If, then, the indictment cannot be supported upon the first count against the bankrupt law, can it be sustained upon the second, as against the general criminal law of the United States? If the case could be brought clearly within the 18th section of this law, no doubt that the indictment might be supported. But this section plainly refers to perjuries committed in judicial proceedings, whether orally, or by deposition. The words relied upon by the attorney cannot, I think, be construed to extend the crime of perjury to all cases of depositions taken under the authority of the United States, because that would be to make the same false oath perjury, and punishable if put into the form of a deposition, which would be dispunishable if given orally. This would be a great absurdity; but, if it be construed to extend to depositions taken in judicial proceedings, then the consequence will be, that false oaths taken in judicial proceedings, whether orally or by deposition, when taken under the authority of the United States, are declared to be perjury. Besides, if the construction contended for be correct, the many laws declaring what should be perjury in particular cases, would have been unnecessary. And what is conclusive upon this point is, that, admitting the construction, the defendant has not committed this perjury in any deposition; for the answer taken down by the secretary in this case, though committed by him to writing, cannot be called a deposition. But if the defendant can be indicted under the general law now, he might have been before the repeal of the bankrupt law—if so, he might upon conviction have been punished with fine, imprisonment, and pillory; although under the bankrupt law, the punishment was confined to imprisonment only, which proves either that false oaths, taken in judicial proceedings, are not made punishable by the law in question; or if they were, that the law quoad oaths, taken before commissioners of bankruptcy, was repealed by that law; for otherwise the legislative declaration of what should be the punishment in such a case, would be defeated by the prior law, and the act of the public officer in preferring to indict under it. A bankrupt, though deprived of every thing, and therefore excused from paying a fine under the bankrupt law, might be fined to the amount of 800 dollars under the general law. This cannot be contended for. If then the defendant could not have been indicted under the general law, had the bankrupt law been still in force, to say that he can be so indicted after the repeal, would be to place him in a worse situation by the repeal than he was before it, whereas the effect of the repeal was to excuse, or rather to render him dispensable for this offence

If he cannot be indicted under either of those laws, can the common law be pressed into the service? I think not; and for the same reasons I have assigned why he cannot be indicted under the general criminal law. First. Because the common law description of perjury is, a false oath taken in some judicial proceeding in a matter material to the issue, and the punishment is fine and imprisonment. In this case the offence does not answer the description, and the punishment is different.

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

[NOTE. Rev. St. U. S. § 13, (Act Feb. 25, 1871,) provides that "the repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture, or liability incurred under such statute, unless the repealing act shall expressly so provide." In U. S. v. Ulrici, Case No. 16,594, this section was held to apply to indictments for criminal offenses.]

Case No. 476.

ANONYMOUS.

[2 Wash. C. C. 270.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1808.

COSTS—PAYMENT BEFORE DISCONTINUANCE OF SUIT.

The cause had been at issue for three terms, and the defendant asked leave to file a new plea, the effect of which would be to oblige the plaintiff to suffer a nonsuit. The defendant, before the suit was brought, refused to show his lease to the plaintiff, when, by so doing, he would have prevented the institution of the suit. The court refused to permit the defendant to enter the plea, but upon his paying the whole costs of the suit.

At law. This was a rule obtained by the defendant, after two or three terms that the cause has been at issue, for liberty to amend his plea of covenants performed, which it is admitted, if allowed, will compel the plaintiff to discontinue the action. The plea is certainly a fair one, it being stated, that the defendant is a sub-tenant, and has paid the rent demanded, to his immediate lessor. But still, the defendant asks a favour, and one which the court, in its discretion, and upon the circumstances of the case, may grant upon equitable terms. Now, it appears that the defendant, by refusing to show his lease to the plaintiff when asked to do so, misled him into bringing a suit, which, if he had known that the defendant was only a sub-tenant, he would not have brought, but, by his present plea, he had admitted the lease as laid. He now asks to withdraw his admission, and to plead what must inevitably force the plaintiff out of court. Upon no principle can he be allowed to amend, without paying the costs which have accrued since he put in his plea. But since he has occasioned the bringing of the suit by his refusal to show his deed, we do not think he ought to be indulged in his present application, so as to throw the other costs on the plaintiff. The proposition of the plaintiff, to discontinue without paying costs, seems perfectly fair.

¹[Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.]

Case No. 477.

ANONYMOUS.

[3 West. Law J. (1845,) 144.]

Circuit Court, D. New York.

PATENT LAW—PURCHASER OF ARTICLES KNOWN TO BE MANUFACTURED IN VIOLATION OF A PATENT NOT LIABLE TO INJUNCTION.

In the U. S. circuit court, at New York, a motion was made for an injunction by a patentee, to restrain the defendant from selling cotton wadding, made with a machine, which the plaintiff alleges was an infringement on his patent. The court held that the purchaser on his own account of an article, the product of patented machinery, though purchased with the full knowledge that it was manufactured in violation of the patent, could not be enjoined, nor held liable in any other way.

[Contra, see Haselden v. Ogden, Case No. 6,190.]

[Note. Nowhere fully reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 478.

ANOWEURTH v. BURLINGIN.

[6 West. Law J. (1848,) 431.]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois.

TAX TITLES IN ILLINOIS—"CLAIM AND COLOR OF TITLE MADE IN GOOD FAITH."

[At law. Action of ejectment by Anoweurth against Burlingin to recover 160 acres of land in Adams county, Ill.] The plaintiff showed good title derived from the United States, and possession by the defendant, and rested his case. The defendant relied upon seven years' possession, the payment of taxes during that time, and a connected title from the auditor of the state on a sale in 1829 for taxes, under the act of 1827; the auditor's deed dated in 1831. Such was his title. The defendant maintains that he is protected by the limitation laws of 1835. If not by that, then he is by the law of 1833-9, "to quiet possession and confirm titles to land." [Judgment for plaintiff.]

Williams & Lawrence, for plaintiff.
Browning & Bushnell, for defendant.

THE COURT decided as to the act of 1835, that possession without title would not avail; that the supreme court of Illinois, in 1837, in the case of Garret v. Higgins, [Garret v.

Wiggius, 1 Scam. 335.] had decided, that the auditor's deed, unaccompanied with proof of the performance of the essential requisites of the law, conveyed no title. Therefore, the defendant is not protected by that law. Also that the law of 1838-39 was unconstitutional and void, because it purports to convey to one man the land of another. The court farther decided, that the auditor's deed, unaccompanied as in the case at the bar by proof that he had performed all the requisites of law authorizing him to sell the land for taxes, conveys no title. Therefore, the defendant is not protected by "claim and color of title made in good faith" in the meaning of the law. The court defined the "claim and color of title made in good faith" under this law, to be such a title as in law would pass the estate prima facie, if a better title be not shown. That it is a question of law, and not depending upon the opinion of the occupant, otherwise the defence would depend upon the capacity of the man to judge; in which case it would protect one and not avail another, who might be more intelligent.

[NOTE. The points determined in this case were originally published in the St. Louis (Mo.) New Era, and reprinted in 6 West. Law J. (1848,) 431. See Arrōwsmith v. Burlingim, Case No. 503.]

=====
 ANSHUTZ v. CAMPBELL. See Case No. 17-796.
 =====

Case No. 479.
The ANTARCTIC.

[1 Spr. 206; 15 Law Rep. 573.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1852.

MARITIME LIENS — MATERIALS FOR CONSTRUCTION — MASSACHUSETTS ACT OF 1848 — CREDIT — PAYMENT APPLIED TO THE DEBT SECURED BY LIEN.

1. Under the Massachusetts statute of 1848, (chapter 290, § 1,) the lien upon a new vessel for materials furnished is only for those actually used in her construction.

[Cited in The James H. Prentice, 36 Fed. 781.]

2. Where, in the purchase of materials to be used in the construction or repair of a vessel, a credit is given, which, it is known by the parties, will expire before the completion and sailing of the vessel, the lien is not thereby extinguished.

3. When there are two debts, one secured by a lien and the other not so secured; and a general payment is made by the debtor, without any appropriation thereof at the time it is made, either by the debtor, or by the creditor with the actual or presumed assent of the debtor, the law will appropriate it to the extinguishment of the debt secured by the lien.

[Cited in The A. R. Dunlap, Case No. 513; The J. F. Spencer, Id. 7,316; The Lady Franklin, Id. 7,984; Schuelenburg v. Martin, 2 Fed. 749.]

[Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In admiralty. Libel in rem, by Gurdon Waterman [against the ship Antarctic] to recover a balance of $1048 claimed to be due on account of materials furnished for the ship Antarctic, by virtue of the lien given by the statute of Massachusetts of 1848, c. 290, § 1, which provides that "whenever a debt is contracted for labor performed, or materials used in the construction or repair, &c., of any vessel within this commonwealth, such debt shall be a lien," &c. It appeared in evidence that the libellant, in pursuance of a contract with Cannon & Lewis, the ship-builders, delivered a quantity of lumber valued at $1148, at their ship-yard, while the Antarctic was building. The evidence, as to what portion of this identical lumber was actually used in the ship, was conflicting. The lumber was originally purchased upon a credit of four months. On the 1st of January, 1852, the builders made to the libellant a cash payment of $100, and gave their promissory negotiable note, payable at the Marine Bank, in New Bedford, without interest, for $400 more. The note was dated Jan. 6th, 1852, and was payable in four months. The Antarctic was libelled April 28th, and sailed in May following. The points taken by the respective counsel, and the facts in the case, sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

T. G. Coffin, for libellant.

R. C. Pitman and J. C. Stone, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The first question is, whether the libellant has any lien. It is contended by the claimant, that in order to create a lien, the materials should have been originally furnished for this specific ship, and I have been referred to the case of The Callisto, [Case No. 2,316.] But the language of the Maine statute, under which, that decision was made, is different from the Massachusetts statute. The former requires the materials to be furnished for, or on account of, the ship; the latter, that they should be used in the ship. In this case, the ship was in the process of building; the lumber was delivered to the builders, at their yard, and was suitable for this ship, and so far as it was actually used in her construction, the presumption is, that it was purchased for that purpose. It is said, that the construction of the statute contended for, will give a general and indefinite lien, following the property through any number of intermediate hands. But where the circumstances plainly show a personal credit, and negative the idea of any other, the lien will not exist. When a man sells to a mere lumber dealer, he certainly trusts to individual credit; and generally, when he sells to one not a builder, he has no lien. The debt is to be created for materials to be used in the ship. I think, in this case, there is a prima facie lien. On the other hand, it is contended by the libellant, that there is a lien for the whole amount, whether used or not, if it were apparently furnished for the ship. But I cannot say, that if it were furnished for the ship, it would create a lien, unless used. That is the language of the statute, and is equitable. The merchant, contracting with, or purchasing of, the builders, may know what amount of materials has gone into the ship, and may guard himself to that extent; but he cannot know what amount the builders may have purchased. The equity of the law is, that the materials and labor put into the vessel, shall be held as security to those who furnished them. The Kearsarge, [Case No. 7,634;] The Kiersage, [Id. 7,762;] 1 Pars. Mar. Law. 493-496.

The second question is, whether such a credit as was given by the original contract, excludes the idea of a lien. When the original credit was given, it was known by the parties that it would expire before the completion or sailing of the vessel, and I think there is nothing in it inconsistent with the existence of the lien. Such a credit only suspends the remedy, until it expires.

[The more important question is as to the application and effect of the note which was given. This note was not due when process was commenced, and the credit given by it at least suspended the remedy, if it did not displace the lien. As to this amount, then, the suit was clearly premature. But the claimants contend that the note was absolute payment pro tanto. By the law of Massachusetts and Maine, a negotiable promissory note is prima facie payment. It is otherwise in most of the other states. The case of The Chusan, Case No. 2,717, was decided according to the local law of New York. In the present case, the law of Massachusetts must govern the contract. There is nothing in the case to repel the presumption of payment.]² By the evidence it is shown, that the note for $400 was an absolute payment pro tanto, and it remains to consider how this amount, and the $100 paid in cash, shall be appropriated. The libellant contends, that, if it appears that for a portion of the lumber purchased he has no lien, then this payment shall be applied to discharge the portion of the debt not thus secured; while the claimant contends that the payment shall be applied to the extinguishment of the lien. This leads us to consider the doctrine of the appropriation of payments. The books abound with very conflicting opinions on this subject. The language of different cases is not capable of being reconciled. But I think we shall find the dicta more contradictory than the decisions. The disposition to generalize has led to much of the difficulty. Thus, the strongest case cited for the libellant, Upham v. Lefavour, 11 Metc. [Mass.] 174, contains the general proposition, that the creditor may appropriate a payment to discharge a portion of the debt that has no security; but the circumstances of that case were very peculiar, and required no such dictum to support the decision. (The judge here entered upon a critical examination of the facts in that case, and the grounds upon which the decision might properly be placed.) The authorities agree that, in the first instance, the debtor may appropriate; that, failing to do so, the creditor may appropriate at the time; but, beyond this point, the decisions are not uniform. It is held, in some of the cases, that the creditor has the right of appropriation, even up to the last moment, and may change a prior application made by him. But I think the true rule is otherwise, and is that which is substantially laid down in the cases. Gass v. Stinson, [Case No. 5,262;] Pattison v. Hull, 9 Cow. 773; Warren v. Warren, 6 Law Rep. 501. All the authorities agree in one point, that the debtor, when he pays, has a right to say to what debt the payment shall be appropriated; and this for the obvious reason, that the debtor might withhold the payment, and if the creditor receives it, he must take it on the terms offered by the debtor. Now, it is said, that the debtor failing to exercise the right, it passes to the creditor. Why so? What equity is there in giving this right to the creditor, at any subsequent period? If the creditor appropriates it at the moment, and with the knowledge of the debtor, and he is silent, there is a presumed assent to the application. Otherwise the law ought to appropriate. But on what principles? The Roman law adopted the rule of appropriation, sanctioned in the case of Gass v. Stinson, [supra,] and the other cases above cited, viz., that the application was to be made as the defendant would have made it, if he had expressed his choice at the time. Thus, where there are two debts, one secured by a penalty and the other not, or one bearing interest and the other not, the payment, in both cases, is to be applied to discharge the former, according to the presumed intent of the debtor. I am satisfied, that the law applies the same principle, in case of a debt in part secured by a lien; that the debtor would naturally intend to relieve his property from incumbrance. He had the original right of appropriation, but it not having been made by either party, the law comes in and makes it, as it presumes the debtor would have done. The case cited of Harker v. Conrad, 12 Serg. & R. 301, fully sustains this view, and the present case is stronger in favor of the claimant. The case in Pennsylvania, was one of lien and a general payment, and the court held that the builder was bound in conscience, to have relieved the property sold by him, from incumbrance; and, therefore, he must be presumed to have intended so to do. But from the circumstances of that case, it is doubtful whether it was his pecuniary interest to do so. The presumption was certainly a charitable one. But, in the present case, both the obligation and interest of the builders required them to deliver the ship to the claimant free of all incumbrances, for he had made advances to the builders equal to the value of the vessel. It is therefore to be presumed, that they would have so appropriated the payments as to effect this object. I shall therefore appropriate the $500, toward satisfaction of the part secured by the lien.

²[From 15 Law Rep. 578.]

The last question to be considered is, what was the amount of materials used in this ship, for which a lien existed? The amount is left somewhat indeterminate, but on the whole I must take the builders' testimony as most satisfactory, and shall fix the amount at $700. From this the $500 is to be deducted, and a decree will be entered for the balance, $200, and costs.

Case No. 480.

The ANTELOPE.

[1 Ben. 343.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1867.

SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT—WAIVER—CANCELLING STIPULATIONS—PRACTICE.

1. Where a libel was dismissed by default in 1860, and the claimant, without notice to the libellant, entered an order, in 1861, cancelling the stipulation for costs and the bond under the act given on the discharge of the vessel, but thereafter agreed to open the default, and the cause was, in 1864, noticed for hearing by both parties, but when it was called for hearing, in March, 1864, the claimant's proctor stated that it had been dismissed, and thereupon the libellant's proctor moved to set aside the decree and the order of cancellation, which motion was adjourned by consent till the present time: Held, that the claimant was regular in entering the order of cancellation without notice to the libellant, the libel having been dismissed by default.

2. That the claimant had, by his acts, waived the decree dismissing the libel and the order of cancellation.

3. That the court had power to vacate that decree and order, so as to hold the stipulators still liable on their stipulations.

In admiralty. This was a motion to set aside a decree entered in October, 1860, dismissing the libel in this case, and an order entered in January, 1861, cancelling the bond given on the discharge of the vessel, and to set the cause down for trial. The libel was filed in October, 1855, to recover for spars furnished to the vessel on the order of her owner while she was being built by him, and used in building her, of the value of $415. A claim and a stipulation for costs and a bond under the act of congress, in double the amount claimed, were filed, and the vessel was discharged from custody. The claimant filed an answer, and, in March, 1859, the cause being on the calendar, was called in its order, and, the libellant not appearing, a decree was made dismissing the libel, with costs. This disposition of the case was made, it was said on the motion, because of the decision made by the supreme court at the December term, 1857, in the case of People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, and of the rule adopted by the supreme court at the December term, 1858, as the result of the case of Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 251, and because it was thought that, under the principle of that rule, taking away from district courts the right of proceeding in rem against a domestic vessel for supplies or repairs in virtue of a lien given therefor by state laws, no recovery could be had in this suit. But, notwithstanding this decree, the case was noticed and put upon the calendar by the claimant for the October term, 1860, and, on the 5th of October, 1860, the libel was again dismissed with costs, the libellant not appearing, and a decree to that effect was entered. On the 26th of January, 1861, an order was entered, on motion of the claimant, reciting that the libel had been dismissed by default, and that more than ten days had elapsed since the decree, and no subsequent proceedings had been taken on the part of the libellant, and ordering that the stipulations executed on the part of the claimant be cancelled. This order was entered as an order of course and without notice to the libellant. No notice or copy of the decree dismissing the libel, and no notice or copy of the order of January 26th, 1861, was served on the libellant's proctors. The clerk's costs were taxed January 26th, 1861, and the taxed bill was filed the same day, but the taxation was without previous notice to the libellant, so far as appeared. The bill of costs was served on the libellant's proctor, and he, immediately on receiving it, requested the claimant's proctor to open the default and withdraw the bill of costs, and was told, in reply, that he might consider the bill of costs withdrawn and the default opened. In February, 1864, the libellant's proctor informed the claimant's proctor that the cause would be noticed for the March term, 1864, and each party served a notice of trial on the other party in the suit, for the March term, 1864. The originals of these notices were produced to the court, that is, the one served by the claimant's proctor on the libellant's proctor, and a copy of the one served by the libellant's proctor on the claimant's proctor, the latter having upon it an admission of service by the claimant's proctor, dated February 16th, 1864. The cause being on the calendar for the March term, 1864, was called for trial, when the claimant's proctor stated to the court that the libel had been dismissed by default. The case then stood over, and this motion was noticed for the 29th of March, 1864, and had been postponed by consent from that time until now.

¹[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

A. F. Smith, for libellant.
W. R. Beebe, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is claimed on the part of the libellant, that, under the decision of the supreme court in the case of The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 522, this court has jurisdiction of this case, and that the libellant ought to have an opportunity to try the case on its merits.

It is urged that it was irregular to enter the order of January, 1861, as an order of course, and without notice of a motion for leave to enter it; but I am of opinion that the proceedings on the part of the claimant were regular. After he took the decree in October, 1860, dismissing the libel by default for want of the appearance of the libellant when the case was called for trial, it was regular for him to enter without notice an order of course cancelling the stipulations executed on the part of the claimant. Such an order followed of course the dismissal of a libel, and it did not require any special fiat of the court or the judge, or any signature of the judge to the order, or any notice, to authorize its entry. Under rule 145 of this court in admiralty, where proceedings on a decree are not stayed by an appeal, and the decree is not satisfied in ten days after notice to the proctor of the party against whom it is rendered, an order that the sureties of such party cause the engagement of their stipulation to be performed, or show cause why execution should not issue, is an order of course. In view of this practice and of the fact that, where a libel is dismissed, the whole foundation and support of the stipulations is gone, and they fall with the libel as a matter of course, there is no reason why an order cancelling the stipulations should not be an order of course.

But I think that the claimant, by his conduct, followed up by his noticing the cause for trial for the March term, 1864, waived the decree of October, 1860, dismissing the libel, and the order of January, 1861. The only question as to which I have had any hesitation has been, whether the claimant could thus practically assent to the reinstatement of the cause, so as to affect the sureties in the stipulations, and hold them to their liability after the dismissal of the libel, and whether the court could now vacate the decree and the order, so as to hold the sureties still liable on their stipulations. Unless that can be done, the remedy to the libellant is practically worthless. The point, however, is settled by the decision of the supreme court in the case of The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1. In that case, the supreme court dismissed an appeal, and afterwards ordered the case to be reinstated. It was contended that the court had no authority to reinstate the case after such a dismissal, because it might operate to the prejudice of the stipulators or sureties to whom the vessel was delivered upon stipulation in the court below. The court, Mr. Justice Story delivering its opinion, overruled the objection and said: "Whenever a stipulation is taken, in an admiralty suit, for the property subjected to legal process and condemnation, the stipulation is deemed a mere substitute for the thing itself, and the stipulators liable to the exercise of all those authorities on the part of the court which it could properly exercise if the thing itself were still in its custody. This is the known course of the admiralty. It is quite a different question whether the court will, in particular cases, exercise its authority where sureties on the stipulation may be affected injuriously. That is a subject addressed to its sound discretion." "Every court must be presumed to exercise those powers belonging to it, which are necessary for the promotion of public justice, and we do not doubt this court possesses the power to reinstate any cause dismissed by mistake. The reinstatement of the cause was founded, in the opinion of this court, upon the plain principles of justice and according to the known practice of other judicial tribunals in like cases." This court has, therefore, clearly the power to reinstate this case. It was dismissed on the idea that the supreme court had decided that this court had no jurisdiction of such a case. The libellant now claims that the supreme court has decided otherwise. He is entitled to try the case and to maintain the jurisdiction of this court if he can, and he cannot try the case unless it be reinstated. The mistake made by the libellant in allowing the case to be dismissed by default, was indeed a mistake of law, and the case would have been in a different position if the claimant had not waived as he did the decree and the order, and, but for such waiver, the court might have been constrained to deny any relief to the libellant. Nor is it shown that the sureties will be affected any more injuriously than sureties in any case who may be compelled to respond for their principal. The court acts on the matter as if the vessel were still in its custody. The result is that the case is a proper one for granting to the libellant the relief asked for.

Motion granted.

Case No. 481.

The ANTELOPE.

[1 Ben. 521.]¹

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1867.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—BONDING A VESSEL WORTH LESS THAN SEVERAL CLAIMS AGAINST HER — MARRIED WOMEN REJECTED AS SURETIES.

1. Where several libels were filed against a vessel to recover claims, which amounted to more than the appraised value of the vessel, Held, that she might be discharged, on the claimants giving a stipulation, in the full value of the vessel, the same to stand in court, for the benefit of all the libellants before the court.

2. That a married woman, though she justified in the required amount, would not be accepted as surety.

In admiralty. The ship Antelope was held under process in two cases, and both cases came before the court upon a motion made on behalf of the claimants, for the release of the vessel upon bail. It appeared that, on the 31st day of August, 1867, one George W. Curtis filed his libel against the vessel to enforce a lien, amounting to $827.22, for supplies furnished the vessel in this port between the 19th day of June and the 30th of August last. The vessel was, at that time, in the custody of the sheriff, under process issuing out of a state court, and the execution of the process of this court was, accordingly, delayed until the custody of the sheriff terminated by a sale and delivery to the persons now before the court as claimants, when the vessel was duly seized by the marshal, under the process issued in the action of Curtis, and also under process issued in a subsequent action instituted against the same vessel by the libellant, Franklin F. Randolph, to recover the sum of $23,000, claimed to be due by reason of a breach of a charter party, which occurred in this port at about the same time. The total value of the vessel, as ascertained by an appraisal, to which no objection was taken, was $18,000, a sum insufficient to discharge in full the claims made against her in the two actions above mentioned. The claimants, having perfected their appearance, now moved for the release of the vessel, upon the filing of a stipulation in the full value of the vessel, the same to stand in court in place of the vessel for the benefit of all the libellants before the court, and conditioned to abide by and perform the decrees of the court in such actions, and pay the sums awarded therein, not exceeding in all the appraised value of the vessel.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for Curtis.

¹[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Scudder & Carter, for Randolph.
Emerson & Goodrich, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. Inasmuch as the value of this vessel is conceded to be less than the amount claimed in these actions, it is manifest that the claimant will, by stipulating to pay the decree in each case to the extent of the value of the vessel, render himself liable to pay into court, upon his stipulations in the two cases, more than the value of the property which he will receive upon the release. Unless, then, some form of stipulation can be taken which will render the claimant liable for no more than the value of the property which he receives from the marshal, the vessel must remain in custody. According to the view taken by the libellants, the necessary effect of admiralty proceedings against a vessel, under circumstances like the present, is to compel the shipowner either to permit his vessel to be taken from him and sold before any liability on her part has been ascertained, or to allow her to remain tied to the wharf in custody of the marshal until the final termination of the litigation in this or the appellate court, or to pay a demand which he disputes. But the flexible proceedings of the admiralty cannot be supposed to be inadequate to such a state of facts, and the court powerless to prevent such an effect of its process. To relieve a ship owner from such a dilemma, by a stipulation in the form here proposed, is as clearly within the general powers of a court of admiralty as the power to release upon a stipulation in the ordinary form. It is a power necessary to the proper exercise of the extraordinary jurisdiction over a ship and her owners, which belongs to this court, and the same reason which impels the court to take the ordinary stipulation is applicable in favor of the stipulation in the form proposed. A court of admiralty will always release a ship, and enable her to proceed to earn freight, when the rights of parties having claims upon her can be properly protected by a stipulation taken in place of the vessel. The stipulation here offered will fully secure to the libellants all the rights which they now have. Their proceedings look to a sale of the vessel, in satisfaction of the claims set forth. If the vessel were to be sold upon final decrees, or as perishable, only her value would be paid into the registry, no matter how many claims were outstanding against her, and the liens of each libellant would be then transferred to the fund in court, leaving the vessel free from all liens. Under the stipulation proposed, the same sum will be paid in, and with this difference in favor of the libellants, that, by the terms of the stipulation offered, the amount so paid in will be applicable to the payment of the claims of the present libellants before the court; whereas, in case of a sale, the proceeds might be subjected to subsequent and additional claims. While the stipulation proposed will thus secure to the libellants the payment of their demands, it will cause no inconvenience in the prosecution of the suits. The proceeding is, in effect, a consolidation of the two causes for the purpose of bonding, to avoid the loss and expense which must otherwise be sustained; and the causes could properly be formally consolidated for this purpose, and might well remain consolidated, if either libellant desires to contest the validity or amount of the demand made by the other, to be dissevered whenever it shall be needful for the sake of convenience or in furtherance of justice. The Wm. Hutt, 1 Lush. 25. In all cases of many libels against a vessel, where the proceeds in court are insufficient to pay all, the causes are, in effect, consolidated: that is, no one is heard without notice to all, and the rights and priorities of all are disposed of at one and the same time, each libel being generally considered as an answer to all other libels, when the question is simply one of priority. The Magoun, [Case No. 5,163.] It is not seen why the same practice cannot as well be pursued where, instead of proceeds, there is a stipulation for the benefit of all. See The Rodney, [id. 11,993.] As to the objection founded upon the eleventh rule of the supreme court, it seems sufficient to say that that rule is not intended to apply to a case of several libels against a vessel which is insufficient to pay all; and no rule of the supreme court applying to the case, it must be governed by "the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of admiralty, as contradistinguished from courts of common law." The Delaware, [Case No. 3,762.] Moreover if the eleventh rule were to be deemed applicable to a case like this, the power which the rule confers upon the court to fix the amount of the stipulation, without regard to the value of the vessel, would include the power to limit the liability of the stipulation as proposed here. The motion of the claimants will, therefore, be granted, and the vessel will be released upon the claimants filing a stipulation to the effect above indicated. The form of the stipulation may be settled before the court, if necessary, and it must contain a provision for interest. In this court, all persons desiring to recover property upon stipulations are required to include in their stipulations a provision for interest on the value of the property, from the time of its receipt.

The claimants presented, as surety on the bond directed to be given as above, a married woman, who justified in the required amount. The libellants objected to taking a bond thus executed, and, on referring the matter to the judge, the surety was rejected, and the claimants were ordered to furnish other surety.

Case No. 482.

The ANTELOPE.

[2 Ben. 405.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1868.

MARITIME LIENS—BUILDING VESSEL—RIGHTS UNDER STATE LAW.

1. When articles are furnished towards the building of a vessel, no lien for their value is given by the general maritime law.

2. Where a vessel was built at Newburgh, New York, in 1855, and articles were furnished by the libellant there for such building, and the vessel left Newburgh and went to New York city, and the libellant then filed his libel, in 1855, to recover the value of the articles: Held, That he had no lien under the lien law then in force in the state, because he had not filed specifications of his lien within twelve days after the vessel left the port of Newburgh, as was required by such lien law. That he had no lien otherwise, and the libel must be dismissed.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by David J. Taff against the brig Antelope for materials furnished during the building of the vessel. Libel dismissed, with costs.]

A. F. Smith, for libellant.
C. Donohue, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel, which avers, that, sometime in September, 1855, there being then a brig or vessel, since called the Antelope, building at Newburgh, in the state of New York, her owner or owners, or his or their agent employed in building the same, applied to the libellant, David J. Taff, to furnish a set of spars and a foreyard for the vessel; that the libellant, on such order, furnished to the brig one set of spars and a foreyard; that the value of the set of spars was $385, and the value of the foreyard $30; that the articles were duly delivered, and were used in building the vessel; that the value thereof was, by the maritime law and the law of the state of New York, a lien on the vessel; that the articles have not been paid for; that the vessel is at the city of New York; that she left Newburgh, where she was built, for the city of New York, about seven days prior to October 4th 1855; and that she has remained at New York ever since, and has never been without the state of New York. The libel was filed October 4th, 1855.

The answer sets up, as a defence, that the spars alleged to have been furnished to the brig were furnished to one Marvell, and not to the vessel, and that, if any lien ever existed, it was lost by the departure of the vessel from the port where she lay at the time of the alleged furnishing of the spars.

This defence is made out, as respects the loss of any lien which the libellant ever had. He had no lien by the general maritime law, for the articles furnished by him towards building the vessel, which this court can enforce in admiralty. People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393; Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129. Therefore, any lien which he had was one given by the law of New York. By that law, (2 Rev. St. 493, § 1, as amended by chapter 110 of the Laws of 1855, passed March 29, 1855,) whenever a debt amounting to fifty dollars or upwards is contracted by the master, owner, or his agent, builder, or consignee, of any ship or vessel within the state, on account of any materials or articles furnished in this state, for or towards the building, fitting, furnishing, or equipping such ship or vessel, such debt is made a lien upon such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and is preferred to all other liens thereon except mariners' wages. It is further provided (section 2, as amended by the same act of 1855) that, in all cases, the lien shall cease immediately after the vessel shall have left the port at which she was when the debt was contracted, unless the person having the lien shall, within ten days after such departure, cause to be drawn up specifications of his lien, the correctness of which shall be verified by oath and filed in the county clerk's office of the county in which the lien shall be created. In this case, the libel and the testimony show that the vessel was built at Newburgh, that she was at Newburgh when the debt was contracted, that the articles furnished by the libellant were furnished to her at Newburgh, and were used in building her at Newburgh, and that she had left Newburgh, and had arrived at New York. The lien, therefore, if any there was, ceased immediately after the vessel left Newburgh, unless the libellant filed the specifications prescribed within ten days after the departure of the vessel from Newburgh. The libel avers no such filing. It is for the libellant to aver and prove such filing. No evidence of any such filing was given. The answer takes the objection clearly, and the libel must be dismissed, with costs.

¹[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 483.

The ANTELOPE.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas. 370.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1863.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—FALSE PAPERS.

Vessel and cargo condemned for having false papers as to their destination, and for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured, March 31, 1863, by the United States steamer Memphis, as prize, and were sent into this port for adjudication. They were here libeled, April 23, 1863. Default for the non-intervention of any claimant or defence having been regularly taken in court, the preparatory proofs and the vessel's papers were submitted to the court, on the part of the libellants, with a demand for judgment against the vessel and cargo.

¹[Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

No papers relating to the vessel and cargo or the voyage were found on board of her, except the clearance of the vessel at the port of London for Nassau, N. P. January 15, 1863, and letters of introduction of the master of the vessel, William Brain, from a Mr. Martin, assuming to be the owner of the schooner, and recommending the vessel and the cargo of salt on board of her to a Mr. Hart, of Nassau, for advice and directions as to the business of the voyage. The mate of the vessel, in his examination in preparatorio, says that the master and the crew of the vessel belonged to England, and shipped from London to Nassau, but that he understood that the voyage was not to be to Nassau, but to some other port on the continent of North America; that her cargo was all salt; that London was her last clearing place; that she was captured near Fort Sumter, going into Charleston harbor; that he and the master knew that that port was then under blockade; that, when first pursued, the Antelope was endeavoring to enter Charleston; and that she tried to escape by getting into Bull's bay. The master, William Brain, confirms the evidence of the mate, and says that the vessel was captured trying to run the blockade of Charleston; that he knew of the war and of the blockade of Charleston, and presumes that the owner of the vessel did also, when he sailed; and that he was bound to run the blockade at Charleston, and steered for that purpose.

All the evidence is concurrent and conclusive that the nominal clearance of the vessel from London to Nassau was simulated and false, and that the voyage from London was set on foot and pursued with a design to violate the blockade of Charleston. A decree is pronounced for the condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo, because of false papers, and an attempt to run the blockade of Charleston, in her destination and procedure.

Case No. 484.

The ANTELOPE.

MONTGOMERY v. TYSON.

[1 Lowell, 130.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1867.

SEAMEN—WAGES—WRITTEN CONTRACT—WHALING VOYAGE—SALVAGE—SEAMEN AS SALVORS.

1. Seamen in the whaling service have a lien on the oil for their wages.

[Cited in The Ontario, Case No. 10,543.]

¹[Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Seamen can be salvors only when their connection with the ship has been entirely broken up.

[See The Olive Branch, Case No. 10,490; Phillips v. McCall, Id. 11,104.]

3. Daily wages which had been promised the crew for services in the nature of salvage were allowed, the owners not objecting.

4. Where, in the original articles for a whaling voyage, the time of its continuance, though agreed on, was accidentally omitted to be written out, the defect can be supplied by oral evidence.

[Cited in Frates v. Howland, Case No. 5,066.]

5. Salvage paid by the master in good faith, and in the exercise of reasonable prudence, is a charge upon the oil in which the crew must share.

In admiralty.

F. W. Sawyer and E. H. Pierce, for libellants.

T. K. Lothrop and W. W. Crapo, for claimants.

LOWELL, District Judge. These two cases, which were tried together, were both promoted by the crew of the whaling bark Antelope; one for wages and salvage, brought against the oil which was saved and sent home from the wreck of the vessel, and the other against the master and owners for damages for alleged short supplies and other breaches of the contract or the duty of the respondents. The vessel, which was lost on the rocks of Nianteleck harbor, in Cumberland inlet, on the night of the fifth of October last, had had a long and unsuccessful voyage, and had passed two winters in the ice. The amount of oil and bone taken was not sufficient to give either to owners or crew any thing like a fair return upon their respective outlays of time, labor, and money. These circumstances are not the most propitious for the harmonious settlement of any joint enterprise.

Taking first the libel that was first filed. It is clear that the libellants are entitled to the lays provided for in the articles. They contend for more, and say that the articles are void as not complying with the statutes, in this, that the voyage is not stated in them. It appears, that in the original paper the time to which the voyage was limited is not mentioned; but it is proved that the usage on this Greenland fishery, is, to stipulate for a term not exceeding thirty months; and that it was so understood in this case; and that the copy of the articles certified by the collector, which was taken in the ship, was so written out. How this discrepancy occurred is not shown, and there is no reason to suspect any fraud on the part of any one. Under these circumstances the omission may be made good by oral evidence. Wickham v. Blight, [Case No. 17,611;] The Harvey, 2 Hagg. Adm. 79. So far as statutes are concerned, there is none, I think, which regulates the shipping of men on whaling voyages, or requires the contract to be in writing; I mean the original shipment in the home port. Curt. Merch. Seam. 60; Taber v. U. S., [Case No. 13,722;] The Atlantic, [Id. 620.] So that no question arises under the law making void shipments of seamen contrary to law.

Salvage the crew cannot have in whaling voyages more than in others, except in the few excepted cases, of which this is not one. The Holder Borden, [Id. 6,600.] In one case like this, Judge Betts allowed the men a per diem compensation for work and labor. Reed v. Hussey, [Id. 11,646.] In the present case it is admitted that they are entitled to such a compensation, under a promise of the master, the binding force of which is not disputed by the owners, though perhaps they might have set up that it was without consideration. When the wreck occurred, the crew, knowing that their interest in the catchings amounted to little or nothing beyond the advances and slops they had received, showed a disposition to refuse duty, and six of them actually deserted for a time; and the master promised the men they should have days' wages if they would work faithfully in saving the property. They did work for some eleven days, and I shall allow them for that time the highest rate mentioned by the master. They will receive fifty-five dollars each, excepting the six men above mentioned; and they, forty-five dollars each.

Some doubt was expressed at the argument whether the seamen can proceed against the oil in the hands of the owners. It has long since been settled that the property in the oil is wholly in the owners of the vessel; and that the lays of the crew are only a mode of arriving at their wages. Many important consequences have followed from this doctrine; one of which is, that the sailors, not being partners nor part-owners, may sue at law for their wages, and are not obliged to go into equity for a settlement of accounts. The crew always have a lien on the freight for their wages; and one usual mode of enforcing liens on freight, in the English practice, is by a warrant against the cargo, to detain it until the freight is paid into the registry. The Ringdove, Swab. 312. Where the owners of the vessel own the cargo, they would be liable for a reasonable freight in all controversies and adjustments in which that question became important; and no doubt the right might be enforced in any proper case against the cargo itself. In whaling voyages, it may almost be said that the cargo, to the extent of the owners' shares, represents freight exclusively, having been earned in a long cruise by the use of the vessel and her outfits. The doubt arises out of the terms of the articles, by which the owners have the right to sell the oil and bone. This agreement must undoubtedly confer upon them the right to give a good title, clear of all liens; and they might probably sell the oil and bone before its arrival home. But, until a sale is made, I am of opinion that the seamen have a lien upon the oil, Judge Sprague appears to have understood the matter in this way in his remarks in Hussey v. Fields, [Case No. 6,947;] and such a libel was brought in Two Hundred and Ninety Barrels of Oil, [Id. 14,294.] If the question were between shipper and ship-owner, the master's lien for freight would be lost by any agreement in the charter-party or bill of lading inconsistent with his retaining the cargo for the freight. But the master's lien for freight has been decided by the supreme court of the United States to depend entirely on possession; that of the seaman for wages has no relation whatever to possession, which he never has, either of ship or freight.

On the part of the crew, it is urged that the large payment which was made to the steamer Wolf, for assistance in saving the oil and transporting it and the crew to St. Johns, Newfoundland, ought not to be allowed as a charge against the gross proceeds, or what otherwise might have been the proceeds of the voyage. There can be no doubt that the services of the Wolf were salvage services, whether her crew took more or less part in getting the oil from the wreck, because it appears that there were no conveniences for storing or caring for the oil on the bleak shores of the country where the Antelope was lost; and no regular or reasonably certain means of getting it home; and in a few days or weeks all intercourse with the wreck would be shut out for months by the ice; and under these circumstances something more than mere freight would be allowed for the work actually performed by the steamer. The contract was made by the master of the Antelope, in good faith and for the best terms he could obtain, and he has actually paid the price. If there were any appearance of fraud, or of any underhand advantage accruing either to the master or owners, I should not hesitate to disregard the contract; for I shall adhere, until otherwise instructed by a superior court, to the doctrine laid down by Judge Sprague, in Jay v. Allen, [Case No. 7,235,] that the master is the agent of the owners, and that for his embezzlement or misfeasance in respect to the oil, they must be responsible to the crew. I am aware that some doubt was expressed upon this point by Mr. Justice Woodbury, in the same case, reported as Joy v. Allen, [Id. 7,552;] but it seems, on a careful examination of the judgment, that the decision did not turn upon this point; and there is reason to believe that Judge Sprague did not consider the point as definitely settled against his opinion.

The same doctrine is invoked by the crew in another way. They endeavor to show that the vessel was purposely cast away by the master; and aver that if this be proved the owners must bear all the expenses consequent upon his act. In the first libel the allegation is in the modified form, that the libellants aver and believe that the disaster was unnecessary and might have been avoided. The evidence fails to sustain this grave charge. It is shown that the vessel was but partially insured, and the cargo not at all; and that every possible present or prospective interest of the master as well as the owners was against the loss of the vessel, and no just cause of suspicion either of wilful or grossly negligent conduct is shown. On the contrary, the testimony confirms the statement of the libel, that there was a great and sudden increase of wind about two o'clock at night. There is some evidence on both sides that the watch were either inattentive or incapable; but there is none that the master is responsible for this. The attempt of the libellants to charge the master with so grave a crime upon the flimsy grounds brought forward in its support, tends to throw great doubt upon their own fairness as witnesses, and leads me to scrutinize their evidence with much care in other matters.

That the crew contribute to salvage in whaling and fishing voyages might be established by reasoning, were it not already decided. The contract of the owners to receive and transport the oil contains an implied exception of perils of the seas; and it is only on what escapes such perils that the lays can be reckoned, and they therefore contribute. Reed v. Hussey, [Case No. 11,646;] Utpadel v. Fears, [Id. 16,808;] The Holder Borden, [Id. 6,600.] The libellants will recover, in this case, their extra wages, and their lays, if any.

The judge then considered the second case, which turned only on points of evidence, and decided it for the claimants; giving costs to neither party. Decrees accordingly.

ANTELOPE, The, (WAITE v.) See Case No. 17,045.

ANTHES, (UNITED NICKEL CO. v.) See Case No. 14,406.

ANTHONY, Ex parte. See Case No. 5,070.

Case No. 485.

Ex parte ANTHONY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 295.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March, 1806.

SLAVERY—RUNAWAY SLAVES—AUTHORITY OF JUSTICE OF THE PEACE TO COMMIT.

A justice of the peace in Alexandria cannot commit a person as a runaway, unless according to the form of the act of assembly of Virginia, of 26th December, 1792, p. 246.

Habens corpus. On return it appeared that the prisoner was committed by a warrant under the hand of Mr. Justice Faw, in these words: "Alexandria County, ss. You are hereby required to receive into your custody negro Anthony, who was brought before me by Joseph Simpson, as a runaway, said to be a slave, the property of Mr. Richard West, of Prince George's county, Maryland, and him safely keep until he be thence discharged according to law. Given under my hand, this 19th day of April, 1806. A. Faw. Capt. James Campbell, Jailer."

¹[Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The prisoner was discharged, on consideration of the Acts of Assembly, of December 26, 1792, p. 246; December 10, 1793, pp. 315, 316; and January 21, 1801, p. 412.

Case No. 486.

ANTHONY v. AETNA INS. CO.

[1 Abb. (U. S.) 343; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 34.]
Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. June Term, 1869.

INSURANCE — WHAT ARE "PERILS OF THE SEAS."

1. Under a policy of marine insurance against "perils of the lakes, seas, rivers, &c.;" also against "all other perils and misfortunes, &c.;" also against "the usual risk of ligherage at O." the assured shipped cattle to O. At that port, as the vessel was prevented by a bar from landing, the cattle were put on board a lighter to be landed. They were tied by ropes to a chain running through the lighter, fore and aft. This was the usual mode of landing cattle at that port. While the lighter was proceeding in, the cattle became frightened, broke a part of the chain loose, rushed overboard and were drowned. Held, 1. That this loss was within the insurance of "perils of the seas, &c."

2. That even if it were not covered by that provision, it was embraced within the general assurance against "other perils and misfortunes," and that against "the usual risk of ligherage at O."

At law. Motion for a new trial.

This action was brought by Francis W. Anthony against the Aetna Insurance Company, to recover upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendants upon live stock shipped on board a propeller plying upon Lake Superior. The facts out of which the controversy arose are detailed in the opinion of the court. Upon the former trial, which took place before Judge Wilkins, the court directed the jury to render a verdict for the defendants, upon the ground that the loss which the plaintiff had sustained was not covered by the policy. The plaintiff now moved for a new trial, contending that this ruling was erroneous.

Moore & Griffin, for the motion.
Pond & Brown, opposed.

WITHEY, District Judge. On May 1, 1865, an open, season policy was issued by defendants to plaintiff, insuring the plaintiff's property from ports and places to ports and places, including the voyage in which was this risk. The adventure was to begin from the loading, and continue until the property should "arrive and be safely landed at the port of destination." The risks covered by the policy are, "perils of the lakes, seas, rivers, canals, railroads, fires, jettisons, and all other perils and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment or damage of the said property, or any part thereof;" also, "the usual risk of ligherage at Ontonagon." Under this insurance the plaintiff shipped on board the propeller Pewabic, from Bayfield to Ontonagon, on Lake Superior, forty or more beef cattle. The vessel arrived off the latter port in July, 1865, but was prevented by a bar in the harbor from landing. The animals were taken from the propeller on to a lighter to be landed, and were fastened upon the lighter in this way: A chain of five-eighth inch iron—called an anchor chain—ran fore and aft through the middle of the lighter, fastened at the ends to timber heads eight or ten feet from each end of the lighter. To this chain the cattle were tied by ropes, heads in, on opposite sides of the chain. When the lighter had proceeded from a quarter to a third of the distance in, the cattle, from some cause not explained, became frightened, breaking the chain into three pieces, and twenty-seven of the cattle, tied to one of these pieces, went over into the lake and were drowned by the weight of the chain carrying their heads under water. The lighter was tugged in and out, and was in good condition. The cattle were fastened on the lighter in the customary way of lightering at that place. Such was the case made by the plaintiff at the trial, and the question presented, which we are called upon to decide, is whether the loss was occasioned by a "peril of the lakes," or "other peril or misfortune," within the meaning and intent of the policy.

[Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The general doctrine is, that the insurer undertakes, in a marine risk, only to indemnify against extraordinary perils of the sea, and not against those ordinary ones to which every ship must inevitably be exposed. Every loss which arises from tempests, or by rocks, winds or waves, strictly and naturally comes under the idea of a loss occasioned by perils of the sea. But if this be the extent of the phrase, "perils of the sea," we should be obliged to conclude that it covered only accidents of an extraordinary nature, and produced only by natural causes peculiar to that element. Such, however, is clearly not the rule for construing the phrase, "perils of the sea," in reference to marine insurance. Mr. Parsons, in his work on Marine Insurance, (volume 1, p. 544.) says: "The phrase, 'perils of the seas' covers all losses or damage which arise from the extraordinary action of the wind and sea, and from inevitable accidents directly connected with navigation, excepting those provided for in other parts of the policy, as captures and the like." Mr. Justice Story, in the case of The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657.] remarks, that "the phrase 'danger of the seas,' whether understood in its most limited sense, as importing only a loss by the natural accidents peculiar to that element; or whether understood in its more extended sense, as including inevitable accidents upon that element, must still, in either case, be clearly understood to include only such losses as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from some irresistible force, or some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence." The supreme court of the United States, in Garrison v. Memphis Ins. Co., 19 How. [60 U. S.] 312, 314, seems to give the more extended sense to the term, "perils of the sea," as suggested by Judge Story. That court says, these words "have been extended to comprehend losses arising from some irresistible force or overwhelming power, which no ordinary skill could anticipate or evade." It has often been said, and correctly, that what are ordinary and what are extraordinary perils, is a question of much difficulty. The difficulty has been illustrated by many cases: Thus, in Magnus v. Buttemer, 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 461, a vessel moored in a tide harbor, and took ground when the tide fell. In consequence of this she was hogged and strained all over. It was held the underwriters were not liable. In Potter v. Suffolk Ins. Co., [Case No. 11,339,] the circumstances were very similar to the last case, and Mr. Justice Story held, "that unless there was inherent weakness in the vessel, such damage could only be occasioned by an unusual and extraordinary accident in grounding, upon the ebbing of the tide, which would be a peril of the sea." In Hunter v. Potts, 4 Camp. 203, Lord Ellenborough held that a leak occasioned by rats was not a peril of the sea, not being a loss of an extraordinary nature. But in Garrigues v. Cox, 1 Bin. 592, a leak occasioned by rats was held to be a peril within the policy. And Mr. Parsons, in his Marine Insurance, (volume 1, p. 546, note,) after citing a number of cases, concludes his review by saying: "On the authority of the recent cases in this country, we should consider the insurers liable in such a case, even if the rats remained on board through the negligence of the master, on the ground that the damage by water was the proximate cause of the loss." We might refer to many other cases on the subject, but we think they will not tend very much to elucidate the question involved in the case at bar; inasmuch as every case depends so much on its own particular facts and circumstances.

My own views are strongly in the direction of holding this case to be a loss within the term "perils of the sea," in accordance with the more comprehensive sense of those words and their more reasonable signification—in brief, because the cattle were drowned, which is peculiar to the element on which they were being transported; because they were drowned by an accident that could not have been guarded against by ordinary exertions or prudence, considering the fact that it was the usual mode of lightering at that place, which fact must be presumed to have been known to the insurer; because, too, it could not reasonably have been foreseen that there was inherent weakness in the chain; and because, in the absence of explanation by the insurer, it is to be presumed the fright of the animals was caused by something connected with navigation, whether from the exhaust of steam, the working of machinery of the tug, the ringing of a bell, or otherwise. It was a peril of navigation, which could not well have been foreseen or guarded against by the carrier. But we are not compelled to rest our decision on the ground strictly of a loss by a "peril of the sea," and the court does not wish to be understood as so deciding. I have simply indicated the tendency of my own mind after an examination of the question, because that particular point was much dwelt upon by the arguments of the learned counsel. We are entirely clear, after a careful examination of the authorities, that the loss was a risk within the general terms of the policy, "all other perils and misfortunes," and the specific provision, "the usual risk of lighterage at Ontonagon." While it is laid down by the authorities, that these general words, "all other perils," cover only perils of the like kind to those specifically enumerated, we think they are material and operative words, and are not in the policy to have no effect assigned to them in its construction. Hildyard on Marine Insurance, (page 348,) says, these words have "the effect of providing for any doubts which might arise as to cases which come nearly, but not precisely, under the specific causes of loss. In Cullen v. Butler, 5 Maule & S. 465, Lord Ellenborough says: "They are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have due effect assigned to them in the construction of this instrument; and which will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes."

The animals did not die from disease or any inherent defect in them, but from an accident on water, in course of the voyage, and was something peculiar to that element. Had the accident of breaking the fastening occurred in a land transportation, no such result could have taken place. The cattle were drowned by their heads being drawn under water by the weight of the piece of chain to which they were tied. It was five-eighths inch iron, and had the chain been perfect would undoubtedly have resisted any strain the whole number of the animals on board could have produced, and yet the accident was fortuitous. It was the custom to use this chain for fastening cattle lightered from vessels; it was believed to be sufficiently strong, and, as we have already remarked, it could not have been foreseen, in all reasonable probability, that there was inherent weakness in this anchor chain. The insurer must be presumed to have known the usual mode and appliances of lighterage at the place, and to have had it in contemplation when taking the risk.

If, now, we regard it doubtful whether the loss was strictly within the indemnity against "perils of the sea," still we think it should be regarded as caused by perils of like kind, and therefore covered by the general words of the policy. No case has been found where the facts were like those in the one at bar; but on principle, Devaux v. l'Anson, 7 Scott, 507, is regarded as sustaining the conclusions to which we have arrived. In that case, the effect of the general words of the policy, "all other perils and misfortunes," were very fully considered, and the cases which had been decided referred to. The declaration averred that the "ship was broken, damaged and destroyed, and rendered wholly incapable of pursuing the said voyage, by certain perils which the said assurers as aforesaid, by the said policy did take upon themselves, to wit: by the accidental breaking and giving way of the tackle and supports whereby the said ship was supported, in being moved from a certain dock; in consequence of which breaking and giving way, the said ship struck violently against the sand and was bilged, broken, destroyed, damaged, and rendered incapable of pursuing the said voyage as aforesaid." The defendants traversed the allegation that the ship was "broken, damaged, and destroyed, and rendered incapable of pursuing the said voyage, by any perils which the said assurers, by said policy, did take upon themselves." Lord Chief Justice Tindal said, "the point remaining to be considered is, whether the loss was occasioned by any of the perils insured against by the policy. It is to be observed that the words in the policy are very large; the policy not only enumerates 'perils of the sea,' but 'all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage' of the subject matter of the insurance." After referring to several cases, the learned judge says, "the loss occasioned by the endeavor to get the vessel afloat from the dock in which she had just been repaired, was a loss within the policy." Here the supports broke and caused the damage, like the case at bar. Again, the other clause in the contract, "the usual risk of lighterage at Ontonagon," was clearly not necessary to indemnify the assured against "perils of the sea," nor perils of the like kind, for the risk begins with loading the freight, and continues until safely landed. Assuming, then, what is claimed by defendants, the accident which happened not to be a loss by "perils of the sea," nor "other perils and misfortunes," we should, in order to give due effect to the clause, "usual risk of lighterage," in view of the other stipulations of the policy being held not to cover the loss, say that it is covered by the risk of lighterage. In the view we have taken of "all other perils and misfortunes," there is no occasion to inquire into the effect of the lighterage clause; but if we were to hold differently in reference to the other specific and general clauses of the policy, it would be difficult to see how the lighterage clause could be regarded as operative words in the contract, unless held to cover their loss. For the reasons given, the motion must prevail, and a new trial be awarded. Order accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] This decision was reviewed by the London Law Times upon the erroneous view that the jury had found, upon the facts, that the case was not one within the terms of the policy; was not a loss by perils of the seas. In truth, Judge Wilkins, before whom the cause was tried, upon hearing the facts, which were stipulated in writing, directed the jury to render a verdict for the defendant.

ANTHONY, (BARTON v.) See Case No. 1,084.

Case No. 487.

ANTHONY v. CARROLL.

[2 Ban. & A. 195; 9 O. G. 199; 23 Pittsb. Leg. J. 123.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1875.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—STATE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. State statutes of limitation cannot be pleaded in bar, in a suit for the infringement of a patent.

[Cited in May v. Logan Co., 30 Fed. 257.]

[See Sayles v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co., Case No. 12,417.]

2. Whether a court of equity will entertain a suit for the benefit of an assignee of a right of action for a tort, quaere.

[In equity. Bill by R. C. Anthony and the American Wood-Paper Company against John Carroll for an accounting for the alleged infringement of patent No. 17,387. Heard on demurrer to the bill. Demurrer overruled.]

Francis C. Nye and L. C. Ashley, for complainant.

Browne & Holmes, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This bill in equity, filed July 27, 1874, alleges the grant of letters patent of the United States to Marie Amedee Charles Mellier for a new and useful improvement in making paper-pulp; the assignment by Mellier to one Buchanan, June 19, 1857, of all Mellier's right and title to the invention secured by the letters patent; the assignment by Buchanan to Buffam, trustee of the American Wood-Paper Company, October 14, 1863, and the assignment by Buffam to that company June 16, 1865, of his legal estate in the patent. The infringement by the defendant, and consequent profit to defendant and damage to the American Wood-Paper Company, is alleged from October 14, 1863, to August 19, 1867. The bill alleges an assignment, August 19, 1867, from that company to Gardner Harland of "all their claims against the said defendant for the said damages and profits for the said infringement during the said period," and an assignment by Harland to R. C. Anthony, one of complainants, October 4, 1873, of all said claims. The bill is brought by R. C. Anthony, a citizen of New York, and the American Wood-Paper Company, a corporation created by the legislature of the state of Rhode Island and located at Providence in said state, against the defendant, a citizen of Massachusetts, for a discovery and account of profits, and for damages and other relief.

¹[Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The defendant has demurred generally to this bill, and in support of his demurrer relies upon the bar of the statute of limitations of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and also upon the character of the claim alleged in the bill. The limitation in cases of tort in this commonwealth is six years. Gen. St. Mass. c. 155, § 1. As a general rule, the laws of the state in which a national court sits must be the rules of decision in such court. The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act provided that "the laws of the several states, except when the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." It is too well settled to require the citation of authorities, that, in ordinary actions at common law, the statutes of limitation of the state where the suit is brought may be pleaded in bar under this provision of the judiciary act. Whenever the cause of action is one cognizable by a court of common law, a court of equity, in accordance with the general rules of equity jurisprudence, follows the law in relation to the limitations of actions. The question presented is whether this rule applies to actions, the subject-matter of which is under the exclusive control of the national legislature and judiciary.

Mr. Justice Swayne held, in the case of Collins v. Peebles, [Case No. 3,017,] that the state statutes could not limit the time within which actions for the infringement of letters patent might be brought in the courts of the United States; that congress having failed to legislate upon this subject, there was no limit to the time for bringing such actions; and Mr. Justice Grier is reported, in a note to the above case, to have so decided in the case of Parker v. Halleck, [Id. 10,735.] To the same effect is the decision in Read v. Miller, [Id. 11,610.] In the case of Parker v. Hawk, [Id. 10,737,] the learned judge of the southern district of Ohio decided that the limitation act of Ohio applied to an action on the case in the circuit court of the United States for an infringement of a patent. It is stated, in a note to that, that the decision was affirmed by Mr. Justice McLean. Parker v. Hawk, [supra,] was decided on the authority of M'Cluny v. Silliman, 3 Pet. [23 U. S.] 270. But M'Cluny v. Silliman is by no means decisive of the question. That was an action on the case against the defendant as register of a land office in Ohio for non-feasance, in refusing at the request of the plaintiff to enter his application for the purchase of certain government lands, as required by an act of congress. Such an action against an officer for non-feasance could have been prosecuted in the state as well as in the federal courts. The cause of action was one over which the national and state courts had concurrent jurisdiction. Such a case clearly falls within the provisions of section thirty-four of the judiciary act. It is one of the cases where the laws of the state apply. But how can it be contended that the laws of the states apply to an action for the infringement of a patent, when the right of action is exclusively under the constitution and laws of the United States, when the form of the remedy is prescribed by the acts of congress, and when the circuit courts of the United States are clothed by statute with exclusive jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter?

Should the legislature of a state pass an act in express terms limiting the time for bringing an action in the federal courts for infringement of patent rights, there can be no reasonable doubt that such a statute would be unconstitutional and void. The policy of the government to provide a uniform system of rights and remedies throughout the United States upon the whole subject-matter of patents for new and useful inventions and discoveries, by placing it under the control of congress and the federal courts, would be frustrated, if such state legislation could directly or indirectly limit, restrict, or take away the remedy. For these reasons, I think no state statute of limitation can be pleaded in bar of this action. It is contended, in support of the demurrer, that a court of equity will not entertain a suit for the benefit of an assignee of a right of action for a tort. The question whether a court of equity would entertain this bill, if brought only in the name of an assignee of a right of action for a tort, does not necessarily arise in this case, as this bill is brought by the assignor, who is also the owner of the patent, and who, under the rules of equity pleading, joins with him the assignee, he being beneficially interested therein. The better opinion seems to be that, if the claim be for an injury to one's estate or property, and not to a mere solatium for an injury done to the person or feelings of the assignor, the claim may be assigned. People v. Tioga, 19 Wend. 73; McKee v. Judd, 2 Kern. [12 N. Y.] 622; Milnor v. Metz, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 221. The demurrer of the defendants is not sustained.

[NOTE. For other cases involving the same patent, see note to American Wood-Paper Co. v. Fiber Disintegrating Co., Case No. 320.]

ANTHONY, (GORDON v.) See Case No. 5-605.

Case No. 488.

ANTHONY v. JASPER COUNTY.

[4 Dill. 136; 3 Cent. Law J. 321.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. 1876.

REGISTRATION BOND ACT—FRAUDULENT ANTE-DATING—INNOCENT HOLDER.

A statute of Missouri (Laws 1872, p. 56) provided that "before any bond hereafter issued by any county shall obtain validity or be negotiated," it must be first registered by the state auditor, who shall certify thereon that all conditions precedent, required by law, and by the contract under which the bonds were ordered to be issued, have been complied with. Subsequent to the passage of this statute, certain bonds were issued by the county court of Jasper county to a railway company, the said company not having fully complied with the conditions upon which the issue of the bonds had been authorized by a vote of the people. In order to evade the statute, the bonds were antedated to a date prior to the passage of the act: Held, that they were void, even in the hands of an innocent holder, and that the county was not estopped to set up this defense. Argument.—Where a statute declares absolutely and without exception that a contract or bond or note is void, it is void into whosoever hands it comes.

[See note at end of case.]

The court made the following special finding of facts, viz.:

1. This action is brought for the collection of interest coupons, originally attached to bonds of the following tenor:

"United States of America, state of Missouri. No. 1. Jasper County Bond. $500. Interest, ten per cent. per annum. Know all men by these presents: That the county of Jasper and state of Missouri acknowledges itself indebted and firmly bound to the Memphis, Carthage, and Northwestern Railroad Company, or bearer, in the sum of five hundred dollars, which sum said county of Jasper, for and on account of Marion township, for value received, hereby promises to pay said company, or bearer, at the National Park Bank, in the city of New York, and state of New York, twenty years after date, with interest thereon from the date hereof at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, on the first days of January and July of each year, on the presentation and delivery at said National Park Bank, in said city of New York, state of New York, of the coupons of interest hereto attached. This bond is issued pursuant to an order of the county court of said county of Jasper, made by authority of an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, entitled 'An act to facilitate the construction of railroads in the state of Missouri,' and approved on the 23d of March, A. D. 1868, and authorized by a vote of more than two-thirds of the voters of said township. In testimony whereof, the said county of Jasper has executed this bond by the presiding justice of the county court of said county, under the order of said court, signing his name hereto, and by the clerk of said court, under the order thereof, attesting the same, and affixing thereto the seal of said court. This done at the office of the clerk of said court, this 28th day of March, A. D. 1872. [Seal.] R. S. Merwin, Presiding Justice of the County Court of Jasper county, Missouri. A. E. Gregory, Clerk of the County Court of Jasper county, Missouri.

"Carthage, Jasper County, — 1872. The county of Jasper promises to pay the sum of twenty-five dollars on the 1st of July, 1873, being interest on bond No. 1, for $500, payable at the National Park Bank, in the city and state of New York. A. E. Gregory, Clerk of the County Court of Jasper county, Missouri."

2. That at the regular term of the county court of Jasper county, Missouri, held on the 10th day of February, 1872, the following, among other proceedings, was had, to-wit: "Whereas, more than twenty-five persons, tax-payers and residents of the municipal township of Marion, in the county of Jasper, in the state of Missouri, have petitioned this court, setting forth their desire as a township to subscribe to the capital stock of the Memphis, Carthage, and Northwestern Railroad Company, proposing to build a railroad into and through said township; that the amount they desire to subscribe is seventy-five thousand dollars, upon the following named terms and conditions, viz.: First. That the railroad of said company be continued and extended through said township of Marion, from the depot at Carthage, westward to some point on the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf Railroad, in the state of Kansas, within nine months from the 1st day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, and that the work of grading and constructing be commenced within twenty days after the date of making the subscription, and be pushed vigorously until completed. Second. That the machine and repairing shops of the said company be permanently located and forever maintained within three-quarters of a mile of the public square in Carthage; and said shops, with their equipments, when completed, shall cost not less than three hundred thousand dollars; that the construction of said shops shall begin within sixty days after the cars are running to the depot at Carthage, and be completed within one year. Third. That such subscription shall be paid by issuing and delivering of the bonds of said township to the said railroad company; said bonds to be of the denomination of five hundred dollars each, to bear date on the day and year when said railroad company shall become entitled to receive the same under the stipulations herein contained. Aforesaid bonds to bear ten per centum interest per annum from the date they are delivered, the interest payable semi-annually, and represented by the coupons to be attached, the principal payable twenty years after date, and both the principal and interest payable at the National Park Bank, in the city of New York, in the state of New York. 'Said railroad shall be equal to the standard construction of railroads in the state of Missouri, and of the same gauge as the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad.' The aforesaid bonds shall be issued and be placed in escrow, and bear interest as aforesaid from the date of the delivery of said bonds to the aforesaid railroad company. Fourth. That when the cars are running regularly on said railroad, for the transportation of freight and passengers, from the town of Pierce City, in Lawrence county, Missouri, into and through Marion township to the depot at Carthage, and thence westward to a point on the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf Railroad, within the time specified in the first specification herein, to-wit: nine months from the 1st day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, and making regular connection with the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad at Pierce City, in the county of Lawrence, in the state of Missouri, and the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf Railroad, in the state of Kansas, fifty thousand dollars of the said bonds, and when at least fifty thousand dollars shall have been first expended and paid out towards the construction of said machine and repair shops, and work begun in good faith for their erection, then twenty-five thousand dollars more of said bonds shall be delivered to said company."

¹[Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

3. That at a special term of the county court of Jasper county, Missouri, held on the 28th day of March, 1872, the following, among other proceedings, was had, to-wit: "In the matter of a subscription to the capital stock of the Memphis, Carthage, and Northwestern Railroad Company, in behalf of Marion township: Whereas, it appearing from the returns of an election, held in pursuance of an order of this court, on Tuesday, the 5th day of March, A. D. 1872, that more than two-thirds of the qualified voters of the municipal township of Marion, in Jasper county, Missouri, voting at said election, are in favor of subscribing to the capital stock of the Memphis, Carthage, and Northwestern Railroad Company seventy-five thousand dollars, upon the terms and conditions as set forth in the petition heretofore presented, and the order of this court, made on the 10th day of February, A. D. 1872, for said election, and that more than two-thirds of the voters of said township voted in favor of such subscription being made; now, therefore, it is ordered by the court that the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars be, and is hereby, subscribed to the capital stock of said railroad company in behalf of said Marion township, according to the terms and conditions of said order of election, and that the bonds to be issued in payment of such subscription be signed by the presiding justice of this court, and attested by the clerk of this court, with the seal of this court affixed."

4. That at an adjourned term of the county court of Jasper county, Missouri, held on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1872, the following, among other proceedings, was had, to-wit: "Ordered by the court, that fifty thousand dollars of Marion township bonds, voted to the Memphis, Carthage, and Northwestern Railroad Company, be issued, and that the clerk of this court have the same registered according to law, and that when so registered the same shall be deposited in escrow in some responsible banking house in the city of St. Louis."

5. That an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, entitled "An act to provide for the registration of bonds issued by counties, cities, and incorporated towns, and to limit the issue thereof," approved March 30, 1872, enacted inter alia:

"Section 4. Before any bond hereafter issued by any county, city, or incorporated town, for any purpose whatever, shall obtain validity or be negotiated, the same shall be presented to the state auditor, who shall register the same in a book or books provided for that purpose, in the same manner as the state bonds are now registered, and who shall certify by endorsement on such bond that all the conditions of the laws have been complied with in its issue, if that be the case, and also that the conditions of the contract under which they were ordered to be issued have also been complied with; and the evidence of that fact shall be filed and preserved by the auditor. But such certificate shall be prima facie evidence only of the facts therein stated, and shall not preclude or prohibit any person from showing or proving the contrary, in any suit or proceeding to test or determine the validity of such bonds, or the power of any county court, city or town council, or board of trustees, or other authority, to issue such bonds; and the remedy by injunction shall also be at the instance of any tax-payer of the respective county, city, or incorporated town, to prevent the registration of any bonds alleged to be illegally issued or founded on any provisions of this act."

6. That John Purcell was the presiding justice of the county court of Jasper county on the 28th day of March, 1872, and continued to hold said office until the — day of September, 1872, when he resigned; and that R. S. Merwin was a member of the said county court in March, 1872, and until the 21st day of October, 1872, when he became, and thereafter was, presiding justice of said court; and these facts appear by the records of said court.

7. That the bonds in controversy were sealed with the seal of the county court of Jasper county, affixed by the clerk and signed by the clerk, and at the same time said bonds were signed by the said R. S. Merwin, which was after he became presiding justice of said county court, in October, 1872. Merwin delivered the said bonds in October, 1872, to the Union Savings Association, of St. Louis, for the use of one Edward Burgess, a contractor for the building of the railroad named in the bonds, having first removed the first two coupons; and the said bonds were purchased by one William C. Wilson from said Burgess at the rate of fifty-five cents on the dollar, which was then the market value of said bonds, and the same were paid for in November, 1872, by the said Wilson giving his check to Burgess for the amount ($27,500) on said savings association, which check was paid. Neither the other justice of the county court, nor the county court, consented to the said delivery of the said bonds by Merwin to or for the use of Burgess. The said railroad for which the bonds issued was finished through Marion township, but the said railroad company has never complied with the condition of the vote requiring its railroad to be continued and extended through said township of Marion, from the depot at Carthage, westward, to some point on the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf Railroad, in the state of Kansas, and there still remains about nine miles of such railroad to be constructed in Kansas.

8. That said bonds, when signed, sealed, and delivered as aforesaid, were antedated so as to bear date the 28th day of March, 1872, and they were never presented to the state auditor, and he never registered the same, nor made any certificate thereon, under the provisions of said statute, approved March 30, 1872, and said bonds, as held by the plaintiff, contain no certificate of registration endorsed or written thereon.

9. That the plaintiff is a bona fide purchaser of said bonds and coupons for value, without actual notice of any matter of fact impairing the regularity and validity of said bonds, and without actual notice that the said bonds had been antedated so as to bear date prior to the 30th day of March, 1872.

Joseph Shippen, for plaintiff.

E. J. Montague, for county.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The well-known history of the issue of municipal bonds in this state, as it appears by the many cases in this court, shows that conditions imposed by law requiring a popular vote, or conditions in the proposition submitted to the voters, intended to prevent fraud, and to secure the actual building and completion of the roads, have been often evaded, and the bonds issued without compliance therewith. Such bonds, when negotiated for value, the courts have held to be binding. To prevent such improper or improvident issue of bonds in the future, the legislature passed the act of March 30, 1872, (Laws 1872, p. 56.)

The fourth section of that act provides that "before any bond hereafter issued by any county * * * shall obtain validity or be negotiated," it must be first registered by the state auditor, who shall certify thereon that all conditions precedent, required by law, and by the contract under which the bonds were ordered to be issued, have been complied with.

In this case the bonds were signed, sealed, and issued in the manner above appearing, after this statute went into effect, and were antedated to a date prior to the passage of that enactment. In point of fact, the conditions on which the bonds had been voted had not been fully complied with; and hence they could not have been, and were not, certified by the auditor as registered bonds. The bonds have found their way into the hands of an innocent holder for value, who did not know that the bonds bore a false date.

If the bonds bore date after the act of March 30, 1872, and had not been registered, it is plain, we think, that they would have no "validity," and hence could not support an action in the hands of any person. Pars. Bills & N. 218, 276, 279. But they are antedated, and the question is whether they have validity in the hands of the innocent purchaser. Upon the best consideration we have been able to give, our conclusion is that the bonds cannot be enforced. The case comes within the doctrine, which is well settled, that where a statute declares absolutely and without exception that a contract or bond or note is void, it is void into whosoever hands it may come. This statute declares that no unregistered bond shall be valid or be negotiated. Bonds must first be registered. Without registration they "obtain no validity." Such is the statute. A declaration that bonds shall have no validity is equivalent to declaring them to be void.

Is the county estopped to set up this defence? We think not. The case is to be distinguished from those decided by the supreme court of the United States, in which it is held that the frauds of the officers cannot be visited upon the innocent bondholder, and falls within the case of Bayley v. Taber, 5 Mass. 286. In that case it was held, where a statute enacted that promissory notes of a certain description, "made or issued" after a specified day, should be "utterly void, and no action should be sustained thereon," that it was competent to the makers of such notes, when sued upon notes bearing date before the day fixed by the statute, to prove that they were, in fact, made and issued after such day.

The principle of that case is the same as in the case at bar, and if that is a sound principle when applied to the individual maker of prohibited paper, it should apply with at least equal force in favor of public bodies, where one or two officers, without the consent of the others, may, as in this case, combine to evade the law, the other officers being innocent of wrongful participation.

The principle involved is one of great consequence. For illustration: Loose and general powers have been heretofore given in this state to municipalities and counties to issue such bonds. This power has been taken away by the new constitution. Can the protective provisions of that instrument be evaded and rendered useless by the mere fraudulent act of the officers of the county in antedating the bonds. If so, the power to defraud is endowed with a fearful vitality, which survives the prohibition of the constitution, and threatens to become immortal.

Judgment for the defendant.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. In speaking for the court, Mr. Chief Justice Waite said: "When the bonds now in question were put out, the law required that, to be valid, they must be certified to by the auditor of the state. In other words, that officer was to certify them, before their execution was complete, so as to bind the public for payment. * * * Antedating, under such circumstances, partakes of the character of a forgery, and is always open to inquiry, no matter who relies on it. The question is one of the authority of him who attempts to bind another. * * * It matters not that when the bonds were voted the registration law was not in force. Before they were issued, it had gone into effect. It did not change in any way the contract with the railroad company. * * * All the legislature attempted to do was to provide what should be a good bond, when issued. There was nothing changed, but the form of the execution." Anthony v. County of Jasper, 101 U. S. 693. Also see Douglass v. Pike Co., Id. 677.]

ANTHONY, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,459 and 14,460.

ANTHONY KELLY, (The SCOTTISH BRIDE v.) See Case No. 12,551.

ANTHONY MANGIN, The, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,461.

ANTHRACITE, The, (HERN v.) See Case No. 6,412.

ANTHRACITE INS. CO., (GERMOND v.) See Case No. 5,365.

Case No. 489.

The ANTILLES.

[8 Ben. 9.]

District Court, E. D. New York. Jan., 1875.
SMUGGLING — GOODS NOT ENTERED ON THE MANIFEST.

In order to sustain a libel against a vessel for the recovery of the penalty imposed by the 24th section of the act of March 2d, 1799, (1 Stat. 646,) for the importation of goods not entered on the manifest, it must be shown that the vessel belonged in whole or in part to a citizen or inhabitant of the United States. The value of the goods omitted must also be shown.

[See, also, U. S. v. Twenty-Six Diamond Rings, Case No. 16,572.]

In admiralty.

A. W. Tenney, Dist. Atty., for United States.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem on the part of the United States to enforce against the bark Antilles a penalty incurred by a violation on the part of her master of the 24th section of the act of March 2, 1799, (1 Stat. 646,) which provides that if any goods, wares and merchandise shall be imported or brought into the United States, in any ship or vessel belonging in whole or in part to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants, of the United States, from any foreign port or place, without having a manifest containing a full description of the cargo, in such case the master or other person having charge of such ship shall forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to the value of such goods omitted from the manifest.

The allegations of the libel are all denied by the answer. An examination of the evidence introduced on the part of the government to sustain the libel, shows at least two fatal defects of proof, namely, that there is no evidence to show that the vessel belonged in whole or in part to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants, of the United States; and, further, that there is no evidence as to the value of the goods claimed to have been shown to have been omitted from the manifest. In the absence of any evidence upon these material facts, no decree can be rendered against the vessel.

The libel is accordingly dismissed.

[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 490.

In re ANTISDEL.

[18 N. B. R. 289.]

District Court, D. Michigan. April 29, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—PROPER BOOKS OF ACCOUNT—CONCEALMENT OF PROPERTY—RES JUDICATA.

[1. On objections to the discharge of a bankrupt, it appeared that his books of account were kept in the ordinary form of books of country merchants, and that, although there might be errors in posting, a trial balance could be made with no extraordinary effort, and a competent accountant could gain a correct idea of the bankrupt's business. Held, that the requirement as to keeping proper books was fully met.]

[Cited in Re Vernia, 5 Fed. 725; Re Frey, 9 Fed. 384; Re Graves, 24 Fed. 554.]

[2. It appeared that certain erasures in such books arose from errors in the original entries, which were corrected by erasing the figures and substituting the correct ones therefor, and there was no suggestion of fraudulent intent. Held, that a discharge would not be refused because of such erasures.]

[Cited in Re Frey, 9 Fed. 382.]

[3. A member of a firm in embarrassed circumstances conveyed to his wife a large amount of property, real and personal, constituting all his individual property, at a time when a withdrawal from his assets of this amount of property was likely to embarrass him seriously in meeting his obligations. He continued embarrassed, and became bankrupt. Held, that such conveyance could not be upheld on the ground that it was made in consideration of a loan made to him by his wife 20 years before, and which had been barred by the statute of limitations for 14 years, and the omission from his schedules of the property conveyed was a concealment thereof, for which his discharge might be refused.]

[4. A creditor of a bankrupt, having recovered a judgment against him in a state court, filed a creditor's bill against the bankrupt and wife to have a conveyance by him to his wife set aside as made in fraud of creditors. The bill was dismissed upon the merits, and on appeal to the supreme court the decree was affirmed. Held, that the creditor was estopped to oppose the bankrupt's discharge, as the matter must be regarded as res judicata.]

[5. Creditors who have been duly notified of a bankrupt's application for discharge, and make no opposition, are regarded as consenting to the discharge; and the court will only consider whether the bankrupt has committed an act which would bar a discharge, upon specifications regularly filed in opposition thereto, upon which an issue can be joined, and the bankrupt be heard in his defense, and will not of its own motion refuse a discharge, though it may appear that such an act was committed by the bankrupt.]

[Cited in Re Read, 5 Fed. 722.]

[In bankruptcy. Application by James S. Antisdel a bankrupt, for discharge. On specifications filed by the Union National Bank, a creditor of the bankrupt, setting forth objections to his discharge, as follows: (1) That the bankrupt had willfully and intentionally concealed his title to certain real estate and personal property which belonged to him, by having the same conveyed to his wife at a time when he was insolvent, and knew himself to be so, and when he expected and contemplated proceedings in bankruptcy;

(2) that the bankrupt, being a country merchant, did not keep proper books of account.]

John Atkinson, for bankrupt.

Alfred Russell, for objecting creditor.

BROWN, District Judge. Substantially three objections are made to the bankrupt's books of account. 1. That they did not exhibit the condition of his business, that no trial balance could be made from them, and that Antisdel's individual account was unintelligible. 2. That there were unexplained mutilations and erasures. 3. That he had omitted to credit two or three small amounts, and had made false entries of advances to his wife.

With regard to the first objection, I fully concur in the opinion of Judge Longyear in the case of In re Archenbrow, [Case No. 505,] that the books of account of a merchant, whatever be their form and number, must be so kept as to give the creditors an intelligible idea of the business, and enable a competent accountant to ascertain the debtor's financial condition. If that be done, the form in which they are kept is of no importance; but if it be not done, then it is immaterial whether the omission was fraudulent or otherwise. The evidence of the experts upon the subject is somewhat conflicting—one testifying that a trial balance could not be made, and three that it could be. The books consist of a ledger, a cash-book, a journal or day-book, and are kept in the form in which the books of country merchants are ordinarily kept. While there may be errors in posting, which would prevent a balance being obtained, upon the first trial, I am satisfied that such balance could be obtained with no extraordinary effort, and that from an examination of these books a competent accountant could gain a correct idea of the bankrupt's business.

To sustain the second objection, I think it should be made to appear that the mutilations or erasures were fraudulent, and that the ruling in the case of In re Archenbrow, [supra,] above cited, extends no further than to the form and nature of the books. In re Beatty, [Case No. 1,196;] In re Pierson, [Id. 11,153;] In re Burgess, [Id. 2,153.] There are undoubtedly numerous erasures through these books, but all of them seem to have arisen from errors in the original entries, subsequently corrected by erasing the figures, and writing the corrected ones over them. There is not the slightest evidence of a fraudulent intent.

The third objection, that certain credits to which his customers were entitled were omitted and certain false entries made, is wholly unsupported by the testimony.

In support of the first specification, it was proven that on the 6th of August, 1873, the bankrupt conveyed directly to his wife, for the nominal consideration of two thousand dollars, about twenty acres of land in Union City; that on 7th of February, 1872, he conveyed to one Decker several lots in the same village, which were afterwards and on the 23d of July, 1873, conveyed by Decker to the bankrupt's wife, for the nominal consideration of three hundred dollars, the bankrupt at the same time discharging a mortgage of two hundred and seventy-five dollars, which he had taken from Decker upon the sale to him. He subsequently made another conveyance to his wife of land in Sherwood, and on 1st of January, 1875, gave her a bill of sale of certain lumber and stone, originally designed for a house to be erected upon the same land. It appeared that in 1869 the bankrupt went into partnership with one Leonard, buying a half-interest in the business for ten thousand dollars, without taking an inventory, or knowing the financial condition of the firm, except as he had obtained certain impressions with regard to the business from his having been assessor of taxes the year before. He supposed the firm was worth twenty thousand dollars, but never knew the amount of the indebtedness until the administrator of his deceased partner took an inventory in the season of 1874, Leonard having died 5th of August, 1874. Leonard had attended to the financial part of the business, and sometimes the bills "seemed to crowd them," as he expressed it. In 1873, when Antisdel conveyed his land in Union City to his wife, he owed the Union City National Bank, the objecting creditor, two thousand dollars. He then knew the firm was in debt from fifteen thousand dollars to eighteen thousand dollars. He had no recollection whether they had run behind or not the first or second years, though he remembers that once or twice Leonard made the remark that they were behind, and had not made anything—had even lost. It appears, however, that the merchandise account exceeded the sales without counting any profits, and at the end of the first year showed a loss of about one thousand dollars. At the end of the second year the inventory showed a loss of two thousand dollars of stock, with all the profits. His partner then, being persuaded from the accounts that the profits of the year should be some six or seven thousand dollars more than paying for the goods, decided to dissolve the firm, to which Antisdel at first consented, but afterwards proposed to withdraw from taking an active part in the business, and put a clerk in his place. The next year showed a margin of one thousand six hundred dollars in the profits, and from thence to the day that Leonard was taken sick and left the store the business was in better condition. After March, 1874, the management of the store was in the hands of Antisdel until a settlement was made in September, when the administrator found that the purchases exceeded the sales some six thousand dollars. When the inventory was taken shortly after Leonard's death, the assets footed up about twenty-two thousand dollars, and liabilities about eighteen thousand dollars. The bankrupt continued in business until March, 1875, when he sold out to one Watkins, the inventory at this time being about six thousand dollars. The debt of two thousand dollars to the Union City National Bank was contracted before the conveyances were made by the bankrupt to his wife. The property stood in Antisdel's name at the time the loan was made to the firm of which he was a member, August 27, 1872, and the fact of his possessing this property was undoubtedly some inducement for making the loan. It was then believed to be worth between four and five thousand dollars. Allen, cashier of the bank, remonstrated with Antisdel when he learned of the transfers through the newspapers, when Antisdel remarked he ought to let his wife have the farm. Antisdel afterwards said Allen had abused him, and probably that would be the last claim that would be paid. One Bostwick testified his wife had a mortgage on the firm property, and the payments were due semi-annually; that after Leonard's death payments were not made on the mortgage, and when Bostwick applied to Antisdel for payment, he said he could not pay it, that there was no company money to pay it with, and he didn't calculate to pay it with his own money. With regard to the personal property, one Scott testified that Antisdel took him to look at the lumber piled on the land in or near Union City, and asked him to buy it. He said he didn't want him to take the lumber and keep it, but he wanted him to take it; he wanted it for building purposes, and wanted him to give a note for it, and he would take it back and give up the note; they had got the lumber out for building a house and wanted to keep it for that purpose. That the firm of Leonard & Antisdel had got to pay their debts, and he did not propose that his private property should go to pay them. Scott recommended him to convey it to his wife. Antisdel doubted whether she could hold it from his creditors, but Scott thought she could if he owed her anything, and about a week after this he learned that Antisdel had given his wife a bill of sale for the lumber and stone. In defence it was shown that Mrs. Antisdel in 1850 let her husband have eight hundred dollars inherited from her father's estate, and in 1853 four hundred dollars from her grandfather's estate, but she took no security, and no memorandum of the loan was made by either party. It appears, however, that Antisdel had promised to make good these loans to his wife, though before 1866 he had owned two farms in his own name without securing the loan to her. In 1866 he bought twenty-five acres in Union City, with the understanding that it should be conveyed to his wife, and the deeds made in her name, but by an accident this was not done, and it was not until August 6, 1873, that he conveyed this property to his wife. No explanation was given for the delay. In 1873 it was calculated that the one thousand two hundred dollars originally loaned amounted to about three thousand dollars, and these three conveyances were said to have been made in payment of this amount. The personal property consisted of building material intended for the house, which was upon the lot in 1873 when the conveyance of the land was made, and she agreed to take it at four hundred dollars, though the bill of sale was not made until January 1, 1875. Under Scott's testimony, however, I regard it as extremely improbable that any such agreement was made. Both parties testified that when these conveyances were made Antisdel believed himself entirely solvent, and had always met his paper at maturity. There is further testimony tending to show that his credit was good up to about the time of his bankruptcy, and there is no direct testimony that he was actually insolvent at the time they were made. He seems, however, to have been doing a losing business, had been pressed by his creditors, and if he were a man of ordinary business sagacity could hardly fail to have been aware that he had made a bad bargain in buying into the business, and that the partnership property would in the end be wholly insufficient to pay his liabilities.

The second subdivision of section 5110 requires the court to refuse a discharge, "if the bankrupt has concealed any part of his estate or effects." This specification is satisfied by proof that the bankrupt has concealed his title to real estate, by leaving out of his schedules property that has been conveyed by him in fraud of his creditors. In re Hussman, [Case No. 6051;] In re Rathbone, [Id. 11,583, Id. 11,581;] In re Hill, [Id. 6,483;] In re Goodridge, [Id. 5,547.] The facts in this case seem to me to fall within the ruling of the supreme court in Humes v. Scruggs, 94 U. S. 22, and to establish a case of a conveyance made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. The court in his case seems to me to establish a most salutary principle in holding that "if the money that a married woman might have had secured to her own use is allowed to go into the business of her husband, and to be mixed with his property, and is applied to the purchase of real estate for his advantage, or for the purpose of giving him credit in his business, and is thus used for a series of years, there being no specification when the same is purchased that such real estate shall be the property of the wife, the same becomes the property of the husband for the purpose of paying his debts; he cannot retain it until bankruptcy occurs and then convey it to his wife; such conveyance is in fraud of the just claims of the creditors of the husband." See, also, Phipps v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 3. Putting the facts in this case in the most favorable light for the bankrupt, it appears that he received this money of his wife without giving her security, or any written evidence of the loan; that he held it in his possession for upwards of twenty years, having in the meantime purchased land which he might have conveyed to his wife in satisfaction of the debt, but which he held in his own name, and thereby acquired credit at the bank; that the loan was made, partly at least, upon the faith of this security, and that he made the conveyance to his wife at a time when he was heavily indebted, and when a withdrawal of this amount of property from his assets was likely to embarrass him seriously in meeting his obligations. Although it does not appear that he had failed to meet his paper at that time, he continued embarrassed, and finally was compelled to wind up his business in a court of bankruptcy. This is regarded as sufficient evidence of insolvency as to existing creditors, whose debts remain unpaid. Bump, Fraud. Conv. 294. To hold that a member of a firm in embarrassed circumstances may convey all his individual property to his wife in payment of a debt barred by the statute of limitations for fourteen years is a premium upon fraud I am unwilling to offer. If such a transfer be sustainable at all, I think it should be made within a reasonable time, at least within the six years fixed by the statute. But it appears by the record in this case that Charles T. Allen, cashier of the Union City National Bank, the opposing creditor, in June, 1875, recovered a judgment in the circuit court for the county of Branch against the bankrupt for the debt which was proved by the bank in this court; that he afterwards filed a creditor's bill against Antisdel and his wife, praying that these conveyances be set aside and declared to have been made in fraud of creditors; that the case went to a regular hearing upon pleadings and proofs, and his bill was dismissed, and upon appeal to the supreme court, the decree of the circuit court in that regard was affirmed. It is insisted that the objecting creditor is estopped by this decree to claim here that this conveyance was made in fraud of creditors.

Three replies are made to this defence:

1. That the proceedings are not identical. A similar question arose in Re Hussman, [Case No. 6,951,] in which the opposing creditors pleaded a decree of a state court setting aside a similar conveyance as fraudulent in bar of a discharge, and the learned judge held it to be a case of res adjudicata. The question litigated in the state court was practically the same, and I see no reason why its judgment does not operate as an estoppel. See Downer v. Rowell, 25 Vt. 336. The cases of Jones v. Milbank, 6 Lans. 73, and Bradley v. Hunter, 50 Ala. 265, evidently have no application.

2. That the parties are not identical. But it appears distinctly by the testimony in this case, that Allen was cashier of the Union City National Bank, that the foundation of his suit was the debt proved by the bank in this case, and that it was brought by Allen in his own name as trustee for the bank. Under these circumstances it is quite clear there is an estoppel as between the defendant and the person for whose use the suit is brought. Freem. Judgm. § 173; Hodson v. McConnel, 12 Ill. 170; Peterson v. Lothrop, 34 Pa. St. 223; Calhoun v. Dunning, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 120; Rogers v. Haines, 3 Greenl. 362; Boynton v. Willard, 10 Pick. 166.

3. That admitting the question is res adjudicata as between the opposing creditor and the bankrupt, it is insisted that the court is bound of its own motion to refuse a discharge, wherever it can see that the bankrupt has committed an act which if properly pleaded would bar a discharge. I know of but one case which tends to support this proposition, viz.: In Re Wilkinson, [Case No. 17,667,] in which the court, upon inspecting the record of the bankrupt's examination by the assignee, discovered that he had lost a large sum of money in gambling, and refused a discharge, although creditors interposed no objection. The circumstances of this case were such as to appeal strongly to the discretion of the court. The question does not seem to have been argued, and the matter apparently did not receive any very careful consideration. The other cases cited by counsel lend no support at all to this proposition. In Re Houghton, [Id. 6,730,] the only point considered was, whether the court could permit opposition to be made after the return day of the order to show cause, where a creditor, who ought to have considered himself the representative of all the creditors, had filed specifications of opposition, and then withdrew them. In the case of In re Palmer, [Id. 10,678,] the bankrupt obtained the consent of a sufficient number to entitle him to his discharge, but desiring to obtain also the consent of another creditor, "to strengthen his application," he gave him a note for $40 with security, and in consideration thereof the creditor signed his consent; another creditor opposed the discharge because of this transaction, and the learned chief justice held that, although there was a sufficient number and amount without this, he was still precluded from obtaining his discharge. It is true that he remarks in the course of his opinion that "the courts are as much bound by the provisions of the act as the bankrupt himself, and if it appears in the regular course of the proceedings that an applicant for a discharge has failed in any particular to perform his duties as a bankrupt, the application must be refused." This language, however, must be considered in connection with the facts of the case, which were far from sustaining the position that the court is bound of its own motion to refuse a discharge. The better opinion seems to be, that creditors who have been duly notified, and make no opposition, are regarded as consenting to a discharge; and that the court will only consider whether the bankrupt has committed an act which would bar a discharge, upon specifications regularly filed in opposition thereto. Creditors v. Williams, [Case No. 3,379;] In re Sullivan, [In re Sutherland, Case No. 13,640;] In re Schuyler, [Id. 12,494;] In re Rosenfeld, [Id. 12,057.] The books are full of cases holding that the specifications must not be vague and general, but distinct, precise and specific, and so framed as to advise the bankrupt what facts he must be prepared to meet and resist. In re Rathbone, [Id. 11,590;] In re Hill, [Id. 6,482;] In re Hansen, [Id. 6,030;] In re Waggoner, [Id. 17,037.] But of what use all this particularity in framing an issue, if the court may disregard the issue thus framed, and refuse a discharge mero motu if it appears the bankrupt has committed any other act not covered by the specifications? Suppose there be a trial by jury upon the specifications; that upon such trial it should appear that the bankrupt had not committed the act alleged, or that a creditor was estopped to take advantage of it; but, that he had committed some other act which would bar his discharge; would the court be bound to refuse a discharge, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury that the specifications were not sustained. It seems to me that the statement of this proposition is its own answer. When the bankrupt has taken the required oath, I think a discharge should only be refused when some creditor has filed specifications of his opposition thereto upon which an issue can be joined, and the bankrupt be heard in his defence. I do not feel authorized in this case to refuse a discharge, but will direct it to be withheld for a few days to permit other creditors to intervene in case they should desire to do so. The point upon which these specifications are overruled is a technical one, and it may be that the court would permit other creditors who have awaited the result of this proceeding to intervene and take up these specifications in their own behalf.

ANTISDEL, (HAWES v.) See Case No. 6,234.]

Case No. 491.

The ANTOINETTA C.

[5 Reu. 564; 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 115.]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1872.

DAMAGE TO CARGO—PERIL OF THE SEA.

Casks of bleaching powders were stowed in the hold of a vessel, against the skin, without dunnage. Water, which came in through the deck and water-ways, reached the casks and wet their contents, which rotted the wood of the casks. The casks were stove by reason of this, and the bleaching powders were mixed with the water, and this water reached some bundles of bags and injured them. The bags were being carried under a bill of lading which excepted the dangers of the seas: Held, that the injury to the bags was not caused by the dangers excepted, and that the ship was liable for the damage.

[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in The H. G. Johnson, 48 Fed. 697.]
[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty.

Townsend Scudder, for libellants.
James D. Keymert, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed to recover for the damage caused to sundry bales of empty grain bags, while being transported under a bill of lading, by the bark Antoinetta C., from Liverpool to New York. The libel alleges that the goods were damaged by contact with sea water and with certain bleaching powders on board of the bark, and that the damage was not caused by the perils of the seas, or by any of the perils excepted in the bill of lading. The answer alleges that the damage was caused by the accidents and perils of the seas.

The bill of lading acknowledges the receipt of the bales of empty bags in good order, and contracts for their delivery in like good order, the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation excepted. That the bales of bags came out of the vessel in a more or less damaged condition, is shown. The injury arose from the destruction of the fibre of the bags, by their having been wet by water in which bleaching powder, or soda ash was dissolved. The burden of proof is on the claimant to show that this was a peril of the sea. There was on board both bleaching powder and soda ash, in casks. Some of the casks of bleaching powder were stowed against the skin of the ship, without any dunnage. The bleaching powder became wet, the water penetrating through the wood of the casks. The effect was to rot the wood, and break it, and discharge some of the powder, which mixed with the water and became dissolved in it, and reached the bags, and saturated and burned them. The water which wet the bleaching powder leaked through the deck and water-ways. If the bleaching powder had remained dry, there would according to the evidence, have been no such result as there was. I cannot regard it as a peril of the sea, to stow casks of bleaching powder in such relation to bales of grain bags, that the casks, being against the skin of the ship, may become wet, and the bleaching powder become wet, and destroy the wood of the casks, so that, by the rolling of the vessel, the casks will be stove and discharge their contents so as to reach and injure the bales of bags. The loss is not shown to be one which could not be guarded against by the ordinary exertion of skill and prudence on the part of the ship owner. The Reeside, Case No. 11,657; Bearse v. Ropes, Id. 1,192.

There must be a decree for the libellants, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages.

[NOTE. As to the point that a carrier is bound to observe reasonable care in loading and stowing chemicals or bleaching powders, see The St. Patrick, 7 Fed. 125; The Kate Irving, 5 Fed. 630; The Pharos, 9 Fed. 912.]

Case No. 492.

The ANTONA.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas. 572.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 23, 1863.

PRIZE—ATTEMPT TO VIOLATE BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The steamer Antona and cargo were captured off Cape San Blas, Florida, by the United States war vessel Kittatinny, January 6, 1863, as prize of war. The vessel and cargo having been appropriated by the government at the appraised valuation of $76,353.09, a libel was filed for the condemnation thereof, May 25, 1863, and the warrant and monition were thereupon made returnable in court June 26th thereafter, and, being served by publication and returned in court by the marshal, on motion of the United States attorney, in open court, the default of all persons interested in the said vessel or cargo, in not appearing to the said monition, was ordered and taken. By the joint consent in writing, of the United States attorney and the counsel for the captors, executed July 2, 1863, and on application of the proctors for the claimants, the default was vacated by order of the court, and, on the 3rd of September thereafter, a claim and answer, by consent of the United States attorney, was filed on behalf of J. and T. Johnson, merchants of Liverpool, England, owners of the vessel and cargo, by Edwin Gerard, their agent. The answer and claim denies in general, all the allegations made in the libel, and the jurisdiction of the court over the cause. It admits the taking of the vessel and cargo for the use of the United States, but charges that the same were unlawfully taken, without the intervention of any prize tribunal, and were unlawfully converted by the captors in the port of New Orleans; and it denies that the prize property was ever duly appraised by a board of naval survey or otherwise, or was brought within the jurisdiction of this court. The test oath made by the agent, solely, asserts no fact in relation to the ownership of the vessel or cargo, or the acts of the captors in its seizure or disposal, as within his personal knowledge.

The case was brought to hearing at the present term, upon the proofs in preparatory and the ship's papers and the argument of the United States attorney, no brief or argument on the part of the claimants having been furnished to the court, nor any application for further proofs made by the claimants.

[Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

The certificate of British registry, dated Glasgow, April 24, 1860, states that David Sloan and others, of the county of Lanark, were the owners of the Antona, and an indorsement on the same registry shows that George Wigg, of Liverpool, was on the 16th of October, 1862, the owner of 64 shares of the vessel. The shipping agreement with the crew, dated Liverpool, October 31, 1862, is for a voyage from that port to Havana and Nassau, N. P., and back to a port of final discharge in the United Kingdom. There is a charter party, dated October 23, 1862, from George Wigg, owner of the vessel, (George Grindle, master,) to John and Thomas Johnson of Liverpool, for a voyage to Nassau and Havana, with liberty to touch at intermediary ports for coals, &c. No mention is made in the shipping papers, of the destination of the vessel to Matamoros. There is a clearance of the ship from Liverpool, November 1, 1862. The bills of lading of the cargo are all drawn to order, in blank, for the delivery of the cargo at Nassau, and no designation is made on them, or contained in any papers of the vessel respecting the cargo, that it comprehends any other than lawful merchandise and ordinary supplies for the ship's company, or that it is deliverable elsewhere than at Nassau. The prize commissioners, on the 14th of September, 1863, reported to the court a sworn inventory of the lading of the prize, as consisting, in gross, of 618½ chests of tea, 1 case of needles, 1 case of sample shoes, 40 cases of boots and shoes, 541 cases of brandy, 1 case and 2 barrels of sample crockery, 1 case of army buttons, 1 case of calf skins, 4 barrels of salt provisions, 4 cases of clothing, 1 cask of files, 1 case of assorted brushes, 3 coils of hemp, 2 gentleman's coats, 29 casks of wine, 36 iron cans (patent) of caustic soda, 29 crates of crockery, and 5 cases of drugs.

The facts testified to by the ship's company, on the depositions in preparatorio, on the 12th, 14th and 15th of May, 1863, in their clear bearing and results, prove that the voyage undertaken by the Antona was set on foot and conducted with the design to run the blockade of the port of Mobile, and furnish her cargo to the use of the enemy within the rebellious states.

The master deposes that the capture of the prize was made January 6, 1863, at 11 P. M. in latitude about 23° 50' north, and longitude 86° 11' west; that the vessel was taken to the blockading squadron off Mobile, thirty-six or forty hours after her capture; that she was bound to Matamoros; that, when captured, she was on her way back to Havana, in consequence of having had to throw coal overboard to lighten her, because of having had heavy weather; that the voyage began at Liverpool, and was to have ended at Nassau; that from Havana the vessel went, on the 31st of December, towards Matamoros; that he had been at anchor before the capture, waiting for daylight to see the land, having been driven back northward in the heavy weather; that he wished to ascertain about his chronometer before returning to Havana; that, from the loss of coal, he would not have been able to complete the voyage to Matamoros; that he had just raised his anchor when the capturing vessel came in sight; that he believes that the cargo was consigned to order, on his arrival at Matamoros; that he expected these instructions from his agents at Nassau; that he should have waited for those instructions before disposing of his cargo; that he took a Gulf pilot on board to give him information, as he (the master) was unacquainted with the Gulf navigation; that he does not know the name of that pilot, or that his name was entered in the log-book; that when he raised his anchor he steered from the vessel which came in sight, and observed that she followed him 13 or 14 hours; that the Antona altered her course during the chase about 2½ points; that she had always been on the course of her destination on the ship's papers until he determined to return to Havana, in consequence of having been exposed to severe weather; and that the destination of the vessel at the time of her capture was Matamoros.

The testimony of Grindle, the master, has been stated more fully, to give the claimants the largest benefit they can derive from the statements and exculpation of the commanding officer under whose charge and directions the vessel and cargo were when captured. Only three other witnesses were examined—Horace Pontet, rated as boy on board the vessel, on the 12th of May, 1863, and William Cumming, first mate, and John Patterson, carpenter, both on the 15th of May, 1863.

The boy states no facts of any moment, not appearing to know anything other than outside occurrences common to a trading voyage from a port in England to another in the Gulf of Mexico.

The testimony of the mate and the carpenter is directly in conflict with that of Grindle, the master, and, if credited, proves beyond doubt that the design and effort of the master, after reaching Havana, were to run the vessel and cargo into the blockaded port of Mobile, and, also, that such was the purpose of his voyage from its inception. The facts stated by Cumming and Patterson are in essential accordance, where they speak of things known to both of them, and they only differ on matters having a material bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the enterprise, where they relate particulars as being within their separate individual knowledge. For instance, Patterson, the carpenter, asserts it as within his knowledge that the vessel was in part laden with powder; and the mate is more positive and exact as to the movements of the vessel and soundings of her course taken along the shore to guide her progress into Mobile. Both of the witnesses are very clear and positive in their asseverations that the Antona went from Havana with the design to run directly into Mobile, and never was bound for Matamoras, or contemplated going to Nassau. They assert that the master took on board a man who was understood to be a resident of Mobile, as a Gulf pilot; that they were paid each a considerable sum of money at Havana, by the master, to keep silence as to the purpose and destination of the vessel; and that it was understood by the ship's company on board that she was to go where she had no right to go. Cumming, the mate, says that when he inquired of the master after leaving Havana, where the vessel was going to, his reply was that it was none of his business; that he had never heard that she was bound to Matamoras; that, when captured, was wide off the course given upon her papers and was going up along the coast towards Mobile; that her course was altered, by order of the master, 12 or 14 points on the appearance of the capturing vessel, and that she was chased. Patterson says that it was the common report on board, after leaving Havana, that the vessel was to run the blockade. Cumming says that the Antona made all sail to avoid being taken by the capturing vessel, and that 31 shotted guns were fired at her before she came to.

The log-book shows that the course of the Antona, after she left Havana, until she anchored close in on the Florida coast in 5 fathoms of water, on the 5th of January, was, generally, northwest or northwest by west.

From all the facts in proof it is clear, in my opinion, that, when arrested, the vessel was actively engaged in the endeavor to enter the port of Mobile, in violation of the blockade known by her master to be then maintained there. A decree of condemnation and forfeiture must be entered.

Case No. 493.

ANTONE v. HICKS.

[2 Lowell, 383.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec. 1874.
SEAMEN—WAGES—SEPARATION FROM SHIP WITHOUT FAULT.

1. A seaman in the whaling service, who, having become separated from his ship by no fault of his own, fails to rejoin her from causes which he cannot control, is entitled to wages to the time of separation, and the expenses of return to his country, as if the ship had left him behind for sickness.

¹[Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Where the master sold the effects of such a seaman by auction, and there was no evidence of negligence or bad faith on his part, the owner of the ship was held liable only for the amount realized by the sale.

[See Five Seamen v. The Fair American, Case No. 4,846; Vencock v. McCall, Id. 10,904; Nevett v. Clarke, Id. 10,138.]

In admiralty. The libellant was shipped at New Bedford in July, 1869, on board the defendant's ship Mermaid, for a whaling voyage not exceeding four years in length. In February, 1870, when the vessel was cruising off South Australia, the fourth mate's boat, with six men, was separated from the ship, and, after being out for two days with a very insufficient supply of food, they made the land at a point where there were no inhabitants. Three of the men walked overland to George's Bay, where the ship was expected to be found, and joined her. This took them about a week, and they were on the sick list after their arrival. The fourth mate and the remaining two men, of whom the libellant was one, went in the boat to Vasse, the nearest port, which was about two hundred and fifty miles from George's Bay by water, and was the only port they could make with the wind they had. The master's next cruise took him within about one hundred miles of Vasse, and he would have gone in there for the boat and the men, but that the wind was ahead and blowing hard, and he thought it would take too much time to wait for a change of wind. The libel set up that the master neglected his duty in not calling for the libellant at Vasse. The answer averred that the libellant deserted the ship.

C. T. Bonney, for libellant.

O. W. Clifford, for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. A case tried upon depositions, taken four years after the events occurred upon which the dispute arises, is not in the most satisfactory position for clearing up doubtful constructions of conduct. I think the preponderance of the evidence is, that the fourth mate, and the two men with him, not only did not desert the ship, but were not understood to have deserted her. The master knew where they were before he was told, which is pretty good evidence that they were in the right place. He knew they would be there when he called for them, and intended to call. He says he received a letter from the consul at Vasse, promising to detain the boat until he came. But the letter is not produced; and there is not the least reason to believe that the men had any intention of leaving Vasse or removing the boat. They remained there for several weeks after the ship had left them behind. The master does not testify that he entered the mate and men as deserters on his log-book, or reported them as such to the nearest consul, or to the authorities at home; all which he was bound to do, if he believed the truth to be so. Neither the log-book nor the copy of the articles that was on board the ship is produced. I do not know when he considers them to have deserted. Certainly not when they determined to stay by the valuable whaleboat and gear, rather than to take the chances of a week's journey overland in an unknown country. What were they to do? They could not stay in the uninhabited spot, where they first landed, without starving to death. Three of them tried the overland journey, and three sought the nearest and only available port. The former were the more fortunate; but I do not know that their course was more reasonable at the time it was undertaken.

It is clear to a reasonable intent that the ship deserted the men, and not the men the ship. Then the question remains whether this was such a breach of duty or contract on the part of the master as will entitle the libellant to damages. I am disposed to believe that the master decided this matter according to his best judgment. He had no interest to leave the boat or the men behind him; and I may well assume that his decision was in accordance with the interests he was bound to consult. In this I follow the same rule that I have applied to the conduct of the fourth mate, when he determined to make sail to Vasse, instead of leaving his whaleboat upon the beach, and going overland to George's Bay. It was not a case in which humanity required that the men should be rescued at all hazards. They were in a country where they could take care of themselves, and had some opportunities to obtain employment and a passage home, though such opportunities do not appear to have been very frequent. At all events, they did not apply for relief to the consul, or the person who acted as such. What are the rights of the parties in such a state of things? By the articles an officer or man who is prevented by sickness or death from performing the whole voyage is to have his lay in the proportion which the time he served bears to the whole length of the voyage. This has often been held to be a reasonable stipulation. The same rule was adopted by Judge Sprague, where a minor justifiably but voluntarily left a whaling-ship in a foreign port. Lovrein v. Thompson, [Case No. 8,557.] Where two seamen, on occasion of a collision, induced by sudden and reasonable fear, jumped on board the colliding vessel, and the master of their ship was unable to lie by for them, it was held that they had earned wages to the time of their separation from the vessel. Hanson v. Rowell, [Case No. 6,043.] In that case the judge said, that if the master had left them on board the foreign ship, without sufficient excuse, they should have had wages for the whole voyage.

This case does not seem to be precisely covered by either of these decisions. The men, in my opinion, failed to rejoin the ship, not only justifiably, but by a sort of compulsion. I do not find in the evidence, what I understand to be argued, that a vessel sailed from Vasse to George's Bay while the men were waiting at the former place, and that by not taking passage in her they neglected a known opportunity to rejoin the Mermaid. If the fact is so, it is not proved. As the case stands, the question was, whether the three men should undertake the voyage to George's Bay in their whale-boat, or wait for the ship to pick them up; and both parties acted on the supposition that the ship would call at Vasse, as she might easily do under ordinary circumstances. Notwithstanding these differences, the case is very like many in which the sickness of a seaman requires him to be left behind without any fault of his own, and he cannot rejoin the ship, though, if the master could wait a day or two, he might resume duty. In such a case the owners are bound to pay the expenses of the seaman's return to his own country. Brunent v. Taber, [Id. 2,054.] This return of seamen is a policy very deeply ingrained in our commercial law, and is fairly applicable to a case of this kind. In this case, however, there is the circumstance that the fourth mate found himself in possession of a boat and its equipments, which the master values at $230. After he had been left at Vasse, he sold these things for some price not known to the libellant, and out of the money he appears to have paid the board of himself and the other men. This, perhaps, ought to be considered an equivalent for the passage money, in the absence of evidence of what the expenses were or the passage money would have been.

Then comes the question of the libellant's clothes. The master sold them by auction to the other men, according to a usage which has, I suppose, been of long standing in these voyages, in cases of death or desertion. By the shipping act, passed after the time of these transactions, a master is authorized to sell, in this mode, any clothes or effects of a seaman dying during the voyage. Act June 7, 1872, § 43, (17 Stat. 271.) Following out the analogy of an involuntary breaking up of the service, the master would seem to have adopted a justifiable course in disposing of the libellant's effects by auction. The amount realized seems small; and if there were reasons to suppose that any error could be shown in the account, or any negligence in keeping the goods, I should be disposed to permit an inquiry upon these matters. As the evidence stands, I find myself authorized to decree only the sum received, with interest, which in all is thirty-three dollars. I understand it to be admitted that the libellant had been paid more than his lay would be for the eight months of his service. Decree for the libellant for $33 and costs.

Case No. 494.ANTRIM v. KELLY.

[4 N. B. R. 587, (Quarto, 189.)]

District Court, E. D. Missouri.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—INDEBTEDNESS OF GRANTOR.

[A voluntary settlement upon his wife and children, made by a member of a firm financially embarrassed, may be set aside as fraudulent, although the debts of the firm existing at the time were subsequently paid in due course of business, where they were met by contracting other obligations, which resulted in bankruptcy.]

[Cited in Spaulding v. McGovern, Case No. 13,218.]

[In equity. Suit by the assignee in bankruptcy of the firm of Antrim, Sweet & Co., against Kelly, as trustee, and the wife and children of the bankrupt, Antrim, to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance made by Antrim to Kelly in trust for the wife and children of Antrim.]

It appeared that the firm of Antrim, Sweet & Co. had procured an extension of a part of their commercial paper for 60 or 90 days; that thereafter on May 15, 1867, Antrim, who owned real estate valued at $60,000, part of which was incumbered to the amount of $18,000 by deeds of trust made to raise money for the firm, conveyed part thereof valued at $20,000 to Kelly in trust for his wife and children. The firm met their suspended paper at maturity and all other debts until July 28, 1868, when they filed their petition in bankruptcy. The assignee brought suit to set aside the settlement, which the defendants alleged was executed when Antrim was solvent, and in fulfillment of a promise made when he purchased the property and before he went into business. Under the Missouri statutes a voluntary conveyance duly recorded, unless made with intent to defraud creditors, is valid as against subsequent purchasers and creditors.

THE COURT held that, since the obligations of the firm were met by assuming other obligations which resulted in bankruptcy, the conveyance should be set aside as a fraud on subsequent creditors, as it took away a large proportion of assets which should be applied to creditor's claims.

Case No. 495.ANTRIM'S CASE.

[20 Leg. Int. 300; 5 Phila. 278; 11 Pittsb. Leg. J. 49.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 9, 1863.

WAR—MILITARY DUTY—EXEMPTION—FINAL DECISION BY BOARD—CONCLUSIVENESS—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1863

1. A statute which, in relation to summary proceedings before a military commission, en-

¹[Reprinted from 20 Leg. Int. 300, by permission.]

acts that its decision shall be final, does not necessarily make the decision conclusive as to the right which was in question.

2. The provisions of the 14th section of the act of congress of March 3, 1863, c. 75, [12 Stat. 733.] requiring the presentation, by drafted persons, of all claims of exemption to the board of enrolment, and making the board's decision final, do not, in the case of an exempt whose claim of exemption has been duly presented to the board and disallowed, preclude the subsequent consideration, under a writ of habeas corpus, of the question of his right of exemption.

3. Quere: Whether the question will be considered under such a writ at the instance of a party, who, having had proper notice and opportunity, has not presented his claim of exemption to the board, or has failed to comply with its reasonable regulations, of which he has had proper notice, or of a party who, after a rejection of such claim, and full subsequent time and opportunity to obtain an unobstructed judicial investigation of the question of alleged right, neglects to apply for the writ until after he has been mustered into military service.

On habeas corpus.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The provost marshal of the proper district returns to the habeas corpus that the petitioner was duly drafted and notified; appeared before the board of enrolment asking exemption as the only son of a widow dependent on his labor for support, [see 2 Stat. 731, § 2;] was duly heard upon his allegation and evidence, and that his claim of exemption was finally disallowed; that he subsequently appeared and reported himself for duty; received his uniform; asked and obtained leave of absence for a time not quite expired when the return was made; and, though not in the respondent's actual custody, was still under his control.

No question as to the effect of the occurrences posterior to the disallowance of the claim of exemption is properly raised by this return. These occurrences are not so stated in it that a traverse of them is necessary. Whether proof of them will ultimately be receivable against the petitioner, if proofs on his part of his alleged right shall have been admitted in the first instance, may be a question to arise hereafter. In the meantime, the question of the sufficiency of such a statement of these occurrences in a return is different. As acts of mere submission to military authority, where obedience would have been compellable, they can add nothing to the effect otherwise attributable to the decision of the board. His temporary acquiescence in it was no waiver of right. But, if the occurrences are mentioned for the purpose of showing that, notwithstanding his previous claim of exemption, he afterwards waived any right of exemption that he may have had, so as voluntarily to become a soldier under the draft, the voluntary waiver should have been directly averred. In a return, a statement of occurrences merely tending, more or less, to prove such a fact, is not of equivalent effect. Sometimes, indeed, a fact consists of a series of connected, or mutually dependent, occurrences. They may then be stated in detail. But such a specification of the details of a fact is different from a mere specification of evidence, tending to prove it. The proposition or fact relied on, whether stated in detail or in that general form which is ordinarily more proper, should be set forth substantively so that the statement, if true, shall absolutely suffice in law. The occurrences mentioned in this latter part of the return, under the most favorable view of it, may or may not, independently of those previously stated, suffice to establish a waiver of right. This part of the return, therefore, does not require a traverse. The objections to it might not apply to returns properly framed in order to meet cases of drafted men who, after proper notice, have omitted to appear before the board and claim exemption, or of those appearing and claiming it, but omitting to comply with proper regulations of the board, of which sufficient information has been given. To cases of drafted men who, after the board's disallowance of their claims of exemption, have had fair time and opportunity to obtain elsewhere the judicial investigation of their alleged rights of exemption, and have not availed themselves of such opportunity, returns might perhaps be so adapted as to prevent unnecessary judicial interference with consummated military organizations embracing such parties.

The question upon the return is whether the military board's disallowance of the claim of exemption must be traversed; in other words, whether this board's decision that there was no right of exemption precludes inquiry here as to the existence of the right. This question depends upon the effect of the fourteenth section of the act of 3d March, 1863, c. 75, which enacts "that all persons drafted and claiming exemption from military duty on account of disability or any other cause, shall present their claims to be exempted to the board, whose decision shall be final." [Section 14, 12 Stat. 733.] Cognizance of the application for exemption, if taken, must be judicial, however special the jurisdiction or summary the proceeding. The point in question is whether the decision is or is not conclusive elsewhere as to the right of exemption. This depends on the effect of the word final. It certainly imports that the decision of the board shall not undergo executive or other revision. The decision is, relatively to military jurisdiction, conclusive as well as final. Therefore a decision of the board in favor of the claim of exemption, is necessarily conclusive as to the right of exemption. The question will be whether the effect of the words should be extended so as to make a decision against the claim equally conclusive against the right. The consideration of this question will involve the inquiry whether an enactment that the decision of such a tribunal shall be thus conclusive, would be constitutional.

The act of 3d March, 1863, has provided for the organization of an exclusively national military force by enrolment, draft, and, where necessary, impressment; that is to say, compulsion to serve. The words of this act, which might otherwise be of doubtful import, must be interpreted so that usurpation of power, beyond the legislative authority conferred by the constitution, may not be unnecessarily imputed to congress. The case has been commendably argued on this point, upon the words of the constitution and of the statute, without any such references to congressional debates, or to debates of those who drafted the constitution, or of those who proposed or discussed its early amendment, as, of late, have, perhaps, been too frequent. Such references to extrinsic matter, it is true, are not always improper. They are sometimes of legal assistance in explaining the meaning of words which are to be interpreted. This meaning may depend upon some relation of the words to occurrences of which historical memorials are preserved in the reports of cotemporaneous discussions. Where, moreover, the meaning of a word is doubtful, or has undergone change since the date of its use, the language of such discussions may sometimes serve, in some degree, the purpose of a glossary. Such cases are, however, not exceptions from, but, on the contrary, exemplify the rule that the intention is ascertainable from the words only. Under this rule, the proper inquiry is, not what may, from extrinsic sources, appear to have been intended by the men whose words are in question, but what was the legal meaning and application of the words when used. The rule applies where a single person has been the lawgiver, and with greater force of reason where a numerous assembly has made a law; and is applicable especially to the constitution of the United States and the amendments. This constitution was, when finished by its framers, as Ch. J. Marshall said, "a mere proposal without obligation or pretension to it." [M'Culloch v. State of Maryland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 404. We read in the subsequent proposal by the first congress, of amendments that the conventions of a number of the states had, in adopting the constitution, expressed a desire for "declaratory and restrictive" additions, (1 Stat. 97); and Ch. J. Marshall has reminded us that almost every convention had recommended such amendments. [Barron v. Mayor, etc., of Baltimore,] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 250. The omission to specify which amendments were declaratory and which restrictive enabled persons who differed most widely in opinion as to the effect of the original constitution to concur in adopting ten of the series of amendments proposed. Otherwise they would not have been adopted. The hope of reconciling the differences of opinion was in future judicial decision upon the constitution and amendments without any consideration of extrinsic matters. The powers conferred by the constitution upon congress to raise and support armies, and make rules for their government, are distinct from the powers which are conferred in it as to the militia of the respective states. Until the act in question, the national armies had been raised by voluntary enlistment. The system of enrolment and draft had long been matured as to the militia of the states. But, until the summer of 1862, the utmost penalty for not serving when drafted from such militia for the service of the United States had been pecuniary, with a limited imprisonment for non-payment. The act of congress of 17th July, 1862, [12 Stat. 597,] authorized impressment into the military service of the United States of those persons drafted from the militia under that act, who, when ordered to attend at the place of muster, disobeyed. The specific power of impressment had not been previously conferred. But, under the former system, though the fine for not serving had, when received, been considered an equivalent for service, the payment had nevertheless been enforced, or the penalty of imprisonment inflicted by courts-martial, when the money was not otherwise collected. The constitutionality of this former jurisdiction of courts-martial may be considered established. Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1. It would not have been constitutional if disobedience to attend at a place of muster had not been a military offence. Congress, unless it had the power of absolutely subjecting a drafted person to military rule from the time of the draft, could not have thus made his disobedience before he was mustered into service a military offence. The act of congress of 1795, [1 Stat. 424, § 4,] which fixed the time of arrival at the place of rendezvous as the period of the commencement of the military service, might, constitutionally, in the opinion of the supreme court, have made the time of draft the period. [Houston v. Moore,] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 17. The constitutionality of the act of 17th July, 1862, when the question was considered here in March last, in M'Call's Case, [Case No. 8,669,] appeared, therefore, to be established by authority. If the question had been thought an open one, the same view of the effect of the constitution would have been taken.

The act of 3d March, 1863, has adopted a like system, on an extended scale, for the purpose of raising national armies independently of the militia of the states. Under the former laws which have been mentioned, a question such as that now under consideration could not arise. The question under those laws could only have been that of a military court's exercise of jurisdiction over a person who, having been lawfully drafted, already owed military service. There could not have been any dispute that the primary question whether he had been lawfully drafted or was liable to serve, was open to decision by the ordinary tribunals under a writ of habeas corpus. Here, however, the question is whether a military commission can so decide the original question of liability to serve, as absolutely to deprive all other tribunals of cognizance of it.

The enactments of the law in question are not so arranged that its provisions for the preparatory enrolment, and those for the draft, are always separated. They must, however, be kept distinct when they are considered with reference to the constitution. The most unlimited system of mere enrolment could not be constitutionally objectionable; but a system of drafting might be arbitrary and latitudinarian to such an extent as to encroach upon constitutional rights. That the framers of the constitution had inherited the parent nation's jealousy of the power to raise and support armies, appears from the prohibition to appropriate money to that use for a longer term than two years. The constitutional authority to enact the law which is under consideration was derived exclusively from this power to raise armies. It cannot be enlarged under the authority which the constitution also confers to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying the powers delegated, this one included, into execution. This incidental authority cannot extend beyond the limits of the principal power. A government previously republican, whose armies are, upon executive requisition, to be raised under a system of draft and impressment, administered without any restriction as to persons liable to serve, and without any limitation of the time of service, may, at the will of the chief executive magistrate, become an established military government. The constitution guaranties to every state a republican form of government. The supreme court have said that a military government, permanently established in a state, would not be republican, and that "it would be the duty of congress to overthrow it." [Luther v. Borden,] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 45. Congress, of course, could not establish such a government for the whole country.

The general provisions of the act are not unconstitutional. Those who are liable to do military duty under it are, in the first instance, described as all able-bodied male citizens, and persons of foreign birth who have duly declared their intentions to become citizens, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, except persons rejected as physically or mentally unfit, and those exempted under seven other enumerated heads; the first including designated magistrates and other principal officers of the United States, and the others including respectively the private persons, whose rights of exemption are specified. One of them is the only son liable to military duty of a widow dependent upon his labor for support. No persons not thus excepted are to be exempt; but no person convicted of any felony can be enrolled or permitted to serve. The preparatory enrolment is biennial, to be made in the present year, and hereafter in each alternate year, and to embrace those only whose ages will be, on the first of July in every year in which it is made, between twenty and forty-five years. They are to be enrolled in two separate classes, the first comprising all between the ages of twenty and thirty-five years, and all who are above the age of thirty-five and unmarried; the second class comprising all other persons liable to do military duty; and those in the second class are not, in any district, to be called into service until those of the first class shall have been called. All persons thus enrolled are subject for two years after the first of July succeeding the enrolment, to be called into military service, and to continue in it during the present rebellion, not, however, exceeding the term of three years. The president is authorized, whenever it may be necessary to call them out for such service, to assign to every enrolment district its quota of men to be furnished. In doing so, he is to take into consideration the number of volunteers and militia furnished by and from the respective states, and the period of their service since the commencement of the rebellion, and is to equalize the respective quotas by allowing for the numbers thus already furnished, and the time of their service. Upon such requisition of the president a draft is to be made, under his direction, of the required number, and fifty per cent. in addition. A roll of the names thus drawn, upon which they are to stand in the order in which drafted, is then to be made. The persons drafted are to be notified within ten days thereafter, and required to report at the rendezvous for duty. Provision is made for the acceptance of substitutes, and for the receipt of such commutation money as exempts those paying it, and enables the secretary of war to procure substitutes for them. Provision is also made for the hearing and decision of claims of exemption; and it is enacted "that as soon as the required number of able-bodied men liable to do military duty shall be obtained from the list of those drafted, the remainder shall be discharged."

This review of the principal enactments of the law suffices to indicate its general purposes. The organization of armies under it is to cease on the termination of the civil war for whose exigencies it provides; and the term of service of those drafted under it cannot exceed three years, though the war should continue longer. Such limitations of the time would have prevented the compulsory requirement of military service from being unconstitutional, though it had included every able-bodied male inhabitant. The administrative regulations of the law will next be considered.

The commission appointed for every enrolment district to execute the provisions of the act is designated in one section of it as the enrolling board, and in other sections as the board of enrolment. Biennial primary rolls, made by subordinate officers in the respective districts and sub-districts, having been reported to the board, are biennially consolidated into one list for each district. Of this list a copy is transmitted to the provost marshal general. The designation of the commission as the board of enrolment is referable not merely to these two stages of that preparatory enrolment, but also to the subsequent roll of the persons who have been drafted. This roll of drafted persons the board is required to make. The word enrolment, when used without any qualification, is, however, ordinarily understood as applicable only to the preparatory enrolment which must precede any draft.

The provisions of the 14th section, requiring the presentation of all claims of exemption to the board, and making its decision final, have been quoted. They do not apply to such a case of a person improperly drafted as depends neither upon a question of disability, nor upon one of exemption for any other specified cause. This opinion was acted upon in the Cases of Stingle and of Robinson. Stingle was drafted as enrolled in the first class. He alleged that he belonged to the second, which is composed of persons not exempt, but not as yet liable to be called into service. Robinson was a person liable to enrolment in the first class. But on the enrolment from which he was drafted, his name and occupation were entered incorrectly. The decisions of the respective boards of enrolment had been that these parties were liable to serve. Both cases were very fully argued, as the present case has also been. Stingle has been allowed to adduce proofs in support of his allegation that he was improperly enrolled in the first class. Robinson has been discharged from military restraint. The same decision was made in Tilghman's Case, where a resident of one sub-district, when sojourning in another, had been enrolled and drafted in the latter. These decisions do not affect the present question otherwise than as they may circumscribe it within ascertained limits.

Executive instructions and regulations have been greatly multiplied under authorities conferred by this act, and under assumed authorities which it has not conferred. These executive mandates, where authorized, have doubtless promoted various useful purposes, including that of securing a desirable uniformity throughout the United States, in the course and modes of proceeding under the act. The sixth section requires "the provost marshal general, with the approval of the secretary of war, to make rules and regulations for the government of his subordinates," and perform other specified acts; among them, "to furnish proper blanks and instructions for enrolling and drafting." Under these two heads of enrolling and drafting, including their administrative incidents, executive instructions conformable to the purposes of the act, and to the provisions of the sixth section, are not less binding than if they had been contained in the act. But some of the executive instructions have, without any warrant in the act, assumed to regulate the exercise of the board of enrolment's duties as to applications for exemption under the fourteenth section. The exercise of this jurisdiction should be independent of regulation or other interference or supervision by any executive department of the government. Instructions of the latter kind, therefore, can have no imperative effect. This remark applies to the instructions which assume to regulate the practical course of proceeding of the board; and applies with greater force to those which assume to furnish rules for its decision upon questions of exemption. Some or all of these instructions which apply merely to the course of proceeding may, nevertheless, have been reasonably and properly adopted by the respective boards of enrolment as their own rule of their procedure; and, through such adoption may, after proper notice to parties appearing to claim exemption, have become regulations observable by such parties.

This independence of executive supervision or interference is neither less nor greater than that of an ordinary court-martial after its organization, and before its finding or sentence. Such independence does not prevent the board of enrolment, even when administering its jurisdiction, under the fourteenth section, from being a mere military commission. Its president is the provost marshal of the district, whose rank, pay and emoluments are those of a captain of cavalry, and who may, under the act, be an officer of this rank specially detailed. That such an officer may be thus detailed as a member, is conclusive as to the military character of the commission. The other members are the surgeon, who is also required by the act to inspect the drafted men at the rendezvous, and report on their physical condition; and a third person who, in another act of congress, passed on the same day (chapter 79, § 5) is called a "citizen at large." Under the latter act, the compensation of these two members of the board is that of an assistant surgeon of the army. Under a subsequent executive regulation, all the members of the board receive their dues through the pay department of the army. The powers conferred on the board would have been exercisable with precisely the same legal effect as if congress had conferred them upon any officer of the army who might be from time to time specially detailed as a sole commissioner.

The requirement in the fourteenth section that all claims of exemption should be made before such local military commission is reasonable and convenient. Non-compliance with such a salutary provision, and with reasonable regulations made by such commissioners for carrying it into execution, might perhaps preclude such an inquiry as the petitioner now asks. But he has fulfilled the statutory condition; and the question recurs whether the additional enactment in the fourteenth section that the decision of the military commission shall be final has precluded inquiry here as to his right which was in question before the board.

To the board's independence of supervision, which resembles that of ordinary courts-martial, this enactment adds an independence of such executive revision as the proceedings of courts-martial and of other military commissions ordinarily undergo. Their findings and sentences do not ordinarily take effect, even provisionally, till after such revision. The exigency of a legal application for the word final is fulfilled when it is understood as meaning not subject to such executive revision. This makes it conclusive so far as military jurisdiction can properly extend. But even the word conclusive, if it had been superadded in the act, would, perhaps, not have made a decision against the claim conclusive against the right. [Clarke v. Patterson,] 6 Bin. 128. See [Mussina v. Hertzog,] 5 Bin. 387; [Wilson v. Young,] 9 Pa. St. 102. Upon the word final the question is more simple. There is no doubt that a decision may, relatively to the proceeding in which it was made, be final, and yet not conclusive elsewhere as to the right which was in question. See [Weston v. City Council of Charleston,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 463; [Galbraith v. Black,] 4 Serg. & R. 211, 212. This remark is applicable especially to such summary proceedings under a special jurisdiction as are those of this board.

The meaning of the word "final" in this enactment must, of course, be thus qualified, if its effect would otherwise be unconstitutional. The argument that it would have been constitutional is that it would have been so if no exemption from military service had been specified in the act; that the exemptions specified were therefore not of right; that an army might constitutionally have been raised, not by draft or lot, but by selection; that a power of absolute selection might therefore have been directly conferred upon commissioners or a commissioner; and that the exemption in question, being consequently of mere grace, can be claimed only in the mode and under the conditions imposed. This argument, if analyzed, will appear not to meet the constitutional difficulty.

The privilege of exemption is not the less of right because it has been legislatively conferred, or because it might have been altogether withheld. The mere form of the legislative enactment through which the immunity was obtained is, in this respect, immaterial. The right is conferred in the law by way of exception from a general enactment. This form of legislation, whatever opinion the lawgivers may possibly have entertained, cannot affect the substantive character of the right, and therefore cannot affect the question of constitutional power. As to privileges or immunities enjoyed through legislation, powers of government must be administered constitutionally, and their execution must be regulated in due subservience to judicial authority, exercisable through the proper organs. No power, otherwise unconstitutional, can, as qualifying rights, privileges or immunities, legislatively conferred or vested, acquire validity through any legislative annexation, express or implied, of a condition to their enjoyment. Such a condition as would abrogate, or abridge, the effect of a constitutional provision as to the judicial power cannot be implied from any phraseology of the act in question.

If armies may constitutionally be raised by selection, as distinguished from lot, the proposition is immaterial, because, under such a system, the power of selection would be executive, and not like that in question, which is judicial. If such a power should ever be conferred by congress, its definite character, the prescribed methods of its exercise, the official character of those exercising it, and the method of their appointment, might become subjects of judicial consideration. Congress cannot constitutionally delegate its own powers; but may confer executive and judicial powers upon those respectively who are, according to the constitution, qualified for their exercise. Those qualified, except a single class, must be such officers as are nominated to the senate, and appointed with its consent. Those of the excepted class are designated as inferior officers. Their capacities must necessarily be tested and limited in every case, with special relation to authorities which are, according to the distribution of the powers of government, superior. In the distribution of the judicial power, congress may establish inferior courts. But judges of such courts are not in the class of those inferior officers who can be appointed or designated without reference to the senate. Therefore, independent judicial powers could not be vested by congress in such a commission as the board of enrolment unless it is regarded as a tribunal simply military. Thus regarded, it can have no jurisdiction except over persons who are already under military rule. Whether a person is or is not under such rule is a question which a military tribunal may often have occasion to consider, and, so far as may concern its own proceedings, to decide. The tribunal may or may not be so organized that its decision of such a question is, relatively to military jurisdiction, final. But an act of congress making such a decision as to the status of a citizen final, in such a sense as to preclude altogether judicial cognizance elsewhere of the question, would not be constitutional. Such a law, if thus executed, would confer a judicial power not warranted by the constitution. Congress cannot give to such a mere military commission, or to a simple court-martial, any jurisdiction over a person who is neither in military service, nor locally amenable to the military police of a territorial space properly occupied for military purposes. Nor can congress confer upon such a special tribunal the power of conclusive adjudication, whether a case is within its own jurisdiction.

An argument in support of the return has been that, as to persons drafted under this act, the fourteenth section may, at a time like this, of rebellion, take effect constitutionally by suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. If this had been the intention of congress, it might have been simply, and would doubtless have been directly, expressed. An intention to frustrate a right by indirectly suspending a remedy, is not imputable to congress. Moreover, such legislation would not well comport with another act passed on the same day, authorizing, during the rebellion, the suspension of this privilege by the president, but requiring a sworn return of a detention in custody under his authority. The question of right is dependent more, perhaps, upon the amendments to the constitution than upon that provision of the original instrument which restricts the power to suspend this privilege. If the point were attended with any difficulty, the amendments might, in this respect, require full consideration. But I do not think it necessary. The return does not require a traverse.

=====
 APEGUES, Ex parte. See Case No. 10,907.
 APLINGTON, (BARRETT v.) See Case No. 1,045.
 =====

Case No. 496.

APOLLINARIS BRUNNEN v. SOMBORN.

[14 Blatchf. 380.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 16, 1878.

TRADE-MARKS—ARBITRARY WORDS—INFRINGEMENT.

The use, on labels and bottles, of the word Apollinis, in connection with the representation of a bow and arrow or anchor, was restrained, by preliminary injunction, on account of the similarity between them and the word Apollinaris and the representation of an anchor.

[Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

as before used by the plaintiff, as being calculated and designed to induce the supposition, by users and dealers, that the waters of the defendant, so marked, were the waters of the plaintiff; but the plaintiff was ordered to give a bond to pay all damages to the defendant, if it should be finally determined that the plaintiff is not entitled to the injunction.

[Cited in Glen Cove Manuf'g Co. v. Ludeling, 22 Fed. 826.]

[See McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245; Carbolic Soap Co. v. Thompson, 25 Fed. 625; Hostetter v. Vowinkle, Case No. 6,714.]

In equity.

Rowland Cox, for plaintiff.

Edward T. Bartlett, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. Upon the hearing of the motion of the orator for a preliminary injunction in this cause, it is considered, that the use, by the defendants, on their labels and bottles, of the word "Apollinis," in connection with the representation of a bow and arrow, or anchor, as used by them, on account of the similarity between them and the word "Apollinaris" and the representation of an anchor, as before used by the orator, is calculated to lead those using and dealing in such waters, to suppose that the waters of the defendants, so marked, are the waters of the orator; and, as there is no other reason apparent, that the use of these symbols was adopted for that purpose. Wherefore, it is ordered, that, upon the filing a bond to the defendants, in such penal sum as shall be fixed by the clerk, as a master of this court, with good surety approved by him, conditioned for the payment of all damages to the defendants, in case it shall finally be determined, in this cause, that the orator is not entitled to this injunction, a writ of injunction do issue, to restrain the defendants from the further use of the word "Apollinis," and such representation of an anchor, or bow and arrow, in connection with the sale of their waters, until further order in the premises.

APPEAL OF.

[Note. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the names of the appellants.]

APPEL, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,462.

Case No. 497.

APPERSON et al. v. CITY OF MEMPHIS et al.

[2 Flip. 363.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. March 31, 1879.

POWER OF THE FEDERAL COURT — LOCAL LAW — MANDAMUS — STATE COURT — CONSTRUCTION OF "MAY" AND "SHALL" — LAWS IMPOSING TAXES TO BE UNIFORM — SET-OFF.

1. This court has power to so control its process as not to violate the local law, and to prevent injustice to the tax-payer.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The state court can make no order or decree which shall interfere directly or indirectly with a mandamus issued from this court. This court not only has the power to pass upon all questions connected incidentally with the collection of the tax, (in question) but it is its duty to exercise that power in such a way as that no property justly subject to its burden shall escape liability, and that those who have honestly paid their obligations shall, as far as possible, be protected.

[See U. S. v. City of Memphis, 97 U. S. 284.]

3. The word "may" is not to be construed in all cases as "shall." The ordinary meaning of the language used in legislative acts must be presumed to be intended, unless it would manifestly defeat the object of the provisions.

[See Thompson v. Roe, 22 How. (63 U. S.) 434.]

4. While laws imposing taxes are required to be uniform, it is no objection to a tax that there is a want of uniformity in its application.

5. The general law is well settled that no set-off is admissible against demands for taxes, as they are not in the nature of contracts between party and party, but are the positive acts of the government through its various agents, binding upon the inhabitants, and to the making and enforcing of which their personal consent individually is not required. The fact that persons complaining were not parties to a suit out of which orders grew upon them to pay taxes, affords no ground to set such orders aside as to them.

[See U. S. v. Pacific Railroad, Case No. 15,983.]

6. It would seem that where the judgment on which a mandamus is founded has been reversed, the mandamus would fall also.

In equity. Demurrer to bill, which prayed for an injunction against the collection of a tax.

Statement of Bill.

Complainants [Edward M. Apperson and others] are citizens of Shelby county, Tennessee, and property owners and tax-payers of the city of Memphis. Defendant Brown is a citizen of Iowa, and Rawlings and Shaper are tax collectors of the city of Memphis. By an act of the legislature passed November 24, 1866, the city of Memphis was empowered to lay Nicolson and stone pavement, etc., and to charge the entire cost of such improvements on the abutting property. By virtue of this act and in pursuance thereof, the city, by ordinance, provided for paving certain streets with Nicolson pavement and certain alleys with stone. Contracts were made by the city with certain firms to lay such pavements, and part of the work was done, when defendant Brown became the assignee of such contracts, and completed the work. In pursuance of the system adopted, bills were made out as the work progressed, against the owners of property abutting upon said improvements for the entire cost of the pavement to the center of the street in front of such lots, and payment thereof demanded of the owners. Under threats of suit complainants severally paid to Brown the entire cost of making said improvement in front of their several pieces of property, for which payment Brown gave receipts in full, as against them, for their part of such improvements. Most of the citizens whose property was on these paved streets, resisted this mode of collection and assessment, and refused to pay. Numerous bills were filed against such by Brown, which were resisted in the courts, and in 1872 the supreme court of Tennessee declared that the act of the legislature of November 24, 1866, pretending to authorize the city to make the assessment by frontage to pay the cost of the pavement, was unconstitutional and void. After this decision, Brown, by a suit in this court against the city of Memphis, on the thirteenth of March, 1872, recovered judgment against the city for $488,993 for said work, from which judgment the city took an appeal to the supreme court of the United States, but being unable to give a supersedeas bond, the judgment stood in force pending the appeal. Upon the hearing of the appeal in the supreme court, the decree of this court was reversed in part and the cause remanded to this court, in which, on the fifteenth of March, 1875, a new decree was rendered in the sum of $292,133.47.

By an act of the legislature passed on the 18th day of March, 1873, it was enacted that "where an incorporated town or city has, by virtue of presumed authority to levy special assessments for specific purposes, levied and collected taxes or special assessments, the right to make which special assessment was afterward declared void by the supreme court of the state, said town or city shall have power to levy a tax, in addition to all other taxes allowed by law to be levied, sufficient to cover the entire cost of the improvement, with interest thereon, for which said special assessments were illegally made. And in the levying of such additional tax authority is hereby given to such town or city to allow as valid payments on such additional tax any sum or sums, with interest, paid by persons in satisfaction, or in part satisfaction, of said special assessments illegally levied and collected as aforesaid." After the passage of this act, on the 24th of June, 1873, a writ of mandamus was granted against the city, commanding it to levy a tax to pay Brown's then existing judgment of $488,993, the city having taken an appeal without a supersedeas. This was the first mandamus, and was predicated upon the aforesaid act of 1873. In pursuance of this act, the general council of the city of Memphis passed an ordinance to provide for the issuance of certificates of indebtedness to all persons who had paid assessments, which certificates provided upon their face that they should be receivable in payment of any tax levied to cover the entire cost of the Nicolson pavement. In pursuance of this mandamus of June 24, 1873, the city of Memphis levied a tax of seventy cents on each one hundred dollars worth of taxable property to pay Brown's said judgment. For 1874, without mandamus, the city levied a tax of thirty cents, for the same judgment, voluntarily, upon all the taxable property of the city, including the property of these complainants, and sought to collect the same in money. On the 22d of March, 1875, the act of March 18, 1873, was repealed, and upon the same day Brown filed in this court a petition for an alternative mandamus against the city, claiming a balance of $292,133.47, found to be due him by the decree of March 15, 1875, and praying that the city be required to levy a tax each year, for '75, '76 and '77, sufficient, after allowing for errors, delinquencies, insolvencies and defaults, to realize $125,000 each year. The answer of the city was filed, and on the 28th of June, 1875, a peremptory mandamus was issued. On the 9th of February, 1876, the city filed a return to the peremptory writ, presenting sundry excuses for not promptly obeying such writ, and submitting certain legal questions to the court for its decision, for its own guidance in levying a tax. Among other questions were the following: First. Whether those lots upon which the frontage tax had been paid were exempt? Second. Whether the ninth and tenth wards, which had been taken into the city after the contracts with Brown's assignors, were exempt? Third. Whether the capital of merchants should be included in the levy as subject to such tax? On March 2, 1876, upon due consideration of the matter set forth in said return of February 9, and the affidavit of Brown filed upon March 1st, the court adjudged the ninth and tenth wards and the property upon which the assessments had been paid, exempt, but held the merchants' capital liable, and ordered an alias writ, commanding a levy of an additional tax, sufficient, excluding the exempted property, to pay the residue of Brown's judgment. From these orders appeals were taken to the supreme court of the United States, where such orders were afterward affirmed and are still in force.

The bill of complainants now filed, sets forth that they are the owners of lots in front of which pavements were laid and the cost thereof paid to Brown and for such sums, thus collected, Brown gave receipts in full satisfaction of the cost of the pavement in front of the lots designated. It claims that, independently of the judgment of March 2, 1876, in the mandamus proceedings, Brown is estopped from demanding additional tax on said property. The frontage tax was necessarily larger than the pro rata share of the particular property would be in a general tax, because, by the frontage tax, the whole cost of the pavement was imposed on a small portion of the property in the city, while a general tax would cover the whole; hence, in any contingency, those who paid the frontage tax have paid more than their just share of the entire cost of the pavement. The bill further claims that the act of March 24, 1873, was the only authority granted by the legislature to the city to levy a tax for the payment of the cost of the pavement, and that under this act the power granted was to levy a tax sufficient to cover the entire cost of the pavement, with interest thereon, and coupled with this power, was also the authority and duty to allow, as valid payments on such additional tax, any sums with interest, paid by persons in satisfaction of such special assessments illegally levied and collected. To the mandamus proceedings none of these complainants were parties, and hence are not estopped by the judgment to deny the liability of their property. It is charged that in pursuance of the act of 1873, the city took steps, by ordinance, to issue certificates, and to protect those who had paid frontage tax from further taxation; but in spite of this the collectors are claiming to collect again this tax from the complainants, and they are instigated thereto by the demands and threats of Brown. For 1876, the city, in conformity to the judgment of this court of March 2, considered the ninth and tenth wards, and the property which had paid the frontage tax assessment, as exempt; but as it was impracticable in making the tax books, to exclude this property, which was taxable for other purposes, the mandamus tax was put upon all the property without distinction, but the rate was fixed so high, that the amount to be realized in money would cover the amount demanded by the mandamus, after allowing those who had paid the frontage assessment to pay the tax on that particular property in Brown's receipts or paying certificates. Still the tax collectors are pressing the collection in money against the exempted property. The bill further sets forth that the city is insolvent; that the tax collectors, if not insolvent, have property of little value, and wholly inadequate to answer complainants' demands. That, by the laws of Tennessee, taxes are a lien upon property, and constitute a cloud upon complainants' lots, and unless restrained, such officer will proceed to sell the property for payment of taxes; that the attempt to collect such taxes, and especially the actings and doings of Brown, are a fraud upon the complainants and upon the court; that some of the complainants hold the receipts of Brown for the payment of the front foot assessments, and some of the scrip of the city, issued in exchange for his receipts. Complainants have tendered and offered to surrender a sufficient amount of such receipts and scrip to cover their respective taxes, and desire to enjoin the collection of all such taxes in money. Complainants pray that the city and its officers be enjoined from collecting from said complainants any part of the mandamus taxes on their property, described in the exhibits to the bill, and that the right of complainants to satisfy and discharge the mandamus tax, levied or to be levied, on any of their lands in the city, by the payment of said receipts or scrip to the amount of the money originally paid by each of them on frontage assessments, be declared and established.

To this bill Brown interposes a demurrer for want of equity upon the ground: First. That the front foot assessments paid by the complainants were voluntary payments, and the only remedy the complainants have for a recovery of the amount so paid is against the city. Second. That the act of March 18, 1873, under which the complainants claim the right to pay in Brown's receipts or scrip issued in exchange therefor, was repealed before the taxes complainants are seeking to enjoin were levied or ordered by the court to be levied. Third. That the decree of the state court in favor of Bethel and others, enjoining the collection of the taxes levied under the mandate of this court, was void for want of jurisdiction in the state court to pronounce the same, and cannot be relied upon as a ground of relief here. Fourth. That the constitution of Tennessee requires that all property shall be taxed, and that taxation shall be equal and uniform, and the fact that the tax is required to be levied, requires that it be levied upon and collected from the property of the complainants as well as others. Fifth. That the judgment of March, 1875, decided that all the questions made by the appeal adversely to the complainants, and this court cannot now make a decree inconsistent therewith. Sixth. That the taxes complainants here seek to be relieved from were not levied under the order of March 2, 1876, but under the judgment of March 30, 1875, and no right to relief from such taxes can be based on the order of March 26, 1876. Seventh. That the complainants have by law no right to set off claims due them by the city, against the taxes levied by the city under the mandate of this court. Eighth. If the complainants have any equity at all, such equity extends no further than to the particular piece of property owned by any complainant, on which the assessment by the front foot was in fact paid, and such equity is in no sense personal or restrictive of the personal obligation of the person who made the payment, and the bill does not show whether or not all the property on which the taxes sought to be enjoined have been levied is property on which the frontage assessments have been paid. Next, the bill shows that some of the property on which the taxes are sought to be enjoined was never assessed for the cost of the pavement.

Meriwether and Myers & Sneed, for complainants.

Wm. M. Randolph, for defendant Brown.

BROWN, District Judge. No doubt is entertained of the power of this court to control the execution of its process in such a manner that no local law be violated and no injustice be done to any particular taxpayer. Clearly no power exists in a state court to make any order or decree which shall interfere directly or indirectly with this mandamus, and unless the power is vested with us the tax-payer will be remediless. This was the view taken by the supreme court of Tennessee in Lea v. City of Memphis, [9 Baxt. 103,] by the supreme court of the United States, in City of Memphis v. Brown, [97 U. S. 300, affirming Case No. 9,415;] and also by Judge Emmons, in Brooks v. City of Memphis, [Case No. 1,954,] where the question of the taxability of merchants' capital for these assessments was fully considered. Not only has this court the power to pass upon all questions connected incidentally with the collection of this tax, but it is our duty to exercise that power in such a way that no property justly subject to its burden shall escape that liability, and that those who have honestly paid their obligations shall, as far as possible, be protected. Acting upon this theory, the order of March 2, 1876, was made, exempting the property upon which the assessment had been paid, and no reason is now perceived why that order should not apply to all writs of mandamus issued from this court for the collection of this tax, whether such writs were issued before or since the making of such. The payment of these assessments having been voluntary, perhaps it would be difficult to justify this order upon technical principles of law without trenching upon another maxim—that all taxation must be uniform. But without touching upon this question, the order was upheld by the supreme court upon the ground that it was exactly the order which Brown had asked for, and that he could not be heard to complain of it. The case certainly presented the strongest possible equities for the exemption of the property in question. But we are now asked to go further (and that is the main question in the case) and exempt not only the property upon which the front foot tax was paid, but all other property of the owner to the amount of Brown's receipts or the city scrip still in his hands, so far as there is a balance still remaining unapplied to the payment of the frontage assessment upon his paved lot. It is argued that the only authority to impose this tax is derived from the act of March 18, 1873, and that by this act, the city was required to allow as valid payments, any sums so paid in satisfaction of special assessments. It will be observed that this act did not in terms exempt such property from assessments, for that might have laid the tax open to the charge of want of uniformity. But it sought to bring about the same result by permitting Brown's receipts to be taken in payment. The act evidently contemplated that a tax should be laid sufficient to cover the entire cost of the improvement, including the amounts already paid by way of special assessments; in which case, the allowance of these amounts, so paid, would still leave enough to pay Brown the balance due him. Indeed, the certificates of indebtedness issued under the provisions of the ordinance of June 29, 1873, passed in accordance with the above act, provided upon their face that they should be receivable only in payment of any tax that might be levied by the city of Memphis to cover the entire cost of laying the said pavements. This course, however, was not pursued. A tax was laid sufficient simply to pay Brown the residue of his claim. Of course, he was entitled to payment in cash, and, if his receipts or city scrip were taken in liquidation of the amounts, he would realize little or nothing upon his rights. It is true, that where the course contemplated by the act was pursued, permission was given to allow the special assessments as payments, but I do not understand that the legislature absolutely required this to be done, or that the general council intended it to be done, unless a tax was laid sufficient to cover the entire cost of the improvement. It is not true that in all cases the word "may" must be construed as "shall." The principle adduced from the modern cases is that that exposition ought to be adopted in this case as in other cases, which carries into effect the true intent and object of the legislature in the enactment; the ordinary meaning of the language must be presumed to be intended, unless it would manifestly defeat the object of the provisions. Sedg. St. Lav., p. 439; Minor v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46, 64; Mason v. Fearson, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 248, 250. In this case, if the course marked out by the statute had been pursued, and a tax had been laid to cover the entire cost of the improvement, I should have found little difficulty in holding that the city was bound to credit the special assessments; but, where such construction would defeat the object of the writ, a different rule should be applied. This seems to have been the view adopted by Judge Trigg, in his opinion of August 23, 1877, enjoining the defendants Rawlings and Shaper from collecting anything but money in payment of this tax. While laws imposing taxation are required to be uniform, it is no objection to a tax that there is a want of uniformity in its application. For instance, a tax of twenty-five dollars is imposed upon all retail dealers in liquors. The tax is uniform, but it bears ten times heavier upon one who only does a business of a thousand dollars a year, than upon one whose sales amount to ten thousand dollars. "It is only where statutes are passed which impose taxation on false and unjust principles, or operate to produce gross inequality, so that they cannot be deemed in any sense proportionate in their effect on those who are to bear the public charges." Cooley, Tax'n, 127. In the imposition of taxes upon real estate great inequalities frequently occur in the assessment and valuation, beyond the reach of the legislature or courts. If the collection of these mandamus taxes could be so arranged that every tax-payer holding Brown's receipts or city scrip, could use them in payment, all would receive a like benefit; but, as has already been shown, this is now impracticable, owing to the fact that the tax was laid only sufficient to cover the balance due him upon his contracts. But to permit one to avail himself of this privilege, and to deny it to another, is to produce inequality rather than uniformity. To illustrate: A owns two lots; in front of one the pavement was laid and the assessment paid. In paying this assessment A paid one thousand dollars more than he would have paid on this lot had a general tax been laid over the whole city; he now asks that the tax now laid upon his second lot may be paid with city scrip to the amount of the thousand dollars overpaid upon the first. Upon the other hand, B owns but one lot, upon which he has paid an assessment greater by one thousand dollars than he would have paid if a general tax had been laid, but having no other property, he can only look for his thousand dollars overpaid, to the responsibility of the city. The general tax-payers, then, are called upon to make up the thousand dollars held by A in scrip, and not that held by B, simply because A happens to own another lot. I think the liability of the general tax-payers should not depend upon an accident of this kind, but that all parties holding city scrip of this issue should be placed on an equality and required to look to the city for payment. Leaving out of view the act of 1873, there seems to me no reason for holding that complainants are entitled to set off assessments illegally but voluntarily paid. The general law is well settled that no set-off is admissible against demands for taxes, as they are not in the nature of contracts between party and party, and are the positive acts of the government through its various agents, binding upon the inhabitants, and to the making and enforcing of which their personal consent individually is not required. M'Cracken v. Elder, 34 Pa. St. 239; Peirce v. City of Boston, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 520; Cooley, Tax'n, pp. 13, 14. In Fremont v. County of Mariposa, 11 Cal. 361, it was held directly that equity will not relieve from a tax on the ground that an illegal tax was collected of the complainant in former years. The fact that complainants were not parties to the original suit or to the proceedings which culminated in the orders of March, 1875 and 1876, does not confer upon them the right to object to these orders or set them at naught. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575. I see no authority for collecting taxes levied for 1873-4. The judgment upon which the mandamus for their collection was based was afterwards reversed by the supreme court of the United States, and a new judgment taken in 1875 for the balance remaining due to Brown. The mandamus was in the nature of an execution and when the judgment was reversed and held for naught, it would seem the mandamus must fall with it. But as this point was not made by defendant Brown in his brief, I am quite willing to reconsider it if I have overlooked any material fact in this connection. I think the complainants are entitled to an injunction against the collection of the tax for 1873 and 1874, and also against the collection of any tax for this pavement upon property in front of which the pavement was laid and the assessment paid, but as to all other property the demurrer is held good. Counsel will prepare the proper order and submit it to me for signature.

NOTE, [from original report.] The decision of Judge Emmons (referred to) in Brooks v. City of Memphis [Case No. 1,954] laid down several important propositions, among others these:

"When a contract has been made with a municipal corporation, and the work performed by the contractors, who relied upon a certain mode of taxation, which the supreme court declared unconstitutional, and the legislature afterwards pass a law to take the place of the invalid law, under which a judgment is had and a mandamus applied for, when this latter law is repealed; the court will disregard the repeal and apply the same rule as though it was in full force when the contract was made.

"The legislature has no power to repeal the only adequate remedy to enforce an existing judgment, unless some other reasonable mode of enforcement is provided. And this is so by virtue of the provision in the state constitution, which declares that 'no retrospective law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts should be passed.' And although there may be a statutory limitation upon a corporation's general power of taxation, yet, where there has been an express grant of power to such corporation to contract a debt, a power of taxation for its payment will be implied.

"The federal courts will sometimes delay judgment to await decisions in state courts, but where there is a mandamus to enforce the payment of a final judgment in a case where a tax to be collected had been levied according to the common usage of the state, and no objections have been raised to the lawfulness of the tax in other cases, or as to the taxes levied for other purpose—such a course will not be followed."

APPLEBACK, (POSTMASTER GENERAL v.) See Case No. 11,305.

APPLEBY, (HOPNER v.) See Case No. 6,699.

APPLER, (TRAVERS v.) See Case No. 14,148.

Case No. 497a.

APPLETON v. CHAMBERS.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 384.]

Circuit Court. District of Columbia. Sept. 21, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INTERFERENCE—PRIORITY—CAVEAT—LACHES—WITNESSES.

[1. On appeal from the commissioner of patents in an interference case, the appellant must rely upon the strength of his own case, not the weakness of his adversary's.]

[2. One who filed a caveat in 1855, and used constant effort to perfect his invention until his application for a patent, in 1859, is a prior inventor, with respect to another person, who conceived the idea after the filing of the caveat.]

[3. Upon the question of priority of invention in an interference case, one of the alleged inventors is not a competent witness in his own behalf, nor is another person who is to have an interest in the patent if issued.]

Appeal [of Appleton] from the decision of the commissioner of patents refusing to grant letters patent to them for an improvement in paper-folding machines, and awarding priority of invention to said Cyrus Chambers, Jr. [Affirmed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The appellant, in stating his claim in his specification, states very minutely all the various parts of it under eleven heads or divisions. This occupies great length, and instead of rectifying it, I must refer to it, and state the points or principles involved. As they are stated by himself, they are: First, propelling rollers to advance paper in a paper-folding machine, in combination with wires to support the paper while being advanced. Second, deflectors which are curved pieces of metal that turn the sheets as they pass through the folding rollers.

The commissioner's decision dated March 29, 1860, adopts the examiner's report dated the 16th of the same month. It says: "Chambers' application was made on the 10th of November, 1859, North's on the 22d of the same month. Chambers cites his invention as certain new and useful improvements in machinery for cutting and folding paper; and claims the combination of circular or revolving cutters with folding rollers for the purpose of cutting paper, as it is being folded; also sliding or moving the paper on or between bars or their equivalents by means of revolving wheels or rollers whose surfaces come in contact with the paper, &c. The claim is divided into four sections. North declares his invention to be certain new and useful improvements in machinery for folding paper and divides his into eleven sections. These sections embrace all that Chambers has claimed, excepting the cutters, which are however included in the devices, though they do not appear to be claimed. The interference was declared on the 5th of December, 1859. Chambers has produced but two witnesses, Robt. L. Armstrong and Cornelius Mullans, but has produced a caveat filed on the 30th of November, 1855, on which he chiefly relies to prove priority of invention. North has produced seven witnesses, two of whom are charged with being interested in the issue, one being himself, the other William Matthews. The caveat of Cyrus Chambers with additional papers filed on the 30th of November, 1855, establishes his priority of claim to the bars and rollers, but not to the cutters. The office cannot ignore the existence of Myers and Dukehart's paper-folding machine rejected on the 28th of June, 1853, where the rotary cutter is shown and described. Therefore it is respectfully suggested that a patent be issued to Chambers for his device to dispense with the tapes constituting the third and fourth sections of his claim when he shall have cancelled the two first sections of the same. I further suggest that a patent be granted to John North on his removing all sections of his claim interfering with the prior claims of Cyrus Chambers which have been clearly proved as above set forth. The commissioner says: "The foregoing report is confirmed and patent allowed to Cyrus Chambers, Jr., upon the third and fourth sections of his claim, when he shall have cancelled the two first sections thereof. A patent is also allowed to John North upon the cancellation of all sections of his claim which interfere with the prior claims of Cyrus Chambers, Jr."

From which decision the appellant, having prayed an appeal, filed his reasons of appeal. First on the ground that the said Chambers has never, up to the time of the hearing of the interference before the commissioner, made a working machine or a drawing or a model of one, has never applied his idea or suggestion to practice, and consequently has never made the invention, and that his acts are therefore no bar to the grant of a patent to North. And secondly, that even if his application for a patent be held to describe a working machine, he has never exercised diligence in applying his idea to practice, and in fact abandoned his idea until after he saw North's working machine, and that consequently he, the said Chambers, is not to be deemed the first inventor,—but on the contrary, North, who invented, independently used diligence and first practically embodied the idea in a working machine, is really the first original inventor, and this appellant further objects to the honorable commissioner's decision for the reason that he, as far as this appellant can discover, refuses to grant to him a patent for the deflectors specified in his application, the equivalents for which are described in the application of Chambers. and without assigning any reason therefor, and without deciding, as appears from the evidence, that they are public property, and belong neither to North or Chambers, which ought to have been his decision, as the testimony does not show that Chambers ever invented them, as it shows they were in use more than two years prior to Chambers' application, with his knowledge, even if he was an inventor, and as it shows that North, although an inventor, invented subsequent to the public use of said deflectors in Philadelphia, &c. Further, in conclusion, he says that "even supposing Chambers to have been an inventor subsequent to the Philadelphia use, and that such use was without his knowledge, nevertheless such public use deprives both him and North of their rights to a patent for a subsequent invention." According to the foregoing state of proceedings, the original papers and documents with the evidence, the commissioner's decision, and the reasons of appeal, were laid before me by the commissioner of patents in pursuance of previous due notice of the time and place of hearing, at which time the respective parties appeared by their counsel, filed their arguments in writing and submitted the case.

The issue to be tried and decided between these parties is priority of invention, and evidence has been taken by each of them with that view. Chambers dates his invention as early as November, 1855; North's claim appears to be of a more recent date in the year 1858. Chambers' application was filed 10th November, 1859. North on the 22nd of the same month. Ordinarily the appellant holding the affirmative of the issue, and according to the practice of the office, before an interference is declared, the inventions being ascertained to be identically the same, the simple question then, which in its character is rather collateral than on the merits, (for both may be independent inventors,) to be tried, has been which of the two was the first, and original discoverer of that invention, and the evidence shaped accordingly. But instead of substantively relying on the strength of his own title, his principal ground seems to be the weakness of his adversary's, and accordingly, his reason of appeal involving as he supposes the two points of objection before stated, he proceeds in his argument to take a resume of the testimony, from which he supposes it nowhere appears that Chambers has ever constructed a practical or operating folding machine containing propelling rollers and wires, and that he has never built such a machine. Second, nor that Chambers built the model sent to the office until after he had requested to see, and had seen and examined, North's machine. Third, that it appears from the testimony of Worthen, an engineer of reputation and experience, and from that of Matthews, a book-binder, and from that of McLeod, a book-binder, that Chambers' model, as described in his application, is not a model of a practical machine for folding paper, and that a machine constructed after that model would be entirely inoperative. It appears also from the testimony of English, a working book-binder, that propelling rollers on the underside of the paper only will not work, &c.; he saw the experiment tried, &c. Fourth, it appears that Chambers filed a caveat, or rather an additional paper making a part of a caveat, by a letter dated November 28, 1855, &c., substantially admitting that an idea or suggestion has been conceived by Chambers that he is going to experiment, in order to put the idea in practical shape; the language, in mentioning the wires and rollers, is not that paper can be propelled by rollers, but it may be slipped, &c. There is no hint how the paper is to be got out of the machine, no description of any upper rollers to press up the paper, no description on the addition, &c. He concludes therefore that the caveat is proof of an idea, but no proof of an invention, which is an idea reduced to practice. Fifth, that North is an independent inventor. Sixth, that the witnesses prove North conceived the idea, experimented on it, altered one working machine so as to introduce his invention into it, and had another working machine built, and that both those machines were in use up to the time when the testimony was taken, and that he wasted no time in making these successive steps. To support the positions taken in this branch of his argument he has referred to various judicial decisions, before noticing which it may be proper to state that having considered the objection to the competency of the two witnesses, North and Matthews, I am satisfied the objection must be sustained and their testimony be ruled out of the case.

In the case of Dietz v. Wade [Case No. 3,903,] on appeal from the commissioner of patents, similar grounds were taken, and the same authorities (except the cases before Judge Sprague and Judge Clifford) were cited and relied on, and after a very full and thorough consideration given them, my conclusion was that the principles decided by them did not sustain the positions contended for on this point by the appellees, and so I think in this case, for I consider the decisions of Judge Sprague and Judge Clifford not materially different from the others cited. With respect to the description, although it cannot be so satisfactorily seen in the model, yet the specification, drawings and other papers connected therewith do seem to me to describe it sufficiently to enable any one skilled in the art to make and use the invention. In the interpretation a liberal construction should be given. As to the opinion of the experts, I am very much disposed to think as Judge Story says he did. He says "that in the course of thirty years' experience he had never known them to agree in opinion as to whether any machine was really an invention or not." I have seen enough with my own eyes to satisfy me they were mistaken.

As to the objection on the ground of laches and abandonment, the decision on the Case of Dietz [supra] also establishes the right of the inventor to an allowance of a reasonable time, to be judged of according to the circumstances of the case, in which to perfect his invention, without impairing his claim to priority. The facts in the case from the earliest time of the discovery prove constant and unremitting endeavors to prepare it for his application for a patent. His early and repeated caveats, &c., and his experimental advances to attain the desired object, show that he was not unreasonably sleeping on his rights and awoke only by the filing of an application by another inventor, for he was the first of the two in this cause; nor do I observe any other use than is permitted for necessary experiments; no public use took place before January, 1858, less than two years before filing his application.

I think, from the fullest and best consideration I have been enabled to give to the case, that the decision of the commissioner is correct, and ought to be affirmed, and the same is accordingly hereby affirmed.

APPLETON, (DWIGHT v.) See Case No. 4, 215.

APPLETON, (GRATTAN v.) See Case No. 5,707.

APPLETON, (HEINE v.) See Case No. 6, 324.

Case No. 498.

APPLETON v. SMITH.

[1 Dill. 202.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. 1870.

PRACTICE OF SUPREME JUSTICE ON THE CIRCUIT.

1. The justice of the supreme court sitting alone in the circuit court, will not review and set aside an order or judgment made by the district judge, when the latter was alone holding a term of the circuit court; and Mr. Justice Miller added that he had "prescribed it as a rule of conduct for himself, that the presence of the district judge, and his consent to a review of his decision, would not vary the course to be pursued.

[Cited in Reynolds v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 33 Fed. 355; U. S. v. Biebusch, 1 Fed. 214.]

2. Accordingly, Mr. Justice Miller, holding the circuit court alone, overruled a motion to quash an attachment levied on goods, solely because a motion involving the same legal proposition was overruled at the preceding term, by the district judge, who then held the court.

[Cited in Reynolds v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 33 Fed. 355.]

This was an action at law commenced by attachment. A motion was made before Mr. Justice MILLER, holding the term, to vacate and dissolve an attachment levied on the goods of the defendant.

Watkins & Rose, for the motion.
Garland & Nash, opposed.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. This motion is made upon the ground that the writ was wrongfully issued. Upon looking into the record of the case, I find that the same motion, based upon the same legal proposition, was made at the last term of the court, and was overruled by the district judge, who at that time held the court.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

I have repeatedly decided in this circuit, since I was first assigned to it, that I would not sit in review of the judgments and orders of the court, made by the district judges in my absence.

Where, as in the present case, the motion is made on the same grounds, and with no new state of pleadings or facts, it is nothing more than an appeal from one judge of the same court to another, and though it is my province in the supreme court, to hear and determine such appeals, I have in this court no such prerogative. The district judge would have the same right to review my judgments and orders here as I would have in regard to his. [It would be in the highest degree indelicate for one judge of the same court thus to review and set aside the action of his associate in his absence, and might lead to unseemly struggles to obtain a hearing before one judge in preference to the other.]

I have also held, and have prescribed it for myself as a rule of conduct, that the presence of the district judge, and his consent to a review of his decision, will not vary the course to be pursued.

If it were understood that in such case the order of the court would be reconsidered, the desire of the district judge to have the responsibility shared by another, and his natural reluctance to refuse his assent to a rehearing, would always enable pertinacious counsel to get his consent.

For these reasons I decline to consider this motion. Counsel for the motion thereupon withdrew it.

Motion withdrawn.

APPLETON, (STEVENS v.) See Case No. 13,394.

APPLETON, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,463.

APPLICATION OF.

[Note. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the names of the applicants.]

Case No. 499.

In re APPOLD.

[25 Leg. Int. 180; 1 N. B. R. 621, (Quarto, 178); 7 Amer. Law. Reg. (U. S.) 624; 6 Phila. 469; 1 Amer. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 83.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 11, 1868.

BANKRUPT LAW—CONSTITUTIONALITY—UNIFORM OPERATION—POWERS OF ASSIGNEE—RENT.

1. So far as conformity in the procedure under executions out of the federal courts, and out of the courts of the respective states, had been attained under the act of congress of 12th May, 1828, and the rules of practice in the federal courts, which, under the authority conferred by that act, had, from time to time, been adopted before the present bankrupt law was passed—the constitutional requirement that the system of bankruptcy should be uniform throughout the United States has been fulfilled if the bankrupt law operates uniformly upon whatever would have been liable to execution if no such law had been passed, though the subjects of its operation may not be in all respects the same in every one of the states.

¹ [Reprinted from 25 Leg. Int. 18, by permission.]

2. Quære, whether under the present bankrupt law of the United States, goods of the estate in the hands of the assignee are distrainable for rent?

3. If they are not, it is because they are not less in legal custody than goods taken in execution; and under the equity of any laws of the respective states which, like the English statute 8 Anne c. 14, entitle a landlord to payment of rent accrued, not exceeding one year's, out of the proceeds of goods sold under an execution, the landlord, who is prevented from distraining may demand such an amount of rent from the assignee in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Trim, Case No. 14,174; Re Hufnagle, Id. 6,837.]

4. Such a rule of decision is not inconsistent with apparently contrary decisions under the English system of bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Trim, Case No. 14,174.]

5. Though rent, as such, may not accrue during the proceedings in bankruptcy, an equal charge for storage may, for a certain period, under certain circumstances, be incurred by the assignee.

In bankruptcy. On 1st May, 1868, Register Slaymaker certified the following questions, agreed to by the assignee of the bankrupt [Benjamin F. Appold] and the attorney of the bankrupt's landlord: The room, in which the bankrupt had conducted his business of a grocer, was leased to him at $62.50 per quarter. On January 24, 1868, the day appointed by the assignee for the sale of the goods of the estate on the premises, a bailiff of the landlord appeared, and by virtue of a warrant from him, distrained the goods for $125, due for two quarters rent. The bailiff did not sell the property, but it was agreed by and between the principal and the assignee, that the latter should make the sale and that the proceeds "in his hands should remain subject to the claim of the landlord just as the goods then were." The assignee made the sale and received the proceeds. In his account, as audited before the register, immediately following the statement of the balance for distribution, was a memorandum, that this balance was subject to such rights as the landlord of the bankrupt might have obtained by virtue of the levy made by his bailiff, and of the agreement made as above by the assignee. The questions presented were, 1st. Is the landlord entitled to take out of the balance in the hands of the assignee the sum of $125 due to him by the bankrupt for rent? and 2d. Has the register authority to direct or sanction the payment of this sum to the landlord by the assignee out of the balance in his hands as shown by the account.

CADWALADER, District Judge. Under the present system of bankruptcy in the United States the estate in the hands of the assignee is more determinately in legal custody than under the English system. There is, therefore, I think, reason to doubt the applicability of the English decisions that a landlord's right to distrain continues after an assignment under the bankruptcy of his tenant. [See note at end of case.] But if these authorities are inapplicable, it does not follow that the so-called lien of a landlord for rent should be wholly disallowed. The proceedings in bankruptcy may then have the effect of a statutory execution so that the case of the bankrupt's landlord may be within the equity of any laws of the respective states which entitle a landlord to payment out of the proceeds of goods taken in execution. The Pennsylvania statute, following the English act of 8 Anne, c. 14, entitles him thus to receive an amount not exceeding a year's rent. Blackstone's opinion, (2 Comm. 487,) that the landlord was thus entitled to the benefit of the analogy of the statute of 8 Anne where he omitted to distrain, has been overruled in England only because the goods late of the bankrupt on the demised premises are distrainable in England notwithstanding the assignment in bankruptcy. Otherwise the case would be within the equity of the statute. This conclusion may be reached without any necessity for considering the rent as a lien properly so called. Under the Maryland insolvent law it has been decided that the property of an applicant for the benefit of that act is in the custody of the law and cannot be distrained, and also that, without a previous distress, the landlord has no recourse against the estate. The latter part of this decision depends upon the local statute law. The statute 8 Anne, it is true, is in force in that state; but certain state laws are cited as controlling the decision there. [Buckey v. Snouffer,] 10 Md. 156.

Where the landlord makes a demand upon the assignee before the removal of the goods for an amount not exceeding a year's rent, it should, I think, if unpaid, be admitted as entitled to priority of payment whether the right of distraining exists or not. Where more than a year's rent is demanded, the question of the existence of the right of distraining will arise. At present I intimate no opinion upon this point. The claim is allowed under the alternative view of the law which I have explained. In cases in which assignees in good faith keep the stock in trade of a bankrupt in his former place of business for the purpose of either economical storage or advantageous disposal, if there is no improper delay, the hire of the landlord's premises may often be fairly valued by the standard of the former rent. In such cases I have not hesitated to allow him an amount equal to accruing rent. The cost of storage elsewhere would equitably be considered a lien.

The first question of the register is therefore answered affirmatively. The landlord's claim is allowed, but without any costs of a distress.

Upon the second question I am of opinion that the register, if the assignee had paid the amount, would have been warranted in allowing him credit for it in the audit of the account under the 27th section of the act of congress, at the second meeting of creditors. The allowance, as any other one, would then of course have been subject to exception. But I am of opinion that a prospective payment could not have been regularly sanctioned by the register unless there had been a special reference of the question to him by the court. Even then his allowance would have been subject to exception. In all cases however he may refer any such question incidentally to the court, as he has done in this instance. I understand that the questions here certified have arisen at a second meeting of creditors. The sum of $125 will be deducted by the register from the nett amount in the hands of the assignee after all proper charges have been allowed. The register's own account will be settled with the assignee, and the excess or deficiency of the deposit of $50 accounted for between them. The nett amount will be reported for a dividend, after which the distribution of it will be reported according to form No. 32, appended to the general order of the supreme court. The remarks in the last paragraph are made in answer to inquiries by the register in a letter to the clerk.

Recurring to the main point in question it may be added that the bankrupt law of 1867, does not, in general, vest in the assignee any more beneficial interest in the debtor's estate than his execution creditors could, under the laws of the respective states already in force have obtained under adversary proceedings. General conformity of procedure in this respect in the federal courts, and in those of the several states, had been previously attained through the act of congress of 19 May, 1828, (4 Stat. 281,) and the rules and practice of the federal courts adopted from time to time, under the authority conferred by this act. The system of bankruptcy is, in a relative sense, uniform throughout the United States when it operates uniformly upon whatever would thus have been available to the recourse of execution creditors if the bankrupt law had not been enacted. My views to this effect have been explained in a former opinion. The assignee in bankruptcy will, in the present case, obtain what would have been obtainable for the benefit of an execution creditor under the law of Pennsylvania. That less or more may perhaps be obtainable in another state does not prevent the operation of the bankrupt law from being, in a constitutional sense, uniform.

NOTE, [from original report.] In a case of involuntary bankruptcy there certainly can be no distress while the estate is in custody of the marshal as messenger; and the assignee succeeds to this custody. In the case of the estate of Samuel C. Brown, [unreported,] an involuntary bankrupt, (21 October, 1867,) this court was of opinion that rent might be paid by the assignees on the same footing as under an execution, and that an equal amount as accruing storage might be paid in addition so long as the assignee should necessarily occupy the premises. In a previous case of the estate of Jeremiah M. Gale, also an involuntary bankrupt, the landlord of the bankrupt commenced summary proceedings before an alderman to recover possession of the demised premises under the Pennsylvania statute of 25th March, 1825. Upon the petition of the assignee showing that his dispossession would be injurious to the interests of the creditors, he was, on the 19th August, 1867, authorized by this court [unreported] to pay the rent, or if not in funds, to give security under the Pennsylvania statute. In this case it was desirable that the lease, fixtures and good will should be sold with the late stock in trade of the bankrupt. In case of Schell, Berger & Co., voluntary bankrupts, a provisional receiver had been appointed after the adjudication of bankruptcy and before the first meeting of creditors. He was afterwards elected assignee. But before he thus became assignee, an order upon him as receiver to pay rent was made, on 16th March, 1868, [unreported,] upon the landlord's petition, showing that funds were in hand which ought to be thus applied. The receiver certified that in his belief the landlord's claim was correct.

[No opinions can be found in the unreported cases cited in this note.]

APPOMATTOX R. CO., (POWHATTAN STEAMBOAT CO. v.) See Case No. 11, 363.

Case No. 500.

The AQUILA.

District Court, S. D. Florida. April 11, 1871.

SALVAGE—AMOUNT OF AWARD.

[Cited in Buckley v. The William M. Jones, Case No. 2,095, and in Baker v. The Slobodna, 35 Fed. 543, as having awarded the salvors of a portion of the cargo of sugar of the Spanish bark Aquila 27 per cent. on the sugar saved dry, 42 per cent. on that wet and damaged, and 50 per cent. on the materials.]

[Note. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible. 10 Adm. Rec. 26, only contains the decree.]

Case No. 501.

The ARABELLA.

[2 Gall. 368.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1815.

PRIZE—CAPTURED PROPERTY LYING IN NEUTRAL PORT—REMOVAL OF GOODS—MASTER AND SHIP'S PAPERS—EVIDENCE—CONDEMNATION.

1. The prize courts of a belligerent may take jurisdiction of property captured by its cruisers, while such property is lying in a foreign neutral port.

¹[Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

[Cited in Hopner v. Appleby, Case No. 6,699; Jecker v. Montgomery, 13 How. (54 U. S.) 516.]

2. It is the duty of captors to bring in the master of the captured ship, and the ship's papers. An omission to do this must be fully and satisfactorily explained to the Court, otherwise it will withhold condemnation.

See The Bothnea and Janstoft, [Case No. 1-686.]

3. The removal of prize goods is an irregularity, but is indulged under certain circumstances.

[Cited in The Ella Warley, Case No. 4,371.]

4. How far the want of regular evidence may be supplied by the affidavits or written declarations of the captured.

[Cited in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 477.]

5. Of the mode of sale and distribution, in case of condemnation, of prize goods lying in a foreign neutral port.

In admiralty. The British ships Arabella and Madeira were captured, in June, 1814, by the private armed brig Rambler, Edes commander; and thirty boxes of medicines, sixteen bales of piece goods, five boxes of opium, and seventy-five casks of Madeira wine, parcel of their cargoes, were removed on board of the Rambler, carried into the port of Canton, in China, and there landed. On the 7th day of April, 1815, a prize allegation was filed in the district court against the same goods and merchandise, praying condemnation thereof as enemy's property, while lying in the neutral port of Canton. The usual monition having been returned, at the hearing of the cause, certified copies of the affidavits of the master and mate of the Arabella, sworn to before the American consul at Canton, were produced, in which there was a most explicit avowal, that the whole property was British. Certified copies of the written declarations of the master and mate of the Madeira, drawn up and signed at sea after the capture, were also produced, in which were contained similar avowals. No ship's papers, or documentary evidence of property, had been lodged in the registry, and the only other evidence in the cause was a copy of the protest of the prize master of the Arabella, stating the circumstances of her subsequent recapture by the British. No claim having been interposed in the district court, a pro forma decree was rendered, from which the captors appealed to this court.

A. Townsend, for the captors, now moved the court, upon the evidence above stated, to proceed to condemnation. The court having taken time for advisement, the following opinion was delivered by ein neutral port. This question has been discussed with much ability and learning in the admiralty courts of Great Britain, and has there been finally settled in the affirmative, not so much upon the supposed correctness of the principle, as the general usage of nations. It was there admitted, that condemnation of prize property, lying in the ports of an ally in the war, was strictly justifiable; but it was thought, that a different rule might apply to neutral ports. The Henrick and Maria, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 43; The Christopher, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 207; The Victoria, 1 Edw. Adm. 97; The Comet, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 285. In the courts of the United States, the question has received a solemn decision, and it has been held, that upon principle a condemnation of a prize, lying in a neutral port, is valid, and may be rightfully decreed by the prize jurisdiction. Hudson v. Guestier, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 293, 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 281. And the correctness of this decision is evidently presupposed in several provisions of the prize act. Act June 26, 1812, c 107, § 6, [2 Stat. 761.] If, therefore, I felt any lurking doubts on the subject, I should feel myself bound by authority. But I am free to declare that, after much reflection, I am entirely satisfied, that the doctrine is founded in national law.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first question which presents itself, is, whether the court has jurisdiction to proceed to the adjudication of prize property, lying in a for-

The next consideration is, whether the court ought now to proceed to adjudication, in the absence of the regular testimony and documentary evidence, required in prize causes. The court always demands from the captors a compliance with the requisitions of the prize statute and the public instructions; and watches, with great jealousy, every deviation from them. Whenever such deviations occur, the court requires the most satisfactory proof, that they were unavoidable, or at least justified by very cogent and pressing reasons. It is an ancient and fundamental rule of prize proceedings, enforced by the president's instructions, that the master of the captured ship should be brought in and examined upon the standing interrogatories, and that the ship's papers should accompany the property brought before the court. I do not say that the rule is inflexible, for cases may and do occur, in which the omission has not been allowed to work any injurious consequences. But the omission must be accounted for in a satisfactory manner, or the court will withhold its sentence even in very clear cases. The Anna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 373, and note, page 385f. The transaction, indeed, in the present case, having taken place in a remote part of the world, the absence of the regular testimony of the enemy's masters may be easily accounted for; and, under such circumstances, I should have no difficulty in admitting their affidavits, taken before some proper authority in the neutral country. Such a proceeding is by no means unusual. The Peacock, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 185, 191. But here even such original affidavits are not produced. Copies only are offered of the affidavits and certificates of the enemy's masters and mates, and no reason is assigned for the non-production of the originals. In respect to the certificates of the master and mate of the Madeira, there is this further objection, that they gave them while they were at sea, as prisoners, on board of the capturing ship. Nor is there any reason assigned, why their testimony was not afterwards taken, as was done in the case of the Arabella. Certainly, the certificates of hostile persons, while prisoners of war on board of an enemy's ship, are liable to some suspicion, for they may have been procured by duress or by fraud. I do not mean to suggest any doubt of the purity of the transaction in the present case. On the contrary, I have many reasons to presume it to have been entirely fair. But the court would surrender all its discretion, if it could permit captors to act with such irregularity, and not require a plenary explanation of the manner, in which it happened, and of the circumstances which may excuse it. It would hold out temptations to gross misconduct in captors, and subject the prize tribunals to unjust accusations of connivance in breaches of national law. Our duty also, in respect to the interests of neutrals, requires us to act with caution, and to afford no just pretext for dissatisfaction in administering the maritime rights of war.

There is another irregularity, which indeed has become so general in practice, and has so far obtained the silent acquiescence of public opinion, that it seems almost to have been thought to have ripened into a right, I allude to the removal of the goods from prizes on board of the capturing ship. This is in direct contravention of the express provisions of the prize act, which require, that before bulk is broken, or the prize property is otherwise disposed of or converted, it shall be brought in and proceeded against before some competent tribunal. This provision was undoubtedly designed more immediately for the security of neutrals; but it is also a useful restraint, even as to enemy's property, inasmuch as it has a tendency to prevent embezzlements and frauds, and to aid the regular operation of the revenue laws. In relation, however, to neutrals, it is of the highest importance; as their property, especially on board of enemy's ships, would otherwise be liable to every species of hazard, and often to irretrievable ruin. Courts of prize are therefore bound to hold the captors to very strict scrutiny, whenever cases of removal of goods occur, and to take every precaution to guard against the abuses growing out of the practice. I do not say that a removal is in no case to be allowed, unless of necessity, though perhaps the prize act might, at first view, seem to warrant that rigorous construction. In point of practice, however, even in the British courts, where a similar statutable direction exists, a more indulgent rule has been adopted. Where property has been captured on a remote station, or under circumstances calling for a removal, sale or other conversion, or even a delivery on bail, on the ground of some great inconvenience, the act has been held valid upon the proper explanations being made, and condemnation has been pronounced in favor of the captors. The Peacock, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 185, 191; The L'Eole, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 220, 224; La Dame Cecile, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 257, 260; The Falcon, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 194, 200.

In respect to our own country, considering the character of the war, in which we have been engaged; the great naval force of the enemy; and the consequent difficulty of bringing prizes into our ports; it has not been thought unreasonable to hold, that a removal of prize goods into the capturing ship, if not strictly justifiable, is at least excusable. I trust it is no want of proper decorum to assert, that this conduct seems to have received the favorable consideration even of the government itself. It has been deemed consistent with the national policy, to interpose no obstacles to such proceedings; and to leave the courts of law to make the most liberal interpretations in such cases, in favor of the captors. Under these circumstances, a uniform practice has prevailed in all the courts of the United States, to proceed to adjudication of prize property without any other regard to the fact of its transshipment, than as it called for a most exact examination of the proprietary interest. Still, however, after every indulgence, the transshipment is deemed an irregularity, and at the peril of the captors, who become ultimately responsible to the court for all its consequences.

I have thought it proper to state thus much, in order to vindicate the court from the imputation of lending its aid to great irregularities without reasonable cause. In every case, what shall be the effect of any irregularity must depend upon the sound discretion of the court, acting upon an enlarged and liberal policy. Cases may occur of such gross misconduct, that it might be proper to apply the penalty of a forfeiture of the right of the captors to the United States. I profess not to see in the present case any circumstances, which may not entitle the parties to the most benign indulgence of the court. What I shall at present do is, to suspend judgment, and to require of the captors affidavits of the facts, which shall explain the irregularities, to which I have alluded.

NOTE, [from original report.] On a subsequent day of the term, the affidavit of the commander of The Rambler, stating the circumstances, having been produced, condemnation was decreed. A sale was ordered to be made under the direction of the court. It was stated, that any mode of sale, that might be agreed upon by the captors, would be sanctioned by the court. And that, upon receipt of an account of sales, it might be filed in court, and distribution would be decreed accordingly.

Case No. 502.

ARAPAHOE COUNTY v. KANSAS PACIFIC RY. CO. et al.

[4 Dill. 277; 5 Cent. Law J. 102; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 369; 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 181.]

Circuit Court, D. Colorado. 1877.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—CITIZENSHIP—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1875—"CONTROVERSY"—SUIT.

1. The plaintiff, a citizen of Colorado, brought a stockholder's bill in a state court, in Colorado, making the defendants thereto the railroad company (also a citizen of Colorado), in which the plaintiff was a stockholder, viz.: the Denver Pacific Railway Company, and also the directors thereof, including two directors, citizens of Colorado, against whom, however, no charges were made, and no relief asked; also making a defendant another railroad company, viz.: the Kansas Pacific Railway Company (a citizen of Kansas), and certain individuals, all citizens of other states than Colorado. The object of the bill was to secure an accounting in favor of the Denver Pacific Company against the Kansas Pacific Company, and to secure a decree in personam against the non-resident directors of the Denver Pacific Company. The Kansas Pacific Company, and the individual defendants connected with that company, without being joined with the other defendants, applied to remove the suit to the circuit court of the United States, under the act of March 3, 1875: Held, that the suit was removable.

2. The right of removal cannot be defeated by the joinder as defendants of citizens of the same state with the plaintiff, if no relief is prayed against them, and they are made defendants without any right or reason or just cause.

[Approved in Walden v. Skinner, 101 U. S. 589. Cited in Donahoe v. Mariposa Land & Min. Co., Case No. 3,989; Pond v. Sibley, 7 Fed. 135; M'Henry v. New York, P. & O. R. Co., 25 Fed. 69; May v. St. John, 38 Fed. 771; Dow v. Bradstreet Co., 46 Fed. 827. Distinguished in Mills v. Central R. Co., 20 Fed. 451; Belding v. Gaines, 37 Fed. 820.]

3. In a stockholder's bill of the kind before the court, the company in which the plaintiffs are stockholders is a necessary party defendant, but the interests of the stockholders and the company are identical, and they represent one side of the controversy, and the company against whom the accounting and relief are sought represents the other.

[Cited in Barry v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co., 27 Fed. 2.]

4. The removal act of March 3, 1875, provides that the suit—the whole suit, and not a part of the suit—shall be removed; and under that act, if the requisite conditions exist, any one of the plaintiffs or defendants may remove the suit and carry the other parties with them.

5. Act March 3, 1875, (18 Stat. 470.) does not repeal all acts on the same subject, but only such as are in conflict; so that Act March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 558, c. 196.) concerning local prejudice as a cause for removal, remains in force.]

[Cited in Dennis v. County of Alachua, Case No. 3,791.]

In equity. This suit was brought in the district court of Arapahoe county, by the complainants, against the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, Sayre, Moffat, Carr, Perry, Meier, Edgerton, Greeley, Dodge, Gould, and Dillon. The defendants, the Denver Pacific Railway Company, Sayre, and Moffat, are and were, with the complainants, citizens of the state of Colorado; the defendants, Dodge, a citizen of Iowa, and Gould and Dillon, citizens of New York. The three last named were not served with process, nor have they entered an appearance in the suit. The Kansas Pacific Railway Company, a citizen of Kansas, Carr, Perry, Meier, Greeley, and Edgerton, citizens of Missouri, united in a petition, accompanied by a sufficient bond, to the district court of Arapahoe county, for the removal of the suit into the circuit court of the United States for the district of Colorado. The judge of the state court indorsed his approval of the sufficiency of the bond, but declined to make an order for the removal of the cause. Nevertheless, the petitioners, in accordance with the conditions of their bond, filed, on the first day of the term of the circuit court of the United States, a certified copy of the pleadings and proceedings in the suit had in the state court, with the clerk of the circuit court, who docketed the cause as one properly removed; whereupon the complainants appeared and moved the circuit court to remand the cause to the state court, on the ground that the cause had been improperly removed from the state court. The attention of the court was not directed to the fact that the state court had declined to make an order for the removal of the suit. The issues tendered by the bill are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

[Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Wm. B. Mills, John I. Redick, and Charles R. Redick, for plaintiff.

Alfred Sayre, John P. Usher, and A. H. Holmes, for defendants.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The case of the board of county commissioners of Arapahoe county against the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, and various individuals mentioned, presents a question of the jurisdiction of this court arising under the act of [March 3] 1875, [18 Stat. 470.] and especially that branch of it which concerns the removal of cases from state to federal courts. The construction of this statute, in various respects, has been very largely the subject matter of my consideration and action on the circuit during this spring and summer.

It was very aptly remarked here, in the course of the argument on the motion to remand this case to the state court, that the act was intended and was understood to have been passed for the purpose of developing substantially all the judicial powers which the constitution conferred upon the government of the United States. The constitution, while it declares to what the judicial power of the government shall extend, created no court except the supreme court of the United States; and it declared in no manner where that jurisdiction should be vested, except that the supreme court of the United States should have a certain class, which was as to the original jurisdiction very limited, and as to appellate jurisdiction was to be regulated in such manner as congress might determine. It was therefore necessary, for the exercise of all jurisdiction, except that which was directly conferred upon the supreme court of the United States, that some action of congress should create courts in which that jurisdiction should be vested. Congress has created these courts, and it has from time to time made various declarations of what their jurisdiction shall be. The original act of [September 24,] 1789, [1 Stat. 79, § 12,] (called the judiciary act, for the reason that it did attempt and was intended to create courts and invest them with so much of this jurisdiction as in the wisdom of congress ought to be exercised at that time), did not fill the measure of the judicial power of the federal government. The main body of this as to original jurisdiction was vested in the district courts and circuit courts. That of the district courts was confined in a large measure to criminal jurisdiction of the federal power, with an exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty cases. To this has since been added exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy. The circuit court, however, was the main depository of the power as regards the original jurisdiction of the federal courts. But all of the power which congress might have conferred on these courts, either separate or united, was not developed. They specified a limited class of cases, and for the purposes of this suit I may say that the main source of the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States was originally contests between citizens of different states, as it is to-day. Congress provided two modes by which jurisdiction might be exercised in the circuit courts of the United States; one by a suit brought there, and in which it was necessary in the declaration, or petition, or bill by which the suit was instituted, to describe the citizenship of the parties, so that the court could recognize that it had jurisdiction of the case. In the construction of that statute the supreme court of the United States decided, in the case of Coleman v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 264, and has always adhered to this to the present time, that, in bringing suit by original process in the circuit court of the United States, all the parties plaintiff and defendant must have the required citizenship — to be more explicit, that all of the parties plaintiff must be citizens of a state or states different from all and each of the parties defendant, and that if either of the parties plaintiff and either of the parties defendant were citizens of the same state the juris-isdiction failed. That has been the uniform construction of the act of congress upon the subject.

There was another mode by which the circuit courts acquired jurisdiction of cases, which has been called the original jurisdiction, because it does not fall within the ground of appellate jurisdiction, and this is by removal of cases brought in the state courts of which the state courts had concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the United States. If a suit was brought in a state court, which, in the arrangement of parties as plaintiffs and defendants, might with equal jurisdiction have been brought in the circuit court of the United States, the act of 1789 provided for a removal of that suit to the circuit court of the United States, upon the application of the party who was not a citizen of the state where the suit was brought. The terms and time and manner of removal were limited. That act remained unrepealed and without substantial modification for a great many years. But about the time of the late civil war in this country it became the policy of congress to enable parties, citizens of different states, for reasons readily imagined, to remove a class of cases not included in the original act, and to remove them at times and under circumstances which could not be done under that act; and from that date to 1875 the statute has been undergoing continual modification and changes. The final act is the one under which the removal is sought in this case from the state court of Arapahoe county, Colorado, into this court.

The suit in this case is brought, as the parties concede, and as the petition shows, by the commissioners of the county of Arapahoe, who are citizens of the state of Colorado, against the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, which is also a citizen of Colorado, and against two gentlemen, Mr. Sayre and Mr. Moffat, who are citizens of Colorado, and against seven or eight other persons, who are citizens of other states than Colorado. The case has been removed to this court upon a petition setting forth substantially these facts, and it is now asked to be remanded because the requisite essentials, as prescribed by the act of congress conferring jurisdiction upon this court, are not found in this case. The objection is that the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, Sayre and Moffat, are citizens of the same state with the complainants in this action. This objection, as before stated, has always been considered decisive against the jurisdiction of this court; [that unless the parties on each side, each and all of them, have the required citizenship, this court is without jurisdiction.] Where the complainant and defendant are both citizens of the same state, this court has no jurisdiction. It is further alleged, in support of the objection to the jurisdiction of this court in this case, that the Denver Pacific Railway Company, and Sayre and Moffat, each of them, are necessary adverse parties to the complainants in this suit. The objection, if well taken, will require the suit to be remanded.

¹[From 5 Cent. Law J. 103.]

The reply is that the Denver Pacific Company, and Sayre and Moffat, are nominal parties, against whom no relief is sought, and against whom no decree can be rendered; that the bill is clear and specific on that point; consequently the right which belongs to the other parties to remove the case is not and cannot be defeated by the joinder in the petition of other defendants, citizens of the same state with the complainants, against whom no relief is prayed. As regards Sayre and Moffat, the case seems very clear. A careful reading of the bill shows that no relief can be had against them. No case is made in the bill against them, nor does it appear that any was intended to be made. They are carefully distinguished from the other trustees against whom the relief is asked. No relief is asked against the corporation of which they are directors, nor is the relief asked against all the directors of the road. Not only so, but the complainants are very careful to show in their bill that there is no cause of action, or anything asked against these two directors. The charges are against the majority of the board of trustees of the Denver Pacific Railway Company; the decree asked is a decree in personam against the majority of the trustees, and not against the whole board. It is perfectly clear that no possible decree can be had, nor any charge of misconduct or maladministration be sustained, against Sayre and Moffat, as nothing is alleged against them. They are, therefore, entirely immaterial parties, and may be regarded as out of the case.

The supreme court has decided that where there are merely formal parties, without the requisite citizenship, that does not oust the jurisdiction. But in this case they are hardly formal parties, and it is hard to see why they were put into the bill at all; for it charges that they protested against the wrong while it was being done.

It would be a very dangerous doctrine, one utterly destructive of the rights which a man has to go into the federal courts on account of his citizenship, if the plaintiff in the case, in instituting his suit, can, without any right or reason or just cause, and with the express declaration that he asks no relief from them, join persons who have not the requisite citizenship, and thereby destroy the rights of the parties in federal courts.

We must, therefore, be astute not to permit devices to become successful which are used for the very purpose of destroying that right. In this case there is no question but that these two gentlemen—Sayre and Moffat—are in no sense in the way of the removal of the case, though they be citizens of the same state as the complainant.

The case then rests upon the question of whether the fact that the Denver Pacific Railway Company is a party defendant, and is a citizen of the same state of the party plaintiff, ousts the jurisdiction of this court or defeats the right of removal of the other parties who are citizens of other states. That question does not rest upon the same principle as the case of Messrs. Sayre and Moffat. The Denver Pacific Railway Company is a necessary party to this suit; it is one without which the suit cannot proceed. The main object of this suit, aside from obtaining a temporary injunction, and the appointment of a receiver, is to obtain an accounting with the Kansas Pacific Railway Company and other defendants, on an allegation that a majority of the trustees of the Denver Pacific Railway Company have been committing frauds, and thus depriving that company of the funds belonging to it. The relief sought is an accounting, and the relief asked is a decree in favor of the Denver Pacific Railway Company for the amount found due upon that accounting. The Denver Pacific Railway Company is a necessary party to that accounting. A party cannot be required to go to all the trouble of accounting and having a decree, when that accounting and decree will not be a valid defence against the principal party having the right to call such party to account. If the suit was merely between the county commissioners and these trustees, the decree would not protect the trustees, whether they were decreed to pay over moneys, or whether they were discharged or acquitted. It would be no protection against the Denver Pacific Railway Company in another suit upon the same cause of action. This shows very clearly that the Denver Pacific Railway Company is not a mere nominal party, but is an indispensable party. But, as already stated, the main relief sought in this case will be, if the suit is successful, a decree in favor of the Denver Pacific Railway Company for the amount found due from the other defendants in this case. That is an important and significant feature of the transaction. In an action at law a suit could not be maintained in which the board of commissioners of Arapahoe county should be plaintiffs, and the Denver Pacific Railway Company and these petitioners defendants, in which a judgment should be asked for one hundred thousand dollars in favor of the Denver Pacific Company against itself and its co-defendants. The court would say, you cannot make two defendants litigate before a jury and get a verdict as between themselves, while the party who brought the suit looks on as having no interest in the transactions. But the flexibility of the mode of proceedings in a court of chancery is such that, for the attainment of justice, you may, in some instances, where the party is not before the court, make him a defendant, when he will not be a plaintiff. You cannot compel him to hazard the results of a defeat, though his presence in the court may be necessary for the rights of somebody else, and his rights be with the plaintiff in the case. In suits at common law he would be there as plaintiff, if there at all. By the rules and practice in equity the court allows him to be defendant in the case; but the mere fact that he is placed as defendant instead of plaintiff in a suit in chancery, never changes his relation to the controversy in the case, and it is very clear that the interest of the Denver Pacific Railway Company is the interest of the plaintiffs; that their interest is identical—that the board of county commissioners are using the name of the Denver Pacific Company to carry on this suit solely for the benefit of that company. The Denver Pacific Company, being in the control of the defendants, refused to bring this suit, and the complainants, stockholders of that company, were of necessity compelled to make it defendant, that it might be brought before the court; but when before the court, the company is entitled to recover against the other defendants. The complainants recognize this themselves, for in their prayer for relief they say expressly what they pray for is a decree in favor of the Denver Pacific Railway Company against the Kansas Pacific Railway Company and the other defendants. Now, the controversy in this case is one in which the commissioners of Arapahoe county and the Denver Pacific Railway Company are on one side, citizens of the state of Colorado, against all the other defendants. And all the other defendants are citizens of other states, except Sayre and Moffat, and the controversy, in the language of the constitution and of the statutes, is one between citizens of the state of Colorado and citizens of other states, and therefore within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, and within the meaning of the statute under which this removal is sought. The statute says, in the second section, "that any suit of a civil nature, at law or equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any state court, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority, or in which the United States shall be plaintiff or petitioner, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, or a controversy between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states, or a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects, either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district; and when, in any suit mentioned in this section, there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can fully be determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants, actually interested in such controversy, may remove said suit to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district."

The best judgment I am able to give is that this is a controversy between citizens of the state of Colorado on one side, and citizens of other states on the other side, and is properly subject to removal.

Another objection, and the last one taken in the argument, was, that all of the parties defendant, who are citizens of other states, have not united in asking this removal, and that it requires the union of all these parties in the request that it should be done. The decisions of the courts were that, under the former statutes, it did require all the defendants, or the parties who were classed on the same side as regards citizenship, to unite in the petition for removal, or the suit could not be removed. But the act of 1875 intended to make a different rule upon the subject, and, in my judgment, it was the purpose and intent of the last clause of that act to enable one man, where all the parties on his side of the controversy had such citizenship as to authorize a removal, to have the case removed, and with it to carry all other parties. The language of the statute on that subject is very clear: "And when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states"—which is so in this case—"and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants"—not all of them—"actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit." The argument is, that where less than the whole number on the same side made application, it could be removed as to them only, if they had a separate or special interest which could be determined between them and the plaintiffs. But it is the suit that is intended to be removed under this clause, and congress provided that one plaintiff or one defendant could remove the suit. I have decided that the act of [March 2] 1867, [14 Stat. 558, c. 196.] concerning prejudice, remains in full force. The reason is, that the act of 1875 does not repeal all acts on the same subject, but only such as are in conflict. It is very guarded. It is not in conflict with the provisions of this act that one of the defendants may, under the act of 1866, remove the cause as to himself. They are supplementary rights. To say that, where the case can be removed as a whole, it should be removed, but where, from its essential nature, it cannot be removed as a whole, and a part can be removed, that part shall be removed, is not in conflict; so that the two statutes stand together, and are not in conflict, just as I held under the act of 1867. In all cases of removal under the act of 1875, application must be made at the first term, or before the term at which the suit could be tried or heard. No such provision is made in the act of 1867, or in that of [July 27,] 1866, [14 Stat. 306.]

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the fair construction of the act, taken in connection with the general policy of the statute to give very nearly all the jurisdiction which the constitution of the United States intended to belong to the federal judicial power, requires that this case shall remain where it is; and the motion to remand it is denied. Motion denied.

ARBOR. The ANN. See Cases Nos. 407 and 408.

ARBUNCLE, (BOWNE v.) See Case No. 1, 742.

ARBUNKLE, (BROWN v.) See Case No. 1, 990.

ARBUSTOL, The, (JUSTI PON v.) See Case No. 7,589.

ARCHBOLD, (GERMAN SAV. BANK v.) See Case No. 5,364.

ARCHEMBROUN, In re. See Cases Nos. 503, 504, and 505.

ARCHENBRAUN, In re. See Cases Nos. 503, 504, and 505.

Case No. 503.

In re ARCHENBROWN.

[8 N. B. R. (1876,) 429.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBTS—EXPENSES OF ATTACHING CREDITORS.

[A claim by creditors of a bankrupt for the expenses of an attachment, begun by them against him before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, should not be allowed against the bankrupt estate. Gardner v. Cook, Case No. 5,226, followed.]

In bankruptcy.

By the register: Foreman & Friedlander presented for allowance an account. The following are the items:

Services of Dickenson & Dickenson, investigating said bankrupt's condition.....	$10
County fee paid clerk of Wayne county said case in attachment.....	2
Clerk's fees in said-suit, attorney's services in suit of attachment.....	20

The allowance of this account being contested by the assignee, the register certifies the case to the district court, with the following opinion:

I do not think that the account ought to be allowed; because: 1st. It is not and does not claim to be an account for which the bankrupt is liable; and if it were, it could only be proved after the form prescribed by section twenty-two. 2d. It does not claim to be an account for disbursements incurred by a petitioning creditor in procuring the adjudication of bankruptcy. Such accounts have usually been allowed, because they are seen to have been incurred in the interest of all the creditors by taking proceedings which will bring the estate of the bankrupt within the power of this court, where an equitable distribution may be assured, according to the principles and policy of the bankrupt act. Nothing appears from the petition to show that the expenses here incurred were not solely for the benefit of the attaching creditors; and their proceedings, if they had not been interrupted by the proceedings in bankruptcy, would have resulted in the payment in full of the parties who make this application, at the expense of all other creditors. A result so hostile to the policy of the bankrupt act ought not, in my judgment, to be countenanced by the allowance of the claim here presented.

Hovey K. Clarke, Register.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. I think Judge Knowles' opinion in Gardner v. Cook, [Case No. 5,226,] in the reasoning and conclusions of which I entirely concur, and the cases there cited, are conclusive of the correctness of the foregoing decision of the register. I, therefore, hereby approve the same.

Case No. 504.

In re ARCHENBROWN.

[11 N. B. R. (1875,) 149; 7 Chi. Leg. News, 99.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY — SUFFICIENCY OF NOTICE — IDEM SONANS—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—JURISDICTION.

[1. A notice in bankruptcy addressed to "Levey, New York," is insufficient as notice to Lawrence J. Levey, residing in New York.]

[2. Though a creditor has had no notice of, and has not proved his debt nor received any dividend in, bankruptcy proceedings, he cannot proceed by action at law against the bankrupt, pending an application for his discharge, under Act 1867, §§ 33, 34, which provide that a discharge shall release the bankrupt from all claims which "might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy," except such as were created by fraud or in a fiduciary character. His remedy is to oppose a discharge.]

[Cited in Lamb v. Brown, Case No. 8,011.]

[3. The court obtains full jurisdiction of the proceeding by petition, adjudication, and warrant, and not by notice to the creditors.]

[In bankruptcy. Archenbrowne was adjudicated a bankrupt on creditor's petition on November 6, 1872; and his estate was subsequently collected and distributed. Lawrence J. Levey, a creditor, sued the bankrupt, at law, for the collection of a debt; and the bankrupt petitioned, under section 21, to enjoin the prosecution of the suit until the determination of the question, then pending, of the bankrupt's discharge. An order for the creditor to show cause having been made and served, he appeared, and for cause showed that the bankrupt did not include his name in the list of creditors furnished to the marshal; that he received no notice of the bankruptcy proceedings; that he was not informed of such proceedings till long after; that his debt was not proved therein; and that he had received no dividends. Petition granted.]

Mr. Dewey, and Chipman & Dewey, for petitioner.

Mr. Burt, and Burt & Clark, for Levey.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. On an inspection of the list of creditors furnished by the bankrupt to the marshal, I find that the name of Lawrence J. Levey does not appear therein; and there is no proof on file that any notice was sent to or served upon him, or that his name and address was furnished to the marshal in any manner whatever. The attention of the court was called, however, to the following appearing upon said list, viz.: "Levey, New York, 400;" and it is claimed, that this was meant for Lawrence J. Levey, the respondent, and the court is asked so to construe it. It appears by the records that the notices were sent by mail, addressed as indicated by the list of creditors. It certainly needs no argument to show that a notice addressed to "Levey, New York," without any other description or designation, cannot be presumed to have reached Lawrence J. Levey, notwithstanding that he resides and did business in New York. The two names are not idem sonans, and cannot, by any stretch of construction, be held to be the same in any respect whatsoever. The case is therefore one in which the name of the creditor sought to be restrained from prosecuting his suit at law to await the determination of this court upon the bankrupt's application for a discharge was entirely omitted, and who had no notice of and has not proved his debt or received any dividends in the bankruptcy proceedings. If a discharge, under the provisions of the act, may be a bar under such circumstances in any case, the proceedings at law must be stayed (in the absence of any objection that the application for a discharge has not been made and prosecuted with reasonable diligence), and the creditor must come into this court and oppose the granting of the discharge in the mode pointed out by the act, if he would avoid such bar, otherwise he ought not to be delayed in the prosecution of his suit.

By section 34 of the act of 1867 it is provided "that a discharge duly granted under this act shall, with the exceptions aforesaid, release the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities, and demands which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy. * * * Always provided, that any creditor or creditors of said bankrupt whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in bankruptcy, who shall see fit to contest the validity of said discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, may, at any time within two years after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to set aside and annul the same." The "exceptions aforesaid" are those mentioned in the first clause of section 33, viz.: Debts created by fraud or embezzlement, by defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character. The present case does not come within the exceptions; and, being a debt which "might have been proved" against the bankrupt estate in bankruptcy, it clearly comes within the category of "debts, claims, liabilities, and demands," as to which a discharge is declared by section 34 to be a release.

But it was contended that the court has no jurisdiction of a debt, etc., of a creditor whose name was omitted from the schedule, and who received no notice of the bankruptcy proceedings, nor voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court by proving his debt and receiving dividends in the bankruptcy proceedings. This position, at first impression, seems very reasonable, and there have been some decisions in its support. Anon., [Case No. 457;] Barnes v. Moore, 2 N. B. R. 573; In re Hall, [Case No. 5,922;] Perkins v. Gay, 3 N. B. R. 772. But unfortunately, perhaps, for the position contended for, jurisdiction is not made by the act to depend upon the correctness of the schedule of creditors, or that the creditors actually received notice of the proceedings. Provision is made for a schedule of creditors, and also for notice to creditors personally, or by mail and by publication; but jurisdiction, either of the proceedings or to grant a discharge, is not made to depend upon the correctness of the schedule or the actual reception of such notice by the creditors. The court obtains full and complete jurisdiction for all purposes whatsoever by the petition, whether voluntary or involuntary, adjudication, and warrant. Provision is made, however, by section 29, for defeating the granting of a discharge, and by section 34 for the annulling of the same when once granted, on the grounds here alleged, under certain restrictions and limitations; and creditors like Mr. Levey, who have been omitted from the schedule, must avail themselves of the provisions of those sections, if they would avoid their debts being barred by the granting of a discharge. So long as they do not do so the presumption is that their debts will be released by a discharge if granted, and they must be restrained in the prosecution of suits upon such debts until the question of the granting of a discharge shall have been determined in the bankruptcy court. Hill v. Robins, 22 Mich. 475, 478; Symonds v. Barnes, [59 Me. 191;] Payne v. Able, 4 N. B. R. 220; Corey v. Ripley, [57 Me. 69.] Prayer of petition granted.

Case No. 505.

In re ARCHENBROWN.

[12 N. B. R. (1875), 17; 7 Chi. Leg. News, 231.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—"PROPER BOOKS OF ACCOUNT"—EVIDENCE.

[1. A merchant tailor, for several months before his bankruptcy, kept no account of his business done for cash, and his previous accounts consisted of a running memorandum of work done, without showing whether for cash or credit, nor whether cash received or cash paid out was on account or otherwise. Part of his accounts with customers were marked "settled," without showing how, and he discontinued his account with his creditors for more than a year before his bankruptcy. Held, that his discharge must be refused for failing to keep "proper books of account."]

[Cited in Re Antisdel, Case No. 490; Re Blumenthal, Id. 1,575; Re Vernia, 5 Fed. 725; Re Graves, 24 Fed. 554; Re Frey, 9 Fed. 384.]

[2. The fact that a bankrupt did not keep "proper books of account," without reference to his intent or harmless results to creditors, will prevent his discharge.]

[Cited in Re Graves, 24 Fed. 554.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by William Archenbrowne for a discharge. Refused. For prior opinions, see In re Archenbrowne, Case No. 503, and In re Archenbrowne, Id. 504.]

Mr. Burt, for opposing creditor.

Mr. Dewey, for bankrupt.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The first specification is for omitting the opposing creditor's name from the schedule of creditors, and not for willfully swearing falsely to the schedule. In this it is fatally defective, but even if it had been properly framed, it was clearly not sustained by proofs. For both reasons, therefore, it is overruled without further comment. The second and only other specification is for not keeping proper books of account, the bankrupt having been a merchant or tradesman. The object of the requirement of the act (section 29) that merchants and tradesmen shall have kept proper books of account in order to be entitled to a discharge in case of bankruptcy, is that the debtor himself, or his creditors, might at any time ascertain his financial condition from an examination of his books; and in case of bankruptcy to insure the entire appropriation of the debtor's property, not exempt, to the payment of his debts, and to enable the assignee to accomplish that end, and to assist him in the administration of the estate. The test as to whether the books which were kept, when, as in this case, some books were kept, were "proper" books of account, within the meaning of the act, is, whether a competent accountant could, from the books themselves, ascertain the debtor's financial condition. If that can be done, then the form in which they were kept is of no importance. In re Hammond, [Case No. 5,999]; In re Bellis, [Id.

1,275;] In re Solomon, [Id. 13,167;] In re Gay, [Id. 5,279;] In re Schumpert, [Id. 12,491;] In re Garrison, [Id. 5,254;] In re Bartenbach, [Id. 1,068.]

Archenbrowne was a merchant tailor, and did work and sold goods both on credit and for cash. So far as the books kept by him of work done and goods sold on credit, I do not see as there is any just cause of complaint, although the accounts were kept in a loose and rather informal manner. For several months before his bankruptcy he kept no account of his business done for cash, and the account he kept previously is very unsatisfactory and quite unintelligible. It seems to have been a sort of running memorandum of work done, without any distinction as to whether it was for cash or on credit, and the item of cash received and cash paid out is often without any indication as to whether it was on account or how otherwise; and his accounts with his customers where a balance appears against them upon his books are very often marked "settled," without saying how, whether by note, cash, or barter. For a time he seems to have kept an account with his creditors—those of whom he purchased stock, but even this seems to have been discontinued for more than a year before his bankruptcy. Without going further into details, it must suffice to say that his books do not come anywhere near to what would be the lowest degree of the list above laid down. I am satisfied from the proofs that Archenbrowne had no intent, in his failure to keep proper books of account, to defraud his creditors. Neither does it appear that any fraud upon or loss to creditors has resulted from it; but these elements do not enter into the calculation. The fact that he did not keep proper books of accounts is made by the act a cause for refusing to discharge, without any reference to the intent or the result. I am therefore constrained, however reluctantly, to refuse his petition for a discharge. In addition to the cases already cited, see In re Littlefield, [Case No. 8,398;] In re White, [Id. 17,532;] In re Newman, [Id. 10,175;] In re Burgess, [Id. 2,153.] Discharge refused.

Case No. 506.

In re ARCHER.

[9 Ben. 427; 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 110.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1878.

INCOME TAX.

1. It is not within the purview of sections 3172 to 3182 of the Revised Statutes that unpaid income-taxes are now to be assessed and collected through the machinery provided by those sections, or that the examinations which are solely a part of such machinery should now take place.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Where a person made sworn returns of his income each year from 1866 to 1872, and paid income-taxes accordingly, the commissioner of internal revenue could not, in 1878, under section 3182, make a new or corrected list in respect to the income-taxes of such person for those years, because the fifteen months named in that section had elapsed.

R. M. Sherman, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Dudley Field, for Mr. Archer.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The order to show cause is an order to show cause why an attachment should not issue, as for a contempt, "as provided by section 3175 of the Revised Statutes of the United States." That section applies only to persons summoned under sections 3173 and 3174. The proceedings which resulted in the order to show cause are, on the face of the papers, based specifically on those three sections only. The summons was one "to produce all books of account containing entries of your business transactions, and relating to the trade or business of yourself, from January 1st, 1866, to January 1st, 1872, which you may have in your possession, custody or care, and to give evidence, according to your knowledge, respecting the liability of yourself as an income-tax payer, to an excise duty or tax under the internal revenue laws of the United States."

The three sections above cited are part of a scheme looking solely to the assessment and collection of taxes through the machinery of assessment and collection by the warrant of the collector. This appears from the tenor of the three sections themselves, and of section 3172, and of the sections which follow section 3175. Whether the case be one of neglect to render a return, or of the rendering of a false return, section 3176 shows that the object of the examination of books and the taking of testimony under section 3173 is to enable the collector or deputy collector to make a correct list or return, and to enable the commissioner of internal revenue to assess the tax on objects liable to tax. I do not think it is within the purview of the sections referred to, even including section 3182, that unpaid income-taxes are now to be assessed and collected through the machinery provided by those sections, or that the examinations which are solely a part of such machinery should now take place. Moreover, in the present case, Mr. Archer made sworn returns of his income each year during the period named in the summons, and paid income-taxes accordingly. Therefore, under section 3182, the commissioner of internal revenue could not now make a new or corrected list in respect to the income-taxes of Mr. Archer for the years named in the summons, because the fifteen months named in section 3182 have elapsed.

I do not think there is anything in section 3163 as to the power of supervisors, in connection with the provision of the act of August 15, 1876, (19 Stat. 152,) which varies the view above taken of the sections on which this proceeding is based, or which can uphold it.

The application for the attachment is denied.

Case No. 507.

The ARCHER.

[9 Ben. 455.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1878.

CARGO AND FREIGHT—BONDING—SECURITY— CHANGE OF CLAIM.

1. A vessel, cargo, and freight being attached on a libel on a bottomry bond, the owner of the cargo moved for leave to bond in its value less the freight on paying the freight into court, and the libellant, opposing, moved for a sale of the cargo: Held, That, as it appeared likely that the proceeds of the sale of the vessel alone would be sufficient to meet the demand of the libellant, if proved, the sale of the cargo would not be ordered; but the cargo must be bonded in its full value and not less freight.

2. It is no reason for refusing to a libellant any part of the customary security, that he seems to have much more than enough security.

3. A claimant of a vessel, filed a claim in which he averred that he was a mortgagee in possession. The libellant denied his right to appear and claim, and on a reference it was determined that the claimant was a mortgagee in possession. Thereafter he applied for leave to withdraw that claim and file a new one averring that he was the owner of the vessel. The libellant objected. Held, That the motion would be granted, no other party having been affected by the proceedings or suffering prejudice.

[4. Cited in The Two Marys, 10 Fed. 925, to the point that a common law lien is enforceable under the general power of a court of admiralty.]

[In admiralty. For a subsequent hearing in this case on motion to take out of registry the proceeds of sale of the vessel upon giving the customary bond, see The Archer, Case No. 508.]

Theodore F. Meyer and R. D. Benedict, for libellant.

W. W. Goodrich, for claimant of vessel.

Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for claimant of cargo.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a libel on a bottomry bond against vessel, cargo, and freight. The vessel, cargo, and freight having been attached, and claimants having appeared for vessel and freight and also for cargo, the claimant of the cargo now moves to be allowed, on paying the freight into court, to bond the cargo for its value in this port, less the freight. The claimant of the vessel consents; the libellant objects. The ground of the motion is that the extreme interest of the owner of the cargo in the cargo, on which the libellant can have obtained security by the bottomry bond, is the value of the cargo in this port, less the freight; that the master cannot have hypothecated what was not at risk; that when the bond was given it covered only the value of the cargo as it was in the foreign port where the bottomry bond was given; that the amount of the freight has been added to that value, and that if the owner of the cargo pays the freight and is made liable also for the full value of the cargo, he will have to pay freight twice, while all that he has at risk is the cargo, which he may, if he will, abandon, without paying freight.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

But I am referred to no statute, rule, or decision which authorizes the bonding of property in the custody of the court for less than its actual value, and it seems to me that all equities as between the owner of the cargo and the libellant, growing out of the fact that the freight is paid into court, and the other circumstances referred to, should be considered and determined upon the hearing of the cause. If the libellant is not entitled as against the cargo or its owner to a larger sum than the value of the cargo in this port, less the freight which he will have paid, his equity in that regard will not be affected or impaired by his giving bond for the value of the cargo. However plain his apparent equity may be, it should not be determined on this motion. The libellant claims to hold a lien on vessel, cargo, and freight, and he, having attached them, may well object to any of the property attached being taken from the custody of the court without the customary security for its value, and the fact that he seems to have much more than sufficient security, is no reason for depriving him of any part of it.

A motion is also made on behalf of the libellant for the discharge and sale of the cargo, which consists of empty petroleum barrels.

Upon the affidavits, it appears that the proceeds of the vessel are likely to be sufficient to discharge the libellant's claim. The cargo will not, therefore, be ordered sold against the opposition of the claimant of the cargo, but if it shall not be bonded nor sold with the consent of the claimant, an order may be entered for its discharge from the vessel within ten days before the time fixed for the sale of the vessel.

A motion is also made by the claimant of the vessel to withdraw his claim filed on the 22d day of March, 1878, and to substitute another claim filed by him on the 12th of April. In the first he claimed as mortgagee in possession; in the second, as owner.

When the first claim was put in, his right to appear and claim was denied, and upon a reference to the clerk and the clerk's report it was determined that he was mortgagee in possession.

Notwithstanding what has taken place, I think the claimant should be allowed to state his claim in the form which he now prefers. The question whether he is owner, or mortgagee in possession, is rather a question of law than a question of fact. The claimant does not now, by his new claim, seek to deny or controvert any of the facts relied upon by him upon the reference to determine his former claim, and I cannot see that any other party has been affected in any way by the proceedings so as to suffer prejudice from the granting of this motion.

Motion granted that the claim filed April 12th, 1878, stand as the claim of said Harrison, claimant of the vessel, upon payment of the costs of the reference under his former claim.

Case No. 508.

The ARCHER.

[10 Ben. 99.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 1878.

PRACTICE—BONDING PROCEEDS OF VESSEL.

1. A libel was filed against a vessel on a bottomry bond. The default of all persons was entered except that of a claimant who was in possession at the time of the attachment of the vessel, claiming under mortgages overdue and unpaid. The vessel was sold and the proceeds paid into court. Both parties applied for leave to bond the proceeds. The libellants claimed that evidence already taken by the claimant, if unexplained or uncontradicted, established their right to the amount of their bottomry bond as against the vessel: Held, That, though, in a clear case, when the rights of the libellant were admitted, the court might permit him to take the money from the registry on giving proper security for its return, such was not this case, the libellants' right being denied in the pleadings, and the court would not prejudice it on a partial production of the evidence.

2. Motion of the libellants denied and motion of the claimant granted.

[In admiralty. Heard on motion of claimants to take out of registry the proceeds of sale of the vessel upon giving the customary bond. For report of hearing on the merits, see The Archer, Case No. 507.]

T. F. Meyer and R. D. Benedict, for libellants.

W. W. Goodrich, for claimants.

CHOATE, District Judge. Upon a libel on a bottomry bond, default having been entered against all persons except the claimants who, at the time of the attachment of the vessel, were in possession, claiming under mortgages overdue and unpaid, the vessel has been sold and the proceeds paid into the registry. The claimants now move for leave to take out of the registry the proceeds, upon giving the customary bond. The libellants also move to be allowed to take out the money on giving bonds, on the ground that the testimony already taken in the cause by the claimants, if unexplained or uncontradicted, establishes the right of the libellants to the amount of their bottomry bond as against the vessel. In a clear case, where the right of the libellant is virtually admitted, he might be permitted to take the proceeds from the registry, giving suitable security for its return; but that is not this case. The right of the libellants is disputed upon the pleadings, and the question can not be prejudged upon a partial production of the testimony. Their motion must therefore be denied. The claimants should be allowed to bond the proceeds, as they would have been entitled to bond the vessel, if still in the custody of the marshal. Their possession of the property has been interrupted by the process of the court to enable the libellants to prove their claim against it, and the same reasons which make it proper that parties from whose possession the vessel is taken should be allowed to bond her, make it also proper and right that they should on the like terms receive the possession of the money into which the vessel has been converted. The system of bonding is intended to mitigate the hardships attendant upon the seizure of the property, while at the same time affording to parties having claims to assert against it a reasonable security for payment of their claims. Upon the bonding of the proceeds the libellants will have all the security that libellants ordinarily have.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Motion of claimants granted.

ARCHER v. The ADRIATIC. See Cases Nos. 89, 90, and 91.

ARCHER, (PLATT v.) See Cases Nos. 11,213 and 11,214.

Case No. 509.

ARCHER v. POOR.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 542.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1830.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An acknowledgment of a claim is not sufficient to take a case out of the statute of limitations.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit for use and occupation. To take the case out of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff offered in evidence the defendant's letter to the secretary of the navy, in which he says, "I could have availed myself of the insolvent laws of the District, but preferred paying all debts as soon as possible, not omitting Mr. Archer's claim."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Judge, absent) said it was not a sufficient acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute. See Wetzell Bussard, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 309, and Bank of U. S. v. Moore, [Moore v. Bank of Columbia,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 93.

Mr. Dermott, for plaintiff.

Mr. Bradley, for defendant.

[NOTE. In Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch, (12 U. S.) 72, Chief Justice Marshall held that it is not enough to take the case out of the act that the claim should be proved or be acknowledged to have been originally just, but that the acknowledgment must go to the fact that it is still due. See Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 351; Kampshall v. Goodman, Case No. 7,605. To take a case out of the act, there must be an express promise to pay, or circumstances from which an implied promise may fairly be presumed, in addition to the admission of a present subsisting debt. Moore v. Bank of Columbia, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 86. See, contra, Cowan v. Magauran, Case No. 3,292. For other cases in which acknowledgments have been held sufficient, see Arnold v. Dexter, Case No. 557; Penaro v. Flourney, Id. 10,916. Held insufficient in Thompson v. Peter, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 565.]

ARCHER, (TAYLOR v.) See Case No. 13,778.

ARCHER, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,464.

Case No. 509a.

The ARCTIC.

[1 Brown, Adm. 347.]¹

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Nov., 1871.

PRACTICE—SECURITY FOR COSTS IN WAGES CASES.

A seaman suing for his wages cannot be compelled to give security for costs for the sole cause that the amount claimed is small, and the indebtedness is denied in the answer.

In admiralty. Motion for security for costs. The libel in this case was for seaman's wages. The answer denied there was anything due to libellants. The claims, as set up in the libel, were for small amounts, being for $5, and $11.46, respectively. The motion was founded upon the facts that the claims set up are small in amount, and the denial of any indebtedness contained in the answer.

W. A. Moore, for the motion.

E. E. Kane, opposed.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. It is conceded that under rules 9 and 10 of this court, this motion is addressed exclusively to the discretion of the court. Unless the court is prepared to say that in all such cases where the amount claimed is small and the indebtedness is denied, without any showing of improvidence or bad faith in the bringing of the suit, security for costs shall be given, the motion in this case cannot be granted. The exemption of seamen from giving security for costs in suits for wages, under the proviso to rule 9, is general. No distinction is made as to the amount claimed, and I can find no authority for the court to make any such distinction without an amendment or abrogation of the proviso. And to say that security shall be required in all cases where the indebtedness is denied by the answer, without any showing of bad faith, would be a practical abrogation of the proviso in a great majority of cases; because, that is usually the very question involved, and to try which the suit is brought.

¹[Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

¹[Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Common seamen are often transient persons, having no fixed place of residence, and generally of no pecuniary responsibility, and therefore unable to give security. It is upon this presumed inability that the exception is founded. To require them to give security in all cases would be a virtual denial of justice, and would place them at the mercy of their employers. They must not, however, abuse the privilege; and in all cases where the presumption of their inability to give security is overthrown, or it is satisfactorily shown that bad faith has been practiced in bringing the suit, or that the suit was unnecessarily brought, the court would not hesitate to exercise the discretion reserved by rule 10, and require security to be given. See Wheatley v. Hotchkiss, [Case No. 17,483.]

Motion denied.

ARCTIC, Cargo of The, (CRAPO v.) See Case No. 3,361.

ARCTIC, The, (GEORGE v.) See Case No. 5,330.

ARCTIC OIL CO., (NATIONAL FILTERING OIL CO. v.) See Case No. 10,042.

ARCTURUS, The, (TIBBITTS v.) See Case No. 14,021.

Case No. 509b.

ARCULARIUS v. STAPLES.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 586.]

District Court, S. D. New York. March Term. 1859.

ADMIRALTY — JURISDICTION — STATE LAW—HALF PILOTAGE — DEFAULT JUDGMENT — VACATION—LACHES.

[1. Act Aug. 7, 1789, (1 Stat. 53,) enacts that "all pilots in the harbors of the United States shall continue to be regulated in accordance with the existing laws of the state;" and by a law of the state of New York a pilot is entitled to receive one-half legal pilot fees from the master of a vessel who refuses to employ or receive such pilot on board. Held, that the right to half pilotage is not cognizable by the admiralty side of the district court, but is a legal right triable only on the common law side.]

[2. An action for pilotage commenced June 7, 1857, was by both parties put on the calendar for hearing, and was noticed by libellant from term to term until January 29, 1859, when a default was taken, and the case referred to a commissioner, who made his report February 19, 1859. On March 1, 1859, defendant filed his answer, denying the allegations of the libel, and gave written notice of a motion to set aside all proceedings as coram non iudice, and void. Held, that the irregularities and laches of defendant, unexplained by him, debarred him of the right to set aside the libellant's proceedings by such a form of motion.]

[In admiralty. Action by Benjamin F. Arcularius against Capt. Staples for pilot fees. Judgment by default for libellant. Defendant moves to set aside all proceedings as coram non iudice and void. Motion denied.]

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a licensed Hell Gate pilot, against the master of a sailing vessel belonging to the state of Maine, to recover fees fixed by the laws of the state of New York. The charge was that the pilot offered his services to the master to pilot the vessel, then going through Hell Gate. The master refused to employ or receive him on board. By the laws of the state of New York the pilot is entitled to receive one-half legal pilot fees from the master for such refusal and that such fees amount to $5.25. The action has been prosecuted to default and reference to a commissioner, and a report made by the commissioner, finding that the sum was due to the pilot. The master applied to the court to set aside all the proceedings as coram non iudice and void. The pilot opposed the motion as irregular, and on the ground that the master has waived, by his acquiescence and laches, all claim to relief.

The action was commenced June 7, 1857, and was by both parties put upon the calendar for hearing; and it was noticed by the libellant every term till January 29, 1859, when the default was taken, and the case was referred to a commissioner who made his report Feb. 19, 1859. On the 1st of March instant, the defendant filed his answer denying the allegations of the libel and to the jurisdiction of the court, giving written notice of this motion.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction on general principles of maritime law, as in pilotage, service was performance. The right of action is claimed under a statutory provision of the legislature of this state. The act of congress of August 7, 1789, [1 Stat. 53, § 4.] enacts that all pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors and ports of the United States, shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the states, respectively wherein such pilots may be, or with such laws as the states may respectively hereafter enact for the purpose until further legislative provision shall be made by congress.

If by power of this statute the state law becomes also a law of the United States in respect to the provision giving compensation to pilots who are prepared and tender their services but are refused by masters of vessels, and actually render none, it would not make the right so conferred one of which this court can take cognizance on the admiralty side. It would become a legal right triable on the common law side of the court only. "The irregularity and laches of the defendant unaccounted for on his part, debar him of the right to set aside libellant's proceeding by this form of motion;" but the court will feel compelled to withhold its further action in suffering the interlocutory judgment obtained by the libellant, for want of jurisdiction over the subject matter.

Order accordingly, but without costs.

Case No. 510.

ARDEN v. BROWN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 121.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1830.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS — SALE OF LAND AT PUBLIC AUCTION—EQUITABLE INTEREST—PAROL AGREEMENT BETWEEN PURCHASERS.

1. Sales at public auction are not within the statute of frauds.
2. The statute of enrolment of conveyances, 1766, c. 14, relates to estates at law only, not to the transfer of equitable interests.
3. A contract to sell land, or an equitable interest in land, is not void for want of acknowledgment and enrolment.
4. A parol agreement among the purchasers at a public sale, is void under the statute of frauds.

In equity. Bill in equity, filed August 14, 1829, stating that the plaintiff, on the 12th of July, 1826, purchased, for a valuable consideration, half of H. Langley's interest in the property called the Indian Queen Hotel, in Washington, District of Columbia, which interest was one seventh. That Langley, by an instrument in writing, signed by him, assigned to plaintiff one half of that interest, and to the defendant, Jesse Brown, the other half. That Langley was a joint purchaser with the defendant, Brown, and others, of the whole premises, in the name of Brown, who received a conveyance of the same from the commissioners, who sold the same under a decree of this court, in the Case of Crawford's Heirs. That the plaintiff had offered repeatedly, to the commissioners, to comply with the terms of the sale, for the moiety of Langley's interest, but that they refused to permit him so to do. That Brown has refused to recognize him as assignee of Langley, &c.

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiff.

Mr. Marbury and Mr. Cox, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, after stating the substance of the bill, answer, and evidence, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: In bar of the plaintiff's claim, under the assignment of Mr. Langley, the defendant pleads the statute of frauds, and the statute of enrolment of conveyances. Sales at auction are considered out of the statute of frauds, because it has been decided that the auctioneer, or his clerk, is the agent of the purchaser, and authorized by him to sign his name in the sales-book which contains the terms of sale; and that his entry in the book is a memorandum in writing, of the agreement, signed by a person thereunto lawfully authorized by the person to be charged therewith agreeably to the 4th section of the statute of 29 Car. II. c. 3. Mr. Langley, therefore, on the 12th of July, 1826, had a valid interest in the property, which he could, in equity, assign. His assignment to Mr. Arden was by a written agreement, signed by both of them, and therefore not within the statute of frauds.

The statute of enrolment of conveyance, 1766, c. 14, relates to estates at law only, not to the transfer of equitable interests. The words are, "No estate of inheritance, or freehold, or any declaration or limitation of use, or any estate for above seven years, shall pass or take effect, except the deed or conveyance by which the same be intended to pass or take effect, shall be acknowledged," &c., and enrolled, &c. It is believed that it has never been decided, that a contract to sell land, or an equitable interest in land, is void for want of acknowledgment and enrolment. Neither the statute of frauds nor the statute of enrolment is a bar to plaintiff's claim, under the assignment of Mr. Langley. On the 13th of July, 1826, the plaintiff had as good a right to complete the sale, by a compliance with its terms, as Mr. Langley had. The time for complying with the terms of sale was not limited by the advertisement, nor by any verbal notice at the time of sale. The terms advertised, were: "One fourth of the purchase-money in six months, the remainder in equal instalments of one, two, three, four, and five years; the interest to be paid annually upon the whole amount; the several payments to be secured in such manner as the commissioners may hereafter determine and fix upon." A reasonable time, therefore, must have been allowed for the purchasers to obtain and tender to the commissioners the security for the payment of the purchase-money.

The plaintiff, in his bill, has averred that he repeatedly offered to comply with the terms of sale, for the moiety of Langley's interest; but he does not say when he made the offer, nor that it was made before the commissioners had returned Mr. Brown, as the purchaser. Nor does it appear by any averment or evidence in this cause, that the commissioners had any notice of the plaintiff's claim, as assignee of Langley, until after they had made their report to the court. The defendant, indeed, does not deny that the offer was made, but he avers, that if any agreement was made, by which the plaintiff acquired any interest in the purchase, he never complied with the terms thereof, nor made the payments, nor gave the securities required by the conditions of sale. If the commissioners had no notice of the plaintiff's claim, as assignee of Mr. Langley, they could have received from him no offer to comply with the terms of sale, as to that portion of the property; and there is no pretence that Mr. Langley had ever offered to comply with those terms, as to any part of the property. The commissioners were the sole judges of the security to be offered, and of the time within which it should be received, as a compliance with the terms of sale. It was certainly too late to offer it, after the commissioners had reported to the court, and returned Mr. Brown as the purchaser and he had complied with the terms of sale. The plaintiff, by the assignment from Mr. Langley, acquired only an inchoate right—a right to complete the sale, by giving the requisite security in a reasonable time. There is no complaint that a reasonable time was not given, and no evidence that the security was offered within that time. The plaintiff's right, therefore, was never complete, and he lost the benefit of his inchoate right by not complying with the terms of sale. But the plaintiff claims to be considered as a joint purchaser of one seventh of the property, under a verbal agreement among the purchasers, on the evening of the day after the sale. This, however, being a mere verbal agreement, is void under the statute of frauds. Upon the whole, therefore, the court is of opinion that the plaintiff has not made out any claim to the property which can be supported either in law or in equity, and that his bill must be dismissed with costs. The other judges concurred.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

ARDEN, (SMITH v.) See Case No. 13,003.
ARDEN, (YATES v.) See Case No. 18,128.

Case No. 511.

• ARDREY v. KARTHAUS.

[Taney, 379.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1836.

SEAMEN—"FREIGHT THE MOTHER OF WAGES"— PRIZE CAPTURE—CONDEMNATION.

1. A vessel owned by the respondent, a citizen of the United States, was captured by a British cruiser, during the last war with Great Britain, near San Andres, in Spain, within a mile of the shore, and within the jurisdiction of Spain, with which nation the United States were then at peace: the owner put in a claim, under the Florida treaty, on the ground that Spain had not discharged her neutral obligations in this matter, and was bound, therefore, to make reparation for the injury sustained by him: he was allowed, on account of such claim, for the vessel and cargo, and for the outward freight, but the amount awarded and received fell far short of the amount found to be due: the libellant was mate of the vessel, at the time of the capture, and was detained as a prisoner of war, until exchanged, when he returned to the United States, after the lapse of more than a year from the time he had left, having earned no wages after he left the vessel. On a libel filed by him against the owner of the vessel, to recover his wages up to the time of his return to the United States: Held, That where freight is earned, or damages recovered in lieu of it, the seamen are entitled to wages.

[See Adams v. The Sophia, Case No. 65.]

2. That the only exception to this rule is, the case of recovery against the underwriters.

[See The Saratoga, Case No. 12,355, and The Two Catherines, Id. 14,288.]

3. That capture by a public enemy forms no such exception.

4. That wages were recoverable in this case only to the day of condemnation, and that no deduction should be made from them, on account of the insufficiency of the sum received by the owner to cover his whole loss.

In admiralty. Circuit court, April term, 1836. Appeal from the district court, in admiralty.

This was an appeal from the decree of the district court, upon a libel filed by Ardrey for wages, against Karthaus, the respondent. Ardrey shipped as a mate on board the schooner Baltimore, owned by Karthaus, who loaded her on his own account, and she sailed from Baltimore for Bordeaux, during the last war with Great Britain; being driven out of her course by the pursuit of enemies, she was finally captured by a British cruiser, on the voyage from San Andres, in Spain, within a mile of the shore, and within the jurisdiction of Spain, with which nation the United States were then at peace. She was carried into San Andres, and detained there a few days, and then carried to an English port, where she was condemned as prize, and the libellant, who had remained on board until her arrival in England, was detained as prisoner of war; after some considerable detention, he was exchanged and returned to the United States at least twelve months after he sailed, but as soon as he could, after his release by the enemy, and having earned no wages after he left this vessel. Karthaus put in a claim under the Florida treaty, upon the ground, that Spain had not discharged her neutral obligations to the United States in this matter, and was therefore bound to make reparation for the injury sustained, and that this was among the wrongs provided for by that treaty. The commissioners decided in favor of the claim for vessel and cargo, and also including freight on the outward voyage, and the respondent received the amount awarded, but which, like all other awards under that treaty, fell far short of the amount found to be due, because the fund provided by the treaty fell short of the valid claims against Spain. The libellant claimed wages until his return to the United States; many objections were raised, and the points fully argued on both sides; the libel was dismissed in the district court, where the decree was pro forma, and the case brought to the circuit court by appeal from this decree. The points discussed in the argument will be seen from the opinion delivered by the court.

¹ [Reported by James Mason Campbell, Esq., and her: reprinted by permission.]

J. Glenn, for appellant.

C. F. Mayer, for appellee.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The main point in this case appears to be a new one, and we are not aware of any case in which it has been directly decided; we must form our judgment, therefore, upon those principles which have been settled in analogous cases. The general rule is, that freight is the mother of wages, and where freight is earned, or damages recovered in lieu of it, the seamen are entitled to wages. It has frequently happened that, after the capture of a neutral vessel, and condemnation and sale, the sentence has been reversed in the appellate court, and restoration ordered, and in such cases, where the owner recovers freight, the seamen are, undoubtedly, entitled to wages. The only exception to the rule is, the case of recovery against the underwriters. But that exception stands entirely on principles of policy; for as a seaman is not permitted to insure his own wages (and such a contract of insurance would be void in law), he cannot, for the same reason, protect his wages under the insurance of the owner; for that would allow him to accomplish indirectly what he is not permitted to accomplish directly.

We are not aware of any other exception to the rule above mentioned. The case of collision at sea has been referred to. Without meaning to impeach the decision in the case cited from the Massachusetts Reports,² it may be proper to say, that no other case has been adduced upon the same subject, nor does the point appear to have been very deliberately examined in that case. It can, therefore, hardly be regarded as a settled rule of law, and if it could be so regarded, there are reasons sufficient to distinguish it from damages paid for freight under a decree of restitution, or by public treaty, or any other analogous proceeding. For as the damages given by a jury in a case of collision, would be a gross sum, it would commonly be difficult, and often impossible, to ascertain whether freight was allowed or not, for the voyage; or if allowed at all, to what amount, and upon what principles. The verdict of the jury being for a gross amount of damages, and there being no written and authentic document showing the items which produced this gross amount, it would be difficult, in many cases, by the oral testimony of the jurors, to come to any certain conclusion; for some of the jurors might have arrived at the conclusion as to the proper amount of the result, by allowing freight, some without allowing it, and often the amount would be a compromise of conflicting opinions, without reference to any particular item, or any settled principle agreed on by the whole jury. The case of collision is not, therefore, an exception to the rule, but stands on principles peculiar to itself.

The court consider the general rule to be as above stated; that wherever freight is earned, or damages recovered in lieu of freight, the seamen are entitled to wages, and that the only exception to it is, the case of recovery against the underwriters, which rests upon principles of policy, as above mentioned. It is now contended, that capture by a public enemy ought also to be made another exception to the rule; the court do not see any principle of justice upon which this exception can be introduced; and they certainly would not be disposed, in the absence of any precedent, to sanction such an exception upon mere technical principles. If, in this case, after the capture, there was no spes recuperandi, and the case on that account distinguishable from the capture of a neutral, it would not affect the application of the rule; for, if without hope, and even against hope, the owner afterwards recovered damages in lieu of freight, the claim to wages is within both the letter and the spirit of the rule before stated. The wages of the seamen depend upon a fact—was freight earned? or were damages recovered by the owner in lieu of freight? If either of these facts is shown, it is sufficient; it does not matter whether the owner had or had not a right to hope for such an issue, upon strict legal principles. It is well settled that, in case of capture by an enemy, if the vessel is recaptured and freight earned, the seamen are entitled to their wages for the voyage. It would be difficult, indeed, to find a reason why they should not be entitled to wages in such a case, and equally difficult to assign a reason why they should not be also entitled, where the vessel, or the value of it, was restored to the owner, from any cause whatever, and damages paid to him in lieu of his freight.

But in this case there was a well-grounded spes recuperandi; for although, as between the American owner and the British captor, the American owner had no right to complain, nor any defence to make against condemnation in the prize courts of England; yet, as the capture was made within the territorial limits of Spain, and Spain was neutral, the American had a right to demand protection from the Spanish government; Spain was bound to interpose, and if she did not, she failed in her neutral obligations, and the American had a right to demand compensation from her. A neutral power is not at liberty to decide, according to her own convenience, whether she will perform her neutral obligations or not; she is bound to perform them, and if she fails to do so, she becomes herself responsible for the injury which she ought to have prevented. In this case, the Spanish authorities ought to have restored the vessel to the owner when she was brought into San Andres; having failed to do so, the government was bound, through its minister, to have interposed before condemnation in England, and to have demanded her restoration; and if this demand had been made, the vessel could not have been lawfully condemned in England, but must have been restored. The American had a right to suppose that Spain would perform her neutral duties, and that England, upon her application, would restore the vessel. There was, therefore, a well-grounded spes recuperandi, if such a state of things could be deemed necessary to entitle the seamen to wages. The result has proved that there was foundation for a hope of recovery, for Spain has acknowledged the obligation, and paid the damages—or what amounts to the same thing, the commissioners have so decided, and the owner has recovered damages for the loss of his vessel, and for freight; and the recovery is against Spain, and founded upon the failure of Spain to perform her neutral duty.

²[See Frothingham v. Prince, 3 Mass. 563.]

The seamen being entitled to wages, the next question is, for what time? The libellant remained in the vessel until she was condemned, and the freight allowed is for the outward voyage. In the case of a neutral, wrongfully captured by a belligerent, and which the nation or its courts afterwards restores or pays for, and where freight for the outward voyage has been allowed, the seamen are entitled to wages up to the time of condemnation. The reason given is, that as the seaman has a right to suppose that the capturing nation and its tribunals will do their duty, he has a well-grounded hope that the vessel will be restored and allowed to proceed on her voyage, and that his services will, therefore, be needed. The same foundation for hope existed in this case; the owner had a right to expect that Spain would demand the release of the vessel, and that she would be accordingly restored; and allowed to proceed on her voyage; and that hope was not lost until the condemnation in the prize courts of England. This case, therefore, is entirely analogous to the capture of a neutral on her outward voyage, and when after condemnation and sale, the owner receives compensation in damages. The libellant is, therefore, entitled to wages up to the day of condemnation, but no longer.

The remaining question is, whether an account is to be taken, and the wages to be reduced pro rata, on account of the expenses to which the owners have been subjected in prosecuting this claim, and on account also of the reduction to which they were compelled to submit, by reason of the deficiency of the fund out of which they were to be paid. The case of Sheppard v. Taylor, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675, appears to be conclusive on this point. According to the principles adjudicated in that case, the freight and the ship itself, to its last plank, are liable to wages. The claim of the seamen is a preferred one, to be paid without any deduction for the losses or expenses of the owners; and damages in lieu of freight, or in lieu of the ship, stand on the same footing, according to this decision, with the freight or ship itself, and the wages are not liable to be charged for any share of the expenses which the owner incurred in prosecuting his claim for reparation—nor are they liable to abatement on account of the reduction of his compensation, occasioned by the insufficiency of the fund out of which he is compelled to accept payment. It is admitted, that the amount recovered for the ship and freight greatly exceeds the amount due for wages, upon the principles hereinbefore stated; and the libellant is, therefore, entitled to the full amount of his wages, up to the day of condemnation, deducting only the amount heretofore received by him. The decree of the district court is, therefore, reversed, and a decree made in favor of the libellant for the sum of $184.49 and costs.

Case No. 512.

ARDREY v. WADSWORTH.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 109.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1802.

INSOLVENCY—EFFECT OF DISCHARGE—PENDING ACTION.

A plaintiff who has been discharged under the insolvent act of Maryland, of 1774, since the commencement of the action, is still competent to maintain it.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit. Non assumpsit and issue. The defendant offered evidence that the plaintiff had been released under the insolvent act of 1774, c. 28, since the bringing of this suit, and contended that the plaintiff's right of action was transferred to the marshal, and so the plaintiff has no subsisting cause of action.

THE COURT was of opinion that the plaintiff can still support the action. CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting.

[NOTE. Act Md. 1774, c. 28, provided for the discharge of an insolvent debtor from imprisonment in certain cases, upon his filing a schedule of his assets, and turning the same over to the sheriff for the benefit of his creditors. Repealed by Act 1817, c. 183.]

[Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 513.

The A. R. DUNLAP.

[1 Lowell, 350.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July, 1869.

MARITIME LIENS—SUPPLIES—STEVEDORE'S LIEN—ORDER OF PAYMENT—ATTACHMENT.

1. If it be necessary for libellants to show that the owners of a vessel were not in good credit at the time the supplies were furnished, evidence that the vessel was attached for a common-law debt of the owners in a foreign port, and that they did not dissolve the attachment, and that the master, who was a part-owner, was obliged to mortgage his share of the vessel to procure her release, is sufficient proof of a want of credit.

[Cited in The Tangier, Case No. 13,744; The Clotilda, Id. 2,903; Nippert v. The Williams, 39 Fed. 826.]

2. If a vessel is attached in a foreign port in a suit at common law against the owners, money advanced to pay this debt does not constitute a lien on the vessel, although the owners had no funds, and the master could obtain the release of the vessel in no other way.

[Cited in The Clotilda, Case No. 2,903; Nippert v. The J. B. Williams, 42 Fed. 542.]

3. The taking of a mortgage by persons furnishing supplies as collateral security does not prevent their enforcing the lien given by the maritime law.

[Cited in Nippert v. The Williams, 39 Fed. 828.]

4. Money advanced to pay a debt which is a lien on the vessel, constitutes a lien.

5. A stevedore has no lien on a vessel.

[Cited in The Tangier, Case No. 13,744; The Benjamin English, Id. 1,306; The E. A. Barnard, 2 Fed. 715; The Gilbert Knapp, 37 Fed. 211. Disapproved in The George T. Kemp, Case No. 5,341; Roberts v. The Windermere, 2 Fed. 726; The Canada, 7 Fed. 119, 121.]

6. The decision in the case of The Antarctic, [Case No. 479,] as to appropriation of payments, does not apply to a running account, and require the creditor to satisfy all the items for which he has no lien. In such a case the law will appropriate the payments to the items in the order of their dates.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,005.]

7. The case of Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359, discussed.

[Cited in Nippert v. The Williams, 39 Fed. 828.]

In admiralty. Supplies furnished a Nova Scotian vessel in New York.—The vessel was attached in New York in a suit in a common-law court for a debt of two of the owners. The master, who was owner of one-third of the vessel, after writing to his owners and finding that they could do nothing to release the vessel, borrowed a sum of money from the libellants to pay this common-law debt, and gave a mortgage upon his share of the vessel to secure this sum, and also to secure them for supplies which they were to furnish the vessel to enable her to go to sea. These supplies were furnished, and supplies were also furnished at subsequent times on different voyages. The master from time to time paid the earnings of the vessel to the libellants who gave him credit on account. The vessel was afterwards proceeded against in rem in Boston, and mortgagees of the shares of the vessel not owned by the master appeared as claimants. The vessel not being released on bail, and no security for her value being given, she was sold by order of court under the eleventh admiralty rule and her proceeds paid into court.

¹[Reported by John Lathrop, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

John Lathrop, for libellants.

1. The libellants are not bound as a part of their case in chief to prove that the owners of the vessel had no credit in New York, and that the supplies could not have been obtained upon their personal credit. The interpretation put upon the case of Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359, by Judge Sprague in The Sarah Starr, [Case No. 12,354,] and since followed by this court, is erroneous, and the court is respectfully asked to reconsider it. In Pratt v. Reed, [supra,] there was no evidence that the coal had been supplied on the credit of the vessel, and the libel was properly dismissed. The term "necessity for a credit," which is used by the court in that case, has been interpreted to mean that the libellant must, in the first instance, show that there was such a necessity, and that the owner had no credit. By the law, as it was understood before Pratt v. Reed, [supra,] a necessity for a credit was presumed. The libellant started with this presumption. The claimant of the vessel might rebut it by showing that the master had funds which he ought to use and that the lender knew it, or that the master was guilty of fraud and the lender connived at it. It is true that the court in Pratt v. Reed, [supra,] said: "But the more serious difficulty in the case on the part of the libellant is the entire absence of any proof to show that there was also a necessity, at the time of procuring the supplies, for a credit upon the vessel." This may refer to the libellant's evidence in chief, or to his evidence in reply. If to the former, the case has changed a well-established rule of law. If to the latter, no change has been made. That this form of expression does not necessarily denote that the evidence in chief was meant, is conclusively shown by the language of the court in a case decided at the same term: Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22, 31. In that case the rule is thus stated by Mr. Justice Curtis: "To constitute a case of apparent necessity, not only must the repairs and supplies be needful, but it must be apparently necessary for the master to have a credit to procure them." If the learned judge had stopped here, it might well be argued that the libellant must show the necessity for a credit in the first instance, but he continues: "If the master has funds of his own which he ought to apply to purchase the supplies which he is bound by the contract of hiring to furnish himself, and if he has funds of the owners, which he ought to apply to pay for the repairs, then no case of actual necessity to have a credit exists. And if the lender knows these facts, or has the means, by the use of due diligence, to ascertain them, then no case of apparent necessity exists to have a credit, and the act of the master in procuring a credit does not bind the interest of the general owners in the vessel." This is but a statement of the rule laid down in the case of The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96, 103, where Mr. Justice Story said: "No presumption should arise that such repairs and supplies could be procured upon any reasonable terms, with the credit of the owner, independent of such hypothecation. If, therefore, the master has sufficient funds of the owner within his control, or can procure them upon the general credit of the owner, he is not at liberty to subject the ship to the expensive and disadvantageous lien of an hypothecatory instrument." Here is a clear recognition of the rule that there is no presumption that supplies or repairs can be procured on the credit of the owner, and that this must be shown as a matter of defense. From all these cases it is submitted that the term "necessity for a credit" means merely that if the master has funds and the lender or person furnishing supplies knows it, this may be shown in defence. See The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 554; The Neversink, [Case No. 10, 133;] The James Guy, [Id. 7,196;] same case before Judge Benedict, [Id. 7,195;] The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 624. See, also, The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129.

2. That the owners of the vessel had no credit is fully proved.

3. The money advanced to pay the debt of the owners of the vessel and to release her from arrest constitutes a lien. If the money had not been advanced the vessel must have been sold in New York. See The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409. The master might have given a bottomry bond to release the vessel from arrest: The Vibilia, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 1; Smith v. Gould, 4 Moore, P. C. 21; The Edmond, Lush. 211, 220.

4. The lien was not waived by the taking of collateral security: The Kimball, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 37; Carter v. The Byzantium, [Case No. 2,473;] The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 532; The Nestor, [Case No. 10,126;] The St. Mary, [Id. 12,242;] The West Friesland, Swab. 454; The James Guy, [Case No. 7,195.]

5. Money advanced to pay for supplies constitutes a lien: Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 28.

6. Stevedore's bills constitute a lien: The Medora, [Case No. 9,391;] The Circassian, [Id. 2,722.] In the latter case such a claim would have been allowed had it not been for two cases which were considered as precedents the other way, viz.: The Amstell, [Id. 339;] The Joseph Cunard, [Id. 7,535.] The Amstell was decided on two grounds, 1st. That the labor was performed partly on land and partly on board the vessel; 2d. That credit was not given to the vessel. The first ground is incorrect in law: Wortman v. Griffith, [Id. 18,057.] The second does not apply here, because in our case credit was given to the vessel. In The Joseph Cunard, [supra,] the vessel was chartered and the libellants sought to recover the amount of a bill of exchange drawn by the master in favor of the charterers' agent for disbursements made by the agent at Mobile. The owners of the vessel had an agent at Mobile whose duty it was to attend to all charges against the ship, and the master was specially instructed not to draw bills on the owners for disbursements, and this was known to the charterers and their agent. The case was properly decided on these grounds, and the remarks of the judge are merely dicta.

J. C. Dodge, (T. K. Lothrop, with him,) for the mortgagees.

There never was a lien upon the vessel for any part of the libellants' claim.

In order to create a maritime lien upon a vessel for supplies, there must exist,—

1. A necessity for the supplies themselves; such a necessity as arises only under very special circumstances, and in an unforeseen and unexpected emergency.

2. A necessity for the credit upon the vessel. It must appear affirmatively that the supplies could not be had upon the credit of the owner.

The necessity for the supplies and for the credit must be such necessity as would justify the master in taking up money on a bottomry of the vessel: Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359. I am well aware that the principles above stated are at variance with those upon which courts of admiralty have usually proceeded, but they are all of them established by the supreme court of admiralty in the case cited above, and some of them in Thomas v. Osborn, Id. 22, and must therefore now be regarded as settled.

A bottomry bond made by the master is invalid if it were possible for him before making it to communicate in a reasonable time with his owner: La Ysabel, 1 Dod. 273; Wallace v. Fielden, 7 Moore, P. C. 398. So if the master have funds of the owner in possession or within reach, or can borrow on the personal credit of the owner: 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 143, 144, and cases cited; The Golden Rose, [Case No. 1,658.] So if the bond were given by the master to relieve the vessel from arrest under legal process founded upon a claim that did not itself constitute a lien upon her: The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; The Osmanli, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 198; The Augusta, 1 Dod. 283, 288; The Yuba, [Case No. 18,193;] The North Star, Lush. 45; The Edmond, Id. 57, 66.

We have seen that the foregoing rules of law, well settled in regard to bottomry bonds, are equally applicable to an implied lien:

Pratt v. Reed, ubi supra. Now, looking at the case before the court in the light of these principles, we find.—1. There existed no special circumstances or unforeseen emergency. The vessel was not wrecked nor in distress. The case stands simply upon the ground that she was in a foreign port and needed ordinary supplies. 2. The master might have communicated with his owner and had a reply by mail in a week, by telegraph in an hour. 3. It is not shown, or attempted to be shown, that the owner had not credit in New York when the supplies were furnished. On the contrary, it may be inferred that he had, from the fact that the amount annexed to the libel shows a large remittance from the libellant to the owner. Again, no implied lien would arise unless it was so intended by the parties, or at least, unless the libellants, when they furnished the supplies, intended to rely upon a lien. The fact that they took a mortgage on the property shows that they had no such intent or understanding. The mortgage conveyed the property to them, and a man cannot be presumed to intend a lien upon his own property. Or if he once had a lien, the taking the mortgage was a waiver of the lien. The express lien created by the mortgage is inconsistent with the implied lien now claimed: The Ann C. Pratt, [Case No. 409;] The Nestor, [Id. 10, 126;] The Chusan, [Id. 2,717;] Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige, 20; Little v. Brown, 2 Leigh, 353. If for any of the items of the libellants' bill there ever was a lien upon the vessel, the payments made on account, and not specifically applied by the debtor or creditor at the time of payment, must be regarded as applied by the law to such items: The Antarctic, [Case No. 479.]

There are several items in the account annexed to the libel for stevedore's bills. It is settled that a stevedore has no lien upon the vessel for his services. It follows, of course, that the libellant could acquire no lien by paying for such services. The stream cannot rise higher than the fountain.

LOWELL, District Judge. This brig was owned in Nova Scotia, and the libellants, who reside in New York, present a bill for the disbursements, as they are called, of the brig, furnished by them at New York upon the request of the master, and for a certain other sum of money lent to him, as is presently more fully set forth.

The first part of the case has brought into discussion, as usual, the decision of Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359. That case has been understood to decide that a material-man, in order to maintain his lien, must bring himself within the rule applied to a lender on bottomry, and show not only that the supplies were necessary for the ship, or appeared to be so, but that the master had not, or appeared not to have, funds of the owner in hand to pay for them, and also that the owner had no personal credit on which they could be procured at the place where they were furnished: The Sarah Starr, [Case No. 12,354;] The Sea Lark, [Id. 12,579;] The James Guy, [Id. 7,195;] The Neversink, [Id. 10,132, Id. 10,133.] Accordingly, the main issue in all these cases of late years has been whether the owner had such credit, and judges have been somewhat astute in ascertaining in each particular case that he had not. My own opinion has been guided by those above cited, and I have followed the course of inquiry pointed out in them. A more careful scrutiny of the leading case has brought me to doubt whether it professes to lay down any such principle.

It must be remembered that material-men have often nothing to do with credit at all, any more than other mechanics. If a shipwright puts a new spar into a foreign ship, he expects payment when his work is done. He cannot exact it beforehand, because his labor is furnished from day to day, and the amount is neither liquidated nor due until the last day's work is done. If the master then neglects or refuses to pay him, he brings his libel. It is mere mockery to tell him that the owner is a man of good credit. That is only one more reason why his bill should be paid. The mechanic cannot transmute the owner's credit into money, and the master will not. It is for this reason that he brings his suit, and it is altogether a novel answer to a suit that the person liable to pay is able but unwilling to do so. Such an answer as that, of course, merely amounts to telling the creditor to seek redress at the home of the debtor, which is what he never contracted to do. It was to save him from this necessity, which in most cases would be a total denial of justice, that the lien of material-men was established throughout the mercantile world; and it is for this reason, probably, that in England and America it is confined to foreign vessels. The contracts of material-men are not really maritime, at least many of them are not; they are, in their reason and origin, much more like those of an unpaid vendor than like an ordinary maritime lien. In England the lien has always existed, though for nearly two centuries it was in a state of suspended animation, because the superior courts would not enforce it, nor permit the admiralty courts to do so. The statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, § 6, gave the court of admiralty jurisdiction of suits for necessities furnished to foreign vessels in English ports, and thereupon the liens became operative, although there is not a word in the statute about liens; and the court has ever since enforced these well-known maritime liens, and every decision of that court which upholds such a lien is necessarily a decision upon the general maritime law of liens, as well as upon the statute. Now, in the numerous and important cases which have been reported in that court on this subject since that statute was passed, no one has appeared bold enough to argue that the credit of the owner has any thing to do with the matter; and it is safe to say that no one ever will take that point, because one main purpose of the act was to save material-men the inconvenience of being obliged to resort to the foreign owner to recover a just debt payable at their own home and not at his. Laws are made for the enforcement of contracts according to their terms against persons in good or bad credit. If the mechanic, in the case supposed, had made inquiry and found that the owner was in good credit, what then? Is he therefore not to put in the spar until he is paid a sum as yet uncertain, contrary to all sense and usage? This example merely illustrates the reason and principle out of which the lien of material-men has grown. The same law applies to the ship-chandler who has agreed with the master for cash on delivery, but whom the master has cheated of his cash after receiving his goods. That the owner has credit, or even that the master has funds, only makes his position the stronger. He asks for his fair dividend of the funds according to his contract. Nor is it any answer to him that by the law of some states and countries he may attach the ship in a common-law action, and hold it as security for his debt. The jurisdiction of the common-law courts is not exclusive. It is no defence to a libel that the libellant has a remedy at common law. And if it were, this remedy is often delusive; for the attachment in most of the cases which have come under my notice would amount to nothing, because the class of vessels that come here from the British provinces are almost always mortgaged for more than they are worth in this market, and the mortgage takes precedence of the attachment. The remedy is not adequate; besides, it exists equally whether the owner's credit is good or bad. It is a mode of enforcing payment of comparatively recent origin, of limited use, and by no means calculated to supersede the old admiralty remedy. I cannot suppose, therefore, that the decision of Pratt v. Reed, [19 How. (60 U. S.) 359] was intended to apply to material-men who have given no credit at all.

If the material-man has given credit, he must show that the master had not, or appeared not to have, funds of the owner in hand wherewith to pay for them; because it is an elementary principle of the law of agency that the agent cannot pledge his principal's credit when he has, with the knowledge of the creditor, funds of the principal to apply to the immediate payment of the debt. Not that the law of lien depends always upon that of agency, but in this instance it does. But when this is shown, when it appears that the supplies were necessary and that a credit was necessary, the common law pledges the credit of the owner, and the maritime law that of the vessel; just as it does to a seaman or a shipper of goods, neither more nor less. Of course, it is a valid defence to an asserted lien to aver and prove that the personal credit of the owner, and that only, was pledged; just as it would be to a suit by a shipper of goods, and might be even to a seaman's libel under some very peculiar circumstances. But it is no defence to say that the personal credit of the owner would have been sufficient, when in fact it was not relied on.

The lender on bottomry stands on a wholly different foundation. He is agreeing for a credit to be liquidated at the home of the ship-owner; and he must furnish that credit at the lowest market rate. As he has agreed to be paid at the home of the owner, and as a solvent owner can be compelled to pay his debts at home, the law says that the lender shall not charge the unusual, and often almost ruinous, marine interest which is allowable in bottomry, if the money can be obtained at the usual rates and on the personal credit of the owner. This is the reason, and the only reason, that the rule in question has been adopted in bottomry law. The very foundation of the right of the master to borrow on bottomry in one class of cases is, that he must pay the material-men whose contract entitles them to payment in the foreign country, and who have a charge on the ship. But the doctrine of the owner's personal credit does not apply to them, for the reasons I have stated, and for those given by Judge Sprague in The Sarah Starr, [Case No. 12, 354.] cited above, to which I refer.

If then the case of Pratt v. Reed [supra] is to be understood as Judge Sprague and other district judges have understood it, the law is not only new, but it creates this anomaly: that if one of our vessels is repaired or supplied in the British provinces, and a suit is brought in this court by the material-men, my only inquiry must be whether the materials were furnished, and were necessary; but if the case is reversed, the parties remaining the same, and our merchants have supplied the foreign vessel, I must superadd an inquiry, which the creditors did not concern themselves with, whether the ship-owner in the provinces was a man of good commercial standing in his parish. This is not equality nor reciprocity, nor is it sound maritime law. I shall therefore, perhaps, find it my duty to cause such a case to be reviewed by the circuit court whenever the facts render it necessary, for I confess to grave doubts notwithstanding the opinions to the contrary, including my own as expressed on former occasions, whether the supreme court intended to decide anything more than that when a credit was given it must be shown that a credit was necessary. It is, perhaps, more probable that they overlooked for the moment the distinction between bottomry loans and the debts due material-men, than that they intended to establish a strict analogy between them in this respect.

In this case the largest item of the account is for money furnished to the master, for which the libellants took a mortgage on his part of the vessel. This money was raised to relieve the vessel from an attachment in a court of common law, at the suit of a creditor of the remaining owners. There is no pretence that the debt, thus paid, was a charge on the vessel; and the libellants are driven to maintain that the master may always hypothecate his vessel to relieve her from any detention which interferes with the prosecution of his voyage, and not only so, but that such an hypothecation will be implied. The maritime law contains no such term as that. It is true, as I said before, that bottomry bonds have been upheld when they were given to relieve the vessel from debts which by the law of the country where the vessel was lying would be a charge upon her, though they would not be such, or at least could not be enforced as such, at the home port. But I do not recollect that this doctrine has ever been applied to debts contracted before the last voyage. Even if it has, no law has ever given to the master authority to hypothecate the ship for personal debts of the owners, unrelated to the ship or its navigation. By the law of New England, and in a modified form, by that of most of our States, personal property may be attached and held as security for any debt of its owner. But there is no maritime lien on the property so attached, by reason of the attachment, nor does the fact of attachment give an agent of the owner an authority which he would not otherwise have, to hypothecate it for payment of that debt. The master of a ship is an agent, whose duties and powers are well understood and defined. It is no part of his authority to hypothecate his ship for the general debts of the owner. Nor did he undertake to do so in this case. On the contrary, he gave a mortgage of his own share of the vessel, and an agreement that the ship should be consigned to the libellants, from time to time, till the freight should have paid the debt. This agreement he did not fulfil, and the libellants must obtain their indemnity, if the mortgage proves insufficient, by such personal action as they may be able to maintain. For most of the items of that part of the account which were furnished before the vessel sailed on her last voyage, and which are shown in schedule B., there appears to be a lien. If it be material that the owners were not in good credit, the attachment and mortgage show that they were unable to pay their debts, and were obliged to resort to extraordinary means to satisfy their creditors, even to pledging the property of their master. Under any construction of Pratt v. Reed, [supra,] the libellants could maintain this part of their case. They have been careful, prudent, and diligent. No doubt they relied largely on the freight for their security, but this does not exclude the conclusion that they also relied on the vessel. The cases cited by the libellants establish this point. Each item of schedule B. has been carefully scrutinized by counsel, and fully discussed. The general rule in this country is that the person who advances money to pay the debts which are liens on the ship has himself a lien for his reimbursement: Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22; The Gustavia, [Case No. 5,876;] and this is now the law of England, with some refinements and distinctions not necessary to be here examined. Perhaps the rule has grown out of the doctrine of subrogation. But whether so or not, the lender of money has not usually any more ample remedy than the material-men themselves would have had. See Davis v. Child, [Id. 3,628.] It has been decided in several cases, that a stevedore has no lien on the ship: The Amstel, [Id. 339;] The Joseph Cunard, [Id. 7,535;] The S. G. Owens, [Id. 8,748.] The reason given by some of the learned judges, that the contract is not maritime, does not appear to be decisive, because the contracts of other material-men are no more so. The lien is for supplies and repairs to enable the vessel to perform her voyage, and only in that sense are they maritime. The other reason, that the cargo is a collateral matter and no part of the necessary equipment of the vessel itself, is more to the purpose, though not satisfactory, because a ship cannot be used to advantage without a cargo. But it is important to adhere to decided cases, and I shall follow these, though I doubt their correctness as applied to foreign vessels, and should be glad to have the point reviewed by the circuit court. In England, the stevedore may arrest the ship under the statute of Victoria: The Waban, cited 1 Pritch. Adm. Dig. 364, tit. "Material-Men," 71. Advertising the vessel for charter has likewise been decided not to create a charge on the vessel. Pilotage and towage are maritime services for which there was a lien on the vessel.

The mode in which the payments should be appropriated, has been discussed at the bar. Judge Sprague decided that when the creditor had two distinct debts, and money was paid him generally without specific appropriation, it was his duty to apply it in the way most beneficial to the debtor, which, in that case, required an appropriation to extinguish a builder's lien: The Antarctic, [Case No. 479.] This rule does not apply to a running account, and require the creditor to satisfy first all those items for which he has no lien. To such an account the general rule applies, that, if there is no appropriation at the time, the law will apply the payments to the items, in the order of their dates. Applying this rule, a considerable part of schedule B. has been paid, if I understand the account. Those that remain, and for which there is a lien, on the principles above stated, can be recovered by the libellants, with costs. Interlocutory decree for the libellants.

Case No. 514.

ARELL'S REPRESENTATIVES v. MARSTELLER et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 11.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1810.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — ACTIONS AGAINST—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

In suits in equity against executors and administrators in Virginia, a lawyer's fee is not to be taxed.

In equity. Bill, against executors, to account, and pay over distributive share. Decree accordingly.

Mr. R. I. Taylor, moved that the attorney's fee should be charged in the bill of costs. The act of assembly of 19th of November, 1792, § 14, says, "except against executors and administrators."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) directed that an attorney's fee should not be taxed.

ARESTA, (FONTAINE v.) See Case No. 4-905.

AREY, (MERRILL v.) See Case No. 9,468.

Case No. 515.

The ARGO.

[7 Ben. 304]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1874.

SEAMAN'S WAGES—JURISDICTION—STALE CLAIM NOTES.

1. A pilot was engaged on a steamboat in the harbor of New York during several months in 1872 and several in 1873. The owners gave him notes for part of the amount, which notes were not paid. In April, 1874, he filed a libel against the boat. She had in the mean time been sold at sheriff's sale, and had been again sold to H., who had no knowledge of this claim, but had been told that the men on the boat had claims: Held, that the libellant's claim was not stale, and that he was entitled to a decree for his wages on his depositing the notes, properly endorsed, with the clerk, for the use of the claimant.

2. A vessel in a basin at Jersey City, which communicates directly with the Hudson river, lying at some piles about 40 feet from the dock, is subject to the process of the United States district court for the southern district of New York.

[Cited in The L. W. Eaton, Case No. 8,612; Kiernan v. The Norma, 32 Fed. 411.]

¹[Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

²[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In admiralty. This was an action brought by Willett Martin, to recover wages for services on board the steamboat Argo, as pilot, from April 17th, 1872, to October 9th, 1872, and from June 21st, 1873, to October 14th, 1873. The libel was filed April 11th, 1874. It alleges the services performed, and the amount due, and that the owners had given him two notes therefor, which were unpaid, and which the libellant offered to surrender. The claimant, A. H. Harris, set up in answer, that the steamboat was not within the jurisdiction of the court, when she was attached under the process, and that he had bought the steamboat since the libellant's claim accrued, and without knowledge of such claim. It appeared, that the vessel, when attached under the process, was lying in what is called the Morris Canal Basin, at Jersey City, made fast to piles driven into the bottom, and about 40 feet from the side of the dock, and that the basin communicated directly with the waters of the Hudson river. Harris bought the vessel in February, 1874, from one Silbers, who bought her from a purchaser of her at a sheriff's sale. Harris bought without knowledge of the libellant's claim, but was told by Silbers that the men on the boat had claims. The libellant lived at South Amboy, N. J. and had been ill during the previous winter.

W. J. Haskett, for libellant.

H. Wallis, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case, I am of opinion that this court acquired jurisdiction over the vessel by the attachment of her at the place where she was attached; that the libellant did not take the two notes in payment, or waive his lien by taking them; and that the defence of staleness cannot be alleged against his claim. The claimant is entitled to have the two notes, and, whenever they are deposited with the clerk of this court, for the use of the claimant, properly endorsed by the libellant, if that be necessary to pass the title to them, but without recourse to the libellant, then let a decree be entered for the libellant for $552.81, with interest from May 14th, 1874, with costs.

Case No. 516.

The ARGO.

[1 Gall. 150.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1812.

PRIZE—CONDEMNATION — VIOLATION OF EMBARGO ACT—EXCUSES—NECESSITY.

1. The 3d section of the embargo act of the 9th January, 1808, c. 8, was not repealed by the act of the 1st March, 1809, c. 91.

2. Of the kind of necessity which excuses from forfeiture; condemnation on the facts.

[Disapproved in The Ella Warley, Case No. 4,373.]

¹[Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

[3. Cited in Beals v. Hale, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 53, to the point that a second law does not repeal a former one on the same subject without a repealing clause or negative words, unless so clearly repugnant as to imply a negative.]

In admiralty.

Mr. Dutton, for claimant.

G. Blake, for the United States.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The only count, relied upon in the information, is for a departure from the port of Boston, and proceeding on a voyage to certain foreign ports, viz. Halifax and Barbadoes, against the 3d section of the act of 9th January, 1808, c. 8. The claim admits the fact of proceeding to Halifax, but alleges, that on the 15th May, 1809, the ship departed from Boston, bound to a permitted port in the West Indies, having given bonds, and being duly cleared, according to the 13th section of the act of 1st March, 1809; that during the voyage, the ship was compelled by stress of weather and necessity, to go to Halifax, where she arrived the 29th of the same month; that by virtue of the president's proclamation of 19th April, 1809, her subsequent voyage to any British port became lawful after the 10th June, 1809, and she accordingly went to Barbadoes, &c. Upon the breaking of the argument, it was at first supposed, that this count was founded on the 13th section of the act of 1st March, 1809, c. 91, and it was contended, that even if the defence of necessity was not made out, (as all the other facts were admitted) the vessel would not be subject to forfeiture, as the only remedy, under that section, was on the bond given on the departure of the ship. I lay all the argument proceeding on this ground out of the question, as the count is clearly founded on another act. It has since been argued, with great ability, that the 3d section of the act of 9th January, 1808, on which this information is founded, was repealed by the act of 1st March, 1809, c. 91, and if the argument be correct, it undoubtedly follows that this prosecution is not maintainable. In support of the argument, it has been assumed as a general position, that subsequent laws respecting the same subject matter, when repugnant to prior laws, repeal them. The propriety of this position is not disputed. The only question is, whether such actual repugnancy exists here in such a shape, as leaves no reasonable doubt of the legislative intention. For a presumed legislative intention of repeal is the ground, on which rests the maxim "leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant."

It is exceedingly to be regretted, that the legislature have chosen to express themselves in so loose and inartificial a manner, and to leave so important a subject to mere inference and judicial construction. Yet the court cannot avoid the difficulty, and must content itself with the obscure and wavering lights, which are thinly scattered through the act. The sections of the act, which have been chiefly relied on in the argument, are the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 16th. The 12th declares, that so much of the act laying an embargo, &c. as forbids the departure of vessels owned by citizens of the United States, and the exportation of domestic and foreign merchandise to any foreign port or place, shall be repealed after the 15th of March, 1809, except so far as they relate to Great Britain and France, or their dependencies. The legal effect of this enactment, at first view, would undoubtedly seem to be, that the embargo acts were left in full force, as to Great Britain, France, and their dependencies, and were repealed as to all the rest of the world. At least, it is difficult to give any exact sense and meaning to the terms, unless this be the true construction. For there are no provisions in those acts exclusively directed against Great Britain, or France, or their dependencies. By the operation of this clause, the bonds, required in ordinary cases by the embargo law, would have been completely at an end, as to voyages to permitted ports. The 13th section therefore declares, that during the continuance of so much of the embargo acts, as is not repealed by that act, no vessel bound to a foreign port, with which commercial intercourse shall, by virtue of that act, be again permitted, shall be allowed to depart for such port, unless a bond be given, with condition, that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance; nor, when leaving the port, shall proceed to any port of Great Britain, France, or their dependencies, nor be directly or indirectly engaged, during the voyage, in any trade with such port, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel. These are almost an exact copy of the prohibitory words of the 3d section of the act of 9th January, 1808, c. 8. If the act had stopped here, the whole coasting and fishing trade would have been subject to all the restrictions of the embargo acts, and therefore the 14th section expressly repeals so much of these acts, as compels vessels owned by citizens of the United States, bound to another port of the United States, or vessels licensed for the coasting trade or fisheries, &c. to give bond or to load under the inspection of the revenue officers; or so much as renders them liable to detention merely on account of the nature of their cargo, with the exception of such provisions, as relate to districts adjacent to foreign territories, or to vessels belonging to or bound to such districts. This clause would have completely relieved coasting vessels from all the restrictions of the embargo acts, but the 15th section immediately takes up the case, and provides that no vessels owned by citizens of the United States, bound to another port of the said states, or licensed for the coasting trade, shall be allowed to depart from any port of the United States, nor shall receive a clearance, nor shall it be lawful to put on board such vessel, any specie, goods, wares, or merchandise, unless a permit shall have been previously obtained from the proper collector, &c. nor unless a bond, prescribed by the section, is given with condition, that the vessel shall not proceed to any foreign port or place, and that the cargo shall be relanded in some port of the United States.

The 16th section provides, that during the continuance of so much of the embargo acts, as are not repealed, &c., if any ship or vessel shall depart from any port of the United States, without a clearance or permit, or having given bonds in the manner provided by law, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, shall be wholly forfeited. Much stress has been laid on this section, as containing within itself provisions applicable to the same cases, as the 3d section of the act of 9th January, 1808, and therefore that being in pari materia, the latter is repealed by the former. Certainly the clauses will not be contended to be wholly repugnant, although they may be held to apply, in some instance, to the same facts. But because the provisions of different acts may, under certain circumstances, apply to the same subject matter, it does not follow that they are to be construed as totally repugnant, unless they cannot be construed as cumulative. And where several acts exist on the same subject, the last does not repeal the former, unless it be couched in negative terms, or when its matter is so clearly repugnant, that it necessarily implies a negative. 1 Bl. Comm. 89. But I do not rely on this rule. On a careful attention to this section, I am satisfied, that it applies to the cases enumerated in the 13th and 15th sections, and none other. The words, "in the manner provided by law," seem to me to refer to the departure without a clearance or permit, as well as to the giving of bonds, in the cases stated in those sections. If this be the true construction, it avoids most, if not all of the difficulties and repugnancies, which have been so elaborately urged by the counsel for the claimants.

It is said, that the remedy intended by the legislature in cases like the present, where the vessel proceeded to an illicit port, is the forfeiture of the bond, and that when other forfeitures have been intended, express provisions have been made for this purpose. This reasoning however leaves the original question untouched; for as it was competent for the legislature to provide such forfeitures, still the inquiry returns, whether the legislature have not so expressed their will. Much has been said, as to the repugnance of the 13th section of the act, where it refers to the 2d section of the act of 9th January, 1809, c. 7, and if the present forfeiture were claimed under the latter section, it would deserve great consideration.

But all arguments derived from sources of this nature are liable to great objection, when they encounter the positive enactments of a leading section. Now if the construction contended for by the claimant be true, it will follow, that the embargo acts were repealed, not only as to foreign countries, but even as to Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. Unless the provisions of these acts remain in full force, as to those countries, it is difficult to find in any other act a prohibition of trade with either. There is no clause in the nonintercourse act of 1st March, 1809, directly inhibiting a departure for, or exportation to those countries, unless it be in the 12th section. It has indeed been ingeniously urged by the counsel for the claimant, that the exposition of the 12th section assumed by them, may well be maintained by holding, that the embargo acts are altogether repealed, as far as they impose penalties and forfeitures, and that a mere naked embargo and interdict of trade remained as to Great Britain and France, without any other vindictory sanctions, than those contained in the 16th section. But if such had been the legislative intention, the natural course would have been to have repealed all those acts, and to have enacted a direct embargo, as to Great Britain and France. Instead of this, the legislature declare, that so much of these acts, as forbid a departure, &c., are repealed, except so far as they relate to Great Britain and France. It is not a mere naked embargo or interdict, but the acts laying and regulating it, which are to continue as to those nations. It is not simply the original act laying the embargo, (which according to the argument would alone exist in force), but all the acts supplementary to that act, which are excepted from the repealing clause.

In order therefore to effectuate the manifest intention of the legislature, as well as the words of this section, it is necessary to consider the embargo acts as remaining in full force, as to vessels bound to Great Britain, France, and their dependencies; and if in full force, surely a vessel departing from an American port, and proceeding to a prohibited port, must be within the purview of the 3d section of the act of 9th January, 1808. In this view it seems to me, that all difficulties vanish. Vessels bound to foreign permitted ports, or to our own ports, are regulated by the act of 1st March, 1809. Vessels bound to prohibited ports are restrained by the embargo acts, and these operate upon them in the same manner, as though the embargo had not originally extended beyond the prohibited countries; or in other words, the embargo acts, as to all voyages to such countries, remain in full force. When the court is called upon to reject the words of a whole section, upon inferences deduced from supposed incongruities in other sections, the case should be too palpable to admit of doubt; and if by any reasonable construction, the whole can be reconciled, it is an indispensable duty to adopt such construction. In my judgment, the 3d section of the act, on which this information is founded, was in full force at the time of the Argo's departure. She sailed after the president's first proclamation was issued, (19th April, 1809,) but before it had had effect, (to wit, 10th June, 1809), and consequently must be condemned, unless the facts alleged in justification are fully supported.

Continued for argument on the facts.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The case has now been argued upon the facts, and the single question for the court to decide is, whether the justification set up by the claim is supported by the evidence. The claim alleges that the ship proceeded to Halifax, as stated in the information, but that it was occasioned by stress of weather, and an inevitable necessity growing out of the accidents of the voyage. I need not, after the repeated determinations of this court, state that it is a settled principle, that where the facts constituting a case of forfeiture are admitted, and a justification or excuse is alleged by the claimant, it rests on him to show such justification or excuse free from any reasonable doubt; and if he fail so to do, a decree of condemnation must prevail. It has been argued, that the necessity, which will excuse a violation of the law, need not be an overruling physical necessity, but such facts and circumstances which ought to induce a prudent master, in the exercise of the authority confided to him, to deviate for the purpose of refitting and repairs: and the case has been likened to that of a deviation under a policy of insurance. It may be admitted, that the necessity which will excuse or justify a violation of the law in cases of this nature, need not be irresistible in a physical view; but it can never be successfully argued that the facts, which will excuse a deviation in cases of insurance, will constitute an excuse for offenses committed against the public law. The cases are totally different. There is, from the nature of the contract of insurance, an implied authority to the master, to act upon emergencies, for the benefit of all parties; and if he act bona fide, and with reasonable discretion, he acts within the scope of that authority; but where the law imposes a prohibition, it is not left to the discretion of the citizen to comply or not; he is bound to do every thing in his power to avoid an infringement of it. The necessity which will excuse him for a breach, must be instant and imminent, it must be such as leaves him without hope by ordinary means to comply with the requisitions of the law. It must be such, at least, as cannot allow a different course without the greatest jeopardy to life and property. He is not permitted as in cases of insurance, to seek a port to repair, merely because it is the most convenient, and the most for the interest of the parties concerned. He is, on the contrary, bound to seek the port of safety which first presents, if it be one where he may go without violation of the law. In a word, there must be, if not a physical, at least a moral necessity, to authorize the deviation. Under such circumstances the party acts at his peril; and if there be any negligence or want of caution, any difficulty or danger which ordinary intrepidity might resist and overcome, or any innocent course, which ordinary skill might adopt and pursue, the party cannot be held guiltless, who, under such circumstances, shelters himself behind the plea of necessity.

Now in the present case I must say, that the evidence is in no degree satisfactory, as to the existence of any necessity for the voyage to Halifax. The witnesses for the claimant, whose depositions are before the court, give testimony, which at most is loose, inaccurate and awkward. The deposition of the mate, which is mainly relied on, presents a very feeble case. The account which he gives of the storms is very mild, compared with the usual exaggerations in these cases. The wind does not appear to have been very violent; the deck load was not thrown overboard; no sails were lost, no spars sprung, no rigging injured. The leak is no where represented as serious, and one hand could always keep the vessel free; the tar, which is said in some degree to have choked the pumps, does not appear to have presented insurmountable obstructions. On arrival at Halifax, it is not pretended that any serious leak was discovered; the upper works were examined, and, says the mate, "the caulker was round the vessel, and I heard him caulking her, as I thought, but I did not see him drive any oakum in her, and he said he could not find any material leak in her." Yet it seems the leak, if any where, was in the upper works, for on lightening the ship it was greatly diminished. Besides, the whole deposition is essentially defective in the most important particulars. It comes from the person who usually keeps the log-book, and from whom we are entitled to expect a full and minute account of the state of the weather, the courses of the ship, the length of the gales, and the general transactions on board during the period in which the disasters are alleged to have occurred. I might add also, that the log book, a most material document, is not produced, and as it is usually called for in cases of this nature, its absence does not add to our general confidence. But independent of these objections, there are certain intrinsic difficulties in this case, from which I cannot relieve my mind. In the first place the owner was at Boston about the time of the vessel's sailing, and though she arrived at Halifax in eight days, he met her there on her arrival. No account is given of his journey thither, nor of its object. He appears there without surprise to the captain; and a supercargo is put on board at Halifax, who accompanies the ship to the West Indies. I think it is difficult to resist the impression, that there was something like preconcert in these circumstances; at least it throws a shade over the cause which has not been attempted to be removed.

In the next place the ship run down the whole eastern coast of the United States. The winds were very favorable for her to go into any eastern port to refit, yet no effort was made for this purpose, and no reason is assigned why it was not done. Surely no master of ordinary skill could, without cause, be guilty of so gross a misbehavior, as not to make a port in the United States, when so many lay in his way, and the strong injunctions of the law pressed upon him. There are some other striking singularities in the case, but I will not spend time in commenting upon them, because the foregoing, left as they are without explanation, would perhaps be decisive. But when we take into consideration the depositions introduced by the United States, of three of the crew, it is altogether unreasonable to expect, that the court could be free from doubt. Some exceptions have been taken to apparent incongruities and exaggerated statements made by some of the witnesses. Perhaps these exceptions are well founded; but admitting their force, still, taken with all their imperfections on their head, the depositions contain in general a substantial coincidence, as to material facts, which I must say are either corroborated, or not fully contradicted by the testimony on the other side. Now if these depositions are believed, there is no longer any doubt in the case; the justification is wholly unsupported. On the whole, I am satisfied that the decree of the district court ought to be reversed, and that the ship and appurtenances should be condemned, with costs, to the United States.

Condemned.

Case No. 517.

The ARGO.

[2 Gall. 314.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1814.²

DEPOSITION—NOTICE—ATTORNEY OF RECORD.

1. When there is an attorney of record, it is improper to take depositions without notice to him, or to the party.

2. When depositions are taken to be used against the United States, if there be an attorney of the United States within one hundred miles of the place of caption, he must be notified.

[See note at end of case.]

¹[Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

²[Affirmed by supreme court in The Argo, 2 Wheat. (15 U. S.) 237.]

This was an information for a violation of the non-intercourse law.

G. Blake, Dist. Atty., offered in evidence depositions, which had been taken in New York without notice, since there had been an attorney of record for the claimant.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SHERBURN, District Judge.]

PER CURIAM. Though depositions thus taken have been usually received, there are certainly great objections to the practice; and the court have heretofore intimated a resolution to require notice to be given in all cases, where there is an attorney of record. To prove that the vessel had not been at Guadaloupe, as alleged in the information, the claimant produced the depositions of several of the crew, which appeared to have been taken in Boston, and elsewhere within one hundred miles of the residence of a district attorney, without notice to him. Upon objection by the district attorney, they were rejected for this cause, and the court observed, that in all cases, where there is an attorney of the United States residing within one hundred miles of the place of caption, notice must be given to him of the taking of depositions, to be used in any cause, in which the United States are a party.

[NOTE. The judiciary act of 1789, § 30, (1 Stat. 89,) required notice from the magistrate before whom the deposition is to be taken, to the adverse party or his attorney, "if either is within one hundred miles of the place of caption." See Dick v. Runnels, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 8. This provision was modified by the act of 1872, c. 146, (17 Stat. 89,) which requires "reasonable notice" in writing to the adverse party or his attorney. See Rev. St. § 863.]

Case No. 518.

The ARGONAUT.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 62.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1861.

PRIZE—NEUTRAL PROPERTY—BLOCKADED PORT.

1. Vessel and cargo restored as neutral property, on a lawful voyage, but without costs against the captors, there having been probable cause for the arrest, the vessel having attempted to enter a blockaded port to obtain the necessary supplies.

2. An excuse of that kind is looked upon with distrust by prize court.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This cause was submitted to the decision of the court by counsel, on the pleadings and proofs, and a brief oral statement of the points in controversy.

The Argonaut was captured by the United States war steamer Susquehanna, September 13, 1861, off Hatteras inlet, and sent into this port in charge of a prize crew, and was libelled by the United States attorney as prize of war. The claimants filed separate answers and claims to, the suit, each alleging that they are British subjects resident in Nova Scotia, and that the vessel and cargo are owned by them and both are British property, and neither is subject to arrest or condemnation as prize of war; and they invoke their own affidavits, appended to the proceedings and the evidence taken in preparatorio, in support of their defences.

¹[Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

The proofs show that the vessel and cargo were neutral property and it is not made a point of contestation by the libellants, since the proofs are in, that the voyage was honest and fair in its inception, and that neither vessel nor cargo are, upon the facts before the court, subject to confiscation; but, on the part of the United States, it is insisted that the direction of the vessel, and her apparent purpose when she was arrested, denoted an intention to enter the blockaded port, so far, at least, as to well warrant her arrest and to impose upon her the necessity of establishing the justifiableness and innocency of her proceedings. On the other side, it is urged that she deviated from the regular course of her voyage for necessary causes, and stands, on that account, exonerated from all blame and all reasonable grounds of suspicion.

The evidence given by the master, mate, and scamen of the captured vessel, on the preparatory examination, is entirely consistent and clear, that the vessel was laden and despatched at Nova Scotia, on a voyage to Key West, and was manned by a British crew and laden with a British cargo, not contraband, and that the voyage was faithfully pursued until, in its regular course, the vessel became short of water for the crew, and also of burning fluid to supply her lamps, a portion of the fluid, shipped in quantity sufficient for the purpose, being found, when at sea, defective in quality and incapable of being used as a light, so that the vessel could not be safely navigated at night. The vessel deviated from the true course of her voyage about fifteen miles, and attempted to obtain from other vessels the supply needed for her wants, and, in so doing, was seized by the United States vessel-of-war.

I perceive no reason to doubt, on all the facts and circumstances in proof, that the master of the vessel and her supercargo acted under an honest conviction that the necessities of the vessel required she should obtain the supplies lost to her in order to continue the voyage safely, and were governed in their proceedings by that motive, and not by an intent to violate the blockade of the port which she sought to enter and near which she was seized. Although the condition of the vessel relieves her from confiscation because of the effort of the master to enter a blockaded port for the purpose of relieving her necessities, yet excuses of that kind are looked upon with marked distrust by prize courts, who scan them cautiously. Lord Stowell holds that nothing but a high necessity justifies an attempt to enter a blockaded port, (The Hurtige Fane, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 124,) and that slight and plausible excuses will not be listened to, (The Fortuna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 28,) and the want of provisions is referred to as a simulated reason often set up in excuse of the offence. Still, when the necessity is actual and is the motive which governs the conduct of the master the vessel will be exonerated from the severe penalty which the act of breaking a blockade incurs.

I think the proofs fairly make out such a case for the vessel in this instance, and that, accordingly, the vessel and cargo should be restored to the claimants; but I think there was probable cause for arresting the vessel in an attempt to make a blockaded port and sending her in to make good before the proper court the justification she alleged for her proceedings. The judgment of the court, accordingly, is that the vessel and cargo be restored to the claimants, without costs against the captors.

Case No. 519.

The A. R. GRAY.

[7 Ben. 483.]

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1874.

RELEASE OF VESSEL FROM CUSTODY—PRIORITY OF CLAIM.

Where a vessel was libelled, and seized under the process, then released by the marshal from custody, upon consent of the libellant, and was subsequently libelled by other parties, condemned and sold: Held, that the first libellant had no claim to be first paid out of the proceeds; that the consent to release the vessel operated as a waiver of priority of claim.

In admiralty.

Geo. W. Rathburn, for Nathan.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for Burtis.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These cases came before the court for a determination of the question of priority between the claims set forth in the libel of A. F. Nathan and others, and the claim set forth in the libel of Divine Burtis and others.

The first mentioned libel was filed on the ninth day of May, 1874, when process was issued, and the vessel was taken into custody. Subsequently by the consent of the libellants, the vessel was released by the marshal, and went about her business, in pursuance of an agreement made between the libellants and the owners of the vessel by which the earnings of the boat should be applied to the payment of the libellants' demand. On the 22d day of July, 1874, the vessel was again libelled by the libellant Burtis, and also by other libellants, to recover for supplies, some of which had been furnished since the marshal's release of the vessel from his custody, under the process issued in the case of Nathan & Co. Upon these subsequent processes, the vessel was seized, and she had been condemned and sold under decrees entered in some of them.

¹[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Her proceeds being thus in court, the libellants Nathan & Co., now insist that they are entitled to be first paid, because their libel was the first in time; and they say, that as the marshal released the vessel from custody under the process, upon their consent simply, without an order of the court, they have lost no rights by such release. I am of the contrary opinion. It does not lie in the mouth of those who consented that the marshal release the vessel from custody, partly at least for their own benefit, now to say that the release was unauthorized. The fact is patent that the vessel was released and resumed her occupation and incurred additional liabilities, not only with the knowledge of but in pursuance of an agreement with the libellants Nathan et al. Such a release amounted to a waiver of any right of priority which might otherwise have been acquired by the filing of their libel prior to the filing of the libel of Burtis. In distributing the proceeds therefore, the order will be that the claim of Burtis be first satisfied.

A. R. GRAY, The. See Case No. 10,949.

ARGUELLES, (ALLEN v.) See Case No. 213.

ARGUELLES, (LENOX v.) See Case No. 8,244.

Case No. 520.

ARGUELLES v. WOOD.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 579.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1825.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—ORDER FOR RENT—ACCEPTANCE—ACTION—VERDICT OF JURY—AMENDMENT—ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

1. If the landlord draws an order on his tenant, on account of rent, and the tenant accepts, but does not pay it when due, and suffers himself to be sued for it by the payee, he is not entitled to set it off, under the plea of no rent arrear, in an action of replevin, if the landlord, at the trial of the replevin, produces the order cancelled, and offers to surrender it to the tenant and to pay the costs of the suit brought upon it.

2. If the jury find the amount of the rent arrear in damages, without stating it to be the amount of the rent, the court will permit the verdict to be so amended by the clerk, after the jury have rendered their verdict and retired from the bar, and even after another cause has been tried. And upon such a verdict the court will award a retorno habendo; and will not arrest the judgment because the jury have not found the value of the distress taken.

¹[Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

At law. Replevin. Avowry for rent-plea, no rent arrear, and issue. The defendant had drawn an order on the plaintiff on account of the rent, in favor of R. Smith, for $87.50, which was accepted by the plaintiff. This was outstanding at the time of the distress, and was not credited. The amount distrained for was $175, on the 7th of August, 1823. Suit was brought by Mr. Smith against the plaintiff upon her acceptance in November, 1823. She now claims credit for this sum of $87.50, against the rent. The defendant produces the acceptance and offers to cancel and surrender it, and to pay the costs of the suit of Smith v. Arguelles.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Judge, contra) was of opinion that the plaintiff could not now receive credit for that acceptance; it being sufficient for the defendant, at this trial, to produce and cancel the acceptance.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, was of opinion, that if the acceptance was received by Wood as payment of so much of the rent, the plaintiff was now entitled to the credit, as it was not produced and cancelled, or tendered at, or before, the time of the distress. See Chit. [Bills,] p. 130, note 1; Phil. [Ev.] (Ed. 1821;) Harris v. Johnston, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 311; Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 253; Clark v. Young, [1 Cranch, (5 U. S.) 191,] and other cases cited in the note in Chit. [Bills,] p. 130.

The jury found their verdict for the defendant; damages $140, with interest from the 20th of July, 1824. After the verdict was taken down by the clerk, and before the jury separated, Mr. Ashton, for the defendant, suggested a doubt whether the verdict was correct, but did not then make any specific motion to amend it, and the court went into another trial, and the jurors in this case retired from the bar and separated. After the trial of the next cause, Mr. Hall and Mr. Ashton, moved for leave to amend the verdict, by stating that the $140 was the amount of the rent arrear, and

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) permitted the amendment to be made. After the amendment was made, stating that the jury found one cent damages for defendant, that the rent arrear was $140, with interest, &c., Mr. Jones, for the defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, and contended that the verdict was not good at common law, nor under the statute of 17 Car. II. c. 7, because it has not found the value of the goods distrained; for by the statute the judgment for the defendant must not exceed the value of the distress. 2 Selw. N. P. 1144; Freeman v. Archer, 2 W. Bl. 763; Rees v. Morgan, 3 Term R. 349.

Mr. Ashton, contra. An avowry was a proceeding at common law, and if the verdict is for the defendant, the regular judgment at common law is for a writ de retorno habendo. The finding of the amount of the rent arrear, does not injure it as a common law verdict. It is surplusage; and we ask only the common law judgment of retorno habendo. Ham. N. P. 493; Rees v. Morgan, 3 Term R. 349. The verdict cannot now be amended so as to justify the statute judgment, but we are entitled to judgment at common law.

THE COURT (nem. con.) ordered judgment to be entered for the writ de retorno habendo.

Case No. 521.

The ARGUS.

[Olc. 304.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1846.

COLLISION—BETWEEN SAILING VESSELS—TACKING —CUSTOMS ON NORTH RIVER.

1. The estimate or judgment of witnesses formed in the night time, and expressed orally, or exhibited on charts or diagrams on a vessel in motion, are of slight weight in determining the relative position and bearing of another vessel, also under motion.

[See The Narragansett, Case No. 10,019.]

2. A vessel close-hauled on the wind has a right to rely to the last moment on the ability and care of another meeting her with the wind free to avoid a collision, and is not responsible for a wrong movement on her part, caused by the negligence of the one running free; but a vessel close-hauled is bound to hold her tack, so as not to come round in the way of one free and endeavoring to avoid her.

[Cited in The Greenpoint, 31 Fed. 232.]

[See The Catherine v. Dickinson, 17 How. (58 U. S.) 170; The Clara M. Porter, Case No. 2,792; The Clement, Id. 2,879; The John Stuart, Id. 7,427; The M. M. Hamilton, Id. 9,685.]

3. A vessel running free has no right to cross the bows of a beating vessel, unless she has clearly room to do it without disturbing her course; nor to come so closely upon the stern of the other as to create apprehensions of a collision, and alarm her into a change of her course to escape it.

[Cited in The Free State, Case No. 5,090; The Maria & Elizabeth, 7 Fed. 255; The Renovator, 30 Fed. 195.]

[See The Rebecca, Case No. 11,618; Allen v. Mackay, Id. 228; The Blossom, Id. 1,564.]

4. A vessel on the wind has the right to run out her tack, and it is the duty of another vessel approaching her before the wind to take the necessary precautions to avoid a collision.

5. The customs as to the navigation of the North river are in consonance with nautical usages at sea, and the rules regulating such navigation are the same as obtain in regard to sea-going vessels.

[See Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How. (51 U. S.) 586; The Santa Claus, Case No. 12,327.]

In admiralty.

Geo. A. Shufeldt, for libellants.

A. L. Jordan, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a case of collision between two sloops on the North river, and the extent of damage incurred renders it one of serious importance to the respective parties. It has been litigated at great expense, and through protracted and tedious inquires into the facts. The law and facts bearing upon the case have been thoroughly discussed; orally before the court, and by able and well-digested written arguments submitted by the counsel. The statements of the transaction by the witnesses do not strictly coincide with the representations of the parties in their pleadings, but the variances are, perhaps, deserving no special regard, other than in respect to the effect they may have upon the credit of some of the witnesses, whose testimony is called in question. The libellants charge that the sloop Bucktail, owned by them, being on a voyage down the river to the city of New York, and about opposite the end of the long dock at Rhinebeck, and nearly in the middle of the river, making a tack to the westward, the wind ahead, blowing straight up the river, the sloop Argus was seen coming in the opposite direction before the wind, and standing directly for the Bucktail; and as soon as within call, she was hailed by the Bucktail to bear up or to luff; that no attention was paid to the direction; on the contrary, she continued her course, heading for the Bucktail, until her stem struck the larboard bow of the Bucktail, cutting it down to the water's edge, from which injury she afterwards sunk and was totally lost.

[Reported by Edward R. Olcott, Esq.]

The claimant answers, that the night was very dark, and the atmosphere thick and hazy, so that objects could be distinguished but a short distance; that the wind was blowing heavily from the southeast; the Argus was on her course up the river, from New-York to Hudson, bearing about northeast; when she was opposite the long dock at Rhinebeck, and near the west shore of the river, the Bucktail was discerned from her a very short distance ahead, obliquely to the eastward, beating down the river, on a tack from the eastern to the western bank of the river, with the wind so favorable as to be able to hold her course nearly with that of the river. That it was judged advisable to keep the Argus away to avoid a collision, and she was steered in a proper angle towards the westerly bank of the river, so that she could have safely passed the Bucktail on her lee side without danger of collision, if that vessel had kept her course as she was bound to do; but that after the direction of the Argus had been so altered, the Bucktail deviated from her proper course, and ran directly across the bows of the Argus, thus producing the collision complained of. The other parts of the pleadings need not now be rehearsed, as the gist of the controversy is involved in these allegations. Before adverting to the proofs adduced by the parties, it is proper to observe, that the estimate or judgment of witnesses, as to the bearings, distances or relative positions of objects on the water looked at in the night-time, and particularly when the witnesses are placed on vessels in motion, cannot be considered entitled to confidence as facts. They are little more than conjectures, formed in a state of mind and position disabling the witnesses from speaking with any reliable certainty.

The course of the river, at the place of the casualty, is assumed by the witnesses to be north and south, and the direction of the wind, and the track of the two vessels, are probably estimated with reference to that assumption; and as the true range of the river is a point or more east from the one supposed, the relations of the other particulars would have to be taken with corresponding allowances. Indeed, both the proofs and the arguments concede, that a variance of several points from any of the supposed courses might be reasonably expected and accounted for, without impeaching the veracity or intelligence of the witnesses. These considerations must lead to great caution in adopting diagrams or charts framed upon the courses assigned the two vessels by the respective witnesses, as affording any just criterion by which the facts in controversy may be adjusted. A few prominent particulars in the case, not essentially in dispute, appear to me to settle the question between the parties as to the wrong or negligence of the claimants' vessel, and the right of the libellants to damages. The Bucktail was sailing against the wind, be its exact direction at whatever point may be assumed, and her longest stretch or tack was from the east to the west. She was loaded below, and had bundles of hay on deck so piled up as to require the boom to be raised by a reef in the mainsail, and this trim would somewhat impede and embarrass her management. It was night, but not dark enough to prevent the two vessels being seen by persons on each, at a distance of half a mile to a mile apart. The Argus was light, and running free before the wind, about in the middle of the river, which, at the place in question, was a mile wide, with the channel from shore to shore. The Bucktail came around on her larboard tack a quarter of a mile above the long dock at Rhinebeck, and was supposed by her pilot to range off about a south southwest course, and by those observing her from the Argus, to head southwest. The defence is placed essentially upon the position that she was able on that wind to hold her course, which, if adhered to, would have carried her far east of the track the Argus was running; and, also, on the proposition of law, that the Bucktail was bound to pursue the course she had taken, whilst the Argus was only required to use measures for avoiding her, on her continuing to hold that course as close to the wind as she could be laid until her tack was run out.

The counsel for the claimant submits various diagrams to substantiate the conclusions he draws from these considerations. Whatever nautical theories may be raised in respect to the relative bearing, ability and duty of the two vessels, I am satisfied, upon the proofs, that up to the point of time at which a collision became apparent and imminent on board both vessels, the Bucktail was managed by her crew with ordinary skill and precaution. There is nothing in the evidence necessarily conflicting with the statements of those on board the Bucktail, that she was kept steadily on her course as near to the wind as her build and trim would permit. She took her direction towards Kingston Point, intending to run out her tack in that vicinity; and upon the evidence, this would bring her scarcely half a mile below a right line across the river from the place of her departure on the tack. The actual course she was making across the water could not correspond with any of the hypotheses of the witnesses on either side, for though it was undoubtedly, by the compass, south of west, yet the notions that it was southwest or south southwest, were only conjectures, and of slight moment in the case, it being satisfactorily proved that she was kept close-hauled to the wind, with a view to Kingston Point on the west shore as the terminus of her tack.

The libellants' witnesses testified in consonance with the libel, that the collision took place near the middle of the river, opposite Rhinebeck dock, which, as appears from the surveys, was about eighty rods below the beginning of her tack. The Bucktail would accordingly have made southing a quarter of a mile, and reached nearly half the distance across the river towards Kingston Point. The witnesses for the claimant concur substantially in placing the two vessels near the middle of the river when they met, and there can be no question, upon the evidence and the plan of the various courses, that if she had made, from the start, a south southwest or southwest course, she could not have run beyond the middle of the river, in falling down a quarter of a mile, opposite to Rhinebeck dock. But the claimants' answer, by which their defence must be governed, avers that the collision took place near the west shore of the river, opposite Rhinebeck dock. This is palpably a gross error, for by no possibility could the Argus be so placed, having a view of the Bucktail at that distance, as to act on the belief that the latter was holding a southwest course, with a wind asserted to be nearly free for her from the time she came about to the moment of collision; and it would be physically impossible the two vessels could, under the circumstances, come in contact on a line nearly at a right angle from the point of departure of the Bucktail. If the Argus saw the Bucktail come about, a mile off, then the two vessels must have run an equal distance in the same time, and directed to the same point, in order to effect the meeting, and the Bucktail, instead of heading down the river, must have been necessarily and obviously to the eye, laying at nearly right angles across it; which would have been emphatic notice to the Argus not to attempt to cross her bows.

If the distance of a mile and the position of the Argus on the west shore is disregarded, and the Bucktail is assumed to have been seen three-quarters, a half, or quarter of a mile distant, the Argus being in the middle of the river, the difficulty of reconciling the claimants' theories and diagrams with the proved facts, are no way diminished; on the contrary, they are multiplied and enhanced. The nearer the two vessels are placed to each other, at the moment the Bucktail came round on her larboard tack, the more difficult and improbable would be a collision in the manner this occurred; for the Argus continuing her course in the middle of the river, every moment she advanced in that direction, with a speed superior to that of the Bucktail, she would necessarily be running out, and passing the point where the Bucktail must cross her track, even at right angles, and the more oblique the course of the Bucktail on the wind, towards that line, the more improbable would be their meeting on that line. This improbability of contact upon these assumptions would become next to an impossibility, on the allegations of the answer. The Argus is by the answer placed near the west shore, opposite Rhinebeck dock, which, it is seen, is only a quarter of a mile below the position of the Bucktail, on the opposite side of the river; and if, instead of the two running in different directions, both had endeavored, on the most direct line, to reach collision, it would be utterly incredible that the Argus would not, before a strong and free wind, in her trim, have passed the point before the Bucktail, deeply laden, could beat the same and even a greater distance. It is, therefore, most clear, that if the proofs had been secundum allegata, and shown the Argus running her course before the wind, near to the western shore, when the Bucktail came about, there could be no rational mode of accounting for the collision on the proofs, but by supposing the Bucktail, after the Argus passed her track, bore up, and by superior speed, overtook and ran into the latter vessel.

The answer and proofs of the respondent do not so correspond that they can stand together and establish the case for him in either aspect, but yet the proofs may be used to countervail the evidence adduced on the part of the libellants, and take away their claim to a recovery. So, also, the claimants' proofs or answer may be invoked by the libellants, in support of their version of the transaction. The statement of Swart, the helmsman, and Warringer, the pilot of the Bucktail, is in substance, that she was beating down the river, westward on her larboard tack, and as close to the wind as she could lie, when it was found that the Argus had taken no measures to avoid her, and the two vessels were approaching each other rapidly, in a way threatening an immediate collision. That the Argus was hailed loudly to luff, and not obeying the order, the Bucktail bore up, and instantly was run into by the Argus, on her larboard bow; and that if any watch had been kept on the Argus, the danger would have been seen on board her in time, and she could easily have avoided it.

Testimony is given by the claimant tending to impeach the credit of Swart; and direct and strong evidence that a look-out was kept on the Argus, and that the Bucktail was distinctly seen, and her movements watched from the time she came about; and if she had held the course she took on that tack, and which her capacity as a sailer, and the direction of the wind enabled her to hold, she would have gone clear of the Argus, and that the collision was the consequence of her fault in these respects. If Swart's general character is impeached by the evidence, still the answer of the respondent in this behalf directly corroborates his statement, and that of Warringer, so that in respect to this branch of the issue, that testimony must prevail against any number of witnesses offered by the party who put in, and swore to the correctness of the answer. The allegations of the claimant are, that the night was very dark and hazy, that objects could be distinguished but a short distance; that when the Bucktail was first discovered, the Argus was kept away to the west shore, and "when the course of the Argus had been so altered," the Bucktail was made to deviate from her true and proper course, so as to run across the bows of the Argus, and make a collision between the two unavoidable. This places the two vessels precisely in coincidence with the description given by Swart and Warringer, and demonstrates that the Argus did not observe the Bucktail until the moment she attempted to avoid her by bearing away; and the presumption is exceedingly strong, that the attention of the Argus was first called to the Bucktail from the cry of the latter to luff, which was heard by her, and which was so urgent as to call up one of her men from below.

Whether, in that emergency, the most prudent and discreet course was pursued on board the Bucktail, in bearing away, also, it is not important to inquire and determine. She had a right to rely to the last moment upon the ability and care of the vessel before the wind, and if in the alarm, resulting from the instant danger, she adopted a false manoeuvre, that will in no sort excuse the Argus, or take away the right of the Bucktail to claim damages, since the confusion, and all the consequences of the then situation of the two vessels, arose from the fault of the Argus. The Diana, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 132; The Celt, 3 Hagg. Adm. 321; The Harriett, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 182. I am by no means satisfied that any wrong manoeuvre was made by the Bucktail, or that she had it in her power to take any course, when it was found that the vessels were directly upon each other, which would have rescued her from the danger that was upon her.

The Argus had no right to pass the bows of the beating vessel, unless she had clearly room enough to do it without driving her into the wind, or to come so closely upon her stern as to alarm her for her safety, and induce her, under such apprehension, to bear away before the wind. There was the full breadth of the river to the Argus, with a free wind, and it was her duty to observe the Bucktail and take such a course as to leave her undisturbed on her tack.

It is clear to my mind, upon the evidence, that this was not done, and the unfeeling neglect on board the Argus after the disaster to stop and aid the crippled vessel or ascertain what might be her danger, although urgently appealed to with the cry that she was sinking, and from the refusal on the part of her officers to give the name of the vessel, is impressive evidence of conviction on board of the Argus that the wrong had been wholly on her side. Moreover, the character of the injury received, as detailed by the ship-carpenters, is very strongly corroborative of the statements of the libellants' witnesses, that the Argus struck the Bucktail stem on, and did not receive the blow obliquely from the Bucktail to the windward of her, and in the act of escaping the contact.

There is no conflict between the parties as to the law applicable to the case. The libellants do not deny that it was the duty of their vessel to hold her course down the river, as uniformly as the circumstances under which she was sailing, combining wind, the tide, the lading and trim of the vessel, and her capacity as a sailer would admit, certainly until coming near the Argus, and having great reason to fear the latter would not take measures to avoid her; and the claimant admits that she was entitled to run out her tack, and that it was the duty of the Argus, while such course was pursued, to take precautions, from her having a free wind, to avoid intercepting or injuring the Bucktail, so maintaining her direction. These views are elucidated, and the principles of law applicable to them are very fully discussed in the books. Story, Bailm. §§ 608, 609, 611; [Hawkins v. Dutchess & O. Steam-Boat Co.,] 2 Wend. 452; Rathbun v. Paine, 19 Wend. 399; 3 Kent, [Comm.] 184; The Celt, [Woodrop-Sims,] 2 Dod. 83; The Chester, [The Celt,] 3 Hagg. Adm. 321; [The Chester,] Id. 316; The Diana, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 131; The Harriett, Id. 182; 7 Lou. 222.

The proof of the established usage and custom in navigating the North river is in consonance with nautical usages at sea, and the rules of law laid down in the authorities above cited. In my judgment, the evidence in this case clearly casts the blame upon the Argus, and imposes upon her the duty of bearing the loss. There was manifestly a want of proper precaution on her part, or of skill and attention in managing her, in her approach upon the Bucktail, and however severe the consequences may be upon the absent owner, the law lays upon him and his vessel the responsibility of repairing the damage which she has occasioned.

I must, accordingly, pronounce for the libellants in this cause, and decree that they recover damages for the injuries they have sustained, which must be a compensation for the actual loss of property. The Dundee, 1 Hagg. Adm. 120.

Case No. 522.

The ARIADNE.

District Court, S. D. New York.

[Cited in The City of Norwich, Case No. 11-202. Nowhere reported; no opinion on file in clerk's office.]

Case No. 523.

The ARIADNE.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May, 1870.

[Affirming The Ariadne, Case No. 524. Reported as The Ariadne, Id. 525.]

Case No. 524.

The ARIADNE.

[2 Ben. 472.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1868.²

COLLISION OFF BARNEGAT—STEAMER AND BRIG—LIGHTS—SPEED—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where a brig, sailing westward, at night, and keeping her course, was struck on her starboard quarter by a steamer running south by west quarter west, at the rate of about seven or eight knots an hour, the steamer having kept a good lookout, and having, as soon as the brig was seen, no light being visible, stopped and backed her engine, and having, as soon as the course of the brig was seen, put her helm hard a starboard: Held, that, on the evidence, the brig did not have burning such a green light as could be seen at the distance of two miles, and that this fault contributed to the collision.

[Cited in The State of Alabama, 17 Fed. 863; The City of Merida, 24 Fed. 236.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. That the burden was on the libellants, the owners of the brig, to establish that the steamer was in fault.

3. That it was not shown that the steamer could have seen the brig sooner.

[See note at end of case.]

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Decree affirmed by the circuit court in The Ariadne, Case No. 525, but afterwards reversed by the supreme court in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 475.]

4. That the speed of the steamer was not too great, as she had the right to rely on the exhibition of a light by an approaching vessel.

[See note at end of case.]

5. That the steamer was not in fault, and the libel must be dismissed.

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Archibald M. Pentz and others, owners of the brig William Edwards, against the steamer Ariadne, Charles Mallory, claimant,] for a collision, which took place about 11 o'clock P. M., on the 13th of December, 1865, between the brig William Edwards and the steamer Ariadne. The brig was bound from Havre to New York. The steamer was a propeller, bound from New York to Appalachicola. The brig had taken a pilot, and was about twelve miles from Barnegat, and about eight miles off shore. The libel averred that the brig saw the steamer approaching, at a distance of three miles off; that the brig was at the time close-hauled to the wind, and had all her lights displayed; that she kept steadily on her course, but the steamer continued to approach her and struck her starboard quarter, causing her to sink and be totally lost. The damage claimed was over $60,000. The answer set up that the night was cloudy and dark; that the wind was from north to north-north-east, a strong whole-sail breeze; that the steamer had her lights properly set and burning, and a competent lookout properly stationed and vigilant; that the steamer had no sails set, and was going from seven to eight knots an hour, heading south by west quarter west, Barnegat light bearing about southwest half south; that the brig was discovered near to the steamer, a little on her port bow, no lights being visible on the brig, and heading towards the shore across the steamer's bows; that the steamer's bells were immediately rung to stop and back, and her wheel was put hard to starboard so as to make her go under the stern of the brig, but, although her engine was immediately stopped and reversed, and her helm was put hard to starboard as quickly as possible, yet, by reason of the proximity of the vessels, it was impossible to clear the brig; that the green light on the starboard side of the brig had gone out, or burned so low and dimly, or had so smoked the glass of the lantern, that it was not visible; and that the brig could not have been seen sooner than she was. [Affirmed by the circuit court in The Ariadne, Case No. 525, but on appeal to the supreme court the decree was reversed in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 475. See note at end of case.]

J. E. Parsons and T. Scudder, for libellants.
E. H. Owen, and C. Donohue, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think the weight of evidence is, that the brig did not have burning, at the time of the collision, such a green starboard light as the statute requires—a light capable of being seen on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles. The night was dark, but not foggy, though cloudy, and the evidence is that the light of a vessel could have been seen that night two miles. No green light on the brig could be seen from the steamer, and the evidence from on board the brig, that her green light was burning at the time so as to be visible, beyond a very short distance, is very unsatisfactory. There had been trouble with both of the side lights of the brig that night, and they had required to be taken down and retrimmed. If the green light had been properly burning, it would have been seen from the steamer, at a sufficient distance to have left the brig wholly blameless, and the steamer wholly in fault, for the collision. This fault on the part of the brig undoubtedly led to the collision.

In any view, the burden is on the libellants to show that the steamer was in fault. But, as the brig did not have a green light properly burning, it is especially incumbent on them to show, that, notwithstanding such condition of their own light, the collision arose from the fault of the steamer. The libellants fail to show this. They do not show that the steamer could, with proper vigilance, have seen the brig in season to avoid her. The speed of the steamer was not too great, in view of the character of the night, there being no fog, and she having a right to rely on the exhibition of a light by an approaching vessel, for the reason that a proper light, if exhibited, could be seen at a distance sufficiently great to avoid a collision. The steamer had a lookout properly stationed, competent and attentive, and it is not made out that the brig could have been seen sooner than she was. She loomed up out of the darkness, but, because her green light could not be seen, her course could not be discerned, and the evidence is, that the steamer was promptly slowed and stopped and backed, and, that when the master of the steamer, by the aid of his night glass, made out the course of the brig, the helm of the steamer was put to starboard, which turned her head to the eastward, and was a proper manoeuvre, as the brig was headed to the westward. The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. This decree was affirmed by the circuit court in The Ariadne, Case No. 525, but on appeal to the supreme court it was reversed, with directions that a decree be entered dividing the damages between the steamer and the brig, although the finding of the court below that the brig was at fault in not having her starboard light burning, or burning so as to be visible more than a short distance, was held to be fully sustained by the evidence. Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the court, said: "The steamer was about two hundred yards long. * * * When running at her then speed, she could easily be stopped in a space of about twice her length. She approached the brig in the direction most favorable for her lookout to see the hull and sails of the latter. According to the steamer's testimony, a vessel without a light could be seen the eighth of a mile. Her testimony also shows the following facts: She had but one lookout. The second mate saw the brig first. He asked the lookout if he saw her. The lookout thereupon turned, and saw her. He had not seen her before. He saw no light, and could not tell which way she was heading." (The steamer's engine was stopped and backed as soon as the brig was discovered.) "The lookout says the steamer ran about a length between the time when he first saw the brig and the time when the steamer struck her. * * * For all the purposes of this case, there might as well have been no lookout on the steamer. He could have rendered, and it was his duty to render, a service of vital importance, but he rendered none. * * * We think the conduct of the lookout was marked by gross carelessness, and that it was clearly one of the concurring causes of the disaster." The Ariadne, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 475.]

Case No. 525.

The ARIADNE.

[7 Blatchf. 211.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1870.²

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAM AND SAIL—LIGHTS AND LOOKOUTS.

1. Where a collision occurred at sea, at night, between a brig and a steamer, whereby the brig was sunk, she having been struck on her starboard side by the steamer's stem, and it appeared that the starboard side-light of the brig was not so burning at the time that it could be seen from the steamer: Held, that, the brig being thus in fault, the steamer could not be held liable for the collision, unless some fault on her part was shown, so concurring with the fault of the brig, as to warrant a claim to contribution.

[Cited in The Sunnyside, Case No. 13,620; The City of Merida, 24 Fed. 236.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Vessels have a right to assume that other vessels, if in their neighborhood in the night, are acting in obedience to the statute regulations; and when, by reason of the neglect of the brig to carry a proper light, she was not seen in time to enable the steamer to avoid a collision, the brig cannot insist that, by extraordinary vigilance, she might have been discovered from the steamer at a few yards greater distance, and claim contribution on that ground.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court [by Archibald M. Pentz and others, owners of the brig William Edwards] against the steamer Ariadne, [Charles Mallory, claimant,] to recover for the damages sustained by the libellants, by the sinking of a brig owned by them, through a collision, which took place between her and the steamer at sea, the steamer having struck, stem on, the starboard side of the brig. The district court dismissed the libel, [The Ariadne, Case No. 524,] and the libellants appealed to this court. [Decree affirmed. On appeal to the supreme court, the decree was reversed in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 475. See note to The Ariadne, Case No. 524.]

John E. Parsons, for libellants.
Edward H. Owen and Charles Donohue, for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. After a careful study of the evidence in this cause, aided by the able argument of the counsel for the libellants, and his full written brief, I cannot resist the conclusion that the misfortune which befel the vessel of the libellants, was due to the fact that, at the time of the approach of the Ariadne, the starboard or green light of the brig had gone out, or so nearly so that it could not be seen from the steamer. There is, undoubtedly, much conflict in the testimony, but the evidence on the part of the libellants, though it be taken to establish that the light was trimmed and bright twenty minutes or half an hour before the collision, is not inconsistent with the assumption that, either by smoke or other imperfection, it had become nearly invisible within that time, while there is much evidence in the testimony of the libellants' own witnesses which warrants that assumption. They had had much trouble with the lights, the binnacle light, fed by the same oil, required frequent attention to prevent its going out, the side-lights required trimming once, twice, and even three times, during a single watch, and, when the starboard light was last brought from the cabin and put up, it was flaring. When to this added the uniform testimony of every man who testified in behalf of the claimant, that no light could be seen from the steamer, it is clear that, in this respect, the libellants stand with a preponderance of testimony against them. And this is so without imputing wilful falsehood to their witnesses, no one of whom, I think, professes to have inspected the green-light after it was put up, twenty minutes or half an hour before the collision.

Now, in such case, the libellants cannot recover, unless they show fault in the steamer, so concurring with their own as to warrant a claim to contribution. Indeed, the only ground for recovery, even if the brig was free from fault, would be either that the steamer might and ought to have sooner seen the brig, or that, when she did see the brig she did or omitted something which she ought not to have done or omitted. On this point the burthen of proof is upon the libellants.

It is true that, in circumstances of apparent danger, where there is reason to apprehend collision, instant and extraordinary diligence is the duty of a steamer seeing and approaching a sailing vessel, so as to avoid her if possible. But vessels have right to assume that other vessels, if in their neighborhood, are acting in obedience to the statute regulations; and, where the negligence of the sailing vessel, and her failure to comply with the statute requiring her to bear a light which can be seen at a distance of two miles, have led the steamer into danger of collision, it is not for the sailing vessel to insist that, by more than usual vigilance, she might, nevertheless, have been discovered at a few yards greater distance, and to claim contribution on that ground. In this case, I think there is a failure to show that the brig could have been seen from the steamer sooner than she was. Certainly, the proof does not show it so clearly as to warrant a decree declaring the steamer in fault.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirming The Ariadne, Case No. 524. This decree was reversed by the supreme court in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 475.]

When the brig was discovered, I do not perceive that any thing was omitted which could have tended to save the brig. The steamer's helm was hove a-starboard, and her engine was stopped and reversed. The propriety of these manoeuvres cannot be questioned. They were done immediately, and the manner of the blow shows that they were very nearly effectual to cause the steamer to pass astern of the brig.

Without discussing the very prolix testimony of the various witnesses, it must suffice to add that, upon a most pains-taking consideration of the case, I think the conclusions of the district court were correct, and that the libellants have failed to put the steamer in fault.

The decree must be affirmed, with costs.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court this decree was reversed, with directions that a decree be entered dividing the damages between the steamer and the brig, for the reason that proper vigilance on the part of the steamer's lookout might have avoided the disaster. The Ariadne, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 475. See note to The Ariadne, Case No. 524.]

Case No. 526.

The ARIADNE.

[1 Pet. C. C. 455.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1817.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE — PAYMENT OF PROCEEDS BEFORE DECREE—RULE TO RETURN.

Where money had been paid by an order of the district court, under an erroneous construction of an act of congress, before a final order of the circuit court, in which the suit for the same was pending, the circuit court granted a rule on the person who had received the money to return it.

[In admiralty. Heard on motion for a rule requiring the persons who had received the money resulting from the condemnation of the vessel to return the same to the court. For report of the case as heard in the supreme court, see The Ariadne, 2 Wheat. (15 U. S.) 143.]

The supreme court having affirmed the sentence of this court condemning this vessel and her cargo as prize, the mandate was presented at the last term, but no order was made respecting the distribution of the money. In June last the money was paid into bank, to the credit of this court. At a district court lately held, the judge of that court ordered the money to be paid over in part to the captain of the Argus, who made the capture, and a part to the district attorney.

Mr. Woodward now moved for a rule upon the persons who had received the money under the above order, to return the same to this court, or, on failure, that an attachment should issue. He contended, that the whole subject was in this court, under the mandate, and that no order to take the money out of the bank, could issue by any judge in vacation, under the act of the last session of congress, until this court had made an order of distribution amongst the claimants; and that even then, the captain had no right to receive the parts belonging to his officers and crew, without a regular power of attorney from them.

THE COURT granted the rule.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

ARIADNE, The. (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,465.

Case No. 527.

The ARIEL.

[1 Hask. 65.]¹

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1867.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO—DOMESTIC GOODS SHIPPED FROM FOREIGN PORT TO AID IN CONCEALING FOREIGN GOODS — MANIFEST — ADMIRALTY—GOODS SEIZED ON LAND.

1. Goods shipped from one domestic port to another, and on the voyage taken to a foreign port with the design and purpose to disguise the character of the vessel, and conceal foreign goods there taken on board to be smuggled, become incorporated into, and a part of an entire cargo to be imported from thence.

2. Goods seized on land are not subject to condemnation and forfeiture in admiralty.

3. A claimant, who has voluntarily destroyed the ship's manifest to prevent its being used as evidence, cannot prove its contents by secondary evidence.

4. A sufficient manifest must state, first by whom the goods are shipped, second, if part of the cargo is brought back, by whom shipped out, and to whom consigned inward.

5. For want thereof, goods, belonging to one of the officers or crew of a vessel belonging in whole or in part to an American citizen, are liable to forfeiture under section 24 of the act of 1799, [1 Stat. 646.]

6. If a manifest is not produced to the proper officers, or its nonproduction accounted for to the satisfaction of the court, a forfeiture attaches to the goods imported.

7. An attempt to import merchandise from a foreign port as coming directly from a domestic port is fraudulent, and subjects the same to forfeiture.

¹[Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

¹[Reported by Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In admiralty. Libel in rem by the United States against the schooner Ariel and cargo, claiming a forfeiture of both for violation of the revenue laws. For the vessel and a part of the cargo no claim was made; but the balance of the cargo was claimed as goods brought from a domestic port and not subject to duty.

Geo. F. Talbot, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Almon A. Strout and Geo. F. Shepley, for claimant.

FOX, District Judge. The Ariel is a registered vessel of about 23 tons. She sailed from Portland about the 11th of July last with only one person on board, her owner, Francis Raymond. Her cargo consisted of 25 hogsheads of salt, which had been taken on board the previous voyage at Portland, and remained on board until it was disposed of by Raymond on the present voyage at Mt. Desert. This salt was the property of Thomas G. Young. Having disposed of the salt, Raymond proceeded in the vessel to Calais, where he found Young, who had purchased there 25 M. of lathes, which he put on board the schooner. Young and Raymond then proceeded in the schooner to Eastport, where Young purchased about 100 quintals dry fish, 1200 boxes herring, and 16 barrels cod-liver-oil. Young states, these articles were purchased by him on speculation, and were put on board the Ariel, consigned to Dana & Co., Portland, that the vessel was cleared from Eastport for Portland, these articles being entered on a manifest as shipped by him to Dana & Co., and that at the time they sailed from Eastport, he did not know that Raymond had any intention of going into Campo Bello. The Ariel with Young and Raymond, the only persons on board, sailed from Eastport Aug. 15th, and the same night went into Head harbor, which is in the island of Campo Bello, and British territory, and there received on board from the British schooner, Frank, 8 hogsheads of alcohol, 75 packages of gin and brandy, 2 casks of brandy, 1 cask of gin, and 8 packages of spices, one J. D. Carlisle being there and aiding in the business, having come there in the Frank. The Ariel remained in Head harbor three days, and then sailed for Portland with Young still on board, Raymond acting as master. She arrived in Casco bay off Mackie's island in the night, and landed Young, and then stood out to sea. She was hovering about the islands in the bay, standing off in the day time, and running in at night to communicate with Young, and whilst so employed, she got ashore on Birch island and filled with water. A portion of her cargo was landed, she was then got off, and the next day was seized by the revenue cutter Mahoning near Cow island, and within the limits of Portland. Whilst the vessel was ashore, Young returned to her and assisted in saving the cargo. The vessel and cargo were libelled, and upon proclamation, no person appearing as claimant, she was condemned with all the property taken on board of her at Head harbor; but Young has appeared and filed a claim as owner of the lathes, fish, oil and herring, denying their liability to forfeiture, and the controversy is now confined to these articles.

This claimant is shown to be an experienced ship-master; he denies all connection or interest in the illicit undertakings of this vessel, and asserts that he did not know or expect that she would go into Head harbor; he also denies any interest in the property there taken on board. It is certainly the duty of the court not lightly to suspect the truth of statements clothed with the solemn sanctions of an oath, but testimony however positive must in its nature be liable to control by strong presumptive circumstances, and must be weighed with care when it comes loaded with the temptations of private interests and the impressions of personal penalties. It is a melancholy consideration for judges, that in the discharge of public duty, they often find themselves obliged to resist the influence of human declarations, and to rely upon the concurrence of probable circumstances. There is evidence before me, full and uncontradicted, that this same vessel with Young and Raymond on board, in May last went from Portland to Eastport with this same 25 hogsheads of salt, and a quantity of pottery belonging to Young, that Young then bought some cord-wood, put it on board the schooner, that they then sailed to Head harbor, where they met this same schooner Frank with Carlisle, and took from her on board the Ariel a large quantity of alcohol, spices and foreign liquors, all of which were successfully smuggled ashore at Falmouth the latter part of June, Young and Carlisle both aiding in the work. Young was interested in that expedition, served as a hand on board the schooner throughout the voyage, purchased at Eastport the cord-wood for a deck-load, in order, as I suspect, to deceive any revenue boats they might meet, and I cannot but believe that his purchases at Calais and Eastport on this present voyage were for the same object and purpose, to conceal the foreign goods on board, and hold out to any casual observer that the Ariel was a coaster, with her deck-load of lathes, etc., engaged in an honest, legitimate business.

Young joins this schooner again at Calais, acts as one of the crew of this vessel then about 30 years old, and of so little value that Young himself states under oath, he would hardly take the gift of her, and if Raymond is to be believed, he assisted in receiving the liquors on board at Head harbor from the Frank, and continues on board, until they again arrive off Mackie's island, as Raymond swears, where he landed Young in the night time, as he did on the former expedition. Young, however, denies that he was landed on that island, but says he was put ashore on the east end of Long Island, and that his reason for going ashore at that place was, that he wished to purchase of a person on Haskell's island, a quantity of oil and fish. If such was his object, it is quite extraordinary that he should have pursued just the course he did, as Long Island is 12 or 15 miles to the westward of Haskell's island, and the Ariel on her passage up, passed quite near to Haskell's island, so that Young could have easily been set ashore from the Ariel upon the island, if he wished to land there, instead of being carried a dozen miles away from it to the westward. I am inclined to believe, Young did land on Mackie's island, and there met his accomplices, and finding perhaps, that the suspicions of the government officers had been excited, and that they were on the watch, it became necessary to seek out some other place of landing, and he therefore returned to the vessel, and was set ashore at Long Island for that object. If everything had been fair, legitimate and honest on Young's part, he would not have allowed this vessel to be dodging around the islands with his property at risk, but having arrived so near to her port of destination, he would have required the master to finish his cruise and enter the cargo, which could easily have been done by inserting on the manifest, if correct and according to law, all the goods and merchandise received on board at Head harbor. All the circumstances of the case satisfy me that Young was a participator, interested in this smuggling expedition, and that I am not justified in placing implicit confidence in his testimony; and upon this point his actions and conduct upon the previous voyage of this vessel have, in my view, an important bearing, and are clearly admissible. I find therefore, as a matter of fact in this case, that these articles claimed by Young, although products of the United States, were purchased by the claimant at Calais and Eastport, not for legitimate trade and commerce, but with the design of taking them to a foreign territory in this schooner, there to be used in aid of a smuggling voyage to this port; that they were not taken there for a lawful purpose, but on the contrary, the design was they should be used there and on the homeward trip in concealing the real purposes of the voyage and the foreign goods on board, and in so disguising the cargo and the general appearance of the vessel, that she would not be likely to be overhauled by revenue boats during the voyage. From the time the foreign goods were taken on board at Head harbor, the goods in question became incorporated with them, constituting in the whole but one cargo, which under all the circumstances of the case, I deem it my duty to consider exactly as if it had all been there shipped on board the Ariel, and had been brought and imported from thence into this port; for there can be no doubt that they were all brought in this schooner within the limits of the port of Portland and Falmouth voluntarily by the master, and with the design of here landing them.

This proceeding is on the admiralty side of the court, and the libel alleges in the first count that these goods are forfeited, being seized on navigable waters, etc., because they were landed without a permit and not in open day; but the fact is, that although some of the goods were thus landed, none of the goods so landed were ever restored to the Ariel, but were seized on land by the government officers, and although landed in violation of the statute, yet having been seized on land, they are not subject to condemnation and forfeiture in the admiralty. Of course the goods which had never been landed, but had always remained on board the Ariel, cannot be condemned under this count in the libel. The second count charges an importation of these goods from a foreign place by the Ariel without having a manifest or manifests on board agreeably to the requirements of the statute. It is necessary, therefore, to examine carefully all the evidence relating to the manifest, and ascertain whether the provisions of the statute have in any respect been violated.

Young says "The articles in question were entered on the manifest in his name, consigned to the Dana's in Portland, that he and Raymond went to the custom house in Eastport, and he thinks he saw the name of the collector of Eastport upon the manifest." Raymond in his deposition states "The lathes, fish, herring and oil, were on the manifest. The vessel cleared from Eastport for Portland. They were by a written memorandum from Young to me put upon the manifest in the name of J. D. Carlisle. At the time the schooner was taken, there was in a tin box in my trunk on board of her, her register, a bill of sale from Barton, a manifest and some other papers. The last time I saw them was on Sunday before I got on the ledge, have not seen them since, and don't know what has become of them." On cross examination he again repeats that these articles were on the manifest, and in reply to the inquiry, "what did you do with the manifest," he says, "I cannot tell you. I lost it certainly. I had my papers in a tin box on Sunday, the day I got on the ledge. Since that I don't know what has become of them." Young says he has no doubt Raymond threw the manifests overboard, for he heard him say he should do so if chased by a cutter. Raymond claims there was a manifest on board when the schooner was seized; but this is denied by the officers of the cutter. None has ever been produced, and on the whole, I am inclined to believe Raymond told Young what Young says he did, and that when chased by the cutter, he did destroy it by throwing it overboard. In his deposition he nowhere expressly denies that he did so, and as he does not pretend that the liquors were entered upon any manifest, he would be quite likely to take that course, if the occasion should arise.

The act of 1799, c. 22, § 23, [1 Stat. 644.] declares, that no goods, wares or merchandise shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place, in any ship or vessel belonging in whole or in part to a citizen, unless the master or person having charge, etc., shall have on board a manifest or manifests in writing, signed by such master or other person, containing the name of the port where the goods in such manifest mentioned shall have been taken on board, and the port for which they are consigned or destined, particularly noting the goods, wares and merchandise destined for each port, and the name, description and build of such ship or vessel, her true admeasurements; and the port to which she belongs, with the name of each owner according to the register, together with the name of the master or other person in charge, a just and particular account of all the goods, wares and merchandise so laden and taken on board, whether in packages or stowed loose, together with the marks and numbers as marked on each package, and the number, quantity and description of the packages, in words at length, together with the names of the persons to whom the same are respectively consigned agreeably to the bill of lading, signed for the same, unless when the said goods are consigned to order, when it shall be so expressed in said manifest, together with names of passengers and their baggage; and that the form of a manifest for goods and merchandise imported in a vessel of the United States, shall be as specified in the statutes. If any articles of the outward cargo are brought back, they are to be detailed, specifying by whom shipped outward and to whom consigned inward. It thus appears that the statute explicitly declares what the manifests shall contain to give it validity; it makes all these particulars requisite; they must each and all be found in the manifest to protect the property on board; all these matters as to the vessel, the voyage and her ownership, the ownership of the goods, the consignee, etc., the statute requires should be recited in the manifest. Is there sufficient legal evidence before the court, that such a manifest of these goods was ever on board the Ariel? Is secondary evidence of the character and contents of a manifest voluntarily destroyed by the master admissible? Under such circumstances, is the claimant at liberty to prove by parol, that there was on board a valid statute manifest? A party, who under no pretense of mistake or accident, voluntarily destroys primary evidence to prevent its being used against him, or for other fraudulent purposes, thereby excludes himself from the benefit of secondary evidence.

Ittigs v. Tayloe, 9 Wheat., [22 U. S.] 483.

There is no evidence properly before me, showing that there was any valid manifest on board the schooner during this voyage, and I should be fully justified in condemning this property on this account; but waiving this objection, and conceding that these goods were entered on a manifest of some kind either at Eastport, or after leaving that port, this paper, whatever it was, is not produced in court at the hearing, but was fraudulently destroyed by the master, and I have no satisfactory evidence of its contents. Am I to presume it was a perfect and complete document in accordance with all the requirements of the statute? or from its destruction, should I not rather presume, that it would not answer the requirements of the law. "In odium spoliatoris omnia praesumuntur."

Spoliation of papers is always an aggravated and flagrant circumstance of suspicion, and whilst in prize causes, in England and this country, it does not, as on the continent, create an absolute presumption of guilt, yet in the language of Lord Stowell "a case that escapes with such a brand upon it, is saved so as by fire." But, whatever might be the presumption ordinarily, the testimony of Raymond and Young are in conflict in relation to one particular, which the statute requires should be truly stated in the manifest, and that is, the name of the consignee of the goods. Young says that the goods were consigned to Dana, and so entered upon the manifest, whilst Raymond states they were by Young's written direction entered in the name of Carlisle. It may be claimed that from the language of this witness, it is uncertain whether he intended to be understood that Carlisle appeared by the manifest to be the shipper, or consignee, but this is not of any great consequence for according to the testimony of Young, Carlisle was not the shipper, and had no interest in the goods; and the form prescribed by the act requires that the manifest shall state by whom the goods are shipped. Again, this vessel, being bound from Eastport on a foreign voyage, should have cleared for her port of destination after delivering to the collector a manifest of all her cargo. This is required by the 93d section of act of 1799, [1 Stat. 698,] and by the 23d section of the same act, [1 Stat. 644,] it is provided, that if any part of the outward cargo is brought back, the manifest at the port of arrival shall state, by whom shipped outward, and to whom consigned inward. Of course no manifest, which was ever designed to be presented to the customs officers at the port of arrival of this schooner, would have shown that these goods had been transported to a foreign country, or that she had touched at any foreign port after leaving Eastport.

By the 24th section of the statute of 1799, [1 Stat. 646,] it is enacted, that if any goods, wares or merchandise shall be imported or brought into the United States in any ship or vessel whatever, belonging in whole or in part to a citizen of the United States, from any foreign port or place without having a manifest or manifests on board agreeably to the directions in the foregoing section, or which shall not be included or described therein, or shall not agree therewith, in every such case, the master or other person having charge, &c., shall forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to the value of such goods not included in the manifest, and all such merchandise, not included in the manifest, belonging or consigned to the master, mate, officers or crew of such vessel, shall be forfeited. The claimant was one of the officers or crew of the Ariel; there was an importation of the goods in question from a foreign port; the vessel is found with the goods on board without a manifest; and I think I am justified in concluding that if there ever was any manifest, it was not one which would answer the requirements of the law, and that the property in question is therefore liable to forfeiture.

It seems to me, that under another view of the provisions of the act of 1799, this property is also liable to forfeiture. The 25th section of that act [1 Stat. 646] requires, that the manifest described in the 23d and 24th sections [1 Stat. 644-646] shall be produced by the master to the boarding officers of the customs on his arrival within four leagues of the coast, and shall also be produced to the officers of the customs, who shall first come on board upon the arrival of the vessel within the limits of any district in which any part of the cargo is to be landed. He shall also deliver to each of these boarding officers true copies of this manifest, and they shall certify on the back of the original manifest to its being so produced to them, and the master shall produce and deliver to the collector his original manifest so certified. The manifest, it appears, should thus be made out before the vessel arrives within four leagues of the coast, and must be on board at the time of the importation, and remain and continue on board until produced to the collector. It is not enough for the claimant to show that a manifest was on board at the time when the vessel arrived within four leagues of the coast, or when she arrived at the port of destination, and that five minutes afterwards it was fraudulently destroyed by the master. The original document is demanded by the law. It has its own work to accomplish. It is to manifest the truth and the facts, and to continue on board, so manifesting them, from the time the vessel is within four leagues of the coast; from that moment to be always in readiness to testify and declare the truth to the different boarding officers, and finally to rest in the custom house, there to remain as part of the public documents of the department. And this result is confirmed by the proviso of section 24, which enacts, that if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, or to the satisfaction of the court in which a trial shall be had concerning such forfeitures, that no part of the cargo of such ship or vessel had been unshipped after it was taken on board, except such as shall have been particularly specified and accounted for in the report of the master or other person having charge or command of such ship or vessel, and that the manifests have been lost or mislaid without fraud or collusion, or that the same were defaced by accident, or incorrect by mistake, in any such case, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred.

If the manifest is not produced, I am of opinion that the forfeiture attaches to the importation, unless its non-production is accounted for to the satisfaction of the court, within the terms of this proviso; as in the present case, I believe the manifest was fraudulently destroyed by the master, and as a portion of the cargo had also been discharged without being specified in any report of the master, this claimant cannot derive any benefit from this proviso, but on the contrary is rather concluded by it. I am therefore of opinion that all the property in question which was found on board this schooner, is liable to forfeiture under the second count in this libel.

The last count is founded on the act of 27th of May, 1848, [9 Stat. 232.] in connection with the act of 1866, c. 201, § 4, [14 Stat. 179.] By the former act, registered vessels, trading between one port in the United States and one or more ports in the same, are allowed to touch at foreign ports and take on merchandise, &c., provided they are furnished by the collector of the port in which they take in their cargo in the United States, with a certified manifest of their cargo. In the present case, there is no evidence of any such manifest having been obtained at Eastport; and as the announcement to the collector at Eastport that they were bound to Head harbor, and a request for a certified manifest, would at once have excited his suspicions, and defeated their purpose in going there, I cannot believe that any such certified manifest was obtained there, although from the omission of the government and claimant to procure any evidence touching this point from the files of the custom house at Eastport, the court has not been furnished with that certain and positive testimony, which it was in the power of either party to have produced. By the 48th section of the act of 1799, it is made requisite that merchandise of the growth, product or manufacture of the United States, if exported to a foreign country, should be cleared out, on its original exportation from the United States; if not so cleared out, and it is taken to a foreign place and re-imported from thence, it is subject to duty. In the present case, there is no pretence of a clearance of these goods from Eastport to any foreign port, and if brought from such foreign port and liable to duty, the manifest should certainly show the true state of the case in regard to them, and it was fraudulent on the part of the claimant to attempt to import them as coming directly from Eastport, and so not subject to duty.

The 4th section of the act 1866, c. 201, [14 Stat. 179,] declares that if any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, any goods, wares or merchandise, contrary to law, the same shall be forfeited. These goods were carried from Eastport to a foreign place, Head harbor, without a clearance or certified manifest, and are brought here from this foreign port without the certified manifest required by the act of 1848, or the manifest described in the act of 1799, and under the fraudulent pretext of being brought here directly from a home port. Raymond and Young were both of them experienced ship-masters, conversant with the revenue laws, practiced in the violation of their provisions, and I think I am justified under all the circumstances, in finding that these goods were imported and brought by them into this port fraudulently and knowingly in violation of law, and therefore subject to forfeiture.

Obedying the instructions of the supreme court as declared in U. S. v. Taylor, [Taylor v. U. S.] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197, that "revenue laws ought to be so construed, as most effectually to accomplish the intentions of the legislature in passing them, instead of being construed with great strictness in favor of defendant," I do pronounce, declare and decree, that the property here claimed by Thomas G. Young, which was seized on board the Ariel to wit: 16 barrels cod-liver-oil, 10 M. lathes, 2,000 lbs. dry fish, 424 boxes of herring, be forfeited to the United States of America, and that the remainder of this property, although equally liable to condemnation, having been seized on land, is not subject to condemnation in the present proceeding.

Case No. 528.

The ARIES.

[2 Spr. 198.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1863.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—ACT OF MASTER—OWNERS OF VESSEL AND CARGO.

1. In case of breach of blockade, the owners of the vessel, in a prize court, are conclusively bound, in all cases, by the act of the master.

2. It is also a general rule that the owners of the cargo are bound in like manner; and the few cases in which persons interested in the cargo are permitted to show that the act of the master in violating blockade was against their wish, are carefully guarded, and are chiefly such as present a kind of physical impossibility of their knowledge or desire.

3. Examination of facts to show a hostile destination and ownership of cargo.

In admiralty.

R. H. Dana, Jr., U. S. Atty., for the United States and captors.

C. G. Thomas, for claimants of vessel.

H. H. Coolidge, for claimants of cargo.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The steamer Aries was built little more than a year ago, in Sunderland, England, and owned, as the papers show, by a person with a foreign name, and called by some of the witnesses a Spaniard, F. P. Obicini. She sailed from Sunderland directly to Charleston, S. C., running the blockade of that port, with a cargo which was sold there by auction. None of the papers found on board show what was her ostensible destination for that voyage. We learn the fact from the admissions of the master and mate, on the preparatory examination. From Charleston she sailed with a cargo of cotton, again breaking blockade, to Porto Rico, and thence to St. Thomas. At St. Thomas she took in a cargo, and sailed to Gibara, in Cuba, near Havana, where she took in more cargo, and sailed thence for Charleston, and was captured at Bull's bay, near Charleston, by the United States steamer Stetton, Captain Devens, on the 28th March last, in the act of attempting to break the blockade. The master, mate, and crew admit, on their examination, that the actual destination was Charleston, while the ostensible destination, on all the ship's papers, was New York. Under these circumstances, the condemnation of the vessel is inevitable. The master, who has been here and returned to England, puts in no claim for the vessel. The only claim is by the British consul, rather a formal and official claim, in behalf of vessel and cargo, for British owners. As the blockade has long been notorious, and the vessel has been in and out of Charleston in violation of it, the owners of the ship cannot be heard to deny that the master was their agent in his acts. Indeed, the rule of prize courts seems to be that, in all cases of breach of blockade, the owners of the vessel are concluded by the act of the master. In this case, there is satisfactory evidence that the owners knew of the blockade, and must have known and assented to this series of acts in violation of it.

A claim is put in for the cargo by Messrs. Riera, Thibaut, & Co., of New York, as agents for Messrs. I. Munne & Co., of Gibara, Cuba. Their affidavit states only that the cargo was consigned to them, at New York, by I. Munne & Co., who sent them three bills of lading of the cargo, and a letter of advice. On learning of the capture, and of the arrival of the Aries in Boston, they wrote to I. Munne & Co., and received a reply; but they do not annex the reply to their affidavit, or a copy of it, and only say that it promised further information. It is evident that Messrs. Riera, Thibaut, & Co., knew nothing of this consignment beyond the fact that there was an ostensible consignment to them at New York. The preparatory evidence shows that two Spaniards, by the names of Salcedo and Malgar, sailed in this steamer, as passengers, from Sunderland to Charleston, and thence throughout the voyage, until her capture. The mate says he understood they owned the outward cargo, and that they acted as owners at Charleston. At St. Thomas, two other Spaniards, by the names of Pucho and Estoval, joined her as passengers, and were in her when captured. Estoval was examined, and states, without attempt at concealment, that the cargo was owned by these four passengers, he having given the others $1000 for an interest in it, the extent of which he does not state; that there were no bills of lading or consignees of the cargo; and that it was destined for Charleston, to be sold there by the owners, who accompanied it. He makes no claim to it in this court, apparently considering it as a hopeless case, and says, in his examination, that he lost his adventure by the capture. The three other passengers left the vessel, and have made no attempt to claim their property. The mate also testifies that this cargo belonged to the passengers. The engineer also testifies that it was reported on board that the passengers owned the cargo or a part of it. The testimony of the master, William Richards, is disingenuous. He at first states that the steamer was bound, "by her papers," to New York, and says he does not know who owned the cargo, and refers to the bills of lading as showing who were consignees, and says he thinks Roman & Poa, of Porto Rico, were the shippers, to whom he gave bills of lading; but, at last, admits that she was bound to a Confederate port. The officers, and such of the crew as were examined, all admit their knowledge of her actual destination. Against this testimony, we have only the documents found on board. These, of course, would not be expected to disclose a blockaded port as the port of destination, for that would betray her to any cruisers who might board her. She would have an apparent lawful destination to exhibit to cruisers so long as it would serve her, and until it was necessary to keep off for her destined port, when the ostensible destination would no longer avail her. Her ostensible destination was from Havana to New York, which would account for her position off the southern coast, at any point not too near in shore. But the cargo was of a character it would be absurd to suppose could be sent from the West Indies to New York. It consisted chiefly of the produce and manufactures of the New England and the middle states, which are exported thence to the West Indies, and other articles paying high duties in the West Indies. It would require great credulity to believe that a cargo of cotton and flannel clothing, flour, breadstuffs, boots and shoes, butter, cheese, tea, nails and spikes, pig lead, and cordage was destined on any mercantile enterprise from St. Thomas and Cuba to New York, rather than to the rebel states.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr., and here reprinted by permission.]

There are found on board three bills of lading, all dated at Gibara, in the name of J. Munne & Co. as shippers, with Riera & Thibaut, of New York, as consignees, and a letter accompanying them. This letter is from J. Munne & Co. to Riera & Thibaut, and states that this cargo, part shipped at St. Thomas and part at Gibara, chiefly belonging to the writers, but a part to a passenger, is all consigned to them. It requests them not to insure, and says they will advise them hereafter what to do with the proceeds. The custom house documents all contain the same statements as to the consignments of the cargo, and destination of the vessel. If Messrs. Munne & Co. were the real owners of this cargo, I could not permit them to show that they did not know of the intent of the master to break the blockade. The general rule is, that the owner of the cargo is concluded, in respect of breach of blockade, by the act of the master; and the cases in which he is allowed to show that the act of the master was without his knowledge and against his wish, are few and carefully guarded; one being where it was physically impossible that it could have been otherwise, as where no war or blockade existed, or was impending when the vessel sailed, and there had been no chance to communicate since. But, in this case, it is impossible to suppose ignorance in Munne & Co. The blockade of Charleston had long been notorious, and the four passengers, and the master, officers, and crew, all knew that this vessel had come from Charleston, and was bound directly there again; and the letter of Munne & Co. shows that they had relations with one of the passengers respecting part of the cargo, and they of course had dealings with the master, who signed the bills of lading made out for them from printed blanks furnished by them. It seems also that, with full knowledge of the capture and prize proceedings here, they have done nothing which their nominal agents think it necessary to bring before this court. If an owner of a cargo could save his property in a clear case of breach of a notorious blockade, by showing that he did not, in fact, know of the intention of the master of the vessel to attempt a breach of the blockade, such proof could always be given. He would be studiously silent and uninformed on the subject, and have a full supply of documents to show a lawful destination; and probably nominal owners would also be resorted to, who might in fact know nothing, and care nothing, about the cargo and its destination. The rule of the prize courts is doubtless a wise and necessary one on this head. In the present case, however, the evidence discloses actual ownership in the four passengers, without bills of lading or consignment, and a formal and fraudulent title and papers in Munne & Co., with a false destination and consignment, to cover the transaction as long as the cover would avail it. And even if Munne & Co. were the owners, they would be concluded by the clear force of the evidence in the case, without the necessity of resorting to the presumption of law laid down in the books. Decree of condemnation of vessel and cargo.

[NOTE. For a subsequent hearing in this case concerning the distribution of the proceeds of the condemnation sale, see The Aries, Case No. 529.]

Case No. 529.

The ARIES.

[2 Spr. 262;¹ 26 Law Rep. 336.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1864.

PRIZE—SIGNAL DISTANCE—ACT 1862.

What constitutes signal distance, within the meaning of the act of congress of 1862, c. 204, § 3, (2 Stat. 606,) regulating the distribution of prize money.

In admiralty.

No special counsel appeared for any of the contesting parties, though opportunity was offered to the parties to be so represented. The whole cause was presented, by consent, by R. H. Dana, Jr., U. S. Atty.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This vessel and her cargo have been condemned. [The Aries, Case No. 528.] The actual captor was the United States steamer Stettin. Certain vessels of the navy claim to share in the proceeds with the Stettin. Their right to participate is the question now for decision. The only one of these vessels which claims to have been within direct signal distance is the Memphis. I will consider her case first. The Stettin was the most northerly of the vessels composing the blockading squadron off Charleston, and was stationed at Bull's bay something like twenty miles to the northward of the flag-ship. A little after midnight, on the morning of the 28th of March, there being a thick fog, she saw the light of a steamer attempting to run in. The Stettin slipped immediately and stood outside of the chase, to cut her off from the inlet, and to prevent her going out to sea, and threw up one or two rockets and fired two guns at the chase; but the fog setting in thick, she lost sight of her. The Stettin remained on the watch until daybreak, when she saw the chase ashore in the bay, boarded her with boats, and took possession. The prize proved to be the steamer Aries, bound from St. Thomas to Wilmington, with a valuable cargo.

¹[Reported by Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr., and here reprinted by permission.]

The Stettin fired no guns, and made no signals after daybreak.

The officers of the Aries, having been brought in, have given their evidence. They say that no vessel was within sight, or, so far as they know, within signal distance, from the time they were seen until the capture, and that they heard no guns and saw no lights except from the Stettin. The evidence of the commander and officers of the Stettin was to the same effect. The Memphis was stationed at Rattlesnake shoals. Her distance from the station of the Stettin is variously stated; the nearest being nine miles in an air line, and, by the course of vessels, from twelve to eighteen miles. The United States schooners Blunt and America were both about one mile nearer than the Memphis, at least by the course vessels must take. Neither of them heard guns, or saw lights, or claim to have been within signal distance, or to share in the prize. Mr. Curtis, the executive officer of the Memphis, has given his testimony before the commissioner here. He says that he was below, and neither heard nor saw anything, but was told, the next morning, that lights had been seen in the direction of the Stettin. He adds that he did not consider the Memphis to be within signal distance; that the Stettin could not be seen by day except from the mast-head, and neither flags nor Coston lights could be made out from her under the most favorable circumstances. Interrogatories have been sent to the Memphis, and to her commander, Lieutenant Watmough, but no answers have been received. Lieutenant Watmough replied by letter to the United States Attorney that his recollections were not sufficiently distinct for answering the interrogatories, and adds that he saw the light of a rocket and the flash of a gun from the Stettin, but the fog closed in so thick that he saw no more. It was his duty to answer the interrogatories to the best of his recollection and belief, and his letter is not testimony; but, as his officers and crew are interested, I will consider whether, if full testimony should result in putting the matter where his letter puts it, it would avail the Memphis. If so, I might entertain a motion for further proof. According to his letter, the light of a rocket was seen, and the flash of a gun; but no report was heard, and it does not appear that the direction of the rocket was observed; and probably, in the fog, only the glare of its light was seen. The Memphis made no attempt to reply by gun, rocket, or otherwise, or to get under way. She could only have conjectured, at the time, from what vessel the lights proceeded, and learned the fact the next day, when she heard the circumstances of the capture.

The question, then, is reduced to this: The Memphis was too far distant to make out flags or Coston lights, or to hear, in that state of the wind and weather, the report of guns of the calibre of those on board the Stettin, but was near enough to see the flash of a gun and the light of a rocket in the air. It is to be observed that the capture was made by daylight, when the evidence shows there was no pretext for saying that any signals could be seen. But I will take the most favorable view for the Memphis, and include the whole time from the sighting of the Ariès until the capture. Can the Memphis be considered as "within signal distance" in the meaning of the statute? Evidence has been taken from the principal officers of the vessels off Charleston, and especially of Commodores Turner and Godon, the successive commanding officers of that squadron, on the subject of signals and signal distances. Some of them say that they do not consider guns and rockets to come within the term "signal distance." Others speak of vessels as not within signal distance unless guns and rockets be included. Others again, and perhaps the larger number, and among them the two commodores, include guns and rockets, with positiveness. No system of signalling by guns and rockets has been adopted by the navy department, or is in general use. What use has been made of guns and rockets for that purpose is by special order of the commander of each squadron. In the squadron off Charleston, the utmost extent to which it has been carried seems to be this: Single rockets were to be thrown in the direction the blockade-runner was taking. One witness says that three rockets indicated the approach of a ram. No one says that a single gun has any special signification; but it is said that, if two guns are heard in rapid succession, it is the duty of the vessel hearing them to go immediately and ascertain the cause of the firing. This does not, in my opinion, amount to a system of signals by guns and rockets, of such a character as to satisfy the requirements of the statute regulating the distribution of prize money. Whether such a system might not be established, I do not undertake to determine. The Memphis did not even hear a gun, but merely saw the glare of one gun and rocket as refracted through the fog. The claim, therefore, of the Memphis must be disallowed.

The flag-ship New Ironsides and the Powhattan, Canandaigua, Housatonic, and other vessels of the blockading squadron, have also put in claims to share in the proceeds. They place their claims on two grounds: First, that of co-operation in a common enterprise of blockade, which, they contend, makes them captors of all vessels taken by any ship of the squadron in an attempted breach of the blockade, irrespective of the question of signal distance. This ground of claim was fully considered by this court, and disallowed, in the case of The Cherokee, [Case No. 2,640.] Their other ground of claim is, that, although they were not themselves within direct signal distance of the Stettin, yet, if the Memphis was within signal distance of the Stettin, she could repeat the signals to the vessels nearest to her, and thus they could pass through the fleet. It is sufficient to say that the first link in the chain fails, as the Memphis herself is decided not to have been within signal distance; and, if she had been, I should very much doubt whether the ability to receive signals by repeating can be held to bring a vessel within the benefits of the statute. The decree must be, that no vessel of the navy is entitled to share with the Stettin in the distribution of the proceeds.

See The St. John, [Case No. 12,225;] The Ella & Anna, [Id. 4,368.]

Case No. 530.

ARKANSAS v. BALL et al.

[Hempst. 541.]

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. May Term, 1847.

STATE AND STATE OFFICERS—SUIT BY GOVERNOR ON ADMINISTRATION BOND—PLEADING.

1. On an administration bond, payable to the governor by name, and to his successors in office, the suit for the benefit of the party injured must be brought in the name of the governor for the time being, and not by his style of office.

2. Although he is a purely naked trustee for any party injured, yet the legal title is in him, and he must sue.

3. A suit by the style of office, namely, "The Governor of the State of Arkansas, Plaintiff," cannot be maintained.

[At law. Action of debt on administration bond by the governor of the state of Arkansas against Bennett B. Ball, John S. Blair, and Benjamin F. Howard. Defendants demur. Demurrer sustained.]

A. Fowler, for plaintiff.

Daniel Ringo and F. W. Trapnall, for defendants, made the following points on the demurrer to the declaration:

(1.) The legal title to, or interest in, said bond is not in the plaintiff, but in the state of Arkansas, or the legal representatives of John Pope, deceased, to whom it was made payable.

(2.) That there is no such corporate being known to or recognized by law as "The Governor of the State of Arkansas," capable of suing or being sued, or of creating or receiving any obligation; but the right, if any, in the bond set forth in the declaration, is, by law, vested in the present incumbent of the office of governor, who holds the same as a naked trust, for the use of such as have been damaged by a breach of the condition. And in the name of the individual who holds the office, and not in the name of his style of office only, we presume every suit on such obligations has been prosecuted, and so the statutes certainly contemplated they should be prosecuted, unless, indeed, they must be sued in the name of the state, by virtue of the provisions of the 171st section of the administration law. See Rev. St. p. 59, § 15, tit. "Abatement," which shows conclusively that such suits, when brought in the name of the governor, must be in the name of the person holding the office for the time being, and not in the name of his style of office, otherwise there could be no substitution of the name of his successor, where the plaintiff dies or is removed from office as there provided.

¹[Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

Taylor v. Auditor, 2 Ark. 174, held that the auditor can maintain suit on sheriffs' bonds made to the governor and his successors in office, by virtue of statute of 1836; but on such bond suit in his name can be maintained, only when the state is the beneficiary, or entitled to the money recovered by the suit. This was adjudged before the taking effect of the Revised Statutes.

Phillips v. Governor, 2 Ark. 382, was instituted before the taking effect of our Revised Statutes, and not subject to the provisions of the 171st section of our administration law, as this suit is; was brought in the name of "James S. Conway, Governor, &c., as Successor of Pope," in whom, as the law then was, the legal interest in the bond was vested, as a naked trust, as Pope's successor in office, and so that suit was properly in the name of Conway; was rightly decided; and the principle there adjudged, as regards the party in whose name the suit on such bond is maintainable, rightly understood, is a direct authority against the plaintiff in this suit; as the law, when this suit was instituted, expressly required it to be in the name of the state; as the law pre-existing required it, to be in the name of the person who, at the time, was the incumbent of the office of governor. To the same effect is one of the cases read by the plaintiff's counsel from the Missouri Reports, while the others read from same book neither uphold the view of the plaintiff, nor militate against that of the defendants; but we infer that it was a suit in the name of the person holding the office of governor. The breaches assigned were various, not confined as here, simply to non-payment of the judgments, and an alleged failure to sell lands and slaves without showing the personal estate insufficient for the payment of debts—in which case only such sale is authorized.

The insufficiency of the first four breaches assigned, (each being for the non-payment of the debt allowed in favor of Pinkard & Arnold,) consists in the omission to show or set forth in any manner, the fact, that upon a settlement of their administration accounts with the county court, or any other court of competent jurisdiction, moneys sufficient to pay the debts and expenses, by law required to be paid, was at any time in the hands of administrators; that the same was by such court appropriated to the payment of this debt; or that they were ever ordered to pay the same by such court; and neglected to pay the same within ten days after the making of such order. Until these facts are shown the administrators were not bound to pay, in fact could not pay, without taking upon themselves the whole burden and risk of adjusting the rights and priorities of all the creditors, and of making good the loss to any creditor, if, upon settlement made, the court should direct the payment to be made in a different order, or a greater or less proportion, a burden and responsibility of which the law has entirely exempted the administrator, by only requiring him to pay upon the order of the court only. And so it has been expressly adjudged by the supreme court of this state in Outlaw v. Yell, 5 Ark. 470, and against the principle of this decision, we confidently believe, no case can be found; besides it applies to proceedings under the statutes in force prior to March 20, 1839, as forcibly as to those contained in the Revised Statutes, as is manifest upon a comparison of their provisions. See Ark. Dig. tit. "Administration," §§ 28-31, 33, 43, 45, to show that the administrator shall only pay over or part with the estate upon settlement made and an order directing the appropriation thereof, whether in discharge of debts, legacies, or distributive shares; and contrast same with the corresponding provisions of the Revised Statutes, tit. "Administration," §§ 104-107, 121-124.

To show that prior to March 20, 1839, as well as subsequently, the amount recovered in any proceeding for waste, shall be appropriated for the common benefit of all the creditors, contrast sections 32, 33, 35-37, in Ter. Dig., with sections 171-173, Rev. St. The two last breaches, one for non-sale of slave, the other for non-sale of land, are respectively defective in not showing a deficiency of other personal estate to pay the debts, legally allowed, and chargeable against the administrator; without which deficiency administrators could neither sell slaves nor lands. Old. Ark. Dig. §§ 22, 26. In regard to all the questions at present presented on the demurrer, as regards the breaches assigned, the law will be found to have been substantially the same before and since the 20th of March, 1839, and the demurrer is, as we conceive and insist, in every point well taken.

Before JOHNSON, District Judge, holding the circuit court.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The only question I deem it necessary to decide on the present demurrer is, whether this suit is brought in the name of a person competent to maintain it. The declaration and writ described the plaintiff in the following manner: "The governor of the state of Arkansas, who sues for the use of Pinckard & Arnold, &c." This suit is not brought in the individual name of the governor of the state of Arkansas, but in the manner above stated, by the style of office. The administration bond upon which the action is founded was executed to John Pope, governor of the territory of Arkansas, and his successors in office, in 1833, in accordance with the provisions of the 9th section of the territorial act of 1825. Ter. Dig. 50. The thirty-seventh section of the same act provides that "the bond to be given by the administrator may be put in suit by the party injured in the name of the governor of the territory to the use of the party injured." Ter. Dig. 64. And the fourth section of the schedule to the constitution of Arkansas declares that all bonds executed to the governor of the territory in his official capacity shall pass over to the governor of the state and his successors in office, for the use therein expressed, and may be sued for and recovered accordingly. Rev. St. § 40.

In my judgment it is clear, that an action may be maintained if it is brought in the name of the governor of this state at the time it is commenced, and the only question is, has this suit been so brought? The plain and obvious meaning of bringing a suit in the name of a public officer is, that it shall be in the name of the individual holding the office for the time being. He is a purely naked trustee for any party injured,—a mere conduit through which the law affords a remedy. The legal title is in the officer, and in his name alone can an action at law be maintained; and to that effect are adjudged cases. Brown v. Strode, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 303; Wormley v. Wormley, 3 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 421; Irvine v. Lowry, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 300; McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 9. That this is the meaning of the legislature in using these terms is abundantly manifest from the fifteenth section of the Revised Statutes, under the title "Abatement," which provides that "when an action is directed or authorized by law to be brought by or in the name of a public officer, his death or removal from office shall not abate the suit, if the cause of such suit survive to his successor; but the same may be continued in the name of such successor as plaintiff therein. Rev. St. § 59. Thus showing that the suit is to be brought in the individual name of the officer and not by his style of office.

This action is brought by using the style of office and not by using the name of the officer, and it can hardly be contended that it can be maintained in its present form. This may be said to be mere technical objection as the plaintiff on the record cannot prevent the institution or prosecution of the suit, nor exercise any control over it, the real and only plaintiffs being the persons injured by a breach of the bond. To this it may be answered that the legal right to bring an action upon the bond is alone vested in the person exercising the functions of governor and his successors in office, to whom, in his individual name as governor, it is executed, and he alone or his successors in office, although naked trustees for others, can maintain an action on the bond. And this accords with the general rule of pleading, that the right of action at law is vested in the party having the strict legal title and interest. 1 Chit. Pl. 3; [Anderson v. Martindale,] 1 East, 497, 501; [Scholey v. Mearns,] 7 East, 148; [People v. Hohnès,] 5 Wend. 191; [Lawton v. Erwin,] 9 Wend. 233.

I have seen no case establishing a different doctrine from that here laid down, and the cases, as far as my researches have extended, were all brought in the individual name of the officer, describing himself as holding the office. McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 9. Demurrer sustained.

NOTE, [from original report.] The plaintiff obtained leave to amend; but subsequently dismissed the suit.

Case No. 531.

In re ARKELL.

[15 Blatchf. 437; 4 Ban. & A. 80; Merw. Pat. Inv. 170.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Jan. 9, 1879.
PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PATENTABILITY—NOVELTY.

A notch in one thickness of a paper bag with an evenly cut mouth, such notch facilitating the opening of the mouth, being in existence, a paper bag made with such a notch in one thickness of a mouth cut with jagged or serrated edges, with a view to facilitate the opening of the mouth, is not a patentable invention.

[Cited in Ansonia Brass & Copper Co. v. Electrical Supply Co., 144 U. S. 18, 12 Sup. Ct. 604.]

In equity.

H. D. Donnelly and Augustus Brandegee, for plaintiff.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, which is brought under section 4915 of the Revised Statutes, praying for an adjudication that the applicant is entitled to receive a patent for an improvement in paper bags. Application for a patent was duly filed on December 14th, 1876, and was rejected by the commissioner of patents, upon appeal from the examiners in chief, on June 5th, 1877. Upon appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting in banc, the decision of the commissioner was affirmed, on January 22d, 1878. A copy of this bill was served upon the commissioner of patents, who has filed a brief in support of his views. The improvement relates to the well known class of paper bags, in the manufacture of which the paper is first folded and pasted to form a continuous flattened tubular blank, and the bag blanks are then cut from the continuous blank, by a serrated knife moving more rapidly than the blank. This process of cutting leaves both the cut edges in a serrated or jagged form, and produces a bag having a "jaggedly cut mouth." It is admitted, that, in this kind of bag, the two cut edges naturally clinch together, and that the rough edges of the fibrous material tend to become felted together during storage or transportation in bulk, so that it is difficult to open the mouth of the bag without an expenditure of time and labor. This disadvantage has impaired the usefulness of this class of paper bags to the consumers.

[Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 4 Ban. & A. 80; and here republished by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 170, contains partial report, only.]

The applicant states, in his specification, that the improvement consists in "forming in one of the two adjacent cut edges, a notch or cut-away portion, or a series of such notches, which prevent any clinching, or any subsequent felting together, of the rough edges at such points, and thus afford an opportunity for the more ready opening out of the mouth of the finished bag, while at the same time they render easier the separation of the adjacent cut edges that have to be opened out, folded and pasted to form the bag bottom, during the manufacture." The benefit prior to the completion of the bag was not commented upon in the affidavits, and it is manifest, that the main, if not the only, object of the improvement is, to facilitate the opening of the bag mouth after it has been closed, and its edges have been felted together in cutting and packing. The claim of the applicant, as stated in his specification, is, for "paper bags made with a notch or cut-away portion or portions in one thickness of the jaggedly cut mouth, whereby the clinching and tendency to felt together of the edges of the mouth so cut are overcome, and the opening of the mouth of the bag for use rendered easier, substantially as described." On December 19th, 1876, the applicant obtained a patent for his described method of manufacturing this kind of paper bags.

The main question in the case is, whether the applicant is entitled to a patent for his improved article of manufacture, in view of the bag described and shown in the specification and drawings of the patent to Luther C. Crowell, No. 137,533, dated April 8th, 1873. The Crowell bag was not made from a flattened tube, and the severing of the blanks was made by a clean cut, so that the jaggedly cut mouth is not a feature of his bag. There was a semi-circular incision in the centre of the band of paper, so that the bag, when folded and cut, had a notch in one thickness of the bag, at its mouth end. The object of this notch is not explained in his specification, and the notch is not claimed in the patent, but the existence of the incision and of the notch is clearly shown both in the specification and the drawings. His bag had, in fact, an evenly cut mouth and a notch therein, and the notch facilitated the opening of the mouth. It is not important that the process by which the notch is made in the respective bags is very dissimilar. As the article of manufacture only is claimed in the application, the question now of importance is, whether the improved article had been patented or described in some printed publication prior to the alleged invention by the applicant, or whether he was the first and original inventor thereof. Cohn v. U. S. Corset Co., 93 U. S. 366.

The question resolves itself into this: "Plain edged" and "jaggedly cut" bags being both well known at the date of this alleged invention, does a plain edged paper bag, notched at the mouth, which notch facilitates the opening of the bag, anticipate a notched "jaggedly cut mouth" paper bag, the notch being for the express purpose of enabling the consumer to overcome the resistance of the felted edges to the opening of the bag? The application of an old contrivance to a new purpose is not patentable, when the old and new purposes, and the objects to which the contrivance is applied, are merely analogous. If the use of an old contrivance produces a new effect, the new manufacture or process may be patentable, because the new use is not analogous to the former one; but, if the new use is simply upon a new occasion, not producing a new effect, the use is analogous to what had been done before. Curt. Pat. § 56.

In this case, the new use to which the notch was put was to facilitate the opening of the mouth of a jaggedly cut bag. The old use was to facilitate the opening of the mouth of a plain edged bag. The uses were the same, and the effect was the same in kind. The old result of opening the mouth was attained by the same means which were used when the former result was attained. It is true, that, in jaggedly cut bags, the fibres clinch and felt together, and the object of the notch is to prevent clinching and felting, but the object of preventing felting is simply that the mouth may be easily opened. The notch, in either bag, is to afford an easy means of grasping one lip of the mouth and thus disengaging it from its fellow. The difficulty of opening the mouth of a plain edged bag is slight, because either lip is easily grasped by the finger, whereas, in a jaggedly cut bag, there is a serious difficulty in inserting the fingers between the felted fibres of the paper, but the object of having a notch and the use of the notch are the same, and the difference in effect which the notch produces is one of degree and not of kind. If the effect of the old contrivance, when applied to the new object, is simply a better and, therefore, more useful accomplishment of the old effect, in an analogous object, by the use of precisely the same means, the application of the new use is not patentable. If a person had before him a notched plain edged bag, it would require no invention to discover that such a contrivance would also facilitate opening the mouth of a jagged bag, although it might require much exercise of invention to ascertain the means by which the notch could be produced in a bag of the latter class. Those means have already been patented in favor of the applicant. The bill should be dismissed.

Case No. 532.

ARKELL et al. v. J. M. HURD PAPER-BAG CO.

[7 Blatchf. 475.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June, 1870.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PATENTABILITY—INFRINGEMENT—PAPER BAGS.

1. The claim of letters patent granted to James Arkell and Benjamin Smith, June 6th, 1865, for an "improvement in paper-bags," namely: "Softening the upper parts of paper-bags and making them pliable, substantially as and for the purpose above described," is a claim to a paper-bag having its upper end softened and made flexible, while its lower portion is strong and stiff with the sizing of the paper.

2. A paper-bag which has its extreme upper end unsoftened, but has a strip or band around it, at a short distance from its top, crimped or softened and thus made pliable, is an infringement of such patent.

[In equity. Bill for injunction by James Arkell and Benjamin Smith against the J. M. Hurd Paper-Bag Company,] founded on letters patent granted to the plaintiffs, June 6th, 1865, [No. 48,036,] for an "improvement in paper-bags." The specification said: "This invention consists in making or preparing paper-bags in such a way as to give them, at their upper ends, a flexible character, so that, when properly filled with flour or other substances, the sides of the bags, at their upper ends, will come together after the manner of the sides of a cloth-bag. * * * We prepare paper-bags of every size and quality and strength of paper in such a way as that their top parts can be gathered and brought together in easy lines, and with uniformity, towards a common centre, much after the manner of gathering the top of a bag made of cloth. We accomplish this result by making the upper part of the bag flexible or soft, but without lessening the strength and toughness of the material. The drawing shows side views of two bags which have had this character of flexibility and softness imparted to their top parts by mechanical means. In these illustrations of our invention we have produced this result by subjecting those parts to a crushing or brushing action between corrugated surfaces, the depth of the corrugations, or the degree of pressure, being greatest at the highest part or edge of the bags, and decreasing gradually from such edges downwards, so that the line of termination of the corrugations, or of the limits of pressure, will be as near as possible insensible or imperceptible. If the softening process is effected in any other manner, as, for instance, by chemical action, the same result is to be produced, that is to say, the soft or flexible character of the top of the bag is to be least along the lowest lines, and is to be increased thence upwards, to the edges or top of the bag, where it is to be greatest." The claim was this: "Softening the upper parts of paper-bags and making them pliable, substantially as and for the purpose above described." The defendants had made and sold paper-bags having near their top a strip or band around them, crimped or softened by passing the bag, at a distance of two or three inches from its top, through a machine with two sets of fluted rolls. This operation crimped or softened a strip or band around the bag, equal in width to the length of the flutes on the rolls, and left the top unsoftened. These bags were constructed in accordance with letters patent granted to John M. Hurd, November 12th, 1867, for an "Improved paper flour-sack." The specification of that patent stated, that the invention of the patentee consisted in crimping a band around below the top of the sack, and leaving the top of the sack unsoftened or uncrimped, for the purpose of preventing the string used in holding the mouth of the sack closed, from slipping off over the top, and allowing the mouth of the sack to open and the flour to escape.

¹[Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Charles M. Keller, for plaintiffs.
David Wright, for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. 1. The invention of the plaintiffs is a paper-bag, having its upper end softened and made flexible, while the lower portion is strong and stiff with the sizing of the paper. Although the language of the specification is not very well chosen, this is the substance of their description. The patent itself is for a "new and useful improvement in paper-bags." It is this that the patent is issued for and which it is intended to secure. It is this that the specification is intended to describe. Softening and making flexible the upper portion of the bag produces the improved bag; and that is the proper subject of the patent. It is not softening and making flexible, as a result of some or any means which can be suggested, that is the subject of the patent; but it is the improved bag, or the improvement in the bag, as a result, which the patent is intended to protect. The improved bag is the result. The softening and making flexible at the top are the means by which the improvement is effected. It is this which distinguishes the present case from the principle sought to be invoked from O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 62; Corning v. Burden, Id. 252; Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 156; Burr v. Cowperthwait, [Case No. 2,188;] and other cases cited by the defendants from Law's Digest, p. 483, &c.

The machine, manufacture, or product in this case, is an improved bag for packing flour and other substances. The means by which such improved bag is produced is the softening and making flexible the upper part thereof. When produced, it is better adapted to use. The patent gives the plaintiffs no exclusive right to any process of softening or making flexible sized paper, as a result, nor do the plaintiffs profess to have any exclusive right in, or to have invented any new device for, doing this, as a result. It is the paper-bag, constructed in its improved state, by softening and making flexible the upper part thereof, which is new, useful, and within the protection of the patent. In this view, the specification declares the invention to consist "in making or preparing paper-bags in such a way as to give them, at their upper ends, a flexible character, so that, when properly filled with flour or other substances, the sides of the bags, at their upper ends, will come together after the manner of the sides of a cloth-bag." The plaintiffs do not claim to have invented paper-bags for the uses referred to, nor any mode of preparing the paper, nor of giving them the form of a bag, nor the closing of the bottom or sides, but the superadding, (by softening and making pliable the upper portion thereof,) an improvement in their usefulness and value. Hence, they limit their claim to the softening and making pliable of those upper parts, as the means of producing the improved manufacture. The language of the claim, I must concede, read by itself alone, is not the best which might be employed; and it has laid the foundation for the elaborate argument of the defendants' counsel, wherein he treats the softening, &c., as the thing patented, and a result, instead of the means of producing the thing patented, namely, the improved bag. Taking the whole patent, specification and claim together, the latter is, I think, the just construction of the claim, and relieves it from the operation of the cases cited. In this view, the plaintiffs could not, and do not, claim any exclusive right to any process of softening or making pliable. Any process known to art may be employed for that purpose; and any new mode of performing it would be the subject of a patent. The whole apparent doubt suggested arises from treating this softening as the result which the plaintiffs seek to secure to themselves, whereas it is the means of producing a new and other result, namely, an improved bag. True, the plaintiffs have, in their specification, mentioned various means by which it can be done, and one mode in which they do it, but those means are open to the use of others. All may use them. If they do not employ them to produce the improved paper bag, they infringe no right of the plaintiffs.

The defendants, on the other hand, have sought to secure to themselves a particular mode of crimping or softening, and describe the machinery they employ for the purpose. Whether they have secured, by their patent, the exclusive right to employ such machinery for crimping or softening, it is not necessary, for the purposes of this case, to inquire. If they do not manufacture the plaintiff's improved bag, they do not violate the rights of the latter.

2. Is, then, the bag produced by the defendants an infringement of the exclusive right of the plaintiffs to manufacture and sell the improved bag described in their patent? On that question I have much less doubt than upon the question first considered. They do manufacture and sell a bag crimped, softened and made flexible at the upper end, where the string is to be applied, so that the sides of the bag will come together after the manner of cloth-bags. The substantial end, purpose and usefulness of the plaintiffs' invention was this and only this. It may be quite true that the bag produced by the plaintiffs was susceptible of improvement. It may be, that, leaving the extreme upper end of the bag unsoftened, or, in another form of words, extending the bag upward and beyond the portion made soft and pliable, produces a more useful bag. It may be that this improvement is an invention of the defendants. There is conflict in the evidence upon the last two points, but I deem it quite immaterial. If the defendants have made an improvement, they have not thereby acquired the right to produce a bag embodying the plaintiffs' invention. They cannot apply their improvement without appropriating the very thing which is the substantial end and purpose of that invention. Practically, they say—"Crimping the upper end of the bag, as the plaintiffs do, produces a bag with an important and useful capacity of being tied with ease and preserving the strength and usefulness of the bag; but the string is liable to slip. We, therefore, propose to create an impediment to the slipping of the string, by allowing an extension of the bag beyond the softened portion and above the string, more effectually to retain it." In my judgment, upon the whole proofs, this is in fact no improvement, but a mere artifice to evade the plaintiffs' patent. But, if it be an improvement, it is superadded to the plaintiffs' invention, and the defendants have no right to use that invention without the plaintiffs' consent, although that is essential to enable them to use their improvement at all. It is a familiar rule, that a patent for an improvement does not, per se, give the right to use the thing

Improved and the patentee of the thing improved may not use the patented improvement. On the question, whether the defendants can be deemed inventors at all of what they deem an improvement, I express no opinion.

A decree must be entered for the plaintiffs, for an account, and for an injunction as prayed, with costs.

[NOTE. Patent No. 48,036 has not been involved in any other cases reported prior to 1880.]

Case No. 533.

In re ARLEDGE.

[1 N. B. R. (1873), 644, (Quarto, 195.)]

District Court, S. D. Georgia.

BANKRUPTCY—THE ASSIGNEE—PRIOR ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

[An assignment for benefit of creditors, without fraud, of all a man's property, a year before his petition in bankruptcy, is valid as against the assignee in bankruptcy, who takes only such rights as the bankrupt had at the time of his bankruptcy.]

[See Mayer v. Hellman, 91 U. S. 496; In re Kimball, Case No. 7,770.]

[In bankruptcy. Certificate to district court by register of question arising before him. Affirmed.]

I, the undersigned, having been designated by the court as the register in bankruptcy before whom the proceedings, in the above matter of the bankruptcy of George H. Arledge are to be had, do hereby certify, that in the due course of such proceedings the following question pertinent to the same arose, and was stated by Peter V. Robinson, assignee of the effects of the said bankrupt, namely: The said George H. Arledge, some twelve months prior to his filing his petition in bankruptcy, conveyed by deed of assignments, for the benefit of all his creditors, all his stock in trade, choses in action, books of account and property of every kind to one John H. Thomas; from the proceeds of the sale of said property a dividend of ten per cent. has been paid by the said Thomas, a balance of money, and the books of account, still remain in his hand. Is the said assignee in bankruptcy entitled to receive from the said John H. Thomas the money and property not yet distributed among the creditors? And the said party requested that the same should be certified to your honor for your opinion thereon. Frank S. Hesseltine, Register in Bankruptcy for Said District.

Opinion of the Register. It is my opinion that the assignee is not entitled to recover the said money and books of account in the hands of the said John H. Thomas. The deed of assignment conveys to the assignee "all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto, and such assignment shall relate back to the commencement of said proceedings in bankruptcy." Bankrupt Act, § 14, (Rice's Manual, general clause 46). By this clause of the bankrupt act it appears that all the property of the bankrupt—the title and right to which was in the bankrupt at the time of filing his petition—and that only, passes to the assignee. Property which previous to that time had been lawfully conveyed or assigned to any person by the bankrupt does not pass to the assignee, the title having gone out of the bankrupt and become vested in the person to whom it was conveyed or assigned. The assignee acquires by the deed of assignment the like right, title, power, and authority to sell, manage, dispose of, sue for, and recover or defend the property or estate as the bankrupt might or could have had if no assignment had been made. Bankrupt Act, § 14, (Rice's Manual, general clause 52.)

By section 35 of the act a conveyance or assignment, made by a person being insolvent within four months before the filing of the petition by, or against him, of any part of his property, a person having reasonable cause to believe such a person insolvent, with a view to give a preference to any creditor; or a like conveyance within six months before the filing of the petition, with a view to prevent the property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, or delay the operation of this act, &c., are void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value of it. This section does not apply to this assignment, made more than twelve months before the filing of his petition by the bankrupt, and made for the benefit of all his creditors. In the case of Mitchell v. Winslow, [Case No. 9,673,] Justice Story says: "that it is a well established doctrine that (except in cases of fraud) assignees in bankruptcy take only such rights and interests as the bankrupt himself had, and could himself claim and assert at the time of his bankruptcy."

Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160-162: "The ground that the court go upon is this, that assignees of bankrupts, though they are trustees for the creditors, yet stand in the place of the bankrupt, and they can take in no better manner than he could; therefore assignments of choses in action for a valuable consideration have been held good against such assignees." In the case of Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 87, 100, Sir William Grant said: "I have always understood the assignments from the commissioners, like any other assignments by operation of law, passed his (the bankrupt's) rights precisely in the same plight and condition as he passed them." See, also, Bedford v. Perkins, 3 Car. & P. 90; [Fisher v. Miller,] 1 Bing. 150; [Young v. Taylor,] 2 Moore, 336; [Crowfoot v. Gurney,] 9 Bing. 372. The said Arledge's right and interest in this property claimed by the assignee, ceased on the execution of the deed of assignment to Thomas, subject to the condition that if, after the payment in full of the creditors, there should be a balance in his hands, that remainder would be the property of Arledge, and the right to receive that remainder is all the right his assignees in bankruptcy acquired by the deed of the register. That is the reason why the forms of proceedings in bankruptcy adopted by the supreme court of the United States require that property previously conveyed should be set forth under the heads of Property in Reversion, Remainder and Expectancy, Schedule B, 4. There has been no claim proved against this bankrupt, and he has petitioned for his discharge.

Frank S. Hesseltine, Register.

ERSKINE, District Judge. The decision of the register is affirmed. The clerk will certify accordingly.

ARLEDGE, (BOYLE v.) See Case No. 1,758.

ARLETH, (WHITE v.) See Case No. 17,536.

Case No. 534.

The ARLINGTON.

[2 Ben. 511.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1868.

SALVAGE—TOWAGE—TENDER—COSTS.

1. Where a libel, claiming $1,000 as salvage, for service rendered by a steam-tug in towing a schooner away from a slip where there was a fire, was filed by the owner of the tug, who was not personally present when the service was rendered: Held, that the case was not one of salvage, but that the libellant was entitled to reasonable compensation for the use of his vessel.

[See note at end of case.]

2. It appearing that the service occupied but two or three hours, that another vessel was towed out at the same time, that the steam-tug was not diverted from any other occupation, that her usual compensation was from $10 to $15 an hour, and that the master of the schooner had refused to pay more than $50: Held, that that sum was sufficient, and that the libellants should recover that sum without costs. That, if the $50 had been tendered or brought into court the court would have awarded costs to the claimants.

In admiralty.

W. J. Haskett, for libellant.

R. H. Huntley, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the owner of the steamboat Thomas Kiley, against the schooner Arlington, claiming $1,000 for salvage, by reason of services rendered to the schooner, by the steamboat, on the 20th of August, 1866, in towing her from a slip in Jersey City, New Jersey, into the Hudson river, during a fire which was burning on shore. The libellant was not on board of the steamboat at the time, and did not personally render any of the services. The case, therefore, is not one of salvage. The Charlotte, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 68, 72; The Jack Jewett, [Case No. 7, 122.] But the libellant is entitled to an equitable compensation for the use of his steamboat in towing the schooner. On the evidence, the libel grossly exaggerates the danger both to the schooner and to the steamboat at the time the service was performed. It avers that the master and owner of the schooner refused to pay more than the sum of $50 for the service, and that that sum is too trifling. I think it is sufficient. The service did not occupy more than from two to three hours, another vessel was towed out by the steamboat at the same time, and the steamboat was not diverted from any other occupation to render the service, as she voluntarily went to the spot to render such service as she could, and was engaged by the other vessel, before referred to, prior to the time when the schooner applied to her. The evidence is that the steamboat usually received from ten to fifteen dollars an hour for towing. A decree will be entered for $50, but without costs to the libellants. If the claimants had shown a tender of the $50, or had brought that amount into court, I should have awarded costs to them.

[NOTE. For cases in which aid or assistance in extinguishing a fire on shipboard has been held to be a salvage service, see "The Connemara, 108 U. S. 352. 2 Sup. Ct. 754; Murphy v. The Suliste, 5 Fed. 99; The Cloud, 29 Fed. 272. The owners of a steamboat are entitled to a reasonable compensation for towage in towing a burning vessel from one shore of a river to the other; but they are not, for that service alone, entitled to salvage. Emerson v. The Pandora, Case No. 4,442. So, also, was it held that a tug assisting in extricating a burning vessel was only entitled to compensation for the towage. The Cyclone, 16 Fed. 486. But a tug which had brought up to a pier, within reach of the fire department, a burning barge, was held entitled to salvage, but not as upon derelict property. Corwin v. The Jonathan Chase, 2 Fed. 268. A steamship and cargo valued at $433,000 were towed into the stream from a pier on which a fire was spreading rapidly. The service occupied about an hour, and the steamship was entirely unharmed. There were other tugs near, which might have performed the service. Each tug was awarded $2,000 as salvage. The New York, 34 Fed. 922. A steamship and cargo valued at $600,000 requested a tug to tow her away from a burning slip. Two others assisted, and in about two hours the steamship was moved out of danger. The steamer could have been warped across the slip by her donkey engines, which had steam up. Salvage to the amount of $4,500 was awarded the three tugs, in proportion to their relative merits. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. The Holland, 44 Fed. 362.]

ARLINGTON CASE. See Cases Nos. 8,191 and 8,192.

ARLINGTON, Town of. (FIRST NAT. BANK OF NORTH BENNINGTON v.) See Case No. 4,806.

¹[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 535.ARMA' v. UNION BANK OF GEORGETOWN.[2 Cranch, C. C. 180.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1819.

LOST INSTRUMENTS—ONE-HALF OF BANK NOTE
LOST—RECOVERY.

If the owner of a bank-note lose one half of it, he may recover the amount of the whole note, in an action against the bank which issued it, the plaintiff having offered security to indemnify the bank against the claim of any other person upon the lost half.

[See Bullett v. Bank of Pennsylvania, Case No. 2,125.]

At law. This cause was submitted to the court upon the following case stated, by Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, and Mr. Jones, for the defendant: A note for $100, duly issued and put in circulation as cash by the Union Bank of Georgetown, was cut in two by one T. C. Amory and one of the said halves remitted in payment by him to the plaintiff by mail from Gloucester Court-House to Baltimore; but never arrived by mail, nor in any other manner came to the hands of the plaintiff; but has ever since the said remittance, been missing, and never since heard of, and is lost to the plaintiff. That said Amory afterwards, and before the institution of this suit, delivered the remaining half to the plaintiff, who presented it to the bank and demanded payment of the whole sum of $100; at the same time offering to prove to the satisfaction of the said bank, the miscarriage and loss of the other half, and to indemnify them by security against any loss from the reappearance and demand of the half so lost. The said half so presented is hereto annexed, and it is agreed that the said note, before the same was cut as aforesaid, was in the form hereunto annexed; and was one of a considerable number of one hundred dollar notes issued and put in circulation by the said bank, and not otherwise distinguishable from the said note, than by a certain number and letter on the left of each of the said notes respectively. The said defendants offered to pay to the plaintiff, on presentation of the said half, one half of the amount of the said original note, that is to say, $50; but refused to pay the other half. It is agreed to be the custom of the said bank, and of banks generally, to pay one half of the original sum due upon the whole note, upon presenting one half of a cut note, without accounting at all for the other half. The point now submitted is, whether the said bank is not bound to pay the whole amount of the original note, upon due proof of the loss of one half of the note, and an offer to indemnify as aforesaid.

Mr. Key, for plaintiff. If the whole note had been lost, and the plaintiff had offered indemnity, he would have been entitled to recover, as upon a lost note. A man does not lose his debt, by losing the best evidence of it.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Jones, for defendant. The $100 notes are only distinguishable from each other by a number on the left half. These notes pass as cash. They are payable to bearer. Trover will not lie for them. If stolen and presented by a bona fide holder, the bank is liable. Pierson v. Hutchinson, 2 Camp. 211; Grant v. Vaughan, 3 Burrows, 1516; Peacock v. Rhodes, 2 Doug. 633. The custom to pay half was generally known, and an agreement may be presumed to that effect. The innocent holder of the other half, may, perhaps, show as good a right to recover upon it as the present plaintiff. It was payable to bearer on demand.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said: This is to be considered as a note destroyed. The plaintiff is admitted to have been owner of the whole note. The holder of the other half cannot aver the same fact, and therefore can never recover upon it. Judgment for the plaintiff.

ARMFIELD, (BRENT v.) See Case No. 1,833.

Case No. 536.ARMIJO v. UNITED STATES.[Hoff. Land Cas. 248.]¹District Court, D. California. June Term, 1857.²MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—BOUNDARIES—SPECIFIC QUANTITY FROM LARGER TRACT.

This claim is entitled to confirmation under the rulings of the supreme court in Fremont's Case, [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542.]

[See note at end of case.]

Claim [by the heirs of Jose F. Armijo] for three leagues of land in Solano county, rejected by the board, and appealed by the claimants.

Jeremiah Clarke, for appellants.

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The documentary evidence produced from the archives shows that in November, 1837, Jose F. Armijo petitioned for the land claimed in this case, and obtained from M. G. Vallejo, director of colonization and military commandant of the district, permission to occupy it. On the twenty-eighth of February, 1840, he presented his petition to the governor, reciting the previous proceedings and soliciting a final grant. This petition was referred to the prefect of the district, and a favorable informe returned. On the third of

¹ [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq.]

² [Affirmed by supreme court, sub nom. U. S. v. Armijo, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 444.]

March, 1840, a grant in the usual form was issued by Governor Alvarado. The original grant delivered to the party is produced by him and its genuineness proved. The authenticity of the papers produced from the archives is not disputed, nor is the bona fides of the grant questioned. It also appears that from a period shortly subsequent to the grant, the grantee took possession of his land, built a house upon and stocked it with cattle. From that time to the present the rancho has been in possession of Armijo and his heirs.

Some doubt is raised as to whether the house built by Armijo was within the boundaries of the land granted to him, or within those of the adjoining rancho of Gen. Vallejo. It is evident, however, that Armijo occupied the land, claiming it to be his under his grant; that he continued to assert his title from the date of his grant until his death, and that his representatives were found by the United States, at the conquest, living on the land and claiming to own it. It is clear, therefore, that Armijo never abandoned his rights, and the case has no analogy to that indicated by the supreme court as amounting to an equitable forfeiture of the rights acquired by the grant, viz.: an abandonment of the grant during the existence of the former government, and an attempt to resume it from its enhanced value. The land is described in the grant as known by the name of "Tolenas," and bounded by the Arroyo of Suisun, the Estero of Julpinas, the Arroyo of Ololatos, and the Sierra. The fourth condition describes it as of three leagues in extent, as shown by the map in the expediente. The surplus is reserved in the usual form. The exterior boundaries are shown to embrace a tract considerably larger than the quantity mentioned in the condition. Any objection to the grant on this account is disposed of by the supreme court in the Case of Fremont, [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542.] The claimants are therefore entitled to a decree of confirmation to three leagues of land, to be located within the exterior limits mentioned in the grant, and in the form and divisions prescribed by law for surveys of lands in California, and in one entire tract.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, this decree was duly affirmed. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, held that, the grant being of a specific quantity within more extensive limits, there is no obligation to allow the quantity to be selected in accordance with the grantee's wishes, and that the latter's right of selection is only a privilege given by the generosity of the government. Continuing, the learned justice said: "The alleged priority of occupation and settlement consists in the fact that Armijo, after obtaining his grant, built a house upon a portion of the land included in the patent to Ritchie, and occupied it. But this fact is met by the further fact that the erection of the house gave rise to a suit between the owners of the two grants as to the boundary between them, which finally led to an arbitration of the matter. The award, as we construe it, fixed the Sierra Madre as the common boundary of their respective claims. The patent of the Suisun tract does not embrace any land situated on the Armijo side of this boundary, and cannot, therefore, be justly a ground of objection by the claimants under the Armijo title. The objection that the survey does not locate the land in a compact form cannot be sustained. Compactness of form must depend, in many instances, upon a variety of circumstances; such as the character of the country, its division into different parcels by mountains, rivers, and lakes, and sometimes by the relation of the tract to neighboring grants. In this case, the Tolenas tract is surrounded by three grants, confirmed, surveyed, and patented. The survey is made so as to avoid collision with any of the elder patents, and, under these circumstances, is in reasonable conformity with the decree of confirmation,—the only conformity which the law requires." U. S. v. Armijo, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 444.]

ARMIJO, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,406.

ARMISTEAD, (BLACKWELL v.) See Case No. 1,474.

Case No. 537.

The ARMITAGE BREARLEY.
The DUDLEY S. GREGORY.

[9 Ben. 108.]

District Court, E. D. New York. April, 1877.

COLLISION IN NORTH RIVER — FERRY-BOAT AND STEAMBOAT — FOLLOWING COURSES — RIGHT OF WAY—DANGER SIGNALS.

1. Where a steamboat on her regular trip across the North river, came up after a propeller also on her regular trip, which was going along close to the piers, and attempted to swing into her berth, having exchanged signals with the propeller and given a danger-signal which the pilot of the propeller heard but disregarded, and collision ensued: Held, that both vessels were in fault, the ferry-boat for attempting to swing in and cross the course of the propeller when she did, being the following vessel, and the propeller, for disregarding the danger-signal and not stopping when there was sufficient time for her to do so.

2. Under the circumstances, the ferry-boat, though compelled to enter her slip in a particular way, was not absolved from the general rule of navigation thereby, but should have held herself in the tide till she could swing in with safety.

In admiralty.

W. W. Goodrich, for the Propeller.
Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for the Ferryboat.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These are cross actions instituted to recover for damages to the above named vessels, arising out of a collision that occurred in the afternoon of the 1st of September, 1876. The Dudley S. Gregory was a ferry-boat, making one of her regular trips from Jersey City to Desbrosses street, New York. The Armitage Brearley was a propeller bound up the river from a pier below Desbrosses street, upon one of her daily trips from New York to Tarrytown. The weather was clear, the tide ebb. The Brearley came out of a slip at pier 34, and straightened up the river in the ebb tide upon a course parallel to the piers. The Gregory also straightened up her course parallel with the piers, so that when the Brearley was off pier 35 the two vessels were on parallel courses, the Gregory being outside and astern of the Brearley but gaining upon her, as the Gregory was the faster boat. At this time there was a lighter also sailing up the river, between the courses of the propeller and the ferry-boat and ahead of them. The ferry slip to which the Gregory was bound is between piers 39 and 40. Pier 42 above the ferry slip extends out some 140 feet beyond the ends of the piers below. The usual method by which the Gregory makes her slip in an ebb tide is to keep up about parallel with the piers until she is opposite pier 40, there she swings sharp in towards the piers, passing the lower corner of pier 40 at no great distance, and upon the tide, so reaching her berth, which is inside the line of the piers.

[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The course of the Gregory was observed by the pilot of the Brearley, and he knew that the Gregory was a ferry-boat bound to the ferry slip at the foot of Desbrosses street. After so straightening up, the Gregory and Brearley continued their parallel courses until the Gregory reached a point opposite pier 40, having by this time passed the Brearley and also the lighter ahead of the Brearley. Then the Gregory swung in and headed for her slip in the usual manner, and when in the neighborhood of the end of pier 40 she was struck by the Brearley upon her starboard side forward of her paddle-box and cut into, through seven beams. At the time of the blow the Gregory was moving ahead; the propeller was also moving ahead; her engines having been reversed but her speed scarcely checked.

In regard to the facts as thus far stated, there is no conflict of evidence. The conflict relates to the distance off the piers at which the Brearley was sailing and signals exchanged between the vessels prior to the collision. In regard to the distance I conclude from the evidence that the course of the Brearley was sufficiently far out to carry her outside of the end of pier 42, which pier, as before noticed, extends 140 feet further out than the piers below. It is also evident that the course of the Brearley was such as to bring her inside of the point at which the Gregory would naturally turn to swing into her slip upon such a tide. In regard to the signals, several witnesses swear that while the two vessels were passing up, the Brearley gave the Gregory one whistle and received one whistle in reply. This is denied by the Gregory, in whose behalf it is claimed that no whistle was given on the Brearley until the Gregory gave a signal of two blasts, to which signal the Brearley replied with one blast. Whereupon the Gregory at once gave a signal of three blasts, she at that time being about to swing. It seems unnecessary in the view I take of this case to determine more in respect to the whistles than that the Gregory gave a signal of three blasts as she was about turning in towards her slip, which blasts were heard by the pilot of the Brearley.

The facts now stated are sufficient to determine the result of this case, and they compel a decision that it is a case of mutual fault. The fault on the part of the Gregory consists in attempting to cross the course of the Brearley, when she had not passed sufficiently far ahead of the Brearley to enable her to cross in safety. When off pier 35 the Gregory was outside and astern of the Brearley, and she was not entitled to cross ahead of the Brearley until she had reached a point where she could do so in safety. To cross where she did was a dangerous manoeuvre, as her own whistles show, and she is guilty of fault in attempting it.

If any doubt exists as to whether it should be deemed a fault on the part of the Gregory to have attempted to cross the Brearley when she did, it arises from the fact that the Gregory was a ferry-boat, bound to a slip which she was compelled to approach and enter in a certain way, from which she could deviate but slightly without danger to herself and the passengers on board. This fact has been greatly relied on in behalf of the Gregory, and reference has been made to the case of The Favorita, [Case No. 4,694,] as an authority in favor of her right to swing when she did, and as decisive of the responsibility of the Brearley for this collision. But there is no evidence in the case to show that the Gregory could not, when she reached the point where it was necessary for her to turn in, have held herself in the tide until the Brearley had passed up, and I cannot say from the testimony that such a course would have caused any serious delay in her trip, or any embarrassment to her in the manoeuvre of going into her berth. In the absence of such evidence it is impossible to consider the case of the Gregory to be special, and upon that ground hold her absolved from the obligation to obey the rule applicable to one vessel following another. Judged by that rule, the Gregory is condemned, for she was the overtaking boat, and she had the Brearley on her starboard side.

This fault of the Gregory was gross indeed, if it be the fact, as claimed by the Brearley, that the Gregory had previously received from the Brearley a single whistle, and answered it by a single whistle, for such signals would be notice of her intention either to wait for the Brearley to go by, or to pass under her stern. But aside from the question of whistles, upon the evidence as it stands I cannot regard it as other than a fault to undertake to swing into her slip when she did. I do not intend by these remarks to decide that a ferryboat is not entitled, when once she has commenced the operation of entering her slip, to complete that manoeuvre without molestation or embarrassment from other vessels. The fault I find in the ferryboat was in commencing the manoeuvre when she did. There was also clear fault on the part of the Brearley, and that whether it be true or not that she had received a single whistle from the Gregory, for it is beyond dispute that she received a signal of three whistles from the Gregory, and her pilot, who is also part owner, admits that he could then have stopped or sheered so as to avoid collision with the Gregory if he had regarded those signals as indicating danger.

The pilot of the Brearley does not claim for his vessel the right of way as against a ferryboat, but gives as an excuse for keeping his course and maintaining his speed in the face of three blasts from the Gregory and of the obvious danger of collision, that he was misled by the signal. He says the signal was not three blasts but three "toots," and three "toots" he supposed to mean, "All right, keep on as you are going." But the pilot had no right whatever to entertain such a supposition in regard to the signals. Three blasts of the whistle is the well-known signal of danger. Upon the evidence in this case, no such distinction as is here sought to be established between toots and blasts can be held to exist. According to the evidence of the pilot, and part owner of the Brearley, then he saw the Gregory and knew that she was bound to the slip he was approaching. He also knew that he was running along the piers so as to cut off the boat from her slip if he kept on. As he approached the slip he heard a danger signal from the ferryboat, and could then have avoided a collision, but in face of the signal he kept on until he came in contact with the ferryboat as she was about entering her berth. The course adopted by the Brearley placed her under a peculiar responsibility in regard to the ferryboat, because it was so close along the piers, and if maintained would necessarily carry the Brearley inside the point where she knew the ferryboat must swing to make her slip. Certainly it gave her no right to disregard the danger signal, as it is admitted she did, and to maintain her course. On the contrary it imposed upon her the obligation by an instant and prompt attention to the danger signal to avoid the ferryboat, which, as before mentioned, the pilot admits was then possible.

In accordance with these views, fault on both sides being found, the damages must be apportioned.

ARMOUR, (JENKINS v.) See Case No. 7,260.

Case No. 538.

ARMROYD et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.¹

[2 Wash. C. C. 508.]²

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1811.³

RES JUDICATA—DECREE OF FOREIGN COURT OF ADMIRALTY—PRIZE.

1. The schooner Fortitude, owned by the appellees, citizens of the United States, and merchants resident at New-London, on her return voyage from Martinico, a British island, having on board part of her outward cargo, and the remaining portion of her loading having been shipped at Martinico, was captured as prize by a French privateer, carried to St. Martin's, where the vessel and cargo were sold by order of the governor, and part of the latter sent by the purchaser to the appellants in Philadelphia. The Fortitude and cargo were afterwards condemned by a French court of prize, sitting at Guadaloupe, for an asserted violation of the Milan decree, in trading with a British colony.

2. The sentence of a court of exclusive jurisdiction, operating directly on the thing itself, is conclusive between the same parties, upon the same matter coming in any manner before another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, not only of the right which it establishes, but of the fact which it has decided.

[See note at end of case.]

3. So long as the decree of a court of admiralty, foreign or domestic, remains in force, unreversed, it is conclusive to change the property upon which it operates; and the interference of another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, is not authorized, whether the decree is erroneous or not. The sentence of such a court is not examinable at all, in another court.

[Cited in The Waterloo, Case No. 17,257.]

[See note at end of case.]

4. Whatever may be done by foreign tribunals, in reference to the established principles of the law of nations, relative to the conclusiveness of sentences of foreign prize courts, the courts of the United States will not, for purposes of retaliation, depart from the fixed principles of the law of nations, which declares that they are conclusive.

[Cited in The Waterloo, Case No. 17,257.]

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. Appeal from the district court. The schooner Fortitude, belonging to Williams and others, the libellants, citizens of the United States, with a cargo taken in at Martinico, and a part of her outward cargo carried from the United States, sailed on the 20th of August, 1809, from the said island to New-London, consigned to one of the libellants. On the next day, she was captured on the high seas by a French privateer, and carried into St. Martin's. The cargo and vessel were sold, by order of the governor of St. Martin's, at public auction.

¹ This cause was argued in January last, and held under advisement.

² [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.]

³ [Reversing an unreported decree of the district court. Affirmed by the supreme court sub nom. Williams v. Armroyd, 7 Cranch, (11 U. S.) 423.]

Ninety-seven hogsheads of molasses, part of the cargo, were sold on the 15th of October, and sent to Philadelphia, consigned to Armroyd & Co., restitution of which was demanded by the libellants, and refused; upon which this libel was filed. The molasses was claimed as the bona fide property of Richardson & Carty, of St. Martin's, and others. The claim states, that at the time of the capture, and before war existed between England and France, the Fortitude, on her return from Martinico, a colony under the dominion of Great Britain, where she had been trading with the enemies of France, contrary to the decrees of France, was captured by a French privateer as prize, carried into St. Martin's, a French possession, and, with her cargo, sold by order of the governor; that the molasses claimed was purchased, bona fide, by certain persons, and afterwards sold by them to those for whom the claim is made; that on the 12th of October, 1809, the court of prize, established at Guadaloupe, a French island, condemned the said schooner Fortitude and her cargo. The sentence of the court at Guadaloupe, after setting forth the purport of the papers of the schooner, proceeds thus:—"It results from these papers, that the schooner is the property of a citizen of the United States; that she sailed from New-London, bound to Martinico, where she sold her cargo, and took in another cargo for New-London, and therefore she has incurred the penalty pronounced by the Milan decree, dated September 17th, 1807, (which is set out,) and after hearing the opinion of the inspector, &c., we declare the said schooner to have been duly captured, and to be forfeited to the captors. Consequently, she and her cargo are awarded to the captors, to be sold, if the sale has not already taken place," &c.

A pro forma decree having been made by the district court in favour of the libellant, an appeal was prayed to the circuit court.

The points made by Hare and Rawle, counsel for the appellees, were—First, that the foreign sentence, professing to proceed upon the Milan decree, acknowledged to be a violation of the law of nations, is not valid to change the property, and ought to be disregarded. 2 Ersk. Inst. 793; [Burton v. Fitzgerald,] 2 Strange, 1078; 1 Marsh. 397. Second, that the condemnation and sale were fraudulent. Third, that as France disregards the sentences of foreign courts, we are not bound by those of her courts. Id. 391; 1 Emerig. [Ins.] 458; 2 Pet. Adm. 331, [Hollingsworth v. The Betsey, Case No. 6,612.]

Cases cited on the other side: [Bolton v. Gladstone,] 5 East, 155; [Lothian v. Henderson,] 3 Bos. & P. 547; [Croudson v. Leonard,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 434; [Geyer v. Aguilar,] 7 Term R. 695; [Rose v. Himely,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 271.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. The question is, is the sentence of the prize court at Guadaloupe conclusive to divest the right of the original owners of the property, condemned by that sentence, and to vest it in the purchaser under it? The doctrine of the British courts, acknowledged and adopted by the courts of the United States, is, that the sentence or decree of a court of exclusive jurisdiction, operating directly on the thing itself, is conclusive between the same parties, upon the same matter coming directly or incidentally in question, in another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, not only of the right which it establishes, but of the fact which it directly decides. This doctrine applies emphatically to the decisions of the courts of admiralty, whether foreign or domestic. They are courts of the law of nations, and to their proceedings all the world are parties; that is, any person having an interest in the thing which forms the subject of the suit, may make himself a party, and contest the right of the libellant. It is the conclusive effect of such a sentence upon the facts decided, which has given rise to the many questions which have perplexed the common law courts of Great Britain and the United States, in respect to warranties of neutrality. If the foreign sentence has proceeded upon ground obviously inconsistent with the neutral rights of the captured, it will be disregarded by the courts of common law, in deciding the question whether the warranty has been falsified; not because the fact which it professes to decide is not conclusively decided by the sentence, but because it concludes nothing in respect to the point at issue—namely, the neutrality of the property, or the neutral conduct of the owner. But as to the direct effect of the sentence upon the thing condemned, no doubt has ever been entertained, that it is conclusive to work a change of the property, so long as that sentence remains in force, unreversed by a superior and appellate tribunal. If the principle be thus general and inflexible, it is unimportant whether the foreign sentence be erroneous or not, or whether the error consist in the mistake of the court in matter of fact, or a misconception of the acknowledged law of nations, or is founded upon foreign laws avowedly repugnant to the law of nations. The validity of the sentence rests upon this ground, that it is not examinable by any other court having a concurrent jurisdiction over the subject; and consequently, the objection is met in limine, before the nature of the error committed can be got at. And in the essence of the thing, where is the difference between a decision obviously unjust, and unwarranted by the facts on which it is founded, or by the acknowledged principles of the law of nations—and one which professes to disregard that law? The injury to the individual is the same, and redress is equally due to him by his own government, the only power competent to redress him. It was contended, that where the foreign court professes to proceed upon a ground not warranted by the law of nations, its decree is not binding on other courts. This, as was before observed, is true, if a conclusive effect is attempted to be given to it, for the establishment of a collateral fact, which the decision does not warrant. But the tribunal itself does not lose its character of a tribunal of the law of nations, because its decisions are repugnant to the law which ought to govern it.

An attempt was made to invalidate this sentence, upon the ground that the agent of the original owners of the vessel and cargo was deprived of an opportunity to put in a claim, and to contest the right of the captors; and also because the sale of the property was unfairly conducted. As to the first objection, the fact upon which it is founded is not very clearly made out. The examination of the master at St. Martha's, which stated the nature of his owner's claim, was before the prize court at Guadaloupe, and was considered; nor does it appear that he was prevented from attending the court, and being heard. But if he had been heard, it is evident that the decision proceeded upon acknowledged facts, and could not possibly have been different from what it was, in a court bound by the edicts of the government which constituted it. The other objection has still less weight in it. The property of the original owners being conclusively changed by the sentence of condemnation, and vested in the captors, it is unimportant, in this suit, whether the sale was regular and bona fide, or not.

The last point insisted upon by the counsel for the appellees, was, that as France does not acknowledge, in her own courts, the conclusive effect of the sentences of foreign prize courts, this court, upon the principle of reciprocity, ought not to regard the decisions of her courts, where they are manifestly wrong. Whether the adoption of the rule of reciprocity, in any case, would be proper or not, need not now be decided. It certainly does not prevail, even in England, in the common law courts; and it has never, to our knowledge, been admitted into the prize courts of our own country. We do not, however, mean to say, that it ought not. In matters of salvage, where the amount of compensation rests in the discretion of the court, and perhaps in other instances, where no moral principle, nor established doctrine of law, would be violated by retaliating upon foreign courts their own rule, there is possibly no other objection to the rule of reciprocity in the admiralty court, except the uncertainty in the law, which the rule is calculated to introduce. But most certainly, a court which means to act correctly, will never depart from the rule of right, or reverse fixed principles of law, because a foreign tribunal has done so.

The rule of law which governs the court in deciding this case, is, in our opinion, a wise one; and it has appeared otherwise only during a few years past, because the regular order of things has been disturbed and disfigured by the violence and rapine of the belligerents. We confess that we sicken with disgust, in giving to the appellees the benefit of a general principle of law, which compels submission to so daring an outrage upon our neutral rights. But we must obey the law, and leave to our government the task of protecting its citizens.

Sentence reversed.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court, this decree was affirmed; Mr. Chief Justice Marshall holding that, although the sentence of the court at Guadaloupe was "avowedly made under a decree subversive of the law of nations, that will not help the appellants' case in a court which cannot revise, correct, or even examine, that sentence." Williams v. Armroyd, 7 Cranch, (11 U. S.) 423.]

ARMS & AMMUNITION of The AMELIA
v. UNITED STATES. See Case No.
14,466a.

Case No. 539.

In re ARMSTRONG.

ROOT v. HILLIARD.

[9 Ben. 212;¹ 16 N. B. R. 275.]

District Court, D. Vermont. Aug., 1877.

BANKRUPTCY — MORTGAGE IN FRAUD — BELIEF OF INSOLVENCY — PREFERENCE.

1. A., who was a farmer, owed H. a large sum of money for a considerable time and, after repeated failures to pay, gave H. a mortgage to secure the debt. H. [A.] subsequently went into bankruptcy, and his assignee having brought suit to set aside the mortgage: Held, That the repeated failures to fulfil his promises to pay, by the bankrupt, with the knowledge of his other debts that the defendant had, were reasonable cause for the defendant to believe that insolvency existed;

[Cited in Metcalf v. Officer, 2 Fed. 643.]

2. That defendant, knowing there were other large debts unsecured, knew that, if the mortgage was valid, he was obtaining a preference fraudulent under the statute.

[Cited in Metcalf v. Officer, 2 Fed. 643.]

In bankruptcy.

WHEELER, District Judge. Upon hearing in this cause upon bill, answer, oral testimony taken pursuant to written stipulations filed, and argument of counsel, there is no question made but that the mortgage sought to be set aside was made within the time prescribed to be subject to the proceeding; nor but that the bankrupt was insolvent and made it with a view to give preference to the defendant; but question is made as to whether the defendant received it having reasonable cause to believe the defendant was insolvent and knowing it was made in fraud of the provisions of the statute relating to bankruptcy.

¹[Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The debt due the defendant was quite large and had stood during a considerable time. He had been urging payment more than two years and received several promises that it should be paid at specified times, which had not been kept. It clearly appears that he had known for considerable time that there were other debts, to an amount greater than his; for he has testified that on enquiry he was informed by the bankrupt about six months before, that it would take a sum greater than twice his debt to pay all the debts. It is true, as has been urged, that the defendant was not in mercantile life, but was a farmer, and prompt payment was less to be expected, and failure to pay would excite less suspicion than if he had been a trader or a banker; but still repeated failure to pay when promised is not usual among men of his class and, when repeated times enough, would come to be quite out of the usual course of business and indicate inability.

The question as to cause for belief is, whether in this case it had, at the time of the mortgage, got to that, that the defendant either knew, or ought to have known, that the bankrupt, because he could not, did not pay according to the usual course. There was a promise to pay when a child, that the defendant wanted the money for, became of age in 1874, and another to pay when another child came of age soon after, and another to pay at the expiration of thirty days, that expired just before the mortgage was given, none of which were kept. So many successive failures to meet engagements were not to be expected of a man in the otherwise apparent circumstances of the bankrupt without some unusual cause, and, in connection with the knowledge of other debts that the defendant had, would naturally indicate to him that want of ability to pay was the cause. These indications, as now viewed, constituted within the meaning of the law according to the settled interpretations, reasonable cause for him to believe that the insolvency, which in fact existed, did exist.

As to whether the defendant knew the mortgage was made in fraud of the provisions of the statutes relating to bankruptcy, it is necessary, in order to avoid it, that he should have known it would operate to the contrary of what the effect of those provisions would be. The effect of those provisions would be to divide the property of the bankrupt, liable for debts, rateably among his creditors without preference of any of those then unsecured over the rest. He knew there were other unsecured creditors to a large amount whom the bankrupt could not pay more than he could him; that a large part of the property was common to all from which to get their pay; and he must have known when he took the mortgage that if it was valid to secure his debt, he was lessening their chances to get their pay as much as he was improving his own to get his, and that he was thereby obtaining a preference over the rest. So he knew what the effect would be, and the effect he knew of would be fraudulent in the eye of the provisions of those statutes.

It is urged that there was such an agreement to mortgage, made before, that taking this one was not fraudulent. But the evidence, although it shows security was talked about, fails to show any definite agreement to make this or a similar, or in fact any mortgage, earlier than this one was made, and therefore it cannot be found that this mortgage was made in pursuance of a previous agreement to make it earlier. This makes it unnecessary to consider what sort of an agreement in that direction would be sufficient for the purpose. For these reasons, let a decree be entered setting aside the mortgage, with costs.

Case No. 540.

The ARMSTRONG.

[1 Brown, Adm. 130.]¹

District Court, E. D. Michigan. May, 1866.²

NEGLIGENT TOWAGE—EQUIPMENT OF TUGS—LOOK-OUT—INEVITABLE ACCIDENT.

1. A tug, whose master also acts as pilot and engineer, is not properly manned.

[Cited in The Coleman and Foster, Case No. 2,981.]

2. It is the duty of a tug towing a vessel through a narrow channel and encountering a snow storm so heavy as to obscure the sight, at once to stop and cast anchor.

3. The want of a competent lookout is a fault of the grossest description.

[Cited in The Steamer Ancon, Case No. 348.]

4. The opinion of the master and crew of a tug, that their vessel was properly managed, and that the accident was inevitable, is entitled to very little if any weight.

In admiralty. Libel for damages occasioned by negligent towage. The libellant, the owner of the schooner Swallow, brought his action to recover damages for careless and reckless towage across the St. Clair Flats in December, 1866. By the contract set forth in the pleadings and proofs, the tug agreed to tow the schooner safely from Algonac to New Baltimore, a distance of only 14 miles, employing competent power, skill, experience, and a knowledge of the channel, for such an undertaking at that season, and with the vessel as she then was. The tug ran her aground, a few hours after she had taken her in charge, on the morning of the 7th of December, and the libel alleges fault in the reckless and ignorant towage of the respondent. The answer admits the grounding of the schooner, denies that it was the fault of the tug, but alleges that it was the mismanagement of the master of the schooner, after and while the tug was aground. It appeared in evidence that the master of the tug also acted as pilot and engineer, and the mate was also serving in the capacity of wheelsman. [This case was affirmed by the circuit court, but the circuit court decree has not been reported.]

¹[Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

²[Affirmed by an unreported decree of the circuit court.]

J. S. Newberry, for libellant.
W. A. Moore, for claimant.

WILKINS, District Judge. From the answer the important fact is elicited that the tug ran out of the channel and got aground, and in consequence, the schooner, being attached to the tug, was also grounded, and in the hurry and confusion of such an incident, neglected to detach the line or to cast out an anchor. Neither of these allegations, if clearly proved, would exonerate the tug—because, 1st, the captain of the tug knew the condition of the schooner before he made the contract, as to her active force in case of such an emergency; and, 2d, if his ignorance and incompetency ran the tug aground, he is not excused from responsibility as to the schooner, by her neglect to detach herself immediately from the tug, or stop her own progress by casting anchor. The contract was safely to tow her through the channel for 14 miles, under her then existing condition as to her crew and power of self-control; and it was the grounding of the tug that rendered such other but then unavailable help necessary for her safety. This defense is, therefore, dismissed from consideration.

The business of towage is one of great importance in navigation, and, both in England and in this country, is governed by rules of justice and common sense as certain as those which regulate any other business. Experience and skill are implied in most contracts for work and labor to be performed. A carpenter is not a blacksmith, a tailor is not a lawyer or a physician, neither is a farmer a steam navigator. Holding one's self out as such, against the fact, is a fraud; and, where it embraces the skillful care of property and life upon the water, the fraud amounts to a crime. My mind was strongly impressed during the hearing, that the father and brothers, who owned and had the control of this tug, had not the necessary experience as sailors to warrant them in entering into such a contract; and, though their presence on the witness stand was prepossessing and inviting of confidence, I could not give to their testimony that reliance which would lead to an acquittal from great blame. They ventured the Pass without sounding line or small boat, to feel their way, beset with obstructions, with no other instrumentality but a small pole to exhibit depth of water as they progressed, through a hazardous channel, and at the season of peril. The posts of duty were not sufficiently manned; three persons undertaking the duties at one and the same time, of master, engineer, wheelsman, and lookout, and the master, working the engine one moment, and then hastening to the bow to look ahead and about for the channel. Neither can I determine the case in their favor on their testimony as experts. Their opinion, as to the correct management of their boat, should not be and is not reliable. They swear the blame away from themselves, and attribute it to the act of God, as an unavoidable accident—the result of a blinding snow storm.

Until the act of congress of 1864, [13 Stat. 351, § 3, and page 533, c. 113,] forbidding the exclusion of interested witnesses in civil actions, I had resisted the adoption of the state practice, admitting such as competent, and clinging to the old common law rule as the safest and wisest. When such testimony is offered to a jury, the court has nothing to say, but, as the credibility of witnesses in admiralty is a question for the court, I frankly declare that I will give to such testimony very little confidence, and, more especially where it is but the mere opinion of the witness—under oath, it is true, but a swearing away of personal liability. The yarn spun by sailors, assuming the solemn dignity of testimony, must always be received with caution, and scrupulously sifted, however carefully woven. Sailors will, from habit, compare notes with each other, and where there is a minute exactitude of agreement in narrative, it will lead to suspicion. But the Armstrong brothers and their father were not educated seamen, or so far experienced in the business as to justify the rejection of their statement, simply on that ground. Their concurrent opinion, however, is open to a different objection.

With honorable men—and I know nothing to the contrary but what this father and these brothers are such—interest will not lead to the manufacture of falsehood, or the suppression of truth; but, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, such a relation to the case obscures the judgment, and generates mistake. The question of fact is, whether or not the incident was an unavoidable accident, the snow drift blinding the vision of the tug's master and wheelsman, and their judgment that it was so cannot safely be made by the court the basis of its decree in their favor. The occurrence was either an unavoidable accident or the fault was in the tug. The proof exonerates the Swallow. She was to follow, not to lead the tug. The tug first ran out of the channel, and then aground. This caused the Swallow to swing and get aground. Had the tug kept the channel, neither the tug nor schooner would have got aground. This is clear. But whether she ought to have cast her anchor after the tug was aground, does not affect the question of blame. It is not probable that it would have prevented her grounding; she had not a competent crew to do it, and this the tug's captain well knew when he entered into the contract to tow her through the channel, only 14 miles, in daylight. There was no fault in the Swallow, and her swinging to and fro in this narrow channel, and running into the bank, was caused by her tug pilot running herself ashore. Was it an unavoidable accident? This would excuse. Man is not held responsible for the act of God. But the proof of this must be clear, direct and unquestionable. There was a snow storm while the vessels were in the channel. If it was such as to blind the vision, it was the duty of the tug to stop and await its abatement. Was such the conduct of the captain? He swears, on folio 95: "I did not stop entirely, because I wanted to preserve steerage-way until it cleared up," and "I ran about ten minutes after the snow storm had set in, and did not sing out to stop until my father, by a pole, discovered that we were out of the channel, and the schooner in danger." If, then, the storm was such as they describe, anchorage or stopping the engine was an imperative duty. Ten minutes' run, or a mile, under such circumstances, was imperiling the safety of the schooner, and a gross fault on the part of the tug. The appellate court, in the case of The Morton. [Case No. 9,864,] emphatically establishes the rule, that under such incidents the duty of the tug is forthwith to resort to other measures of precaution and prudence to protect her tow, either by slowing, stopping, or sounding. "The tug," says Mr. Justice Swayne, "has no right to dash blindly on, and incur danger she neither knows nor can avoid." If danger threatens, to stop at once is her duty. Where the vision is obscured, in the navigation of a narrow channel, there is imminent danger, and to continue the course, and not stop, is such negligence as makes the tug responsible for the consequences. The alleged storm cannot protect them; their own folly condemns, and that is not inevitable which can, by common prudence, be avoided.

Although sufficient reason is adduced, in the foregoing considerations, for the rendition of a decree for the libellant, I deem it proper to remark, as an admonition to tug masters, that this and the appellate court have determined that, if the catastrophe in these cases can be at all attributed to the want of a proper lookout, such destitution will of itself render the tug liable. Such is the law in this district, and governing the navigation of these contiguous lakes. It is idle to say that the business will not warrant the expense, or that the captain and wheelsman can, on these boats, keep up a sufficient lookout. Recent exposition of the law declares otherwise; and tugs, engaged in towing most of the time property only, are as much required to have competent lookouts as larger steamers, intrusted with the care of human life. A lookout is a functionary in navigation, with duties distinct from the captain, or mate, or wheelsman, and neither of the latter class can supply his place and attend properly to his own specific charge. As well might the captain work the engine, or the engineer manage the wheel, as either engineer or captain keep up a constant, vigilant lookout. It is true, life is more precious than property, and its protection ranks higher in the law, but admiralty makes no preference in administration, and casts its ample aegis over both.

In The John Fretter, [Case No. 7,342,] Judge Swayne says: "Where there is no lookout, the fault is of the grossest character, and every doubt relating to the consequences is to be resolved against the tug. It is impossible, in the nature of things, that the captain can perform properly his other duties and also that of the 'lookout,' and he must not attempt it. A crew is not competent without a lookout, either on tugs or steamers. If there be none, the tug cannot avoid her responsibility by the oaths of the captain or crew, if there be the slightest doubt as to the spring-head of the catastrophe." Such is the strong language of the appellate court, and I am sure, as now constituted, will never be modified. Of this our tug-owners may be certain. If the damage accruing can by possibility be attributed to this cause, the essential allegation of a competent crew is disproved, and the oaths of the captain and crew will be received with suspicion.

The proofs in this case establish the fact that the mismanagement of the tug and the ignorance of the channel caused the libellant's vessel to run ashore, and a competent lookout, acquainted with the channel and its banks, might have avoided this grounding, notwithstanding the alleged storm. Piloting a vessel through a narrow channel, although for a short distance, in stormy weather, demands a full crew—master, lookout, wheelsman and engineer—each of whom shall be at their posts; and the lookout cannot be dispensed with, and is as essential to avoid collision with natural obstructions as with other vessels.

Collating, then, in a condensed form, the answer and the reliable proofs, the following facts are prominent, incontestable and conclusive: 1. The Armstrong, having the Swallow in tow, first got out of the channel, and first ran aground. 2. The contract was for safe towage, and implied a knowledge of the channel, of the condition of the schooner, and the shifting peril of the weather. 3. There was not sufficient time to detach the tow, or to cast anchor, so as to secure the schooner in the channel. 4. To detach the schooner, by cutting her tow-line, would have, from the narrowness of the channel, and the ignorance of her captain of its banks and breadth, most certainly have run her ashore. 5. The tug continued her course for some minutes after the snow storm had commenced. 6. Instantly stopping might have avoided the catastrophe. 7. The crew of the Armstrong was incompetent for the peril encountered, either for safety or extrication. The grounding of the tug proximately occasioned the grounding of her tow, and if the first could have been avoided by ordinary care and forecast, the proximate was not overruled by any paramount power. If the storm was foreseen, and its peril could have been avoided, the responsibility is with the tug, and cannot properly be ascribed to "a blinding snow storm."

Decree for libellant.

NOTE, [from original report.] Upon appeal to the circuit court, the decree in this case was affirmed.

Case No. 541.

ARMSTRONG v. BEADLE et al.

[5 Sawy. 484; 8 Reporter, 36.]

Circuit Court, D. California. May 12, 1879.

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—EXTRA-TERRITORIAL EFFECT OF STATUTE—DEATH ON THE HIGH SEAS—RIGHT OF ACTION.

1. The statute of California giving a right of action for negligence, resulting in death, has no extra-territorial operation.

[Cited in The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 209, 7 Sup. Ct. 144.]

[See Crapo v. Allen, Case No. 3,360.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Death, resulting from negligence, on the high seas is not within the statute.

3. The statute gives a new right of action, not merely a remedy for an existing right.

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Heard on demurrer to answer. Demurrer overruled.]

T. P. Ryan, for plaintiff.

Andros & Page, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff and his wife took passage upon the steamer Eastport, owned by the defendants, at Empire City, in the state of Oregon, for San Francisco, in the state of California; that on the voyage the steamer, near Point Arena, struck a rock and settled down in the water and became immovable; that plaintiff's wife afterwards entered a surf boat, by direction of the master, whereupon one end of the boat fell suddenly into the sea, in consequence of the negligence of those in charge, and plaintiff's wife was precipitated into the sea and drowned. The action is brought under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for damages sustained by the loss of the wife. The provision is, that "When the death of a person is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death." The answer admits the principal facts; but alleges, that while said steamship was proceeding on her voyage, and on the high seas, the said steamship was, by the perils and accidents of the seas, forced and cast upon a rock, whereby the ship and cargo became a total loss, and the death of plaintiff's wife thereby occurred without the privity or knowledge of defendant. Other facts were alleged, designed to bring the case within the provisions of section 4283 of the revised statutes of the United States. The plaintiff demurs to this answer, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

The first point presented is, that the statute has no extra-territorial operation, and is limited to accidents occurring within the territorial jurisdiction of the state; and as the death occurred upon the high seas, beyond the legislative jurisdiction of the state, the statute is inapplicable. There was no liability at common law for the death of a party, resulting under circumstances like those set out in the complaint; and unless the statute in question gives the right of action, the plaintiff cannot recover. The statute, undoubtedly, creates a new right of action, and does not merely give a remedy for a right already existing. If it operates beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the state, then it becomes a universal law, applicable to all countries, and the legislature of California would be adopting a code of laws affecting the rights of parties arising out of acts done wholly in foreign countries as well as upon the high seas. If California can pass laws of the kind, operating extra-territorially, then other states and countries can pass laws upon the same subject operating upon the high seas, and these laws may be in conflict; but there is nothing in the statute to indicate that it was intended to operate beyond the limits of the state. After giving a synopsis of the statutes of the several states which have legislated on the subject, Shearman and Redfield, in their work on Negligence, state the rule, as to their effect, as follows: "The operation of these statutes is limited to the territory of the states which have enacted them. No action can be maintained upon one of these statutes, if the deceased person received the fatal injury at a place not within the limits of the state by which such statute was enacted, whether such place be in another state, or upon the high seas." Section 296. The rule as stated is fully sustained, both by reason and the authorities. Whitford v. Panama R. Co., 23 N. Y. 465; Mahler v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., 35 N. Y. 352; Needham v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 38 Vt. 295; Selma R. & D. R. Co. v. Lacy, 43 Ga. 461, 49 Ga. 107; Woodward v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co.,

[Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

10 Ohio St. 122. In the latter case, where the death resulted from negligence in Illinois, the statute of which state gave a right of action for the death to the administrator, the court go so far as to hold that the statute of Illinois can have no operation in Ohio, and that the action, though maintainable in Illinois, cannot be maintained in the state of Ohio. So, in Massachusetts, it is held that the action upon the statute cannot be maintained outside of the state enacting it. In this case, it appears both from the complaint and answer, that the negligence complained of, and the death occurred upon the high seas, outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the state. It is, therefore, not within the operation of the statute.

There was a total loss of vessel and cargo, except as to three hundred dollars, for which the wreck was sold by the underwriters after abandonment, and whatever insurance money was due. This case is, undoubtedly, within the provisions of section 4283 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the liability of owners of vessels, as it was engaged in inter-state and foreign commerce. Lord v. Goodall, Nelson & Perkins S. S. Co., [Case No. 8,506.] But, as it is held that the case is not within the statute, and there is no liability at all, it is unnecessary to consider the other points, as to whether there can be a recovery to the extent of the insurance money, or the three hundred dollars for which the wreck sold. Demurrer overruled.

[NOTE. In a number of cases, courts of admiralty have followed the rule of the civil law that civil actions do not die with the person, and have permitted the recovery of damages for wrongful death by libel in rem or in personam. Cutting v. Seabury, Case No. 3,521; The Charles Morgan, Id. 2,618; The Sea Gull, Id. 12,578; Holmes v. Oregon & C. Ry. Co., 5 Fed. 75; The Towanda, Case No. 14,109; The City of Brussels, Id. 2,745. This doctrine was subsequently overruled by the supreme court in The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 209, 7 Sup. Ct. 144. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, reviewed the authorities, both English and American, and said: "We know of no country that has adopted a different rule on this subject for the sea from that which it maintains on the land; and the maritime law, as accepted and received by maritime nations generally, leaves the matter untouched. It is not mentioned in the laws of Oleron, of Wisbuy, or of the Hanse Towns, (1 Pet. Adm. Append.) nor in the Marine Ordinance of Louis XIV., (2 Pet. Adm. Append.) and the understanding of the leading text writers in this country has been that no such action will lie in the absence of a statute giving a remedy at law for the wrong. Ben. Adm. (2d Ed.) § 309; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 350; Henry, Adm. Jur. & Proc. 74. The argument everywhere in support of such suits in admiralty has been, not that the maritime law, as actually administered in common-law countries, is different from the common law in this particular, but that the common law is not founded on good reason, and is contrary to 'natural equity and the general principles of law.' Since, however, it is now established that in the courts of the United States no action at law can be maintained for such a wrong in the absence of a statute giving the right, and it has not been shown that the maritime law, as accepted and received by maritime nations generally, has established a different rule for the government of the courts of admiralty from those which govern courts of law in matters of this kind, we are forced to the conclusion that no such action will lie in the courts of the United States under the general maritime law. The rights of persons in this particular, under the maritime law of this country, are not different from those under the common law; and, as it is the duty of courts to declare the law, not to make it, we cannot change this rule."]

Case No. 542.

ARMSTRONG v. BROWN.

[1 Wash. C. C. 43.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1803.

DEPOSITIONS—COMMISSIONERS NOT ACTING—SET-OFF—UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

1. A commission directed to five commissioners, to be executed by them, must be executed by the whole five persons; although the commissioners nominated by the party objecting to the execution, were present, but did not act.

2. The drawer of a bill of exchange, protested after acceptance, having paid the damages, cannot set off the same, in an action against him by the acceptor, on another account, although the acceptor had funds in his hands to pay the bill, the damages being unliquidated.

[See De Taslet v. Crousellat, Case No. 3,827; Id. 3,828.]

Ruled in this case, that if a commission for taking depositions be directed to five commissioners, of whom three are named by the plaintiff and two by the defendant, and is executed by three only, or by any number less than the whole; the deposition is not well taken, and cannot be read; although the two commissioners named by the defendant, by whom the objection is made, were present. Their authority is special, and must be executed according to the tenor of it. It is unusual to require that more than two or three of the commissioners named shall act, so that one in each nomination be present, to execute it.

Secondly: It was ruled that the drawer of a bill which was protested, having paid twenty per cent. damages thereon, cannot, in an action against him by the acceptor on another account, offset them against the acceptor, who had funds in his hands to have paid the bill, because they are unliquidated damages.

¹[Published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Case No. 543.

ARMSTRONG v. CARSON.

[2 Dall. 302.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1794.

ACTION ON JUDGMENT—PLEADING.

Plea of nil debent to action brought on a judgment obtained in a state court of another state, inadmissible.

[Cited in Banks v. Greenleaf, Case No. 959; Jacquette v. Hugumon, Id. 7,169; Taylor v. Carpenter, Id. 13,785; Burnham v. Webster, Id. 2,179.]

At law. A judgment having been obtained in the supreme court of the state of New Jersey, an action of debt was brought upon it here; and the defendants pleaded nil debent.

But Bradford contended, that, consistently with the federal constitution, (article 4, § 1,) and the act of congress of 26th May, 1790, (1 Swift's Ed. p. 115,) the plea was inadmissible. The constitution declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state." And the act provides, that those records and judicial proceedings, being authenticated in the mode prescribed, "shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state, from whence the said records are, or shall be taken." It is a general principle, that a debt cannot be denied, without denying the instrument on which it is founded; and the only question left open, by the act of congress, is—whether the courts of New-Jersey would sustain any other plea than nul tiel record, if the present action had been brought there.

Ingersoll declined arguing the point for the defendant, thinking it clearly against him.

WILSON, Circuit Justice. There can be no difficulty in this case. If the plea would be bad in the courts of New-Jersey, it is bad here: for, whatever doubts there might be on the words of the constitution the act of congress effectually removes them; declaring in direct terms, that the record shall have the same effect in this court, as in the court from which it was taken. In the courts of New-Jersey no such plea would be sustained; and, therefore, it is inadmissible in any court sitting in Pennsylvania.

Bradford then proposed settling the interest; but WILSON, Justice, observed, that he had had more than one occasion to object to the court's interposing, in any form, to assess damages. In some states, he said, it had, indeed, grown into a practice; and the courts had in that, and, perhaps, in many other instances, done the business which ought to go to a jury. Lewis referred to a case in the supreme court of the United States, in which this point had been made, tho' not directly, decided: but the judge said, it was not the foundation of the judgment, of the court, and that, in his opinion, a writ of enquiry was the regular mode of proceeding.

It being suggested, however, that the usage in the state courts was to enter the judgment generally; and that the plaintiff must ascertain the debt, and issue execution at his own peril; that mode was adopted on the present occasion. Judgment for the plaintiff.

ARMSTRONG, (DAVIS v.) See Case No. 3,624.

Case No. 544.

ARMSTRONG v. HANLENBECK et al.

[3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 43.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 29, 1844.

PATENT RIGHT—ASSIGNMENT—AGREEMENT—INJUNCTION.

1. A., being the patentee of a machine for cleaning and polishing knives, entered into an agreement with H. whereby he assigned and released to the latter all his right, &c., to the patent, so far as the exclusive right of manufacturing and vending the machine should extend for a term of years, in consideration of a weekly payment of $10 for such privilege. The agreement contained a proviso as follows: "It is further provided and agreed that, if the weekly payments aforesaid shall remain due and unpaid for four successive weeks, that then it shall be at the option of the said party of the first part, (A.) (upon showing proof of his having demanded payment thereof,) to claim and take back the interest in the said letters patent." &c. On the 4th January, a demand was made of H. for $100 weekly arrears since October preceding, and the next day a suit was instituted by A. against H., upon which H. appeared on the 8th January, and confessed a judgment for a $100 for arrears due from 15th October to December 25th, 1843. A. subsequently served a notice on H., claiming to exercise the option of taking back the interest in the letters patent conformably to the terms of the agreement. H., however, disregarded the notice, and continued to manufacture and vend the machines. On a bill filed for an account and general relief: Held, that the confession of judgment by H. at the suit of A. amounted to an admission by H., that the weekly payments were in arrear, and that legal demand of payment had been made,—that consequently the proceedings of H. since the 8th January were not justified by the agreement, but were in violation of the complainant's right.

2. Held, also, that the agreement conveyed no interest in the patent right, but amounted to a mere licence, with a limitation or condition at its continuance.

3. Held, also, that the institution of proceedings by A. to recover the arrears due, did not thereby affirm the licence, and that the doctrine in respect to forfeiture of leases in cases of re-entry and distress for arrears of rent, had no application to such an interest as that assigned.

[In equity. Bill for injunction to restrain further infringement of patent No. 2,435, granted to M. N. Armstrong, January 24, 1842. Injunction ordered.]

¹[Reported by A. J. Dallas, Esq.]

John Cook, for complainant.
A. Crist, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The bill prays an injunction and account, and general relief in respect to the violation of a patent right granted the complainant.

The essential facts upon which the suit is founded are, that under letters patent issued January 4, 1842, to the complainant, he became proprietor of the right to a machine for cleaning and polishing cutlery, and that by an agreement in writing entered into between him and the defendant Hanlenbeck, on the 17th of March, 1843, he assigned and released to the latter, all his right, title and interest in those letters patent, as far only as the exclusive right of manufacturing and vending the said machine shall extend, for the term of seven years from the 5th of April, 1842, on the consideration of a weekly payment of $10 for such privilege, with the right to the assignee at any time during that term to terminate the agreement by re-assigning his interest to the grantor. Neither party was "to have the power to sell or use the patent right or any part, right, title or interest thereof, without the written consent of the parties." The agreement concluded with this stipulation, "It is further provided and agreed between the said parties, that if the weekly payment aforesaid shall remain due and unpaid for four successive weeks, that then it shall be at the option of the said party of the first part, (upon showing proof of having legally demanded payment thereof,) to claim and take back the interest in the said letters patent, hereby conveyed to the said party of the second part, and to have and to hold the same as fully and entirely as if the same had been re-assigned to him by the said party of the second part."

On the 4th of January demand was made of the defendant Hanlenbeck for payment of $100 weekly arrears since October 16th preceding, and the next day, suit was brought therefor on summons in the marine court, returnable the 8th day January. On the latter day the defendant appeared and confessed judgment on the demand to $100 for arrears from October 16th to December 25th, 1843. On the same day the complaint served a written notice on the defendant Hanlenbeck, that he exercised the option secured him by the agreement, and took back the interest, &c., conveyed by it, "because the stipulated weekly payments have been and are in arrear and unpaid for more than four successive weeks, and payment thereof has been legally demanded." The bill charges that the defendants since the 8th of January last have continued to manufacture and vend the machines, and now have them on hand and in process of manufacture. The bill is opposed upon two general grounds, 1. That the defendant always tendered the weekly payments within the times limited, but the complainant refused to receive them, and that accordingly there was no default. 2. That the complainant cannot enforce the forfeiture of the grant for any default antecedent to the 8th of January, because he then took a judgment at law for the amount in arrear, and the suit and judgment were a waiver in law of the forfeiture if any had occurred.

Depositions of several witnesses are referred to in the written arguments as supporting the allegations of tender, but no such depositions are submitted with the papers, and none are on file in the clerk's office. Accordingly the fact must be determined by the statements of the bill. The bill admits various propositions to pay the weekly arrears, but asserts they were never made by the defendant, and that a receipt to him therefor was offered by the complainant and refused by those proposing the payments, the complainant then supposing and now alleging that the purpose was to lead him to recognize other parties than Hanlenbeck as possessing the right in question, which he refused to do. It is, however, unnecessary to weigh the effects of those offers, because by confessing judgment to $100 the defendant admits the weekly payments in arrear for ten weeks prior to the 25th of December, and he cannot now be allowed to go behind that judgment, and prove there was no default of payment. The judgment must be regarded as establishing the fact, that default was made by defendant for more than four successive weeks, and that legal demand of payment was made.

The second point has been urged with great strenuousness, and it is supposed the doctrine in respect to the forfeiture of leases applied in cases of re-entry and distress for rent, governs this case. On that subject the law is claimed to be that a forfeiture accruing upon a clause of re-entry in a lease is waived, if the landlord distrain for rent, or subsequently does any act amounting to a recognition of the lease as existing and in force. The supreme court of this state seems to consider the established rule of common law to be that distraining for rent after condition broken deprives the landlord of the right of re-entry, under a re-entry clause in his lease. [Jackson v. Sheldon,] 5 Cow. 454. If this be a true interpretation of the rule, it is certainly one turning on a very narrow point. The same case however conceded that the landlord may have a right of action on the contract to pay rent, and also enforce the forfeiture of the lease by re-entry. [Jackson v. Sheldon,] 5 Cow. 457; [Walker's Case,] 3 Coke, 64. But although the relation of landlord and tenant has some similitude to that of these parties, it is by no means identical with it, and ought not therefore to be resorted to as supplying the law of the case. It is to be observed that the agreement between these parties conveyed no interest in the patent right,

The defendant has accordingly no assignment or letting of the estate of the complainant. He could protect the privilege granted him only as against the complainant, he had not such an interest as would enable him to maintain actions against third persons for a violation of the patent right. The grant accordingly amounted to a mere license with a limitation or condition as to its continuance.

The doctrine of forfeiture in its strict sense would not be applicable to an interest of that character—no estate being imparted, and it being no more than a covenant letting to hire, a method or discovery of the complainant, upon a condition of recall or revocation on the omission by the defendant to pay the stipulated hire therefor. Upon the bill, I think it clear that the defendant has failed to fulfill the condition on the performance of which alone his right to use the privilege given him was to continue. And that accordingly upon the fact of his default, and the notice from the complainant that he has therefor exercised his option to terminate the agreement, his license to manufacture and vend the machine ceased on the 8th of January last. The motion that bringing an action to recover the arrears due for the use of the privilege, was a re-affirmance of the license, abrogates one main feature of the contract, for the agreement was absolute to pay the stipulated hire, and also that the right should cease if that part of the contract was not fulfilled: it would accordingly be incongruous to hold that the complainant could not terminate the license without losing his remedy for past dues, or prosecute for those without re-asserting the continuance of the privilege.

In my opinion, the claimant could resort to either or both remedies, and his action for the debt being in no way incompatible with his resumption of the privilege under the contract. I hold that the proceedings of the defendant since the 8th of January are not protected or justified by the agreement, and are in violation of the complainant's patent right. Upon the case as it stands, the defendants are found manufacturing and vending the patented machines without any subsisting authority or license from the patentee, and the injunction prayed for must accordingly issue. Injunction ordered.

Case No. 544a.

ARMSTRONG v. HOYT.

[5 Hunt. Mer. Mag. 76.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1841.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—EXPORT VALUE—WOOL.

[Taking section 15 of the tariff act of 1832 as explanatory of section 2, which provides that unmanufactured wool, "the value whereof at the place of exportation shall not exceed eight cents per pound shall be imported free of duties," the charges and expenses at the place of exportation, which, by section 15, in computation of ad valorem rates of duty, form no part of the actual value, are not to be taken in determining the value of the wool, with the view of ascertaining whether it is dutiable.]

[At law. Action by Armstrong against Hoyt, collector, for the return of import duties illegally collected on certain importations of wool. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

This is an action against the collector, presenting a question as to the construction of the second section of the tariff act of 1832: by this act, "wool, unmanufactured, the value whereof at the place of exportation shall not exceed eight cents per pound, shall be imported free of duties:" if of greater value, it is subject to duty.

The invoice is relied on by both parties. If the charges and expenses at the place of exportation are added to form the value, then the wool would appear to have cost more than eight cents per pound—otherwise to have cost less: and the question is whether these charges are to be taken as forming part of "the value at the place of exportation," in the meaning of this law. The fifteenth section of the act is referred to as explanatory of the term "actual value." By that, the ad valorem rates of duty are to be computed on actual cost or actual value, and this phraseology appears—"to the actual cost, if the same shall have been actually purchased, or to the actual value, if the same shall have been procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time and place when and where purchased or otherwise procured. shall be added all charges, except insurance." Now "the charges" are not expressly mentioned in the second section, as constituting part of the actual value: but in the fifteenth section, the actual value is treated as a thing to which the charges are to be added: as something distinct from the charges, and of which, of course, the charges are no part. The words "actual value" in each section must mean the same value. If it is exclusive of charges in the fifteenth section, so it must also be in the second section; and the charges therefore must be left out of view in determining if the actual value of the wool was eight cents per pound. Judgment, therefore, is rendered for a return of the duties.

Case No. 545.

ARMSTRONG v. MECHANICS' NAT. BANK.

[6 Biss. 520.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. March, 1876.

SETTLEMENT WITH CREDITORS—PREFERENCE—MISREPRESENTATIONS.

Where a debtor who has made a settlement with his creditors, seeks to recover a certain [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

sum paid by him to one creditor, above the percentage paid to others, it is a good answer that the settlement was obtained by misrepresentation, and that the debtor concealed a valuable portion of his assets.

[Cited in Owens v. Ohio Cent. R. Co., 20 Fed. 15.]

[In equity. Bill by Edwin R. T. Armstrong against the Mechanics' National Bank of Chicago] to recover the sum of thirteen hundred dollars paid by the complainant under the following circumstances: Early in 1873, complainant became embarrassed, and being unable, as he claimed, to pay his debts in full, he entered into a composition arrangement with all his creditors, among whom was the defendant, by which he agreed to pay and they agreed to accept fifty cents on the dollar of their claims, such payment to be secured by notes indorsed or guaranteed by a third party. The complainant alleged, however, that the defendant refused to sign the composition unless it should receive notes for ten per cent. in addition to the fifty per cent. agreed to be paid to the other creditors. This was denied by the defendant, which insisted that Armstrong regarded its claim as of a higher character than those arising from commercial transactions, it being for borrowed money, and that, after the composition was signed, he volunteered to give the defendant his notes for the extra ten per cent. It was admitted that the defendant did receive the complainant's notes for ten per cent. of its claim, in excess of what was received by the other creditors. These notes were assigned by the defendant to another bank, before maturity, and paid by the complainant. He thereupon filed this bill to recover the amount of the ten per cent. thus agreed to be paid to the defendant, alleging that the notes for the same were obtained from him in fraud of the rights of his other creditors, and without their knowledge. The defendant insisted that the complainant had himself been guilty of fraud in not making a full disclosure of his assets to his creditors at the time the composition was obtained.

E. A. Otis, for complainant, cited:

Wood v. Barker, L. R. 1 Eq. 139; Breck v. Cole, 4 Sandf. 79; Lawrence v. Clark, 36 N. Y. 128; Way v. Langley, 15 Ohio St. 392; Russell v. Rogers, 10 Wend. 473; Cockshott v. Bennett, 2 Term R. 763; Jackson v. Lomas, 4 Term R. 166; Horton v. Riley, 11 Mees. & W. 492; Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,170;] Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292; Jackman v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. 581; Story, Eq. Jur. 378; Saddler v. Jackson, [Ex parte Sadler,] 15 Ves. 52; Howden v. Haigh, 11 Adol. & El. 1033.

McCagg, Culver & Butler, for defendant, cited:

Seving v. Gale, 28 Ind. 486; Huntington v. Clark, 39 Conn. 540; Richards v. Hunt, 6 Vt. 251; Clarke v. Tipping, 4 Beav. 588; Phetti- place v. Sayles, [Case No. 11,083;] Mallalieu v. Hodgson, 16 Q. B. 689.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This bill is filed to recover from the Mechanics' National Bank thirteen hundred dollars, which, it is alleged, was extorted by the bank from the complainant, by moral duress, or, by taking an unfair advantage of the circumstances in which the complainant was placed at the time of the alleged transaction. In 1873, Armstrong, then a merchant in this city, finding himself embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs, sought a composition with his creditors, and for that purpose made out a statement of his financial matters, assets, and liabilities, and presented it to his creditors, representing that from that showing he would be able to pay them fifty cents on the dollar. The Mechanics' National Bank was a creditor for money loaned, and interest accrued thereon to the amount of thirteen thousand dollars.

The allegation of the bill is, that Armstrong applied to the Mechanics' National Bank to have them sign the composition; that they refused to do so unless he would also, in addition to paying them fifty cents on the dollar, give them his notes for ten per cent. more, making sixty cents on the dollar, and that in order to secure the assent of the bank to his composition, he did give them his notes according to the terms of the composition for the fifty cents, and then his further notes for the sum of thirteen hundred dollars, to make up the additional ten per cent. which was exacted from him. This bill is now brought to recover back the excess over the fifty cents on the dollar, on the ground that it was extorted from him because of the peculiar circumstances under which he was placed.

The defense set up, is that the composition itself, offered and obtained by Armstrong, was fraudulent.

The evidence shows that Mr. Armstrong made out what purported to be an abstract, from his books, showing his liabilities and assets, which he presented to his creditors, claiming it to be a true one, and offering to allow his creditors to examine his books; that Mr. Page was the vice-president of the bank, and that his firm were also creditors of Armstrong to the amount of several hundreds of dollars, and that in his own behalf, as a member of the firm, and also as an officer of the bank, he examined Armstrong's books, was satisfied that fifty cents on the dollar was all that he could pay, and recommended the officers of the bank to accept the proposed compromise. Mr. Scammon, the president, claimed that an indebtedness to a bank for borrowed money stood upon a different footing from a commercial indebtedness for goods sold, and that the bank ought not to compromise for the same amount. It is claimed that on making out this statement, upon which the compromise was finally effected, Mr. Armstrong omitted from his statement of assets, a valuable farm in the central part of Illinois, which cost him over three thousand dollars, and a thousand dollars full paid stock in the Republic Life Insurance Company, and the evidence shows very satisfactorily and completely, that he did keep back from some of the creditors the knowledge of his interest in this farm.

The law undoubtedly requires that parties seeking or making a composition with their creditors should make a full and honest disclosure of their affairs. Any withholding information valuable to creditors vitiates the entire transaction. It also, undoubtedly, authorizes a party who, for the purpose of getting a given creditor to sign, is compelled to pay more than he pays other creditors to recover back from the extorting creditor the amount which he is paid in excess of the others. But it strikes me very forcibly, and I can see no escape from the position, that a creditor, coming as Mr. Armstrong now does into this court, to recover money which he claims has been extorted from him, must come with clean hands and be able to show that the composition which he sought to, and did, obtain from his creditors, was such an one as they would have indorsed if they had known all the facts. Now, here are four thousand dollars of this debtor's assets concealed from the creditor whom he now calls into court to answer for unfair practice, and I have no doubt that this creditor may reply to such demand by saying that the composition obtained was a dishonest one; nor have I any doubt that if Armstrong were now solvent, a cross bill might be filed to recover the full amount of the debt.

The evidence regarding this farm has been extorted from Armstrong in such a manner as to make it at least a very strong circumstance against his good faith. Of course, there may be such a thing as a man with fifty or sixty thousand dollars assets, overlooking an item of this kind; but in the first place, Armstrong's commercial books, to which he invited his creditors' scrutiny, contained no reference whatever to this farm, and it does not appear that Mr. Page's attention or notice was called to it. Nor does it appear in his exhibit of assets and liabilities. When the defendant first began to ascertain that there was any withholding of information regarding assets, Armstrong was asked if the exhibit which he presented to Mr. Page, and upon which this composition was negotiated, contained a true statement of his liabilities and assets. He said, finally, after some hesitation—"Certainly it is true, as far as the liabilities are concerned." Subsequently, he was asked if he had any interest in this farm: he stated that the title was in his wife. It was subsequently developed—extorted item by item—that the facts regarding the farm were these:

Sometime in 1868, he bought this farm at a cost, including improvements, of over three thousand dollars, placed the title in the name of his wife, and his father in possession. In 1871, Mrs. Armstrong died, leaving a will in which she devised this property to her husband, which will was never probated, but was retained by Armstrong in his own possession. During the time this settlement was being negotiated with his creditors the facts regarding this farm were certainly withheld from Mr. Page, and the officers of the Marine Bank. It seems to me that there was clearly such concealment of some part of this party's assets, as to at least constitute a sufficient answer to his present claim of having been unfairly dealt with; that the complainant is not in such a position that he can complain of unfair dealing on the part of the defendant. The bill is dismissed.

NOTE, [from original report.] To pay one creditor or his agent a larger sum than was to be paid to others, as a condition of accepting a compromise is void, and if the creditor's agent was specially retained by the debtor to urge the compromise, any promise to pay the agent for such service is void. Bullene v. Blain, [Case No. 2,124.]

ARMSTRONG, (MORRILL v.) See Case No. 9,822.

Case No. 546.

ARMSTRONG v. RICKEY.

[2 N. B. R. 473. (Quarto, 150); 1 Ch. Leg. News, 145; 2 Amer. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 65.]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. Jan. Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—JUDGMENT ON NOTE—LEVY—VALIDITY.

[1. A judgment on a note with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, which is not paid at maturity, and a levy on the debtor's lands on the day before the petition in bankruptcy is filed,—the debtor having supposed himself solvent when he made the note, and the payee, up to the day of the judgment, having no reasonable cause to believe the debtor insolvent, or that he intended a fraud on the bankrupt law,—will not be declared void in bankruptcy proceedings.]

[2. A levy made by the sheriff's merely getting a description of the debtor's lands at the recorder's office, and endorsing on the execution the fact of a levy and a description of the lands, without going near them, according to the usual mode in Ohio, since it would be held good by the state courts, should be so held by a federal court in bankruptcy proceedings. The sheriff's return, being a matter of record, is conclusive, and cannot be inquired into in such proceedings, but, if false, must be answered for by him in an action by the proper party.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Hess, Case No. 15,358.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Charles Armstrong, assignee of George Garlinghouse, to declare void a levy in favor of Messrs. Rickey & Brother. Denied.]

SHERMAN, District Judge. Charles Armstrong, assignee of George Garlinghouse, a bankrupt, files in this court a petition, in which he states, that on the 19th day of March, 1868, the said Garlinghouse filed his petition to obtain the benefits of the bankrupt law, and that on the same day he was declared a bankrupt; that on the 9th of April, 1868, the said Armstrong was appointed his assignee; that he took possession of the property and assets of said Garlinghouse as such assignee; that among the assets were lands in Delaware county, Ohio; that the said lands were much encumbered by mortgages and judgment liens, and that subsequently, by order of this court, he sold said land, and has now the money, the proceeds of said sale, in court; that among the judgment liens is a judgment and levy in favor of Messrs Rickey & Brother, of Columbus, Ohio, which he alleges is void and invalid under the bankrupt law, and prays the court to so declare it. To this petition Rickey & Brother have fully answered, and claim that the judgment and levy is a valid and subsisting lien upon said lands.

A large amount of testimony has been taken, and from the petition, answer, and testimony, the following facts are established: George Garlinghouse, the bankrupt, had been for some years a resident of Delaware county, of large means, and of good reputation as a business man and for solvency. He had frequently borrowed money of the Rickey Brothers, bankers, in Columbus, Ohio, and had always met his paper. In December, 1869, he borrowed of the Richeys three thousand dollars at ninety days, and gave therefor his note with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, with one Hunt and one Adams as his sureties. This note was not met at maturity, and on the 18th day of March, 1868, the Richeys caused judgment to be entered on it in the court of common pleas of Franklin county. On the same day they caused an execution to be issued on that judgment to the sheriff of Delaware county, which was taken to the sheriff by one of the Richeys and their attorney, and on the morning of that day was by him levied on the lands of Garlinghouse, in Delaware county. On the same 18th day of March, Garlinghouse was in Columbus, engaged with his attorney, in preparing his petition and schedules in bankruptcy, to be filed in this court. Garlinghouse and his attorney, and one of the Richeys and his attorney, were both in the same train of cars, one going to Cleveland to file the petition, and the other to Delaware to make the levy. Garlinghouse, at the date of the execution of the note and warrant of attorney to the Richeys, had a good reputation for solvency, and thought himself perfectly solvent. He had no suspicion or knowledge of his insolvency until some ten days before the filing of his petition. There was no proof whatever that the Richeys knew, or had reason to believe him to be insolvent, down to the 18th day of March, the date of their judgment, and there is but very slight evidence that they even knew it then, not until next day. The assignee, under this state of facts, claims: First, that the warrant of attorney and the judgment thereon was an act done for the purpose of and by way of making a preference in favor of the Richeys. The thirty-fifth and thirty-ninth sections of the bankrupt act, and the whole scope of the law, intends and declares that to make any act of preferring one creditor over the others invalid, it must be done under such circumstances and state of things that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be at the time insolvent, and intending to commit a fraud or violate the provisions of the bankrupt act. The question here arises, at what time in the history of this transaction should the creditor's knowledge of the debtor's insolvency and his fraudulent intent be established. Should it be at the date of the warrant of attorney, or the date of the judgment and levy. A debtor can only be declared and adjudged a bankrupt by reason of his own acts. The acts and doings of his creditors or other persons cannot constitute and make him guilty of an act of bankruptcy. He must do some act himself which the law declares shall cause him to be adjudged a bankrupt. In this case the only act done by Garlinghouse was the execution and delivery of the warrant of attorney to the Richeys, and that was done on the 4th of December, 1867, more than three months before the judgment thereon and the levy. The judgment and levy were acts of the Richeys, the creditors, and officers of the law, and not the act of Garlinghouse. The judgment and levy were independent and outside of him. It was not done at his instance nor could he control it, and he should not be answerable for them. When he executed and delivered the note and warrant of attorney on the 4th of December previous, it was his act, and he is bound for the consequences of the act. It is a principle of law in bankrupt cases, that if the intent and actions of a debtor are to give a legal construction to a transaction, it must be an intent governing the act done by himself and not by others. Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 169. We must therefore inquire whether Garlinghouse intended to commit an act of bankruptcy at the date, December 4th, and not on March 18th, the date of the judgment and levy.

On this point it is not claimed by the petition that Garlinghouse knew he was insolvent, though he may have been so in fact, or that he intended to give the Richeys a preference. Nor is it claimed that the Richeys had reasonable cause to believe Garlinghouse insolvent, or that he intended a fraud on the bankrupt law. On this point the assignee has failed to sustain his claim. But he secondly claims, that the levy made by the sheriff of Delaware county, on the evening of the 18th of March, 1868, was invalid and void. The facts are these, that on the evening of the day judgment was entered on the note and warrant of attorney, in Franklin common pleas, an execution issued thereon was placed in the sheriff's hands by one of the Rickeys and their attorney; that the sheriff went to the recorder's office of his county, there obtained a description of Garlinghouse's lands and made his levy, by endorsing the fact of a levy and a description of the lands on the back of the execution. He was not on the lands—not near them nor in sight of them. Under this state of facts it is claimed that, under the laws of Ohio, this levy was invalid, and because of the mode of the levy it was not a lien upon the lands. It is possible that this mode of levy may not be quite regular. But it is the usual mode of making levy in Ohio, and been so practiced for years. It would be treated as a good levy by the courts of the state, and whatever is declared and treated as a valid and subsisting lien by the state laws and courts will so be treated by this court. But the answer to this claim is, that the return of the sheriff is a matter of record, and therefore conclusive, and cannot be enquired into by us in this proceeding. If the return is false, if the sheriff did not make a legal levy, he is answerable for it to the proper party, in a proper action, but its truth or falsity cannot be enquired into at this time and in this proceeding. Hill v. Kling, 4 Ohio, 136; [Hall v. Crocker,] 3 Metc. [Mass.] 245; [Wendell v. Mugridge,] 19 N. H. 109. We, therefore, hold that the debt and judgment of the Rickeys is valid, and that it was not given by way of preference, and that the levy of the execution upon the lands of Garlinghouse, the bankrupt, is a lien upon them, and that the judgment should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the assignee.

Case No. 547.

ARMSTRONG v. The RYDESDALE.

[Betts' Ser. Bk. 684.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 3, 1862.

FOREIGN SEAMEN—WAGES—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT—PLEADING—SECURITY FOR COSTS.

[1. On libel against a vessel for wages, an affidavit of a person representing himself as her agent, that she is a foreign vessel, will not overcome the oath of the libellant that she is an American vessel, so as to entitle the claimant to a dismissal of the libel.]

[2. The district court may, in its discretion, take cognizance of such suits by foreign seamen against foreign masters or owners or the foreign vessel itself, if the service has terminated or the contract does not stipulate against its enforcement in a foreign jurisdiction.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Robert Armstrong against the brig Rydesdale for seaman's wages. The agent of the brig moves to dismiss the libel for want of jurisdiction. Denied.]

The libel alleged that the vessel was an American vessel, and that the libellant served on board from July 25 to Dec. 6, when he was discharged, leaving $32 wages due and unpaid, but it did not say where he was discharged, nor that he was an American seaman. On that libel, process of attachment issued against the vessel. An application was made, on the affidavit of a person representing himself to be an agent and consignee of the vessel, that she was not an American, but a British, vessel, that the court dismiss the libel, as out of its jurisdiction, and also because the libellant gave no stipulation for costs before instituting the suit.

Mr. Hart, for libellant.

Judge Beebe, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The motion cannot prevail for either of those causes. The affidavit of the agent does not countervail or displace the oath of the libellant, that the vessel is an American vessel. The jurisdiction of the court does not depend upon the nationality of the vessel. The court may, in its discretion, take cognizance of such suits brought by foreign seamen against foreign masters or owners, and under urgent circumstances, against the foreign vessel itself, if the service has terminated or the contract does not stipulate that it shall not be enforced within a foreign jurisdiction. The proceeding might have been disregarded by the libellant because the notice of motion was not given in the name of any proctor of the court, and because no claimant is before the court. But on the papers, and on the concession of the libellant's counsel, that he is a foreigner, there is prima facie reason for an order that he file security for costs, or show cause why he should be excused from so doing. Order accordingly.

ARMSTRONG, (TOLER v.) See Case No. 14,078.

ARMSTRONG, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,467 and 14,468.

Case No. 548.

ARMSTRONG v. UNITED STATES.

[Gilp. 399.]¹

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May Sessions, 1833.

OFFICE AND OFFICERS — NAVY AGENT — APPOINTMENT — SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS — EXPENSES AND COMMISSIONS — WARRANT OF DISTRESS.

1. A warrant of distress, under the provisions of the act of 15th May, 1820, [3 Stat. 592,] has the effect of a judgment.

2. The bill of complaint of a debtor, against whom a warrant of distress has been issued, under the provisions of the act of 15th May, 1820, is in the nature of a motion to stay execution on a judgment, and the beginning and conclusion of the argument are with the debtor.

3. A permanent agent is one appointed by the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, in contradistinction to one specially appointed by the head of a department, for some particular service, and on terms agreed upon.

[Cited in Strong v. U. S., 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 789.]

4. A permanent agent commissioned under the act of 3d March, 1809, is entitled to no more than a commission of one per cent. on the moneys disbursed by him for the use of the United States, and also on the value of stores furnished by the United States, and distributed though not purchased by him.

5. In the act of 3d March, 1809, [2 Stat. 535,] there is no distinction between foreign and domestic agents, as to either the mode of appointment, the tenure and permanency of their offices, or the terms on which they may receive them.

6. A navy agent stationed abroad, who has been removed, or whose office has been vacated, cannot charge the government with his return home, nor with his travelling expenses in going to the seat of government to settle his accounts.

7. Where an article is furnished by a navy agent, and expressly received and accepted by the United States for the public use, he is entitled to a credit for its value, although the article is not one which an agent is authorised to purchase on public account.

8. Where a bill of exchange, properly drawn by an authorised agent on the head of a department, is permitted by him to be protested for non-acceptance and non-payment, under a mistake of a fact concerning it, the agent is entitled to a credit for the damages paid by him in consequence of the protest.

On the 30th July, 1832, the solicitor of the treasury, according to the provisions of the second and third sections of the act of 15th May, 1820, issued a warrant of distress against the complainant Andrew Armstrong and his surety, directed to the marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, specifying the sum of twelve thousand nine hundred and forty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents, as the amount with which the said Andrew Armstrong was chargeable, for public moneys received by him and not paid over ac-ording to law. 3 Story's Laws, 1791, [3 Stat. 592.] On the 1st August, the marshal, in pursuance of this warrant, made a levy on the person of Mr. Armstrong and on the goods and chattels of his surety. On the 3d August, the complainant, alleging that he was aggrieved by these summary proceedings, and not only denying that he was chargeable with the amount stated in the warrant, but claiming the sum of four thousand six hundred and eighty-one dollars and seventy-four cents, as actually due to him from the United States, over and above all moneys received, preferred a bill of complaint to the district judge of the United States for this district, setting forth the injury thus done to him, and praying the judge to grant an injunction to stay proceedings on the warrant altogether. On the same day, the judge being satisfied that the application was not merely for the purpose of delay, and the complainant having given bond, with approved surety, conditioned for the performance of such judgment as should be ultimately awarded against him, an injunction was granted to stay proceedings on the warrant of distress; and a subpoena issued to the solicitor of the treasury to appear and answer on behalf of the United States. On the 5th October, the attorney of the United States for this district filed an answer on their behalf, as well in regard to the matters of fact stated by the complainant, as to his claims alleged to be derived under certain acts of congress and established usages of the government. On the 12th October, he further prayed the court to dissolve the injunction altogether, and to permit the United States to pursue their legal remedies for the recovery of the whole sum of money demanded by them from the complainant.

On these pleadings the case came to be heard before the district court, on the 24th June, 1833, when the material facts established were as follows: Andrew Armstrong was appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, navy agent for the port of Lima, in Peru, in South America. His commission was dated on the 24th April, 1828, and was to continue in force during the term of four years from that day. From a conversation shortly afterwards with Mr. Charles Hay, at the time chief clerk of the navy department, he derived the belief that all navy agents, at foreign ports, were allowed the customary commercial commissions of their respective stations, as had been especially done in the cases of Michael Hogan, navy agent at Valparaiso, and Richard M'Call, navy agent to supply the Mediterranean squadron. On the 16th January, 1829, he received written instructions from the secretary of the navy, relative to the duties of his office, instructing him to supply the necessary stores and to draw on the department for the requisite funds; he was also directed to furnish accounts and vouchers regularly on the first days of January,

¹[Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

April, July, and October, and referred to the act of congress of the 3d March, 1809, as that by which he was to be governed in the keeping and settlement of his accounts. He left the United States, and commenced the duties of his office at Lima, on the 1st July, 1829; and continued to exercise them until superseded in the following year. On the 5th April, 1830, the secretary of the navy informed him by letter, that the president had revoked his commission, it being considered more for the benefit of the public service, that the duties of a navy agent on that coast, should be performed by a purser specially appointed for the purpose. This letter reached Mr. Armstrong at Lima, on the 20th October; and he was informed also that his successor was Mr. Philo White. Commodore Thompson, then commanding the squadron on the station, requested Mr. Armstrong to continue to perform the duties of the office until the arrival of Mr. White, which he did up to the 1st June, 1831, when that person received from him all the stores in his possession. He continued, however, to reside at Lima until the 20th January, 1832, when he went to Valparaiso; there he embarked on the 9th March, and arrived in the United States in the month of June following. He repaired to Washington and exhibited his accounts, claiming a balance to be due to him from the United States, of four thousand six hundred and eighty-one dollars and seventy-four cents. In his account, as settled by the accounting officers of the treasury, on the 14th July, they certified, on the contrary, a balance of twelve thousand nine hundred and forty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents to be due by him. This difference, amounting altogether to seventeen thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars and thirty-seven cents, constitutes the subject of the present controversy. It consists of the following charges, made by Mr. Armstrong, which were rejected by the accounting officers of the treasury. 1. The sum of five thousand seven hundred and fifty-five dollars and eighty-six cents, and also of four dollars, being four per cent. commission on all the disbursements made by Mr. Armstrong; one per cent. was allowed him according to the act of 3d March, 1809, but he claimed five per cent. as "the customary commercial commission of the station." 2. The sum of ten hundred and forty-three dollars and ninety-nine cents, being five per cent. on the value of the stores distributed by him, and claimed on the same ground. 3. The sum of one hundred and eighty-three dollars and twenty-four cents, five per cent. on the value of the stores delivered over by him to his successor in office, Mr. Philo White, claimed on the same ground. 4. The sum of two hundred and sixty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents, charged for the hire of a clerk, over and above the sum allowed by the department, and claimed on the ground that it had actually been paid in the necessary service of the United States. 5. The sum of eight hundred and sixty-three dollars and thirty-three cents, for damages paid on a bill drawn by Mr. Armstrong on the secretary of the treasury, but protested by him, and claimed on the ground that the bill was properly drawn, while the refusal to accept arose from a mistake made by the officers of the United States, without any fault of his. 6. The sums of sixteen hundred and nine dollars and eighty-seven cents, and three thousand two hundred and twenty-nine dollars and fifteen cents, making together, four thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine dollars and two cents, for board and compensation, from the time he was superseded until he left Lima, claimed on the ground that he was detained on account of the protest of his bill, and also to fulfill the duties of the office until his successor arrived. 7. The sums of three hundred and fifty dollars, and forty-three dollars and fifty cents, making together three hundred and ninety-three dollars and fifty cents, for the cost of his passage to the United States and his journey to Washington, claimed on the ground of his sudden and unexpected recall, without the least alleged misconduct on his part. 8. The sum of four thousand two hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty-eight cents for tobacco furnished and actually delivered by him to the agent of the United States, for the use of the squadron.

At the outset, a question arose between counsel, as to which party belonged the right to commence and conclude the argument. It was claimed by the attorney of the United States, on the ground that this stage of the proceeding was, in fact, the trial of the issue between the United States and the debtor, the ascertainment of the sum due, in which the affirmative rested with them, while the debtor was to disprove their claim in whole or in part. The counsel for the complainant contended that this was, by the very terms of the law, a prayer for relief by him; that he was to show the injury he had sustained; and that he was exactly in the situation of a party against whom a judgment exists, making application to a court to open it and set it aside in whole or in part.

On this preliminary point, HOPKINSON, District Judge, delivered the following opinion: The right to begin and conclude is with the complainant. By the act of congress of 15th May, 1820, [3 Stat. 592,] on the certificate of a balance due being given by the comptroller of the treasury, the United States may issue their warrant of distress, which is, in fact, an execution and levy for the amount certified on the person, goods, and lands of the debtor. It has then all the effect of a judgment, and the party indebted must get rid of it, by showing that none or a portion only of the sum is due. When a motion is made to stay proceedings or an execution, on a judgment entered, and to let the party into a defence, the beginning and conclusion are with the defendant. The district attorney has nothing to show but his warrant of distress, which is prima facie evidence of the debt, and is already in possession of the court, being in the hands of its officer. The question before the court relates only to the continuance or removal of this warrant; not to the final settlement of the debt or balance between the parties. It is incumbent on the complainant to show that there are sufficient grounds for its removal in whole or in part. In this he is the actor.

The case was then argued by Dallas and J. R. Ingersoll for complainant, and Gilpin, Dist. Atty., for United States.

Dallas, for the complainant.

Mr. Armstrong was commissioned by the president, as a navy agent, from the 24th April, 1828, for a period of four years, but his appointment was revoked, and he received notice of it on the 20th October, 1830. In settling his accounts after his return home, a difference arose between him and the treasury; as to the items and amount of this difference there is no dispute; it is only as to the legality or equity of his claims. The first ground taken against him is, that he is entitled but to one per cent. on his disbursements, instead of five per cent. the customary commercial commission at Lima. It is assumed at the outset that he was appointed "a permanent navy agent" under the act of 3d March, 1809, [2 Stat. 535,] which limits his compensation to one per cent. on the public moneys disbursed by him. He was not, however, appointed under that law, nor is he subject to its provisions. He was appointed "a foreign and special agent," and as such was entitled to charge and receive the customary commission of five per cent. 1. As to the first position, that he was not appointed under the act of 1809. There are two sorts of navy agencies known to the laws of the United States, which vary substantially; those at Gibraltar, Valparaiso, London, Marseilles, and St. Thomas are confessedly different from those at Philadelphia, New York, and elsewhere in the United States. This difference arises not from any diversity in the mode of appointment; it may be in any case, whether at home or abroad, either by commission or special authority. Nor does it arise from the circumstances of one being, and the other not being, expressly established by law; the establishment of both or neither may be by law; it is well known that there are various modes of constituting officers who are not expressly appointed by a particular statute, but who are recognised by the government and by the courts as equally legal, and who are bound to perform their duties, and entitled to their com-ensation; there is, in fact, no law whatever, establishing any navy agencies, permanent or special, foreign or domestic. Nor does it arise from any difference in the duration of the office; in this case a distinction has been set up between such as are permanent and such as are temporary, but both are equally dependent on the discretion of the executive; we here see the navy agency of Mr. Armstrong, at Lima, called permanent, which expired in fifteen months; and that of Mr. M'Call, at Gibraltar, called temporary or special, which lasted for fifteen years. No. The real difference arises out of the nature of things. One class is foreign and the other domestic; Lima is like Gibraltar, and the act of 1809 can apply neither to one nor the other; it evidently refers only to a domestic agent, it requires him to keep the public money in some incorporated bank, it obliges him to settle his accounts monthly, things which are absurd in regard to a foreign agent. Nor did the secretary of the navy think so, for he revokes the appointment; he does not remove the incumbent; he abolishes the office instead of changing the officer; had the office been created by the act of 1809 he would have had no authority to do so. 2. If then Mr. Armstrong was not appointed under this act, his compensation does not depend on it; it is not limited to one per cent. but he is entitled to customary commercial commissions. This court has the power to decide on principles of equity and ought to do so. There should not be one rule for individuals and another for the government; if there were nothing to bind it to a uniform rule it would be just and equitable. But the government has itself fixed such a rule; Mr. Hay, a principal officer of the department, gave Mr. Armstrong reason to believe so when he accepted the office. Mr. Hogan's compensation at a port on the same coast with Lima was five per cent. Mr. M'Call was allowed two per cent. on the immense disbursements made by him in the Mediterranean. Mr. Hayne at Marseilles, and Mr. White, afterwards in the Pacific, received large and liberal commissions.

The refusal to allow Mr. Armstrong five per cent. on the value of the stores distributed by him, and delivered over to his successor, rests on the same assumption, that being appointed under the act of 1809, his sole compensation is "one per cent. on the public moneys disbursed." It is of course met by the argument heretofore offered, but in regard to these items it presents the additional hardship, that it actually deprives the agent of all compensation for the largest and most responsible branch of his duty, the distribution of stores. It proves also conclusively that this act applies only to domestic navy agents, for they do not distribute the stores, that duty being intrusted to the naval storekeepers, officers appointed in all the domestic agencies for that purpose, but not known in the foreign agencies. The claims by Mr. Armstrong for the repayment of the clerk hire and the damages on a protested bill, seem to be too just to admit of discussion. He was authorised to employ a clerk, and he has proved that he paid him the amount claimed; if the sum of one thousand dollars was the limit fixed by the department, that was not known to the complainant, and, had it been, could not be complied with; he did a thing which was permitted, and is entitled to be paid what it cost him. So as to the bill of exchange; he was expressly authorised to draw it by his original letter of instruction; it was drawn before he received any notice that he was superseded; and as the refusal of the government was founded on a belief that this was not the case, which belief proved to be erroneous, they must bear the cost of the mistake.

The payment of Mr. Armstrong's expenses and compensation while detained at Lima, and the cost of his return and visit to Washington, is a demand properly addressed to the equitable consideration of the court. He was five thousand miles from home, holding an office which he expected to retain for four years at least, and had incurred expenses under that impression. No complaint was made or fault found; not only this, but his bills rightfully drawn were protested; he was obliged to remain in order to meet them, and also to perform the duties of his office, at the express request of the commander of the squadron, until his successor arrived. Under such circumstances, if no indemnity be given, he should at least be protected from loss. His return home was, as it were, compulsory, made suddenly, and without his means being prepared. It was necessary too, in order to settle his accounts; in the naval service an allowance would be made to an officer brought back under such circumstances. The refusal to allow the remaining claim for the value of the tobacco furnished by Mr. Armstrong, seems to have arisen from some vague notion of his having acted improperly about it. The evidence does not confirm this. It is true he formerly owned the tobacco himself, but he has proved a bona fide sale of it to a Mr. McCulloch; and when he repurchased it, he had the positive instructions of the commander of the squadron. He is actually allowed a credit for a small part of it, which was used by the vessels of the United States. He delivered all of it to their agent, by whom it is still retained, and he is surely entitled to be paid for that which they keep from him, as well as that which their sailors actually consume. 2 Story's Laws, 1123, [2 Stat. 535;] U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 16.

Gilpin, for the United States.

On the 24th April, 1828, the complainant was appointed an officer of the United States; the appointment was made as the constitution directs, by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; he received a commission under the seal of the United States; that commission designates him as "navy agent at Lima, in Peru." This, then, is his office, expressly designated; he is a navy agent; he is to perform the duties and receive the compensation of such an officer. He does perform the duties until the 1st October, 1830. In presenting his claim for compensation, he demands certain allowances which are refused by the accounting officers of the treasury, because a navy agent is not entitled to them. He appeals to this court to reverse that decision. The first and preliminary question is, whether or not the law has recognised the office of a navy agent, described its duties, and fixed its compensation? By the first law relating to supplies for the navy, passed on the 7th August, 1789, the secretary of war was directed to purchase stores for the navy as well as the army, but no arrangement was made for subordinate officers. On the 23d February, 1795, the office of purveyor of public supplies was established, with a salary of two thousand dollars, for the purchase of all naval and military stores; and on the 16th July, 1798, the navy department having been in the meanwhile organised, that officer was placed under the orders of the secretary. By the same law, all 'agents' for supplies for the navy were required to settle their accounts with the accountant of the navy; and in the appropriation law of 1807, there is an allowance for their commissions. During the whole of this period they were thus mere subordinate agents, under the purveyor of supplies, holding no commissions, and not being officers appointed by law. This system being found very inconvenient, a law was passed on the 3d March, 1809, [2 Stat. 535,] directing that all permanent agents for purchasing supplies or disbursing money for the navy, should be appointed by the president and senate, receive a compensation not exceeding that of the purveyor of supplies, which was two thousand dollars a year, and give bond; the compensation to be derived from "a commission of one per cent. on the public moneys disbursed by them." This established the present system of navy agencies, and led to the abolition of the office of purveyor of supplies soon after. On the 15th May, 1820, [3 Stat. 592,] a law was passed declaring that "navy agents shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure."

Such was the law relative to navy agents when the complainant became a public officer; he was appointed, commissioned, and gave bond in the usual mode; he performed the usual duties; he has received the authorised compensation of one per cent. on his disbursements. He claims, however, the large additional sum of seventeen thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars and thirty-seven cents, under various pretexts.

1. He asks to be allowed four per cent. additional on his disbursements. To sustain this he must show either a law, contract, or usage. He can produce no law authorising it, for none exists. The contract he alleges is a conversation with Mr. Hay, chief clerk of the navy department; if that officer had made a contract, it would not have bound the United States, especially when a law fixed the compensation; but in fact, it was altogether too vague to be regarded even as an understanding. What is meant by customary commercial commissions? They vary under a thousand circumstances; in this very case it is proved that M'Call got two per cent. and Hogan five; there is no date given, but this conversation is said to have been "about the time of his appointment;" long afterwards the secretary writes him formally, instructs him at large; would he have omitted so important a contract, varying as it did from the law? Besides, he is directed to govern himself by this law in keeping and rendering his accounts: was it meant he should so totally deviate from it in charging compensation? It is impossible to establish a contract between the United States and the complainant on such grounds as these, especially a contract directly in the face of an existing law, to which he was explicitly referred. But he says he is entitled to this additional compensation by the usage of the department. To prove such usage he must produce a similar allowance in a similar case. He cites those of M'Call, Hogan, Hayne and White. They all differ materially; each was a special agent of the navy department, acting under a written contract with the secretary, and performing services specially designated; neither of them was appointed by the president, or commissioned; their compensation and duties varied according to a previous written agreement; it is no ground of similarity of office that both were in a foreign country, unless their appointments were similar; navy agents may be appointed at home or abroad; special agreements may be made by the department with persons at home or abroad; it is identity in the mode of appointment or terms of agreement that establishes a right to equal compensation, and any such identity the complaint has entirely failed to establish. If, therefore, he can show neither usage, contract nor law which gives him a different compensation from that allowed him by the act of 1809, his claim has been justly refused.

2. He asks five per cent. on the stores he distributed. The law does not allow it; his compensation is confined to the commission on money disbursed. But would it be just? There is no difference between the moneys disbursed and the value of the stores distributed; he disburses the money he has received from the government in buying these stores; he receives his commission on it; and to receive it again on the distribution would be to charge a double commission on the same funds.

3. He asks five per cent. on the stores delivered to his successor. This is not allowed by law; nor is it just, since, as in the case of those distributed, he has already received his commission on their purchase.

4. He asks for clerk hire beyond a liberal allowance already made. The only ground for such a claim at all is the usage of the department, and the sum that recognises has been already paid him.

5. He asks for the return of damages on his protested bill. He had a large amount of funds on hand when he drew it; besides his own commissions, he had twelve thousand dollars at least of public money. In every case where such payments have been allowed, it is where the government have been mistaken in supposing the agent had funds; to allow him to draw ad libitum would be the height of indiscretion; and if he does so when he was not in want of the money, he must suffer the loss.

6. His demands for compensation at Lima and on his passage home, are entirely without law or precedent; he was not an officer of the United States during the time he asks for it; he was a private merchant, and remained there at his own pleasure; he produces neither law, agreement nor precedent to sustain it: where such allowances are granted it is by express law, as in the case of foreign ministers, or when an officer is ordered home, as sometimes in the navy; he could not have waited on account of the protest of his bill, since that was not to be anticipated; and if it was, his claim to damages would have been equally good without such delay; he could not have believed that a mere request, by the commander of the squadron, to perform an occasional service, would entitle him to the emoluments of an office in which he was formally superseded.

7. His claim to be paid for the tobacco has been allowed, for all that he actually furnished, but he has no right to ask payment for all he chose to purchase; it is proved that he bought it for himself, not for the United States; he had no right to buy it for the United States, because by express regulation it was not an article included in the stores to be supplied by the navy agents; an order from the commander of the squadron to him, to do what was forbidden by the department, offered him no excuse; and finally he never did transfer it to the United States, since their officers refuse to receive it.

The complainant having thus failed to establish his claims for additional compensation, must limit himself to that allowed by law; this amount he has already received; consequently he is authorised to make no deduction from the balance of public moneys still in his hands; but the United States have a right to the removal of this injunction altogether, that they may proceed to recover their money in the usual course of law.

J. R. Ingersoll, for the complainant, in reply.

Mr. Armstrong received an appointment important to the public; he discharged its duties faithfully; he abandoned his own concerns; he returned to the United States when all was over; and what was his pecuniary account at last? The sum which has been proved to be the usual cost of living, added to the expenses of his passage, exceeds by nearly three thousand dollars, the amount allowed him by the accounting officers of the treasury. This may be said to be his ill fortune; yet surely it must infuse a spirit of equity into his case. The difference between him and the United States is seventeen thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars and thirty-seven cents. Of this, the largest and most interesting item, is the charge for commissions, whether on disbursements of money, or distribution and delivery of stores; these are identified in their principal features, in none are they essentially different; the grounds taken are applicable to them all. That the complainant has earned the legal compensation of his office or place is admitted; the quantum of that compensation only is disputed. It is perfectly clear the United States made no contract with him, at the rate of one per cent; and if that only is due, it is on account of the express provision of the law. But on the other hand, there was an arrangement positively made, which might not indeed be a contract, for it wanted the formalities of one, yet was a complete understanding between the complainant and that officer of the United States who, in the absence or illness of the secretary of the navy, took his place; and this arrangement fixed the compensation as Mr. Armstrong asks it. When formal instructions were afterwards given to him, not a word was introduced to change it; on other points they were broad and full, as to this they left him where he had been already placed. The opinion he thus had a right to form, was strengthened by what he observed as to every one in a similar situation; he saw the allowances to the same officers at Barcelona, Marseilles, Valparaiso, and elsewhere abroad; he observed no resemblance between his duties and expenses, and those of navy agents at home, but every resemblance between himself and those abroad. The result of all this is therefore exactly the same, whether deduced from actual arrangement or the want of it; from what is usual in similar circumstances, or what ought to be expected in those which are entirely new; this result is, that, at the worst, there is an implied assumpsit, a quantum meruit, a compensation in proportion to his services. When exception is taken to so just a principle, it must be, it ought to be extremely clear. Is that so, which is now taken by the government? They found it on a difference, said to be created by the law of 1809, between permanent and special agents; but this does not help them, unless they can show which is one and which is the other. To do so, they produce a commission as the badge of distinction; for this, there is no reason except that it suits the present case; surely it does not make Mr. Armstrong's like a one per cent. agency, if unlike it in every other particular. The difference really is, that in the special agencies there are previous special agreements, previous special instructions; it was so in this case, in M'Call's, and in others alluded to; when, therefore, we are told that the law of 1809 forms the rule, we answer that Mr. Armstrong is not within the law, more than those persons were. When the law of 1809 created permanent agents, it created entirely new officers; no permanent navy agencies existed before; after this, these offices were created, places attached to the navy yards, and in their character, steady and durable; but certainly in doing this, it did not transform the duties arising from the transient visit of a squadron in a distant ocean into a permanent office. Nor can the mere granting a commission do so, as seems to be supposed, even if this be a commission which wants the attestation of the secretary of state, and which the president can, as he has done, summarily revoke. It has been attempted to meet this argument, by endeavoring to show that the agency of the complainant differed from those abroad, and resembled those at home; this attempt has failed in nearly every particular; in the nature of his duties, his powers, responsibilities, residence, and mode of settling his accounts, he is like the former not the latter. If then the United States have failed to show any agreement with him at the rate of one per cent., or any law limiting him to that sum, within which he can be fairly brought, he is entitled to the usual compensation for such services at Lima, and that is certainly as much as he has claimed. 1 Story's Laws, 49 [1 Stat. 68;] Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 155.

His claims for clerk hire, for compensation during his detention at Lima, and for his expenses home, as well as for the repayment of damages on his protested bill, rest on grounds of incontrovertible equity. They were payments actually made by him, either for the United States or on account of requests or mistakes of their officers. It has been already seen that his aggregate expenditure very far exceeded what is allowed him; if it be shown that this excess arose from duties actually imposed upon him, it becomes highly unjust to refuse its payment. The only remaining claim is that for the tobacco. Mr. Armstrong was expressly ordered in his instructions to furnish supplies to the commander of the squadron, when they were called for; there was no limitation in this order, and the supply in question was made on the positive requisition of Commodore Thompson; it would have been his duty to do so, under his instructions, even had there been a regulation such as is supposed; but there is no proof whatever of any such, at least communicated or known to Mr. Armstrong. As to the allegation that it was a speculation of his own, it is sufficient to say that the property was wanted by the United States, examined and approved by their officers, paid for at a price which they deemed fair, and is now actually in their use and possession.

HOPKINSON, District Judge, delivered the following opinion:

On the 24th day of April, 1823, Andrew Armstrong, the complainant, was appointed, by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate of the United States, navy agent for the port of Lima, in Peru, in South America. The commission which testifies this appointment bears the date above mentioned, and declares that it is "to continue in force during the term of four years from the 24th of April, 1823." The letter of instructions given to Mr. Armstrong, from the navy department, is dated on the 16th January, 1820. By the act of congress passed on the 15th May, 1820, [3 Stat. 592,] it was enacted that navy agents, with other officers mentioned in the act, "shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure." In April, 1830, the president revoked the commission or appointment of the complainant, but the notice of the revocation, contained in a letter from the secretary of the navy of that date, did not reach the complainant until October following. He continued to reside at Lima until January, 1832, when he left it to return to the United States, going first to Valparaiso, from which port he sailed in March. On a settlement of his accounts with the government in July, 1832, a balance was struck against him of twelve thousand nine hundred and forty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents, which, by a subsequent small credit, was reduced, in August, to the sum of twelve thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars and forty-four cents, now claimed by the United States. On the other hand, the complainant has presented an account or claim for credits against the United States, which, if allowed him, will not only absorb the whole demand upon him, but will turn the balance in his favour to the amount of four thousand six hundred and eighty-one dollars and seventy-four cents. The United States, to enforce the payment of the amount they allege to be due to them from the complainant, proceeding under the directions of an act of congress passed on the 15th day of May, 1820, [3 Stat. 592,] have issued a warrant of distress against the alleged delinquent officer and his sureties, directed to the marshal of this district, in which the said officer and his sureties reside. This warrant has been executed by the said marshal according to the provisions of the said act. By the fourth section of the act, "if any person shall consider himself aggrieved by any warrant issued under it, he may prefer a bill of complaint to any district judge of the United States, setting forth therein the nature and extent of the injury of which he complains; and thereupon the judge aforesaid may, if in his opinion the case requires it, grant an injunction to stay proceedings on such warrant altogether, or for so much thereof as the nature of the case requires." Under this provision the complainant filed his bill of complaint, whereupon, he having complied with the requisitions of the act, an injunction was issued to stay proceedings on the warrant of distress. The district attorney has filed a full answer to all the matters complained of in the bill, and the cause has been heard on this bill and answer, with the vouchers and other evidence produced by the parties respectively. The complainant complains of the rejection or refusal of certain credits in the settlement of his accounts with the government to which he alleges he is entitled in law or equity; and the district attorney denies altogether his right in law or equity to any of the allowances he claims, and prays that the injunction may be dissolved, so that the marshal of this district may proceed, under his warrant of distress, to levy and collect the said sum of twelve thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars and forty-four cents, remaining due from the complainant to the United States. It is now to be decided, so far as this court may decide it, whether the said injunction shall be continued altogether, or dissolved altogether, or in part; and, if the latter, for what amount it shall be dissolved, and the United States be permitted to proceed under their warrant of distress against the complainant and his sureties. To determine this question, it is necessary to examine every item of credit claimed by the bill and denied by the answer.

The first credit claimed by the complainant, which has been refused to him by the accounting officers of the United States, is a charge of five thousand seven hundred and fifty-five dollars and eighty-six cents, being for commissions on his disbursements of moneys as navy agent at Lima. On these disbursements an allowance has been made to him of one per cent., and the present claim is for an additional or further allowance of four per cent., making a commission of five per cent. in the whole. On the part of the government it is contended, that a navy agent of the United States, whether he reside abroad or at home, is entitled to no more than one per cent. on his disbursements of moneys, by the express enactment of the act of congress of 3d March, 1809, [2 Stat. 535.] On the other hand the complainant avers, that he was not appointed under that act, and is not subject to its provisions nor bound by its restrictions, but is entitled to a compensation for his services according to their nature and extent and the usual mercantile commissions for similar services at the same place, which were five per cent. The real question on this part of the case is, whether the complainant was appointed a navy agent under and subject to the act of congress of 3d March, 1809, or not; for, if he were so, that act, after declaring the manner in which agents shall be appointed for the disbursements of moneys for the use of the navy of the United States, authorises the president to fix the number and compensations of such agents; "provided, that the compensation allowed to either shall not exceed one per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him." If, then, the complainant was a navy agent described by the said act; if he received his appointment and authority under and by virtue of it; he must be bound by all its provisions. The argument on this item has, therefore, been directed to this question.

The attorney for the United States has contended that the complainant was an officer of the United States, not the agent of a department; that he was a navy agent of and for the United States, appointed as such by the president and senate by virtue of the act of congress referred to; that previous to that act no appointments or commissions of such agents were ever given by the president, or by the president and senate, as this was, and as this act directs; that previous thereto, persons had been, from time to time, appointed by the secretary of the navy, at his pleasure, to perform certain prescribed duties for his department, under such contracts and arrangements as he chose to make with them; but that the appointment of the complainant was clearly not of this description, but was made or could have been made only under the act of 1809. The counsel for the complainant deny that he was an officer of the United States at all; they deny that he was appointed to the service he performed under the authority of the act in question; but that his services were performed for the navy department, in the same manner, by the same authority, and with the same rights of compensation as the agents that had been appointed by the secretary of the navy at other places. The cases of, and allowances made to, Messrs. Hogan, M'Call and others, have been much insisted on as forming precedents for this; and the distinction relied upon between such agencies as are, and such as are not, within the regulations of the law of 1809 is, that they are to be applied only to those navy agents whose duties are to be performed in the United States; not to those who must reside in a foreign port.

After giving a close and careful attention to the arguments and illustrations of the counsel for the complainant, I cannot follow them to their conclusion. It appears to me to be entirely clear that the appointment of the complainant, as a navy agent at Lima, was an office of the United States, and not a mere limb of the navy department; that he was an officer of the United States deriving his authority from the constitutional appointing power, the president and senate; that their power to appoint navy agents was derived from the act of congress which created or established the office. Previous to the passage of the law of 1809, there were no such officers, either at home or abroad, properly so called, under the constitution of the United States. The constitution gives the power to the president to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. In conformity with this provision of the constitution, congress have established, by law, the office of navy agents, and the president, with the senate, has appointed the officer. Prior to this law the purchase of supplies and the disbursements of moneys for the use of the navy, were made, directly or indirectly, by the secretary or his agents; the state of the navy did not require a distinct office and officers for these purposes. These duties or services were performed by persons named for the occasion by the secretary, and, as I have said, they were his agents, his arms, and not officers of the government. They were neither appointed nor removable by the president, any more than a clerk in the department; their agency began and ended with the pleasure of the secretary, or with the particular service for which they were employed. As our naval establishment was extended, and these services became numerous and important; as the operations of these agents became of great magnitude, involving the expenditure of vast sums of money; it was wisely thought they should no longer be entrusted to the agents of a department, irresponsible in some degree directly to the government, and without any security beyond their own responsibility, for the faithful performance of their trust. The patronage, too, may well have been thought to be of too high a character and value to be attached to a department. The law of 1809 was intended to put these concerns under a better regulation. The third section enacts, "that exclusively of the purveyor of public supplies, paymasters of the army, pursers of the navy, military agents, and other officers already authorized by law, no other permanent agent shall be appointed, either for the purpose of making contracts, or for the purchase of supplies, or for the disbursement, in any other manner, of moneys for the use of the military establishment, or of the navy of the United States, but such as shall be appointed by the president of the United States, with the advice and consent of the senate." It is then enacted that the president may fix the number and compensation of such agents, but with a limitation as to the latter, "provided that the compensation allowed to either shall not exceed one per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him." The fourth section requires a bond from the agent, with one or more sufficient sureties, for the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in him. All this appears to me to be very intelligible. We see no intimation of the distinction, essentially and necessarily relied upon by the counsel of the complainant, between foreign and domestic agents, in the mode of appointment, the tenure and permanence of their offices, or the terms on which they may receive them. The construction contended for, taking the foreign agents altogether out of the act, would not only deprive the president and senate of their appointment, but dispense, in their case, with the security to be given for the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in them, as well as of their limitation of the compensation to one per centum on their disbursements. As regards the bond or security, it would seem to me, to be infinitely more necessary in the case of a foreign than a home agent, who is always under the eye and control of the government, whereas the other carries on his operations in a distant country, and might be guilty of the grossest irregularities and frauds for a long time, before they would be known; and when known the delinquent would be out of the reach of the government with all his spoil. It has not been pretended that domestic agents are not subject to the provisions of this law, for this would be to repeal it wholly as to all navy agents, and I think it has not and cannot be shown, that any distinction is made by the law, or by the reason and design of the law, between the agents appointed for foreign or home stations. These are equally within or without the law; they are both clearly within it, in their appointments, their duties, their responsibilities, and their compensation.

It has been argued, with great earnestness, that this act has relation only to permanent agents, and that a navy agent abroad is not a permanent agent, for he is removable at the pleasure of the executive, and, in fact, in this case a removal was made in fifteen months, whereas the foreign agents appointed before the passage of this law continued undisturbed for many years. The first difficulty this argument has to encounter is, that it applies with the same force to the agents at home, who hold their offices in the same way, and may be removed by the same power that acts upon those abroad; and thus the distinction so carefully set up between foreign and domestic agents is overthrown. What is the meaning of a permanent agent as understood in the law? Certainly it does not designate the place of residence as affecting the description. Can we say that the complainant was not a permanent agent because he was removable, or because he was actually removed, by the president? Does the legal character or description of the appointment depend upon the exercise of the right of the president over the officer? This is clearly not the meaning of the law, as is apparent from the act of 15th May, 1820, which enacts, that 'navy agents,' with other enumerated officers, "shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure." The navy agents here referred to are certainly those which are appointed under the law of 1809 by the description of permanent agents. The phrase then 'permanent agents,' signifies those agents which shall be appointed by the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, in contra-distinction to those persons who had been or should be appointed by the secretary of the navy, on some special occasion or service, in his discretion and on such terms as he, on his official responsibility, should choose to arrange and make with the persons so appointed by him. The officer who takes his appointment from the president and senate, under the constitution and law of the United States, testified by his commission, which makes him independent of the secretary, and removable only in the manner and by the power given by the constitution and the law, may well be considered, legally, to be a permanent officer or agent of the United States. When the law declares that no permanent agent shall be appointed but by the president and senate, it, in effect, declares that the agent who is so appointed, is, within the meaning of the law, a permanent agent. The district attorney is a permanent officer of the government, although removable at pleasure, and commissioned just as a navy agent is, in contra-distinction to a special or temporary attorney, who may be employed for a particular cause or service. The cases of Messrs. Hogan and M'Call have been frequently urged upon the court in the argument. It might be enough to answer that they clearly were not appointed under the law of 1809; but made their contracts with the secretary of the navy for the services they undertook to perform. They were not officers of the United States; they were not appointed as such officers must be. They did not derive their agencies, such as they were, from the president and senate, nor were they appointed under the authority of the act of congress. Contracts were made with them by the secretary of the navy under a discretionary power exercised by him. It is true that abuses may be practised in this way; but they are not to be presumed. It is true that under the pretence of making a special agent, under a special contract, a navy agent may be placed in a foreign port by the secretary, with any rate of compensation he may agree to, and without the securities required by law from navy agents for the faithful discharge of their trust, and such an agency may be continued for many years, as has been done, performing all the duties of a permanent navy agent and no more. Such cases might be an evasion of the provisions of the law by the secretary; but they are always under the control of the president, who, by appointing a permanent agent, would supersede the special agency. The complainant in this case went abroad, nor with any such special contract in his pocket, but with his commission as the only evidence of his appointment; the only source of his authority. This commission was given to him under the law of 1809; it could have been given to him under no other legal authority, and he took it as an appointment under that law, and subject to all its provisions. I am of opinion that he is entitled to no more than one per centum on the moneys disbursed by him for the use of the navy of the United States; and, of course, that he cannot be allowed the credit he now claims of an additional four per cent., amounting to the sum of five thousand seven hundred and fifty-five dollars and eighty-six cents. The one per cent. he has already received a credit for.

I have said nothing of the alleged conversation between the complainant and Mr. Hay, a clerk in the navy department. Our knowledge of it and of the time it occurred, is by no means satisfactory; but no such conversation, nor any opinion or representation of Mr. Hay, or any other officer of the government, can have any effect upon the provisions of the act of congress. If the complainant can show that he accepted his commission in consequence of these representations of Mr. Hay, he may have a case for the equity of congress; but we are bound to obey the law.

The next credit claimed by the defendant, and which has been rejected by the accounting officers of the treasury, is a charge of commissions on the distribution of stores, amounting to six hundred and sixteen dollars and twenty-three cents. There is another claim on the same account of four hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-six cents. They will be considered together. The act of 1809, which creates the office of a navy agent, has also fixed his compensation wholly or in part. We must return to it for the decision of the question on the distribution of stores; obeying the directions of the law, where they are clear and explicit, and giving it a fair and reasonable construction where they are not so. It enacts, that the president may "fix the number and compensation of such agents; provided that the compensation to either shall not exceed one per cent. on the public moneys disbursed by him." There is, in my mind, something equivocal in this form of expression. Does it mean that the whole compensation of the agent, for all his services, shall not exceed one per cent. on the moneys he shall disburse; or that the compensation for or on account of his disbursement of moneys shall not exceed that rate. Perhaps the more strict and the more obvious construction of the words, as they stand in the law, would be that the whole compensation, for all the services of the agent, shall be one per cent. on the moneys disbursed by him. But it is not explicitly so said; and if we are permitted to resort to construction, as in a doubtful clause, it does not appear to be the most equitable interpretation of it. What is the difference in labour or responsibility, between distributing stores, and disbursing moneys for the use of the navy; unless we should say that the first is the more laborious and troublesome of the two. They are distinct services in every respect, and why should they be confounded in their compensation? If we look to the practice, under contracts made by the secretary with his agents, these subjects of service have been kept separate, and a commission charged and allowed for each. I must be understood to comprehend in this view only, such stores as were sent out by the government to the agent to be distributed by him to the navy, and not those which have been purchased by him, and for which he has already received his compensation in a charge of commission on the moneys disbursed for the payment. The charge now made by the complainant is understood to be only for the stores furnished by the government.

If we adopt a more rigorous construction of the law, and allow to an agent nothing but his commissions on the disbursements of money for all his services, a case of manifest injustice might occur. The location of an agent might be such, that it would be more convenient or economical for the government to send him every thing, or nearly so, that could be there wanted for the use of the navy; he would then have little or no money to disburse; while his labour in taking care of the stores and distributing them would be very great and unrewarded. By turning to the third section of the act, which creates this office, the duties of the officer, in the view of the legislature, and to which the stipulated compensation may be supposed to refer, are as follows: the "making of contracts, the purchase of supplies, and the disbursements of moneys for the use of the navy." No stores or supplies seem to have been contemplated by this law, but such as were purchased by the agent, and for which, of course, he had received his commission on the disbursements in making the purchase. But the distribution of stores or supplies not purchased by him, and for which service he has, in no shape, received any compensation, seems not to have been considered or distinctly provided for in the description of the duties to be performed by the agent, or in fixing his compensation for his services. It the credit now claimed, such a one as the head of the department was authorised to allow, in the exercise of his equitable discretion in the settlement of the accounts of a public officer? Or is it so clearly prohibited by the act of 1809, that to allow it would be a violation of that law? In the latter case neither the secretary nor the court has any power over it; in the former, the court may do whatever the secretary might have done. We may give the credit, if we are satisfied to consider the service for which it is claimed, as a casus omissus in the law, not provided for by it, and not within the restriction of compensation there imposed. In such a case we may consider the equity of the claim arising from the performance of a service, for which no remuneration has been made, and its allowance or disallowance would be subject to the discretion of the court under all the circumstances of the case. It is not a credit of positive right, for it is not promised by the act of congress, or by any contract with the government; and its allowance, as an equitable charge, will always depend upon the facts upon which the equity is founded. Such an equity may be found in one case and not in another; and each will be governed by its own circumstances. On this item, I have concluded, not without much doubting, to allow a commission of one per cent. on the value of the stores or supplies distributed by the complainant, and not purchased by him, but furnished by the United States. The credit claimed in his account, is five per cent. or ten hundred and forty-three dollars and ninety-nine cents; the allowance will be one fifth of that sum, or two hundred and eight dollars and eighty cents. As connected with this part of the case, I will dispose of the charge of one hundred and eighty-three dollars and twenty-four cents, commissions on stores and provisions delivered over by the complainant to his successor, Philo White. This charge is wholly inadmissible. It has none of the considerations in its favour which have influenced my decision on the last two items. The whole service was probably the delivery of a key to Mr. White. It was his duty to put his successor in possession of the public stores, and can afford no ground for a commission, on any principle of the most liberal equity.

A charge for clerk hire is not deemed, at the treasury, to be an improper credit to the complainant, and one thousand dollars have been allowed for that object. The balance two hundred and sixty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents, was rejected as an excess of what was thought to be a necessary or reasonable expenditure on this account. The complainant has exhibited receipts showing that the whole amount claimed by him has been actually paid to his clerks. He asks only for reimbursement. It must be allowed, as there is no evidence of any bad faith or wanton extravagance in the expenditure.

The sum of eight hundred and sixty-three dollars and thirty-three cents, is claimed for damages and interest paid to Alsop & Co. on a bill drawn by the complainant on the secretary of treasury, on the 16th August, 1830, which was protested for non-acceptance and non-payment. The protest of this bill was permitted by the government under a mistake of the facts concerning it. The complainant, while legally acting as navy agent, had an unquestionable right to draw bills on the government; and many had been drawn and paid. The only reason for refusing this, was a suspicion or belief that it had been drawn after the complainant had notice of the revocation of his appointment, and, of course, after his right to draw had ceased. This was altogether a mistake. The letter of revocation was dated in April, 1830, but did not come to the knowledge of the complainant until October following, several weeks after the date of the bill, which was, therefore, rightfully drawn. When the truth of the transaction was known, the bill was paid; but the damages, which were paid by the complainant in consequence of the protest, by the mistake of the government, and for no fault in the complainant, have been withheld, and the loss thrown upon him. I cannot see on what principle of law or equity this has been done. In such a case, between a factor and his principal, can it be doubted that the factor would be entitled to a full reimbursement of such a payment. This credit must be given to the complainant.

The next two items will be considered together. They are so manifestly unsupported by the facts and reason of the case, that it is a subject of regret as well as surprise, that the complainant should have introduced them into his account. The first is a charge of sixteen hundred and nine dollars and eighty-seven cents, for his board during his detention in Lima, owing to the protest of his bills, say from the day he ceased to be navy agent, the 1st of October, 1830, to the 20th of January, 1832, at three dollars and thirty-seven cents per diem. The second is a charge of three thousand two hundred and twenty-nine dollars and fifteen cents, for his compensation for the above time, at the rate of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum.

As to the detention at Lima, owing to the protest of his bill, if we could agree that the protest of this bill, drawn by him as an officer of the United States, and for the payment of which he was not responsible, could afford a reason for his remaining at Lima at the charge of the United States, it is not to be doubted, on the clear evidence of the case, that he did not remain there for any such reason, but for his own purposes, or at least, at his own pleasure. He remained at Lima, after notice of his removal from office, eight months before he knew of the protest of his bill, and during that time he had not any suspicion that it would be protested. Yet these eight months are a part of the period during which he alleges that he was detained at Lima, "owing to the protest of his bills." Again, he was informed of the payment of the bill in October, 1831, but his charge for detention runs on to the 20th of January, 1832, and he did not actually sail for the United States until March, 1832, either because he was attending to business of his own, or, it may be, waiting for a suitable conveyance. In the face of such facts I cannot admit that the protest of the bill had anything to do with his remaining at Lima; and if it had, I do not see that the protest made such a necessity for his detention, as to raise a claim against the United States for it.

The claim of compensation, amounting to three thousand two hundred and twenty-nine dollars and fifteen cents, for services as navy agent, after the revocation of his appointment and during the alleged detention at Lima, is still more unreasonable. The claim is made for the time between the 1st of October, 1830, and the 20th of January, 1832. Now it is not questioned that Philo White, the official successor of the complainant, arrived at Lima, took possession of the stores, and assumed all the duties of the appointment, in May, 1831; and yet, in the face of this fact, the complainant has made a charge as an acting navy agent, until January, 1832, full eight months after he had ceased to have any connection with the office, its duties, or services. It is true that when, in October, 1830, the revocation of the complainant's appointment came to Lima, he was requested by Commodore Thompson, to continue to act as agent, as his substitute had not arrived, in procuring supplies for the squadron, and taking charge of such stores as might be sent out for its use. We may presume that he did so. But what were the services he performed under this appointment or request of Commodore Thompson? Merely to procure supplies, and receive and distribute stores. For these he has been paid by his commissions on the moneys disbursed for the purchases, and on the stores distributed by him. I cannot but observe that in the same account, in which he has charged a commission of five per cent. for these services, he has also claimed a compensation for them, in the shape of a salary, at the rate of two thousand five hundred dollars a year.

I have felt a strong disposition to allow the credit of three hundred and fifty dollars paid by the complainant for his passage home. He left his country, and his business and prospects here, whatever they were, under an appointment by the government, which purported, by the terms of his commission, to continue for four years, and as much longer as the office and his services might be thought useful and acceptable. It is true he had no legal right even to this period of enjoyment, but he had a reasonable expectation of it, provided he gives no cause for disappointment by his own conduct. No complaint seems to have been made of his ability or fidelity, and he had been but about fifteen months in the enjoyment of the place, when his appointment was revoked. Under such circumstances, we can see and feel that a strong moral equity arises, to bring him back to the place he was taken from. Between individuals, a conscientious and just man would, I think, have done so. But no instance has been shown, under any such circumstances, of the recognition of a right, legal or legally equitable, in an officer who has been removed, or whose office has been vacated, to charge the government with his return home. I am afraid to set a precedent contrary to all usage, and must disallow this credit or charge. So with the complainant's traveling expenses in going to Washington to settle his accounts. The only remaining item or charge in the complainant's account, is for the tobacco sold or furnished by him to the United States, amounting to four thousand two hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty-eight cents. I can have no hesitation in allowing it.

In the letter of the secretary of the navy, to the fourth auditor, of the 25th June, 1832, he says, the tobacco must depend on the fact whether the authority to purchase was revoked generally; and whether the revocation reached the Pacific station before this purchase was made. If not it should be allowed; otherwise it should not. This is a very partial and imperfect view of the question; and it is probable that all the facts of the case were not known to the secretary. We have them now in evidence. The answer of the United States to the bill of the complainant does not deny or admit, that a report of this tobacco was made by the complainant, in his accounts, to the department, nor that it was surveyed by order of Commodore Thompson, as part of the public stores of the United States, and, as such delivered over by the complainant, to the successor in office, and regularly receipted for by him on behalf of the United States. But it is insisted, that if all these things are true, they do not authorise the charge. And why? Because it is denied that the tobacco was purchased on public account; or by authority or instructions of any officer of the government; and it is averred that tobacco is not an article which a navy agent is authorised to purchase on public account, but that it is to be furnished to our ships by the pursers as part of their stores. It is also averred that the tobacco was the private property of the complainant, shipped to him from Norfolk, on his own account, and still remains his private property, and has never been accepted or legally transferred to the United States; that the navy department has never received any part of it, or interfered with it, or done any thing to recognise the validity of any transfer or purchase thereof; and that no officer of the department or the navy, had any authority to do so.

In answer to all these denials and averments, what are the plain and uncontradicted facts of the transaction? This tobacco was originally purchased in Virginia, as the United States allege, as the private property of the complainant; after its arrival at Lima, it was sold by him to a Mr. M'Culloch; it was afterwards re-purchased by the complainant, as he alleges, for the United States. A part of this tobacco was distributed or delivered by the complainant, before his removal from office, to certain ships of the United States, and the residue, remaining in the store of the United States, was handed over, with the other stores, to Mr. White, the successor of the complainant, having been first surveyed by order of Commodore Thompson. From that day to this not a pound of it has been in the possession or under the control of the complainant; but that which has not been consumed in the ships of the United States, has continued in the possession of their agent. Why need we inquire whether, by the regulations of the navy, tobacco is to be furnished to our crews by a navy agent or a purser? If such be the regulation, undoubtedly it would have been a good and sufficient reason for refusing to receive this tobacco, either on board of the ships, or as part of the stores of the United States, and for leaving it on the hands of the complainant, for profit or loss as might happen; but it can never afford a justification for receiving the article, for actually consuming a part of it, and for retaining the residue, and refusing to pay for it. As for that part which has been delivered to the ships, a credit has been allowed, and thus far, at least, the purchase and sale have been recognised and adopted by the department, notwithstanding the alleged navy regulation. In what respect, or on what principle of justice or equity, does the part of the tobacco, for which the complainant has been allowed a credit, differ from that for which it has been refused. The first was delivered to the pursers of the ships and has been consumed by their crews; the other has been delivered to their agent authorised to procure supplies for the navy, and has been by him distributed to the ships, or is still retained by him as the property of the United States. If he was not authorised to receive it, let him answer for it. It is enough for the complainant that he did receive it, and has received for it as the agent of the United States, and on their behalf. Suppose we should consider that the complainant was not warranted as a navy agent to make the purchase from Mr. M'Culloch for the United States. The consequence is, that it was his own property, and by him sold and delivered to Mr. White, who was the agent of the government. Is it any answer to the seller of an article to such an agent, to tell him that, by the navy regulations, the pursers and not the navy agents are to furnish tobacco to our ships, and therefore the United States may keep and use the article but are not bound to pay for it? This cannot be. If the tobacco was received from the complainant as public stores, then he has a right to charge for it the price he gave for it; if it was a sale by him to the public agent, then he has a right to receive its fair price or value for it, and we have no better way of ascertaining it than by taking the actual cost of it to him. I cannot deny that a suspicion hangs upon my mind, that the sale to Mr. M'Culloch was not a real transaction, but a contrivance to enable Mr. Armstrong to sell his tobacco to the United States at an advance or profit on its cost, which, as a public agent, he was not authorised to do. If this were clearly shown, it would have no effect on the case other than to deprive him of the profit, a few cents a pound, and compel him to pass it to the United States at its first cost in Virginia, and the charges of taking it to Lima. The evidence is not sufficiently explicit on this point, to enable me to take this ground; and the objection has not been made at the treasury, from which, I presume they were satisfied in relation to it. I have, therefore, allowed the credit for the sum claimed in the complainant's account.

Decree: This cause coming on for final decision upon the bill, answer, replication, exhibits, depositions and other evidence: It is ordered, decreed and adjudged that the injunction heretofore granted in this cause, be and the same is hereby perpetuated, for and as to the sum of five thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and fifty-six cents, part of the sum or charge of twelve thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars and forty-four cents claimed by the defendants of and from the complainant, and for the recovery of which the warrant of distress in the bill mentioned was issued; and that the said defendants be and they are hereby perpetually enjoined from proceeding further against the complainant upon the said warrant of distress, for or on account of any claim or demand of and for the said sum of five thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and fifty-six cents. And it is further ordered, decreed, and adjudged, that the said injunction be dissolved, and it is hereby dissolved, for and as to the sum of seven thousand two hundred and fifty-four dollars and eighty-eight cents, the balance or remaining part of the said sum or charge of twelve thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars and forty-four cents, for the recovery of which the said warrant of distress was issued.

The following statement, to be filed with the decree, having reference to the account or claim of credits which accompanies the bill of the complainant, exhibits the items of that account which have been allowed and disallowed to him, in making the above decree.

He has been allowed
 A commission of one per cent on stores distributed..... $ 208 80
 Clerk hire..... 268 75
 Damages on protested bills..... 863 33
 For tobacco delivered to the United States navy..... 4,279 68

 5,620 56

He has not been allowed
 Commissions rejected at the last settlement $ 5,755 86
 His board while detained at Lima.. 1,609 87
 Compensation for the same time.. 3,229 15
 The two items for distribution of stores together..... 1,043 99
 His passage home..... 350 00
 Traveling to Washington, two items Commissions for stores handed over to Philo White..... 183 24
 Commissions on $80, paid to Mr. Henderson 4 00

 $12,219 61

Case No. 549.

ARMSTRONG et al. v. UNITED STATES.

[Pet. C. C. 46.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1811.

BOND OF INTERNAL REVENUE COLLECTOR — CONFORMITY TO STATUTE — SURETIES — VALIDITY AS TO COLLECTIONS PREVIOUSLY MADE.

1. A bond, given by a collector of the internal revenue, with sureties, conditioned that the collector had accounted and would account, for all taxes collected or to be collected, is not binding on the sureties, as to collections previously made; and the court granted a perpetual injunction against proceedings on such bond, except for the sums received by the collector after its execution.

[Cited in Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co., Case No. 1,617.]

2. When a bond is taken under a statute, it ought to conform in substance to the requisitions of the law, and if it goes beyond it, it is void, so far as it exceeds those requisitions.

[Cited in U. S. v. Brown, Case No. 14,663; U. S. v. Mynderse, Id. 15,851; U. S. v. Humason, Id. 15,420.]

[In equity. Bill for injunction by Thomas Armstrong and Charles Case against the United States.] The bill stated, that in June, 1796, one Smith was appointed by the supervisor of New Jersey, to collect the internal revenue, within a particular district; and that he gave bond, with one Willis as his security. He was afterwards required to give additional security, and on the 1st of January, 1799, he, together with the complainants, as his sureties, executed a new bond, with condition that the said Smith had faithfully executed the duties of a collector, and would thereafter faithfully execute the same. That, at the time when this latter bond was given, the said Smith was considerably indebted to the United States for collections theretofore made; and that during the year 1799, he became also indebted, in an additional sum, for money collected by him, which he had not accounted for. That a suit was brought by the United States on the last mentioned bond, in the district court, in order to recover the whole sum. The plaintiffs offered to pay, and are still willing to pay the amount collected and not accounted for since the 1st January, 1799, which the officers of the United States refused to receive. That a judgment was recovered by the United States for the whole sum; against which an injunction is prayed.

¹[Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The answer admits the above allegations in the bill, and adds, that before the trial took place in the district court, the counsel for the complainants, and the district attorney, made a statement of the case, for the opinion of the secretary of the treasury; who decided that the complainants were bound to pay the whole sum. The cause came on for a hearing, when a witness was examined, to prove an allegation in the bill, that Willis, the surety on the first bond, owned real property in this state, to nearly double the amount of the debt which had accrued prior to January, 1799, which he sold subsequent to the year 1800.

Mr. Stockton, for the plaintiffs, stated, that the first law which required a bond to be given by the collector of the internal revenue passed the 11th July, 1798, [1 Stat. 591.] and merely says, that the supervisors, inspectors and collectors, shall within three months after being thereto required, give bonds, with sureties, for the true and faithful execution of their respective offices, and settlement of their accounts. This is purely prospective. The law, as to bonds to be given by collectors of duties on imported goods is otherwise.

[Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and MORRIS, District Judge.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. One object of this bond most clearly seems to have been, to secure a debt previously due to the United States; and the court does not mean to say, that security in such cases may not be legally taken by the officers of the United States; but when a statutory bond is taken, it ought to conform, in substance at least, to the requisitions of the statute; and if it go beyond the law, it is void, at least so far as it does exceed those requisitions. This is an official bond, which the supervisor had a right to demand, and Smith was obliged to give, if he meant to continue in office; but the substantial form of the bond required by the act of congress, was prospective only, and no other could be legally taken. A contrary doctrine would open the door to great oppression, and ought therefore to be discontinued. Injunction made perpetual, except as to the sum liquidated, and stated as having been due since January 1st, 1799, with interest from the time the suit at law was brought; and to be dissolved for the residue.

ARMSTRONG, (WINTER'S BANK v.) See Case No. 17,899.

Case No. 550.

ARMSWORTHY v. MISSOURI RIVER, FT. S. & G. R. CO.

[5 Dill. 491.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1879.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE RIGHTS OF SETTLERS UNDER THE TREATY RELATING TO THE CEDED NEUTRAL LANDS IN KANSAS.

The case of Stroud v. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co., [Case No. 13,547,] followed; and it was held in this case that, under the provisions of the treaty referred to, the actual settler whose improvements were wholly upon the west half of a quarter section of land was only entitled to buy the portion of the quarter section on which the improvements had been made.

Suit by complainant [W. W. Armsworthy] to acquire the legal title to the southeast quarter of section four, township twenty-eight, range twenty-five, in Crawford county. The facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Hill & Sallee, for plaintiff.

Wallace Pratt and Blair & Ferry, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and FOSTER, District Judge.

FOSTER, District Judge. The material facts in this case are precisely like those in the case of Stroud v. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co., [Case No. 13,547,] excepting that the improvements in this case are all on the west half of the quarter section, and the complainant makes claim for the whole quarter, as in the Stroud Case. In that case the improvements being on every sub-division of the quarter, the question which arises in this case was not passed upon.

In the first proviso of article 17 of the treaty, [14 Stat. 804,] the rights of the actual settler who has made improvements of the value of fifty dollars and occupies the land for agricultural purposes at the date of the signing of the treaty are clearly defined. In making his proofs, he was entitled to buy at the appraised value the smallest quantity of land in legal sub-divisions which would include his improvements—not exceeding, however, in the aggregate, one hundred and sixty acres. Under the second proviso, as it was originally drafted, the secretary of the interior might sell all these neutral lands in a body, for not less than $800,000 cash. This proviso was general and sweeping in its terms, and did not save the rights of the settlers in the event of such a sale. When the treaty came before the senate for ratification, July 27th, 1866, this last proviso was stricken out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "Provided, that nothing in this article shall prevent the secretary of the interior from selling the whole of said land not occupied by actual settlers at the date of the ratification of this treaty, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each person entitled to pre-emption under the pre-emption laws of the United States, in a body, to any responsible party, for cash, for a sum not less than one dollar per acre." This amendment to the treaty was evidently intended to protect the actual settlers on these lands in the event they were sold in a body. But it imposes a further limitation to the first proviso of the article—that is, the settler must have been entitled to pre-emption under the pre-emption laws of the United States in order to be entitled to a preference in the purchase of the land; and it extended the time from the signing to the date of the ratification of the treaty.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

1. Was it intended by this amendment to do more than impose this personal qualification and extend the time, leaving the value and kind of the improvements and the quantity of land to be determined by the first proviso?

2. Or was it intended to go further, and confer all the rights of the pre-emption laws as to improvements and quantity of land, etc., on the settler?

3. Or was it intended, as claimed by the plaintiff, that to the personal limitation was also given the right of the pre-emption laws as to the quantity of land, leaving the kind and value of the improvements to be determined by the first proviso?

If the second theory is the correct one, then the rights of the settler are to be determined by the provisions of the pre-emption laws of the United States, not only as to the person, but also to the kind of improvements and the quantity of land to which he is entitled, and the provisions of the first proviso are immaterial. Certain rights were given the settler if the land was sold in parcels, and entirely different rights given, and restrictions imposed, if the land was sold en masse. So it would result, from such a construction, that any individual settler might or might not be entitled to his improvements, depending upon which way the secretary of the interior should happen to sell these lands. It does not seem reasonable that it was the purpose of this amendment to go to that extent. We can see no reason why such a wide distinction should be made, or why the court should construe the law as making such difference. Now, if it was not intended to remit the settler to the pre-emption laws for his rights in toto, was it intended to do so in part—i. e., as to the quantity of land to which he was entitled, but not as to the improvements? This is what the plaintiff contends for, but we cannot find a reason for such a construction of the act, unless it be to compensate for the personal restriction imposed.

No one would contend that it is in the power of courts, in construing statutes, to apportion advantages to compensate for disadvantages. That is a legislative power, and we can only declare what the law is, not what it ought to be.

Holding, as we do, that these provisos are in pari materia, as intimated in the Stroud Case, and construing them together, there is still an unmistakable difference as to the rights of the settler in the two cases. In the one case the settler need not be entitled to pre-emption rights under the laws of the United States; in the other case he must be—that is, he must have the personal qualifications of a pre-emptor—such as citizenship, being the head of a family, or widow, or a single person twenty-one years of age, and not owning three hundred and twenty acres of land elsewhere, nor have abandoned his residence on his own land in the state to reside on these lands. Such restrictions might well have been deemed proper to cut off adventurers and speculators, who might go on to these lands without a bona fide intention of remaining and making a home. Further than this, and the extension of the time of settlement, we cannot think this amendment qualified the first proviso. It may be argued that such construction imposes a restriction on the settler in the one case without giving any compensating benefits therefor. But if that were true, the hardship of the case would not alone be a controlling consideration. But is it true? It extends the time named in the first proviso from the date of signing the treaty to the date of its ratification; and as to the original proviso for which this was substituted, it seems to have been intended by its terms to cut off the rights of the settlers altogether in case the lands were sold en masse.

The secretary of the interior was authorized to sell the whole of these lands in a body. There were eight hundred thousand acres of these ceded neutral lands, and it provided for selling them as a whole for $800,000 in gross, which would be one dollar per acre, making no deduction for the lands of settlers. If it was the intention to reserve those lands, it is altogether probable the price to be paid for the body of these lands would have been governed to some extent by the amount of lands remaining after deducting the improved lands. The amendment saved the rights of the settlers, and further provided for a sale as a whole of the remainder of the lands for one dollar per acre.

It is hardly probable that this proviso, which was substituted for one saving nothing to the settlers, was intended to enlarge the rights given by the first proviso of this article, or to fix a different rule as to improvements or the quantity of land reserved to the settler. Under our view of the law, the complainant was entitled to buy only the west half of said quarter section at the appraised value. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 551.

In re ARNOLD.

[2 N. B. R. (1868,) 160, (Quarto, 61.)]

District Court, D. California.

BANKRUPTCY—DEBTS PROVABLE—PREFERENCES.

[1. H. was indorser for A. on a note in bank, and also held two notes executed to him by A. A. was insolvent, and H., apprehending protest of the note in bank, advanced to A. $500 to be applied thereto, and received from A. a bill of sale of a lot of flour, worth about $1,400, in course of shipment to a distant market. Held that, though the transaction may have been a preference in favor of H. as to the note in bank then due, yet, there being nothing to show that the flour was to be held as a security for the other notes not due, no preference was created as to them, and H. was not debarred from proving them against the estate of A. in bankruptcy.]

[Cited in Martin v. Toof, Case No. 9,167.]

[2. Cited in Singer v. Sloan, Case No. 12,899, as a case in which a distinction between "knowledge" and "reasonable cause to believe" has been recognized.]

[In bankruptcy. Certificate by register to district judge of question arising upon exception by a creditor to the rejection of his proof of debt. Proof of debt allowed.]

By the Register: At the first meeting of creditors in this case, on the 24th day of January, 1868, I. H. Ham offered in proof of a debt against the bankrupt, the annexed affidavits with the notes attached, to which the Russell & Erwin Manufacturing Co. filed the objection hereto attached, and thereupon the proof of the debt was postponed to a future day. Upon the application of Henry C. Hyde, who was appointed the assignee of the bankrupt estate, the testimony hereto attached has been taken before me in relation to the claim of the said I. H. Ham, and upon the submission of the same, and of the argument of the counsel of the claimant and the Russell & Erwin Manufacturing Co., the following question is to be determined: Has I. H. Ham "accepted any preference, having reasonable cause to believe the same was made or given by the bankrupt, contrary to any provision of the bankrupt act," and thereby made himself subject to the twenty-third section thereof, which further provides that if he has accepted such a preference "he shall not prove the debt or claim, on account of which the preference was made or given; nor shall he receive any dividend therefrom until he shall first have surrendered to the assignee all of the property, money, benefit or advantage received by him under such preference?"

Before entering upon a discussion of the facts involved in the case, I propose first to dispose of the legal questions presented by the counsel for the claimants. Section thirty-five of the bankrupt act provides that "if any person being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, makes any * * * sale * * * of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such * * * sale * * * is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, * * * the sale * * * shall be void and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt. And if such sale * * * is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, the fact shall be prima facie evidence of fraud." Section thirty-nine of the bankrupt law provides, any person "who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any * * * sale * * * or transfer of money, or other property * * * with intent to give a preference * * * to any person * * * who are, or may be liable for him as endorser * * * shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy * * * and if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt * * * the person receiving such * * * conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that * * * the debtor was insolvent * * * such creditor shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy."

Now, upon the several sections, the counsel for creditor claims that the transaction which is alleged to have resulted in giving to his client a preference, was a sale of the property of the bankrupt for five hundred dollars, cash paid, and that it was not made in contemplation of bankruptcy by either party, and cannot be held to be void, or as affecting his right to prove his debt. The provisions of the bankrupt law of 1867, applicable to this case, are entirely different from those of the law of 1841, and the decisions to which my attention has been directed are all based upon the law of 1841. By reference to the several sections (of which I have quoted so much as is applicable to this case,) it will be observed that any sale made by a person "insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy," to another having "reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency * * * shall be void," and that "the person receiving such * * * conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on this act was intended, or that the debtor was insolvent * * * shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy." It matters not whether either party contemplated proceeding in the bankrupt court; if the fact existed that the debtor was insolvent, and that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe him insolvent, he could not deal with him in any way by which a preference would result to his benefit.

The theory of bankrupt law is, that an insolvent debtor is to husband the estate in his hands as a trustee for his creditors, and that neither the debtor nor creditor shall be a party to any transaction which shall result in giving to one creditor an advantage over another creditor, when he has reasonable cause to believe the debtor is insolvent, and the language of this act could not be more explicit than it is, in declaring this just and equitable principle. That Arnold, the bankrupt, was insolvent on the 18th day of November, 1867, is conceded. On that day it is claimed that Ham, the creditor, purchased of him his interest in two lots of flour afloat on the way to New York, for five hundred dollars cash, without reasonable cause to believe he was insolvent or contemplated bankruptcy, and that that transaction does not preclude him from proving his debt.

Having already determined that insolvency, as well as contemplation of bankruptcy, would vitiate certain sales, it only remains for me to determine whether—

First. Ham had reasonable cause to believe Arnold insolvent.

Second. If he had, whether the sale resulted in giving him an advantage over other creditors, and was made for that purpose.

I. Without especially referring to all the testimony upon which my opinion is based, I am satisfied that Ham, at the time the transaction transpired, which is claimed to be a sale to him of the interest in the flour, had reasonable cause to believe Arnold was insolvent. The peculiar circumstances under which the sale was made were such as were calculated to excite suspicion of Arnold's inability to pay his debts. Had Ham believed him solvent he would not have questioned him as to the amount he could raise to meet his note, and have fixed the amount he would give for his interest in the flour by his ability to pay more or less. Nor would he have made it a condition of the purchase that the five hundred dollars cash he paid him should be applied on Arnold's note in bank endorsed by him. The transaction was not such an one as usually transpires "in the usual and ordinary course of business," and, in the language of the bankrupt law, affords "prima facie evidence of fraud" being committed by the bankrupt against the rights and interests of his other creditors. When Ham testified, "I had to make the trade, because I had to pay the money or let the note go to protest," he confessed that he had good cause to believe Arnold could not meet his liabilities, and that if he did not make the purchase and furnish him with five hundred dollars, he would be liable to have his property attached before night and have his business broken up, and such being the fact, he proposed to him to give him a bill of sale for the amount necessary to pay his note, save him from the immediately impending liability to be attached, and that he would aid him on those terms only. The additional fact that appears from the testimony, that when Ham made the negotiation for the re-purchase of the flour for five hundred dollars, it was worth, had it been in the city of San Francisco, over and above the advances, eight hundred dollars, and that, taking into account the prospective profit to be realized from it above the advances made upon it, in New York city, upon its arrival there, as appears by the prices current affixed to the testimony, it was worth, say, one thousand four hundred dollars, is an additional circumstance to prove that the transaction was made with a view to give to Ham an advantage not to be enjoyed by the other creditors. All of the circumstances, it seems to me, are such as would have induced any prudent man to believe Arnold was insolvent, and I cannot doubt that the cash was paid and the bill of sale given and received by Ham, believing Arnold to be insolvent.

II. Having determined that Ham had good reason to believe Arnold insolvent when he purchased the flour, did the purchase result in a preference of Ham's debt, and was the sale for that purpose, is now to be discussed and settled. The transaction was a singular one, and it is somewhat difficult to determine precisely whether it was a sale for five hundred dollars cash, or an arrangement that if Ham would advance five hundred dollars to Arnold, to be used for his own benefit in taking up a note on which he was an endorser, upon condition that he would give him a bill of sale of property, worth more than that sum in the market, out of which he was to be partially secured for Arnold's liability on the three notes that were then outstanding against him—one in the bank, on which Ham was endorser, and the other in Ham's hands as the original payee. If it was a purchase for five hundred dollars cash, the application of the money to pay the note in bank, which was made a condition of the advance, the payment of this note was giving a preference to the holder, and made with Ham's knowledge and for his benefit as endorser, and was a fraud upon the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, and would preclude Ham from proving his debt. If it was an arrangement by which Ham was to furnish the larger portion of the money to pay a note on which he was an endorser, upon condition that he was to be secured by the bills of sale for Arnold's liabilities on three notes, there can be no question it was giving a preference that cannot be sanctioned under the bankrupt law, and is null and void; and that as a penalty for Ham's being a party to it, he cannot be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy. It matters not, therefore, whether the theory presented by the claimant's counsel be adopted, that it was a sale for five hundred dollars cash, or the theory presented by the party opposing the proof of the claim, that the transaction was an advance of five hundred dollars, to be applied to the payment of an outstanding note, upon which he was an endorser, upon the condition that Ham should become the nominal owner of the flour, with the understanding that the proceeds realized from it was to be applied in liquidation of the notes now offered to be proved. Adopting either alternative, the register is forced to the conclusion that it was the intention of Arnold to give a preference to Ham, and that Ham received the bill of sale with reasonable cause to believe Arnold was insolvent, and must take the consequences. The question is not now before me, whether the transaction subjects Ham to an action to be commenced by the assignee of the bankrupt to recover the value of the property transferred, as assets of the bankrupt, but if my conclusions of law and fact are right, such a result must follow and it will be the duty of the assignee to take action in the matter. It will also, in its results, preclude the bankrupt from obtaining his discharge, though that question is not now under discussion. The results that must follow from this decision, if sustained by Judge HOFFMAN, who will probably be required to review it, may be regarded as a hardship upon both debtor and the creditor offering his claim for proof, as they were not probably anticipated at the time of the transaction, upon which I have commented, as the bankrupt law is not generally understood by the mercantile community, as I have reason to believe, by proceedings almost daily taken before me; yet they are just and right. The bankrupt law is intended to afford a rule of action for the debtor and creditor that will secure a proportionate distribution of the assets of an insolvent person among all of his creditors, and prevent one creditor profiting at the cost of another, and imposes upon the debtors and creditors all alike, a penalty for the violation of its just principles. Asher B. Bates, Register.

Upon announcing the foregoing decision, the creditor offering his debt for proof excepted to the same, and prayed the register to certify the question discussed to the Hon. OGDEN HOFFMAN, district judge of the district court, together with the testimony and the opinion of the register, that the same may be reviewed by him.

Pursuant to the provisions of the bankrupt act, the undersigned, as register of the first congressional district, upon the prayer of the said I. H. Ham, hereby certifies to the said Hon. OGDEN HOFFMAN, the papers hereto attached, for his decision thereupon, and as the question presented has not been adjudicated upon in this district, respectfully asks that counsel for the debtor and the contestant may be heard upon the question presented, at such time and place as may be fixed by the district judge.

San Francisco, 23d day of July, 1873.

Asher B. Bates, Register.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This was a question certified to the court by A. B. Bates, Esq., register, pursuant to section four of the bankrupt act. I am disposed to entirely assent to the general views of the register as to the intent and construction of the various sections of the act referred to by him. I also decline [incline] to take the same view of the facts of this case as presented by him in his opinion. But it has appeared to me that these questions do not properly arise in the present case. If a preference was given by the bankrupt and received by the creditor, who had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, or acting in contemplation of insolvency, such preference was given only in respect of the note then due. The money paid for the flour was applied to the payment of that note, and it was not alleged on the argument that the proofs showed any understanding or agreement that the flour was to be held as security for the other notes not due, or that its proceeds were in any to be applied to the payment of those notes, or in any way credited to the debtor. The sale of flour was absolute on its face, and, so far as appears, transferred the whole property in it to the purchaser, with no obligation on his part to account for the proceeds or to pass them to the credit of the seller on account of the other notes given by the latter. If this be so, the preference was given only in respect of the note then due, and I think it clear that the provisions of the thirty-ninth section, which deprives the creditor who receives a preference of the right to prove his debt, only refers to the debt sought to be preferred and not to other debts, and especially those not then due, in respect of which no preference was attempted to be given. I therefore think that in this case the creditor should be allowed to prove the debts evidenced by the two notes not due at the time the flour was sold to him.

ARNOLD, In re. See Case No. 17,118.

Case No. 552.

ARNOLD v. BISHOP et al.

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 27; Cranch, Pat. Dec. 103.]
Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct., 1841.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—JOINT INVENTORS— INTERFERENCE—PROCEDURE.

[1. One who reduces to practice the theory of another, with the help of the latter, cannot be considered as the sole inventor of the machine or device; and, if such a one could be regarded as the originator of the invention, his right to a patent would be lost, when it appears that such machine had been in public use for more than two years before the filing of the application.]

[2. An objection that the officer before whom a deposition by a joint inventor in opposition to an application for a patent was taken failed to certify thereon that it was sealed by him, as required by the rules in force in the patent office, is sufficient ground for the exclusion of the deposition from the consideration of the commissioner.]

[Printed "decline" in 2 N. B. R. 167, octavo edition, but in the quarto it is given as "incline."]

[Appeal from decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting an application for letters patent. Affirmed.]

Upon the final hearing of this interference the commissioner, the Hon. H. L. Ellsworth, made the following order: "The commissioner, as at present advised, considers from the joint operations of Arnold, Bishop, and Aiken that neither can consistently claim the whole, and that, since they all advisedly aided and consulted together in the progress of the matter, justice will be promoted by suspending a patent to either separately, and informing them that it is considered a joint invention; and inasmuch as the company claim that Arnold and Bishop unitedly and separately have bound themselves to convey all improvements on the machine first patented and sold to the company, the parties will be heard why the present patent should not issue on a petition to the company, provided Aiken, who was not a party to the covenant, assents to the same; and as the commissioner is verbally informed, Mr. Aiken consents."

From this order or decision appeal was taken to the court by Arnold, who alleged that the conclusions of the commissioner were erroneous in fact and were based upon testimony which was not competent or admissible under the rules of the office. The rules of the office referred to in the decision were as follows:

"Rules for Taking and Transmitting Evidence, &c., to the Commissioner of Patents.

"1st. That all statements, declarations, evidence, &c., shall be in writing, setting forth minutely and particularly the point or points at issue, and shall be verified by oath or affirmation.

"2d. That all statements, declarations, proofs, and evidence shall be filed in the patent office by the parties respectively before the day of hearing.

"3d. That before the deposition of a witness or witnesses be taken by either party notice shall be given to the opposite party of the time and place, when, and where such deposition or depositions will be taken, so that the opposite party, either in person or by attorney, shall have full opportunity to cross-examine the witness or witnesses. And such notice shall, with proof of service of the same, be attached to the deposition or depositions whether the party cross-examine or not; and such notice shall be given in sufficient time for the appearance of the opposite party and for the transmission of the evidence to the patent office before the day of hearing.

"4th. That no evidence, statement, or declaration touching the matter at issue will be considered upon the said day of hearing which shall not have been taken and filed in compliance with these rules: Provided, that if either party shall be unable, from good and sufficient reasons, to procure the testimony of a witness or witnesses within the above-stipulated time, then it shall be the duty of said party to give notice of the same to the commissioner of patents, accompanied with statements of the cause of such inability, which last mentioned notice to the commissioner shall be received by him ——— days previous to the day of hearing aforesaid, viz., the ——— day of ——— next.

"5th. That all evidence, &c., shall be sealed up and transmitted to the commissioner of patents by the persons before whom it shall be taken, and so certify thereon."

Thos. P. Jones, for appellant.
Mr. Morfit, for appellee,
Mr. Fitzgerald, for commissioner.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. On the 19th of September, 1840, John Arnold made application for a patent for his invention of a "new and useful manner for forming the web of felt-cloth and web for other purposes," and in October following complied with the other requisites of the act of the 4th of July, 1836. A caveat, however, had been entered by George G. Bishop and John Aiken, who claimed to be joint inventors with the said John Arnold of the same machine; and on the 20th of March, 1841, the said Bishop and Aiken made application by petition for a patent for the same invention in the name of the said Bishop, Aiken, and John Arnold, averring it to be the joint invention of the three. The commissioner, on the 30th of March, 1841, decided them to be interfering claims, and notice was given to the parties by the commissioner that he would hear them on the second Monday in May, 1841, and they respectively took the depositions of several witnesses. On the 16th of June, 1841, the commissioner decided that it was to be considered a joint invention, and that neither of the parties can claim the whole, and rejected the application of all the applicants. From this decision Mr. Arnold has appealed; and the reasons stated are, in effect, that the commissioner has considered and acted upon evidence not competent according to the general rules of law, and upon testimony not taken according to the regulations prescribed and promulgated by himself; and that, independent of the evidence thus objected to, there is not sufficient evidence to establish the fact of joint invention. And Mr. Arnold's attorney asks leave to be further heard if his objections to the evidence should be overruled.

The evidence objected to consists of—

1. John Aiken's ex-parte affidavit in support of the same joint claim.

2. Letters from Mr. Rowley to the commissioner of patents, dated, respectively, March 15th, May 2d, and June 9th, 1841.

3. George G. Bishop's letters to the commissioner of 7th of May and 12th of June, 1841.

4. Mr. Rowley's deposition.

One of the objections to the deposition of Mr. Rowley is that the commissioner of deeds before whom the deposition was taken has not certified upon the deposition, according to the third rule, that it was sealed up by him. By the act of March 3d, 1839, section 12, it is enacted "that the commissioner of patents shall have power to make all such regulations in respect to the taking of evidence to be used in contested cases before him as may be just and reasonable." Under this authority, the commissioner made out and promulgated the following rules: (See statement of the case.) The first of these rules is evidently intended to apply to the initiatory proceedings in applications for patents and to uncontested cases where the commissioner may consider all the circumstances which may come to his knowledge. The other rules, viz., the second, third, fourth, and fifth, are applicable to contested cases where parties are to be heard; and in such cases, inasmuch as each party is bound by the rules, each party is also entitled to the benefit of them. The fourth rule says "that no evidence, statement, or declaration touching matters at issue will be considered upon the same day of hearing which shall not have been taken and filed in compliance with these rules." This is a restraint imposed upon the commissioner himself as much as if the very words of the rule had been contained in the statute; for the rules, made in conformity with the law, while they remain unabrogated, are as binding as the law itself. The rule is an assurance, an engagement, by the commissioner that he will not at the hearing consider any evidence not taken and filed in compliance with these rules, one of which was that the person taking the deposition should certify thereon that it was sealed up by him. This is not an immaterial form. It is a security that the deposition has not been altered after it left the hands of the magistrate before whom the deposition was taken. In the rules which the commissioner has promulgated he has not reserved any right to dispense with them in particular cases at his pleasure. After a deposition was taken while the rules were in force his dispensation cannot affect that deposition. A revocation of the rules can affect only subsequent proceedings. After a contest has arisen, the parties have a right to insist, not only that the evidence should be taken agreeably to the rules prescribed by the commissioner, but that it should be evidence competent in law. It is one of the rules in law that no man can be a witness in his own cause, unless made competent by statute, or by being called upon by the opposing party to answer upon oath, as in cases in equity and admiralty jurisdiction, &c.

If the witness is interested, he is excluded, however small the amount of interest may be.

Objection was made to the taking of the deposition of Mr. Rowley at the time of taking it because of his interest, and because the notice was too short, because the magistrate was not named before whom the deposition was taken, and because the time was so late that Mr. Arnold would not have time to take countervailing testimony. The interest of Mr. Rowley in the patent right is the same, whether the patent should be granted to Mr. Arnold alone or jointly to the three applicants; for his only interest is as a member of the company, to whom all the applicants have bound themselves to convey the patent right when obtained. If the covenants do not cover the claim for a patent, then Mr. Rowley is not interested at all. If they do cover it, then it is immaterial to him which of the claimants obtain the patent.

The objection to the shortness of the notice is answered by the fact that Mr. Arnold did appear at the time and place, and cross-examined the witness. The lateness of the time is no cause for rejecting the deposition, but it might, perhaps, have been good ground for an application to the commissioner of patents to allow further time for taking other testimony which he might deem important in the cause.

But the objection that the magistrate before whom the deposition was taken did not certify thereon that it was sealed up by him is sufficient ground for excluding that deposition from the consideration of the commissioner of patents.

This evidence, then, being excluded, there remains only, on the part of Messrs. Bishop and Aiken, the deposition of Mr. Lownsberry. This deposition is admitted to have been taken and transmitted according to the rules; but it is said that it shows Mr. Lownsberry to be so interested as to be an incompetent witness. In that respect, however, he stands on the same ground with Mr. Rowley, and the same answer is applicable to him.

It appears by his deposition that the idea of crossing the wool diagonally was suggested by Mr. Bishop and Mr. McLean, or one of them, before Arnold was applied to or had any connection with the company in which Lownsberry, Bishop, and McLean were concerned; that upon the recommendation of Mr. Moulton, Bishop, as agent of the company, applied to Arnold to make the necessary machinery, who undertook the work, and was to have one-fifth of the profits; that he made a machine for crossing wool at right angles, and obtained a patent for it in 1829 or 1830, which was afterwards improved by him and Bishop, who obtained a patent for the improvement in their name; that Bishop frequently, from 1828 to 1837, urged the building of a machine to cross the wool diagonally, to which

Mr. Lownsberry was opposed; the machine, however, was built in 1837, by Arnold and Aiken for the company, who paid them for building it; it has always been in possession of the company, and owned by them; that the machine is the same spoken of by Alonzo C. Arnold in his deposition, and the model of which was sent to the patent office by Bishop in March, 1834; that one objection to adopting the diagonal machine was, that it would interfere with a patent machine then in operation at Catskill, but the right-angled machine did not interfere, and made a better article; that the claim of Bishop and Aiken is made for the benefit of the company, and whether the patent be taken out in the joint name of Bishop, Aiken, and Arnold, or of Arnold alone, the benefit of it is to be assigned and transferred to the company under certain covenants entered into by all of them to the company; and copies of these covenants are filed with the papers in this cause. He does not know who invented the machine built by Arnold in 1837, but it is the same mode which had been agitated by Bishop, and occasionally by Arnold, during their connection in business; that Aiken suggested alterations while the machine in 1837 was putting up, and after it was up, to make it go better; that he did the greater part of the work; cannot explain the alterations nor the difficulties to be overcome, but it did not operate at all. It seems to me that there is enough in this deposition to show that Mr. Arnold was not the sole inventor of the principle of crossing the wool diagonally, or the machine for reducing that principle to practice; and if not the sole inventor, he is not entitled to a patent.

There is no claim before me upon this appeal but that of Mr. Arnold. Bishop and Aiken have not appealed from the decision of the commissioner rejecting their joint claim. It appears by Lownsberry's deposition that the principle or mode of crossing the wool diagonally was suggested and contemplated by Bishop and McLean before Arnold was employed by them to reduce their ideas to practice. The machine did not constitute the whole invention. The next material part of the invention was the principle, i. e., the diagonal motion, which was to distinguish this machine from all other felting machines; and it is the vibratory and rotary motions which produce the diagonal crossing of the wool which Mr. Arnold claims as his invention, and for which he asks a patent. The man who reduces to practice the theory of another who assists in the reduction of it to practice cannot be considered as the sole inventor of the machine. Arnold would not have made the machine unless informed by Bishop of the discovery he had made of the effect of the diagonal crossing of the wool. The invention consisted both of the discovery of the principle and the reduction of it to practice. Neither Bishop nor Arnold, therefore, could be considered as sole inventor. It appears also by the deposition of Henry Lamb, taken by Mr. Arnold, that the machine when first put up "would not go;" that Aiken went up to remedy the defect, and that the witness afterwards saw it in operation in the fall of 1837 or spring of 1838; and that he never heard Arnold claim the patent right until within a year.

I see nothing in the deposition of Alonzo C. Arnold inconsistent with the facts stated by Mr. Lownsberry in his deposition; but if there were, Alonzo C. Arnold seems by his own showing to be interested by the promise of his father to give him a share in the patent if it should be obtained; for, although afterwards, in answer to the leading question, he said the agreement was abandoned, yet it is in evidence in the preceding part of his deposition that he thought it depended upon his generosity whether he should have an interest in the patent when obtained. If this interest, however, was not sufficiently certain to exclude his testimony, it cannot fail to have some effect upon his credibility. But he states that the machine was put in operation in 1837, and his father never spoke with him about getting the patent now applied for until the summer of 1840, and after his father had ceased to be a member of the Union Manufactory, which claims the benefit of the patent under the agreement before mentioned if it should be obtained by either or all of the claimants. It may be inferred from this that, so long as he remained a member of the company, he did not claim a sole right, or any right, to the invention. Another strong argument that he did not claim to be the inventor during those three years results from his suffering the machine to be set up and used during that period without taking any steps to procure a patent, when, by the terms of the acts of 1836 and 1839, the use of the machine, with his consent, for two years prior to his application is a bar to his claim. The fact, indeed, seems to be a bar to all other claims, and to put an end to this controversy; for if a patent should now be granted to any of them, and an action should be brought by the patentee for a violation of the patent right, it seems that the defendant might defend himself under the fifteenth section of the act of 1836 and the seventh section of the act of 1839, by showing that the machine had been in public use, with the consent of the patentee, for more than two years prior to the application for the patent.

It is suggested in the reasons of appeal that if the decision of the commissioner is sustained, there does not seem to be any possible mode of determining this question, and that it is only by granting the patent to Arnold that the rights of the individuals interested and of the public can be determined according to the intention of the acts of congress for the promotion of the useful arts. But upon comparing the sixteenth section of the act of 1836 with the eleventh section of the act of 1839 it will appear that "in all cases where patents are refused for any reason whatever, either by the commissioner of patents or by the chief justice of the District of Columbia, upon appeals from the decision of said commissioner, the applicant may have remedy by bill in equity; and the court having cognizance thereof, on notice to adverse parties, and other due proceedings had, may adjudge that such applicant is entitled, according to the principles and provisions of the act of 1836, to have and receive a patent for his invention, as specified in his claim; and such adjudication, if it be in favor of the right of such applicant, shall authorize the commissioner to issue such patent on his filing a copy of the adjudication and otherwise complying with the requisitions of that act." The reservation of a right to a further hearing on the part of Mr. Arnold's attorney was confined to the case of my admitting the evidence which he objected to; and as I have rejected that evidence, any further hearing is unnecessary.

Upon the whole, then, after rejecting the evidence, I am of opinion that Mr. Arnold has not supported his claim as sole inventor, and that if he had he has lost his right to a patent, for suffering the machine to be in use for more than two years before his application for a patent; and that, therefore, and upon both grounds, the decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting his claim ought to be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

Case No. 553.

ARNOLD v. BISHOP et al.

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 36; Cranch, Pat. Dec. 109.]
Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov., 1841.
PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS AND SOLE INVENTOR—APPEAL FROM COMMISSIONERS.

[1. Under Act 1836, § 6, an application for letters patent for an invention will be refused when it appears that the applicant is not the sole inventor, but one of three joint inventors.]

[2. By Act 1839, § 11, on an appeal from a commissioner's decision rejecting an application for a patent, the review must be confined to the points involved in the reasons of appeal, and, in the absence of error in such points, the decision must be affirmed, although the judge should be of opinion, upon the evidence and merits of the whole case, that the patents ought to have been granted; and, if the judge should reverse the decision of the commissioner upon those points, the patent must issue, although the judge should be of opinion, from the whole case, that the patent should not issue.]

[On appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

Statement of the case: Subsequent to the preceding decision of the honorable judge, [Arnold v. Bishop, Case No. 552,] he transmitted a second opinion to the office in the following words:

GRANCHI, Chief Judge. After I had sent my opinion in this case to the commissioner of patents, on the 30th day of October last, I was satisfied that I had misapprehended the attorney of Mr. Arnold in supposing that in case I should sustain his objections to the testimony and evidence on the part of the appellees he would not desire to be further heard. I therefore determined to hear his further argument on the 20th instant at my chambers, of which I gave notice to the attorneys of the parties, and they attended, viz., Doctor Jones on the part of the appellant and Mr. Morfit on the part of the appellees. Mr. Fitzgerald also attended on behalf of the patent office, to give any explanations, &c., which might be required. Doctor Jones then presented his further argument in writing, in which he contended that the claim of Mr. Arnold for a patent is not included in the covenant to the Union Manufacturing Company, of which Mr. Lownsberry is a member; and, therefore, that the interest of Mr. Lownsberry "cannot be the same whether the patent should be granted to Arnold or to the three applicants." I cannot, however, perceive how that consequence should follow. It is only by introducing the assignments and covenants by Mr. Arnold to the Union Manufacturing Company, and by showing that those covenants cover this claim, that Mr. Lownsberry is supposed to be interested. If those covenants do not cover this claim, then Mr. Lownsberry is not interested; and if they do, then, as all the applicants are bound by similar covenants, it is not material to him which prevails. The only question for me to decide is that which is suggested by the reasons of appeal, viz., whether Mr. Arnold was the sole inventor of the machine. To that question it is wholly immaterial whether it be an entirely new machine or an improvement upon an old one. Upon a careful review of the depositions of Alonzo C. Arnold, Mr. Waters, and Mr. Lamb, taken on the part of the appellant, and of that of Mr. Lownsberry on the part of the appellees, I am still of opinion that Mr. Arnold has not supported his claim as sole inventor.

But it is suggested that there is no law which authorizes the commissioner of patents to withhold the grant of a patent in the case in question; that is, where the applicant is not the sole inventor; that it is not one of the grounds, stated in the seventh section of the act of 1836, which would justify the commissioner in refusing the patent; and that the only one of these grounds which can be supposed to apply to this case is its appearing to the commissioner that the same thing had been invented or discovered by some other person prior to the alleged invention or discovery by the applicant. By the sixth section of the same act the applicant must be the inventor. One of three joint inventors cannot with propriety be called the inventor; and if he applies for the patent, the commissioner is bound to refuse it. This seems to be admitted in the reasons of appeal, where it is said that Arnold, who has sworn that he was the first and original inventor, cannot, without admitting that he has been guilty of perjury, acknowledge that Bishop and Aiken were joint inventors with him; and upon their own showing, a patent cannot be granted to Bishop and Aiken without the concurrence of Arnold. Here, then, is the authority of the commissioner to withhold a patent from an applicant who is not the sole inventor.

In my former opinion in this case I stated as one of the grounds for affirming the decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting the claim of Mr. Arnold, that he had lost his right, if he had any, by suffering the machine to be in use for more than two years before his application for a patent. I should have said "public use," which are the words of the statute. But, upon reflection, I doubt whether I can decide upon any other matter than that which arises upon the reasons of appeal. The words of the act of 1836, § 11, which confer the jurisdiction upon the judge, after allowing the applicant a right to appeal by giving notice thereof to the commissioner, filing his reasons of appeal, and paying into the office twenty-five dollars to the credit of the patent fund, are: "And it shall be the duty of the said chief justice, on petition, to hear and determine all such appeals, and to revise such decisions in a summary way on the evidence produced before the commissioner at such early and convenient time as he may appoint, first notifying the commissioner of the time and place of hearing; whose duty it shall be to give notice thereof to all parties who appear to be interested therein in such manner as said judge shall prescribe. The commissioner shall also lay before the judge all the original papers and evidence in the case, together with the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved in the reasons of appeal to which the revision shall be confined," i. e., the revision by the judge shall be confined to the points involved in the reasons of appeal; he is to hear and determine such appeals; but he is to revise the decision of the commissioner only in respect to the points involved in the reasons of appeal. If the commissioner did not err in those points, his decision upon those points must be affirmed, although the judge should be of opinion upon the evidence and the merits of the whole case that the patent ought to have been granted. So, if the judge should reverse the decision of the commissioner upon those points, it would seem that the patent must issue, although the judge should be of opinion that, upon the whole case, as it appears in evidence before him, the patent ought not to issue. I say that this would seem to be the effect of such a decision, because the effect of such a decision upon the further proceedings of the commissioner would depend upon the question whether the reasons of appeal thus affirmed by the judge involved the merits of the case. If they did not, the commissioner might well say it is true that I erred in those points, but my objections to the issuing of the patent still exist untouched by the decision of the judge.

The words of the act are, that the judge's decision "shall govern the further proceedings of the commissioner in such case." This must apply only to so much of the case as is involved in the reasons of appeal; and the appeal itself can be considered only as an appeal to so much of the decision of the commissioner as is affected by such reasons. If, therefore, after the judge shall have decided in favor of the applicant upon the points involved in his reasons of appeal, other sufficient reasons remain for refusing the claim for a patent, untouched by the decision of the judge, it would seem that the commissioner might properly still reject it. Whether such new rejection would be subject to appeal, is a question which may be left, as well as the effect of the judgment of the judge in regard to the subsequent proceedings of the commissioner, to future decisions, as cases may arise, requiring a decision upon these points. For these reasons I doubt very much whether it was competent for me to decide in this case that Mr. Arnold had lost his right to a patent by suffering the machine to be in public use for more than two years before his application for a patent. So much, therefore, of my former opinion in this case may be considered as extra-judicial and as withdrawn. This renders it unnecessary to answer the very ingenious argument of Mr. Arnold's attorney upon that point, which argument, however, has not in any degree diminished my confidence in the correctness of the opinion which I have thus withdrawn. This withdrawal does not in any manner affect the judgment which I certified on the 29th of October, 1841, inasmuch as I am still of opinion that Mr. Arnold has not supported his claim as sole inventor of the machine for which he claims a patent.

The judgment, therefore, rendered by me and certified on the 29th of October last must stand as my final decision in this case.

Case No. 554.

ARNOLD et al. v. BUFFUM.

[2 Mason, 208.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1820.

ESTATES—VESTED AND CONTINGENT REMAINDERS.

A devise to the testator's wife, until his son P. should attain the age of 21 years, and after P. should attain that age, that he should enter into possession, &c. &c. to him, his heirs and assigns, forever. But if the said P. should die before he attained the age of 21, or without lawful issue, then the premises to descend to the testator's heir male in fee simple. P. attained 21 years of age, but died without ever having had lawful issue. Held that P. took an immediate vested estate in fee simple, liable to be defeated by his death before 21, but having attained that age, it became an indefeasible estate.

[At law. Action of ejectment by Ahaz Arnold and another against Thomas Buffum.] The cause turned altogether upon the consideration of a clause in the will of Thomas Arnold, and was argued on the following statement of facts, agreed upon by the parties: "At the time of the making of Thomas Arnold's will, and also at the time of the testator's death, Peleg Arnold was under the age of twenty-one years, being the testator's youngest son. John Arnold was the second son of the testator, and was then over twenty-one years of age; and Thomas Arnold was the testator's eldest son. These three sons were by different wives. Peleg Arnold lived to be upwards of sixty years of age, and died in February, 1820, without ever having had lawful issue. The estate now in question, is that which was devised to Peleg. The plaintiffs claim under Thomas, and the defendant under Peleg. The said Thomas Arnold, the testator, made in his said will, the following bequests to his wife, and the said Peleg. 'I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Patience Arnold, the use and income of my homestead farm, whereon I now dwell, situate in said Smithfield, for the support and education of my young children, and in lieu of her right of dower, until my son, Peleg Arnold, attain the age of twenty one years.' After describing the land, he goes on to say, 'And after my said son Peleg, attain the age of twenty one years, my will is, that my said wife have the profits of the one half of the aforesaid land and real estate, with the appurtenances, during her natural life, provided she remain my widow, for the use and benefit of educating my children, and in lieu of her dower as aforesaid. And after my said son Peleg, attains the age of twenty-one, my will is, that he enter into possession of one moiety thereof. And at the death or marriage, if that should happen, of my said wife, my said son Peleg enter into the possession of the other half of the aforesaid lands and premises, with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging. And I do hereby devise and dispose of the whole of the reversion of all the aforesaid lands and real estate, unto my said son Peleg Arnold, together with one other tract of land, &c., (describing it) to be and remain to him, my said son, his heirs and assigns, forever. But if my said son Peleg, should die before he attain the age of twenty-one, or without lawful issue, then the aforesaid devised premises, with all the appurtenances, to descend to my male heir in fee simple.'

The testator left several daughters as well as the said three sons, for all of whom he provided in said will, and made his eldest son Thomas, (who was by the then laws of Rhode-Island, his heir at law) his residuary devisee of all his real estate undisposed of by his will."

¹ [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Tristram Burgess, for plaintiffs.

The devise in question, is to Peleg Arnold. It is of the homestead farm, and also of sixty acres at Woonsocket Hole, on the south-east end of Black Plain. The homestead is devised to Patience, the mother of Peleg, one moiety in freehold, the other for years to wit, during his minority. In none of the farm could Peleg have any interest, until the age of twenty-one, his interest in the one moiety being a contingent remainder supported by a freehold, and in the other, arising from an executory devise, to take effect on the determination of his minority. By the very form of the devise, therefore, it is evident that Peleg could in no event take any thing under it, in the homestead farm, according to the intention of the testator, unless he should live to the age of twenty-one years. When therefore, he uses the words, "But if my son Peleg should die before he attain the age of twenty-one," he does not use them to create a contingency in the estate of Peleg, for that contingency had already been created by giving the estate to Peleg's mother, until he should attain the age of twenty-one, and not giving it to him until he should have attained to that age. For giving Peleg the homestead farm, when he should arrive to the age of twenty-one, is giving it to him if he attain to that age, and is as much a contingent devise, as if the testator had said, I give my said son said estate, provided he attain to the age of twenty-one years. The words of the testator, therefore, "but if my son Peleg" &c. have no effect on Peleg's estate by the devise, and could not have been used for the purpose of having any, since if those words had been left out of the will, and Peleg had died before twenty-one, he could not have had the estate, for it was not given him until he arrived to that age; and was all actually given to his mother until that event should happen. But for another reason, the words, "but if" &c. could have no effect on Peleg's estate, for they create a contingency, which, if it happen, will divest an estate already vested, and so was the determination in the case of Barker v. Suretees, 2 Strange, 1175. So also in all the cases from Price v. Hunt, Poll. 645, down to Fairfield v. Morgan, 5 Bos. & P. 38. But by the devise to Peleg, he could not take the estate in question, until he attained the age of twenty-one, his arriving to that age, being a condition precedent to the vesting of the estate in him. The words, "but if," &c. therefore, could not create a contingency by the happening of which an estate should be divested, which could not possibly vest, until it ceased to be possible that this contingency should happen. For Peleg's estate could not vest until he arrived at the age of twenty-one, and the possibility of his dying before twenty-one, must be passed the moment he arrived to the vesting of his estate.

Now if the words, "but if," &c. have no effect on the estate of Peleg, then they cannot be considered as used with reference to it; and in considering the exact nature of it, these words may be expunged, and the will read thus, "If my son Peleg die without lawful issue, then," &c. The whole devise will then read thus, "And I do hereby give, devise, and dispose of the whole of the reversion (meaning one moiety of the estate aforesaid, when he should attain the age of twenty-one, and the other moiety at the death or marriage of his mother) of all the aforesaid lands and real estate, unto my son Peleg Arnold, together with one tract of land containing sixty acres, &c. to be, and remain unto my said son, his heirs and assigns, forever. But if my said son Peleg, should die without lawful issue, then the aforesaid devised premises, with all the appurtenances, to descend to my male heir in fee simple." According to this reading, Patience takes in the homestead farm, a freehold in a moiety thereof, and an estate for years in the other moiety, both conditional (if she remain the widow of the testator); she takes nothing in the sixty acre lot. Peleg takes after the interest of Patience in the home farm, and after twenty-one in that and the sixty acre lot, an estate subject to the condition of his arriving at the age of twenty-one. Thomas takes all the remainder, whatever it may be, in fee simple, not indeed by this clause in the will only, but by the residuary devise in the 5th clause of the will. Concerning the estate of Thomas, we need not inquire, for it is agreed that the defendant cannot hold, and that the plaintiffs must recover, unless Peleg took a fee simple in the premises. I think it has been demonstrated, that the condition annexed to the estate of Peleg, is contained in the very form of the devise, and is a condition precedent; and that the words, "but if," &c. have no effect at all on his estate. They were used by the testator solely with reference to the estate of Thomas in the premises, and for the purpose of determining on what event (to wit, the dying of Peleg before the age of twenty-one) the estate of Thomas should commence, or become unconditional, for it could not come into his possession until the estate of Patience determined. The estate of Peleg then being given to him and his heirs, when he should arrive at the age of twenty-one, must be a conditional fee, and whether a fee simple or a fee tail, must depend on the meaning of the word "heirs" in the devise.

If Peleg took a fee simple, there is an end of the plaintiff's case, if he took a fee tail, there is an end of the defendant's. What kind of estate then did he take? Had the testator stopt at the words "twenty-one years," and not added, "or without lawful issue," Peleg would doubtless have taken a fee simple. In using the words "or without lawful issue," the testator must have either meant, first, to convey another condition to the estate of Peleg; secondly, to limit the word "heirs," to heirs of his body; or thirdly, to create a contingency, on the happening of which (to wit, the dying of Peleg without issue) Thomas should take the estate. But if the testator had either of these intentions in using the words, "or without lawful issue," then is the case surely with the plaintiffs. For if he meant that the continuance of the estate of Peleg should depend on his having issue, in the same manner that the commencement of it should depend, on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, then forasmuch as he died without issue, the contingency or condition on which his estate was to determine, has happened, and so the defendant can take nothing by the deed of Peleg, and the estate passed to Thomas, by force of the devise. From him the plaintiffs derive their title. But if the testator meant by the words, "or without lawful issue," to limit the word heirs, to heirs of his body, then Peleg took a fee tail, but he did not convey as tenant in tail to the defendant, and so the defendant takes nothing by his deed. But because the estate tail created by the devise, determined by the death of Peleg without issue, the remainder being the fee simple, vested in Thomas, or his heirs, by force of the residuary clause of the will, and it passed to the plaintiffs from Thomas. But if the testator meant by the words, "or without lawful issue," to annex a contingency to the estate of Thomas, on the happening of which the fee simple should vest in him, then that contingency, viz. "the dying of Peleg without lawful issue," having happened, the estate has vested in Thomas, and through him in the plaintiffs: But it seems clear, that the testator had in view all these three meanings, when he used the words, "or without lawful issue." 1st. He meant the estate should not determine by the death of Peleg before he arrived at the age of twenty one, if he died leaving issue. 2d. He meant to limit the word heirs, to heirs of Peleg's body, and formed this condition in favour of Peleg's children, and not of his other brothers and sisters, or his heirs generally. 3d. He meant the estate of Thomas should not commence, unless Peleg died without issue, or upon the determination of Peleg's estate tail, upon failure of his issue. According to this construction, the devise is to Peleg, if he attain the age of twenty-one, and to his issue if he have any issue, at his demise, whether before or after he attain twenty-one. It cannot be supposed, that the testator, who would not give the estate to Peleg, unless he attained the age of twenty-one, would give it to his collateral heirs, whether he attained that age or not. But it is very reasonable to suppose, that he would give it to the children of Peleg, although he might die in his minority. The words, "or without lawful issue," are words of limitation, and confine the meaning of the word heirs, to heirs of the body of Peleg. This gives Peleg an estate tail, and so the case is with the plaintiffs. This construction is the only one consistent with all the authorities.

The first case in point, is Soullé v. Gerrard. Cro. Eliz. 525. In that case, Richard Baker being seized devised to his son Richard, and to his heirs forever; and if Richard died within the age of twenty-one years, or without issue, then the land should be equally divided amongst his three other sons. Richard, the devisee, had issue, Mary, and died within age. In this case it was adjudged, not that or was and, but that the words, "if he die within the age of twenty-one years," were void, and that the words, "or without issue," limited the meaning of the word "heirs," confining it to heirs of the body, and gave Richard an estate tail. Judge Anderson adjudged the words, "if he die within the age of twenty-one years," to be void in this case, and I think I have demonstrated that in the case in question, the words, "but if my son Peleg die before he attain the age of twenty-one," have no reference to the estate of Peleg. It is therefore clear, that the plaintiff's case comes completely within the principles of Soullé v. Gerrard, and that Peleg took an estate tail, with remainder over to Thomas in fee, on failure of issue of Peleg. The case of Dutton v. Engram, Cro. Jac. 427, is a similar case, and decided in the same way. Chadock v. Cowley, Id. 695, is almost in the same words, and governed by the same principles. Doe v. Rivers, 7 Term R. 276, is on the devise of W. Fifield, to his daughter Mary, on her attaining the age of twenty-one, and to her heirs forever; and in case said Mary "should die without issue," then, &c. Mary married and had issue, and the question was, what estate she took by the will of her father. It was adjudged, that she took a fee tail. In what does this case differ from the case in question? Peleg's estate was given to him when he should attain the age of twenty-one. They are both given to them and their heirs forever, and they are both to go over to the right heirs of the deviser, if the devisees die without lawful issue. If Mary took an estate tail, why does not Peleg take an estate tail? Indeed it is a principle of law, from which there has been no adjudged departure, that "although a devise to a man and his heirs, gives him an estate in fee simple; yet, if the word heirs, is qualified by any subsequent words, shewing the intention of the testator to restrain them to the heirs of the body of the devisee, the devise will in that case create only an estate tail."

In Fearne on Ex Devises, (page 180,) the rule is said to be the same, where the remainder is limited to the heirs of the testator himself, if such heirs must also be heirs to the first devisee. This is also true in the case in question. Thomas was heir to Peleg, and to the testator likewise. A number of decided cases illustrate and confirm this principle; and no case can be found, where an estate is devised to one and his heirs forever, with proviso, that if he die without issue or heirs, then a devise over to the heirs of devisor or devisee, in which, where that question has been made, it has not been decided that the first devisee took an estate tail. The case of Walsh v. Peterson, 3 Atk. 193, though it seems to be such a case, does not raise the question, whether the estate then devised was a fee simple or fee tail. The discussions on the technical meaning of the word or, in wills and deeds, are all in plaintiffs' favour. These discussions are, that or should be read and in certain cases. These are when the manifest intention of the party using the word, requires such reading. This intention is presumed in favour of the issue of the devisee. In the cases where the issue of the devisee would be disinherited by a contrary reading or, has been read and, but in no other cases. The reason constantly given for reading or, as if it were and, is, that otherwise the issue of the devisee might be disinherited. But if all such cases were decided to be tenancies in tail, as the leading case of Soullé v. Gerrard, [Lowell v. Garrett,] Moore, 422, has been, the issue could not be disinherited. Lord Hardwicke in Woodward v. Glasbrook, 2 Vern. 388, reads or as and, doubtless because the case was in form, and not by implication, a fee tail. The case of Glaswarke v. Claggett, [Goshawke v. Chiggel,] Cro. Car. 154, retains the grammatical meaning of or, because the interest of the issue did not require a different meaning. The case of Fairfield v. Morgan, 5 Bos. & P. 38, which Judge Kent declares, has "closed the controversy forever," was a question about leasehold estates, concerning which there could be no question of inheritance, either fee simple or fee tail. It appears clearly the intention of the testator to give the remainder to Thomas, after failure of the issue of Peleg, and the determination of the estate tail carved out for the benefit of him and his children. This is most agreeable to the principles of law. It is an essential rule of law to exclude executory devisees when the estate can pass as a remainder. [Hawley v. Inhabitants of Northampton,] 8 Mass. 38. In the case of Soullé v. Gerrard, Lord Chief Justice Anderson decided that the devising a fee upon a fee, by way of executory devise, was a vain will, and the words, "if said Richard die before twenty-one years of age," utterly void, so that the limitation over was a remainder in fee simple after the determination of Richard's estate in fee tail. The intention of the testator must govern in the construction of wills, and nothing can be more clear, than that Thomas, the testator, did not intend to give a fee simple to any of his children or devisees, except to Thomas his eldest son and heir at law. It is true in the devise to John, he uses words peculiar to the creation of a fee tail, so does he in his devise to Asa. From this it may be inferred, that he knew what words created a fee tail. He knew also what words would create a fee simple; and had he intended such an estate for Peleg, why did he use words, which have so often been adjudged to limit the word heirs, and create a fee tail? Lord Hardwicke says, there is no magic in words, and if he conveys his meaning, the testator has a right to use such words as he may choose. He may use the same words for different purposes, and different words for the same purpose. It may not be strictly logical to do so; but by the laws of the land, a man does not lose the right to dispose of his estate according to his choice, because he is a bad logician. The case of Brownsword v. Edwards, 2 Ves. Sr. 243, is strong on this point, and did I not consider the case conclusively with the plaintiffs under the other views of it, I would go into a consideration of that case.

Searle, for the tenant, argued the case shortly, on the ground that the case was completely settled by authority; and cited the following cases.

Price v. Hunt, Poll. 645; Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; Barker v. Suretees, 2 Strange, 1175; Framlingham v. Brand, 3 Atk. 390, 1 Wils. 140; 1 Rolle, Abr. 833; Fairfield v. Morgan, 5 Bos. & P. 38; Denn v. Kemeys, 9 East, 366; Right v. Day, 16 East, 67; Eastman v. Baker. 1 Taunt. 174; 6 Cruise, Dig. 440, 450; Doe v. Webber, 1 Barn. & Ald. 713; Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term R. 143; Roe v. Jefferey, 7 Term R. 589; Holmes v. Holmes, 5 Bin. 252; Jackson v. Blanshan, 6 Johns. 54; Ray v. Enslin, 2 Mass. 554; Lippett v. Hopkins, [Case No. 8,380.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The question for the consideration of the court is, what estate Peleg took under the will. If he took a fee simple, which became absolute upon his attaining twenty-one years of age, then the tenant is entitled to judgment. If he took a fee tail, or a fee simple determinable upon his dying without issue, notwithstanding his arrival at twenty-one years of age, (and in this latter view the question, whether the executory devise over be not too remote, becomes immaterial because it is a devise to the heir at law) then the demandant is entitled to recover.

The counsel for the demandant contends, 1st. That Peleg took a contingent remainder in the estate devised to him, depending as to one moiety, upon his arrival at age, and as to the other moiety, upon the death or marriage of the testator's wife. 2d. That Peleg took an estate tail only by the devise. If these grounds fail, there is an end of the controversy.

As to the first point, it seems to me impossible to read the terms of this will, and not come to the conclusion, that upon principles of law, the estate devised to Peleg, was a vested estate in remainder, to take effect in possession upon the regular determination of the preceding estate, as to one moiety upon his attaining 21 years of age, and as to the other moiety upon the death or marriage of the testator's wife. The case differs not at all in principle, from a devise to A. for 21 years, and afterwards to B. or to A. during widowhood, and afterwards to B.; in which cases it is clear, that the estate to B. would be vested in interest and not be contingent. To constitute a vested estate, it is not necessary that it vest in possession; it is sufficient if it vest in interest, that is, that there be a present fixed right of future enjoyment, and there be no condition precedent to its vesting in possession, if the prior estate were immediately determined by its natural limitation. On the other hand, a contingent remainder always supposes, that the remainder is limited to depend on an event or condition which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed, till after the determination of the preceding estate. Fearne, Con. Rem. (Butler's Ed.) 3. In the case at bar, there was no such uncertainty as to the event on which the remainder depended; the arrival at age and the death or marriage of the testator's wife, created no condition without which the estate could not vest, but only denoted the time when the remainder was to vest in possession. Fearne, Rem. (Butler's Ed.) 242.

The authorities, too, on this head, are decisive of the question. One of the earliest is Boraston's Case, 3 Coke, 19. There was a devise of land to A. and B. for eight years, and after the said term to remain to the testator's executors till such time as H. should accomplish his full age of twenty-one years; and when the said H. should come to his full age of twenty-one years, then the testator willed that H. should enjoy the lands, to him and his heirs forever. H. died under twenty-one years, and it was contended, that the remainder did not vest in H. because he did not live to attain twenty-one years of age, for that as he was not to have it until twenty-one, it was contingent on that event, it being uncertain, whether he could ever attain that age. But it was held, that the case was nothing in effect but a devise to the executors till H. attained twenty-one years of age, remainder to H. in fee; that the adverbs of time, when, &c. and then, &c. do not make any thing necessary to precede the settling of the remainder, any more than in the common case of a lease for life or years, and after the death of the lessee or the expiration of the term, the remainder to another, in which cases the remainder vests presently; that when these adverbs refer to a thing, which must of necessity happen, there they make no contingency; and it is certain, that every man must die, and every term end, and that H. would or might accomplish his age of twenty-one years, which are all one in construction of law; and that these adverbs expressed the time when the remainder to H. should take effect in possession, and not when the remainder should vest.

Another case is Manfield v. Dugard, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 195, pl. 4, where the devise was to the testator's wife for life, till his son should attain to his age of 21 years, and when his son should attain to this age, then to his son and his heirs; the son lived to the age of thirteen years, and then died; and it was held, by Lord Harcourt, that the remainder vested presently in the son upon the testator's death, and was not to expect till the contingency of his attaining his age of twenty-one years should happen. These, as Lord Chief Justice Willes declared, are two very great authorities, and both of them in point; and upon these authorities, in a case where the devise was to W. U. and A. his wife, to hold to them for so long a time, and until B. C. and D. sons of W. U. and his wife, should come to and attain their several and respective age of twenty-one years, then to the said B. C. and D. and to their heirs and assigns equally to be divided between them as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, and to take and hold their respective shares of and in the same, as they shall severally arrive at their said ages of twenty-one years, and not before, unless W. U. and his wife should, before that time, depart this life, and that then immediately on the death of the survivor of them, W. U. and his wife, to the said B. C. and D. their heirs and assigns, in manner as aforesaid; the same learned judge, and his brethren of the common pleas held, that the estate devised to B. C. and D. in case they had survived the testator, would immediately have vested in them, and have descended to their heirs, although they had never attained the age of twenty-one years. Doe v. Underdown, Willes, 293. There are many other cases to the same effect. I will mention a few of the later cases, and merely refer in general terms to the others. In Doe v. Lea, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 41, where the devise was to trustees and their heirs, until M. L. should attain the age of twenty-four, and unto M. L. when and so soon as he should attain his age of twenty-four years; and M. L. died after twenty-one but before twenty-four, it was solemnly held by the court of king's bench, that M. L. took a vested interest in the estate descendible to his heir at law. In Bromfield v. Crowder, 4 Bos. & P. 313, there was a devise (after two life estates) in remainder, to J. D. Bromfield, if he should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, but in case he should die before he attained that age, and his brother C. B. should survive him, in that case to C. B. if he attained the age of twenty-one years, &c.; and it was resolved, that J. D. B. took a vested estate determinable upon the contingency of his dying under twenty-one years. Then came the case of Doe v. Moore, 14 East, 601, where there was an immediate devise to J. M. when he attained the age of 21 years, to hold to him and his heirs forever; but in case he should die before he attained the age of 21 years, then to his brother, &c.; and it was adjudged, that J. M. took an immediate vested interest, liable to be divested upon his dying under 21 years of age. A still later case is Doe v. Nowell, 1 Maule & S. 327, where the devise was to J. R. for life, and on his decease to and among his children lawfully begotten, equally at the age of 21 years, and their heirs as tenants in common; but if only one child should live to attain such age, to him or her, and his or her heirs, at his or her age of 21; and in case J. R. should die without lawful issue, or such lawful issue should die before 21, then a devise over; and it was resolved, that the children of J. R. took vested remainders. I forbear to quote other cases, although the books abound with them on the same point. Fearne, Rem. 242, 401, 547; [Pills v. Brown,] Palmer, 132, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. p. 188, pl. 8; Goodtitle v. Whitby, 1 Burrows, 228; Doe v. Lea, 3 Durn & E. [3 Term R.] 41; Doe v. Cundall, 9 East, 400; Stanley v. Stanley, 16 Ves. 491; Chambers v. Brailsford, 18 Ves. 368; Perrin v. Lyon, 9 East, 170; Edwards v. Symons, 6 Taunt. 213; Goodright v. Parker, 1 Maule & S. 692; Denn v. Satterthwaite, 1 W. Bl. 519; Fairfield v. Morgan, 5 Bos. & P. 38. They present a mass of authority, against which it is difficult to offer any reasoning, which would not go to unsettle the most solid foundations of the law.

We may then pass to the second point made by the demandant. And I am clearly of opinion, as well upon principle as authority, that the estate devised to Peleg, was a fee simple, and not a fee tail. Consider the terms of the will; the devise is to Peleg, after his arrival at age, "to be and remain to him, his heirs and assigns, forever." These are the very terms in which a fee simple is technically expressed. To narrow the fee simple thus expressly given to a fee tail, it ought to be apparent from the context, that such was the testator's intention. Let us see, therefore, if any such intention can fairly be inferred from the subsequent clause. It is in these words. "But if my said son Peleg, should die before he attain the age of 21, or without lawful issue, then the aforesaid devised premises, &c. to descend to my male heir in fee simple." Now, in order to maintain the demandant's case his counsel is driven to contend, that "or," is to be construed in the disjunctive, so that the devise over may take effect upon the happening of either of the events stated; or that the words, "before he attain the age of 21," are superfluous and inoperative, and are therefore to be struck from the will.

In respect to the first position, the necessary result of the construction contended for, would be, that if Peleg had died under age, leaving lawful issue, the devise over would have taken effect to the exclusion of such issue, against the apparent intention of the testator. It is upon this principle, that in a long line of cases upon analogous devises, it has been decided, that "or," ought to be construed "and." Several of these cases are referred to in Lippett v. Hopkins, [Case No. 8,380,] and I will barely cite as auxiliary, the very recent case of Right v. Day, 16 East, 67, in which the doctrine is acknowledged and confirmed, if indeed, a doctrine can be said to require confirmation, which has been acted upon ever since the decision in Soule v. Gerrard, [Sowell v. Garret,] in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Moore, 422, 2 Rolle, 282.

As to the other, which is the favorite position assumed in the argument, it seems equally unsupportable. It is the duty of courts of justice, to give the natural construction to the words of a will, unless some manifest incongruity or repugnancy would arise; and where the words are sensible in the place they occur, and import a condition or contingency, to strike them out, or render them inoperative, would be to create and not to construe a will. Construing, then, the words as we find them in the clause now under consideration, there is no reason to restrain the estate of Peleg, to an estate tail. If that had been the intention of the testator, there is no reason, why he should have inserted the contingency of Peleg's arrival at age, in the devise, since it could have no operation upon the estate devised to him. But if he intended a fee simple, as his previous words import, then the contingency was necessary to be expressed, as otherwise, the estate would rest absolutely in Peleg, although he should die under age, and without issue. The rule of law is indeed very well settled, that a devise to A. and his heirs, and upon an indefinite failure of his issue, a devise over to another person, shall be construed an estate tail only in A.; and the reason of the rule is, that otherwise the remainder over would be void, as the contingency would be too remote. And the like rule prevails, if the devise over be on failure of heirs, to a person who could be an heir of the first devisee, for heirs in the second devise here, must be construed merely as issue, since the first devisee could never die without heirs, while the second devisee or his heirs were in existence. But the like construction would not prevail, if the second devisee were a stranger, for no such repugnancy would exist, and then the natural meaning of the word heirs, would prevail, although thereby the devise over would be too remote, and consequently be void. See the cases cited in Lippett v. Hopkins, [Case No. 8,380;] Doe v. Bluck, 6 Taunt. 485, 2 Marsh. 170; Lillibridge v. Adie, [Case No. 8,350;] and cases there cited.

The reasoning, on which these rules proceed, does not apply to a case where the devise over is not on an indefinite failure of issue, but on a failure of issue within a limited period. In such a case, the devise over would not be too remote, construing the first devise to be a fee simple. Nor would there be any incongruity in the second devisee's being heir of the first, for the event on which the estate is to go over, is not an indefinite failure of heirs generally, but of issue, within the limited period. There being, then, no obvious inconvenience or incongruity from construing the words of a will of this kind, according to their natural sense, courts of law are not at liberty to abandon that construction. And, accordingly, the rule has become inflexibly incorporated into the law, that in such cases, the first devise shall be construed a fee simple, upon the plain ground of effectuating the intention of the testator, apparent upon the face of the will. Hence, whenever the devise is to A. and his heirs, and if he die under age without issue, then over, the devise to A. is uniformly held to be a fee simple, and upon his arrival at age, it becomes absolute, and descendible to his heirs at law, though he should afterwards die without issue. The cases in the books upon this subject, are so numerous, that the danger is of being overwhelmed in examining them. Pells v. Brown, in the reign of King James the first, is the leading case, and it has never since been shaken. Cro. Jac. 590, and cases cited; Lippett v. Hopkins, [supra,] and cited in this case, [ante, p. 1173.] I will barely cite a few cases, which are directly in point to the case now at bar, leaving a more minute examination to those, who have the ingenuity to doubt, or the courage to compare them. [Price v. Hunt,] Poll. 645; Barker v. Suretees, 2 Strange, 1175; Frammingham v. Brand, 1 Wils. 140, 3 Atk. 390; Collenson v. Wright, 1 Sid. 148; Fairfield v. Morgan, 5 Bos. & P. 38; Denn v. Kemeys, 9 East, 366; Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term R. 143; Roe v. Jeffrey, 7 Term R. 580; Right v. Day, 16 East, 67; Doe v. Webber, 1 Barn. & Ald. 713; Doe v. Wetton, 2 Bos. & P. 324. The first is reported in 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. p. 188, pl. 8. One devised lands to his wife, till his son came to the age of 21 years, and then that his son should have the lands to him and his heirs, and if he died without issue before his said age, then to his daughter and her heirs; and it was held to be a good executory devise to the daughter, if the contingency happened; and in the mean time, the fee descended to the son as heir; and if he lived to 21, though he afterwards died without issue, or if he should leave issue, though he died before 21, yet the daughter was not to have the lands, because he was to die without issue, and before 21, to entitle her. In Eastman v. Baker, 1 Taunt. 174, the devise was to J. B. and her heirs forever, but in case the said J. B. should fortune to die, and not attain the full age of 21 years, or having no such issue as aforesaid, then over to her mother. J. B. died before her mother without issue, but having attained 21 years of age; and it was held, that J. B. took an estate in fee simple, which became absolute upon her attaining full age, and that the executory devise over was contingent upon the event of the daughter's dying in the life of the mother, without attaining 21 years of age, and without having issue. In Fairfield v. Morgan, 5 Bos. & P. 38, the devise was in effect to B. the testator's brother in fee, but in case B. should die before he attained the age of 21 years, or without issue living at his death, then to the testator's mother. B. attained 21, but died without issue, and the house of lords, in conformity with the opinion of all the judges, held that B. took a fee simple, which became absolute on his arrival at 21 years of age, and that the mother took nothing upon the death of B. by the executory devise. The very late case of Doe v. Rawding, 2 Barn. & Ald. 441, is to the same effect. There the devise was as to one moiety, to testator's wife for life, and subject to that all his estate to his daughter M. and her heirs forever, but in case his daughter M. should die under the age of 21 years, unmarried and without lawful issue, then and in such case, the entirety of his estate, &c., to his wife in fee. The daughter died under 21, without lawful issue, but was married. And it was held, that the daughter took an estate in fee simple, which became absolute by the event of her marriage; and that the devise over did not take effect. These are decisions in the English courts, sufficient in point of authority and reasoning, to satisfy the most scrupulous juridical mind. But, I trust, it will not be deemed unfit to add a few from the American Reports, entitled to very great weight from the learning and dignity and ability of the judges. In Jackson v. Blanshan, 6 Johns. 54, the devise was of all the testator's estate to his six children by name, and to their heirs forever, to be equally divided among them all, share and share alike; but if any of the children should die before they arrived at full age, or without lawful issue, then his share to devolve upon and be equally divided among the rest of the surviving children, and to their heirs and assigns forever. All the testator's children survived him and attained full age. Four of them afterwards died, leaving issue, and a fifth, after arrival at full age, died without having had lawful issue. The learned judges of the supreme court of New York, held, that "or" was to be construed "and," and that as all the children survived 21, they took an absolute estate in fee simple, and consequently that the devise over never took effect. Holmes v. Holmes, 5 Bin. 252, in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, is to the same purpose. There the devise to the testator's grandson H. to hold to him and his heirs and assigns forever, to be entered upon and taken possession of by him, as soon as he arrived at the age of 21 years, or the day of his marriage, which should first happen; but that if H. should die under age, or without issue, that his estate should descend to his next brother and his heirs; but if he left no brother, then to his sisters and their heirs, share and share alike. H. entered into possession, and died seized, of full age, but unmarried, and without issue; and it was held, that H. took an estate in fee simple, with a good executory devise over in case he died under age, and without issue; but that on attaining his full age of 21, his estate became indefeasible, and on his death descended to his heirs. A similar doctrine was recognized by the supreme court of Massachusetts, in Ray v. Enslin, 2 Mass. 554, Supp., where the devise was to the testator's daughter and her heirs forever, but in case the daughter should happen to die before she come of age, or have lawful heir of her body begotten, then after his wife's decease, to his sister one third, and two thirds to his wife, so to be divided unto them or their heirs forever. The daughter survived the testator, and afterwards married and died, leaving lawful issue. And it was held, that she took a fee simple, defeasible upon a contingency seasonably determinable, and that her estate became indefeasible in the events that happened. I do not know, that any American decisions have ever been made, that bring the principle of these into question. I take them to be settled law, and have not scrupled to follow them on a former occasion, Lippett v. Hopkins, [Case No. 3,350,] and do not now hesitate to adopt them.

One word, as to some of the cases cited by the counsel for the demandant, which have been supposed to intimate a different doctrine. As to Soullé v. Gerrard, Cro. Eliz. 525, it is sufficient to say, that the case was rightly decided, but the doctrine held by the court, (strange enough in several respects) is not law, and is against the current of authority. Dutton v. Engram, Cro. Jac. 427, is good law, but inapplicable, for it turned on the contingency being an indefinite failure of issue, and therefore fell within the rule already stated. Chadock v. Cowley, Cro. Jac. 695, admits of the same answer, for it was held not to be a contingent limitation to the survivor, on either's dying without issue in the life time of the other. Fearne, Rem. (Butler's Ed.) 243. The only remaining case, is Doe v. Rivers, 7 Term R. 276, where the devise was in effect to the testator's daughter on her attaining 21, and to her heirs, and in case his daughter should die without issue, then he empowered her to dispose of the whole by will, &c. as she should limit and appoint, and for want or such issue, that the same should descend and go to his own right heirs. And it was held, that the daughter took but an estate tail. The case turned altogether upon the intent of the will, and the devise over being upon an indefinite failure of issue. It was deemed so plain, that it was given up by the defendant's counsel, and involved no question as to the estate, being devised over upon the dying of the daughter under age.

Upon the whole, unless I were prepared to overturn a series of the best considered judgments, (which I have not the rashness to attempt) it is most clear, that upon the principles of law, Peleg took an indefeasible estate in fee simple, upon his attaining 21 years of age, and therefore that the judgment in this case ought to be for the tenant. Let it be so entered accordingly.

Case No. 555.

ARNOLD v. CLIFFORD.

[2 Sumn. 233.]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1835.

CONTRACTS TO INDEMNIFY FOR PUBLICATION OF LIBEL.—VALIDITY—PUBLIC POLICY.

1. A promise to indemnify another for doing a private wrong, or committing a public crime, is against public policy, and is void in law. Therefore, a promise to indemnify the publisher of a libel is void.

2. The liberty of the press does not sanction the publication of libels.

[Cited in The Hudson, 15 Fed. 167.]

At law. This was an action on the case [by Isaac Arnold against Benjamin Clifford] for a libel, by publishing, in April, 1835, in the Providence Republican Herald, a false and injurious account of the trial of a cause, in which the plaintiff was a party. There was a special plea in justification, and issue thereon.

At the trial, the principal question was, whether the publication contained a true, fair, and accurate account of the trial of the former cause; and it was argued by Tillinghast and Webster for the plaintiff, and by Richard W. Greene and Whipple, for the defendant. In the course of the trial, the question arose, whether, supposing the publication to be a libel, a promise, by the defendant, to indemnify the publisher, was valid in point of law.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Charles Sumner]

STORY, Circuit Justice. I have not the least doubt upon this point. A promise to indemnify another for doing a private wrong, or for committing a public crime, is against public policy, and is void in law. It is common learning, that among tort-feasors, who are knowingly such, there can be no contribution for damages recovered against any one of them, even although there be a promise of indemnity or contribution. A fortiori, the same doctrine applies to cases of indemnity for the commission of a public crime. No one ever imagined, that a promise to pay for the poisoning of another, was capable of being enforced in a court of justice. It is universally treated as illegal, it being against the first principles of justice, and morals, and religion. The man, who is hired to publish a libel against another, is guilty of an offence equally reprehensible in morals, though not so aggravated in its character; for the publication may not only be ruinous to the reputation of the individual aspersed; but may involve an innocent family in agonizing distress, and, perhaps, destroy its peace forever. There is no such right recognized in civil society, or at least in our forms of government, as the right of slandering or calumniating another. The liberty of the press does not include the right to publish libels. Much less does it include the right to be indemnified against the just legal consequences of such publications. See the case of Colburn v. Patmore, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 73, 4 Tyrw. 677; Pearson v. Skelton, 1 Mees. & W. 504.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Case No. 556.

ARNOLD v. DELCOL.

[Bee, 5.]¹

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1794.²

SHIPPING—PUBLIC REGULATIONS—REGISTRY—FOREIGN FLAG—FOREIGN CLEARANCES—PRIZE.

1. An American vessel does not forfeit her neutral character merely by hoisting a foreign flag in conformity to the regulations of a particular trade.

2. Spanish clearances found on board an American ship are not proofs of double papers, if no other marks of fraud appear.

[3. Cited in The Jane Campbell, Case No. 7,205, to the point that the burden is always on the captain to prove the necessity for the spoliation of property found on a prize, or the separation of the officers or crew from the vessel.]

[In admiralty. Libel by one Arnold against Delcol and others, the owners of the French privateer La Montague, and of the ship Industry, for the capture of the American brig Grand Sachem, commanded by Ebenezer Baldwin, and owned by Arnold. Decree for libellant. Affirmed by the circuit court, but not reported; also affirmed by the supreme court in Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 333.]

¹ [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

² [Affirmed by the circuit court, (not reported); and also affirmed by the supreme court in Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 333.]

A short statement of this case [Del Col. v. Arnold] may be seen in 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 333.

A plea to the jurisdiction of the district court had been over-ruled, and after argument upon the merits, a decree was pronounced in favour of Arnold for the sum of 33,000 dollars and upwards.

Upon appeal from this decision to the circuit court, BEE, District Judge, assigned the following grounds of his opinion in the district court: 1st. Because it appeared in evidence that the Grand Sachem had a regular register and sea-letter, to shew that she was an American vessel, and to entitle her to all the privileges of one. 2d. That the property in Arnold, an American citizen, was fully proved. 3d. That by the 25th article of the treaty with France, the production of sea-letters was sufficient in itself to prevent any just detention of the vessel. 4th. That the witnesses, who maintained that the trade to New-Orleans could only be carried on in Spanish bottoms, speak of a time prior to the period when Arnold's vessel was there, and prior also to the edict of 1793, by which that trade was opened. 5th. That there was much contrariety of evidence as to the legality of trade with New-Orleans, which, though prohibited generally in other than Spanish ships, was sometimes carried on, by express permission, in foreign bottoms. It was proved by one of the witnesses, that two American vessels laden with provisions had arrived at New-Orleans under such permission, notwithstanding which they could not proceed up the river till they had procured Spanish colours. That a compliance with this indispensable requisite was not sufficient to divest the Grand Sachem of her American character and privileges. 6th. That there was no pretence of double papers, or of any fraud or collusion supported by legal proof. That the only Spanish papers were a receipt in that language by the captain, produced to shew that the property on board belonged to Cox and Clark; (but the captain swears he signed it from ignorance of the Spanish language alone, as he knew that the whole belonged to Arnold,) and some Spanish clearances, without which the brig could not have departed from a Spanish port. Clark, too, swears positively that the property was in Arnold, and that he himself was only an agent.

The decree of the district court, founded upon these and other reasons, was confirmed in the circuit court, and that decision was finally supported in the supreme court. See Dallas's Reports [Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 333 as above cited.

[NOTE. Affirmed by the supreme court, upon other grounds, in Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 333.]

Case No. 557.

ARNOLD v. DEXTER.

[4 Mason, 122.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1825.

LIMITATIONS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—NOTE AS GOOD AS MONEY.

If a party says, on his promissory note's being produced to him, that it is as good as money, this is sufficient evidence of a new promise to take the case out of the statute of limitations.

[See Cowan v. Magauran, Case No. 3,292; In re Reed, Id. 11,635; Penaro v. Flournoy, Id. 10,916; Otterback v. Brown, 2 MacArthur, 541; City of Ft. Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 150, 5 Sup. Ct. 56. For cases in which particular acknowledgments were held insufficient, see Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch, (12 U. S.) 72; Thompson v. Peter, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 565; Moore v. Bank of Columbia, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 86.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Samuel G. Arnold against Edward Dexter] on a note dated 16th February, 1815, for $600.80, payable to plaintiff or order. Plea, general issue and statute of limitations, and issue thereon. The suit was commenced on the 12th of May, 1824. At the trial the execution of the note was admitted. It was farther proved, that on the 14th of May, 1818, the plaintiff sent an agent to the defendant with the note, with directions to enter an indorsement on it for a sum, which the defendant claimed to be due to him from the plaintiff in some other right. The defendant, on that occasion, declined to have the indorsement made on the note, but it was made, and the defendant said that his note was as good as money.

William A. Burgess, for plaintiff, contended that this was sufficient evidence of a new promise within six years.

Mr. Searle, for defendant, argued e contra.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I think the evidence sufficient to establish a new promise, and to take the case out of the statute of limitations. The defendant did not deny the validity of the note, but, on the contrary, admitted it to be as good as money. How could this be, unless he meant that the money was still due on it, and he was responsible to pay it? I will leave the facts, however, to be passed upon by the jury.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

ARNOLD, (DEXTER v.) See Case No. 3,855, etc.

¹[Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Case No. 558.

ARNOLD et al. v. FROST et al.

[9 Ben. 267.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1877.

BOND ON APPEAL.

1. On an appeal to the circuit court from a final decree in a suit in equity in this court, the defendant F. executed a bond, with three sureties, to three obligees, who were the plaintiffs in said suit, conditioned "that if the above-named appellant shall prosecute said appeal with effect, and pay all damages and costs which shall be awarded against him as such appellant therein, if he shall fail to make said appeal good," the bond should be void. After the affirmance of the decree by the circuit court, two of the three obligees brought a suit on it in this court against the obligors, to recover on it: Held, that this court had jurisdiction of the suit.

2. That the plaintiffs could sue jointly on the bond.

3. That, where the terms of a bond on appeal comply with the provisions of section 1,000, Rev. St., in regard to a supersedeas and stay of execution, the bond operates as a supersedeas and stay of execution, without any order to that effect.

In a suit in equity in this court, [by Olney Arnold and Alfred H. Littlefield against Jonathan F. Frost and others,] the defendant Frost, after a final decree, took an appeal to the circuit court. On such appeal he executed a bond, with three sureties, to three obligees, who were the plaintiffs in said suit, conditioned "that if the above-named appellants shall prosecute said appeal with effect, and pay all damages and costs which shall be awarded against him as such appellant therein, if he shall fail to make said appeal good," the bond should be void. A citation on the appeal was then issued. The circuit court affirmed the decree, with costs to the appellees. Two of the three obligees in the bond brought a suit on it, in this court, against the principal and the sureties, to recover on it. Among the defences set up were these—that this court had no jurisdiction of the suit, and that the interests of the plaintiffs were not joint but several, and they could not bring the suit jointly.

Francis N. Bangs, for plaintiffs.

Elliott F. Shepard, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This court has jurisdiction of this suit. It is not an original suit, but is an offshoot or out-branch of the suit in which the bond was given, and jurisdiction of that suit gives jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this suit, the defendants having been duly served with process in this suit. Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 327; Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 69; Bobyshall v. Oppenheimer, [Case No. 1,592;] Hatch v. Dorr, [Id. 6,206;] Gwin v. Breedlove, 2 How. [43

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

U. S.] 29; Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 1.

Arnold and Littlefield had a sufficient joint interest with each other and with the Savings Bank, under the transactions litigated in the original suit, to bring that suit in their joint names, and the defendants gave their bond to the three parties jointly. This is sufficient warrant for the only two of those three parties who now claim any interest in the bond, to bring suit on it in their joint names.

Under section 1000, of the Revised Statutes, the security to be taken on signing a citation on an appeal is good and sufficient security that the appellant shall prosecute his appeal to effect, and, if he fail to make his plea good, shall "answer all damages and costs," where the appeal "is a supersedeas and stays execution, or all costs only, where it is not a supersedeas as aforesaid." Section 1000 is applicable to the present case. (See sections 1012 and 4981 and General Order No. 26, in bankruptcy.) It is contended, for the defendants, that a bond on appeal is not a bond for any part of the decree below, unless it operates as a supersedeas and stay of execution and as an agreement to pay the decree; that the bond in this case did not so operate; and that, for the bond to operate as a supersedeas, there must be an order to that effect.

It is well settled, that an appeal becomes a supersedeas and stays execution in the court which rendered the decree, not by virtue of any order to that effect, but by virtue of a compliance with the conditions prescribed by the statute. When those conditions are complied with, the statute operates to suspend the jurisdiction of the court below, and to stay execution in the case, pending the appeal. The Slaughterhouse Cases, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 289, 291; Kitchen v. Randolph, 93 U. S. 88; Goddard v. Ordway, 94 U. S. 673. The terms of the condition of the bond in this case made the bond operate as a supersedeas and stay of execution, without any order to that effect; and the obligors in the bond are liable to the extent of the penalty of the bond, the decree having been affirmed on appeal, for all damages and costs which have been awarded against Frost, as appellant.

Case No. 559.

ARNOLD v. JONES.

[Bee, 104.]¹

District Court, D. South Carolina. July 14, 1798.

NEW TRIAL—APPLICATION—STAY OF EXECUTION—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

Motion for a new trial does not suspend the entering of judgment after one verdict; but execution will be stayed on application to the court.

¹[Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

BEE, District Judge. Notice has been given in writing to the attorney of the plaintiff, that a motion for a new trial will be made in the circuit court in October next, or sooner if possible; and reasons are assigned in the said notice agreeably to the 30th rule of court as established in May term 1797. The question for my determination is whether by any law of the United States the defendant may stay judgment till the next circuit court; or whether the 18th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 83] is to be strictly followed. It is not contended that the right of new trial is taken away, though modified by the latter. This 18th section has, indeed, entirely altered the system pursued in the state courts, and derived from those of Great Britain; and the same is done by other parts of the judiciary act; which also gives a general power to the courts of the United States to make rules for the government of their own proceedings. In doing this, great care has been taken to avoid what might be repugnant to the laws of the United States; and the act of March 1793, entitled "an act in addition to the judiciary act," [1 Stat. 333,] expressly provides, that all such rules and orders as may at any time be made shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and to prevent delay, &c. The judiciary act also holds out the doctrine of appeals from the inferior courts in almost every instance, and has materially changed the common law in this respect. The system provides that, in cases of writs of error, and motions for new trial, execution may be stayed, on certain conditions; and motions for new trial are allowed by it after judgment contrary to the practice at common law.

Writs of error, if lodged within a prescribed time, operate as a supersedeas to execution; and so far the interests of one of the parties is consulted. On the other hand, this writ cannot be had till security is given to answer damages. Motions for new trial may also be granted even after judgment; but such judgment shall be signed and stand as security in the first instance; after which, on petition, and certificate of the judge, that he allows the same, execution shall be stayed to the next circuit court. If these cautions were disregarded, the consequence would be a delay of justice almost equal to a denial of it. Motions for new trial might succeed each other to the ruin of the plaintiff, and in spite of two or three verdicts in his favour; and the 18th clause of the judiciary act would be rendered nugatory. It is true, that at common law, a third trial has sometimes been granted, but only under peculiar circumstances. Besides which it must be recollected that the verdict of a jury cannot otherwise, by that system, be reconsidered. Whereas, after new trial in the courts of the United States, the dissatisfied party may still appeal to the supreme court, if the matter in dispute exceed the value of 2000 dollars.

Upon the whole, I think the law intended that judgment should be signed previously to the motion for a new trial.

ARNOLD, (LYMAN v.) See Case No. 8,626.

Case No. 560.

ARNOLD v. MARSHAL OF UNITED STATES.

[1 U. S. Law Int. 56.]

Circuit Court, D. Georgia. Nov., 1828.

RIGHT TO SUE IN UNITED STATES' COURTS.

The question was whether the plaintiff was a citizen of Rhode-Island, and entitled to sue in the circuit court of the United States. He proved that he was born in Rhode-Island, and had always resided there until a few years since, when he obtained a considerable property in Georgia, since which time he has passed the winter months in Georgia on his plantation, and the summer months in Rhode-Island; he keeps a furnished dwelling-house in both states all the year. The court decided that whilst he might be liable in Georgia to the performance of certain duties, such as military, jury, &c., yet he could not be deprived of his privileges as a citizen of Rhode-Island, since it appeared from the evidence, that he had exercised or claimed no privileges as a citizen of Georgia, and when compelled to perform jury duty, had protested against its compromising his privileges as a citizen of Rhode-Island. Under the circumstances of this case, the will of the party must decide, and the plea is overruled.

Case No. 561.

ARNOLD et al. v. MAYNARD.

[2 Story, 349; 5 Law Rep. 296.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1842.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCES—MORTGAGE TO CREDITOR.

1. Where a trader gives a mortgage to one of his creditors, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving such creditor a preference over the others, it is an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the statute.

2. Where the bankrupt act speaks of a conveyance or transfer by a debtor "in contemplation of bankruptcy," it does not necessarily mean, in contemplation of his being declared a bankrupt under the statute, but in contemplation of his actually stopping his business, because of his insolvency and incapacity to carry it on.

[Cited in Dennett v. Mitchell, Case No. 3,780; Everett v. Stone, Id. 4,577; Morse v. Godfrey, Id. 9,856; Ashby v. Steere, Id. 576; Ex parte Quackenboss, Id. 11,489. Distinguished in Jones v. Sleeper, Id. 7,496.]

3. Where a retailer of merchandise mortgaged his whole stock in trade, of the nominal value of four or five thousand dollars, and comprising the whole mass of his visible property, to a creditor, to secure to him the sum of about seventeen hundred dollars, and against a liability for about five hundred dollars, the debtor owing debts to the amount of five thousand dollars, then over due, and the whole amount arising from a sale of his goods at auction being less than five thousand dollars: it was held, that the debtor must be taken in law, to have known, that he was, at the time of making the mortgage, insolvent, and must stop and break up his business, and that the mortgage having been executed in order to give the mortgagee a preference or priority over the rest of his creditors, it was "in contemplation of bankruptcy" within the meaning of the statute.

¹ [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

[Distinguished in Doan v. Compton, Case No. 3,940.]

4. Such a mortgage may subject the debtor to be proceeded against as an involuntary bankrupt, notwithstanding he did not, at the time of making it, intend to apply for the benefit of the bankrupt law, or to make himself liable to be proceeded against in invitum.

5. Nor does it make any difference as to the character of the act, whether the mortgage was voluntary and spontaneous on the part of the mortgagor, or was given upon the request or demand of the mortgagee, or upon a verbal promise made in general terms when the debt was contracted, to give security upon request, if at the time of giving [such security] the mortgagor knew that he was insolvent, and must stop his business, and intended thereby to give a preference or priority to the mortgagee over the rest of his creditors.

[Cited in Van Kleeck v. Thurber, Case No. 16,861; In re Connor, Id. 3,118; In re Jackson Iron Manuf'g Co., Id. 7,153. Distinguished in Ex parte Ames, Id. 323; Sawyer v. Turpin, Id. 12,410.]

In bankruptcy. This was the case of a petition by Charles Arnold, Henry Adams, and Joseph C. Hicks, of Boston, praying, that Charles Maynard, of Lowell, might be declared a bankrupt. The petition set forth that the said Maynard, on the 5th of April, 1842, made a fraudulent mortgage to John L. Perry, his former partner, conveying all his stock in trade, the same being all his visible property, to secure a debt amounting to $2,200.00. That the said Maynard, on the 10th May, following, made a certain other fraudulent mortgage to one Burton, of all his stock in trade, to secure a debt amounting to $850.00; that he then falsely confessed, as due to the said Burton, the sum of $500; and the said Burton afterwards took possession of the said property under the said mortgage, wherefore the petitioners prayed, that the said Maynard might be declared a bankrupt, within the provisions of the act of congress, in such case made and provided. When this petition came before the district court, the following questions were ordered to be adjourned into this court for a final determination, namely:

First. Whether, if a retailer of merchandise, on the 25th day of April last, mortgaged his whole stock in trade, consisting of goods to the nominal amount of from four to five thousand dollars, and comprising his whole property, excepting debts due to him to the amount of about two hundred dollars, to a creditor, to secure him the sum of about seventeen hundred dollars, and against a liability of about five hundred dollars, he, the debtor, owing debts to the amount of five thousand dollars, all then over due, and the cash value of all his goods, if sold at auction, not exceeding twenty-three hundred to four thousand dollars, it is an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the statute?

Second. Whether, if a retailer of merchandise, knowing himself to be insolvent, makes such mortgage, without intending to apply for the benefit of the bankrupt law, or to make himself liable to be proceeded against in invitum, it is a security, conveyance, or transfer of property, made or given in contemplation of bankruptcy, within the meaning of the act?

Third. Whether, if such mortgage be made upon request, or demand of the creditor, and upon a verbal promise made in general terms, when the debt was contracted, to give security upon request; and without any spontaneous act on the part of the debtor, to induce such request, it is a security, conveyance, or transfer, for the purpose of giving the creditor any preference or priority over his general creditors, within the meaning of the statute?

Fourth. Whether, if such mortgage be made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving such preference, it is an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the statute?

The cause was argued upon the adjourned question by Butler, of Lowell, for the petitioners, and by Parker, of Lowell, for the respondent, Maynard.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is the case of a petition by certain creditors of Charles Maynard, proceeding in invitum, to have him declared a bankrupt under the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, [5 Stat. 440.] There are four questions adjourned into this court for consideration and decision. The questions arise under that clause of the first section of the bankrupt act, which declares, that if any person, being indebted to a certain amount, and being a merchant or a retailer of merchandise, &c., &c., shall "make any fraudulent conveyance, assignment, sale, gift, or other transfer of his lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, credits, or evidences of debt," he may, upon petition of his creditors, be declared a bankrupt. All the questions turn upon this, whether the mortgage and conveyance stated in these questions, is to be deemed, under the circumstances therein stated, to be a fraudulent mortgage or conveyance, in the sense of the clause. Fraud, in any conveyance, is, and rarely can be, a mere matter of law; but, for the most part, it is a matter of fact, dependent upon the intent of the parties. But when all the facts and circumstances are ascertained, it may, and, indeed, often does, resolve itself into a mere question of law, as to the intent fairly deducible from those facts and circumstances. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind, that if the mortgage, in the present case, was made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving a preference to the mortgagee over the other creditors of the mortgagor, it would be an act of bankruptcy within the clause of the bankrupt act already referred to. Indeed, such a case falls directly within the second section of the act, which, among other things, declares, That all "securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, &c., made or given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, &c., &c., any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt, &c., shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon this act." So that the fourth question must be answered in the affirmative, upon the very language of the act, as the mortgage under the circumstances stated in the question, was a "fraud upon the act."

The first question contains, what I suppose are the real merits of this case. And for the purpose of answering it, I must assume, that the retailer was conscious of his own insolvency, and of his utter inability to pay all his creditors, or to carry on his business any longer, and designed to give the mortgagee a preference and priority over all his other creditors by the mortgage. Now, under such circumstances, I must presume, that in point of law, he knew the natural consequences of such an act, and that he must thereby contemplate his own immediate bankruptcy, that is, his utter inability to pay his debts, and to proceed in business, and his own right to petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act of 1841, and his liability to be proceeded against at his own choice, as well as his liability to be proceeded against by his creditors in invitum, in bankruptcy, at their election, for such act, if it was intended to give a preference to the mortgagee over all his other creditors, as being against the provisions and policy of the act. In this view of the matter, and upon the facts stated, I should answer the first question in the affirmative, and say, that the mortgage so given, was an act of bankruptcy, within the meaning of the statute.

The second question involves more difficulty in being answered in direct terms, because it states, what I apprehend cannot, in point of law, be stated, that is, that a man does not intend and contemplate precisely what the law pronounces the necessary result of his acts. No man can be permitted to aver his ignorance of the law as a qualification of his acts. On the contrary, every man is presumed to know the law, and he is bound to know, what are the legal results of his acts; or, as Lord Ellenborough said in Newton v. Chantler, 7 East, 143, every man must be taken to contemplate the ordinary consequences of his own act at the time of the act done. "Ignorantia legis neminem ex-cusat," is a maxim laid up among the earliest rudiments of the law. If the question meant to be asked, was, whether, if the mortgagor, at the time of executing the mortgage, knowing his own insolvency, and inability further to carry on his business, but having no immediate intention on his own part, to seek by petition the benefit of the bankrupt act, or thereby to enable his other creditors to proceed against him in invitum, to have him declared a bankrupt under that act, but actually designing and intending thereby to give a preference to the mortgagee over all his other creditors, it was such a security, conveyance, or transfer as was fraudulent, and in contemplation of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankrupt act, then I say, that his mere private intention cannot overcome the legal intention and purport of the act; and it is to be treated, in the sense of the statute, as made in contemplation of bankruptcy, although it was not done by him with the intention to be declared a bankrupt. When the statute speaks of a conveyance or transfer in contemplation of bankruptcy, it does not necessarily mean, in contemplation of being declared a bankrupt under the statute; but in contemplation of actually stopping his business, because he is insolvent and utterly incapable of carrying it on. And this certainly was the primary sense, in which the language was used and understood in the English bankrupt laws, from which it has been borrowed and incorporated into our statute, whatever may have been the more modern construction put upon it. The very word bankrupt, supposes a man to be broken up in his business, and insolvent, or as Mr. Justice Blackstone, (2 Bl. Comm. 472, note,) puts it, the word is derived from bancus, or banque, which signifies the table or counter of a tradesman, and ruptus, broken, denoting thereby one, whose shop or place of trade is broken or gone. Now, when a man, being about to fail, and to stop all his business, with a perfect consciousness, that he is insolvent, and with the intention to break up all his business, makes a conveyance to a particular creditor, with a view to give him a preference over all his other creditors, of the whole, or of the mass of his visible property, we must understand, that he does the act with a design to evade the provisions of the bankrupt act, which provide for an equal distribution of his property among all his creditors. If such a conveyance should be held valid, what is there to prevent the party at a future time, at his leisure, or his pleasure, from applying for the benefit of the act? If the present mortgage should be held valid, what is there to prevent Maynard from now applying for the benefit of the bankrupt act, since he might say, that at the time, when he gave the mortgage, he had no fixed intention of that sort, and did not make it in contemplation of then taking the benefit of the act?

I agree, that the mere fact of a man's being insolvent, and knowing the fact, does not necessarily establish, that he means to stop business and break up his establishment; for he may hope and believe, that he can still carry it on, and perhaps redeem himself from insolvency. But, when he is deeply in debt, and intending to fail, and break up his whole business at once, he makes a conveyance to a particular creditor, to give him a preference over all the rest, it seems to me irresistible evidence, that he does the act in contemplation of bankruptcy. I do not think, that it is necessary, for this purpose, that he should contemplate the conveyance, as an act of bankruptcy, or that he should make it with a present and immediate intention to take the benefit of that statute. It is sufficient, that he must know, that in making that conveyance, he defeats the provisions of the statute, and yet that if it be not a fraud upon the act, he may still at any time, at his pleasure, take the benefit of the act, and thereby make the preference conclusive and perfect. Now, such a result is manifestly at war with the whole objects of the statute. It would put it in the power of the debtor to avail himself of all the benefits of the act, and yet would enable him at the same time, upon his own secret and unknown intention—inscrutable to others, and admitting of no possible certainty—to do the very acts, which the statute was designed to prevent. I do not think, that the English decisions upon this subject can have any very direct application to govern the construction of our statute. Their bankrupt acts apply for the most part, to cases of involuntary bankrupts; whereas the main purposes of ours are for the benefit of voluntary bankrupts. But the cases of Flook v. Jones, 4 Bing. 20, and Poland v. Glyn, Id. 22, note, and Ridley v. Gyde, 9 Bing. 349, proceed upon principles quite analogous. I am aware, that the authority of some of these cases, so far as they apply to the English bankrupt laws, has been questioned; that they have been thought to go too far; and that they did not meet the approbation of the court in Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Adol. 289. But this last case, as well as the other cases, shows, that the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy," are not necessarily limited to acts done, which would, per se, be acts, for which the party might, or would be declared a bankrupt under the bankrupt laws; but which must and would produce on his part, a positive state of bankruptcy, in which he might become a proper subject of the bankrupt laws. Mr. Justice Parke, in this case, said: "The meaning of these words 'in contemplation of bankruptcy,' I take to be that the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankrupt." Mr. Justice Patteson said; "The recent cases have gone too great a length; they seem to have proceeded on the principle, that if a party be insolvent at the time when he makes a payment or a delivery, and afterwards becomes bankrupt, he must be deemed to have contemplated bankruptcy at the time when he made the payment. But I think, that is not correct; for a man may be insolvent, and yet not contemplate bankruptcy." Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in the case of Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539-541, was still more expressive. "With respect," (said he) "to this doctrine of contemplation in cases of bankruptcy, we have nothing, either in the common or statute law, to show what it is. The cases, in which this doctrine was introduced, make it depend upon the quo animo: if a trader thought he should not ultimately have enough to pay all his creditors, it must be presumed, that if he gives full payment to one, he does it in contemplation of bankruptcy. But if a man, honestly believing he shall have enough ultimately to pay all, but having bought goods with intent to apply them to the particular purposes of his trade, and finding, that it is necessary, that he should discontinue his trade, and therefore cannot make the intended use of the goods, thinks it fair and right to return the goods to the person of whom he purchased them, I cannot say, that this is done with a view or contemplation of bankruptcy." The case of Pulling v. Tucker, 4 Barn. & Ald. 382, is very strong to the purpose of showing, that a voluntary conveyance to one creditor, with the design to give him a preference, to the prejudice of the rest of the creditors, is a fraud upon the bankrupt laws, and an act of bankruptcy. The same doctrine was held in Newton v. Chantler, 7 East, 137, 143, 144. In Wedge v. Newlyn, 4 Barn. & Adol. 831, it was expressly held, that a trader conveying away property to a creditor, to such an extent as will prevent him from continuing his business, and render him insolvent, commits thereby an act of bankruptcy. See, also, Newton v. Chantler, 7 East, 145, per Le Blanc, J.; Compton v. Bedford, 1 W. Bl. 362; Carr v. Burdiss, 1 Crompt., M. & R. 447, Tyrw. 136, per Parke, Baron; Baxter v. Pritchard, 1 Adol. & E. 456; Abbott v. Burbage, 2 Bing. N. C. 444. Indeed, I should deduce the general conclusion from the English cases to be, that a conveyance by a person, knowing himself to be insolvent, to one creditor, with a design of giving him a preference over the other creditors, in the event of his own expected bankruptcy and stoppage of business, was of itself an act of bankruptcy, as a fraud upon the bankrupt laws. But whether it be so or not, under those laws, I think it is the natural, if not the necessary, intention, deducible from the whole structure and policy of the bankrupt act of 1841. With this explanation, I should answer the second question also in the affirmative.

As to the third question, whatever may be the case under the peculiar provisions of the bankrupt laws of England, it appears to me that it ought to be answered in the affirmative, under our bankrupt act of 1841, [5 Stat. 440.] The previous request or demand of the creditor, or the verbal promise of the debtor, when he contracted the debt, to give security upon request, does not make, and ought not to make, any difference as to the rights of the other creditors. Whether the mortgage is spontaneous on the part of the debtor, or requested by the creditor; still, if each knows that the debtor is insolvent, and that he contemplates immediate bankruptcy, and breaking up of his business, and the object of the mortgage is to secure a preference to that creditor over the other creditors, I think that it is a fraud upon the bankrupt act of 1841, and is, therefore, an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the statute. I shall direct a certificate accordingly to be sent to the district court.

The certificate was as follows:

It is ordered by this court that the following certificate be sent to the district court, in answer to the questions adjourned by the said court into this court, in this case.

1. The first question is answered by this court in the affirmative, it being the opinion of this court, that upon the facts stated, the retailer, who made the mortgage to the creditor, the mortgagee, in the case, must be taken to have known, that he was, at the time of making the mortgage, insolvent, and must stop and break up his business; and that he executed that mortgage in order to give the mortgagee a preference or priority over the rest of his creditors, in contemplation of thus stopping and breaking up his business, and thus being in a state of bankruptcy.

2. The second question is also answered in the affirmative, it not being essential in the opinion of this court, that the retailer should contemplate or intend, at the time of making the mortgage, to apply for the benefit of the bankrupt act of 1841, or thereby to subject himself to be proceeded against by his creditors as an involuntary bankrupt, under the bankrupt act of 1841. But that it is sufficient to make the mortgage so given, a security, conveyance, and transfer, in contemplation of bankruptcy, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, that he should, at the time, know himself to be insolvent, and unable further to carry on his business, and that he contemplated a stoppage and breaking up of his business, and intended by such mortgage to give a preference or priority to the mortgagee over the rest of his creditors, in contemplation of such stoppage of business, and state of bankruptcy.

3. The third question is also answered by this court in the affirmative, this court being of opinion, that, under the bankrupt act of 1841, [5 Stat. 440.] it is wholly immaterial, whether the mortgage was voluntary and spontaneous on the part of the mortgagor, or was given upon the request or demand of the mortgagee, or upon a verbal promise made in general terms, when the debt was contracted, to give security upon request, if at the time of giving the mortgage, the mortgagor knew, that he was insolvent, and could not further continue his business, but must stop the same, and he intended by such mortgage to give a preference or priority to the mortgagee over the rest of his creditors, in contemplation of such stoppage of business and state of bankruptcy.

4. The fourth question is answered in the affirmative, as being clearly an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act of 1841.

JOSEPH STORY,

One of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Case No. 561a.

ARNOLD v. PECK.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 193.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1850.

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAM AND SAIL—FAULT OF SAILING VESSEL.

[Where a collision between a steamer and sloop was caused by the act of the master of the sloop in jumping overboard, and abandoning her, when he saw the steamer suddenly appear from under the stern of another vessel, he cannot recover any damages from the steamer.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Lewis B. Arnold against William H. Peck to recover the value of the sloop Harmony, sunk in consequence of collision with the steamboat Isaac Newton. Dismissed.]

JUDSON, District Judge. This was a suit in the admiralty court, to recover the value of the sloop Harmony, which was sunk in the North river, in consequence of a collision with the steamboat Isaac Newton. The latter left her berth, foot of Courtlandt street, at the usual hour, the Troy steamboat having just previously left the opposite side of the pier. About this time, the sloop, with Captain Harmony and one man, came from the East river round the Battery. The Isaac Newton, in taking a stretch to avoid the wake of the Troy, came near the sloop, and the man at the helm, instead of availing himself of the advantage of the wind which was from the S. E., to keep away on the larboard side of the steamer, became frightened, abandoned the helm, and jumped into a small boat. The consequence was that the sloop ran into the net work of the steamer, and the hatches of the sloop being open, she careened over in 54 feet of water.

The question was, which vessel was in fault? The court says the sloop had the wind free, and a steamer is to be considered as always having it. Two vessels, having the wind, each must do all in its power to avoid a collision. The steamer was on her proper course, and did all she could to keep away from the wake of the Troy, and from the sloop. Had the master of the latter considered that he was to do something to avoid a collision, he would have kept away, but instead of that, he deserted the helm, and left the sloop to the mercy of the swell; and the beam, being thrown overboard, struck the steamer, and the consequences were immediate. The decree must be, that this libel is dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 561b.

ARNOLD v. PETTEE.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 353.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 3, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INTERFERENCE—APPEAL—FOLDING ENVELOPES.

[1. A decision of the commissioner of patents that the manner of folding and fastening the sides of an envelope upon the back is not patentable cannot be reviewed on appeal when the evidence submitted does not bear directly upon that point.]

[2. Where a claim for the manner of folding an envelope is embraced in a claim for the form of the envelope, which is rejected for want of novelty, the former claim becomes too broad for the invention, and should be restricted by amendment before the claimant can have the matter considered on appeal.]

[3. The manner of folding and pasting the sides of an envelope, being merely a matter of neatness of finish, which would be obvious to any one engaged in the manufacture of envelopes, is not patentable.]

At chambers. On appeal [by James G. Arnold] from the decision of the commissioner of patents in the matter of an interference between claim of Jas. G. Arnold and patent of S. E. Pettee for an improved envelope for letters, &c. [Affirmed.]

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. The questions both of law and fact presented by the pending appeal are simple, and lie within a very narrow compass. The invention in dispute is an improved form of letter envelope, cut in such manner as to make the least possible waste of material, and which is so folded as to present the utmost neatness of finish. Upon the question of priority of invention raised by the second reason of appeal, I am quite satisfied from a careful perusal of the testimony that, while the applicant shows by his witnesses—Arnold, Earle, and another—that he produced and exhibited to them the form of envelope in dispute in the months of May and July, 1856, and later, the patentee proves by the testimony of Cobb (interrogatory 7, 11, 12, 15) and of Ellis (11, 13, 45, 46, & 55) that he had produced and exhibited the same form of envelope in March and April preceding. I think, therefore, there is no error in the ruling of the office upon that point.

The fourth reason of appeal is not specific enough to raise any question for my decision under the provisions of the 11th section of the act of 1838. The first and third reasons of appeal present the same question, to wit: that the office has erred in determining that the manner of folding and fastening the sides of the envelope to the back, irrespective of the form of envelope, is not a patentable subject. Supposing this position to be true, it could not avail the appellant for two reasons; he has not proved any precise fact touching the manner of folding as claimed, by either of his witnesses. Their attention is entirely directed throughout the questions and answers to the form of envelope and nothing can be gathered from their testimony, except from mere conjecture as to the manner of the fold. Indeed, it may be safely said that no idea on that subject seems to have been present during their examination. In the second place, the claim for the folding being embraced in that for the form of envelope and the latter being decided against him, the claim is vicious, as being broader than the invention, and should have been restricted by an amendment in their proper limits. But, apart from these considerations, I entirely agree with the commissioner that the inventive faculty is not brought into action by folding and pasting the sides down upon the back or the back down upon the sides. It is mere matter of neatness of finish, and would be obvious to any one engaged in that business. It would moreover be an unwarrantable restriction upon the rights of the prior patentee to hold that he had not the right to use his own patented envelope in any mode in which it was reasonably susceptible of being used. Upon the whole case I am clearly of opinion that there is no ground to disturb the title of the patentee upon any of the reasons of appeal filed. And were it otherwise I should feel myself constrained upon such a state of the case as is presented by this record to certify the case back to the commissioner, with instructions to proceed further to enquire whether the party had not forfeited any prior claim he might have had by abstaining to prosecute it for a period of three years and ten months after he had made it known to others, and he, too, a solicitor of patents by profession, and having actual as well as constructive knowledge of the measure of diligence imposed by the law in such cases upon inventors. Now, therefore, I hereby certify to the Hon. Philip F. Thomas, commissioner of patents, that having assigned the 25 of July for hearing said appeal, and having at request of both parties, adjourned the same to the first of August, I have heard them both by counsel, and considered the decision of office and the reasons of appeal, the response to those reasons, together with the testimony and all the other papers, and, finding no error in the judgment of the office upon any point presented by the reasons of appeal, the same is affirmed, and a patent is finally refused to Jas. G. Arnold.

ARNOLD, (SMITH v.) See Case No. 13,004.

ARNOLD, (SWATZEL v.) See Case No. 13,682.

ARNOLD, (SWOPE v.) See Case No. 13,702.

ARNOLD, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,469.

Case No. 562.

ARNOTT v. WEBB.

[1 Dill. 362.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1870.

FOREIGN JUDGMENT—ACTION ON—DEFENSES—ASSIGNMENT—VALIDITY.

1. In an action on a foreign judgment, the debtor may plead as a defense, that he was not served with a process, and that the attorney who entered an appearance and filed an answer for him, had no authority to do so.

2. Where one of several joint or copartnership debtors himself pays off the judgment to the creditor, and causes it to be assigned to a third person, who advanced to the debtor the money with which he paid it, on an understanding between them (to which the creditor was not a party, nor the other joint debtors), that he was to have the benefit of the assignment as a security for his loan: Held, that such assignee could not maintain an action against the other debtors, on the judgment thus assigned to him.

At law. An action was brought, in New York, by a firm creditor, against the three members of the firm, after dissolution, on promissory notes made by the firm. Two of the defendants lived in that state, and the other, the present defendant, resided in Pennsylvania. No summons or other process was issued in the New York action; but an answer was filed by attorneys at law for all of the defendants. Judgment was rendered in that action, against all of the defendants; and the record thereof contains no recital as to the personal appearance of the present defendant (Webb); but only "that the defendants appeared and answered" by attorney, and such an answer is on file, and of record. An action on this judgment was brought against the said Webb, by an assignee thereof, in this court.

Thatcher & Wheat, for plaintiff.

Webb, Burns & Case, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DELAHAY, District Judge.

PER CURIAM, (DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DELAHAY, District Judge, concurring.) Held, 1. That the defendant was not estopped by the record of the New York judgment, from showing as a defence that he was never served with process, and never appeared to the action, and never employed, or authorized, or assented to the employment of the counsel who filed the answer. Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 163; Harshey v. Blackmarr, 20 Iowa, 161, and cases cited at pages 172, 173; Rogers v. Gwinn, 21 Iowa, 58; Bryant v. Williams, Id. 329; Pollard v. Baldwin, 22 Iowa, 328; 5 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 385. Held, 2. That if after the rendition of said judgment in New York, one of the joint debtors paid the same to the creditor, and colorably procured an assignment thereof to be made to the present plaintiff, the latter could not recover thereon, even though he may have loaned the said judgment debtor the money with which he paid the judgment, and have made such loan on the understanding between them that he was to have the benefit of an assignment of the judgment as security for his advance or loan to such judgment debtor.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

- AROMA MILLS, The. See Case No. 2,041.
 ARONSON, (HOFFMAN v.) See Case No. 6,576.
 A. ROSSITER, The, (WARD v.) See Case No. 17,147.
 ARREDONDO, (WARD v.) See Case No. 17,148.
 ARROW, The, (BUTLER v.) See Case No. 2,237.

Case No. 563.

ARROWSMITH v. BURLINGIM.

[4 McLean, 489; ¹ 1 Amer. Law J. (N. S.) 448.]
 Circuit Court, D. Illinois. Dec. Term, 1848.

EJECTMENT—COLOR OF TITLE—EVIDENCE—LIMITATIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under the limitation law of Illinois of 1835, two things are necessary to the defense: first, possession, and second, a connected title in law or equity deducible of record, etc. Possession without title counts for nothing. The party in possession must have held under title for seven years next preceding the action brought.

2. To render an auditor's deed evidence of title to land sold for taxes under the law of 1827, it must be first shown that the requisitions of the law have been complied with.

3. The statute of Illinois of 1838-39, "to quiet possession and conform titles to land," is not a limitation law. It is a legislative conveyance and adjudication of one man's land to another, and therefore unconstitutional.

4. Color of title in good faith must be such a title as would pass the land of itself, if a better title be not shown; if it do not amount to that, but is on its face bad, the tenant can not be said to take possession in good faith.

5. The belief of a tenant that his title is good must be a legal and intelligent belief, and can only be arrived at by an inspection of his title. If the court, on such inspection, pronounce it a connected title in law or equity deducible of record, etc., the tenant having been seven years in possession, would be protected under the limitation law of 1835. The same would arise where the occupant held under "claim and color of title made in good faith."

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Williams & Lawrence, for plaintiff.
 Browning & Bushnell, for defendant.

POPE, District Judge. The plaintiff showed title derived from the United States, and possession of the premises by the defendant. The defendant shows a connected title from the auditor of Illinois upon a sale of the land for taxes in 1829, under the law of 1827. The deed bears date in 1831. The sale was to Cavarly, who sold the premises to — in 1834, and gave a quit-claim deed reciting that he held under a deed from the auditor upon a sale for taxes. His grantee conveyed by quit-claim deed in 1840, the premises to — under whom the defendant claims. No proof is offered that the auditor complied with the requisitions of the law in making the sale for taxes, beyond what the deed itself imports. He has also proved seven years' residence on the land next preceding the bringing of the suit, and that he has paid the taxes assessed during that time.

The defendant relies, 1st. On the statute of limitations of 1835, [Act Ill. Jan. 17, 1835, § 2.] 2d. On the act of 1838-9, entitled "An act to quiet possessions and confirm titles to land," [Rev. St. Ill. 1845, c. 24, § 8.]

The plaintiff contends, 1st. That the defendant has not shown the title required by the act of 1835, in this: that the auditor's deed conveys no title, unless supported by proof of his compliance with the law under which he sold; 2d. That the act of 1838-39 is unconstitutional in this: that it conveys one man's land to another, acting upon the right, not upon the remedy; 3d. That he has not shown claim and color of title in good faith, as required by the law of 1838-39.

The vast amount of property depending upon the principles involved in this case, gives to it unusual importance. It has therefore been argued on both sides with consummate ability and learning. Feeling appeals were made to the sympathies of the court in favor of settlers and in favor of laws of repose. It is only necessary to take a cursory view of the land titles in Illinois to show how little occasion there is for those appeals. The United States was the great land holder. Before it proceeded to sell, it caused the land to be surveyed into quarter sections, numbered by town, range and section. It sold under great precautions against selling the same tract twice; in truth it very rarely happened; so that the patent was for a determinate and surveyed piece of land. Here was simplicity and no confusion. One wishing to own the same tract could ascertain, by application at the proper land office, if it was sold, and to whom. It is true that the patentee or some one holding under him, might sell twice. In such case, the junior purchaser in good faith would be a fit subject for the protection of the statute of limitations. Can this be predicated of him who sets up a claim based upon a deed from a man, or officer, who proposes to convey the property of another? I think not. The case was quite different in Kentucky and Tennessee, and in a part of Ohio. Virginia and North Carolina sold and granted their land in Kentucky and Tennessee upon private surveys, and described the land in the patent as directed by the patentee, not knowing that some other may not have obtained a patent for the whole or part of the land. Hence there were instances where the same land was covered by several patents. Hence arose endless litigation, and it became the duty of the legislative department to strain its power to the utmost to afford relief to the settlers. They indeed had claim and color of title in good faith. It was the duty of the courts to give full effect to the benevolent policy of the legislature. It is far otherwise in this state. Here, a man takes possession of another's land, lending himself to the unconscionable purpose of depriving him of his acres for cents. This case had been argued for the defendant as if the military tract were alone interested, forgetting that it is a very small part of the state of Illinois, and that land has been sold for taxes all over the state

The first point of defense, viz: the law of 1835, will be considered. The law provides that every "real, etc., action brought for the recovery of land which any person may be possessed of by actual residence, having a connected title in law or equity deducible of record from this state or the United States, or from any public officer or other person authorized by the laws of the state to sell such land for the non-payment of taxes; or from any sheriff, marshal or other person authorized to sell such land on execution, or under any order, judgment or decree of any court of record, shall be brought within seven years next after possession taken. But, when the possessor shall acquire title after taking such possession, the limitation shall begin to run from the time of acquiring title." The most striking and peculiar feature in this law is that no length of possession without title will protect the occupant. He must have held under title for seven years next preceding the action brought. So, possession without title counts for nothing. Two things are necessary to the defense. First, possession; second, a connected title in law or equity deducible of record, etc.

The first the defendant has shown. Second, has he shown a title as required by law? He relies upon the deed from the auditor. This court is relieved from the construction of the law under which the deed was made, as it has already received a construction by the supreme court of Illinois, in 1837, in the case of Garrett v. Wiggins, reported in 1 Scam. 343. The court there declares, "it is a settled principle of the common law that a party claiming under a summary and extraordinary proceeding, must show that all the indispensable preliminaries to a valid title which the law has prescribed in order to give notice to those interested and to guard against fraud, have been complied with, or the conveyance to him will pass no title." The court classed the giving notice of the sale among the "indispensable requisites." The authority of the auditor to sell is limited to the lands advertised. "Without proof of this fact, the auditor's deed was not evidence of the regularity of the sale, and consequently conveyed no title to the purchaser." In these remarks of the court, this court fully concurs. The case arose under the law of 1827, and the auditor's deed is for land sold for taxes under that law; so is the case at bar. It is, therefore, a decision of the point now controverted. But it is said that the case of Garrett v. Wiggins, is not in point, because in that case the plaintiff produced the auditor's deed in support of his action of ejectment. In the case at bar, the defendant produces the auditor's deed to protect his possession. In the former case, it was necessary for the plaintiff to make out a good title. In the case at bar, it is only necessary that the defendant should show an appearance of title to protect his possession. It is sufficient answer to say, that the supreme court of Illinois made no such qualification, but declared in terms that the deed conveyed no title. But the act of limitations requires a title. How, then, can it be satisfied with an instrument that conveys no title at all? The case of Skyle's Heirs v. King's Heirs, throws much light upon the subject. It is a decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky, reported in 2 A. K. Marsh. 384. In that case, the defendant in possession showed a connected chain of title under a junior patent from the commonwealth. The court held, that it would protect him, because it would hold the land upon its face when tried by itself. The state was the great landholder. It gave two grants; the younger would hold if the older were not produced. So he has title deducible of record, etc. But it is far different with the case at bar. The auditor does not profess to sell his own land or have any interest in it. His power is, therefore, a naked power. It must appear that he has exercised it in the prescribed manner. This has not been attempted to be shown in this case. For these reasons the defendant has no title, and is therefore not protected by the statute of limitations of 1835.

Is the defendant protected by the statute of 1838-39, "to quiet possession and confirm titles to land?" The defendant contends that it is in effect a limitation law. If not, that it is within the competency of the legislature to act upon the right in this matter so as to divest it. So much of the act as is material to this controversy, is as follows, viz: "Every person in the actual possession of lands and tenements under claim and color of title made in good faith, and who shall for seven successive years continue in such possession, and shall also during said time pay all taxes legally assessed on such lands and tenements, shall be held and adjudged to be the legal owner of said lands and tenements to the extent and according to the purport of his or her paper title." Is it a limitation law? It does not profess to be one either in its title or body. But it is said at the bar, that limitation laws have their origin as to real actions on the assumption of abandonment. No adjudged case or dictum in support of it has been shown, and none is believed to exist; but abundant authorities can be shown to the contrary. See Bl. Comm. 188, and following pages. That position, then, is dismissed with the remark, that it is more ingenious than solid. It is, then, a legislative conveyance and adjudication of one man's land to another. The land passes against all the world not enumerated in the saving clauses. The divestiture is declared to depend upon the act of another, not for any fault or omission or commission in the true owner, who is not required to improve the land nor to pay the taxes; and if he did pay the taxes regularly, it would not save his property. Can legislatures in this enlightened age, with written constitutions to restrain them, take from one and give to another his property with or without compensation? It is only necessary to state the proposition in its nakedness to meet refutation.

The owner has disregarded no regulation nor violated any law. Has he received any benefit from the occupant for acts done without his request? The occupant has paid the taxes which might benefit the owner if he had not paid them himself; but as they were paid without request, no action would lie against him for reimbursement. But he has improved and cultivated a portion of the land. (In the case at the bar, it is not shown how much, nor that any lasting improvements were made, nor is it necessary under this law.) But he has made improvements. Did they cost much? Probably not, in this prairie country. Was the owner benefitted? It is safe to presume not, if the improved land was prairie. If timber, it would be worse. The scarcity is such that great economy should be observed in its preservation. Most probably the owner was injured. Hence, the occupant can have no legal or moral claim for benefits conferred by his labor. It was different in Kentucky and Tennessee. The lands there were covered with timber, and required great labor and long time to open a farm. This awakened the sympathy of their legislatures for the occupant. But in Illinois the farms are already open, with scarcely sufficient timber for building, fuel and fencing. So, sympathy is misplaced when invoked in behalf of occupants in Illinois. But the great question must be met fearlessly, but with a profound sense of the responsibility incurred by a judge, when he interposes the aegis of the law in defense of a citizen whose property is divested by a legislative act, which imputes to him no blame, and holds out to him no recompense for his loss. This act requires of him nothing, nor does it hold out threats of forfeiture for the doing or not doing any thing, but gives his property to another in terms on specified conditions.

Is it within its constitutional powers? A slight glance at the construction of society may be not without profit in the solution of the problem. Man was sent into the world by his Maker to seek his happiness; furnished with a code of laws, enacted by an all-wise and benevolent God, implanted in his heart. Although those laws were perverted by imperfect man, their perfect beauty and adaptation to the moral government of the world is in a constant course of development as Christianity, civilization and true knowledge advances. His rights and obligations had and have their existence in that law. But man's happiness was insecure in his insulated condition. He was inspired with social tastes. The social state promised increased happiness in the security it would afford to his person and property. Hence, the social compact. In this compact it was agreed that man should surrender as many of his natural rights as was deemed conducive to the general good, and received in return the engagement of the society to protect him in his person and property. And for the surrender of the natural right to take redress for wrongs in his own hands, the society agreed to afford him suitable remedies for the injuries he might be exposed to. These obligations imposed upon the society the duty to establish a government; a legislature, to prescribe rules of conduct; a judiciary to expound them; and an executive, to enforce them.

It would be unprofitable to give here an exposition of the origin and progressive changes in the titles to real estate in England. It is sufficient to say, that, until the latter part of the seventeenth century, they differed widely from ours. With us the tenure is free and common socage; the tenure of a freeman. And a freeman may buy and sell at his pleasure. This right is not of society, but from nature. He never gave it up. It would be amusing to see a man hunting through our law books for authority to buy or sell, or to make a bargain. The search would be vain. Society indeed may prohibit the making contracts injurious to the common good. This is a salutary restraint upon his natural right. No grant is needed. Rights are from nature. Titles and remedies are the invention of society. The latter are changeable at the will of the legislative department. Remedies may be granted or withheld; and as the legislature has none over it, there is none to control it. But the former—rights—are sacred, and can not be invaded but by upturning the first principles of society; without violating the great, nay the only object and conditions of the social compact. Magna Charta only asserted first principles. So the articles of the constitution of this and other states are only recognitions of those principles that uphold all free governments; the violation of which would dissolve the obligations of obedience.

In this enlightened age no government dare do it, without incurring a moral responsibility that no man will dare encounter. The omnipotent parliament of Great Britain dare not.

This act is so fraught with disaster to the country in the insecurity of property, etc., that this court must assume that the legislature was not aware of a tithe of the evils they were entailing on the country if this law were sustained. The principles embraced and put forward in the law are at war with freedom. For the man is a slave whose property is unsafe. This act presents a strong anomaly. If the plaintiff had committed a crime causing forfeiture, his property could not be taken from him but upon a judicial decision; but for no imputed fault it is taken from him by this act without a trial. Hence, in the argument, the defendant's counsel earnestly repelled the idea of forfeiture in this case. The United States sold their lands for a full price, and gave a grant in fee simple unconditionally. It is under a grant of this kind that the plaintiff claims. In case of actual settlers, full payment of the land must be made, and all the favor they have is in the right of preemption. In this case the state of Illinois gives without price that which is not hers, but a citizen's. "No person shall be dis seized of his freehold, etc., unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." This is only declaratory of first principles. The only value of it is to restrict the government to a particular mode of divesting the title. "The judgment of his peers or the law of the land." The authorities agree that this must be done through the courts.

This law of 1838-39, has been considered thus far as if the defendant rested his defense alone upon seven years' possession, and payment of taxes assessed. But he has an additional reliance. It is insisted that he has shown claim and color of title made in good faith. Connecting the latter part of the sentence with the first, it appears that the legislature intended a paper title; as it conveys to him all the land to the extent and according to "the purport of his paper title." This is an important point in the case, and so thought the defendant's counsel, who directed to it very great exertions with an ability rarely equalled. They insisted with great earnestness that the title shown by the defendant was "claim and color of title made in good faith," contemplated by the law; that it appeared fair on its face; that the auditor's deed was in the form prescribed, and therefore the occupant was warranted in indulging the honest belief that the title was good. But if in fact bad, still that it was sufficient to protect his possession.

In England, title in ejection, where the defendant shows possession, made no figure but to prove that he was not a wrong doer, and that his possession was adverse. Hence in England and America, under the twenty years' possession, a mere pretence of title might be deemed sufficient to show that the entry was not a trespass, and that he held adversely to the true owner. In such case, there is great force in the argument that it is enough that the occupant believed his title good. In that case, it is the possession that is the principal; the title only explanatory. The statute of Illinois makes the title the principal, the possession only auxiliary. The English decision must be understood to have reference to a different law from the law of Illinois. At the bar, the deed of the auditor has been likened to the grant from the United States or from the state. The difference, however, is manifest. The United States and the state are sovereigns, and every act of a sovereign has all presumptions to sustain it; not so the acts of the auditor. The United States or the state profess to convey their own land; the auditor, the land of another. He, then, stands on no better ground than the sheriff, who is bound to show his authority. The auditor does not profess to be the great land holder, but only to exercise control over another man's property under authority conferred by law; and does not show that he acted in conformity to the authority conferred. Nor has it been proved. See Garrett v. Wiggins, 1 Scam. 343; Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 119; Walker v. Turner, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 541; Williams v. Peyton's Lessee, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 77. All these cases concur in saying, that unless it appear that the officer or agent pursued his authority, the proceedings are void. (I here take occasion to say that I do not adopt the doctrine intimated by the court in the case of Garrett v. Wiggins, that the legislature has the power to establish such rules of evidence as will compel the courts to receive the acts of agents as proof, either prima facie or conclusive, that they have executed their duties correctly. But that case is not before the court. The remark is made now only to repel the inference that I acquiesced in that doctrine.) It is not surprising that the defendant's counsel failed to furnish the court with an English definition of "claim and color of title," for the reason given above. But the supreme court of New York has defined it in the case of Jackson v. Frost, 5 Cow. 351. The court says it must be, as "I understand the law, such a title as the law will prima facie consider a good title; otherwise there would be no uniformity." But in Illinois it must be a paper title, and that title must have the appearance of a good title. The consequences which might flow from the doctrine contended for by the defendant's counsel are truly startling. Suppose the defendant's deed had covered the whole of Adams county. Several years' possession of a very small piece would give him all the unoccupied land in the county, if he be released from the obligation of looking into his grantor's title. As the case at bar now stands, the auditor's deed is void, and conveys no title.

Color of title in good faith must be such a title as would pass the land of itself if a better title be not shown; for if it do not amount to that, but is on its face bad, the tenant can not be said to take possession in good faith. For example: If A conveys to B land avowedly the property of C, it is a fraud in B to take the conveyance. If A professes to act by authority from C, or in any other manner, the authority must appear, or, in its absence, it is the duty of B to inquire. The fact of its being confessedly the property of C, is notice to B; and if he neglect to inquire, but accepts the deed, it is a fraud on C, if A in fact had no authority. That the grantee of Cavarly had notice, is proved by the deed from Cavarly. That the defendant had notice, is plain from the fact that he bought without warranty, which he would not do without the exhibition of the title papers. Three years before his deed, the supreme court decided that such a deed conveyed no title, of which he is presumed to have had notice, as the decisions of the supreme court of a state are the law, and every man is presumed to know the law of the land. They were purchasers with notice, and therefore fraudulent. The auditor professes to sell, not his own land, but that of another; his authority to do this is a natural inquiry with the purchaser. Among others, two things must exist: First, delinquency; second, notice of the intention of the auditor to sell. These inquiries will of course be made by the purchaser, and if he fails or neglects to seek information, it is at his risk; he becomes his own insurer, and can not protect himself under the plea of innocent purchaser without notice.

The land in controversy has been sold by the auditor for $1 84 to Cavarly, a little more than a cent an acre. In a contest between Cavarly and the plaintiff, who would sympathize with Cavarly? Can the defendant who purchased with notice claim more? This court will not inquire into the conscience of the man whose morality will allow him to sleep quietly after appropriating to himself one hundred and sixty acres of valuable land for the pitiful sum of one dollar and eighty-four cents. It is sufficient to say that he can not challenge any sympathy of this court. Nor does his grantee stand better.

With a full knowledge of the nature of the transaction, he thrusts himself forward to assist Cavarly to consummate the speculation. He had sufficient warning. First, Cavarly was a lawyer; if he had no doubt of his title, he would have given a general warranty deed, and would have obtained a sound price for a sound title; his declining to do so was sufficient to alarm the fears of his grantee. Second, it is a notorious fact that there never has been entire confidence in titles derived from tax sales; hence, there were different prices for patent titles from tax titles, the latter much lower. Third, the uniform decisions of the courts of the United States and the states, are that the holders of tax titles must show that the officer selling had complied with all the requisites of the laws under which he acted. So universal has this been, that no case has been shown where a tax title has been maintained; nor is it known that any one has been successful in the assertion of such title in any of the states. This was enough, of itself, to put the purchaser on his guard.

Cavarly, then, and those holding under him, are of equal demerit, so far as to the paper title—all holding under the auditor's deed upon the tax sale, and all with full notice. But it is contended, with great earnestness and ability, that, if the tenant entered and occupied, believing his title good, his seven years' possession will protect him. This is probably true; but the difficulty is not thereby removed. The question still remains, how is this belief to be established? Not by the declaration of the tenant. Not by his acts, because his motives for them might be other than might be ascribed to him. This is properly a question of law. The belief must be a legal and intelligent belief, and can only be arrived at by an inspection of his title. If the judge shall, upon its inspection, pronounce it "a connected title in law or equity, deducible of record," etc., he would be protected under the eighth section of the act of 1835, called the limitation law. The same would arise where the occupant held under "claim and color of title, made in good faith."

It was well contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that any other construction would subject the title to a trial of the intelligence of the occupant, and could not be decided without taking the measure of his capacity to judge. This would make the defense good for one man and fail with another; that it could not be known whether or not he would be protected until it could be ascertained what was the state of his intellect. And how is this to be inquired into? The court can not in any case; and in this case at bar, no proof was offered to the court to enable it to form an opinion. The court then must examine the title offered by the defendant, and decide whether it is such a title as is indicated by the statute. Whatever the law makes it, so it must be assumed that the party regarded it. All men who are allowed to manage their own affairs, are on a level in court, and presumed to know the law.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

ARROWSMITH, The T. V. See Case No. 5, 337.

Case No. 563a.

Ex parte ARTHUR.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 287.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 22, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INTERFERENCE—LUBRICATING OIL-CANS—EVIDENCE.

[1. A device for opening and closing the valve in the spout of a lubricating oil-can by means of a flat spring, connected with a lever and thumb piece, is a new and useful improvement, entitled to be patented, on the testimony of machinists and manufacturers of such articles that it is superior, simpler, less liable to get out of order, and can be made at less cost than an old device, accomplishing the same result by means of a coiled spring.]

[2. The testimony of machinists and manufacturers having practical knowledge of the subject-matter is of greater weight than the opinion of the commissioner of patents on the question of the usefulness and cost of an alleged invention.]

Appeal [by William C. Arthur] from the decision of the commissioner of patents refusing to grant unto him letters-patent for an improvement in oil-cans for oiling machinery. [Reversed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The claim as set forth by Arthur is in these words: "What I claim as my invention is the combination of the spring A with the valve in the spout arranged as above described."

It is alleged that the above description shows the nature of said invention to be the combination of a flat spring and a valve in the spout of the can, so that the spring shall serve as a lever to open and a spring to close said valve.

The report of the examiner, and adopted by the commissioner as his decision, is dated 11 December, 1858. It states that Arthur claims "the combination of the spring A with the valve in the spout, and arranged as above described,"—whether the valve is located in the spout or at its base or lower end does not seem to be material, for the drawings show both modifications, and in the specification it is said that the valve may be placed in either position. The chief distinction between the invention before us and those to which the examiner has referred and to the discussion of which the applicant in his reasons of appeal mainly confines himself is that, whereas there the valve is kept in position by means of a coiled spring, in Arthur's the valve is forced and held upon its seat by the use of a flat spring. The substitution then of a flat spring for a coiled spring is the point upon which the question of patentability turns. Prima facie such a substitution is not the proper subject of letters-patent, and we must therefore look to the peculiar application and effect of the two springs in the separate arrangements which have been given to them.

The applicant holds: (1) That my (his) can is simple in construction. (2) It is less liable to get out of order. (3) As it requires fewer parts and a simpler arrangement of them, it is cheaper,—and that all these advantages are directly derivable from * * * the employment of a flat spring. Let us see if the allegations of the applicant are correct. The first and second heads may be merged into the third. Arthur's can has "fewer parts" under a simpler arrangement, and "is therefore cheaper to the public." Referring to the patent granted to Levi S. Enos, Feby. 12, 1856, we find that his valve like Arthur's is attached to the upper end of a rod which extends down into the body of the can. This rod is then bent upwards and reaches through the cap, thus forming two legs, the largest end of which, or to that end pressing through the cap, is attached to the thumb piece, while in Arthur's arrangement the rod bearing the valve is attached to the flat spring, which is soldered to the inner side of the can and extends across its mouth, the end thereof opposite to its attachment bearing a rod which extends up through the top of the vessel and is provided with a thumb piece. Enos has a coiled spring encircling the base of the spout, and having its bearings on the under side of the thumb piece and on the cap of the can a spring. Now what is the number of parts necessarily employed in both constructions? Enos' coil spring and forked rod, to the separate ends of which last the valve and thumb piece are connected, perform precisely the same functions that Arthur's valve rod, cross piece, and thumb rod do. Here then two elements of Enos' can are represented by three elements of Arthur's can, and while the two require no preliminary preparation to fit them to their uses but the simple colling of the wire, and the bending of the rod into the shape of a syphon whose legs are parallel, the three require four separate operations: 1st. Bending one end of the cross piece or spring at right angles to the body. 2nd. Soldering the cross piece or spring to the inside of the can. 3rd. The attachment of the valve rod to the cross piece or spring. 4th. The attachment of the thumb rod to the cross piece or spring. To say nothing of the comparative time in which these manipulations may be effected, and it being observed that both cans are provided with tubes through which the thumb rods slide, Arthur's plan requires (counting the valves and thumb pieces in both cases) six individual parts; Enos' whole arrangement is effected by five. Where then is to be found the superior simplicity of Arthur's arrangement, where the diminished cost?

Certainly not in the spring which is the gist of the invention—which in Enos' case serves to support the valve rod and return the valve to its seat when depressed for the outflowing of the oil, and which it cannot be and is not denied, can be manufactured no more cheaply than Enos'. We can, therefore, regard Arthur's plan only as a formal modification of Enos' presenting no superior advantages either in operation or in cost of construction.

It is proper to add that several affidavits have been filed in this matter, but they fail to convince us that our judgment is erroneous. From one of them it does not appear that the affiant is any more capable of judging of the merits of this class of inventions than we are; in two others the affiants may be interested in the invention—as far as appears to the contrary; and to the fourth no oath is annexed, as the inventor places great importance in the use of a flat spring in this class of oil-cans he may as well be informed that the device is not new, it having been found in domestic oil-cans and lubricators for machinery. See Austin & Opdyke's rejected applications and the patent granted to Henry J. Hawkins, July 14, 1857, (lubricator,) on the 13 December, 1858. The foregoing report is confirmed, and the application rejected by the commissioner.

Among the papers laid before me in this case there are the affidavits of eight witnesses, consisting of principal and assistant experienced, practical machinists, who swear that they are not interested, four of whom are alluded to in the report just recited, one of them who says he has long been a manufacturer of tin and brass ware; that he has seen and is acquainted with the machines of Enos' and Arthur's cans, and having made an estimate of the cost of the manufacture of each, says he is prepared to state that he can furnish Arthur's can for fifty per cent. less than that of Enos, making both of the same materials. The others swear that they have been acquainted with the two cans and they consider Arthur's can as much superior, simpler, more durable, less liable to get out of order and cheaper.

To the foregoing decision the appellant has filed five reasons of appeal. The fourth will be particularly noticed; it will be sufficient to refer merely to the others. This was the state of the case when the commissioner laid before me all the papers in the case in compliance with due notice directed to be given of the time and place of the hearing.

The appellant appeared by his attorney and submitted; * * * The fourth reason of appeal states—"The commissioner of patents in his rejection of the 14 December, 1858, has made an allegation injurious to said Arthur's invention, and which is controverted by the sworn testimony of men experienced in this branch of business, and filed in the case, to which * * * allegation the said Arthur has so far been refused or not allowed to make an explanation that would place him properly before the community and the patent office. That he is prepared to show that his can can be made with fewer pieces and at much cheaper rates than the one with which it has been so unfavorably compared. The witnesses, four of whose affidavits are alluded to in the report just recited appear from the papers laid before me by the commissioner to be eight in number, all of whom swear that they are not interested in the subject,—one of them that he has long been a manufacturer of tin and brass ware, that he has seen and is acquainted with the machines of Enos' and Arthur's cans, and having made an estimate of the cost of the manufacture of each, says he is prepared to state that he can furnish Arthur's can for fifty per cent. less than that of Enos, making both of the same materials,"—he is said to be amongst the largest manufacturers of such kind of machines in the United States. The others swear that they have been acquainted with the two cans, and that they consider Arthur's can as much superior, simpler, more durable, less liable to get out of order and cheaper. The commissioner in his testimony says: "Several affidavits have been filed in this matter, but they fail to convince us that our own judgment is erroneous. From one of them it does not appear that the affiant is any more capable of judging of the merits of this class of inventions than we are; in two others the affiants may be interested in the invention, as far as appears to the contrary; and to the fourth no oath is annexed."

There can be no doubt that the capacity of the commissioner to judge, as he has said, must be considered as greatly superior to that of the witnesses, and his judgment worthy fully to be confided in; but the witnesses testify as to their practical knowledge of the machine—a machinist by trade—what such would cost to make them; and of the opinion in the practical use of them of such kind of opportunities and facts it is presumed the commissioner could not have had knowledge—with respect to their being interested, there is no proof of the fact; on the contrary, they have all sworn that they were not, and from the stations they fill, that of masters and assistant-masters of machinery, it would be too much to suppose they have sworn falsely. I cannot, therefore, deny the credit due to their testimony which is claimed—the amount of which shows that the article according to practical use and experiment has been found to be greatly cheaper, better and more convenient to the public, besides answering all the purposes of Enos' invention, thus falling within the principle of patent law stated in Curt. Pat. § 8. "We are of opinion that if the result produced by such a combination be either a new article, or a better article, or a cheaper article to the public than that produced before by the old method, that such a combination is an invention or manufacture intended by the statute and may well become the subject of a patent."

I think, therefore, there is an error in the decision of the commissioner, and that the same ought to be and hereby is reversed and annulled, and a patent is directed to be issued to the said William C. Arthur as prayed.

ARTHUR, (BUTTERFIELD v.) See Case No. 2,249.

Case No. 564.

ARTHUR et al. v. The CASSIUS.

[2 Story, 81.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1841.

SHIPPING—CHARTER PARTY—LIABILITY OF OWNERS—REFUSAL TO ACCEPT GOODS—FREIGHT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where the schooner Cassius was chartered to the master, as owner, for a certain voyage, and by the terms of the charter-party, the general owners were to share the freight with the master,—it was held, that the general owners were directly liable, as owners, for the voyage; and that the claim of the shippers for damages was not restricted to the master personally, although their agreement was made solely with him.

[Cited in Skolfield v. Potter, Case No. 12,925; Webb v. Peirce, Id. 17,320; The Freeman v. Buckingham, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 190; Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. (60 U. S.) 40; Harney v. The Sidney L. Wright, Case No. 6,082a; The International, 30 Fed. 377.]

2. Where, also, the master was, by his agreement with the shippers, to deliver the cargo at Velasco, but upon his arriving there, the consignee refused to receive it,—it was held, that, as the cargo was not of a perishable nature, the master was bound to land it at Velasco, and store it for the benefit of the shippers, and could not carry it to another port, nor sell it; although it could not be sold at Velasco.

3. So, also, where freight was payable "on delivery of the cargo at the port of Velasco,"—it was held, that until such a delivery, no freight could accrue; and that the master should have landed the cargo, and secured his lien for freight by placing it in the hands of his agent for the benefit of the owners, but subject to the freight.

[Cited in Cargo of Salt, Case No. 2,406; The Maria White, Id. 9,083; Fox v. Holt, Id. 5,012; Irzo v. Perkins, 10 Fed. 780.]

4. But as the master had carried the cargo to New Orleans, and sold it, it was held, that the libellants were entitled to receive the actual value of the cargo at Velasco at the time when the same might have been there landed, deducting all duties and charges, and the freight for the voyage, as if the cargo had been duly landed.

[Cited in The Joshua Barker, Case No. 7,547; The Freeman v. Buckingham, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 190; The Maria White, Case No. 9,083; The Boston, Id. 1,671; Hatton v. The Melita, Id. 6,218.]

5. The rule of damages in prize cases ordinarily supposes, that the vessel has been captured before she has arrived at the port of destination, and the court, in odium spoliatoris, will presume the cargo to be worth more at the port of destination than the prime cost by 10 per cent. But to cases where the vessel has arrived at the port of destination this rule does not apply.

[6. Cited in New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 436, to the point that proceedings in admiralty may be prosecuted for marine torts in rem and in personam. Cited in The Clatsop Chief, 8 Fed. 164, to this same point.]

In admiralty. Libel [by Isaac W. Arthur and others] on a charter-party, in rem against the schooner, and in personam against the master. The libel, in substance, stated:—1st. That Simon E. Cottrell, master of the schooner Cassius, on the third day of October, 1838, by a certain charter-party of affreightment at New York, annexed to the libel, made and concluded between him and the libellant, engaged to take and receive on board the said schooner a cargo of white pine and hemlock, and lumber, both under and on deck, and all such lawful goods and merchandise as the libellants might think proper to ship, and transport the same from said New York to the port of Velasco, in Texas, by the way of Kingston on the North river. 2d. That it was engaged, among other things, that the libellants should pay to the said Cottrell for the freight or charter of the said vessel at the rate of fifteen dollars for each thousand feet of inch board measure on delivery at the port of Velasco, in conformity with the bills of lading, with five per cent. primage, such payment to be made in the manner specified in the said charter-party. It was also agreed, among other things, that no freight should be paid on such part of the cargo, if any, as might be lost in rafting the same on shore. 3d. That on the 17th of October, 1838, in pursuance of the said contract, the libellants delivered and shipped on board the Cassius, the following goods and merchandise:—47,755 feet hemlock and pine lumber; 29,836 feet hemlock boards, siding, &c.; 9 boxes doors, door-casings, &c.; 10 boxes window glass; 1 box books, stationery, &c.; 1 Franklin stove; 1 box stove; 43 pounds of pipe; 3 boxes paste blacking; all of great value, to wit, of the value of $1,561, for which the said Cottrell signed four bills of lading, in the usual form, stipulating to deliver the same to one Morgan L. Smith, upon payment of freight, according to the said charter-party, with primage and average. 4th. That soon afterwards the vessel set sail, and arrived at Velasco on the 9th day of November, 1838, and that the said Cottrell did not deliver the said cargo to the said Smith, but set sail and went to New Orleans, and there sold it, and received the proceeds, and still retains the same. 5th. That the libellants have always well and truly performed their covenants and undertakings, but that the said Cottrell has not, by not delivering the said cargo to the said Smith. 6th. That, by reason of such non-delivery, the libellants have lost not only all the profits, which they would have received, if the said cargo had been delivered, but also the whole value of the said cargo; and that the said Cottrell wholly refuses to pay them the amount of their damages, or the value of the cargo, or the proceeds of its sale in New Orleans. and that their damages amount to a large sum of money, to wit, $3,000. Whereupon the libellants pray, that process may issue against the said vessel, and that the said Cottrell and all other persons interested be cited to appear, and that the court will pronounce the damages aforesaid, and decree such other relief to the libellants as shall to law and justice appertain, and condemn the said vessel and all persons intervening, in costs.

¹[Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

The answer of the master stated, as follows: 1st. That the respondent was authorized by the owners of the schooner Cassius, and had made an agreement with the said owners, to victual and man the said schooner, and to receive for compensation therefor, and for his own services as master, one half the freight earned by the schooner, and the other half to be paid to the said owners. 2d. The respondent admitting the several matters in the first, second and third articles of the libel to be true, except the valuation of the goods, farther alleges, that the Cassius set sail and arrived at Velasco on the 9th day of November, 1838, as set forth, and that upon her arrival, the said Morgan L. Smith, consignee of the cargo, came on board with a pilot, and instructed the respondent to raft the said lumber ashore, as the said pilot should direct, and that the said pilot thereafter directed the mode in which the said lumber should be rafted ashore, and about twelve thousand feet of lumber were made into a raft and towed ashore, as nearly as practicable, pursuant to his directions, and then left to drift ashore; and that the same raft was safely landed, and was hauled out of the water by men in the employ of the said Smith, who was himself present. That afterwards, before any more could be so rafted ashore, the said Smith gave notice that he would receive no more of the lumber, and would not pay any freight thereon in case it should be landed, and advised the respondent to throw it overboard, as, in that case, he could call on the underwriters, he being fully insured, and the respondent could also receive from the underwriters the amount of his freight; and that the said Smith asserted to the respondent that there was not money enough in Velasco to pay the freight for the said cargo; and that the winds and weather were as favorable for landing the remainder of the said lumber as they were when the raft was landed; and that the said Velasco is a small and poor place, containing not more than twenty-eight houses, and not more than one hundred and twenty-six inhabitants, and that there was no market at Velasco for the said lumber, and that the same could not have been there sold for sufficient to pay the freight agreed upon by the charter-party; whereupon the respondent set sail for New Orleans, that being deemed to be the best port to make with such a cargo, with the residue of the cargo on board, and there sold the same, and the net proceeds of the sale amounted to $1,277.16. 3d. That the respondent has well and truly performed his covenants and undertakings, inasmuch as he had no means in his power to compel the said Smith to receive the said cargo, and to pay the freight thereon, and was not bound to part with the possession of the said cargo, until the said freight was paid; and the respondent avers that he was ready and willing, and offered to deliver the said cargo according to the terms of the charter-party; but that the said Smith would not receive it, nor pay freight, and, therefore, that the libellants did not well and truly perform their covenants and agreements in the said charter-party, and in consequence thereof, the respondent was compelled to convey the cargo to New Orleans, and there to sell it. 4th. The said respondent denies, that the libellants have lost any profits upon the said lumber, and avers, that it could not have been sold at Velasco for enough to pay the freight, and the respondent claims, to be paid by the libellants, the amount of freight according to the term of the charter-party, to wit, $1291.50, and the farther sum of $800 for the detention and delay at Velasco, and for transporting the cargo to New Orleans, and he claims to hold the whole proceeds of the sale of the said lumber at New Orleans, to pay the sum due to him from the libellants; and he prays the honorable court to decree, that the balance remaining due to him from the libellants, shall be by them paid to him; and he denies that the libellants have suffered any damages. Wherefore he prays the court to pronounce against the libel and condemn the libellants in costs. The answer was subsequently amended, by stating, that the box of books and stationery, and the three boxes of paste blacking, were not sold with the cargo at New Orleans, but were sent to the said Smith by the schooner William Bryant, from New Orleans, and the stoves and pipe were not sold, and that their value when taken on board at New York, was about twelve dollars, and that in addition to the proceeds of the said sale, the said stoves and pipes are insufficient to pay to the respondent the amount due to him, and, therefore, he claims to hold them.

The answer of the owners corresponded in substance to the answer of the master, and stated, that by the agreement existing between them and the said master, the said master was owner, for the voyage, of the said schooner, and as such owner solely responsible for all contracts relative to the same, and that the owners are not liable for any default, neglect, or other liability of the said master in relation to the said voyage; that the owners never received any account from the said Cottrell, nor from any other person during the time in which the schooner was performing her said voyage to Velasco, any more than the sum of $638.58, except that they received from the said Cottrell the said stoves and pipes, and that they, the owners, insist that they are entitled to the said sum, and the said stoves and pipes, as having been paid and delivered by the master under his contract with them.

There was evidence tending to show, that the consignee, subsequently to his refusal, offered to receive the cargo.

At the hearing in the district court, there was a decree dismissing the libel, and from that decree an appeal was brought to this court.

The cause was argued by F. C. Loring, for libellants, and by William Gray, for respondents.

For the libellants, it was contended as follows: The matters put in issue by the pleadings are, 1st, the cause of the departure from Velasco; 2d, its sufficiency in point of law, to excuse the departure.

The respondents allege, 1st, that the consignee refused to receive the cargo at Velasco; 2d, that it could not be sold there for enough to pay the freight; and then argue that the master was justified in taking the cargo to New Orleans, and selling it there, and has the right to retain the proceeds in payment of the freight stipulated to be paid on the delivery at Velasco.

The libellants deny both the fact and the law. The alleged refusal of the consignee to receive the cargo, is relied upon as the main ground of defence. The proof of this is drawn from an abandonment made by him to the insurers on the cargo, on account of the unfortunate result of an attempt to land a part of it, and the state of the weather, and from some testimony, as to a refusal by the consignee to pay the freight. The abandonment was a matter between the shippers and insurers, which did not in any wise affect the master, nor discharge him from his contract to land the cargo according to the charter-party. The testimony as to the refusal to pay the freight is by no means satisfactory or unequivocal, and is entitled to little weight. But however this may be, it is fully proved, that afterwards, the consignee urged the master to wait for a favorable opportunity and land the cargo, and promised to pay the freight if landed according to the charter. If there had been a refusal, it was fully retracted, and the parties stood as if none had been made. But if the consignee did refuse, the question remains whether the master was thereby justified in leaving the port, taking the cargo to another port and selling it. By the maritime law, the shippers are bound to pay the freight.

The consignee is not, unless he receive the goods.

The master is bound to carry and deliver the cargo, unless prevented by perils of the seas. He is a mere carrier, having no interest in the cargo, or the result of the adventure; if it arrive at a poor market, it does not diminish his freight. By the charter-party, the owners, not the consignee, were to pay the freight: he therefore did not look to the cargo, and had not even a lien upon it for the freight. His duty was simply to deliver the cargo according to his contract, and look to the charterers for the freight. If after the delivery the consignee had refused to give the stipulated bills on the charterers for the freight, he might perhaps have had the right to sell enough to pay it: at any rate, he would have earned his freight; and if the consignee had then refused to receive the cargo, the loss would have fallen on the owners, and not on the master. Marine Ordinances, bk. 3, tit. 3, § 517; Chickering v. Fowler, 4 Pick. 372; Story, Bailm. pp. 340-350. As to the allegation, that the cargo, if landed, could not have been sold for enough to pay the freight: the fact, if proved, would be wholly immaterial, especially as the freight was payable in New York, and could not be affected by the state of the market at Velasco: but the evidence shows, that if landed in good order, it could have been sold at a large profit, and for much more than the freight. The testimony to the contrary comes from persons who evidently have no knowledge as to this matter. This is the defence set up in the answer; but there is a fact in the case, not stated in the answer, which explains the conduct of the master in going to New Orleans, and clears up the mystery which otherwise overhangs the proceedings at Velasco. It appears, from the testimony of various witnesses, and also from the protests made by him, that he was alarmed for the safety of his vessel, while lying off Velasco; that he considered her to be in a dangerous situation, and did not deem it prudent to remain there longer. There can be no doubt, on the evidence, that this was the true cause for the departure; and none but that this fear was without just cause; and that, if the vessel were seaworthy, it would have been perfectly safe and prudent to have remained, until a favorable opportunity should occur to land the cargo. It was not the alleged refusal of the consignee to receive the cargo, nor the state of the market at Velasco, but an unfounded fear for the safety of his vessel, which induced him to go to New Orleans, against the remonstrance of the consignee. And if this be proved, there can be no question as to the liability of the owners to indemnify the shippers for the loss occasioned thereby. As to damages, the authorities seem to establish the rule, that where the cargo has not been delivered at the port of destination, the amount to be recovered shall be the value at the time and place of shipment, with the addition of ten per centum and interest. The Lively, [Case No. 8,403;] Wheelwright v. Beers, 2 Hall, 391; The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546; Smith v. Richardson, 3 Caines, 319; Bridge v. Austin, 4 Mass. 115; Dusar v. Murgatroyd, [Case No. 4,199;] Gilpins v. Consequa, [Id. 5,452;] Willings v. Same, [Id. 17,766;] Youqua v. Nixon, [Id. 18,189;] The Lucy, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 238. No deduction is to be made for freight, as the cargo was not delivered according to the charter-party. Lawes, Charter Parties, 148; Abb. Shipp. 273. Delivery precedes the right to demand freight. Logs of Mahogany, [Case No. 2,559.] No pro rata freight was earned; the libellants derived no benefit from the carriage to New Orleans, and none can be claimed for the raft landed, because it does not appear that it was landed according to the charter-party, nor in good order, nor how much was landed, and because the contract was to deliver the whole and not a part.

For the respondents, it was contended as follows: The charter-party was merely a personal contract between Simon G. Cottrell and the shippers, and no liability attaches to the owners of the schooner. Cottrell was the owner for the voyage. Taggard v. Loring, 16 Mass. 336; Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829,) p. 22. And as such, neither the general owner nor the vessel is liable for his acts. We concede, as a general proposition, that the ship is bound to merchandise, and merchandise to the ship. Abb. Shipp. 93; Volunteer and Cargo, [Case No. 16,991.] But we contend that this principle does not extend to cases where the general owner is not the owner for the voyage. It is well settled that a lien on a cargo for freight may be displaced by particular circumstances, which denote a clear and determinate abandonment. Logs of Mahogany, [Id. 2,559.] If, therefore, a lien for freight may be displaced, so may a lien upon the vessel; and we take the position that where the owner of the voyage is distinct from the general owner, the lien is displaced. If the owners have made a special contract for the employment of a ship, as was the case here, the master cannot substitute another contract. Abb. Shipp. 99. The owner is not liable for goods clandestinely taken on board. Walter v. Brewer, 11 Mass. 99. In Kleine v. Catara, [Case No. 7,869,] the court say, that where the charterer becomes owner for the voyage, there is no lien of the general owner for freight. It is confined to cases where the carrier for freight is the owner for the voyage. The rights are reciprocal; if the general owner has merely a personal action, the shipper should have no more. Now Cottrell was the owner, and the general owners never received more than $638.58, and the stoves and pipe, valued at $12; and yet it is sought to make them responsible for the whole. If, however, the court is of opinion that the owners of this vessel are liable, then we come to the merits. The making of the charter-party, loading the vessel, and arrival at Velasco, are not disputed. The libellants' ground of action is upon non-delivery at Velasco, going to New Orleans, selling cargo, and retaining proceeds. The non-delivery, sale, &c., are admitted; but the reasons assigned for this course constitute the defence. These are, 1st. That the consignee, who was owner, or agent for the owners, refused to receive the cargo, and to pay the freight according to the charter-party. 2. That the cargo could not have been sold at Velasco for enough to pay freight.

What, then, are the principles of law which govern such a case? The master has a lien upon a cargo for freight, and is not bound to part with the cargo until the freight is paid. Abb. Shipp. 247, 273; Bradstreet v. Baldwin, 11 Mass. 229. An express contract is no waiver of lien. Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324. Volunteer and Cargo, [Case No. 16,991.] It cannot be denied, that he has such lien upon the cargo, and, as a necessary result, has the right to retain it. If, therefore, the master forward goods, or be prevented or discharged from so doing, he is entitled to his whole freight. Hunter v. Prinsep, 10 East, 394. If the consignee refuse to receive the cargo, the master may, by authority of a magistrate, sell a part for payment of his freight, and deposit the rest in a warehouse. Valin, Ord. Mar. bk. 3, tit. 3, art. 17. The voyage being performed, and the master ready to deliver the cargo, he is entitled to freight. [Griswold v. Insurance Co.] 1 Johns. 213; [Ludlow v. Bowne,] Id. 14; [M'Kinstry v. Pearsall,] 3 Johns. 319; [Mayell v. Potter,] 2 Johns. Cas. 371; Abb. Shipp. note, pp. 288, 298; Morgan v. Insurance Co. of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 455. If it could not be sold, he would have a right to carry it to the nearest and most convenient port. But if the cargo could have been sold at Velasco for enough to pay freight, yet, after the refusal of the consignee to accept, the master became agent for the owners of cargo; and the owners of the vessel are not responsible for his acts in that capacity. Then if the master had no right to go to New Orleans, we say, that after the cargo was carried to Velasco, and the consignee refused to receive it, the master thereupon became the agent of the shippers, and his acts in that capacity cannot affect the owners. The Sarah Ann, [Case No. 12,342;] The Gratitude, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 240; 1 Phil. Ins. 192; Stocker v. Harris, 3 Mass. 417; 1 Phil. Ins. 471; Waldens v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 5 Johns. 324, 325; Young v. Smith, 3 Dana, 92. If the consignee refuse to receive the cargo, the master must act as agent for the owners; that is, he alone is accountable to them. It may become important to consider where is the burden of proof; and, in such case, if we show a refusal to receive and pay freight, and the libellants rely upon a waiver, they take the onus.

[Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause has been very fully argued upon the appeal. The merits of the whole controversy mainly turn upon the following points. 1. Whether there was in fact a final refusal on the part of the consignee at Velasco to receive the goods there. 2. If there was, whether the master had a right, under all the circumstances, to carry the same to New Orleans, and there to make sale of them on account of the shippers. 3. If the respondents fail, on these points, to make out a satisfactory defence in proof, whether, as owners of the Cassius, they are responsible for damages to the libellants. 4. If they are so liable, what should be the rule and measure of the damages.

In respect to the liability of the owners of the Cassius, (who have intervened for their own interest,) in this suit, I have no difficulty. The charter-party is in no just sense a mere personal contract of the master. It contains an express stipulation, pledging not only the personal security of the master, but also the Cassius and her freight and appurtenances, for the due fulfilment of the covenants of the charter-party on his side. Now, if the master was, as the owners of the Cassius by their answer assert, owner for the voyage, under a special agreement with them, I do not perceive why he is not to be deemed so for all purposes whatsoever, and to have a perfect right as such owner to pledge the Cassius for the due fulfilment of the charter-party. If, on the other hand, the general owners were owners for the voyage, as I am of opinion upon their own statement of their agreement with the master, they ought to be held to be, then the Cassius is liable upon the charter-party, which is not denied to have been only authorized to be made for the voyage therein stated. What was that agreement, as stated in the answers both of the master and the owners? That the master "should employ and navigate the Cassius, and victual and man her, and should be entitled to retain as his compensation therefor, and for his own services as master, one half of the freight, which should be earned by the Cassius, and he was to pay the other half of the freight to the owners of the said schooner." The owners, then, were, upon acknowledged principles of law, jointly interested with the master in the freight; and jointly responsible with the master to the shippers, as partners or part owners in the freight and profits of the voyage (the gross freight); or he was to receive the half freight in lieu of and as a compensation for his services as master, and then the owners were directly liable as owners for the voyage, as well as general owners. In either view, the case would fall within the principles applicable to the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty by proceedings in rem upon charter parties, which were recognized in the case of The Volunteer, [Case No. 16,991,] with which I have not since seen any reason to be dissatisfied. The case of Taggard v. Loring, 16 Mass. 336, has been cited at the bar as establishing, that the master was owner for the voyage. That case is distinguishable in its actual circumstances from the present. The agreement in that case does not appear from the statements of the Report to have been identical with the present. And if it were, I must say, that I should have some difficulty in acceding to the authority of that case, if it meant to establish, that the master had an exclusive special ownership in the ship for the voyage. I should rather incline to the opinion, that if he had any ownership at all for the voyage, it was in common with the general owners. In the present case there does not appear to be any distinct proof of what the agreement between the owners and master was. None is produced in writing, and none is established in the testimony. It rests wholly upon the answers of the owners and master, whose statements on such a point, even if responsive to the allegations of the libel, (which they are not,) would not of themselves, in a court of admiralty, be satisfactory evidence. Besides, there is this additional consideration, that the charter-party, in this very case, was executed by the master in his character as master, and not as charterer and owner for the voyage. The respondents have admitted, in effect, that he was entitled to make the charter-party; and they held him out to the public, from the nature of this employment as a freighting vessel, as having general authority to bind the owners on a freighting voyage. The secret agreement, therefore, between the master and the owners, as to the shares of the freight between them, or the rights of the master in the navigation and control of the vessel, cannot, as they were not made known to the charterers, bind them, or vary their rights against the general owners. This objection, therefore, in every view is unmaintainable.

Then as to the merits of the case. In the first place, was there any absolute, positive, and final refusal of the consignee to receive the cargo? There certainly is something in the conduct and management both of the master and the consignee in respect to their proceedings at the port of Velasco, which is exceedingly suspicious and mysterious, not to say, which gives rise to great doubts, whether there was not some connivance between them for purposes adverse to the interests of the charterers, on whose account the shipment was made. It has been suggested at the argument, that the consignee was, or at least might fairly be presumed to be, the real owner of the shipment. I see no sufficient foundation for such a suggestion in the facts of the case. It is repugnant to the apparent objects and intentions of the charter-party; and if the consignee had been the intended shipper in the original enterprise, it is inconceivable, why he was not made a direct party to the charter-party. His conduct at Velasco, while it may furnish some reason to doubt (if the evidence is believed) his good faith to the charterers and shippers, cannot be admitted to control their rights or change their property without their knowledge and adoption of all his conduct. It is said, that he might have been made a witness in the cause on the part of the libellants. Perhaps he might, but certainly not without a release, which, if he has sacrificed their interests, they would be very unwise to give. On the other hand, the respondents could have used him as a witness without a release; and if they meant to rely upon his being the owner of the shipment, it was their own fault not to take it, or to exhibit other proofs of the fact, since it is properly a matter of defence to the suit.

The conduct of the master in signing two protests, each of which was false in its statements, as he in his answer on oath now admits, is utterly without excuse. It was done in connivance with the consignee, under the pretence on his side, (as his letter to the master shows), that the landing of the cargo was either impracticable, or so dangerous and expensive, that the whole might be abandoned to the underwriters, and thus the loss thrown on them; when in point of fact, as all the evidence now in the case conclusively shows, the landing might have been effected without danger or difficulty. These protests were drawn up and signed by the master for the purpose of giving this very gloss to the transaction. Neither of these protests alludes in the slightest manner to the refusal of the consignee to receive the cargo. On the contrary, both of these protests, as well as the letter of the consignee, put the case upon the other ground. But I cannot but entertain some suspicion, founded upon the positive evidence in the case, that another motive had its operation upon the mind of the consignee, that is, a desire to have the cargo landed and sold by the master at auction on account of the underwriters, so that it might be bought in at a low price for his own benefit. Be this as it may, for such has been the conduct of these parties that I cannot judicially repose confidence in their acts or statements, if Capt. Hendley is to be believed (and I do not well know what reason to assign why he should not) it is certain that the consignee did subsequently offer to receive the cargo and comply with the charter-party, nay, did require that the cargo should be landed, and the master refused to land it, alleging the dangerous situation of his vessel and the extreme difficulty, if not impracticability, of so doing. Now, even if the consignee did at first refuse to receive the cargo; yet, if before the departure of the Cassius from the port he was willing and ready to receive it, it was the duty of the master to proceed and land it. If he could have landed it (of which there is now no doubt) and he did not, it was a plain breach of the contract. It was an idle pretence to suggest that the cargo could not be sold at Velasco for the want of sufficient money to be had to pay for the same. That was nothing to the master. The freight was not payable in money at Velasco, but was payable by a bill to be drawn by the consignee on New York. It was, therefore, wholly immaterial to the master whether the cargo could be sold at Velasco or not. In this view of the case there was a clear breach of the charter-party by the master, in the non-delivery of the cargo at Velasco.

But, suppose, in the next place, there was a final refusal to receive the cargo by the consignee, did that authorize the master to carry it to New Orleans? The learned counsel for the respondents has insisted, at the argument, that it did. I agree, that in cases of necessity, the master becomes, by mere intendment and authority of law, the agent of all concerned, as well of the owners of the cargo, as of the ship—ut res magis valeat quam pereat. But this right of the master is to be clearly made out by unquestionable proof of such necessity. In the present case, the cargo could have been landed at Velasco, which was the port of destination. Then there was no necessity of carrying it elsewhere. It is said, that it could not have been sold at Velasco, for want of money in the hands of purchasers. Be it so. But there was no necessity of any sale; the cargo was not perishable; and, therefore, the sale would have been unjustifiable on the part of the master; since it would not have been a sale of necessity. The cargo might have been landed and stored, and kept until the charterers at New York could have received information, and given orders as to what should be done with it. But it is said, that the master was not bound to give up the cargo before his freight was paid or secured according to the charter-party; and that he had a right to retain it for the lien created by law. Assuming, that such a lien existed under the terms of the present charter-party, still it is perfectly clear, by the language of the same instrument, that the freight was payable only "on delivery of the cargo at the port of Velasco," and "that no freight was to be paid on such part of the cargo, if any, as may be lost in rafting the same on shore." So that until a right delivery on shore, no freight could accrue due. If the consignee refused to receive the cargo after it was landed, and to give the bill on New York for the freight, then it became the duty of the master to place the same in the hands of some trustworthy person for the security of his lien for the freight, and, subject thereto, for the benefit and account of the owners. But no right, even under such circumstances, could exist on the part of the master to sell the cargo, unless it was perishable, and might otherwise have been lost or have perished, which is not proved or pretended by the answer. A fortiori, if the master had no right to sell at Velasco, because there was no necessity therefor, he could not have a right to carry the cargo to New Orleans and sell it there; since it is just as clear that there was no necessity therefor. This act, therefore, in carrying it to New Orleans, was a gross breach of his duty, and the sale a tortious conversion of the property. It might, perhaps, have admitted of a very different construction, if the cargo could not have been landed at Velasco, or there deposited in safety for the owners; or if the sale at Velasco or at New Orleans had become indispensable from the perishable nature and condition thereof. Such a case has not been made out; and, therefore, it need not be decided upon the present occasion.

It appears to me, therefore, clear that the non-landing of the cargo at Velasco, and the carrying of the cargo to New Orleans, and the sale thereof in that port, are all breaches of duty on the part of the master, for which the respondents are liable.

The only remaining question is as to the rule and measure of damages. It appears to me, that, as the cargo safely arrived at Velasco, and might have been landed there, but for the misconduct of the master, the libellants are entitled to recover the actual value thereof at Velasco, at the time when the same might have been there landed, deducting all duties and charges, and the freight for the voyage, as if the cargo had been duly landed. It is said that no freight was due, because there was no delivery thereof. That is true. But still the cargo was carried there, and if it had been rightly delivered there, the freight would have constituted a charge upon the value in that port. So that, if the libellants are to take the value there, as I think is the true rule, they are to be, as to that value, in the same state and condition as if the cargo had been duly landed, and not in a better state and condition. The rule, adopted in cases of prize, of ten per cent. upon the prime cost, is not applicable to cases like the present. That rule ordinarily supposes, that the vessel has been captured, before she has arrived at the port of destination, and then the court in odium spoliatoris will presume the cargo worth more at the port of destination than the prime cost by ten per cent.; which used to be the old rule of estimating the fair and reasonable profits in ordinary cases, after deducting all charges. But where the vessel actually arrives at the port of destination, in cases like the present, the loss, if any, is susceptible of a more exact computation, by its true and real market value there.

I shall, therefore, refer it to an assessor, to ascertain the value of the cargo at Velasco, deducting the freight and duties, and all other proper charges; and the libellants will be entitled to recover the difference, as the true amount of their loss, with costs. The decree of the district court is, therefore, reversed; and the final decree will be entered according to this opinion.

As the master has died pending the proceedings, and no revivor of the suit, as to him, has been moved for, it is unnecessary to consider whether a proceeding in rem and in personam can be instituted in the admiralty in a case of this sort. The libel must be treated as defunct, so far as the master is concerned.

-
- ARTHUR, (DAVIES v.) See Case No. 3,611.
 ARTHUR, (DODGE v.) See Case No. 3,950.
 ARTHUR, (DUDEN v.) See Case No. 4,112.
 ARTHUR, (GAUTIER v.) See Case No. 5-278.
 ARTHUR, (GODDARD v.) See Case No. 5-489.
 ARTHUR, (HAAS v.) See Case No. 5,885.
 ARTHUR, (KEYSER v.) See Case No. 7,749.
 ARTHUR, (MORRISON v.) See Case No. 9-842.
 ARTHUR, (MURRAY v.) See Case No. 9,956.

INDEX.

[THE REFERENCES ARE TO PAGES.]

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL. Page Defendant not, of course, entitled to continuance on death of plaintiff..... 374 ACTION OR SUIT. A wrongful act causing loss, being single, but one action can be maintained therefor 207 Plaintiff proceeding both at law and in equity, must elect..... 530 A libel in rem may be joined with a libel in personam for breach of a charter party 328 ACTION ON THE CASE. Will lie for false warranty, and averment of scienter is not necessary..... 512 ADMIRALTY. Jurisdiction—In general. The test of jurisdiction is whether the transaction is maritime in character.... 665 Jurisdiction once attached is not divested by further acts on land in continuation of maritime act..... 665 — Persons and property. The district court may take cognizance of a suit by foreign seamen against a foreign vessel.....1146 — Waters and places. What constitutes "high seas"..... 26 Goods seized on land are not subject to condemnation and forfeiture in admiralty..1113 No jurisdiction in case of breach of towage contract on Hudson river between residents of New York..... 10 No jurisdiction of action on contract of carriage by canal boat between New York and Rome in New York state..... 945 — Affreightments; Charter parties, etc. No jurisdiction to afford relief for breach of stipulations of personal nature in charter party,—such as agreement by owner to proceed to another than designated port to find market..... 306 Has jurisdiction of action based on contract of affreightment, though damages may be indirect..... 593 A canal boat having no power of self-propulsion is not subject to a lien in admiralty for breach of a contract of affreightment.. 946 Vessel is liable in admiralty for value of goods shipped wrongfully detained under alleged lien for freight..... 855 — Marine insurance. No jurisdiction over contracts leading to policies of marine insurance..... 885 Cannot reform a policy of marine insurance by an antecedent contract..... 885	Jurisdiction—Pilotage. Page Has jurisdiction in personam as well as in rem for pilotage..... 955 Has jurisdiction notwithstanding pilotage services were rendered under a state law.. 285 Has jurisdiction to enforce lien given by state statute to a pilot whose services were tendered and refused.....617; contra. 1090 Such a case comes within the 14th admiralty rule, and is not governed by rule 12 617 — Shipbuilding. Contract for materials and labor in the construction of a vessel is not maritime, and lien given by local law is not enforceable in admiralty..... 424 — Torts. Proceedings in admiralty may be prosecuted for marine torts in rem and in personam1194 A state statute (Cal.) giving an action for negligence resulting in death cannot apply to negligence on the high seas.....1138 — Towage. Towage services are maritime..... 43 — Wharfage. Has jurisdiction in rem of a claim for double wharfage under N. Y. Act May 6, 1870, for leaving wharf without paying wharfage due..... 987 Procedure. Admiralty will not enforce the equitable title of one to whom a yacht was sold in the presence of the builder by one for whom she was built, against the legal title which never passed from the builder by deed or absolute delivery..... 594 ADVERSE POSSESSION. Possession must be hostile both in its origin and continuance to be adverse..... 97 AFFREIGHTMENT. See, also, "Admiralty;" "Charter Parties;" "Shipping." No freight is due unless cargo is delivered in accordance with terms of shipment at destination.....951, 1194 All claims for freight fall where a voyage is broken up at a port of distress, without consent of shipper, because of great injury to the cargo by perils of the sea..951, 954 Master not authorized to accept cargo on behalf of owner short of port of delivery.. 951 Claiming proceeds of sale at intermediate port is not a ratification of master's act... 951 Master cannot carry cargo to another port where consignees refuse to receive it, but is bound to land and store it.....1194 Where master sells it at another port, owners may recover value at port of delivery1194
---	--

	Page	Page
Giving to shipper credit for freight beyond time for delivery waives lien.....	937	Minor enlisting without consent of parent will be discharged on request of parent 867
Lien for freight is lost by delivering goods to consignee.....	937
Owners of vessel are directly liable for damages to cargo where they share freight with master to whom vessel is chartered, and with whom shippers contract.....	1194
ALIENS.
Immigration.
Exclusion of foreigners when convicts, lepers, etc., within police power of states..	213
Naturalization.
A native of China, of the Mongolian race, is not a white person entitled to naturalization. (R. S. § 2169).....	223
To entitle an alien to naturalization, he must have a territorial residence. Continuous services on board a United States naval vessel is not sufficient. (Act 1802)..	1016
Constant service as a sailor after domicile acquired will not affect right to naturalization	417
Registry must have been made five years before application. (Act 1802.).....	1023
Proof of residence under Act 1802.....	1023
Order of court admitting to citizenship conclusive in absence of fraud.....	52
AMENDMENT.
Not permitted at trial unless defense is just	504
Allowed on appeal in revenue cases or proceedings in rem in district court.....	996
Not allowed on appeal so as to allege damages in an amount to give jurisdiction, though testimony shows the amount..	211
The failure to allege a ground of negligence is amendable where there is no surprise	265
Libel in admiralty may be amended by striking out impertinent and unnecessary allegations	665
APPEAL.
Record must show jurisdiction.....	842
A supreme court justice sitting in the circuit will not review a ruling by a district judge holding a circuit.....	1075
Libellant who does not appeal cannot have damages increased on claimant's appeal	250, 474
New trial not granted because of admission of incompetent testimony where same fact is proved by competent testimony....	450
Judgment will not be reversed because papers recognized on the trial as in evidence were not formally read.....	894
Question of damages in admiralty may be raised upon a remand after affirmance of a decree silent upon such question.....	664
Appeal bonds.
Practice of requiring bond in double amount of decree and costs will not be departed from except under special circumstances rendering it unnecessary.....	701
Operates as a supersedeas and stay of execution without order to that effect....	1179
Court in which action was brought has jurisdiction of a suit on appeal bond therein	1179
Action on, may be brought jointly by obligee claiming interest in the suit.....	1179
ARMY.
The question of the right of exemption from service may be considered on habeas corpus notwithstanding adverse decision of military commission.....	1062
ARREST.
An arrest in New Hampshire for contempt of a register's order in Vermont is illegal, and an imprisonment in pursuance thereof in Vermont is also illegal.....	436
A certified copy of indictment from another judicial district will warrant transfer of person arrested on complaint.....	353
ASSIGNMENT.
One taking an assignment of a demand after fraud committed on the assignor is entitled to all rights of the latter.....	238
Assignment for Benefit of Creditors.
See "Bankruptcy;" "Debtor and Creditor;" "Insolvency;" "Partnership."
ASSUMPSIT.
There may be a recovery under the common counts where plaintiff fails to prove the special contract alleged.....	759
ATTACHMENT.
Lies against absconding debtor under the Virginia law	472
ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.
Proctor for libellant may proceed for costs, after settlement by parties without his knowledge after suit commenced.....	913
AVERAGE.
Adjustment of general average where voyage broken up at intermediate port because of great injury to cargo by perils of sea	951
Commissions of consignees in collecting value of goods before delivering them should be contributed for.....	939
Expenses of causing a general average to be adjusted by an experienced despatcheur should be contributed for.....	939
Repairs of a permanent character not contributed for where vessel seeks port of distress because of incapacity.....	939
Loss from sale of cargo to raise funds, in what proportion contributed for.....	939
Expense of preparing for repairs follows the expense of repairs.....	939
Value of vessel at port of delivery not proper measure of her contributory value. In absence of evidence, amount of insurance may be taken.....	939
BAILMENT.
The bailor of wool and yarn to be manufactured into cloth at a specified price, has a right to the unfinished product on the bankruptcy of the bailee, on an offer to the assignee, to pay the charges, without actual tender.....	37
The bailor can recover the proceeds of a sale by the assignee, less the expenses of manufacture	37
BANKRUPTCY.
Operation and effect of bankrupt laws
—State laws.
What is the uniform operation of the bankrupt laws.....	1075

	Page		Page
Distinction between insolvent and bankrupt laws	141	It is no defense that petitioner is sole creditor	351
A general assignment without preferences is valid, notwithstanding petition pending in voluntary bankruptcy.....	1018	Creditor having adverse interest may defend	995
States may pass bankrupt laws in absence of action by congress.....	141	Practice when debtor denies that requisite creditors have joined.....	995
Act N. Y. April 3, 1811, is an insolvent and not a bankrupt law.....	141	Acts of bankruptcy.
Jurisdiction of courts.		Gift of all property to wife.....	351
Scope of jurisdiction of circuit court, original and appellate, in bankruptcy and its exercise.....	348	Secretion of goods by purchaser to prevent attachment.....	1017
Proceedings in bankruptcy will not lie against railroad in hands of receivers appointed by state courts.....	328	Mortgage to one creditor, as a preference in contemplation of bankruptcy.....	1181
A general creditors' bill in a state court filed after proceedings in bankruptcy commenced gives no jurisdiction, nor can jurisdiction be conferred by consent of the assignee	831	"In contemplation of bankruptcy" defined	1181
A voluntary bankrupt cannot be arrested on an execution for debt before final examination is passed	1007	Transfer so construed.....	1181
Bankrupt arrested on state process in action on debt contracted in fraud, not entitled to release on habeas corpus in federal court.....	557	The fact that a transfer was compelled by the debtor does not prevent its being a fraudulent preference, and an act of bankruptcy	1181
A creditor who has not received notice of the proceedings, nor any dividend, nor proved his debt, cannot sue on his debt pending the discharge. His remedy is to oppose the discharge.....	1084	Change of security,—held not to constitute act of bankruptcy.....	292
An agreement signed by a married woman to save part of her rights taken away under coercion of judicial proceedings, set aside in a court of bankruptcy.....	831	Schedule.
A voluntary proceeding may be prosecuted in the district where the debtor has carried on business for the requisite time, irrespective of residence.....	271	Petitioner only required to use appropriate forms for schedule of property and debts	1012
Involuntary proceedings cannot be prosecuted against an Alabama railroad corporation in a district court in New York where it has its general offices, but no railroad	271	Judgment due firm should be scheduled in firm's name.....	1012
The business of a railroad corporation within the meaning of the law can only be carried on where its railroad is, or is to be, constructed, maintained, and operated. The fact that its officers and directors meet and act within a certain district does not give jurisdiction.....	271	Debts owing to newspapers should be scheduled in names of proprietors.....	1015
Service of process on a debtor corporation must be within the jurisdiction of the court. This notwithstanding the debtor is incorporated in several states.....	275	A person who has not regularly appeared or proved debt cannot file protest against being named as creditor.....	584
Petition—Voluntary bankruptcy.		Adjudication.
Petition will not be allowed to be filed where writing is illegible.....	1024	The decree in bankruptcy retroacts to the time of verification of the petition.....	40
Filing of petition erroneously naming judge not permitted.....	1014	An adjudication will not be made in opposition to debtor in voluntary proceedings, after he has begun proceedings for composition	557
— Involuntary bankruptcy.		Notice to creditors.
A creditor holding security which falls short of debt by $250 may petition.....	351	Notice to all creditors is not necessary to give the court full and complete jurisdiction as to all debts of the bankrupt....	1084
Creditor holding immature note of bankrupt may petition.....	351	Notice of meeting to creditor by wrong name is ineffectual.....	1012
A railroad corporation is a "business" corporation against which a petition will lie	90,	A notice to "Levley, New York" is insufficient	1084
Charter authorizing railroad company to manufacture materials for equipment does not constitute the company a "manufacturer."	275	Direction in warrant as to mode of service	1013
Sufficiency of allegations in petition against railroad company.....	275	Sufficiency of return of marshal.....	82
Commercial paper charged to have been suspended should be described or identified	995	Assignee—Appointment and removal.
Insolvency alone of mercantile partners is no ground of petition.....	292	Assignee will be appointed though no creditors have proved debts and no assets are found.....	1012
The verification and presentation of the petition need not be simultaneous.....	40	Single creditor proving debt and attending first meeting entitled to name assignee.....	1013
Date of filing petition, presumptions, record	281	Election of assignee at his suggestion by one creditor who alone appeared at first meeting of creditors, not sanctioned.....	2
		Removal of assignee, when not reviewable in circuit court.....	176 — Rights, duties, and liabilities.
		As against attaching creditors assignee has no right to attached moneys, released on giving bond and deposited to indemnify bondsmen	315
		The assignee is the agent for the creditors, and the fund in his hands is considered as appropriated to their use.....	238
		Assignee selling property held by bankrupt under conditional sale must account for proceeds.....	521
		The limitation of two years for an action against assignee does not apply to a case of fraud by the bankrupt upon his wife, except from the time of its discovery.....	831
		Assignment.
		Clerk must record original deed of assignment	354

Estate of bankrupt; Encumbrances; Sale.	Page	Discharge—Acts of bankrupt barring discharge.	Page
Property of which the assignee does not take possession remains in the bankrupt..	778	Where creditors do not oppose discharge, the court will not of its own motion refuse it, notwithstanding commission of acts barring it.....	1054
Land of wife standing in husband's name will not be subjected to liens of creditors	831	Failure to keep proper books of account will prevent discharge without reference to intent or harmless result.....	1086
Register has no power on motion of assignee and creditors to order bankrupt to execute release deeds.....	3	Failure to keep an account of cash business and of dealings with creditors for more than a year prior to bankruptcy will prevent discharge.....	1088
The discretion of the bankruptcy court to exercise jurisdiction to liquidate liens on bankrupt's realty cannot be delegated to or assumed by the register.....	167	Books showing only aggregate monthly purchases and sales not "proper books of account"	923
Real estate should not be sold until all liens and their priorities are ascertained..	167	Where notwithstanding errors and erasures in books of account a competent accountant could gain a correct idea of the business, discharge not refused.....	1054
Court may order sale of realty free from encumbrances (Act March 2, 1867), but such sale not directed where no notice was given to encumbrancers.....	1011	A purchase with intent not to pay is a "debt by fraud.".....	557
Purchaser at assignee's sale of real estate in another state, not entitled to confirmation of sale to perfect his title.....	327	A bankrupt, claiming want of knowledge of his insolvency at time of conveying property to his wife, four months prior to voluntary proceedings, who does not repair his error, is not entitled to discharge.....	82
Exception to confirmation of sale of realty by assignee, free of encumbrances, will be sustained where court has declared sale subject to dower right.....	914	Fraudulent transfers before the passage of the act (Aug. 19, 1841) when no bar to a discharge.....	786
Estate of bankrupt not liable for tort of assignee	136	The transfer, prior to and in contemplation of the passage of the bankruptcy act of 1841, to some creditors of money and other assets in full discharge of their debts, while others get nothing, is a preference, though obtained by threats of suit....	786, 788
Proof and payment of debts: Dividends.		Preferences given by confession of judgments prior to passage of the Act of 1841 will prevent discharge not assented to by majority of unpreferred creditors.....	1015
Proof of debts to be sent to assignee...	1014	Bankrupt will be given time to get such assent	1015
Officers of corporation to make proof of debts due must receive special appointment	292	A retiring partner of an insolvent firm, receiving payment for his interest, is not a creditor (Act 1841, § 2).....	788
Landlord of bankrupt, held entitled to rent from assignee.....	1075	— Scope and effect.
A debt guaranteed may be proved as unsecured, without surrendering the guaranty	829	Bankrupt, filing individual petition, is entitled to discharge as to partnership debts scheduled, without bringing in other partners, where there are no partnership assets	3
A fire policy is a "contingent liability" of the insurance company entitling insured to share in dividends where loss occurs before order for final dividends.....	716	Prohibited and fraudulent transfers.
Inaccuracy of record in regard to claim and limitation as a defense no ground of expunging proof	327	Construction of section 35 of Bankrupt Act of 1867.....	894
Debt due to foreign state for taxes not entitled to preference.....	588	Payment by insolvent maker to endorser on promissory note, with knowledge of insolvency, is a fraudulent preference, and may be recovered by assignee.....	220
Expenses of attachment begun before bankruptcy proceedings should not be allowed against the estate.....	1084	An insolvent trader may mortgage his stock and tools for present and future advances to continue his business, and also past advances already, though inadequately, secured	746
Examination of bankrupt.		A prior parol agreement to give security does not prevent its being a preference..	746, 1181
Application for, must be on affidavit or verified petition.....	78	Advances made in good faith pending preparation of mortgage to secure them will be protected.....	746
Examination by one creditor, does not bar examination by others.....	81	A voluntary settlement in favor of an illegitimate child by solvent father is good as against subsequent creditors.....	1027
Costs: Fees: Deposit.		Conveyance to wife by one in embarrassed circumstances, in consideration of loan barred by statute, is fraudulent....	1054
Affidavit that debtor is unable to pay costs is not "proof to the satisfaction of court" to relieve from payment.....	837	Settlement upon wife by one in embarrassed circumstances is fraudulent, where existing debts were all paid by other obligations resulting in bankruptcy.....	1062
Fees of register.....	354	A bona fide general assignment made a year before a petition in bankruptcy is valid	1127
Fee allowed counsel for preparation of schedule	867	A judgment note given when all parties considered the debtor solvent, and a judg-
A petitioner will not be reimbursed for advances as security for fees.....	1012
Balance of the deposit remaining in register's hands goes to assignee.....	1012
Discharge—Proceedings to obtain.
Steps preliminary to the granting of a certificate of discharge.....	784
Notice need say nothing about second or third meeting of creditors, where bankrupt does not make application within three months	1014
Notice must be by publication where there are no assets, and no debts proved..	1012
Act June 22, 1874, § 12, requiring the joining of creditors in the petition, is inapplicable where judgment has been given and a warrant served and executed before passage of act.....	912

ment taken in good faith the day before filing petition, held not fraudulent.....	1144
A seller who, suspecting insolvency, induces buyer to give up goods in greater part purchased from others, in full satisfaction, is liable for their amount to the assignee	1017
Payment of matured notes by transfer of flour in transit, held not fraudulent....	1162
Overdrafts by a merchant in collusion with a defaulting teller, for which a deed of preference is given to the bank one month prior to a default decree in bankruptcy, held sufficient to constitute reasonable cause of belief of insolvency rendering deed void.....	331
Repeated failures to fulfill promises to pay with knowledge of other debts, charges creditor taking mortgage with notice of insolvency.....	1134 — Suit by assignee.
Assignee in bankruptcy may impeach transfer by bankrupt as fraudulent.....	504
Alleged fraudulent transferee may be enjoined from disposing of same, pending involuntary proceedings.....	14
A suit brought 7 years after the assignee's appointment is barred by the statute of limitations (Act March 2, 1867, § 2) for want of due diligence in discovering the fraud.....	878
Under an allegation that defendant did "transfer, assign and convey" plaintiff not limited to proof of technical assignment under state laws.....	894
Creditors obtaining judgment and issuing execution with knowledge of insolvency of debtor, are liable for amount of sale where assignee purchased.....	850
Review.
A person not a party to the proceeding below cannot file petition for review.....	281
Proceedings not passed upon in the district court cannot be availed of as error on review	281
Statement of counsel that they are authorized by a corporation to file petition for review of proceedings is conclusive as to authority	275
Service of petition for review on attorney for creditor filing petition below is sufficient	275
Arrangement with creditors.
Creditors desiring confirmation of resolution appointing trustees are the moving parties and should serve their papers on opposing parties.....	722
A person acting under a power of attorney to accept composition to pay in twelve months from Feb. 16 cannot make composition to pay in twelve months from March 16.....	347
A composition agreed upon by the requisite majority will be confirmed where of benefit to all, though the debtor acted solely in his own interest.....	439
Repealing acts.
Act of March 3, 1843, repealing the Bankruptcy Law, saved all cases commenced before its passage.....	924
BILLS, NOTES, AND CHECKS.
Bona fide payment by maker to fraudulent holder discharges the debt.....	366
Agent liable for failure to make demand and give notice.....	483
Demand and notice excused where drawer has no funds and no reason to expect payment	483
Endorsee not required to prove consideration of negotiable paper until it is shown to have been put in circulation by fraud or undue means.....	156

BILLS OF LADING.
When quantity of cargo uncertain master is bound to tender bills of lading stating quantity only as more or less.....	552
Injury to bags caused by bleaching powders mixed with water, and spilled from casks stowed without dunnage by the rotting of the wood by water coming in from the deck and water ways, not within exception of dangers of the sea.....	1057
Shipper bound to pay freight only on actual weight where freight is to be paid at a certain rate per pound, and printed bill of lading has written condition "contents and weight unknown"	855
BONDS.
See, also, "Municipal Corporations;" "Principal and Surety." Bonds on appeal, see "Appeal."
Bond given under statute void so far as it exceeds requirements thereof.....	1160
A law requiring county bonds to be certified and registered cannot be evaded by antedating bonds voted before but not issued until after its passage.....	1050
Holders of negotiable railroad aid bonds as collateral security for debts are bona fide holders for value.....	465
Error in judgment or want of skill not breach of a bond to faithfully execute duties of office.....	393
A suit on an administration bond payable to the governor by name, must be in his name, and not by his style of office.....	1121
Petition in suit upon marshal's bond should ask actual damages.....	177
In sci. fa. against bail, interest not allowed on judgment rendered against principal	993
BOTTOMRY — RESPONDENTIA.
See, also, "Shipping."
A bond given for a larger sum than advanced to deceive the underwriter on the vessel is void for all purposes.....	947
When a bottomry contract is void for fraud, no recovery can be had as upon an implied contract and lien.....	947
A bottomry bond binds both the ship and her earnings.....	820
Advances by the charterer on account of freight will be paid out of freight in preference to subsequent bottomry.....	820
CHARTER-PARTIES.
See, also, "Affreightment;" "Shipping."
A charter party made by agents who were part owners to enable an individual creditor to repay himself out of earnings, is void as against the vessel and other owners	593
Charter party, held a contract of affreightment and not a letting of entire ship.	30
Burden is on carrier to prove quantity carried under charter fixing freight at stipulated price per ton.....	552
Fire accidentally originating on board a vessel is not a "danger of the sea" within exception of charter party excusing restoration to owners	250
Owners may recover full value, notwithstanding such vessel was stranded at the time, if her value was not materially diminished thereby	250
Charter money preceding destruction may be allowed as damages.....	250
CHATTEL MORTGAGES.
Contract to buy machinery and let another have it to manufacture cloth from, to be paid by sales of such cloth, construed as equitable mortgage.....	540	Steam vessel meeting sail vessel. Page

A contract in effect an equitable mortgage need not be recorded as between the parties and third persons with notice.....	540	Steamer approaching ship at night, when in doubt should slacken speed, and, if necessary, reverse	190, 194
A mortgagee of an unfinished article will hold the additions by accretion	746	Steam vessels meeting.
		Article 13 of Act 1864 requiring steamers to port, only applies when they are meeting end on with risk of collision	598
CHINESE.		Vessels moored, etc.
See, also, "Aliens."		Vessel properly moored at wharf not bound to keep watch on board.....	791
A state statute imposing conditions on Chinese immigrants not imposed on other immigrants is in violation of Act May, 1870	213	Dredging machines have rights of vessels at anchor	643
CLERK OF COURT.		Vessel colliding with another at anchor has burden of proving accident inevitable	643, 791
Calendar fee	406	River and harbor navigation.
Fees for making up record in admiralty..	406	Customs of navigation of North river are the same as the nautical usages at sea	1107
Fees for filing and recording paper.....	817	Ferryboats not absolved from general rules of navigation in making slips.....	1130
A paper is not "filed" until endorsed by the clerk	817	Tug chargeable with notice when steamer is to leave her berth on regularly appointed and notorious trip.....	957
Fees in bankruptcy proceedings	354	Steamship making a maneuver in a slip is liable for damages to her tug caused by the parting of a spring line used to check her sternway	915
Reasonable compensation when no provision made by law, determined by allowance in similar cases.....	1025	Speed: Fog.
Fees for seizure on water for breach of revenue laws determine amount for seizure on land	1025	It is negligence for a steamer to enter Milwaukee harbor at a speed of eight miles an hour	425, 427
COLLEGES.		Ferryboats crossing harbors at night or in fog should proceed with great caution.....	791
Construction of the charter of Bowdoin College and its amendments and modifications	489	Lights; signals, etc.
The power to make alterations and modifications in the charter of Bowdoin College and the manner of its exercise.....	489	Vessel assenting by signal to faulty maneuver, equally liable	299
A college (Bowdoin) privately founded though chartered by the state is not a public corporation	489	Steamers must keep courses agreed upon by signal	425, 427
The visitatorial power of college trustees, its scope and exercise	489	Steamboat has no absolute right to direct another's course by her whistle	598
COLLISION.		Ignorance of language by persons in charge of vessel at anchor in track of navigation will not excuse failure to observe directions by approaching vessels	434
Nature of the liability—Contributive fault.		A vessel sailing at night without lights or a lookout forward, prima facie at fault..	645
Vessels have a right to assume in the absence of knowledge to the contrary that other vessels are complying with statutory regulations	1110, 1112	Lookouts.
Inevitable accident will not be presumed, but must be clearly proved by party setting it up	791	Absence of competent lookout is a circumstance strongly condemnatory	824
Where collision between a steamer and sloop is caused by the act of the master of the sloop in jumping overboard on seeing the peril, he cannot recover.....	1185	Lookout forward necessary for vessel sailing in harbor in daytime	209
Tug's negligence in not carrying proper lights cannot be imputed to tow in libel against colliding steamer	265	Vigilant lookout required on ferry boats crossing East River	602
Absence of all hands from posts of duty save the pilot, though inexcusable, yet if it did not contribute to collision does not render vessel liable	602	Passengers cannot be regarded as lookouts unless specially designated by master as such	791
Rules of navigation.		Particular instances of collision.
Supervising inspectors have power to make rules not inconsistent with general rules of navigation	645	Between sail vessels in thick weather..	526
Sail vessels meeting.		Between sail vessels, of different speed, due to hazardous movement of one.....	285
General rules for sail vessels meeting... 487		Between sail vessels meeting in Long Island sound on different tacks	980
Vessel going free should pass astern of vessel close hauled	209	Between steamer and brig not carrying adequate lights.....	1110, 1112
Vessel close hauled on the wind has right of way over vessel sailing free, and must hold her course	1107	Between steamer and ship in Irish Channel at night where steamer's conduct was erratic, because of change of course by ship	190, 194
Vessel sailing free must not come so near vessel close hauled as to create apprehension of danger of collision	1107	Between steam and sail vessel in fog	339, 824, 936
When a vessel is tacking and out of command, other vessels must avoid her.....	209	Between steamer bound to sea and drifting bark	390
		Between steamer and schooner at sea at night where schooner changed her course..	400
		Between steamer and schooner, caused by schooner's change of course to avoid another schooner	789
		Between steamers, both of which failed to port in time	299
		Between ferryboat and propeller.....	1130

	Page		Page
Between steamboat and ferry boat in East River	598, 602	The fourteenth amendment implies equal exemption with others of same class from all charges and burdens of every kind.....	213
Between steamer and tow in Milwaukee harbor	425, 427	Rights and powers given to Bowdoin College trustees by its charter can only be divested in the manner pointed out therein.	489
Between bark in tow of tug without the required lights for a tow and steamer at night, without lookout	265, 270	Illinois Act 1838-9 "to quiet possession and confirm titles to land" unconstitutional as a legislative adjudication	1187
Between tows of steamboats meeting on Hudson river	597	N. Y. Act May 6, 1870, fixing rates of wharfage and providing penalties in double wharfage for nonpayment is not unconstitutional	987
Between brig anchored in track of navigation and vessel in tow	434
Between dredge anchored at mouth of river and tug and bark	292
With vessel at anchor where colliding vessel not clearly proven	930
Between steamer with a row and sloop at anchor, near shore, caused by steamer's taking inshore course, too great speed, and want of lookout	45
Procedure.		CONTEMPT.
Hearing will be given without proof where pleadings admit liability	643	Refusal by bankrupt to obey register's order to produce his books and papers is a contempt	436
Rule of damages.
It is no defense that the damage would have been less had the vessel been strongly built	791	CONTRACTS.
The vessel is to be paid for at her value when lost	487	General rules of construction	72
Pending "freight" recoverable includes earnings in transporting goods for owners of vessel	487	Mutual understanding governs construction	72
Failure to discover a leak will not charge owners with damage to cargo, where examinations made immediately after collision revealed no injury	791	The rule lex loci contractus discussed..	141
Costs of raising sunken vessel to ascertain if she could be repaired may be added to the value, where there is a total loss	604	Oral contract for sale of merchandise in New York, valid in Rhode Island where made, is enforceable in New York though void under its statute of frauds	512
Cost of cargo at place of shipment with expenses and charges, insurance and interest allowed	342, 487	A promise of indemnity against a private wrong or public crime (libel) is void in law.	1177
Interest on items of damages are allowable	604
Interest allowed on recovery for demurrage, and also reasonable sum for care of cargo	389	CONVERSION: TROVER.
Division of damages.		A purchaser at sheriff's sale on credit, the property being retained as security, has sufficient title to maintain an action for its conversion	22
Loss divided where both in fault	487	Tender of storage charges for goods held adversely not necessary	508
Where steamer and tug held liable for injury to tow, steamer bound for only half damages though value of tug will not make up the other half	270	Expression of intention to retain goods demanded, evidence of conversion.....	508
Review.
On affirmation of decree in collision, interest allowed on damages assessed and not on decree which also includes interest	390	CORPORATIONS.
		Kansas state legislature may amend by special act charter of corporation created by territorial legislature and continued by constitution	106
COMMERCE.		A decision declaring an election of officers illegal and void, is ineffectual until decree entered, and until then their acts are binding though they had notice of the decision.	919
Determination of amount of tonnage tax discretionary with congress	212	The overdraft of a bank account by officers of a corporation is ratified by the directors ordering the issuing of the company's note for the amount.....	919
Tonnage tax on foreign vessels exporting goods is constitutional	212	Notice to stockholder, or one afterwards becoming an officer, is not notice to corporation	178
		Knowledge of a lien on corporate property by stockholders, prior owners, will not affect the corporation where other stockholders are ignorant	178
CONFUSION OF GOODS.
By mutual consent of owners, makes them tenants in common sharing in proportion contributed	136	COSTS.
		Not allowed on dismissal for want of jurisdiction	10
CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.		Not allowed on reversal in circuit court for want of jurisdiction.....	211
Presumption in favor of constitutionality of state laws	141	Libellant cannot recover costs where amount of liability is tendered before suit.	285
Retrospective laws divesting vested rights are not ex post facto laws, nor repugnant to constitution	296	Seamen not compelled to give security for costs on suing for wages, because amount is small	1089
Retrospective state law allowing ejected occupants of land to recover for improvements not unconstitutional	296	Costs of former trial imposed as terms for new trial for newly-discovered evidence	229
Insolvent laws, though retroactive, are not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts	141	Travel fees allowed for witness residing out of state, more than 100 miles from place of trial, attending upon mere request, though his deposition is on file. .844; contra	992
		Lawyer's fee not taxed in equity suit against executors and administrators (in Virginia)	1100

COUNTIES.	Page	Page
In Oregon, a county is a body politic, and may take a note or bond and mortgage and enforce same in courts	370
Procedure in enforcing security for a loan	370
COURTS.
Comparative authority of Federal and state courts: Process.
Federal courts may exercise jurisdiction as to accounts of executors, etc., if jurisdiction of state court has not attached	439
The federal court may so control its process as not to violate local laws.....	1068
The state court can make no order or decree which shall interfere directly or indirectly with a mandamus issued from the federal court	1068
Where vessel attached in state court, marshal cannot disturb possession on libel in rem in admiralty	1008
Concurrent jurisdiction of state and federal courts in enforcing liens against vessels	1008
Federal court on habeas corpus to release bankrupt arrested on process in state court, not bound by case made in state court as to whether debt sued on was contracted in fraud	557
Federal court cannot examine order of Pennsylvania orphans' court directing sale of realty to pay intestate's debts	486
Levy by sheriff valid in state courts will be held valid in federal court in bankruptcy	1144
State court practice in summoning jurors, does not become practice of federal courts until expressly adopted	575
Grounds of jurisdiction.
Federal courts have jurisdiction of suits by individuals on marshals' bonds, irrespective of citizenship.....	177
Jurisdiction of an action under the patent laws depends upon the subject matter and not upon citizenship	444
In an action under the patent laws neither plaintiff nor defendant need be an inhabitant of the state where brought. It is sufficient if the writ is served personally upon defendant in the district	444
Residence of persons having equitable interest in subject matter of suit at law immaterial	156
Jurisdiction on ground of diverse citizenship will not be taken of a suit to enjoin issue of county bonds unless complainant's liability is shown to exceed $500	106
An allegation that complainant sues "on behalf of all others similarly situated" will not give jurisdiction	106
Circuit courts.
The circuit court for the middle district of Alabama has jurisdiction to review an adjudication in bankruptcy by district court	275
District courts.
The district courts have jurisdiction of all cases of marine trespass or tort	765
The general jurisdiction of the district courts includes prize cases	799
Jurisdiction of seizure on high seas belongs to court into which property is brought	26
The district court of the district within which seizure for violation of customs laws is made has original jurisdiction	26
The locus rei sitae gives jurisdiction in suits in rem	72
The district court for district of Oregon has concurrent jurisdiction over Columbia river	983
Vessel in basin at Jersey City moored to piles 40 feet from dock is within jurisdiction of district court for southern district of New York	1100
Territorial courts.
Effect of Colorado enabling act upon the territorial courts, and causes pending therein	750, 753
Local courts.
County court in Oregon sitting as probate court has jurisdiction to compel specific performance by administrator of intestate vendor	132
Justice of peace in District of Columbia has no jurisdiction of suits against administrators	128
CRIMES.
An offence created by law falls by a repeal of the law without reservation of jurisdiction	1032
Robbery committed in the Indian country is not punishable with death, but as larceny (Act 1790, § 8; Act 1834, § 5).....	999
CUSTOMS DUTIES.
Customs laws.
Not construed beyond natural import of language	84
Articles grouped together are to be deemed of a kindred nature	84
Free list.
French silk gloves (Act 1834).....	84
Worsted shawls (Act 1832).....	301
Prohibited importations.
Articles imported in boxes embellished with indecent and obscene prints are subject to forfeiture.....	1024
Manifest.
Must name shipper, and in case of return of part of cargo must show by whom shipped out and to whom consigned inward	1113
Goods will be forfeited for nonproduction of manifest not satisfactorily accounted for	1113*
Invoice: Appraisal.
"Actual cost" in revenue act means bona fide purchase price, not market value	395
Charges and expenses not to be added to determine whether wool is dutiable (Act 1832)	1142
Deductions should be allowed from nominal value of imports for foreign depreciated currency	573, 574
Violations of law.
Onus probandi in cases of seizure for violating customs laws is on libellant.....	36
Domestic goods shipped from foreign port to aid in concealing foreign goods, liable to forfeiture	1113
Evidence of prior fraudulent shipments admissible on libel to forfeit goods for evading duties	395
A libel against a vessel for the penalty for smuggling must show ownership of vessel and value of goods	1053
Proof of foreign growth or manufacture of alleged unlawfully imported goods is not necessary	64
Section 27 and not section 50 of the act of 1799 applies where the goods imported are unladen before the vessel has arrived within a collection district	64
Collection officers.
The government cannot be prejudiced by an opinion or promise of its collector made after he left office	856

Fees, compensation, and disbursements of collectors of ports and deputies	904
Collector of port, by failing to keep and transmit yearly accounts of incidental expenses, does not forfeit right to reimbursement, but only liable to penalty	904

DAMAGES.

Owners of privateer not liable for amount paid in compromise by vessel seized by belligerent as prize for want of papers plundered by privateer.....	765
Loss of voyage is not an item of damages in case of marine trespass.....	765
When excessive in patent cases.....	450
Vindictive damages not allowable against owners of privateer for trespasses committed by crew.....	765

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

The equities of the creditors of a bankrupt in a secret fraudulent trust fund are at least equal to those of creditors of the owner of such fund.....	238
Concealment of assets and misrepresentations in settlement is a good defense to a suit by the debtor to recover an excess in per cent. paid to defendant over other creditors	1142
Agreement by part of creditors to take assignment of debtor's property to apply on account of debts of all creditors is valid as against a creditor not present at the meeting	86
The rule as to marshalling assets, and its application to judgment creditors.....	577
Payments on running account will be appropriated to items in order of dates.....	1095
When payment will be appropriated in law to extinguishment of debt secured by lien rather than unsecured debt.....	1037

DEPOSITIONS.

Should not be taken merely de bene esse in case of old age, sickness, or going abroad	450
Time of taking, generally.....	450
Notice to counsel of taking is necessary when witness is within 100 miles.....	450
Notice of taking must be given to attorney of record.....	1104
When taken to be used against U. S. its attorney must be notified.....	1104
A commission directed to five commissioners must be executed by all of them.....	1139
Effect of error in caption.....	450
Taken and filed by one party may be read in evidence by the other.....	894
Admitted on condition that opposite party have opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, when	229
Answers to cross interrogatories not dependent upon a direct interrogatory, answer to which was ruled out, are admissible	564

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

A woman claiming an estate as widow and heir at law, must give other proof than her mere statement where her right is contested	777
A foreign bill of exchange protested does not bind the heir of the drawer.....	577
Heir is not liable to judgment creditor of his ancestor for profits received before filing bill	577
Agreement among distributees that no administration shall be taken, and that one shall hold and manage the estate for all, not enforceable.....	514

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

Not entitled to fees in prize cases as for extra services. Such fees belong to the government	932
---	-----

DOMICILE.

Person who still lives part of every year in his original home, may claim his citizenship there though he has another home in another state	1181
---	------

DOWER.

Widow not entitled to damages in equity for non-assignment of dower where husband did not die seised.....	383
---	-----

EJECTMENT.

Not necessary to show title out of proprietaries of Pennsylvania.....	486
Color of title in good faith must be such as would pass the land if a better title were not shown.....	1187
Possession for seven years without color of title, no defense under Illinois limitation law of 1835.....	1187

ELECTIONS.

Members of election returning board of state are state and not federal officers, even when canvassing votes for presidential electors.....	828
--	-----

EMBARGO: NON-INTER-COURSE.

No penalty attached for loading without inspection	69
Departure from any place within jurisdictional limits, although not a port, is within the provisions of the act.....	926
What necessity will excuse from forfeiture	1100
Intention of touching off port of United States for supplies, and of terminating voyage in United States if lawful not cause of forfeiture.....	926
Bringing British vessel with British cargo captured on high seas by French vessel and given to American crew, into United States port, not a violation of act.....	202
Section 3 of the Act of 1808 not repealed by Act of 1809, c. 91.....	1100

EQUITY.

Will not relieve against a forfeiture of life insurance incurred by nonpayment of premiums on the day stipulated.....	846
Will not enjoin defense of statute of limitations on the ground that the cause of action was originally good and valid.....	856
Bill against third person to enforce equitable mortgage of chattels—Sufficiency of averments	540

ESTOPPEL.

An agent invoicing goods as purchaser, is estopped to claim that he is a producer or manufacturer	395
Recitals in bond estop parties thereto in action thereon	504
A verified complaint by persons in possession of land to compel a transfer of legal title from persons alleged to hold in trust for them estops them in subsequent ejectment to allege an adverse holding....	97
A parol contract set out in the bill is of same force against plaintiff as though in writing	240

A promise without consideration of a collector of customs not to plead the statute of limitations is neither enforceable in law nor equity856, 863

EVIDENCE.

Judicial notice.
Will be taken that the collection district of Oregon is within limits of the United States 64

Presumptions: Burden of proof.

Presumptions are against a person who withholds his books of account..... 14
Letters not presumed to have been received on proof of mailing only..... 450

Proceedings to sell real estate to pay intestate's debts, presumed authorized after 48 years 486

Burden of proof of necessity of spoliation in action for unlawful seizure.....1178

Best and secondary.
One who has destroyed a paper to prevent its being used in evidence cannot prove its contents by secondary evidence..1113

Documentary.

Sworn answer in chancery evidence in bankruptcy1015

Certificate of clerk is no evidence of character or legal effect of paper, but only as to its being a true copy..... 370

Parol, to vary writing.

Where writing is manifestly incomplete, parol evidence is admissible as to matters not defined therein..... 411

Previous course of dealing is admissible to show intention in respect to time and mode of delivery and payment not set out in contract of purchase..... 411

Accidental omission from shipping articles of agreed time of voyage, supplied by parol1043

Oral evidence admissible to show deed absolute intended as mortgage...374, 778, 896

Declarations.

Of agent, admissible against principal when part of res gestae..... 229

General declarations of testator applicable to any will are not competent to prove execution of a particular will..... 102

Competency: Relevancy: Materiality.

Invoices of shipments in July and August are admissible to show market value of goods shipped in May..... 395

Foreign market value of goods may be proven by testimony of domestic merchants 395

Weight and sufficiency.

Positive testimony is of greater weight than negative testimony..... 7

A direct conflict between equally credible witnesses must be resolved in favor of the one having best opportunity to know the facts 7

Want of credit in the owners of a vessel, in the case of supplies furnished, is shown by proof of an attachment and a mortgage of the vessel to release it.....1095

EXCEPTIONS (BILL OF.)

When motion for allowance of bill of exceptions in a patent case will be granted by the circuit court..... 450

EXECUTION.

Levy by sheriff, by a description of the debtor's lands indorsed on the writ, held sufficient1144

Levy may be made for whole amount of judgment though conditional..... 465

Recitals in forthcoming bond..... 591
Sheriff's return to an execution cannot be impeached collaterally.....1144
Execution will be enforced where terms on which it was suspended under consent decree not complied with..... 842

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

Payment to foreign administrator, no defense to suit by administrator of the state of debtor's domicile..... 992

A receipt by one of four testamentary guardians to himself as executor discharges himself as executor..... 577

Where an executor who was also a guardian charges himself as guardian with a specific legacy to his ward, both he and the sureties on his executor's bond are discharged from liability..... 577

Declaration on promise by one as administrator must aver assets to charge him personally de bonis propriis..... 158

FIXTURES.

A mortgagee of trade fixtures has a good lien as against assignee in bankruptcy 746

FORFEITURE.

Vessel engaged in slave trade liable to forfeiture though taken before slaves are on board 362

FRAUDS (STATUTE OF.)

Sales at public auction not within statute1091

An oral agreement among purchasers at a public sale is void.....1091

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Intention of parties, and not fact of payment, is the test in determining fraud.... 383

Presumption of fraud arising from non-payment of consideration, etc., is rebutted by subsequent payment in good faith under prior agreement..... 383

Conveyance by debtor is fraudulent if no consideration is paid and no security or evidence of indebtedness is taken, or if payment of consideration is falsely admitted 383

Possession and control by grantor is evidence of fraud..... 383

Transfer of furniture between persons living in same house, who continue use as before, is fraudulent..... 504

A transfer with intent to defraud creditors is void, notwithstanding adequate consideration paid 383

Defendants must contradict and explain every fact tending to cast suspicion upon the conveyance..... 383

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

See, also, "Executors and Administrators."

Where a guardian without bond assumes a debt to his ward, his heirs are not liable 577

INDIANS.

Indian country is not within exclusive jurisdiction of United States under treaties with Indian tribes securing local self-government 999

INFORMERS.

Information given by one under arrest for suspected complicity in smuggling, which prevents the smuggling, entitles informer to share in forfeiture.....1010

INJUNCTION.

Nonresident taxpayer cannot sue to enjoin issue of railroad aid bonds, unless he has an interest not common to the community 106
 On preliminary hearing court may consider matters of ordinary knowledge outside the affidavits 162
 Lack of jurisdiction ground of vacating temporary injunction at any time..... 106
 Circuit and district judges may dissolve injunctions in vacation..... 106
 Decisions upon preliminary hearing not conclusive on final decree 856

INSOLVENCY.

See, also, "Bankruptcy;" "Fraudulent Conveyances."
 Insolvency laws of New York discussed.. 141
 Plaintiff who has received discharge in insolvency pending action still competent to maintain it1094
 Discharge covers immature debt..... 838
 Discharge in one state under its insolvent laws passed after the making of the contract in another state, bars action thereon. 141

INSURANCE.

Marine insurance.
 Valued policy on profits not a wager policy unless so intended by both parties 564
 Valued policy void where underwriter designedly misled by insured intending a wager policy 564
 A bona fide overvaluation not made with intent to mislead or defraud will not avoid a valued policy, and underwriter is estopped to consider the actual value..... 564
 Where less goods were in fact shipped than were expected, the recovery on a valued policy must be in proportion 564
 Clause in memorandum of insurance construed as representation of fact..... 885
 Underwriters not liable for loss by seizure at designated port for illicit trade not known at the time..... 885
 Loss of cattle by breaking fastenings in lightering from vessel in usual manner is within insurance against "perils of the seas" and "usual risk of lightering"1046
 Unseaworthiness when insured, good defense 166
 Burden of proving unseaworthiness is on insurer 166
 There can be no recovery for a loss, caused by a leak discovered before sailing, if prudent and discreet master of skill would have repaired same..... 166
 Consignee who advanced money to buy cargo and took assignment of bill of lading entitled to recover on policy "on account of whom it may concern" 336
 Amount of recovery in such case where interests are separable 336

Fire insurance.
 A second policy invalid by reason of misrepresentations as to prior insurance does not violate condition against additional insurance 530
 Whether policy on part of goods previously insured avoids first policy in toto under condition against additional insurance, quaere 530
 Naked legal title in another does not vitiate policy conditioned that insured should be "entire, unqualified owner" 618

Page
 Effect of giving a mortgage upon policy conditioned that insured shall keep "entire, unqualified" ownership 618
 Oath to ownership made in good faith, not falsified by title being in another 618
 After assignment of fire policy to mortgagee with consent of insurer, a mistake in renewal of which mortgagee was ignorant will not avoid the insurance..... 264
 Refusal to recognize right to prove loss is a waiver of proof 264
 The contract limitation of one year for suit is not available where a complaint was filed in time, but, at request of defendant's attorney, summons was not issued 264

Life insurance.
 Condition that policy shall cease and all premiums be forfeited if interest on premium notes not paid annually in advance is valid 846
 A course of business to pay interest on premium notes in cash, and apply dividends earned to the principal, will control the rule of law as to application of payment, even though it results in forfeiture of the policy 846

Subrogation.
 A libel for wrongful act causing a loss may be brought in the name of the insurer who has paid it 586
 Where insurer has paid only part of the loss he cannot sue wrongdoer in his own name 207
 On libel by insurer, who has paid the loss, for the wrongful act causing it, it is no defense that insurer was not liable..... 586

Insurance companies.
 Have power to take, hold, and negotiate negotiable paper in the conduct of their business 366

INTEREST.
 Allowance of interest in cases of tort is matter of discretion 342

INTERNAL REVENUE.
 Collection of assessment not restrained on allegation in bill that assessment is irregular, and in violation of law, and void.. 418
 The remedy in equity to collect assessments is cumulative 418
 Lien on distillery for unpaid taxes is not lost by a bonding and release of the property in forfeiture proceedings afterwards discontinued without judicial action. 418
 Bona fide purchaser of distillery property for value and without notice takes subject to existing liens for taxes 418
 The government is not estopped by statements of its collector to enforce existing liens for unpaid taxes 418

INTERNATIONAL LAW.
 Every nation has exclusive jurisdiction over the waters adjacent to its shores for a marine league 928

JUDGMENT.
Rendition and entry.
 The date of a decision is the time when it is finally settled and approved, and ready to be promulgated 734
 A mistake in calculating marshal's fees may be cured by a release, and judgment rendered for true sum 591
 The heir of a judgment debtor cannot avail himself of an error of the clerk by which the judgment was entered for the penalty of the bond sued on, instead of the damages allowed 577

	Page
A judgment of a justice of the peace docketed in a county court is not a judgment of that court	444
Operation and effect.
The record of a judgment should show affirmatively jurisdiction of the person of defendant	444
Distinction between cases in which judgments may and those in which judgments may not be impeached collaterally	52
A verdict on which a judgment was never entered is not conclusive in another suit....	450
A sentence of a court of exclusive jurisdiction is conclusive both as to the right established and fact decided	1132
A judgment in a suit in rem for forfeiture of a vessel is not conclusive in an action on a bond conditioned for the proper use and delivery up of the certificate of registry	518
A statute making a decision of a military commission final, held not to make it conclusive as to the right in question.....	1062
Dismissal upon the merits of creditors' bill to set aside conveyance as fraudulent estops creditor from opposing bankrupt's discharge	1054
Revival of judgment by scire facias (Va. Act 1792)	577
Amendment.
Federal courts can amend only as to defects of form.....	302
Misnomer not apparent of record is not amendable	302
Relief against: Opening: Vacating.
Fraud upon a party by her counsel will not invalidate a decree where it does not appear that it affected the result.....	777
A delay of eleven years after knowledge of suspicious conduct of counsel bars relief against decree for his fraud.....	777
A decree entered without authority will be set aside.....	784
Office judgment set aside on plea of "never executrix"	389
Judgment by default against married woman may be corrected by writ of error coram nobis (coverture being a question of fact) or by motion on affidavit.....	317
An unexplained delay of 18 months, and after default taken and report of a commission, will bar respondent's motion to set aside proceedings as coram non iudice..	1090
A claimant who, after a libel in rem is dismissed by default and the stipulation and bond cancelled, agrees to open the default, waives the decree and order of cancellation, and the court may vacate them so as to hold the stipulators liable.....	1039
Satisfaction and discharge.
Assignee of judgment who advanced money to one of several joint debtors to pay the same, and took assignment as security, cannot maintain action against other debtors.	1186
Of different jurisdictions.
All presumptions are in favor of a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction.	370
A decree in a divorce suit against plaintiff declaring that she was never legally married may be impeached for fraud when set up against her in another state (Reversing 774)	771
Actions on judgments.
Nil debit cannot be pleaded to action on judgment obtained in another state.....	1140
In an action on a foreign judgment, the debtor may plead that he was not served with process, and that the attorney appearing had no authority to do so.....	1186

JURORS.

	Page
Court has power to order a tales in special jury cases.....	996
Impressions from reading newspapers will not disqualify jurors in criminal cases, though opinions formed will disqualify....	1024
Citizens of municipality not competent in an action of debt for penalty of a by-law of the corporation.....	392

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

A bankrupt's assignment is not within the condition of a lease forfeiting it on an assignment by the lessee.....	444
Acceptance of draft on tenant for rent, no bar to distress if draft not paid.....	388
Avowry is prima facie evidence of amount of rent.....	365
Replevin bond for goods distrained for rent	383

LIBEL.

Liberty of the press does not sanction libels	1177
---	------

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

The statute of the state where the suit is brought governs.....	759, 778
State statutes cannot be pleaded in bar of suit for infringement of a patent.....	1048
The statute commences to run against a claim for a balance of rents against one who holds an absolute conveyance of property to secure a debt, from the time the grantor has knowledge of repayment of the debt by rents received.....	778
The statute runs as against bill for accounting for mortgaged property in the rightful possession of third person from demand and refusal.....	540
Rents or profits in the hands of one who holds an absolute conveyance of property as security for a debt, is a debt or liability not under seal.....	778
A debt protected by a mortgage is not barred until a suit as to the mortgaged property is barred.....	540
Admission that a note is as good as money is sufficient evidence of new promise	1170
A letter stating that the writer could have availed himself of the insolvent laws, but preferred paying all debts as soon as possible, "not omitting A's claim," not sufficient acknowledgment	1089
Replication to plea of statute of limitations alleging absence from state.....	863
Courts of equity apply the statute of limitations	778

LOST INSTRUMENTS.

Owner losing half of bank note may recover on whole note on offering security to bank	1129
---	------

MARRIED WOMEN.

To give jurisdiction against married women, liability must appear affirmatively..	317
Judgment by default against married woman may be set aside.....	317

MARSHAL.

Fees, in bankruptcy.....	354
Entitled to actual mileage travelled on return of nulla bona.....	1004
Fees as messenger—Mileage or expenses of deputy	993

Not entitled to commissions on forfeited delivery bond.....	1004
Where vessel seized is released on stipulation for her appraised value, not entitled to fees on such value.....	42
Claimants not liable to marshal for costs and expenses attending seizure, on bonding vessel, pending appeal from decrees of condemnation.....	225
May have attachment to enforce payment of fees.....	998

MASTER AND SERVANT.

Assumpsit lies by apprentice against master for disobedience of order although no indentures executed.....	138
Master liable only in case of negligence or want of due and proper care and prudence.....	152
Rules for determining care and prudence of master in furnishing suitable materials..	152
Furnishing unsuitable explosive for blasting is negligence.....	152
Master in selecting dangerous instruments, such as explosives, must not sacrifice quality to cheapness.....	152
Superintendent of city streets employing workmen is a vice principal.....	152

MORTGAGE.

A conveyance made in satisfaction of a precedent debt cannot take effect as a mortgage, although providing for redemption.....	374
An absolute conveyance of property as security for money advanced to pay the grantor's debts is a mortgage.....	778
Equity will enforce right to redeem under deed absolute given to secure debt... ..	374
Sufficiency of evidence to show deed absolute intended as a mortgage.....	374, 896
Deed absolute to decedent not declared mortgage on uncorroborated evidence of single interested witness.....	896
Lien not affected by substitution of new notes or bonds for those originally secured or by the giving of a new mortgage expressly reserving rights under original mortgage.....	760
Equitable right of junior to compel senior mortgagee to resort to property on which he has exclusive claim, not defeated by declaration of homestead therein.....	24
Twenty years after forfeiture and possession taken is limit of time of right to redeem, where no excuse for delay is shown	778

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Bonds."

Paving streets in Alexandria, Va.....	393
On motion for judgment for assessment for paving, it is no defense that the paving was badly done.....	393
A county may issue coupon bonds in payment of subscription to railroad stock under the authority to make payment in such manner as may be agreed upon.....	128
What is substantial performance of contract to complete railroad within condition of gift of county bonds.....	106
A proviso that railroad aid bonds shall not be sold for less than par does not affect rights of bona fide purchasers at market value.....	128
A town, having as a corporation voted and issued bonds, is estopped as against bona fide holder to deny incorporation....	522

Naturalization.

See "Aliens."

NEW TRIAL.

Motion for new trial does not suspend entering of judgment after one verdict, but execution will be stayed on application....	1180
Court will settle differences between counsel as to rulings made, for purposes of motion.....	450
Rebutting affidavits not allowed.....	755
Motion for surprise is waived by continuing trial.....	755
Irregular conduct of jury in open court not objected to at the time is not available. General rules as to granting where fraud is in issue.....	450
Not granted because of erroneous instructions or refusals to instruct, if not prejudicial.....	450
Not granted on ground that verdict is excessive unless plainly largely beyond injury inflicted.....	229
Not granted on ground that verdict was against evidence unless clear mistake or manifest abuse of power shown.....	229
Granted for newly-discovered evidence, in the absence of gross negligence.....	229
Not granted upon mere cumulative evidence.....	229, 564, 755

OFFICE AND OFFICER.

No distinction between foreign and domestic agents of government (Act 1809)..	1147
A "permanent agent" is one appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the senate.....	1147
Act July 23, 1868, to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the executive department, applied to existing vacancies.....	734
Public officer is required to perform duties imposed by law after coming into office though his compensation is inadequate....	904
Government agent must be reimbursed damages paid in consequence of protest of bill of exchange authorized to be drawn by him.....	1147
Commissions, expenses, and disbursements of navy agent stationed abroad....	1147

PARTIES.

Suit brought in name of plaintiff who is neither a natural nor an artificial person is a nullity.....	370
Parties may unite in admiralty, where the cause of action is common to all though interests are separate.....	665
The alleged fraudulent endorsee of a note is a necessary party to a bill by the payee to avoid an assignment for fraud and compel the maker to pay a second time	368
A company for whom its stockholders ask an accounting against another company is a necessary party defendant.....	1080
On bill by distributee against executor or administrator to sell personalty for distribution, other distributees not necessary parties.....	574
Executor or administrator is necessary party to bill to enforce trust concerning decedent's property.....	514
The vendee need not be made a party to a bill to enjoin an alleged fraudulent sale by a corporation.....	13
Equity will not proceed to final decree in absence of interested party.....	13
A bill in equity will be dismissed where a necessary party is beyond jurisdiction of the court.....	13
Objection of nonjoinder need not be raised by pleadings.....	366
Persons not parties to suit or belonging to class represented therein can only be heard by original bill.....	842

	Page		Page
An underwriter who has accepted an abandonment may be permitted to intervene as sole owner in a suit.....	947	Application is conclusive evidence of intent not to abandon invention.....	126
PARTNERSHIP.		A presumption of abandonment will not obtain from the lapse of six years after putting down a pavement before applying for a patent, in the face of a manifest contrary intent.....	703
One partner without prior consent of others may convey partnership personalty in payment of firm creditors.....	851	Involuntary delays in prosecuting application will not work a forfeiture.....	126
An assignment of partnership debts by one partner only, though void in law, sustained in equity if bona fide to secure creditors.....	851	A litigation as to a right to two improvements, one of which only is good, will not prejudice the inventor's right to such improvement.....	126
An assignment by one partner of partnership realty in payment of firm debt passes only his interest.....	851	Application and issue.
One partner may give a preference to a particular creditor without consent of others if they are abroad.....	851	It is only necessary that the description and drawings shall be such that one skilled in the art can by their aid embody the invention in an operative and efficient form.....	647, 476
PATENTS.		Technical defect in description will not defeat patent.....	123
The commissioner of patents.		The original deposited model may be examined to resolve doubts from drawings.....	233
Cannot delegate duty of examining new invention (Act July 4, 1837).....	226	Two forms of invention related to the same subject, where the necessary elements of one are substantially used in the other, may be included in one patent.....	703
An order extending a patent signed by the chief clerk acting as commissioner during a vacancy, after the approval of the Act of 1868, providing that the senior examiner in chief shall act as commissioner. is a nullity.....	734	A patentee is not estopped by words omitted from an amended specification... ..	450
Invention.		A patent secures only the means employed, and not the effect produced.....	712
Remedy for theoretical defect is a good invention.....	233	A caveat is intended to give notice of an invention and prevent a patent to another.....	476
Recollection of a prior imperfect machine and its product, and preservation of the same, renders patent void for want of novelty.....	233	Failure of officer to certify to sealing of deposition in an interference case is ground of exclusion.....	1165
Mere experiments are not anticipations..	320	Decision of commissioner is conclusive as to law and facts arising under application, in the absence of fraud or excess of authority manifest on the face of the papers.....	448
Invention is the conception, not the final development.....	112	Appeals from commissioner's decisions.
Utility is evidenced by extensive use....	112	Where the claim becomes too broad through a rejection of part it should be amended before appeal.....	1185
Who may obtain patent.		The review of the commissioner's decision must be confined to points involved in reasons of appeal.....	226, 1168
First inventor is the original discoverer first perfecting and adapting invention to actual use.....	320	Objection to incompetency of witness in interference case cannot first be made on appeal.....	440
A chance operation of a principle unrecognized at the time will not defeat patent to one who discovers principle, and puts it to intelligent use.....	868	No reply will be allowed to be filed on appeal.....	227
The question of originality is not affected by experiments of another subsequently resulting in invention.....	476	Testimony of experts are entitled to more weight than opinion of commissioner....	1192
An invention to be valid as the first must be seasonably reduced to practice and put to use.....	450	Irrelevant reasons by commissioner no ground of reversal.....	226
One who reduces to practice theory of another by his help is not the sole inventor.....	1165	Appellant in an interference case cannot rely upon the weakness of his adversary's case.....	1072
Application will be refused where applicant is one of three joint inventors.....	1168	When in doubt the commissioner's decision in an interference case will be affirmed.....	434
Want of originality in the patentee is shown only by such communication of ideas that other inventive power is not necessary to their application.....	329	Reissue: Disclaimer.
Prior public use or sale.		Purpose and scope of reissues.....	6
The "public and common use" for more than two years prior to application which will invalidate a patent is a common and general use by the community.....	647	Presumption is in favor of validity of reissue.....	703
In the case of successive applications, public use or sale must antedate the first application by two years to defeat inventor's right.....	112	Reissue is prima facie for same invention.....	908
The use of an article made by the inventor for himself at his place of business is private and not public.....	112	Reissue need not claim everything embraced in original, but must not claim new matter.....	320
Abandonment—Laches.		In determining whether reissue is for different invention, the two patents must be compared.....	635
Abandonment is proved only by public use for the required time.....	868, 908	Reissue may include features disclaimed in original patent by mistake of patent office.....	720
Delay of four years after filing caveat will not defeat right where constant effort was used to perfect invention.....	1072	Title of patent presumed to be in one to whom reissue is granted as assignee.....	635
		Defect of broad claim covering primitive device and improvement cured by disclaimer, in case of limited knowledge of primitive device.....	233

	Page		Page
A reissue is not invalid because laying the greater stress on one of two forms of invention included in the original patent...	703	Denied where originality of patent doubtful, but account ordered to be kept pending decision on merits.....	517
Duration.		Granted where the patent has been declared valid, and an infringement is probable, unless a bond is given to pay the decree, to keep an account, etc.....	683
Date of filing of specifications in foreign country, taken as date of patenting there	639	Denied where suit had been pending many months and was nearly ready for hearing, and no newly-discovered ground for writ was shown.....	903
Extension: Renewal.		Refused where infringement not satisfactorily shown.....	675
The extension of a patent by the commissioner cannot be collaterally impeached...	732	Denied where its purpose is to compel a city to award a contract to complainants..	708
The presumption that a renewal was legally made may be rebutted.....	450	The question of priority will not be considered on the application, where priority has been declared and acquiesced in for a long time.....	719
Assignment.		A decree of another federal court sustaining a patent is generally controlling on the application.....	683, 708
Agreement to assign extended term makes promisee equitable owner thereof where conditions are fulfilled.....	233	Adjudications of validity by other courts is ground of granting only where infringement is palpable.....	720
Limited assignment of patent construed..	233	Procedure.
Licenses.		In suits founded on a patent issued to a partnership, both partners are necessary parties.....	589
A licensee from an assignee has no greater rights than his licensor.....	9	Bill alleging fraudulent sale, held bad for multifariousness.....	589
A confession of judgment for arrears of weekly payments for a license is an admission of the arrears, giving the option to revoke the license.....	1140	State statutes of limitation cannot be pleaded in bar of suit for infringement....	1048
Sale of patented machine or product.		Where prior use relied on in defense is by the inventor or under his license, notice is not necessary as to the persons or places..	647
A patented product purchased without condition or restriction loses the protection of the patent laws, and the purchaser may sell the same in the territory of one having exclusive rights.....	100, 245	Patents and specifications will be liberally construed, but courts will not resort to conjecture.....	755
The condition attached to the sale of patented cotton ties, "licensed to use once only" is void.....	623; contra, 625	Trial of issues of originality and infringement.....	517
The purchaser of a patented machine with separately patented parts has no right to manufacture new parts to replace those worn out.....	245	Motion to set aside decree pro confesso, and for leave to answer, denied on plaintiff's stipulating to limit recovery to a certain amount, being less than expense to defendant of trying issue.....	877
But the purchaser may repair and improve the patented parts.....	245	On the withdrawal of opposition to a motion for a preliminary injunction, plaintiff is not entitled to a decision on the merits.....	689
Infringement—What constitutes.		Disclaimer at hearing deprives complainant of all costs.....	233
There is an infringement if use of the machine will produce a result in it which would have been an infringement if originally introduced.....	641	Evidence.
Experimental making and user of patented article is technical infringement....	320	Prior patent not pleaded admissible to show state of art but not want of novelty.	717
Structures are "substantially" the same, if of the same material, thickness, or form, where such condition is important.....	112	A patent is prima facie evidence of the right of the patentee.....	476
A patent for a horizontally revolving retort does not cover an oscillating retort....	440	The prior oath of an inventor as to originality may be opposed to the oath of a witness as to want of originality.....	329
A device to raise and suspend a finger bar to an angle of 45 degrees is anticipated by one which raises and suspends the bar in a perpendicular position.....	434	One to be competent as an expert must understand the science involved.....	476, 448
A change in location of a part, in combination, where no new function is performed, will not evade a patent.....	123	The burden of proof is on defendant alleging prior public use.....	450
Superiority of defendant's invention no defense of infringement.....	329	Party claiming patent should be limited in duration has burden of proof.....	639
Who liable.		Bond for damages, etc.
The board of education and not the city is liable for the use of a patented seat in the city's public schools.....	464; contra, 506	Not required of defendant unless injunction should issue if not given.....	675
Carrier of articles made in infringement of patents where he refuses to disclose shippers is liable for infringement.....	631	Accounting.
Purchaser of articles known to have been manufactured by infringing machinery not liable to injunction or damages....	1036	Accounting for profits, allowance of expenses, etc.....	691
Preliminary injunction.		Though preliminary injunction denied defendant required to keep an account..	517, 675
General rules applicable to the granting.	708	On bill for infringement where title not disputed, federal courts will refer to master to take account of profits.....	444
Effect of laches.....	683	Accountability is not limited to the payment of the royalty required of licensees..	691
Infringement enjoined independent of other relief.....	631	Infringer liable for whole profits unless he show affirmatively the extent to which instrumentalities and improvements not covered by patents contributed.....	691
Denied to inventor who falsely described his invention as patented.....	1008
Previous use by plaintiff not absolutely essential.....	683
Not granted on a theory not affirmatively supported by affidavits.....	641

The fact that defendant could have made the profits realized by the infringement by doing the work in another way is immaterial 691
 Complainants are entitled to interest upon profits only from date of final decree.. 691

Infringement—Damages.
 The court may allow treble what is found by the jury as damages..... 450
 The jury may allow costs and counsel fees, as damages..... 450

Various particular inventions and patents.
 Boots and shoes. No. 127,964, for improvement in manufacture of soles and heels, held invalid..... 165
 Chime toys. Reissue No. 150,933, held valid 6
 Chewing gum. No. 111,798, for improvement, held void..... 135
 Cornshellers. No. 132,128, for improvement, held valid..... 123
 Driven well. No. 73,425 and reissue No. 4,372, held valid..... 868, 908 Envelopes. Manner of folding and pasting sides, held not patentable..... 1185
 Fire arms. Reissue No. 60 for improvement in locks, held valid..... 517
 Flour. Reissue No. 5,841 for manufacture of new process by purification of "middlings" invalid as broader than original.. 678
 Gauge lathes. No. 53,003, for improvement, construed, and held valid and infringed 723 Harness. Reissue No. 5,155, for dies for finishing rubber coated mountings, held valid 320 Harness-saddle pad. No. 86,112, for improvement, held valid..... 717 Hydrometers. Adams' improvement, held patentable 76
 Kindling wood. No. 93,775, for improvement, held void..... 324
 Knitting needles. No. 6,025, for improvement, held valid..... 233
 Lantern. No. 50,591, for hinged top, held valid 119
 Locks. No. 16,676, for improved keeper for right and left hand door locks, held valid and infringed by Patterson's patent... 126
 Lubricating oil cans. Device for opening and closing spout, held patentable..... 1192
 Paper. Ames' patent construed and held infringed 755
 Paper bags. No. 48,036 for improvement, held valid and infringed..... 1125
 Paper bags. No. 137,533, for improvement, held void..... 1123
 Paper bags. Notch in mouth to facilitate opening, held not patentable..... 1123
 Paper bags. Softening upper parts to make pliable held patentable..... 1125 Pavements. Nicholson patent held infringed by Brocklebank's and Trainer's patent for improvement..... 703
 Pins. Slocum's patent for "a machine for sticking pins into paper" and Howe's improvement, defined, and held not infringed by Crosby's patented machine..... 712
 Rock drill. Reissue No. 3,690, for improvement, construed and held valid... 635, 641
 Safes. No. 3,117, for application of plaster of Paris, held valid..... 112 Seats for public buildings. Reissue No. 21, for improvement, held valid..... 506 Sieves. Design No. 4637 for flaring rim, held invalid..... 162
 Sieves. No. 106,597, held not infringed 162
 Toys. Reissue No. 150,933, for chime toys, held valid..... 6
 Umbrella ribs. No. 39,210, for improvement in tempering, defined and held valid and infringed..... 673

Window screen, adjustable. Reissue No. 52,726, held invalid as too broad..... 175
 Wood pulp. No. 17,387 defined and held valid and infringed..... 728, 732
 Wood pulp. Nos. 25,418 and 33,901 defined and construed..... 728
 Wood pulp. Reissues Nos. 1,448 and 1,449, for improvement, held invalid..... 740

PAYMENT.

See, also, "Debtor and Creditor."
 A note is not per se payment of antecedent debt 483
 A note operates to discharge debt if endorsee fails to demand payment and give notice of dishonor..... 483
 Payment during Civil War in Confederate money to agent in southern states of citizen of northern state does not discharge debt 838
 Where draft given in compromise of suit is unpaid, suit may proceed..... 840
 The payment of money to the purchaser of property under an unauthorized sale for salvage with a reservation of all rights, does not prevent an action for wrongful sale 665

PENALTIES.

Penal statutes strictly construed..... 904
 Ignorance of the existence of penal statute forms no legal excuse for its violation. 926

PERJURY.

A false swearing from mistake is not perjury 1032
 An indictment will not lie after the repeal of the bankrupt act by act of 1803 for a perjury committed thereunder..... 1032
 Perjury committed in bankruptcy proceedings cannot be prosecuted under the general criminal law (§ 18) nor will an indictment lie at common law..... 1032

PILOTAGE.

See, also, "Admiralty."
 A pilot who does not take charge of a vessel until she reaches pilot grounds is only entitled to inshore pilotage..... 285
 Mere wrongdoers or mutineers have no authority to bind the ship for pilotage... 955

PLEADING AT LAW.

Pleas.
 Plea to merits waives exception to jurisdiction 26
 Plea in bar waives plea in abatement.. 156
 Plea to jurisdiction, form, verification, time of filing..... 156
 Plea to merits not allowed to be withdrawn to permit special demurrer..... 557

Replication.
 Mere narrative statements need no specific reply..... 326
 Replication to plea of statute of limitations setting up agreement not to plead statute 863
 Granting leave to put in several replications not an adjudication of their sufficiency. 863

Demurrer: Exceptions.
 Reasonable presumptions are admitted by demurrer as well as matters expressly alleged 778
 An exception that a libel does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of forfeiture is too general..... 64

Errors and defects.
 Omission in copy of note filed of indorsement, which is alleged in the declaration, is not fatal..... 156

Issues: Variance.
 In debt on bond, entry of pleadings as "covenants performed," "joined," is sufficient joinder of issue..... 392
 Admission by answer of execution of agreement particularly set out in libel, admits contents..... 326
 In an action for a penalty, where defendant pleads that it is not reasonable, he cannot submit issue of law to the court..... 393
 Variance between proof of by-law of March 27 and averment of March 26..... 392

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

Answer should be none the less full because not on oath..... 326
 Waiver by bill of oath in answer is ineffectual unless accepted..... 778
 Answer not sufficiently authenticated unless authority of justice of peace before whom it was sworn is shown..... 170

PRACTICE.

At law.
 Appearance without bail..... 338
 Court may order causes consolidated or one tried as a test case, where they involve same issues..... 902
 Decision upon a motion has not the effect of a judgment so as to preclude further examination by same court..... 259
 A stipulation to answer judgment waives illegal service of process..... 43
 An oral agreement by counsel made out of court will not be construed on conflicting opinions..... 719
 After three terms leave to file a new plea compelling plaintiff to suffer nonsuit granted on condition of paying all costs..... 1036

In equity.
 Suit dismissed for want of prosecution is no bar..... 635
 Bill will be dismissed as to defendants against whom it contains no allegations, though they answered..... 899
 Cause may be shown against decree nisi any time during term, and before other order made..... 518
 Objection to admission of testimony by master, not heard unless testimony and objection are taken down..... 691
 Rule answer in chancery..... 896

In admiralty.

A foreign consul may appear for citizens of his country to protect proceeds of sale of property for salvage..... 182
 A libel in personam may be filed for the libellant and all others interested..... 665
 A claimant of a vessel will be allowed to change his claim where no one is prejudiced thereby..... 1087
 An appraisalment by an appraiser nominated by the clerk without notice to the opposite party will be set aside..... 526
 District court in admiralty may deliver property on bail, either in the form of bond or stipulation on which judgment may be rendered..... 527
 Where proceeds are prematurely ordered to be paid over, rule to return will be granted..... 1113
 The claimants and not the libellants will be allowed to bond the proceeds of a vessel where libellants' claim is denied in the pleadings..... 1088
 The vessel may be discharged on stipulation in its full value where the claims for which libels are filed exceed its appraised value..... 1041

A vessel, cargo, and freight attached on a libel on a bottomry bond will be bonded for their full amount, although proceeds of vessel are alone sufficient to meet the claim..... 1087
 A married woman will not be accepted as surety on a stipulation in admiralty.. 1041
 Where a libel in rem is dismissed by default the claimant may without notice enter an order canceling the stipulation and bond..... 1039
 Proctor for libellant is bound by notice to respondent that he would ask only for a decree for costs..... 913

In bankruptcy.
 Agreements of counsel in bankruptcy must be in writing or of record to bind clients..... 784

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Scope of power of general and special agents..... 508
 Civil War did not revoke agency in southern states for citizen of northern state.... 838
 Repudiation of agent's act in excess of authority must be within reasonable time
 Unratified tentative arrangement by agent, not binding..... 7
 Irregularities of agent in disposing of proceeds do not affect title of realty sold by him..... 899
 Agent of undisclosed principal personally liable..... 512
 One contracting with agent personally may refuse performance where responsibility is shifted to principal..... 44
 Agent in southern states during Civil War of loyal citizen is liable for receiving Confederate money in payment of debt.... 838
 Where a ratification is necessary to bind the principal, agent is not liable to principal for abuse of power..... 208
 Declaration in action for abuse of power as agent must aver that defendant acted as agent..... 208
 Amendment of pleading by principal against agent..... 838

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

Bond of internal revenue collector not binding as to collections previously made.. 1160
 On the acceptance of a new bond, sureties on old bond are released unless it affirmatively appear that the default was committed prior thereto..... 585
 One having a mortgage securing his acceptances, which he buys up at a discount, can only charge such amount against the mortgaged property..... 746
 Verbal condition on signing a bond that certain other signatures shall be obtained, not available in defense unless known to obligee..... 621
 The fact that a prior signature was forged is not available in defense..... 621
 Defenses available against a bond given to secure a debt of another are available in action on a note given to extend the time of payment..... 621
 A warrant of distress under Act May 15, 1820, has the effect of a judgment..... 1147

PRIZE.

See, also, "War."

Jurisdiction.
 Jurisdiction and rules of decision in prize courts..... 799, 808
 Prize court must decide the question of prize as to vessel captured and libelled as such though war not declared by congress 799

	Page	Page
What constitutes prize.
Slaves captured during Civil War are neither prize nor prisoners of war.....	538
The court must decide what shall be deemed enemy's country in determining the question of prize founded on hostile ownership.....	799
It is not personal hostility of owner, but his relation to the enemy, which determines the question of condemnation as enemy's property.....	808
Sailing under enemy's license is cause for forfeiture of neutral vessel.....	524
Captors entitled to freight if goods are carried to port of destination.....	958 Procedure.
Construction of Act 1862, c. 50, for better administration of law of prize.....	808
Where capture is admitted on original evidence, further proof not allowed to create doubts.....	357
Production of evidence by captor.....	1077
Order and sufficiency of proof—Further proof.....	958
Practice as to the taking of additional proof in prize cases.....	811
The rule requiring the master and crew of the prize vessel to be produced as witnesses may be dispensed with where there is no means of complying therewith, and secondary evidence admitted.....	71
Proceedings in condemnation suspended to permit production of evidence.....	965
Evidence showing actual hostile destination of vessel.....	533
Examination of witnesses confined to persons on board vessel at time of capture....	525
Spanish papers found on board an American vessel do not prove double papers if no other marks of fraud appear.....	1178
Control and custody of property.
Vessel proceeded against in prize, when need not be brought before court.....	206
Jurisdiction may be taken while property captured is lying in foreign neutral port.....	1077
Custody of prize pending examination of prisoners taken in her.....	312
Sale and distribution of proceeds.
Order to sell cargo, denied when.....	523
Sale and distribution under decree of prize goods lying in foreign neutral port.....	1077
Who entitled as within "signal distance" to share in prize money.....	1120
Rules to determine the vessels entitled to share in the proceeds of a prize.....	916
Costs, etc.
Costs, fees, and compensation.....	992
Commission of one-half of one per cent. allowed auctioneer on sale of prize cargo..	815
Foreign decree.
A decree of a foreign prize court is conclusive both as to the right established and fact decided.....	1132
Courts of U. S. will not, for purposes of retaliation, depart from fixed principles of the law of nations declaring decrees of foreign prize courts conclusive.....	1132
Various cases of condemnation or acquittal.
Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy's property.....	226, 931
Cargo condemned for violation of blockade.....	72
Vessel condemned for violation of blockade.....	206
Vessel and cargo condemned for violation of blockade.....	201, 211, 303, 305, 925, 966, 967, 968
Vessel and cargo condemned for attempt to violate blockade.....	915, 966, 985, 1043, 1058
Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy's property, and for violation of blockade....	253, 311, 909
Vessel and cargo acquitted of violation of or attempt to violate blockade.....	524, 525
Vessel and cargo restored as neutral, but without costs.....	1104 PROCESS.
Service upon duly-authorized officer of corporation is good though fraudulently concealed by him.....	465
PUBLIC LANDS.
The "Donation Act" (1850) is a grant in praesenti, defeasible until conditions performed.....	97
The patent is only record evidence of the donee's right.....	97
Upon death of settler or his wife intestate, before patent issues, the estate vests in the survivor and children, or the heirs.....	97
One owning land in trust for another is not a "proprietor" disqualified to acquire right of pre-emption.....	240
Pre-emptor must actually reside on land until final proof and payment made.....	240
Right of pre-emption not an interest in land, but only right to be preferred as purchaser.....	240
Settler's wife dying before completion of residence under donation act has separate property which descends to her heirs....	370
Actual settler only entitled to buy portion of quarter section upon which his improvements are made (14 St. 804).....	1161
Person without showing right in himself cannot question right of others.....	240
A junior settler to whom the land office by erroneous construction of law issues a patent will be decreed to hold in trust for senior settler.....	240
Decisions of land office on questions of fact conclusive, in absence of fraud or mistake.....	240
A claim under the donation act need not be described by its boundaries.....	370
Boundaries of Armijo Mexican land grant.....	1129
RAILROADS.
Agreement to sell tickets over connecting line in one direction does not give right to sell in opposite direction.....	845
A contractor's right to possession of road until its completion is subordinate to right of trustees of mortgage bondholders to possession given upon default in payment of interest.....	465
Right to foreclose railroad mortgage not affected by provision allowing trustee on default to take possession and operate road	363
Court may allow trustee to file bill of foreclosure, after suit by individual bondholder.....	363
Individual bondholder may bring foreclosure, where trustee improperly refuses....	363
Provisions of railroad mortgage as to foreclosure suit.....	363
RECEIVERS.
The court will not appoint a receiver of a railroad corporation where another circuit court having jurisdiction has appointed receivers.....	281
Default in payment of interest on railroad bonds for which trustee authorized to take possession of railroad property and operate it justifies appointment of receiver, regardless of question of insolvency.....	465
Imminent danger of forfeiture of railroad charter and land grant for failure to complete road justifies appointment of receiver on application of bondholders.....	465

Where appointment of receiver for railroad is not resisted because of concealment of service of notice of motion by officer, case will be reopened..... 465

RECORDING ACTS.

Act 1766, c. 14, relates to estates at law only1091
 A contract to sell land or an equitable interest therein is not void for want of an acknowledgment or recording.....1091

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

Right of removal.
 Act 1875 inapplicable to causes brought in territorial courts subsequently made state courts by enabling act..... 753
 Affidavit of prejudice under Act March 2, 1867, not required for removal under Act July 27, 1866..... 511
 The right of removal cannot be defeated by the joinder as defendants of citizens of the same state with plaintiff against whom no relief is prayed.....1080
 Nonresident defendant may remove if there can be final determination without resident co-defendant (Act July 27, 1866).. 511
 Removal of ejectment suit by intervening nonresident landlord—Petition..... 529
 Where a judgment in one suit would conclusively settle the controversy in others between the same parties, they are to be considered together in determining the jurisdictional amount 840
Time for removal.
 Application must be made at or before term in which cause could have been finally heard 753
 Application may be made after new trial granted253, 892
Proceedings to obtain.
 Petition for removal must state facts showing a removable cause..... 828
 Averment of petition for removal of cause as arising under revenue laws..... 40
 Cause will not be remanded because petition for removal unverified..... 511
 Admission of service of rule to declare waives informality in removal..... 40
 Certiorari and habeas corpus not required for removal..... 40
 State court has no power to delay transfer of cause or review order of removal.. 253
Effect of removal: Subsequent procedure.
 The whole suit, and not a part only, must be removed on a proper case.....1080
 After removal of cause, judgment as in case of nonsuit may be entered on plaintiff's failing to declare, after notice of rule to declare 40
 All rights and defenses under state laws are recognized by federal court..... 259
 Action removed after issue joined must be tried on pleadings certified from state court 259

Revival.

See "Abatement and Revival."

SALE.

See, also, "Frauds, (Statute of.)"
 A clause in a bill of goods respecting deficiencies is inoperative where contract is previously complete 512
 On a sale by sample exhibited in a sealed bottle, there is implied warranty that the goods correspond with its apparent qualities 512

A bill of sale on condition, having been recorded in the town where the purchaser represented that he resided, though he actually resided elsewhere, is valid as against his assignee in bankruptcy 521

SALVAGE.

Jurisdiction.
 Jurisdiction of salvage cases in Florida.. 658
 Court has jurisdiction in rem notwithstanding salvage services were performed under written contract 183
Right to salvage compensation.
 Upon recapture or rescue from enemy ... 958
 When a vessel considered derelict or abandoned 928
 Successful exertions by crew to avoid impending collision with another vessel not salvage services 56
 Seamen can be salvors only when their connection with the ship is entirely broken.1043
 A salvor accepting the agency of the property cannot be allowed salvage, but where he acts in good faith will be allowed commissions as agent 58
 Where different salvors at different times render salvage service, each is entitled to compensation, though separate service of either would have been unavailing 119
 Salvors rendering no service except to receive cargo about to be jettisoned by master to float ship, can claim only against such cargo 283
 Awarded for keeping company with distressed vessel at her master's request ... 464
 Not allowed to a passenger who superceded alleged incompetent master and brought vessel to port, facts alleged not being sustained by proof 818
 First discoverers and bona fide possessors of a derelict have right to exclusive possession 762
 But they must accept services offered by others where their force is insufficient to save derelict without great risk 762
 To bar a claim for salvage services there must be an absolute agreement to pay a certain sum 119
 Contract for salvage services will be disregarded if exorbitant or unreasonable or extorted through pressure of impending calamity 183
Other compensation.
 Crew assisting salvors by performing extraordinary labor in pumping, allowed extra compensation 991
 Salvor entitled to compensation for services performed, though his conduct has been such as to forfeit all claim to salvage 665
 An owner who was not aboard his vessel when it rendered services to another in peril and did not personally render services cannot claim salvage, but is entitled to compensation1128
Forfeiture of salvage.
 Licensed wreckers must offer services to vessels in need, though not requested.... 911
 Licensed wreckers only entitled to award for pilotage where salvage services resulted from lack of pilotage refused by them ... 911
 Salvor forfeits salvage by neglecting to inform vessel of imminent and secret danger 665
 Appropriation of salvaged property, though of trifling value, forfeits all compensation.. 989
 Neglect to produce property resulting from mere thoughtlessness will not forfeit salvage 989
 Intoxication of salvors and refusal to work forfeits compensation in part 989
 Salvors who at a critical moment refuse to work or embarrass others forfeit all compensation 989

	Page		Page
Compensation forfeited for neglect of duty increasing labors of others should be divided between them	989	Stipulations in derogation of general rights void unless fully explained and additional compensation allowed	535
Compensation forfeited for wrongful appropriation should be paid to claimants....	989	Services required.
Amount.		Cook may be required to perform service as seaman	472
The risk to a steam tug being very light, salvage is fixed accordingly	431	Seamen not bound to assist in unloading cargo at final port of destination unless so contracted in shipping articles, or required by custom of port	983
Moiety allowed where value small and property saved from inevitable destruction.	991	A deserting seaman, who secretes himself on board after another is shipped in his place, may be required to perform seaman services	472
Award not increased by unnecessary employment by salvor of other vessels	323	Conduct of master in respect to seamen.
Salvors entitled to liberal compensation for saving vessel abandoned by crew notwithstanding incompetency or bad faith by master	978	Master liable for failure to protect seamen from violence of officers	845
Salvor only undertakes to exercise ordinary skill and diligence	431	Seamen may be moderately corrected by master	206
A salvor not guilty of an intentional tort in selling salvaged property is liable to the owner only for salvage received	665	To justify punishment for refusal to perform work required, master must show that seaman was capable of performing the work	472
Decree of district court fixing amount controlling on appeal unless error clearly shown	931	Master not justified in imprisoning seamen in foreign jail for discipline, unless there is danger in keeping them aboard..	1028
Salvors allowed 35 per cent of dry cargo and 50 per cent of wet cargo	252	Advice of consul will not justify master in illegally imprisoning seamen in foreign jail, or deprive seamen of remedy.....	1026
Salvors allowed 25 per cent of cargo saved uninjured and 50 and 60 per cent of damaged portions	596	Where master acting in good faith sells effects of seamen separated from ship, it is liable only for amount realized.....	1060
Salvors allowed on cargo of sugar 27 per cent of portion saved dry and 42 per cent of injured portion	1077	Wages—Right to.
Salvors allowed $13,000 on property saved valued at $70,000.....	119	Wages fall with loss of cargo and freight	138
Salvors entitled to $23,500 for cargo valued at $30,000 about to be jettisoned by master to float ship and received by salvors who stayed by ship and helped at pumps..	283	In the case of capture, seamen are entitled to wages only to day of condemnation	1092
Salvors allowed 45 per cent of proceeds of sale of cargo saved from ship burning at anchorage	305	Where freight is earned or damages recovered in lieu of freight, though inadequate, seamen are entitled to wages, except where the recovery is against insurers	1092
Salvors allowed $2,500 for carrying out anchors for grounded ship worth $20,000..	323	Where a portion of a vessel or cargo is saved by extraordinary exertions of seamen a new lien arises thereon for wages, though freight lost.....	138
Salvors allowed $2,600 on vessel worth $11,000 saved by 20 salvors in 2 hours' time	978	Seamen may be dissatisfied for incapacity but are entitled to reasonable wages.....	555
Owner awarded $50 for towing schooner from slip on fire	1128	— Remedies for recovery.
For towing to place of safety, disabled steam ship worth $47,000, steam tug allowed $5,000	431	Wages are due when vessel is moored at final port of destination, and libel may be filed 10 days thereafter.....	983
Salvors allowed $6,000 for bringing into port brig abandoned 50 miles from Sandy Hook, worth with cargo $30,000	928, 931	Seamen in whaling service have no lien on the oil for their services.....	1043
Remedies for recovery.		Lien for wages not destroyed by sale of vessel during seizure by customs officers..	849
Salvage paid by master of whaler acting with prudence and in good faith is a charge upon the oil binding on the crew	1043	In fixing quantum meruit for wages on whaling voyage, court may consider its unusual protraction and hardships.....	474
Nonjoinder of the crew in a suit for salvage by the master and owner of the salvor is not objectionable, in the absence of personal danger and extraordinary hardships	183	— Deductions; extinguishment, etc.
Pleadings on a libel for salvage.....	119	Seamen not liable for board while unjustly detained in foreign jail by master..	1026
Value of goods saved depreciating from time to be ascertained at time of filing libel where salvors refused to deliver property to owners and delayed filing bill	312	Under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, § 7, there can be no deductions for absences admitted by seamen, unless noted in log book.....	72
Apportionment.		Agreement to proceed on voyage beyond terms of shipment, good consideration for release of claims for deduction from wages	72
Rule where there are separate sets of salvors	312	In libel in rem by mate for wages, court cannot investigate his conduct while temporarily in command of vessel as master..	248
Where master of salvor sailing on shares.	928	Willful misconduct not imputed to mate failing to rejoin master on island from which vessel is blown by stress of weather	247
Wrecking vessel is deemed to have "arrived," within rule 4 of the Florida district, when within hailing distance, ready to receive and obey orders	57	Seaman in whaling service separated from ship without fault entitled to wages and expenses of return to his country...1060
SEAMEN.		Justifiable discharge for bad conduct forfeits wages previously earned.....	535
Contract of shipment.		Single act of disobedience, if trivial or provoked, will not justify discharge.....	535
Term "voyage" imports a definite commencement and end, and not controlled by term "elsewhere"	1004	Seamen are justified in leaving vessel for just fears for personal safety.....	555
Shipping articles construed as to length of voyage	72

	Page
Seamen unlawfully discharged or required to leave for personal safety from cruelty, entitled to full wages for voyage..	605
Stealing part of cargo forfeits all wages	365
Acquittal of larceny of cargo not conclusive to rebut charge when set up in defense of wages.....	365
Sale of part of cargo by direction of mate during permanent absence of master, to procure necessary provisions, will not forfeit wages	849

SEIZURES.

See "Admiralty;" "Customs Duties;" "Internal Revenue;" "Prize;" "War."

It is no abandonment of vessel seized for violation of customs laws to permit her master and crew to navigate to port..... 26

SET-OFF.

Not admissible against a demand for taxes1068

Damages paid by the drawer of a protested bill, being unliquidated, cannot be set off in an action against him by the acceptor1139

An order on account of rent accepted by the landlord cannot be set off in replevin for goods distrained where the landlord produces it cancelled and offers to pay the costs in a suit upon it.....1106

SHIPPING.

See, also, "Affreightment;" "Bill of Lading;" "Charter-Parties;" "Forfeiture."

Public regulation: Title of vessel.

Act 1866, directing issue of enrollment and license, is mandatory. Oath not necessary, and if false without effect..... 52

Evidence to prove forfeiture for violation of registry laws as to false ownership must be taken as a whole, and if it support claimant's case, he need not introduce evidence of ownership..... 52

Person swearing to registry and license of vessel estopped to deny truth of its recitals 161

Exemplified copy of record of naturalization sufficient prima facie proof of citizenship 52

A vessel licensed for the codfishery may be forfeited for engaging in transporting goods 69

Coasting vessel not forfeitable for carrying foreign goods without manifest.... 606

Title to vessel building, not to be fully paid for until completed and delivered, is in the builder..... 28

The title to a ship built in the United States for alien residents abroad passes like any other chattel without writing.... 68

Admiralty will order sale on application of half owners, on disagreement as to employment of vessel..... 968

Employment of vessels.

Where shipper refuses to accept proper bills of lading as tendered, the owner may recover demurrage for delays in unloading caused by want of proper bills of lading.. 552

Vessel is liable for rotting of fruit unduly hastened by stowage which did not permit proper ventilation, though bill of lading excepts losses by inherent deterioration 601

Failure to adopt a system of ventilation, the efficacy of which is in dispute, will not render vessel liable for "sweating" of cargo..... 187

Burden is on libellant to show that injury to goods transhipped not appearing externally was caused on board vessel libelled 193

	Page
Carriers of passengers bound to utmost care in providing approach to vessel.....	921

The master.

Contract of employment of captain construed to give him authority as master... 161

Owners are liable for excess of authority used by master or crew of privateer..... 765

Mate becoming master during voyage not liable on contracts of predecessor.....1023

Liabilities of vessel.

Not liable to stevedore injured by imperfect tackle rigged by master for his own use in unloading..... 1

Liable for performance of contract for carrying passengers.....30, 35

Liable for wrongful but not malicious act of master..... 30

Liable for short allowance to passenger if master's conduct not malicious.....30, 35

Passenger voluntarily encountering a seen danger, guilty of contributory negligence 921

Liens—Generally.

See, also, "Admiralty;" "Bottomry," etc.

Maritime liens do not depend upon possession 937

A stevedore has no lien enforceable in admiralty798, 1095

Seller has no lien for materials sold generally to shipbuilder on credit without reference to particular vessel..... 28

No lien is given by general maritime law for materials furnished towards building a vessel1042 — For advances.

Advances made to relieve vessel in straitened circumstances presumed to be on credit of vessel..... 48

Testimony of person making advances to relieve vessel in straitened circumstances, as to his intent, is admissible..... 48

Advances to pay a debt which is a lien, constitute a lien.....1095

Advances to release vessel from common-law attachment in a foreign port, not a lien on the vessel.....1095

No lien upon vessel arises for loans made on pledge of freight..... 593

— For repairs and supplies.

No lien arises for repairs or supplies to a domestic vessel..... 288

Whether vessel foreign or domestic depends upon residence of owners and not enrollment 288

Home port determined by residence of actual owners, irrespective of register and enrollment where material man not misled 404, 405

Right to lien on foreign vessel for supplies, not affected by local legislation..... 68

— Priority and enforcement.

Liens of same rank paid out of proceeds in inverse order of dates of creation..... 607

Seamen's wages preferred to claims of material men 607

A mortgage lien is postponed to maritime liens given either by state or maritime law 402

Liens arising out of contracts of affreightment are inferior to liens of material men, bottomry lenders, etc..... 607

Distribution of proceeds of vessel sailing under false colors with fraudulent nationality, as between owner of bottomry bond and mortgagee from fictitious owner....45, 48

Liens for damages by collision are of equal rank with those resting upon the necessities of the ship and hazards of the voyage 607

Consent to release a vessel from custody operates as a waiver of priority of claim as against subsequent libellant.....1105

	Page
Decreets of material men with costs should be paid in the order in which libels are filed	170
Master with knowledge of mortgage, allowing monthly wages to accumulate, not entitled to proceeds of vessel as against mortgagee	161
Creditor proceeding in rem is preferred to creditor who has not intervened or instituted proceedings until after final decree..	607
But where fund still in court, decree may be opened under circumstances which would excuse a default	607
Notes taken for pilotage services must be surrendered up for benefit of claimant on enforcing lien	1100
Liens — Waiver, discharge, and extinguishment.
Vessel is exonerated from any lien where creditor alone looked to personal responsibility of master or owner	798
Drawing a draft on owner for advances made to relieve vessel in straitened circumstances does not deprive owner of lien.	48
Taking mortgage as security for supplies furnished does not prevent enforcement of lien	1095
Taking a note for supplies no waiver of lien	68
Even from agent, unless principal has settled with agent to his prejudice	68
Lien for materials for construction not extinguished by credit which it is known will expire before completion of vessel....	1037
Liens continue during reasonable time for enforcement	178
Claim for pilotage made 6 months after last service performed not stale as against bona fide purchaser without notice	1100
Lien not discharged by the making of a subsequent voyage where prosecution prevented by sudden departure.....	849
Departure of foreign vessel from state before arrest does not affect either the lien or the remedy	68
A lien in a collision case will not be enforced after change of ownership and delay of 20 months	178
— Under state statutes.
Liens given by state laws cannot be enforced by process in rem (Rule 12)	170
Lien on domestic vessel is enforced subject to qualifications and limitations of local law	408
The libel must show that the lien was filed within the time required by the law giving it	1042
Lien for repairs during season on domestic boat making daily trips	408
Lien arises under New York statute for fuel furnished boat	411
Lien for supplies dates from time when furnished, and not from date of contract..	411
Act Mass. 1848, c. 290, § 1, gives lien for materials actually used in construction of vessel	1037
SLAVES.
Suit for freedom	799
Relief in equity in case of lost manumission	408
Jurisdiction to commit runaway slaves..	1045
When entitled to freedom as imported for sale (Act Md. 1796).....	596
STATES.
A state in the exercise of its police powers cannot discriminate against citizens of a foreign treaty power	213
A state cannot be sued in its courts without its consent	93

	Page
Appearance of attorney general or district attorney without express authority of law does not give jurisdiction	93
Comp. L. Nev. § 2778, does not authorize the attorney general to appear for state generally in actions against officers in individual capacities, so as to bind state ...	93

STATUTES.

The legislature of Oregon has power to confer on probate courts jurisdiction to compel specific performance by administrator of intestate vendor	132
Ordinary meaning of language is to be presumed to be intended unless it would manifestly defeat objects of the law	1068
Penal statute takes effect from time of passage when no other time is fixed	926
A later law does not repeal an earlier one unless so clearly repugnant as to imply a negative	1100
An action commenced on the day a law is repealed is within a saving clause of all actions commenced before the passage of the repealing act	924

TAXES.

Want of uniformity in the application of a tax will not defeat it	1068
Deposits in a Pennsylvania savings bank made by a citizen of New Jersey, not subject to Pennsylvania collateral inheritance tax	510
A savings bank is not liable for the collateral inheritance tax on a deposit therein.	510
Auditor's tax deed not evidence of title unless requisitions of law shown to have been complied with	1187
Effect of Rev. St. §§ 3172-3182, on settlements of income taxes	1086

TERRITORIES.

The government and laws of the United States do not extend to territory ceded by a foreign power by the mere act of cession	658
The legal status of Florida under the treaty of cession and subsequent acts and the conflicting jurisdiction between federal and territorial courts	658
Admission of Colorado as a state and its effect upon the territorial courts and upon cases pending therein at the time of admission.....	750

TOWAGE.

A tug is not a common carrier	10
A tug is bound to the degree of care and skill usually employed by careful navigators	171
A tug is not liable for a tow sunk when in ordinary and proper channel, by striking a single rock on the bottom, whose presence was not known to mariners and could not have been known by exercise of care....	600
The tug must be extremely diligent to render assistance to tow in distress	10
Vessel in tow must keep in proper trim to follow tug, and steer accordingly	431
Tow cannot recover for injury from ice where tug gave due notice of danger and refused to take any responsibility ...	399
A tug whose master also acts as pilot and engineer is not properly manned	1135
A tug towing in narrow channel encountering blinding snow storm should anchor	1135
Burden is on libellant to prove negligent performance of contract	171
Liability for injury to schooner by striking on rocks in attempt of tug to wind her by means of an eddy and the current	171

When tug not liable to vessel in stern tier of tow, injured when leaving dock at night 10

TRADE-MARKS.

The word "Eureka," first used in a compounded fertilizer, will be protected..... 429
 Use of "Apollinis" with representation of bow and arrow or anchor restrained as infringing trade mark of "Apollinaris" with representation of anchor1067

TREATIES.

The right to acquire territory by cession is incidental to treaty making power 658

TRIAL.

Counter affidavits on motion for continuance, held admissible 993
 Opposing creditor has affirmative of issue on trial of right to a discharge in bankruptcy1016
 Complainant in a bill to stay proceedings on a warrant of distress has the right to open and close1147
 Opinions of counsel not in practice may be quoted at the bar in court's discretion..1027
 The waiver of an objection should be entered on the record with the objection ... 719
 Additional proofs cannot be produced as to a point reserved for further argument.. 10
 Dates fixed by records of court may be stated to jury as facts 894
 Failure to furnish written instructions precludes counsel's objecting to court's statement as to instruction refused 450
 A verdict upon an issue ordered by a court of equity is not final until adopted by the court 448
 Verdict amended in replevin for goods distrained by stating amount of rent in arrears1106

Trover.

See "Conversion."

TRUST.

A deed in satisfaction of precedent debt, under agreement that grantor should have surplus on resale, creates trust only in proceeds of sale 374

WAR.

See, also, "Prize."

Alien enemies.

A British subject domiciled in U. S., though temporarily absent in British territory, is an American merchant 958
 The trade between Jamaica and Canada not national 958

Blockade and violation thereof.

Powers of president in establishing blockades, and directing capture of hostile property 799
 Owners of vessel, and generally owners of cargo, bound by violation of blockade by master1118
 Vessel confiscable for sailing to and running blockaded port under false clearance, after official proclamation 180
 Effect of proclamation "relaxing blockade" 533

Capture.

The president has power to direct the capture and destruction of the property of a hostile power making formidable war upon the United States, though war has not been declared by congress 799

 An animus capiendi, and a submission, constitute a capture, though no prize crew put on board 357
 Persons found on board a prize vessel are not subject to order of the court 595
 Captors on public armed vessel have no title until distribution..... 225

Confiscation.

Books intended for a public library will not be confiscated..... 595
 The law as to conquests and confiscation of enemy's territory and property..... 808

Illegal trading.

American vessel loading in enemy's port after knowledge of war declared, liable to confiscation for trading with enemy... 357

Neutrality.

National character depends upon domicile 958
 Property shipped to become the property of the enemy is not protected by neutrality of shipper 958
 Claim of neutral will be recognized only where he is in possession with right of retention 811
 A neutral having made advances on cargo shipped to enemy correspondents under bill of lading to his own order, has a claim cognizable in a prize court..... 811
 Vessel does not forfeit neutral character by hoisting foreign flag in conformity to trade regulations1178

WHARFAGE.

An Erie canal boat employed about New York harbor is not a boat "navigating the canals of this state" within Act N. Y. May 6, 1870..... 987

WILLS.

The common-law distinction between wills of realty and wills of personalty does not obtain in California..... 102
 The custom in California under the Mexican government authorizing two witnesses to a will, operated as a repeal of the law requiring three witnesses..... 102
 The title of office added by a ministerial officer attesting a will may be disregarded, and he be considered an attesting witness.. 102
 Witnesses ignorant of language in which a will is drawn, not interpreted, are incompetent 102
 An unprobated will executed in California under the Mexican government is not a nullity, and its due execution may be proved to sustain title to property thereunder 102
 A will is to be construed under the law as existing at the time of testator's death.. 158
 Devise of property in Third street may be explained to mean property in Fourth street 486
 Proceeds of mortgages identified in lands will pass under a devise of "proceeds" of such mortgages which were foreclosed before testator's death..... 621
 Devise construed to give a fee simple conditional and not a fee tail, and rules by which such devises determined..... 16
 Vested and contingent remainders, how determined1170
 Annuities charged on real and personal estate will be paid out of personalty if there is sufficient to pay both annuities and legacies not specially charged..... 521
 Otherwise the legatees will be subrogated to annuitants already paid out of personalty 521

WITNESSES.		Page
Wife of bankrupt is competent as to facts affecting his estate.....	831	Rule as to privileged communications does not extend to student in attorney's office
Neither the inventor nor a person interested in a patent if issued are competent in an interference case.....	1072	Attorney of bankrupt cannot add to his oath as a witness reservation as to privileged communications
		899
		82