July 8, 1870, but which does not now exist, because the time has been extended to two years, and the word "common" has been stricken out. In order now to void a patent upon the ground of a prior patent in England, the invention must have been in public use two years prior to the application here, although it is not required to be in common use; but this law was not in force before the act of July 8, 1870, and is not applicable to this case. This case is to be decided upon the construction of the statute of 1839; and I instruct you that the use referred to in the sixth section of that act must be a general use as well as a public use; it must be a common use as well as a public use of the invention which is to void the patent in the United States, if it has been prior to the application here, in case there has been a patent taken out in England by the patentee more than six months before his application here. What would be a common use, however, must be considered with reference to the device invented or the thing patented. What would be a passing into common use of one invention might be a very different thing from what would be a passing into common use with regard to another invention. For instance, a hotel annunciator might be an invention applicable to hotels alone, and useless for any other purpose. Such an invention could never come into common use in the community in the sense in which a friction-match or a paper-collar would, or any other device or invention which was intended to be used by the community. You might, therefore, in the case of the annunciator, consider its use, in a very few instances, a common use, as compared with what would be a common use of a thing designed for the use of every person. So there might be an invention applicable to only one species of manufacture; and if there were only three manufacturers of that particular article in the United States, and each one of these three publicly used the invention, and if they were the only persons who would be likely to use, or whose business would require them to use, such an invention, you might be justified in finding that that invention had passed into public and common use when it became universal with all the persons or in all the manufactories for whose use the invention was designed.

And I instruct you further, that if an inventor obtained an English patent more than six months before he made his application in the United States for a patent for the same invention, and after it had been patented abroad and prior to the application here, that invention passed into public and common use in this community so as to become a part of the manufactures of this country, then whether the persons through whom it had been introduced here had derived their information of it from the English patent, or had invented it themselves, or had derived it from the first inventor himself, the patent would be void. The statute was intended to require the patentee to use reasonable diligence and to fix a proper time within which he must make his application, in justice to the public; so that an invention which has been patented abroad, and has become a matter of public notoriety, and of common knowledge among persons engaged in that art or manufacture, shall not pass into the commerce of the country and into common and daily and public use by the community, and then, after the lapse of any length of time, the party go on and obtain a patent and prosecute the whole community as infringers. Congress has, with propriety, fixed a time which they consider reasonable for the exercise of diligence in this matter; and if you find that this inventor allowed that time to pass by, and that this invention had been introduced into public and common use, into general use in the community, then this patent is void. And in determining what is common and general use, you have a right to take into consideration the nature of the machine, the effects which it is designed to produce, and the number of persons or of manufactories likely to use it, so as to determine whether, in view of all the devices which constitute the characteristics of the invention, and the uses to which it can be, and is designed to be, applied, the use is a general and common and public use, or a private, special use, under a particular grant or license.

I have said, gentlemen of the jury, that I do not intend to recapitulate the testimony in this case. These questions of fact it is your province to determine; and I do not wish you to consider any thing I have said as intended to influence you in your determination of them. I am only endeavoring to give you the principles of law which are to guide you, and which you are to apply to the consideration and determination of these questions of fact. It is for you to find whether, upon the testimony, there has been this public use and sale or not; whether it has been for the length of time, under the circumstances and conditions which I have previously stated to you. It is for you to find whether there has or has not been this abandonment or dedication to the public; and it is for you to find whether or not this invention had been introduced into public and common use prior to the application for a patent, in this country, under the conditions which I have stated to you in relation to the English patent. Whether the English patent is or is not for the same invention, you have had the testimony of experts, and you will have the drawings and models before you. The conflict apparent in the testimony upon that point relates principally to one question, and that is, the practicability of making an operative, effective machine by the aid of the specification and drawings of the English patent. Now it is not necessary, in order to make a patent valid, that the patentee should so make the drawings in his patent that they could be used for working-drawings, or that a machine made in accordance with the exact scale of the drawings, which accompany the patent in the patent office, either in England or in this country, should be an operative machine. It is necessary, however, that the patentee should so describe his invention that a mechanic skilled in the art to which that invention relates would be able by the aid of the description and drawings of the patent to embody that invention in a practical, operative, efficient, and effectual form. That is all that is necessary; and, therefore, if you find, upon a critical examination of these drawings, that there are some slight differences in distance, or in proportion, which, if exactly carried out upon the same scale, in a machine constructed according to the patent, would require modification in order to make the machine operative, that does not affect the question. You are to consider whether, in the light of the testimony which has been introduced to you, on both sides, the English patent does or does not embody what is in the American patent, striking out of consideration those claims in the respective patents, which are not in issue here, and whether, so far as relates to that invention which is in issue here, they are or are not identical.

I. "If the defendants give notice of special matter in defence under the general issue, and rely upon any prior knowledge or use of the thing patented which the statute may contemplate as a defence to the action, they must give the names and places of residence of those whom they intend to prove had any such knowledge, and where such use was had." I have already ruled upon this point; and I instruct you, that, upon the pleadings in this case, there being no question made that the plaintiff's patentee was the original and first inventor, and the prior use relied upon being a prior use only by the inventor himself, or under his license, it is not necessary, in the statutory notice, to give the names of the persons using, or the places where used. I therefore decline to give you the first instruction requested by the plaintiff. In the construction I give to the statute, when a party gives notice of special matter of defence under the general issue, and in that notice sets up priority of invention and of use by others, for the purpose of showing that the patentee was not the original and first inventor, he must in his notice specify the names of the persons using, and the place where used; but if the prior use relied on be a use by the inventor, or by persons with his consent or allowance, then it is not necessary to notify him of the names of the persons using the invention, or of the places where used.

II. The second instruction asked for is, that "abandonment means a general abandonment to the public, and must be shown affirmatively and positively as affecting the interest of the party." I give you that instruction, saying here, that, in the sense in which "abandonment" is used in this connection, it is dedication to the public; a giving up of the claim to monopoly in the invention; and it must be shown affirmatively. The burden is upon the defendants.

III. The next instruction which I am requested to give you is, that "'use and on sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor,' means use and sale of the perfected invention, and not its use in an imperfect and inchoate and experimental condition. If, therefore, in this case the use prior to April 11, 1858, would seem to be that of an invention not perfected, which the inventor was striving to make perfect and practical, it would not be such a use as would work forfeiture, but would be considered experimental only." One portion of that instruction I give you. I do not give you the inferences which are drawn from it. "Use and sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor," does mean use and sale of the perfected invention, and not of the invention in an imperfect, inchoate, and experimental condition. But then, gentlemen, you must distinguish between the invention and the machine which embodies it. The invention may be perfect, and the machine which embodies that invention and several others may be an imperfect machine. In this instance, the imperfection of the rotating knife, which was the subject of another invention in these machines, would not have made this invention imperfect. Suppose that the machine had had a badly cutting knife, or that, in consequence of the imperfection of the jaws which held the knife in place, there had been so much friction that the knife did not operate, it would not be for your consideration here. You must apply this instruction to the devices and mechanism which are the subject of the invention in this patent, and not to the machine embodying several other inventions. So far, then, as relates to this invention, the public use and sale referred to must be of the perfected invention, and not of an experiment, or for the purposes of experiment, or in a merely experimental form.

IV. The next instruction requested is, that "the putting of a device intended to improve the working operation of a patented machine upon such machine, when sold, would not necessarily be such sale of the device as would work abandonment and forfeiture of right to a patent, but might well be put on for experimental purposes, and especially where such is the best, if not the only, means for the inventor to test the practical utility of the device." I give you that substantially. I give it to you in these words: The putting of a device intended to perfect the working operation of a patented machine upon such machine, when sold, would not necessarily imply that the patentee intended to abandon it to the public, or to put it in public use or on sale. But that is a question of fact purely, for your determination. Whether he put it on merely for the purpose of experiment, or put it on and sold it with the rest of the machine, for gain and profit, and let it go into public use, is a question of fact for you to determine.

V. The next instruction asked has reference to the sixth section of the act of 1839, and I have already given it to you.

VI. The next is as follows: "Without regard to section 7. of the act of 1839, if the English machine, as shown, would require experiment and change in regard to the adjustment of the parts, in order to bring it to the perfection of the American machine, as shown, the English patent will not be allowed to work forfeiture of the American patent." I do not give you this instruction in the words in which it is requested, because I think it is ambiguous. I do, however, instruct you, that if the English machine is shown to have required further invention to make it a practical and operative machine, and to embody the same invention which is described in the American patent, it would not work a forfeiture of the American patent. I do not say that, if the English machine would require change or adjustment of its parts, it would not work such forfeiture; because a change or adjustment of its parts might have nothing to do with the question of invention. But if you find that in the English machine there was the same device, the same combination of elements to produce the same results in the same mode, so that there was an identity of invention, then it is immaterial whether it did or did not require more adjustment of parts or mechanical perfection to make it work as well or better than the American machine.

VII. The next instruction I am requested to give you is, that "it is not the policy of the law that an American inventor shall fare worse in his application for an American patent, by reason of his having previously obtained a foreign patent for the same invention, and the same having been published, than if the same thing had been patented abroad by some other person." I decline to give you that, upon the ground that it is not the duty of the court to instruct you as to what the policy of the law is, but only as to its construction.

I am also requested on the part of the defendants to instruct you:

1. "If the jury find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the patent declared on, one machine embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein had, with his knowledge and consent, been sold or openly and publicly used by even one other person, he thereby forfeited his right to the patent." I give you that instruction, with the qualifications which I have already stated, and which are, that experimental use, or use to test it for the purpose of experiment, or for the mere purpose of perfection, not for gain or profit, and with no intention to put it into public use for any other purpose than experiment, is not the public use contemplated by the statute.

2. "If the jury find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the grant of the patent declared on, one or more machines embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein had been sold and publicly used with his knowledge and consent, and if the jury further find that such sale and public use was caused or permitted by the said Flanders for the sake of pecuniary gain and profit directly or indirectly to himself, the same was incompatible with any use for the sake of experiment or trial of the machine, with the view of testing or perfecting it, which the law would allow, and the patent is therefore void." I do not give you that instruction in those words, because it combines a question of law and fact. Whether it is incompatible with the purpose of experiment or not, is a question not for me to determine. But I give it to you in this form: If the jury find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the grant of the patent declared on one or more machines embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein had been sold and publicly used with his knowledge and consent, and if the jury further find that such sale and public use was caused or permitted by the said Flanders for the sake of pecuniary gain and profit directly to himself, and not merely for the sake of experiment and trial, with the view of perfecting the invention, then the patent is void.

3. "If the jury find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the patent declared on one or more machines embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein were sold by him, or with his knowledge and consent, to be publicly used by the purchasers thereof in their ordinary and proper business, and that such machines were then capable of useful operation, when skilfully managed, and were thereupon in fact publicly put into useful operation by the said purchasers, such a sale and use worked a forfeiture of Flanders's right to the grant of a patent for the said invention." That instruction I give you.

4. "If the jury find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the patent declared on one or more machines containing and embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein had been sold by him, or with his knowledge and consent, and if they also find that the said machine or machines after such sale were put into useful operation by the purchaser or purchasers thereof more than two years prior to the said application, the forfeiture of Flanders's right to the grant of the said patent would not be avoided or removed by any alteration, modification, or improvement in the mechanical construction or mode of operation of the said machine or machines, which may have been made between the time of such sale and of such useful operation, provided that when so put into use and operation they continued to embody the said invention." I do not give you this instruction in the exact words in which it is asked, because I have already instructed you upon this subject, carefully distinguishing, what I do not think this so fully distinguishes, such modifications as amount to structural changes from such modifications as amount to mere mechanical perfection of the machine.

5. "If the jury find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the patent declared on one or more machines embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein were sold by him, or with his knowledge and consent, to be used by the purchasers thereof freely and openly in their regular business, and if the jury further find that the said machines were thereafter in fact put into useful operation by the said purchasers, the said patent is invalid, even if the said machine or machines so sold were, before being put into useful operation, modified, altered, or improved, in their mechanical construction or mode of operation in respect to any parts thereof not claimed as new in the said patent." I give you that instruction, substantially, in these words: If you find that more than two years prior to the application of Flanders for the patent declared upon, machines embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein were sold by him, or with his knowledge and consent, to be used by the purchasers, and were freely, openly, and publicly put into useful operation by them, the patent is invalid without regard to any such modification, alteration, or improvement in the other parts of the machine which did not embody any part of this invention and were not claimed as new in this patent.

6. "If the jury find that the English patent granted to Newton, April 27, 1858, was solicited and procured at the instance and request and for the benefit of the said Flanders, and that the specification and drawings thereof set forth substantially the same mechanism, arranged to operate in substantially the same mode as the mechanism set forth and claimed in the patent declared on, and if the jury further find that, prior to the application of the said Flanders for the grant of the said letters-patent declared on, one or more machines embodying the invention therein set forth and claimed had been openly and regularly used by others in the ordinary prosecution of the business of splitting leather in a leather manufactory within the United States, then the said invention had been introduced into public and common use within the meaning of the statute in such case made and provided, and the said Flanders was thereby debarred from obtaining and receiving a valid patent for the same." I do not give you that instruction, because I have already stated to you that the "public and common use" mentioned in the sixth section of the act of 1839 is a different use from the "public use" mentioned in the seventh section, and this instruction seems to contemplate the identity of the two.

7. "If the jury find the facts in respect to the English patent to be as set forth in the sixth instruction prayed for, and the jury further find that within the United States, prior to the application of the said Flanders for the grant of the letters-patent declared on, machines embodying the invention therein set forth and claimed had been put and continued on sale to the public, and some of them had been actually sold to the public and put into open, continuous, and ordinary use by the purchasers thereof, then the said invention had been introduced into public and common use within the meaning of the said statute, and the said patent declared on is invalid." I have given you, gentlemen, what amounts very nearly to the instruction requested here, and I think it supersedes the necessity of my giving you this, because I have given to you full and general instructions as to what would constitute common use, and have stated to you that you had a right as a question of fact, in determining what amounted to common use, to consider the nature of the device, and result intended to be effected by the invention and the machine which embodied it, the number of persons in the community or of manufactories who might use it, and that there might be a common use of one invention which would be a very specific, restricted, and special use of another.

8. "If the jury find the facts in respect to the English patent to be as set forth in the sixth instruction prayed for, and if the jury further find that within the United States, and prior to the application of the said Flanders for the grant of the said patent declared on, machines embodying the invention therein set forth and claimed had been put and continued on sale to the public, and had in fact been sold to the public in numbers sufficient to supply the public demand for the same, and had thereupon been put into open and ordinary use by the purchasers thereof, then the said invention had been thereby introduced into public and common use within the meaning of the statute in such case made and provided, and the grant of a valid patent therefor was prevented." I give you that instruction, omitting the words "open and ordinary use," and substituting the words "public and common use" for them.

9. "In determining how many such machines were sufficient to supply the public demand for the same at any time prior to the said application, the jury may properly take into account the character of the machine itself in respect to its cost of construction, the expense of purchasing and of running it, the number of men then having sufficient knowledge and skill to operate it effectively, and the number of places in the country where it could then have been profitably employed." I have already instructed you that you were entitled to take those elements into consideration in determining what constituted the "common use" of this invention.

10. "If the jury find that, prior to the application of the said Flanders for the patent declared on, machines embodying the invention set forth and claimed therein, and so constructed as to be capable of useful operation, were by others, with the said Flanders's knowledge and consent, put and continued on sale, and in fact sold and put into public use, and if the jury further find from the acts and declarations of the said Flanders that he intended to give to all purchasers of the said machines the free and unrestricted use of the said invention embodied therein, and to allow the sale and public use of the said machines to be continued by others without any claim on his part of any adverse right to the said invention, then he could not afterward resume his original rights in respect thereto, nor obtain a valid patent." I give you that instruction. That is to say: If you find, as matter of fact, that Flanders had once dedicated this invention to the public; had abandoned it, and allowed it to be made and sold and to go into public use with the other inventions embodied in the machine; it would not be competent for him to resume his original right to it. If a person has once abandoned his invention or dedicated it to the public, then, as a matter of law, it has gone from him, and he has no power of revocation or resumption.

11. "If the jury find that, prior to the application of Flanders for the patent declared on, he assigned, gave, or surrendered to others his rights to take a patent for the invention set forth and claimed therein, and that he in fact did not secure a patent for the benefit of those to whom he had so assigned, sold, or surrendered his said right, but acquiesced in and encouraged the sale and public use by them and their vendees of machines embodying the said invention, and that such machines were in fact, by those to whom the said Flanders had so assigned, sold, or surrendered his said right, sold, and by their vendees put into open and ordinary use with his, the said Flanders's, knowledge and consent, and if the jury further find that the said Flanders did not intend to apply for a patent to secure the said invention for his own benefit, and did intend to give the free and unrestricted use of the said invention to all purchasers of the said machines, then it was such a dedication and abandonment to the public as he could not afterward recall or revoke, and the said patent is void." I decline to instruct you that any specific state of facts would in law amount to abandonment, but I give you what is substantially this instruction. I have told you what would constitute abandonment; and I repeat to you, that if Flanders put this device upon these machines, without the intention of obtaining a patent for it, and allowed them to go out to the public, and to come into public use, so that whoever bought one of these machines embodying this device and invention had a right to use it without objection on his part, these are facts from which the jury, if they choose, have a right to presume a dedication to the public. Abandonment or dedication to the public is a question of fact for the jury to determine, not for the court; and I instruct you, that, if you find the state of facts to be as set forth in this instruction asked for, you have a right to find that Flanders abandoned his invention to the public, without 'strutting you that that follows as a matter of law.

12. "If the jury find that, prior to the application of the said Flanders for the patent declared on, the invention therein set forth and claimed was, with his knowledge and consent, embodied in leather-splitting machines so as to be usefully operative therein, and that such machines were, with his knowledge and consent, put and continued on sale to the public, and some of them actually sold to others and put into open and ordinary use, and if the jury further find that the said Flanders intended to give to the public the free and unrestricted right to continue the sale and use of such machines, he thereby forfeited his original right to the grant of a patent for the said invention." I give you that instruction, adding only one word: "And that such machines were, with his knowledge and consent, put and continued on sale to the public, and some of them actually sold to others, and put into open and ordinary and public use."

It is unnecessary that I should incumber you with a minute statement of the several issues of fact which are presented by the pleadings in this case. You will, therefore, consider the plea of the general issue, and under it the special defences set forth in the notices, and you will be prepared, when you come in, to answer to the court these questions:

First, Whether or not the invention was in public use and on sale, with the knowledge and consent of the inventor, more than two years previous to his application for the patent in issue.

Second, Whether or not the inventor had abandoned his said invention to the public prior to his application for the said patent. If you find that his invention was in public use and on sale, or that he had abandoned it in accordance with the instructions which I have previously given you, it is unnecessary for you to consider the other issue; but if you should not so find, then you will consider the special plea, and be prepared to answer:

Third, Whether or not the said invention had been patented in England by the said inventor more than six months prior to his application for the United States patent here in issue, and whether or not the said invention had been introduced into public and common use within the United States prior to his said application for the said United States patent.

The jury found for the defendants; and, upon being interrogated by the court, answered each of the foregoing questions in the affirmative.

[NOTE. So far as ascertained, there are no other cases reported prior to 1880 involving this patent.]

H. N. Cruger, for libelants.

King & Gadsden, for claimant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes up on a cross appeal, from a decision of the district court, adjudging a part of the res subjecta to the libelants, and the residue to the claimants. The decree establishes the right of the parties libelant to recover, but dismisses the libel as to a great proportion of the cotton, on the ground of a defect of evidence to identify it. From the pleadings and testimony, it appears that the libelants were insurers to a large amount on a quantity of cotton shipped by certain individuals, in the French ship Point a Petre, on a voyage from Orleans to Havre; that the ship was stranded and lost on the coast of Florida, and the cotton abandoned to these underwriters. That the cotton libeled was a part of the cargo of the Point a Petre is admitted; but it appears, that after being saved from the wreck, it was deposited at Key West, where it was sold and purchased by Canter, the claimant, under the order of a municipal court, constituted under a law of Florida, with jurisdiction over cases of salvage.

The preliminary question alone has now been argued, to wit, whether the sale by that court was effectual to divest the interest of the underwriters. The general principle is not denied as to the mutations of property which takes place through the intervention of courts of justice; but it was argued that the constitution of the United States vests the admiralty jurisdiction exclusively in the general government. That no state can exercise a concurrent jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime causes, and that salvage was of that description. Wherefore the legislature of Florida had, in organizing this court, exercised a power not legally vested in it, and the act constituting it being a void act, it was as though no such court existed. That moreover, the nullity of that court did not rest merely on an inherent want of power to constitute it, but on positive prohibition contained in the acts organizing the government of the territory to pass any laws contrary to the laws and constitution of the United States. That the act organizing this court was an act of this nature, inasmuch as jurisdiction of causes, admiralty and maritime, were expressly vested in the superior courts of Florida; and that, without the right of exercising a concurrent power over the subject vesting this jurisdiction in an inferior court, is quoad hoc, divesting the superior court of its jurisdiction, and rendering null the act of congress, which vests the admiralty jurisdiction in that alone. On the other hand, it has been contended, that salvage is a subject of municipal and common law cognizance, not exclusively belonging to the admiralty; that although the constitution may vest the exclusive cognizance of admiralty and maritime causes in the United States, in those instances in which the admiralty at the adoption of the constitution had exclusive jurisdiction of the subject, yet, in those cases in which the common law exercised a concurrent jurisdiction with the admiralty, there is no reason for carrying the grant beyond a concurrent jurisdiction with the common law courts of the states. That the court which ordered this sale was properly a municipal court, and a court of a separate and distinct jurisdiction from the courts of the United States, and as such its acts are not to be reviewed in a foreign tribunal; of which description, it was contended, were the courts of the United States for South Carolina district. That the district of Florida was no part of the United States, but only an acquisition or dependency, and as such the constitution, per se, had no binding effect in or over it. And, finally, that argument drawn from the assumed fact that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction was by law expressly vested in another court, originates in a misconstruction of the law, inasmuch as no act of congress vests in the superior court any other portion of the jurisdiction of the Kentucky court than that of causes arising under the laws of the United States. That this is not a cause of that description; it is one arising under a casualty in which no law of the United States came necessarily under review. To this it was replied that it was a cause arising under a law of the United States, and the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S. [9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 738] was quoted and insisted on as furnishing a decision in point. That if the cause there was one of that description, because the bank was incorporated by a law of the United States, for the same reason was this a cause of that description, because the body politic here was like the body corporate there, created by a law of the United States; and, if at every step there the court was met by the law which made the one a bank, gave it power to make by-laws, and to act under those by-laws, so was it equally met here by the laws which made this a state, gave it power to legislate, and legalized this transfer of property under laws which, without the laws of the United States, were mere nullities.

It becomes indispensable to the solution of these difficulties that we should conceive a just idea of the relation in which Florida stands to the United States, and give a correct construction to the second section of the act of congress of May the 26th, 1824, [4 Stat. 45,] respecting the territorial government of Florida; correct views on these two subjects will dispose of all the points that have been considered in argument. And first, it is obvious that there is a material distinction between the territory now under consideration and that which is acquired from the aborigines, (whether by purchase or conquest,) within the acknowledged limits of the United States, as also that which is acquired by the establishment of a disputed line. As to both these there can be no question that the sovereignty of the state or territory within which it lies, and of the United States, immediately attach, producing a complete subjection to all the laws and institutions of the two governments, local and general, unless modified by treaty. The question now to be considered relates to territories previously subject to the acknowledged jurisdiction of another sovereign; such as was Florida to the crown of Spain. And on this subject we have the most explicit proof that the understanding of our public functionaries is, that the government and laws of the United States do not extend to such territory by the mere act of cession. For, in the act of congress of March the 30th, 1822, section 9, [3 Stat. 659,] we have an enumeration of the acts of congress, which are to be held in force in the territory; and, in the 10th section, an enumeration, in nature of a bill of rights, or privileges, and immunities which could not be denied to the inhabitants of the territory if they came under the constitution by the mere act of cession. As, however, the opinion of our public functionaries is not conclusive, we will review the provisions of the constitution on this subject.

At the time the constitution was formed, the limits of the territory over which it was to operate were generally defined and recognized. These limits consisted in part of organized states, and in part of territories, the absolute property and dependencies of the United States. These states, this territory, and future states to be admitted into the Union, are the sole objects of the constitution; there is no express provision whatever made in the constitution for the acquisition or government of territories beyond those limits. The right, therefore, of acquiring territory is altogether incidental to the treaty-making power, and perhaps to the power of admitting new states into the Union; and the government of such acquisitions is, of course, left to the legislative power of the Union, as far as that power is controlled by treaty. By the latter we acquire either positively or sub modo, and by the former dispose of acquisitions so made; and in case of such acquisitions I see nothing in which the power acquired over the ceded territories can vary from the power acquired under the law of nations by any other government over acquired or ceded territory. The laws, rights, and institutions of the territory so acquired remain in full force until rightfully altered by the new government. In the present instance, however, the laws of Florida were not left to derive their force from general principles alone; for by the 13th section of the same act it is declared, "that the laws in force in the said territory at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified, or repealed by the legislature. From these views of the subject it results, 1st. That, whatever may be the correct idea of the distribution of the admiralty jurisdictions as between the states and the United States, it can have no application here, since this territory does not stand in the relation of a state to the United States. 2nd. That, whether salvage be of admiralty jurisdiction exclusively or not, it is immaterial to this cause, since the whole power of legislation over the subject in Florida existed exclusively in the general government. 3rd. That the general principles of international law on the immunities of foreign courts and foreign decisions have no application here, since the courts of Florida have a common origin with this court. Our authority flows from the same source. We are connected at the fountain-head, governed by the same legislative power, and have equal access to the laws which constitute and govern us. It follows that neither can regard the decisions of the other, if acting without authority derived through the legislature of the Union. The act entitled "An act for the establishment of a territorial government in Florida," [Act of March 30, 1822; 3 Stat. 654.] and the acts in pari materia of the 3d March, 1823, [3 Stat. 750.] and the 26th May, 1824, [4 Stat. 45.] constitute what may be properly termed the constitution of Florida. The first provides for the appointment of an executive, with powers not material here to be considered. It constitutes a legislature, organizes a judiciary, and imposes upon the one and the other some general restrictions, subject to which they are empowered to exercise the legislative, judicial, and executive powers which belong generally to an organized government. The act of March, 1823, goes over the same ground, and repeals the preceding act so far as the provisions of the latter are inconsistent with those of the former act. And with regard to both, or either, as far as the latter remains unrepealed, the position is incontrovertible that the legislative power could enact nothing inconsistent with what congress has made inherent and permanent in the form of government of the territory. Therefore, if the admiralty jurisdiction is made inherent in the superior courts, it was not in the power of the territorial legislature to transfer it to any inferior tribunal. To determine this question we must examine the provisions of the several acts touching the exercise of legislative and judicial power.

In defining the legislative power, the words of the act of 1822 are these: "They shall have power to alter, modify or repeal the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. These legislative powers shall, also, extend to all the rightful subjects of legislation; but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, or which lay any person under restraint, burthen or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not to be burthened with those of another." The language of the act of 1823 [3 Stat. 751, § 5] is: "They shall have legislative power over all rightful subjects of legislation; but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States; or which lay any person under restraint," &c.

That jurisdiction of salvage is a rightful subject of legislation is not to be questioned. The jurisdiction, then, vested by the legislature in this municipal court, must be sustained, unless inconsistent with the laws or constitution of the United States. But with the constitution, in legislating on the subject of salvage, there can be no incongruity; it is only, therefore, the supposed inconsistency with the act of congress of May, 1824, that can impugn it. The provisions of that act upon this subject are these: "Each of the said courts (meaning the superior courts of the district of Florida) shall moreover have and exercise the same jurisdiction within its limits, in all cases arising under the laws and constitution of the United States, which, by an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved the 24th day of September, 1789, [1 Stat. 73.] and 'an act in addition to the act, entitled an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved the 2d of March, 1793,' [1 Stat. 33, c. 22.] was vested in the court of Kentucky district." The question, then, is reduced to this, in what cases arising under the laws and constitution of the United States is jurisdiction vested in the court of Kentucky district by the two acts of the 24th September, 1789, and the 2d March, 1793? It has been erroneously assumed, that all the jurisdiction vested by those acts in the Kentucky court, was vested by this law in the superior court of Florida; it is expressly confined to cases arising under the laws and constitution of the United States; and the reason is obvious. In all cases arising under the laws of the district, jurisdiction is given by the preceding section of the same act; but, as most of the laws of the United States had been made of force in the territory as before observed, the 2d section is intended to extend the jurisdiction of the court to cases arising under the latter laws, and further, if necessary, to all cases arising under laws of the United States, over which jurisdiction had been given to the Kentucky court,—a practice in defining jurisdiction that had been pursued by congress with regard to all the territories subsequent to the time when the Kentucky court was established. In the original organization of the judiciary of the United States, Kentucky and Maine were excluded from the arrangement of circuits. And, as no circuit court was required in law to be held there, the district court was vested with circuit court jurisdiction. This is the whole purport of the act of 1789, referred to in the Florida act of 1824. The other act there referred to, to wit, that of 1793, has no other operation as to the Kentucky court, besides vesting in it the power given to the circuit courts to hold special sessions. If the Florida act were as broad in its operation as the two acts referred to, it would indeed be a serious question, whether the legislature of Florida could divest its superior court of any part of its admiralty jurisdiction, as existing in and exercised by the district courts of the United States. But I think it incontestable that the jurisdiction here given is explicitly restricted to so much of the jurisdiction of the Kentucky court only as comes within the description of cases arising under the laws and constitution of the United States. Now, excepting in the single instance of the present Bank of the United States, congress never has vested a jurisdiction even in its circuit courts, generally, over causes arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. It has given an appellate jurisdiction, and that only to the supreme court, over causes of that description, when such causes arise in the state courts, but we look in vain through the law defining the jurisdiction of the Kentucky court for any general claim to jurisdiction under the description of "cases arising under the laws and constitution of the United States." Yet, very ample operation must be given to these words of the Florida act, considered in reference to the jurisdiction actually possessed and exercised by the Kentucky court, under the two laws of 1789 and 1793. The land laws, revenue laws, laws of trade, criminal laws, and many other public laws, were all laws of the United States, under which cases might arise, and over which the Kentucky court was undoubtedly vested with jurisdiction. Nor do I doubt that the admiralty jurisdiction over revenue cases, as exercised by the Kentucky court, is rightfully vested (and that beyond the control of the Florida legislature) in the superior court of this district. But here, it appears to me, the grant of jurisdiction terminates. The admiralty jurisdiction, beyond this limit, is left to be administered under the laws of the territory, for this simple reason, that other causes, occurring in the admiralty, cannot be brought within this description of causes, arising under the laws of the United States. At least this appears incontrovertible, when applied to questions of salvage arising on wreck of the sea—to questions of salvage on captures as prize of war, I am inclined to think it would extend, at least, to all causes, in which the distribution of prize money depends upon laws of the United States. But it is argued that this is a cause arising under the laws of the United States, within the reason of the decision of the supreme court, in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S.; that the validity of the sale, divesting the interests of these libellants, depends upon the legality of the powers exercised by the court of Key West, which depends upon the powers vested in the legislature of Florida, which finally depends upon the acts of congress which created the body politic of Florida; that creating a body politic, is only creating a body corporate on a larger scale, but essentially the exercise of one and the same power; that whether the one or the other sues or defends, legislates or acts, by itself or its agents, all must be done with reference to the law that creates and organizes it; and in fine. In the language of the court, in the case cited, "the charter not only creates it, but gives it every faculty that it possesses. The power to acquire rights of any description, to transact business of any description, to sue on those contracts, is given and measured by its charter, and that charter is a law of the United States. This being can acquire no right, make no contract, bring no suit, which is not authorized by a law of the United States. It is not only itself the mere creature of the law, but all its actions, and all its rights, are dependent on the same law," &c.

I have taken a week to reflect upon this question alone, and I cannot withhold from the gentleman, who argued the cause for the libellants, an acknowledgment, that I have not been able to draw any line of discrimination, between this and the decided cause, which satisfies my mind. Yet, I am thoroughly persuaded that the learned men who decided that cause, never contemplated that such an application would have been given of their decision. I am happy in the prospect that this cause will finally be disposed of elsewhere, not doubting that the mental acumen of those who decided the other, will be found fully adequate to distinguish or reconcile the two cases, on grounds which have escaped my reflections. At present, I must content myself with observing, that it is too much to require of a court, upon mere analogy, to sustain an argument that not only proves too much, if it proves anything, but which leads, in fact, to positive absurdity. It will be recollected that it is not only in the territories that we find bodies politic created by the laws of the United States, but that near one-half the states derive their origin and admission into the Union under laws of the United States. But will it be contended that all the causes arising under their laws, are causes arising under laws of the United States? It is true, that in the District of Columbia, the appellate jurisdiction given to the supreme court, can be maintained only on the ground that the laws of that District are laws of the United States; and that all the laws of the district of Florida derive directly, or indirectly, their force from the same origin. But in the case of the District of Columbia, this power is expressly given to the supreme court, and we are not now inquiring whether congress might not have vested this jurisdiction in the superior court of Florida, but whether they have so vested it. The simple inquiry is, what force and operation is to be given to those words, in the second section of the act of 1824, "Jurisdiction in all cases arising under the laws and constitution of the United States?" And what could be more absurd than to decide that the same force is to be given to those words as if they were not there? Expunge that sentence altogether, and the construction of the clause will be necessarily and precisely that contended for by the libelants, to wit, an unrestricted grant of the jurisdiction vested by law in the Kentucky court. It not unfrequently happens, that in the construction of a whole law, or a section, or a clause of law, words, or even sentences, are declared surplusage, or irreconcilable with other words or sentences; but here we are called upon to give a meaning to words, which deprives them of all meaning, and that without any incongruity with other words, or want of distinct meaning in themselves, but from an analogy with another case, in which similar words have received a construction which produces that consequence, when applied to these words. Until better advised, I must maintain that these words have a definite meaning and bearing in their place in this law, and amount to a restriction of the jurisdiction of the superior court of Florida to a class of cases which does not comprise salvage on wreck of the sea.

Some minor grounds have been dwelt upon in argument, of which it is proper to take a brief notice. It has been argued that the superior court of Florida acquired jurisdiction in another way, to wit, that the 9th section of the Florida act of 1822 makes of force in the territory all public laws of the United States not repugnant to the provisions of that act; that the judiciary acts are acts of that description, and, therefore, are laws of the territory. But this argument is without point, until such an organization of circuit and district courts of the United States takes place in that territory as will admit of the application of this law to the jurisdiction of its courts; or, rather, it takes effect as to the subject now under consideration only through those clauses which relate to the jurisdiction of the Kentucky court, and thus returns, in a circle, to the argument which we have been before considering.

It has also been contended that the Florida act, under which the court at Key West was organized, is void, 1st, because never ratified by congress; and 2nd, because inconsistent with that provision of the first section of the act of 1824, which gives original jurisdiction to the superior courts of the territory in all cases of $100 in value. To the first of these reasons, the 5th section of the act of 1822 furnishes an unequivocal answer. It is only the right of repealing that congress retains over the laws of Florida. That clause which requires the governor to report the laws of the territory to the president, to be laid before congress, is merely directory, but has no bearing upon the validity of those laws, until repealed. The words are "which, if disapproved by congress, shall thenceforth be of no force;" necessarily implying their previous operation. With regard to the second, I have no doubt but that the individual who chooses to resort to his common law remedy, of an action for work and labor, instead of libeling for salvage, may maintain an original suit in the superior court of the territory. But I see nothing in the act which makes that jurisdiction exclusive, in a case in which both remedies are open to the choice of the party. The language of the 6th section is, "that the judicial power shall be vested in two superior courts, and in such inferior court and justices of the peace as the legislative council of the territory may from time to time establish." The 7th section of this act, and the 2d of the subsequent act, confine to the superior courts exclusively the jurisdiction over the cases arising under the laws, &c., of the United States, of which the Kentucky court had jurisdiction; but as to all others, I perceive nothing in the law which precluded the Florida legislature from making any distribution of jurisdiction, consistent with preserving to the superior court a concurrent jurisdiction, to be exercised according to its own terms.

It is proper to remark here, that whatever may be the fact as to the integrity and propriety, which regulate the proceedings of the court of Key West, there is nothing novel or unprecedented in the organization of that court. The model of it is of great antiquity, and throughout the civilized world some such summary mode of adjusting salvage, in cases of wreck of the sea, is to be found. We had just such a court here, and I believe in most of the states, when the constitution was adopted; and although jurisdiction of the subject has been everywhere abandoned to the district courts of the United States, where it is generally adjusted with great solemnity and discretion, and, I believe, very much to the satisfaction of all the commercial world, there exists no reason to preclude the congress of the United States from constituting similar summary tribunals, whenever and wherever it may become necessary. The establishment of this tribunal, therefore, however justice may be distributed in it, is no unwarrantable exercise of the legislative or judicial power vested in Florida.

Finally, I am of opinion that there is error in the decision of the district court, and adjudge that it be reversed, and the goods restored to the claimant with costs.

[NOTE. The decision of the circuit court was affirmed on appeal by the supreme court, Chief Justice Marshall rendering the opinion, in the course of which he said: "The constitution confers absolutely on the government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties. Consequently, that government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or by treaty. The usage of the world is, if a nation be not entirely subdued, to consider the holding of conquered territory as a mere military occupation, until its fate shall be determined at the treaty of peace. If it be ceded by that treaty, the acquisition is confirmed, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed, either on the terms stipulated in the treaty of cession, or on such as its new master shall impose. On such transfer of territory, it has never been held that the relations of the inhabitants with each other undergo any change. Their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same act which transfers their country transfers the allegiance of those who remain in it; and the law, which may be denominated 'political,' is necessarily changed, although that which regulates the intercourse and general conduct of individuals remains in force, until altered by the newly-created power of the state. On the 2d of February, 1819, Spain ceded Florida to the United States. * * * This treaty is the law of the land, and admits the inhabitants of Florida to the enjoyment of the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States. They do not, however, participate in political power, they do not share in the government, till Florida shall become a state. In the mean time Florida continues to be a territory of the United States, governed by virtue of that clause in the constitution which empowers congress 'to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' * * * The powers of the territorial legislature extend to all rightful objects of legislation, subject to the restriction that their laws shall not be 'inconsistent with the laws and constitution of the United States.' * * * All the laws which were in force in Florida while a province of Spain, those excepted which were political in their character, which concerned the relations between the people and their sovereign, remained in force until altered by the government of the United States. Congress recognizes this principle, by using the words 'laws of the territory now in force therein.' No laws could then have been in force but those enacted by the Spanish government. If, among these, a law existed on the subject of salvage,—and it is scarcely possible there should not have been such a law,—jurisdiction over cases arising under it was conferred on the superior courts, but that jurisdiction was not exclusive. A territorial act, conferring jurisdiction over the same cases on an inferior court, would not have been inconsistent with the 7th section of the act of 1823, vesting the whole judicial power of the territory 'in two superior courts, and in such inferior courts and justices of the peace as the legislative council of the territory may from time to time establish.' * * * The 11th section of the act declares 'that the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, and all other public acts of the United States, not inconsistent or repugnant to this act, shall extend to, and have full force and effect in, the territory aforesaid.' The laws which are extended to the territory by this section were either for the punishment of crime or for civil purposes. Jurisdiction is given in all criminal cases by the 7th section, but in civil cases that section gives jurisdiction only in those which arise under and are cognizable by the laws of the territory. Consequently all civil cases arising under the laws which are extended to the territory by the 11th section are cognizable in the territorial courts, by virtue of the 8th section; and in those cases the superior courts may exercise the same jurisdiction as is exercised by the court for the Kentucky district. * * * The constitution and laws of the United States give jurisdiction to the district courts over all cases in admiralty; but jurisdiction over the case does not constitute the case itself.

* * * The constitution declares that 'the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors or other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.' The constitution certainly contemplates these as three distinct classes of cases, and, if they are distinct, the grant of jurisdiction over one of them does not confer jurisdiction over either of the other two. The discrimination made between them in the constitution is, we think, conclusive against their identity. A case in admiralty does not, in fact, arise under the constitution or laws of the United States. These cases are as old as navigation itself; and the law, admiralty and maritime, as it has existed for ages, is applied by our courts to the cases as they arise. It is not, then, to the 8th section of the territorial law that we are to look for the grant of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction to the territorial courts. Consequently, if that jurisdiction is exclusive, it is not made so by the reference to the district court of Kentucky. * * * The judges of the superior courts of Florida hold their offices for four years. These courts, then, are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the constitution on the general government can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it. They are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the government, or in virtue of that clause which enables congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of that judicial power which is defined in the 3d article of the constitution, but is conferred by congress, in the execution of those general powers which that body possesses over the territories of the United States. Although admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised in the states in those courts only which are established in pursuance of the 3d article of the constitution, the same limitation does not extend to the territories. In legislating for them, congress exercises the combined powers of the general and of a state government. We think, then, that the act of the territorial legislature, erecting the court by whose decree the cargo of the Point a Petre was sold, is not 'inconsistent with the laws and constitution of the United States,' and is valid. Consequently, the sale made in pursuance of it changed the property." 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 511.]

See note at end of case.

[The libelants entered their protest against the reference on the ground that the mandate gave no authority to inquire into damages; that none had been in fact awarded, either by the district, circuit, or supreme court; and that the libelants were not in any manner liable for damages. The register, notwithstanding the protests, proceeded to inquire into the damages, and made his report thereon to the circuit court, where the same grounds of objection were again taken by the libelants. The court, upon the hearing, asserted the right to inquire into the damages, as a matter undisposed of in the former decree, but denied any allowance of them upon the merits, and decreed costs and expenses only to the claimant.]

[NOTE. This decree of the circuit court is nowhere reported. On claimant's appeal, this decree was affirmed by the supreme court, on the ground that there was no authority to inquire into the question of damages. The court, per Mr. Justice Story, said that "the original decree of restitution, with costs, without any allowance of damages, or any express reservation of that question, was a virtual denial of damages, and a final decree as to the demand of damages set up by Canter in his original claim. * * * We wish it now to be understood by the bar, as the settled practice of this court, that wherever damages are claimed by the libelant or claimant in the original proceedings, if a decree for restitution and costs only passes, it is a virtual denial of damages; and the party will be deemed to have waived the claim for damages, unless he then interposes an appeal or cross appeal to sustain that claim. * * * As to the costs and expenses, we perceive no error in the allowance of them in the circuit court. They are not matters positively limited by law, but are allowed in the exercise of a sound discretion of the court; and, besides, it may be added that no appeal lies from a mere decree respecting costs and expenses." ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—PARTIES—MARITIME TRANSACTIONS—SALVAGE.

1. Parties whose interests rest upon a cause of action common to all, may unite in the same libel in admiralty, though as between themselves their interests are separate and distinct.
2. A libel in personam, resting upon a common cause of action, may be filed for the libelants and for all others interested, whenever the whole subject matter can be disposed of in one suit.
3. A libel may be amended on motion by striking out unnecessary and impertinent allegations.
4. Admiralty courts have jurisdiction equally in personam and in rem.
5. When admiralty jurisdiction has once attached, it is not divested by reason of any further acts done upon land in continuation of the maritime act which gave jurisdiction.
6. Admiralty jurisdiction, when administered under the restrictions of the English jurisprudence, is co-extensive with the ebbing and flowing of the tide.
7. The test of admiralty jurisdiction is whether the transaction is of a maritime character.

[Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and Francis Howland, Esq.]

Charles Johnson.] The libellants were underwriters upon the cargo of the brig Hercules, by twenty-eight several policies, to the amount of $151,875, for a voyage from New-York to Mobile. The brig sailed with a cargo valued at $180,000, and, in September, 1825, grounded on Carysfort reef on the coast of Florida. The respondent, who was master of a wrecking schooner, saw the Hercules the day before she grounded. At the time the two vessels came in sight of each other the wind was N. E., the schooner standing S. W. by S., on a direct course to Key West, and the brig about S. S. E. The schooner was to the windward, and passed the brig the same day. The vessels were about two miles apart. There was evidence to show that the respondent believed the brig to be in danger of running ashore, but it did not clearly appear whether it would have been practicable for him to approach near enough to warn her of her danger, the seamen of the two vessels, who were the witnesses, varying in their representations on this point, according to their situations and apparent prepossessions. No attempt was made on the part of the schooner to approach the brig, or to give her any notice, or to put her on her guard. After the accident, the respondent, with two wrecking vessels, came to the rescue of the brig, and got her off the reef. The brig was thought to be in a good deal of peril, and the respondent took possession of her at the request of her master. After depositing a large part of her cargo in the two wrecking vessels, the respondent navigated the brig to Key West. Seaman, the master of the brig, did not at first show any unwillingness to go there, though, after the brig had started, he requested the respondent to proceed to Mobile, her port of destination; but the respondent, who had shown a strong preference for Key West from the first, resolved to take her there. Proceedings to obtain salvage were instituted by the respondent in the territorial court of Florida, which awarded 31¼ per cent. of the value of the brig and her cargo, and, under the decree of the court, the vessel was sold at auction at Key West for $1,531 12, and the cargo for $77,853. The salvage money was finally adjusted at $25,006 27. The respondent purchased property at the sale to the amount of $9,046. The master of the brig was examined as a witness in the Florida court, but did not acquiesce in the award of salvage, and attempted, without success, to enter a formal protest against the sale of the vessel and cargo. Although the property was sold at a sacrifice, it did not appear that the sale was fraudulent, or that the respondent was guilty of any bad faith. The greater number of the purchasers who attended the sale were from Havana and Matanzas. The owners of the cargo abandoned it to the libellants, who sent one Earle, as an agent, to Key West. He found, on his arrival there, that the brig and her cargo were already sold. The nearest court then in session was held at St. Augustine, and, before he could have gone there and returned, the goods would have been taken beyond its jurisdiction. Under these circumstances, he offered $72,500 to recover possession of the brig and her cargo from their respective purchasers, but with an express reservation of all his rights, and with the open assertion that he ransomed the goods as if from pirates. The $72,500 was finally given to one Whitehead, a member of the firm of Greene & Co., which had sold the brig and cargo at auction; and that firm agreed, for that sum, to recover back the brig and her cargo, and return them to Earle. This was done. The libel prayed that the salvage money be refunded, and that the $72,500 paid to the respondent and his associates to redeem the vessel be decreed to the libellants, with costs and damages.

The respondent filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, setting forth that the territorial government of Florida had authority to pass any laws not inconsistent with the laws and constitution of the United States, and that, on the 4th of July, 1823, they passed an act entitled "An act concerning wreckers and wrecked property," prescribing certain formalities, according to which the brig and her cargo had been sold, as would appear by a copy of the record of the territorial court of Florida. To this plea the libellants demurred. In March, 1826, this court (Van Ness, district judge) gave judgment for the libellants upon the demurrer, with leave to the respondent to answer over. The grounds of the decision were, that all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction were, by the 9th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, (1 Stat. 76,) originally cognizable in the United States district courts exclusively; that salvage was a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; that the United States district courts had exclusive original cognizance of a case of salvage, unless congress had conferred jurisdiction on some other tribunal; that congress had not granted to the legislative council of Florida authority to establish a court with jurisdiction over cases of salvage on the high seas; and that such a court was unconstitutional and its acts were void. [See note at end of case.] After his plea was overruled, the respondent answered to the merits, and incorporated in his answer the substance of the plea. The cause was then heard upon pleadings and proofs. The evidence consisted mostly of depositions taken before a commissioner, though the same witnesses were in some instances examined both before the commissioner and in court. The opinion of the court supplies all the facts necessary to an understanding of the case.

BETTS, District Judge. There are three objections raised upon matters of form to the libellants' recovery, which it may be well to consider before proceeding to the merits of the case.

It is insisted, first, that the libellants show no joint interest or common cause of action which entitles them to unite in this action. Points of practice and forms of pleading have for ages formed the most perplexing and entangled subjects of litigation in the jurisprudence we have adopted in this country. Those courts which derive their rules of procedure from the civil law have been generally supposed to be most free from this difficulty. Yet, on the other hand, it is imputed to them that they are destitute of any distinct principles in this behalf, which may serve to insure uniformity in their procedure, or to modify the mere discretion which courts may be prone to apply in dictating for each case the law deemed most fit for it. It has been adjudged that in certain branches of the practice of a court of admiralty, the technical niceties of the common law are not to be regarded. The Merino, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 391; The Samuel, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 9; Locke v. U. S., 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 339. And there might probably be no incongruity in applying that doctrine to the whole extent of the jurisdiction of the court. The supreme court has decided that in cases of information in a court of admiralty, it is enough to set out the offense so as to bring it within the statute upon which the information is founded, and to give notice to the opposite party of the charge he is called upon to answer. This is, unquestionably, the true spirit of all pleadings; and it will not be denied that there is a higher philosophy in it than there is in determining the sufficiency of a pleading by merely ascertaining its conformity to some formula which was contrived for general application, and not framed with a view to the facts or circumstances to be actually brought before the court. Still it leaves much to discretion, and the justness with which the principle may be carried out in practice, will depend upon the competency of the magistrate who is called upon to administer it.

It does not belong to the functions of this court to enact a system for the correction of such supposed defects. Its province is to inquire whether there are any determinate rules established which regulate the matter. If there are none, its duty is to bring the case within the analogy of such as are most consonant to the principles regulating the course of courts of maritime jurisdiction. A research into the sources of the practice of this court affords very little light on the subject. From its earliest history, the business of the court seems to have proceeded in about one course. But when the authority for employing certain branches of practice is sought for, none other is discoverable than that the court at some early day began to employ them; and ever after, on a recurrence of like circumstances in a suit, it was probably found more convenient to apply the means before used than to establish methods by positive appointment. This may be sufficient to create or sanction those uses; yet it is not accompanied by what ordinarily attends the growth of a rule of pleading or practice in other courts—the adjudication of the court upon the point, declaring or confirming the reasons for its introduction or continuance.

The civil jurisdiction of the admiralty is generally held to be according to the forms of the civil law, by which is understood, in the United States and England, the positive law of the Romans, exhibited in the compilations of Justinian, and not, as on the continent of Europe, the modern private laws of the various nations which adopted the Roman law. Its course of proceeding in the United States was originally appointed to be conformable to the same law, (Act Sept. 20, 1789; 1 Stat. 93,) and is remarkable for comprehension, brevity, celerity and simplicity. 1 Kent, Comm. 380. In relation to the point now under consideration, the method of drawing out the written pleadings, the civil law would supply us no satisfactory assistance. At various periods of the Roman jurisprudence, formalities and ceremonies abounded in the institution of actions and in the methods of conducting them, and a scrupulous observance of verbal niceties in the frame of process was exacted. Quintil. de Oratore, 3, 8. So, also, each proceeding in the cause was taken with an accompaniment of symbols and fixed phrases. 4 Gibb. Decline & Fall, c. 44; Bever, Rom. Laws, b. 2, c. 4. Primarily, the manner of instituting a cause was of the most rude and abrupt character. The plaintiff himself took the defendant, without warrant or precept, before the Praetor, oblato collo, (by the collar,) and the proceedings there seem to have been conducted ore tenus by the parties, in short assertions and replies, very like the ancient method of pleading reported in the Year Books. Adams' Rom. Ant. 193. And, as a remnant of such usages, viva voce libels are yet admissible in summary causes in the ecclesiastical courts, the processes of the canon courts being derivatives from the civil law. Clerke, Prax. Adm. tit. 19; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. c. 5; 1 Hall, Law J. 83. In process of time, the allegations or demands of the actor were presented in writing, in what was termed "libellus," or "libellus supplex." Gibb. Forum. Rom. 23; 2 Browne, Civil Law. (Ed. 1799,) 26; Adams' Rom. Ant. 220; Cockb. Ecc. Prax. Append. 59; 1 Hall, Law J. 81; Consett, Ecc. Prax. pt. 3, c. 1, § 1. It does not appear to have been a subject of specific regulation in the civil law, (or in the French practice, which is closely modelled upon it,) as to what interests might be prosecuted jointly, or how far relief was restricted to the special manner in which the case was charged or articulated. The allegations of the parties might be expanded through a series of pleadings, sponsio, replicatio, duplicatio, triplicatio, etc., (Livy, b. 39; Cicero in Verr.; Id. in Cocc.) yet the constituents of each particular pleading are not clearly defined by the books, (Spence, Orig. Laws; Sevigne, Hist. Rom. Law; 4 Gibb. Decline & Fall, c. 44.) The reasonable presumption, however, is, that these counter allegations were designed to maintain the controversy upon the allegations first propounded, and were not employed to determine the scope of the action or the competency of the actors to it. The libel was not required to correspond exactly with the demand put forth by the actor, either as to amount, time, place or thing. Just. Inst. b. 4, tit. 6. The only qualities apparently prescribed by the text of the law were, that the libel should state the complaint with distinctness, certainty and aptness, with a proper conclusion or prayer, and without being contradictory to itself. Wood, Inst. Civil Law, bk. 4, c. 3, § 3. This was no doubt the substance of the action given by the Praetor, whether one for which a precedent was found, or one devised for the particular case. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 6; Dig. bk. 2, tit. 13, § 1; Heinecc. Syntag. 673; 2 Browne, Civil Law, 349, 350. Whatever, then, might be comprehended within the action, might be properly made part of the complaint in the libel, and no interdiction to pleading in one action a right common to several parties, appears to have been made in the edicts or expositions of the laws.

Clerke and Browne consider the practice of the ecclesiastical courts in England to be the source from which that of the admiralty courts is drawn, and upon which it relies for authority. Clerke, Prax. Adm. tit. 19; 2 Browne, Civil Law, (Ed. 1799.) 149. This only removes the inquiry one step further, without affording a solution of the difficulty presented. For the ecclesiastical law of England was modeled from the canon law, and, in all defective or doubtful cases, recourse was had to the body of the pontifical canon law for authority and guidance. 4 Reeve, Eng. Law, cc. 24, 25. And then, again, proceedings in the courts of canon and civil law were considered identical. Bac. Abr. "Eccles. Courts, E."

It accordingly still remains to determine what the original rule—that of the civil law—was. Baron Gilbert regards a libel under the civil law, and a bill in the court of chancery, to have been the same in their structure. Gilb. Forum Rom. 44. In early practice, the bill in chancery was merely a petition to the chancellor, narrating the petitioner's case, and asking redress, without respect to form. Wyatt, Pract. Reg. 57; Wood, Inst. Civil Law, bk. 4, c. 3, § 3. Though subsequent practice has amplified and affected to give great formality to bills in chancery, yet they still retain the substance of the libel employed in the canon courts. Bart. Suit Eq. 19, 26. From the chancery court having been, for many ages, under the presidency of ecclesiastics, with whom the canon law was a rule both of conduct and of faith, it was natural that the proceedings of the one forum should be, as they proved in practice, common to both. We might, therefore, reason with tolerable directness, from the principles known to have been introduced into the court of chancery in respect to pleadings, as to what those principles were as then understood in the civil law. Yet we must be careful to discriminate between the practice and pleadings as known in the court of chancery during the early period of its history, and that which has grown up since the days of Lord Bacon and Lord Nottingham. The canon law only required in the libel a plain narrative of facts. 2 Browne, Civil Law, (Ed. 1799.) 79. Reeves says it must contain the thing in question, with the quality of the action. 4 Reeves, Eng. Law, 14. The ecclesiastical courts in England require the libel to be clear and explicit. 1 Hall, Law J. 81; 2 Browne, Civil Law, (Ed. 1799.) 101, 102. Consett says, that in the plenary proceedings the plaintiff's claim is set forth simply, in a continued speech or oration; or articulate, in which the merits of the cause are propounded by articles. Consett, Eccl. Prax. 402. The choice of these varieties seems to have been left wholly to the pleader. When the libel was obscure, uncertain, confused or preposterous, and exception was taken to it for such causes, the most liberal practice in respect to amendments prevailed. Id. pt. 3, c. 1, § 2. And they were commonly made instantane, at the suggestion of the excepting party. Cockb. Ecc. Prax. c. 5, § 4. And, though numerous provisions are made by the civil law for various defences against what are held to be, prima facie, efficacious actions, yet the defences relate in no case to matters of form. No system of rules seems ever to have been designed in the civil law, like those established by the common law, to destroy the plaintiff's action because he had framed or managed it inaptly. Just. Inst. lib. 4, tit. 13; Pandects, lib. 44, tits. 1, 2. Such, also, seems to be the case in the French courts, whose practice has been conformed with great exactness to that of the civil law. 13 Poth. Works. So far, therefore, as the pleadings in a cause were subject to regulation under the civil law, it would appear that little more than simplicity and perspicuity in their structure were required. It was sufficient if they plainly informed the court and the opposite party of the object sought, though they might be destitute of that technical fulness or unity of object which was exacted by the common law, and which has, in later times, grown into use in the court of chancery. None but substantial defects were regarded; and, if no exception was taken to the sufficiency of a pleading, an amendment was permitted at any time before final sentence; and, when an exception was formally taken, the amendment might be made at any time before contestation of suit, (Consett, Ecc. Prax. pt. 3,) and at any time before sentence was pronounced, if the defendant had not previously excepted to the defects, (Id. pt. 3, § 2.)

The objections raised upon the defectiveness of the libel in the present case, were offered at the hearing of the cause after the proofs were all taken. They are said, however, to be in time, because they arise out of the testimony, the allegations of the libel importing that the libellants have a joint interest in the whole subject, while the proof shows that their interests are entirely distinct. I do not think the libel bears the interpretation put upon it by the respondent's counsel. In the introductory part it does, indeed, assert "that the libellants, by twenty-eight several policies, became underwriters upon the cargo of the brig Hercules." This language might perhaps indifferently bear the construction that each libellant subscribed all the policies, or that, the policies being several, they were so both in respect to the portions of cargo insured and to the parties underwriting. But the libel is made sufficiently distinct in this respect by the subsequent allegation, that the parcels were broken open at Key West, and the marks so defaced and altered that the libellants "were unable to identify the several parts and parcels thereof by them respectively insured as aforesaid." This denotes that the libellants were not joint insurers.

If any advantage could legally be taken of this want of joint interest, the respondent should have interposed the proper exception. But I do not think the fact of any importance, however it is brought to the notice of the court. The canon law permitted several actions to be joined in the same libel. 2 Browne, Civil Law, (Ed. 1799,) 79. And our own courts sustain libels uniting the most dissimilar interests. In The Amiable Nancy, the libel was filed by the owners of the vessel, the master, the supercargo and a mariner, for trespass to the vessel, and for an assault and battery on some of the libellants. Damages were awarded by this court for each of those causes of action, and its decision was sustained, on appeal, by the circuit court and by the supreme court. [Case No. 331.] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546. The practice of the court of chancery permits suitors who have a like interest in the subject matter to unite in a bill, though they are not to participate with each other in the recovery. Lloyd v. Loaring, 6 Ves. 773; Adair v. New River Co., 11 Ves. 429; Good v. Blewitt, 13 Ves. 397; Mitt. Pl. (Amer. Ed. 1816) 135 et seq. There is a manifest fitness and convenience in allowing parties in admiralty suits to join as libellants, whose interests rest upon a cause of action common to all, though as between themselves their interests are separate and distinct, and I find no rule or principle of the civil law interdicting such junction. This libel, however, should be amended so as to state that the cause is prosecuted for the libellants and for all others interested who may come in and establish their rights in the subject matter. One action is enough to determine the right of the respondent in respect to the vessel and her cargo; and the judgment should be so far final as to protect him from any further proceedings in relation thereto. This would be so if the suit were in rem; and actions in personam and actions in rem being co-ordinate, and resting upon like principles in a court of admiralty, ought to be attended with the same result in this respect.

The second objection taken by the respondent is, that the libel is only adapted to a case of force or fraud, and that as neither of these is proved, no remedy can be had secundum allegata for a mere illegal privation of property. It is true that the libel admits of this exception. The brig was put in possession of the respondent by her master, both for the purpose of immediate relief from her peril, and to be afterwards piloted out of the reefs and into port. She was at that time in great danger, and required immediate assistance. Nor was there any force or fraud in conveying her to Key West. The testimony of Seaman, her master, though much more clear and explicit as taken before the commissioner than as given in court, yet in both cases agrees in this, that he did not urge the respondent to take the vessel to Mobile until she had got under weigh. The respondent was under no obligation to take her to her port of destination, there being an intermediate American port to which she could go with but slight interruption of her voyage. Neither is the respondent made a trespasser from the beginning by reason of any misconduct of his in Key West, or by his invoking the authority of the local court there. The allegations of the libel, which charge the respondent with obtaining possession of the brig by force or fraud, cannot be supported. But I attach no importance to these allegations. They may be treated as surplusage or as matter of aggravation, and the libellants are at liberty to strike them out, if they shall be so advised. The court proceeds upon the whole case as it is made out, without regard to what the libellants have denominated it, as in admiralty practice there is no discriminating appellation of actions. The remedy is upon the case made, and not in conformity to any nomenclature of the action.

I perceive nothing in the cases cited or in the argument urged, to support the third objection, namely, that this proceeding cannot be sustained in personam, but only in rem against the brig and her cargo to reclaim them in kind. There is no doubt of the power of the court to proceed with like authority in personam as in rem, where the subject matter is within its jurisdiction. Blackstone admits that the first process in admiralty is frequently by arrest of the person. 3 Bl. Comm. 108; Smart v. Wolff, 3 Term R. 323, 330. This concession is fortified by the whole tenor of the practice of the court, and of decisions here and in England. Clerke's Prax. by Hall; Brevoor v. The Fair American, [Case No. 1,847.] There is no reason for requiring a different form of libel in respect to parties or causes of action in the one case from what is proper in the other. The seizure of the article and the monition consequent upon that, is equivalent to an arrest of the person, and was probably introduced as a substitute for a personal arrest; and it is not to be supposed that such attachment brings the subject matter in contestation more immediately before the court, than if the party were held in actual arrest. The character of the court and the subjects with which it deals render it of signal advantage to suitors that its functions can be exercised in relation to maritime matters with all the benefits of a personal summons or arrest of parties, without incurring the delays, if not impracticability, of making a personal service of process. That end is effected by seizing the subject which gives cause to the litigation.

But it is urged, that if the libel be sufficient in point of form, the matters charged therein do not make a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, cognizable in this court, because the cause of action, if any, arose not out of the original taking possession of the vessel and her cargo upon the high seas, but from transactions subsequent thereto, on land, at Key West, within the body of a county, so that if any wrong was there committed, the libellants must seek redress in a court of law. It is not denied that if the original possession of the vessel had been wrongful, the act would have been a marine tort, and within the jurisdiction of this court. When the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty has attached, it is not divested by means of acts subsequently done on land and cognizable by the law tribunals. Jurisdiction in admiralty once acquired cannot be thus ousted. The after acts, when incidents of the first, are, in respect to jurisdiction, all regarded as one.

In this case, the cause of action is the taking and holding possession of the goods by the respondent, in the character and with the authority of salvor, to which all that subsequently transpired was incident. Over that principal act the court has undoubted jurisdiction, and it also has cognizance of every accessory act done on land, although not of itself sufficient to confer jurisdiction. 1 Kent, Comm. 379; Rex v. Broom, 12 Mod. 135; Dean v. Angus, [Case No. 3,702.] Moreover, if the cause of action arose at Key West, it was in respect to property waterborne, and a sea-going vessel; and the admiralty jurisdiction embraces ports and havens as a portion of the high seas. Nor is there evidence that the harbor of Key West is land-locked so as to be within the body of a county, and within the restriction of the English rule. Willets v. Newport, 1 Rolle, 250; Montgomery v. Henry, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 50. I am satisfied that, as a general rule, a party deprived of his property by any act on the high seas, whether that property be jetsam, flotsam or ligan, be abandoned by those who have charge of it, or be voluntarily delivered over by them to another without authority, has his remedy in this court, because the transaction is of a maritime character, without regard to any question of marine tort connected with the possession. De Lovio v. Boit, [Case No. 3,776.]

It is insisted for the respondent, that admitting the court at Key West had no jurisdiction, yet that objection had been waived by the assent of Seaman to the proceedings, and the subsequent composition and adjustment made by Earle with those claiming the cargo as purchasers under those proceedings. It is not necessary to inquire whether Seaman possessed authority to bind the libellants by the assent supposed, since the fact of the assent is not established. His appearance as a witness before the local court does not amount to a submission to the authority, which the court assumed, to award salvage and condemn the vessel and her cargo to sale, to satisfy its decree. He had no reason to suppose the court would do more than fix a reasonable compensation for the particular services rendered, and such compensation he professed a willingness to pay. When the court ordered a sale of the vessel and her cargo, he remonstrated against and excepted to the whole proceeding, and thus plainly evinced that he never assented to or acquiesced in the authority which the court undertook to exercise. As to the composition entered into by Earle, there is no question, that if one who is tortiously deprived of his property, freely and voluntarily compounds with the wrong-doer, the original tort is thereby extinguished, and cannot afterwards be made a ground of action, unless there was duress or fraud practised in obtaining the compromise. The $72,500 were not paid to the respondent to discharge his lien upon the property as salvor, but was paid to parties who claimed the absolute title to the property as owners, and who are not now before the court. Such payment, therefore, did not amount to a waiver of any rights whatever, as between the libellants and the respondent, at least without an express stipulation at the time to that effect. No contract or understanding of the kind is proved. It appears that Earle was unable to obtain the property in any other way. On the question of fact, therefore, whether the agent of the libellants acquiesced in the assumed ownership of the property, and paid the sum upon that footing, I am convinced, upon the evidence, that he did not, and that he insisted upon a reservation of all the rights of his principals, and refused to take any steps that might impair them. Earle's testimony is entitled to full credit. It is corroborated, also, by all the facts in the case, and is called in question only in some particulars by the testimony of Mr. Whitehead, who, though he has no such fixed legal interest in the case as would make him an incompetent witness, is nevertheless so implicated in the transaction as to be under a strong bias of mind adverse to the libellants and in favor of the respondent, as his own integrity is involved in upholding the judgment of the court and the proceedings under it. I must, therefore, hold that the rights of the libellants remained, after the re-purchase or redemption of the property by Earle, in the same condition as before.

Since, therefore, the libel must be regarded as sufficient in matter of form and of substance, and the court has jurisdiction in the case, and the libellants have established claims against the respondent not waived by them, it remains to determine the extent of the respondent's liability.

The libellants demanded remuneration for all they have lost in consequence of the proceedings at Key West, on the ground that the act of the respondent in taking the brig into Key West was intentionally tortious, and that he is therefore liable for all the consequences of that wrong. But the evidence fails to establish any such wrongful intent. It has been already shown that he did not acquire possession of the brig by force or fraud, and did not retain her, by right of possession, against the demand of her owners, but handed her over to what was claimed to be the custody of the law. The decree of the territorial court having been unauthorized, he is liable to the extent of the property acquired by him under it, but he is not necessarily answerable for all the property the libellants have lost, into whose-soever hands it may have gone. It is evident that the respondent desired to go to Key West, yet there is not enough to charge him with bad faith in the proceeding. There is, indeed, ground for suspicion that he intended or hoped to secure a more favorable award of salvage at Key West than he could expect at any other of the places proposed. But there are not enough circumstances to warrant the conclusion that he resorted to Key West for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud upon the parties interested in the brig or her cargo. The utmost sum for which he can be held liable is the sum received by him as salvage, which is asserted by the libellants to have been $25,006 27; and it is not denied by the respondent that he obtained that amount.

On the other hand, the respondent rendered important services at a time when the brig was in a perilous situation on the reefs; and there is some reason for supposing that but for his timely appearance she would before long have been abandoned by her crew. He is, then, entitled to compensation therefor, unless he has, by his own misconduct, forfeited the right, not only to salvage, but to every other reward. If the charges made in the libel are sustained by the evidence, he has no claim to salvage. This court, having a broad discretion in cases of this character, takes into consideration the merits and motives of the salvor, in regulating the amount of salvage to be awarded him, in some cases giving a large proportion of the property saved, and in others diminishing it to a compensation for pilotage or mere labor, or denying it altogether. The Vrouw Margaretha, 4 C. Rob. [Adm.] 104; Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 240. It is charged upon the respondent that he neglected to inform the brig of her danger, though well aware of it, and fully able to warn her; that he predicted her grounding when he first fell in with her, and placed himself near the spot where it actually occurred, with a view to make a profit from the calamity which he was aware must befall her. The obligation which a vessel is under to warn another of a danger clearly discerned by her, but of which the other is ignorant, is so far an imperfect one that it may not supply a right of action by the party injured against the other for a neglect to comply with it. But if the party in fault comes into a court of justice seeking salvage for rescuing the other from a danger which he might have prevented, it is clear that all right to a salvage reward is destroyed. That is a recompense resting essentially upon equitable considerations. The respondent, if he claims as salvor, must present his claims with clean hands. The evidence to show that the respondent was aware of the danger to which the brig was exposed, consists of his declarations on board his vessel, his answer to the libel, and his conduct at the time the brig was in view before her disaster. His declarations are sworn to by the master and seamen of the Hercules; but their evidence is open to obvious objections, and their depositions, like all ex parte examinations, are to be received with the greatest caution, particularly as, in this case, their testimony before the commissioner was much more full and compromising to the respondent than their evidence as given in court. His own answer to the libel is not so explicit as could be wished. The navigation of those seas and the situation and employment of the respondent are to be considered in estimating the character of this answer. The Gulf-Stream at that place runs northerly at the rate of at least three miles an hour. A northeast wind raises the stream upon the Florida shore, and gives it a direction towards the land. From a minute chart of that section of the coast, previously made by the respondent, it appears that the current tends towards the spot where the Hercules grounded. No observation had been taken by the brig for one or two days before the accident, on account of the weather, and the master of the brig was out of his reckoning. The respondent was perfectly familiar with the navigation of those seas. He must have been able to determine whether the master of the brig was a good pilot or not. He was himself bearing straight for the land, and he observed the brig on a course varying but three or four points from his own, tending towards a long line of reefs, and continually nearing a lee shore, where there was no harbor, and where the danger to her must continue for hundreds of miles. The master of the brig supposed himself to be on the other side of the Gulf-Stream. The respondent, in his conversation with his son, anticipated danger to the brig, not from any change of wind or weather, but from her course when he last saw her. He predicted that she would "be either on the Bahama banks or Carysfort reef." It is not easy to see why the Bahama banks were mentioned. They were from sixty to one hundred miles distant on the other side of the Gulf-Stream. The wind, the current and the direction of the brig, all tended from the Bahama banks towards the Florida reefs. The respondent added: "unless the captain was a good pilot." But how much confidence he placed in the ability of the "captain" may be gathered from his having advised his son that they had better remain where they were, to be ready in case of accident. If danger was equally to be apprehended from the Bahama banks, why should they both remain sixty miles from those banks, and within a mile of Carysfort reef? Why did the respondent come to anchor at mid-day? He says, because the weather was squally; but it is abundantly shown that the sea was smooth at the time the Hercules ran aground. From these and other circumstances, I am convinced that the respondent understood the danger to which the brig was exposed, and kept himself in readiness to take advantage of an accident to the brig, should it occur.

The remaining question is, whether the respondent was able to warn the brig of her danger. The vessels were two or three miles apart, running with the wind, upon courses differing only three or four points. It does not appear that there would have been any danger or difficulty to the respondent in bearing directly for the brig; and, though his son says that he bore away one point for the purpose of speaking the brig, but she hauled her wind, as he supposed, to avoid him, yet this is wholly unsupported by any other evidence, and, had it been true, it must have attracted the notice of some of the seamen or officers of both vessels. The respondent also would have set it up in his answer as evidence of his having discharged his duty, but he makes no mention of anything of the kind. It does not even appear that a flag was raised or a signal shown, and it is not to be assumed that the respondent was unable to warn the brig of her danger, without evidence of any attempt on his part to do so. His claim to salvage should, therefore, not be entertained. He has forfeited it by his conduct in the critical situation of the brig. He acted under a persuasion that she was about to incur the very danger which occasioned the acceptance of his services, and he manifestly contemplated all that occurred. This fact takes from those services, however opportune and indispensable, those meritorious qualities which characterize a salvage service.

At the same time, the respondent rendered valuable assistance to the brig. He did not bring her on the reef, and was under no legal obligation to get her off; and he might have left her there without incurring any personal responsibility. It is evident that the brig was in danger, and the aid he offered was accepted by the master. Nineteen men and two vessels were engaged six days in lightering the cargo and transporting it to Key West, and in piloting the vessel there, a distance of from ninety to one hundred miles. Without pretending to estimate with great exactness the value of the services rendered, I shall allow the respondent therefor the sum of $3,000.

The respondent must, therefore, pay into court the balance of the money received by him from the proceeds of the brig and cargo, with interest, after deducting $3,000. No costs will be allowed to the libellants, since the respondent, in retaining the money awarded to him at Key West, cannot be considered as wrongfully withholding it, as long as the right to it was not settled by a court of adequate authority. The clerk must ascertain the proportion that the respective interests of the libellants in the brig and such of her cargo as was stowed below decks bore to the sum received by the respondent. The deck-load was thrown over-board before the respondent came on board. The clerk will then ascertain and report the proportion due to each of the libellants according to their several interests. Decree accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] Upon the question raised by the plea to the jurisdiction, the opinion of this court was, that the legislative council of Florida did not intend, by the act of July 4th, 1823, to confer upon the courts of Florida any other powers or duties than those of common law courts; that the words wrecked property, in that act, were to be understood of wrecks at common law, namely, goods cast or left upon the land by the sea. (Sir H. Constable's Case, 5 Coke, 107; Jacobsen's Sea Laws, 540; Republica v. Lacaze, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 122.) of which the English common law courts had jurisdiction; that the act was not intended to confer jurisdiction over cases of salvage upon the high seas; and that if it were so intended, the legislative council of Florida had no constitutional authority to confer such jurisdiction. The case of American Ins. Co. v. Canter, [Case No. 302a.] which arose about the same time in the district of South Carolina, presented the same question, and was decided

In the same way, but was carried by appeal to the circuit court, and finally to the supreme court of the United States, (1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 511,) where the decision of the circuit court reversing that of the district court was affirmed, and the point was settled, that though admiralty jurisdiction in the states could be originally exercised only by the district courts of the United States, yet the same limitation did not extend to the territories; that in legislating for them, congress exercised the combined powers of the general and state governments, and that the act of the territorial legislature of Florida, erecting a court which proceeded under the provisions of the law to award salvage and to decree the sale of the cargo of a vessel which had been stranded, and which cargo had been brought within the territorial limits, was not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, and was valid. The opinion of this court upon the point raised by the plea in this case is therefore omitted. On the 1st of February, 1826, about four months after the decree of the territorial court awarding salvage to the respondent, the act of the legislative council of Florida of July 4th, 1823, was annulled by an act of congress, (4 Stat. 138,) and, on the 23d of May, 1828, an act was passed by congress to establish a southern judicial district in the territory of Florida. PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — WHAT CONSTITUTES INFRINGEMENT — SIMILARITY — IMPROVEMENT IN TEMPERING UMBRELLA RIBS.

1. The invention set forth in letters patent granted to A. Stewart Black, July 14th, 1863, for an "improvement in tempering umbrella ribs," defined.

2. The first claim of said patent, namely, "constructing the tempering die with a square hole, corresponding in size to the wire to be tempered, in order that the wire may be straightened in all directions, and the flattened portions of the wire be brought in line with each other, as and for the purposes specified," is infringed by the use, for the tempering of umbrella ribs of U-shaped wire, with wider flattened parts in them, of a die formed of two plates, one above and one below, with the groove in one plate shallow and semi-elliptical, to accommodate one edge of the flattened parts of the rib, and with the groove in the other plate broader and deeper, and, in its cross-section, the shape of the body of the wire, with a channel opposite to and like the groove in the other plate, to accommodate the other edge of the flattened part of the rib.

3. The prior existence of a square hole or groove for the purpose of drawing through it square bars or strips of metal, to compress them and straighten them, does not anticipate the invention claimed in said first claim.

[In equity. Bill for injunction to restrain the infringement of patent No. 39,210. Injunction granted.]

Everett P. Wheeler, for plaintiff.
John D. Shedlock, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This is an application for a provisional injunction to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent granted to A. Stewart Black, July 14th, 1863. The specification of the patent sets forth that Black has "invented, made and applied to use a certain new and useful improvement in tempering umbrella ribs and similar articles." The specification says: "In tempering ribs for umbrellas and parasols and similar articles, great difficulty is experienced in obtaining a uniform temperature throughout the entire length, so as to temper all parts equally. Some parts are tempered too much and bend in use, and others are not tempered enough and break. Besides this, the hardening operation renders the wire composing such ribs more or less crooked, and they have to be straightened at the time of tempering, while in a heated state. Various attempts have been made to effect these operations, however, with but partial success. The nature of my said invention consists in a peculiar construction of grooved or perforated metallic tempering die, that is heated to a sufficient extent to temper the umbrella rib or similar steel article, and the groove or opening in said die, being straight and of the size required for containing such article, straightens it at the same time that its temper is drawn to the degree required. I make use of gas flames or jets to heat the said tempering die, whereby greater uniformity can be obtained in the same than by a fire heat, and said heat can be kept uniform, hour after hour, without especial attention, thus rendering my apparatus adapted to tempering in the most uniform and delicate manner, even when attended by boys, or comparatively unskilful workmen; whereas, the tempering of such articles has heretofore required the exercise of great judgment by skilful workmen." There are three figures of drawings referred to. Figure 1 "is a vertical section of the tempering apparatus, at the line x x, of Figure 2." Figure 2 "is a plan of said apparatus, partially in section, to show the interior." The specification proceeds: "In the drawing, a is a metallic bar, of the requisite size and length, with grooves planed or otherwise formed in the upper surface, as seen in the section, Figure 1, and these grooves are to be of the size required for admitting the wire forming the umbrella spoke or other article; and I prefer, for such ribs, that the grooves be formed with square corners, to allow the flattened parts of the ribs to pass, as illustrated in larger size in Figure 3, said flattened parts being made for the reception of the holes required at the ends and near the middle of such ribs, and, when placed in the said grooves, these flattened portions are diagonal and are brought properly into line with each other by the groove itself. The grooved bar a is to be covered with a second bar b, setting closely to the bar a, so as to form a perforated tempering die. It will be seen that this form of construction is preferable to any other in which the hole might be bored or formed partly in each bar, as this construction is the cheapest and most accurately made, although I do not confine myself in this particular. Where desired, the upper bar b may also be grooved with the same or a different sized groove or channel, setting intermediate to those in the bar a; and the parts a and b may be held together by screws or otherwise. The perforated metallic tempering die made as aforesaid, and heated by competent means, will temper wire umbrella ribs, or similar articles passed through it, and hold the same in a straight position while being tempered, the wire or ribs being passed in at one end and forcing out the tempered rib at the other end." The specification then describes an apparatus for heating the dies, by means of gas-burners, and says, that, "by this device, the temperature of the dies is rendered uniform and continuous, and can be regulated with the greatest exactness, by the flow of gas admitted." There are three claims, as follows: (1.) "Constructing the tempering die with a square hole, corresponding in size to the wire to be tempered, in order that the wire may be straightened in all directions, and the flattened portions of the wire be brought in line with each other, as and for the purposes specified;" (2.) "Constructing the tempering die with the grooves in one of the half-pieces coming opposite the flat surface of the other half-piece, whereby the tempering dies are more easily made and kept in order, as set forth;" (3.) "The tempering dies constructed substantially as specified, and enclosed in a suitable casing, in combination with gas-burners applied substantially as shown, whereby the temperature of the said tempering dies is easily regulated and maintained with uniformity, as set forth."

The defendants have made umbrella frames called "paragon" frames, the ribs in which are constructed of U-shaped wire. Such wire cannot be tempered and straightened in a die with a square hole, if there are wider flattened parts in the wire. The die with a square hole can be used to temper and straighten only round wire, if there are wider flattened parts in the wire. The wire referred to in the specification of the plaintiff's patent is round wire. The "paragon" ribs tempered and straightened by the defendants have wider flattened parts in them, and have been tempered and straightened by them in heated dies. The dies are formed of two plates, one above and one below. The groove in one plate is shallow and semi-elliptical, and the groove in the other plate is broader and deeper. The former groove accommodates one edge of the flattened parts of the rib, while the latter is, in its cross-section, the shape of the body of the wire, with a channel opposite to and like the groove in the other plate, to accommodate the other edge of the flattened parts of the rib. In the square-holed die, the wider flattened parts of the round wire are accommodated in the diagonal corners of the square hole, while the surface of the round wire touches the four sides of the square hole. In the defendant's die, the contour of the body of the wire touches the surface of the body of the groove at all points, while the wider flattened parts of the wire pass through the two narrow grooves.

In each of the two constructions of dies the result is attained of tempering and straightening the rib at the same time, and of doing this after the wider flattened parts have been formed in the rib. In each the groove is straight longitudinally, and is of the shape and size requisite not only to contain the rib, but to embrace and support it at such points as will serve to straighten it in its passage, and to admit at the same time of the free passage of the wider flattened parts through portions of the groove, which are so arranged as to keep such wider flattened parts of the rib in line with each other. In each the dies, when heated, will temper the rib, and hold all parts of it in a straight position while being tempered, and the tempering and straightening take place while the rib is moving through the groove longitudinally from end to end. The mode of operation of the two dies, in their use in connection with the wire which is passed through them, is the same. The defendants' tempering die is constructed with a hole which corresponds in size to the wire which is to be tempered, and, in tempering the wire, by drawing it through such hole when the die is heated, the wire is straightened in all directions, and the flattened portions of the wire are brought in line with each other. The language of the first claim of the plaintiff's patent describes the defendants' die and its effect on the wire that is drawn through it, except that such claim describes the hole in the die as square. The hole in the defendants' die is not mathematically square. But, the whole tenor of the specification shows that the meaning of the claim is, that the hole or groove shall be of such size and shape as to allow the body of the wire to go through and be straightened while it is being tempered, and also to allow the flattened parts of the wire to go through and be kept in line with themselves and with the body of the wire. For a round wire a square hole will accomplish all of these results. The corners of the square are merely supplementary spaces for the passage of the wider parts. The shape of the exterior walls of such spaces is manifestly immaterial, so long as the spaces exist and have exterior walls. In the patent the spaces are described as corners of a square. But, whether the two lines of the corner form a right angle with each other, or a greater angle than a right angle, or form together any other figure, is manifestly shown by the specification to be immaterial, so long as the walls of the groove hug the body of the wire and yet leave space for the wider flattened parts. The corners of the hole in the defendants' die, though not mathematically square, are, to all practical intents, square, so far as the supplementary spaces are concerned. The invention embodied in the first claim of the patent is found, in all particulars, in the defendants' dies. The first claim of the patent is not limited to a groove which is wholly in one of the two half-pieces of the die. That feature exists in the second claim; but the specification states that a groove formed partly in each of the two half-pieces is contemplated by the inventor.

The specification is not artistically drawn. It seems to set out with describing the invention as being to draw the rib through a straight heated groove of the proper size in a metallic die, and it follows out that idea. It states the leaving of a space for the flattened parts of the rib to pass through, as a preferential construction. It would seem as if the intention originally was to claim broadly the tempering and straightening of the rib in a heated metallic die having a straight groove in it of the size and shape of the rib. But there is no such claim. The first claim is narrowed to a construction which includes only a rib with flattened parts, and a groove which will accommodate such flattened parts, which are shown in Figure 3 of the drawing as projecting beyond the line of the body of the unflattened parts of the rib. The first claim does not include a rib which has no flattened parts, nor does it include a groove which will accommodate only a rib which has no flattened parts. It is contended by the defendants that the first claim claims merely a die with a square hole, as a structure, and that, if a square hole in a metallic die is shown to have existed before, the first claim is void for want of novelty. But, the fair construction of the first claim, in connection with the body of the specification, is a claim to the mode or process of tempering and straightening a rib which has a body, and flattened portions other than such body, by drawing the rib through a straight hole or groove in a heated metallic die, of the proper size and shape to at once embrace closely the body of the rib, and yet, by supplementary spaces in the groove, to allow such flattened portions to pass through freely and be brought in line with each other. The whole text of the specification shows that the invention is declared to be one of an improvement in tempering the rib, that is, in the process or mode of tempering it, and the description is declared to be a description of such improvement. The square hole or groove may have existed before and been used for the purpose of drawing through it square bars or strips of metal, to compress them and straighten them, but, such prior existence and use of the square groove does not anticipate the invention claimed in the first claim of the Black patent, as such invention is above defined. In such aspect, the use of the square groove in the manner and for the purpose indicated in such first claim is not the mere use of an old thing for a new purpose, or the mere application of the square groove to a new use.

The defendants adduce various prior inventions, but none of them anticipate the invention covered by the first claim of the patent. The Holland patent has semicircular grooves for straightening and tempering umbrella ribs, but makes no suggestion as to ribs with wider flattened parts. The Fox patent is for tempering and straightening cylindrical wire in circular grooves. The same is true of the Chesterman patent and the Maddin patent. The Hadfield and Shipman patent shows square holes and round holes through which to draw metallic strips, to temper them, but nothing is disclosed that suggests anything more than that round wire is to be drawn through a round groove and square wire or steel through a square groove. So far as appears, Black was the first person to perform the process described in the first claim of the patent by the means therein described, and thus the first to temper and straighten an umbrella rib having the wider flattened parts in it.

I do not see that there is any infringement of the second and third claims. Let an injunction issue as to the first claim.

[NOTE. So far as known, this patent, No. 39,210, has not been involved in any other cases reported prior to January 1, 1880.]

Case No. 305.

AMERICAN MIDDINGS PURIFIER CO.
v. ATLANTIC MILLING CO.

[4 Dill. 100; 3 Ban. & A. 168.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1877.

INJUNCTION AGAINST INFRINGERS IN PATENT CASES —VALIDITY OF PATENT—EFFECT OF DECREE OF CIRCUIT AND SUPREME COURT SUSTAINING A PATENT—BOND AS THE ALTERNATIVE OF AN INJUNCTION—ORDER AS TO KEEPING AN ACCOUNT.

1. An application for an injunction, pendente lite, to restrain defendants from an alleged infringement of the Cochrane patent (owned by the plaintiff) for the "new process" of manufacturing flour from "middlings:" the patent having been sustained by a decree of the supreme court, and that decree not having been shown to be collusive, the validity of the patent was considered as sufficiently established to give the right to an injunction; but the injunction was refused because the infringement was not satisfactorily shown.

2. The alleged invalidity of the reissued Cochrane patent on the ground that it contains claims not warranted by the original patents, and on the ground that the invention was not novel, was not shown with such clearness as to justify the court in holding, on a preliminary application, a patent to be void, which had been sustained by the supreme court.

3. The giving of a bond by a defendant as a condition of avoiding an injunction, will not be required, except in a case where, if the bond is not given, an injunction will and ought to issue.

4. Although an injunction was denied, the defendants were required to keep an account of the amount of flour manufactured in their mills, and report the same monthly, under oath, and to submit to an examination of their mills, when in operation, by the plaintiff, its counsel, and expert witnesses.

[In equity. Bill by the American Middlings Purifier Company against the Atlantic Milling Company for infringing patents Nos. 37,317, 37,318, and 37,321. Heard on motion for provisional injunction. Injunction refused. On final hearing, plaintiff's bill was dismissed. American Middlings Purifier Co. v. Atlantic Milling Co., Case No. 306.]

The plaintiff company, as the assignee of the Cochrane patent for the "new process" of making flour from "middlings," filed a bill against the defendant company, and against several other mill owners in St. Louis, charging them with infringing the reissued Cochrane patent, and asking, inter alia, for a preliminary injunction. Answers were filed in all of the cases, assailing the validity of the patent and denying the alleged infringement. Only one affidavit to support the charge of infringement was filed. There were numerous affidavits denying the infringement. The following opinion was delivered on the application for an injunction.

Rodney Mason, John A. Hunter, and C. H. Krum, for plaintiff.

George Harding and F. N. Judson, for defendant.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The bill in this case charges the defendants with infringing several patents issued to William F. Cochrane, all of which have been assigned to plaintiff. These patents are reissues following upon a surrender of original patents, and they relate to the "new process," as it is called, of making a superior flour out of middlings, which were formerly rejected, or, if used, were very inferior in quality and value. The patent of principal importance in the case is for the process by which these middlings are purified and converted into flour, and the others are patents for several machines used in the process. The bill prays for a preliminary injunction, and due notice of the application was given. The case having been fully heard on affidavits and argument of counsel, we now proceed to its decision. It is proper to add that, before the hearing, the answers of the defendants were filed.

The defences are: First, that the patents are invalid; and, second, that if valid, they have not been infringed by the defendants. The patents have been found to be valid by the judgment of the supreme court of the United States at its last term, in the case of Cochrane v. Deener, [95 U. S. 355.] and a copy of the record of that case is produced as evidence in this case. And while it is conceded that the judgment in that suit is not an estoppel as to the defendants in this, because they were not parties to the former, it is not denied that it is conclusive on this court as to the principles which it decides, and raises a prima facie presumption of the validity of those patents, which requires clear and satisfactory proof to the contrary, before it can be rebutted. This proposition was announced in the case of American Middlings Purifier Co. (present plaintiff) v. Christian, [Case No. 307.] on a similar application in the Minnesota circuit court, a few months ago, and we adhere to it now. To avoid the legitimate effect of that judgment, it is alleged by defendants that the judgment of the supreme court was obtained by fraudulent collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant, imposing upon the court what it believed to be a genuine contest, while in fact it was intended and desired by both parties that the patent of plaintiff should be established by its judgment.

There is, in our opinion, a failure to prove this collusion. The fact that the parties to this suit and others similarly interested have, during the vacation of the supreme court, filed a motion to vacate that judgment on that ground, certainly has no tendency to prove it. And scarcely any more weight can be attached to ex parte affidavits purporting to retail, at two or three removes by hearsay, the statements of the counsel of one of the parties to that suit. Nor can a presumption of such collusion arise from the fact that the case was heard on printed argument instead of oral, or that the two counsel of defendant, who each presented a printed argument, did not make it longer or fuller. These arguments in the supreme court were very fully considered and accurate models were examined. A division of opinion in the court caused a protracted examination of the case, which was before the court after its submission some six months—a very rare thing.

It is next urged that the reissued patents are void because they differ from the originals in important particulars, and contain claims not justified by the originals, and it is said that this question was not before the supreme court. It appears to be true that no such question was considered by the court, and if the showing of the defendants were such as to convince our judgment, or satisfactorily prove that the position is well taken, we should give the defendants the benefit of it. But the action of the officers in the patent office, in making these reissues, must be presumed to be right, and the burden of proving the reverse is on the defendants. They have produced nothing on that subject but the specifications of the original and reissued patents, and insist that it appears clearly from a comparison of these, that the reissue is for a different thing from the original. The comparison, as thus made, and especially when extended to all the patents relating to the same improvement issued to the patentee on the same day, does not satisfy us that the reissues are void on that ground. They are not, in our judgment, sufficient, in the absence of the original applications in the patent office, to justify us on this preliminary motion and imperfect presentation of the case, to hold patents which have been passed upon by the supreme court, and by the circuit court of Minnesota, void. The same remarks apply to the next objection to the patents, namely, that they were not novel. The principal evidence offered on this subject is an extract from a French publication, which is said to be now in the patent office at Washington, bearing a date anterior to the date assigned by Cochrane to his invention. The correctness of the translation offered is disputed. The original is not before us. The whole matter is so imperfectly presented, that it would be a gross injustice to hold the patents void without a more extended examination of the matter. It may be observed in respect to both these objections, that, on final hearing, when the issues are clearly made and seen, and the testimony of witnesses subjected to cross-examination, with the aid afforded to the court by models and drawings illustrated by full argument, they can receive that careful consideration of the court which they cannot here, and which is necessary to justify the rejection of the patents.

For the purposes of the present motion, we are bound to treat the patents set up by the plaintiff as valid. There remains to be considered the question of infringement. The case standing at the head of this opinion was heard and argued with four others, brought by the same plaintiff for a like infringement by other defendants. In all these cases, the bills charge the infringement and the answers deny it under oath. It is necessary, therefore, for the plaintiff to sustain the allegation of infringement by a preponderance of evidence. There is but one witness on the part of plaintiff in all the cases. The defendants in each case have introduced several witnesses, who, on oath, deny that the defendants use the process or the machines described in plaintiff's patent. Looked at in this general way, there is the force of the answer and the more numerous witnesses

If we examine more closely the statements of these affidavits, it does not appear that Mr. Paige, the witness of plaintiff, ever saw any of the machines of plaintiff, or any model of them, or of the Welch patent. He describes their mode of operation and the process of plaintiff from the language of the patent alone. Conceding that he is sufficiently an expert to understand this, and taking his description of the mode or process of the defendants, some of which he does not pretend to describe except by reference to others, his affidavit is liable to the objection of a want of minuteness and precision in those descriptions. These affidavits are unaccompanied by any models or drawings of defendants' machines, or anything whatever by which the court can institute for itself a comparison of the processes used by the defendants with those patented by plaintiff. This is a very serious defect in the presentation of the case. When the case in Minnesota [American Middlings Purifier Co. v. Christian, Case No. 307] was before me, several models were introduced, and the patent which defendant used was brought into court and the actual process of bolting, with the use of the current of air, was put in operation before our eyes. The defendant then claimed that the patent of which that model was an exhibit, antedated that of plaintiff and rendered it void. There was scarcely a question that, if it was not an anticipation of plaintiff's invention, it was an infringement of it. The infringement in that case was but feebly denied and was manifest. Here it is very different. The infringement is but feebly supported by a single witness and denied by many. Mr. Paige, himself, seems to recognize two variations of the processes of defendants in all the cases from those of plaintiff. One of these is, that plaintiff describes a process by which the middlings are purified in the first separation from the superfine flour, the meal going through a series of reels and bolting cloths, subjected from the beginning to the current of air, and the middlings, when this part of the process is ended, being left in the reel purified and ready for regrinding. The defendants do not use the air current in the first step of the bolting, but, following the old mode, separate, without the use of the air current, the superfine flour from the middlings, ship-stuff, etc., and then taking the middlings, run them through the sieves prepared for the purpose. In the mills of a majority of defendants the current of air is not introduced into the sieve where the middlings are until they have been rebolted several times. The other variation is, that the defendants use the old mode of bolting, by which the meal, as it progresses, passes over cloths, the meshes of which are continuously coarser, while with plaintiff's they grow successively finer. The result of this is obvious, namely: that the middlings with such heavy particles of bran and other impurities as cannot be driven off by the air-blast, all remain in the bolt in plaintiff's process. These same middlings pass through the bolting cloth in defendants' process and are found in the chest, divided by the relative size of the meshes of the cloth into middlings, shipstuff, etc.

Another variation insisted upon as important by Mr. Harding, is that in all the defendants' processes the current of air is produced by suction, while in plaintiff's they are created by pressure forcing the air into the machine. We do not think we are called upon to determine with critical accuracy, upon consideration of the doctrine of equivalents, whether these variations which are apparent now are such as to exempt the defendants on a final hearing from the charge of infringement. On that hearing, no doubt much that is obscure will be made clear. Drawings and models will be shown, and witnesses subjected to cross-examination. Other competent witnesses will have opportunity to examine defendants' process. The law of equivalents will be discussed as it has not been now. The decision of the supreme court is strong evidence that plaintiff's patent is valid, and is conclusive that Deener, in the use of Welch's patent, infringed it. But it is no evidence that these defendants have infringed it. The full burden of proving that rests upon the plaintiff as an entirely new issue of fact. When we consider the consequences to defendants of stopping their mills by injunction at this season of year, that we are asked to do this in a summary manner on a hearing at short notice, without the usual test of cross-examining witnesses, we are of opinion that the case which demands such a grave interference with the business of individuals should be clearly made out and should not rest upon unsatisfactory evidence that the acts charged have been committed. It may be said that, by placing defendants under bonds, as we did in St. Paul, their business can go on without interruption; but we can only require bonds as an alternative, the other branch of which is, that if they do not give bonds, they must be stopped by injunction; we can only demand a bond, therefore, in a case in which, if it is not given, the injunction must issue.

We do not see that such a case is made in regard to the defendants in either of the cases before us. As there is no allegation of present or threatened insolvency in any of the bills or affidavits, and as substantial precautionary justice can be fully attained by requiring the defendants to keep an account and report monthly under oath, and to submit to a thorough examination of their mills, while in operation, by plaintiff, his counsel and expert witnesses, we shall make such an order and deny the injunction.

Judge TREAT, though not constituting a part of the court, has heard the case and given us the benefit of his counsel, and agrees to what is here said.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, concurs.

Ordered accordingly.

COCHRANE REISSUED PATENT — NEW PROCESS
FLOUR—PURIFICATION OF MIDDINGS — EXPAN-SION OF CLAIM IN REISSUED PATENT.

The Cochrane reissued patent, sustained in Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780, for the manufacture of new process flour by the purification of "middlings" by screening and blowing, was held void because no such process was described, suggested, or claimed in the original patent.

[In equity. Bill by the American Middlings Purifier Company against the Atlantic Milling Company, and another bill against John A. Christian & Co. for infringing plaintiff's patents Nos. 37,317, 37,318, and 37,321. On application a preliminary injunction was refused in the Atlantic Milling Case, (Case No. 305,) and also in the Christian Case, provided the defendants would give bonds, etc. (Id. 307.) The cases came on for final hearing, and were argued together. Bills dismissed.]

On the 6th day of January, 1863, letters patent, numbered 37,317, were granted by the United States to William F. Cochrane for "a new and useful method of bolting flour." The claims in this patent were as follows: "1st. Bolting the meal over a series of reels covered with cloths of increasing fineness, in combination with a blast, substantially in the manner described. 2d. Running the offal through the entire series of reels, substantially in the manner described, for the purpose of making the flour bolt more freely. 3d. Rebolting the 'white middlings' flour after regrinding and mixing them with offal, substantially in the manner described. 4th. Conducting the flour made upon each reel into a separate compartment, substantially in the manner described, for the purpose of making a variety of grades, or of mixing them in any proportion desired, as set forth."

On the 24th day of April, 1874, the above-mentioned patent was reissued, numbered 5,841, for "a new and useful improvement in the art of manufacturing flour." The claim in the reissued patent was as follows: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, as an improvement in the art of manufacturing flour, is the hereinbefore-described process for manufacturing flour from the meal of ground wheat, by first taking out the superfine flour, and then taking out the pulverulent impurities by subjection to the combined operations of screening and blowing, and afterwards regrinding and rebolting the purified middlings."

The complainant is the assignee of the reissued patent. The reissued patent was sustained by the supreme court, in Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780. A motion was made in the supreme court to vacate that decree, because it was procured by collusion. The charge was not sustained, but in denying the motion the supreme court said: "Under the circumstances, we think that third parties, who had no opportunity of being heard, and whose interests as opposed to the Cochrane patents are very important, should not be concluded from having a further hearing upon it whenever a future case may be presented for our consideration." [95 U. S. 355.] The defendants in their respective answers deny the validity of the reissued patent on various grounds, the more important of which are that such reissue is not for the same invention as that described and claimed in the original patent, and that the invention had been anticipated by others, and described in various publications and patents prior to 1863; and the defendants also deny the alleged infringement. Voluminous proofs were taken, accompanied with many diagrams, models, and exhibits.

By consent of parties, the arguments were heard by the circuit judge and Judges Treat and Nelson.

George Harding, Gordon E. Cole, F. N. Judson, and others, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, and NELSON, District Judges.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The reissued patent is a process patent for an alleged new and useful improvement in the art of manufacturing flour. "The claim therein," as construed by the complainant, "is for the use of five consecutive steps performed in the art of manufacturing flour, in a definite order, viz.: 1st, Grinding the wheat into meal; 2d, Taking out the superfine flour; 3d, Taking out the pulverulent impurities by the combined operation of screening and blowing so as to purify the middlings, which are then, 4th, Reground, and then, 5th, Rebolting."

The real value of the invention described and claimed in the reissued patent consists in the purification of the middlings by screening and blowing, thus freeing them from pulverulent impurities, and thereby fitting them to be reground into flour of a superior quality. The mode described in the patent and accompanying model and drawings for effecting the purification of the middlings is by the agency of revolving bolts acting upon the meal or "chop" as sieves or screens, assisted in their operation by blasts of air introduced within them. The claim of the complainant is that wherever, in the manufacture of flour, the wheat is ground by the first operation of the stones into meal, so that superfine flour is by the next step of the process taken therefrom, any purification of the middlings in residual mass (of which the valuable constituent is the middlings) by the combined operation of screening and blowing, intermediately, for the purpose of regrinding and rebolting, whether such purifying is within the flour reels or upon vibratory screens outside of reels, is an infringement of the Cochrane patent.

Flour made from purified middlings is now, and since about the year 1871 or 1872 has been, well known throughout the country as "new process flour." In what consists the essential value of this "new process?" The answer is, purified middlings—that is, the making of a first grade, and even the best grade, of flour out of middlings—from which it had generally been considered by the millers of this country (although more intelligent or advanced ideas prevailed in France, and perhaps elsewhere in Europe) impossible to produce, or, at all events, impracticable profitably to produce, flour of the first quality.

A fundamental question in the cause, underlying all others, is: Did Mr. Cochrane, in his original patent, granted January 6th, 1863, contemplate or provide for the purification of middlings by the combined action of the screen and blast? If he did not, the reissue, which must be for the same invention as the original patent, and which makes the basis of its claim such purification of the middlings, is void.

In the light of arguments of great ability and thoroughness, extending over a period of fifteen days, and illustrated at every step by exhibits, diagrams, and models, the judges who sat at the hearing have deliberately considered the question above stated, and have reached a unanimous conclusion upon it. It becomes my duty to announce the judgment of the court. I shall content myself with stating it, without displaying in detail the reasons, or elaborating the grounds upon which it rests.

The description of the invention in the original patent as a "method of bolting flour;" the progressively finer meshes in the three bolting reels therein described; the absence of any "returns;" the statement therein that the agency of the blast is to "assist the bolting;" the cupola, or dome, on the model, provided with screens, which could have no other effect than to arrest the impurities, or the most of them, and return them directly to the flour; the enforced circuit of air, containing any impurities that might escape the screens in the cupola, and returning the air, under the conditions specified, laden with such impurities, directly into the reels; the absence of any statement in the patent of a purpose to purify middlings; the absence of any claim for purifying middlings; the statement that air is used "to aid bolting," and the obvious consideration that, if air was used to purify middlings, it could not fail to have occurred to so ingenious a mind as Mr. Cochrane's that this could be most easily and most effectually applied as it is now almost universally applied—outside of the reels or bolts, and not within them; the failure to provide for blasts of air in the "separator," or in a separator; the low grinding which his process evidently contemplated, as evidenced by the successively finer meshes; the fact now established, that the manufacture of middlings flour is not practiced without more or less high grinding, or higher grinding than was ordinarily used in this country—the foregoing considerations, in connection with the extrinsic testimony as to what was done under the patent, all concur to satisfy us that the idea of Mr. Cochrane was the use of the blast in the reels as an aid in the mere process of bolting, with the view of obtaining an increased quantity of choice flour, and not for the production of purified middlings.

The reissued patent having been expanded to embrace a claim for purifying middlings, when no such process was described, suggested, or claimed in the original patent, it is void. If this conclusion is sound, it is not necessary to consider the questions of anticipation or infringement, upon some of which, if compelled to decide them, we might not agree. The result is that the bills must be dismissed, and decrees will be entered accordingly. All concur.

NELSON, District Judge. I concur in the opinion of the circuit judge. The actual invention of Cochrane has been enlarged by the addition of new matter in the reissue, so that, when the two patents are compared, the expansion is apparent. The new patent is not for the same invention secured and embraced in the original letters patent.

TREAT, District Judge. I concur in the opinion just delivered by the circuit judge. The reissued patent, No. 5,841, is not for the same invention as patent No. 37,317, and is consequently void. In addition to the summary of reasons just announced for the conclusion reached, it seems advisable to state that the original patent was merely for an improved method of bolting in the manner described, whereby an increased quantity of choice flour could be obtained from the ordinary process of milling, without any reference to purified middlings, by combined blowing and screening in an intermediate or any other stage of the operations.

The original contract of Cochrane, in 1860, with Warder & Barnett, shows that his purpose was, by low grinding, to produce a superior grade of flour in larger quantities than heretofore known. He agreed to make "the most superior grade of flour in the United States out of four bushels and twelve pounds of choice wheat for each barrel of flour," which result could not be accomplished except by low grinding, if at all. His scheme or plan did not contemplate a large amount of middlings, and could not have done so, for the lower the grinding the less the quantity, and, as a general rule, the poorer the quality, of the middlings.

At the time said contract was made, Cochrane had an interest in the Coggswell & McKiernan patent, the devices of which he evidently designed to utilize. His experiments at Lagonda, and subsequently at the first Barnett mill, also show that his purpose was to produce a large amount of such choice flour by low grinding from the least possible, or a comparatively small, quantity of wheat.

The early experiments were directed to that end, and hence the satisfaction evinced when the required amount of flour was produced approximately from the designated amount of wheat. When, however, it was ascertained that no grade of good middlings flour could be thus made, the resort was had to higher grinding, of which, as to the result, Warder & Barnett complained as being one-quarter too much.

They prove by their correspondence at the time, just as the original patent shows, that the inventor supposed that by his process and devices for bolting he could accomplish his purpose by using the ordinary process of milling. This is evident, not only from the correspondence at the time, but from the mechanical inventions to which he referred, and also from the special stress placed on meshes of increasing fineness. In that correspondence there was a constant boast of the new mode of bolting, whereby the meshes were to be kept cool, and free from clogging, etc., and also of the device for returning the current of air through the cupola back into the reels, whence it had just escaped through the perforated pipes, meshes, etc. In one of the letters it was confidently claimed that the difficulties as to low grinding, even of spring wheat, could be overcome by Cochrane's contrivances—that grinding of even that class of wheat could not be so low as to prevent "cleaning up." It was low grinding, then, whereby the large quantity of choice flour was to be made, that the inventor had in view. This was to be effected, not by an "intermediate" stage of purification between the production of superfine flour and the re-grinding of middlings, but by the use of meshes of increasing fineness in the flour bolts, assisted by blasts of air. Those blasts of air were to spend their force within the first three reels; for no blasts were to be used in the separator before regrinding. The necessary effect of using successively finer meshes, instead of successively coarser, was to prevent the escape through the meshes of a larger quantity of impurities, and, consequently, of making the flour thus screened clearer and better. The impurities thus prevented from passing through the screens into the flour would necessarily be retained in the reels, and pass off with the tailings, consisting of middlings, shipstuf, etc. It is not to be supposed that meshes of increasing fineness could operate in any other way. Hence the Cochrane process was not to purify the middlings, or increase their quantity or quality, but merely by his "improved method of bolting" to obtain a larger amount of choice flour from the specified quantity of wheat.

In his original patent, No. 37,317, he formulated four claims, not one of which was for purifying middlings, but two were specially directed to his mode of "bolting." He especially stated that the flour screened through each of his first three reels could be kept separate or mixed, as the miller might desire, without a hint that the siftings of the third reel would consist of dirty flour, or pulverulent impurities, not fit to be used, or which it was sought to remove, either from the flour thus sifted through the third reel or from the middlings within that reel, which were to pass off with the tailings.

The devices specified in the original patent are very significant on this point. They provided for the introduction of a blast of air through perforated pipes into each reel, as stated, for the purpose of keeping the meshes open, cooling, etc., without mentioning any effect to be produced towards removing pulverulent impurities, or even naming such impurities. Indeed, if that effect had been contemplated, the invention would not have provided a cupola with two screens and brushes to arrest the escape of whatever was blown or wafted into the cupola, and to cause that wafted matter to be thrown back or discharged directly into the first flour chest. If that wafted matter, whether flour, dust, or pulverulent impurities, was to be thus returned and mixed with the siftings of the first reel, it is evident that the invention had no reference to the removal and separation of such matter from the flour. The devices involved necessarily a contrivance for the escape of the air forced into the reels—for an enforced current of the kind must have an outlet, otherwise disastrous results would follow, or the blasts cease to be operative. The screens in the cupola, and the brushes, for the purpose of returning the arrested particles into the reel-chest, indicate plainly enough that there was no thought of causing pulverulent impurities to escape through the cupola. This is made still more apparent from the fact that whatever escaped through the cupola was, in the normal operation of the connecting tubes, to be blown back into the very reels from which it had been just expelled. It was only in exceptional states of the weather that the valve in the tube was to be opened, but at all other times there was to be a return of the current escaping from the cupola into the reels, carrying with said current whatever it contained. If, then, the purpose was to expel impurities, why such well-arranged devices to force them back into the contents of the reels?

Again, the "cant" ventilator of Cogswell & McKiernan, and their air blasts through zinc jackets, had been used at Lagonda and in the Barnett mill before the original patent, No. 37,317, issued, and simultaneously with that patent Cochrane had procured for his "cant" ventilator his patent No. 37,321; yet in the specifications and claims of No. 37,317 he omitted, and it must have been ex industria, all reference to his No. 37,321, and substituted therefor his cupola, with screens and brushes. When he had ascertained, in 1874, that his devices, as referred to in the original patent, would not purify middlings, nor essentially aid in so doing, he interjected into his specifications for a reissue the rejected device No. 37,321. The testimony sufficiently explains why, from his experimenting at Lagonda and in the first Barnett mill, he discarded the "cant" ventilation, independent of its anticipation by Cogswell & McKiernan. The devices by which the improved method of bolting was to be carried on, so far as air was concerned, looked to an enforced current, or blast, operating from within the reels outward, and not by induced currents operating from without, through the screens, inward or upward, as in flat and vibrating sieves.

Whatever construction may be properly put on the words "combined operations of screening and blowing," it is obvious that the original invention contemplated a blast of air from within the reels, whereby its force should be directed not only through the meal as it was whirled around inside the reels, but also against the meshes of the reels, tending to force through whatever was small enough to pass. If the flour dust was thus forced through and wafted into the cupola, while the heavier particles—small enough to pass—fell by their greater specific gravity into the conveyers, the extremely comminuted particles of the integuments of the wheat berry, or of its cell-walls, would, like the flour dust, pass into the cupola by force of the blast, there to be arrested and brushed back into the flour, or returned through the tube into the reels, to be again and again whirled in and out in a continuous round.

The many changes made by Cochrane, and Warder & Barnett, after the original patent issued, and also after the reissued patent was granted, in order to adjust the devices referred to in No. 37,317 to an induced current or suction, indicate very clearly that the idea or thought of a process for purifying middlings in an "intermediate" or any other stage of the manufacture, by the combined operations of blowing and screening, was not originally in the mind of the inventor. The testimony is clear that when the Cochrane device or machine was rearranged and altered so as to work by suction, the perforated pipes performed no function. The manner of inducing or drawing the air into the reel-chests by suction, and the operation of the reel-screens when suction was used, were the reverse of combined blowing and screening. It cannot be fairly said, in the light of facts and circumstances now in evidence, that those reverse modes of operating were substantially the same, or immaterial changes as to form or modes of accomplishing what the patent covered. Even after the reissue, No. 5,841, Cochrane and Warder & Barnett had to resort to important changes as to the modes of introducing air into their reel-chests; they abandoned the device of a cupola with screens and brushes, introduced practically a new tube and valve, left their perforated pipes functionless, and changed blasts into suction, or enforced into induced currents. In brief, the essential changes in Cochrane's devices, as described in No. 37,317, which he was compelled to make in order that a beneficial result might follow, so far as purifying middlings went, demonstrate that a process for purifying middlings and making therefrom a high grade of flour, superior to superfine, was not thought of by him in or before 1863.

But where can there be detected in No. 37,317 a suggestion either of a mode of purifying middlings by the combined operations of blowing and screening, or of an "intermediate" stage therefor between the production of superfine flour and the regrinding of the middlings? Where is or was such an "intermediate" stage? It is contended that the screenings by the first reel were superfine flour, or, if not, perhaps the screenings also of a part or whole of the second reel, and, consequently, the combined operations of blowing and screening in the third reel purified the middlings at that stage which was intermediate the production of superfine flour and the regrinding of the middlings. But we have endeavored to show that the screenings of the third reel were flour, which could be mixed with the flour from the first two reels, and that the patent so states. If, then, by meshes of increasing fineness, the middlings discharged at the tail of the third reel were less free from impurities than they would be if coarser meshes were used, the process of purification could not occur by the use of that reel, nor at that stage of the operations. There is suggested in the original patent neither the idea of purifying the middlings at the intermediate stage mentioned, nor the use of the combined operations of screening and blowing for that specific purpose. It cannot be said that the mention of "white middlings" embodies such a conception, so that the reissue, without expansion, could cover the purification of middlings in the manner and at the stage claimed, for the term "white middlings" was well known to the art of milling long before, and also to the commercial world. The manner in which "white middlings" are referred to in the patent shows that the term was used as one well known, and not as a new or special product of any superior value.

A comparison of the original and reissued patents, and an examination of Cochrane's contract with Warder & Barnett in 1860, also of the correspondence of the latter and of the testimony concerning low and high grinding in connection with Cochrane's invention, will show that the purpose was as stated, viz., by the ordinary process of milling, through his method of bolting, to increase the yield of choice flour. He soon learned that higher grinding, or what Professor Horsford's report terms "half-high milling," was necessary to the production of the best quality of flour, or of that superior grade which he contracted to make. Instead of accomplishing the promised result by low grinding from four bushels and twelve pounds of wheat, higher grinding was soon resorted to, requiring five bushels and twenty pounds of wheat per barrel. He complained to his millers, it is said, that they persisted in grinding too low, although that mode of grinding was necessary to make the required yield, and insisted that they should grind higher. It was well known in the art that high grinding made a better quality but less quantity of good flour, but Cochrane thought he could increase the quantity of choice flour by his process. Warder & Barnett, it seems, following, it may be, the suggestion of Cochrane, began the use of high grinding at an early day, and stated to their correspondents that certain shipments made were from grinding "high," yet, in one of their letters, they then boasted that by the new method even spring wheat could not be ground "too low" to prevent its being "cleared up." The ordinary process of milling, in connection with which Cochrane's method of bolting was to be employed, must have been, if not low grinding, certainly not the high grinding used in defendant's mill; for the value of his method looked to the greater yield of choice flour.

The reissue says: "It is this intermediate treatment (between the separation of the superfine flour and the completion of the middlings flour by regrinding and rebolting) for the separation and removal of the pulverulent impurities which distinguishes my improvement in the art from all before known modes of manufacture." In the original patent there is not only no such claim, but nothing is said about the removal of pulverulent or any other impurities, or any such intermediate treatment. A brief use of air in an expanded portion of one reel at Lagonda, operating as a separator, was soon abandoned in the course of the early experimenting, and, hence, in the original patent no use of air in the separator was mentioned.

The proof is that, in the modern or present mode of purifying middlings, the purification occurs in connection with what answers to Cochrane's separator; and in that connection a current of air is now employed, while Cochrane did not call for any blast of air at that stage of the process, and previous to regrinding. His plan or process was not to use blasts of air in connection with the separator, but to rely on the ordinary process of screening, without the use of air blasts or currents. The reissue attempts to expand the original invention to cover, therefore, in connection with the separator, what he did not originally claim or suggest, in order that he might appropriate to himself what had been since discovered or used outside of his invention.

As the conclusion is reached that the reissued patent is void, it is unnecessary to consider whether the process claimed was anticipated in any of the various publications, or by any of the persons or processes as set up by defendants. The questions concerning "high milling," the French and economical processes as used in Europe, the connection of the Cabanes and other patents with such processes, and also of Gove's method and machine, would, if fully considered, involve a very elaborate investigation of details, and require, for a clear presentation of their analysis, resort to numerous drawings and models.

If the reissue had been held valid, an embarrassing and delicate question would have arisen concerning the alleged infringement by the defendant. In the case of Cochrane v. Deener, [94 U. S. 780.] the United States supreme court decided that the Welsh patent was an infringement of Cochrane's. That court had before it not only the process patent of Cochrane, but also his patents for machines; and to what extent this court, under the circumstances, should venture to enter upon the subject anew—if an investigation as to that point were needed—might be doubtful. But, if an appeal is taken, that court will have before it in this suit the large amount of new evidence introduced, in the light of which it can determine for itself whether it will review its former opinion or not. Were it necessary for a decision on that point to be now made, and were it open for our consideration, we might possibly reach a different conclusion. Decree accordingly.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS IN PATENT CASES—EFFECT OF DECREE OR JUDGMENT SUSTAINING A PATENT—PREVIOUS USER—EXPERT TESTIMONY—BOND AS AN ALTERNATIVE FOR AN INJUNCTION.

1. Application for an injunction pendente lite, to restrain the defendants from an alleged infringement of the plaintiff's patent for the "new process" of manufacturing flour from middlings: the validity of this patent having been sustained by the supreme court (Cochrane v. Deener, October term, 1876, [94 U. S. 780.]) and that judgment not being shown to have been collusive, and the infringement being made probable, the court ordered an injunction unless the defendants would give a bond conditioned for the payment of any final decree for money in favor of the plaintiff, and for keeping an accurate account of the amount of flour made by them, and to report the same every three months to the court.

[Cited in Hoe v. Boston Daily Advertiser Corp., 14 Fed. 916.]

2. The principles which guide the courts in granting or refusing such injunctions, considered by Miller, circuit justice.

3. A decree or judgment of a circuit court, after full hearing or trial in an adversary cause, sustaining a patent, is very strong evidence of its validity in an application for an injunction; and such a decree or judgment of the supreme court is of still greater weight, if not absolutely conclusive.

[Cited in American Paper Pail & Box Co. v. National Folding Box & Paper Co., 51 Fed. 232, 2 C. C. A. 165.]

4. Previous user of the patent by the plaintiff, or those who claim under him, is not absolutely essential to the right to an injunction: if the validity of the patent has been established by a decree or judgment of the circuit or supreme court, the plaintiff, if otherwise entitled, may have an injunction without showing previous general user, especially where the patent is for a process, as distinguished from a machine.

5. Effect of plaintiff's laches on his right to an injunction, considered; and, under the circumstances, held not to defeat the right.

6. Expert testimony in patent causes, and the weight to be attached to ex parte affidavits, commented on.

[In equity. Bill by the American Middlings Purifier Company against John A. Christian & Co. for infringing plaintiff's patents Nos. 37,317, 37,318, and 37,321. Heard on motion for preliminary injunction. Motion allowed unless the defendants give security in the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. On final hearing plaintiff's bill was dismissed. American Middlings Purifier Co. v. Atlantic Milling Co., Case No. 306.]

This suit was commenced in May last, by the complainant, as the owner of the patent by assignment from the patentee, to recover damages in the sum of $300,000, for an alleged infringement by the defendants of the process for manufacturing flour and purifying middlings, which was patented to William F. Cochrane, originally in 1863, and afterwards by a reissued patent in 1874, on which reissued letters patent the complainant's claim is based. At this term of the court (June, 1877), the complainant's counsel moved, upon the bill of complaint and affidavits, that an injunction be issued, restraining the defendants from using this process in the manufacture of flour until the final determination of the suit. This motion was vigorously opposed by the counsel for the defendants, by models and a large number of affidavits, their defence being that Cochrane, the patentee, was not the first inventor of the process, but that, as long ago as 1856, a description of the same process was published in France as the invention of one Cabanes, and that it was patented by him in England in the preceding year; also that the process had been in use in this country for many years in the farina mills of New York, and that if the complainant ever had any rights, it had lost them through its laches or negligence, in allowing so long a time to elapse before asserting them or making them known. On the other hand, the complainant's counsel contended that this process differed substantially from that of Cabanes'; and that in the case of Cochrane v. Deener, [94 U. S. 780,] which was decided by the supreme court of the United States at the last October term, the validity of this patent was fully established.
