ARTHUR v. NEW ENGLAND MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

[7 Reporter, 329; 6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 403.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Jan. 25, 1879.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — RECORD — FILING BY ADVERSE PARTY—ACT MARCH 3, 1875.

[1. The filing of the petition of removal and bond, as provided in Act March 3, 1875, § 3, (18 Stat. 471,) ipso facto deprives the state court of jurisdiction, and from that time the case is in the federal court. Taylor v. Rockefeller, Case No. 13,802, followed.]

[2. Under Act March 3, 1875, § 3, (18 Stat. 471,) a copy of the record in the state court may be filed before the first day of the "then next session" of the federal circuit court; and, if the party removing the cause fails to file a copy before that time, his opponent may do so.]

[At law. Action of debt on a policy of life insurance in the court of common pleas No. 4, Philadelphia county, Pa., by Arthur's administrators against the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company. The defendant removed the cause to this court. Heard on defendant's motion to extend the time of pleading, or to strike from the record the copy of the record in the state court which has been filed by plaintiffs. Motion denied.

[The summons in this case was returnable in the state court on the first Monday in August, 1878. The defendant's petition and bond for the removal of the cause to the federal circuit court was filed in due form October 16, 1878, before any pleadings had been filed. In accordance with Act March 3, 1875, § 3, (18 Stat. 471,) the bond was conditioned for the defendant's "entering in such circuit court, on the first day of its then next session, a copy of the record in such suit." The then next session of the circuit court was that beginning on the first Monday in April, 1879. As the defendant took no further steps, the plaintiffs filed a copy of the record in the state court; then filed their declaration, and took a rule to plead.]

S. C. Perkins, for the motion.

[The act provides for a filing of a copy of the record by the party petitioning for removal, and his opponent should not be allowed to succeed to the petitioner's rights. The plaintiffs might have brought the case originally here, and by so doing they could have avoided all delay. But they have first brought the action in the state court, and now seek to deprive the defendant of its right, viz. to delay the filing of the record until the time fixed in the act,—"the first day of the then next session," which in this case is the first Monday in April, 1879.]

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, here said that to file on the first day means on or before. Defendant would not contend that he had no right to file the copy of the record and rule the plaintiffs to declare before the day named in the act. The language of the statute meant merely to impose a limit of time within which the copy of the record must be filed, not to forbid speedier action.

[S. C. Perkins, continuing, said: The act was intended to give the petitioner for removal the option to file on or before the day named. It was intended for his benefit. The judiciary act of 1789, § 12, (1 Stat. 79,) uses the same language; yet no case can be found in which the nonpetitioning party attempted to file the copy of the record. The intention of the act of 1789, and that of 1875, was that the cause should be begun anew in the federal circuit court. The established usage under the statute is proof of its meaning. The argument of inconven-

lence should not be allowed to prevail over the words of the statute. Plaintiffs could not sue defendant on its bond if it filed a copy on the first Monday of next April, and this proves its right to delay the filing until that time.]

[A. Sidney Biddle, (and with him William Darlington,) against the motion. As soon as the petition and bond have been rightly filed, the state court loses jurisdiction, and any further proceedings by it are void. Taylor v. Rockefeller, Case No. 13,802. Where, then, is the cause from that time, if not in this court? If here, then the nonpetitioning party can perform the ministerial act of filing a copy of the record which enables this court to deal with the cause. Otherwise in the case of a motion for a preliminary injunction, or for a receiver in the state court, a respondent could delay the cause six months by filing his petition and bond, and refusing to file a copy of the record,—a construction which would make the act destructive of the most important rights.]

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, (orally.) No statute is to be read in the way contended for by the defendant's counsel. Such a contention could only be supported by the most unambiguous enactment, and I fail to find anything of the sort in the act of congress in question. It never could have been intended by the national legislature to destroy the parties' rights by an act which professedly extended their right of litigation in this court; and the illustration used in argument shows how completely the complainant in any suit would be at the mercy of his opponent if such were to be its construction. We recently decided in Taylor v. Rockefeller, [Case No. 13,802,] that the state court ceased to have jurisdiction upon the proper filing of the petition and bond in cases where the act of congress gave jurisdiction in the cause to the court. The result is, that the cause from that time is, in theory, in this court, and the only question is, whether, where the party who has the right neglects to file the copy to the detriment of the other party, the latter cannot do it for him. I have no doubt that he can, and therefore the motion must be denied. Motion denied.

SEAMAN'S WAGES—STALE CLAIM.

In 1872, W. shipped at Sag Harbor, N. Y., as mate on the steamboat A. When he left her in November, 1872, there was a balance of $40 due him for wages. In March, 1876, he filed a libel against the A. to recover that balance. One-half of the vessel was sold in June, 1875, and the other half in February, 1876, to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the libellant's claim. During all the time before the filing of the libel the vessel was running or laid up in the waters about New York. She was in Sag Harbor twice a week from February to April, 1873. In 1875, she was in custody of the marshal of the eastern district, in which Sag Harbor is situated, for 125 days, and was then bonded. The libellant resided all the time in Sag Harbor. He did not know what had become of the vessel, but he made no effort to find her till the fall of 1874, when he put the claim in the hands of the proctor who afterwards filed this libel: Held, that the libellant had lost his lien, by his laches in seeking to enforce it, the rights of bona fide purchasers having intervened.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Dominick White against the steamboat Artisan for wages. Libel dismissed without costs.]

Beach & Brown, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel for seamen's wages. The libellant, Dominick White, shipped on board of the steamboat Artisan, as mate, at Sag Harbor, N. Y., in the summer of 1872, and served on her for 5 months, at $40 a month, leaving her in November, 1872. She ran between Bridgeport and New York. A balance of $80, or two months' wages, is claimed to be due. The claimants purchased one-half of the vessel in June, 1875, and the other half of her in February, 1876, and had no notice of the libellant's claim until this suit was brought. The libellant, during the interval between his service and the bringing of this suit, resided in Sag Harbor. This suit was commenced in March, 1876. Sag Harbor is in the eastern district of New York. From February, 1873, to April, 1873, the vessel ran twice a week between Sag Harbor and New York. From December, 1873, to March, 1874, she was laid up at Jersey City, New Jersey. From March, 1874, to June, 1874, she ran three times a week between New York and Newburgh. From June, 1874, for four months, she ran between New York and Sandy Hook, New Jersey. From the fall of 1874 to June, 1875, she lay at a wharf in Jersey City, in the Hudson river. From June, 1875, for 4 months, she ran between New York and Sandy Hook. The libellant did not know what had become of the vessel, but he made no efforts to find her until the fall of 1874, when he put the matter into the hands of the proctor who filed this libel. Some time in 1875 the vessel appears to have been libelled in the district court for the eastern district of New York, for a large number of claims. Under process in those suits she lay at a pier in the Hudson river, at the city of New York, in charge of the United States marshal for said eastern district, for 125 days, at the end of which time she was bonded. Subsequently to such bonding, the proctor in this suit enquired at the office of the clerk of the district court for said eastern district, in Brooklyn, and learned that the vessel had been libelled and bonded. No evidence is given showing that any other effort was made to find the vessel.

Not only did the vessel ply between New York and Sag Harbor in the spring of 1873, but, during the years 1874 and 1875 she was, for long periods, in waters within the jurisdiction of this court and of the district court for the eastern district of New York. This suit was brought more than three years after the termination of the libellant's service. By the act of February 25, 1865, (13 Stat. 438, § 2, now section 542, Rev. St.,) the district courts of the southern and eastern districts of New York have concurrent jurisdiction over the waters within the counties of New York, King's, Queen's and Suffolk, and over all seizures made and all matters done in said waters, and all processes or orders issued out of either of said courts, or by any judge thereof, may run and be executed in any part of the said waters. The defence set up to the libellant's claim is that the libellant has, by laches, lost his lien. I think the delay in enforcing the lien constitutes, under the circumstances of this case, a valid defence. The libellant had a reasonable opportunity to enforce his lien, but he waited until after the rights of the claimants as bona fide purchasers intervened, and I do not think his delay is excused. 2 Pars. SEAMEN'S WAGES—CHARTERED VESSEL—LIABILITY OF OWNERS.

1. Where seamen were hired by a master of a steamer, who was put in charge by the charterers of the vessel, under their contract with the owners, and after fifteen days labor in getting the vessel ready for sea, were discharged without pay, the voyage being given up: Held, That the seamen had a lien on the vessel for their wages, notwithstanding the charterers by the contract were to pay the crew;

2. The main duty of seamen being in ship's work, an incidental condition of their contract to do work on shore, does not deprive them of a lien upon the ship.

In admiralty.

Wm. G. Wilson, for libellants.

Owen & Gray, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by the crew of the steamer Artisan, to recover wages for services performed on board that steamer, in the port of New York. It appears that the steamer had been chartered by Howes & Cushing, for a period of six months, to be used in transporting a circus company intending to exhibit in various parts of South America. By the charter, the charterers were to furnish the master and crew. Accordingly a master was appointed by the charterer, who took command of the vessel and shipped the libellants as the crew. The libellants went on board and worked some fifteen days in ship's work, getting the ship ready for sea, when the adventure was abandoned and the crew was discharged without any payment whatever. Whereupon they instituted this action against the vessel to recover for labor actually performed by them on board the vessel, and for their expenses for board during that period.

The owners of the vessel have intervened and contest the demand, first, upon the ground that inasmuch as between them and the charterers, the wages of the crew were to be borne by the charterer, no lien attached to the vessel. This ground is untenable. There may be cases where a lien is created upon a ship without any personal liability attaching to the owners of the ship. This is such a case. This crew was hired by one permitted by the owners to be on board and in command of the vessel, as the master thereof, with apparent and actual authority to hire the ship's crew. Sailors employed in the ordinary method by the master of a vessel and working on board thereof in ship's work, have a lien upon the vessel, whoever may be liable as owner of the vessel. The credit of the ship is presumably an element in every mariner's contract, and strong evidence should be required to prove its absence. No such evidence is here presented.

A second ground of objection is that it was part of the contract of the crew to work on shore for the circus company when the vessel should be in port, and their services be required. The testimony does not very clearly show such a feature of the contract, but if it were shown no defence to the demand would be made out.

The main and principal duty provided for by the contract, was that of navigating the ship. Any labor on shore when the vessel was in port would be merely incidental and not sufficient to deprive the contract of its maritime character. See The Canton, [Case No. 2,388;] The Brookline, [Id. 1,937;] The Charles F. Perry, [Id. 2,616.]

The libellants are entitled to a decree for the amounts they have respectively shown by their depositions to be due.

COLLISION AT PIER—PLEADING—TOWBOAT AND TOW.

1. A steamboat was lying, properly moored, at a pier in the North river, in the harbor of New York. A schooner, in tow of a tug, was towed by the pier, when the tow-line parted, and the schooner, by force of the wind and tide, was carried against the steamboat. The owners of the steamboat filed a libel against both the schooner and the tug to recover the damage occasioned by the collision. The libel alleged no other facts than as above stated. The answer of the schooner admitted that the accident arose from the parting of the line, and that the schooner furnished the line, and averred that the line broke because it was not sufficient for towing the schooner stern foremost, and charged as a fault on the tug, the omission to take a second line. The answer of the tug denied that the breakage of the line arose from any act or neglect of the tug. The libellant proved only the facts alleged in his libel. Neither the schooner nor the tug offered any evidence whatever. Held, that, as the steamboat was lying moored at a pier, and unable to move or to do anything to prevent the collision, it was sufficient, as against the schooner, to aver that she ran into the steamboat.

[Cited in The Chickasaw, 38 Fed. 363.]

2. That, under the answer of the schooner, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the schooner must be presumed to have been adrift by her own act, and must be held liable for the damage which she did by drifting against the steamboat.

3. That, as the schooner was not connected with the tug at the time of the collision, and the power which drove her into the steamboat was that of wind and tide, there was no presumption of responsibility for that act, against the tug; and that on the evidence there was no careless action shown to have been committed on her part.

[Cited in The Chickasaw, 38 Fed. 361.]

4. That the libel, therefore, must be dismissed as against the tug, and a decree rendered against the schooner.

In admiralty.

T. E. Stillman, for libellant.
R. D. Benedict, for The Epsilon.
C. Donohue, for The A. R. Wetmore.

BENEDICT, District Judge. On the 24th day of March, 1870, the steamboat Thomas P. Way, while lying properly moored at pier 27, in the Hudson river, inside the pier and on the upper side thereof, was run into by the schooner A. R. Wetmore, and sustained damages, to recover which this action is brought against the schooner, and also against the steamtug Epsilon.

The accident occurred in the day time, and on an ebb tide, when there was no current, or wind or ice, a fog, or other vessels, which in any way prevented or interfered with the proper navigation of the vessels proceeded against. The only material facts alleged in the libel are that the Thomas P. Way, when properly moored, as above stated, was run into and damaged by the schooner A. R. Wetmore, in consequence of the breaking of a hawser by which the schooner was being towed by the tug Epsilon. And upon these facts a decree is sought against the schooner, or the tug, or both.

In a case like this, where the injured vessel, owing to the fact that she was moored at a pier, was under no obligation to move, and unable to do anything to prevent or to cause the collision, it is doubtless sufficient, as against the schooner, to aver that she ran into the vessel so moored, (The Bothnia, 1 Lush. 52;) and where the circumstance, charged as occasioning the accident, is of such a nature as to render it impossible for the injured vessel to know which of two vessels is responsible for its occurrence, it may be permitted to state the case in the manner here adopted. In cases of this description, a decree may be rendered against one or both of the vessels proceeded against, as the evidence shall locate the fault causing the accident.

The answer of the schooner is meagre and uncertain. It seemingly concedes that the collision arose from the circumstance that the towing line parted, and it expressly admits that the schooner furnished the line. But it avers that the line broke because one line was not sufficient to tow the schooner stern foremost, and charges upon the tug, as a fault, the omission to take a second line. Under this answer there must be a decree against the schooner, unless she show negligence on the part of the tug, in towing the schooner stern foremost with a single line; and for this purpose she may resort to any evidence in the cause, and to any averment in the libel or in the answer of the tug. Neither the libel nor the answer of the tug states that it was improper to tow the schooner stern foremost, or that such a method of towing required a stronger line than the one used, or that the tug was responsible for the employment of the line that was used. The defence of the schooner must, therefore, be sought for in the evidence. But no evidence whatever was introduced by either the schooner or the tug, and the evidence of the libellant is as silent as the libel in respect to any matter of defence set up by the schooner.

In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the schooner must be presumed to have been adrift by her own act—and here there is no evidence tending to prove the matters which the schooner has set up in her answer, and nothing in the evidence or the pleadings to rebut that presumption. It follows, therefore, that the schooner must be held liable to pay for the damage which she admits having done by drifting into a vessel properly moored at a pier.

The case against the tug is different, and she has put in a separate defence. The libel admits, and the evidence proves, that the damage sued for was done by the schooner, which was at the time unconnected with the tug, and that the power, which drove the schooner into the libellant's vessel, was that of the wind and tide, and not power derived from the tug. No presumption of responsibility for the act of the schooner can therefore arise against the tug, and, to render her liable, some neglect on her part, which placed the schooner adrift, must be shown. The answer of the tug admits her employment to tow the schooner, and that, while so employed, the schooner became detached from her by the breaking of the line—but it denies that the same arose from any act or neglect of the tug, and it contains no admission which will serve to fasten upon the tug a responsibility either for the breaking of the line or for its condition. In the evidence there is nothing tending to show any careless action or undue strain which would break a line.

Upon these pleadings and proofs I am unable to see how the libellant can ask a decree against the tug. The only ground put forth on the argument was that the answer of the tug admits the insufficiency of the line. Assuming this admission to be contained in the answer, or conceding that on the evidence the fact appears that the schooner became adrift by reason of the insufficiency of the line, still, in order to charge the tug, it must appear that she was responsible for that insufficiency.

The evidence discloses no strain put upon the line which a sound line would not bear; nor does any witness say that the mode adopted for towing the schooner called for a stronger line than would have been required to tow her bow first. The fair inference from the evidence is that the schooner became adrift because of the unsoundness of the line; but whether the line was unsound or was too light for the work, the responsibility is the same upon these proofs, inasmuch as the schooner admits that the line was hers, furnished by her for the purpose of being towed by it. I am of the opinion, therefore, that no case is made out against the tug, and that the libellant is entitled to a decree against the schooner alone for the amount of his damage.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INTERFERENCE — ENJOINING SUITS FOR INFRINGEMENT — CANCELLATION OF JUNIOR PATENT.

1. A junior patent was issued after an interference had been declared by the patent office between the application for it and a senior patent, and a decision in favor of the subsequent applicant. The owner of the senior patent then filed a bill against the owner of the junior patent, alleging the conflict of the patents, and that the invention covered by the senior patent was prior in time, and that the defendant had brought suits for the infringement of his patent, and praying that the junior patent might be cancelled, and that, pendente lite, such suits on it might be enjoined. A preliminary injunction to that effect being applied for: Held, that it could not be granted.

[Cited in Kelley v. Ypsilanti Dress-Stay Manuf'g Co., 44 Fed. 22.]

2. The fact of the decision on the interference is sufficient ground for refusing the application.

[Cited in Kelley v. Ypsilanti Dress-Stay Manuf'g Co., 44 Fed. 22.]

3. The defendant ought not to be restrained from bringing suits on his patent, before that patent is adjudged to be invalid.

[Cited in Strait v. National Harrow Co., 51 Fed. 820.]

[Compare Birdsell v. Hagerstown Agr. Imp. Manuf'g Co., Case No. 1,437.]

[In equity. Injunction denied.]

Jonathan Marshall, for plaintiff.

George E. Betton, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The plaintiffs, owners of a senior patent, allege, in their bill, that the defendants are owners of a junior patent, which was issued after an interference had been declared, and testimony had been taken, and the patent office had decided in favor of the subsequent applicant. The bill further alleges that the patents are in conflict; that the later patent was obtained through fraud, but in what manner is not set forth; and that the defendants have brought suits in Massachusetts for the infringement of their patent. It also alleges the priority in time of the invention covered by the senior patent, and prays that the junior patent may be cancelled, and that, until an adjudication in this suit, the defendants may be enjoined from bringing suits for the infringement of the junior patent. An application is now made for such injunction.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge; reprinted in 2 Ban. & A. 369; and here republished by permission.]

It ought, probably, to be a sufficient reason for denying this application, that the defendants' patent was granted after a full hearing before the patent office, on testimony taken in an interference declared between the application for such patent and the plaintiffs' patent. But, in addition to this, I have examined such testimony, and it shows plainly that the defendants' patent was properly granted, and that, as between it and the plaintiffs' patent, the latter cannot prevail.

Independently of the foregoing considerations, I am not aware of any principle which would authorize the court, in a suit of this character, to restrain a defendant from bringing suits on his patent, before that patent is adjudged to be invalid. The granting of the patent to the defendants confers the right to bring suits thereon for its infringement. Especially is this so as between the parties to this suit, in view of the interference and its result. There is no evidence to sustain the charge of fraud, even if the plaintiffs could be heard to make it. The application for an injunction is denied.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION—EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT.

[A bankrupt may be compelled to present himself and produce his books before the register for examination on the question whether a composition entered into in his case is for the best interest of all concerned.]

In bankruptcy.

Chamberlain, Carter & Eaton, for opposing creditor.

Richard S. Newcombe, for alleged bankrupt.

I, James F. Dwight, one of the registers of the said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify, that in the course of proceedings in said cause before me, and at the second meeting in composition held before me on the 3d day of January, 1878, pursuant to an order of this court dated the 24th day of December, 1877, the following questions arose pertinent to the said proceedings, and were stated and agreed by the counsel for the opposing parties, to wit: Mr. Richard S. Newcombe, who appeared for the alleged bankrupt, and Messrs. Chamberlain, Carter & Eaton, who appeared for Strauss, Kupfer & Co., one of the creditors of said alleged bankrupt, opposing the composition.

Mr. Eaton of counsel for said creditor made the following motion: First.—That he may be allowed to examine the alleged bankrupt touching the question of "best interest of the creditors." Second.—That the register direct the alleged bankrupt to produce his books and papers to be used upon such examination; and Third.—That he be allowed to examine the said alleged bankrupt and the said books at once. Mr. Eaton, in support of said motion, said that he expected to show that the proposed composition was not for the best interest of the creditors, by showing, first, that the alleged bankrupt had cancelled assets which did not appear in his statement; and, second, that several of the claims upon which proofs of debt have been made and which have been counted in favor of the composition are fictitious; and third, that if such claims are fictitious the resolution in said composition had not been properly adopted and confirmed. Mr. Eaton stated that one of his clients, to wit, Mr. Kupfer, a member of the firm of Strauss, Kupfer & Co., the opposing creditors, was present and would make affidavit to these charges if desired.

Mr. Newcombe, the attorney for [Michael Ash] the alleged bankrupt, opposed such motion upon the following grounds: First, that the time for such examination by the creditors had elapsed; second, that such examination can only be had at or during the first meeting; third, that this is the second meeting in composition, and is held for the limited purpose stated in the order of reference, and that such purpose does not require or demand the examination of the alleged bankrupt by a creditor. That no excuse is offered by the opposing creditors for not moving for the examination of the alleged bankrupt at the first meeting of creditors. The alleged bankrupt was present in person at a portion of the second meeting, but did not answer when called for examination, and Strauss, Kupfer & Co., the opposing creditors, were not present at the beginning of the first meeting, but their claim was proved during the first meeting.

I decided that Mr. Eaton had made out a prima facie case for such examination, and granted the motion, holding that the opposing creditor should be allowed to examine the alleged bankrupt touching the question of best interest of the creditors, and that the alleged bankrupt should attend and should produce his books and papers for the purpose of such examination. To this ruling the attorney for the alleged bankrupt excepted, on grounds identical with those given in connection with his opposition to the motion, and requested that my ruling should be certified to the judge for his opinion thereon. Mr. Eaton desired me to certify that he wishes to be heard by the court upon the exception thus taken; Mr. Newcombe expressed no desire to be heard unless Mr. Eaton's request to be heard is granted. James F. Dwight,

In my opinion, inasmuch as I am directed by the order of reference to inquire, and upon hearing to report the results of my inquiries whether it is for the best interests of all concerned that the composition should be confirmed, etc., it is my duty to take all the information I can upon the subject, and if a contesting creditor desires to examine the debtor and his books, to develop facts showing that it would not be for the best interests of all concerned, the debtor must present himself for such examination.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—OFFER TO COMPROMISE.

Terms offered by way of compromise cannot be given in evidence to rebut the statute of limitations.

[See Rhodes v. Hadfield, Case No. 11,748; Hamilton v. Carnes, Id. 5,977; Nicholls v. Warfield, Id. 10,234; Bank of Columbia v. Sweeney, Id. 882.]

At law.

Assumpsit, upon the defendant's promissory note due in 1806. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. To take the case out of the statute, the plaintiff offered in evidence a letter from the defendant to the witness in which he says, "I am desirous that Mr. Ash's claim should be settled;" and offers to pay $150, which was half of the amount of the note without interest. This evidence was objected to by Mr. Marbury, for the defendant, on the ground that it was a mere offer to compromise; and he relied upon the case of Neil v. Abbott, in this court, at December term, 1819, [Case No. 10,088.]

The COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) rejected the evidence.

ASH v. WILLIAMS.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1840.[2]

SLAVERY—CONDITIONAL BEQUEST OF SLAVES—FREEDOM.

In the will of Maria T. Greenfield is the following clause: "I also give and bequeath to my nephew, Gerard T. Greenfield, all my negro slaves, namely Ben, Mansa, James, &c., (naming seventeen slaves,) provided he shall not carry them out of the state of Maryland, or sell them to any one; in either of which events I will and desire the said negroes to be free for life." The legatee sold one of them (the petitioner) to the defendant. Held, that the petitioner thereby became entitled to his freedom.

[See note at end of case.]

The petitioner claimed his freedom under the clause of the will recited in the margin. Upon the death of the testatrix, the legatee, who was also executor, took possession of the petitioner and the other slaves bequeathed to him by the will and held them until he sold the petitioner to the defendant.

Mr. Bradley, for the petitioner, contended that it was a bequest of freedom to the slaves, upon the occurrence of the event of removal or sale. This is a limitation over, in the event of the sale or removal of the negroes by the legatee. Although they are personal property, yet they are also recognized as persons, and are so called in the constitution of the United States; and are capable of receiving a bequest of freedom; even an implied bequest. Dolly Mullin's Case, [Hall v. Mullin,] 5 Har. & J. 190; Wheeler, Slavery, 183, 252; Fitzhugh v. Foote, 3 Call, 13; Le Grand v. Darnell, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 664; Wallingsford v. Allen, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 583; Menard v. Aspasia, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 505; Lee v. Lee, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 44; Boyce v. Anderson, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 154, 155; McCutchen v. Marshall, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 220. This is a question of intention. The testatrix had a right to dispose of her property absolutely, or sub modo. She had a right to bequeath freedom, conditionally, or in a certain event; and when the event occurs, the right to freedom becomes absolute. Dommett v. Bedford, 6 Term R. 684; Gill v. Pearson, 6 East, 173; Pow. Dev. 265; Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 74; Gulliver v. Poyntz, 3 Wils. 141; Bradley v. Peixoto, 3 Ves. 324; Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. 429; [Yarnold v. Moorhouse,] 1 Russ. & M. 364; Hall v. Smith, 14 Ves. 429.

Mr. Marbury and Mr. Jones, contra, contended that the prohibition to sell or remove the slaves is repugnant to the bequest and therefore void; and that the bequest vested an absolute right to the slaves in the legatee. There is no difference in the decision of cases of freedom, and other cases; nor in the construction of wills. Mima Queen v. Hepburne, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 290; Corcoran v. Jones, in this court at last term, [Case No. 3,229;] Bradley v. Peixoto, 3 Ves. 324; Newkerk v. Newkerk, 2 Caines, 345.

THE COURT, (CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting,) at the prayer of the petitioner's counsel, instructed the jury, that by the fact of the sale of the petitioner the estate or property in the petitioner so bequeathed to the said Gerard T. Greenfield, ceased and determined; and the petitioner, thereupon, became entitled to freedom as claimed in his petition.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the following opinion. The petitioner claims his freedom under the following bequest in the will of Maria Anna T. Greenfield, dated September 16th, 1824. "I also give and bequeathe to my nephew Gerard T. Greenfield, all my negro slaves, namely, Ben, &c., (naming seventeen); provided he shall not carry them out of the state of Maryland, or sell them to any one; in either of which events I will and desire the negroes to be free for life." Here is a clear bequest of freedom to the slaves upon the happening of a certain event, which has happened; for it is admitted that the said Gerard T. Greenfield, sold the petitioner to the defendant. The condition, in the bequest, that the legatee should not sell the slaves may be repugnant to the bequest of the slaves to the legatee, and may therefore be void as a condition, and the bequest may be absolute to him; but that does not prevent the happening of the event upon which the bequest of freedom to the slaves also became absolute. Here then are two absolute bequests inconsistent with each other; in which case the last of the bequests must prevail, as being the last will of the testatrix. But the bequest of freedom to the slaves is not a condition annexed to the bequest of the slaves to Gerard T. Briscoe. It is an independent bequest which has become absolute upon the happening of a certain event; and the circumstance, that that event consisted of an act done in the supposed violation of a condition which is void, as being repugnant to the legacy to G. T. Greenfield, does not affect the truth of the fact, that that event has happened; to wit, the sale of the petitioner, by which his title to freedom became absolute. There is another view of the subject. The owner of property has a right to dispose of it as he pleases, either absolutely, or sub modo; or to grant or bequeathe a temporary use of it, reserving to himself an ultimate right of property. It is true that if he parts with his whole interest in the thing to his legatee, with condition that the legatee shall not alienate it, such condition is void, and the bequest is absolute. But if any right or interest in the thing remains in the testator, and not bequeathed to that legatee, he may annex such condition, for it is not repugnant to that bequest. This remaining right or interest may be bequeathed over, or pass to the next of kin, as being undisposed of by the will. The intention of the testator is the rule of construction of the will. In the present case the question is, whether the testatrix intended to devise to G. T. Greenfield such an estate in, or right over, these slaves, as would enable him to carry them out of the state of Maryland, or to sell them. It is very clear that she did not, for she has plainly declared her will that he should not sell or remove them, by giving them their freedom, if he did.

The words of the legacy to G. T. Greenfield, therefore, which, without the proviso, and bequest of freedom to the slaves, would have given him an absolute right to them, are restrained by that proviso, and that subsequent legacy of freedom, which operate upon the supposed absolute legacy to G. T. Greenfield, exactly as the devise of the remainder to the son in the case of Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 74, operated upon the absolute devise to his mother; namely, by limiting and restraining the supposed absolute bequest to G. T. Greenfield, and show that she did not intend to give him an absolute estate in the slaves. See Prest. Est. 38, 42, 43, 45, 46. If she had said, I give and bequeathe all my slaves to G. T. Greenfield, provided they shall be free at his death; according to the case of Smith v. Bell, the estate, under such a bequest, to the said G. T. Greenfield, would be only an estate for life; and, a fortiori, if she had restrained him from selling or removing them. There is only this difference; that the death of G. T. Greenfield was an event which must certainly happen, and his sale of the slaves might never happen; but although his death would be certain, yet it would be uncertain whether he would die before the slaves. There would, therefore, be an uncertainty in both cases; and the uncertainty of the event cannot deprive the slaves of the benefit of it, if it should happen. It is a mere question of construction of the will, which construction must be governed by the intent of the testatrix, derived from a view of the whole will. If she had said, in her will, that her slaves should be free at the death of her nephew, and that, in the meantime, he should not remove nor sell them, but should be entitled to their labor and services, I can see no reason why this should not be a good bequest of freedom to the slaves who should be alive at his death; and I think that a similar construction should be given to this will upon the event of a sale. The law of Maryland which authorizes the owner to manumit his slaves by his last will, makes them capable of taking their freedom under such a bequest, although the manumission should be intended to take effect at a future time or upon a contingent event. If it should be said that these slaves may be taken in execution against G. T. Greenfield, and sold as his property, the same may be said of any other bequest of slaves subject to a contingent right, to freedom at a future day; but I apprehend nothing more could be sold under the execution than the right, title, and interest of the legatee. If the sale should be by collusion with the creditor to defeat the right of freedom, I suppose it might be set aside on the ground of fraud. But it has been said, in argument, that this bequest of freedom to the slaves is void because it is upon an unlawful condition. The condition of this bequest, (if it be a condition,) is, that G. T. Greenfield should remove or sell the slaves. But it is contended by the defendant that such removal or sale is not unlawful; and, if so, the bequest is not upon an unlawful condition. But the sale is not the condition of the bequest; it is only the event, or fact, upon the happening of which the bequest is to take effect; and whether that sale be lawful or unlawful the effect upon the petitioner's right to freedom is the same. Verdict for the petitioner. Bill of exceptions taken by the defendant.

ASHBAHS et al. v. The TRUSTY.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 554.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May 18, 1857

SALVAGE—DERELICT—DISTRIBUTION.

[A vessel, totally abandoned and partly stripped, was manned and worked into port when the position of such vessel, the state of the weather, and season of the year were all unfavorable to saving her. Held, that the salvors should be allowed one moiety of the proceeds of the wreck, after payment of taxable costs, which is the largest allowance ordinarily made for salvage in case of derelict.]

[In admiralty. Libel by John Ashbahs and others against the sloop Trusty and cargo for salvage. Decree for libellants. Motion by libellants for an order of distribution. Granted.]

Mr. Sandford, for libellants.
Mr. Jenness, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a motion for an order of distribution of the proceeds of salved property among the respective salvors. No party appeared to contest the suit for salvage, and a decree was therefore rendered by default. The salvors demand the allotment of the entire property to them as compensation for bringing it in. This is against the general principles of salvage rewards, which contemplates a division of the property saved between its owner and those who have preserved it and restored it to him. It may, however, happen that the expense of rescuing and restoring the property equals its entire value, or so nearly so that the surplus is an inadequate reward to the salvors for their risk and labor. In that case, it is competent to the court to devote the whole property to the satisfaction of the charges incurred in rescuing it. The misfortune of the owner, however, is never to be lost sight of, in the anxiety to do full justice to the merits of the salvors.

The owners of the Trusty and her cargo bought her in at an auction sale under the decree of condemnation in this cause, at the sum of $1,800, and the net proceeds deposited in court were $1,468.80. The schooner, William A. Spofford, which was employed in making the salvage, was worth at the time $8,000, and her cargo $12,000. Her owner expended in making the salvage and keeping the wreck after it was brought in $115.75. She was manned by a crew of nine men and a master, bound from Florida to New York, with a full cargo of cedar wood on board. She fell in with the Trusty Dec. 28, 1856, some three hundred miles from New York, totally abandoned and partly stripped. The weather was rough and the sea bad. The wreck was manned and worked into New York, arriving on Jan. 1, 1857. The position of the wreck, the state of the weather and the season of the year were all unfavorable to saving her, but she was worked in by judicious exertions without any special hazard other than supplying some equipments from the salving vessel and two men to navigate the wreck, and being exposed to extra labor on both vessels.

I think the largest allowance ordinarily made for salvage in case of derelict is the proper sum to be awarded in this instance. I shall decree that the libellants recover one moiety of the net proceeds of the wreck, after payment of the taxable costs. I accept the plan of distribution among the salvors proposed by the libellants, and direct the sum in court, after deducting the costs of suit, to be divided into fourteen equal parts, one half of which is to be paid to the owner of the Spofford, three parts to the mate who took charge of the wreck, and two parts to the seamen who went on board with him, and aided in navigating her into New York, one part to the master of the Spofford, and a moiety of one part to each of the remainder of the crew.

Case No. 574.

ASHBROOK et al. v. The GOLDEN GATE.

Newb. 296;[1] 5 Amer. Law Reg. 148; 36 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 61.]

District Court, D. Missouri. Sept., 1856.

STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS — CONCURRENT ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — MARITIME LIENS — ENFORCEMENT.

1. Under the judiciary act of 1789, the courts of the United States have cognizance of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, exclusive of the state courts, except as to the common law remedy.

2. The common law remedy existed before the constitution and act of 1789, and is by the latter saved, not given.

3. A common law remedy is a remedy by action at common law, and is not a proceeding in rem or against the vessel.

4. A proceeding in rem is not a common law remedy.

5. The admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States in rem, is exclusively in the United States courts.

6. There is no concurrent jurisdiction in rem in admiralty cases between the courts of the United States and of the several states.

[Cited in McAllister v. The Sam Kirkman, Case No. 8,658. Approved in Hill v. The Golden Gate, Id. 6,491.]

7. The proceedings under the statute of Missouri, entitled "An act concerning boats and vessels," are not strictly proceedings in rem.

8. Where, as in this case, a material man has a lien upon a vessel under the general maritime law of the United States, he has a right to enforce that lien by a suit in the United States court, although the vessel may have been subsequently seized and sold under the Missouri act concerning boats and vessels.

[Cited in McAllister v. The Sam Kirkman, Case No. 8,658.]

[See The Skylark, Case No. 12,928.]

9. Where a material man has no lien under the general maritime law, but has a lien under the state law, and the same law provides certain proceedings by which that lien may be divested, if those proceedings are had, his lien is divested, and he cannot sue in the United States court.

[In admiralty. Libels by Ashbrook and others against the steamer Golden Gate. Decree for respondent.]

John H. Rankin, for libelants.

Hudson & Thomas, for respondent.

WELLS, District Judge. In this case certain of the libelants had liens under the general maritime law of the United States; and others had liens under the statute of Missouri, entitled "An act concerning boats and vessels." Dig. Laws Mo. [Rev. St.] 1845, p. 180. Those having liens under the general maritime law, furnished supplies in Cincinnati, Ohio, where they resided at the time, and whilst the boat was owned in Missouri; others resided in Missouri, and furnished supplies whilst the boat was owned in Ohio. Those having liens under the state law resided in Missouri and furnished the supplies there, the boat at that time being also owned in Missouri. After the supplies were furnished, the boat was sold under the provisions of the above cited statute of Missouri; and the question now raised for the consideration of the court is, were these material men divested of their several liens by not intervening in the state court, or by the proceedings in the state court? It is a question of delicacy, as the decision of it may conflict with state laws; but I am compelled to decide it.

The provisions of the statute of Missouri make no distinction in terms between vessels owned by citizens or subjects of foreign nations, or citizens of other states of the Union, and those owned by citizens of Missouri. They apply to "every boat or vessel navigating the waters of this state," (see the act, [Rev. St. Mo. p. 181,] § 1,) and to "contracts made within this state with boats used in navigating the waters of this state." See the case of James v. The Pawnee, 19 Mo. 517. If I understand correctly the language of Judge Story, he entertained the opinion that similar provisions in the statutes of the state of New York could not properly be construed to apply to any but domestic boats or vessels—that is, those owned in New York. The Chusan, [Case No. 2,717.] But the supreme court of Missouri makes no distinction between foreign and domestic vessels. James v. The Pawnee, supra. The case now under consideration differs from that of The Henrietta, [Case No. 6,121.] In that case the boat was owned in Missouri, and the supplies were furnished in Illinois. I held that the case did not come within the provisions of the steamboat law of Missouri, because the vessel was not, at the time the contract was made for the supplies, "navigating the waters of this state;" nor was the contract made or supplies furnished "within this state," and, therefore, the lien obtained in Illinois under the general maritime law, was not divested by the sale in Missouri. But much of the reasoning in that case is applicable to this case, and will not be here repeated.

Is the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in rem, exclusively in the United States courts? When I wrote the opinion in the case of The Henrietta, I had never known it questioned; but in a recent decision by the supreme court of Ohio, it is questioned and denied. See Thompson v. The J. D. Morton, 2 Warden, 26. That court appears to think that the provisions of the ninth section of the judiciary act of congress makes the jurisdiction of the district courts exclusive only as relates to the circuit courts of the United States. In that opinion I cannot concur. The ninth section of the judiciary act, 1789, [1 Stat. 76,] declares that the district courts of the United States shall have, in certain cases specified, first: Jurisdiction or cognizance exclusive of the courts of the several states. Second: In other cases jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of the several states, or the circuit courts of the United States, as the case may be. Third: And in other cases, exclusive original cognizance, without mentioning any other courts, either federal or state; and this last includes all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including certain seizures on water, "saving to suitors, in all cases, a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it;" and a like cognizance in other cases of seizure without any saving.

In the first class of cases, as I have arranged them, the jurisdiction is not declared to be exclusive except as to the state courts; and there is, therefore, an implied exception as to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States. In the second class, the grant is not declared to be exclusive, but concurrent, and the jurisdiction both of the courts of the several states and the circuit courts of the United States is excepted. In the third class there is no exception of the exclusiveness as to either the courts of the several states or the circuit courts of the United States, except as to the common law remedy in the first branch of that class, and without that exception as to the other branch. So that, in the third class, which includes the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, there is no exception except that of the common law remedy, as to the exclusiveness of the original jurisdiction in the district courts. It is absolute, unconditional and exclusive. But the grant of exclusive original jurisdiction to the district courts, does not exclude the appellate jurisdiction of the circuit courts, which is also provided for in the twenty-first section of the same act. This seems to me conclusive. Again: As to all other matters mentioned in the third class, there never has been any doubt as to the jurisdiction being exclusive as to the state courts. Why then is it not exclusive as to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction? The same language is used as to all.

The supreme court of the United States, Judge Marshall delivering the opinion, in the case of Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 9, expressly decided that the jurisdiction of the United States courts, as to seizures on land and water, is exclusive of the courts of the several states. This is embraced in the second branch of the third class above. In the case of Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246, the question in the supreme court of the United States is put beyond all dispute. The court is discussing the question of the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States courts as it regards the state courts, and declares that "By the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, § 9, [1 Stat. 76,] the district courts are invested with exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and all seizures on land and water, and of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States." Similar phraseology is used in the eleventh section of the judiciary act, which gives the circuit court "exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where this act otherwise provides, or the laws of the United States shall otherwise direct," without mentioning the state courts; yet no one has ever doubted that the jurisdiction here given, was exclusive of the state courts. See, also, 1 Conk. Adm. 349. The opinion (excepting so much as regards the effect of the 9th section of the judiciary act) given by the supreme court of the state of Ohio, in the case above cited, and the opinion expressed by that court in the case of Keating v. Spink, 3 Warden & S. 105, do not apply to the case I am considering, although they deny exclusive jurisdiction in rem to the United States courts in admiralty causes. The cases in which those opinions were delivered, arose and had to be decided under the act of congress of the 26th February, 1845, [5 Stat. 726,] which applies only to the lakes and their connecting rivers, and which not only saves the common law remedy, but also "any concurrent remedy which may be given by the state laws."

1st. Let us now see how the matter stands. The courts of the United States have cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and have it exclusive of the courts of the several states, except as to the common law remedy.

2d. This is a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

3d. The libelant has a lien given by the general maritime law of the United States; it is as much a vested right as that of a mortgage. It is a contract which the legislature of a state can pass no law to impair. Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311.

4th. The party having this lien is entitled to sue in the United States court, in admiralty, to enforce it. This right is given by the laws of the United States.

5th. The laws of the United States are supreme over state laws.

6th. A state law comes in and declares that the party having this lien shall either sue in the state courts (under the "act concerning boats and vessels,") or lose his lien.

Can it be possible such state law is valid? The United States law, and the state law cannot both be enforced. The first gives the party a right to sue in the United States courts, and there to establish his claim and obtain the enforcement of his lien; the second declares that if he does not sue in the state court, that is, if he sues in the United States court, he shall get nothing. I refer to the case of Shelby v. Bacon, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 69, 70, 71, to show that where a person has the right to sue in the courts of the United States, no state law, and the proceedings of no state tribunal, can deprive him of that right. It is substantially as follows: The Bank of the United States, after obtaining a charter from the state of Pennsylvania, failed. It made assignments of its assets under the laws of that state. The assignees, according to those laws, were to receive and collect the assets and allow debts and pay creditors; all under the control and jurisdiction of the court of common pleas of that state. If creditors did not exhibit their claims and get them allowed, they obtained no part of the assets of the bank. A creditor who resided in Kentucky, brought suit in the circuit court of the United States. The assignees pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court. The case went to the supreme court of the United States. That court held that the plaintiff, as a citizen of another state, had a right to sue in the courts of the United States, and the state law could not deprive him of that right. The court says: "To establish this claim as against the assignees, the complainant has a right to sue in the circuit court of the United States which was established chiefly for the benefit of non-residents." "On the most liberal construction favorable to the exercise of the special jurisdiction, the rights of the plaintiff, in this respect, could not, against his consent, be drawn into it." "Citizens residing, perhaps, in a majority of the states of the Union, are debtors or creditors of the bank. It is difficult to perceive by what mode of procedure the state of Pennsylvania can obtain and exercise an exclusive jurisdiction over the rights of persons thus situated."

It appears to me that if a person having a lien under the general maritime law, cannot resort to this court—a court of exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty cases—because of the provisions of the state laws and proceedings under them, then the whole subject is reversed, and the state courts have the exclusive jurisdiction; and in that way the entire jurisdiction, in all cases, of the courts of the United States, might be absorbed by the state courts. I am speaking of the effect of such laws, not of the motives or intentions of the legislature in passing them; for, to do the legislature of Missouri justice, the steamboat laws were enacted some sixteen years before it was understood that the United States courts had jurisdiction of cases arising out of our inland navigation upon the public rivers of the United States.

The act of congress, section 9, above referred to, saves to suitors the right of a common law remedy, when the common law is competent to give it. It is a common law remedy, as distinguished from a remedy in the admiralty, or in chancery. This common law remedy existed before the constitution and act of 1789, and is, by the latter, saved, not given. 2 Brown, Civil Law, 111, 112. But a common law remedy is a remedy by action at common law, and is not a proceeding in rem, or against the vessel itself. Id., and note 53 to page 111. Courts of common law do not proceed in rem. Percival v. Hickey, 18 Johns. 292; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 461; Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., [Case No. 2,859;] 1 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) 378. Opinion of Mr. Justice Catron, in Waring v. Clarke, supra. And therefore a proceeding in rem cannot be a common law remedy.

The common law is competent to give a remedy in many cases, which are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Thus a material man may proceed in admiralty either against the vessel in rem, or against the owners in personam, or against the master in personam. He has also his remedy at common law, which would be an action of debt or assumpsit against the owners, or a like action against the master for the value of the supplies furnished. In some, if not all cases of collision, where a party injured could maintain a suit in rem in the admiralty, he could also maintain an action of trespass at common law. Percival v. Hickey, supra. So an action of trover will lie in many cases of a wrongful dispossession of vessels, although there is a remedy also in the admiralty. Why are suitors, not suing in the admiralty, but in the state courts, limited to a common law remedy, and are not authorized to proceed in rem? The proceedings against ships and vessels affect the citizens and subjects of foreign nations, as well as the citizens of the several states; and it is important that the principles and rules for determining rights and injuries, and the courts to administer them, should be those known to the law of nations; and those principles and rules should be uniform throughout the United States, so also of the remedies.

If the courts and officers, including justices of the peace and constables, of the several states, can proceed in rem, against the vessels of other states, so they can against foreign ships and vessels, and thus ships would be seized, voyages would be broken up, the United States involved in difficulties and reclamations with foreign nations; a multiplicity of laws, rules and proceedings, contradictory and inconsistent with each other in the several states, be introduced; and thus the exclusive right and jurisdiction of the United States over our foreign relations, and over the commerce and navigation of the United States, both foreign and domestic, would be interfered with and rendered impracticable. And the states themselves would soon get into conflicts of jurisdiction and laws, and resort to laws retaliatory and vexatious upon the shipping of each other, as was the case before the adoption of the federal constitution. It must be remembered, also, that the navigable rivers of the United States are not the exclusive property of any state or states, but are common to all. Ben. Adm. 114. And that vessels navigating those rivers are enrolled and licensed by the United States, and that such license imports full power and authority to navigate them; and no other authority is necessary.

In relation to the authority of the United States courts and the state courts in admiralty cases, see The Spartan, [Case No. 4,085;] Certain Logs of Mahogany, [Id. 2,559;] Wall v. The Royal Saxon, [Id. 17,093;] [The Flora,] 1 Hagg. Adm. 298; The Flora v. The Globe, [Case No. 4,879.] I do not find any reported case in which is satisfactorily discussed and decided the question how far, under the 9th section of the judiciary act, the courts of the several states have jurisdiction to proceed in rem against ships and other vessels enrolled or registered and licensed under the laws of the United States. I find cases decided, which arose under the act of 1845, extending a quasi admiralty jurisdiction to the lakes and their connecting rivers; which are, as already shown, not applicable to the commerce and navigation on other rivers. Some other cases speak of a concurrent remedy at common law, and say that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is not exclusive. This is all true, because the common law remedies are saved; but they do not discuss the legality of a proceeding in the state courts in rem, and how far it is affected by the 9th section of the judiciary act. It was said in the case of The Robert Fulton, [Case No. 11,890,] that under the law of New York, [1 Rev. Laws N. Y. p. 130, as amended Laws N. Y. 1817, p. 49; 2 Rev. St. N. Y. (1st Ed.) p. 180,] a somewhat similar statute to that of Missouri, the state courts proceeded in rem, and have a concurrent jurisdiction. After a most careful, and I may say, laborious investigation of the subject, I cannot discover on what principle that opinion can be maintained. The court merely says, "that the state tribunals had authority also to enforce the lien (given by the statute of New York), in the present case, is very certain, from the express provisions of the law of New York. There was, then, a concurrent jurisdiction in the two courts, and the proceedings under the state authority were in the nature of proceedings in rem." Now, with the greatest respect for the opinions of the learned judge who delivered the above opinion, it appears to me that the concurrent jurisdiction in rem, of the United States and state courts cannot depend on the statutes of the state, but on those of the United States.

Let us examine carefully and critically the language used in the constitution of the United States, and also that used in the 9th section of the judiciary act; it will aid us in the investigation. The constitution declares that, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The 9th section of the act declares that, "The district courts of the United States shall have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." "Saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." It has been said that, perhaps there has never been in the United States, a law more carefully and ably digested, than that of 1789. In this opinion I fully concur. It has remained almost untouched for sixty-seven years; it originated in the senate, which then possessed men of eminent ability, several of whom were distinguished members of the federal convention. Oliver Ellsworth, afterwards chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, was chairman of the committee to whom the subject was referred, and who is said to have prepared the bill. Observe, the only exception to the exclusive cognizance is, not a remedy in the common law courts, but a common law remedy. The remedy is to be the common law remedy, no matter in what state court it may be sought or what may be the system under which the court may proceed. There is also a qualification of this saving of a common law remedy; it can be only in a case "where the common law is competent to give it." This qualification was, doubtless, intended to cut off new remedies which might be devised, but which were unknown to the common law; for, if the common law was not competent to give the remedy sought, then the party could not resort to any other, but must sue in the United States court in admiralty. A suitor cannot therefore say "a common law remedy is saved to me, and if there be none to effect my object (the seizure of a vessel), I can use any the legislature may have devised for my case." What, then, is the common law remedy spoken of in the ninth section? In my judgment, it can be only common law actions, actions of debt, assumpsit, case, trespass, trover, &c., as known and practiced at the common law. Such are the only common law remedies then, or indeed now known; and these, in many cases, are proper remedies, and such as the common law is competent to give. But a proceeding by bill in equity is unknown as a common law remedy; and a proceeding in rem is unknown as a common law remedy. What lawyer ever knew or heard of a proceeding in rem as a common law remedy? Even the actions of detinue and replevin have in them nothing of the nature of proceedings in rem. Each requires a plaintiff and defendant who are persons, and the judgments bind no one but parties and privies. True, a proceeding in rem may be used in common law courts of the states, but in all such cases it is given by statute, or is a proceeding under the civil law. And the fact that it is given by statute and did not exist before the statute which gave it, in states where the common law prevails, shows that it had no existence as a remedy at the common law. I do not speak of modifications and improvements of actions at common law, which may doubtless be made by the legislatures, and still be within the meaning of the ninth section, but the proceeding in rem is given originally and entirely by statutes where it exists in common law courts, and is not merely modified and improved.

When a court has jurisdiction to proceed in rem, and does so proceed, its judgments are binding and conclusive on the whole world, and this is so, whether the tribunal be foreign or domestic. The Mary, 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 126. Not so with judgments at common law: they bind only parties and privies. If the state courts can have jurisdiction in admiralty cases conferred on them by state statutes, to proceed in rem, so they can to proceed in equity, and this would constitute them, to all intents and purposes, courts of admiralty; and this jurisdiction can be, and in many cases is given by the state laws to justices of the peace, and to constables, as their ministerial officers. If there is an average of fifty counties to each state, and twenty justices of the peace to each county, we should then have in these United States, thirty-one thousand courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, to say nothing of the courts of record. These courts proceeding against, and seizing and selling vessels of foreign nations, and those of sister states, although they would have all the powers of courts of admiralty, yet they would, in but few instances, proceed according to the maritime law, which is part of the law of nations, nor according to acts of congress (for congress can pass no law regulating proceedings in the state courts); but they would proceed according to the statutes of the several states, and usages that would there prevail: each state having a different system. The effect of this must be, it appears to me, to embroil the United States with foreign nations, and the several states with each other, and to produce retaliatory laws and proceedings, and endless conflict, uncertainty and mischief. And this, I repeat, would render nugatory the provisions of the 9th section of the judiciary act of 1789, and the power of congress to regulate commerce and (navigation as incident thereto) with foreign nations and among the several states. If I am right in the views above expressed, there can be no concurrent jurisdiction in rem in admiralty cases between the United States courts and the courts of the several states. I do not, however, consider the proceeding in the state courts of Missouri against boats and vessels as strictly a proceeding in rem. It is, it appears to me, a proceeding devised for suing the owners; but instead of using the name of the owner, it uses that of the boat. In some cases, arising under the act, a judgment is rendered against the boat for the demand of the plaintiff only, execution thereupon issues, and only enough is collected to pay the plaintiff's judgment and costs; and there is consequently nothing to distribute among other creditors or claimants. In no case can creditors, material men and others, although having valid liens, intervene and have their claims adjudicated and get any part of the proceeds, unless the contract for supplies, &c., was made within this state, and the boat at the time navigating this state. James v. The Pawnee, 19 Mo. 517. So I presume it would be as to the other contracts, and as to injuries specified in the act. Such proceedings do not look much like proceedings in admiralty, or proceedings in rem. See the opinion of this court in the case of The Henrietta [Case No. 6,121.] Be this as it may, I could not give to those proceedings the effect which is given to the proceedings strictly in rem. I am, therefore, of opinion that the material man, who has a lien under the general maritime law of the United States, has a right to enforce that lien by a suit in the United States court; and that the state law, and proceedings under it, given in evidence in this case, do not deprive him of that right. The Chusan, [Id. 2,717;] Certain Logs of Mahogany, [Id. 2,559.] But how is it with the material man who has no lien under the general maritime law, but has a lien under the state law?

The subject is not without its difficulties; but I think that as the lien is given by the state law, the state law may divest it. If he takes under the state law, he must hold under the state law. He takes his lien subject to all the provisions for divesting it contained in state laws passed anterior to his lien. He takes it cum onere. Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311; The Chusan, [supra.] The statute which gives the lien—and which is the only law which gives him a lien—provides for certain judicial proceedings by which the vessel may be sold and the lien divested. The 13th section of the "act concerning boats and vessels" (Dig. Laws [Rev. St.] Mo. 1845, p. 183,) declares that, "when any boat or vessel shall be sold under the 11th section of this act, the officer making the sale shall execute to the purchaser a bill of sale therefor, and such boat or vessel shall, in the hands of the purchaser and his assigns, be free and discharged from all previous liens and claims under this act." What the law gave, the law hath taken away. The libelant cannot complain, his lien is divested by the same law and the same authority which gave it.

SALVAGE—COMPENSATION—DUTIES OF WRECKERS.

[1. Where six large wrecking vessels and two small boats, carrying in all 85 men, are employed in lightening and floating a stranded ship, when not more than three or four of the vessels and their crews are necessary, no increased compensation can be given on account of the employment of the supernumeraries.]

[2. Where the gross value of the ship and her cargo of 1,608 bales of cotton was $73,000, and wreckers carried out three anchors, and lightened the ship of 350 bales of cotton, but omitted to sound around the vessel and to ascertain the channel and shoals, so that she was heaved off one shoal and onto another, of which the wreckers were ignorant, and which caused considerable damage, and obliged her to discharge, a reasonable salvage award of 15 per cent. of the net value should be reduced to 11 per cent. of the net value, because of the error and omission on the part of the wreckers.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Thomas Adams and others against the ship Ashburton and cargo for salvage. Decree for libelants.]

William R. Hackley, proctor for libelants.
S. J. Douglas, proctor for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This ship, laden with 1,608 bales of cotton, and bound from New Orleans to Liverpool, ran ashore upon the American shoal, where she lay in twelve feet of water drawing fifteen feet. Six of the largest wrecking vessels and two small boats, carrying in all eighty-five men, were employed in lightening and getting the ship off. No more than three of these vessels and crews, or at the most four, were necessary, and no increased compensation can be given on account of the employment of the supernumeraries.

The wreckers carried out three anchors, and lightened the ship of three hundred and fifty bales of cotton, and heaved her off. The particulars of the service are detailed in the libel. The gross value of the ship and cargo may be estimated at $73,000. And I should think fifteen per cent. upon the net value would be a reasonable salvage, but for the fact, that the wreckers omitted to sound around the vessel, and ascertain the channel and shoals, as was their duty to do. And the ship, after being heaved off from one reef, was heaved on to another, of which the wreckers were ignorant, and of which it was their duty to be informed. The ship suffered considerable damage, and has been obliged to discharge in consequence of this error and mistake on the part of the wreckers. They acted in good faith, but neglected to inform themselves of the soundings about the ship. The anchors were placed right, and in sufficient water, but the shoal lay between them and the ship. I think that this shoal might have been avoided if its existence had been known to the wreckers. Under these circumstances, I think eleven per cent. upon the net value is a reasonable compensation. The difference to the salvors, in their salvage, owing to their omission to make the proper soundings, will be not far from $4,000 growing out of the difference in the value of the ship, the increased charges, and the difference in the rate per cent.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCES—INSOLVENCY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Under the bankrupt law, a sale of property to a creditor, more than thirteen months before the debtor applied for the benefit of the law, if bona fide, and without knowing that the debtor contemplated going into bankruptcy, is valid.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Such a sale, if done as a preference of one creditor over another, when the debtor contemplated going into bankruptcy, might prevent him from getting his discharge, and might be in him an act of bankruptcy, but still be valid in regard to the creditor.

[Cited in Whetmore v. Murdock, Case No. 17,510.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. In England, the contemplation of bankruptcy means the benefit of the bankrupt act, but here it has been construed to mean insolvency.

[See Morse v. Godfrey, Case No. 9,856; McLean v. Lafayette Bank, Id. 8,888; Atkinson v. Farmers' Bank, Id. 609; Everett v. Stone, Id. 4,577.]

4. The preference of a creditor is not the payment of one in the ordinary course of business, or under threats or suits, but selecting one, as a relation or friend, or settling with him before due, or on the eve of bankruptcy, when not pushed by him.

[Cited in Whetmore v. Murdock, Case No. 17,510; Grow v. Ballard, Id. 5,848.]

5. The burden of proof, and duty to offer facts which tend to impeach or annul a sale, lie on the party who attempts to avoid it.

[6. Cited in Carr v. Gale, Case No. 2,435, to the point that an assignee in bankruptcy can sue fraudulent grantees in order to regain possession of the bankrupt's property.]

At law. This was an action of trover for a conversion, alleged to have been committed Dec. 21st, 1841. The plaintiff claimed as assignee of a bankrupt, R. R. Ricker, and it appeared in evidence that R. R. Ricker was one of a firm of traders, for whom the defendant had become indorser, and to whom he had loaned money; and, at the time of the alleged conversion, pressing for payment, R. R. Ricker, the acting partner, conveyed to him in discharge of his debts and responsibilities their stock of goods, at an agreed price. Upon this, he entered into possession of them, and employed R. R. Ricker as his salesman. The firm had then due to them nominally nearly $10,000 in notes and accounts, and were sued soon after as well as previously by some of their creditors, a portion of whom, but not all, they were able to pay. R. R. Ricker did not file a petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act till Jan. 23, 1843. Doing it then, the plaintiffs were appointed his assignees, and brought this action Feb. 18, 1843, for the goods sold to the defendant in December, 1841. The plea was not guilty, and on the evidence in the case, the court instructed the jury, that after the great lapse of time between the sale of the goods to the defendant, and the application for the benefit of the bankrupt act, being nearly fourteen months, if they believed the sale was bona fide and for a valuable consideration, the defendant was entitled to retain the property; and that it was not proof the sale was made mala fide, if the vendor knew the vendee would probably obtain the payment of his debt, when others would not; unless the debtor made the sale in contemplation of bankruptcy, and one of his leading objects was to contravene the policy of the bankrupt act, by giving a preference to the defendant, and the defendant was probably aware of that fact. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, a copy of which is annexed. "And now on this seventh day of the term, after verdict and before judgment, the plaintiff in said cause moves that said verdict should be set aside and a new trial be had, for the following reasons:—

"Because the court declined to charge the jury as requested by the plaintiff's counsel; 1. That a conveyance by a person in insolvent circumstances of the whole of his property, or that visible portion of it with which he was carrying on business, with the intent thereby to give a preference, was an act of bankruptcy under the bankrupt act, and void; and therefore was not within the exception of the first proviso of the second section. 2. That the circumstances of such a transfer, as above stated, of the whole or a large portion of his property by the debtor, was sufficient notice of contemplation of bankruptcy in him to the creditor receiving the payment or transfer for the purpose of preference as aforesaid. 3. That a payment or transfer of property made by a person in insolvent circumstances to a creditor or indorser, with the intention of giving a preference to that creditor or indorser over the rest of the creditors, was (if the jury should so find the facts) absolutely void under the second section of the bankrupt act, and not within the exception in the first proviso. And also, for that the court charged the jury, that such payment or conveyance by way of preference was a bona fide transaction, and within the first proviso of the second section, provided the jury should find that the transaction took place more than two months before the petition in bankruptcy, and that an adequate consideration was given for the property, instead of charging that said proviso of the second section did not protect any conveyances made in contemplation of bankruptcy by way of preference, which are declared fraudulent in the enacting part of the section. Wherefore, because of the misdirections in law above stated, the plaintiff prays the court that said verdict may be set aside, and a new trial be granted in the premises." [New trial refused.]

Jencks, counsel for plaintiffs.
R. Greene and Steere, for defendant.

Before WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, and PITMAN, District Judge.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. A copy of the motion in this case for a new trial has not been brought to my attention till the present term; nor has any argument been presented till now. The facts and the law, as they appeared at the trial, are not so fresh in my recollection, therefore, nor are they so full in my minutes as could be wished. The bankrupt law, under the provisions of which this dispute arises, having long since been dead, it is not of so much public importance how its leading enactments are to be construed. But these particular parties have their rights under it; and hence it is necessary to dispose of them in conformity to that law. Consequently I shall proceed to do it in a manner as true to its spirit and design as the time allowed for investigation will permit, and without longer and injurious delay.

Some of the difficulty here and in previous cases under the bankrupt act has arisen by not discriminating well between the different objects of different parts of the act, in regard to subject matters, as well as persons. Some clauses are severe if not penal against the bankrupt in certain events, but do not impair the rights of third persons, such as purchasers, unless they co-operated in his misconduct. Thus the objects of the first and second sections of the bankrupt law, under which the questions arise here, were threefold. One was to define, to some extent, what conduct of the bankrupt himself should constitute an act of bankruptcy, so as to justify his creditors to have him proceeded against under the law, and his property divided equally among them. The other was to define some of the misbehavior, which should prevent a trader, when becoming a bankrupt, from getting his discharge, and this as a penalty for such misbehavior. And another, and the only one material in the present case, was to declare what conveyances by a person becoming bankrupt should be void, or annulled as to third persons, no less than himself, so as to require, under the policy of the bankrupt law, that the property be restored to the general assets of the bankrupt, and to be apportioned equally among his creditors. Thus for instance, it may be an act of bankruptcy, so as to justify proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor, if he secrete himself, or abscond, or make any fraudulent conveyance. And it may prevent him from getting a discharge, if he does that or makes any preferences among his creditors, considered by that act unlawful, or any material concealment of his estate.

But what, as a matter of public policy, shall justify the avoidance of sales to third persons, or sales and payments to creditors, and after what length of time, or under what defects and misbehavior, such sales should be disturbed, or overturned, is entirely a different question, depends in part on the conduct of the creditor as well as the debtor, and in some degree rests on different principles and provisions in the law. No titles would be safe where a bankrupt system prevails, if, after one or two years, some of the parties to them should choose to go into bankruptcy, and those titles are all then to be destroyed, on account of some secret, unrecorded taint, though the purchaser acted bona fide, gave a full and valuable consideration, and had no notice of any prior act of bankruptcy, or intent of the vendor to go into bankruptcy. Hence the second section does not avoid any sales of that character, if made more than "two months before the petition filed against him or by him;" viz. the vendor and debtor.

The present case exhibits a sale made more than a year previous, so that the only remaining considerations are, whether it was bona fide and without any "notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, or of the intention of the bankrupt to take the benefit of this act." Now the jury have found that it was bona fide and for a valuable consideration; and there was, in truth, little controversy on that point at the trial. Next, there was no evidence except inferential, that the bankrupt then, at the sale, contemplated taking the benefit of the act, or if he did, that his intention was known to the defendant. This last is the essential condition precedent for annulling the sale, and though the bankrupt was on the stand as a witness, and knew whether he then notified the defendant of such an intent. and whether he even entertained such an intent, yet the plaintiffs, whose business and duty it is to show the facts, which invalidate a sale, put no such questions to him, to draw out those decisive facts. He was asked if the defendant knew his embarrassments, and he replied, that the defendant probably suspected them, but that was all. And the bankrupt afterwards paid some other debts, and attempted a compromise with all his creditors.

In Gorham v. Stearns, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 366, an assignment was made to a creditor to pay him, in choses in action, only two days before he went into insolvency, and after goods had been attached. But when he conveyed them, he did not contemplate going into insolvency, and the transfer was held not to be void as to other creditors. That statute and the bankrupt act use similar language on this. The burden and duty lie on assignees to show that the transfer was with a view to give a preference. and in contemplation of bankruptcy. Id. 367. It was admitted in the case in Metcalf, that the debtor was insolvent, which is the chief fact here, from which it is argued, that the creditor should have inferred he was looking to the insolvent system, and meant to violate its spirit. Id. 368. But almost the whole facts here tended to rebut such an intent at that time, as the bankrupt law was not then in operation, and he did not apply for the benefit of it for more than a year afterwards; and sought in the mean time to effect a compromise with his creditors. So most of the circumstances here actually put in tended chiefly the other way, rather than to support this objection. Had the debtor then contemplated taking the benefit of the act, he would probably have applied for it in the February after, when the act went into effect. But he delayed it for more than a year; he delayed it, too, under suits and inconveniences, which would have probably hastened his application, had he intended in the December previous to have made one. The only other evidence at all relied on to justify a different conclusion, is the naked fact of the sale of most of his tangible property. But he retained some of that and a large amount of notes, and postponing, so long after, to go into bankruptcy, looks more like an original design not to do it at all; because, in that event, he would be obliged to surrender all his notes as well as other estate. The existence of such an intent being therefore doubtful, and not attempted to be proved by the best testimony, the bankrupt himself; and these remarks applying still more strongly to the evidence on the next point, the most important one, whether a notice was given to the defendant of such an intent; there is nothing left to avoid the sale, unless some prior act of bankruptcy had occurred, of which Steere was apprised. But nothing of that kind is pretended. These being the facts and the law, was there any direct or incidental ruling by the court, on any of these questions, which was erroneous?

It is said that the jury were instructed that a preference of one creditor over another, by a bankrupt, would not alone avoid such a sale, and that in this there was a misdirection. I have no doubt that the bankrupt law intended to prevent a bankrupt from having his discharge, if, "in contemplation of bankruptcy," he made a preference of one creditor over another; yet I never supposed that either of these would alone be sufficient to avoid the sale. Not only both must be made out distinctly, i. e. a preference and a contemplation of bankruptcy, in order to punish or disfranchise the bankrupt as a species of criminal; but the creditor was not to suffer penally likewise, by having his purchases destroyed, unless he had knowingly co-operated in what was wrong. This question, of a punishable preference by a debtor, involved two inquiries; 1. Did the bankrupt make a payment or conveyance in contemplation of bankruptcy? and, 2. Did he do it for the purpose of giving a preference? In relation to the first question, the rule in England was, that the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy," implied that the debtor must have had the bankrupt law in his mind, at the time of the payment or conveyance. Cooke, Bankr. Law, 147; Hopkins v. Grey, 7 Mod. 139; [Morgan v. Brundrett,] 5 Barn. & Adol. 289; [Fidgeon v. Sharpe,] 5 Taunt. 539; McLean v. Lafayette Bank, [Case No. 8,888.] But in this country the phrase had been construed to mean, "in contemplation of becoming insolvent, and being compelled to wind up business." 5 Law Rep. 289, 296, 310; [Hutchins v. Taylor, Case No. 6,953; Arnold v. Maynard, Id. 561; Wakeman v. Hoyt, Id. 17,051;] 6 Law Rep. 16, [Dennett v. Mitchell, Case No. 3,789;] Morse v. Godfrey, [Case No. 9,856.]

These decisions, it is true, were not made under this section, but were given in cases where the question was, whether an act of bankruptcy had been committed or not. But, for the purposes of the trial, the court ruled that the same construction applied to the present case. The jury, in order to find the bankrupt guilty of this, must find that, at the time of making the conveyance or transfer, he was conscious of his insolvent condition, and expected to be compelled to wind up his business. It was not enough that he knew he had not then property enough to pay his debts, if he should be obliged to stop immediately; for a person who was indebted more than the amount which he possessed might, if a portion of his debts were not yet due, believe he should be able, before the time came round, to earn enough to meet them. If at the time, therefore, he did not contemplate becoming insolvent, he was not within the meaning of this clause of the second section. But if he did, so far as regards himself, perhaps bankruptcy was contemplated.

But the greatest error has been in considering almost every sale or payment, just before stopping payment, as an illegal preference. The payment or conveyance must be for the purpose of preferring a creditor. There had been numerous decisions upon this point; and a number of instances might be mentioned, as illustrating the question of intent. Thus, if a debtor went to a particular creditor, hunted him up, picked him out from the rest, and paid him more in proportion than he could pay the others; if he elected to pay a relative to whom he was indebted; if the transfer or conveyance was done secretly; if it was out of the usual course of business, in a new, extraordinary, or unusual manner; if it was just in the hurry of going into insolvency, a day or two or an hour or two before making the petition; if payment of a debt was made before it became due; or if a debtor should convey away the whole of his property on the eve of bankruptcy. Wakeman v. Hoyt, [Case No. 17,051.] Any of these circumstances would tend to show his intention to prefer the creditor to whom the payment or transfer was made. On the other hand, if the creditor had pressed hard for his debt; if payment was made under the pressure of importunity, or threats of legal process; if it was in the ordinary course of dealing between the parties; these would be circumstances tending to show that some other motive actuated the debtor, rather than the intention to prefer a creditor. And where the consequences of an act are penal, and a fair and honest motive is as consistent with the act as a fraudulent one, the former is of course to be presumed to have been the real and true one.

In England a sale of part of his effects by one insolvent is not fraudulent and void, if for a valuable consideration, or if it be to secure a surety or creditor, unless seeking as an object to give a preference, and to deprive others of an equal dividend. [Devon v. Watts,] 1 Doug. 86; Linton v. Bartlet, 3 Wils. 47; [Worseley v. Demattos,] 1 Burrows, 474, 477. It was of all his goods and property only two days before a bankruptcy, and to a brother conveyed, and still good. [Harman v. Fishar,] Cowp. 124; Hooper v. Smith, 1 W. Bl. 441; [Wheaton v. Sexton's Lessee,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 503. If the transfer is in the ordinary way, and is completed before an act of bankruptcy, the title passes. Cowp. 123. Or if it is a payment on legal process, though the night before one becomes a bankrupt; or if right to be done, and not a mere design to prefer; or if in pursuance of a previous agreement, as there it is not a mere preference. Here the conveyance was urged by the creditor; he was a surety also. It was right he should have been paid; and the bankrupt act was not resorted to for more than a year after; and, as a matter of fact, it probably was not a preference made from favor, and in contemplation and in fraud of that act.

It is bona fide, if done by means of acts of the creditor, his threats or persuasions, and it then has a good consideration. [Ogden v. Jackson,] 1 Johns. 370; [Phoenix v. Ingraham,] 5 Johns. 412; [Fulton Bank v. Benedict,] 1 Hall, 503; [President, etc., of Phoenix Bank,] Id. 575. It is never bad, if the debtor did not mean to prefer. [Worseley v. Demattos,] 1 Burrows, 478, 481; [Wheelwright v. Jackson,] 5 Taunt. 109; [Manton v. Moore,] 7 Durn. & E. [7 Term R.] 67. Beyond all this, a preference alone is not a void act at common law or in many states; neither is it under the bankrupt law itself, unless looking to that law, and meaning, by the preference, to thwart its policy. Hence, though a bankrupt is punished for making a preference, if made in contemplation of bankruptcy, as he then forfeits his discharge, because he thus attempts to thwart the law which he is about to resort to; yet such a preference by a debtor is no fault or crime in him, if not contemplating bankruptcy. Nor is the creditor ever punished, unless such motive existed and was known to him, and certainly he is not at common law; nor is he under the bankrupt act to be punished, except so far as to carry out its policy against such knowing misconduct by those about to seek its aid, and others co-operating with them. If made here then by the debtor, without contemplating a subsequent resort to the law, the sale and preference are not void at all. Nor if made with such contemplation, though culpable in the debtor, it is not invalid as to the creditor, unless he took the property with notice of what was contemplated; and thus designedly co-operated against the act, and did it within the short period of two months prior to the debtor's application for the benefit of the act.

The purchaser as well as seller must have intended fraud, else being preferred by the debtor does not make the act void under 13 Eliz. Magniac v. Thompson, [Case No. 8,956;] [Sexton v. Wheaton,] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 238. The debtor has a right to prefer, and, if the creditor does nothing improper, it is valid. 2 McLean, 44, [Findlay's Ex'rs v. Bank of U. S., Case No. 4,791;] [Holbrook v. Union Bank of Alexandria,] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 556; Brooks v. Marbury, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 78; The Experiment, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 268; 4 Wash. C. C. 232, [Pearpoint v. Graham, Case No. 10,877;] Magniac v. Thompson, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 348. A bankrupt was originally defined to be one who concealed his property, or fraudulently evaded payment, and hence his bank for trade was broken up, and his assets divided. 2 Bl. Comm. 471, 472, c. 31. It was for a wrong act of his, and he was made to feel the penalties; so he is to feel them, if he tries to evade the law. But not innocent purchasers or innocent creditors, whom he had paid. The law wisely considers it is better that a preference of this kind which is good at common law, and when the creditor does not know of the design of the debtor to go into bankruptcy, and does not thus co-operate to defeat the policy of that law, should not be disturbed as to the public, after two months, as before named, than that such assets should go into a common fund for all creditors. See more cases, Com. Dig. "Bankrupt," C 9.

The limitations on the doctrine are safe, and I see no sufficient reason to change my views, that this is the true construction of the law. The cases chiefly relied on in support of the motion were, first, Peckham v. Burrows, [Case No. 10,897.] But there the court say it decided no law, but merely the fact, that a conveyance of most of one's estate, on the eve of the bankrupt law coming into effect, was in their opinion as a fact, "in contemplation of the" act, and a preference of one creditor over others. This impugns no rule now laid down as law for this case. When the court afterwards say, that the creditor need not know, though they think he had sufficient grounds to know the debtor contemplated going into bankruptcy, the court chiefly went on its own decision of this fact; and so far as the remark goes beyond that into a question of law, it is not sustained by the records, or by the general policy of the bankrupt act. Next, in Hutchins v. Taylor, [Id. 6,953,] the court merely decided what was an act of bankruptcy, and that in contemplation of bankruptcy meant a state of insolvency, as stated in the trial of the pending case. So in Arnold v. Maynard, [supra,] the court merely settled what was an act of bankruptcy, and that in contemplation of bankruptcy must mean a state of insolvency. So in Wakeman v. Hoyt, [supra,] the decision was as to what constitutes an act of bankruptcy, and not what avoids a conveyance. So, Albany Ex. Bank v. Johnson, [Case No. 133.]

In Dennet v. Mitchell, [Id. 3,789,] the opinion goes to show, that it is not in contemplation of bankruptcy unless the debtor appeared to regard himself as insolvent. None of these cases in respect to the law, seem to contravene the substance of what was ruled here; and most of them relate to questions connected with the bankrupt and his discharge, rather than his creditors or purchasers. There were several other questions started in the trial of this cause as to the validity of the proceedings in bankruptcy, on account of the partnership, the competency of the bankrupt as a witness, &c. But as they have not been relied on in argument, I refrain from going into them.

[NOTE. In discussing prohibited sales in contemplation of insolvency under the bankrupt act, Mr. Justice Davis, speaking for the supreme court of the United States, said: "It is for the interest of the community that every one should continue his business, and avoid, if possible, going into bankruptcy; and yet how could this result be obtained if the privilege were denied a person who was unable to command ready money to meet his debts as they fell due, of making a fair disposition of his property in order to accomplish this object? It is true he may fail, notwithstanding all his efforts, in keeping out of bankruptcy, and in that case any sale he has made within six months of that event is subject to examination. If it shall turn out on that examination that it was made in good faith, for the honest purpose of discharging his indebtedness, and in the confident expectation that by so doing he could continue his business, it will be upheld. On the contrary, if he made it to evade the provisions of the bankrupt act, and to withdraw his property from its control, and his vendee either knew, or had reasonable cause to believe, that his intention was of this character, it will be avoided. Two things must concur to bring the sale within the prohibition of the law,—the fraudulent design of the bankrupt, and the knowledge of it on the part of the vendee, or reasonable cause to believe that it existed." Tiffany v. Lucas, 15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 410. For instances in which a sale has been set aside because the vendee had reasonable cause to believe the vendor to be insolvent, etc., see Babbitt v. Walbrun, Case No. 694; Brooks v. D'Orville, Id. 1951.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — WHAT CONSTITUTES INFRINGEMENT—PRIOR PATENT—DISCLAIMER.

1. In view of the prior state of the art, the reissue patent granted E. H. Ashcroft, assignee of William Naylor, Nov. 9, 1869, for a steam safety-valve having an overhanging downward-curved lip surrounding an annular recess into which the steam passes as it issues from under the valve, if valid, must be limited to the combination of the other elements of the device with an annular recess of the precise form described.

[Cited in Consolidated Safety-Valve Co. v. Crosby Steam-Gauge & V. Co., 7 Fed. 769.]

2. So limited, the patent is not infringed by the use of a steam safety-valve substantially the same as that described and shown in the patent granted George W. Richardson Sept. 25, 1866, although that valve has an overhanging downward-curved lip and an annular recess surrounding the valve-seat, into which a portion of the issuing steam is deflected; the lip and recess being, in construction and mode of operation, substantially different from the lip and recess described in the Naylor patent.

[In equity. Bill by Edward H. Ashcroft against the Boston & Lowell Railroad Company to restrain the infringement of patent No. 58,962. Bill dismissed. An appeal was subsequently taken to the supreme court, where this decree was affirmed. 97 U. S. 189.]

James B. Robb, for complainant.

J. G. Abbott and Benjamin Dean, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case charges the defendant with infringement of letters-patent of the United States, reissued Nov. 9, 1869, [No. 58,962,] to the complainant, as assignee of William Naylor, of the county of Middlesex, England, for an improvement in steam safety-valves. The answer of the defendant sets up in defence: First, that the reissued letters-patent are not for the same invention described in the original letters-patent. Second, that William Naylor was not the original and first inventor of the improvements specified in said reissued patent, but that the same were known to others and used by them, as stated specifically in the answer, prior to the alleged invention thereof by Naylor. Third, that the reissued patent does not cover and embrace the valve used by the defendant. Fourth, that the valve used by defendant is described and contained in letters-patent of prior date to complainant's invention, granted by the British government to Thomas Green, also to Charles Beyers, and by the United States to Henry Waterman, and also to George W. Richardson, and that the invention of George W. Richardson, described in his patent, was made prior to the invention of Naylor set out in the bill. The invention relates to spring safety-valves for use on locomotive, stationary, and marine engine boilers. As the spring on common safety-valves was compressed by the lifting of the valve, the force of the spring became stronger by tension, while, inversely, from other causes, the tendency of the valve to rise became weaker. The spring safety-valve, therefore, failed to relieve the boiler; for, as the spring was compressed by the lifting of the valve, its power to resist was largely increased, and if steam was rapidly generated, the pressure in the boiler continued to increase while steam was escaping at the valve. Various attempts have been made, as shown by the various patents in evidence, to obviate this defect in the operation of the common spring safety-valve.

William Naylor, in his specification filed in the great seal patent office of Great Britain, on the twenty-first day of January, 1864, described two methods of obviating this difficulty. One of these methods claimed by him as his invention, he says, "consists, when using a spring for resisting the valve from opening, in the employment of a lever of the first order, one end resting by a suitable pin upon the safety-valve, and the other end of the lever resting upon the spring being bent downward to an angle of about forty-five degrees from the fulcrum, so that, when the valve is raised by the steam, the other end of the lever is depressed upon the spring downward, and at the same time is moved inward toward the fulcrum, thus virtually shortening that end of the lever, and thereby counteracting the additional load upon the valve as it is raised from its seat by the greater amount of compression put upon the spring." This method he claimed as his invention in the specifications of his English patent. These specifications also described another method of obviating the difficulty. This consisted of the following contrivance: A lateral branch or escape-passage was provided for a portion of the steam after it passed the valve, the valve was made to project over the edges of the exit-passage for the steam, and the projecting edges of the valve were curved slightly downward, so that the steam, on issuing between the valve and its seat, would impinge against the curved projecting portion of the valve, and a portion of it would be directed downward into the annular chamber which surrounded the central passage for the steam, which chamber communicated with the exit-pipe, while the other portion of the steam ascended past the edges of the valve. "By this means," he states, "I am enabled to avail myself of the recoil action of the steam against the valve, for the purpose of facilitating the further lifting of such valve when once opened; but I wish it to be understood that I lay no claim to such recoil action, nor to the extension of the valve laterally beyond its seat." And in the claims, at the close of his specifications, he made no claim for any such extension of the valve, or any device for effecting any recoil action of the steam. In fact, Charles Beyer, in his English patent, dated Oct. 21, 1863, before the date of Naylor's patent, had fully described a valve made to project over the edges of the exit-passage for the steam, and the projecting edges of the valve were curved slightly downward, so that the steam, on issuing between the valve and its seat, would impinge against the curved projecting portion of the valve. The description is as follows: "This invention consists in forming a flange round the valve, commencing at the outer edge of the valve-facing, which flange is undercut and concave in shape, and the concave side is toward the seating of the valve, which has also a flange upon it, commencing at the outer edge of the valve-seating, but the upper surface of the flange is convex, and corresponds nearly to the concave surface of the flange upon the valve. There is a slight space between the concave and convex surfaces of the two flanges, which diminishes toward the outer edge of the flanges. When the steam begins to escape from between the surfaces of the valve, it gets between the concave and convex surfaces of the two flanges, and its force thus acts upon a larger area, and reacts upon the concave surface of the valve, and causes it to open to a greater extent than the ordinary safety-valve." It will be seen from this description that the Beyers safety-valve had "an overhanging downward-curved lip or periphery and an annular recess," into which the steam will be directed downward on issuing between the valve and its seat, while a portion of the steam will also impinge against the curved projecting portion of the valve.

Without adverting to the patents of Henry Waterman and other devices older than Naylor's, we have seen that Naylor could not, with propriety, claim to have been the inventor of the combination, in a spring safety-valve, of every form of projecting overhanging downward-curved lip or periphery, with an annular recess surrounding the valve-seat, into which a portion of the steam is directed as it issues between the valve and its seat. Neither of the attempts to overcome the objections to the spring safety-valve in common use appears to have been so far successful as to have introduced either of the inventions into common or general use. Letters-patent of the United States, issued Sept. 25, 1866, [No. 58,294,] to George W. Richardson, of Troy, N. Y., for an improvement in safety-valves. The purpose of a safety-valve being to open and relieve the boiler, and then to close again at a pressure as near as possible to that at which the valve opened, Richardson accomplished it so far as to invent a valve which would open at the given pressure to which the valve was adjusted, and relieve the boiler, and then close again when the pressure was reduced about two and one-half pounds to the inch when the pressure in the generator was one hundred pounds to the inch. This practically answered the required conditions for a useful spring safety-valve. It went very soon into general use. The complainant, who is a manufacturer in this country of safety-valves, then, as appears from the evidence in the record, endeavored to find something to anticipate the invention of Richardson. Finding in the patent office a model of the Naylor valve, with an overhanging lip and an annular chamber surrounding the valve-seat, he goes to England and purchases the right to the Naylor invention; and although Naylor himself had disclaimed the recoil action of the steam consequent on the passage of a portion of the steam downward into the annular chamber surrounding the central chamber, while the other portion of the steam ascends past the edges of the valve, and had also disclaimed the extension of the valve laterally beyond its seat, the complainant caused the patent to be reissued to him, as assignee of Naylor, with the following claims, which were not in the original patent:

"2. The safety-valve, C, with its overhanging downward-curved lip or periphery and annular recess, D, substantially as herein shown and described, and for the purpose set forth.

"3. The annular recess, D, surrounding the valve-seat, substantially as herein set forth.

"4. The combination of the valve, C, and the annular recess, as herein set forth, and for the purpose described."

From the history of the art as previously given, and from a comparison of the original with the reissued Naylor patent, as well as from the language of the claims in the reissued patent, it is manifest that if these claims can be sustained, it can only be for the combination of the described valve with its overhanging downward-curved lip, with precisely such an annular recess surrounding the central chamber as he describes. Naylor did not invent the overhanging downward-curved lip or periphery, nor was he the first to use an annular chamber surrounding the valve-seat into which a portion of the steam is deflected as it issues between the valve and its seat. His claims must, therefore, be limited to the combination of the other elements, with precisely such an annular recess as he has described, and operating in the described manner so far as such recess, separately or in combination, differed in construction and operation (if it did materially differ in those respects) from those which had preceded it. The claims cannot be made to cover a safety-valve like the Richardson valve, which, in its construction and mode of operation, is substantially different from the valve described in the Naylor patent, simply because the Richardson valve, in common with the Naylor valve, has the overhanging downward-curved lip or periphery, and an annular recess surrounding the valve-seat, into which a portion of the steam issuing from between the valve and its seat is deflected. The differences between the Richardson and Naylor valves in construction are apparent upon an inspection of the drawings in the respective patents. The difference in the mode of operation is most clearly proved by the testimony of the experts in the case. In the Naylor valve it appears that it was the intention of the inventor to use the impact of the issuing steam upon the concave lip of the valve to assist in lifting it, and only this, except so far as it was aided by the diminution of atmospheric pressure on the top of the valve, consequent upon the issuing of a portion of the steam in an upward direction around the periphery of the valve, the annular chamber into which the steam is discharged on leaving the valve serving no other purpose than that of a conduit for the steam when the valve is constructed in accordance with the drawings in the original patent. In the Richardson valve, when the valve opens, the steam expands and flows into the annular space around the ground joint. Its free escape is prevented by a stricture or narrow space formed by the outer edge of the lip and the valve-seat. Thus the steam escaping from the valve is made to act by its expansive force upon an additional area outside of the valve proper to assist in raising the valve, this stricture being enlarged as the valve is considerably lifted from its seat, and varying in size as the quantity varies of the issuing steam. There would be no such variable stricture in the Naylor valve, and, in fact, there would be no stricture in it without substituting a diaphragm or some equivalent device for the radial bars which, in the drawings in the original patent, connected the inner and outer cylinders; and if Naylor's annular chamber had been intended to be closed, or partially closed, at the bottom by substituting a diaphragm for the radial bars shown in the drawing, or by substituting a small outlet, not shown, for the large one shown in the drawing, for the exit of the steam from the annular cylindrical chamber, then his device of a bent lever would not only have been useless, but injurious, in its operation; and this last device is the only one which he claimed in his original patent. The Richardson valve is the one used by the defendant; there is added an extension-cup and upward-curved flange to give an upward direction to the issuing steam and keep it away from the cab of the engine. This is an old device, and does not affect the principles or mode of operation of the valve proper.

There is a substantial difference between the Richardson valve and the valve in the specifications and drawings of the Naylor patent, not merely in degree. The increased practical utility of the Richardson valve results from a substantial difference in construction and mode of operation. Bill dismissed.

[NOTE. On appeal, this decree was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion, said: "Throughout, the steam valve used by the respondents is the valve patented to George W. Richardson, whose patent makes a part of the record. He obtained his patent September 25, 1866, nearly a month earlier than the date of the original American patent granted to Naylor. His invention, as he describes it, consists in increasing the area of the head of the common safety valve outside of its ground joint, and terminating it in such a way as to form an increased resisting surface, against which the steam escaping from the generator shall act with additional force after lifting the valve from its seat at the ground joint, and so, by overcoming the rapidly increasing resistance of the spring or scales, will insure the lifting of the valve still higher, thus affording so certain and free a passage for the steam to escape as effectually to prevent the bursting of the boiler or generator, even when the steam is shut off and the damper left open." After duly considering the evidence, the steam valve used by respondents was held not to be an infringement of that described in the specification of either of the three patents representing the invention claimed by complainant. Ashcroft v. Boston & L. R. Co., 97 U. S. 189. Richardson's patent (No. 58,294) was construed in Consolidated Safety-Valve Co. v. Crosby Steam-Gauge & V. Co., 7 Fed. 768; Same v. Kunkle, 14 Fed. 732; Same v. Crosby Steam-Gauge & V. Co., 113 U. S. 157, 5 Sup. Ct. 513.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—ANTICIPATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. In an action for the infringement of a patent, the burden of showing, as a defence, that the patentee was a joint inventor, with some other person, of the thing patented, is on the defendant.

2. Where the oath of such alleged joint inventor was contradicted by that of the patentee, and the patentee was corroborated by the circumstances that he was a draughtsman and had taken out patents for several inventions made by him, and that the other person was not a draughtsman, or a designer, or an inventor, and had neglected, although eight years had elapsed since he knew of the patent, to apply for a patent himself for the invention, or to assert his right in the premises in any legal form, this court sustained the patent.

At law.

This was an action on the case, for the infringement of letters patent, granted to Arthur Neill, as inventor, January 22d, 1861, [No. 31,187,] for an "improvement in moulds for shaping india-rubber pencil holders," and assigned to the plaintiff. By a stipulation in writing, it was tried before the court without a jury. The stipulation further provided, that, if the plaintiff had judgment, it should be for the sum of $10,000, and costs.

Albert Van Wagner, for plaintiff.
Williams, Bates & Bonney, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. If the patent is valid, the infringement is admitted. The novelty, utility and patentability of the invention are, also, admitted, and the only question at issue in the case is, whether Neill was the original and sole inventor of the improvement, or whether one Francis P. Hale was a joint inventor of it with Neill. The burden of proof is on the defendants, to overthrow the prima facie title conferred by the patent. The testimony of Hale is directly contradicted by that of Neill, in all its material points, while the surrounding circumstances, that Hale was not a draughtsman, or a designer, or an inventor, and that Neill was a draughtsman, and had taken out patents for several inventions made by him, and that Hale has always neglected, it being nearly eight years since he knew that Neill had taken out a patent for the invention in question, to apply for a patent himself therefor, or to assert his rights in the premises in any legal form, corroborate the oath of Neill.

I find for the plaintiff, for the sum of $10,000.

[NOTE. Patent No. 31,187, so far as known, has not been involved in any other cases reported prior to 1880.]

ASHCROFT v. HOLLINGS.

[11 O. G. 879.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April 13, 1877.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—EXTENT OF CLAIM.

1. The patent for a lamp, can, or barrel, packed in part with an absorbent or finely granulated material, and over them a body of wire-gauze or perforated thin plate, either rolled up like paper scrolls or put flat together like book-leaves, is not infringed by the use of a lamp containing cotton covered with a layer of asbestus or porous fire-proof cement, and covered with one thickness of wire-gauze.

2. The invention patented to Wm. Beschke, August 14, 1866, includes as a necessary ingredient wire-gauze or perforated thin plate in the form of scrolls or of layers like the leaves of a book.

[In equity. Bill by Charles E. Ashcroft against William Hollings to enjoin infringement of letters patent No. 57,245. Bill dismissed.]

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The defense in this case is based upon the alleged want of novelty in the invention described in the letters patent granted to William Beschke and others, August 14, 1866, No. 57,245, "for an improved method of using explosive fluids for the production of light and heat," and also upon a denial of any infringement of the Beschke patent. The question of infringement depends upon the construction to be given to the Beschke patent. In view of the state of the art at the date of the patent, as well as upon what is clearly described in his specification and claimed in his claims, it appears to be clear that the invention of Beschke is described and claimed as consisting in a lamp, or can, or barrel, packed in part with an absorbent or finely granulated material, (excluding sand and including saw-dust, cotton, beads, shot, gravel, asbestus, and their equivalents,) and over them "a body of wire-gauze or perforated thin plate, either rolled up like paper scrolls or put flat together like book-leaves." The defendant sells a lamp for heating purposes, manufactured under letters patent issued to Thomas W. Houchin, May 4, 1875, called Houchin's patent pocket cook-stove. The lamp is made of metal, and is filled with cotton covered with a layer of asbestus, or of porous fire-proof cement of which asbestus is an ingredient. The upper opening is covered with one thickness of wire-gauze. There is no tube as distinguished from the body of the lamp, and there is no "body of wire-gauze or perforated thin plate, either rolled up like paper scrolls or put flat together like book-leaves." Wherever in the Beschke patent wire-gauze or perforated thin plate is alluded to, it is in the form of a scroll or of layers, like the leaves of a book, and after constantly repeating this description throughout the patent, and never using the words without some description of a scroll or layers, except in one instance, and then "wire-gauze combined and shaped as mentioned," the patentee adds, "I disclaim also the simple use of mere wire-gauze or perforated thin plate not rolled up like paper scrolls or put flat together like book-leaves." The wire-gauze or perforated thin plate, described in the claim of the Beschke patent, must be construed as referring to wire-gauze or perforated thin plate rolled up like paper scrolls, or put flat together like book-leaves, as described in the specification, and upon this construction of the claim in the patent the defendant does not infringe. Bill dismissed with costs.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — ASSIGNMENT OF PATENT BY COURT—RECORDATION—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. The title of an insolvent debtor to, or his interest in, letters-patent of the United States for an invention, does not pass to his assignee in insolvency by an assignment of his property, made by a judge of probate and insolvency under the insolvency law of Massachusetts.

[Cited in Gordon v. Anthony, Case No. 5,605.]

3. An assignment of all the grantor's right, title, and interest, in and to a certain patent, carries only the existing interest of the grantor at the time of the assignment.

4. An unrecorded assignment of all the grantor's right, title, and interest, in and to a certain patent, is good as against a subsequent recorded assignment by the same grantor to a purchaser having notice of the previous assignment.

[See Continental Windmill Co. v. Empire Windmill Co., Case No. 3,142.]

In equity. Bill in equity for an injunction to restrain alleged infringement of letters-patent for an improvement in pipe-tongs, granted to James R. Brown Nov. 30, 1858, [No. 22,157,] and for an account of profits. The defendants claimed the right to make and sell the patented article under several assignments. Among these was an assignment of the property of the patentee, then an insolvent debtor, duly made to one Kingsbury, his assignee in insolvency, by a judge of probate and insolvency, according to the insolvency law of Massachusetts; and a subsequent assignment by Kingsbury of all his right, title, and interest in and to the letters-patent. The defendants also claimed the right to make and sell the patented article under conveyances of Richard A. Brown to one Norton. It appeared that, on the 12th of October, 1860, Richard A. Brown was the owner, by the patentee's assignment, of an exclusive right to manufacture the patented article, and on that date assigned back to the patentee all his right, title, and interest, in and to the patent. Subsequently he conveyed all his right, title, and interest, to Norton. His conveyances to Norton were recorded in the patent office before his assignment to the patentee was; but Norton took them with knowledge of that assignment.

James B. Robb, for complainant.

Chauncey Smith and W. W. Swan, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. -The patent in this case was granted to James R. Brown Nov. 30, 1858. Previously to this time, Nov. 6, 1858, Brown had conveyed to one William Freedly one-half of his interest in the invention, and any patent which might be granted therefor. On the 31st of March, 1859, Freedly conveyed his interest to Silas B. Goldthwait. The title stood one-half in James R. Brown and one-half apparently in Goldthwait on the sixteenth day of June, 1860, at which time James R. Brown went into insolvency under the law of Massachusetts. It is claimed by the defendants, that, by virtue of the proceedings in insolvency, all the interest which James R. Brown then had in the patent passed to George H. Kingsbury, his assignee. The insolvent law of Massachusetts authorized the judge, "by an instrument under his hand, to assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor, except such as is by law exempt from attachment, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto;" and it provided that "the assignment shall vest in the assignee all the property of the debtor, real and personal, which he could lawfully have sold, assigned, or conveyed, or which might have been taken on execution upon a judgment against him," &c., * * * "and shall be effectual to pass all said estate," &c. Under this statute, it has been decided that the property vests in the assignee by force of the statute rather than by virtue of the terms of the assignment. Clarke v. Minot, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 346, 348.

The act of congress of 1836, c. 357, § 11, [5 Stat. 121,] provides that every patent shall be assignable at law, either as to the whole interest or any undivided part thereof, by an instrument in writing; which assignment shall be recorded in the patent office within three months from the execution thereof. This act clearly contemplates a written instrument, signed by the owner of the patent and duly recorded in the patent office, as necessary to vest the legal title in the purchaser. The insolvent law of Massachusetts provides further, for confirming the assignment made by the judge, by making it the duty of the debtor "to execute all such deeds and writings, and do all such other lawful acts and things, as may be necessary or useful for confirming the assignment so made by the judge, and to enable the assignee to receive or become possessed of all the estate and effects assigned as aforesaid, especially such part thereof as may be without the commonwealth." This is an express recognition of the fact that there may be property so situated in other countries or states or territories, that the assignment itself would be ineffectual to pass it and transfer the title to the assignee without an instrument of conveyance from the debtor. Especially is this the case with patent-rights; for, in the language of Mr. Justice Curtis, "these incorporeal rights (copy-rights and letters-patent) do not exist in any particular state or district: they are coextensive with the United States. There is nothing in the act of congress or in the nature of the rights themselves to give them locality anywhere so as to subject them to the process of courts having jurisdiction limited by the lines of states and districts." Stevens v. Gladding, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 451.

It might have been competent for the court under the insolvent law to have compelled the debtor to execute such an instrument in writing as, in accordance with the provisions of the patent act, would have been effectual to transfer the title in the patent to the assignee. If a right in a patent was such property as did not come within the exceptions of the insolvent law, as property not liable to attachment, or if it is of such a nature that it is subject to the operation of state insolvent laws, this would seem to have been the only proper and effectual mode to have made it available for the benefit of the creditors. Without such a conveyance as the statute of the United States contemplates, we do not think the assignee acquires any legal title to any interest the debtor may have in any letters-patent. To invest the assignee with the legal title, the court must compel a transfer in conformity with the requirements of the patent act. Stephens v. Cady, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 530, 531. No title, therefore, vested in Kingsbury, the assignee, no such instrument in writing assigning the debtor's interest to him ever having been made and recorded in conformity with the requirements of the act of congress.

The defendants did not acquire any title through the conveyances to Richard A. Brown, and from him to Norton. Before the conveyances from Richard A. Brown to Norton, he had reconveyed to his father, James R. Brown; and although that conveyance was not recorded, it was good as against Norton, for Richard A. Brown only undertook to convey whatever right, title, or interest he had under the patent to manufacture the thing patented; not the patent itself, or any undivided interest therein. Nothing passed but the actual interest the grantor had at the time. Brown v. Jackson, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 449. Norton was not a bona fide purchaser, but took the conveyances with full knowledge of the previous conveyance from Richard A. Brown to James R. Brown. Complainant is entitled to a decree for an account of the patented pipe tongs made, used, or sold by the defendants since the conveyance to the complainant; and to an injunction, according to the prayer in the bill.

[Decree for complainant for account and injunction as prayed for—decree to be drawn up and submitted to the court.][1]

ATTACHMENT—LEVY—LIEN—SUBSEQUENT BANKRUPTCY.

[To constitute an attachment of personal property, the officer must actually take it into his custody and control; the mere taking of a receipt for certain property, followed by a return that he had attached it more than four months before the bankruptcy proceedings, though it would estop the receiptors from denying that there was an attachment, is not enough to create a lien as against the assignee in bankruptcy.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by John Boothe, a deputy sheriff, against the assignee in bankruptcy of Ashley, to enforce a prior lien created by an alleged attachment. Dismissed.]

Park Davis and W. L. Burnap, for assignee.

C. W. Witters, for petitioner.

WHEELER, District Judge. The petitioner, John H. Boothe, a deputy sheriff, having writs of attachment in his hands against the bankrupt, without taking possession of any property, took a receipt for certain specified property, signed by the bankrupt and another, and made return that he had attached it more than four months before the bankruptcy proceedings. The assignee found the property in possession of the bankrupt, and took it. This petition is brought to enforce a lien upon the property by force of these proceedings.

The bankrupt law leaves attachments in force when made a sufficient length of time before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings. To constitute an attachment of personal property, the officer must actually take it into his custody or control. Lyon v. Rood, 12 Vt. 233; Soule v. Austin, 35 Vt. 519. This was not done here. The officer took a receipt which conclusively estopped the receiptors from denying that there was an attachment. This did not make an attachment in fact; it only affected the personal liability of the receiptors. Their liability rested wholly in contract. Soule v. Austin, 35 Vt. 519. The officer accepted their personal liability in place of taking the property. This left no lien upon any property as against bankruptcy proceedings. Zollar v. Janvrin, 49 N. H. 114; Carpenter v. Farrell, 100 Mass. 450. This is just, too. If the property had been taken into the custody of the officer, other creditors might, and probably would, have found it out, and commenced proceedings in season to cut the attachment off. If the mere giving a receipt would answer, they might be deceived into letting it run too long.

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1873.

STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY — POWER TO FORFEIT STOCK — EFFECT OF FORFEITURE — RADICAL CHANGE OF CHARTER.

1. An incorporated company which exercises its power to forfeit the stock of the subscriber for the non-payment of a call, cannot afterwards recover upon a note given to it by such subscriber for a previous unpaid assessment on his stock.

2. The change in the charter of a "life and accident" insurance company, whereby such company is also authorized to transact the business of "fire, marine, and inland insurance," is of such a radical character as to discharge previous subscribers, who do not assent to the change, from liability to pay future assessments on their stock.

At law. This is an action on a promissory note, dated August 19, 1867, for $3,000, made by the defendants to the Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company. The defendants were subscribers of that company, and the note in suit was given for an assessment upon their stock. The original charter of said company authorized it to transact a "life and accident insurance" business. After the defendants' subscription to the stock, the charter was amended, and the name of the company changed to the Eagle Insurance Company, and it was also authorized, by the amended charter, to transact the business of "fire, marine, and inland insurance." The amended charter was accepted, but, in point of fact, the company took no risks during the short period it afterwards did business, except such as were authorized by its original charter. Subsequently, the company, being then in possession of the note in suit, forfeited, under authority given in its charter, the stock of the defendants therein. The note in suit, when long past due, was transferred by the company to the plaintiff. Based upon these facts, two special defenses are made to the note, the facts relating to which appear in the special verdict, and the question on the special verdict is whether either of these defenses is sufficient in law to defeat a recovery on the note. The special verdict is in these words:

"The note was executed by the defendants, and is now the property of the plaintiff by assignment and purchase from the payee after due, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover thereon the full amount thereof, less the credit indorsed on the same, of $157.50, October 10, 1868, unless the following facts, which we state in the form of a special verdict, constitute a defense:—

"First Special Defense.—We find the following facts: The Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company, the payee of the note in suit, was chartered by the legislature of the state of Illinois, February 13, 1865 (Laws of 1865, p. 761, made a part of this verdict), 'to carry on the business of life and accidents insurance' at Chicago, with power to establish a branch at Peoria, Illinois. The defendants, living in Minnesota, subscribed to the stock of said company, each in the sum of $5,000, and paid, in cash, at the time of the subscription, ten per cent thereon. Some months afterwards, the company made an assessment of fifteen per cent on said stock, and it was for, or in payment of, this assessment, that the note in suit was given. That is, the consideration of said note in suit is the aforesaid assessment of fifteen per cent upon the defendants' said subscription to the said stock of said company. Two days after the note in suit was given, the defendants received from the said company certificates of stock, which recite that twenty-five dollars on each share had been paid. Each certificate is as follows:—

" 'Capital, $1,000,000. Shares, $100 each. Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company, Chicago, Illinois. No. 417. 50 Shares. Be it known, that J. C. Burbank, Esq., is entitled to fifty shares of the capital stock of the Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company, on which has been paid twenty-five dollars on each share, and holds the same subject to the conditions and stipulations contained in the act of incorporation of said company; which shares are transferable on the books of the company, at its office, in Chicago, by the said Burbank or his attorney, on the surrender of this certificate and payment of all installments then due, and when such transfer shall be sanctioned and approved by the transfer agent. [Seal.] Witness the signature of the president and secretary, and the seal of the company, attached. Chicago, August 21, 1867. I. Y. Munn, President. C. Holland, Secretary.

" 'This certificate to be surrendered on payment of the next installment, when a new one will be given.'

"This amount was made up as follows, viz: the ten per cent paid at the time of the subscription, and the said fifteen per cent for which the note in suit was executed as aforesaid. On the 10th of October, 1868, the defendants paid the payee $157.50 as interest, being the amount indorsed thereon.

"Subsequently, to-wit, on the 3d day of March, 1869, the legislative assembly of Illinois passed an act as follows: 'An act to amend an act to incorporate the Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company,' approved February 13, 1865. Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois, represented in the general assembly,

That so much of section 1 of said act, to which this is amendatory, as relates to the name and style of the corporation, and sections 5 and 15 of the said act, to which this is amendatory, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. Sec. 2. The name and style of the company shall be and is Eagle Insurance Company, and the said company may transact fire, marine, and inland insurance; and may hold an annual meeting of the shareholders on the first Tuesday of July, for the election of thirteen directors, to serve until their successors be chosen. Approved March 3, 1869.'

"The defendants neither procured nor assented to said last mentioned act, nor did they know of it until after its passage, and thereupon they protested against it, and refused to pay the note in suit on this ground. Subsequently the said Eagle Insurance Company ceased to do business, and this note, among other assets, was sold to the plaintiff in the year 1871, in payment of a debt due from the Eagle Insurance Company to him. After the said amendment of the charter of March 3, 1869, the Eagle Insurance Company did not, in fact, transact any fire, marine, or inland insurance business, or do any other business than such as was authorized by the original charter.

"Second Special Defense.—We find all the foregoing facts, and also the following, to-wit: Under the second section of the charter of the Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company, calls were made upon the defendants in September, 1869, for the payment of an additional assessment of twenty per cent upon their stock, payable October 25, 1869, which they neglected and refused to pay, and that the board of directors of the Eagle Insurance Company, on the 2d day of December, 1869, declared all the stock on which said assessment had not been paid, including defendants' said stock, forfeited; and soon after new stock subscriptions were received from new subscribers, and the old directors went out, and new directors, elected by the new stockholders, came in; and the Eagle Insurance Company ceased to do active business or issue new policies after January, 1870."

The provision in the charter of the company in relation to the forfeiture of stock is, that if any shareholder or subscriber shall neglect to pay a call for a specified number of days, "it shall be lawful for the directors to declare the shares forfeited to the company, and all previous payments made thereon."

Gilman, Clough, & Wilde, for plaintiff.

E. C. Palmer, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and NELSON, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. We hold the following propositions:

1. The plaintiff taking the note in suit directly from the company, long after it was due, and after the change in the charter, and after the action of the company forfeiting the defendants' stock therein, stands precisely in the place of the company, and cannot recover on the note unless the company could have recovered, had the action been brought by it.

2. The note being given for an unpaid stock assessment, represents, for all the purposes of this action, that assessment, and the note not having been paid, it follows that the defendants have not paid the stock assessment for which the note was given. Under its charter, the company had the power, if any assessment upon stock subscribed was not paid, to forfeit the stock and all previous payments thereon; or, at its election, the company would have the right to sue for such assessment. But the two courses are inconsistent, and it must elect whether to sue for and recover the stock subscription, or to forfeit the stock. It cannot do both. Having elected, in this case, to forfeit the defendants' stock, it cannot afterwards recover for a prior unpaid assessment; and this doctrine, which was conceded in argument, is not, in our judgment, varied, as the plaintiff's counsel contends, by the circumstance that the company, at the time of the forfeiture of the stock, held the defendants' note for such prior unpaid assessment. Small v. Herkimer Manuf'g Co., 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 330.

3. The change in the charter, by which a life and accident company was authorized to transact fire, marine, and inland insurance, is an organic change of such a radical character as to discharge previous subscribers to the stock of the company from any obligation to pay their subscription, unless the change is expressly or impliedly assented to by them. Here there was no such assent, and no acquiescence in the structural change made in the charter of the company. The company could not, against such a subscriber, maintain a suit to collect his subscription, and take the money and use it as capital for the transaction of business under the charter as altered. We think, in such a case, the subscriber is not bound to enjoin action under the amended charter, but may, if he elects, defend against an action to recover on his subscription to the stock.

If the company accepted the amended charter, as it did by adopting the new name, it is not essential to such a defense to show that at the time of the trial the corporation had actually exercised the enlarged powers conferred upon it. The defendants are not bound, on their subscription, to pay to the company money which, if paid, may be used as capital to carry on the business authorized by the amended charter.

PLEADING—DECLARATIONS—NOT FOR SPECIFIC SUM—DEMURRER.

A declaration in debt for "$103⅓, or 31 pounds Virginia," is bad on special demurrer. It must be for a sum certain.

At law. Special demurrer; because the declaration is that defendants render to plaintiff $103⅓, or 31 pounds of Virginia, which they owe and detain; which is uncertain, not being positive, nor certain what pounds are meant, whether of tobacco or anything else. It was also suggested by Mr. Caldwell, that it was uncertain because it stated that the defendants were bound, &c., and there are no defendants until after plea or defence taken. The writ was against Philip and McCarthy Fitzhugh, to answer to Henry Alexander Ashton, in a plea that they render to him "one hundred three dollars, thirty-three one third cents, or thirty-one pounds of Virginia, which they owe and detain." The declaration was that H. A. Ashton complains of Philip Fitzhugh and McCarthy Fitzhugh, late of the district and county, aforesaid, yeomen, who were summoned to anwer in this behalf of a plea that the said defendants render the said plaintiff one hundred three dollars, thirty-three one third cents, or thirty-one pounds of Virginia, which they owe and detain; for that the defendants, on 20th March, 1797, at &c., by their certain writing obligatory of that date, sealed with their seals, and now here exhibited, promised to pay the plaintiff on or before the 25th of December thereafter, sixteen pounds ten shillings of Virginia, equivalent to fifty-five dollars, for the hire of negro Charles, with suitable clothing, victuals and taxes, to the payment whereof they bound themselves in the penal sum of thirty-one pounds of Virginia, equivalent to one hundred three dollars, thirty-three one third cents; and the plaintiff avers they did not pay the said sixteen pounds ten shillings, or fifty-five dollars, according to the tenor of the said writing, whereby action accrued to have the said penal sum; yet though often requested, the defendants have refused and still refuse to pay the said thirty-one pounds, or one hundred three dollars, thirty-three one third cents, to the damage of the plaintiffs five hundred dollars, wherefore they sue, &c.

Mr. Caldwell, for defendants.

THE COURT was of opinion that the declaration is too uncertain, but gave leave to amend on payment of costs of the term and a continuance if required by defendant.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 19.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

SET-OFF — NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENT — PAROL AGREEMENT TO ACCEPT SERVICES IN PAYMENT.

At the time of the complainant's giving the single bill, it was expected and understood by both parties, that the whole amount might be satisfied by the services of the complainant, and that such services, as far as they should be actually rendered, should be set off against the bill. Services, to an indefinite extent, the value of which was not ascertained, were admitted to have been performed; and it was not denied that the complainant was always ready and willing to perform all that should be required of him. Held, that the complainant had a right, under the original contract, to have the value of those services ascertained and set off against the bill. Injunction continued till final hearing.

In equity. Bill for an injunction to stay proceedings upon a judgment at law upon a single bill for $766.65 given by the complainant to J. & P. Turner, and by them assigned to the defendant McKim. Upon the coming in of the answers of the defendants,

Mr. Lear, for the defendants, moved to dissolve the injunction, and Mr. Tabbs, for the complainant, filed exceptions to the answer of the defendants J. & P. Turner.

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the exceptions; and as to the matter of equity in the bill,

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court. The next questions are, 1st. Whether there is equity in the bill; and 2d. Whether the matter of that equity is denied by the answer. It is no equity that the complainant has an off-set at law to the defendants' action at law against him. Nor is it any matter of equity that the complainant has a claim for unliquidated damages, for breach of contract, against these defendants which could not be set off at law, unless it be accompanied by an allegation of the insolvency of these defendants, or some other impediment to the complainant's maintaining an action at law for such unliquidated damages; neither of which is averred in the bill. If there be any equity in the bill, it grows out of the true nature of the contract between the parties. Apparently it is a single bill acknowledging an absolute debt under hand and seal. According to the allegations of the bill, the debt is admitted, but it is said that it was not intended to be paid in the ordinary mode, by money, but by services, and that therefore it is inequitable in the defendants to avail themselves of the legal advantage which the form of the instrument has given them to enforce payment in money, the complainant having been always ready to perform the services which might be required.

The form of the instrument is certainly such as to throw the burden of proof upon the complainant to show that the contract was different from that which it purports to be. Neither fraud, nor imposition, nor mistake is alleged. The bill avers that the single bill for $766.65, was executed and delivered by the complainant, to the said Turners, "upon the express understanding that the said Turners were to give him all their law business;" "and that he should never be called upon to pay the said note, but that the whole amount was to be taken out in professional services; and expressly charges that the said Josiah did, for himself, and in the name of the said firm, proffer and make those terms." That "the Turners did not employ him in all their law business, as agreed as aforesaid," "although he was ready and willing to transact any that they offered to him." In the answer of J. & P. Turner, they deny that they or either of them, at the time of taking the note, or at any time thereafter, ever did agree to take it all out in law, unconditionally. They deny that it was executed and delivered to Josiah Turner, with any express agreement that the complainant never was to pay the same, or that he was never to be called on for payment thereof, as charged in the complainant's bill; but they admit that Josiah Turner said, that, if he would come to St. Mary's to reside, he would give him all his business, with that also of the firm of Josiah Turner & Co.; and that, in such case, the payment of the note would come easy to him; and that the greater part of it, on such conditions, would be taken out in law; and promised, at the same time, that if the complainant would determine on it then, this defendant would set him to all the cases of the firm; and might have said, "provided the complainant came to St. Mary's to reside, and took charge of their business, that he might never be called on for payment." The defendant Josiah also denies, that, at the time of taking the note, or at any time since, he promised the complainant to give him the individual and private law business of Philip. And the defendants aver that the whole of the said conversations and conditional promises grew out of the complainant's stating, at the time they were about to take his note, that he thought of coming to St. Mary's to reside, which conditions were never complied with by the complainant.

It is evident, then, from the bill and answer, that, at the time the single bill was given, it was expected and understood, by both parties, that the whole amount might be satisfied by the services of the complainant; and that such services, as far as they should be actually rendered, should be set off against the obligation. Services, to an indefinite extent, the value of which is not ascertained, are admitted to have been performed, and it is not denied that the complainant was always ready and willing to perform all that should be required of him. The complainant, then, has a right, under the original contract, to have the value of those services ascertained and set off against the bill; and if it shall appear, upon final hearing, that the promise to give him the whole law business of the firm was not upon a condition not performed by the complainant, and that he was always ready to give his services and that the business has been given to another, it may possibly happen that equity will relieve him entirely from the obligation. We think, therefore, that the injunction ought to be continued until final hearing.

BANKRUPTCY—EXEMPTIONS—STATE LAWS—HOMESTEAD.

[The bankrupt act of 1867 expressly limits the exemptions to be allowed to bankrupts to those allowed by the state laws in force in 1864. The law of Georgia then in force (Irwin's Rev. Code, § 2013) allowed the head of a family 50 acres of land. Laws Ga. 1868, allows a debtor to set apart land to the value of $2,000, and, in case of his failure in that respect, empowers the wife to do so, provided that no debtor who has claimed an exemption under said section 2013 shall take any benefit under the later act. Held, that a debtor by filing his petition in bankruptcy elected to take the exemption allowed by the bankrupt act, namely that of section 2013, and that a setting apart by the wife of his tract of 510 acres of land as a homestead, of the value of $2,000, was illegal and void.]

[In bankruptcy. The Georgia homestead law, passed October 3, 1868, provides that any head of a family who may be indebted beyond his ability to pay, may, by application to the ordinary of his county, have surveyed and set apart as a homestead $2,000 specie value in realty, and $1,000 specie value in personalty, which shall be exempt from levy and sale by virtue of the process of any court; that, in case the husband shall neglect or refuse to apply for the setting apart such homestead, the wife may apply to the ordinary, and have the same set apart; that the passage of the law shall not preclude a debtor from choosing the exemptions allowed by Irwin's Rev. Code, § 2013; and that a debtor who chooses the exemptions allowed by one of these laws shall have none of the benefits of the other.]

By the Register: The question here presented for consideration and decision is this: "Can a married woman, under the law, claim a homestead under the new constitution and laws of Georgia, out of the property of her husband, at the same time that the husband seeks relief and a discharge from his debts in a court of bankruptcy, he returning the property in his schedule of assets, out of which he claims a homestead?"

David R. Askew filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy on the 30th day of December, 1868, and on the same day, Mrs. Eliza A. Askew, his wife, filed her application before the ordinary of Spalding county for the setting apart and valuation of homestead. Mr. Askew returned in his schedule of assets five hundred and ten acres of land. This same land, under the order of the ordinary, was surveyed and platted by the county surveyor on the 8th day of January, 1869, and the whole set apart as a homestead, which action of the county surveyor was approved by the ordinary on the 11th January, 1869, and on the next day, January 12th, 1869, Mr. Askew was adjudged a bankrupt by the court of bankruptcy. It is admitted that Mr. Askew knew of his wife's application to the ordinary, and no one can reasonably doubt that she knew of his application in bankruptcy; so it seems to have been a concerted arrangement between husband and wife—he to get a discharge from his debts in bankruptcy, and she to cover all the property by a homestead under the state exemption law of October 3d, 1868.

The bankrupt law, § 14, [14 Stat. 523,] expressly limits the exemptions to be allowed a bankrupt in bankruptcy to the state exemption laws of force in 1864. The state exemption law that was of force in 1864, in Georgia, is found in Irwin's Revised Code, § 2013. This exempts to each head of a family but fifty acres of land and five acres additional for each child under sixteen years of age. Mr. and Mrs. Askew have three children under sixteen, and under the said 2013th section, would be allowed sixty-five acres as exempt; but under the law of October 3, 1868, Mr. Askew claims the whole five hundred and ten acres. Mr. Askew, being fully cognizant of the action his wife was taking, and offering no objection thereto, thereby showing consent on his part, is in the same condition as if he had made a transfer of the property to his wife, and she, being fully cognizant of his bankruptcy and accepting such transfer by the action she took, is in the same condition as if she had accepted a deed to the property from him. All such transfers are declared void by the 35th section of the bankrupt act.

The act of 1868, [14 Stat. 523,] under which the homestead is now claimed, provides, in the 14th section thereof, that a debtor may take his choice and choose the exemptions allowed by the 2013th section of Irwin's Revised Code, instead of those allowed by this act, and adds: "But no person who shall be allowed the exemptions under those laws, shall take any benefit under this act." Mr. Askew, by filing his petition with the schedules annexed, in bankruptcy, on the 30th day of December, 1868, then elected to take the exemptions allowed by the bankrupt law (the striking from his schedule B 5, the sixty-five acres allowed by the 2013th section, Irwin's Code, can make no difference). The bankrupt law allows that exemption, and the law gives it to him whether he claims it or not. Having elected to go into bankruptcy, he is bound by the provisions of the bankrupt law; and having thus elected to take the exemptions allowed by the 2013th section of Irwin's Code, he is not entitled to any benefit under the state exemption act of 1868.

This is evidently a case wherein the husband and wife are acting in concert, and attempting to dispose of the debts under the bankrupt laws and the assets under the state law. Such a proceeding cannot be tolerated in bankruptcy: because, when a court of bankruptcy takes jurisdiction at all, it assumes the entire jurisdiction of both the person and property of the bankrupt. When a proper case is made, the bankruptcy court takes jurisdiction, and such jurisdiction is exclusive. A proper case was made when Mr. Askew filed his petition in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy court took jurisdiction of Mr. Askew and his property on the filing of his voluntary petition on the 30th December, 1868; hence all his property was in the legal custody of the bankruptcy court from that time, and the action of the court of ordinary of the 8th and 11th January, 1869, is null and void, because then that court had no legal jurisdiction; the property then being in the legal custody of the bankruptcy court. A question may be made as to the time when a court of bankruptcy assumes jurisdiction of the property of a bankrupt. The rule is different in case of voluntary bankruptcy from that in involuntary bankruptcy. In a case of involuntary bankruptcy the bankruptcy is disputed, and the question is not determined until the judgment of the court is pronounced. The adjudication of bankruptcy, in that case, transfers the custody of the property to the court. But in a case of voluntary bankruptcy, the filing of the petition is an acknowledgment under oath of the bankruptcy. The filing of the petition is a surrender of the property named in the schedule to the court for the benefit of the creditors. On this point Judge Blatchford, of the southern district of New York, in Re Vogel, [Case No. 16,983,] after quoting the several provisions of the bankrupt act relating thereto, uses the following language: "It is manifest from these provisions that when a voluntary petitioner in bankruptcy files his petition, in due form, he becomes eo instanti a bankrupt, so far as any interference with the property named in his schedule is concerned, and that such property is thereby brought into the bankruptcy court, and placed in its custody and under its protection, as fully as if actually brought into the visible presence of the court. Being in the custody of the bankruptcy court, no other court, and no person acting under any process from any other court, can, without the permission of the bankruptcy court, interfere with it, and to so interfere is a contempt of the bankruptcy court." Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612, 625; Williams v. Benedict, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 107; Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 52, 66; Peale v. Phipps, Id. 368, 374; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, 594–597; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334.

This is a case of voluntary bankruptcy. David R. Askew filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy, on the 30th day of December, 1868, and eo instanti he was a bankrupt, so far as any interference with the property named in his schedule is concerned; and hence the survey and valuation of property, and setting apart the homestead under the process of the court of ordinary on the 8th of January, 1869, and its approval by the ordinary on the 11th, were unauthorized by law, and are null and void. The five hundred and ten acres of land and other property named in the schedule, filed with his petition in bankruptcy, by David R. Askew, on the 30th day of December, 1868, except such portion thereof as is exempt by the bankrupt law, and the state exemption laws of force in the year 1864, must pass to the assignee in bankruptcy, for the benefit of the bankrupt's creditors.

ASKEW v. ODENHEIMER.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. 1845.

Case No. 587.

ASKEW v. ODENHEIMER.

[Baldw. 380.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1831.

TRUSTS—COMPENSATION OF TRUSTEES — PARTNERSHIP—FRAUD BY COPARTNER — DESTRUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS—EVIDENCE.

1. In Pennsylvania all trustees are entitled to a commission on moneys passing through their hands; the usual rate is five per cent, any departure therefrom is under special circumstances.

[See Burr v. McEwen, Case No. 2,193.]

2. If a partner who has committed frauds on the firm agrees to indemnify the injured party to his satisfaction, by an assignment of all the partnership effects for his indemnity, such assignment will be construed liberally in his favour, and will be reformed in equity so as to meet the intention of the parties in conformity with their agreement.

3. But the injured party will not be allowed to be the judge of his indemnity.

4. As a trustee he will be confined to such satisfaction as a court of equity deem reasonable.

5. If the books and papers of the firm have been destroyed or suppressed, false entries made in them, or no entries made by the partner who has charge of them to his debit, with a view to fraud, the injured partner may support a specific charge by his own affidavit, but not by one which specifies no amount under any particular item.

6. On a bill by the fraudulent partner for an account, the master may charge him on any evidence which is competent or admissible as proof of the item; he cannot hold the injured partner to such degree of proof, as would justify a charge under ordinary circstances, against a customer or partner; there must however be some proof.

7. The general rules on which courts of equity act in odium spoliatoris.

[Cited in Hanson v. Lessee of Eustace, 2 How. (43 U. S.) 704.]

In equity. The bill set forth a partnership between the parties commencing in 1822, and terminating in March, 1829, when the following assignment was made by the complainant:

"Whereas, there is reason to believe, that in keeping the books of the firm of Askew & Odenheimer, errors and misentries have occurred, of which the amount cannot be ascertained, but which errors are injurious to the interests of John W. Odenheimer, one of the partners of said firm, and it is just and proper that he should be secured against any loss resulting from these errors and misentries, which have been made by his partner Joseph Askew: Now, therefore, be it known, that the said Joseph Askew, in order to secure to his partner, the said John W. Odenheimer, his full and just and undiminished share in the stock and profits of said firm, and in consideration of the sum of 10 dollars to him in hand paid by the said John; has granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over, and by these presents, does grant, bargain, sell, assign, and transfer unto the said John, all the right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand whatsoever of him, the said Joseph, in law, in equity, or otherwise, in and to the moneys, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and effects, and in and to all the property, real and mixed, in which they the said Joseph and John are jointly at this time interested as partners in the above firm, or may be, to have and to hold to the said John, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to his and their use for ever: Provided always, however, that when an entire adjustment of the accounts of the firm be made, and debts due by the firm paid, all the deficiencies, losses and injuries resulting to the said John W. Odenheimer, shall be made up to him, to his reasonable satisfaction, this conveyance and transfer shall then cease to be operative; and the said John shall re-transfer the same to said Joseph. And it is further agreed between the parties hereto, that the business of the concern shall go on as usual, unless the said John W. Odenheimer shall find it necessary to stop the further progress, in which case, he is at full liberty to do so. And it is further agreed that the said John may proceed to collect the debts due, and wind up the said firm without any hindrance on the part of the said Joseph. In testimony whereof the said Joseph Askew, hath hereunto set his hand and seal this 25th day of April, A. D. 1829. Joseph Askew. Sealed and delivered in presence of Richard Paxson, Thomas Folwell. Proved before an alderman, by the oaths of the two subscribing witnesses on the 22d of May, 1829, and recorded on that day."

The complainant alleges that the errors and misentries were such as he thought himself entitled to make, without any injustice to his partner, in order to compensate himself for extra services to the firm, the amount of which did not exceed the sum saved in clerk hire, and was set forth in a schedule annexed to the bill. It then alleged, that the amount of errors and misentries had been ascertained, that all the objects of the assignment had been effected, that a large balance remained in the hands of the respondent, due to the complainant, which the former was applying to his own use. The prayer was for an account of what had been received since the assignment, of the amount of his claim on the complainant, for a re-transfer of his share of the partnership effects, and the payment of the balance of money on hand.

The answer admits the partnership, by the terms of which the defendant was to do the out of door business, and complainant to attend to the books and in door business of the firm; it averred that there was great mismanagement by the complainant for some years, which he concealed by false entries in the books. That when called on to explain them, he promised to do so, but before this was done, a number of the books and papers of the firm were destroyed by fire, so that it became impossible to ascertain the extent of the frauds thus committed. That the respondent believed that he had sustained losses to the amount of 5000 dollars, exclusive of damages for breaking up the business of the firm, which was profitable, that he was not able to specify the extent with precision, but that they far exceeded the amount of damages stated in the bill, or in any account which had been made out. He therefore claimed to retain out of complainant's share of the partnership effects, a sum sufficient to cover the estimated amount of his losses by the misconduct of his partner. A great mass of testimony was taken, by which it clearly appeared that the complainant had been for some time in the habit of committing frauds on the firm, in the manner recited in the assignment and otherwise. The evidence of the destruction of some of the books and papers of the firm by fire, was very clear, and very strong to prove that it was wilfully done by complainant, to conceal the frauds he had committed. The case was referred to a master, who reported misentries to the amount of 889 dollars, and goods taken to the amount of 250 dollars, for which the complainant had not charged himself; the master reported a balance due to complainants of 5619 dollars and returned the depositions to the court. Both parties filed exceptions to the report, which were argued at length by counsel on both sides on the evidence and law, the latter of which only will be noticed.

Mr. Cadwalader and Mr. Binney, for complainant.

The suppression or destruction of books and papers by complainant, does not dispense with the production of evidence on part of respondent, though it will help slight or defective proof of a charge; every presumption is against the party who is guilty of suppression or spoliation, but there must be some prima facie evidence, sufficient to raise ground for the presumption, such as would authorize a jury to infer the fact. The court will not impose a penalty on complainant arbitrary in its amount, but will supply the defect and ascertain the truth as far as they can. Though by the terms of the assignment the correction of errors was to be ascertained to the satisfaction of respondent, it is not submitted to his arbitrary discretion to judge for himself; he must be reasonably satisfied, and the court will compel him to be satisfied when he is compensated to the full extent of the proof he makes of specific losses. Pandects, b. 2, §§ 6, 7; Poth. Obl. No. 48. So where a party covenanted that if a title was good, he would pay 60 pounds in three months after he was satisfied he held the land by an undisputed title. It was held incumbent on the defendant to-state a lawful claim adverse to, and better than the one conveyed. Folliard v. Wallace, 2 Johns. 395, 401. The respondent has not insisted on the right to claim, according to his own conscience; he has offered and gone into proof before the master, to ascertain the extent of the fraud, as a matter of account, which is a waiver of the right now assumed, by which he is bound. The assignment embraces only misentries, it was not intended to extend to the goods taken by respondent and not charged, this was never set up till the answer was put in, errors and misentries in the books refer to the face of the books, the meaning of the assignment is, that there shall be an accounting—an adjustment of the accounts of the company, when that is done the trust is terminated; the adjustment must be to the reasonable satisfaction of the trustee, but the measure of the reason of a trustee, is the rule of reason prescribed by a court of equity. Jones v. Nabbs, Gilb. Ch. 146; Webb v. Shaftesbury, 7 Ves. 480. When a party insists on proof of a matter alleged against him, the degree of proof required depends on his position; if an allegation is made that a party has been deprived of evidence, it is answered when evidence is produced; here there is evidence as to the uncharged goods, to which the party will be confined, unless he will show that goods have been taken, which cannot be traced, or their amount ascertained. Respondent has not sworn to the particular losses he has sustained, he is bound by the thirty-fifth rule of this court to specify his exceptions to the master's report, and the court will sustain none which are not made according to its rules, unless for special cause shown. The question before the court is, whether the master acted correctly on the evidence before him, or if he was wrong, what he ought to have done. No evidence will be received but what was before the master, if one general exception is taken, which includes several matters, and one is right, the whole exception fails. 2 Madd. Ch. [Pr.] 510. The master is a judge, no evidence is admissible after the report is settled, and the facts he finds are presumed to be true. Id. 511, 516. Exceptions are in the nature of special demurrers, the party must put his finger on the matters excepted to, [Wilkes v. Rogers,] 6 Johns. 592,—and references to a master have the same effect, whether they are made by agreement of parties, or the order of the court.

Mr. Kittera, for the respondent.

In making the assignment, it was not the intention of the parties to put the respondent to legal proof of the items of fraud by which he had been injured, but to have him satisfied to the amount which in his conscience he believed he had suffered; the object of the assignment was full and perfect indemnity to him, for all the consequences of the fraud, as clearly appears by the preamble and recitals. Their extent was known to complainant, but by his conduct, he has put it out of the power of respondent to ascertain it; in such a case the court will not control his conscience, when he swears to a certain sum, by putting him to the proof of items. The parties have made a standard, by which the trustee is authorized to settle the accounts, without any provision for any appeal from his judgment, as to what is a reasonable satisfaction. The court will not undertake to correct his judgment and oath, merely because there is a defect of proof as to items or amount; unless there is clear evidence that he has abused his discretion, or has fixed an amount unjust at the first blush, the complainant must disprove it clearly. If any other rule is adopted, the parties will be put in the same position, as if their conduct had been fair on both sides, the account between them will be a mere adjustment of balances, appearing on the books, or by legal evidence of charges and credits. The position into which complainant seeks to force us is this, he destroys our means of accounting, and then calls on us for a strict account by the rules of legal evidence; but he has placed us in a position from which no court of equity can remove us. By the assignment, the legal right to all the partnership effects is fully vested in the respondent, the court can take from him only so much, as the complainant can show is retained against equity and good conscience. His position is also a fixed one, he admits fraud in his bill, states the misentries, in addition to which we have proved the suppression and spoliation of the books, accounts and papers of the firm, in which position every presumption is against him. Courts of equity go further than courts of law, in odium spoliatoris, the oath of the party injured will support a charge. [Childrens v. Saxby,] 1 Vern. 207; Childrens v. Saxby, 12 Vin. Abr. 10, 15 Vin. Abr. 312, 16 Vin. Abr. 356. So where a will is destroyed, it will be presumed that it gave the opposite party a right to recover. 2 Poth. 336; [Cowper v. Cowper,] 2 P. Wms. 720; Cowper v. Cowper, 1 Bridg. Eq. Index, 456, pl. 225. The same rule is applied to deeds, books, papers, accounts, &c.; their suppression raises the presumption that they contained what was against the party suppressing, and in favour of the other party, whose oath as to their contents must be admitted from necessity. The court will construe the assignment liberally in favour of the respondent, it was avowedly made for his benefit, its objects were fair and just; and though in terms it extends only to errors and misentries, it will embrace all errors to his injury arising from whatever cause. He must have complete indemnity, and if the words used to afford it are not broad enough to comprehend each item of loss, the court will reform it according to the manifest declared intention of the parties. As the complainant was conusant of his own acts, and the respondent ignorant, except so far as they had become known to him, he shall not be prejudiced by an omission in the preamble and recitals, which was the language of the complainant.

In his answer, respondent averred his losses to amount to 5000 dollars, he claimed this amount before the master, and yet claims it; he has a right to produce all the evidence in his power in favour of his claim, either by proof of items or of undefined injuries, not choosing to stand on his oath alone. But this cannot be deemed an implied waiver of any right which his position gave him, and it is not pretended that he made any express waiver. His first, second, third and fifth exceptions meet the objections of the complainant's counsel, pointing to errors of the master, in confining himself to credits specifically proved by items and in amount, and disallowing any claim for the injury sustained by loss of the credit of the firm, and its consequent premature dissolution, while its business was highly profitable. An allowance for this was expressly claimed in the answer, and ought to have been made by the master. The court may not be bound by the oath of the respondent as to any precise amount, but must make some reasonable allowance for an injury which is apparent. As reported by the master, our credits are such only as are sustained by strict proof.

Before BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, and HOPKINSON, District Judge.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court on exceptions to the report of the master, to whom this cause was referred on the 10th of June last, for an account by the defendant. The account exhibited a balance of partnership effects in the hands of the defendant of 25,498 dollars 91 cents, to which both parties agreed. They likewise agreed on the sum on which a commission should be charged by defendant for his services, being 69,726 dollars 55 cents, but they differed on the amount of commission, the defendant claiming five per cent, the plaintiff willing to allow two and a half, the master allowed four, to which both parties except.

In the case of Burr v. M'Ewen, [Case No. 2,193,] Hale and Davidson, at April term 1830, this court gave their views on the subject of commissions to trustees, and are satisfied that they are in accordance with the settled judicial opinion and usage of the state. In Pusey v. Clemson, 9 Serg. & R. 209, and in the case of Walker's Estate, Id. 225, the supreme court declare, that common opinion and understanding have fixed on five per cent as a reasonable allowance, and that cases in which the court may fix on a higher or lower rate, are to be considered as exceptions arising under the particular circumstances of the case. We think this a reasonable and safe rule, which will prevent much litigation if so understood and adhered to, and in this case we perceive no such circumstances as to induce us to depart from it.

The complainant comes into a court of equity demanding a retransfer of his part of partnership effects, included in the assignment, alleging that the defendant has in his hands a balance of money justly due to the plaintiff, or his stock in the firm, which he cannot retain in good conscience, and withholds in bad faith. In such a case the court is not governed by the technical and strict legal construction of the words of the assignment, but the real meaning and intention of the parties in relation to the subject matter and object for which it was made. Though they were satisfied that the words were not broad enough to include all the errors and misconduct of the plaintiff which had been injurious to the defendant, we would not decree of course for the complainant as to those items, but adopt the principles of equity which the supreme court lay down as incontrovertible. Hunt v. Rousmanier, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 13: "Where an instrument is drawn and executed, which professes or is intended to carry into execution an agreement, whether in writing or by parol, previously entered into, but which by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or law, does not fulfil or violates the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement, equity will correct the mistake so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement." They will compel "the delinquent party fully to perform his agreement, according to the terms of it and the manifest intention of the parties; so if the mistake exists, not in the instrument which is intended to give effect to the agreement, but in the agreement itself, and is clearly proved to have been the result of ignorance of some material fact, a court of equity will in general grant relief according to the nature of the particular case in which it is sought."

Deciding this question by these principles, we feel bound to consider the agreement and assignment as embracing all errors and misentries, whether of cash on the cash books, errors in not charging the plaintiff with goods taken by himself, or receiving money from customers and not accounting for it, and any other errors or misentries in keeping the books which would be injurious to the interest of the defendant. We do not think it important to examine minutely whether Mr. Odenheimer knew of the omission to charge the goods taken by plaintiff, or of any other misentries than such as relate to those in the cash book; if he was ignorant of the existence of any others, it would be a good reason for our reforming the assignment, especially when their existence was known to plaintiff. His concealment of them from his partner, when about executing a paper intended to be a complete indemnity against all errors and misentries in keeping the books of the firm, would be a complete bar to any equitable relief, when we had before us abundant proof of errors and misconduct on his part highly injurious to defendant. We would not take from him the security of a fund given to him for an indemnity, until it had been made effectual for all the objects intended, and for which the plaintiff was in equity bound to make a provision. If the defendant had a knowledge of all the errors committed by plaintiff, it would not alter the case, the words of the assignment are broad enough to cover them; the plaintiff knew of them, and agreed that defendant should retain the stock assigned till all losses, deficiencies and injuries resulting from them should be made up to his reasonable satisfaction.

We do not mean to decide, that the defendant is to be the judge of the amount which he shall retain out of the fund assigned; he holds it in trust, subject to the supervision of this court; for his own use, so far as he can reasonably satisfy us, that any alleged errors exist which operate to his injury, and for the plaintiffs for the residue. The cases cited by the plaintiffs' counsel, fully support their position in this respect, and we think it the fair and equitable construction of the assignment. Thus far the case is attended with no difficulty, but a very serious one has occurred in ascertaining the sum which we shall decide, on all the circumstances of this case, to be a reasonable satisfaction to the defendant for the errors and misconduct of the plaintiff. The reference to the master was a general one for an account, and his report does not find facts, on the legal result of which we are to pronounce an opinion as on a special verdict or case stated. 2 Madd. Ch. [Pr.] 506. In stating the account between the parties, he makes specific allowances to the defendant, on account of errors and misentries, and returns the whole evidence for our consideration on the propriety of these allowances, which are the subject of exception by both parties. That errors and misentries, to a considerable amount, have been made by the complainant, is admitted in the bill and the assignment, it is also abundantly proved by all the witnesses. The burning of the books has not been conclusively brought home to the plaintiff, but the evidence is of that strong and convincing nature, as leaves no doubt on our mind that the act was committed by the complainant, and so we consider the fact to be.

Under these circumstances, he calls for the interposition of this court, to compel the plaintiff to account, to pay the balance in his hand, and retransfer what remains of his share of the fund assigned without producing any statement of the errors or misentries, giving no information which could tend to ascertain the amount, putting no estimate on the sum he thought himself entitled to for extra service, or what he had taken under such pretext, when he could have done it from his own knowledge. He does not swear to his bill, or even positively aver, that he had made no other errors or misentries to the injury of his partner than are referred to in his bill, or were proved before the master. Where papers are destroyed or suppressed by a party with a deliberate design to defraud or injure another, the presumptions of law are very strong against him, and there cannot well be a case more strong against a complainant in equity than this. Courts of law are very severe in punishing fraud, but when it is aggravated by the destruction or suppression of papers or books which would, if produced, be the means of detecting it, courts of equity will go beyond, and even contrary to the rules of law, and presume most liberally, in odium spoliatoris. [Philips v. Philips,] 1 Ch. Cas. 293; [Cowper v. Cowper,] 2 P. Wms. 748; [Cookes v. Hellier,] 1 Ves. Sr. 235; [Garth v. Cotton,] 3 Atk. 755, 756; [Bowles v. Stewart,] 1 Schoales & L. 222; 5 Brown, Parl. Cas. 300, 324; [Childrens v. Saxby,] 1 Vern. 207.

A court of equity will entertain jurisdiction of a trespass, where it is done secretly, so that it cannot be proved easily, as where on his own ground a man digs under ground to another's mineral. East India Co. v. Sandys, 1 Vern. 127, 130. So where an interloper trades to the East Indies, he shall admit his trading, and to some certain amount, because it is difficult of proof. Id. 130; [East India Co. v. Evans,] Id. 307. So where a bailiff took a sum of money under an execution issued in breach of an injunction in odium spoliatoris, "the oath of the party injured is a good charge on him who hath done the wrong." Childrens v. Saxby, 1 Vern. 207; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. p. 11, pl. 2; Id. p. 229, pl. 11. So where a man ran away with a casket of jewels, the oath of the party injured was allowed as evidence, (East India Co. v. Evans, 1 Vern. 308;) but not to conclude the party committing the fraud, (Plampin v. Betts, Id. 272.) Where a plaintiff in equity has been guilty of fraud, and his bill is dismissed, the court will decree costs to the defendant, to be taxed on his oath. Dorrington v. Jackson, Id. 449, 450. So as to the plaintiff where a bill of exchange was obtained by fraud and the oath of defendant was falsified. Dyer v. Tymewell, 2 Vern. 122, 123.

These cases fully establish the principle, that in cases of fraud, suppression and spoliation, the oath of the party injured is evidence, but not conclusive; the court must judge of the weight it is entitled to, under all the circumstances of the case. The mere circumstance of a party having destroyed or suppressed a deed, book or paper, will not induce a court of equity to decree a penalty against him to deprive him of what may be his just right, to dispense with such secondary proof of the existence and contents of the paper which has been so suppressed or destroyed as may be in the power of the party injured to produce, or to give a decree in his favour, without some proof. [Cowper v. Cowper,] 2 P. Wms. 738, 748; [Saltern v. Melhuish,] Amb. 247, 249; Saltern v. Melhulgh, [Bowles v. Stewart,] 1 Schoales & L. 222.

It is difficult to define precisely what will be deemed some proof, as much must necessarily depend on the particular case; but there can be little danger in laying it down as a general rule, that where there is the least positive proof of the existence of a paper, or where it may be supposed or inferred from appearances out of which such supposition or inference necessarily or naturally arises, proof of spoliation would entitle the opposite party to a decree. Cowper v. Cowper, 1 P. Wms. 750. If there has been actual spoliation by a party, every thing would be presumed against him in favour of those setting up a prima facie title; and though there is no actual spoliation proved, yet a complete suppression would, for the purposes of the suit, be equal to a spoliation. Bowles v. Stewart, 1 Schoales & L. 222. Where a widow made a deed of the greatest part of her estate, to the value of 800 pounds, to trustees for her children by the first husband, which the second husband destroyed, he was decreed to pay the amount without any account of the estate. Hunt v. Matthews, 1 Vern. 408. So where a defendant swore that he had burnt a deed, and afterwards produced it, he was compelled to admit the deed as laid in the bill. Sanson v. Rumsey, 2 Vern. 561. Where a defendant in a bill in equity swore that she had delivered a will to the plaintiff, which he did not produce, she was held not to be bound to answer till the will was produced by plaintiff; on a final hearing, it was decreed, that having suppressed the will, it ought to be presumed most strongly against him, and to be taken as set forth by the party claiming under it. Hampden v. Hampden, 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 250, 252. Where a deed limiting a term was burnt by the defendant, who contended that the limitation was void, the court decided, that since a term might be limited in such a manner as to take effect, they would intend it to have been so limited in that case, and decreed a conveyance accordingly. Dalston v. Coatsworth, 1 P. Wms. 731, 732, &c. So where title deeds are suppressed, the court will decree possession to the party claiming under them till produced. King v. Hounsdon, [Arundel,] Hob. 109; [Tucker v. Phipps,] 3 Atk. 360. Where on an account being decreed, the master reported that defendant had suppressed and embezzled some pages of accounts in a bundle, or that it had been done with his privity, the court disallowed his whole accounts for diet, &c., on account of embezzlement. Wardour v. Berisford, 1 Vern. 452; [Cowper v. Cowper,] 2 P. Wms. 749. Where a will is suppressed by the executor or heir, he shall be compelled to pay a legacy bequeathed by it before probate, and without a citation in the spiritual court; equity interferes on the head of spoliation and suppression. [Tucker v. Phipps,] 3 Atk. 360.

From these cases we may take the rules of equity to be well established, that where a deed, a will or other paper is proved to be destroyed or suppressed, or there is vehement suspicion of its having been done, the presumption in odium spoliatoris applies in favour of the party who claims under such paper, though the contents are not proved. The fact of spoliation, suppression or embezzlement may be proved by the answer or oath of the opposite party, so may the contents of the paper; the same rule applies to matters of account; the mere embezzlement of books or accounts is sufficient to authorize a rejection of claims by the spoiler though supported by evidence, or the party spoiled may rebut the claim by his oath. But where he comes to charge the spoiler in account, in order to raise a debt against him, he must give some evidence beyond the fact of spoliation, his oath would be admissible evidence, its effect depending on the circumstances of the case. If he relies on other evidence he must make out a prima facie case, by proof competent for a court of equity to presume, a court of law to give a judgment on a demurrer to the evidence, or a jury to find a verdict in favor of the charge set up. This is what is understood by some evidence, it may be slight, yet if it conduces to prove the charge it is legally sufficient, its weight or credibility is a matter of discretion and circumstance. No specific sum can be charged against the spoiler on proof of the mere fact of spoliation, herein the rule differs from that which applies to a claim of property under a deed or will on which the right depends, and the thing claimed is ascertained.

The circumstances of this case would justify the utmost latitude of presumption in a court, jury, master or auditors; the fraud was premeditated, the spoliation wilfully made to conceal it, and we would not disturb a verdict or report which did not at the first blush appear to have debited the complainant with items, in support of which there was no evidence, conducing to make out the charge.

So far as the master has debited the complainant, his report is confirmed; but from the evidence returned with his report he seems to have held the defendant to proof not required by any rule, and to have withheld all credits not definitely proved, or at least to have allowed none which were not supported by such evidence as would have supported charges in an ordinary case between partners or merchant and customer. Were we to confirm this report, on a consideration of the evidence which accompanies it, it would confound all distinction between the spoiler and the despoiled, and tend to encourage rather than to suppress spoliation by throwing on the innocent party the burthen of supplying the evidence which the other had destroyed.

The master has overlooked entirely one powerful item of evidence, the admissions in the bill of the complainant, which are conclusive on him, as well as on a master, a jury or a court, who can approve of nothing in contradiction or opposition to such admissions. East India Co. v. Keighley, in the house of lords, 4 Madd. 15, 21. These admissions must be carried into every act of fraud, in taking money or goods furtively, the amount of which may be presumed to be equal to the object for which they were taken; that is, to the saving of clerk hire for the services performed. We should forget the first principles of justice in confining the respondent to the rules by which the master has acted. One of the clerks testified to repeated acts of the complainant in taking goods not charged, of which he kept a memorandum, amounting to 570 dollars, exclusive of what was allowed by the master; though the proof was not specific, we think it reasonably sufficient to justify giving the defendant credit to this amount, and direct it accordingly.

We have not thought it proper to direct any credits on the general averment in the answer that the injuries sustained amounted to 5000 dollars; it is too vague to act upon satisfactorily. Had it been definite as to any particular fact, or the amount of injury sustained under any defined item, we might have directed a further allowance to the defendant, but it would be acting too much on vague conjecture for us to specify any particular amount. Though we should not have disturbed the report if the master had done it, we cannot feel justified in decreeing any particular charge under this general allegation.

We have allowed no damages for breaking up the business of the firm, no sum was specified in the answer as applicable to this item, and no evidence is before us which enables us to ascertain what may be just; there is therefore no prima facie case, either by the oath of the respondent or the evidence, for the allowance of any specific sum on this ground.

ASKEW v. SMITH.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 26, 1804.

JUDGMENT BY CONFESSION—BEFORE RETURN OF THE WRIT.

A defendant, arrested to appear at the next term, cannot come in and confess judgment at this term; the writ being returnable to the next term.

[See Hoden v. Perry, Case No. 5,893.]

Rule to show cause why the defendant should not come in and confess judgment.

Mr. Youngs, for the defendant. Although the writ is not returnable to this, but to the next term, yet a confession of judgment cures all errors.

Rule discharged—THE COURT being of opinion that such judgment could not, at this time, be regularly entered, so as to avail the plaintiff.

ASPDEN'S ESTATE.

[2 Wall. Jr. 368.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April, 1853.

IMPLIED REPEAL OF STATUTE — HEIR AT LAW — STATUTORY HEIR AND COMMON LAW HEIR—PAROL EVIDENCE TO EXPLAIN WILL—COMMON LAW CANONS OF DESCENT — HEIRS EX PARTE PATERNA—AND HEIRS EX PARTE MATERNA.

1. The implied repeal of statutes not being readily to be inferred, a section of an old law containing a short but important expression, was held not to be repealed by a section in a new act which legislated generally on the same subject, omitting only the short expression; the later act being declared to be 'supplemental' to the old one: referring to it as 'incomplete,' and repealing, in terms, another section.

[Cited in U. S. v. The Cuba, Case No. 14,898.]

2. The term 'heir-at-law,' especially when found in context with the term 'lawful heir' as a synonyme, means, in Pennsylvania, the person on whom the law of the commonwealth casts the real estate of an intestate, at the time of his death; and it does not mean the person on whom the common law of England, as distinguished from the law of Pennsylvania, casts such estate.

3. A devise to one's 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' passes the estate to such persons as, at the time of the testator's death, answer by the then existing law that description; and contemplates not only changes from death in the persons designated by the term, but changes also by legislation in the laws regulating successions and descent. Thus where a testator domiciled technically in Pennsylvania, though resident most of his life in England, devised estates to his 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' those terms, as the law stood when he made his will, indicating the heir at the common law of England, but, at the time of the testator's death, indicating wholly different persons—st. whole classes, who were absolutely incapable of inheriting, as the law stood when the will was made—it was held that these last persons, and not the former person, were the 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' and the parties, therefore, to take.

4. The terms 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' mean so clearly and fixedly, in Pennsylvania, heir by the law of that state, whatever it may be, statutory or other, that its meaning is not easily controlled or shaped into the common law signification, when differing from it. Thus where a testator, domiciled technically in Pennsylvania, though resident most of his life in England, devised his estates to his 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' he first paying certain legacies to A. B. & C.; it was held, that A. B. & C., being the Pennsylvania statutory heirs, should take the estates, notwithstanding the provision by which they would have first to pay themselves the legacies; and that the estates should not go to D., a different person, the heir at common law, who could more properly first pay the legacies to A. B. & C. while subject to, or after such payment, he took the estates himself.

5. Though the expression 'heir-at-law,' has been often used in professional and judicial parlance in Pennsylvania, as meaning heir at the common law of England, yet it is not rightly and with legal exactness so used. And especially when explained by the term 'lawful heir,' used as a synonyme with it, it presents no such ambiguity as to let in parol evidence, of any kind, as to the sense in which a testator technically domiciled in Pennsylvania, though resident most of his life in England, used it; or more particularly to show that such a testator used it in the sense of the English common law, i. e. to mean the person who should, at the time of his death, be nearest in blood and descent from a common ancestor of the full blood, by his father's side, and did not use it in its general legal sense, i. e. to mean the person or persons on whom the law of his domicil would cast his real estate, on his death intestate.

6. A general testamentary disposition of all one's 'estate real and personal,' to his 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' by one who had no real estate, either when his will was made, or afterwards, is not a disposition of it to the next of kin; the term 'heir' being capable of an abstract sense as well as of a concrete one; and not being true in legal any more than in popular sense, that there can be no heir, unless there is property strictly heritable.

7. A general testamentary disposition of all one's 'estate real and personal,' to his 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' by one who, neither in law nor in fact, had any real estate, either when his will was made or afterwards, but who, some years prior to the time his will was made, received by devise from his father such estate, which he himself occupied for some time, and never aliened, but which had been confiscated by the commonwealth for his alleged treason, and had been, in law and in fact, irrecoverably taken from him by legislative acts, whose legality, validity, and moral justice he ever strenuously denied, and which estate he always pertinaciously, though absurdly, claimed during a term of more than forty years, and until the day of his death, to own and dispose of as his own, entertaining a hope or pretence of hope, though an absurd hope, that his heir if not himself, would some day gain it; it being a thing, as the testator warmly, though absurdly said, in which his heir had rights, and which "he could not lose:"—does not carry the personal estate into the channel of heirship ex parte paterna, as distinguished from heirs general.

8. Nor can evidence extrinsic to his will, of the testator's mistaken and absurd belief, be received to narrow the construction of terms of law so clear, unrestricted, and general as 'heir-at-law,' or 'lawful heir,' which terms, including heirs ex parte materna, as much as heirs ex parte paterna, pass the personal estate to the heirs of both sides jointly.

[9. Cited in Allen v. Allen's Ex'r, Case No. 211, to the point that although, in Pennsylvania, the orphans' court of the county, as a special court of equity, has jurisdiction of the accounts of executors, etc., it is no bar to the federal courts' exercising jurisdiction over exactly the same subjects, other things allowing, and the orphans' court not having at the time actual possession of the case or parties.]

In equity. By the eleventh section of a Pennsylvania statute of 1794, directing the descents of intestates' real estate in that commonwealth, it is enacted, as set forth in the left hand column below; and by the seventh section of an act of 1797, entitled an act supplementary to the former one,—the preamble to one section of which says, "And whereas the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement, appear to be incomplete,"—it is enacted as set forth in the right hand column below. The two acts form a scheme of descents. The latter act nowhere in terms repeals any part of the former act, except a second section of it, which it does repeal in express terms.

Act 1794, § 11: "Where any person shall die seised as aforesaid, leaving no children, or lawful issue, father or mother, brothers or sisters, or their lawful issue, of the whole blood, then brothers and sisters of the half blood, and their lawful issue, shall inherit the same as aforesaid, in preference to the more remote kindred of the whole blood, unless where such inheritance came to the said person so seised by descent, devise, or gift, of some one of his or her ancestors, in which case, all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from such inheritance."

Act 1797, § 7: "If the intestate shall die seised or possessed of real or personal estate as aforesaid, leaving neither widow nor lawful issue, father or mother, but brothers and sisters, of the whole and half blood, or their representatives, the brothers and sisters of the whole blood, and the legal representatives of such of the whole blood as are dead, shall inherit the real estate in fee simple, and the personal estate shall be distributed equally between the brothers and sisters of both the whole and half blood, or their representatives; but if there are no lawful issue, widow, father or mother, brothers or sisters, or their representatives, of the whole blood, then brothers and sisters of the half blood, shall inherit the said real estate in fee-simple, and the personal estate absolutely, the estate both real and personal to be held by them, as tenants in common, in equal parts, except such parts of the real estate as came to such intestate by descent, devise, or gift, of some one of his or her successors, in which case, all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from such inheritance and such part of the real estate."

This act omits the provision of the former one "and their lawful issue."

The former of these acts—the one passed in 1794—was the first ever passed in Pennsylvania, which let in half blood as heirs to realty; and prior to the date of it, 'the heir-at-law,' under the statute laws of Pennsylvania, of a person situated as was the testator hereafter mentioned, would have been the same person as 'the heir,' according to the common law of England; it having been established in Pennsylvania, until 1833,—when it was enacted by a statute of the Revised Code, that the heir at common law should not take, in any case, to the exclusion of other heirs and kindred standing in the same degree of consanguinity with him—that the common law here takes in all cases not provided for by statute.

Before either of the laws was in existence, st., in December, 1791, Mathias Aspden, a person born in Pennsylvania, and who, according to evidence ordered by the court to be taken, extrinsic to his will, was found by a verdict on a feigned issue ordered by this court, to have been domiciled there also, —White v. Brown, [Case No. 17,538,]—but who, as was shown by the same testimony, left this country at the beginning of the Revolution, and lived nearly all his life afterwards in England, and died there in 1824—made his will, a short and informal instrument, penned by himself. He gives "my estate, real and personal to my heir-at-law; first paying all my just debts and funeral expenses," and certain pecuniary legacies hereinafter mentioned. And in a postscript, referring to some doubts,—which he remarks were ill founded—as to his legitimacy, says, "It is my will that my estate, real and personal, to the party who would be my lawful heir in case there might arise no doubt on that head." The pecuniary legacies above referred to, were small legacies to each of the children of his half brother, Benjamin, and his half sister, Ann, living at the time of his death; to his half sister, Beersheba, and to his half brother, Roger. At the time he made his will, he had, besides these, as was proved by testimony extrinsic to the instrument, and received subject to exception, a half sister, Rebecca, and a half brother, James, neither of whom he mentions. This evidence showed that he had long maintained feelings of great animosity to this brother; that Rebecca was living in 1791, when he made his will, but died in 1814, leaving seven children; that Benjamin was dead prior to the date of the will; that Beersheba was married in 1761, and died about 1817, leaving five children; that Roger died between 1802 and 1814, leaving twelve children; and that Ann had died in 1769, leaving four children. None of these dates or items are specially important.

The will was made in Pennsylvania, and executed so as to pass real estate in that commonwealth, but not so as to pass such estate elsewhere. It had Pennsylvania executors; one of whom was to be the president "at the time being" of a bank in Pennsylvania; and it remained in Pennsylvania from its date in 1791, till the testator's death in England in 1824.

A very particular account is given of the testator in another case,—White v. Brown, [supra,]—where the question of his domicil was in issue; and it will perhaps make the comprehension of the present case more perfect, if the reader will refer to it. He was a strange, disordered and unhappy individual; a monomaniac, in short, and a fool in everything but amassing money. As already stated, he left this country in 1776, and died abroad in 1824. He was never married, and left neither father nor mother; brothers nor sisters of the whole blood, nor any descendant of them; nor brother nor sister of the half blood. He did however leave descendants of these last, and between them and his heir at the common law, this suit was raised about his estate, which, from the time of his death in 1824, had now grown, under the care of an American chancery, from its original amount of $250,000 to about three times that sum. The relatives whom he left were, as proved by extrinsic evidence: I. Nephews and nieces, named Harrison, the descendants of a half sister on his mother's side. II. Nephews and nieces, named Hartley, &c., the descendants of half brothers and sisters on his father's side. III. His heir at the common law of England, John Aspden, of that country; the oldest son of his paternal first cousin, the latter person having been alive at the date of the will, 1791, but not alive at the testator's death in 1824. The first and second parties stood, therefore, in equal nearness with each other, being each the issue of half blood brother and sisters; and both in greater nearness than the third party, John Aspden, whose superiority to them consisted in his being of the whole blood. The two former parties were also the testator's next of kin.

The whole of the large estate above spoken of was personal. The history of the testator's real estate, as it was proved by evidence extrinsic to the will, and which the court, directed to be taken, was peculiar. Neither at the date of his will, nor afterwards, did he hold or claim any real estate acquired by purchase; nor any which came to him by descent from his maternal ancestors; but in the year 1765 he became by devise from his father, the owner, in fee, of a house and lot in Philadelphia, and of a farm in Chester county, which he never aliened. He continued in possession of this paternal real estate till 1781, when, he having fled the country, and gone to Great Britain, it was seized and confiscated under an attainder for an alleged treason. The legality and moral justice of this attainder, the testator always afterwards vehemently denied; maintaining that he had done nothing whatever to justify it, and that it was void. In a will made nine years after the confiscation, and long after every chance of recovering practically either estate had passed away forever, and within a few months of making the present will, he devised both these estates specifically, one to one person, and the other to another; speaking of each of them as my estate, &c., "which has been unjustly seized and confiscated, under pretence of high treason." These pretensions and claim of legal ownership and control of these estates, though palpably absurd, to all practical objects, were always pertinaciously maintained by the testator, who seemed to consider this confiscation as the great event, and the greatest wrong of his life. And he ever entertained the hope —or at least so said—that his heir, if not himself, would gain it; it being a thing, as he said in 1796, "which interests the public, and also my heir at law, who has his right in this case, and cannot lose it."

Aspden's paternal grandmother bore the distinguished English name of Scroop; a matter of which he boasted; having, as he said, "a right to seal with a feather." And his English feelings were supposed to be proved by a letter to the Hon. Thomas Willing, of Philadelphia, in which he speaks of an heir at law to an estate to bear the port of a gentleman. In a petition for redress to the legislature of Pennsylvania, asking relief about his confiscated property, he says that "his heir at law in England" is entitled to £5,000 damages for the chance he has lost of getting his estate. Among the few books which he ever owned was Blackstone's Commentaries, in which the term 'heir-at-law,' in the chapter on 'Descents,' (volume 2,) is explained to be the heir by the common law of England. All these facts, as well as his belief and pretensions of ownership of the real estate, were proved of course by evidence extrinsic to the will, which the court had not ordered to be taken, and which was therefore taken subject to exception. Upon this state of facts, the two parties of the half blood, st. the Harrisons, ex parte paterna, and the Hartleys, ex parte materna, united to contest the right of the heir at common law, John Aspden, of England; and having defeated his claim, then contested the case with one another; the Harrisons, heirs ex parte paterna, claiming the whole estate as being the persons to whom the testator's real estate would have descended had he owned it; while the Hartleys, heirs ex parte materna, claimed to share the estate with them; because, in point of fact, there was no real estate ex parte paterna, to change the direction from heirs general to heirs on the father's side.

In the course of these contests, which occupied the court for many weeks, the following questions arose: The first five questions arising between the heir at common law, in opposition to both the parties of the half blood; and the sixth arising only after the claim of the heir at law was disposed of against him; and therefore arising between the two parties of the half blood alone.

I. Whether the 11th section of the act of 1794 was repealed by the 7th section of the act of 1797? for if it was, then there being no heir fixed by statute (the parties claiming here being but the issue not mentioned in the act of 1797 of brothers and sisters of the half blood), John Aspden, as heir at the common law, came in under the term 'heir-at-law;' the case being an omitted one, and there being no other law to provide for him.

II. Supposing this 11th section not so repealed, and that by the statute law of Pennsylvania, the issue of the brothers and sisters of the half blood would succeed, what, in Pennsylvania, is meant by 'heir-at-law?' Does it mean heir at the common law, or does it mean heir by the statute law of Pennsylvania? If it mean the former, John Aspden would still take in preference to the Harrisons and Hartleys.

III. Supposing this 11th section of the act of 1794, unrepealed, and that since the passage of that act, the term 'heir-at-law,' strictly and in its most accurate sense, means statutory heir, and so includes half blood; yet as the will was made before the passage of that act, and when, confessedly, the term had a different signification, and meant, both by the law of Pennsylvania and that of England, heir at the common law, Is the term to be taken according to the sense it had at the time of making the will, or does it attract to itself that new sense which the statute would give it?

IV. Conceding that this 11th section was repealed, and that 'heir-at-law,' unexplained, means heir by statute law, and so includes half blood; and finally, that the will must be taken to speak at the testator's death, Does the fact that by the will the 'heir-at-law,' to whom the bulk of the estate was devised, was first to pay legacies to certain relatives, or the fact of a provision for them at all, show that these relatives, who were of the half blood, were not meant to be included in the term 'heir-at-law,' and so to show that the term was used in the common law sense, which does not include the half blood; and not in the Pennsylvania statutory sense, which does?

V. Making all the previous concessions, and conceding in addition that the expression 'first paying,' is not enough to control the legal meaning of the term 'heir-at-law,' Does this term present a case of such ambiguity, as to its meaning in Pennsylvania, as that extrinsic evidence might be resorted to, to show that the testator used the term in the English common law, and not in the Pennsylvania statutory sense?

VI. Conceding that the term 'heir-at-law,' as used in the will, means heir by the statute law of the state, and not heir at the common law of England; by which concession the right of John Aspden is disposed of, and the two parties, Harrisons and Hartleys, on opposite sides of the half blood, let in; Is the legal operation in favour of heirs general of the phrase 'giving and bequeathing all my real and personal estate to my heir at law,' changed so as to operate in favour of heirs ex parte paterna, by the fact that the testator, some years prior to the date of his will, received by devise from his father real estate, which he himself never aliened, but which had been, in fact and in law, confiscated by the state for his alleged acts of treason, the legality, validity, and moral justice of which attainder the testator ever strenuously denied; and which estate he always pertinaciously, though absurdly, claimed till the day of his death, to own and dispose of as his own; entertaining a hope, though an absurd hope, that his heir, if not himself, would some day gain it; it being a thing, as the testator warmly though absurdly said, in which his heir had 'rights,' and which "he could not lose."

VII. Can evidence extrinsic to the will be received, to show his mistaken and absurd belief?

The case was elaborately argued on the respective points, by Mr. Randall, Mr. Budd, and Mr. W. B. Reed, for the heir at common law, (Mr. W. L. Hirst represented certain Packers as next of kin of the whole blood, who originated the suit, but on the appearance of nearer heirs, the court considered their pretensions as palpably without foundation. Much of Mr. Hirst's argument supported the case of the heir-at-law, and is incorporated with the argument on that side;) and by Mr. J. M. Read, Mr. Newbold, Mr. Meredith, Mr. H. D. Gilpin, and Mr. W. M. Tilghman, for the statute heirs. Mr. Read and Mr. Newbold, after the heir at common law had been disposed of, arguing for the heirs ex parte paterna, the Hartleys, against their former colleagues, the remaining gentlemen, who claimed the whole estate for their particular clients, the Harrisons; heirs ex parte materna.

I. The seventh section of the act of 1797 repeals the eleventh section of the act of 1794.

In the attempt of the act of 1794 to provide for the issue of half blood, the first law which let in half blood at all, the legislature adopted a rule of preference over the more remote kindred of the whole, productive of great embarrassment in its application, and calculated to make titles dependent on facts often difficult to be ascertained. In this new canon of descents, what rule was to determine the remoteness of degree? See Christian's note to 2 Bl. Comm. c. 14, p. 240. The merit of the issue of brothers and sisters of the half blood might not be so apparent; the sympathy which justified a provision for the one did not operate so strongly in favour of the other; and there was evidently no good reason for giving the preference an indefinite extent. The language of the 11th section of the act of 1794 was too loose for correct legislation, and accordingly, in the enactment in the 7th section of the act of 1797, the objectionable clause giving the estate to the issue of brothers and sisters of the half blood, in preference to more remote kindred of the whole blood, is omitted. The new section is skilfully drawn. The word 'representatives' occurs twice in the context. The omission to insert it in the giving clause in an act designed to perfect a code proved not satisfactory by experience, is pregnant with exclusion. The legislature, in so remote a case, might well mean to admit its inability to provide any rule always satisfactory, and to let in again the heir at common law, as a person as good as any. The common law was our possession and our glory; and except in the preference of the eldest son, and the exclusion of daughters, its canons of descent have never been odious.

A subsequent statute revising generally the subject-matter of a former one, impliedly repeals it. A 'supplemental' act may supply an act in toto, as well as in part. A 'supplemental' act, punishing a crime by imprisonment for ten years, would repeal one punishing the same offence by imprisonment for five years and fine. In a Massachusetts case, —Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 536, 545; and see Weatherford v. Weatherford, 8 Port. (Ala.) 171; Carter v. Hawley, Wright, 74; Mackey v. Hodgson, 9 Pa. St. 470,—a former act having provided for a case, its subject-matter was provided for again by a new act, which omitted some of the restrictions and limitations of the former act; yet the court considered that the old act was repealed in toto. Here the act of 1797 does legislate upon the identical particulars provided for by the act of 1794. Up to a late point in the new section, it re-enacts the provisions of the old one; an omission easily accounted for, and restoring the ancient law in that particular alone. Can the omitted words thus left out, be hunted up from the context of obsolete enactments, and be brought up in their dismembered state to have the force of law? But even if this eleventh section of the act of 1794, is not repealed, still John Aspden, of England, takes, for—

II. 'Heir-at-law' means in Pennsylvania. 'Heir at the common law.' In Johnson v. Haines' Lessee, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 64, in 1799, a question arose between certain brothers and sisters, and a party who was heir at the common law. The counsel or reporter speak of this latter person as "heir at the common law." The opinion of the supreme court came up on error to the high court of errors and appeals; a tribunal still higher, then existing, now abolished. It was the most solemn and august judicature ever known in Pennsylvania. The chief justice of Pennsylvania, M'Kean, delivered its unanimous opinion, and notwithstanding the technical language of counsel, as already given, was yet sounding in his ears, twice speaks of that same party as the "heir-at-law," and speaks of him in no other way. In Jenks v. Backhouse, 1 Bin. 91, in 1803, a party similarly situated, is styled by reporter, one counsel and the court, "heir at the common law." And the counsel, quoting an English case, speaks of "the heir-at-law." In Cresoe v. Laidley, 2 Bin. 279, in 1810, the reporter styles him in one place, "heir at common law," and in another, "heir-at-law." Mr. Rawle and Mr. Lewis, counsel of the party, call him once "heir-at-law," once "common law heir," and once "the heir." Mr. Binney and Mr. Hopkinson replying, call him once the "heir-at-law," and once the "common law heir." Chief Justice Tilghman in delivering the opinion, calls him three times "heir at common law," and once "heir-at-law." In Bevan v. Taylor, 7 Serg. & R. 397, in 1821, Judge Duncan styles him once "heir at common law," and once, apparently, "heir-at-law." This convertible language is also the language of legislation. In one section of an act of assembly of 1705, (3 Smith's Laws, p. 158, § 8,) the phrase "next heir, according to the course of the common law," is used; and also, "heir-at-law, according to the course aforesaid." In another, (Id. § 11,) younger children being spoken of, the oldest son—being in reference to them truly heir at the common law—is spoken of as "the heir-at-law;" and the term is used several times in the same way, in a supplemental act of 1764, (Id. p. 160, § 4.)

There is no doubt that until the statute of 1833 was passed, the heir at common law occupied in Pennsylvania a prominent and favoured position, and that he was recognized by the courts as the person always to take, except in every case where the statute has stripped him of his rights. "It must be remembered," says Chief Justice M'Kean, —Johnson v. Haines' Lessee, [supra,]—"that the system of distributing real estate in cases of intestacy, is an encroachment on the common law; and whenever such an encroachment takes away a right, which would otherwise be vested in the heir-at-law, the operation of the statute should not be extended further than the very words of the legislature."

In England there is descent in gavelkind, to all the sons, and descent in borough English, to the youngest son; and these inherit there by the law of special custom, just as all the children do here by special statute. Yet the term 'heir-at-law,' which is not more correct, by strict language, in England than it is here, runs throughout books common to both countries, as a phrase commonly and rightly used to indicate the "heir at common law." 2 Bl. Comm. 201; [Denn v. Gaskin,] Cowp. 661; [Doe v. Bower,] 3 Barn. & Adol. 453; [Carne v. Roch,] 4 Moore & P. 862. The common law being the general law, must generally be referred to, just as it generally governs. It is the nursing mother of us all. "In Pennsylvania," says the court in Hileman v. Bouslaugh, 13 Pa. St. 344, "a testator is to be considered as speaking in reference to the common law system of descents." Nor is the force of this expression 'heir-at-law,' qualified by the expression 'lawful heir,' in another part of the will. If there be any want of precision in the phrase "lawful heir," when applied to a devise of real estate, it cannot qualify or obscure the meaning of the better defined term, "heir-at-law." An ambiguous phrase cannot be used to explain, but must itself be explained by one free from ambiguity. But standing alone, 'lawful heir' means heir jure haereditatis, right heir, own heir, or heir-at-law. In Davies v. Lowndes, 4 Bing. N. C. 478, which will be much relied on by the other side, when they divide and come to a contest between themselves, the testator uses the terms convertibly; meaning to indicate heir by the common law. The term, however, is used by Aspden in connexion with a doubt about his own legitimacy; just as a man speaks of his lawful child, in opposition to one not lawful, or illegitimate, or his lawful wife, in contrast with a woman to whom he may have been allied by ties less regular. What he meant, was 'the party who would be my heir in case I was lawfully born.' But he has confused his ideas, and therefore misuses his words; as is obvious from the sentence, which expresses no idea with correctness of language.

III. Conceding that the argument on neither of the preceding points is well founded, still the heir at common law takes; for, confessedly, he was 'heir-at-law' when the will was made. And the will must refer to the law as it then was, and not to the law as it might thereafter be changed. In this point of view the domicil is not material; for the laws of England and Pennsylvania were on this point the same in 1791, when the will was made. The testator has not given any reason to believe that he intended to leave his estate to such person as the laws of Pennsylvania from time to time might, could or would direct, to be the party or parties to whom the estate of an intestate should go. We cannot interpolate into the will an intention that during thirty-three years, in which it remained unchanged, the disposition of the testator's property should depend on these varying laws. In 1791, he declared his last will to be, that his estate should go to his 'heir-at-law.' The will was never revoked. The heir-at-law was a person perfectly defined. He was the person who should, at the time of the testator's death, be nearest in blood and descent from a common ancestor, of the full blood, by his father's side. John Aspden, heir at the common law, now claiming, answers that description. No one else does. This declaration made in 1791, the law repeats for the testator in articulo mortis.

In Martindale v. Warner, 15 Pa. St. 479, the supreme court of Pensylvania has authoritatively settled this point. Between the making of the will and the death of the testator, the law in 1844 was changed, and the court determined that the law in existence at the time of the execution of the will must govern, without regard to the kind of property. "Though a will, it is true," says Judge Rogers, "does not take effect until after the testator's death, yet it is inchoate, though not consummate from the execution of it, and for many purposes in law of which this is one, it relates to the time of the making." "I do not put the case," he says, "on the actual intention of the testator, but on his legal intention, which is the only safe rule. That the testator permitted his will to stand without alteration for several years, or that he may have known of the act of 1844, is nothing. It is a question of construction, depending on certain fixed principles, which ought not to be varied by forced speculation as to the knowledge or ignorance of testators, some of whom may, or others may not know of the statute and its legal construction." So in another Pennsylvania case, (Mullock v. Souder, 5 Watts & S. 198,) it was held that a statute "which provides that real estate acquired by the testator after the date of his will, shall pass by a general devise, does not apply to a will dated before its passage." The court says it could only be so applied "by giving the act a retroactive effect, which will never be done, where such does not expressly appear to be the design of the legislature; but the act will be left to operate on wills made and executed after the act comes into operation. A devise of real estate," it continues, "is in the nature of a conveyance; and a statute will not be considered as altering the effect of a conveyance already made, so as to pass more than it purported to pass when made. A retroactive effect will not be given to a statute so as to affect contracts or property. In the case of Ashburnham v. Bradshaw," 2 Atk. 36, it says, "a devise to charitable uses was made by a will dated in 1734. The testator lived till July, 1736, a month after the mortmain act had been passed, and upon a case, the judges certified that the devise was good. And to the same effect are Attorney-General v. Lloyd, 3 Atk. 551, and Same v. Andrews, 1 Ves. Sr. 225. There the application of the statute would have abridged the rights of the devisee; here it would abridge the right of the heirs; and there seems no difference in the principle."

The English authorities also adopt the same law. Lord C. J. Willes says, (Doe v. Underdown, Willes, 297,) that it is an established rule "that the intent of the testator ought always to be taken as things stood at the time of making his will, and is not to be collected from subsequent accidents, which the testator could not then foresee." In a much later case, (Doe v. Perratt, 5 Barn. & C. 69,) Holroyd, J., says that "it is laid down by Willes, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court of common pleas, to be one of the certain and established rules for the construction of wills, that the intent of the testator ought always to be taken as things stood at the time of the making of his will. This rule had been before laid down by Lord C. J. King, in Wright v. Hall, [Fortes. 182,] and has been since confirmed by Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the judgment of the court of king's bench in Doe v. Scott," 3 Maule & S. 306, (and see Winter v. Perratt, 9 Clark & F. 606.) Lord Ellenborough, quoting and adopting the opinion of Lord King and Lord Willes, says, "though the will is not complete until the death of the testator, so as to vest anything in the devisee, yet the intent of the testator is to be taken to be as things stood at the making of his will; for the testator makes his will as if he were to die that moment." 3 Maule & S. 306.

"It is the intention of testator," says Mr. Ram, (on Wills, pages 107, 108,) "at the time he makes his will, which alone the law will carry into effect. Events which have happened since the publication of a will, are unavailable to introduce an intention into it." Again—"It has been said by Lord Hardwicke, and it is often repeated, that a will must be made to speak from the testator's death, and be looked upon, not only as his last will, but his last words. It is true, that a will speaks from the death of the testator; but what does it speak? Does it say more than what the testator said when he made his will? Were it permitted to say more, clearly the law would fulfil an intention which is not expressed in it." If the testator, after making his will, should become insane, and continue so to the time of his death, could a change of intention, arising out of a change of law, which he had no capacity to counteract, be imputed to him? If A. devises £10 to the parish where he lives, and afterwards removes his habitation to another parish; the parish where he lived at the time of the will, shall have the legacy. 2 Com. Dig. tit. "Chancery," (3 Y. 16,) p. 679.

IV. But conceding the arguments on all the foregoing points to be ill founded, the direction of "first paying to the testator's half brothers and half sisters certain pecuniary legacies," controls the otherwise settled meaning of the term "heir-at-law," and gives it a common law as distinguished from a statutory sense. Using the term "heir-at-law," to mean heir at the common law, that person could very well first pay pecuniary legacies to persons of the half blood; for no person of the half blood could be "heir-at-law," in the common law sense. But using the term in the Pennsylvania statute sense, which, violating the rule of common law, prefers nearer half blood to more distant whole blood, an estate of half a million is divided between, or at least includes, parties who are first to pay themselves a few dollars as a specific legacy. The construction of the other side defeats this plain and positive direction. If the half blood inherits, there can of course be no previous payment, nor any payment. If the heir at common law inherits, there can be. One construction carries out a plain direction; the other directly defeats it, by rendering it impossible. Independently of the expression "first paying," &c., these provisions in favour of half brothers and sisters, &c., are forcible to show that even if naturally or by force of terms they are included, they are not included by the testator's meaning. The authoritative case of Finlay v. King, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 377, (and see Darbison v. Beaumont, 1 P. Wms. 229; Spring v. Biles, 1 Term R. 435, note; and Doe v. Perratt, 5 Barn. & C. 48,) is much in point. Delivering the opinion in that case, Chief Justice Marshall, quoting the terms of the devise, which were very stiff and difficult to manage, says: "These words (the devise) certainly import that the whole estate should vest in possession at the same time, and mark with precision when that time shall be. This express provision can be contracted only by a strong and manifest intent to be collected from the whole will. But the intent of the testator is the codicil rule in the construction of wills; and if that intent can be clearly perceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule, often it must prevail; although in giving effect to it, some words should be rejected, or so restrained in their application, as materially to change the literal meaning of the particular sentence." And that strict lawyer, whose mind was itself law, went on to infer a particular meaning from exactly such indications as we seek to infer it from; to wit, that having already made a provision for certain parties, he did not mean to provide for them again by operation of law.

"The father," he says, "who was the presumptive heir when the will was made, died during the life of the testator. This event is supposed not to affect the construction of the will. But were it otherwise, were it supposed that he might look forward to that event, and contemplate his brothers and sisters as his probable heirs, the will furnishes arguments of great weight in support of the opinion that he did not intend them to take anything not expressly devised to them. The heirs of the testator, at the time of his death, were, a brother of the whole blood, a sister of the whole blood, the daughters of a sister of the whole blood, a brother of the half blood, and a sister of the half blood. Each of these persons is named in the will. For some of them ample provision is made. To others less favour is shown. The legacies to his brothers and sisters of the half blood are inconsiderable, while the bequests to those of the whole blood are large. No one of them is omitted. The circumstance that his mind was clearly directed to each, and that he has carefully measured out his bounty to each, discriminating between them so as to show great inequality of affection, operate powerfully against the opinion that he intended to leave a very large property to descend upon them by the silent operation of law."

V. Conceding, 1. That the 11th section in question is not repealed; 2. That in a strict legal and correct Pennsylvania sense, 'heir-at-law' does not mean heir at common law; 3. That the will must refer to the meaning of the term at the testator's death in 1824, and not at the date of the will in 1791; and finally, that there is nothing in the will itself which controls the statutory meaning, still have we not shown that the expression was so capable of being used, and was in fact so often and so generally used in the common law sense also, that we may now resort to the extrinsic evidence of the testator's situation and circumstances, to show in what sense he used it? We seek to show no more than that Mr. Aspden has used a law term in the identical sense in which Chief Justice M'Kean and Chief Justice Tilghman, on the bench, and Mr. Rawle, Mr. William Lewis, Mr. Binney, and Mr. Hopkinson, at the bar, all of them speaking on a law subject, also used it. Admit that he might have meant heir by some statute law not then existing, but which might be enacted any time before his death; still, as the most eminent lawyers in this state have used it in another sense, may we not prove that Aspden fell into the same error, negligence, inaccurateness of style, or whatever else you choose to call it, the question being on a will, and a question of intention merely? Independently of the question of domicil, and admitting a technical domicil in Pennsylvania, cannot we show, in construing a word of such doubtful meaning, that in fact he lived all his life in England or in an English colony; that he had highly aristocratic feelings, boasting of his descent from the Scroops; speaking, as in his letter to Mr. Willing, of an heir at law to bear the port of a gentleman; that among the very few books he ever had was Blackstone's Commentaries, in which heir-at-law is used in one sense, and had no book in which it is used in another; that he always lived in hostility with the person to whom one construction of the term would give his estate, and always manifested vanity and pride in another person, whoever he might be, that would get it by another? That he discriminated among his step-brothers and sisters and their families, bestowing legacies with clear indications of difference, and excluding the one through whom some of these parties now claim. To enlarge upon these last facts as explanatory of the sense in which he used the doubtful term heir-at-law.

The testator excluded his step-sister Rebecca, then living, but who died about 1814 leaving seven children. He also excluded his step-brother James Hartley, because he was on bad terms with him. He included the children of his step-brother Benjamin, who had previously died leaving seven children. He included his step-sister Beersheba previously married and now having children, none of whom did he include. He included his step-brother Roger, who died between 1802 and 1814, leaving twelve children, none of whom did he include. He included the children of his step-sister Ann, who had died in 1769, leaving four children; but as to her children, and as to the children of Benjamin, he limited the legacies expressly to such of these children "as should be living at the time of his death." In view of this discrimination and these limitations, can we not show that the testator did not intend to bequeath the mass of his fortune to his step-brothers and sisters and their children, under the description of my heir at law?"

But without so much detail. A domicil merely technical, unaccompanied by actual residence, cannot furnish a satisfactory explanation of the testator's intentions. It was in the place of his residence that he acquired ideas and language. The presumption is, that he used words in the sense in which they were there understood. Cannot we show that the testator was educated in England, and lived there the greater part of his life, and so infer that the term 'heir-at-law' was used in an English sense. The authorities, which give to the law of the domicil the supremacy, relate to the execution of wills, and to the transmission of property, in cases of intestacy, or when, in consequence of some positive law, the provisions of a will fail to take effect. They do not relate to the interpretation of wills, except where residence is combined with the technical domicil. Mr. Burge, (4 Confl. Laws, 590, 591,) in speaking of the rule, that the law of the domicil affords the rule of construction of wills, says, "The ground on which this rule rests is, that, as it becomes necessary to ascertain the sense in which the testator has used the expression, and what law of succession he contemplated, it is presumed that they were those of the country in which he was domiciled, because, it must be supposed, he was familiar with those laws. There are grounds for presuming he was acquainted with them, but there exist no grounds for presuming him to be acquainted with any other laws of succession. In affixing the sense in which he has used certain words, terms, or phrases, he is presumed to have adopted that which prevailed in the place of his domicil. It has been sometimes said, that they ought to be understood in the sense in which they are accustomed to be used in the place where the will or contract was made. But it would be impossible to consider this as a general rule, for the residence of the party in the place may have been for so short a time as to negative the presumption, that he was even acquainted with that sense." Story (Confl. Laws, § 479f) says that the will is to be construed according to the "law of the place of his actual domicil," evidently excluding the mere technical domicil, without residence, like that which the circuit court imposed on Mr. Aspden. Courts having in view, therefore, not a technical but an actual domicil, of which residence is the essential feature, with a view to ascertain the sense in which the testator used the language of the will, cannot we point to his education and long residence in England, as furnishing evidence that the words of the will were used in the English sense?

VI. Argument for the paternal half-blood. —Supposing all the foregoing points to be decided against the heir at common law; that his pretensions are thus finally disposed of, and the half-blood let in as 'heir-at-law,' a new question arises, one between the half-blood itself. To which side of the half-blood, or how amongst it, does the estate go? Does it go to the paternal side alone; or to the maternal, in common with it? We contend for the paternal. By blending the personal estate with the real, the testator bequeathed both to the heir of the real estate. In order to ascertain the heir to whom the real estate is devised, it is necessary to know what real estate is referred to in the will, and extrinsic evidence is admissible and has been directed to prove that fact. Such evidence shows that the real estate referred to in the will, was the testator's paternal estate, and the will is therefore to be read as containing a specific devise of that estate. So reading the will—and in the absence of proof, that the testator owned or claimed any other real estate, at or after the date of the will—its true construction is, that the heir described is the party who at the testator's death intestate, would be capable of inheriting the real estate referred to in the will. The Harrisons alone, were so capable of inheriting that real estate, and, as the heir described, are alone entitled to the personal estate.

The fact that the testator was out of possession of his real estate at the date of his will and afterwards, has no bearing upon the case; inasmuch as the term "heir" is used in the will merely to describe the legatee of the personal estate, and that description is rendered just as certain by a reference to the course of descent of an estate of which the testator was out of possession, as it would have been by a reference to the course of descent of an estate of which the testator was in possession. Neither the state of the possession of that real estate, nor the condition of its title, at or after the date of the will, affect in any way the description of the heir of that estate, contained in the will; and as the condition of that real estate, in so far as regards the acts of the testator himself, was the same at his death as at the date of the will, there is no ground for any inference that the kind of heir to which the description pointed, at the date of the will (to wit, the party upon whom the law at the testator's death, intestate, would cast the inheritance of that land, as his heir,) at the date of the death no longer answered that description. In a word: By the devise of his real estate to his heir, the testator at his death described the heir of his estate, and did not describe a party who by no possibility could ever inherit that estate. This is the strict legal construction of the will, and all the extrinsic facts having a legal bearing upon the subject, strengthen that construction: it being clear that it was the testator's idea that the heir of his confiscated real estate, as heir, had rights to that estate which he "could not lose;" and as the restitution of those rights was the absorbing object of the testator's life, at and after the date of the will, the bequest of the personal estate to that heir, would under such circumstances, be a disposition much more in accordance with the testator's views, than would a bequest of it to a party who never could be such heir.

These positions we fortify by authorities.

1st. By blending the personal estate with the real, the testator devised and bequeathed both to the heir of the real estate. In Gwynne v. Muddock, 14 Ves. 488, a testator gives "all my real and personal estate" to A. W. for life, "and my nighest heir-at-law to enjoy the same after her death." Upon the death of A. W., the next of kin of the testator claimed the personal estate, on the ground that the description "heir-at-law" must be considered with reference to the nature of the property; and therefore applied to personal estate, must mean the next of kin; according to the opinion expressed by Sir R. P. Arden, master of the rolls, (though not a decision) in Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. 399. The master of the roll (Sir Wm. Grant,) after taking time to consider the case, gave his decision as follows: "I have not found any case directly applicable: but there is no doubt the heir-at-law, properly and technically speaking, may take personal property bequeathed to him by that description. It is always a question of intention what the testator means by the use of such a description. Where two descriptions of property are given together in one mass, then the difficulty arises, who is meant; for both the next of kin and the heir cannot take; unless this construction can be made reddendo singula singulis, that the next of kin shall take the personal estate; and the heir-at-law the real estate. But in this case the testator could not mean that; for he blends all the real and personal estate together; and after the death of Ann Williams, directs that his nighest heir-at-law shall enjoy the same. As both are to be enjoyed together, it is absolutely necessary for the court to say who shall enjoy both. It would be contrary to the intention to divide them; and it would be contrary to the words to give the whole to the next of kin. Therefore, the court has no alternative, but to adhere to the words of the will, and permit the person who answers the description of heir-at-law, to enjoy the whole." The decree accordingly declared the heirs-at-law were entitled to the capital, and the accumulation since the death of the tenant for life, Ann Williams.

In Mounsey v. Blamire, 4 Russ. 384, the language was, "to my heir £4000," and three co-heiresses of the testator were held to be entitled, Sir J. Leach, master of rolls, observing, "where the word is used not to denote succession, but to describe a legatee, and there is no context to explain it otherwise, there it seems to me to be a substitution of conjecture in the place of clear expression, if I am to depart from the natural and ordinary sense of the word heir." And see Davies v. Lowndes, 4 Bing. N. C. 478.

2nd. In order to ascertain the heir described, it is necessary to know what real estate the testator referred to in his will, and extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove that fact. It is an elementary rule, that extrinsic evidence is always admissible "in order to ascertain what is comprehended in the terms of a given description, referring to an extrinsic fact." 1 Jarm. Wills, 367, 370, and cases. It will be contended, that the terms of description here used ("my estate real,") are only applicable to real estate of which the testator was actually seised, or to which he had an indefeasible title; and that although evidence to identify such real estate may be admissible, yet no evidence can be received to show that the words used refer to real estate of which the testator had been disseised, or his title divested, but of which he still asserted himself the rightful owner. Now it is well settled in Pennsylvania, that land of which a testator is disseised at the date of the will, is still devisable. "Of the right of a testator to devise land of which he has been disseised," (Humes v. McFarlane, 4 Serg. & R. 435,) says Chief Justice Tilghman, in a Pennsylvania case, "I think there can be no question. The tenures attached to the feudal system never having prevailed in Pennsylvania, we have paid no regard to that principle of the English law, which requires seisin in order to authorize the alienation of land by deed or will. Our statute of wills, made in 1705, enacts that "all wills in writing whereby any lands, tenements, or hereditaments within this province have been, or shall be devised, being proved by two or more credible witnesses, &c., &c., shall be good and available in law for the granting, conveying, and assuring of the lands or tenements thereby given or devised." In another case, (Stoever v. Whitman, 6 Bin. 416,) it was made a question whether one out of possession could convey land by deed, and decided in the affirmative. The following is an extract of the opinion delivered by the court. "When deeds and devises of land have been considered by our courts, it has never been made a question whether the grantor or devisor was in or out of possession; and to make it now would be to disturb what has been looked upon as settled." In the case first cited, (Humes v. McFarlane,) the testator had devised in these words. "I also give and bequeath to my sons John and Alexander, all that my messuage or tenement wherein I now live," &c. It appeared that the tract on which the testator lived had originally contained 200 acres, but that he had been dispossessed of part of it, containing 44 acres, under a recovery in ejectment by an adverse claimant, four years before the date of the will. The point was made, whether the testator's title to these 44 acres passed under the devise—and the court said, "The testator having devised 'all that messuage and tenement wherein he lived,' if the 44 acres now in dispute were at that time separated from the plantation on which he lived, and he did not keep up his claim, they would not pass by the will; but if he did keep up his claim they might pass. It was a question of intention, involving a fact on which the jury might decide. Whether an estate passes, is matter of law, but where that estate lies, or what is the extent of it, is fact." But again: The objection to the admissibility of this evidence rests wholly upon the assumption that the word "my," when used as a term of reference or description, is always to be construed in its strict and primary sense.

The answer to it is in the following extract from Mr. Wigram's Treatise on the Interpretation of Wills, (page 42:) "Proposition III. Where there is nothing in the context of a will, from which it is apparent that a testator has used the words in which he has expressed himself in any other than their strict and primary sense, but his words, so interpreted, are insensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances, a court of law may look at the extrinsic evidence of the case, to see whether the meaning of the words be sensible in any popular or secondary sense, of which, with reference to these circumstances, they are capable." This proposition is proved by the cases incidentally referred to in considering the second proposition. The most striking examples, perhaps, are those in which a popular or secondary interpretation has been put on the words child, son, my estate, and other similar cases. Thus the word child, though in strict construction it means a legitimate offspring, may be applied to an illegitimate offspring where the circumstances of the case make it impossible that the testator (who must have had some meaning) used it in such a strict and primary sense. Wilkinson v. Adam, 1 Ves. & B. 422; Woodhouselee v. Dalrymple, 2 Mer. 419; Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, 1 Mad. 430; Bayley v. Snelham, 1 Sim. & S. 78. So, son means an immediate descendant; where however, with reference to extrinsic facts, it is impossible that the word can have been used in such its proper sense, that construction of the word is of absolute necessity excluded; and the necessary inference that the testator used the word in some improper or inaccurate sense, lets in the inquiry in what sense the testator used it. Steede v. Berrier, 1 Freem. 292, 477; 8 Vin. Abr. p. 310, pl. 9. So, property subject to a power, is not, strictly speaking, his by whom the power is to be exercised. Now, suppose a testator having no real estate at the time of making his will, but having a power over the real estate of another, to devise his real estate over to A. Every devise of real estate being specific, the facts of such a case would exclude the presumption that the testator had used the word his in its proper sense, and would let in the secondary and only other interpretation of which the word under the circumstances is capable. Lewis v. Lewellyn, 1 Turn. & R. 104; Napier v. Napier, 1 Sim. 28; Sugd. Powers, c. 5, § 56, note.

3rd. The evidence shows that the real estate referred to in the will, was the testator's paternal estate. That real estate then, being that referred to in the will, it follows that we are to read the will as containing a specific devise of that real estate.

4th. Thus reading the will, and in the absence of proof, that the testator owned or claimed any other real estate at or after the date of the will, its true construction is, that the heir described is the party who, at the testator's death intestate, would be capable of inheriting the real estate referred to in the will. As a general rule, in every limitation of an estate of inheritance by a grantor or devisor to his own right heirs, heir-at-law, or lawful heir, the law construes those terms with reference to the descendible quality of the estate limited, and considers them as designating the heirs of the estate limited, in contradistinction to the heir general. Thus in limitations by deed by an heir ex parte materna, where the ultimate remainder is to the "right heirs" of the settlor, the term is construed to mean heirs ex parte materna. In an English case, Godbold v. Freestone, 3 Lev. 406, "A man seised of lands by descent ex parte materna, makes a feoffment of them to uses, viz., of Blackacre to the use of himself for life, the remainder to his wife for her life, the remainder to the heirs of his body on his wife begotten, the remainder to his right heirs. And of Whiteacre, to the use of himself for 99 years, if he so long lived, the remainder to trustees for his life, remainder to his wife for her life, remainder to his first, and so to his tenth son in tail, remainder to him and his heirs; the husband and wife are both dead without issue; and if the heirs ex parte paterna or ex parte materna should have the lands, was the question." Held that the remainder descended to the heirs of the feoffor ex parte materna, because the ancient fee remained in him. "'Tis all one, be the use expressed or not; the word heirs shall be heirs of the same quality as before." In another English case, (Abbot v. Burton, 11 Mod. 181; 2 Cruise, Dig. 402,) A. being seised in right of his wife of lands which she had by descent on the part of her mother, the husband and wife by deed covenanted to levy a fine, which was thereby declared should be to the use of the conusees and their heirs, to make them tenants to the praecipe, in order to suffer a common recovery; and afterwards such recovery was had accordingly; which, by the same deed, was declared should be to the use of the said A. for his life, and to his said wife for her life, and then to the first and every other son of their two bodies in tail male, remainder to the right heirs of the wife. A. and his wife died without issue; and the question was, whether the lands should descend to the heir of the wife on the part of the mother, or to her heir on the part of the father. Judgment was given in favour of the heir on the part of the mother. In a third English case, (Hutcheson v. Hammond, 3 Brown, Ch. 128,) F. W. having an estate by descent ex parte materna, on her marriage conveyed the same to trustees to such uses as she should by deed or will appoint: and in default of such appointment "to the only proper use of the right heirs of the said F. W., forever." By will, F. W. directed the estate to be sold, and inter alia, a legacy of £1000 to G. P., to be paid out of the proceeds. This legacy having lapsed by the death of G. P. during the life of the testatrix, it was held that it resulted as land unsold, and should go to the heir ex parte materna—per Buller, J. "The next question is, who is the heir-at-law entitled to take, the heir ex parte paterna, or ex parte materna. It is admitted the estate came to Frances Weeks, by descent from her mother; and the question is, whether the settlement upon her marriage, by giving the ultimate remainder to her right heirs, gave them a new estate as purchasers, or the old uses remain. I think it was the old use." On a rehearing before Lord Thurlow, he "gave a clear and decisive opinion against the claim of the heir ex parte paterna to the £1000." And see Harris v. Bishop of Lincoln, 2 P. Wms. 135; Watk. Des. p. 174.

That in a devise to the testator's own "heir-at-law," or "lawful heir," the heir described is the party who, but for the will, would have taken by descent the land devised, is one of the main points decided in the great case of Davies v. Lowndes, 4 Bing. N. C. 478, a case very similar to this. The testator, Selby, devised thus: "Next I give and devise to my right and lawful heir at law all my manors, &c., to hold the aforesaid manors to my heir-at-law," chargeable with certain legacies, to be paid by his said "heir-at-law," within twelve months after his decease. "But should it so happen that no heir-at-law is found, I then do hereby constitute and appoint William Lowndes, Esq., my lawful heir, on condition he change his name to Selby. And I give the estates and all the manors beforementioned, &c., to the said William Lowndes"—chargeable with the legacies. A part of the real estate thus devised had been purchased by the testator; part by his father, and part by his paternal grandfather.

It was held by the judges in the exchequer chamber, that the term right and lawful heir-at-law meant, "not any one who should be heir-at-law, but such heir-at-law as but for the will would have inherited the whole of the testator's property, whether purchased by himself, his father, or grandfather, and that no one can claim under the devise, who has not this qualification." Lord Mansfield in 1780, Lord Loughborough in 1782, and C. J. Tindal in 1835, had all taken this view of the subject, but had all gone one step further. Relying upon some expressions in the context of the will, they all expressed the opinion that the heir described must not only be able to take by descent all the property devised, but that he must also be of the blood of the Selbys. The point did not arise, and was not decided, in either of the cases before Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough. But it did arise, and was decided in the case tried before C. J. Tindal. That part of his decision (that the heir must be of the blood of the Selbys) was reversed in the exchequer chamber. But the doctrine, that the heir described must be capable of taking by descent all the property devised, was admitted by the distinguished counsel for the defendant (Sir W. Follett), and most strongly affirmed by the court. "The judgments of Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough, on the same will," says Sir W. Follett, "were relied on by the court below; but those judgments were given in cases in which neither of the claimants could be heir to the whole property. The reasoning of those judges only goes to show what is now admitted, that the heir whom the testator intended, was an heir who could take the whole; that he might be of the blood of the Selbys, but not that he must." "The cases of Doe v. Lowndes, [1 Bing. N. C. 620, 622,] in K. B. and C. P. (says Baron Parke, in delivering the opinion of the court), in the time of Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough, were naturally pressed on us in the argument. We entirely concur in the decisions then pronounced, and in the general reasoning on which they proceeded; but it was unnecessary there to decide the point now presented for judgment. The lessors of the plaintiff, in neither case satisfied the necessary requisites of the devise. They could not have inherited all the property. Upon a careful perusal of the language used by those distinguished judges, it will appear that the capability of taking all the property as heir was the leading principle on which they proceeded; and any expressions importing beyond this, that the heir must be of the Selby blood, were either used somewhat loosely, as being of equivalent import, or certainly they were extrajudicial." To apply this case to the one now under consideration. Suppose the whole estate devised by Mr. Selby had been derived by descent ex parte materna—and the plaintiff had been his heir general—but not of the blood of testator's mother, and therefore not capable of taking by inheritance the land devised? According to this decision, he would not have been the heir described—because the term right and lawful heir-at-law meant, "not any one who should be heir-at-law, but such heir-at-law as, but for the will, would have inherited the whole of the property" devised. "No one can claim under the devise who has not this qualification." This case therefore fully establishes the position, that when a testator devises his real estate to his right and lawful heir-at-law, the heir described must be able to take by descent the land devised—he must be of the blood of the purchasing ancestor—and otherwise will not take, even although he be heir general. There, the heir general would have taken by descent the lands which the testator had purchased; but inasmuch as he could not take by descent the other lands—as he could not make himself heir to the two other purchasers, testator's father and grandfather—he was excluded from the one estate which he could have inherited. So that instead of his character of heir general enabling him to take as a purchaser lands which he could not take by descent the mere possibility that there might be an heir who could take all three estates by descent, was sufficient to prevent his taking what he otherwise would have been entitled to by descent.

It is an elementary rule that "an heir-at-law is not to be disinherited without an express devise, or necessary implication." Yet by the construction contended for, the doubt, if there could be one, as to which of the senses the term heir is used in this will—heir general, or heir of the land devised—would be resolved so as to disinherit the heir. Apart from authority, the reason of the thing is wholly opposed to the construction claimed for the heir general. By such a construction, the testator is presumed, when in the act of devising his inheritance to his heir, not only to have no reference to the rules regulating the descent of the inheritance devised, but he is presumed to refer to the very opposite,—to the rules regulating the descent of some other inheritance, which he has not and does not devise. He gives his land to his heir; but by the construction contended for, the heir of that land shall not take it: he shall be excluded, in order that the heir general, who by law can by no possibility take the land devised, by inheritance, shall yet take it as heir!

5th. This exclusion of those not of the blood of the purchasing ancestor, has ever been a governing principle in the legislation of Pennsylvania. In the language of Mr. Justice Duncan, (Bevan v. Taylor, 7 Serg. & R. 400,) "it was the manifest and declared intention of the legislature to preserve the line of descent in the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came, for ever and for ever." "To me it is clear intention written in capital letters in the act of 1794, and the explanatory act of 1797, that all who are not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came, are excluded from the inheritance; however remote in degree the descent may be, the lines in which the estate came, are preserved ad infinitum, and the blood of the ancestor runs through every clause of these acts." "In this and other parts of the act" says Yeates, J., (Shippen v. Izard, 1 Serg. & R. 226,) referring to the 7th section of the act of 1794, "sedulous attention is shown that the property shall not go out of the line of the father or mother who acquired it respectively."

6th. It now only remains to consider whether the fact that the testator was out of possession of his real estate, or that his title to it was defective, at, or after, the date of the will, has any bearing upon the construction which the law would otherwise give to the description of the legatee of the personal estate contained in this will. Neither of these facts has any bearing upon its construction. In every bequest of personal estate to the testator's "heir," the word heir is necessarily a mere term of description. Whatever may be the kind of heir described, whether heir general, or heir of particular lands, the legatee cannot take personalty as heir, for "a man by the common law cannot be heir to goods or chattels, for haeres dicitur ab haereditate." The question then arises, whether, when a legatee of personal estate is described in the will by terms which point either to the heir general, or to the heir of particular lands, as the case may be, it is of the essence of such description that the party referred to should actually inherit from the ancestor that real estate, his capacity for inheriting which, in ordinary parlance, constitutes him its heir? Now it is not true, either in legal or popular parlance, that there can be no heir when there is nothing to be inherited. A man's children and other kindred may be described or designated as heirs, whether they take anything from their ancestor or not. The principle upon which this rests is, that where the term heir is used to describe a legatee of personalty, the description is by reference, expressed or implied, to the course of descent, of some real estate, and not to its actual descent. Actual descent of the real estate so referred to, is not a condition implied in such description. The description is just as certain, and identifies the party referred to just as well, whether there is an actual descent or not.

Now if this be true where the terms of the description point to the heir general, upon what principle is it, that it is not true where the description points to the heir of particular lands?

The descriptions in both cases rest upon the same foundation. They in both cases refer to the course of a descent, not to an actual descent. In both cases the description remains the same, whether an actual descent takes place or not. If a testator should devise purchased lands and his personal estate to his heir, and before the date of the will, should have been, or afterwards should be, divested by legal process both of the title and the possession of those lands, the heir of those lands would still take the personal estate, because he still answered the description. He is still the party referred to, although he has not actually inherited, either as regards possession or valid title, the real estate of which, had the testator died seised, he would have been the actual heir. So, if instead of being purchased lands, they had been derived by descent ex parte materna. The description points as certainly to the maternal heir in the one case, as to the heir general in the other. It is clear, therefore, that the law does not make the actual descent of the real estate which the testator has devised to his heir, a condition precedent, which must happen in order to enable such heir to take personal estate bequeathed to him by the description of heir of the real estate devised. It is admitted, however, that the testator may, if he chooses, make such actual descent of the essence of the description of the heir to whom he refers, and it now remains to consider whether he has done so in this case. And first it is to be observed, that if he has done so, then no one can under this will take the personal estate in controversy, because the actual descent has not occurred. The testator has, in such event, described a kind of heir who never had any existence, and who never could have any existence, unless the testator died seised of the land devised. It is next to be remarked, that the description in this will, is given with express reference to the course of descent of an estate of which the testator was then disseised. When, therefore, the testator directs that the course of descent of his estate, of which he is then disseised, shall designate his heir, is it not a most strained inference to presume that he intends that description shall be operative only in the event of his dying seised of that estate? His description had a meaning when it was given. That meaning was intended to have an operation the moment after the will was executed, if the testator had died at such moment; yet by the construction contended for, the testator is declared to have expressed a meaning which he knew was utterly insensible at the time he stated it—to have given a description of a legatee which he knew could have no operation if he died the next day, and which, although he retained it to the day of his death, he must all the while have known to be still inoperative?

To avoid the conclusions which thus result, the line of argument will have to be changed, and the position taken that this description must be construed as having been at the outset contingent. That it was intended to apply to the heir of the land devised, provided the testator recovered and died seised of that land, or at least, maintained a good title to it; but that otherwise, it was intended to apply to the heir general. This proposition is not only unsupported by anything appearing on the face of the will, but is essentially opposed to the whole frame of it. Nothing can be more absolute and unconditional than the terms the testator has used. "My estate real and personal to my heir," twice repeated. The very basis of the whole devise, is an unqualified assertion of ownership of the real estate referred to. This assertion is made with full knowledge of the fact that that estate has been for ten years seized and confiscated—and it is made in distinct and utter disregard of that fact. The estate, he asserts, is still his. He will make it his for the purposes of his will. It is his estate, and all contingencies aside, it shall go to his heir—and not only so, but that heir shall have his personal estate. If the testator had been seised of the estate at the date of the will, and was afterwards disseised, there would have been even more foundation for the idea that the description was contingent, on the event of his dying so seised, than there is now. The very fact of his devising as he has done, the estate which had been torn away from him, is the fact of all others which shows the strength of his intention to make his assertion of his ownership to that estate, for all the purposes of his will, and free from all contingencies, equivalent to actual ownership. It is wholly immaterial therefore, what was the condition of the title of the testator, to the real estate devised, either at the date of the will, or at his death. All, perhaps, that is necessary to be known upon that subject is, that he never aliened it. He continued pertinaciously to claim it till the day of his death, and entertained the hope that his heirs, if not himself would some day regain it. But if it were not so the result would be the same. The testator's description remains unchanged: the law repeats it for him in articulo mortis: and its effect, at his death, in identifying the heir of his land, is precisely that which it was originally framed to accomplish.

Finally: The situation of the testator before, at, and after the date of the will, with reference to the real estate devised, shows that his actual intention in this will was to make the party who at his death would be the heir of his paternal real estate, the legatee of his personal estate. The evidence upon the question of domicil given in the case of White v. Brown, [Case No. 17,538,] exhibits the whole story of the testator's life, as told by himself, with a minuteness of detail seldom met with. In his estimation the greatest event of his life was the wrong he had suffered by the confiscation of his real estate. He always entertained the most firm conviction of the absolute illegality as well as gross injustice of that confiscation; and he appears to have been impressed with the idea that the heir of that estate had rights to that real estate which he "could not lose." Under such circumstances this will was made; and it is probably to some such notion as to the superior right, or chance of success, that the heir of his real estate might have to its recovery, coupled with his own determination to leave no means in his power unused, to enable that heir to enforce his rights to that estate, that the present will owes its existence. It is clear from the whole frame of it, that the testator personally cared not who was to enjoy his large personal estate; otherwise he never would have designated his legatee by a description which, under every possible construction of it, left the particular individuals who were to take under it, of necessity a matter of uncertainty until the day of his death. He cared not even as to the class of persons to which that description would apply at his death; for that class was changed by the intestate act of 1794, and yet he made no change in his will in consequence of it. What he did care for was, that the party who would be the lawful heir of his real estate—that confiscated estate which was still his—should have the means to enforce those rights to it which as heir "he could not lose"—that such heir after the testator's death should be enabled to carry out the one absorbing idea of the testator's life. This was his intention at the date of the will; and as the foundation of it—the sense of the injustice he had suffered by the confiscation—became stronger by lapse of time —there is every reason to believe that such intention remained in full force at his death. There is every probability, therefore, that from first to last the testator actually intended to describe the kind of heir which the law says he has described; that his intention and his words both point in the same direction. Both are satisfied by the construction which gives his personal estate to the heir of his land—both are violated by that which gives it to a party who is not, and never could be, such heir.

In reply. I. The repeal of the 11th section of the act of 1794. There is nothing in the section of the new act contrary, either in terms or in spirit, to what is provided in the omitted clause of the old act. The new act declares itself to be supplemental to the old act, and remedial of defects in it; and where it means to repeal a section, it repeals it expressly. In the well-argued and well-considered Pennsylvania case of Bevan v. Taylor, 7 Serg. & R. 403, the court held the two acts as forming "a scheme of descents" in Pennsylvania; and a declaration in the 7th section and the 11th section of the last act, I incorporate, said the judge who gave the opinion of the court, into the whole system; for different statutes made at different times, are to be explanatory of and construed into each other; as in the construction of the statute of distributions 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 14; and St. 1 Jac. II. c. 16.

II. Supposing the 11th section unrepealed, what is meant in the will by "heir-at-law?" It means heir by statute law. The question of domicil is unimportant, as the testator had the laws of Pennsylvania in view, when using the terms "heir-at-law," and "lawful heir." For the real estate referred to in the will—if any is referred to anywhere—is situate in Pennsylvania; since, at and after the date of the will, the testator neither owned nor claimed any other, and always did claim that. By his devise of that real estate to his heir-at-law, the testator necessarily referred to the law which, at his death intestate, would regulate the descent of that real estate; and the only law which could so regulate that descent, was the law of Pennsylvania, where the estate was situate. By blending the personal estate with the devise of the real, he designed it also to go to the heir of that real estate; and therefore in the bequest of the personal estate, the testator referred expressly to the law of Pennsylvania, which, at his death intestate, would designate the heir of his real estate, as designating also the legatee of his personal estate. In this case, therefore, while the testator's domicil, at and after the date of the will, was in Pennsylvania, we are yet relieved from the necessity of relying exclusively upon that position, by the facts that the will was made in Pennsylvania,—by a native of Pennsylvania,—devising real estate in Pennsylvania and not elsewhere,—and bequeathing personal estate to the heir of that real estate; that the will was executed so as to pass only real estate in Pennsylvania, with Pennsylvania executors, one of whom was to be the president, at "the time being," of the testator's death, of a bank in Pennsylvania; and that the will, from its date to the testator's death, was deposited in Pennsylvania; all of which circumstances render it manifest that whatever might be the testator's domicil, at or after the date of the will, he yet had in his view, when he made the will, only the laws of Pennsylvania.

The words "heir-at-law," as used in this will, are not in Pennsylvania a technical expression, meaning "heir at common law." No authority has been cited which in any degree sustains the position that the words in question ever had in Pennsylvania, when used as in this will, the technical signification claimed for them. If there is any word in the language of the law, whose precise meaning should be considered as fixed, it is the term "heir;" and just in proportion to the precision heretofore attached to its signification should be the strength of the authority adduced to show that the signification has changed. A brief examination of the references cited on the other side, will show that that position cannot be sustained. The point they have to prove is, that in a naked devise to a testator's own "heir-at-law," those words, in Pennsylvania, mean "heir at common law." The proof they adduce is, That from the date of this will, until after the testator's death, the canons of descent, established by the common law of England, were adopted in Pennsylvania, in all cases where they were not abrogated by statute, so that in such cases there was an heir, who was "heir at common law." That this heir at common law was sometimes, in the language of legislators, judges, and lawyers, termed "heir-at-law, and that, therefore, those words when used nakedly in a will, must mean "heir at common law."

1st. Let us examine the language of the legislation cited. The words of the act of 1705 relied on, are as follows: "But if the intestate leaves a widow and no child, then such widow or relict shall inherit one moiety or half part of the said lands and tenements, and the other moiety shall descend and come to the intestate's next heir according to the course of the common law. But if the intestate leaves no widow nor child living at the time of his death, or if the children all die in their minority, without issue, then the said lands and tenements shall descend and come to the intestate's heir-at-law, according to the course aforesaid." It will be perceived that the language of this act, instead of supporting the position in question, is directly opposed to it. Instead of deeming the phrase "heir-at-law" sufficiently precise to designate the heir at common law, the legislature first describe him by the words "next heir, according to the course of the common law," and afterwards when they do use the words "heir-at-law," carefully subjoin the words "according to the course aforesaid." The words of the supplemental act of 1764, also cited, are as follows: "But where the wife is living, and the whole premises shall be adjudged and ordered to the heir at law or any other of the children, the wife of the person so deceased shall not be entitled to the sum at which the purpart or share of her estate, so as aforesaid ordered to her heir at law or any of the children, shall be valued, but the same, together with the interest thereof, shall be and remain charged upon the premises, and the interest thereof shall be regularly and annually paid by the heir at law or such other child to whom the same shall be adjudged," &c. "And at the decease of the said mother the said principal sum, so as aforesaid valued and adjudged shall be paid by the said heir at law or other child aforesaid, to whom the same shall be adjudged," &c. In this act, the words "heir-at-law" are throughout used as synonymous with eldest son. They do not refer to the heir at common law, taking as such heir, but are loosely and inaccurately used to distinguish the eldest son from his brothers and sisters. [Walton v. Willis,] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 265, 353. If such inaccurate phraseology proved anything in relation to the meaning of the words "heir-at-law," considered as a technical term, it would prove that they meant eldest son, and nothing else. A nephew of the intestate, although he might be heir at common law, does not come under the description of "heir-at-law," as the words are used in this act. They are, therefore, clearly not synonymous with "heir at common law."'

2. The language of judicial opinions is next to be considered. In Johnson v. Haines' Lessee, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 65, the question was, whether a particular case of intestacy was a casus omissus in the intestate laws of Pennsylvania. The reporter, and Chief Justice M'Kean, when speaking of the plaintiff, use the terms "heir-at-law," and "heir at common law," indiscriminately. It is to be remarked, however, that in every instance where the term "heir-at-law" is used in this case, the context shows clearly that the heir at common law is referred to; whence it is evident that the term "heir-at-law" is used merely as an abbreviation of the term "heir at common law," where, from the context, there is no possibility of mistaking the meaning of the term. In Walton v. Willis, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 353, Chief Justice M'Kean, when speaking of the intestate acts then in force, says, "The main intent of these acts appears to have been, that real estates should be divided among the children, or representatives in the descending line of an intestate; and not descend to the heir at common law:" thus describing such heir in terms which are unmistakable. So, in an anonymous case, decided in 1774, reported in 3 Smith's Laws, 160, [note.] "Question, whether his heirs at common law shall take, or it shall divide among his other brothers and sisters under the supplemental intestate law?" Opposed to the casual expressions, loosely used and always in association with such precise language as prevents their misinterpretation, is Ruston v. Ruston, 2 Yeates, 54, an authority in point to show that the term "heir-at-law," has no such technical signification attached to it, as is here contended for. A question in that case was, whether a proviso, in a devise of land (by a will dated in 1784) to the eldest son, directing the payment of a sum of money, was a condition. M'Kean, C. J., said, "The defendant could not be considered in this case as heir-at-law in Pennsylvania, where, if at that time a person had died intestate, leaving divers children, his real estate would have descended to all his children equally, the eldest son having only a double portion or share, and therefore the devise may even be considered as a condition." Yeates, J., "But it is objected that the proviso in the will does not form such a condition as will warrant an entry on its breach, the defendant being the eldest son and heir-at-law under English ideas." And Smith, J., "When an ancestor leaves more children than one, the term 'heir-at-law' conveys no idea with us; they are all his co-heirs. All are equally entitled, if he dies intestate." See, also, French v. McIlhenny, 2 Bin. 20; Crosby v. Davis, 4 Pa. Law J. 193.

If the term "heir-at-law" had the technical meaning claimed, in 1791, it has it at this day. The intestate act of 1833 in no way affects the meaning of the words "heir-at-law," as used in a will. It merely excludes the heir at common law in cases of intestacy, where there are nearer of kin. No one will contend, that if a testator in Pennsylvania were now to devise his real estate to his "next heir according to the course of the common law of England," the devise would fail because of the exclusion of such heir in a case of intestacy by the act of 1833. The devisee would still take, under the description given by reference to an ascertained course of descent; and if the heir at common law, as the party described, would take under such description, so also would he take under any other description which identified him equally well. By the argument submitted on behalf of the Aspdens, in this case, the term "heir-at-law" is such a description. It means "heir at common law," in a will in 1852, just as much as it did in 1791. Yet will any one contend that if a testator in Pennsylvania should, at this day, devise all his estate, real and personal, to his "heir-at-law," and should die leaving many children, the eldest son alone would take, to the exclusion of his brothers and sisters? The argument, to be worth anything, must go to that extent. It must go to the extent of saying, that if the testator, Matthias Aspden, had, after the date of this will, married and had numerous children, and had then republished this will, his eldest son alone, as "heir-at-law," that is, it is said, "heir according to the course of the common law," would have taken everything, and his brothers and sisters nothing; and that such a will made at this day, would have a similar operation. It is said, however, that the words here used must be construed to mean heir at common law, because "the testator did not intend his estate to be divided: it was to go to one person, hence he uses the singular number." To this, the answer is conclusive, that it is perfectly well settled, the term heir is "nomen collectivum." Gwynne v. Muddock, 14 Ves. 488; Mounsey v. Blamire, 4 Russ. 384; George v. Morgan, 4 Harris, [16 Pa. St.] 108. In this case, if the party claiming as heir at common law, John Aspden, had died before the testator, leaving daughters only: no one will say that the daughters, however numerous they might be, would not collectively be the heir at common law. Co-parceners are but one heir, "They be but one heir, and yet several persons." Again, no person can take under this will unless he is clothed with the character of heir-at-law; and if he takes in that character, he must take in that quality, as the heir of the testator, by lawful descent to his real estate, as the person whom he has designated as the heir to whom his whole estate shall go as one entire fund. The rules of law put it out of the power of a testator to make his own right heir, or his heir-at-law, a word of purchase to break the course of descent; not because he may not do it by words denoting such intention, but because such intention cannot be legally inferred from the mere use of the term. Yet by the doctrine contended for, the heir at common law shall take as a purchaser, under the description of "heir-at-law," although he is unable to take by descent. He takes by force of the "technical expression," alleged to designate him; and as "heir-at-law" is to take away the inheritance devised, from the only party who by the law of the land is capable of taking that inheritance as heir.

An isolated extract from the opinion of the court in the Pennsylvania case of George v. Morgan, [supra,] has been cited as authority for the general proposition that "in Pennsylvania a testator is to be considered as speaking in reference to the common law system of descents." But the extract in connection with its context, shows that the expression used has no such unlimited application as appears to be attributed to it. In that case, the testator, in 1744, devised an estate to his son Mordecai, "to hold to him for and during his natural life, and after his decease to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and to their heirs forever, and in default of such issue then to the heirs of my son Samuel and their heirs forever," and the question was whether Mordecai took an estate tail under the rule in Shelley's case. The passage in the opinion of Bell, J. above referred to, is as follows: "But it is urged upon us that as, in England, an intention to change the line of descent is sufficiently manifested wherever the superadded words import eventual distribution of the estate among several, as if it be limited over as a tenancy in common, or to be divided equally among all the heirs of the first taker,—in Pennsylvania since the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, such a devise as we have here must be taken as changing the descent; the superadded words and 'to their heirs forever,' necessarily importing not the heir in tail, who is generally the right heir in England, but all the lineal descendants of the praepositus, who take as parceners with us under the general title of heir. I confess, I was much struck with the view when it was first presented, and very much inclined to adopt it as consistent with reason. But further reflection has satisfied us that it is inadmissible. In the first place, it frequently happens that, even in England, the right heirs of a devisor may be of persons entirely different from him who would alone take as heir in tail, and yet it has always been there held as essential, that to withdraw the devise from the power of the rule, distribution must be expressly contemplated, and shown to be so by some precise direction. Secondly, though in Findlay v. Riddle, 3 Binn. 139, Yeates, J., seemed much inclined to adopt the idea that, with us, a limitation to heirs general always imports distribution, and is therefore repugnant to the rule in Shelley's case, it was not received in our subsequent cases, though expressly urged upon the attention of the court, where full scope was afforded for its operation, had it been thought tenable. In the last case of Hileman v. Bouslaugh, [13 Pa. St. 344,] the reasoning of the chief justice is in direct repudiation of it. All this is conclusive that, in this state, a testator is to be regarded as speaking in reference to the common law system of descent."

Thus far the case has been considered as if it turned solely upon the construction of the term "heir at law." The testator however has in a subsequent clause of the will used the words "lawful heir" in a repetition of the original devise of his estate real and personal. It cannot be pretended that any one, in this commonwealth, when speaking of his "lawful heir," refers to that person who would inherit according to the law of a distant country; or that, like the phrase "heir-at-law," it has been used in any special, or professionally accurate sense, as an equivalent or abbreviation of the more correct expression, "heir at common law," or "next heir according to the course of the common law." The exact term 'lawful heir' is used in the statute of 1705, to designate that person, or those persons to whom that statute gives the estate. Speaking of escheats of real estate in default of any "known kindred," it says: But "if the lawful heir to any such lanus or tenements shall at any time appear, he shall have them," &c. This clearly means the persons to whom, on the owner's death, that statute gives them, and it entirely changed the common law canon of descent. 3 Smith's Laws, p. 158; section 13, Act 1705. In State v. Engle, 21 N. J. Law, 347, 361, 367, it is said that "the words lawful heir must be understood to mean an heir capable of inheriting the lands in question under the laws of New Jersey." In a Pennsylvania case, (Simpson v. Hall, 4 Serg. & R. 337. And see Hart v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 190,) a brother of the half blood is called 'heir.'

III. The terms "heir-at-law," and "lawful heir," as used in this will, designate the person or persons on whom the law of Pennsylvania at the testator's death, would cast the inheritance of the real estate referred to in the will, as his lawful heir, provided he had died intestate. The general rule, that in a devise to the testator's own heir, the term heir must be construed to apply to the person or persons answering the description at the testator's death, is unquestioned. In such a case the maxim "nemo est haeres viventis," emphatically applies. 2 Jarm. Wills, 28. That the view of the testator was prospective in fact, is evident, for he declares that his estate shall go to the party who would be his lawful heir in case there might be no doubt of his own legitimacy. That doubt could only arise after his death. As matter of law also, as well as of actual intention, the law of descent which is to designate the heir referred to in this will, is the law in force at the testator's death, and not in force at the date of the will. From the very nature of a devise to a testator's own heir, it is plain that every such testator must contemplate two classes of contingencies.

1. The person or persons answering the description may change, by births or deaths, from hour to hour.

2. The laws regulating the course of descent, like all other laws, are liable to change.

In regard to the first class of contingencies, it is not pretended that it is not, as matter of law, within the purview of such a testator. In this very case, the party who was the heir at common law, at the date of the will, died before the testator; yet no one doubts that the present claimant, the son of that party, at the date of the testator's death, answered the description of the testator's heir at common law, although he did not do so at the date of the will. So also, as to changes in the law of descent. A testator when devising to his own heir, ex vi termini, refers to the period of his own death, as that whereat his heir is to be ascertained. He has such period in his actual, as well as legal, contemplation, when making such devise: and as it is then, and then only, that his heir can be ascertained,—and such heir can only be ascertained by the law then in force—it follows that that law, whatever it may be, is the rule which the testator declares it his intention to adopt as part of his will.

This doctrine in no degree conflicts with the general proposition that "the intent of the testator ought always to be taken as things stood at the time of making his will, and is not to be collected from subsequent accidents which the testator could not then foresee;" for in the case of a devise to his own heir, his intention at the date of the will is prospective in its character; it actually looks at the period of his death, as that before which the law cannot operate to define his heir. It does not follow therefore, that because the law of descent changes after the date of the will, in which a testator has devised to his heir, we are to impute an actual change of intention to the testator, and presume that he actually adopts the law as changed. He has relieved us from the necessity of speculating upon such a question, by declaring in advance, that the law in force at his death, is that which is to define his heir. The changes in the law of descent, after the date of such a will, however frequent and however great, affect in no degree his legal intention. Whenever he dies, his heir will still take. The law throughout all its changes, will still carry out his intention, and give the estate to his heir.

All the cases cited on the other side, therefore, to the effect that after-purchased lands would not pass at the date of this will, and that devises to classes of individuals in existence at the date of a will, cannot be construed to apply to individuals of the class referred to, who came into existence after the date of the will,—have no application in a case where the devise is in its nature prospective, and looks to the period of the testator's death. Martindale v. Warner, 15 Pa. St. 479, cited as "authoritatively settling" the point now in question, it is submitted, has no bearing on it whatever. In that case a testator, in 1828, bequeathed certain legacies to several of his brothers, nephews and nieces, naming each of them, and died in 1849. Several of the legatees died before the testator—some before, and others after the passage of an act of May 6, 1844, hereafter mentioned—leaving issue; and the question was whether the legacies to those persons lapsed, or whether the issue of such legatees were entitled thereto, under the provisions of the act referred to. The words of the act are as follows:—"No devise or legacy, hereafter made, in favour of a brother or sister, or the children of a deceased brother or sister of any testator, such testator not leaving any lineal descendants, shall be deemed or held to lapse or become void, by reason of the decease of such devisee or legatee in the lifetime of the testator, if such devisee or legatee shall leave issue surviving the testator; but such devise or legacy shall be good and available in favour of such surviving issue, with like effect, as if such devisee or legatee had survived the testator, saving always to every testator the right to direct otherwise." It was held that this act did not operate upon the will in question, because it was obvious by the words "devise or legacy hereafter made," that no retrospective effect was intended to be given to it, and that, such being the case, "that the testator permitted his will to stand without alteration for several years, or that he may have known of the act of 1844 is nothing."

IV. The expression first paying, and the provision for the half blood, is too feeble to control any but an ambiguous expression. We have shown that the term heir-at-law, explained by the term 'lawful heir,' points plainly and fixedly to certain persons who are constantly changing, who are left perfectly uncertain till the testator's death; and are then determined easily, clearly, and unchangeably. The fact that in the course and changes of thirty or forty years these persons happen to fall within some other provision of the testator's bounty, is not enough to unsettle the legal definition of the clearest and best defined term of the law.

V. Extrinsic evidence is inadmissible to show that the testator used the words "heir-at-law," or "lawful heir," in a peculiar sense of his own, differing from their legal signification.

The law upon this subject is embodied by Mr. Wigram on Wills, (page 17,) in a general proposition laid down by him. "When there is nothing in the context of a will, from which it is apparent that a testator has used the words in which he has expressed himself in any other than their strict and primary sense, and where his words so interpreted, are sensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances, it is an inflexible rule of construction, that the words of the will shall be interpreted in their strict and primary sense, and in no other, although they may be capable of some popular or secondary interpretation, and although the most conclusive evidence of intention to use them in such popular or secondary sense, be tendered." Delmare v. Robello, 1 Ves. Jr. 412; Hampshire v. Pierce, 2 Ves. Sr. 216. In Mounsey v. Blamire, 4 Russ. 384, the testatrix gave the sum of £4000 "to her heir." Evidence was tendered to prove that the person intended by the testatrix was an individual (a stranger) whom she had promised to make her heir, and whom she used to call her heir. The heir at law claimed the legacy. The master of the rolls decreed the legacy to the heir-at-law.

VI. Argument for the maternal half blood. Supposing all the foregoing arguments to be insufficient, then the case of the heir at common law is disposed of against him. And the new question arises; the one between the half blood itself. To which side of the half blood, or how amongst them does the estate go? Does it go to the paternal side alone, or to the maternal in connexion with it? We contend that it goes to both.

1. This will, in fact and in law, is a will of personal estate alone, and not of real estate, because the testator had no real estate to devise at the time of making his will, nor had he any at any period afterwards, up to the day of his death. The case resembles those cases in which it has been held that a will of real and personal estate is revoked pro tanto, as to real estate, by its alienation subsequently to the date of the will; and becomes a will of personalty alone. Thus in a Massachusetts case, (Brown v. Thorndike, 15 Pick. 388, A. D. 1834,) the language was, "all the residue of my estate, real and personal." But the testator afterwards aliened the only real estate he had at the time of making the will: and this, on a question of probate, was held to be a revocation pro tanto, and that the will became a will of personal estate simply. Evidence extrinsic to the will was held necessarily admissible to show the alienation of the real estate whereby the will had become a will of personal estate only. After speaking of the object of the law in excluding parol testimony generally, as being to prevent the intention of the testator being defeated, Shaw, C. J., says, what is certainly true as a fact, and will explain the testator Aspden's devise of real estate, he having no estate of that sort: "It is usual, in wills as well as in other instruments, to use broad and general language large enough to embrace every species of property, although there are but few species of property in the mind of the testator or in his power to bequeath, upon the safe maxim that "omne majus continet in se minus;" as "all my estate of every name and nature;" "all my property wherever, &c." And see Very v. Very, 3 Pick. 374, and Hilliard v. Binford, 10 Ala. 977. Now, the will being one of personalty merely, the term 'heir' is to be considered in reference to its subject-matter, and means next of kin; who are in this case, it may be observed, the same persons as the heirs general. In Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. 403, where there was a bequest of money to "heirs-at-law," these heirs, at the testator's death, being there also, as in this case, the next of kin, the master of the rolls, Sir R. P. Arden, says: "This is personal property; and it is said that though 'heirs, &c.,' have a definite sense as to real estate, yet as to personal estate it must mean such person as the law points out to succeed to personal property. I am much inclined to think so. If personal property were given to a man and his heirs, it would go to his executors. I rather think if I was under the necessity of deciding this point, I must hold it heirs quoad the property; that is, next of kin. . . . Great difficulties would arise from the construction that heirs-at-law are intended, and applying it to personal property. He might have different heirs-at-law; heirs descending from himself as first purchaser; heirs ex parte paterna and ex parte materna. I am inclined to think the court would in such a case consider him as the first purchaser, so as to take in both lines. However, there is no occasion to say anything upon that." This view is supported by other cases. Vaux v. Henderson, 1 Jac. & W. 388; Gittings v. McDermott, 2 Mylne & K. 69; Evans v. Salt, 6 Beav. 266; Eddings v. Long, 10 Ala. 203.

2. But if this be not so, still real estate which did not belong to the testator at all—estate which was not his—cannot direct the course of this personalty. The words are "my real estate." Now that alone is 'mine' which is not owned by any body else. What I claim, is not necessarily mine; nor even what I believe to be mine. The argument of the Harrison counsel recalls Lord Harwicke's language, when speaking in parliament upon the bill to indemnify witnesses who should give evidence against Sir Robert Walpole, and offering a reward for evidence without assertion of any corpus delicti. 'But, says a noble lord,' replies Lord Hardwicke, sarcastically, 'if we have not here a corpus delicti, we have what is sufficient for the purpose, a corpus suspicionis; a new expression and a new invention, the body of a shadow, and on this foundation he calls upon you to build his new superstructure of injustice.' Camp. Lives Ld. Ch. p. 94. The Harrison counsel seek to change a natural and primary construction of the will, not by showing any real estate which either did or might, could, would, should, or ought to pass by the will, but by showing his unfounded and absurd belief—his delusion—that he owned, or ought to own, some such estate. Such a belief or delusion has never been regarded as real estate, except that kind known as chateaux en Espagne, by any court anywhere. "In expounding a will," says Mr. Wigram, (Wig. Wills, 8,) "the court is to ascertain not what the testator actually intended as contradistinguished from what his words mean, but what is the meaning of the words he used. And certainly in a will so simple as this, calling for no forced construction, 'my' can never be converted into 'his.'

3. All this belief, too, is sought to be proved by the testator's declarations extrinsic to the will. No doubt you may and must resort to extrinsic evidence to show whether or not the testator had or had not real estate. But, then, this is simply a fact, and this case states that it is shown by such evidence that he owned no such estate. The Harrison counsel now attempt to contradict this fact, and to prove this imaginary subject-matter by the testator's ridiculous declarations. This cannot be done. The declarations of a testator prior to or cotemporaneous with, or subsequent to the making of his will, are inadmissible, and cannot be received to prove his intention; not even the instructions given for the will. 1 Jarm. Wills, 353. Nor even an express declaration made at the time, of what his intention was, (Wig. Wills, pl. 104;) and this although no doubt may exist in the mind of the court that such was the actual intention of the testator. To the same purport are our American authorities. "The legal construction of a will in writing," say the court, in Comfort v. Mather, 2 Watts & S. 453, "cannot be explained or altered by the parol declarations of the testator, of his understanding of the meaning of the will, or of his intentions to do something else. So in Lewis v. Lewis, 2 Watts & S. 455; (and see Asay v. Hoover, 5 Pa. St. 21; Trustees v. Sturgeon, 9 Pa. St. 321; Farrar v. Ayres, 5 Pick. 404; Brown v. Saltonstall, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 423,) "where parol declarations made by the testator as to his intention of dying intestate, whether before or after the making of the will, are not admissible to show a revocation of it." The only exception to this is of declarations of the testator to prove a material fact collateral to the question of intention, where such fact would go in aid of the interpretation of the testator's words. These cases, however, will be found to be those only in which the description in the will is unambiguous to any one of several subjects. See cases cited 1 Greenl. Ev. pp. 373-376; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 560; Wig. Wills, pl. 104, p. 81; and Id. pls. 194, 195.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. This case has been learnedly, laboriously and on some points very ably argued, and we congratulate the parties and the counsel that, after twenty-two years of litigation, there is now a prospect that, in three or four years at farthest, those who are entitled to the large estate in suit, will be permitted to enjoy it, and that those who are not, will cease to indulge in vain hopes respecting it.

The first question for our decision, is whether the 11th section of the act of 1794 has been repealed by the 7th section of the act of 4th April, 1797. If so, then all other parts are unimportant. Let us inquire what are the principles laid down by the sages of the law to govern questions like the present.

1st. "An act of parliament may be repealed by the express words of a subsequent statute, or by implication."

2nd. "If a subsequent statute contrary to a former have negative words, it shall be a repeal of the former act."

3rd. "Every affirmative statute is a repeal by implication of a precedent affirmative statute, so far as it is contrary thereto; for 'leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant.'"

4th. "A later act has never been construed to repeal a former act, unless there be a contrariety or repugnance in them, or at least some notice taken of the former act, so as to indicate an intention in the law-giver to repeal it." The law does not favour a repeal by implication unless the repugnance is quite plain. Dore v. Gray, 2 Term R. 365. Also, when two acts are seemingly repugnant, yet if there be no clause of non obstante in the latter, they shall, if possible, have such construction that the latter may not be a repeal of the former by implication. [Foster's Case,] 11 Reports, [Coke,] 63.

To come to the case before us. The act of 4th April, 1797, was made, says Chief Justice Tilghman, (Cresoe v. Laidley, 2 Bin. 286,) for the express purpose of supplying the defects of the act of 19th April, 1794. The latter act purports to be a supplement to the former. The 5th section, where the cases omitted in the former act, and intended to be supplied, are commenced, has this preamble: "Whereas the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement, appear to be incomplete," &c., and proceeds in that and the following sections, to supply certain casus omissos of the act of 1794, and ends the last section in these words: "and that the second section of the act to which this is supplementary, be, and the same is hereby repealed." Now the legislature have declared, in express terms, that they repeal the 2nd section of the act of 1794 only. There is, therefore, no express repeal of the 11th section. There is no provision in the latter law, which negatives any provision of the 11th section of the former. The issue of the half-blood shall inherit, says the former, in preference to more remote kindred of the whole blood, and there is not a syllable in the last act, which is contrary to this provision of the first. There is no repugnancy between them. The latter was made to supply omissions of the former, and yet, without directly repealing the 11th section, it is contended that the 7th section of the latter act creates a casus omissus by implication, because it omitted to re-enact what already had been provided for in the 11th section of the first act.

In the case of Bevan v. Taylor, 7 Serg. & R. 403, cited at the bar, the supreme court of Pennsylvania declared that the act of 1794, and its supplement of 1797, should be construed as one act. The 11th section of the former applies only to the inheritance of real property, and the 12th section, which appears to include both real and personal, provides for the issue of brothers and sisters of whole and half-blood only by implication, or negative pregnant, and wholly omits the case where there are both. The 7th section supplies this oversight or omission; first, in case there are brothers and sisters, or their representatives, both of the whole and half-blood; and, secondly, provides for the distribution of the personalty when there were no brothers or sisters of the whole blood, but brothers and sisters of the half-blood; but, in supplying this omission, it unnecessarily included the inheritance of the realty, which had already been provided for in the 11th section of the original act; and, moreover, neglected to include the issue of the half-blood, which still remained a casus omissus as regards the personalty, by the omission of the words or "their lawful issue," in the supplement. Construing this act of 1794, with its supplement of 1797, as one act, we have, then, this case: a latter section unnecessarily repeats some of the provisions of the former section, and omits others. This omission does not, I think, amount to a repeal of what is not repeated.

II. As to the meaning of the term, in Pennsylvania, 'heir-at-law.' The language of some of our statutes, as well as that of eminent lawyers belonging to the bar and bench. do seem undoubtedly to favour the argument of John Aspden's counsel; that the term has been generally used in Pennsylvania, to designate the heir at common law. Let us however look at this matter further. By the charter granted to Mr. Penn, the laws of England "for regulating and governing of property, as well as for the enjoyment of lands and succession of goods and chattels," were introduced and established in Pennsylvania, to continue till they were altered by the legislature of the province. But the canons of descent of the common law were soon changed; and as early as 1683 it was enacted "that the estate of an intestate shall go to his wife and child or children, and if he leave no wife, child, or children, it shall go to his brothers and sisters, if any there be," &c., &c. Afterwards the act of 1705 gave the eldest son a double share. But, without attempting to give a history of the legislation on this subject, it may suffice for the present to say that, although the policy of her legislation was to distribute the estate of an intestate equally amongst the next of kin, no attempt was made to provide a complete canon of descents and distribution till 1794. This act was soon found to have many omissions, and was further amended by a supplement in 1797. In the meanwhile the courts construed these acts strictly, giving the inheritance to the heir at common law in all cases where a contrary direction was not given to it by the plain words of the statute. Johnson v. Haines' Lessee, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 64; Cresoe v. Laidley, 2 Bin. 279; Jenks' Lessee v. Backhouse, 1 Bin. 91. The common law of England, as governing cases not specially provided for by statute, was never totally abolished till the revised code of 1833 was adopted. Hence, the language and phraseology of the English courts continued to be used in the courts of Pennsylvania, sometimes, perhaps, without regard to proper distinction or absolute correctness of diction; and here, as there, the term "heir-at-law" was not unfrequently used as an abbreviation, substitute, or equivalent for the expression "heir at common law."

In section 8, of the act "For the Better Settling of Intestate's Estates," passed in 1705, (3 Smith's Laws, 156,) the heir at common law is described with accuracy as "the next heir according to the course of the common law." But in the supplement to that act, passed in 1764, (Id. 160,) and in section 4 of the principal act, the phrase "heir-at-law" is somewhat inaccurately used to distinguish the elder son from his brothers and sisters. In Johnson v. Haines' Lessee, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 65, Chief Justice M'Kean uses the expressions "heir-at-law" and "heir at common law" indiscriminately to designate the same person. In the cases of Jenks' Lessee v. Backhouse, 1 Bin. 91, and Cresoe v. Laidley, 2 Bin. 279, reported in the volumes of Mr. Binney, while the very learned and accurate reporter, in his syllabus, carefully uses the phrase "heir at common law" only, the counsel, of whom the reporter was one, and sometimes the court, have used the shorter expression "heir-at-law" as synonymous. Without venturing to assert that these and other instances to be found in our reports are evidences of careless diction, or of an inaccurate application of the language of English lawyers to the peculiar legislation of Pennsylvania, I may say, it is an usus loquendi peculiar to a class; it has not the force of authoritative definition, or of judicial decision, where the question is directly brought before the court. On the other hand, we have a case more like an adjudication of the point. In Ruston v. Ruston, 2 Yeates, 61, the question was made whether a proviso in a devise of land (by will, dated in 1784) to the eldest son, directing the payment of a sum of money, was a condition. It was argued that it could not be so, for the "heir-at-law" only can enter for the condition broken, which heir the defendant himself was. To this it was answered, that in Pennsylvania all the children are "heirs-at-law," or the "heir-at-law" of the father; and with this Chief Justice M'Kean, who delivered the opinion of the court, agreed, and said, "the defendant could not be considered, in this case, as heir-at-law in Pennsylvania, where, if, at that time, a person had died intestate, his real estate would have descended to all his children equally, the eldest son having only a double portion or share, and therefore the devise may even be considered as a condition." In this same view, in another case, (French v. McIlhenny, 2 Bin. 20,) when the two expressions come to be considered together, and therefore to be considered accurately, Chief Justice Tilghman observes, "In England the eldest son is heir; but here the law is more equitable, and the children together are considered as heirs." The persons on whom the law of Pennsylvania casts the estate of an intestate, if more than one, hold as tenants in common, or as co-parceners do in England, and in correct legal phraseology may be styled the 'lawful heir,' or the 'heir-at-law.'

But admitting that if this will had used the words "heir-at-law" alone as descriptive of the person to whom the whole estate is bequeathed, there might have been sufficient reason to doubt whether the testator had not intended thereby to describe the "heir at common law" in contradistinction to the heir-at-law by the statutes of Pennsylvania; we are, nevertheless, relieved from this uncertainty by the second description of the devisee in the will, intended to be explanatory of the first. The testator explains his meaning, by saying he intended to describe the party who would be his "lawful heir," in case he himself were legitimate. Now, it cannot be pretended that any one, either lawyer or layman, in Pennsylvania, when speaking of his "lawful heir," refers to the person who would inherit according to the law of England; or that, like the phrase "heir-at-law," it has been used in any special, peculiar, or professionally technical sense, as an equivalent or abbreviation of the more correct expression "heir at common law," or "next heir according to the course of the common law." The statute of 1705 expressly used it in the sense of any person to whom the statute itself gives the estate. How can the court be justified in construing the expression "heir-at-law" in its peculiar professional sense, according to the modus loquendi of a certain class, and not according to its legal and established definition, as the person or persons on whom the law casts the inheritance, when the testator himself has used another expression, as an equivalent or explanatory of the first, which never was used in that peculiar sense which has been carelessly given to the other, but agrees with it in its legal and established definition? Nor is this argument subject to the retort which the lord chancellor said the counsel might have on each other, in Lowndes v. Stone, 4 Ves. 649, where A. devised his "estate to his next of kin or heir-at-law." "You have a fair retort," says he, "on each other; one side may contend that 'next of kin' means 'heir-at-law;' the other that 'heir-at-law' means 'next of kin.'" In that case the testator had ignorantly used terms as equivalent or synonymous which are incapable of the same definition. Here the term used as explanatory is capable of the same definition, and relieves the doubt as to whether the first was intended to be used in a special sense, not necessarily included in its general definition.

III. From what date is the will supposed to speak? The strict and legal meaning which the court assign above to the term "heir-at-law," and the decision hereafter given on this account on the admission of parol evidence, will render obvious the reasons of our decision on this point, argued by the counsel of the heir at common law, with so much learning. The maxim "Nemo est haeres viventis," applies; and it follows, that where a testator describes his intended devisee or legatee as the person on whom the law, at his death, would cast the inheritance of his estate, his will must, ex vi termini, be construed as speaking at the death of the testator, and not at the time of its execution. 1 Jarm. Wills, 287. It will also dispose of the argument raised by the same counsel,—

IV. That the expression "first paying" controls the otherwise settled meaning of the term "heir-at-law." It does not follow, the court is of opinion, because the testator gives some legacies to certain of his half-blood relations, that he intended to exclude them if one or more of them answers at the same time this clear, exact, settled, and legal designation of his will. Let us proceed to consider a remaining considerable point, illustrative of the reasons of our decision on these two last.

V. The admission of extrinsic evidence to show in what sense the testator used the phrase "heir-at-law." The difficulty presented in this will is not one arising upon a latent ambiguity, as where a testator bequeaths his estate to his nephew, John Smith, and has two or more nephews of that name. On the contrary the testator has described a certain person, or a certain class of persons, as the objects of his bounty: the description given cannot equally apply to two or more. If the testator declares that the haeres factus of his will shall be the same as the law would designate as his haeres natus, if he had died intestate, there can be no ambiguity to be explained by parol testimony. If A. B. be the person described by the will, it would be a perversion of law to suffer parol testimony to be admitted, to prove that the testator meant C. D. The statute of frauds and perjuries would be annulled. Much of the extrinsic evidence, therefore, which by consent of the court, was conditionally taken and drawn into the discussion of this case, will have to be rejected. Conversations, related after the lapse of half a century, are seldom worthy of credit; and, even if believed, are no evidence of a testator's true intention. The declarations of a rich uncle to his numerous poor relations, may often be considered as made rather to conceal than to exhibit his real intentions. Again, suppose a testator should devise his property to such of his cousins as should be tenants of the manor of Dale, at the time of his death; and that, at the time the will was made, his cousin A. was tenant, but at the time of his death his cousin B. answered the description in the will; would the court admit evidence to show that the testator always lived, and had died under the impression that A. would be the person that would take under this devise? The will having declared the clear, paramount, and ruling intention of the testator, that a person should take, who, at the time of his death, should answer to a certain description; the fact that the testator never knew, or always laboured under a mistake, as to the person who would probably answer to that description, at the time of his death, would not affect the construction of his will.

Now the meaning of the term "heir-at-law," I consider to be settled, and that there is nothing within the four corners of this will which explains or controls that meaning, or shows any intention of the testator to use the word in any other than its technical legal import, to wit, "as the person or persons on whom the law would cast the inheritance of his real estate at his death." I consider the established principles of law, which bear upon the question, being the result of all the cases, to be clearly and correctly stated in the valuable treatise on wills, by Mr. Jarman. 2 Jarm. Wills, c. 28.

1st. Like all other legal terms, the word "heir," when unexplained and uncontrolled by the context, must be interpreted according to its strict legal import, in which sense it obviously designates the person or persons appointed by law to succeed to the real estate in case of intestacy.

2nd. It is clear, therefore, that where a testator devises real estate simply to his heir, or to his heir-at-law, or his right heirs, the devise will apply to the person or persons answering this description at the time of his death.

3rd. The circumstance, that the expression is "heir" (in the singular,) and that the heirship resides in, and is divided among several individuals as co-heirs, would create no difficulty in the application of this rule of construction; the word "heir" being in such cases used in a collective sense, as comprehending any number of persons who may happen to answer the description.

4th. It is true, that with respect to personalty, it is often doubtful whether the testator employs the term "heir" in its strict and proper acceptation, or in a more lax sense, as descriptive of the next of kin, or the person or persons appointed by law to succeed to property of this description. Where the gift to the heirs is by way of substitution, this latter construction has sometimes prevailed, an example of which occurs in the case of Vaux v. Henderson, 1 Jac. & W. 388, note, where a testator bequeathed to A. £200, "and failing him, by decease before me, to his heirs," and the legacy was held to belong to the next of kin of A., living at the death of the testator. Sir R. P. Arden, M. R., in Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. 399, was strongly disposed to give the same construction to the word "heirs" applied to personalty, though his opinion, on another question, rendered the point immaterial.

5th. But cases of this description must not be understood to warrant the general position that the word "heirs," in relation to the personal estate, imports next of kin, especially if real estate be combined with personalty in the gift; which circumstance, according to the principle laid down by Lord Eldon, in Wright v. Atkyns, 19 Ves. 299, affords a ground for giving to the word, in reference to both species of property, the construction which it would receive as to the real estate, if that were the sole object of disposition. Thus, in the case of Gwynne v. Muddock, 14 Ves. 488, where a testator gave all his real and personal estate to A. for life; adding, after her death, "her nearest heir-at-law to enjoy the same," Sir William Grant, M. R., held that the heir-at-law took both the real and personal estate, not the realty only, the testator having blended them in the gift.

6. And even where the entire subject of the gift is personal, the word "heir," unexplained by the context, must be taken to be used in its proper sense, nor will the construction be varied by the circumstance that the gift is to the heir in the singular, and there is a plurality of persons conjointly answering to the description of heir. Thus, under the words "to my heir £4,000," three coheiresses of the testator were held to be entitled; Sir J. Leach, M. R., observing, "where the word is used, not to denote succession, but to describe a legatee, and there is no context to explain it otherwise, then it seems to me to be a substitution of conjecture in the place of clear expression, if I am to depart from the natural and ordinary sense of the word heir." Mounsey v. Blamire, 4 Russ. 384.

Now, we have not here a legacy of money to "heirs" by way of succession; nor is there a syllable in the will indicating that the testator had any peculiar meaning of his own attached to the words "heir-at-law," or "lawful heir," or that he used the word "heir" as a synonym for "relations" or "next of kin." On the contrary, he calls it his "estate," and not only so, but his estate "real and personal," and the person or persons designated to take it, are designated as the "heir-at-law" or "lawful heir." It is manifest that the testator did not intend that his property should be divided into real and personal after his death, and be given to different persons, but that the person or persons on whom the law would cast the inheritance of his lands at his death should have his personal property, subject only to the payment of debts and legacies.

Our decision on these five points disposes of every part of the case of John Aspden, the heir at common law. He has no claim to this estate, on any view of the case which we can take. But now arises a new question between new parties. The two parties of the half blood, neither of whom could get anything if the heir at common law was the person designated, and who therefore combined their forces as friends to dispose of his claims, now raise a question between themselves which they had reserved as against him, and upon which they now dispute separately with one another as strenuously as they before did jointly on the other question with the heir at common law. Assuming rightly that the estate is to go to whomsoever the law would cast the inheritance of the testator's lands; the Harrisons —the heirs ex parte paterna—claim the whole estate. And whether they shall have it all, or whether they must share it with the heirs ex parte materna, their late co-operators, the Hartleys, against the heir at common law, is this new question. The court apprehends fully the argument of the Harrison heirs. As being the only heirs ex parte paterna, they contend that they alone fulfil the description of "heir-at-law," or "lawful heir" of the testator, to the exclusion of the half blood ex parte materna; that the term heir has reference to an inheritance, and the question as to what person is designated by that term depends on the realty which is to be inherited; that this designation of the testator's intention to give his personalty to his heir, instead of his next of kin, cannot depend on the validity of his title to the estate which the testator expects him to inherit. Thus, in England, if a man dies seised of lands which came to him by descent from his father, and without children, his cousin of the whole blood of his father will be his heir; but if his estate came to him from his mother, his cousin of the whole blood ex parte materna would be his heir. That, therefore, the term "heir-at-law," as designatio personae, in a will, has reference, ex necessitate, to something dehors, or without the will, which must be known in order to ascertain the intention of the testator. That the law of Pennsylvania, while it substitutes nearer kindred of the half blood to more distant kindred of the whole blood, adopts the same principle, viz. that the heir must be of the blood of the first purchaser. That the testator having never owned any property, except that which came to him from his father, and having never voluntarily parted with it, but having tenaciously claimed it all his life (believing his attainder and the forfeiture of his property was not only unjust but illegal), must be supposed to designate and intend by the description "heir-at law or lawful heir" only such person or persons as would stand in that relation to the property which he expected to descend to his heir. That if it is competent to receive parol testimony as to what estate he died seised of, and how the title to it devolved upon him, it is equally competent to ascertain in this way what property he claimed or supposed would descend to his heir, especially as it appears on the face of the will that he supposed himself seised of some real estate, and his intention must be the same whether he was right or wrong in that claim, belief, or supposition. And consequently, that the testator having never owned or claimed to own any property but that which was devised to him by his father, his nephews and nieces of the maternal half-blood would have inherited nothing from him, and the description of heir-at-law or lawful heir could not possibly attach to them.

The court acknowledges the force of this argument. Let us then consider the question, 1st, on the undisputed fact that the testator was not seised of any real estate at the time he made his will, or afterwards; and, 2d, consider whether the unfounded belief that he was the rightful owner of certain property which was devised to him by his father, can be received to vary the result.

1st. It is not true, either in legal or popular parlance, that there can be no heir where there is nothing to be inherited. A man's children and other kindred may be described or designated as heirs, whether they take anything from their ancestor or not. Thus, in Counden v. Clerke, Hob. 31a, it is said: "But this (the words 'right heirs male') hath a divers consideration in cases of descent, and in case of purchase. For the word heir is sometimes taken absolutely, and as the Grecians call it, απλως, or simpliciter, sometimes κατα τι, or secundum quid, or per accidens; sometimes in abstracto, standing naked by itself, or of itself; and sometimes in concreto, clothed with land or rent, in respect of which he may be heir, as the word is here. For example, the younger son in borough English, is heir, and all the sons in gavelkind; whereof the reason is, because the custom of those lands is, that they must descend to the younger sons, or all the sons; so they are heirs secundum quid of those lands, in point of descent, or when they descend, for then they are within the custom that gives the inheritance." Hence, a bequest of personal estate "to my heir-at-law," or "right heir," would not be void for want of some person to take, even though the testator should not die seised of real estate. And whether a bequest by a man seised only of property by inheritance from his mother, to his "right heir," or "heir-at-law," would be interpreted as describing his right heir simpliciter or in abstracto, and not his heir secundem quid, or special heir of the particular estate, is possibly an open question. But in a case in 3 Lev. 406, (Godbold v. Freestone,) an heir ex parte materna limited (by deed) several estates, with reversion to his "right heirs," and it was decided that the reversion should go to his right heirs secundum quid, that is, to his heir ex parte materna.

Now, admitting that a devise of Blackacre "to his heir-at law," or "right heir," by a testator who inherited it from his mother, would be construed as a devise to his heir ex parte materna, or his heir quoad hoc, and that such person would hold by descent, and not by purchase, on the supposition that the testator meant to describe the person who would, at his death, be the lawful heir of the thing devised; and admitting that a bequest by the same person of all his real and personal estate to his heir-at-law would be construed as a designation of the person on whom the law would cast the estate of Blackacre at his death, it is evident that it is the character impressed upon the thing devised of descending to the heir, and to which the testator is supposed especially to refer, which is seized upon by the court to justify them in thus narrowing or changing the general term heir-at-law or right heir, so as to mean his special heir, or heir quoad hoc; and their desire to follow that canon of descent which requires the heir of an estate to be of the blood of the first purchaser. But in case of a bequest of personal estate to the testator's heir-at-law, when he has no special heir, there is no reason for departing from the plain and obvious meaning of the term, nor is there any character impressed upon the thing devised which can restrain it to the blood of the first purchaser. For I do not join in inclination of opinion with Sir R. Pepper Arden, who, in the case of Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. 399, was inclined to think, though he did not assert nor decide, that a bequest in trust for "such person as shall be my heir or heirs-at-law," should be construed "heirs quoad the property," meaning "next of kin." But I concur with what he was further inclined to say in the same case, "that in such case the court would consider the testator as the first purchaser," and, as a consequence thereof, would give a bequest of personalty to "my heirs-at-law," or "right heir," or "lawful heir," the same designation as if it had been a devise of lands acquired or purchased by the testator. But to apply these principles more especially to the case before us. The testator left at his death a nephew, A., of the paternal half-blood, and a nephew, B., of the maternal half-blood (who, for our present purpose, may represent the two stocks of relatives,) and a cousin, C., of the whole blood ex parte paterna. C. was his heir presumptive at the time this will was made, in 1791. But when a testator describes his heir-at-law, or lawful heir, as the person that shall take his property, he intends such person or persons as shall be found to sustain that character or description at the time of his decease, by the law of the country of his domicile. By the law of Pennsylvania, the persons who would answer to that description in 1824, when the testator died, are A. and B. By that law, they together constitute the lawful heir of the testator in the abstract or simpliciter, and are preferred to C. They take the personal estate by purchase, as the persons described in his will. There is no real property which either would take in exclusion of the other. The terms heir-at-law, or lawful heir, as descriptive of the person to take, are not narrowed by accident to a particular subject, nor are we required to look to the exception in the act, or compelled to give to general terms a special application, in order to conform to a principle of law which excludes the heir general, in order to continue the inheritance of the blood of the first purchaser. The exception in the act, which constitutes one of them as heir to the exclusion of the other, through an accidental quality attached to the thing to be inherited, has not occurred, and the question of preference does not arise. Being, therefore, equally within the description of persons entitled to take under the will, they must take jointly.

2nd. "Can the evidence of the testator's unfounded belief that he was owner of certain property devised to him, be received to show an intention different from that expressed in his will?" In construing wills it is often necessary to receive parol testimony, as to the property and persons described in it, in order to apply the devises and bequests to the proper persons and things. And in this way a latent ambiguity may be discovered, which must of necessity be resolved by testimony of the same description.

Now, as we have seen, the reason for construing the general terms of description in a special or narrowed sense, arises from the disposition of the courts to favour the policy of the law, which confines the descent of real estate to the blood of the first purchaser, and the presumption that such was the intention of the testator. And, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the half-blood ex parte materna would have been excluded by this description, if the testator had died seised of his paternal estate, what evidence have we that he would have given it a different destination from that which it now receives, had he believed otherwise? He did not know, when he made his will, that, before his death, the law of descents would be changed in Pennsylvania, yet, having willed that the law, as it existed at the time of his death should designate the person who should take his property, what right have we to say that he would have made a different will, if he had anticipated the fact of its change? He lived thirty years after the law was changed, and did not change his will on that account. He lived long enough to satisfy any reasonable man that he never would regain his paternal estate. The statute of limitations had twice run against his fancied claim before his death, and yet he made no change in the designation of the person who should take his estate, but left it to the law to settle that question, as the case might be, at his death. We have refused to receive evidence that he lived and died in the belief that his lawful heir would be the son of some of his English cousins. His will, clearly expressed, could not be interpreted by his false notions, because it would be conjecture to say that he would have changed his will had his notions been different. It is equally conjecture to presume that he would have changed it, had he entertained correct ideas as to his real estate. The testimony introduced on this subject is to limit the description of his devisees, or rather to change the destination of his property, unambiguously expressed, both as regards persons and things, to a different person or class of persons, by declarations of the testator of an absurd belief, when it cannot be proved that he would have given a different destination to it, if his knowledge or belief had been different. Such a construction, founded only on conjecture, would annul the statute of frauds, "and leave titles depending on intention to the decision of chance and the sport of opinion." I am of opinion, therefore, that both stocks of half-blood are equally entitled to the property in dispute, and take it under the description in the will, as "heir-at-law" or "lawful heir;" and that a different intention, in favour of one class to the exclusion of the other, cannot be inferred, from the fact that the testator had mistaken notions in regard to his ownership of real property, at the time he made his will and afterwards, and that such evidence cannot be received to narrow the construction of the clear, unambiguous description of his will, as connected with the actual situation of the property and persons referred to in it.

Let me now say, in conclusion of this long pending, important and difficult case, that although made after careful investigation, and with an anxious desire to arrive at the truth, I feel that my opinion is not so certainly right, as I could desire to feel that it is. And that it is a source of great satisfaction to me to believe that it will be reviewed by my brethren and myself in the highest tribunal of the country.

Equity Docket, No. 1, April sessions, 1828.

NOTE, [from original report.] From the final decree of the court, which was in conformity with the opinion above given, appeals were taken to the supreme court by the heir at common law, and by the Harrisons', so far as related to the parts of the estate from which they were excluded: the question of domicil, passed upon in the case of White v. Brown, [Case No. 17,538,] along with the evidence in that case, which was all documentary, being also taken up with this decree. The parties of the half-blood, here again joined their force. Their counsel, maintaining the Pennsylvania domicil, contended that the fact had been established by the verdict of a jury, upon an issue directed for that purpose by the court below: that the judge who directed the issue, was satisfied with the verdict, and refused a new trial: that under such circumstances, a very strong case must be made out, in order to induce an appellate court to send the cause back for a new trial: and that the law upon that subject is well stated by Lord Lyndhurst in Collins v. Hare, 1 Dow, & C. 139, in these words, "As the issue was directed for the purpose of informing the conscience of the equity judge, if the main object was gained it was sufficient. The judges both at law and equity were satisfied with the verdict, and therefore it must be a strong case indeed, that should induce your lordships to send the matter to a new trial, in opposition to the opinion of the late noble chancellor of Ireland, who had a much better opportunity of investigating the facts on which the case mainly depended, than your lordships have." An examination of the evidence, which was made by the counsel of the half-blood, showed, they contended, that the weight of it was altogether on the side of the American domicil.

On the other hand, the counsel of the heir at common law, contended that, the testator's domicil was England; that the verdict of the jury interposed no obstacle to a decision conformably to the evidence which appears on the record; that the object of the issue was to instruct the conscience of the chancellor, and like all the other proceedings in the circuit court, is the subject of review in the supreme court: that "the chancellor may, if he thinks fit, make no use whatever of the verdict, but treat it as a mere nullity." Gres. Eq. Ev. 405; [Mem.,] 6 Madd. 58; [Ex parte Learmouth, Id.] 113; Harrison v. Rowan, [Case No. 6,141.] They cited a Pennsylvania case, where, on an appeal, the supreme court disregarded a verdict, reversed a decree made in conformity to it, and remanded the case, without sending it to another jury, with instructions to the inferior court to enter a different decree. They relied on the opinion of Coulter, J., who, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It was contended by his counsel here, on the argument, that the verdict ought to be, and is conclusive. In a court proceeding according to the forms of the common law, the verdict of a jury is of high import and great solemnity; although, even then one verdict is not conclusive in any case, if against the weight of evidence. The court may set it aside, and grant a new trial. But in a court of equity, its effect and function is entirely different. In that court it is used merely for the purpose of informing the conscience of the court, and is incidental and auxiliary. A chancellor cannot, if he would, surrender his high prerogative and duty of deciding upon facts, according to the convictions of his conscience. In that court, the wisdom of our ancestors deposited the faculty of deciding upon facts within its jurisdiction, as well as determining the rules of equity applicable to them. And where, after all, could the power be more safely lodged, especially in cases of trusts and fiduciary transactions? Long experience, the habit of sifting and comparing testimony, calm deliberation and exemption from local prejudices, seems to give a guaranty for enlightened judgment. A chancellor will examine the notes of evidence by the judge who tried the cause, listen to the explanation of counsel, and, at last, if his conscience is not satisfied, will decide the cause according to his own convictions, and disregard the verdict of the jury." The counsel argued that there is no writ of error in the case of an issue directed for the information of a chancellor, who may after all, disregard the verdict, and that if the verdict enter into the decision of the cause, they had no other remedy that an appeal, which must necessarily be co-extensive with the final decree of the circuit court. Com. v. Judges of Court of Common Pleas, 4 Pa. St. 302. Domicil, they argued, is a mixed question of law and fact; that it is not the verdict, but the evidence, which exhibits the facts from which a correct estimate may be formed of the sense in which the testator used the language in his will; that the jury disregarded the only facts of importance in the controversy; the testator's education and residence for more than fifty years in England, his English doctrines, prejudices and associations, his long absence from Pennsylvania, his embittered feelings towards that state, and every other consideration, calculated to cast light on the meaning of the terms he used, &c. And they went, as did the counsel of the heirs of the half-blood, over the whole case of White v. Brown, already reported. [Case No. 17,538.]

The supreme court heard, at great length, the argument on both sides, as to this question of domicil, as well as upon all the questions reported in the present case. But no opinion was ever delivered in that tribunal. The court was equally divided as to affirming the decree, (See Brown v. Aspden, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 25;) and it was therefore simply affirmed. It was understood by the profession, that the chief difficulty with their honours was, the question of domicil: and it is, perhaps, not easy entirely to reconcile the verdict in the case with certain parts of the language of the judge who gave the opinion of the supreme court delivered at the same term, in the case of Ennis v. Smith, involving the question of the domicil of General Kosciusco. See 14 How. [55 U. S.] 400. On the effect in law of a judgment by an equally divided court, see Krebbs v. Directors of Carlisle Bank, [Case No. 7,932.]

RE-EXAMINATION OF CLAIMS—ORDERING OF ISSUES—POWER OF REGISTER.

1. An order was made by the register for the re-examination of the claims of certain creditors against the bankrupt's estate. Evidence having been taken under the order, the register, on the application of the creditors, made an order for the framing of an issue to be certified into court. On the return of the order, the register revoked it, on the motion of the creditors, on the ground that he had no authority to order the framing of issues, until it appeared from the examination before him that the claims should be expunged: Held, that, under General Order No. 34, the register had no authority to require the parties to frame issues as to the re-examination of a claim, if either objects to framing such issue, until it appears to the register that the claim ought to be expunged or diminished; but may require them to frame an issue when the examination before him is completed, if neither of them objects;

2. That in this case, it was too late to revoke the order for issues, which had been made without objection, and the revocation should be vacated.

In bankruptcy. In this case the register certified to the court, that an application had been made for the re-examination of claims of the Phoenix National Bank and Richard Irvin & Co., against the estate in bankruptcy; that he made an order fixing a time for hearing the application, and, having taken the examination of the witnesses called by the parties, made an order, on the application of the bank and Richard Irvin & Co., requiring the framing of issues; and that, on the return of that order, on like motion, he revoked the order, as inadvertently made, on the ground that he had not authority to make it, unless it appeared, from the examination before him, that the claims ought to be expunged or diminished.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think, that, under General Order No. 34, [see note at end of case,] the register has no authority to require the parties to form an issue, if either of them objects to forming such issue until it appears to the register that the claim ought to be expunged or diminished, and until objection is then made to his making an order to that effect. He may require them to form an issue, if neither of them objects to forming such issue, at any time after the examination is completed, and may certify such issue for determination. In the present case, the motion for the order for issues was made by the Phoenix National Bank and Richard Irvin & Company, the same parties on whose motion the order was revoked. The other parties, as appears, not only did not object to making the order for issues, but object to its revocation. I think it is too late to revoke the order, and that its revocation should be vacated, and the parties be required to form issues under it.

[NOTE. General Order No. 34 provides, inter alia, as follows: "When the assignee or any creditor shall desire the re-examination of any claim filed against the bankrupt's estate, he may apply by petition to the register to whom the cause is referred, for an order for such re-examination; and thereupon the register shall make an order fixing a time for hearing the petition, of which due notice shall be given by mail, addressed to the creditor. At the time appointed, the register shall take the examination of the creditor and of any witnesses that may be called by either party; and, if it shall appear from such examination that the claim ought to be expunged or diminished, the register, if no objection be made, may order accordingly. If objection be made, the register shall require the parties then, or within a time to be fixed for that purpose, to form an issue to be certified into court for determination." See Gazz. Bankr. 374.]

WITNESS—PRIVILEGE OF COUNSEL.

Counsel for a bankrupt is not required, when examined as a witness in the bankruptcy proceedings, to disclose any information as to the affairs of the bankrupt, which he received as such counsel, from the bankrupt, or from persons to whom he was referred by the bankrupt for the purpose of obtaining such information as such counsel. But he may be required to answer questions not coming within this principle.

T. Saunders, for the assignee in bankruptcy.

G. H. Forster, for the witness.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In the course of his examination as a witness in this matter, before the register, under the 26th section of the act, Mr. Weeks, an attorney and counselor at law, was asked (question 5) what affairs of the bankrupt were the subject of a conversation which he had testified he had with two persons named, other than the bankrupt, at a time named, in which some of the affairs of the bankrupt were the subject of conversation between the witness and those persons. The witness objected to answering the question, on the ground stated by him, that he was acting as counsel for the bankrupt at the time, and that his remarks were made in that capacity. Subsequently, in the course of the same examination, the same witness objected to answering eight other questions, on the same ground. At the close of the examination the witness said: "I wish to state, that all my interviews with Mr. Aspinwall were strictly of a professional character, and all the information in relation to his affairs, imparted to me, was so imparted in the capacity of counsel, and was of a confidential character, and, under the privilege of counsel, I decline to disclose those matters." The point as to whether the nine questions shall be answered, or whether the privilege claimed is a sufficient reason for not answering them, is certified by the register for decision by the court.

Undoubtedly, the witness is entitled to claim that he is not required to disclose any information he received from the bankrupt, in regard to the affairs of the bankrupt, which was imparted to the witness by the bankrupt, if the witness received such information from the bankrupt, as counsel for the bankrupt. And this privilege extends to information received on behalf of the bankrupt, in regard to the affairs of the bankrupt, from persons to whom the witness was referred by the bankrupt, for the purpose of his obtaining such information, as counsel for the bankrupt. But the privilege does not have the wide scope which seems to be claimed by the witness. Thus, when the witness is asked, in question 5, what affairs of Aspinwall were the subject of his conversation, his objection, that he was acting as counsel for the bankrupt at the time, and that his remarks were made in that capacity, is too broad. He may have been acting as counsel for the bankrupt at the time, and his remarks may have been made in that capacity, but a designation, in some form, of what affairs of the bankrupt were the subject of the conversation, does not necessarily require the witness to disclose information about such affairs, which was imparted to him by the bankrupt, and thus involve his privilege. I do not see, therefore, that the objection taken is, in view of the question (5), tenable.

So, too, the remark of the witness that all his interviews with the bankrupt were strictly of a professional character, may apply very well when he is asked to disclose the information received by him from the bankrupt at such interviews. And his remark, that all the information in relation to the affairs of the bankrupt, imparted to him, was so imparted in the capacity of counsel, and was of a confidential character, will justify him in withholding the disclosure only of such information in relation to the affairs of the bankrupt as was imparted to him by the bankrupt, in the capacity of counsel for the bankrupt, and of such information in relation to the affairs of the bankrupt as was imparted to him by persons to whom he was, as counsel for the bankrupt, referred by the bankrupt, with a view to his obtaining such information, as such counsel. Guided by these tests, it is difficult to see how the privilege of the witness can cover question 10, as to whether the indebtedness of the bankrupt to a certain named creditor was spoken of at either of the interviews between the witness and the two persons before referred to. The same remark is true of question 11, as to whether anything was said at either of such interviews, by either of the parties present, relating to the bankrupt's inability to meet his obligations to such creditor. The witness had previously stated that he did not think he had any interview with the bankrupt at which either of the two persons referred to was present. Nor does it seem that the witness can be privileged from answering question 12, as to who it was with whom, if with anyone, he had the first conversation concerning the claim of such creditor against the bankrupt; or question 13, as to whether a certain paper shown is one that has ever passed under the witness' observation; or question 14, as to whether the witness drew or directed the drawing of a certain deed from the bankrupt; or question 15, as to whether the witness drew or directed the drawing of a certain declaration of trust between the bankrupt and certain persons named; or question 17, as to whether, at a certain date, the witness received any checks drawn to the order of the bankrupt by a certain named firm; or question 18, as to what disposition was made of any such checks so received.

ASPINWALL'S CASE.

[3 Pa. Law J. 212, 380.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—VOLUNTARY ASSIGNMENT—RELEASES—PREFERRED CREDITORS.

Creditors who have executed releases according to the terms of voluntary assignments, are to be considered as having been preferred thereby over the creditors of the petitioner, who have not executed releases.

In bankruptcy.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. In the case of George W. Aspinwall, a petitioner for the benefit of the bankrupt act, on a point [see note at end of case] certified from the district court, it appeared that on the 1st March, 1841, the petitioner and David R. Pope his partner, made an assignment of all their joint and separate estate and effects, real and personal, in trust to pay certain of their creditors in full, and also to pay in full or rateably as the case might be, such of their creditors as should within a limited time execute and deliver an absolute release of all demands against the said Pope and Aspinwall, with a proviso to this effect, that all creditors who held collateral securities might retain them, and all the property thereby secured, and be at liberty to come in under the assignment for the balance due on their respective debts, after exhausing the property secured. The discharge of the petitioner was opposed on the ground of having made this assignment, whereupon the following question arose in the district court, which is now the subject of consideration, viz. Whether those creditors who have executed releases according to the terms of the assignment, are to be considered as having been preferred thereby over the creditors of the petitioner who have not executed releases. This question arises under the second enacting clause of the second section of the bankrupt act which prohibits the discharge of a petitioner who has by assignment or otherwise, after the 1st of January, 1841, or at any other time in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, given or secured any preference to one creditor over another, without the assent of a majority in interest of the creditors who have not been so preferred. This assignment having been made after the 1st of January, 1841, comes within the above provision as held in the Case of Irwine, [Case No. 7,086.] It gives preferences to certain creditors, and consequently the discharge of the petitioner is subject to the condition of assent by those creditors who have not been preferred, so that the only question is, what is giving or securing a preference of one creditor over another according to the true interpretation of the bankrupt act?

Taken in its common acceptation, a preference of one over another is putting him in a better situation, giving him an advantage or benefit which others do not enjoy; whatever act tends to produce this effect is a preference—is within the law, no matter by what means it is done, whether by assignment "or otherwise," or what may be the mode of preferring. Any preference, of whatever nature or to whatever extent, imposes this condition on the petitioner. No exception is contained in the law, nor are any words used which can justify the implication of one which discriminates between the creditor who is preferred without any act to be done by him after the assignment, or other act giving the preference, and the creditor who by its terms must do something before the preference can attach. The leading policy of the whole bankrupt act, is to enforce the equal distribution of a bankrupt's property among all his creditors, and to prevent all preferences of any creditors over others. not only after the passage of the act, but from the express words of the law the same spirit is directed to all preferences after the 1st of January preceding, or even before if made in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt act. When the intention of the legislature is so clearly manifested, it ought to be carried into effect in the same spirit; every creditor has a legal right to resort to the property of a debtor for the payment of his debt, without any obligation to submit to any terms or conditions sought to be imposed on him. If the debtor makes such an assignment of his property as to make a release by his creditors a condition of his being entitled to any part of the debtor's property, he is forced to surrender his right, or be cut out of any hope of payment; this of itself puts those creditors who release in a better position than those who do not; it divides the creditors into two classes, one of whom may be paid in full, while the other receives nothing. When paid in full, the giving a receipf or release of the debt is a duty of the creditor, independent of the assignment; no right is given up by the release, and if paid only in part, the releasing creditors will have first exhausted the whole fund, leaving to the others no right or remedy but to pursue the person of the debtor, both of which are under the laws of the state and the late act of congress, difficult if not impossible to enforce, and will be wholly abrogated if the construction relied upon by the petitioner prevails. As the law does not invalidate the assignment, or other act which gives the preference, no vestige remains either of right or remedy in the creditors who do not release, other than the right to oppose the discharge of the bankrupt without the consent of a majority in interest. And even this poor remnant of a creditor's right will be taken from him, if the releasing creditors constitute a majority in interest by themselves, or by the addition of others, and give their assent to the discharge. So to construe the law would be to annul it, for the creditors who have released the debtor have no interest in his discharge. They cannot prove their debts under the bankruptcy, for none exist. They cannot oppose the discharge, for it cannot affect them, nor do or can they in any sense fill the character of creditors after they have absolutely released the debt. This consideration alone would be conclusive to show the true meaning of the law to be, that when a preference of one creditor over another has been given or secured as in this case, the petitioner cannot be discharged without the assent of a majority in interest of those creditors who have not executed releases, and whose debts are existing and unpaid, at the time of the hearing of the petition for a discharge. In ascertaining whether a preference has been given, the act looks to the time when it purports to have been given, and to those who are then creditors; but the discharge must be referred to the final hearing, and none can be recognized as creditors to whom the bankrupt is not then indebted. The question adjourned to this court, must therefore be answered in the affirmative.

NOTE, [from 3 Pa. Law J. 380.] "The opinion of the late Judge Baldwin is given without any statement; and as the question certified to the court is not precisely stated in the opinion, we have examined the record, and give below the question in terms as certified by the district court, and some facts which may serve to prevent any misunderstanding of the decision. The report of the commissioner shows the amount of debts of unpreferred creditors to be $258,732.60, of whom those holding debts amounting to $147,911.05 assented to the discharge. But of these the larger portion though not preferred, had released the petitioner in accordance with the terms of the assignment, which stipulated that all who released within a certain time should be paid pro rata. It was objected that the creditors who had released in accordance with the terms of the assignment, were preferred over those who had not released. The question was thus certified by the judge of the district court: Are the creditors who executed the release stipulated for in the assignment of G. W. A., a copy of which is annexed to the petition, creditors 'not preferred,' within the meaning of the second proviso of the second section of the bankrupt law?

"The decision of the circuit court was, that the releasing creditors were preferred within the meaning, &c. The answer of the circuit court should be in the negative, as it is evident from the course of argument in the opinion, and the manner in which the question is therein stated, that it was understood affirmatively by the circuit court."

ASPINWALL v. COUNTY COM'RS.

[3 Wkly. Law Gaz. No. 26.]

MANDAMUS—ENFORCING JUDGMENT ON MUNICIPAL BONDS—PEREMPTORY WRIT.

[1. Where county bonds in aid of a railroad are issued under authority of an act of the state legislature providing that the county commissioners shall levy a tax to pay the interest and principal, a judgment for interest thereon, recovered in a federal court, may be enforced by mandamus to compel such levy.]

[See note at end of case.]

[2. Where the defendants have had ample opportunity to set up all substantial defenses in previous litigation, a peremptory instead of an alternative mandamus should be granted.]

[See note at end of case.]

[Application for a peremptory writ of mandamus. In an action of assumpsit by William H. Aspinwall, Joseph W. Alsop, Henry Chauncey, Charles Gould, and Samuel L. M. Barlow against the board of commissioners of Knox county, to enforce the payment of certain coupons of bonds issued by the defendant, judgment had been rendered for plaintiffs for $17,832.36, (case not reported,) and, on writ of error, was affirmed by the supreme court. Board Com'rs Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. (62 U. S.) 539. An execution was issued on the judgment in June, 1859, but was subsequently, by order of the court, set aside, and an alternative writ of mandamus granted, commanding the defendant to levy a tax for the payment of the judgment, or to show cause, etc. This writ was quashed, but upon this application a peremptory mandamus was granted. On writ of error sued out by defendant, this judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. 24 How. (65 U. S.) 376.]

Samuel Judah and N. C. McLean, for plaintiffs.

Judge McDonald, for defendant.

HUNTINGTON, District Judge. At the May term of this court, 1857, a judgment was recovered in favor of the plaintiffs, and against the defendant for a large sum of money found due upon the interest warrants of certain bonds issued by the county of Knox to the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, in payment of subscription of stock made by that county to said road. This judgment was, at the last term of the supreme court of the United States, affirmed by that tribunal. The judgment of that court is final and conclusive between these parties. By the act of the legislature under which this subscription of stock was made, and these bonds issued, it was provided that the commissioners of Knox county should levy a tax upon the property of the county to pay these bonds, and the interest as it fell due. For several years the board of commissioners have failed and refused to levy the tax. At last the parties holding these bonds have sued on these interest warrants and obtained a judgment. There being no property in the county subject to the payment of this judgment, the plaintiffs, at the present term of this court moved the court for an alternative mandamus to compel the board of county commissioners to show cause why they had not levied the tax, etc. To this proceeding the county board, by counsel, appeared, acknowledged service, etc., and filed a demurrer. After argument, the court refused the mandamus on the ground that the tax to be levied was by the act directed to be levied at the June term of said board, and that as no such term had intervened since the final determination of the cause, the board should have the then and now passed June term, in which to make the levy before a mandamus should issue. By the affidavit of Samuel Judah the attorney of the plaintiffs, and the affidavit of N. C. McLean, the attorney of other judgment creditors, it appears that application was made by them personally to the county board at its June session, just passed, to make the levy required by law, and that the board peremptorily and utterly refused to do so. Under this state of facts, the plaintiffs ask for a mandamus to compel the board to execute this duty. In opposition to this motion, a transcript of the proceedings of the county board is read, which shows that the regular sessions of the board are limited to nine days, and that the regular county board have adjourned over until the 6th of July next without having decided the question, with a view, as is expressed in the order, to consult public opinion in the matter. It has already been decided by this court at this term, on the former motion, that in order to sustain the jurisdiction of this court and enforce its judgments and decrees, the court may issue this prerogative writ. Indeed, to deny this power is to deny the jurisdiction of the court, for it would be a farce to say that this court has the power to give a judgment without the power to enforce it. It can be enforced in but one way, and that is by a levy of the tax required by the law. The proper officers refuse to levy the tax, and the only remedy is to enforce obedience by this writ.

The usual course in cases of mandamus is to obtain a rule upon the defendant to show cause why the writ should not issue; and if the cause be deemed insufficient, then a mandamus in the alternative issues—to which a return is to be made; and if good cause is not thereby shown for not doing the thing required, then a peremptory mandamus is issued. But if both parties have been fully heard, and there is no dispute about the facts, the court will, if perfectly satisfied, without going through the form of an alternative mandamus, grant a peremptory mandamus in the first instance. Board of Police of Attala Co. v. Grant, 9 Smedes & M. 77; Ang. & A. [Corp.] § 729, and notes, page 809. The present application is for a peremptory mandamus. As far as the facts of the case are concerned, there is nothing left for determination. The plaintiffs have a judgment given by the court and affirmed by the supreme court of the United States. The right of the plaintiffs to receive from the county of Knox the amount of this judgment is settled, and cannot be disputed. Payment can be enforced in only one way, and that according to the terms of the act of the legislature. The board whose duty it was to levy the tax has refused to do so, and has adjourned over beyond the period fixed by law for its June term. This board has for years refused to perform a duty expressly enjoined by public law. The court gave it the June session just passed to perform this duty. This board still refuses. It is a case clear of all doubt as far as the right of the parties is concerned; there are no facts to dispute; none to investigate. The county is concluded by the judgment of the highest court in the Union. The board has a mere ministerial duty to perform, and it contumaciously refuses to perform it, and we know of no other mode in which it can be enforced than by this prerogative writ. An execution would be unavailing for not only is there no property by which the judgment can be collected, but if there were, the act requires the debt to be satisfied by a tax on the property of the county. Already has an alternative writ been issued and service acknowledged—it was quashed on the ground that it was prematurely asked for. But what is the object of issuing an alternative writ, unless it be to give the party against whom it is issued the right to set up some real and substantial defense to the proceeding? In this case what defence can be made? The judgment is final—the amount due is fixed—it cannot be changed—there can be no defense to the merits, it can only be purely technical and go to the right of the party to enforce this judgment. This question has already been decided. We grant the writ.

[NOTE. The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, and Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion, said: "Why should not the circuit court of the United States be competent to give to suitors this only adequate remedy? By the common law, the writ of mandamus is granted by the king's bench, in virtue of its prerogative and supervisory power over inferior courts. The courts of the United States cannot issue this writ by virtue of any supervisory power at common law over inferior state tribunals. They can derive it only from the constitution and laws of the United States. The jurisdiction of these courts is, by the constitution, extended to 'controversies between citizens of different states.' Congress has authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying this jurisdiction into effect. The jurisdiction of the court to give the judgment in this case is not disputed; nor can it be denied that, by the constitution, congress has the power to make laws necessary for carrying into execution all its judgments. See Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. (23 U. S.) 22. Has it done so? By the 14th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73) it is enacted 'that courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles of the common law.' Now, the 'jurisdiction' is not disputed, and it is 'necessary' to an efficient exercise of this jurisdiction that the court have authority to compel the exercise of a ministerial duty by the corporation, which by law they are bound to perform, and by the performance of which alone the plaintiff's remedy can be effected. * * * There is no other writ which can afford the party a remedy, which the court is bound to afford, if within its constitutional powers, except that afforded by this writ of mandamus. It is 'agreeable to the principles of the common law,' and, consequently, within the category as defined by the statute. * * * It is no reason for setting it aside that a previous alternative writ had not issued. The notices served on the commissioners gave them every opportunity of defense that could have been obtained by an alternative mandamus. There was no dispute about facts which could affect the decision. The court gave them an opportunity to comply with the demand of the plaintiffs. Their excuse for not doing so was, palpably, 'a mere colorable adjournment or procrastination of the performance of the act, for the purpose of delay.' It is equivalent to a refusal. Having refused to perform the duty which the law imposed upon them on the proper day, without even the pretense of a reason for such conduct, the peremptory mandamus was very properly awarded, commanding the duty to be performed 'forthwith.'" ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—ENFORCEMENT OF COMMON LAW JUDGMENT.

[A judgment against the master of a vessel, recovered in an action for wages in a common law court, cannot be enforced against either the vessel or its owner in an admiralty court.]

[In admiralty. Action in the marine court of New York city by Norman Assign against the master of the brig G. B. Lamar for seaman's wages. Judgment for plaintiff. Motion in United States district court by plaintiff for summons against the owners of the brig to show cause why the judgment should not be paid by said brig and why an attachment should not issue against her. Denied.]

Mr. Nash, for plaintiff.

PER CURIAM. The object of the proceeding is to employ the remedy applied by the admiralty court, to enforce or execute a judgment rendered in a court of common law. The application is an entire novelty and is without support in any principle connected with the constitution of admiralty courts or the exercise of their jurisdiction. The court takes cognizance only of causes of maritime jurisdiction. Act Sept. 24, 1789. A suit at common law for wages is a mere common law action, subject to the incidents of that action and having no privilege beyond it,—[Ewer v. Jones,] 2 Ld. Raym. 934,—and when carried to judgment the original cause of action is therefore merged in this judgment, and cannot be inquired into or rejected in an ultimate suit upon this judgment.

Decrees of foreign courts proceeding according to the course of the civil law are executed in admiralty when the whole matter is of a maritime character. 2 Bum Cir. & Ad. It was upon the recognition of this general principle that the district courts under the United States constitution were held to have authority to decree the execution of sentences rendered in the court of appeals in prize cases executed under the confederation. [Penhallow v. Doane's Administrators,] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 54; [Jennings v. Carson,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 2; [U. S. v. Peters,] 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 115. The arguments of counsel in this court in these cases, however, demonstrate that no idea was entertained that the district court in its capacity of a court of admiralty had authority to act upon the adjudication of any other than courts proceeding strictly in conformity with the principles of the civil law. If this application could succeed there would be nothing to limit the action of this court when invoked to aid judgments assumed to have been rendered upon considerations of a maritime character. The counsel for the petitioners contends that the court is concluded by the statements of the law record, and accordingly, if judgment is obtained in a court of law upon a bill of lading, a policy of insurance or contract for repairing or refitting a vessel, this court may be invoked upon the record exhibiting said cause of action to enforce the judgment by attachment of the property. This certainly is broad not to say bold doctrine, and would if adopted soon lead to results varying to a most important degree the functions of this court. Judgment creditors of that class would have in effect a creditors' bill out of this court of infinitely higher efficacy than could be given by chancery without the creditor being subjected to the hazard of any scrutiny of the justness of his demands. Independent of these objections to adopting common law judgments in this court growing out of the different procedures of the two tribunals antecedent to and concomitant upon the final rendition of a decision it is sufficient to take the facts of the present case in full illustration of the objections of the jurisdiction decreed.

The defendant when tried at law was no longer master of this brig, and suffered judgment by default to such amount as the plaintiff could prove. The principle could be the same if he had given a cognovit. It is not now sought to apply this judgment to the estate of the defendant, but to transfer its lien to the property of third parties having no privity in the matter. The contract of the master with seamen is obligatory upon owners and an action will lie directly against them or the vessel, upon it. So is the master personally liable to the seamen thereon. [The Virgin v. Vyfhius,] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538; Abb. Shipp. & Adm. 476, note. But it could scarcely be contended that a judgment against the vessel or owner could be enforced against the master, nor are there more conclusive reasons for holding the judgment against the master per se binding upon the owners or vessel. The remedy against each is independent and distinct and having sought it in one direction does not deprive a seaman of the right to resort to another upon the original consideration; the judgment on decrees subsisting against either party unsatisfied being no bar or objection to his proceeding de novo against the other.

The motion for an attachment is accordingly denied.

BANKRUPTCY—RESOLUTION OF COMPOSITION—CONFIRMATION BY REQUISITE NUMBER—AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT'S STATEMENT.

1. A motion, to record a resolution of composition in bankruptcy, was opposed by creditors on the ground that it had not been confirmed by the number of creditors required in accordance with the debtor's statement presented at the creditors' meeting. The debtor claimed that the statement was inaccurate, and that an accurate statement would show that the composition had been confirmed by the requisite number: Held, That the statement could not be corrected at this time, but should have been corrected at the creditors' meeting. At such meeting the creditors are entitled to examine the debtor as to any corrections intended to be made.

2. Confirmation of the resolution of composition denied, the requisite number of creditors according to the list presented at the creditors' meeting not having signed, with leave to renew motion when the list should be corrected and properly confirmed.

In bankruptcy.

G. A. Seixas, for petitioners.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in bankruptcy which comes before the court upon a motion to record a resolution of composition and to file a statement of assets and debts. The motion is opposed upon the ground that the resolution has not been confirmed by the requisite number of the creditors, upon the debtor's statement of debts and assets, presented at the creditors' meeting, and which it is now proposed to file.

An examination of this statement shows the fact to be as claimed by the opposing creditors; but on the part of the debtor it is claimed (and so the fact appears) that the statement is inaccurate in this, that at least one person named as a creditor is not a creditor, and two of the creditors named as unsecured are in fact secured; so that, as a matter of fact, the resolution has been confirmed by the requisite number of all the creditors. It is therefore contended that the law has been complied with and the resolution can be recorded, although, if the statement of debts and assets be taken as correct, the requisite number have not confirmed the resolution. No doubt the statement of assets may be corrected by the consent of a meeting of the creditors, for the statute so expressly declares; and I incline to the opinion that this statement might have been amended at the first meeting of creditors so as to make it conform to the facts then disclosed by the proofs of debts and the examination of the debtor. But I am also of the opinion that, until so amended, it cannot be filed. It is by the statement presented to the court, that the court is to see that the requisite proportion of creditors have voted to confirm. The evident intention of the statute is, that the statement and resolutions should be filed together, and disclose to all interested a legal confirmation of the resolution by the requisite proportion of the creditors appearing on the statement.

It cannot, therefore, be sufficient that it be made to appear by evidence outside the statement, presented to the court, and not to the creditors, that the statement is inaccurate, and in this way to show that the resolution has been passed by the requisite number of the creditors. The creditors are entitled to learn in what respect the debtor's statement is inaccurate, and wherein it is to be amended, and to have the opportunity of examining the debtor, as to any corrections intended to be made; and the statement as intended to be filed must furnish to the court the basis on which to determine whether the resolution has been passed, as required by law. Looking to the statement now presented in this case, and which is sought to be filed, it cannot be seen that the resolution has been confirmed by the requisite number of creditors.

The motion to record and file must, therefore, be denied, with liberty to renew the same upon an amended statement, when the statement shall have been amended in the method provided by the statute.

The other objections do not appear to me to be sufficient to defeat this composition, and I should have no difficulty in finding it to be for the interest of all concerned to record the resolution, provided it appeared to have been passed in the manner directed by the statute.

[4 Wash. C. C. 711.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1827.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RUNNING OF STATUTE—WHEN CAUSE OF ACTION ACCRUES.

At what time the cause of action may be said to accrue, from which to date the commencement of the running of the act of limitations.

At law. This case resembles that of M'Culloch v. Girard, [Case No. 8,737,] which was tried at the October sessions of this court in 1822, the present plaintiff having been one of the persons on whose account Mr. Jones made the contract with the defendant. The few points of difference between the two cases are totally immaterial to the point decided in this cause, and therefore are not stated. Besides the general issue, the defendant in the present case pleads the act of limitations, and the question to which this plea gave rise was. whether the six years began to run from the 2d of October, 1816, when the interest on the stock paid by the plaintiff to the defendant was received by the latter, or from the 25th of November of that year, when the resolution of the bank of the 5th of that month was rescinded, and if not then, from the 7th January, 1817, when the resolution was passed for restoring to those subscribers who had paid the interest under the first resolution, the sums so respectively paid by them? The agreement to enter an amicable action in this case was signed on the 20th, and was filed on the 27th of November, 1822.

Thomas Sergeant, John Sergeant and Chauncey, for plaintiff.

J. R. Ingersoll and Mr. Binney, for defendant.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Thinking, as I do, that this action is barred by the act of limitations, I deem it unnecessary to notice the case upon its merits. It is contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that the cause of action did not arise until the 7th of January, 1817, when the bank of the United States resolved to restore to the subscribers the interest which they had paid under the resolve of the 5th of November, 1816, or at farthest from the 25th of November, 1816, when the resolution of the 5th, asserting the right of the bank to this interest, was rescinded. That the material question to be decided is, which of those resolutions amounted to a renunciation by the bank of their right to this interest, since the plaintiff could have no right to it until that act was performed. If the earliest day, viz. the 25th of November, should be taken, this action was brought five days before the expiration of the six years. I do not agree with the plaintiff's counsel in the position upon which their whole argument upon this point is founded; which is, that the relinquishment by the bank of its claim to the October interest on the subscribed stock was essential to the plaintiff's recovery in this action.

In the case of M'Culloch v. Girard, [Case No. 8,737,] the right of the bank to this interest was asserted by the defendant as a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery. The court thought it a sufficient answer to the objection that the bank had, by its resolutions of the 25th of November and 7th of January, relinquished to the subscribers its right to the interest; after which it was not competent to the defendant to set it up as a defence in that action. We might have added, that such claim was no answer to that action, whether it was relinquished or not; but this was either not thought of, or the first reason being considered conclusive, it was deemed unnecessary to go further.

In deciding this question it is necessary to keep always in mind the ground of this action. It is not founded upon a right to this interest against all the world, but against the defendant, in consequence of a special agreement, which forms the basis of the action. If a suit could have been brought by the plaintiff against the United States for the recovery of this interest, or a mandamus to the proper officer, commanding him to pay the interest to the plaintiff, the unquestionable right of the bank, before it was relinquished, would have been a conclusive answer to such suit or application. But the present suit is founded upon the agreement of the defendant that the plaintiff should participate with him in his subscription, to the amount of three thousand shares, with every advantage he would have if he were actually a subscriber. This agreement was fully executed on the part of the plaintiff by the payment of the coin, and the transfer of the stock, forming the first instalment on two thousand shares.

Now the question, and almost the only one arising in this view of the case is, what would have been the situation, and what the rights of the plaintiff in relation to this interest, if Mr. Jones had strictly complied with his order, by subscribing for two thousand shares in the name of the plaintiff; instead of making the contract he did with the defendant? The answer is obvious. He would have been placed in the shoes of the defendant as to the interest on $50,000 of stock, and, as the legal owner of the stock, would have been entitled to draw that interest, and to use and retain it against all the world, except the bank of the United States. How then can it be said truly that the plaintiff participated with the defendant in his subscription to a certain amount, and with every advantage of a subscriber, if the interest, to the use and possession of which he would have been entitled had he subscribed, could have been legally retained by the defendant?

If this suit had been brought on the 3d of October 1816, could the defendant have defended himself by setting up the acknowledged right of the bank to this interest? Clearly, I think, he could not. The defendant held the money subject to the better title of the bank. The plaintiff claimed under his contract, and had a right to claim the money to the extent of two hundred shares, subject to the same title. The value of the advantage of possessing and using this money, could have formed no part of the case in such an action. The interest received by the defendant was, by virtue of his contract, received to the use of the plaintiff; and to retain it, was a breach of that contract. To an action to recover damages for the breach of an agreement to convey property, or to a bill for a specific performance of such an agreement; it would surely be no answer in the mouth of the defendant, that some third person had a better title than himself to the property. The plaintiff may well ask, in reply, what that is to the defendant, if he, the plaintiff, is willing, or is bound, to accept a conveyance subject to such outstanding title in a third person? The cause of action then in this case arose upon the receipt of this interest by the defendant, and his failure to pay it over to the plaintiff; which happened more than six years before this action was brought. The jury found for the defendant.

NOTE, [from original report.] A motion was made, and argued at the succeeding term for a new trial, which after mature consideration was denied.

In equity.

Douglass & Walker and Mr. Romeyn, for complainants.

Norvell & Goodwin, for defendant.

BY THE COURT. The complainants state in their bill that they purchased certain lands of the United States in the state of Michigan, the patent for which was issued the 1st May, 1839. That previous to the emanation of the patent, though subsequent to the entry of the land, the state of Michigan imposed a tax on the same. This tax it is alleged the state could not impose, as the land belonged to the United States, until the fee was vested in the purchaser by a patent. That the ordinance of 1787, [1 Bior. & D. 479.] and the act [Jan. 26, 1837; 5 Stat. 142] which admitted Michigan into the Union, prohibit the state from taxing the lands of the United States. The proceedings in the assessment of the tax are also alleged to have been irregular, and an injunction is prayed, &c. The case was argued as on a demurrer to the bill. The counsel for the complainant insist that any restrictions on the state, contained either in the ordinance or in the act admitting the state into the Union are void, as Michigan was admitted into the Union on the same footing as the other states; and that any restriction on the exercise of its sovereign power is void.

It is admitted that the imposition of a tax is an exercise of sovereign power. This is sometimes done indirectly by vesting the right to tax, for certain purposes, in a corporation. But the act is done under the sovereign authority.

The inhibition on the state in regard to taxing the lands of the United States, does not rest upon an act of congress, but upon a compact made between the general government and the state, and this agreement does not divest the state of any attribute of sovereignty, but withdraws a certain property from taxation for a limited time, and for certain reasons. No one doubts the competency of the state and the federal government to make such a compact; and it can only be dissolved or modified with the consent of both parties. This does not impair the sovereignty of the state, as the power of taxation remains as before the compact. It is not unusual for the state, on grounds of public policy, or for a consideration paid, to exempt from taxation certain property. This is often done in grants to corporations, but no one supposes that this is a cession of a part of the sovereignty of the state. This question was considered somewhat at large in the case of Spooner v. McConnell, [Case No. 13,245,] and it need not again be discussed. In 1832, the land in question was entered and paid for by the purchaser, and by reason of the great press of business in the land office, it is understood the patent was not issued until 1839. But there can be no doubt that the interest of the purchaser, whether it be equitable or legal, was liable to taxation. All property, by whatever name it may be denominated, is liable to be taxed. Until the patent is issued the purchaser has not the legal title, but having made his entry of the land and paid for it, the government can no more dispose of the land to another person, than if the patent had been issued. The final certificate obtained on the payment of the money, is as binding on the government as the patent. That the statute of 1836 [Laws Mich. 1835–36, pp. 57, 60] imposed a tax on these lands, has been settled by the state tribunals. The assessors were required to examine the land office of the United States, to ascertain what lands had been entered, and they were set down for taxation, so that the only question open is as to the power of the state; and that it has this power, as before remarked, there seems to be no doubt. Lands thus purchased descend to the heirs, and do not go to the administrator. They are treated as real estate, and in some states are liable to be sold on execution, before the patent is issued. When the patent issues, it relates back to the entry, and makes good any conveyance the purchaser may have made.

In Ohio, it has often been decided that lands are liable to be taxed by the state before the patent is obtained; and this has embraced land under the credit system, before it was paid for. So lands located by Virginia military warrants, are liable to be taxed before the patent. But whether, on the face of the bill, the court have jurisdiction, is the important question to be considered. It does not follow that there is no jurisdiction, from the mere fact that the defendant is auditor of state. No suit can be sustained against a state; but an unconstitutional law affords no justification to a state officer for an act injurious to an individual. The officer is not the state, and can set up no exemption under it, unless he act within the authority of law. But the judiciary cannot exercise a revisory proceeding over executive duties. In carrying a law into effect, the executive must necessarily construe it, and it is not for this or any other court to say that there is error in the construction, and a different course must be pursued. It is true, if an act be done without the authority of law, the individual that acts is responsible; and where the mischief would be irremediable, an injunction may be interposed. But, it is only in such a case that the judicial power could be exerted. In all matters of discretion, and in regard to the forms of proceeding, it is clear, that executive acts cannot, in any form, be drawn in question by the judicial power. This power is limited to cases where by the exercise of the executive functions an injury is done to an individual; and in such cases there is a remedy at law. Upon the whole, we think the demurrer to the bill must be sustained. We think the tax was properly imposed by the state, and it does not appear from the bill that the errors stated in the assessment of the tax are of such a character as to produce great mischief, should the land be sold for the taxes. We see no probable result from the proceeding, which may not be remedied by an action at law.

District Court, E. D. Michigan. March, 1874.

STALE CLAIM—PURCHASER BOUND TO USE DUE DILIGENCE.

1. Where the buyer of a vessel, who had given non-negotiable notes for the purchase money, advanced $2,000 on account of certain claims against her, taking up his notes to this amount, and neglected to ascertain the nature and full amount of the claims, which information was easily accessible, it was Held that, in suits for the residue of the claims, he did not stand in the position of a bona fide purchaser without due notice, though he had paid for the vessel in full.

2. The purchaser of a vessel is bound to the exercise of reasonable diligence to ascertain the nature and amount of liens against her.

3. Notice to a purchaser, while a sufficient amount of purchase money remains unpaid to meet the liens, is as effectual to keep the liens alive as it would be if he had such notice at the time of such purchase.

In admiralty. Libels for supplies, towage services, and repairs. The only defense was, that the claimant was a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration, in good faith and without notice of liens, and that the liens had become stale and extinguished as against the vessel in claimant's hands, by failure of the libellants to prosecute within a reasonable time. In October, 1870, the Atalanta was disabled in a storm on Lake Huron, and the claims in this case were for towage, supplies and repairs rendered in consequence thereof and at that time. The vessel was then owned in Chicago, and belonged to the estate of her former owner, then deceased. One Wm. H. Rogers was administrator of said estate. Immediately after the repairs, the vessel returned to her home port, Chicago. During the season of 1871 she made one trip to Buffalo, but with that exception, she was not again in the waters of this district until she was seized upon, by process from this court, in May, 1872. Libellants had no knowledge of her trip to Buffalo at the time, although they were on the watch for her. The claimant Whitbeck purchased the vessel of the administrator Roberts, in February, 1871, for $10,575, her full value, of which he paid half cash, and for the other half gave five promissory notes, payable in six months from date. For the purpose of protecting Whitbeck against liens, these notes were made non-negotiable, and each one had indorsed upon it a statement that it should not be collectable so long as there were any unpaid liens upon the vessel. These claims were duly filed and proved in the probate court at Chicago. Soon thereafter an arrangement was made by which one Connors, who had a power of attorney from libellants to collect these claims, and the administrator Rogers called upon Whitbeck for the purpose of obtaining payment of the claims. and he did take up two of the $1,000 non-negotiable notes, and gave negotiable notes instead, which were discounted and the proceeds remitted to libellants, who credited the same upon their claims, but they were not sufficient to pay them in full. Two other of the non-negotiable notes were paid to Rogers at the date of their maturity, but the third, for $1,285.50, remains still unpaid. During the winter of 1871–2, the vessel was seized at Chicago upon a chattel mortgage, and to redeem the same Whitbeck paid $1,142, which he claims as an offset to the remaining note, leaving but a small amount of the purchase money unpaid.

H. B. Brown, for libellants.

Connors swears that, at the time he received the $2,000 in negotiable notes of Whitbeck, he informed him of the amount of the claims on account of which the notes were given. Whitbeck denies this, but admits the notes were given on account of these claims. Paying $2,000, as he did, upon these claims, he was bound to inquire their amount, and cannot now plead his ignorance. He cannot shut his eyes and claim the rights of a bona fide purchaser. But irrespective of notice, libellants have been guilty of no laches, and are entitled to recover, as the vessel was not once in the district, to their knowledge, until she was attached. General admiralty rule requires that every libel in rem should state that the "property is in the district." The Sarah Ann, [Case No. 12,342;] The General Jackson, [Id. 5,314;] Burk v. The Rich. [Id. 2,162;] The D. M. French, [Id. 3,938.] The question is, has the libellant used due diligence, considering all the circumstances of the case? bona fide purchaser at the time of payment, as well as at the time of the sale. Blanchard v. Tyler, 12 Mich. 339.

W. A. Moore, for claimant.

Whitbeck was a bona fide purchaser of the vessel, without actual notice of the existence of the claims at the time of the purchase, or that they were outstanding and unpaid at the completion of the purchase price: 1st. By the terms of purchase the title was to be perfect, and the vessel free of liens and incumbrances; and, to secure that, five notes were made non-negotiable. 2d. Rogers and Connors asked for two of the notes to be made negotiable, to pay libellant's claims. No claim for more was made, nor was more ever requested to pay any claims at any time. 3d. The remaining two $1,000 notes were left by Rogers at his bank, and they were paid at or soon after maturity, which Whitbeck would not have done, if he had supposed other claims were outstanding. 4th. The note for $1,287.50 was not paid, because Whitbeck supposed that it was settled by payment of mortgage on the vessel, and costs and expenses connected therewith.

More than one year elapsed after the debts were contracted before any proceedings were taken against the vessel. 1st. The vessel made one trip to Buffalo and return, and therefore, although she may not have stopped at Port Huron, she passed there twice, and must have been for at least from thirty to forty hours within the jurisdiction of this court. 2d. The balance of two seasons of navigation she was accessible, by writ from the district court of the western district of Michigan, or of the northern district of Illinois. 3d. That libellants cannot plead ignorance of the whereabouts of the vessel, for they knew where she was in the summer of 1871, while their agent was endeavoring to collect, in probate court in Chicago, the home port of the vessel.

In this case the libellants had an opportunity to enforce their claim in rem, in the spring of 1871, from this district, for the remainder of the season of 1871, in the western district of Michigan and the northern district of Illinois. They permitted the vessel to pass into a bona fide purchaser's hands, and permitted him to pay the purchase price, without putting the purchaser upon inquiry until after more than one year had elapsed. Under the law, as construed by this court, the claim has become stale. The Buckeye State, [Case No. 13,445;] The Dubuque, [Id. 4,110;] Willard v. Dorr, [Id. 17,679;] Brown v. Shipp. & Adm. 361.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. I. There is no direct evidence that Whitbeck had notice of the particular liens in question at the time of his purchase. The fact, however, that he took the precautions he did to protect himself against liens affords a strong presumption that he knew there were liens then in existence, and to a considerable amount, in addition to the chattel mortgage; and if he knew that much, it would be but a short and reasonable step further, to hold him responsible for the additional knowledge of what those liens were and by whom they were held, especially in the absence of all proof that he made any effort to gain such knowledge, or that it was withheld or concealed from him. But, as we shall presently see, it is unnecessary in this case to resort to such presumptions.

II. Notice to the purchaser while a sufficient amount of the purchase money remained unpaid to meet the liens, is as effectual to keep the liens alive as it would be if he had such notice at the time of such purchase, especially where, as in this case, the balance of purchase money was not secured by negotiable paper. At the time Whitbeck took up the two $1,000 non-negotiable notes and gave negotiable notes in lieu, for the purpose of raising money to pay on these claims, there was then still remaining unpaid on the purchase money an amount more than sufficient to pay the balance of these claims in addition to the chattel mortgage. Then, if not before, he had notice of the existence of these specific claims. But he insists that, because only $2,000 was then demanded of him, he had the right to suppose that the claims represented by Connors, with whom he did the business, were no more than that in amount, although he makes no pretense that any such representation was made by Connors, or that the payment then made was understood to be in full. On the contrary, Connors testified that he thought, as it is quite reasonable he would have done, that he told Whitbeck at the time what the claims amounted to. This was not positively denied by Whitbeck, although he said he did not recollect the fact, and thought it was not so. At all events, and this is conceded by Whitbeck, he was then informed, and knew, if he did not before, that the claims were on file in the probate court, where they were readily accessible to him at any time he might desire to examine them. He also admitted that he may have gone to the probate office and examined the claims, but as to whether he did or did not, his recollection was again quite indistinct. He knew, however, that the information was within his reach, and that it was readily accessible, and if he failed to avail himself of it, he must suffer the consequences of his neglect, and be held responsible for the knowledge he would have gained if he had made the requisite examination. Finally, taking all the proofs together, and taking into consideration the nature and character of the transactions in question, and in view of what a reasonable business man, engaged in an important business transaction, would naturally and almost inevitably do in the same circumstances, the court cannot avoid the conviction that Whitbeck not only must be presumed to have known, but that he actually did know that there were balances of these claims unpaid, before he paid the remaining two $1,000 notes to the administrator. Therefore, upon all considerations, Whitbeck cannot be granted any exemption from the liens claimed by libellants, for want of notice.

III. Laches on the part of libellants in prosecuting their liens could be made available, if at all, in this case, only in case of want of notice of the liens to Whitbeck as a subsequent purchaser. As the court has already decided that Whitbeck is chargeable with such notice, a consideration of this point is unnecessary. It results, that libellants must have decrees in their favor for the balances due them respectively, including interest to this date, and for costs.

SALVAGE—COMPENSATION—APPORTIONMENT.

[Seven large wrecking vessels and several small boats, carrying in all 78 men, went to the assistance of a schooner which had run ashore on a Florida reef. All were employed to assist in saving the schooner and cargo, and spent four days (during which the sea was rough, and the schooner became a total loss) in saving and bringing into port the cargo, a portion of which they got by diving; and the aggregate value of the cargo and materials saved was $41,756.41, of which the large vessels saved $41,451.84. Held, that the large vessels should be allowed a salvage compensation of 30 per cent. of the value of the property saved by them, less costs and charges, and that the small boats should receive 50 per cent. of what they saved.]

MARVIN, District Judge. This schooner, (Welton, master,) laden with an assorted cargo, and bound from New York to Appalachicola, on the night of the 19th of September last, ran ashore on that part of the Florida reef known as the "Western Dry Rocks," situated a few miles west of Sand Key. On the morning of the 20th the wrecking vessels Florida, Dart, Champion, Texas, Chesnut, Champlin, and Lafayette, carrying in all seventy-eight men, arrived at her assistance; and, the sea being rough, and the vessel badly ashore, and in immediate peril of total loss, they were at once all employed to assist to save the vessel and cargo. The vessel lay on the outside of the reef, exposed to the action of the sea, in eight and six feet water, her starboard bilge pressing on a rock lying nearly underneath her main chains. When the wreckers boarded her, she was leaking considerably, but still one pump could keep her free. They immediately carried out an anchor by which to heave her off; and, as the water was too shallow to allow any of their vessels to come alongside, they commenced boating cargo on board their vessels. The leak increased in a short time, so that two pumps could not keep her free; and, about five o'clock in the afternoon, she filled with water, careened over on her starboard side, and appeared to be bilged. She became a total loss. The wreckers took out the cargo, a portion of which, they got by diving, and brought it to this port. They were employed in this service four days. During a considerable part of the time, the weather was squally, and the sea rough. The entire cargo and materials were boated on board their vessels. The aggregate amount of the value of the cargo saved is $40,771.83, and the value of the materials is $984.58, making $41,756.41, as the entire value of the property saved. Of this sum the seven large vessels saved $41,451.84. Thirty per cent. of this sum, less the costs and charges, is a reasonable salvage for these vessels and crews, and fifty per cent. to the small boats.

ATTACHMENT—FOREIGN CORPORATION—AN ADMIRALTY PROCEEDING NOT A "CIVIL SUIT" WITHIN SECTION 11 OF THE JUDICIARY ACT.

1. Where a libel was filed against a corporation foreign to the district, and under process issued upon that libel property of the corporation was attached, and a motion was made to set aside the attachment, as contrary to the provision of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, Held. 2. That if they did, the act of August 23, 1842, and the supreme court rules of 1845 must be held to have repealed that section as far as relates to admiralty proceedings.

3. That the power to attach the property of absent defendants to compel an appearance has always been recognized as within "the course of the admiralty," and the intention to withdraw it or to limit its power will not be inferred from the use of an indefinite phrase.

[Cited in Casey v. Leary, Case No. 2,497.]

4. That the objection to the proceedings based upon the words of the eleventh section of the act of 1789, is not tenable.

[In admiralty. [Motion denied. This cause was heard on the merits. Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 601.]

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for the motion.
Benedict, Tracy & Benedict, opposed.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This motion is brought up in order to obtain of this court its construction of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, [1 Stat. 78,] as affecting proceedings in admiralty.

The action is against a foreign corporation created by the laws of New Jersey, and the process was served by attaching the property of the corporation found in this district. This attachment the defendants now move to set aside upon the ground that the provision of the eleventh section of the judiciary act, which declares "that no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ," governs proceedings in admiralty.

The question is not new. It has been up in various districts, and has been decided both ways. In the southern district of New York, although I find no reported case deciding the precise point, the construction adopted and adhered to for many years has been to consider proceedings in admiralty as not affected by the provision in question. A construction as firmly fixed as this is in the practice of the southern district I should feel bound to follow in this district, even if doubt were entertained as to whether that construction would be laid down if the question were new; for the interests of suitors, as well as the convenience of the judges and the bar, require that if possible the practice of the two courts having concurrent jurisdiction over the waters of this harbor should coincide upon a point like this.

But it seems to me that the question ought to be considered settled by authority. Numerous cases in which the question has existed and where it is not reasonable to suppose that the point was overlooked, have arisen in the southern district, which have been carried by appeal to the circuit court of this circuit, and there the rightfulness of the jurisdiction has been always assumed by both court and counsel. Beyond this, the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, decided by the supreme court, (6 How. [47 U. S.] 344,) presented the question, but no such point was made or alluded to, either in the opinion of the court or in the three dissenting opinions, although the discussion was upon the subject of the jurisdiction. "A tacit recognition like this is equivalent to an express determination." [Cliquot's Champagne,] 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 144.

That the question has been thus passed over, indicates that it has not been considered to be an open one, since the decision of Judge Story in Clark v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., [Case No. 2,859,] and of the supreme court in Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473. These cases with the opposing decision by Judge Hoffman in the California district,—Wilson v. Pierce, [Case No. 17,826,]—have moreover been lately considered and weighed by the distinguished author of Parsons' Maritime Law, who thus announces his conclusion: "We do not consider this decision (Wilson v. Pierce, Hoffman, J.,) to be correct, and have no doubt but that a person who resides out of a certain district may be sued in admiralty in the district, if he has property there which can be attached." 2 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 686. To my mind, the decisions referred to, confirmed by long practice, and supported by an opinion like the one above cited, constitute a weight of authority abundantly sufficient to place the question at rest.

I cannot hope to add anything to the force of the authorities I have referred to, but in view of the late contrary decision in the district of Connecticut which has occasioned this motion, (Blair v. Bemis, [Case No. 1,484,] Shipman, J.,) I shall venture some considerations which seem to sustain the construction of the phrase "civil suit" in the eleventh section of the judiciary act as referring to ordinary proceedings in courts of law and equity, and not intended to include causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

[2] [Reversed by circuit court in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 602; but that decree was reversed by the supreme court in 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 272, and the decree ordered affirmed.]

I notice first, then, that in the process act of 1789, which was passed but five days after the judiciary act, and was doubtless under consideration when the judiciary act was passed, admiralty proceedings were not only specially provided for, but they are designated by their appropriate name. It is a reasonable supposition that the same congress passing the two acts almost simultaneously would have used the same particular and proper designation in the eleventh section of the judiciary act, if it had intended there to refer to admiralty proceedings.

Again, the eleventh section of the judiciary act gave rise to difficulties which it was found necessary to remedy, and the first section of the act of February 28th, 1839, [1 Stat. 321,] was passed for that purpose. Law, Pr. p. 84. But this latter section is only made applicable to "suits in law or in equity," although the same difficulties would arise in admiralty proceedings if such proceedings were within the provision of the eleventh section. The studied omission of admiralty proceedings from the effect of the remedial section of the act of 1839, shows, therefore, that those proceedings were not then considered as having been affected by the provision of the eleventh section sought to be remedied.

Indeed, in any properly drawn statute admiralty proceedings, when referred to, will be in some way specially designated, and they are so designated in very many if not most of the statutes heretofore considered as covering them. For instance, the act of August 21, 1862, (12 Stat. 588.) They are proceedings so diverse in form and in spirit from ordinary civil suits, and are applicable to classes of property, of persons, and of obligations, so peculiar in their character and their necessities, and are so seldom in the mind of the law makers in passing general statutes, that it seems to be proper to hold as a general rule of construction that, unless alluded to by name or otherwise necessarily within the provisions of any particular statute, such proceedings will be deemed excluded.

Certainly great confusion will arise if in the numerous statutes now being enacted, affecting new classes of industry and of persons, and providing new forms of remedy, admiralty proceedings are to be considered as referred to whenever the words "suit," "civil suit," or "civil action" are used.

Take as an illustration the act of May 4, 1858, (11 Stat. 272,) which requires residence in the district to give jurisdiction in suits in this and many other states, and its effect upon the well known admiralty proceeding in rem against the ship and in personam against the master under the same libel and process, a proceeding often necessary to a proper administration of the maritime law. If the word "suit" in the act of May 4, 1858, covers causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, this proceeding is substantially destroyed, for it is seldom indeed that the ship is to be found in the district where the master resides.

Take also the more important admiralty proceeding to obtain possession of a ship, which is a proceeding in personam. 22 Adm. Rule; The S. C. Ives, [Case No. 7,958.] What, under the construction contended for, is to be done when the residence of the defendant is in one district and the ship to be seized and delivered is in another? Is it possible that embarrassments like these and those others which are indicated by the act of February, 1839, as having arisen in ordinary civil suits, have existed in admiralty proceedings from 1789 to this day, without attracting attention and calling for remedy? There is still another aspect to this question. By the act of 1842, authority was given to the supreme court to provide, regulate, and alter proceedings in admiralty, under which authority the general admiralty rules were promulgated by the supreme court in 1845. Now these rules, which are held to be effective as statutes, seem to ignore the provision of the judiciary act in question, and authorize service of admiralty process by the attachment of property in all cases where the defendant cannot be found. Even if then the terms of the limitation of the eleventh section of the judiciary act were to be held to cover admiralty proceedings, the act of 1842 and the rules of 1845 taken together would be effective as a repeal of the provision so far as applicable to admiralty proceedings. Such an effect was given to these rules by Judge Betts in regard to the important act of January 14, 1841, [1 Stat. 410,] abolishing imprisonment for debt "on process issuing out of courts of the United States." Gaines v. Travis, [Id. 5,180.] And the decision was confirmed by the action of the supreme court in amending the rule.

Moreover, these rules are intended to be and are but the embodiment, for the sake of uniformity in the various districts, of most ancient and important modes of proceeding—adapted to meet the peculiar necessities of ships and of commerce on the sea—substantially the same in all maritime countries and known as "the course of the admiralty." They are one of the special characteristics of causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, causes which do not differ from ordinary civil suits so much in the law to be declared as in the way in which it is administered. These methods and modes of proceeding are the life of the admiralty. They constitute an essential part of the jurisdiction which the grant of the constitution secures to the national courts, and when the district courts were constituted courts of admiralty they acquired the right to those methods and modes, among which has from the first been the power to seize property of defendants who cannot be found, and to compel an appearance. This power is recognized by the admiralty rules as existing in these courts; it has never been conferred upon any other tribunal, and any intention to place it in abeyance, or to limit its exercise, when entertained by the law-making power, will, it may well be supposed, be clearly expressed and not left to be inferred from the use of a general and indefinite phrase.

It may be added, in conclusion, that no inconvenience or injustice is known to have been caused by the exercise of this power by the district courts, and it is believed that a withdrawal of it now would be deemed a misfortune to the classes of interests to be affected thereby.

If either from changes in the habits of commerce, or from modifications which are found necessary and become fixed in the practice of admiralty courts of other countries, or from changes in the spirit of our institutions, a limitation of the mode of exercising this power shall become necessary or proper, it is not to be doubted that the supreme court as the high appellate court of admiralty, and as empowered by the act of 1842, will effect a change in this particular as it most properly did in regard to the power of imprisonment.

The objection to the proceedings based upon the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, is therefore held to be untenable, and the motion to set aside the attachment on that ground is denied.

[NOTE. This case was reversed by the circuit court, as to the points decided in above opinion, in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 602; but, upon appeal to the supreme court, the circuit court decree was reversed in 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 272, and this opinion affirmed. See note to Case No. 602.]

Case No. 601.

ATKINS et al. v. FIBRE DISINTEGRATING CO.

[2 Ben. 381.]

District Court, E. D. New York. April, 1868.[2]

CHARTER—FREIGHT PER BUNDLE — SECOND SAFE PORT—MASTER'S AUTHORITY.

1. Where a vessel was chartered in New York for a voyage to Kingston, Jamaica, to load with a full cargo of bamboo, in bundles of a specified size, for freight payable per bundle, and it was specified in the charter that if the charterers did not have sufficient cargo to load her at Kingston, they were to have the privilege of sending her "to a second safe port," and the vessel went to Kingston and partly loaded, and was directed to go to Port Morant to complete her loading, and the bamboo with which she was loaded at both ports was in bundles of larger size than that specified in the charter, which the master received under protest, and the vessel, in coming out of Port Morant, owing to the land breeze dying away, as she was coming out through a narrow channel, there being no tugs in the port, nor any means of getting out except the land breeze, struck on one of the reefs which form the channel, and was seriously injured, and the owners sued on the charter to recover the damages sustained by the vessel and also the charter money: Held, That the vessel was entitled to recover freight under the charter, at the rate specified in the charter, for as many bundles, of the size specified in the charter, as she could carry.

2. That the words "a second safe port," imply a port which this vessel could enter and depart from without legal restraint, and without incurring more than the ordinary perils of the seas; and that, on the facts, Port Morant was not such a port, and the master of the vessel would have been justified in refusing to go there.

3. But that, as he made no objection, but went without giving any notice of an intention to hold the charterers responsible for any injury that might arise from its unsafeness, he must be deemed to have waived the objection, and his action bound his owners, and they could not recover for the injury received by the vessel in coming out of the port.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. This was an action in which the libellants, who were the owners of the ship Elizabeth Hamilton, sought to recover the sum of $19,500, as the sum due them upon a charter of that vessel made with the respondents. As to the contract there was no dispute. According to its terms the vessel was bound to proceed to Kingston, Jamaica, and there load for New York with a full cargo, both under and on deck, of bamboo, in bundles five feet long and two feet square, for which service she was to receive two dollars and a half per bundle, payable on proper delivery in New York. It was also provided, that in case there should not be cargo enough at Kingston, the charterers were to have "the privilege of sending the vessel to a second safe port, by paying all expenses incurred in changing ports, and the time consumed in changing ports to count as lay days." Under this contract, the vessel duly proceeded to Kingston, and was there partly loaded, and was then directed to proceed to Port Morant to complete her cargo. She accordingly proceeded to Port Morant, and was there filled up with bamboo. But neither the bamboo received in Kingston nor that received at Port Morant corresponded with the contract, the bundles being larger and longer than was required by the charter. It was all received under protest and notice that it was not received as complying with the contract. When the vessel was loaded at Port Morant, she attempted to go to sea, but as she was passing out of the port the breeze failed her, and she struck upon a reef and received considerable injury before she was got off. She then proceeded to New York and delivered her cargo, and brought this action to recover freight on four thousand bundles, at $2.50 each, that being her alleged capacity for bundles of the size provided in the contract, and also for demurrage for twenty days used in loading and discharging and changing ports beyond the lay days given in the charter, and also for $7,500 as the amount of the injury received by the vessel in coming out of Port Morant.

[This action was commenced by attachment against the respondent, a foreign corporation, and, upon hearing, a motion to set aside the attachment was denied in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 600. Decree for libellants. Afterwards reversed by the circuit court in Case No. 602; but that decree was reversed by the supreme court in 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 272, with direction that this, the decree of the district court, be affirmed.]

Benedict & Benedict, for libellants.
Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. As it is not disputed that the bundles of bamboo which were furnished to the vessel were larger than the contract permitted, and as the evidence is clear and full that the vessel brought all that she could stow of bundles such as were furnished, the libellants are entitled to receive payment at the rate of $2.50 for as many bundles as she could stow of the required size. They are also entitled, upon the evidence, to recover demurrage, at the rate of $100 per day, for all days used exceeding the lay days given by the charter, including the time used in changing ports.

But they are not entitled to recover the amount claimed for damages sustained in coming out of Port Morant; and this, although it must be conceded that, upon the evidence, Port Morant cannot be held to be a safe port, within the meaning of the charter. The words, "second safe port," imply a port which this vessel could enter and depart from without legal restraint, and without incurring more than the ordinary perils of the seas. The evidence shows that, by reason of reefs extending nearly across the narrow entrance of this port, a vessel of the size of the Elizabeth Hamilton must strike the reefs if, by chance, the breeze should fail her while passing in or out. On the present occasion she passed in in safety, but in coming out the breeze did fail, and she accordingly struck the reefs, and sustained the injury now sought to be recovered.

This accident, as appears from the evidence, was from no want of judgment or seamanship on the part of the vessel, but was inevitable under the circumstances, by reason of the narrowness and character of the channel. No tugs were to be had, and the only power by which this vessel could get out was that of the land breeze; while the peril of the port was such that no vessel of this size could get out without making her safety from the reefs dependent entirely upon the continuance of the breeze. Such a hazard the vessel was not bound to incur under the charter, and the master would have been justified in refusing to accept the designation of such a port as a port within the privilege given in the charter.

But he did not do so. On the contrary, he proceeded to Port Morant, entered the port, and there completed his cargo and then again departed, without objecting to the port, and without giving any notice that it was the intention to hold the charterers responsible for any injury that might arise from its unsafeness. This action of the master bound his owners.

The master is the navigator, presumed to know best the channel of the ports within the natural range of the adventure, and the capacities of his vessel; and he is the proper person to determine whether his vessel can or cannot enter any particular port.

In this case the second port was to be designated at Kingston, where the owners did not intend to be except in the person of the master; and they must have intended that the master should act for them in determining the question which would arise when the second port should be designated, and must be there decided.

If, then, the port named was deemed an unsafe port for his vessel, and so not within the privilege given by the charter, it was the duty of the master, as the sole representative of the owners, to have made known his objections at the time. Not having done so, he must be deemed to have waived the right to object, and, the condition having been waived, no action can now be maintained for the breach of it.

But it is said that the master was induced to accept Port Morant as within the terms of the contract by the representations of the charterers' agent that it was a safe port; and that his acceptance was a qualified acceptance, given upon representations which amounted to a warranty.

The evidence is, that when the agent first spoke of designating Port Morant, he did inform the master that it was a safe port, but it also appears that the master made inquiries elsewhere as to the character of the port, which was, moreover, fully described in the Coast Pilot; and I do not think it could be justly held, upon the evidence, that any thing said or done by the master was calculated to lead the charterers' agent to suppose that Port Morant was not accepted by the master upon his own judgment as a proper port, duly designated within the privilege given by the charter party, or to inform him that the charterer was to be held responsible in case the vessel received injury in using that port.

The claim for the injuries received in Port Morant is accordingly rejected, and a decree rendered in favor of the libellants for the other portions of their demand, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount, in accordance with this opinion.

[NOTE. This action was commenced by attachment against the respondent, a foreign corporation, and, at a former hearing, a motion to set aside the attachment was denied. Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 600. After this opinion on the merits was filed, an appeal was presented to the circuit court, and the decree reversed, on the ground that the attachment should have been set aside. Case No. 602. Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Dec. 14, 1870.[2]

ADMIRALTY—OBJECTION TO JURISDICTION—WAIVER—RESIDENCE OF CORPORATION.

1. A district court of the United States, as a court of admiralty, cannot obtain jurisdiction to proceed in personam against an inhabitant of the United States, not residing within the district, by attachment of the goods or property of such inhabitant, found therein, to compel an appearance.

4. A corporation created by or under the laws of another state of the United States, is to be regarded, in reference to the point above stated, as an inhabitant of the state by or under whose laws it was so created.

5. An entry in the record of the district court, that, on the return day of the process of attachment, A. B. "appears for the respondent, and has a week to perfect an appearance, and to answer," does not show a submission to the jurisdiction and a waiver of objection, which precludes such respondent from insisting thereafter that the court has not, by attachment of goods, obtained jurisdiction to proceed in the cause against him.

[2] [Reversing Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 601, Id. 600. Reversed by supreme court in 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 272.]

In admiralty. The libel in this case charged, that the respondents were a corporation, and had property in the eastern district of New York; that a charter party was executed by and between the libellants and the respondents, by which the latter chartered the ship Elizabeth Hamilton, for a voyage from the port of Kingston, Jamaica, to New York, agreeing to provide and furnish a full cargo of bamboo, in bundles five feet long and two feet square, both under and upon deck, to be stowed without dunnage, at a freight of $2.50 per bundle, payable on delivery at New York, with a further stipulation, that, if there should not be cargo enough at Kingston to load the vessel, the respondents should have the privilege of sending the vessel to a second safe port, the vessel to be fitted, provided and navigated by, and at the expense of, the libellants, and the respondents to pay demurrage at $100 per day, for any greater detention than a specified number of lay days; that the vessel proceeded to Jamaica, and was there loaded in part by the agent of the respondents, and the master was directed to proceed to Port Morant, to take in more cargo; that she did so, but, in coming out of the harbor, at the port last named, struck a reef, and was injured; and that such last named port was falsely represented by the respondents, or their agents, to the master of the vessel, to be a safe port, when, in truth, it was unsafe, unsuitable, and dangerous. The libellants claimed, that the respondents did not furnish bamboo in bundles of the length, form and size specified; that, by reason thereof, and of their irregular form, a much less number could be stowed; that the bundles in fact brought, being larger than the specification, were equivalent to a much larger number of the required size; and that, therefore, the respondents were liable for freight according to the number of bundles which might have been brought, of the precise form and size mentioned in the charter party; that is, at the rate of $2.50 for every 20 cubic feet, $10,000. They also claimed $2,000 for demurrage, for an alleged detention of 20 days, and $7,500 for compensation for the damage done to the vessel by striking the reef in the harbor of Port Morant. The prayer of the libel was, "that process in due form of law may issue against the said respondents, and that they may be cited to appear and answer, upon oath, all and singular the premises, and, if they be not found, then that a foreign attachment issue against their property within this district, and that this court would be pleased to decree in favor of the libellants, for the payment by the respondents of said sum of $19,500, besides interest and costs, and otherwise right and justice to administer in the premises."

Process was issued accordingly, commanding the marshal to cite and admonish the respondents, if found within the jurisdiction of the district court, to appear on the 20th of June, 1866, to answer the libel, and, if the respondents could not be found, then to attach their goods and chattels to the amount sued for. On the return day, the marshal returned to the process, that the respondents were not found, and that he had attached all the property of the respondents in their factory, at Red Hook, in the city of Brooklyn. The record contained this entry, as a proceeding on that day: "Mr. Beebe appears for the respondents, and has a week to perfect an appearance and to answer." Thereupon, the respondents procured an order to show cause, why the property should not be discharged from the attachment, or why such other order should not be made as the court should see fit to grant. The affidavits on the part of the respondents showed, that the officers of the respondents' corporation were within the jurisdiction, and that no effort was made by the marshal to find or serve them. The affidavits produced and filed by the libellants showed, that the respondents were a corporation, incorporated by the laws of the state of New Jersey, but having a manufactory, and carrying on business, in the eastern district of New York. The record did not show any disposition of the motion, except by an order dated the 22d of March, 1867, which recited, that a motion had been made to vacate and set aside the attachment and proceedings under the same, "based upon the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, [1 Stat. 78,] on the ground that the respondents are and were nonresidents of the state, and not found therein;" and such motion was, by such order, denied. The opinion of the court on the motion will be found in 1 Ben. 118, [Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 600.] It discusses at length the jurisdiction of the court in admiralty to proceed in personam against an inhabitant of the United States, though not an inhabitant of the district, nor found therein, and sustains the power of the court to proceed by attachment of the property of such an inhabitant, and thence to a decree. Meantime, under an express agreement that it should not prejudice their motion to discharge the property, and that, if such motion should be granted, their stipulations should be cancelled, the respondents had given stipulations for value in $25,000, and the property attached was discharged from custody. After the decision of the motion, the respondents answered the libel, denying the causes of action alleged, and setting up the fact that the respondents were a corporation, incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and were not residents of the eastern district of New York, and that it was not alleged in the libel that the respondents were either in the district, or resided in the district. The cause being tried, [Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 601,] the district court, upon the proofs, decreed that the libellants should recover against the respondents, for the reasons and causes mentioned in the libel, except that no claim should be allowed for injuries sustained by the libellants' vessel in Port Morant, and ordered a reference to compute the amount due. The commissioner reported $9,737 due for freight, and $1,500 for demurrage, and $1,822.26 for interest, and, thereupon, a final decree was made, that the libellants recover against the respondents, the Fibre Disintegrating Company, the sum of $13,059.26, so reported due, with $243.44, costs, as taxed, making $13,302.70, "and that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered therefor, in favor of said libellants, against the said respondents," and that the stipulators for value cause their stipulations to be performed, &c.

Both parties appealed to this court—the respondents from the decree as made, and the libellants from the disallowance of their claim for damages by reason of the injury to the ship at Port Morant. [This decree was afterwards reversed by the supreme court in 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 272.]

Erastus C. Benedict, for libellant.
Charles Donohue, for respondent.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The respondents insist, that the district court had no jurisdiction to proceed herein, because such respondents were not an inhabitant of the eastern district of New York, nor found therein. If the respondents are right in this, it will be wholly unnecessary to consider any question arising on the merits, on the appeal of either party.

(1) The libellants insist, that the respondents were not in a situation to raise the objection, and that, by appearance, the objection was waived. I think that in this the claim of the libellants has no sufficient foundation. The record shows, only, that, on the return day of the process, "Mr. Beebe appears for the respondents, and has a week to perfect an appearance and to answer." This ought not to be regarded as an appearance which operates as a voluntary submission to the jurisdiction and a waiver of the objection. No doubt, a general appearance and answer, without objection, is to be deemed a voluntary appearance, and is equivalent to service of process within the district. But here the respondents were allowed time to perfect an appearance, and immediately moved to set aside the proceeding; and, that being denied by the court, they were compelled to answer, and did so, by setting up the objection. It was according to the ancient practice in admiralty, in cases of attachment, not to recognize anything as an appearance but putting in of bail; and a similar practice formerly obtained in New York, in cases of attachments against foreign corporations. Although special bail be not now required in New York, it is obvious, that neither party regarded an appearance by the respondents as perfected, and the libellants stipulated expressly that the subsequent bond for value should not operate as a waiver of the respondents' motion.

(2) Upon the important question, whether a court of admiralty in one district can obtain jurisdiction to proceed against an inhabitant of another district by attachment of his goods, the opinion of the district judge in this case shows some conflict of opinion.

The question is not affected by the circumstance that the respondents are a corporation. For the purposes of the question, a corporation must be deemed an inhabitant of the state in which it is incorporated, and it is as clearly within the reason of the rule regulating jurisdiction over inhabitants, as a natural person. I, therefore, treat the question precisely as I should if the respondents were a natural person, an inhabitant of New Jersey, sued in the eastern district of New York, by attachment of his goods, and not found nor served with process.

Had the district court, sitting in admiralty, jurisdiction to proceed in that manner against the respondents, upon the cause of action alleged? The cause of action was maritime, and, therefore, it was a subject of admiralty jurisdiction. This is not questioned by the respondents. Thereupon, the libellants insist, that it is according to the long and well-established practice of courts of admiralty, to proceed against a respondent by attachment of his goods, if he absconds from, or cannot be found within, the jurisdiction of the court, to be served with process; that, when the congress of the United States established courts of admiralty, and gave them "cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty, and maritime jurisdiction," (Act Sept. 24, 1789, "to establish the judicial courts of the United States," § 9; 1 Stat. 76,) and provided that "the forms and modes of proceedings, in causes of * * * admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be according to the course of the civil law," (Act Sept. 29, 1789, "to regulate processes in the courts of the United States," § 2; 1 Stat. 93,) they sanctioned this mode of obtaining jurisdiction to proceed against a respondent, in personam, for the recovery of a demand which is, in its nature, cognizable in those courts; that this is further confirmed by the second section of the act of May 8, 1792, (1 Stat. 276,) which provides, that "the forms of writs, executions, and other process, except their style, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits, in those of common law, shall be the same as are now used in the said courts respectively, in pursuance of the act entitled, 'An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States,' in those of equity and in those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, according to the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of equity and courts of admiralty, respectively, as contradistinguished from courts of common law; except so far as may have been provided for by the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, subject, however, to such alterations and additions as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the supreme court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same;" that, if the question were before doubtful, no such doubt can exist since the act of August 23, 1842, (5 Stat. 516,) which (section 6) gives to the supreme court of the United States "full power * * * to prescribe and regulate and alter the forms of writs, and other process, to be used and issued in the district and circuit courts of the United States, and the forms and modes of framing and filing libels, bills, answers, and other proceedings and pleadings in suits at common law, or in admiralty and in equity, pending in said courts; * * * and, generally, to regulate the whole practice of the said courts, so as to prevent delays and to promote brevity and succinctness in all pleadings and proceedings therein, and to abolish all unnecessary costs and expenses in any suit therein;" and that, by authority of the foregoing statutes, the supreme court have provided by rule, (rule 2, in admiralty,) that, where the respondent to a libel filed in admiralty cannot be found within the district, process may issue against his property in such district.

The general proposition deducible from the statutes above referred to was decided by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Manro v. Almeida, (in 1825,) 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473, and is not open for discussion in this court, namely, that the courts of the United States, proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, may issue the process of attachment to compel appearance, in cases of maritime torts and contracts.

As that is the only case in which the question appears to have been raised and passed upon in that court, and as the decision of that court is conclusive upon me, it is important to state what the case was in which the above general proposition is held, and to what precise extent the decision goes. The libel was filed in the district of Maryland, charging Almeida with having committed a tort, on board a certain vessel off the capes of the Chesapeake, in taking therefrom $5,000 in specie, and converting it to his own use. It appears, by the statement of the case, that Almeida resided in the district, but had absconded from the United States, and fled beyond the jurisdiction of the court; and the libel averred, that the libellants had no means of redress but by process of attachment against his goods, chattels and credits, which were, also, about to be removed, by his orders, to foreign parts. The goods, &c., were attached by the marshal, and a copy of the monition was left at the late dwelling-house of Almeida, and a copy affixed at the public exchange, and on the mast of the vessel containing the attached goods, &c. On demurrer to the libel, the questions decided were raised, and, from the decision dismissing the libel, an appeal was taken to the supreme court, and the decree was reversed. The decision affirms, therefore, that it is within the power and jurisdiction of the district court, as a court of admiralty, to issue process of attachment to compel the appearance of a respondent proceeded against by a suit in personam; and that, in the United States, such process may issue against the goods of a resident of the district in which the suit is brought, whenever the defendant has concealed himself, or absconded from the country. The case of Bouysson v. Miller, [Case No. 1,709,] is referred to as an authority in this country, and Clerke's Praxis, by Hall, pt. 2, tit. 28, is cited for the general practice of the civil law. The opinion of the court shows, further, that the attachment was originally devised, and is still maintained, as a means of compelling the respondent to appear in the suit to answer, and that this is its primary object, while, if he does, nevertheless, not appear, the goods, &c., may be sold to satisfy the libellant.

In Cushing v. Laird, [Case No. 3,508,] recently decided in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, Judge Blatchford has examined the subject further, and concludes, mainly upon the authority of the case of Manro v. Almeida, [10 Wheat. (23 U. S.) 473,] and of the text of Clerke's Praxis, that the jurisdiction and power to attach property to compel an appearance also exists in this country, where the defendant is not an inhabitant of the United States, but is an alien not found within the district, but having property there which can be attached.

With these decisions, the case now before me raises no controversy. They are in perfect consistency with the ground relied upon by the respondents here, to wit, that, being, in a legal sense, inhabitants of the district of New Jersey, they could not be sued in the eastern district of New York, by process of attachment and seizure of their goods. And it is of great pertinency to say, that, recognizing the principles and practice sanctioned by the decisions above referred to, completely satisfies the provisions of the acts of congress already cited, and gives a proper and sufficient field for the operation of the act regulating the practice of the court, and of the rule of the supreme court of the United States prescribing the process of attachment when the defendant cannot be found within the district; for, by these decisions, if he be concealed, or have absconded, or be an alien non-resident, there is occasion for the process.

The question then recurs—and entirely without conflict with those statutes, or with the rule of the supreme court, or with those decisions—Can an inhabitant of the United States be sued in a court of admiralty, by process of attachment of his goods, issued and served to compel his appearance, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant?

The judiciary act of September 24, 1789, (1 Stat. 73,) establishes the judicial tribunals, defines their location and the times of holding courts, distributes and limits their jurisdiction, and regulates the manner of its exercise, with other details to complete the system. By the first section, the organization of the supreme court is declared. By the second, the United States are divided into judicial districts, limited and designated as therein prescribed. By the third, it is declared, that there shall be a district court in each district, and its constitution and its sessions are fixed. By the fourth, the districts (excepting Maine and Kentucky) are allotted to circuits (embracing several districts) and circuit courts in each are provided for. By the fifth, the various sessions of the circuit courts, in the respective districts, are appointed. Organization being thus provided for, the sixth, seventh and eighth sections provide for adjournments, vacancies, continuances, the appointment of clerks, their oath of office and the oath of office of the judges. Then, in section nine, the jurisdiction of the district courts is conferred, first, over certain crimes and offences; and, next, they "shall also have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost * * * where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable * * * within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas; * * * and shall also have exclusive original cognizance of all seizures on land * * * and of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States; and shall also have cognizance, concurrently with the courts of the several states or the circuit courts, as the case may be, of all causes where an alien sues for a tort only in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States; and shall also have cognizance, concurrent as last mentioned, of all suits at common law where the United States sue and the amount in dispute amounts, exclusive of costs, to the sum or value of one hundred dollars; and shall also have jurisdiction, exclusively of the courts of the several states, of all suits against consuls," &c., &c. The tenth section gives to the district court in Kentucky certain circuit court powers.

The eleventh section defines the jurisdiction of the circuit courts and provides as follows: "The circuit court shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state; and shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where this act otherwise provides, or the laws of the United States shall otherwise direct, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offences cognizable therein." Then follow two provisions, the effect of which is especially important to the question under consideration: "But no person shall be arrested in one district, for trial in another, in any civil action before a circuit or district court. And no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts, against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ."

The further and other provisions of the statute it is unnecessary to recite, as they do not bear on the question. But it is of some significance to note, that the constitution of the United States had already provided, (article 3, § 2, subd. 3,) that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, * * * shall be held in the state where the said crime shall have been committed;" and an amendment, (article 6,) proposed by the same congress, and at the same session, at which the judiciary act was passed, provides, that, "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed."

That an attachment of goods to compel appearance, and a holding thereof to answer any claim which a plaintiff may recover, is "original process," within the meaning of the language of the statute above quoted, is not doubtful. That the circuit and district courts of the United States cannot send their process into another district, in suits at common law or in equity, and thereby obtain jurisdiction of the person, is also clear. That, in actions at the common law or in equity, they cannot proceed by attachment, and so obtain jurisdiction of a person who is an inhabitant of another district, is settled. Indeed, it is not here denied, by the counsel for the libellants, that, in such actions, the statute applies according to its very terms; and that, in order to jurisdiction, the defendant must be an inhabitant of the district in which the suit is brought or be found therein, if the defendant be an inhabitant of any of the United States. Picquet v. Swan, [Case No. 11,134;] Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 300; Ex parte Graham, [Case No. 5,658;] Hollingsworth v. Adams, [Id. 6,611;] Day v. Newark India Rubber Co., [Id. 3,685,] which applies the principle to a corporation created by the laws of another state; Sayles v. North Western Ins. Co., [Id. 12,421.] If, then, the present is a "civil suit," within the meaning of the act, there is an end of the question; and jurisdiction of the defendant could not be acquired by attachment of goods.

1. The restriction cited, and which forms part of the eleventh section, is not confined, in its operation, to the jurisdiction conferred by that section. This is clear, because, no civil jurisdiction is, by that section, conferred upon the district courts; and yet the restriction forbids that any civil suit shall be brought before either the district or circuit court in any other district, &c. The words "district court" and "either of said courts" would be senseless and inoperative, if the restriction did not apply to other actions than those which were authorized by that section. The terms, therefore, plainly apply to the district court in the exercise of some jurisdiction theretofore mentioned, and must operate to limit or explain the powers given to those courts in the previous ninth section. Including both courts in terms, the limitation operates upon the jurisdiction of each conferred by that section. This is also settled by the cases cited; for, if it were otherwise, then the district court could, in the exercise of such common law jurisdiction as is given by the ninth section, proceed by attachment.

2. The congress of the United States, when this restriction was imposed, were in the very act of framing a judicial system. They provided for the organization of the courts, for a distribution thereof throughout the states, bringing the federal tribunals within easy approach by every citizen, for the determination of controversies deemed appropriate to those tribunals. Their jurisdiction as to subject matter was made to depend chiefly upon the nature of the subjects and the residence of the parties, who, when of different states, might prefer a tribunal existing and acting in freedom from state influence. The courts of original jurisdiction were located in each district. As they acted not under local authority, but derived their power from a government embracing the entire Union, they might seem warranted in entertaining suits against defendants residing in any state, however remote, and in sending process for service compelling appearance. It was, therefore, of great and manifest importance, that some rule on this subject should be prescribed; and it was done so as to prevent parties proceeded against from being called to a great distance to defend actions brought against them, when there was a federal tribunal at their own door competent to administer justice.

3. There is, therefore, no possible reason for any distinction in this respect between a suit in admiralty and a suit in equity or a suit at law. A suit in personam in the court of admiralty is within the jurisdiction of that court, when founded on a maritime contract, or prosecuted for a marine tort.

But no reason can be stated for requiring a party living in New Orleans or San Francisco, to come to New York to defend an action or suit on the covenants in a charter party, when he ought not to be required to come there to defend a suit at law or in equity founded on any commercial or common law contract. For a marine tort committed by a resident of New Orleans, he is liable at common law, and may also be held liable in the court of admiralty. There is no just reason for holding him to answer in such case in any district court of the United States, however remote, if the plaintiff elects to proceed in admiralty, while, if the plaintiff proceeds at common law, he must sue in the district of the defendant's residence, or in the district in which he may be found. The reason of the act of congress includes suits in personam in admiralty, as fully as in equity or at law.

4. The word "civil" is used in the act in distinction from "criminal." In the 9th and 11th sections, conferring jurisdiction on the district and circuit courts, congress had spoken of "crimes and offences," "civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," "suits for penalties and forfeitures," "causes where an alien sues for a tort," "suits at common law," "suits against consuls" other than "for offences," and "suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity." They then declare that "no civil suit" shall be brought, &c. A civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is prosecuted by a suit. It is within the terms of the restriction as closely as a cause "where an alien sues for a tort." It was wholly unnecessary, in the restrictive clause, to recite again the several terms previously employed, as suits for forfeitures, suits against consuls, suits at common law, &c., and civil causes in admiralty. These are all civil in their nature. A cause in admiralty is so expressly described. It is a civil cause. The general term "civil suit" was apt to describe all these actions and causes of action, and it was so employed. And, as the constitution provided that criminal prosecutions, jurisdiction whereof was given by this act to the circuit and district courts, should be had in the state where the crime was committed, so, also, civil suits against an inhabitant of the United States were required to be brought in the district whereof he was an inhabitant. Jurisdiction of crimes and offences, as well as of proceedings of a civil nature, being conferred on these courts by the sections mentioned, this classification, by the word "civil," as distinguished from "criminal," was an essential conformity to the constitutional requirement, that crimes and offences should be prosecuted where committed. The restriction, therefore, made the system in this respect complete.

5. This view of the effect of this statute, securing to inhabitants of the several states the right of being sued within the district whereof they are respectively inhabitants, is, therefore, in perfect consistency with the claim, that courts of admiralty have general power to proceed in personam by attachment of goods, where the defendant cannot be found within the district, so far as that is asserted in Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473; in King v. Shepherd, [Case No. 7,804;] in Boyd v. Urquhart, [Id. 1,750;] or in Bouysson v. Miller, [Id. 1,709.] The limitation is the result of the act of congress, and does not deny the original jurisdiction or practice of those courts, or their present power or jurisdiction where the respondent is an alien non-resident, or, being an inhabitant of the district, conceals himself or absconds, so that he cannot be found.

6. To the suggestion, that the acts of congress regulating the process and practice of the courts are in such general terms that they and the rule of the supreme court in admiralty have operated to modify the act of 1789 limiting jurisdiction in this respect, it is sufficient to say, that these acts are not designed to alter or enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts, but only to regulate the exercise of jurisdiction where it exists. I understand this to be distinctly affirmed in Toland v. Sprague, already cited. Indeed, if these acts are held to authorize the supreme court in any respect, by rule, to abrogate the restriction in the act of 1789, it cannot be confined to the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty. For, the act of 1842 (relied upon as above) gives the same power touching proceedings at the common law and in equity as in admiralty; and the construction and effect contended for would enable that court practically to repeal all the restrictions contained in the act of 1789 on this subject, and to authorize common law actions against inhabitants of any state to be brought in any district of the United States.

Of the cases of Clark v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., [Case No. 2,859,] and New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, it is sufficient to say, that the point discussed in this case was neither raised nor decided in either; and the first named case is full to the effect above asserted, that, on this question, a corporation stands in the same position as a natural person. The effect of the eleventh section of the judiciary act on the power of the court to proceed against either, was not raised, discussed or decided. The decision in the last named case related, first, to the merits, and, second, to the inquiry whether the case was, in its nature, cognizable in a court of admiralty. The synopsis of the case first named, as reported, would suggest that the point in question was decided adversely to the views I have expressed; but, in truth, the point was not raised, the opinion stating that it had not been doubted, and referring to the general doctrine of Manro v. Almeida, [supra,] with which my views are in no conflict.

The case last referred to suggests what is, perhaps, sufficiently obvious without discussion, that the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty by libel and process in rem is in no conflict, but is in entire harmony, with the views I have expressed. In those cases, the court has jurisdiction of the rem wholly irrespective of the question to whom it belongs. For all the purposes of the proceeding, the liability rests upon the rem, and it is made to answer. In form and in substance, that and that only is charged. It is a proceeding for the enforcement of a maritime lien already existing, or acquired by the seizure of the subject of the lien, and to be enforced against it, without regard to questions of title or ownership; and one who intervenes as claimant does so, not to defend himself from liability, but for the protection of the rem proceeded against. Nor is the right of intervention at all confined to one who is liable upon the same cause of action. Such a proceeding, in very form adverse, not to an inhabitant of the United States, but to a rem or subject within the district, upon which the liability was chargeable, was so clearly according to the established jurisdiction and practice of courts of admiralty, that it must have been recognized by congress, and neither the words of the act, nor any reasonable implication therefrom, affect it.

I have examined the opinion of Judge Shipman, of the district court for Connecticut, in Blair v. Bemis, [Case No. 1,484,] in admiralty, (August, 1863,) and that of Judge Hoffman, of the district court of California, in Wilson v. Pierce, [Id. 17,826,] and am constrained to concur in their conclusion. Their opinions embody many of the views I have suggested, and very ably, I think, present most of the considerations pertinent to the subject, with the authorities.

In the opinion of the district court in this case, the opposite conclusion is ably sustained, and the practice, said to be of long standing in the southern district of New York, is stated to be in conformity with such conclusion. If I could satisfy myself that such practice was not forbidden by the judiciary act, I should prefer to make no decision disturbing such practice. I have, therefore, retained the case for further and more deliberate consideration, longer than I should otherwise have deemed necessary. I am, however, by my convictions, compelled to concur with the conclusions of Judges Hoffman and Shipman, and to hold, that jurisdiction of the defendants was not acquired by the district court, by the attachment in this case.

The decree herein must, therefore, be reversed, and the stipulators be discharged from their stipulations provisionally given.

[NOTE. This decree was reversed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion, said: "This controversy turns upon the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789. * * * The prohibition to bring a civil suit in a district other than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found, is the hinge of the controversy between these parties. * * * It may be admitted that an admiralty case is a 'civil suit,' in the general sense of that phrase. But that is not the question before us. It is whether that is the meaning of the phrase as used in this section. The intention of the lawmaker constitutes the law, * * * and, in a case of doubt, that is to be sought from the entire context of the section, statute, or series of statutes in pari materia. * * * The first paragraph of the 11th section defines the jurisdiction of the circuit court as extending to 'all suits of a civil nature, at common law, or in equity, where,' etc. The criminal jurisdiction of the circuit court is next defined. Then follows the provision that no one shall be arrested in one district for trial in another 'in a civil action' before a circuit or district court; and next the prohibition here in question. Construing this section down to the second prohibition, inclusive, by its own light alone, we cannot doubt that by the phrase 'civil suit,' mentioned in this prohibition, is meant a suit within the category of 'all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity,' with which the section deals at the outset. * * * We think the conclusion is inevitable that the terms 'civil suit,' in the 11th, and 'civil actions,' in the 22nd, section, were intended to mean the same thing. The meaning of the phrase employed in the latter admits of no doubt: The language there is 'civil actions,' and it is used to distinguish them from 'causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction,' provided for in the preceding section. The 21st and 22nd sections are in pari materia with the 11th, and throw back a strong light upon the question arising under the latter. We think it dispels all darkness and doubt if any could otherwise exist upon the subject." Directions were given to affirm the decrees of the district court. Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 272.]

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 617.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July 14, 1860.

SHIPPING—DAMAGE TO CARGO—BILL OF LADING—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In admiralty. This was an action by Joshua Atkins and others, the owners of the ship Seth Sprague, against August Horrman, to recover freight on some pipes of wine brought on the ship from Rotterdam to New York in May, 1859, consigned to the respondent. The defence was that a pipe of wine worth more than the freight was lost on the passage by carelessness. This pipe, on arrival of the vessel, was found to have one head pressed in so that the wine had leaked out. The libelants proved that the cargo was well stowed and dunnaged, and proved also that the head of the cask had been made thinner in the middle on the inside than at the sides, and argued that by reason of this the cask had been unable to bear the necessary weight of the cargo. Decree for libelants.

Benedict, Burr & Benedict, for libelants.
Mr. Hart, for respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. The proof clears the ship of negligence in the lading and carriage of the goods, and the defendant does not, by a preponderance of proof, show that the loss was not ascribable to the insufficiency or defect of the casks. The bill of lading renders the ship responsible for no more than the good appearance of the casks externally, and for all just care and stowage of it in transportation. Occult and material defects in the cask are not at the risk of the carrier, but are presumptively at that of the freighter. Decree for libelants for the freight, with a reference to a commissioner to compute the amount.

Case No. 603.

ATKINS v. PEASLEE.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1860.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—ENTRY AND APPRAISAL IN BOND—PRIVATE WAREHOUSE—WAREHOUSE FEES.

Where certain merchandise was stored in private warehouses by the plaintiff, with the consent of the collector of customs, but without expense to him or the United States, and it appeared that this arrangement was made by the plaintiff because he desired to warehouse his goods, and thus obtain the benefit of the warehouse laws, and that the defendant would not assent to such deposits except on condition that the plaintiff would pay to him, in his official capacity, half the usual rates of charges on similar goods stored in the public warehouses. Held: 1. That the goods were "warehoused." 2. That the stipulated sum was rightfully received by the collector, and that the same could not be recovered back in an action for money had and received.

[See Clark v. Peaslee, Case No. 2,831.]

[At law. Action of assumpsit by Elisha Atkins against Charles Peaslee, collector for the port of Boston,] for money had and received, and the case came before the court upon an agreed statement of facts as follows: On the 24th of June, 1853, the plaintiff imported into the port of Boston, in the bark Tom Corwin, from Cienfuegos, sundry hogsheads of molasses, and also sundry hogsheads and tierces of sugar, of which he duly made entry for warehousing, and requested the defendant, who was collector of customs for said port of Boston, to cause the same to be stored in the public warehouses at the said port, which the defendant declined to do, for the reason that said warehouses were full. The plaintiff thereupon procured, at his own expense, and without cost or charge to the defendant or the United States, accommodations for two hundred and eighty-five hogsheads and five tierces of sugar, in a store in Broad street, and ten hogsheads of molasses on Packard's wharf, and the defendant assented to the deposit of the said sugar and molasses at those places under the provisions of the warehouse laws, on condition that the plaintiff would pay to the defendant, as collector of the customs for said port, one half the usual rates of storage charged on similar goods deposited in public warehouses. This condition was submitted to by the plaintiff, in order to enable him to warehouse his merchandise as aforesaid. On the withdrawal of the merchandise, the sum of $145.19 was demanded by the defendant as and for storage of said sugar and molasses, which plaintiff paid defendant. If, upon the foregoing statement of facts, the court should be of opinion that the defendant had no legal right to impose such condition and charge half-storage, on the aforesaid merchandise of the plaintiff, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $145.19, with interest thereon from the time the same was paid, together with costs; but if the court should be of opinion that the charge was legal, then judgment to be entered for defendant, with costs.

Milton Andros, for plaintiff.

By the acts of August 6, 1846, [9 Stat. 53,] and of April 20, 1818, (3 Stat. 469,) and the instructions of the treasury department of February 17, 1849, stores where goods are warehoused must be either public warehouses or private bonded warehouses, and the collector has no right to permit any others to be used. There was no service performed by defendant. There is no rate except for goods stored either in a public or a private bonded warehouse, and the plaintiff's merchandise was stored in neither. By the agreement the warehousing was at the expense of the importer, and he cannot be held to pay twice.

C. L. Woodbury, for defendant.

Warehousing to be at the charge of the importer. [Act March 2, 1799,] 1 Stat. 667, §§ 53, 55, 56, 62. A service was performed by the United States. Act 1846, §§ 1, 3,[2] 7, 34. The act of 1841, § 6, confers a general power as to warehousing imported merchandise upon the secretary of the treasury; and the act of 1846 enlarges that power, and gives full effect to the authorizing of private stores to be used by the government. Section 5.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Most of the difficulties that surround the case arise from the incompleteness of the statement of facts; as, for example, it is stated that the goods were imported on the 4th of June, 1853, but it nowhere appears when the importation was withdrawn from the operation of the warehouse laws. Entry for warehousing, it is stated, was duly made, and the case shows that the merchandise was subsequently withdrawn; but the agreed statement furnishes no means of determining when the withdrawal took place, except what may be inferred from the amount demanded and paid for the storage. Full provision was made by the act of the 28th of March, 1854, [10 Stat. 270,] for the selection, use, and regulation of private warehouses under the warehousing system of the United States; but it is insisted by the counsel of the plaintiff, that the provisions of that act have no application to this case, and, considering the small amount demanded and paid for the storage, I am inclined, in the absence of any more explicit statement, to adopt that view of the case. Assuming that to be the correct view of the facts, it then appears that the goods were duly entered for warehousing at the time of their importation, and remained on deposit under the act of the 6th of August, 1846, until they were withdrawn. 9 Stat. 53. Nothing, however, can be more certain than the fact that the goods were duly entered for warehousing, and not for consumption; and the agreed statement is explicit, that the defendant assented to the deposit of the same at the places before mentioned, under the provisions of the warehouse laws. Application was made by the plaintiff for that privilege to the defendant, as collector of the port, and the assent was given, on the condition that the plaintiff would pay to the defendant, as collector of the customs, half the usual rate of storage charged on similar goods, deposited in the public warehouses. All of the goods were deposited under the warehouse laws, and the clear inference is that the plaintiff enjoyed all the benefits of the warehouse system during the period they so remained on deposit; and the goods were finally withdrawn under the warehouse regulations. Whether any protest was ever made does not appear, but it is certain that nothing of the kind is mentioned in the agreed statement. But it is insisted by the plaintiff that no services were performed by the defendant, or any other of the officers of the revenue, that authorized him to charge anything for the storage of the goods, and that the places of deposit were neither public nor private bonded warehouses, and consequently that the defendant had no authority, as collector of the port, to make any such demand as was made in this case. Both of these propositions seem to be relied on by the plaintiff, and yet, in another part of the argument, he concedes that if the goods had been stored in storehouses, properly selected and designated as private bonded storehouses, he would have been liable for the half-storage, which hardly seems consistent with the first proposition. Waiving that matter, however, his objections to the payment of the storage are twofold: first, he insists that the defendant rendered no service for which, either in law or equity, he was entitled to compensation; and, second, that the places of deposit were not private bonded warehouses, within the meaning of the acts of congress establishing the warehouse system. His first proposition he endeavors to maintain by affirming as a matter of inference, from the agreed statement, that all the defendant did in the premises was to refuse the plaintiff his right to store the goods in a public warehouse, and then illegally to consent that he might store them in stores procured by himself, provided he would pay all the expense, and also the further charge which is the subject of complaint in this case. Looking at the agreed statement, however, I am of the opinion that the theory of fact assumed by the plaintiff in his first proposition must receive very considerable qualification. Undoubtedly, he procured the "accommodations" for the goods at his own expense, and without cost or charge to the defendant or the government; but it is nowhere stated that the goods, after being placed in warehouse, were not in the custody and under the control of the customhouse officers. Unless they were so, it is difficult to see in what respect they were under the provisions of the warehouse laws, or what necessity there was for withdrawing them from the warehouse entry, which was made at the time the goods were imported. Services, therefore, must have been performed by the officers of the customs, else it is not true that the goods were deposited, or withdrawn from the original entry under the warehouse laws. Fraud is not to be presumed; and clearly, unless both parties were guilty of a departure from a positive law, the theory of fact assumed by the plaintiff cannot be sustained.

Having disposed of the first point made by the plaintiff, it remains to consider the second, which is, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the sum paid, because the goods were not deposited in a private bonded warehouse. Previous to the act of the 6th of August, 1846, [supra,] the privilege of warehousing importations in other than public stores was confined, except in certain special cases, to teas, wines, and distilled spirits. Importers of teas were authorized by the sixty-second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, [1 Stat. 673,] either to secure the duties or give bond to the collector of the district in double the amount of the duties, with condition for the payment of the same in two years from the date of the bond; and in case any importer of such goods elected to give the bond, it was made the duty of the collector to accept it without surety, provided the importer deposited the importation in one or more storehouses agreed upon between the importer and the inspector of the revenue. Two locks were then required to be affixed to each storehouse, the key of one to be kept by the importer, and the key of the other by the inspector, whose duty it was to attend at all seasonable hours to deliver the teas; but no delivery could be made till the duties were paid, nor without a permit in writing, under the hand of the collector and naval officer. 1 Stat. 674. Similar provision was made in behalf of the importers of wines and distilled spirits, by the first section of the act of the 20th of April, 1818, [3 Stat. 469,] whereby it was left at their option, either to secure the duties or give bond in double the amount for the payment of the same in twelve calendar months; and if they elected to give the bond, it was made the duty of the collector to accept the same without surety, on the condition that the goods should be deposited at the expense and risk of the importer, in such public or other storehouses as should be agreed upon between the importer or other officer for the inspection of the revenue. All such importations also were required to be kept under the joint locks of the inspector and the importer; and no delivery could be made of such wines or distilled spirits without a permit in writing, under the hand of the collector and naval officer. 3 Stat. 469. Unclaimed goods have been the subject of frequent legislation, and the twelfth section of the act of the 30th of August, 1842, made provision for the neglect or failure of the merchant to pay the duties on the completion of the entry; but none of these provisions have any application to the question under consideration. 3 Stat. 562. Deposit of the wines or distilled spirits, it will be seen, might be made under the first section of the act of the 20th of April, 1818, in public or other storehouses, and that privilege was extended by the first section of the act of the 6th of August, 1846, to all importations properly entered for warehousing, according to the provisions of that act. Those places for the deposit of importations were called "other storehouses" in the act of the 20th of April, 1818, and "other stores" in the act of the 6th of August, 1846, which is entitled an act to establish a warehousing system. They had never been described as private bonded warehouses in the previous legislation of congress, and are not so denominated in the last-named act. 9 Stat. 53. Authority was given to the secretary of the treasury, by the fifth section of the last-named act, to make such regulations from time to time, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as might be necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the act, and secure a just accountability under the same. Assuming to act under that authority, the secretary of the treasury, on the 17th of February, 1849, issued certain instructions to the collectors of the customs. Three classes of bonded warehouses are designated by those instructions: first, stores owned by the United States or leased to them prior to that time, and known as public stores; second, stores in the possession of an importer, and in his sole occupancy for the storing of merchandise imported by himself; third, stores in the occupancy of persons desirous of engaging in the storage business. Every person, before he could be permitted to open such a store, was required by the instructions to give bond with sureties, exonerating the government and all the officers of the customs from any risk growing out of the joint custody of the goods stored in such storehouses. Classes two and three, mentioned in the instructions, are therein denominated private bonded warehouses, and all such stores are required to be placed in the custody of an inspector; but it is expressly directed, in the same instructions, that merchandise entered for warehousing will only be stored in these stores when the same are agreed on by the proper officer of the revenue and the importer, owner, or consignee.

Whether all of these regulations were authorized by the fifth section of the act of the 6th of August, 1846, is a question that need not be considered at the present time, as I am of the opinion that the plaintiff, after having deposited the goods as goods in warehouse, and enjoyed all the benefits of the warehouse system, cannot now, under the circumstances of this case, turn round and deny that the places of deposit agreed on between himself and the collector were proper places for the storage of the goods, within the meaning of the acts of congress then in force establishing the warehouse system. Recurring to the explanations of the agreed statement already given, it will be seen that he duly entered the goods for warehousing, and that the collector, after the accommodations for the goods had been procured by the plaintiff in the manner before stated, assented to the deposit of the same in the places so procured, under the provisions of the warehouse laws, on the condition that the plaintiff would pay to him, as collector of the customs, half the usual rates of storage charged on similar goods in the public warehouses. Payment was accordingly made to the defendant, as collector, on the withdrawal of the merchandise, and of course it was the duty of the collector to render an account of the same to the department. Suppose a bond might properly have been required of the owners of the store, and of the wharf, under the beforementioned instructions, still, it was a security for the benefit of the government, and it did not injuriously affect the rights of the plaintiff, that none such was taken. All his rights were secured under the arrangement, and having paid the charge for storage, under the agreement he made with the collector, he cannot now recover it back. According to the agreement of the parties, judgment must be entered for the defendant, with costs.

Case No. 604.

ATKINS et al. v. PETERSBURG R. CO.

[3 Hughes, 307.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. July Term, 1879.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—RECEIVERS—ADVANCES TO MEET WAGES PREFERRED TO MORTGAGES.

When the company defendant was in difficulty, before the appointment of a receiver, from its employes threatening to strike for the nonpayment of wages due for months past, and on appeal by its officers to the petitioners, who were holders of bonds, they advanced the money necessary for the payment of the back wages due, on a distinct understanding that they should be reimbursed out of the first net earnings of the company, and that the money advanced should be paid to the employes: and afterwards, before their reimbursement, the road went into the custody of the court under the appointment of a receiver. Held, that the advances must be paid in preference to the claims of mortgagees, out of income accruing while the road was in the custody of the court.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity.

Frank W. Christian, for petitioners.

H. H. Marshall and J. Wesley Friend, for the trustees of the mortgagees.

HUGHES, District Judge. The petitioners, Hiram Sibley, John B. Davis, Thomas Wilson, and J. D. Evans, ask for payment, in preference to bonds held under first and second mortgages, of certain moneys advanced to the president of the Petersburg Railroad Company, after default in payment of certain coupons and before the filing of the bill for the appointment of a receiver. The advance was made on an understanding with the president and directors that they should be paid out of the first net current revenues, and that the amount advanced should be used in paying off back wages due to the employes of the company. Each of the petitioners had at the time of the advance second mortgage bonds of the company, each of them except Davis was a stockholder, and Davis had made large advances to one Ragland, personally, on a pledge of shares owned by Ragland, who, until recently before the advances of the petitioners, had been president of the company. Some time in the first half of the year 1875, Ragland resigned, a new board of directors were appointed, and another president was elected. Davis and Sibley were elected members of this new board in their absence, and I believe against their consent, but Sibley refused to serve, and though Davis protested against being assigned to the position, he never actually resigned. Davis held the additional relation to the company of a trustee with Thomas Branch in the deed securing the second mortgage bonds. Isaac H. Carrington was elected president.

Shortly after this reorganization of the company its affairs came to a serious crisis in the form of a threatened strike of its employes for wages in arrears. The amount of the arrearage was about $27,000, and it was necessary for the new president to raise this sum of money without delay. In his extremity he appealed to the petitioners to advance the amount needed. Although the fact is disputed by J. Wilcox Brown, trustee in the first mortgage, and by Thomas Branch, trustee in the second mortgage, who resist this petition, the evidence that that was the object of the petitioners in making the advance, and that they made it on a specific appeal from President Carrington for that particular purpose, is conclusive. Moreover the evidence shows that the advance was made for this object on an understanding between the petitioners and President Carrington, approved by all of the directors but one, who was absent from sickness, that they should be reimbursed their advance out of the first net earnings of the road. The amount advanced was $26,500, and it was paid by the petitioners at several dates, from July 28th to August 6th, 1875. This particular fund was deposited in the Planters' National Bank of Richmond, of which Davis was president; the current earnings of the company were deposited in other banks. In his letter relating to the advance, dated in New York, 26th July, 1875, Mr. Sibley said to President Carrington: "This amount is to pay the men on the road. I regard the labor on the road as the first lien on the property. Mr. Davis will give you an equal amount, which will pay or nearly so, the arrears. I want you to send me your receipt for the ten thousand and a certificate that Mr. Davis has paid an equal amount for the purpose, with an agreement that these advances by me and Mr. Davis are to be refunded to us in equal amounts out of the first net profits of the road. It is desired that the men be paid off at once, in order that any may be discharged that are not wanted, etc."

The reply of President Carrington to this letter is not given in the evidence, and if ever sent in writing, would seem to have been lost. But letters from him to Mr. Sibley are in proof, written in November and December following. In that of November 1st, 1875, Mr. Carrington says: "So far as respects the $20,000 advanced by Mr. Davis and yourself, and the $6500 advanced by Evans and Wilson, I look upon them as debts standing upon a different footing from all other debts of the company. They are for cash advanced to the company without security, at a time when it was necessary to the life of the company, etc." In a long letter of November 23d, explaining his financial plans and efforts, Mr. Carrington uses similar language, and in his letter of December 29th, 1875, the same officer says: "Mr. John B. Davis has demanded that the first payments to be made, over and above actual running expenses, shall be, upon the four loans, made to the company which are unsecured, viz.: $10,000 by you, $10,000 by J. B. Davis, $3250 by Thomas Wilson, and $3250 by Evans. I acquiesce in this. I suppose you and Mr. Davis understand each other. I expect to send you a check for $2000 during this week, and to pay Mr. Davis a similar amount, and my expectation is to pay you both $3000 more by February 1st, making $5000 to each in part of above loans."

Mr. Davis, in his deposition, says: "The advance was for the purpose of paying off the employes of the road, and the agreement by the president, Mr. Carrington, was that it should be repaid out of the first earnings of the road." Isaac H. Carrington says, in his testimony: "I was elected president of the Petersburg Railroad Company on the 19th of July, 1875. The road at that time was in very bad condition; the iron was so much worn as to render travel unsafe; the ditches were generally filled up; there were many unsound ties in the track; the rolling stock needed repair; there were very few laborers employed as track hands; many of the employes had brought suit for their wages and recovered judgments in North Carolina. Two engines of the company had been levied on under executions on these judgments, and were in possession of the sheriff; other judgments had been obtained against the company in Virginia; the company was without credit, and its operations were suffering for want of necessary supplies of all kinds. Amounts due to the company from connecting roads had been attached at Baltimore. A few weeks before my election as president, I had made a full examination of the affairs of the road. On my election I represented to John B. Davis and Hiram Sibley in person, and to other stockholders by letter that the condition of the road rendered an immediate advance of money necessary. There were past due wages to employes amounting to between $27,000 and $29,000, and I told them that it would be impossible to manage the road with any success unless payment was made to these employes. I also represented the absolute necessity for immediate outlay on the track and rolling stock; also, that there were debts due and secured by collateral, and that there was imminent danger that the collateral would be sacrificed at forced sale. Four of the stockholders responded to this appeal by making the following advances (these have been already stated). There was no written contract stipulating the terms or conditions of this loan. There was an understanding that the object of the loan was to enable me to pay wages, and my recollection is that Hiram Sibley particularly insisted that his money should take that direction. I executed the notes of the company at four months (I think), and they were renewed at maturity. I resigned the office of president in January, 1876, and do not know what was done with these notes afterwards; our distinct understanding with these gentlemen was that theirs was to be considered a debt of the highest obligation, and I stated to them that if they loaned the money, and I afterwards found that I could not get on with the road, I would devote its receipts to the payment of these notes. I file as part of my deposition three letters, etc. (describing the three letters already quoted from, written by himself to Sibley in November and December, 1875)."

As tending to show that this was not the understanding on which the advances in question were made by petitioners, the defence produce the account of the company with the Planters' National Bank, of which Mr. Davis was president, from which it appears that this specific money was not all paid specifically in discharge of wages in arrear, but went in part to other purposes, and especially that $5000 of it were paid to the counsel of a judgment creditor of the road, in part payment of his debt (paid as the evidence shows without the knowledge of Davis). This creditor was the one on whose bill for foreclosure, this court appointed a receiver and took possession of the road in May, 1877; but under a consent decree. This matter is referred to by Mr. Carrington in his testimony in answer to a question by the defence, whether all the money advanced by Davis, Sibley, Wilson, and Evans was applied to the payment of back dues to the employes of the company. Mr. Carrington says: "It was not. On the 29th of July, 1875, I paid, in part of the judgment for wages due in Weldon, $3777; and on the 7th of August, 1875, I paid $6500 on pay rolls for the months of June and July, 1875. The policy I adopted and which I followed as long as I was president was, to pay current wages as they matured, and thus carry the payments back month by month as I was able.... When I received these loans I deposited them in the Planters' National Bank of Richmond.... Under the arrangements under which I borrowed this money I did not consider myself bound to apply this identical money to the payment of wages; but, if there was pressing necessity from other directions, I felt at liberty to use this money for that purpose, thus relieving current receipts, and looking to current receipts to replace it. I did feel bound to apply an amount equal to these loans to back wages, and continued to make such application from time to time during my presidency. The payment of the pay rolls for June and July, and the partial payment of the judgments of Weldon entirely restored the confidence of the employes, and they were willing to wait, I giving frequent assurances that I would continue the payment as fast as I could."

It would seem in short that the back wages for which the advances were made by the petitioners were all paid off in the course of time, but not in whole with the specific money advanced for that specific purpose, and deposited in the Planters' National Bank. A great deal of the testimony put into the case by the defence (in fact much the greater part of it) relates to the history of the difficulties of the company subsequent to this advance of money, to transactions directly or indirectly connected with the subsequent filing of the bill in this court for the appointment of a receiver, and to the history of the bill between the time it was filed in the summer or fall of 1876 and the appointment of a receiver in May, 1877. But I do not think that this testimony at all affects the case as it appears from the letters of Carrington and Sibley that have been referred to, and the testimony of Carrington and Davis that has been given. The fact seems to be conclusively proved that on the part of the petitioners, their money was advanced for the specific purpose of keeping the road running by the payment of arrears due its employes, and that though all the money deposited in the Planters' National Bank was not specifically used for that one purpose, yet that the equivalent of any particular part of that money which was otherwise used by the president was paid to the employes out of current receipts in time to satisfy the employes and accomplish the object for which it was advanced by the petitioners. When I further state that the net current earnings of the road for any three or four months since the petitioners advanced the money, would have been sufficient to pay off the advance, I believe that I have stated all the facts of the case material to its decision. Although this suit was originally brought by a judgment creditor, yet the decree appointing a receiver was given by consent, and the trustees under the mortgage deeds at once came in by cross-bill, and took the position of domini litis in the cause.

The questions presented by the petition are: 1st. Whether, under any circumstances, the advance of moneys to keep a railroad running without the exaction of security, can entitle the creditor to payment out of the earnings of the road in priority over the claims of mortgagees, and if this can be done in any case? 2d. Whether the circumstances under which the petitioners in this case advanced the money which they now ask the court to repay to them, are such as will justify the court in granting their petition?

The trustees who contest the claim of these petitioners rely upon the priority of their mortgages and the sanctity of their rights, as secured creditors, under solemn deeds. They vouch in support of the superiority of their rights the decision of this court in the Atlantic, Mississippi and Ohio Railroad Case, [Skiddy v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co., Case No. 12,922,] upon the petition of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, of sundry creditors holding assigned labor claims, and of sundry other holders of unsecured debts against that defendant company. I concurred in the decision in that case, 1st, Because the principal part of the claims then passed upon did not present the peculiar equities about to be discussed; and, 2d, Because, as to the rest of those claims, the weight of authority seemed at that time to preponderate in favor of mortgage creditors as against unsecured creditors of every name. Since then the supreme court of the United States has had this whole subject before it in a group of suits connected with the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad Company, in which it has passed upon the rights of a variety of petitioners having claims adverse to the mortgagees of that railroad. Its decrees in the various petitions and suits referred to are the more important because they were made after a general invitation had been extended to members of the bar of that court interested in like cases, to present briefs on the questions arising in that case; and because, after a most patient hearing and the most searching and able argument from the best legal minds of the country, the court arrived at unanimous conclusions on this delicate, difficult, and important subject. In the principal case before it, connected with the railroad mentioned, that of Fosdick v. Schall, [99 U. S. 235,] the court, through Mr. Chief Justice Waite, announced its views of the law in the following paragraphs, which though they fall within the characterization of dicta, yet are in fact a careful and deliberate expression of what the court considered to be the law of this whole subject. Nor is there any reason to doubt but that it will apply the principles indicated to cases which will come before it hereafter. In the case of Fosdick v. Schall, [Id.,] the court, in the course of its decision, said as follows: "We have no doubt that when a court of chancery is asked by railroad mortgagees to appoint a receiver of railroad property pending proceedings for foreclosure, the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, may, as a condition of issuing the necessary order, impose such terms in reference to the payment from the income during the receivership of outstanding debts for labor, supplies, equipment, or permanent improvement of the mortgaged property, as may under the circumstances of the particular case appear to be reasonable. Railroad mortgages are comparatively new in the history of judicial proceedings. They are peculiar in their character, and affect peculiar interests. The amounts involved are generally large, and the rights of the parties oftentimes complicated and conflicting. It rarely happens that a foreclosure is carried through to the end without some concessions, by some parties, from their strict legal rights, in order to secure advantages that could not otherwise be obtained, and which it is supposed will operate for the general good of all who are interested. This results almost as a matter of necessity from the peculiar circumstances which surround such litigation. The business of all railroad companies is done to a greater or less extent on credit. This credit is longer or shorter, as the necessities of the case require; and when companies become pecuniarily embarrassed it frequently happens that debts for labor, supplies, equipment, and improvements are permitted to accumulate, in order that bonded interest may be paid and a disastrous foreclosure postponed, if not altogether avoided. In this way the daily and monthly earnings which ordinarily should go to pay the daily and monthly expenses are kept from those to whom in equity they belong, and used to pay the mortgaged debt. The income out of which the mortgage is to be paid is the net income obtained by deducting from the gross earnings what is required for necessary operating and managing expenses, proper equipments, and useful improvements. Every railroad mortgagee in accepting his security impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim upon the income. If for the convenience of the moment, something is taken from what may not improperly be called the current debt fund, and put into that which belongs to the mortgage creditors, it certainly is not inequitable for the court, when asked by the mortgagees to take possession of the future income, and hold it for their benefit, to require as a condition of such an order that what is due from the earnings to the current debt shall be paid by the court from the future current receipts before anything derived from that source goes to the mortgagees. In this way the court will only do what, if a receiver should not be appointed, the company ought itself to do; for, even though the mortgage may in terms give a lien upon the profits and income until possession of the mortgaged premises is actually taken or something equivalent, the whole earnings belong to the company, and are subject to its control. The mortgagee has his strict rights, which he may enforce in the ordinary way. If he asks no favors, he need grant none; but if he calls upon a court of chancery to put forth its extraordinary powers and grant him purely equitable relief, he may with propriety be required to submit to the operation of a rule which always applies in such cases, and do equity in order to get equity. The appointment of a receiver is not a matter of strict right. Such an application always calls for the exercise of judicial discretion, and the chancellor should so mould his order that while favoring one, injustice is not done to another. If this cannot be accomplished, the application should ordinarily be denied. We think, also, that if no such order is made when the receiver is appointed, and it appears in the progress of the cause that bonded interest has been paid, additional equipments provided, or lasting and valuable improvements made out of earnings which ought in equity to have been employed to keep down debts for labor, supplies, and the like, it is within the power of the court to use the income of the receivership to discharge obligations which, but for the diversion of funds, would have been paid in the ordinary course of business. This, not because the creditors to whom such debts are due have in law a lien upon the mortgaged property or the income, but because in a sense the officers of the company are trustees of the earnings for the benefit of the different classes of creditors and stockholders; and if they give to one class of creditors that which properly belongs to another, the court may, on an adjustment of the accounts, so use the income which comes into its own hands as, if practicable, to restore the parties to their original equitable rights. While ordinarily this power is confined to the appropriation of the income of the receivership and the proceeds of moneyed assets that have been taken from the company, cases may arise where equity will require the use of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property in the same way. Thus it often happens that in the course of the administration of the cause the court is called upon to take income, which otherwise would be applied to the payment of old debts, for current expenses, and use it to make permanent improvements on the fixed property, or to buy additional equipments. In this way the value of the mortgaged property is not unfrequently materially increased."

These principles strike my mind as self-evident. I do not think they can be successfully controverted. More briefly stated they are these: The possession of a receiver is only that of the court whose officer he is, and adds nothing to the previously existing title of the mortgagees. He holds, pending the litigation, for the benefit of whomsoever in the end it shall be found to concern, and in the meantime the court proceeds to determine the rights of the parties upon the same principles as if no change of possession had taken place. When a court of chancery is asked by railroad mortgagees to appoint a receiver of railroad property, pending proceedings for foreclosure, the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, may, as a condition of issuing the necessary order, impose such terms in reference to the payment from the income during the receivership of outstanding debts for labor, supplies, equipment, or permanent improvement of the mortgaged property, as may, under the circumstances of the particular case, appear to be reasonable. If the court should not do this in the decree appointing a receiver, it may enforce these equities against mortgagees, in proper cases in later decrees. The income out of which the mortgage is to be paid is the net income obtained by deducting from the gross earnings what is required for necessary operating and managing expenses, proper equipment, and useful improvements; and every railroad mortgagee, even of earnings, in accepting his security, impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim upon the income. The mortgagee has his strict rights, which he may enforce in the ordinary way. If he calls upon a court of chancery to put forth its extraordinary powers and grant him purely equitable relief, he may be required to submit to the operation of the rule requiring that he shall do equity in order to get equity.

In general the opinion holds that a court may for certain purposes stand in the shoes of the company whose property it has sequestrated, and satisfy equities which the company necessarily contracted for the benefit of all parties interested in keeping the railroad alive and in operation. The opinion does not go to the extent of allowing the court to touch the corpus of the mortgaged property for the purpose of discharging the equitable claims described; but limits it to the earnings as the fund out of which they are to be paid. It virtually requires that the court shall pay these claims out of income earned, while the road is in its custody, forbidding it to fix them as a permanent charge upon the property after it passes out of its custody. The reasoning of the opinion covers cases only of the strongest equity and clearest good faith. It does not cover any expenditures but such as were of urgent necessity, and as inured to the benefit of all parties interested in the property. While the supreme court is thus severe as to the character of the claims which may be paid, and as to the funds out of which payment is to be made; yet it does not limit them to the payment of wages due employes. It allows the expenses of permanent improvements to be refunded where those improvements were necessary to render the road safe for public use, and when the credit for them was incurred on the faith of their being paid for out of current earnings. There was no such pledge of faith given in the case of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, nor in favor of the holders of assigned labor claims in the Atlantic, Mississippi and Ohio Case, which has been referred to. The supreme court, in its opinion under consideration, makes a broad distinction between railroads (which the interests of all classes of creditors and good faith to the public who charter them for public purposes, alike require to be kept going and alive) and other property. It intimates that a court may order the payment of such debts incurred by a railroad company before the appointment of a receiver, as it may authorize a receiver to contract and pay after his appointment; provided that the corpus of the property be not touched.

Now it has never been questioned that a receiver may apply so much of the current income as may be necessary for repairing or operating the road, or may, by receiver's certificates, anticipate the future income for that purpose; and it would be difficult to draw a distinction between the principles under which a court authorizes a receiver to make necessary expenses for operating a railroad and keeping it in a safe condition, and the principles embodied in the language quoted from the opinion of the supreme court, relating to sundry expenses of the railroad companies incurred before the appointment of receivers. The cases where the power to issue receiver's certificates has been denied, have been where they were to be issued, not for the preservation, but for the improvement of the property. Courts have in some instances gone even to the length of authorizing permanent improvements where the circumstances of the case called for the exercise of the power; but the opinion of the supreme court in Fosdick v. Schall, [99 U. S. 235,] does not go that far. It is enough for us that no court has ever refused to issue such certificates when it was necessary for repairing the road or keeping it agoing as a safe road; and if it may authorize such expenditures by a receiver, it may pay them if they have been made by the company before the appointment of a receiver.

Mr. Jones, who cannot be said to lean against the rights of bondholders, in his work on Railroad Securities, (section 537,) says: "When it is necessary for a receiver to raise money for the purpose of repairing or operating a railroad, the court may authorize him to issue negotiable certificates of indebtedness, which shall constitute a first lien of the property or the proceeds of it, and shall be redeemable within a limited time, or when the property is sold by the court." And, at section 542, he says: "The court has power, while in possession of property, to protect it from loss and destruction, and to preserve it in the condition in which it was received; and for this purpose it may authorize the expenditure from the property itself of whatever is absolutely necessary for its preservation, and may do this as against any and all parties interested."

These propositions are fully sustained by the cases of Kennedy v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., [Case No. 7,706;] Meger v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 237; Hoover v. Montclair, etc., R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 4; Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 734; Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., [50 Vt. 569,] stated in Jones, Ry. Sec. § 536; Stanton v. Alabama & C. R. Co., [Case No. 13,296.]

It seems to me that the equity of the petitioners, Sibley, Davis, Wilson, and Evans, falls within the reasoning of the supreme court. In consequence of the non-payment of their wages the employes of the Petersburg Railroad Company were greatly dissatisfied, and it was found that in order to retain their services some provision must be made to satisfy their just claims. Many of them had instituted suits and recovered judgments for their wages. In these suits they had attached property of the company and garnished debts due to it. The officers of the company recognized that for the efficient operation of the road, it was absolutely essential that these claims should be satisfied. But the company had neither money nor credit. In this state of things the petitioners made these advances, at the request of the president of the company. For it they received no consideration, and from it they derived no peculiar or private benefit apart from the general advantage accruing to the railroad. The advance enabled the company to continue its operations, and it inured to the general advantages of all concerned in its success. In July, 1875, the alternative presented was, that these advances should be made or the road be judically sequestrated. The petitioners believed it could be extricated from its difficulties, and most probably it could have but for the discredit and embarrassment of the company produced by subsequent legal proceedings against it. The petitioners did not desire a receiver, and proved their bona fides by this advance of their money. But even if a receiver had been appointed in July, 1875, the first thing that would have confronted him would have been these wages. To run the road it would have been necessary to pay them. They had a claim on the road which the court would have provided for; and the company having no money, the first thing necessary for the court to do would have been to authorize the receiver to issue certificates to raise money to pay these wages, i. e., to raise the money which was supplied by these very advances. As equity regards the substance and not the form, these advances must be treated as preferred debts. The employes had a claim on the road which it was absolutely essential to the interests of all should be satisfied. These petitioners came forward on an appeal from the president, and advanced their private means, as one of the witnesses said, to save the life of the company. They were not speculators, but persons acting for the benefit of a concern in which they had a deep interest. The right of the mortgagees to have the fund realized by the receiver applied to their debts, is equitable only; and should not be so enforced as to produce inequity. The court in a proper case is bound to attach to its enjoyment such conditions as are right and just. It would be highly inequitable to refuse to pay advances made for the benefit of mortgagees by men whom the servants of the mortgagees promised to refund out of current earnings. This court, when it appointed a receiver, might have done so upon the just and reasonable condition that those claims were to be provided for; and, according to the opinion of the supreme court, it may equally do so by an order subsequently made, operating by way of modification of the original order. See, also, Douglass v. Cline, 12 Bush, 608. I will therefore make an order granting the prayer of these petitioners.

ATKINS v. STEACY.

[5 Dill. 381, note.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Arkansas. 1879.

STOCKHOLDER'S BILL TO IMPEACH JUDGMENT AGAINST THE CORPORATION.

A bill by a stockholder to impeach a judgment against the corporation was, under the circumstances, dismissed, but without prejudice.

In equity. The plaintiff [Elisha Atkins] in this suit, in behalf of himself and all other stockholders of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company [against John G. Steacy, surviving partner of Peirce, Steacy & Yorston, and others,] prays that the defendant, Steacy, may be enjoined from proceeding further against the plaintiff and said railroad company, and all the stockholders thereof, in a suit which he, as surviving partner of the firm of Peirce, Steacy & Yorston, has instituted in this court against the plaintiff and certain alleged stockholders, to collect from them the amount of a judgment for $1,041,181.70, which judgment the said Steacy, as such surviving partner, recovered against said company by default on the 8th day of December, 1875, in the circuit court of Pulaski county. The plaintiff also prays that the said defendant may be enjoined from otherwise seeking and endeavoring to enforce the collection and satisfaction of said judgment against the plaintiff and said company and all the stockholders thereof. Then follows a prayer for general relief. The equities set forth in the bill were denied in the answers, and, a replication having been filed, voluminous proofs were taken. The cause is before the court on final hearing, and was submitted and argued with that of Steacy and Hurley v. Atkins, impleaded with Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and CALDWELL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The judgment which the bill seeks to impeach was rendered in the state court. The judgment creditor made that judgment the basis, in part, of an original creditor's bill in equity in this court to enforce against the complainant, Atkins, and other stockholders in the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company, an alleged individual and corporate liability as stockholders. We have held, in that case, that the stockholders were under no individual or double liability, and that, as Atkins was a bona fide transferee for value of full-paid stock, he was under no liability, of any kind, to the plaintiffs or other creditors of the company in respect thereto. Accordingly, a decree has been ordered dismissing the bill as to him. No other stockholder has joined him in the present suit to impeach the judgment of Steacy for $1,041,181.70 rendered by the state court. This bill of Atkins is, in its nature, supplementary or ancillary to the creditors' suit against him as a stockholder. Since it has been determined that he is in no way liable to the creditors of the company in his capacity as a stockholder, he has no interest in the result of the creditors' suit against other stockholders.

The judgment in question, it is to remembered, was not rendered in this court, but in the state court. The learned counsel for Mr. Atkins admitted, in the argument, that an original bill would not lie in this court by Mr. Atkins to impeach the judgment recovered in the state court, and that the basis of Mr. Atkins' present bill was that, since the judgment in the state court was being proceeded upon in this court as the basis, in part, of a creditors' bill, this gave to this court the right to prevent any inequitable or fraudulent use being made of it to his injury. Since no such injury can, under our decree in the other case, occur, and since no other stockholder has united with Mr. Atkins in seeking to impeach that judgment, a decree will be here entered (without deciding whether that judgment is wholly invalid or is excessive in the amount recovered) dismissing the plaintiff's bill, without prejudice to the right to bring another suit if occasion should arise, and without prejudice, also, to other stockholders in this regard.

Bill dismissed.

CONTEMPT—VIOLATION OF INJUNCTION—STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. Platt, contra.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. The proofs show that the respondents held judgments against Atkinson in the court of common pleas of Wyoming county, upon which they issued writs of fi. fa. on the twentieth of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and levied upon the personal property of the defendant on the twenty-fifth of December, eighteen hundred and seventy-one. Atkinson filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy in this court, and on the third day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, was duly declared a bankrupt. A petition was presented on the thirteenth of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, praying for an injunction to restrain the respondents from proceeding with their execution, and the return of the marshal shows that it was regularly served on the seventeenth of the same month. Notwithstanding this, the respondents, in defiance of the writ of injunction, proceeded with their writs of fi. fa., and caused the sheriff of Wyoming county to sell the personal property of the bankrupt. The court is willing to make all proper allowance for the want of knowledge which exists in agricultural communities as to the operation of the bankrupt law, and the power of the courts of the United States in its administration. At the proper time that will be taken into consideration; but we would be recreant to our judicial trust should we fail to maintain the law and vindicate its process. The respondents to this rule were in error in supposing that the judgment of the state court and its execution were paramount to the federal authority. The bankrupt law was passed in pursuance of a provision of the constitution of the United States. Its administration, and when invoked, the cases of all insolvent persons and corporations are, by its requirements, placed exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal courts sitting as courts of bankruptcy. It suspends all state insolvent laws mitigating [militating] against its provisions. It is a wise and beneficial law, making an equal distribution of the assets of the debtor among all the creditors who have proved their debts, at the same time preserving intact all valid liens entitled to priority. It was designed to relieve the debtor from oppressive liabilities which render him unfit to contribute to the productive wealth of the country; and it affords to the creditor the assurance that all the property of the debtor, except what from motives of humanity he is permitted to retain, shall be honestly devoted to the payment of his debts. With a fraudulent debtor it is wisely and justly stringent, compelling a full discovery and surrender of his assets for the benefit of his creditors, under peril of imprisonment for contempt, which in the courts of the United States, is a penalty not to be disregarded. Disobedience of the injunction in the present instance was a grave offense. Its palliation, so ably argued by respondent's counsel at the argument, will be considered upon the return of the attachment. The rule is made absolute and attachment ordered.

PATENTS FOR INVENTION — CONFLICTING APPLICATIONS—INTERFERENCE.

[In a case of conflicting applications for letters patent for certain improvements in the construction of steam-pumps, it appeared that defendant filed his application for the invention, which was rejected, presumably for want of patentability in the design as it was then presented; that certain improvements were thereafter made, by which the matter became patentable; that, after the rejection of defendant's first application, no patentable improvements were invented or made by plaintiff, who claimed to have been the inventor; that five pumps were made under the direction and supervision of defendant; that plaintiff did not suggest the peculiar combination of mechanical principles upon which the improvements were based. Held, that defendant was entitled to letters patent for the improvements.]

[On appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

Chas. M. Keller, for Atkinson.

1. The commissioner has no authority in deciding an interference to refer to caveats, letters alleged to have been filed in the patent office, or generally to the files and entries in the patent office which have not been introduced in evidence by the parties.

2. The fact that Boardman, in carrying out the invention of Atkinson, was the first to make a machine embodying the invention, does not place the burden of proof upon Atkinson. The invention is his who first conceives of and discovers the thought or idea which is the essence of the invention; and if the inventor is not a worker with tools, he is at liberty to employ skilled mechanics to carry his invention into effect. Bloxam v. Elsee, [6 Barn. & C. 169;] Hind. Pat. 23, 25, 31, 445. The fact that the inventor does employ, and is often compelled so to employ, mechanics in building his inventions does not, and should not in reason, create a prima-facie case against him.

Keller & Greenough, for appellant.

Z. C. Robbins, for appellee.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This is an appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents in a case of conflicting applications for certain improvements in the construction of steam-pumps. [Affirmed.]

It appears by the files in the patent office that on the 4th of December, 1843, William Boardman, Jr., filed his application for his invention "of a new and improved portable steam-pumping engine for relieving stranded vessels, and for other purposes;" which application was rejected by the then commissioner of patents on the 20th of February, 1844. It does not appear upon what grounds that application was rejected, but it is suggested that the matter as then presented was not patentable, but that certain improvements have been since invented and made by which the matter has become patentable; and the commissioner has decided that the applicant —William Boardman, Jr.—is entitled to a patent. It is unnecessary to ascertain what those improvements were, as this is a case of conflicting applications for a patent for the same thing. The question is not, now, who invented the matter upon which the first application of Mr. Boardman was founded, but who is the inventor of the improvements which have made the matter patentable. That such improvements have been made, is admitted by both parties and by the commissioner.

I do not find any evidence that Mr. Atkinson, after the rejection of Mr. Boardman's first application on the 20th of February, 1844, invented any patentable improvement upon the pump. It appears, by all the evidence that Mr. Boardman constructed the pump and all the improvements. In the absence of all evidence to the contrary, the presumption, therefore, is that he was also the inventor; and the burden of proof is thrown upon Mr. Atkinson to show, not merely that he first suggested to Mr. Boardman the abstract idea of a steam-pump—(for steam-pumps had been in common use for many years)—but that he invented the improvements which entitled it to a patent. To rebut this inference Mr. Atkinson produces the deposition of Josiah L. Hale, who says: "Not long after the loss of the ship 'Sheffield,' in November or December, 1843, I met Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Boardman in the Merchants' Exchange; and knowing that some alienation of feeling existed between them, and being anxious that they should be friends, I said to Mr. Boardman, 'Why don't you and Mr. Atkinson settle your difficulties,' or words equivalent. He (Boardman) made a reply having reference to a little paragraph which had about that time appeared in one of the papers respecting the pump in question,—meaning, no doubt, the paragraph which appeared in the Journal of Commerce of the 25th of November, 1843, which gave to Mr. Atkinson the whole credit of the invention of the pump. He (Boardman) spoke with some warmth, but respectfully. The deponent replied, I had always supposed Mr. Atkinson was the inventor; he (Boardman) said he was, I again say he was; he (Boardman) used these words or words equally strong. I (deponent) replied, 'so I always supposed.' After those strong expressions, Mr. Boardman said that it was the combination which made the steam-pump. Always supposing that Mr. Atkinson was the inventor, I feel certain I could never have conveyed any other idea to any person that he was not the inventor."

Taking the whole testimony of Mr. Josiah L. Hale together, it seems strange that Mr. Boardman, while expressing indignation at the paragraph which gave to Mr. Atkinson the whole credit for the invention of the pump, should have admitted that he was the inventor in the technical sense of the word. He might have admitted that Mr. Atkinson suggested the idea of having a steam-pump, as testified by Mr. Flanders, and yet he (Boardman) might be the inventor of the peculiar combination of mechanical principles which entitled it to a patent. Mr. Hale says that Mr. Boardman told him "that it was the combination which made the steam-pump." There is no evidence that that combination was suggested to him by Mr. Atkinson. I do not perceive in the testimony any further evidence in support of Mr. Atkinson's claim to be the inventor of any of the patentable improvements of the portable steam-pump. I have not considered the declarations of the parties in their own favor in the absence of each other as competent evidence in this cause for any purpose but to ascertain when and what they have respectively claimed to have invented. There is no evidence that Mr. Boardman was in the employment and pay of Mr. Atkinson at the time of the supposed invention, or at the time of the construction of the improvements which rendered it a patentable invention, or at any previous time. On the contrary, it appears in the testimony of Mr. Carmen that before the first application for a patent in December, 1843, Mr. Boardman built four of these pumps for the board of underwriters, who paid him for the construction thereof, and that this was done without the interference or agency, but with the knowledge, of Mr. Boardman. There does not appear to be any evidence that Mr. Atkinson, either before or after the rejection of Mr. Boardman's application for a patent for the pump, gave Mr. Boardman any instructions in relation to the particular combination of mechanical principles which is understood to be the ground of his present application for a patent, nor any model or drawings by which to construct the pump; nor does there appear to be any evidence that he paid Boardman or any other person for constructing it, or that the underwriters had any authority from Mr. Atkinson to use those pumps which had been built for them by Mr. Boardman.

The deposition of Mr. Josiah L. Hale was taken in New York ten days after Mr. Boardman's (Sr.) deposition had been taken in Nashville, N. H., and may have been taken with a view to rebut it. Mr. Boardman testified that between the spring of 1841 and the fall of 1842 Mr. Atkinson told him that William (his son) had invented a steam-pump at his (Atkinson's) request, and that he had requested him to give his attention to getting up a steam-pump—a portable pump to be used about wrecked vessels. That Atkinson asked him if he had seen the model of the pump invented by William. He and this witness replied that it was shown to him by Carmen. That in none of the conversations which he had with Mr. Atkinson did he ever pretend or intimate that he was the inventor of the pump or of any part of it; but, on the contrary, had always stated that William (his son) was the inventor. That in September, 1842, Mr. Hale, speaking of William Boardman, Jr., said he had recently invented a steam-pump which they thought highly of, and he should use his influence to have the insurance company adopt it and to have one built, and that he intended William should make money out of it. Mrs. Boardman, mother of the appellee, says that in the summer of 1842 Mr. Atkinson, speaking of her son William, told her that he had been inventing a new pump—a steam-pump—to raise ships from the ocean; that he thought William would do something great with it; that he would assist him; that in the next season Mr. Atkinson was again at their house in Nashville. He said William was getting along finely with his pump, and expressed his opinion that it would be very valuable to him; that in neither of those conversations did Mr. Atkinson intimate that he had invented any part of the said pump; that he expressed himself as grateful for favors he had received from her husband, and was glad to have some opportunities to make a return by assisting her son. Mr. Jeremiah J. Dickson says that some time between June or September, 1842, he was present at the exhibition of a steam-pump in Pearl street at the request of Mr. Atkinson; that two or three of the board of underwriters were there, and he thinks Mr. Boardman was there also. He understood from Mr. Atkinson that Mr. Boardman was the inventor of the pump; that Mr. Atkinson was to find the funds, and that they were to be partners in the concern, and that he always thought they were partners until one or two years ago, when he learned there had been some misunderstanding between them. Horace Prior testifies that he received from Mr. Boardman compensation for the use of the room in which the pump was exhibited. Mr. Orlando Burnett proves the publication of the offensive paragraph which seems to have caused the misunderstanding between Boardman and Atkinson, by attributing the whole invention to Mr. Atkinson. This paragraph, a copy of which is annexed to Mr. Burnett's deposition, appeared in the Journal of Commerce of the 25th of November, 1843. This seems to have excited Mr. Boardman, and on the 4th of December following he filed his petition for a patent. William Hetcher testifies that William Boardman, Jr., employed him to make the patterns for the pump, and paid him for making them. Mr. Boardman showed him a sketch which gave him the idea so that he could commence. He never had any communication with Mr. Atkinson, and did not know him till the day of taking his deposition. This witness made a casting of the pump pattern. Mr. Boardman made an alteration in the angle of the discharge nozzle. About the 1st of June, 1842, he took to Mr. Boardman a boiler for the purpose of trying the model, which was then complete. The boiler was of iron. The pumps were cast in Browning's foundry.

Cyrus Currin, of the firm of Davis, Currin & Co., machinists at Newark, New Jersey, testifies that they made five of these steam-pumps for Mr. Boardman, and were paid for them by the New York underwriters, Mr. Boardman having testified to the accuracy of the accounts; that he directed the building of them and drafted them. The order for the first pump was given about the middle of March, and completed the middle of May, 1843. Mr. Atkinson was never in the shop during the building of these pumps to the knowledge of this witness, and gave no instructions about the building of them. He (Mr. Atkinson) has been in the shop since they were removed. He came and said he wanted an engine built with a pump attached to it. He gave no drawings, but asked this witness' opinion as to the size, &c.; thinks he asked if Mr. Boardman's patterns were there. We answered, "No, they are in New York." He then asked the witness if he could build him a pump the same as they had built for Boardman; thinks it was in the fall of 1841 that Boardman first told him he contemplated building a pump for wrecking purposes; thinks it was in the middle of the fall. He first saw the model of the steam-pump completed in the spring or summer of 1842. He saw Atkinson at the place where he saw the model. Mr. Atkinson did not at the time claim to be the inventor of the pump, or say anything to lead this witness to think that he was the inventor; nor did he say or do anything which gave this witness to understand that he did not recognize Mr. Boardman at that time as the inventor. Mr. Atkinson said nothing about it. Mr. Boardman showed him the whole, and explained it to him. Mr. Julius Von Schmidt, a machinist in Washington, D. C., testified that he was applied to to make a model for Mr. Atkinson "a year ago last winter" (his deposition was taken in 1847.) Mr. Atkinson showed him a model and drawing in Doctor Jones' office, and wished him to make him such a model, which he did with some small variations; saw the same model in the patent office about three months ago; the name of William Boardman, Jr., was upon it; he made a sketch of it at Doctor Jones' office; he has seen at the patent office the model he made for Mr. Atkinson. Mr. Atkinson did not give him any idea of the principle or construction of the pump before he took him to Doctor Jones' office; he called the model at Doctor Jones' office his model; he did not examine the drawing particularly; he only took a glance at it; Doctor Jones held it in his hands and took it away immediately, and told him he could sketch better from the model. Upon a careful consideration and comparison of the evidence on both sides, I am of opinion that the preponderance is greatly in favor of William Boardman, Jr., as the inventor of the improvement in the steam-pump for which he has now applied for a patent; and I do therefore affirm the decision of the honorable commissioner of patents in this cause.

Case No. 609.

ATKINSON v. FARMERS' BANK.

[Crabbe, 529.][1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb., 1844.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY — PREFERENCES — COERCION BY CREDITORS—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. To render the confession of a judgment an act of bankruptcy, it must not only have been intended as a preference, but also have been given in contemplation of bankruptcy.

2. An assignee in bankruptcy is not bound by proceedings against the bankrupt to which he was not a party.

3. By "contemplation of bankruptcy" is not meant a contemplation of applying for the benefit of the bankrupt law, or of proceedings in a court of bankruptcy, but a contemplation of the breaking up of one's business, or an inability to continue it.

4. Payments made or securities given by a party knowing himself to be insolvent, are not in contemplation of bankruptcy, if, at the time, he fully expected to continue his business and retrieve his losses.

5. A preference in contemplation of bankruptcy is no less an act of bankruptcy because yielded to the threats and coercion of a creditor.

[Cited in Grow v. Ballard, Case No. 5,848; Graham v. Stark, Id. 5,676.]

At law. This was an action of assumpsit [by Samuel Atkinson, assignee in bankruptcy of David B. Taylor, against the Farmers' Bank of Bucks County,] to recover a sum of money paid to the defendants by the sheriff of Bucks county, in Pennsylvania, on an execution by them against David B. Taylor. It appeared that Taylor, being in failing circumstances, confessed judgments to various relatives, sureties, and particular creditors, and, among the rest, one to the defendants for $7163.22. Execution being issued on this judgment the sheriff of Bucks county levied on and sold Taylor's personal property, and of the proceeds paid the defendants $1618.90, under a rule upon him to that effect. Taylor was subsequently decreed a bankrupt, and his assignee thereupon brought this suit, contending that the judgment to defendants was fraudulent and void, as being confessed in contemplation of bankruptcy, and to secure them in preference to other creditors. In the petition to have Taylor declared a bankrupt this judgment was mentioned, but as it was not there alleged to have been given in contemplation of bankruptcy, this court decided the allegation to be insufficient, and made no decision as to the validity of the judgment. The case came on for trial on the 23d February, 1844, before Judge RANDALL and a special jury, and was argued by:

C. & J. Fallon, for plaintiff.

J. W. Wallace and Mr. Reed, for defendant.

RANDALL, District Judge, (charging jury.) This action is brought by the assignee in bankruptcy of David B. Taylor, to recover from the defendants a sum exceeding sixteen hundred dollars with interest, being the proceeds of the personal property of the bankrupt sold by the sheriff of Bucks county, under an execution issued by the defendants on a judgment confessed by David B. Taylor in their favor, and which proceeds were received by them from the sheriff.. The plaintiff contends that the judgment on which this execution issued was fraudulent and void, under the provision of the bankrupt law which declares "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, endorser, surety, or other person, any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt, and all other payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by such bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person or persons whatever, not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon this act, and the assignee under the bankruptcy shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover, and receive the same as part of the assets of the bankrupt."

Independently of the bankrupt law, Taylor had a perfect right to give the judgment and the defendants to receive the proceeds, and under the laws of Pennsylvania the proceedings would be valid. But it is alleged that the judgment was confessed for the purpose of preferring either the bank or the endorsers of D. B. Taylor over his creditors generally, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and is, therefore, void.

In order to make this judgment void, it is necessary that it should have been given not only to effect a preference, but also in contemplation of bankruptcy. It has been said that this court has already decided the judgment to be valid by its decree on the application of Taylor's creditors to have him declared a bankrupt; but there has been no such decision. In that petition the judgment was not alleged to have been given "in contemplation of bankruptcy," and for that reason the court determined the allegation to be insufficient, but decided nothing as to the validity of the judgment. But if the court had decided the judgment not to be invalid, it would not have been binding on the jury. The party suing here is the assignee in bankruptcy, who must satisfy them of the facts necessary to support his case, but who cannot be bound by a decree in proceedings to which he was not a party. It is incumbent on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by evidence that this judgment was confessed with intent to give a preference, and also in contemplation of bankruptcy. By "contemplation of bankruptcy" the law does not mean a contemplation of applying for the benefit of the bankrupt law, or of proceedings in a court of bankruptcy, but a contemplation of the breaking up of one's business, or an inability to continue it. It has been held by this court that a knowledge of such a derangement of one's affairs as would prevent a party from carrying on his business, is a contemplation of bankruptcy; not mere insolvency, for a party may be insolvent, and know it, and yet payments made or securities given by him not be in contemplation of bankruptcy, if, at the time, he fully expected to continue his business and retrieve his losses; but if he did not expect this, or if the derangement of his affairs was such as to make the inability to continue his business highly probable, then the act was in contemplation of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankrupt law. The question of intention to give a preference is entirely for the jury, to be judged of by the acts and conduct of the parties at and about the time of making the payment or giving the security. If a party makes payments secretly; or gives securities to friends, or relatives, or persons to whom he may feel under special obligation; or when he says, as William Taylor swears David B. Taylor said, that he intends to prefer his sureties, and such security is given, there can be little doubt of the intention with which such payment or transfer is made. The credibility of the witnesses, however, is a question entirely for the jury.

It has been argued that the giving of judgments by David B. Taylor, about the same time, to his friends and relatives, would be without purpose, if, at the time, he expected to be able to pay all his creditors, and did not intend to give preferences. The giving of such judgments will be considered by the jury so far as it bears on or evidences the intention of D. B. Taylor, in the giving of this judgment to the bank. Again, it is alleged by the defendants that the judgment was given by Taylor at the pressing instance of the bank, and was obtained by their threats and coercion. The evidence of coercion is very slight; but if, at the time, Taylor contemplated bankruptcy within the meaning I have given to those words, and if he also intended to give a preference to the bank, then this judgment is void under the bankrupt law, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover, though the jury should believe that it was yielded to the threats and coercion of the creditor.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $1697.40.

ATKINSON v. GLENN.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1831.

DEPOSITION—COMMISSION—NOTICE—VERIFICATION OF AFFIDAVIT.

1. Notice on the 28th of December, to take a deposition in Alexandria, on the 29th, is not too short, all the parties residing in that town.

2. An affidavit may be sworn before the counsel of the party, and may be wholly in his handwriting.

[See note at end of case.]

The plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Neale, offered to read the deposition of Thomas Lee taken by commission under the act of Virginia of November 29th, 1792, § 12, p. 279, [providing for the examination by a commission of witnesses who are about to leave the country, or are unable to attend court.]

Mr. Hodgson, for the defendant, objected that the notice was too short, it having been given on the 28th of December; to take the deposition on the 29th of December, at Alexandria, all the parties residing in that town. He also objected, that the affidavit that the plaintiff's claim depended, in a material part, upon the testimony of a single witness who was about to depart, was sworn before the plaintiff's counsel as a justice of the peace; and that the deposition also was wholly in his handwriting.

But THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objections, and permitted the deposition to be read. Verdict for the plaintiff.

[NOTE. The question arose in U. S. v. Pings, 4 Fed. 714, as to whether or not it was a fatal objection to a deposition, taken under a commission "according to common usage," that the attorney for one of the parties to the action wrote down the answers for the commissioner, the other party to the suit not being represented; and plaintiff's counsel cited this case and Nichols v. White, Case No. 10,235, as authorities for the proposition that a commission, so executed, was executed "according to common usage." In considering the effect of these cases, Choate, District Judge, said: "In neither does it certainly appear that the party making the objection was not represented by his counsel upon the taking of the testimony. If he was, the objection might well have been considered waived, if not taken at the time. If, however, it was otherwise, and the cases were like the present, yet a practice, which at one time may appear to the courts harmless, may, at a different period and in a different state of things, be seen to involve such possibility of abuse that it should not be permitted."]

ATKINSON v. The HAMILTON.

[1 Bond, 536.][1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. June Term, 1862.

ADMIRALTY—PLEADING—MISJOINDER OF DEFENDANTS—DISTINCT CAUSES OF ACTION.

1. Where a collision is the joint act of two steamboats, there can be no objection to the joinder of both as defendants in an action.
2. If each boat is charged with a distinct and separate act of collision, without any allegation of privity between them, or concert or unity of purpose, they cannot be joined in the same libel.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by John H. Atkinson against the steamboats R. B. Hamilton and H. Logan for damages caused by collision. Heard on exception to the libel because of the misjoinder of defendants and of distinct causes of action. Exception sustained.]

Lee & Fisher, for libellant.

Lincoln, Smith & Warnock, for respondents.

OPINION OF THE COURT: An exception to the libel has been filed in this case, based on an alleged misjoinder of distinct causes of action, and of two defendants, as between whom there is no privity in the facts set forth in the libel as the grounds of the action. In deciding on this exception, the court must view it in the light of a demurrer in an action at law. The only question therefore is, whether from the statements and averments of the libel, the alleged misjoinder is apparent, and of a character to render it impossible to enter a valid decree in the case.

The suit is in rem. against the steamboats Hamilton and Logan for an alleged collision, by which a keel-boat laden with firebrick, fire-clay, etc., the property of the libellant, was sunk in the Ohio river while on its way from New Cumberland, in the state of Virginia, to the city of Cincinnati. The keel-boat and its cargo are alleged to have been a total loss to the libellant, and damages are claimed for the full value thereof. In the introductory part of the libel, it is averred that the suit is brought against the steamboats named, "jointly and against both and each of them." After stating that the keel-boat was navigated with all proper care and skill, and that every precaution was used by those having it in charge to avoid a collision, the libel alleges that the two steamboats, then ascending the river, were unlawfully engaged in racing, and were attempting at an undue speed to pass each other; and being just abreast, "almost simultaneously came into collision with said floating keel-boat—the bow of the said Henry Logan striking said keel-boat near her bow with a force sufficient to sink said keel-boat, and cause the same, her cargo, etc., to become a total loss, and the bow of the said Hamilton almost at the same time coming in violent collision with said keel-boat about ten or fifteen feet forward of her stern, with force also sufficient to sink her, and cause her to become a total loss." It is then averred, that as the result of these collisions the keel-boat was sunk, and that boat and cargo are a total loss to the libellant.

Upon these averments, the question presented, is whether the collisions were the joint act of the two steamboats, in the sense of making each collision the act of both. If this is the logical and legal import of the averments of the libel, there can be no objection to the joinder of both in this action. On the other hand, it is clear, if each boat is charged with a distinct and separate act of collision without any allegation of privity between them, or concert or unity of purpose, they can not be joined in the same libel. Such a course would be liable to the same objections that would lie to the joinder of two different persons for two distinct acts of trespass or misfeasance, in an action at law. It needs no citation of authorities to prove that this can not be done. In analogy to the settled principles of chancery, as connected with the frame of a bill, a libel thus setting forth the cause of action, would be liable to the objection of multifariousness in averring different causes of action, necessarily leading to distinct issues, and involving confusion and inconvenience in the trial. Its further practical effect would be to bring parties defendants before the court, between whom there is no privity, and who in defending the action might find it necessary to assume distinct grounds of defense and to rely on wholly different evidence.

In 1 Conk. Adm. 368, the author asserts, in very comprehensive terms, that "persons between whom there is no privity, can neither join as libellants, nor be joined in the same libel as respondents." And this doctrine, the learned author says, is alike applicable to cases arising ex contractu and ex delicto. In the case of Thomas v. Lane, [Case No. 13,902,] Judge Story held, that a libel charging two persons with distinct acts of assault and battery, could not be sustained. The learned judge says, "If the trespasses are different and distinct, several suits must be brought against the parties; and if they are joined, the libel ought to be dismissed for multifariousness and a misjoinder of parties." There can be no question that this doctrine applies to all actions sounding in tort, as well as to the action of trespass for an assault and battery. Suits for collisions always involve the commission of a tort, predicated of some act of carelessness, negligence, or want of skill. And if the acts charged are the separate acts of different boats, not acting in concert and with a common purpose, they can not be joined in the same action. And this doctrine does not at all conflict with the doctrine well settled, and of universal application, that tort feasors are liable both jointly and severally, and may be sued either jointly or severally. But this principle must be limited in its application to cases in which the parties have acted in concert in the commission of the tort, and resting under a common responsibility. Betts, Adm. 20.

Now, it may undoubtedly occur that two boats may be so acting in privity and with a common purpose, that both may be jointly responsible for an injury inflicted by either. If two boats, for any purpose, should be lashed or fastened together, and while thus connected, from carelessness or want of skill should injure another boat by collision, there can be no doubt that there would be a joint liability, and that both could be proceeded against in the same suit. In such a case, in legal estimation, the two boats would be considered as one, and both under the same management and control. But clearly, to sustain such a proceeding, there must be the distinct allegation that they were thus in privity or union; and on the hearing, such allegation must be proved.

In this libel there is clearly no such averment of concert or unity of action between these boats as to justify the conclusion of a joint liability. It is not averred that the boats were the property of the same persons, or that there was any mutuality of interest as between the owners, or that they were both under the control of the same persons. Nor is it averred that the same collision resulted in the loss of the libellant's boat and cargo. On the contrary, the averments are, that each boat was guilty of a separate act of collision, each of which was sufficiently violent to have caused the sinking of the libellant's boat and cargo. These collisions were committed not only by each boat separately, but the injury by each was on a different part of the keel-boat, and though near together in point of time, were not simultaneous. It is thus evident that the owners of the two boats might find it necessary to resort to different lines of defense in resisting the claim of the libellant, and to rely on different evidence for this purpose. The interests of each boat might therefore be brought into direct conflict and confusion, and inconvenience arise, not only in the final hearing, but in the preparation of the case for trial. There certainly is no necessity for this, as it is the undoubted right of the libellant to proceed in a separate action against each of the boats. To avoid any injury that might possibly result from such a course, it would perhaps be the duty of the court in the exercise of its discretion, to see that no decree should be entered in either case, until both should be heard. Thus, if the libellant by his evidence shall prove a case of fault and consequent liability, as to one or both the boats charged with fault, damages may be decreed on such principles as shall meet the justice of the case. If the libellant, by amendment, can allege a state of facts showing such concert and privity between the two steamboats, as will create a joint liability, within the principles stated by the court, he can have permission to do so; otherwise, the libel must be dismissed, and the proceeding commenced de novo.

CONTRACTS—SALE—VALIDITY.

[A principal can recover on a contract to buy made by his broker, where the seller, knowing nothing of the principal's financial standing, has agreed to write for information, and, if the answer is unsatisfactory, to accept security, although no answer at all has been received.]

[At law. Action by Richard Atkinson against Gurdon S. Hubbard & Co. for breach of a contract of sale. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Some time on or about the 4th day of November, 1858, Mr. J. K. Fisher, an extensive produce broker in this city, having several orders from different parties for the purchase of pork, called at the office of Hubbard and Hunt, and ascertained from Mr. Hubbard that they had one thousand barrels mess pork, which they would sell at $15 per barrel, February and March delivery, seller's option. Fisher agreed to buy the pork, and Hubbard agreed to sell. Fisher then gave Mr. Hubbard at different times the names of several persons as his principal, to each of whom Mr. Hubbard objected for the reason that he did not know anything about them. Fisher, on the morning of the 6th of November 1858, (Hubbard and Hunt having declined each of the names before given them,) gave them the name of the plaintiff, and said he was a member of the firm of Hewitt and Co., of New York, and was in every way responsible, and if, when they wrote to their New York correspondent, (which they volunteered to do,) his reply was not satisfactory, then he was willing to put up security at any time. Hubbard and Hunt both expressed their entire satisfaction, and said that was all right. Fisher at the time held money in his hands which belonged to Atkinson, and with which he was ready at any time to put up the required security. Hubbard and Hunt wrote to New York to inquire about Atkinson. Fisher, after allowing a reasonable time for a letter to get to New York and a reply to be received, called upon Messrs. Hubbard and Hunt on several occasions to know whether they had heard from New York, and if they would require him to put up the security, and received a reply from Messrs. Hubbard and Hunt that they had not heard. He called again on or about the 16th of November to make the same inquiry, and then, for the first time, was told by Mr. Hunt that they had made no contract. Mr. Fisher told Mr. Hunt that it was as fair a purchase as he had ever made, and he should hold them to it. On the 31st of March, 1859, the last day in which Messrs. Hubbard and Hunt had the right to deliver the pork, Mr. Fisher called on them, and demanded the pork, and tendered them the sum of $15,000 in gold. They declined to receive the money or deliver the pork. From the 6th of November, 1858, until the 31st of March, 1859, there was a firm feeling and steady advance in the market, and on the 31st of March pork was worth $16.75 per barrel. Such was in substance the proof on the part of the plaintiff, and upon which he claimed a contract was made on the 6th of November, 1858, and for a breach of which he claimed damages.

The defendants claimed that there was no contract made on the 6th of November, 1858, and that they had the right to make the contract or not, as they pleased, on hearing from New York, and introduced evidence to establish their view of the case, which in many particulars, in relation to the making of the contract, was conflicting with the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs. Of amount of pork, time of delivery, the price to be paid for the same, and the price on the 31st of March, 1859, there was no dispute.

DRUMMOND, District Judge, presiding. The court instructed the jury that if they believed the parties mutually understood, on the 6th of November, that the contract was complete and binding in case the reply from New York was satisfactory, and that in such event nothing further was to be done by either party to complete the contract, then the contract was binding, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover; but, if both parties did not so mutually understand it, then the plaintiff could not recover.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff of $1,750.

BANKRUPTCY—DIVIDENDS—SET-OFF—PARTNERSHIP.

[An assignee in bankruptcy may withhold payment of a dividend, out of the assets of a bankrupt firm, to a creditor who is debtor to one of the members of the firm, which debt is included in the schedule of such member, until the recovery by the assignee of such debt, or the determination of a suit for the same.]

[In bankruptcy. Motion to compel the assignee in bankruptcy of the partnership of Atkinson & Kellogg to pay Patrick Rahilly, a creditor of the firm, a dividend which the assignee had refused to pay, because Rahilly was a debtor, by the schedules, to the estate of one of the partners, for which debt Rahilly had been sued by the assignee before the dividend was declared.]

Bigelow, Flandrau & Clarke, for the motion.

E. C. Palmer, opposed.

NELSON, District Judge. The only question presented for decision in the view taken by the court, is whether the assignee can withhold the payment of the dividend to Rahilly declared upon the net proceeds of the joint stock of Atkinson & Kellogg until the recovery by him or the final determination, by the suit now pending, of a disputed indebtedness of Rahilly to the estate of George Atkinson, one of the members of the firm. The bankrupt Atkinson, in his schedules, has placed the indebtedness of Rahilly to him personally, at one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five dollars and fifty cents, and the assignee has commenced a suit to recover this amount, or whatever may be the sum due. Rahilly has filed a proof of debt against the estate of Atkinson for the sum of one thousand four hundred and thirty-one dollars and forty-five cents, less certain advances, which, according to the computation made in the proof filed, leaves no debt against the estate, but, on the contrary, an indebtedness by Rahilly in the sum of four hundred and ninety-three dollars and fifty-five cents. The proof, it is claimed, is defective, and Rahilly insists that it does not correctly state the actual condition of the account between himself and Atkinson.

In my opinion, it is immaterial whether the proof is correct or not, so far as this motion is concerned. The assignee is certainly justified in taking the statement of Atkinson's schedules as true, and in seeking to collect this claim by suit, if necessary, as well as all others in favor of the bankrupts, either as partners or individuals.

The bankrupt law (section 36) provides that in case members of partnerships are declared bankrupts, the estates of the individual members, as well as the partnership estate, must be settled in the bankrupt court. The creditors of the partnership elect the assignee, but he becomes the assignee of the estate of the individuals as well as the firm. It is true he must keep a separate account of the joint stock of the copartnership and of the individual estate of each member, but the expense and disbursements are taken out of the property received by the assignee, without reference to the fact whether it was collected from the partnership or the separate estate. It is only when the claims of creditors are to be determined that the assignee must consider the estate separately. He, of course, must pay the firm creditors before the creditors of the individuals, and in order to do equal and exact justice, the proceedings resulting in the final settlement of the partnership estate and the individual members' estate are conducted as if they had been commenced against one person. The assignee can adjust all the credits and debits of individuals to the firm, and the members thereof, provided he permits the partnership creditors to obtain their pay out of the partnership estate, and the separate creditors of each partner out of his separate estate, in the first instance. But adjustment of claims against the partnership and debts in favor of either partner with the same person is a part of the assignee's duty, and prevents unnecessary and vexatious litigation. There can be no objection to the settlement by the assignee of an indebtedness of the partnership, by canceling a debt due from the same person to the separate estate of one of the members, placing the proceeds to the proper account. If the claim is disputed, and is one that has been returned in the schedules, I can see no reason why the assignee should not retain in his possession, until the final decision, as much of the proceeds which would otherwise belong to the creditor of the partnership as is necessary to satisfy the debt due from the partnership creditor to the separate estate of one of the members. In this way multiplicity of suits is avoided, and no possible injury can result to any one. The assignee must pay over the balance in his lands, after deducting the sum which appears to be due to Atkinson's individual estate from the proofs on file.

LIBEL AND SLANDER—JUSTIFICATION—INFORMATION RECEIVED FROM SLAVE.

It is no justification, in slander, that the defendant received his information from his slave.

Slander. Office judgment at the rules before last term.

Mr. Taylor, for the defendant, moved to set aside the office judgment on filing special pleas of justification to the first and third counts, and a demurrer to second count. The special justification was, that, at the time the defendant spoke the words, he stated that he had received his information from his slave.

Mr. Lee, for the defendant, cited the following cases in support of the plea. Davis v. Lewis, 7 Term R. 17; Earl of Northampton's Case, 12 Coke, 132; and Actions for Slander, 4 Coke, 12.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Swann and Mr. Young, for the plaintiff, said that the reason of those decisions was that the plaintiff might have his action against the person from whom the defendant received his information. But in the present case the defendant's informer is a slave, against whom no action lies.

THE COURT seemed inclined to the opinion that the special matter, if good, might be given in evidence on the general issue.

Cur. ad. vult. Afterwards THE COURT was unanimously of opinion that the pleas ought not now to be received. KILTY, Chief Judge, because the facts stated are not a justification; MARSHALL, Judge, because the pleas did not confess the words charged.

NAVIGABLE WATERS — OBSTRUCTION—INJUNCTION

[1. An act incorporating a certain railroad company authorized, by necessary implication, the erection of bridges, providing that no obstruction should be placed across any stream declared a public highway so as to interfere with the full and free navigation thereof, nor across any unnavigable stream so as to divert its flow to the injury of private rights, and that, for injuries so inflicted, compensation should be given as for other property. Held, that an injunction would not be granted by a federal court, at the suit of an owner of certain vessels under contract to pass with cargo beyond the bridge, when it did not appear that the bridge contemplated would necessitate any alteration to be made in such vessels other than striking the masts, and any injury caused by the construction of the bridge admitted of adequate compensation.]

[2. Were it made to appear that the proposed bridge was a common nuisance or purpresture, the proper remedy would be in a court of law, at the prosecution of the state for a public offense.]

[3. Wherever the public convenience and common interest of the people demand it, the state, by legislative enactment, may repeal or modify a law declaring a stream a public highway.]

[4. Cited in Baring v. Erdman, Case No. 981, to the point that equity will not interfere by injunction when the act complained of is done under color of authority conferred by law until all doubts as to such authority have been removed, and the matter finally determined at law.]

[In equity. Suit by Chalkley Atkinson and others against the Philadelphia & Trenton Railroad Company for an injunction to restrain the defendant from creating a bridge across the Neshaminy creek, on a proposed route of a railroad, the construction of which was authorized under an act of the general assembly of .Pennsylvania. Injunction denied.]

C. J. Ingersoll, for plaintiffs.

W. B. Reed and J. Sergeant, for defendants.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. Chalkley Atkinson vs. John Savage, president, Simon Gratz and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, and Edmund Carlis, and Jesse Oakley, citizens of New York, directors of an incorporated company called the Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad Company. Timothy Field vs. The Same Defendants.

The complainants having filed their respective bills on the equity side of this court, praying for injunctions to restrain the defendants from erecting a bridge across the Neshaminy creek on the route of a railroad from Philadelphia to Trenton, which they are about constructing under order of an act of assembly, but as is alleged without any authority in law, to the great injury of the complainants, now move that one be granted till answer and the further order of the court. Due notice has been given to the defendants, who accordingly appeared by their counsel; affidavits have been taken on both sides, and the cases fully and ably argued; they are the same in their leading features, the principal difference between them being that Mr. Atkinson is under a contract for delivering lime in vessels navigating the Neshaminy, while Mr. Field is employed in transporting stone thereon from places on said river above the site of the contemplated bridge. As they both depend on the same facts and principles of law, it is unnecessary to recite the allegations of both bills.

The bill of Mr. Atkinson states that he is a citizen of New Jersey, employed in transporting articles by water to and from different places, for which purpose he is the owner of five schooners; that he has recently in the course of such business, made a contract with Anthony Taylor, who resides on the Neshaminy river, in Bucks county, in this state, to deliver to him one thousand bushels of lime at his wharf about two miles from the mouth of said river, which is by law a public navigable river or highway for the free passage of vessels up and down the same. That the defendants, under color of an act of assembly of this state for incorporating the Philadelphia and Trenton Rail Road Company, passed in February 1832, are about constructing a permanent bridge over and across said stream, near its mouth, where it is navigable for sea vessels, and thence to the farm of said Taylor, which bridge is intended to be a flat structure, without an elevated arch, span, draw, or other contrivance for permitting masted vessels to pass up and down the river, freely without interruption, hindrance, delay, or unnecessary expense as heretofore. That neither by the laws of Pennsylvania, or the constitution of the United States, can any obstruction be placed across the said stream; that it is contrary to law, to impede or interfere with the full and free navigation thereof, for the accommodation of the inhabitants on said river, as well as all the citizens of the United States who may have occasion to pass and repass on the same with any masted vessel. That the act of incorporation gives no authority to erect such a bridge as is contemplated, which the defendants have begun to construct, or any bridge which shall in any way impede the full and free navigation of said river. The prayer of the bill, is for an injunction to restrain the said president and directors, their agents, workmen, laborers, and all other persons employed about said railroad, from constructing any bridge whatever over and across said river, and for further relief. The complainant asserts no right of property on the bank or in the bed of the river; his claim to the interposition of this court rests on his contract with Mr. Taylor for the delivery of one thousand bushels of lime at his wharf above the site of the contemplated bridge, and on the common right of navigation resulting from the act of assembly declaring the Neshaminy a public navigable river. In this position, he asks us to arrest the completion of a public improvement now in rapid progress under an authority claimed in virtue of a law especially directed to this object; on such an application, it was our plain duty to pause and inquire whether this was a case in which an injunction should be granted on the usual allegations of ordinary bills, and the common affidavit of their truth.

That the matters involved are of deep concern to the parties and the public at large, cannot be denied, or that the consequences of our interference would be most serious; the injunction asked is not a matter of right, but rests in the discretion of the court to be exercised according to certain well known rules of equity from which we cannot depart. It is perhaps the highest, most delicate, and dangerous power which can be confided to any judicial tribunal, yet it is one which is indispensable for the purposes of preventive justice; the nature of the cases which call for its exercise is such too, as often to require a prompt and decisive action, on an ex parte application without a hearing of the adverse party, and sometimes without even notice, as that might lead to the immediate commission of an irremediable injury, in order to avoid the effect of the injunction, as the transfer of stock, the negotiation of a bill of exchange or promissory note, the transfer of a chattel of peculiar value, &c. On the other hand, as the erroneous exercise of this power may operate to the irretrievable injury of the party enjoined, and for which, as it is the act of the court, he can have no legal redress in damages, while the complainant may have his remedy at law, though the relief in equity is refused; too much caution cannot be used by the court in satisfying themselves that the case presented for their summary action is one which admits of neither doubt or delay. Hence the complainant must show in himself an apparent prima facie right of property or action to the subject matter of the injunction, as well as an injury intended or threatened by the defendant, which if done cannot be compensated by damages or adequate legal remedies, and can be effectually averted only by the protecting preventing power of a court of equity. [Osborn v. Bank,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 840, 846; Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co., [Case No. 1,617.] It is never exercised in a doubtful case, or in a new one, which does not come within the established rules of equity, (2 Dickens, 600; Coop. 77; 7 Johns. Ch. 334;) and if the courts of the United States can be at liberty to depart at all from the settled course of proceeding in chancery, it would seem to be their duty to proceed with more caution than its ordinary rules require. In England it is in the discretion of the chancellor, to proceed without notice, it is directed or not, according to the nature of the case; if the effect of the injunction would be to suspend the operations of a manufactory established and carried on at great expense, he would not proceed one step without notice of the motion for an injunction, (18 Ves. 217;) but this is merely a matter of discretion. The act of congress however makes notice indispensable before any proceedings had by the court—"Nor shall such writ be granted in any case without reasonable notice to the adverse party, or his attorney of the time and place of moving for the same." [Albers v. Whitney, Case No. 137.] The spirit of this requisition is not merely to give the notice in fact, the party is entitled to all the benefits resulting from notice; to be heard by his counsel on all matters appearing in the bill or disclosed in the affidavits of the complainant, not as amici curiae, but as representing the party in interest who may be affected by the motion as to whom it becomes an adversary suit, even before demurrer, plea, or answer. It is difficult to draw with precision the line between the merits of the summary application, and the final hearing on the whole equity of the case after an issue. On the motion for the injunction, the court will permit either party to inform its conscience as to the nature of the case, the consequences of granting or refusing it; without going into a full examination of the respective rights of the parties, they are bound to inquire into all circumstances bearing on the necessity of immediate action to prevent an irreparable injury to a prima facie right, and in doing so are not confined to the case made out by the complainant. Though this remedy will not be withheld merely because the title of the complainant may admit of doubt, or be open to litigation, there must be a clear case made out of impending danger, requiring prompt action to save an apparent right from destruction. Eden, Inj. 234; 7 Ves. 309; Dickens, 101, 102; 2 Atk. 182, 184. The defendant has an undoubted right to show by affidavit, or otherwise, the authority or claim of right by which he acts, and to explain his conduct in relation to the subject matter of complaint. The whole matter resting solely in the discretion of the court, they must be governed in its exercise by the particular circumstances of each case; a greater latitude will be allowed in those which affect persons engaged in large and expensive undertakings, especially great works of public improvements, in which a great portion of the community may be interested, than in those merely affecting individuals, litigating on their own account. The consequences of arresting the progress and completion of canals, bridges, or artificial roads, are too serious, and the responsibility of doing it is too great to be assumed, unless in a plain case of the violation of rights which are under the peculiar protection of courts of equity. Vide 7 Johns. Ch. 330. In this case it was of special importance, to be well informed as to the kind of navigation upon the Neshaminy, the kind of bridge proposed to be constructed,—the extent of the inconvenience to which vessels would be subjected in consequence of its erection on the plan contemplated by the defendants, and the nature of the injury which might be done to the complainants by its completion. To restrict the defendants, to the case made out by the bill and affidavits of the complainants, would mainly deprive the former of the benefits of notice of the motion, as well as confine our inquiries within limits much too narrow for a case so interesting to all concerned as this; in the development of which we are fully satisfied that a less expanded view of the subject, as to the localities and facts, would not have enabled us to come to a conclusion satisfactory to our minds, as to the justice and equity of the application.

A preliminary question of jurisdiction has been raised by the counsel of the respondents, on which we do not deem it necessary to express any opinion; without being understood as deciding it, by taking the case into our consideration, we shall assume that there are proper parties before us, for all the purposes of the motion, and proceed to consider the grounds on which it is urged and resisted. By an act of assembly of March, 1771, the Neshaminy was declared a public highway for the purposes of navigation, up and down the same as far as Barnley's ford, and no further. 1 Smith, Laws, 322. All citizens of this and other states, had therefore, the full and free right of passing and re-passing on the said river with all kinds of vessels or water craft, which no individual could in any way impede or obstruct, without subjecting himself to an indictment for a nuisance or an action for damages by the party injured. This common right is as much under the protection of the law, as a right of property in a citizen, in all matters relating to individuals to the full extent in which the legislature have granted it; but it is a right derived from legislation, which may be abridged or modified from time to time, as may be thought most conducive to the public welfare, by authorizing the erection of bridges or dams, which may subject the navigation to partial interruption or wholly destroy it.

It is also competent to the legislature, to repeal a law declaring any stream a public highway for the purposes of navigation, as it is to vacate a road; the source of the power is the same, and the reasons for its exercise on land or water are the same, public convenience and the common advantage of the people, for the furtherance of which the legislature may take away or modify at their pleasure a common right of passage, or any easement which could be enjoyed by any person, who had no right of soil or property, in the river or road. The only restraint which the constitution imposes on their authority is, that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation, and the consent of the representatives of the people. Const. Pa. art. 9, § 10. Laws in relation to roads, bridges, rivers, and other public highways, which do not take away private rights to property, may be passed at the discretion of the legislature, however much they may affect common rights, even private rights, if they are not those of property, may be taken away if it is deemed necessary for the promotion of public improvements, or if their destruction is the necessary consequence of their construction, without making compensation. The various laws of this state authorizing the making canals, either by the state or incorporated companies, have been so construed by the supreme court, as to establish the rule—"that the jury are to value the injury to property, without reference to the owner or the actual state of his business, and in doing that, the only safe rule is to inquire, what would the property unaffected by the obstruction have sold for at the time the injury was committed, what would it have sold for as affected by the injury. The difference is the true measure of compensation." 7 Serg. & R. 422, 423. The injuries to be compensated, are those which are done to property immediately, "as the swelling of waters into mill races, the inundation of land, the carrying of canal or lock through a man's land, or the taking away materials." This is the line which seems to have been marked by the legislature. Compensation shall be made for all damage from immediate injury to property, but not for any damage where there is no legal injury, which is called damnum sine injuriae—as the loss of a fishery by the erection of a dam in the Schuylkill, whereby the passage of fish are prevented. "For not only may the owners of land contiguous to the river, complain of the obstruction, but all others near it who have been accustomed to receive fish thence, or to fish with an angle or hoop net. 'There are other kinds of injury too, sustained particularly by the owners of land on the river, between the Fairmount dam and the lower falls. All those persons have lost the benefit of navigation from toll, in batteaux flats, &c. which was very useful, as it served for carrying produce to market, and bringing up manure for their lands. Yet it has not been contended that for such injuries compensation is to be made. Suppose the health of the country to be injured by evaporation from the dams, is compensation to be made for this the greatest of all injuries? I presume not. No property has been taken from him, he had no property in the fish or the river, and he was bound to know the law by which the river remained public property, and of course all emoluments were precarious,' 14 Serg. & R. 83, 84." So of a spring of water between high and low water mark, of the use of which the owner of adjacent land has been deprived,—he is entitled to no compensation, because, he had no vested property in it, "and it is ridiculous (say the supreme court) to talk gravely of a great national work being obstructed because a man will be deprived of the use of what never was his own." 1 Pen. & W. 467. We must consider these adjudications of the supreme court of the state, as establishing the general principle, that the right to the use of the navigable streams which are public highways, either for fishing or navigation, is subordinate to laws which regulate its general police and internal concerns; and that no common right in the common property of rivers, is considered as private property, or the subject of individual ownership. As it rests wholly in the discretion of the legislature, to provide for any other injury than what the constitution compels them to compensate, the sole remedy for any damages, sustained by the interruption of any common right, is that which the law authorizing the construction of a road or canal across a navigable stream, prescribes in favor of a party who may sustain a loss; if the law is silent, the loss is deemed no legal injury, which gives a claim to redress. So far then as depends on the constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, and their judicial construction, there is no doubt that the right of navigation on the Neshaminy may be wholly or partially taken away by the legislative power of the state, without compensation.

The only remaining objection to the validity of this law rests on its alleged repugnancy to the constitution of the United States by interfering with the power of congress "to regulate commerce among the several states," and violating that provision which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities in the several states."

The first of these objections is fully answered by the opinion of the supreme court in the case of the Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245. The legislature of Delaware had authorized this company to erect a dam across a navigable creek; the dam formed a permanent obstruction to the navigation, so that no vessel could pass on the stream; but the court decided, that the act of assembly was neither repugnant to the constitution nor in conflict with any act of congress on the subject of commerce or navigation; and that this abridgment of the common right of navigation was a matter between the government of the state and its citizens; of which they could take no cognizance. Id. 252. State laws on the subject of turnpike roads, ferries, and bridges, are a part of the system of internal commerce, and police of the respective states, the regulation of which they have reserved to themselves without any control by congress,—[Gibbons v. Ogden,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 208; [Brown v. Maryland,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 443; [Livingston v. Van Ingen,] 9 Johns. 560, 564, 573; 4 Wash. C. C. 378, [Corfield v. Coryell, Case No. 3,230;] Bennett v. Boggs, [Case No. 1,319,]—and no law on these subjects is prohibited by the constitution of the United States, unless it impairs the obligation of a contract,—[Satterlee v. Matthewson,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 410, etc. The other objection is wholly inapplicable, as the law abridges the right of the citizens of Pennsylvania to the free navigation of the Neshaminy to the same extent as those of New Jersey, while both are equally entitled to its benefits. This brings us to the construction of the act. The eighth section authorizes the company to construct a railroad from Philadelphia to Trenton which by necessary implication gives the power of erecting bridges over the stream between these places, without which the object of the law could not be effected. This is admitted by the counsel for the complainants, but he contends, that the proviso to the eleventh section is a positive prohibition, to erect any bridge that shall not leave the navigation as full and free from all impediments as it has heretofore been, so that vessels can pass and repass with standing masts. This proviso is in these words: "That no obstruction whatever shall be placed on or across any stream now declared a public highway, so as to impede or interfere with the full and free navigation thereof; or to change the direction of any stream or water course not declared a public highway, so as to affect the rights and interests of the owners thereof, without the consent of the said owners, unless the right to the same be obtained by such process as is before directed in relation to other property; and that any inconvenience or expense attending the alteration of vessels now navigating said streams to conform, to the bridges erected by said company shall be paid out of the funds of the company." The sense of the legislature as expressed in this proviso seems clear; the first part is a declaration that there shall be no obstruction to the full and free navigation of the streams, the last clause is the legislative construction of the first, that an inconvenience or expense in so altering the vessels as to conform to the bridge, is not such an obstruction as is prohibited; it is by necessary implication a declaration, that the company are not bound to conform the bridge to the vessel, but that the vessel must be made to conform to the bridge, on the company paying the expense. We are bound to give this meaning to the law, or the last sentence becomes senseless for it can admit of none other; taking the whole together the sense is obviously, that if the erection of the bridge causes no other obstruction to the navigation, than the inconvenience in the alteration of the vessel passing it, it is within the authority of the law. This is the more evident, from the obligation of the company to pay for the expenses being confined to vessels "now navigating said streams;" this refers to the time of passing the act incorporating the railroad company, and would exclude the owner of any vessel which had not in February 1832, navigated the Neshaminy from a right to call on the company for any reimbursement of the expenses attending the alteration. The words "full and free navigation," must therefore be taken with the qualification attached to them by the legislature; which precludes us from considering such a bridge as they have authorized to be erected, as an obstruction in violation of the law; if the bed of the river is unobstructed, if vessels can freely pass and repass between the piers of the bridge, without injury or interruption, it seems to us that the public common right of navigation is protected to the extent contemplated by the law. Had it been intended that the construction of the bridge should have been such, as to permit masted vessel to pass, there would have been a provision, that a draw should have been made as is often done; this seems to have been a matter left to the discretion of the company, on condition of their making compensation to the owners of vessels then navigating the river.

So far as we can judge from the bills and affidavits, the only subject of complaint seems to be, that the masts of the vessels must be struck in order to pass the bridge, according to its present plan of construction; it is admitted that such is the fact, and it is not denied that vessels with struck masts can freely and safely navigate the river without meeting any obstruction from the bridge, except the trifling delay in striking and raising them. Though the prayer of the bill is for an injunction to restrain the erection "of any bridge," the case has not been pressed to that extent in the argument; the great question seems to be whether the company have a right to erect one without a draw, which will permit those vessels which have standing masts to pass at pleasure. It appears to us, that the law imposes no such restriction, but that it contemplates the striking the masts, as the very alteration for which provision is made. The affidavits point us to no other inconvenience or expense to which the owners of vessels can be subjected, and unless some other is pointed out, it may be fairly inferred that none other exists; the consequence is, that the owners of vessels must submit to this restriction on their right of navigation on the terms prescribed. The legislature had the power to authorize the erection of a dam or causeway which would stop the navigation, if in their opinion it was conducive to the general welfare; whether it would be a discreet exercise of their power is not for this court to decide, as the whole subject is clearly within their discretion which the judicial power cannot control. [Satterlee v. Matthewson,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 412; [Providence Bank v. Billings,] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 563; [McCulloch v. Maryland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 423; [U. S. v. Arredondo,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 729. They have thought proper to authorize this company to subject the navigation of the streams on the route of the road to some inconvenience under the obligation making compensation for the only injury to the common right of the citizens, which they deemed a proper subject of indemnity. In this respect and to this extent, they put it upon the same footing as private property, but they have deemed any other inconvenience, expense or abridgment of navigation, to be matters of subordinate importance to the construction of the road—these are questions of public policy with which we cannot interfere without usurping legislative powers. Though as it would seem from the affidavits, that the contemplated bridge may render the Neshaminy unnavigable for sea vessels, yet that must have been foreseen by the legislature, to be the necessary consequence of the authority given by the eleventh section, they have made no provision for such a case, the same effect has been produced on the Schuylkill, and other navigable rivers in the state, over which permanent bridges without draws have been erected by corporations under the authority of laws without a doubt of their validity or expediency. The authority given to this corporation, is agreeable to the uniform course of legislation, which allows a degree of latitude in the construction of works of public improvement, according to its nature and objects, by which more or less discretion is allowed as to the route, plan and execution, which we are not prepared to say has been wantonly abused by the officers of the company. Vide 2 Dow, 521; 20 Johns. 740; 7 Johns. Ch. 330.

The affidavits produced on the part of the company, especially that of the person employed to construct the bridge, are very strong to show, that its erection on the present plan is not only required by considerations of convenience, economy, and security, to the company; but that the making of a draw would be productive of very serious obstructions to the navigation, by requiring an additional pier in the bed of the stream, which would narrow the channel at low water, so that vessels could not pass. They also state, that the bridge crosses the stream at an angle with the current, whereby vessels would be incommoded and endangered in passing through a draw, and express an opinion that the striking of the masts is a much less inconvenience than passing the draw. These statements and opinions, tend strongly to prove, that the powers of the company have not been so exercised as to evince either a want of discretion, or a design to deviate from their authority by perverting it, so as unnecessarily to impair the rights of navigation. Whether they have abused, or misused their privileges, is an inquiry more proper for the legislature to institute under the provisions of the 20th section of the law, than for this court to make on an application for a summary injunction; if we could interfere at all in such an allegation, it would only be on a clear departure from the route, or a palpable abuse of their discretion, in a manner that could admit of no colorable excuse—such a case we think has not been made out by the complainants.

We cannot perceive in the law in question, any excess of legislative authority, any violation of any provision of the state or federal constitution, or in its execution by the defendants, the assumption of any power not conferred upon them, any wanton invasion of public or common rights, or any legal ground for an injunction arresting the further progress of the work, on any principle hitherto recognized in a court of equity. Were it even conceded that the bridge is a common nuisance, or a purpresture, the remedy is in a court of law at the prosecution of the state for the public offence, where the defendants would have a right of trial by jury before conviction. If this court enjoin them, it is in effect an adjudication that the offence has been committed, and the consequence becomes visited upon them in anticipation of their legal guilt. Whether a court of equity would do this in any case before a conviction at law, is not well settled, there may be cases where on an application of the attorney general such a proceeding might be sustained, it is unnecessary to give any opinion on such a case till it arises; it is clear, however, that to sustain such an application the injury must be a public one, and can be redressed only at its suit. 18 Ves. 217, etc.; 2 Johns. Ch. 375, etc.; Harg. Law Tracts, 83, 87. If a public nuisance is also a specific injury to the property of an individual, he has his remedy in equity, not because the act complained of is a nuisance, but on account of the irremediable injury to his private right of property. 6 Johns. Ch. 439, 440. No case has yet occurred, in which an injunction has been granted in favor of an individual, who claims only a common right on a common highway in which he can have no private property; nor can we conceive one in which it could be justified, unless it was accompanied with an obstruction, or destruction of a private right. The injury too must be what is deemed in equity to be irremediable, a permanent appropriation of the property of the complainant to the use of the defendants, a destruction or total loss consequent on the act about to be done; "if the injury is susceptible of perfect pecuniary compensation, if the ordinary legal remedy in courts of law can afford adequate satisfaction, it is not in the sense of the law irreparable," "it must reach to the very substance and value of the estate going to its destruction in the character in which it is enjoyed." If the act complained of is done under color of an authority conferred by law, the court will not interfere if there is any ground of doubt as to the authority, until the doubt has been removed, and the matter finally determined at law. 7 Johns. Ch. 332, etc., and cases cited; also [Osborn v. Bank,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 842, etc.; 4 Johns. Ch. 22; Coop. 77; Dickens, 600; 2 Johns. Ch. 473.

The application of these familiar principles of the law of equity to the present motions seems conclusive against them. Mr. Atkinson as the owner of vessels employed in navigating the Delaware and its waters, can have only a common right to the navigation of the Neshaminy, the interference with which by the defendants is not the proper subject of an injunction; but if it were so on general principles, his case would be a clear exception. He does not alledge in his bill, that his vessels have standing masts, or that he would be subjected to any particular inconvenience or expense, by conforming his vessels to the bridge about to be erected, or that they had ever been employed in navigating the Neshaminy prior to the passage of the act. On the contrary, the affidavits of the defendants are full to the fact, that his five schooners have struck masts, and go far to negative their ever having navigated this river as early as 1832. The bill does not state the time when the contract was made for the delivery of lime, or how much of the 1000 bushels remains to be delivered; one schooner load it seems has been received, but we are left in the dark as to the present state of the contract—be that as it may, there seems no impediment to its completion. If his vessels have struck masts, they can pass and re-pass as heretofore, or if the defendants have illegally obstructed the navigation, the injury is one which admits of adequate compensation; it is at most but temporary, as it must cease with the expiration of the contract.

Mr. Field's case differs from the other, only in the circumstance of his being engaged in transporting stone from a quarry on the river above the bridge; this gives him no peculiar claims to our interference, as it is only the mode in which he exercises his common right of navigation—he must stand on the same footing as the other citizens of this and other states, whose common right is protected by the law, subject to the qualifications imposed upon it by the provisions of the charter to this company. So long as they comply with its requisitions for the indemnity of the owners of vessels navigating the river at the time of its passage, this court cannot restrain them in the completion of the bridge; should they refuse to pay for the inconvenience and expenses attendant on the necessary alteration of the vessels, that might be a case of special injury under the provisions of the law, which would call for the interposition of the equitable powers of the court. It appears, however, that the company have made a public offer, to pay for such alterations, which is all they are bound to do before an application for indemnity, by any person who alleges himself entitled to it. Vide 2 Daw. 6, 523; 20 Johns. 105, 740; Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co., [Case No. 1,617.] We can take no judicial notice of any special injury sustained by any citizens of this state, or any general inconvenience to which the people on the Neshaminy or its vicinity may be subject on account of the bridge; those are exclusively the subjects of judicial cognizance in the courts of the state, nor can we in any way consider the injury which any persons who are citizens of other states have sustained who are not parties to this suit. The remedy of injunction is individual, applicable only to special injuries in violation of private right, as to which the grievances of one man can have no bearing on those of another, nor can any alleged grievances of the public authorize any one to redress it at his own suit, either in a court of law or equity. Considering these cases, therefore, as depending either on the validity of the act of incorporation or its construction, we are of opinion that the defendants have full legal authority to erect the contemplated bridge on the plan now in progress, and that it is neither a public nuisance or purpresture; but independently of this consideration, we are also of opinion that neither of the complainants have such a right, as under any circumstances to entitle them to an injunction before a trial at law. There is another objection to their motion arising from the acquiescence of the complainants, from the time, when from the plan of the bridge, it was known that it was not intended to construct it with a draw, and its erection was commenced in September or October last, till the present application was made; this objection might be a very serious one if it was necessary to consider it, but as we have no doubt on the other points in the case, we shall give no opinion upon it. The motions for injunctions are accordingly overruled.

Case No. 616.

ATKINSON v. PURDY.

[Crabbe, 551.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 30, 1844.

COURTS — CONFLICTING STATE AND FEDERAL JURISDICTION — PROCEEDINGS BY ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—JUDGMENT.

1. Suits by an assignee in bankruptcy are excepted from the general rule that court of the United States have not jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of the same state, and this exception includes a suit by such assignee against a person not a party to the proceedings in bankruptcy.

2. The bankrupt law, being supreme, overrides all state legislation, and, therefore, judgments confessed in contravention of that act are void, and not liens on the bankrupt's property, although they may be valid by the state laws.

3. In general, every judgment of a court having jurisdiction over the parties and subject-matter in controversy is binding upon those parties, and their privies, until regularly reversed, and, though founded on an erroneous view of the matter in controversy, is conclusive on every other court; therefore, this court, in a suit by the assignee of a bankrupt, refused to examine into the validity of a judgment confessed by the bankrupt in a state court, the jurisdiction of which was not denied.

[Cited in Shuford v. Cain, Case No. 12,823.]

At law. This was an action of assumpsit [by Samuel Atkinson, assignee in bankruptcy of David B. Taylor, against Thomas Purdy] to recover a balance of purchase-money, received by the defendant, as sheriff of Bucks county, in Pennsylvania, for certain real estate sold by him, in execution, as the property of one David B. Taylor. It appeared that Taylor had, when in failing circumstances, confessed various judgments to particular creditors, and among others to the Farmers' Bank of Bucks County. Execution was issued on this judgment, and Taylor's personal property sold thereunder. Atkinson v. The Bank, [Case No. 609.] Subsequently his real estate was also sold under the same judgment, but the proceeds of the sale were exceeded by the amount of judgments confessed by him, which were liens on the real estate prior to that of the bank. In the mean time Taylor had been declared a bankrupt, and his assignee brought this suit, alleging that the judgments confessed by Taylor were void, and in fraud of the bankrupt law. The case came on to be tried, on the 18th September, 1844, before Judge RANDALL and a special jury, and was argued by C. and J. Fallon for the plaintiff, and by Miller and Reed for the defendant.

J. Fallon, for plaintiff.

After commenting on the facts and evidence, cited in support of the plaintiff's right to recover, Lewis v. Smith, 2 Serg. & R. 158; Stewart v. Stocker, 13 Serg. & R. 204; Wats. Sher. 7 Law Lib. 61, (*84.)

Mr. Miller, for defendant.

The court under whose process the money was made is the only one which can protect the sheriff, and the assignee has no right to sue him here. The courts of the United States have, on general principles, no jurisdiction over such a case as this, it being between citizens of the same state, one of whom was not a party to the proceedings in bankruptcy. Those courts being of limited jurisdiction, the record must show a case wherein the jurisdiction may attach. This is not so here. Lucas v. Morris, [Case No. 8,587.] We are bound by the state decisions and must proceed according to them, and cannot, therefore, in this court, inquire into the validity of Taylor's judgments, so long as they are unreversed in the state tribunals. Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 34; 1 Story's Laws, 67, [1 Stat. 92;] Golden v. Prince, [Case No. 5,509;] U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 115; Pratt v. Northam, [Case No. 11,376;] McFarland v. Griffith, [Id. 8,790;] Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 25.

Mr. Reed, for defendant.

The question as to the validity of the judgments is not for this court; it is similar to the case of process against a foreign minister: that process is declared to be void, but it must be decided so by the court which issues it. Cabrera's Case, [Case No. 2,278.] These judgments have been passed upon and treated as valid in courts of competent jurisdiction; they may not be inquired into here.

C. Fallon, for plaintiff, in reply.

The act of 1789 merely provides that state laws shall be regarded as rules of decision in the courts of the United States, when the statutes of the United States do not otherwise require, not that where state laws and those of the United States conflict, the latter shall give way. Yet here, where judgments, probably valid by the law of Pennsylvania, are in manifest violation of the bankrupt law of the United States, the defendant asks this court to sustain those judgments notwithstanding the bankrupt law, and denies that it has jurisdiction to inquire into their validity. Such an inquiry, however, has been made in this very case, and by this court, in Atkinson v. Farmers' Bank, [Case No. 609.]

RANDALL, District Judge, (charging jury.) This action is brought by Samuel Atkinson, the assignee in bankruptcy of David B. Taylor, against Thomas Purdy, the sheriff of Bucks county, to recover the balance of purchase-money said to have been received for certain real estate of Taylor sold by the defendant, as sheriff, by virtue of process issued out of the court of common pleas of Bucks county, on a judgment entered in that court in favor of the Farmers' Bank of Bucks County. The sale of the property and receipt of the purchase-money is not the subject of much controversy, but it is said the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, because this court has no jurisdiction of the cause of action, and because—being a court of limited jurisdiction as to parties—that jurisdiction has not been made to appear, as is requisite, on the face of the record. The position is undoubtedly correct in law, but is not supported by the facts. The declaration states the suit to be brought by the plaintiff as assignee in bankruptcy of David B. Taylor, and although, in general, the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction, in civil actions, between citizens of the same state, there are exceptions to the rule. A suit by an assignee of a bankrupt, although he may be a citizen of the same state as the defendant, is one of these exceptions. It has been said, too, that the recovery of a debt from one not a party to the proceedings in bankruptcy is not such a cause of action as gives jurisdiction to this court, although the parties may be otherwise liable to its process. In this also I think the defendant is in error; the eighth section of the bankrupt law gives concurrent jurisdiction to circuit and district courts, within and for the district where the decree of bankruptcy is passed, of all suits, at law and in equity, which may or shall be brought, by any assignee of the bankrupt, against any person or persons claiming an adverse interest touching any property or right of property of the said bankrupt. If, therefore, on the merits of the case, the plaintiff has the right to recover, I have no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court over the parties.

The defendant alleges, however, that, at the time of the sale by him, and before the decree of bankruptcy, there were sundry judgments entered in the court of common pleas of Bucks county against David B. Taylor, which, by the laws of Pennsylvania, were liens upon the real estate sold, and in amount exceeded the whole of the purchase-money. The existence of such judgments is admitted, but it is said that they are fraudulent and void, having been confessed by the bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, and with an intention of giving the several plaintiffs a preference or priority over the general creditors of the bankrupt.

The second section of the bankrupt law declares, "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, endorser, surety, or other person, any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt, * * * shall be deemed utterly void." This act, being within the express powers of congress, is supreme, and overrides all state legislation on the subject; if therefore the judgments were confessed in contravention of this law, they are void, and are not liens on the property of the bankrupt.

A most material question now arises:—which is the tribunal to decide on the validity of these judgments? The constitution of the United States provides, in the first section of its fourth article, that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. And the congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." And congress have provided, by the act of 26th May, 1790,—1st Story's Laws, 93, [1 Stat. 122, c. 11,]—that the records and judicial proceedings of the several states, authenticated in the manner therein provided, shall have such faith and credit given them in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence they are taken. As a general principle, every judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter in controversy, is binding upon the parties and their privies until it is regularly reversed, and, although founded upon an erroneous view of the matter in controversy, is binding upon every other court. The errors and irregularities, if any exist, are to be corrected only by some direct proceedings before the same court to set them aside, or in an appellate court. If, however, the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter then its proceedings are void, and may be treated as a nullity.

It is not disputed that the court of Bucks county had jurisdiction of the parties, and the subject-matter in the causes before them. The congress of the United States has been careful to avoid anything like a conflict of jurisdiction between the courts of the United States and the state courts, and in granting equity powers to the supreme court has provided that no writ of injunction shall be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a state. If there has been any fraud or irregularity in the proceedings of the state court, it cannot be doubted—indeed it has been proved in this case—that that court will afford every facility to correct it; but for this court to inquire into it, would not only be an evasion of the act of congress prohibiting the interference of courts of the United States with the process of state courts, but might be productive of great injustice to the defendant, inasmuch as a judgment against him for the amount claimed here would not be an available answer to the demands of the plaintiffs whose judgments are subsisting in the court of the state, unless those judgments are set aside or opened by that court. By the sale, the lien of the judgments upon the land was discharged, and the sheriff substituted as the debtor of the plaintiffs therein, according to the priority of their liens. He must account to the court which authorized the sale. By permitting the plaintiff to recover in this action, we must either subject the defendant to the liability of paying the money twice, or say to the courts of the state: We have inquired into the regularity of your proceedings and find them erroneous; you will therefore proceed no further. Such a direction there is no power in this court to enforce, and it therefore cannot be given. The true and proper remedy for the plaintiff is in the court of common pleas of Bucks county, and to that he is confined. The jury must, therefore, under this view of the law, find a verdict for the defendant. On the same day, the jury came into court and were ready to deliver their verdict, but the plaintiff being called did not come, and made default; whereupon a judgment of nonsuit was entered, with leave reserved to the plaintiff to move to have the same taken off. The motion to take off the nonsuit was made, and, on the 3d January, 1845, discharged, and the judgment made absolute.

ATKINSON v. ROBBINS.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1837.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—COMPENSATION—FEDERAL COURTS.

1. The orphans' court for the county of Alexandria has authority under the law of Virginia, to regulate and fix the compensation of an executor in settling the estate; and for that purpose may order an inventory to be taken and an appraisement to be made, although the will directs that no inventory should be taken.

2. The rights of the parties under the will are to be decided by the law of Virginia; the powers and jurisdiction only of the court, are to be ascertained by the law of Maryland, referred to by the act of congress erecting the orphans' court.

Appeal from the orphans' court for the county of Alexandria, allowing the executor for his compensation seven and a half per cent. on the appraisement of the stock in trade, which the testator directed not to be appraised, and to be kept in trade to be carried on by one of his sons for the joint benefit of all the children until it should become necessary to divide it among them. Exception was taken in the orphans' court, by Mr. Semmes, for the legatees, and overruled by the judge, because, he says, the profits cannot be ascertained but by a comparison of the present value of the stock, with the value at the time of division; and because the orphans' court, in practice, proceeds under the Maryland law, which requires an appraisement in all cases.

Mr. Semmes, for the legatees, contended that the orphans' court had no jurisdiction to have an appraisement made, for the purpose suggested, against the express provisions of the will. The rights under the will must be determined by the law of Virginia. The powers, duties, and jurisdiction of the court only are to be ascertained by the law of Maryland referred to by the act of congress erecting the court. The case of Nicholls v. Hodges, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 562, was decided under the express provisions of the Maryland law, which requires the compensation to be made by way of commissions on the amount of the inventory. But there is no statute in Virginia ascertaining the amount of the commissions. The compensation of an executor is by an allowance made by the judges in their discretion according to the circumstances of each case.

Mr. Taylor, contra. By the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801, § 12, (2 Stat. 103,) the orphans' court in each county is to "have all the powers, perform all the duties, and receive the like fees, as are exercised, performed, and received by the judges of the orphans' court within the state of Maryland." This is not a question of the right of property; it is only of the compensation to the executor for his services. His duties are to be ascertained by the law of Maryland. There is no law in Virginia to regulate the commissions. The practice and forms of proceeding must be governed by the Maryland law. Some commission must be allowed, but without an inventory and appraisement it cannot appear how much. There is no evidence from which this court can say whether the commission is too large. The whole personal estate passes through the hands of the executor, in whom it is vested by law, and the legacies vest only by his assent. He is responsible to the legatees and must finally make a distribution.

THE COURT, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra,) affirmed the decree of the orphans' court.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, stated his opinion to be, that the rights of all parties under the will are to be decided by the law of Virginia. The powers and jurisdiction, only, of the orphans' court are to be ascertained by the law of Maryland. The rights of the legatees, and of the executor, are to be governed by the law of Virginia. By that law the court is to fix the compensation of the executor. It is a right which the executor has under that law. The court in Virginia is not obliged to give the compensation in the form of commissions; but may take the commissions, (or rather the sum upon which commissions might be charged) as a guide to their discretion. So may the orphans' court here. And the supreme court has decided in Nicholls v. Hodges, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 562, that the rate of compensation is exclusively in the cognizance of the orphans' court, and its decision is conclusive.

SEAMEN—WAGES—AUTHORITY OF MASTER TO DISPLACE MATE—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — MASTER AS WITNESS.

1. When and for what causes a mate may be displaced by the master.

[Cited in Sherwood v. McIntosh, Case No. 12,778; The Exchange, Id. 4,594.]

2. Accounts for traffic and dealing between master and mate, not subjects of admiralty jurisdiction.

3. The master is answerable to the owners for damages accruing from the illegal discharge of mariners, and also for extravagant wages given.

[Cited in The Fortitude, Case No. 4,953.]

4. Mate may sue for wages in the admiralty court, [and] all rules operating on mariners apply to him.

[Cited in The Leonidas, Case No. 8,262.]

5. Master may displace the mate for just and lawful cause; but this cause may be enquired into.

6. Mate not being lawfully displaced, and offering to do his proper duty, should have been received; [and,] if a loss accrues when the mate is unlawfully displaced, the master must answer.

[Cited in Thompson v. Busch, Case No. 13,944; Sherwood v. McIntosh, Id. 12,778; The Exchange, Id. 4,594.]

7. Master offered as a witness, and refused.

In admiralty. The dispute, between the master and the mate, in this cause, was concerning the mate's wages. Process, or a citation was issued against the master and owner. There were accounts of monies and articles of traffic and dealing between the captain and mate, but they were not considered within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, except so far as they were connected with the claim for wages. The master had, a short time before the arrival of the vessel at Philadelphia, the last port of delivery, turned the mate before the mast. The mate insisted on his wages, agreeably to contract. He went on shore at Philadelphia, where the voyage ended, against the captain's orders, to take advice. He returned in a few hours (far under forty-eight) and tendered himself ready to assist in unlading the cargo, as mate. The captain refused to reinstate him in the capacity of mate, and he would not labour as a mariner, in delivering the cargo.

The forfeiture of wages was insisted on—First. Because the captain had displaced the mate at sea, for causes of which he was competent to judge, and having legal authority so to do. Second. The mate had gone on shore without the captain's orders and against his directions—He had not assisted to unlade the cargo; and had left the ship before she was unladen, thereby incurring a forfeiture of all his wages, as he was absent without leave, and did not return on board, within forty-eight hours, as the act of congress directs. On the first point. The causes assigned for displacing were—First. The mate having been found asleep during his watch—the proof was, that the mate, who was lame in one of his feet, was found during the watch, lying for a few minutes on a hencoop. One witness said he was asleep; the other could not be positive, and spoke doubtfully. Second. The mate had disobeyed the orders of the captain at sea, in neglecting to have the jib hauled down, on the approach of a squall, whereby the jib was split. The proof on this point was not satisfactory; it appeared that the mate had at first ordered the jib down—afterwards he conceived there would be no necessity for it—but on the squall encreasing he repeated, too late, the orders to haul it down: all this happened in the course of a few minutes.

The captain was offered as a witness, to prove these and other facts, which the mate denied. The judge refused to permit the captain to be sworn; alleging it to have been his practice not to admit such testimony. In this case there appeared much personal animosity; and the contest seemed to lay entirely between the master and mate. The master is answerable to the owners for damages accruing to them by his improper and illegal discharge of mariners, as well as for extravagant wages given to, or injurious contracts made with them. This, he said, was among the reasons inducing him to refuse permitting the master to be examined as a witness, in such controversies. The mate is permitted to sue in the admiralty, as a mariner. All general rules in cases of mariners apply to him. On the several points, the judge declared his opinion, and determined as follows.

BY THE COURT. When I first came into this court, I found it taken for granted, that the captain had a legal right to displace the mate for just cause. I have seen repeated instances, where the exercise of this power was necessary for the safety of the ship; and I have examined into many cases, wherein it had been executed from arbitrary, capricious, and improper motives. It is established by the maritime laws, and so it ought to be, that the captain must be supreme in the ship. His lawful orders must be obeyed. But when a contract is in question, the law, by its proper courts, will see that it is not vacated, for any other than legal, reasonable and necessary causes. The courts will control and examine the powers and conduct of the master. He is authorized to give all commands for the navigating, government and safety of the ship; but he has no authority to nullify a contract at his will, or for light and trifling causes. A contract is a solemn engagement, not to be vacated without the consent of all parties, or on considerations, on which the law must decide through the tribunals established to make such decisions. The mate is a respectable officer in the ship, and generally chosen with the consent of the owners; he is under the orders of the master, in his ordinary duty; but his contract is not subject to arbitrary control. He may forfeit his right to command and wages, by fraudulent, unfaithful, and illegal practices; by gross and repeated negligence, or flagrant, wilful and unjustifiable disobedience; by incapacity, brought on him by his own fault, to perform his duty, or palpable want of skill in his profession. These are very different from the charges alleged, but not satisfactorily proved, in this cause. I do not therefore think that the captain was justifiable in displacing the mate for the causes assigned. The safety of the ship often depends on this officer, who is sometimes more trustworthy and capable than the master; and commonly placed by the owners to encrease the security of their property. In case of the absence, incapacity or death of the captain, the command and responsibility devolve on the mate. [See note at end of case.] The causes of removal should, on all these considerations, be evident, strong and legally important.

The second point depends on the first—the mate tendered himself ready to perform his duty as mate, but the master refused to receive him in that capacity: he was not bound to act in any other station. If any loss accrued to the owners hereby, the master, and not the mate, is responsible. If a common mariner even rebels, disobeys and refuses to do his duty, but repents in time and offers amends, and a return to, and faithful discharge of his duty, the master is bound to receive him. If the master will not so receive and reinstate him, but discharges him, the maritime laws declare that he may follow the ship, and recover his wages for the whole voyage.

I do not think it necessary to determine the point made in this cause, "Whether the mate is, or is not, bound when the voyage is ended, to assist in unlading the cargo?" The mate seems peculiarly charged with this duty (however it may be with the mariners) and he offered to perform the service. I have on many occasions, given my opinion on the subject of the duty of mariners, under similar circumstances with the mate. On the whole, I think wages must be paid agreeably to the contract in the shipping articles.

[NOTE. The footnote (1 Pet. Adm. 247) cites a case in the district court for the district of Pennsylvania to the point that the command and responsibility necessarily fall upon the mate in the absence of the captain. This case is the same as Anonymous, Case No. 467a.]

[PRIZE — WHAT CONSTITUTES THE CAPTURING FORCE — DISTRIBUTION BETWEEN CAPTORS AND THE UNITED STATES.]

[1. A war vessel within signal distance of another, making a prize, is entitled to share in the prize, under 12 Stat. 606, § 3, but is not a part of the "capturing force," within the meaning of section 2, providing that, where the capturing force is superior, the prize shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men making the capture.]

[2. The Confederate ironclad Atlanta came down Warsaw sound on June 17, 1863, to attack the United States monitors Nahant and Weehawken, stationed there to prevent the Atlanta's egress, supposing herself superior to their combined force. The monitors steamed away from the Atlanta until fully prepared for action, when the Weehawken turned, followed immediately by the Nahant, and both vessels ran towards the Atlanta, which had directed her fire wholly against the Nahant. As they approached, the Weehawken fired five shots, with such effect as to compel the Atlanta's surrender. The Nahant had reserved her fire for closer range, but had never been more than 1,000 yards from the Weehawken, and, at the time of the surrender, was equally distant with the latter from the Atlanta. Held, that the Nahant was a part of the "capturing force," within the meaning of 12 Stat. 606, § 2.][3]

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This vessel, an iron-clad war steamer, taken from the rebels in battle, has been condemned as lawful prize, and the question now is on the distribution. The main and difficult question is, whether the entire value is to go to the captors, or half to them and half to the government. The act of 1862, c. 204, § 2, (12 Stat. 606,) prescribes the rule thus: If the prize is "of equal or superior force to the vessel or vessels making the capture," it goes wholly to the captors; if of inferior force, it is divided equally between the United States and the "officers and men making the capture." The third section provides for the distribution of the whole or half adjudged to the captors in these words: "When one or more vessels of the navy shall be within signal distance of another making a prize, all shall share in the prize." In determining whether the captors shall have half or all, the court must first decide what vessel or vessels "made the capture" or "made the prize," and then compare the capturing force with the force of the prize. Then, having by this process adjudged the whole or the half to the vessels making the prize or capture, the court is to determine whether any and what vessels of the navy were within signal distance of the vessel or vessels that made the prize, and let them in to participation.

What vessel or vessels, in this case, "made the capture"? The officers of the Atlanta, now prisoners of war at Fort Warren in this harbor, have refused to testify, so that I have not the benefit of their statements. But still the evidence in the cause presents a clear account of this most interesting conflict,—perhaps, in its bearings on naval science, the most significant battle in modern times, except that of the Monitor and Merrimac. The Atlanta, originally a British steamer, powerful and fast, called the Fingal, had, early in the war, run the blockade of Savannah, and had been converted by the rebels into an iron-clad war steamer, at a vast expense. She had a long low deck, with a casemate or covered iron-plated house in the centre, with sloping sides and ends, in which was her battery. She had also a powerful ram, and, attached to her bow and carried under water, a torpedo charged with about fifty pounds of powder. Two steam vessels of our navy, of the type so novel, and yet already so universally known as "monitors," were guarding the Warsaw sound, to prevent the egress of the Atlanta. These were the Weehawken, commanded by Captain John Rodgers, and the Nahant, commanded by Captain John Downes. Captain Rodgers was the senior and commanding officer. Each monitor had one revolving turret, with two smooth-bore Dahlgren guns, one of fifteen-inch and the other of eleven-inch calibre. The rebels knew that these monitors were there, and knew their size and force; and the Atlanta, when fully ready, was sent down the sound for the purpose of capturing or destroying them. It would seem, too, that they had little doubt of their success. The Atlanta was accompanied by several steamers having passengers on board, to be spectators of the conflict. Two of these steamers were armed, and belonged to the rebel navy; but, being wooden vessels, they kept at a safe distance, and took no part in the action. On our side, also, there was the wooden gunboat Cimmerone, which was directed by Captain Rodgers to keep out of the action unless signalled specially.

It was at early dawn on the 17th of June, 1863, a little after four o'clock, that the Atlanta was descried coming down the sound. The monitors at once began to prepare for action. The Weehawken lay higher up than the Nahant. She slipped her cable. The Nahant weighed her anchor, Captain Downes thinking he might need it in the action in case of injury to his motive power, and that he could prepare for action as well while weighing. To give themselves time to get fully ready, Captain Rodgers steamed slowly down the sound, directing Captain Downes to follow in his wake, the Weehawken having the pilot. Captain Downes followed in the wake of the Weehawken as soon as he got his anchor. This left him for a time nearer to the advancing enemy than the Weehawken. When fully ready, the Weehawken turned toward the enemy. Just as she turned, the Atlanta opened her fire on the Nahant. Her shot did not take effect. The Weehawken rounded and steamed towards the Atlanta, the Nahant following in her wake. It was then seen that the Atlanta was stationary, and lying partly across the channel. When within between three hundred and four hundred yards, the Weehawken slowed, and fired her fifteen-inch gun. Drifting with the tide, and under slow way, when within about two hundred yards, she fired both her guns, as nearly together as possible. Captain Downes acted on a different plan. He thought his fire would be most effectual close aboard, and made directly for the Atlanta at full treat as actual captors all who were within signal distance of actual captors. Another result would follow, that all vessels within signal distance of this second class of vessels would share in the distribution, though not within signal distance of the first class, because they would be within signal distance of some of the vessels which we should have held to be vessels making the capture. I have no difficulty, therefore, in deciding that I must exclude the Cimmerone, in determining the relative force of the captors and the prize. In like manner, I exclude the gunboats of the rebels which were within signal distance of the Atlanta, but kept aloof.

It now becomes necessary to compare the force of the Atlanta with that of our monitors.

Beside the depositions, complete drawings of the Atlanta have been annexed to Captain Rodger's evidence, and a report from the bureau of construction. The Atlanta's dimensions were as follows: Length, 191 feet 2 inches; extreme beam, 40 feet 6 inches; depth of hold to top of beam, 13 feet and one-half inch. These dimensions make her measurement tonnage 927 6-10 tons, or if, as the agent of the captors contends, we must include the thickness of the deck, 1075 8-95 tons. She was plated with two layers of iron, one horizontal and one vertical, each two inches thick, making four inches of plating. At the knuckle, where the casemate was fastened to the hull, her sides were six feet in thickness of solid wood. Her deck was two feet one inch in thickness of plank, beside the iron covering. Her casemate was a little over one hundred feet in length, fastened to the hull, in about the middle of the length of the deck, and covering its entire width, leaving an open deck of about forty-five feet at each end. This casemate had sloping sides and ends, at an angle of twenty-nine degrees from the horizontal, and three ports on each side, with heavy port-stoppers. The sides of the casemate were four inches of iron and thirty-six inches of solid wood. She mounted four guns, Brooke's rifled ordnance,—two of seven inch, throwing balls of one hundred and fifty pounds, and two of six inch, throwing balls of one hundred pounds; the six-inch guns working in broadsides, and the seven-inch guns, one at the forward and one at the after end of the casemate, working on pivots, either as broadside, or as bow and stern guns, so that three of her four guns could be used on either broadside. She had a powerful ram of solid wood, strapped with iron bands, above water; and a torpedo at the end of a jointed crane, capable of being raised in the air or lowered under water, carried about twenty feet beyond the bow, and charged with some fifty pounds of powder, expected to explode on concussion. Her crew were one hundred and forty-three, all told. The two monitors were as nearly equal, indeed as nearly identical, as it is easy to suppose war vessels to be. They were each 844 tons measurement, armed and arranged alike, with the usual low deck of the monitors, but little above the water line, with one revolving turret. Their guns were of the same calibre; one of fifteen-inch, and one of eleven-inch, smooth-bore Dahlgrens; the former throwing shots of 440 pounds solid and 400 pounds cored, and the latter 168 pounds solid. The Weehawken had eighty-four men, and the Nahant eighty-five men.

In comparing the force of these novel engines of war, the old rules of naval science are superseded. Not only are the vessels extraordinary and experimental, but the ordnance scarcely less so. The first shot from the Weehawken is said to have been the first iron shot of that size ever fired in naval warfare. I entertain no serious doubt that the force of the two monitors combined was superior to that of the Atlanta (I do not judge merely by the result); I am aware that a different course on either or both sides, might have presented a different aspect. If the Atlanta had run at the monitors with her full force, instead of lying still to take and give fire, and her torpedo had exploded under one of them successfully; or if she had struck both, or either of them, with the full force of her ram; or if a better-aimed or more fortunate shot had injured the turret, or the steering or motive power, of either monitor; or if the first two shots from the Weehawken had been less skilfully directed, or less fortunate, or the Weehawken had reserved her fire to the last, and thus the Atlanta had been able to use her battery steadily until at close quarters,—under any or all these suppositions, the length of the contest, and the injuries on each side, might have been very different, if the final result had been the same. I am to consider the means the vessels possessed, and not the use they made of them. Still, I am satisfied, that, for offence and defence, the two monitors, with their batteries, acting together, at the same time, and under one command, must be considered of superior force to the Atlanta. They were each of 844 tons, and the Atlanta of about 1000 tons. They had, one eighty-four, and the other eighty-five men, and the Atlanta one hundred and forty-three men. The effective power of large ordnance against iron-clads has not yet been fully tested by experience; and, in the present state of our knowledge, the actual effect of the shot of the Weehawken must have much influence in forming our opinion. I am constrained to think that two fifteen-inch and two eleven-inch smooth-bore Dahlgrens, mounted on two vessels, capable of taking separate positions, are superior, for offence, to two seven-inch and two six-inch rifled Brookes, in one vessel. And in case of a fight on the decks, by boarding or otherwise, we had the superiority of men. As to defence, the Atlanta presented a larger surface than the monitors, and could be more easily hit; and the result showed that the walls of her sides and pilot-house, however strong, were not, in fact, a protection against the shot of the monitors at that range. We do not know, by experiment, how well our hulls and turrets would have resisted her shot; but a construction which avoids shot is an element to be calculated, as well as one which resists shot. Indeed, neither the agent of the captors, in his argument, nor the two commanders, in their depositions, appear to contend, or to give an opinion, that the Atlanta was equal, or superior to, the two monitors.

The agent for the captors contends that, in comparing the forces, the Weehawken alone is to be counted. It is said, that the only shot fired, and the only damage done, was by the Weehawken, and that her shot compelled the surrender; that the Atlanta was put beyond the possibility of fighting or escaping, by the first two shots, and actually surrendered, by reason of them, before the Nahant had, in fact, done any thing. It is contended, that it was not necessary that the Nahant should have been present; that the Atlanta did not surrender by reason of intimidation from the presence and approach of the Nahant, but by reason of her own totally disabled condition. It is further argued, that the Nahant must be considered only a constructive captor; that she was within signal distance, ready and eager, and doing her best to aid in the battle; so situated as to afford encouragement to our side, and intimidation to the enemy; but that such is the definition of a constructive captor, and that the facts go no further. It may be said, too, that the policy of the statute is to stimulate vessels to attack equal or superior vessels at once and alone; and that if a vessel does so, and succeeds, before others actually strike a blow, the entire prize should go to the captors; and that, in such case, it ought to be deemed immaterial how near the others may be, or on what theory of battle they reserved their fire. In a question solely between conduct of the highest merit and the public treasury, the government would doubtless desire a construction liberal to the officers and men who perilled all in a strange and unwonted conflict, and attained a success that has attracted the attention of the world. But my duty is limited to construing the statute. I cannot make a gratuity of the public property, however meritorious the object.

I shall decide the present case on its exact and peculiar circumstances. I lay down no rule for other cases, nor do I say what variation from the facts of this case would have led to a different application of the statute. I am led to the belief that the Nahant must be considered so far a participator in the conflict of forces, as to be included in the comparison. The Atlanta came down to attack both the monitors, knowing they were together, under one command, and for one purpose. She calculated on their combined force, and governed herself accordingly. It is impossible for me to say now, whether the Atlanta would have taken the same course, if she had had only the Weehawken to deal with. Each monitor knew that the other was co-operating,—not merely ready to co-operate, but actually taking part in the attack, during all the time, within effective distance for firing, and part of the time at nearly the same distance from the enemy, with her consort, and one as capable as the other of all acts of offence and defence. This is not all. It was the Nahant that the Atlanta fired at. The Nahant drew off the fire of the enemy, and engaged its offensive force, so far aiding her consort. It was known to those on board the Atlanta, that the Nahant, apparently uninjured by their previous fire, was coming upon the Atlanta at full speed, reserving her fire, though within easy range. This would have been enough to settle a doubtful question of surrender, if a doubt remained. One of the facts to be considered by the commander of the Atlanta, in determining whether and when to surrender, might well have been the demoralized state of his crew. How far may the knowledge that a second monitor of the same force with that from which they had suffered so terribly was within equal distance, have contributed to this demoralization? How far did the co-operation of the two monitors affect the course taken by the Atlanta in all respects, the training her guns on the Nahant, her lying still to present her broadside? How far did this co-operation affect the course taken by each monitor? If the Weehawken had not been there, or had not opened fire, would or would not Captain Downes have reserved his fire as he did? If the Weehawken had been alone, or with a vessel within signal distance capable of aiding, but not just where the Nahant was, and doing just what she was doing, would or would not her course have been the same? If the Nahant had not diverted the fire of the Atlanta, what might have been its effect on the Weehawken? If Captain Rodgers's shot had been unsuccessful, might or might not, in a few minutes, almost seconds, the close discharge of the Nahant have been decisive?

The result to which I am brought is, that in comparing the force of "the vessel or vessels making the capture" with that of the prize, I must include the Nahant with the Weehawken. I do this, as the result of the special circumstances of this case, without attempting to establish a test for determining who, under other circumstances, should be deemed actual captors. The result is, that half the net proceeds of the prize are to be given to the captors, and half to the United States, and that the vessels entitled to participate in the distribution are the Weehawken, Nahant, and Cimmerone.

[NOTE. The officers and crew of the Weehawken, John Rodgers commanding, took an appeal to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree. The Weehawken v. The Atlanta, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 425. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion, said: "'The mere fact that the only shot fired, and the only damage done, was by the Weehawken, is not decisive. Other circumstances must be taken into account in determining the matter; such as the force, position, conduct, and intention of the Nahant. The two vessels were known to be under the same command and of nearly equal force. The Atlanta descended the sound to attack both, and governed herself with reference to their combined action. It is not reasonable to suppose that her course would have been the one pursued had she had only the Weehawken to encounter. Besides, the fire of the Atlanta was directed entirely to the Nahant, and of course diverted from her consort. It is possible that a different result might have followed had the fire been turned upon the Weehawken. This diversion must be considered in every just sense of the term as giving aid to her. Again, the power of the shot of the Weehawken had evidently surprised the officers of the Atlanta, who found their vessel speedily disabled, and their crew demoralized. The advance upon her, at full speed, of a second monitor, of equal force, ready to inflict similar injuries, may have hastened the surrender. It can hardly be supposed that the approach of the second monitor did not enter into the consideration of the captain and officers of the Atlanta. If the shot from the guns of one of the monitors could, in a few moments, penetrate the casemate of the Atlanta, crush in the bars of her pilot house, and prostrate between forty and fifty of her men, her captain might well conclude that the combined fire of both would speedily sink his vessel and destory his entire crew. It cannot be affirmed, nor is it reasonable to suppose, that any of the incidents of the battle would have occurred as they did if the Nahant had not been present in the action. We concur, therefore, in the view of the learned district judge, that, in the comparison of the forces engaged in the conflict, the Nahant must be included with the Weehawken."]

The ATLANTIC.

[Abb. Adm. 451.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1849.

SEAMEN — LIBEL FOR WAGES — DEFENSES — DISCHARGE BY CONSUL—PROOF—CONTRACT OF SEAMAN—PLEADING—SPECIAL REPLICATION—LIABILITY OF SHIP TO INJURED SEAMAN.

1. Where, in answer to a libel for wages, the claimants set up a discharge of libellant in a foreign port by order of the consul, it is incumbent on them to set forth in their answer a state of facts justifying the discharge relied on, and to support the allegations by adequate proof.

2. The discharge of a seaman in a foreign port (under the acts of February 28, 1803, [2 Stat. 203, c. 9,] and July 20, 1840, [5 Stat. 394, c. 48,]) can be ordered by the consul, only upon the consent of the seaman, given, or proved before him.

[3. Cited in Coffin v. Weld, Case No. 2,953, to the point that the certificate of the consul must show clearly his jurisdiction, and the grounds of his action.]

4. The party relying upon such discharge in defence to an action for subsequent wages, must show the fact that such consent was given.

[Cited in Coffin v. Weld, Case No. 2,953.]

5. To entitle an instrument to the respect accorded to documents under official signature and seal, the signature must be legible, and the impression of the seal sufficiently distinct to allow the vignette and motto to be distinguished.

6. In answer to a libel for wages, the claimants set up a stipulation in the shipping articles in bar of the recovery. The libellant served a replication in the usual form, but contended, upon the trial, that the stipulation relied upon was void. Held, 1. That so far as the claim to treat the stipulation as void might rest upon any matters of fact outside the stipulation itself, the question was not raised by the general replication; but the libellant ought, either by an amendment of the libel or by a special replication, to have introduced into the pleadings averments contesting or avoiding the apparent bar contained in the stipulation. 2. That the question, whether the stipulation was not void in point of law in itself considered, and apart from any extraneous facts, might be raised on the general replication, and should be considered as if it had arisen upon demurrer or exception to the answer.

7. As a general rule, seamen are competent to bind themselves by a contract with the master and owners; and in the ordinary case of a hiring for money wages at a specific rate, the contract of the seamen in respect to the rate will be upheld.

[Cited in The Antelope, Case No. 484; Frates v. Howland, Id. 5,066; Slocum v. Swift, Id. 12,954.]

8. The contract of a seaman in respect to his compensation will likewise be upheld where the mode of compensation contemplated is by a proportional division of the earnings of the vessel among the owners, officers, and crew.

[Cited in The Antelope, Case No. 484; Slocum v. Swift, Id. 12,954.]

9. Shipping articles entered into for a whaling voyage, and contemplating the payment of the officers and crew by "lays" or shares in the vessel's earnings, contained a stipulation that either of the officers or crew who might be prevented by any cause from performing their duty during the whole of the voyage, should receive of his lay only in proportion as the time served by him should be to the whole time of the voyage. Held, That this stipulation would be sustained; even without evidence that special explanation of it was made to the seaman.

[Cited in The Antelope, Case No. 484; Slocum v. Swift, Id. 12,954; The Grace Darling, Id. 5,651.]

10. A mariner receiving injury in the performance of his duty is entitled to be treated and cured at the expense of the ship; and this is equally true, whether his compensation is by specific money wages, or by a share in the earnings of the vessel.

[Cited in Babcock v. Terry, Case No. 702; The Ben Flint, Id. 1,299; The City of Alexandria, 17 Fed. 394; The Lizzie Frank, 31 Fed. 481; The City of Carlisle, 39 Fed. 816; The J. F. Card, 43 Fed. 94.]

11. As a general principle, the liability of the ship in this regard is limited to the reconveyance of the disabled mariner to the United States, or to such period of time as may be reasonable, to enable him to return thither; but this rule is liable to variations.

[Cited in Babcock v. Terry, Case No. 702; The Ben Flint, Id. 1,299; The Lizzie Frank, 31 Fed. 481; The City of Carlisle, 39 Fed. 816; The J. F. Card, 43 Fed. 94.]

[12. Cited in Burdett v. Williams, 27 Fed. 117, to the point that a whaling voyage which is not from port to port has never been regarded as within the provisions of Rev. St. § 4520, requiring shipping articles to specify certain particulars.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem by George Stotesburg, against the ship Atlantic, to recover wages, and also the expenses of libellant's cure for injuries received during his service on board. The libel stated the following facts: That in July, 1845, the master of the Atlantic, then in the port of New London making ready for a three years' whaling voyage to the Northwest coast, shipped the libellant as green hand for such voyage, on the two hundred and twenty-fifth lay or share of what should be taken by the ship, as the libellant's wages. That the libellant signed the shipping articles, in which the contract was fully set forth. That in August following, he entered upon the service of the vessel, under the agreement, and the vessel, with the libellant on board, proceeded on her intended voyage, and cruised for about seven months, when she arrived at Maui, one of the Sandwich Islands. That on March 16, 1846, the ship being yet at Maui, the libellant, while in the performance of his duty, fell from the maintopsail yard, and was so severely injured that he was taken ashore to the hospital, where he remained confined to his bed for about twenty-one months. That while he was in the hospital, the ship proceeded on her cruise until November, 1847, when she started for home, and on her way touched at Maui, and took the libellant on board, and then proceeded to the port of New London, where she arrived April 20, 1848; having taken a cargo of which the two hundred and twenty-fifth part claimed by the libellant was averred to be of the value of $300 and upward, which he claimed to recover from the ship. The libel further stated, that by reason of the injuries received by libellant in his fall, he had lost the use of one of his legs, and one of his arms had been rendered almost useless; that he had already incurred great expense for medical advice, and must incur still more before he could be fully restored; and he claimed to recover from the ship "his reasonable expenses already incurred, and hereafter to be incurred in his cure, and his reasonable support since his injury and till he shall be cured."

The answer stated that the libellant shipped on board the Atlantic as alleged in the libel, except that he shipped as carpenter's mate instead of green hand, and that no limit of three years or otherwise was set to the duration of the voyage. The answer then set up as a defence to the claim for wages a clause in the shipping articles, which was in these words: "It is also further agreed between the owner of said ship Atlantic on the one part, and the captain, officers, and crew on the other part, that if the captain, officers, and crew, or either of them, are prevented by sickness or any other cause from performing their duty during the whole of said voyage in said ship Atlantic, that any of them so falling short, shall receive of their lay or share in proportion as the time served or duty performed by them is to the whole time said ship is performing her voyage." And it was also charged, in respect to the injury received by libellant, that the accident with which he met was not occasioned by his being engaged in any unusual duty, or by any agency or through any fault of the master, or of any officer of the ship, but through want of sufficient care on the part of the libellant. The answer further showed, that on the libellant's being placed in the hospital at the port of Lahaina, at Maui, the libellant was discharged from the ship with his own consent, and by the authority of the United States consul at the port. That the master of the ship then produced to the consul the list of the ship's company certified as required by law, and paid to the consul $36, being three months' wages of libellant, for which the consul gave his receipt, together with his certificate that the libellant had been discharged from the ship according to the laws of the United States. That on the return of the vessel to the port, the United States consular agent put the libellant on board the ship as a sick and disabled seaman, to be carried as passenger to the United States, and that he was so received and brought home. The answer further stated that advances had been made to the libellant, which more than paid the amount due him upon his lay or share under the stipulation in the shipping articles before mentioned.

To this answer the libellant filed only a general replication in the usual form. The cause was heard upon depositions and documentary evidence; the important points of which are adverted to in the opinion of the court.

Burr & Benedict, for libellant.

I. The rule of the maritime law is well settled from the earliest periods, that a seaman taken sick shall be cured and tended at the ship's expense, and have his whole wages; if he be hurt in doing his duty, and in rendering services to the master or the ship, he must be cured and indemnified at the expense of the ship; if he be disabled for life in defending himself or the ship, he must be provided for, for life, at the ship's expense. Cleirac, 25, on article 6 of Laws of Oleron; Laws of Oleron, arts. 6, 7, [Append. Fed. Cas.,] of Wisbuy, arts. 18, 19, [Append. Fed. Cas.;] of Hanse Towns, art. 39, [Append. Fed. Cas.;] Pardessus, passim; 1 Valin, 721; 2 Valin, 167; 2 Boulay-Paty, §§ 9–11, tit. 5; Abb. Shipp. 622, 624, note; Harden v. Gordon, [Case No. 6047;] The

George, [Id. 5,329;] Reed v. Canfield, [Id. 11,641;] The Forest, [Id. 4,936.]

II. This law is dictated by humanity and policy. "The Spaniards are the most unkind and indeed unjust to their sick mariners of any people, for they neither pay them any wages, nor maintain them, unless they pay others to serve in their stead." 1 Pet. Adm. Append. 107, note; Sea Laws, 203; Translation of Cleirac, note to article 45 of Laws of Hanse Towns. "Public policy, as well as the ordinary claims of humanity, demands that the interests of the seaman should be linked, in these respects, to those of the ship." The George, [supra.] All the ancient codes and their commentators, and the uniform current of modern decisions, agree in the rule and the reasons of it.

III. The claimants, however, insist that the rule is confined to seamen who ship by the month, and does not apply to seamen on whaling voyages, whose wages are usually a share of the profits. It is not easy to see how the mode of hiring should alter either the humanity or the policy of the law, or in any manner change the rule. In length of voyage,—in absence from friends and the comforts of civilized life on shore,—in purely maritime service, and perils, and hardships,—in the great profits and national benefits which result from his labors,—and in the necessity of being kept in good condition, the whaling seaman is the mariner par excellence.

IV. A participation in the profits of the voyage is believed to have been originally the mode of compensation of mariners in all employments, and by degrees the capitalist took the profits, and the mariner had fixed wages; but in the fisheries the original and primitive plan has always prevailed with modifications. In the time of Cleirac there were six modes or hiring mariners. 1. By the voyage or by the run—a fixed sum. 2. By the month, week, or day. 3. By the distance—so much a mile or league. 4. By a share of the freight. 5. By the right to put so much freight on board belonging to themselves or others. 6. The most common—part in money and part in the right to put freight on board. Cleirac, 38, §§ 32-34; Laws of Oleron, arts. 19, 28, 29. All the cases in which mariners are spoken of, in the codes and elsewhere, make no distinction in their rights and duties, depending on the mode of payment. Pardessus, Lois Mar. passim; Laws of Oleron, art. 19; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 35; 1 Pardessus, 382, 485. Their rights belong to them as "mariners," "matelots," and not as paid by the month or otherwise.

V. The whaling business existed before the codes and the commentators. The Biscayans were the first people who prosecuted the whale fishery as a regular commercial pursuit. They carried it on with great vigor in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. Encyc. Am. art. Whale-fishery. The whale-fishery is one of the oldest, most profitable, and purely maritime commercial pursuits. Cleirac, in his notes to article 44 of the Laws of Oleron, (page 119,) devotes more space to this subject than to any other in his whole commentary. Twelve closely printed and interesting pages are devoted to the history, mode of conducting, and commercial importance of this great maritime pursuit. It was conducted then, as now, on shares. Not only the men in each vessel were paid in shares, but several vessels often went on shares. Those who pursued it were always subject to the maritime law, and to the jurisdiction of the admiralty, except in England, since the masters of the English admiralty have prohibited it from exercising its jurisdiction. 2 Valin, 794; Curt. Merch. Seam. 71, 353.

VI. "Although seamen in whaling voyages are compensated by shares of the proceeds, this compensation is always treated as in the nature of wages. They are never deemed partners, although they may be said to partake of the profits of the voyage. The apportionment of the proceeds is only a mode of ascertaining their compensation." Reed v. Canfield, 1 Story, 203, 204, [1 Sumn. 203, 204, Case No. 11,641.] This was a case of a seaman injured on a whaling voyage, and shows that the modern rule, like the ancient one, extends to whaling seamen as well as others.

VII. It is said, however, that the mariners contracted in the articles that they should not be paid for time lost by sickness. The clause in the articles is a most extraordinary one. 1. Its inhumanity and impolicy in connection with whaling voyages is most manifest. It leaves the sailor after eight months' service sick and unprotected, 12,000 miles from home, on an island in the sea, without a dollar. It makes it the pecuniary interest of the officers to have the men sick, or to disable them, or confine them, or disrate them, or put them off duty, during that large portion of the voyage when there is little to do. It makes it the interest of the seaman to shrink from peril and exposure. Every accident or a cold must cost them a portion of their lay. 2. It also makes the measure of compensation two things which cannot be correctly measured—relative health and labor. How long must he be sick, and how sick, and how much labor shall he fail to do? Shall every hour be deducted, or must it run to a day, a week, or a month? Shall every headache, and stiff joint, and swelled finger, that impairs his efficiency, take away a portion of his wages?

VIII. Courts of admiralty are in the habit of watching with scrupulous jealousy every deviation from the principles of the maritime law; and when any stipulation is found in the shipping articles which derogates from the general rights and privileges of seamen, courts of admiralty hold it void, unless the nature and operation of the clause be fully and fairly explained to the seaman, and an additional compensation is allowed. Brown v. Lull, [Case No. 2,018;] The Juliana, 2 Dod. 504; 2 Mason, 541, 556, [Harden v. Gordon, Case No. 6,047;] 3 Kent, Comm. 193; The Minerva, 1 Hagg. Adm. 347; Abb. Shipp. 609, § 3, and 610, [Johnson v. The Walterstorff, Case No. 7,413,] note, and cases cited.

IX. It is not material whether the articles be in the usual form, or what is the custom of New London. It is the departure from the principles of the maritime law, and the general rights of seamen, and not the departure from the usual form of articles, or from the custom of a particular place, that avoids the clause. All articles are stuffed with void clauses. Abb. Shipp. p. 609, § 3; The Minerva, 1 Sumn. 158, [1 Hagg. Adm. 347;] Curt. Merch. Seam. 57, note.

X. There is no evidence that the articles were explained to the libellant, nor that he received any additional compensation, nor that he knew of any custom or was bound by it. It is not to be presumed from his signing articles at New London. Harden v. Gordon, supra; 1 Sumn. 158, [The George, Case No. 5,329;] [Rankin v. American Ins. Co.,] 1 Hall, 631, 632.

XI. This clause may be construed consistently with the maritime law. The court will therefore so construe it. 1. It may reasonably apply only to cases in which seamen, from sickness or other cause, needlessly or wrongfully, or by consent of the consul, leave the service before the voyage is up,—or only to provide that in cases in which a seaman for any cause should not be entitled to be paid for the whole voyage, that he should be paid his share of the whole voyage ratably to the time, and not be entitled or restricted to his share of what was taken before he left. 2. Does he not do his duty who does all he can? By either of these constructions, the rule of the maritime law is unimpaired, and the libellant is entitled to recover his entire wages.

XII. There is nothing in the articles to impair his right to recover the indemnification for the injury received in the services of the ship. That stands under the maritime laws. The clause in the articles only relates to wages.

XIII. The alleged discharge of the libellant in Maui the morning after the accident is not proved. The consular certificate is not evidence of a discharge. It is only a certificate that the seaman was left there sick, to save the captain's liability on his bond to the collector if the ship should not return to Maui. The consul has no jurisdiction to discharge a man except in cases of joint application or consent, of which this does not appear to be one, there being no pretence of any consent, and the man was not in a situation to consent, and it would have been brutal to ask him.

Asa Childs, for the claimants.

I. The libellant's claim is founded on the special contract. He does not set up the relation of a mariner to the ship, and claim wages, and the expense of his cure from the ship, as the result of that relation in virtue of the maritime law; but he sets up this contract, alleges he signed it, and making it the ground of his claim, asks the court to decree its specific performance, and give him his share of the products of the voyage. 1. Now, either the contract is in force or it is not. If it is not in force, or is abandoned, then it is certain this action cannot be sustained. If it is in force, then the duty of the court is to ascertain its import, and giving it a fair legal construction, to enforce it. But in respect to compensation, the rights of seamen are and always have been matters of contract. The maritime law, like the common law, will imply a contract to pay wages, in the absence of an express contract, upon the principle of a quantum meruit, but it leaves parties free to make their own contracts, and when there is a contract made it will enforce it. The whole regulation as to shipping articles rests upon this recognition of the right of parties to make contracts. 2. Whatever may be the rules of the maritime law as to the rights of parties, it is perfectly well settled that they may be controlled by special contracts in respect to the parties themselves. 1 Pet. Adm. 113, [Thompson v. The Catharina. Case No. 13,949;] 1 Pet. Adm. 186, [Relf v. The Maria, Id. 11,692;] 1 Pet. Adm. 214, [Jameson v. The Regulus, Id. 7,198.] 3. It is not denied that the contract, to be valid, must be fairly and honestly made. But the law as to seamen is in this respect the same as the law as to other men. Acts of oppression, cunning, deception, introduced into contracts, courts will protect the parties against. Inequality in terms, disproportions in bargains, sacrifice of rights on one side only, not compensated by benefits on the other, courts will pronounce unjust, and regard as evidence of fraud. 4. All the rules as to the illegality of provisions inserted in shipping articles, and all the grounds for showing special favor to seamen by courts, rest upon either their liability to be imposed upon, in consequence of their peculiar relation, or actual fraud practised upon them. But even in the extreme cases, if the contract is fairly made, the parties are bound by it.

II. The contract now under consideration can be affected by none of the principles referred to. It is not a contract imposed upon seamen by the master or owners of a ship. It is in the nature of a copartnership. Abb. Shipp. (5th Amer. Ed.) 915. The owners, officers, and men have associated to pursue a particular business. The owners furnish the ship, the officers and men agree to do the work; and they are all by their agreement to be interested jointly in the whole enterprise. They all unite in a mutual covenant, and for their own protection submit to the authority of the captain, and prescribe their own terms of interest. The men are not laboring for the owners, but for themselves, as much so in every sense as the members of a mercantile firm. The business in which they engage is not a trading voyage, but rather a manufacturing business. Except the time spent in passing from port to their fishing ground, they are engaged in the actual labor of procuring oil and bone, &c. The early business of catching whales and other fish was carried on by companies collected in tents on the shore, and had no connection with shipping business whatever. The peculiar rules adopted in maritime ports for the regulation of seamen in trading voyages —men employed simply to navigate ships— cannot be applicable to such an association as this.

III. This contract was fairly made. It is in the form used at the port where made by every company engaged in the business for thirty years. It is free from all suspicious circumstances. It is signed by the libellant, who writes a good hand, and furnishes evidence of having been understandingly executed. There is no pretence of unfairness. The captain and officers are all subject to the same rules, and have signed the same articles.

IV. The contract is reasonable in its terms, and equal as respects all parties. Every man is to receive the fruit of his own labor for the time he shall perform his duties. In a trading voyage from port to port, where the seamen take charge of the owner's ship, and expose themselves to danger for his exclusive benefit, there may be a reason and it may be just that he receive his wages from the owners, though sick. But this is not such a voyage. The voyage is without limit; the crew are to engage for themselves, as well as the owners, in a particular enterprise, to work as long as circumstances shall seem favorable. If a man fails to continue with his associates, and another person is procured in his place, the loss should be his own, and not fall upon his associates. At any rate, a contract so providing is not unjust or unreasonable. It is not just, it is not right, that the earnings of others should be transferred to him. The question is not, what shall be done to cure a sick man; but the question is, can it be said to be an unreasonable provision in a contract that he shall not, as a pecuniary interest, receive the fruit of other men's labors. Bear in mind this is not a claim against owners of the ship for wages, but against the associates in the enterprise, to obtain a part of their earnings.

V. The principle adopted by Story, in 2 Mason, 541, [Harden v. Gordon, Case No. 6,047,] and 2 Sumn. 449, [Brown v. Lull, Case No. 2,018,] that where a contract imposes unusual hardships on a seaman without extra compensation, or deprives him of rights secured by the mercantile law, the court will presume the contract to be fraudulent, does not apply to this case. No such unusual hardships are imposed, no ordinary rights are taken away. This contract stands like every other contract brought before the court, presumed upon well-settled principles of law to be fair till the contrary is shown. Admit that a contract on its face apparently unjust imposes upon the party who sets it up the burden of proving it to be fair. This contract contains no provision which justifies any presumption against it.

VI. As to the claim of the libellant, that he is to be cured at the expense of the ship, no question of any practical importance can arise. He was placed in the hospital at the Sandwich Islands, and all the expenses paid by the captain. He was brought home at the expense of the United States. His board bill and his surgeon's bill at New London, and all his expenses, were paid by the owners.

VII. The libellant was discharged according to law at the Sandwich Islands, and this would be conclusive against his claim to be cured at the expense of the ship. 1. The consul had a right to discharge him. Act July 20, 1840, (5 Stat. 394.) 2. His certificate is that he was discharged according to law. 3. The presumption of law is that a public officer has done his duty. 4. The payment of $36 is confirmatory evidence that the consul discharged him according to law. 5. His sending him home as a disabled seaman proves that he was discharged.

BETTS, District Judge. The libellant shipped at New London in July, 1845, as carpenter's mate, on a whaling voyage. In consequence of injuries received by him, in the discharge of his duty, he was taken on shore in the port of Lahaina, in the island of Maui, one of the Sandwich Islands, and left in the hospital there. The ship proceeded on her voyage, and after completing her cruise, touched at Maui, on her return home, and received the libellant on board, he being placed there as a sick and disabled seaman by the consul, and was brought to the United States, the master receiving $10 passage money from the consul therefor. The libellant now demands wages for the whole voyage, together with the expenses of his cure. There are disagreements in several particulars between the statements of the libel and those of the answer, but they do not essentially affect the points upon which the cause turns, and accordingly no time will be spent in the consideration of them.

The questions in the case are three:—Was the libellant discharged from the ship at Maui, so as to terminate the shipping contract, and exempt the vessel from all further liability in consequence of his shipment? Was the condition contained in the shipping articles, limiting the libellant's compensation or wages to the time he was actually on board and capable of rendering the services he contracted to perform, a legal condition and obligatory upon him? Is the ship chargeable with the expenses of the libellant's cure? and if so, to what extent?

1. It is incumbent on the claimants to set forth in their answer, a state of facts justifying the discharge of the libellant in a foreign port, and to support the allegations by competent and sufficient proofs. They plead that the libellant, on March 16, 1846, fell from the topsail yard of the ship through want of sufficient care on his part, and was so severely injured by the fall, and became so sick in consequence of it, that he was rendered unable to perform his duty on board. and was, at his own request, and by order of the captain, and by aid of the consular agent, placed in the hospital. That on March 18th, he was discharged from the ship by his own consent, and by the consent and authority of Giles Waldo, the United States consul at that port, the master of the ship having produced to the consul the list of the ship's company, certified according to law, and having paid to the consul the sum of $36, being three months' wages to the libellant. The evidence to support this discharge is a certificate,—represented to be under the consular seal, but the impression of the seal is too faint to admit of its being deciphered, —attached to the articles, and expressed in these terms:—

"United States Consular Agency, Lahaina, Hawaiian Islands. I, the undersigned U. S. consular agent, do hereby certify, that George Stotesburg has been discharged from ship Atlantic on account of sickness and in accordance with the laws of the United States. Given under my hand and seal this 18th day of March, 1846. Giles Waldo, U. S. Consular Agent. By A. H. Linigsyez," (or some other similar name, not easily determined from the signature.) On another paper a memorandum or account is made in this form:—"Ship Atlantic and owners to U. S. consulate.

3 months' wages to Stotesburg.....	$36 00
Certificate	2 00
	$38 00

"Rec'd payment, (Signed as above.) Lahaina, March 18, 1846."

These papers are all the evidence produced to support the allegation of the answer, that three months' wages had been paid to the commercial agent, and that the discharge had been given under the authorization of the act of congress of February 28, 1803, (5 Stat. 396.) The discharge, however, manifestly was not made in conformity with the provisions of the statute; for the cardinal requisite to the exercise of that authority is, that application for the discharge shall be made by both the master and mariner; and it is not even certified that the consular agent acted on any such application; on the contrary the proofs import that the libellant was sent ashore by direction of the master, and under expectation that he still remained connected with the vessel as if he had continued in her. The court cannot assume that the assent of the libellant to his discharge was given, merely upon the fact of his being left in a hospital in his then maimed and dangerous condition; nor upon the assertion of the person acting for the consular agent that the libellant was discharged from the ship in accordance with the laws of the United States. It is unnecessary to inquire, whether an averment in such certificate that consent was given by the seaman and master in the presence of the consul, or was proved to him, would justify the discharge without other evidence of the fact, because the certificate contains no such allegation. Indubitably the particular which gives authority to consuls to act in this behalf under the statute, must be duly established, or his proceedings will be a nullity. This is a special power and trust confided to consuls and commercial agents, and must be exercised by those officers strictly in pursuance of the directions of the statute. Nor can the payment of $36 wages made to the consul by the master, be accepted as a payment of the three months' wages prescribed by the act. The hiring was for a share of the takings on an entire whaling voyage; and the rate of the lays could not, by the method of apportionment appointed in the articles, be applied with any justness to the period of service which had then elapsed. The vessel was on her outward cruise to the fishing grounds, and it would be evidently unjust to measure the compensation of the libellant by lay shares out of the chance takings on that part of the cruise. The takings of the entire voyage was the basis upon which the libellant's share should be computed. Twelve dollars per month was evidently adopted as an arbitrary allowance of wages. It might chance to be more advantageous to the libellant than his lay of the earnings of the adventure, apportioning the time he was in the ship with the entire duration of the voyage. Still, it might be disproportionately short of his share. And it certainly was not competent to the master and consular agent to determine that matter without the clear understanding and concurrence of the libellant. I think, therefore, there is not in this discharge that conformity with the requirements of the act of 1803, which will uphold it to protect the ship. Jay v. Almy, [Case No. 7,236.][2] The act of July 20, 1840, (5 Stat. 394, c. 48, §§ 5, 6, 9,) empowers consuls and consular agents abroad, to discharge seamen from their contracts or their ships, and to exact the payment of three months' wages, or even more, or to dispense with it as in their judgment they may think expedient. This power can be exercised but in two cases,—upon the application of both the master and the mariner, or upon that of the mariner alone. The master can act in the matter only jointly with the mariner. And it is not enough for the consul to certify that he gave the discharge "lawfully," or that he gave it "in accordance with the laws of the United States." It must be made to appear upon what grounds he proceeded. The court cannot intend that it was on the joint request of the master and seaman; nor that it was on the sole application of the latter, nor even that one or other ingredient of fact actually existed. The power imparted to consuls is limited and specific in character, not appertaining to him virtute officii, but conferred by a statutory provision; and the law raises no presumption or intendment in support of his doings, until it is shown that his jurisdiction attached to the subject,—that a case had occurred falling within the scope of his powers. The rule is coeval with the existence of statutory or limited tribunals or officers, that their doings must be made to appear to be within their authority, and that nothing can be supplied in support of their jurisdiction by intendment. 1 Co. Inst. 117; 2 Coke, 16b; 1 Lil. Abr. 371; 1 Lev. 104; Powers v. People, 4 Johns. 292; Adkins v. Brewer, 3 Cow. 206; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319; Bennett v. Burch, 1 Denio, 141. Nor is it sufficient for the officer to aver ever so positively his jurisdiction. He must set forth the facts necessary to confer it, and those jurisdictional facts must be established by proof. The People v. Koeber, 7 Hill, 39, and cases cited. I do not discuss the question raised respecting the sufficiency of the proof, that Giles Waldo was the consular agent of the United States at Lahaina, or that the gentleman who has subscribed the act for him, was his legally authorized substitute. Admitting that the seal of the consulate imports a legal authority in the person using it to do all official acts appertaining to the office, still the case calls for the remark, that the papers should present a distinct impression of a seal so that it may be identified and discriminated. The paper before the court does indeed bear a faint similitude of a seal, but neither vignette nor motto is distinguishable; and the vague flourish employed for a signature, affords no means by which the authentication of the discharge can be verified.[1]

2. To meet the claim for wages during the period of the libellant's disability, the answer sets up a stipulation in the shipping articles signed by the libellant, whereby it was agreed that if either of the officers or crew should be prevented by sickness or other cause from performing their duty during the whole of the voyage, he should receive of his lay or share only in proportion as the time served or duty performed by him should bear to the whole time the ship should be in performing the voyage. A general replication to the answer is filed by the libellant, which has only the effect to put both parties to the proof of the allegations in their respective pleadings not admitted to be true, (Dist. Ct. Rules, 88;) or of permitting the cause, when the answer operates as a plea in bar, to be set down for hearing upon the libel and answer alone, (Dist. Ct. Rules, 78.) That rule allows the libellant to treat the answer as a plea in bar, and by so replying to it, save himself from the consequences of admitting its truth, which he would do in effect by setting it down for hearing on a general replication. It may admit of question whether the supreme court rules (rule 27) do not, by fair implication, take away the right of a claimant or respondent to interpose a formal plea or demurrer on the merits to a libel or information in admiralty, and whether he is not limited to a defence by answers alone. See Sup. Ct. Rules, 27. The rule, however, does not import that he can interpose no other defence than a denial or admission of the facts. The facts may be undisputed, and yet supply no cause of action; or the defendant may be able to adduce other facts avoiding the effect of those alleged by the libellant, or he may possess matter of estoppel and bar which the court could never intend he should be precluded from using, without his being also compelled to make formal denial of the facts set up by the libel. Certain Logs of Mahogany, [Case No. 2,559;] Pratt v. Thomas, [Id. 11,377.] The provisions of the supreme court rule must be deemed satisfied if the defendant, whether or not required by the libel, replies to the allegations in the libel by a full and explicit answer. The special replication authorized by the district court rule, may thus be urged to create a triable issue upon the merits. This is the practice in equity. Sup. Ct. Rules, Equity. There would be equal conveniency and fitness in applying it to pleadings in Admiralty.

The supreme court rules indicate no method of pleading applicable to such case, unless it be embraced in the right to amend the libel. Rule 24. That would necessarily lead to a new answer, and would by no means further the simplicity in pleading which was regarded by congress as an object of cardinal importance in authorizing the supreme court to regulate Admiralty proceedings. Act Aug. 23, 1842, (5 Stat. 518, § 61.) In the summary of the practice of this court, it is stated that the replication to an answer as to a plea, may, in case of urgent importance, be special or double; but ordinarily it should take a single issue upon the allegations of the answer, however multifarious those may be. Betts, Adm. 50. The practice in the District of Louisiana appears to be essentially to the same effect, (Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441,) but in general, special replications to answers would not seem to be in use, in American Courts of Admiralty, unless demanded by the libellant, (Dunl. Adm. Pr. 197; Coffin v. Jenks, [Coffin v. Jenkins, Case No. 2,948.]) It is otherwise in the English Admiralty, although an eminent compiler appears to regard the practice as irregular. 2 Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 365, 415. Pleas in bar may be interposed, with the right to plead generally afterwards, (The Sarah Jane, 7 Jur. 659, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 110;) and a reply or rejoinder contradictory to the allegations in the answer, or setting up new matter, are of constant use in the English Admiralty. The Aurora, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 325; The Anne and Jane, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 104; The Hebe, Id. 146, 152.

Manifestly, then, the libellant ought to have introduced into the pleadings, either by an amendment of the libel after the answer was interposed, or by special replication to this branch of the defence, such averments as were necessary to enable him to contest or avoid the bar to his recovery supposed to be contained in the stipulations of the shipping articles, which he admits he signed and that they contain the true contract with him. His counsel, however, insist that he has a right to treat the engagement as a nullity, without alleging any facts impugning it; and that the court, as matter of law, must pronounce an agreement of that description, entered into with a mariner, to be nugatory and void, in respect to him. In considering the question thus raised, I shall regard the objection urged to the defence founded upon the stipulation, as if it arose upon demurrer or formal exception to that part of the answer. It is not to be denied that a common sailor is competent to make a shipping contract. Indeed, the statutes of both the United States and England imperatively impose on masters the duty of entering into contracts in writing with seamen employed by them. And the acts of congress clearly imply that such contracts will be valid although operating to the disadvantage of the mariner even in their most essential feature,—the rate of wages,—for they make that a particular which must be stipulated, and on omission by the master to have a written contract, they give the mariner a chance of higher wages than he may have bargained for verbally, by allowing him to demand the highest current rate at his port of shipment. Act July 20, 1790, (1 Stat. 131, c. 29, § 1;) Act July 20, 1840, (5 Stat. 395, § 1, arts. 3, 10, 19.) The written or printed shipping articles must now "contain all the conditions of contract with the crew as to their service, pay, voyage, and all other things." Act July 20, 1840, (5 Stat. 395, § 3.) It is remarkable, that the act of congress of July 20, 1790, in specifying the constituent parts of a contract with seamen, should omit the rate of pay or wages he was to receive. By the provisions of that act the agreement must "declare the voyage or voyages, term or terms of time for which such seaman or mariner shall be shipped." Section 1. The act of July 20, 1840, assumes that the rate of wages is a component part of shipping articles, (section 3,) and the courts, previous to that enactment, always enforced against masters of vessels the obligation to stipulate the rate of pay as an essential part of the written contract. Bartlett v. Wyman, 14 Johns. 260; Johnson v. Dalton, 1 Cow. 543; 3 Kent, Comm. (4th Ed.) 177; Gilpin, 305, [U. S. v. Twenty-Three Coils of Cordage, Case No. 16,573;] Gilpin, 452, [Wickham v. Blight, Case No. 17,611.] The English statutes moreover are precise and unequivocal upon this point. Abb. Shipp. 607. See 3 Kent, Comm. 196, note c, where a summary of the last English act is given. The English and American admiralty have, in many instances, interposed to protect seamen against stipulations introduced into shipping articles, not demanded by statute, and which were in abridgment of their rights under the law maritime, and where no adequate compensation was secured them as an equivalent for the rights relinquished. Abb. Shipp. 722; Curt. Merch. Seam. 44; 3 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 193, note. But they have uniformly held that the shipping articles are conclusive as to the wages, where no fraud or deception is proved.

Upon these principles it would seem to result, that the mariner can act in forming a contract for wages or compensation with the same authority, and can bind himself to the same degree as any other contracting party, where specific wages for a period of time, or for a voyage or cruise are agreed upon, or where any other special mode of compensation is adopted. The Sydney Cove, 2 Dod. Adm. 11; The Mona, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 137; The Riby Grove, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 52; The Mariner's Case, 8 Mod. 379; Howe v. Nappier, 4 Burrows, 1944. The law has established no distinction which goes to invalidate his contract when coupled with conditions or qualifications to his right to recover the stipulated wages in full. The courts have gone no further than to declare that they will scrutinize agreements to the seaman's prejudice, which are outside of the statutory requirements, or unusual in shipping articles; and will absolve the mariner from them unless it is proved by the master or owners that he clearly understood their character, and was secured a compensation correspondent to the disadvantages or restriction imposed upon him. 3 Kent, Comm. 193, and note; Abb. Shipp. 722, and note. With this limitation the contract operates in respect to the mariner with no less efficiency than upon the owner. Contracts for wages in money have become almost exclusively those now employed in general navigation by commercial nations. 3 Kent, Comm. 185. Shipping agreements are accordingly greatly simplified in comparison with what might be required were seamen now accustomed to be rewarded, as in the earlier periods of commerce, out of the freight or profits of the voyage, or by their own ventures on board. In defining and fixing the metod of compensation in such cases, agreements might be required or appropriate, which should make the mariner's right to a full share, or to any share of the ship's earnings, dependent upon circumstances which ought not to affect a contract for money wages. I do not find, in looking carefully through the ancient ordinances of maritime countries, any inhibition upon the right of a master or owner to make special contracts with seamen in voyages for freight or profits, or any exoneration of seamen from the obligation of their special agreements in relation thereto. Both parties were considered as acting in concert and by mutual consent in arranging the terms upon which the voyage was to be undertaken and in conducting it after it commenced, (Laws of Oleron, art. 16; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 32,) and as having a common interest in the direction of the vessel, (Laws of Oleron, art. 21.) In all critical emergencies the advice or opinion of a major part of the ship's company determined the matter. Laws of Oleron, art. 2; Wisbuy, arts. 14, 21. The laws secured to seamen certain advantages of venture or portage in shipping portions of the cargo on their own account, (Laws of Oleron, art. 16; Wisbuy, art. 30; 1 Pardessus, Lois Mar. 336; Lubeck, art. 10; Hamburg, art. 9,) and the privileges were sometimes in addition to money wages; at other times they constituted the entire compensation, (3 Pardessus, 340.) These provisions denote that the mariners, in a common adventure, had a concurring voice with the owners and master in controlling its management, and could regulate, at their own discretion, the privileges they were to have in the voyage. No intimation is made that they were under tutelage or disabilities in that respect, so that their engagements would be voidable if varying from the familiar formula adopted in money hirings. Whaling voyages, as conducted in England and in the United States, form a species of navigation bearing considerable similitude to the ancient method of rewarding seamen by shares of freight earned, but very little, if any, with the system of employment on money wages, which forms the basis of ordinary shipping agreements. They are held not to be strictly copartnerships, (Abb. Shipp. 705; The Phebe, [Case No. 11,064;] 3 Kent, Comm. 185;) yet they are mutual concerns, involving an entire reciprocity between owners and mariners in respect to the profits and losses of the adventure, (1 Boul. P. Dr. Com. 197, § 7; Cleirac, Cout. de la Mer, 66, note 2.) They result in communities or associations, in which each and all take a common risk, and are mutually entitled to a profit. The owner supplies the ship, her equipment, and stores, and the officers and crew contribute their services, and an agreed ratio of remuneration out of the earnings of the enterprise is allotted to these respective interests. The proportions in this distribution will, from the nature of the case, be exceedingly dissimilar, and are invariably the subject of express agreement, because not a matter capable of adjustment by the courts on any principle of legal or equitable merits between the parties.

It is somewhat singular that an interest of such magnitude in this country as the whaling business, should not have been regarded by congress as deserving regulation by law as much as fishing voyages, or ordinary trading ones. No statute has, however, fixed the rights of parties in these adventures, or required their agreements to be in writing. Chancellor Kent is mistaken in supposing that the act of June 19, 1813, (3 Stat. p. 2, c. 2,) applies to whaling voyages. 3 Kent, Comm. 178. It is limited to the bank and other cod fisheries. But a species of usages, adapted to the necessities of these adventures, are growing into practice, which the courts seem disposed to favor, and which may soon acquire the character and usefulness of authoritative ordinances. Curt. Merch. Seam. 394, App. 2; Barney v. Coffin, 3 Pick. 115; Baxter v. Rodman, Id. 435. The contract brought before the court in this case is a fair representation of the terms upon which these engagements are usually arranged. If the limitation of the rights of the crew to shares in those takings only which they have aided in making be not of general use, the stipulation would seem in itself reasonable and appropriate, if entered into by the mariner with an understanding of its purport and aim. The exception taken in this case to the argument does not go to the provision as in itself inadmissible, but the scope of the objection is, that the stipulation is void for want of proof on the part of the owners that the libellant had it clearly explained to him, and that he was secured an equivalent for a general right to wages for the voyage surrendered by this clause of the engagement. There are facts in evidence affording a strong implication that the libellant well understood this provision. The vessel was fitted out in the port of New London, and it is proved that for a long period of years a like condition has been introduced into shipping articles signed at that port, and that for twenty years, or more, voyages have been made up and settled there upon that basis. The libellant, in his libel, evinces a familiarity with the contents of the shipping articles, as he asserts that his contract is fully set forth in them. He was a mechanic, a carpenter's mate, shipped at New London, and joined the vessel there; and in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, it will be implied that he was a resident of that place or vicinity, and he must be deemed cognizant of so old and notorious a custom in the line of business in which he engaged. His handwriting indicates a good education, and as he took a rate of wages above that of green hands and ordinary seamen or cooper's mate, and equal with that of seamen, it is also fairly inferable that the particulars of his compensation and the circumstances likely to affect it, were ascertained and particularly attended to upon his part. But, in my opinion, the stipulation is not of that unusual or extraordinary character that any explanation of it to the libellant was requisite. It clearly was the customary one at that port, and it seems to be exactly adapted to the character of the adventure in which the parties were about to unite upon a ground of common interest. Upon the basis of recompense adopted, each party would be solicitous to secure the whole advantage of his own labor, and to prevent others from participating in profits and earnings towards which they had contributed no aid. There was a legal and equitable equivalent for the engagement in its mutuality. It applied alike to officers and crew. Those who were to receive large shares and those whose portions were the smallest reciprocally surrendered and acquired like rights under it; and it is to be observed, that although the libellant was entitled to a precedence over portions of the ship's company, other portions had reserved to them shares much larger than his own. His chance of gain might thus, by their shares falling into the distribution fund, counterbalance his risk of loss. The adventure was in its nature one of hazard, and each person would naturally compute the chances as more likely to turn in his favor than against him, and would accordingly regard the stipulation as promising an advantage to himself. I shall accordingly hold that the engagement was valid, and that the libellant cannot claim any part of the takings earned during the period of his disability.

3. The remaining question is, as to the liability of the ship in this peculiar engagement, to bear the charge of the libellant's sickness and cure. The general principle applicable to the rights and liabilities of seamen is, that the shipping contract is presumed to include the provisions of the law maritime, except as varied or modified by express stipulation between the parties. The Crusader, [Case No. 3,456;] Jameson v. The Regulus, [Id. 7,198;] Curt. Merch. Seam. 106. A fundamental doctrine applicable to mariners' contracts, and one regarded in the maritime law as forming a part of the contract, is the right of the seamen to be cured at the expense of the ship, of sickness or injury received in the ship's service. Jac. Sea Laws, 144; Abb. Shipp. 258; Curt. Merch. Seam. 106, 111. Pardessus, in his compilation of marine ordinances and laws, collects the provisions upon this subject embodied in those edicts and usages. 1 Pardessus, 327, 471, 474; 2 Pardessus, 521; 3 Pardessus, 141, 374, 510, 518. See, also, 1 Boulay-Paty, 202. Valin comments upon the import of several of the ancient ordinances which are embraced in article XI. of the Ordinance of the Marine of Louis XIV.; and evidently regards them as being of universal obligation, including mariners employed under every method of hiring. 1 Valin, 721. The decisions of the American courts rest upon and sanction the maritime codes of continental Europe upon this subject. Abb. Shipp. 260, notes; 3 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 184–186, notes; Curt. Merch. Seam. 106–111. Seamen are entitled to be maintained and cured at the expense of the ship of sickness or injuries received while in her service. And courts would receive with great distrust any engagement upon the part of mariners to dispense with or qualify this privilege, alike important to them personally in point of humanity and in view of wise policy, in aid of the navigation and commerce of the country. The case of the libellant falls clearly within this rule, and nothing is shown in its character in any way detracting from his right to the full benefit of it. The pretended discharge at Lahaina was of no effect upon the rights of libellant, for the reasons already stated; and his assent to be put on shore, if such assent is to be implied, was only in accordance with the direction of the master and the convenience of the ship. He still continued entitled to support from the vessel, and to all the advantages he would have possessed if put on shore without being consulted or against his consent, or if he had continued on board during the residue of the cruise. In my judgment, therefore, there is no ground to question his right to be treated and cured at the expense of the ship.

The essential question is, what is the extent and duration of that charge, and how is its value to be measured in money? The vessel must cover every necessary and appropriate expenditure made and responsibility incurred by the libellant during the period, for board, nursing, or medical treatment. The authorities above referred to fully support his right of recovery to that extent; and whether such disbursements have been made by him, or there is an outstanding liability on his behalf for them, may be a fit subject of reference and adjustment before a commissioner. The main difficulty is, whether the libellant's disabilities still continue a charge upon the vessel after the voyage is fully completed, and if so, what is to be the legal termination of the charge. The expression often employed in the various ordinances and in the decisions is, that mariners are entitled to be cured of sickness and wounds received in service of the ship.[4] This statement is clearly not to be taken in an absolute sense. That would involve impossibilities. Diseases and injuries so incurred are frequently in their nature, and in their direct consequences, incurable. An exposure to unusual labor or privations on the voyage may induce maladies permanent or irremediable in their character; thus broken limbs, or bodily debility resulting from services in the ship, are very often the sailor's heritage for the residue of his life.

Judge Story was manifestly laboring under uncertainty of mind whether the liability of the ship or owner was of indeterminate duration, and might be enforced so long as the necessity should continue. In Harden v. Gordon, [Case No. 6,047,] the rule was laid down with great amplitude, that the expenses of sick seamen were to be borne by the ship, including medicines, medical advice, nursing, and lodging. In The George, 1 Sumn. 59, [1 Sumn. 151, Case No. 5,329,] this rule was restated, and applied to the case of a mate substituted as master by the consul abroad, and who was lodged and treated on shore. In Reed v. Canfield, [Id. 11,641,] the point was presented with more distinctness, as that was a case of disability continuing after the termination of the voyage, and which might probably last for the life of the sailor. Judge Story puts the inquiries:—"What are the limits of the allowance?" "May they be extended over years or for life?" "Are they to be like the pensions allowed by some of the marine ordinances in cases of wounds and other injuries received by seamen in defending the ship from the attack of pirates?" These are interrogatories of great significance and weight, and it is to be regretted that the learned judge has not relieved the subject of its pressing difficulties by a more full solution of the questions. He says,—"The answer to suggestions of this sort is, that the law embodies in its formulary the limits of the liability. The seaman is to be cured at the expense of the ship of the sickness or injuries sustained in the ship's service. It must be sustained by the party while in the ship's service; and he is not to receive any compensation or allowance for effects of the injury which are merely consequential. The owners are liable only for expenses necessarily incurred for the cure, and when the cure is completed, at least so far as the ordinary medical means extend, the owners are free from all further liability." This is sufficiently distinct as to the period within which the injury must have been received, or the sickness incurred. The ship can only be held liable for those events occurring whilst the mariner is attached to her. 1 Pardessus, Droit Comm. § 688. Still, the inquiry whether the cure required during the voyage is to be continued after its termination, is not met in terms by this decision, and seems to be left open for solution upon general principles. Reed v. Canfield, [supra.]

The British act of 7 & 8 Vict. (chapter 192, § 18) lays down a clear and practical rule upon this subject. It enacts that, in case the master or any seaman shall receive any hurt in the services of the ship, the expense of medical advice, attendance, medicine, and subsistence for him "until cured, or brought to this country," together with the costs of his conveyance thither, be defrayed by the owners without any deduction whatever from his wages. This is but a reenactment, in substance, of the provisions of the act of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 19. Abb. Shipp. 170; Id. 616. It is probable that the ancient ordinances referred to by Judge Story, were those cited by Cleirac, (Cont. de la Mer, 25, 26,) which provided that seamen wounded in fighting for their vessel, should, besides their cure, be supported for the rest of their lives at the expense of the ship and cargo; but I do not find this rule extended to ordinary cases of sickness or injuries in the merchant service. Ord. de Oleron, art. 7; Cleirac, 27. This was regarded as a general average charge. 9 Code de Commerce, art. 400. The French marine law, according to the commentary of Pardessus, limits the obligation of the master, in case of a seaman left sick abroad, to the providing for the charge of his sickness, and for the expense necessary to place him in a condition to return home. 1 Pardessus, § 688; 1 Boulay-Paty, 202; The Littlejohn, [Case No. 6,153.] The Code of Commerce leaves the subject without special legislation, (Code Comm. art. 262,) further than the general principle that the mariner shall be cured by the ship, and receive his wages without abatement. The term cure, was probably employed originally in the sense of taken charge or care of the disabled seaman, and not in that of positive healing. The obligation of the ship to the mariner would then be coextensive in duration to that of the mariner to the ship. Natural reason would seem to point to that limitation, it being the one consonant to the relation in which the law places the parties to each other, and by which it measures their privileges and liabilities under a shipping contract. This rule may undoubtedly be subject to variations. When a course of medical treatment, necessary and appropriate to the cure of the seaman, has been commenced and is in a course of favorable termination, there would be an impressive propriety in holding the ship chargeable with its completion, at least for a reasonable time after the voyage is ended or the mariner is at home. So, also, in case due attention to his necessities has been unjustly omitted by the ship abroad, or his case has been improperly treated, the courts may properly enforce against the ship this great duty towards disabled mariners, even after her contracts are terminated, upon the ground of a failure to perform towards them the obligation in the shipping contract. These particulars, however, are not stated as ingredients in the present case, but are referred to in illustration of the doctrine involved in some of the authorities, and to show they are not inconsistent with the general principle, that a seaman has no claim upon the ship or her owner for the cure of his sickness or disabilities after his contract has terminated, and he is returned to his port of shipment or discharge, or has been furnished with means to do so. A reference must be ordered to have an account stated upon the principles of this decree, stating the expenses incurred by the libellant, and the amount of wages due him, the credits to which the claimants are entitled, and the balance, if any, due the libellant. Decree accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] The report of the commissioner, filed pursuant to this decree, found that no balance was due to the libellant. On the confirmation of this report, the claimants moved, that the libel be dismissed with costs. The libellant objected to the allowance of costs, upon the ground that the main point in controversy was novel, and that the decision against his claim turned upon a point of law and not on the merits. The court concurred in this view, and denied costs against the libellant.

Case No. 621.

The ATLANTIC.

[1 Ware, 121.][1]

District Court, D. Maine. 1827.

SHIPPING — PUBLIC REGULATIONS — COASTING LICENSE — FOREIGN VOYAGE — ACT MARCH 1, 1823.

1. A vessel under a coasting license is not subject to forfeiture for a voyage from an American port to Calais, and delivering her cargo to a British merchant, while lying in the stream, on the American side of the jurisdictional line.

2. This is not a foreign voyage, the delivery of the cargo being within the American waters, though it is delivered to a British subject residing on the British side of the stream.

[See The Lark, Case No. 8,090; The Three Brothers, Id. 14,009.]

3. The waters of the river Schoodiac and of the bay of Passamaquoddy, separating the United States from the British province of New Brunswick, are common to both parties for the purposes of navigation.

4. The act of 1823, [3 Stat. 740, c. 22,] c. 21, entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," does not render unlawful the exportation of American produce in American vessels to any of the ports of the British North American provinces not enumerated as open ports in that act.

In admiralty. December term, 1827.—This was a vessel seized by the collector of the customs for the district of Passamaquoddy, for an alleged violation of the revenue and navigation laws. The libel contained three allegations of forfeiture. 1st. That she was a vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, and was engaged in another trade than that for which she was licensed. 2d. That she proceeded on a foreign voyage, without first giving up her license and taking out a register. 3d. That the merchandise was shipped and water-borne for the purpose of being exported to the port of St. Stephens, in the province of New Brunswick, in violation of the act of March 1, 1823, entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," mentioned in the act, [3 Stat. 740.] The material facts proved at the hearing were, that the Atlantic sailed from the port of Bath, under a coasting license, with a cargo of hay, corn, &c., previously bargained for by Mr. Jones, a British merchant resident at St. Stephens, a place lying on the river Schoodiac, opposite to Calais, with written orders, which were produced on her arrival, to deliver her cargo, "along-side," while she should be lying in the stream. There was some evidence introduced, tending to show that she came to anchor and discharged part of her cargo while lying on the British side. But this was met by contradictory testimony on the part of [Swan and others,] claimants, and was abandoned at the argument by the district attorney. While lying at anchor in American waters, as the proof was, several bundles of hay were discharged into a flat-bottomed boat, or gondola, part of which were carried to a British vessel lying in the stream, and part to the shore in St. Stephens. The captain, who was released and examined as a witness, stated that the boats did not belong to the vessel, and were not employed by him, but by Jones, and that the delivery of the cargo into them was a delivery to the purchaser, and discharged the owners from all further responsibility.

WARE, District Judge. Upon the facts which have been proved in the case, the counsel for the libellants has argued that the vessel and cargo are forfeited under the 8th section of the act of February 18, 1793, commonly called the coasting act,—2 U. S. Laws, c. 153, [1 Stat. 308,]—for proceeding on a foreign voyage without first giving up her license and taking out a register. The ostensible voyage was strictly one of coasting from Bath to Calais. In making such a voyage, a vessel with a coasting license is not rendered liable to forfeiture by merely passing out of the jurisdiction of the United States into that of an adjoining power. The waters of the bay of Passamaquoddy and the river Schoodiac, separating the United States from the British provinces, are, upon the principles of public law, common to both powers for the purposes of navigation. The Fame, [Case No. 4,634;] The Apollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 362. The mere fact, therefore, of her transit through British waters in the performance of the voyage, will not work a forfeiture, and it is not contended upon the evidence that she discharged her cargo while lying beyond the jurisdictional line of this country. But it is argued that though she was discharged while lying in American waters, yet if the cargo was taken in boats belonging to the vessel, and carried to the British side, or in boats employed by the master, this would, on a sound construction of the law, be a foreign voyage, as much as if she actually discharged her cargo at the wharf in a foreign port, the termination being that which fixes the character of the voyage, and determines whether it be a foreign or coasting voyage. The argument would certainly be entitled to great consideration, upon a different state of facts. But the testimony of the master on this point is clear and uncontradicted. He states explicitly that the cargo was delivered to Jones, along-side the vessel, into boats provided by him, and that the goods were at his risk from the moment that they were in the boat; and the facts as he states them are in conformity with his written instructions. There is nothing in the case to bring his statement into doubt. The true question on the facts is, whether this delivery of the cargo to a British merchant, within the waters of the United States, rendered this enterprise a foreign voyage, within the meaning of the law. I am clear in the opinion that it did not. The whole voyage, from its commencement to its termination, was within the jurisdiction of the United States, nor can I see how this section of the law is any more violated by the delivery of the cargo in the harbor of Calais, than it would be by a delivery on the wharf. It is then contended that the vessel and cargo are forfeited under the 32d section of this law, for being engaged in a trade other than that for which she was licensed. It is argued that the voyage was in violation of the act of congress of [March 1,] 1823, [3 Stat. 740,] c. 21, entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports." If the voyage was illegal, a forfeiture will undoubtedly follow from this section of the coasting act which prohibits all trade but that for which she was specially licensed; and if it had not already been settled by adjudicated cases, it is too clear to admit of a question, that the license cannot be extended to protect a traffic prohibited by law. The Eliza, [Case No. 4,346;] The Resolution, [Id. 11,709.]

The third allegation of the libel is founded on the 8th section of this act, and alleges that the cargo was shipped and water-borne for the purpose of being exported to the port of St. Stephens, in violation of this act. This offence is visited by a forfeiture of the goods only; but if the voyage were illegal, as the forfeiture of the vessel would follow from the 32d section of the coasting act, by the operation of the two laws the forfeiture will extend to both the vessel and cargo. It is this point which has been most elaborately argued at the bar. The cargo was sold to a British merchant at St. Stephens, to be delivered at Calais, while the Atlantic was lying in the stream. A part, after being discharged from the Atlantic, was actually carried to St. Stephens in British boats, and part put on board a British vessel lying in the stream. None was landed at Calais. It is contended that it was originally shipped and water-borne for the purpose of being carried to St. Stephens in British bottoms; and further that the voyage was, under the operation of the act of 1823, illegal, whether the conveyance was in British or in American vessels, and that by the true construction of that act, all intercourse with the non-enumerated British colonial ports is interdicted. Two questions may be raised on this argument. First, whether such be the true construction of the act; secondly, if it is, whether the whole act is not abrogated by the president's proclamation of March 17, 1827. The first section of the act suspends the navigation act of April 18, 1818, [3 Stat. 432,] and the supplementary act of May 15, 1820, [3 Stat. 602,] as to the ports enumerated in the act. The second and third sections regulate the importations from these ports in British vessels. The fifth, which is the section relied upon, provides, "That it shall be lawful to export from the United States directly to any of the above enumerated British colonial ports, in any vessel of the United States, or in any British vessel, navigated as by the second section of this act is provided, &c., any article of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States, or any other article legally imported therein, the exportation of which elsewhere shall not be prohibited by law." The argument is, that this is an implied prohibition of exporting to any other than one of the enumerated ports, either in British or American bottoms; that it was the policy of the act to confine the intercourse entirely to those ports, and establish a non-intercourse with all the other ports. If such were not the intention, it is asked, why were the words "vessels of the United States" used? I cannot assent to the correctness of this argument. It is well known as an historical fact, that our government has always sought a free and unrestrained commercial intercourse with all parts of the world. Its policy always has been to extend the trade of the country to its utmost limits in every direction. No stronger proof could be given of it than the act of 1815,—4 U. S. Laws, p. 824, [Bi. & D. Laws, 3 Stat. 224,]— which abolishes all discriminating duties against foreign vessels of any nation which has no such discriminating duties against vessels of this country. They are at once admitted to all the privileges of American vessels in the direct intercourse with this country, as soon as our vessels are put on the same footing with respect to privileges, as theirs, in their ports. Such are the terms of the treaty regulating the intercourse between this country and the European ports of the British empire. The only condition required by our laws, to give to our trade with any foreign nation its utmost extent and activity, is, that such nation shall extend to the navigating interests of this country the same advantages which we offer to theirs. If British vessels are prohibited from coming to an entry in our ports, when arriving from any of their colonial ports, it is only because our vessels are prohibited by their navigation laws from engaging in trade at the same ports. The 7th section of this act offers to every other colonial port all the privileges of the act as soon as their ports shall be opened to American vessels on the same terms as the ports enumerated in the act are. To suppose, then, that this act prohibits a trade to the non-enumerated colonial ports, in American vessels, would be to give a construction in direct hostility to the whole policy of the country in relation to its commerce and navigation. If the intention of the legislature were such as is contended, why are not American vessels required to give a bond, analogous to that required of British vessels, to land their cargoes in some of the specified ports. Yet American vessels are nowhere named in the proviso, though it contains the penal clause on which this allegation of the libel is founded. Whatever may have been the object of introducing the words "vessels of the United States" in the enacting clause of the section, it would be a bold construction to hold that the effect is to interdict, by implication, a trade which was before lawful, even if the statute contained nothing to repel such a construction. But it is not so. The disabling and penal clause in this section clearly negatives the construction contended for by the libellants. The words are, "It shall not be lawful to export from the United States any article whatsoever, to any of the above enumerated British colonial ports in any British vessel, other than such as shall have come directly from one of the said ports to the United States; nor shall it be lawful to export from the United States any article whatsoever, in any British vessel having come from one of the said enumerated ports, to any other port or place whatsoever than directly to one of said ports. And in case any such article shall be shipped or waterborne for the purpose of being exported, contrary to this act, the same shall be forfeited," &c. Here we have both the interdict and the penalty, and this is the only part of the act which regulates the export trade. And what is prohibited by this clause? It is a shipment for the purpose of exportation to some of the enumerated ports in a British vessel which did not arrive from one of them; or a shipment in a British vessel arriving from one of these ports for a non-enumerated port. I see no other case in which the forfeiture would attach. But if the intention was what is supposed by the argument, the words "vessels of the United States" would have appeared in this clause.

It is further contended that the original purpose of this enterprise was a transportation of the cargo from Bath to Calais, to be there transhipped and conveyed in British bottoms to St. Stephens. As these two places lie on opposite sides of the river, it is manifest that for all purposes of navigation a voyage to Calais is a voyage to St. Stephens. The object of this law being to secure to our shipping a fair proportion of the carrying trade, if the termination of this voyage is that which is alleged, this would be no violation of the spirit and intention of the act, even if it were of its letter. If it were necessary to decide this point, it would be difficult to maintain that the mere discharge of a cargo into boats, while the vessel was lying in waters common for many purposes to both parties, for the purposes of landing it, was, in any proper sense of the word a transhipment. It is, however, unnecessary for me to decide on these facts. My opinion is that the whole law is repealed and suspended by the president's proclamation. The sixth section provides that if at any time any of the ports named in the act should be closed against American vessels, "proclamation to that effect having been made by the president, each and every provision of this act, so far as the same apply to the intercourse between the United States and the above enumerated British colonial ports in British vessels, shall cease to operate in their favor;" and that the acts of 1818 and 1820 should revive and be in full force. The fact contemplated in this section having happened, the president issued his proclamation on the 17th of March last, to that effect; the consequence of which was, that this act, from that time, ceased to operate in favor of British vessels, and the two other acts were restored to their full force. When this part of the act is erased, what is there remaining? The act was not necessary to render the trade in American vessels lawful; that was lawful before, and continues to be so after the repeal. The whole operation of the statute was to open our ports to British vessels, under such regulations as are prescribed. When the whole act is repealed, so far as it grants this liberty, or regulates it, the penalty necessarily falls with it; for nothing remains on which it can act. There can be no violation of an act which is extinct. It would be extravagant to suppose that the penalty is kept alive when the act is dead. It is not pretended that the vessel here violated any of the provisions of the two acts revived by the proclamation. I therefore decree her to be restored to the claimants.

[9 Ben. 464.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. April, 1878.

WHARFAGE—MARITIME LIEN—STATE LAW.

1. The agent to whom a vessel is consigned and who does the business of the vessel, and to whom an account of the wharfage of the vessel during the time she was in his charge is presented before the departure of the vessel, is made liable for such wharfage by the statute of the state of New York. Laws 1873, p. 430, [2 Rev. Laws N. Y. 1813, c. 216, p. 430.]

2. Such liability, although created by statute, springs out of and is incident to a maritime transaction, is therefore maritime in its character and accordingly may be enforced in admiralty.

[In admiralty. Action by the Atlantic Dock Company against B. J. Wenberg to recover wharfage due. Decree for plaintiff.]

Nathan Burchard, for libellant.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the sum of $682.50, being the amount of a bill of wharfage due for the wharfage of the brig San Juan. There is no question as to the correctness of the bill, but the liability of the defendant is denied.

The brig San Juan was a foreign vessel, which came to the port of New York, consigned to the defendant, her owners being absent. The defendant was the agent of the vessel, and transacted her business in New York while she occupied the wharf of the libellant. Before the departure of the vessel an account of the amounts due for her wharfage while in charge of the defendant as agent, was delivered to the defendant, and a demand made upon him for the payment of the same. He acknowledged the demand, and promised to pay, but has hitherto neglected so to do. The statute of the state of New York, which fixes the rate of wharfage, provides also as follows: "The master or owner of any ship or vessel, or in their absence the factor or agent to whom such ship or vessel shall be consigned, shall be liable to pay the wharfage due for such ship or vessel; provided, however, that such factor or agent shall not be liable for the same, unless an account of the wharfage due be delivered to such factor or agent, or if absent, left at his usual place of abode, and the money there demanded before the departure of such ship or vessel from the port." See 2 Rev. Laws 1873, p. 430, [2 Rev. Laws N. Y. 1813, c. 216, p. 430.] The facts of this case clearly bring the defendant within the effect of this statute, so that, if this were an action at common law, no question could arise as to the plaintiff's right to recover. But the action being in admiralty the question is presented whether a court of admiralty has jurisdiction to enforce the liability created by the statute of the state above recited.

It is now settled that the courts of admiralty have jurisdiction in actions to recover wharfage by reason of the subject matter. Such an action the present must be held to be, notwithstanding the circumstance that the liability of the defendant arises under a statute of the state. The defendant's liability is to pay a demand maritime in character. He is made liable to pay wharfage. The liability springs out of, and is incidental to, a transaction maritime in character. The effect of the statute is to create a legal presumption that wharfage service is rendered on the request of the ship's agent as principal, when in the absence of the ship's owner the vessel under the control of the agent makes use of a wharf. In my judgment such a liability is one that a court of admiralty can enforce.

Let a decree be entered for the sum of $682.50, with interest from May 21, 1875, and costs.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — ENJOINING INFRINGEMENT—SUBSTITUTION OF EQUIVALENTS—ENLARGING SCOPE ON REISSUE—COMITY BETWEEN COURTS.

1. The reissued letters patent, No. 5,799, for a compound of nitro-glycerine with an absorbent substance, preferably infusorial earth, are infringed by the use of a mealed powder composed of nitrate of soda, charcoal and sulphur.

2. The rule, that when a substitute is used for one ingredient in a patented combination, which substitute has every property and performs every function of the original in the combination, it does not cease to be an equivalent because in addition it does something more and better, recognized.

[Cited in Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Rand, Case No. 626; Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Mowbray, Id. 624.]

3. The term "inexplosive" in the original patent, was properly omitted in the reissue as being ambiguous and meaning only comparatively inexplosive, or explosive under certain conditions; and such omission, reference being had to the terms of the original specification, did not enlarge the scope of the invention.

[Cited in The Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Rand, Case No. 626.]

4. The patent having already been contested and held valid in this court on final hearing, this court will not postpone the granting of a preliminary injunction, merely because another suit is pending on the patent in another circuit.

5. The question of comity between courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, reviewed.

Browne, Holmes & Browne, for complainants.

Godfrey Morse, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The reissued patent of complainants, No. 5,799, for the invention of Nobel of a new explosive compound, consisting of a combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth, or other equivalent substance, was fully considered by this court in the case of Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Mowbray, [Case No. 624.] In that case the reissued patent was fully sustained as valid, and as not claiming in the reissue any invention different from the one substantially set forth and suggested in the original. The question presented in this case is, whether the pulverulent powder compounded of the usual proportions of nitrate of soda, charcoal and sulphur, as used in the "Vulcan blasting-powder," in combination with nitro-glycerine, is, for the purposes of and in that combination, the equivalent of "the substance" described in the Nobel patent, which "possesses a great absorbent capacity, and which, at the same time, is free from any quality which will decompose, destroy, or injure the nitro-glycerine, or its explosiveness," thus, when combined with nitro-glycerine, forming out of the two ingredients "a composition which, without losing the great explosive power of nitro-glycerine, is very much altered as to its explosive and other properties, being far more safe and convenient for transportation, storage, and use than nitro-glycerine." The preferred form of this substance, as described by Nobel, was the kieselgurgh, or infusorial earth. The substance used by defendants, in combination with nitro-glycerine, is a mealed powder of nitrate of soda, charcoal and sulphur, in proportions the same as in some gunpowder in common use in granular form. This substance has in the combination "a great absorbent capacity," and it is "free from any quality which will decompose, destroy, or injure the nitro-glycerine or its explosiveness." The compound of this substance with nitro-glycerine, without losing the great explosive power of nitro-glycerine, is far more safe and convenient for transportation, storage and use than nitro-glycerine. It does not appear to be contended that the substance itself used by defendants does not possess, in the combination, every property claimed for the infusorial earth in the dynamite patent, or that the combination of it with nitro-glycerine, as "Vulcan blasting-powder," does not possess every attribute and property, in a greater or less degree, possessed by dynamite.

The contention of defendants is, that the only object and aim of Nobel's invention, as patented, was to render nitro-glycerine safer in handling and transportation; that there was no intent to augment its explosive force; that, on the contrary, the solid substance exerted no influence and remained as inert matter, while the object of the manufacturer of the Vulcan powder is stated to be "to render the explosion and combustion of gunpowder instantaneous." That this is not the sole or principal object of the combination is perfectly evident. If the only object of the combination be "to render the explosion and combustion of gunpowder instantaneous," why begin the process by substituting for the granular gunpowder, so highly explosive, a mealed powder of the same ingredients in a pulverulent state, and of a lower degree of explosiveness than grained powder? As nitro-glycerine has eight or ten times the explosive force of the same quantity of gunpowder, as it explodes under proper conditions much more rapidly and instantaneously than gunpowder, the object of the compound is, manifestly, not merely to get an instantaneous explosion and combustion of the gunpowder, but primarily to effect an explosion, the operative effect of which is principally due to the nitro-glycerine in the compound, although augmented in some degree by the gas generated by the explosion of the powder. If the purpose be merely, by means of the nitro-glycerine, to effect instantaneous combustion of the powder, why is the ingredient of sulphur introduced, whose only function is to facilitate ignition—a purpose better accomplished by the nitro-glycerine itself? The real question in the case is more truly stated as follows: Does the substitution of gunpowder, as used in the Vulcan powder in combination with nitro-glycerine, in the place of the infusorial earth or other absorbent described by Nobel, make the combination a different and not an equivalent compound, because when gunpowder is used as an absorbent, in addition to fulfilling every condition and performing every function of the absorbent in the dynamite compound up to the time of the explosion, and at that time, it then has the additional function of co-operating, by means of its conversion into gas, with the nitro-glycerine in rending the rock, instead of remaining, like the infusorial earth, an inert substance?

The mica powder of Mowbray was held to be an equivalent of the dynamite, and to be subordinate to the dynamite patent, although the mica scales of Mowbray, while possessing all the properties which render the infusorial earth efficient and useful in the compound, had additional properties of greater elasticity and resiliency, and although the nitro-glycerine used by him and prepared by his process was much more effective than the less highly nitrated nitro-glycerine known to Nobel at the date of his invention. The books are full of cases proving that when a substitute is used for one ingredient in a patented combination which has every property and performs every function of the original in the combination, it does not cease to be an equivalent because in addition it does something more and better.

The equities in Mowbray's case were much stronger than in this case. For Mowbray, although not the first and original, but a subsequent inventor, was in fact an independent inventor of the substance of the Nobel invention, and he also made a subsidiary invention, an improvement on the dynamite invention. In the present case there is no evidence of a combination of nitro-glycerine with gunpowder as an absorbent before the invention of Nobel, or even before it was used by the owners of the Nobel patent, as one of the modes of using and embodying his invention. The defendants rely upon the position assumed by them that, as gunpowder is an explosive of itself, the use of it in the combination is open to them, as the assignees of Nobel are claimed by them to be limited by the terms of their patent to a non-explosive substance as the absorbent. At the hearing on this motion the argument was strenuously and forcibly presented to the court that Nobel described his absorbent as an "inexplosive" substance, and that if the omission of the term "inexplosive" in the reissue enlarges the scope of the invention, the reissue itself is void; and that if the reissue is to be construed in connection with the original, and for the same invention, it must be limited to the use of absorbents as equivalents which are inexplosive. This position of the defendants is entitled to careful consideration.

In Russell v. Dodge, 93 U. S. 460, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, Mr. Justice Field says: "The change made in the old specification, by eliminating the necessity of using the fat liquor in a heated condition, and making in the new specification its use in that condition a mere matter of convenience, and the insertion of an independent claim for the use of fat liquor in the treatment of leather generally, operated to enlarge the character and scope of the invention. The evident object of the patentee in seeking a reissue was not to correct any defects in specification or claim, but to change both, and thus obtain, in fact, a patent for a different invention. This result the law, as we have seen, does not permit." See, also, Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 544. The reissue in this case is not invalid according to the principles of law as stated in Russell v. Dodge, [supra,] and Seymour v. Osborne, [supra.] The word "inexplosive" is applied in the original patent as a term of description to a substance only preferentially used. The other descriptions in the specification clearly apply to substances which in one sense may be explosive, but are inexplosive as compared with nitro-glycerine. The word "inexplosive" appears clearly to have been used in the original patent to describe substances which, as compared with nitro-glycerine, were inexplosive by concussion, which would not, of themselves, explode under those conditions which rendered nitro-glycerine so dangerous and unsafe for practical use, and which, inexplosive of themselves under those conditions, when combined with nitro-glycerine, would make the combination a compound which would also be inexplosive except under such conditions as were not inconsistent with substantial safety in its use for blasting and similar purposes. In this sense the mealed powder used by the defendants is inexplosive. It prevents, by the interposition of its particles, the explosion of the nitro-glycerine by any such concussion as would ordinarily explode it when uncombined with an absorbent. It makes the compound practically inexplosive under ordinary fortuitous and accidental concussions, and practically explosive only under predetermined and prearranged conditions. The word is omitted in the reissue, and we think properly omitted, not for the purpose of including equivalents which were not within the scope of the original invention as described, but as an ambiguous expression not consistent with the other words in the specification which clearly describe the absorbent, its properties and functions, all of which properties and functions, it is evident, from a reading of the original patent, might appertain to a substance explosive under some conditions, but inexplosive under those conditions which made nitro-glycerine explosive by concussion, and dangerous and unsafe for practical use.

The conclusion, therefore, I think is a legitimate one, that under the reissued patent the owners of the patent are not limited to treat as infringements the use of such equivalents only as are actually inexplosive, but they are entitled to the exclusive use of such equivalents as are inexplosive as compared with nitro-glycerine, and which, while complying with the other requisites of the infusorial earth in the combination, will, also, when combined with nitro-glycerine, form out of the two ingredients a composition which, without losing the great explosive power of nitro-glycerine, is more safe and convenient for transportation, storage and use than nitro-glycerine.

The objection is taken by the counsel for the defendants to the granting of a preliminary injunction by this court in the cases now before the court, for the reason that an action has been pending for two years and upward in the circuit court for the second circuit, in which the same questions are involved, and that no effort has been made to prosecute such action, or to obtain a preliminary injunction. It is proved that this action is pending in the circuit court for the second circuit. It is urged that the courtesy usually observed by one court toward another court of equal jurisdiction should deter this court from the exercise of its power to grant a preliminary injunction till that case, which was first originated in the other tribunal, should be finally brought to trial and decided by the court.

A consideration of the condition of this litigation in the respective courts will show that there is no foundation for this objection, and no ground for contending that the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court over the subject-matter would involve any want of courtesy to the court in which the other action is pending. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the Nobel patent, under which this litigation arises, has been made the subject of litigation in this circuit, and that the Nobel patent, after a long and patient and exhaustive examination and argument by able counsel, and a hearing of the testimony of the most competent experts, has been adjudicated to be valid. The foundation, therefore, has been laid in this circuit for a motion for a preliminary injunction. The patent itself having been sustained after a litigation closely contested and free from any pretence of collusion or of any neglect to properly raise and and ably present any issues which could be raised in defence, there is good ground upon which the party complainant can urge with more force its motion for the preliminary injunction in this circuit, in which the validity of the patent itself has been sustained, in which the principal questions arising in this case, as well as in others in relation to the validity of the reissue, have been fully tried and determined.

If such had not been the case in this circuit, and if there were a case pending in another circuit court of the United States involving the validity of this patent which had not been adjudicated upon in this circuit, and that case had progressed to a final hearing and was before the court for adjudication in such other circuit, this court, in the exercise of proper courtesy toward other tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction, would probably decline to hear a motion for a preliminary injunction, and would certainly decline to adjudicate upon it, under ordinary circumstances, without awaiting the decision of such other circuit court before which the case was pending for adjudication after a final hearing.

It would seem to follow that in this court, in which there has been such adjudication after a final hearing and a determination upon the validity of the patent, was the place, and peculiarly the proper place, to make the motion for a preliminary injunction, and that the exercise of its jurisdiction involves clearly no want of courtesy to any other tribunal in which such case has not reached a final hearing, and in which the testimony does not appear to have been taken. The injunctions, therefore, in these cases must issue against the defendants in the usual form.

Case No. 624.

ATLANTIC GIANT POWDER CO. v. MOWBRAY et al.

[2 Ban. & A. 442;[1] 12 O. G. No. 14, p. iii.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—WHAT CONSTITUTES INFRINGEMENT — SUBSTITUTION OF INGREDIENTS—SAME BENEFICIAL RESULT.

1. The principal feature in Nobel's invention of dynamite was the absorption of liquid nitro-glycerine by means of absorbent material, preferably infusorial earth, thus, among other results, rendering the explosive safer and more readily used: Held, that the use of extremely minute scales of mica, which become coated with the liquid, is, in principle and effect, equally absorption, and although an improvement, is yet an infringement.

[Cited in Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Rand, Case No. 626.]

2. In a compound material, the substitution of an ingredient somewhat different, even if preferable, is nevertheless an infringement, if the same beneficial results are obtained by substantially the same means.

[Cited in Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Rand, Case No. 626.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. Reissued patent No. 5,799, granted to Alfred Nobel, March 17, 1874, for the combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth, or other equivalent absorbent substance, as a new explosive compound, held, valid.

Charles F. Blake, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This bill is founded on three patents, one being reissue No. 5,798, for an improvement in methods of exploding nitro-glycerine, the claims in which are for a process or certain described modes of utilizing nitro-glycerine as an explosive by means of fire, heat, electricity, or an initial explosion, communicated to the mass under a condition of confinement, so as to produce an instantaneous explosion of the entire mass, and generally by effecting an impulse of explosion by the detonation of an explosive substance communicated to the mass under such condition as to produce an instantaneous explosion of the whole mass. This may be briefly described as the process patent. The second one is reissue No. 5,800, in which there are seven claims for as many different igniters or exploders for initiating the impulse of explosion in a charge of nitro-glycerine. This will be styled, for the sake of brevity, the exploder patent. The third patent, reissue No. 5,799, for an improvement in explosive compounds, is for the combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth, or other equivalent absorbent substance, as a new explosive compound. This compound is generally spoken of as dynamite, and therefore this may appropriately be called the dynamite patent. This last-named patent will be first considered. In 1847, Ascagne Sobrero (soon after the discovery by Schonbein, in the same year, of gun-cotton) invented nitro-glycerine, an explosive substance prepared by treating glycerine with a mixture of nitric and sulphuric acids. For a long time after the invention of nitro-glycerine by Sobrero in 1847, in fact, until 1863, when Nobel's inventions began, although nitro-glycerine was well known to be a very powerful explosive as compared with gunpowder and gun-cotton, it was very little used for blasting purposes. This delay in the introduction of nitro-glycerine as an explosive to practical use appears to have been attributable, first, to the enormous danger to life and property attending its manipulation, transportation, and use in its fluid state; and secondly, to a practical difficulty, amounting almost to an impossibility, of exploding the whole mass of fluid nitro-glycerine, no instantaneous decomposition of the whole mass following from the application of heat or of a blow, as in case of gunpowder or gun-cotton when fire is applied. To overcome this last objection was the object of the exploder and the process patents. The object of the dynamite patent was to remedy the first objection of enormous danger to life and property, and to combine the nitro-glycerine with some absorbent substance, whereby the condition of the nitro-glycerine is so modified as to render the resulting compound more practically useful and effective as an explosive, and far more safe and convenient for handling, storage, and transportation, than nitro-glycerine in its ordinary condition as a liquid. Objection is made to the reissue of the dynamite patent, on the ground that the description of the invention is broader in the reissue than in the original patent; but the description of the invention in the original patent appears to describe in general terms, although without minutely demonstrating all the peculiarities of operation in the new compound, all that is more specifically described in the reissue. The invention is described in general terms to "consist in mixing with nitro-glycerine a substance which possesses a very great absorbent capacity, and which at the same time is free from any quality which will decompose, destroy, or injure the nitro-glycerine or its explosiveness." A certain kind of silicious earth, known under the several names of silicious marl, tripoli, rotten stone, etc., the preferred variety being infusorial earth, is described as the inert matter which he mixes with the nitro-glycerine. The described advantages are, that it will, by reason of its great absorbent capacity, take up about three times its own weight of nitro-glycerine, and still retain its powder form, thus leaving the nitro-glycerine so compact and concentrated as to have nearly its original explosive power. The patent also points out the result of insensibility of the compound to ordinary concussions without loss of the great explosive power of the liquid nitro-glycerine, where it describes it "as being far more safe and convenient for transportation, storage, and use, than nitro-glycerine." It is true that the original patent does not undertake to enunciate the law of the explosion of nitro-glycerine by concussion, or to explain fully the peculiarities of operation attending the use of the compound. This was not necessary to the validity of the patent any further than might be requisite to instruct others as to the qualities to be inherent in other substances to be used as equivalents for the silicious earth described, and I hardly think essential for that purpose. If, in this respect, there was any need of more specific detailed description in addition to the general words in the patent, it has been corrected, and, as far as I can judge, properly corrected in the reissue. Without giving that extended comparison and collocation of corresponding passages in the original and reissue which would be necessary to properly answer all the objections raised in the argument, I must content myself with stating that such careful comparison has failed to satisfy me that the reissued dynamite patent is open to objection on the ground of its being for an invention broader than, or different from, the one described in the original. The omission of the word "inexplosive" might seem to indicate, as it perhaps does, a disposition to enlarge the scope of the patent; but, as I think, when a question shall arise on that expression in the patent, the court will look to the specifications in both the original and the reissue, in aid of the true construction of the reissue, as stated in Forsyth v. Clapp, [Case No. 4,949.] I do not think the omission of that word renders the reissue defective. The construction which the court would give as to what would be an equivalent for the silicious earth would be the same under the reissue as on the original patent.

The patent to Shaffner for a mode of tamping, and for a combination of sand with nitro-glycerine in the blast-hole, does not anticipate the invention of Nobel. It does not approach any nearer to it than the explosion of nitro-glycerine in the sand and gravel, in front of the stable at Titusville, approaches Mowbray's perfected invention of mica powder, although it suggested the train of experiments which resulted finally in that invention. The defendants have used mica powder, an invention of the defendant Mowbray, a great improvement in the art of blasting with nitro-glycerine, the valuable properties of which have been signally demonstrated in the use which has been made of it in blasting operations in the Hoosac Tunnel, attaining the result of the highest efficiency and greatest economy consistent with perfect safety, as compared with all other highly explosive substances. Mica powder, so called, is prepared by pouring tri-nitro-glycerine, at a temperature of about seventy degrees, in the proportions of about fifty-two and one-half pounds of tri-nitro-glycerine to about forty-seven and one-half pounds of mica scales, over mica scales prepared by triturating mica or Muscovy talc into scales of about one-thousandth of an inch in thickness, and exceedingly minute surfaces, and free from the powder or dust of mica, in such a manner that the surfaces of the minute mica scales are painted or coated with the tri-nitro-glycerine, and the mass of forty-seven and one-half pounds of mica scales retains or holds in suspension the fifty-two and one-half pounds of tri-nitroglycerine. To determine whether this, which must be admitted to be a great and patentable improvement upon the dynamite of Nobel, be an independent or a subsidiary invention, we must look carefully into the nature and scope and the limitations of the reissued dynamite patent, treating it, as we have already shown, as a valid patent for the invention described therein and in the original.

The invention is described in the original as consisting "in mixing with nitro-glycerine a substance which possesses a very great absorbent capacity, and which at the same time is free from any quality which will decompose, destroy, or injure the nitro-glycerine or its explosiveness," thus forming out of the two ingredients "a composition which, without losing the great explosive power of nitro-glycerine, is very much altered as to its explosive and other properties, being far more safe and convenient for transportation, storage, and use than nitro-glycerine." In the original and the reissues there is a statement, in different forms of expression, and with more particularity in the reissues than in the original, of the advantage of the use of this compound, enabling the miner to fill up the bore-hole with the compound, while the cartridge containing the fluid nitro-glycerine must be of less diameter than the bore-hole, thus obtaining as much nitro-glycerine in the same height of bore-hole with this powder as with nitro-glycerine in the pure state, increasing the safety of the miner by preventing leakage into the seams of the rock. The claim in the original patent is for the composition of matter made substantially of the ingredients, and in the manner and for the purposes set forth. The reissues claim the combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth or other equivalent absorbent substance as a new explosive compound. It is not perceived that the claim in the reissues is any broader than in the original. The defendants' explosive compound is prepared by mixing the nitro-glycerine with the mica scales before described. Are the mica scales an equivalent in the compound for the infusorial earth or other substance which possesses a great absorbent capacity, and which at the the same time is free from any quality which will decompose, destroy, or injure the nitro-glycerine or its explosiveness? I am forced, upon mature reflection, to the conclusion that in this compound the mica scales possess all the properties which render the infusorial earth efficient and useful in the compound, as well as some additional properties of greater elasticity and resiliency, which add to their value. It is true that the infusorial earth is described as a porous substance, and is supposed to hold the nitro-glycerine suspended in the pores by capillary attraction, but it must also hold it in suspension by coating and adhering to the exterior surfaces of the particles. The mica scales, on the other hand, are supposed to hold the nitro-glycerine in suspension only as it is painted or coated on the exterior surfaces of the minute scales; but they each in the compound perform the same funtion as an absorbent of the nitro-glycerine. They each take up and hold by cohesive or molecular action, and each without chemical action or reaction, the nitro-glycerine in the compound. The mixture is a mechanical one, and it is not material to the function of the compound or its properties whether the absorption be effected by that mode of absorption by which a sponge, or the lacteals of the body suck in or draw up a liquid, or that by which some pulverulent substances absorb gases or moisture, whether the liquid is held absorbed or suspended in the inner surfaces of minute capillary tubes, or on the outer surfaces of minute scales. I have seen diatoms, small silicious scales, called animalcules, yet of vegetable origin, so minute that four hundred different forms catalogued and classified are arranged within the space of less than one-fourth of an inch square on the surface of the glass slide of a microscope. These small silicious scales make up the substance of large tracts and mounds of earth. If used as the inert matter with a mixture of nitro-glycerine, it would be difficult to say whether they were more closely the equivalent of the infusorial earth of Nobel or the mica scales of Mowbray. The kieselgurgh or infusorial earth of Nobel is composed of the minute scales of the diatomaceae. Each one of the properties and qualities ascribed by Nobel to the inert matter in his compound pertains to the mica scale in the mica powder, and the functions are the same in each. Nobel uses nitro-glycerine manufactured by a process which, with acids of the specific gravity used by him, produces mono or di nitro-glycerine. Mowbray uses nitro-glycerine prepared by processes which yield a substantially pure tri-nitro-glycerine, which is only another more concentrated and more highly nitrated form of nitro-glycerine, in mono-nitro-glycerine one of the hydrogen atoms of glycerine being replaced by nytril (constituting nitric acid,) in di-nitro-glycerine two of the hydrogen atoms being so replaced by nytril, and in tri-nitro-glycerine three being so replaced. For the purposes of the compound the substances are substantially the same in kind, though differing in degree. In strictness, either by the old or the new graphical system of chemical notation, they would be differently described and represented. But notwithstanding this difference in chemical nomenclature, the practical fact remains, that the only difference is in the degree to which the glycerine is nitrated, and the three resulting products, as to the properties which constitute the peculiar character of nitro-glycerine as an explosive, and as one of the elements of the patented compound, differ only in degree and not in kind.

As to the other two patents—the exploder and the process patents—without any elaborate statement of reasons, I must content myself for the present with a very brief statement of the conclusions at which I have arrived. Initial exploders—the use of one explosive compound or substance to communicate the impulse or action of explosion to another—are old. These initial exploders have been made of fuses of gunpowder or other ignitible compounds, and different forms of tubes or capsules containing ignitible or explosive compounds, which communicated sufficient heat directly or indirectly by a shock, adequate, when arrested, to produce sufficient heat to explode the mass by detonation or deflagration, or both. These initial exploders have been used to explode gunpowder and gun-cotton, both of which can be exploded by detonation. In this state of the art, if there was anything patentable in the initial exploders of Nobel, the claims of the patent must receive so narrow a construction as would not charge the defendants as infringers. Decree for injunction and account as to infringements of reissued patent No. 5,799, for an improvement in explosive compounds, and that no infringement is proved of reissues 5,798 and 5,800.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—WHAT CONSTITUTES INFRINGEMENT—PRIOR PATENT—CLAIM.

1. The reissued letters patent No. 5,799, granted to the Giant Powder Company, March 17th, 1874, for an "improved explosive compound," (the original patent having been granted to Julius Bandmann, as assignee of Alfred Nobel, the inventor, as No. 78,317, May 26th, 1868,) are valid.

2. The decision in Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Rand, [Case No. 626,] confirmed.

3. The claim of that patent is infringed by a powder called "Neptune Powder," composed of 56 parts of nitrate of soda, 14 parts of charcoal, and 30 parts of nitro-glycerine.

[See note at end of case.]

4. A description in a prior patent, to invalidate a subsequent patent, must be such as to show that the article described in the subse-

Charles F. Blake, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This is an application for a preliminary injunction founded on reissued letters patent No. 5,799, granted to the Giant Powder Company, March 17th, 1874, the original patent having been granted to Julius Bandmann, as assignee of Alfred Nobel, the inventor, as No. 78,317, May 26th, 1868, being the same reissue considered in the case of the same plaintiff against Jasper R. Rand and others, [Case No. 626,] decided herewith. The powder of the defendants in the present case is known as Neptune powder, and is composed of 56 parts of nitrate of soda, 14 parts of charcoal, and 30 parts of nitro-glycerine. It is the same powder which was held by this court, in May, 1878, in the case of the same plaintiff against the Neptune Powder Company, to be an infringement of No. 5,799. Many views now urged in defence in this case have been considered at length and overruled in the decision in the case against Rand. Those views were, to some extent, presented and passed upon in the case against the Neptune Powder Company, but no written decision was given in that case, [nowhere reported.] There are, however, some points taken in the present case which are not discussed in the decision in the Rand case, and those points are also urged as grounds for dissolving the injunction granted in the case against the Neptune Powder Company.

Stress is laid on the fact that a compound made of 30 per cent. of nitro-glycerine and 70 per cent. of infusorial earth, will not explode, while the defendants' compound will explode, although it has but 30 per cent. of nitro-glycerine, and its gunpowder ingredients will not absorb a greater amount of nitro-glycerine. But, it is a plain direction of the patent, that an absorbent must be used which will absorb and retain sufficient nitro-glycerine to make the compound explodable by detonation, at the place of designed use. The less the absorbing and holding capacity of the absorbent, the less the explosive force of the nitro-glycerine absorbed, because the less the quantity of nitro-glycerine absorbed. There is nothing in the patent which admits of the use of an absorbent which will not, with the nitro-glycerine, make a compound explodable by detonation, or of the use, with an absorbent which will absorb and hold sufficient nitro-glycerine to make a compound explodable by detonation, of an insufficient quantity of nitro-glycerine for such purpose. It is, therefore, of no consequence that a particular proportion of nitro-glycerine with a particular absorbent will not make a compound explodable by detonation, such compound being outside of the patent.

On the question of novelty, a book published in Germany, in the German language, is introduced, called Dingler's Polytechnic Journal, volume 171, 1864, page 443, cviii. The particular article is headed: "On Nobel's blasting powder, improved by addition of nitro-glycerine. By B. Turly, mining engineer." The translation of the text is as follows: "W. Nobel, an engineer of Stockholm, has taken out a patent in different countries for an improved blasting and shooting powder. His improvement consists in making the ordinary powder considerably stronger by an addition of nitro-glycerine. As is known, nitro-glycerine is a very clear oleaginous liquid, is ignited at about 170° C., without exploding, but burns slowly away with a crackling and snapping noise. If this oil is poured on a solid foundation and struck heavily with an iron hammer, it explodes with a violent detonation, but only on the spot where the hammer touches the liquid, while all the rest of the mass of oil remains unchanged, that is, unexploded. The combustion of the liquid follows without the development of any gas perceptible by the odor. From this relation this much appears, that this mass, in and of itself, is quite harmless, and requires a strong concussion or blow to make it partially explode; that its employment has, at least, no greater danger than that of common powder. But, in combination with common powder, nitro-glycerine developes a very considerable strength, and this new nitro-glycerine powder is at least three to five times stronger than ordinary powder or blasting powder. In the fortress of Carlborg, on the Wetten Lake, Mr. Nobel has made experiments with his powder in the presence of a commission. Bomb shells with ordinary and the improved powder were bursted, and the effect of the latter is said to have been five to seven times that of the ordinary powder. The experiments of blasting rocks, performed in my presence, have, however, in general, shown only a three times greater development of strength, but always the result that merits the greatest attention. Besides, it is not to be left out of the consideration, that a bore hole can only be quite generally compared with a grenade or bomb; that, while these missiles consist of homogeneous cast iron, in which the strength must show itself proportionally much greater—in a bore hole in a rock, in most cases, a certain part of the force is uselessly lost, so that, consequently the effect will be proportionally a smaller one than in the former case. Nevertheless, this new powder is an essential improvement on the old, and, when it passes a wholesale test, of which there is no present reason to doubt, it will find the greatest recognition and most extended employment by the mining public. The blasting experiments were performed as follows: The powder employed is distinguished from the blasting powder here in use by being much finer and not round but oblong and angular. Mr. Nobel shows this powder for common Swedish cannon powder, which has the same price as the mining powder of Nora. The improved powder was used in cartridge shells of sheet zinc, 18 millimetres in width, and in length of from 75 to 100 and 200 millimetres. These zinc shells, which are open at one end, are filled with the ordinary cannon powder, and, when the filling is completed, as much nitro-glycerine is poured upon it as can find room in the interstices of the powder. The powder, moistened with the oil, has a 40 per cent. (?) greater weight. After the cartridge is filled with powder and oil, it is tightly closed with a stopper of cork 20 millimetres long. It will be better to solder the cartridge. The charging of the hole is performed as follows: The bore hole, which, at its lower end, must have a width 4 to 6 millimetres greater than the thickness of the cartridge, is, of course, made dry. The cartridge is so inserted in it that the cork comes towards the bottom, that is, touching the solid rock. The space between the cartridge and the wall of the bore hole is now filled up with cannon powder, so that the latter surrounds the cartridge as completely as possible, (according to Mr. Nobel, the soldering should offer no difficulties—perhaps it suffices to pour sulphur on the cartridge—) being, also, 15 to 30 millimetres over the cartridge. This powder serves only for the ignition of the charge, for the bursting of the cartridge. The fuse is then stuck into the touch-hole, and the hole is not filled quite as usual, only care must be taken not to injure the cartridge with the tamper, on which account the first tamping is only made very loosely. If the hole is sufficiently wide, the fuse may be fastened to the cartridge with a piece of thread, and then it is not necessary to take so much igniting powder. It seems better, however, not to be sparing with the latter, in order to insure the explosion of the blast. On the explosion of the blast it is found that the detonation is a much weaker one than with common mining powder. A few examples of the effect of this powder will here be sufficient: 1. A hole 18 inches deep was discharged three times with a 9-inch mining cartridge, without showing the slightest effect; the same hole was charged with a 6-inch glycerine cartridge, and was well and completely broken up. 2. Several holes 24 inches deep, that usually here require mining cartridges 9 to 12 inches long, were well blasted with glycerine cartridges 3 inches in length. 3. Holes of 30 inches depth, that are otherwise charged with mining cartridges 18 inches long, broke with glycerine cartridges 6 inches long. From these experiments I have already deduced the conviction, that the degree of effect of this improved powder in blasting is at least three times that of the ordinary mining powder. The great advantage which will probably be obtained with this new powder will consist in this—that greater masses can be obtained at a time; that, consequently, the cost of production will be diminished. The charge of a single blast might be rather dear, but a workman will, perhaps, accomplish twice as much in the same time. First of all, will this powder be particularly valuable in building above ground and stone quarries—in general, in ample spaces where a great deal can be given to a single blast. Experiments still to be made must decide as to its utility in small spaces, confined quarters and works. Cartridges 18 inches in length might seem astonishingly large for German use. Here, the same (containing 180 grains powder) are often employed in working above ground, but each blast throws at least ⅛ cubic foot of solid mass. I consider it my duty not to withhold these preliminary remarks on a subject which possesses so great an importance for mining, and I can only add the wish that the mining public will accept this thing as far as possible, and will test and employ the new powder. Ammeberg, January 1, 1864." The number of the Journal in which the foregoing article appeared was published March 6th, 1864.

Professor Henry Morton, in an affidavit on the part of the defendants, says, that he finds in said article the following description of experiments: "The blasting experiments were conducted as follows: The powder used differs from the blasting powder ordinarily in use here, in being much finer and not round, but longish and angular. Nobel states that this powder is common Swedish gunpowder, which has the same price as (Nora blasting powder?). The improved powder was used in zinc cartridge cases, 18 millimetres in width, and in length varying from 75 to 150 and 200 millimetres. These zinc cases, which are open at one end, are filled with the ordinary gunpowder, after which so much nitro-glycerine is poured in as can find room in the interstices of the powder. The powder soaked with the oil has an increased weight of 40 per cent.?" He further says, that, in order to repeat the experiment so described, he took "a quantity of common blasting powder, such as is sold throughout the country, and, having first removed from it all dust by means of a fine sieve, passed it through a coarse sieve, so as to secure only the moderately fine grains;" that "the powder so obtained corresponded, in all respects," as he believes, "to that described in the above extract as being much finer than that ordinarily in use, and not round but angular;" that he "then selected a glass test tube about ¾ inch in diameter, and 4½ inches long, this corresponding to the dimensions of the cartridge cases given in the extract, namely, 18 millimetres in width and 75 to 150 millimetres long;" that into this glass tube he "then poured 15 grammes of the fine grain blasting powder above described, and upon it poured 6 grammes of nitro-glycerine, these being the proportions of powder to nitro-glycerine mentioned in the above extract;" and that "the nitro-glycerine was rapidly absorbed by the powder, and produced an essentially dry powder, which could evidently be handled and transported with as much safety as is attainable with any similar mixture." He further says, that he "mixed together 14 parts, by weight, of charcoal, and 56 parts of nitrate of soda, both in fine powder, and to these added 30 parts, by weight, of nitro-glycerine; and that the mixture, when made, constituted an essentially dry powder, evidently capable of being handled and transported with as much safety as is attainable with any such mixture." He further says, that the proportion of nitro-glycerine to gunpowder in said two experiments is 28 5-10 per cent. of the whole mixture in experiment one and 30 per cent. in experiment two; that these do not, in his opinion, differ to any practical extent; and that, in his opinion, "nothing further is required, beyond the description given by Turly, above quoted, to enable any one familiar with the manufacture of ordinary gunpowder, to make such mixtures of gunpowder and nitro-glycerine as are described in experiment two, which is the powder of the defendants."

Mr. Robert J. Howe, one of the defendants, says, in an affidavit: "It is a well-known fact, that gunpowder is more effective when exploded by percussion caps than by simple fuse. Some consumers (contractors) always use percussion caps for that purpose. For the same reason, caps are better to explode the improved blasting powder, but the improved gunpowder is largely used by some parties and exploded (without cap) by fuse alone. In such use, the gunpowder of the mixture explodes the nitro-glycerine of the mixture."

Mr. Thomas Varney, an expert for the plaintiff, testifies as follows, in an affidavit, in regard to the foregoing affidavits of Professor Morton and Mr. Howe: "I have read the affidavits of Professor Henry Morton and Robert J. Howe. I understand how Professor Morton made his mixture of nitro-glycerine and gunpowder, in imitation of that described in the report of Mr. Turly, in Dingler's Journal of 1864. I have made and further tested Dr. Morton's mixture, to ascertain whether his opinion was correct, that this mixture was a safety one—as safe as the powder made by the defendants. I find it is not. I experimented with two kinds of gunpowder. In one case I used common blasting powder. In the other I used the Laflin & Rand Orange Ducking Powder—a powder closely resembling that used by Professor Morton both in structure and size of grain. The proportions of nitro-glycerine and gunpowder were the same in each case, and the same as Professor Morton's, to wit, 28½ parts, by weight, of nitro-glycerine to 71½ of gunpowder. I placed these mixtures upon several thicknesses of paper and allowed them to remain in a room having a temperature of 75° Fahrenheit for 45 hours, and then weighed them. I found they had lost almost two-thirds of their nitro-glycerine, the same having drained out of the mixture and became absorbed into the paper, going through ten thicknesses thereof. * * * This mixture is not a safety one, nor is it dynamite," (meaning, the compound of No. 5,799,) "or the same thing as that made by the defendants. It is leaky. If it should be packed in paper cartridges, and these cartridges be packed in wooden cases, and be carried in cars, as is done with the powder made by the defendants, nitro-glycerine would drain from it and run into the springs, journals and other machinery beneath and upon the wheels and rails, as was the case with the leaky dualin at Worcester, Massachusetts, and the result would be the same as in that case—the entire cargo of powder would be exploded; whereas, the powder made by the defendants is thus packed and transported without the slightest danger of explosion from this source, because it is not leaky. The mixture in the Turly experiment was not made according to the rules of the dynamite patent," (meaning No. 5,799,) "but the defendant's powder is, to wit, so much nitro-glycerine is put in as will make the mixture an efficient explosive, and be retained without leakage, and no more. The leading rule for making the old mixture, as stated by Turly, is, that so much nitro-glycerine was poured in as could find room in the interstices of the powder. I tried this also, and found the mixture much more wet and leaky than the others above described. The reason why the old mixture was put into zinc cases instead of paper ones or directly into the bore hole, was because it was leaky and had to be treated like liquid nitro-glycerine. I have carefully studied the French patent of 1863, the English one of 1864, and the memoranda filed in the American patent office in 1865," (the last is a part of the contents of the file wrapper in the matter of the patent granted to Nobel, No. 50,617, October 24th, 1865, for "substitute for gunpowder," and being the original of reissues, Nos. 4,818, division D, and 4,819, division E, both dated March 19th, 1872,) "being all the evidence, except the Turly report, referred to by the defendants herein as either anticipating the dynamite invention or tending otherwise to invalidate it. My views as to the old mixtures, and some of the grounds for them, are as follows: I regard them as really merely experimental, because, in the first place, as practical things, they amounted to nothing. They did not go into practice at all. They were tried and abandoned. At this time, we are able to understand them and their value fully, and, we know they were quite worthless, except as links in the chain of experiments which led to the exploding of nitro-glycerine by detonation. If, at this day, any one should do, in all respects, what was described in the documents referred to, or what was actually done, as shown by Turly's report, he would be guilty of a great folly, but he would not infringe the dynamite patent. Nobody has ever been guilty of this folly, or ever will, except from sheer ignorance or some ulterior design. He will never adopt the old process, as an economic mode of blasting. We presume this old process aided Nobel in reaching the detonating mode of exploding nitro-glycerine; but, however this may be, it has never been used except experimentally, so far as I know. Let any one be ever so deeply skilled as an expert, or ever so experienced in the practice of all that is shown by these old documents, yet he could not make the defendants' powder, that is, gunpowder dynamite. Furthermore, even if, by accident, in making the old mixtures, the ingredients may have been used in dynamite proportions, yet there is no evidence that the mixture was ever applied to the purposes and uses peculiar to dynamite. The leading purposes of dynamite are safety in transport and freedom from leakage at the bore hole. There is no account, as far as I know, either of the transport of the old mixtures, or of their use naked in the bore hole, or in mere paper cartridges. In the documents referred to, it appears that the old mixtures were designed for two purposes—fire-arms and blasting. If it was dynamite, or such powder as the defendants make, and was used as theirs is, to wit, detonated in a gun or cannon, the gun and cannon were blown to pieces in every instance. The defendants' powder never has been used, and never can be used, in ordnance or fire-arms. We must, therefore, conclude, that the old mixture designed for fire-arms was not dynamite, or that it was never used in fire-arms, was, therefore, never transported, and was, therefore, never put to dynamite use. As to the old blasting mixture, Turly, the only reporter on the subject, gives his account in such manner as to lead one to conclude that the mixture was made at the mine. The narrative of the process shows, that the shell of zinc was filled with gunpowder—then the nitro-glycerine poured in—then corked—then turned cork downwards and put into the bore hole, &c.—as if each step immediately followed the preceding one. The old mixtures were never used as dynamites, that is to say, the leading functions of dynamite were never involved, applied or enjoyed. Not a single life or limb, or a single dollar's worth of property, was ever saved by their use, whereas, undoubtedly, many lives and much property have been saved by the use of the defendants' powder, instead of using the nitro-glycerine contained in it in its pure state, or in the form of the old mining mixture. Mr. Howe says his powder is largely used by some parties and exploded (without caps) by fuse alone. If it be inferred from this statement, or from his calling his powder an improved gunpowder, that it is more readily explodable by fire than infusorial dynamite, or any other dynamite, such inference would be erroneous; in this respect, it is precisely like all others. The original dynamite patent," (meaning, No. 78,317,) "fully explains this subject."

In reply to the foregoing affidavit of Mr. Varney, the defendants produced the affidavit of Charles Leibshner, to show that the Swedish gunpowder mentioned by Turly must have been an uncompressed, unglazed, saltpetre powder, and that the gunpowder used by Mr. Varney, in his experiments, was a compressed and glazed powder, so that the former would be a better absorbent than the latter. The defendant Howe also makes an affidavit to the effect that unpressed powder is comparatively loose, porous and absorbent, and would readily absorb and retain 30 per cent. of nitro-glycerine, while pressed powder is hard, compact and non-absorbent; and that he believes the Swedish gunpowder of the Turly article was uncompressed, unglazed gunpowder. Professor Morton also makes an affidavit, in reply to that of Mr. Varney. He says: "I have examined what I understand to be the powders named by Mr. Varney, namely, the 'common blasting powder' used in this vicinity at present, and the 'Laflin & Rand Orange Ducking Powder,' and find them to differ in a very essential respect from the powder used by me in the experiment mentioned by me in my said previous affidavit, and from the powder which I believe to have been used in the experiments recited in the Turly extract. That is to say, these powders, used by Mr. Varney, are extremely hard and compact, and not porous, or capable of absorbing a fluid, and are, moreover, highly glazed with black lead; while, on the contrary, the powder which I employed in my experiment, and which I believe to be that described in the Turly extract, was a powder made without compression, in the manner in general use long ago, and, consequently, light, porous and eminently absorbent. I repeated the experiments with these powders as described by Mr. Varney, and found that, when they were mixed with nitro-glycerine in the proportions named, they produced by no means dry powders, but, on the contrary, refusing to absorb the nitro-glycerine, the grains of powder were simply drenched on the outside with nitro-glycerine, which ran from them into the vessel in which they were mixed, or drained from them into the paper on which I spread a portion. This was true of both the common blasting powder and of the orange ducking powder." He further makes statements to show that a powder made and sold by the plaintiff, and called "giant powder, No. 2," permitted nitro-glycerine to leak from it "in a very marked manner, equal in degree to the leakage of the nitro-glycerine from the Turly mixture" made by him, though "not nearly so much as the leakage of nitro-glycerine from the mixtures described in the Varney affidavit," and made up by him "in accordance with the directions of the same;" that a mixture of nitro-glycerine and the best English rotten stone, pulverized to a very fine powder like flour, in the proportions of 40 per cent. of rotten stone to 60 per cent. of nitro-glycerine, produced a semi-fluid paste; and that a mixture of 78 per cent. of nitro-glycerine with 22 per cent. of infusorial earth, of low specific gravity and great absorbent capacity, furnished to him by the plaintiff, as a specimen of the best absorbent substance of that character, produced a pasty mixture, which drained to a greater extent than did the Turly mixture; and that samples of the two powders used by Mr. Varney in his experiments, showed both of them to be compressed, hard and non-absorbent, and glazed with black lead, and corresponded, in all those respects, with the powders with which he made his said repetitions of Mr. Varney's experiments.

To those affidavits the plaintiff replies by several affidavits. There is an affidavit of T. P. Shaffner, setting forth, that, during the year 1864, he was engaged by the Swedish government, at Stockholm, in experimenting with explosives, and was well acquainted with the powder mentioned in the Turly article as being used in the experiments of Nobel, and knows that that powder was compressed and was very hard; that, although he has been acquainted with different kinds of powder, both in this country and in foreign countries, from long before 1864 down to the present time, the powder referred to in said article as having been used in the experiments of Nobel was the hardest powder he ever handled, and was, also, a highly glazed powder; that it was much harder than any blasting powder he has ever known; that Turly, in said article, says: "After the cartridge is filled with powder and oil, it is tightly closed with a stopper of cork, twenty millimetres long. It will be better to solder the cartridge;" and that it is perfectly clear to his mind, that the use of the cork stopper ("tightly closed") and of the solder, was to keep the nitro-glycerine from leaking out, for, the article says, that "as much nitro-glycerine is poured upon it as can find room in the interstices of the powder." There is also an affidavit of John Schrader, to the effect, that he poured upon some medium sized grains of the powder in a vial, as much nitro-glycerine, at about 70° Fahrenheit, as could find room in the interstices of the powder; that the powder became saturated in about three minutes; that the powder was represented as the kind used many years ago, being made in stamp mills, and not either pressed or glazed; and that it is very soft and absorbent, but, like all absorbents, when saturated with nitro-glycerine in the manner above described, the mixture is leaky, and is substantially as dangerous for handling and transport as pure nitro-glycerine. There is also an affidavit of Alfred Mordecai, the author of "Report of Experiments made at Washington Arsenal, in 1843 and 1844," published in 1845. He states, that the experiments described in that Report were made, and the Report was printed, under his immediate superintendence; that the powder therein mentioned as Swedish musket powder was part of a sample of gunpowder brought from Sweden in 1840, by a commission of officers of the ordnance department of the United States, of whom he was one; that the powder is mentioned in the report of the commission as "a sample of gunpowder from the royal manufactory;" that it was contained in a sealed glass bottle; and that it is correctly described in said "Report of Experiments" as "musket powder, glazed, grain very hard, fracture slaty." It is also shown, by various European books, that powder is described, in 1842, as being pressed in a hydraulic or screw press, and smoothed or polished, to make it dense, and to take off its rough surface, splintering edges and corners, and to make angular powder round; that powder is described, in 1850, as being submitted to a pressure of about 75 tons to a superficial foot, and made hard, and then glazed, with the result of giving an equal degree of density to the grains, and a polish to their surface, and rendering the powder less susceptible of absorbing moisture; and that it is described, from 1807 to 1861, as being pressed and glazed.

To such affidavits the defendants reply. Carll Dittmar says, that the powder generally used for all purposes, on the continent of Europe, in 1864 and 1865, was loose, porous and absorbent in character, capable of absorbing 30 per cent. of nitro-glycerine, more or less; that, as a general thing, no hydraulic or screw presses were used in the manufacture of gunpowder, on the continent of Europe, prior to 1865, nor up to 1869; that the structure of the powders made in this country, at the present day, which have been subjected to the pressure of powerful hydraulic or screw presses, is essentially different from that made with the stamp mills and without pressure, the former being hard, compact, and slow of absorption, and the latter light, porous, and readily absorbent; and that he has no doubt that the powder alluded to in the Turly article as "common Swedish gunpowder" was a loose, porous, absorbent powder, uncompressed, and that the nitro-glycerine, used in the proportions cited by Turly, was all taken up by the powder and was held by the same, and that the resulting compound was a dry powder, safe to be handled, transported and used. Carl W. Volney says, that all Swedish and German powders that were commonly used in those countries prior to and during 1864, and for some years afterwards, were what is known as stamp mill powder, unglazed and unpressed. The defendant Parker states, that hard grained unpressed powder absorbs and retains, as a comparatively dry powder, safe to transport, handle and use, 30 per cent. of nitro-glycerine.

The Turly article starts out with stating, that what Nobel had invented and patented before January 1st, 1864, was an improvement which made ordinary powder, for blasting and shooting, considerably stronger by adding to it nitro-glycerine. This evidently refers to Nobel's specifications of September, 1863, in the English and French patents to Nobel, referred to in the Rand case; and the article of Turly alludes to no other feature of the compound made of nitro-glycerine and gunpowder, except that it is stronger in its effects, when exploded, than ordinary powder. The only place in the Turly article where any suggestion is made as to the percentage, in weight, of the added nitro-glycerine, is in the account of the blasting experiments. The description manifestly is narrating an experiment where the cartridge is filled with the two substances at the bore hole and then immediately used. There is no suggestion of a resulting dry powder, capable of transportation, or of any thing but a wet mixture, in a vessel which is to be tightly corked, because it would otherwise allow the nitro-glycerine to leak out, when it is turned with the cork downward, in which position it is inserted in the bore hole. The cartridge is then imbedded in gunpowder in the bore hole, and the gunpowder is fired by a fuse. The description is entirely insufficient as an anticipation of Noble's invention. All the speculation indulged in as to what the Swedish cannon powder was, and all the experiments to show that a powder which is assumed to be what that was, will, with the addition of the indicated proportion of nitro-glycerine, make a dry compound, amount to nothing, in the face of the fact, that the article does not suggest that the blasting compound was a dry powder, or a safety powder, or such a compound as the patent sued on describes. The prior description, to invalidate the patent, must be such as to show that the article described in the patent can be certainly arrived at by following the prior description; and it is not enough to show, that, by the lucky accident of taking gunpowder of the proper quality, a compound may be obtained which is unlike that indicated by such description. By the light of what Nobel has taught in the patent sued on, much can now be asserted to be seen in what was published before, which no one ever, in fact, saw in it before the original of the patent sued on was taken out. There is no evidence that any one, from the Turly article, or by any method supposed to be described in it, made, before the invention in question, as patented by Nobel, in the original of the patent sued on, was made by him, the safety powder which constitutes that invention. So far from this, the Turly article starts out with the assertion, that a mass of liquid nitro-glycerine is quite harmless in and of itself, and that its employment has no greater danger than that of common powder. The memoranda referred to by Mr. Varney, in his affidavit, show, in common with the English and French patents to which he refers, nothing more than attempts by Nobel to mix gunpowder with nitro-glycerine, and then to burn the nitro-glycerine by igniting the gunpowder. After that, he discovered that nitro-glycerine could be exploded in a mass, under given conditions, by detonation, and then its liability to accidental explosion in mass by concussion in handling and transportation was observed, and then followed the invention we are considering.

In every view the case for the plaintiff is such as to warrant the granting of a preliminary injunction, in this case, and the denial of the motion to vacate the injunction against the Neptune Powder Company.

Case No. 626.

ATLANTIC GIANT POWDER CO. v. RAND et al.

[16 Blatchf. 250; 4 Ban. & A. 263; 16 O. G. 87; Merw. Pat. Inv. 173.][1]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—WHAT CONSTITUTES INFRINGMENT—REISSUE—GIANT POWDER—PRIOR PATENT.

1. The reissued letters patent, No. 5,799, granted to the Giant Powder Company, March 17th, 1874, for 17 years from the 26th of May, 1868, for an "improved explosive compound," (the original patent having been granted to Julius Bandmann, as assignee of Alfred Nobel, as inventor, as No. 78,317, May 26th, 1868,) are valid.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The claim of said patent, namely, "The combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth, or other equivalent absorbent substance, as a new explosive compound," is infringed by an explosive compound known as "rendrock powder," and containing, in 100 parts by weight, 34.71 parts of nitro-glycerine, 52.68 parts of nitrate of potash, 5.84 parts of sulphur and 6.77 parts of woody fibre, charcoal and resin, in nearly equal proportions. Said reissued patent is not for a different invention from the said original patent. The specifications of the original and the reissue examined and compared.

[See note at end of case.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 4 Ban. & A. 263; and here republished by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 173, contains partial report only.]

3. Where a defendant has always been notified that it was claimed he infringed, and has not been misled, by any action of the plaintiff, into making investments, and has no peculiar equity as against the plaintiff, an injunction will not be withheld because the plaintiff, having sued the defendant for infringement, permitted the suit to rest until a recovery was had on the patent in other suits, and then discontinued it and brought a new suit against the defendant.

4. A description in a prior patent, to invalidate a subsequent patent, must show how the article can be certainly made, and its making must be the result of directions in the description, and not of accident.

[In equity. Bill by the Atlantic Giant Powder Company against Jasper R. Rand and others for a preliminary injunction restraining the infringement of reissue No. 5,799, of patent No. 78,317. Injunction granted.]

George Gifford and Causten Browne, for plaintiff.

Edward N. Dickerson and Charles C. Beaman, Jr., for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This is an application for a preliminary injunction, founded on reissued letters patent, No. 5,799, granted to the Giant Powder Company, March 17th, 1874, for 17 years from the 26th of May, 1868. The original patent was granted to Julius Bandmann, as assignee of Alfred Nobel, of Hamburg, Germany, the inventor, as No. 78,317, May 26th, 1868. Bandmann assigned the patent to the Giant Powder Company, and it was reissued to them October 21st, 1873, as No. 5,619. On the surrender of No. 5,619, reissue No. 5,799 was granted. The plaintiff is the owner of No. 5,799 for all the States and territories of the United States which lie east of the easterly boundary lines of the territories of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico. The application for No. 5,799 was filed March 11th, 1874. The specification of No. 5,799 is signed by the Giant Powder Company. It begins by setting forth that Nobel invented "an improved explosive compound, of which the following is a specification." It then proceeds: "This invention relates to a new and useful combination or mixture of nitro-glycerine with some absorbent substance, whereby the condition of the nitro-glycerine is so modified as to render the resulting explosive compound more practically useful and effective as an explosive, and far more safe and convenient for handling, storage, and transportation, than nitro-glycerine in its ordinary condition as a liquid. The invention consists in combining or mixing with nitro-glycerine some porous or absorbent substance, which, being free from any quality which will cause it to decompose, destroy or injure the nitro-glycerine, forms, in combination with it, an explosive compound possessing certain marked properties of great practical utility, which not only increases its efficiency, but also obviates many of the serious practical objections to the employment of nitro-glycerine as an explosive. Some of these peculiar properties of this mixture will be briefly stated. Nitro-glycerine being a liquid, it is usually necessary, in exploding it as an explosive for blasting purposes, to place it in cases or cartridges formed of paper, metal or other substance, which must, of course, be of somewhat smaller diameter than the bore holes, as, if not so inclosed, the nitro-glycerine would permeate the seams of the rock, and prove highly dangerous to the miner, on account of its liability to explode in subsequent drillings; but, by means of this invention the nitro-glycerine, being held in combination with the porous or absorbent substance with which it is mixed, and then assuming the altered form of a powder or paste, remains in the bore hole in which it is placed, without leaking through the seams of the rock. Another advantage over liquid nitro-glycerine is, that this mixture can be made to fill the bore hole more closely than a cartridge case will, owing to the irregularities of the shape of the hole, which greatly increases its efficiency. The liability of fluid nitro-glycerine to accidental explosion from agitation or concussion, renders its handling and transportation very dangerous. This danger is, however, almost entirely obviated by the use of the compound described in this specification, because, when mixed with a suitable absorbent, the nitro-glycerine is far less sensitive to shocks than when in a liquid condition, so that it may be handled in mass, either loose or in packages, with impunity. So much is this the case, that, when this mixture is packed in a wooden case or box, the inclosure may be knocked to pieces without danger of exploding its contents. This invention, then, consists in mixing liquid nitro-glycerine with some solid (as distinguished from liquid or fluid) substance, which will absorb and retain a sufficient amount of nitro-glycerine to form an efficient explosive. The substance which is believed to be best adapted for this purpose, is a kind of silicious earth, found in various parts of the globe, and known by the various names of silicious marl, tripoli and rotten stone. The peculiar variety of this material best suited for this use is homogeneous, has a large specific gravity and great absorbent capacity, and is generally composed of the remains of infusoria. So great is the absorbent capacity of this infusorial earth, that, when in a pulverized condition, it will take up about three times its own weight of liquid nitro-glycerine, and still retain the form of a powder. Other porous substances, even though they have less absorbent capacity, may be used; but, in this case, the explosive strength of the powder will be diminished, owing to the smaller proportion of nitro-glycerine contained therein. Chalk, for example, will absorb about fifteen per cent. of nitro-glycerine and retain its powdered condition; and porous charcoal, although of greater absorbent capacity, has less elasticity of particles, so that nitro-glycerine is apt to squeeze out of it. Any of the various vegetable or mineral substances susceptible of pulverization or comminution, and which will retain nitro-glycerine by absorption, may be substituted for infusorial earth. The relative proportion of the ingredients used in making this new explosive compound will vary according to the absorbent capacity of the substance mixed with the nitro-glycerine, it being preferable in all cases—and this is the only limit—to use so much only of the liquid nitro-glycerine as the absorbent substance will retain without liability to subsequent separation by compression or leakage. Where the absorbent used in a powdered condition is infusorial earth, a thin paste or semi-fluid condition of the mixture is to be avoided. The method of making this new explosive compound with infusorial earth is as follows: The earth being first thoroughly dried and pulverized, is placed in any suitable vessel, and the nitro-glycerine is then gradually introduced and thoroughly mixed with the powdered earth, which is effected either by stirring with the naked hand or by means of any suitable wooden instrument, worked either by machinery or by hand. Where infusorial earth is used, the proportions may be conveniently varied, from sixty parts, by weight, of liquid nitro-glycerine, and forty parts, by weight, of infusorial earth, to seventy-eight parts, by weight, of nitro-glycerine, and twenty-two parts, by weight, of infusorial earth, the former proportions forming, at ordinary temperatures, a dry, pulverulent mass, and the latter a pasty mixture. These proportions may, however, be varied outside of the limits above stated, it being observed, that the explosive force of the mixture is increased where a larger proportion of nitro-glycerine is employed, and that, when the mixture is to be used in a cold climate, a larger quantity of nitro-glycerine may be safely employed than when it is to be exposed to a warmer atmosphere. For ordinary practical purposes, a mixture of seventy-five parts, by weight, of nitro-glycerine, and twenty-five parts, by weight, of infusorial earth, gives a powder sufficiently dry at ordinary temperatures, and which is susceptible of compression to a specific gravity nearly equal to that of pure nitro-glycerine. When the ingredients have been intimately mixed and thoroughly incorporated, by stirring and kneading, the compound may be rubbed through a sieve made of hair, silk or brass wire, and any lumps which remain may be powdered by rubbing them through the sieve with a stiff bristle brush. The powder is then ready for use, and may be packed in bulk in boxes, or compressed into cartridge cases made of paper, of such convenient sizes as may be most in demand for blasting purposes. A greater or less degree of fineness of grain may be given to the powder by using a fine or coarse sieve. In using this improved explosive compound for blasting, it may be inserted into cartridge cases, as above stated, or without any inclosure or wrapping, as may be preferred. For the best effect, it should be pressed firmly down so as to fill the bore hole, whether in cartridge or not, a small quantity at a time, with a wooden rod, until it is firmly packed. If the cartridges are smaller than the bore, the pressure will burst them, and allow the powder to spread laterally and fill the bore. It may be easily and efficiently exploded by means of an ordinary blasting fuse inserted into the open end of a percussion cap, the metallic edges of the cap being compressed or crimped tightly and firmly around the fuse, so as to hold it in place, with the end of the fuse in close contact with the fulminate in the percussion cap. The capped end of the fuse is then inserted into the explosive powder, which is pressed closely around it in the bore hole, and a tamping of sand or other suitable material may be placed above the charge of powder, and pressed down upon it. The fuse thus applied is fired in the ordinary manner, and, when the fire reaches the percussion cap, it explodes, which effects the immediate explosion of the charge of explosive compound. It is better to use a percussion cap having a heavy charge of fulminate, in order to insure an explosion of the powder, although, under favorable circumstances, it might be exploded with an ordinary fuse, without any cap; but this method is too uncertain to be relied upon. For ordinary blasting, the bore holes may be about one-half the size, and the charge of explosive compound about one-fifth the quantity, that would be made use of when gunpowder is used as the explosive." The claim is in these words: "The combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth, or other equivalent absorbent substance, as a new explosive compound."

The infringement complained of is the making and selling by the defendants of an explosive compound known as "rendrock powder," and which, by analysis, contains in one hundred parts, by weight, the following ingredients in the following quantities: nitro-glycerine, 34.71 parts; nitrate of potash, 52.68 parts; sulphur, 5.84 parts; woody fibre, charcoal and resin, in nearly equal proportions, 6.77 parts. Mr. Hayes, the chemist who made such analysis, testifies, that the solid ingredients found in such powder constitute together an absorbent substance which is the equivalent of the infusorial earth mentioned in the plaintiff's patent; that such powder is a combination of nitro-glycerine with such absorbent substance, in substantially the same manner as the combination of nitro-glycerine and infusorial earth specifically mentioned in said patent; that said solid ingredients have the property of absorbing and retaining by absorption nitro-glycerine, and are free from any quality which will cause them to decompose, destroy or injure nitro-glycerine; that the nitro-glycerine is combined with such solid ingredients in such proportions as to be retained without liability to separation by compression or leakage; that such solid ingredients are not liable to explode by concussion, as nitro-glycerine is; that the entire combination constitutes a safety powder, which can undergo the ordinary shocks of transportation and manipulation without explosion; that the nitro-glycerine therein is explosible, in blasting operations, by the means ordinarily employed for exploding nitro-glycerine; that, while the mixture is in the form of a powder, the nitro-glycerine remains so compact and concentrated as to have its original explosive power; that he has been unable to separate the carbonaceous woody fibre and the resin from the charcoal, so as to determine their percentage proportions with accuracy, but that they are not materially different from charcoal, as constituents of the powder; and that they each have all the properties which the other solid ingredients of the powder have, as above described, for the purposes of performing the office of infusorial earth in the mixture. These averments in respect to the rendrock powder are not controverted by the defendants.

The rendrock made by the defendants is a composition of nitro-glycerine with an explosive substance, but it was admitted, on the hearing, by the counsel for the defendants, that the claim of the plaintiff's patent includes a mixture of nitro-glycerine with an explosive substance, as well as a mixture of nitro-glycerine with an inexplosive substance. It is very plain, therefore, that the claim of the plaintiff's patent covers the defendants' powder.

It is insisted, however, by the defendants, that the cause [course] of litigation between the parties, in regard to the rendrock powder and the patent No. 5,799, has been such that the plaintiffs are not now entitled to a preliminary injunction. The view urged is, that the plaintiffs, owning No. 5,799, and also owning a reissued patent No. 4,818, brought a suit in equity in this court on both them, in 1874, against these defendants, for making this rendrock powder; that the plaintiffs took proofs in that suit to show that the rendrock powder, as a mixture of nitro-glycerine with an explosive substance, infringed No. 4,818; that they gave no evidence to show that it infringed No. 5,799; that they subsequently notified the defendants that they need not, until further notice, put in proofs in that case; that they then brought and prosecuted suits on No. 5,799, in another court; and that, having been successful in those suits, they discontinued the first suit against the defendants, and brought the present one on No. 5,799 alone. It is urged that this course of action deprives the plaintiffs of the right to ask, in this suit, for a preliminary injunction. The answer to this contention is, that the defendants appear to have been always notified, by the existence of the first suit against them, and by the suit in Massachusetts against Goodyear, [Case No. 623,] that the plaintiffs claimed that powders like the rendrock powder infringed No. 5,799. There is nothing to show that the defendants were misled into making investments by any action of the plaintiffs, or that they have any peculiar equity, as against the plaintiffs, to be allowed to continue to infringe the patent until a final hearing, while preliminary injunctions are granted against others making like powders.

It is urged by the defendants that the reissued patent No. 5,799 is for a different invention from the original, No. 78,317, and is, therefore, invalid. The specification of No. 78,317 says that the invention is "a new and useful composition of matter, to wit, an explosive powder." It proceeds: "The nature of the invention consists in forming out of two ingredients long known, viz.: the explosive substance, nitro-glycerine, and an inexplosive porous substance hereafter specified, a composition which, without losing the great explosive power of nitro-glycerine, is very much altered as to its explosive and other properties, being far more safe and convenient for transportation, storage and use than nitro-glycerine. In general terms, my invention consists in mixing with nitro-glycerine a substance which possesses a very great absorbent capacity, and which, at the same time, is free from any quality which will decompose, destroy or injure the nitro-glycerine or its explosiveness. It is undoubtedly true, as a general rule, that nitro-glycerine, when mixed with another substance, possesses less concentration of power than when used alone; but, while the safety of the miner, (to prevent leakage into seams in the rock,) prohibits the use of nitro-glycerine without cartridges, which latter must, of course, be somewhat less in diameter than the bore holes which are to contain them, the powder herein described can be made to form a semi-pasty mass, which yields to the slightest pressure, and thus can be made to fill up the bore hole entirely. Practically, therefore, the miner will have as much nitro-glycerine in the same height of bore hole with this powder as with nitro-glycerine in its pure state. This is the real character and purpose of my invention, and, in order to enable others skilled in the art to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, compound and use the same, I will proceed to describe the same, and also the manner and process of making, compounding and using it, in full, clear and exact terms. The substance which most fully meets the requirements above mentioned, so far as I know or have been able to ascertain from numerous experiments, is a certain kind of silicious earth or silicic acid found in various parts of the globe, and known under the several names of silicious marl, tripoli, rotten stone, &c. The particular variety of this material which is best for my compound is homogeneous, has a low specific gravity, great absorbent capacity, and is generally composed of the remains of infusoria. So great is the absorbent capacity of this earth that it will take up about three times its own weight of nitro-glycerine, and still retain its powder form, thus leaving the nitro-glycerine so compact and concentrated as to have very nearly its original explosive power; whereas, if another substance having a less absorbent capacity is used, a correspondingly less proportion of nitro-glycerine will be absorbed, and the powder will be correspondingly weak or wholly inexplosive. For example, most chalk will take but about fifteen per cent. of nitro-glycerine and retain its powder form; twenty per cent. will reduce it to a paste. Porous charcoal has also a considerable absorbent capacity, but it has the defect of being itself a combustible material, and also of less elasticity of its particles, which renders it easy to squeeze out a part of its nitro-glycerine. The two materials are combined in the following manner: The earth, thoroughly dried and pulverized, is placed in a wooden vessel. To it is introduced the nitro-glycerine in a steady stream, so small that the two ingredients can be kept thoroughly mixed. The mixing may be effected by the naked hand, or by any proper wooden instrument used in the hand, or by wooden machinery. Sufficient of nitro-glycerine should be used to render the compound explosive, but not so much as to change its form of powder to a liquid or pasty consistency. Practically, about sixty parts, by weight, of nitro-glycerine to forty of earth forms the useful minimum, and seventy-eight parts, by weight, of nitro-glycerine to twenty-two of earth, the useful maximum of explosive power. The former has a perfectly dry appearance; the latter is pasty. Between these two extremes the composition will be explosive powder, and it will be more easily exploded, and its explosive power greater, as the relative proportion of the nitro-glycerine is greater. The proportions, by weight, of seventy-five of nitro-glycerine to twenty-five of earth gives a powder as well adapted to ordinary practical purposes as that from any proportions I am now able to name, and can be easily compressed to a specific gravity nearly equal to that of pure nitro-glycerine. When the mass has been intimately mixed and thoroughly incorporated by stirring and kneading, it is rubbed through a hair, silk or brass wire sieve, (iron corrodes,) and any lumps which may remain are rubbed with a stiff bristle brush till they are reduced and made to pass the sieve. The powder is then finished and ready for use. The fineness desired for the powder will determine the fineness of the sieve to be used. The chief characteristic of this powder is its nearly perfect exemption from liability to accidental or involuntary explosion. It is far less sensitive than nitro-glycerine to concussion or percussion, and, contained in its usual packing, a wooden cask or box, the latter may be smashed completely to pieces without any danger of explosion. Unlike gunpowder in the open air or in ordinary packing, a wooden cask or box, it burns up, when set fire to, without exploding. It can, therefore, be handled, stored and transported with less danger than ordinary gunpowder. When confined in a tight and strong inclosure, it explodes by heat applied in any form when above the temperature of 360° Fahrenheit. Under all other circumstances, it may be exploded by some other explosion in it or into it. The most simple and certain method known to me of exploding it is as follows: The end of a common blasting fuse is inserted into a percussion cap, and the rim of the cap crimped tightly and firmly about the fuse by nippers or other means, so as to leave the fulminating powder of the cap and the end of the fuse tightly and firmly inclosed together. The end of the fuse with the cap attached is then imbedded in the powder, the more firmly the more certain the explosion. In blasting, the powder is pressed tightly about the cap and fuse, and tamping of sand, or other proper material, added and pressed, but not pounded in. A tamping firmly pressed is as good as if rammed in the most solid manner. The fuse explodes the cap and this explosion explodes the powder. I will here add, that, by carefully packing the end of a good fuse amid the powder of a charge inclosed, like a blasting charge, in a tight place, the fuse alone will explode the powder, especially if the powder is strongly charged with nitro-glycerine; but this method of explosion requires too much care, and is too uncertain, to be depended upon or generally used. As before stated, the more strongly the powder is charged with nitro-glycerine the more easily it explodes. If, therefore, the powder contains a low proportion of nitro-glycerine, it is necessary to employ in its explosion a correspondingly long, strong and heavily charged percussion cap, made especially for the purpose. For the sake of certainty of explosion, it is better to use such a cap in all cases. If the fire from the fuse comes in contact with the powder before the cap is exploded, (which is liable to occur if the fuse is leaky and the cap extends too far into the powder,) a portion of the powder will be burned before the explosion takes place. To guard against this, the cap should only be fairly inserted into the powder, and poor fuses wound next to the cap firmly with strong glued paper or hemp, or otherwise secured. The bore holes, as a practical but not absolute rule, should be about one-half the size, and the charge should be from one-fifth to one-tenth the quantity, ordinarily used in gunpowder blasting. A very convenient form in which to use the powder is to pack it firmly in cartridges of strong paper." The claim is in these words: "The composition of matter made substantially of the ingredients and in the manner and for the purposes set forth."

It is contended by the defendants that the invention set forth in No. 78,317 had for its declared object, the preparing of a solid composition of matter which should contain practically, in a given space, as much nitro-glycerine as could be put into that space in a liquid state, whereby the force of the nitro-glycerine would be preserved, while at the same time the inconvenience of using it as a liquid would be obviated; that No. 78,317 stated that to be the "real character and purpose" of the invention; and that No. 78,317 did not set forth that the inventor had in view, as an object, the safety character of the compound. It is urged that, in these respects, the reissue departs from the original: and that, as the claim in the original was a claim to the invention of a compound made substantially of the ingredients, and in the manner, and for the purposes set forth in the specification of the original, and the reissue claims broadly the combination of nitro-glycerine with infusorial earth, or other equivalent absorbent substance, as a new explosive compound, ignoring the concentration feature as the character and purpose and essence of the invention, the original and the re-issue are for different inventions, and not for the same invention, and so the reissue is invalid.

The specification of No. 78,317 sets out with declaring that the invention is of an explosive powder. This means a powder, as distinguished from a fluid mixture, and a powder which will explode. It states that the composition forming the powder is made of nitro-glycerine and infusorial earth; that nitro-glycerine is explosive, and infusorial earth is inexplosive; that, while the explosive power of nitro-glycerine is preserved in the composition, the composition is more safe and convenient for transportation, storage and use, than nitro-glycerine; that, in general terms, the invention consists in mixing with nitro-glycerine a substance which possesses a very great absorbent capacity, and yet will not injure the nitro-glycerine or its explosiveness; that, generally, the mixture of nitro-glycerine with another substance causes the nitro-glycerine in the mixture to possess less concentration of power than when it is not so mixed; that, while liquid nitro-glycerine must be used in cartridges, which must be less in diameter than the bore hole, this new powder can be made into a semi-pasty mass, and be used without cartridges, and so fill the bore hole entirely; and that thus, by using this new powder, the miner will have, in a bore hole of a given size, practically as much nitro-glycerine, notwithstanding he has in the hole the infusorial earth also, as if he used a cartridge with liquid nitro-glycerine. The specification then says that what has thus been stated is the real character and purpose of the invention. That is, that, by the mixture of the nitro-glycerine with the absorbent substance, the explosive power of the former will be preserved and not injured, while the mixture will be more safe in use than the liquid nitro-glycerine, with the incidental result, that any loss of concentration of power in the nitro-glycerine, by mixing it with the other substance, will be compensated by the fact that the bore hole can be filled with the mixture while it could not be filled with liquid nitro-glycerine, and thus practically there will be the same quantity of nitro-glycerine in a given size of hole in one case as in the other. The specification then states, that the best substance to meet the above requirements is the infusorial earth, because it will take up about three times its own weight of nitro-glycerine, and yet retain its original powder form, so that, in four pounds of the mixture, there will be three pounds of nitro-glycerine, and that the latter will be so concentrated as to have very nearly its original explosive power; that, when a substance of less absorbent capacity than infusorial earth is used, a less proportion of nitro-glycerine will be absorbed, and the explosive power of the powder will be reduced; that, for example, most chalk will take but about 15 per cent. of nitro-glycerine and retain its powder form, while 20 per cent. will reduce it to a paste; and that porous charcoal, while absorbent, is combustible and will suffer what it absorbs to leak out. These remarks show that the inventor contemplated the use, also, of a substance having less absorbent capacity than the infusorial earth, resulting in a mixture with a less proportion of nitro-glycerine, and with a less explosive power than the mixture in which infusorial earth is used; and that the mixture was in all cases to be and remain in the powder form, and to be such as to retain the absorbed nitro-glycerine and not suffer it to leak out. The mode of preparing the mixture with infusorial earth is then set forth. Stress is laid on the requirement that enough nitro-glycerine must be used in the compound to render it explosive, while the earth, in dry powder, is not to have so much nitro-glycerine put with it as to change its form of powder to a liquid or a paste. The useful minimum and the useful maximum of explosive power are then stated, according to given proportional weights of nitro-glycerine to infusorial earth, the minimum compound having a perfectly dry appearance and the maximum compound being pasty. It is then set forth, that, between these two extremes the compound will be explosive powder, and that it will be more easily exploded, and its explosive power be greater, as the relative proportion of the nitro-glycerine in the compound is greater. These observations are to the effect, that the useful maximum of explosive power in the compound is attained when the absorption of nitro-glycerine causes the mixture to cease to have the form of powder; that the useful minimum of explosive power in the compound is what results from the stated proportion of nitro-glycerine; that, although so much as 78 parts by weight of nitro-glycerine to 22 of infusorial earth may be used, and still the compound be just leaving the powder form, yet, even in the use of infusorial earth, a useful result will be given when the nitro-glycerine is 60 parts by weight to 40 of the earth; and that between such maximum and such minimum the compound will be a powder and an explosive powder, with greater explosive power and more easy of explosion as the relative proportion of the nitro-glycerine is greater. The specification then states, that, when infusorial earth is used, the proportion, by weight, of 75 nitro-glycerine to 25 of earth will give a powder, and one as well adapted to ordinary practical purposes as can be specified, and one which can be made to have a specific gravity nearly equal to that of pure nitro-glycerine. Directions are then given how to treat the mixture to make it pulverulent. The specification then sets forth, that the chief characteristic of the powder is its nearly perfect exemption from liability to accidental or involuntary explosion; that it is far less sensitive than nitro-glycerine to concussion or percussion; that, unlike gunpowder, it burns up, when set fire to, without exploding; and that it can, therefore, be handled, stored and transported with less danger than ordinary gunpowder. The safety character of the powder is thus dwelt upon. It will not explode accidentally or involuntarily, because, first, fortuitous concussion or percussion will not be likely to cause it to explode; and, secondly, it will burn, and not explode, when set fire to. The specification then sets forth the proper method of exploding the powder, by exploding a percussion cap in it, with the injunction, that the percussion cap must be longer, stronger and more heavily charged, as the proportion of nitro-glycerine is less in the powder, for the reason, that, the greater the proportion of nitro-glycerine, the more easily will the powder explode. This analysis of the specification of No. 78,317 shows, that, taking the whole of it together, the concentration feature referred to, that is, the preparing of a solid compound which should contain practically, in a given space, as much nitro-glycerine as could be put into that space in a liquid state, was not set forth in that specification as of the essence of the invention; that such concentration feature was set forth as an incident of the use of the proportions of 75 parts of nitro-glycerine, by weight, to 25 of infusorial earth; that a compound of less nitro-glycerine and more earth, which would, of course, not have such concentration feature, was stated to be useful and to be within the invention; that the safety character of the compound was set forth as an object in view, in the invention; and that one feature of such safety character was alleged to consist in the diminished sensitiveness of the compound to accidental explosion from concussion or percussion, as compared with liquid nitro-glycerine. The reissue is, therefore, not open to the objection, that it departs from the original, in the respects mentioned.

The original patent speaks of the substance that is to be mixed with the nitro-glycerine as "an inexplosive, porous substance." The substances it mentions are the silicious or infusorial earth, chalk and porous charcoal. These substances are absolutely inexplosive, whether fire be applied to them or not, and without reference to the fact whether they will burn or not. Nitro-glycerine is liable to explode by accidental concussion or percussion. The proper and usual mode of exploding in it is by designed percussion, that is, exploding something in it or into it. The object desired was to prevent its explosion by accidental percussion, and to ensure its explosion by designed percussion. In that view, and taking the whole of the original specification together, when the absorbent substance is spoken of therein as inexplosive, it clearly means inexplosive by percussion or concussion, as compared with nitro-glycerine. The object was to mix with the nitro-glycerine a substance which, not being liable, like nitro-glycerine, to explode by accidental percussion or concussion, would produce a powder not liable to explode by accidental percussion or concussion. The word "inexplosive" had reference to the explosive nature of nitro-glycerine. If the substance mixed with it acted its part of an absorbent, to make a powder safe from liability to accidental explosion by percussion, and yet a powder the nitro-glycerine in which could be exploded by designed percussion, and could not be injured, in its explosive quality, by such substance, it was, manifestly, entirely immaterial what became of such substance after the nitro-glycerine in the powder had been exploded, whether it did or did not itself burn up, or even though it should itself be caused to explode by the explosion of the nitro-glycerine, and thus perform a useful office, in addition to that of acting as such an absorbent as the specification prescribes. Such is the plain meaning of the language of the original specification.

The questions thus considered were, to some extent, passed upon by Judge Shepley, in his decision in the case of The Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Mowbray, [Case No. 624,] where this same patent was sued on. Objection was there made to the reissue, on the ground that the description of the invention was broader in the reissue than in the original patent. Judge Shepley held that the description of the invention in the original patent appeared to describe all that was more specifically described in the reissue, and stated that a careful comparison of corresponding passages in the original and reissue had failed to satisfy him that the reissue was open to objection on the ground of its being for an invention broader than, or different from, the one described in the original. He added, that he did not think that the omission of the word "inexplosive," in the reissue, rendered the reissue defective, or that the claim in the reissue was any broader than in the original.

The defendants in the Mowbray case made a powder by mixing 52½ pounds of tri-nitro-glycerine with 47½ pounds of mica scales. Judge Shepley held, that, in the compound so made, the mica scales possessed all the properties which rendered the infusorial earth efficient and useful in the compound, as well as some additional valuable properties; and that the mica scales performed the same function, in the compound, that the infusorial earth did, as an absorbent of the nitro-glycerine.

Reissue No. 5,799 came again before Judge Shepley in the case of The Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Goodyear, [Case No. 623,] where the defendant made a powder composed of 32.60 parts of nitro-glycerine, 49.46 of nitrate of soda, 9.63 of charcoal, and 8.31 of sulphur. The nitrate of soda, charcoal and sulphur were in the form of a mealed powder, their proportions being the same as in gunpowder in common use in the granular form. This mealed powder was mixed with the nitro-glycerine. It possessed, in the mixture, as Judge Shepley held, every property claimed for the infusorial earth in the plaintiff's patent, and the powder known as "Vulcan blasting powder," resulting from its combination with the nitro-glycerine, possessed every attribute and property, in a greater or less degree, possessed by the plaintiff's powder. It was set up, in the Goodyear case, as a defence, that the only object of Noble's invention, as patented, was to render nitro-glycerine safer in handling and transportation, without any intent to augment its explosive force, because the substance mixed with the nitro-glycerine was inert; and that the object of the manufacturer of the Vulcan powder was "to render the explosion and combustion of gunpowder instantaneous." But Judge Shepley held, that the substitution of gunpowder, as used in the Vulcan powder, in combination with nitro-glycerine, in the place of the infusorial earth or other absorbent of the plaintiff's patent, did not make the combination a different, and not equivalent, compound, because the gunpowder, when used as an absorbent, in addition to fulfilling every condition, and performing every function, of the absorbent in the plaintiff's compound, up to the time of the explosion, and at that time, had then the additional function of co-operating, by means of its conversion into gas, with the nitro-glycerine, in rending the rock, instead of remaining, like the infusorial earth, an inert substance. In the Goodyear case, it was further contended for the defendant, that, as gunpowder was an explosive of itself, the use of it in the compound was no infringement, because the plaintiff was limited to a non-explosive substance as the absorbent; that, if the omission of the term "inexplosive," in the reissue, enlarged the scope of the invention, the reissue was void; and that, if the reissue was to be construed in connection with the original, and for the same invention, it must be limited to the use of inexplosive absorbents as equivalents. On this subject Judge Shepley said: "The word 'inexplosive' is applied, in the original patent, as a term of description to a substance only preferentially used. The other descriptions in the specification clearly apply to substances which, in one sense, may be explosive, but are inexplosive as compared with nitro-glycerine. The word 'inexplosive' appears clearly to have been used, in the original patent, to describe substances which, as compared with nitro-glycerine, were inexplosive by concussion, which would not, of themselves, explode under those conditions which rendered nitro-glycerine so dangerous and unsafe for practical use, and which, inexplosive of themselves under those conditions, when combined with nitro-glycerine, would make the combination a compound which would also be inexplosive, except under such conditions as were not inconsistent with substantial safety, in its use for blasting and similar purposes. In this sense, the mealed powder used by the defendants is inexplosive. It prevents, by the interposition of its particles, the explosion of the nitro-glycerine by any such concussion as would ordinarily explode it when uncombined with an absorbent. It makes the compound practically inexplosive under ordinary, fortuitous and accidental concussions, and practically explosive only under predetermined and prearranged conditions. The word is omitted in the reissue, and, we think, properly omitted, not for the purpose of including equivalents which were not within the scope of the original invention, as described, but as an ambiguous expression, not consistent with the other words in the specification, which clearly describe the absorbent, its properties and functions, all of which properties and functions, it is evident from a reading of the original patent, might appertain to a substance explosive under some conditions, but inexplosive under those conditions which made nitro-glycerine explosive by concussion, and dangerous and unsafe for practical use. The conclusion, therefore, I think, is a legitimate one, that, under the reissued patent, the owners of the patent are not limited to treat as infringements the use of such equivalents only as are actually inexplosive, but they are entitled to the exclusive use of such equivalents as are inexplosive as compared with nitro-glycerine, and which, while complying with the other requisites of the infusorial earth in the combination, will also, when combined with nitro-glycerine, form, out of the two ingredients, a composition which, without losing the great explosive power of nitro-glycerine, is more safe and convenient for transportation, storage and use than nitro-glycerine."

The first of these cases was a final hearing, the other was a motion for a preliminary injunction. Comity would induce a following of the views of a co-ordinate court on questions so directly raised, considered and decided, especially where the decision was made by so careful and discriminating a judge. Independently of this the observations cited meet the full concurrence of this court.

It is contended, for the defendants, that what is claimed in No. 5,799 is described in a French patent and in an English patent, each previously issued. The French patent was taken out September 18th, 1865, [1863,] by Nobel, for 15 years, and was delivered to him November 5th, 1863. It was for "improvements in the manufacture of mining and shooting powders." The descriptive memoir annexed to the patent is dated, Paris, September 18th, 1863. The French text is not furnished to me. An English translation is furnished in these words: "The invention consists in the employment of explosive or easily decomposable substances, especially of explosive liquids mixed with ordinary powder, gun cotton or other analogous bodies. By this mixture one succeeds in tempering the breaking force of every fulminating substance, so as to heat it, if it is a liquid, to the degree of heat at which it explodes. There are many fulminating bodies that may be used for this purpose, such as nitro-glycerine, the nitrates of ethyle and methyle, &c. I use, by preference, nitro-glycerine, and I prepare it by introducing the glycerine slowly into a mixture of sulphuric acid and nitrate of soda or of potash, after having freed the liquor from the sulphate of soda or of potash, which is formed. This nitro-glycerine, mixed with or absorbed by the ordinary powder, communicates to it the following properties: 1. In appearance, it is dry like ordinary powder; 2. It is much stronger, without producing a more breaking effect; 3. It produces less debris; 4. The explosion is a little slower. If it is only wanted to obtain this last effect, I mix with the powder, or I make it absorb, if it is already prepared, any other fluid, such as oil, &c. With regard to mining powder, it may be mixed with nitro-glycerine until it is wet on the surface. Nitrate of soda may then be used with advantage for the powder, as the nitro-glycerine prevents it absorbing the water. The nitro-glycerine, to explode, must be heated to 170° Centigrade. It is evident, that, besides ordinary powder, there are many mixtures which may determine this heating, but the explosive liquid must always be absorbed by their mass, and equally distributed in it; if not, there will always be breaking effects. Thus it is, that, in a powder formed solely of charcoal and sulphur, the nitro-glycerine will in a manner replace the saltpetre." On the 19th of January, 1864, a certificate of addition to the French patent of September 18th, 1863, was taken out in France by Nobel, and was delivered April 1st, 1864. The descriptive memoir annexed to such certificate of addition is dated Paris, January 19th, 1864. The French text is not furnished to me. Two English translations of it are furnished. One of them is in these words: "The numerous experiments which I have made since my first application have demonstrated to me that I could employ the substances mentioned in my patent of September 18, 1863, (nitro-glycerine and others,) both as powder for war or sporting, and as mining powder, under the following forms: 1. Absorbed in the powder, as described by the first patent, for shooting powder. 2. Mixed with the powder, which they wet more or less. 3. In a cartridge, with or without powder; in the former case, the powder surrounds or environs the cartridge, which may be of wood, zinc or any other material. In mines, and especially in galleries, I make use of cartridges soldered hermetically; and, to avoid smoke, gun cotton replaces the powder. It is, then, the powder or the gun cotton, placed around the cartridge, which pierces its walls and communicates the fire to the interior. 4. Absorbed in charcoal or other porous substances, it is still, as in the preceding cases, the powder or an analogous agent, which determines the explosion. As the nitro-glycerine mixed with the powder is denser than the latter, it is often important to economize it. Wherever less force is wanted for breaking than for raising the rock, and the pressure of the gas is of more consequence than its volume, I close with wood or any other substance a part of the cylindrical hole, to the height filled by the powder, as showu in the annexed sketch. This method may also serve sometimes for ordinary powder. The introduction of hermetical cartridges, hitherto not in use, facilitates the employment, even alone, of the powder with nitrate of soda, being preserved from dampness, whence results a notable economy. I shall observe, in closing, that the proportions of the mixture of the powder with the nitro-glycerine may vary according to the nature of the applications, and that, consequently, nothing can be stated precisely with regard to them." The other translation is in these words: "The numerous experiments which I have made since my first application have demonstrated to me that I could employ the substances mentioned in my patent of September, 18, 1863, (nitro-glycerine and others,) as well for powder for military purposes (or for hunting purposes) as for blasting powder, under the following forms:. 1st. Absorbed in the powder, as the first patent for gunpowder indicates. 2d. Mixed with the powder, which they moisten more or less. 3d. In a cartridge, with or without powder; in the first instance, the powder surrounds or encases the cartridge, which may be of zinc, wood or any other substance. In mines, and especially in galleries, I make use of cartridges hermetically sealed; and, to avoid all smoke, gun cotton replaces the powder. It is, then, the powder or the gun cotton placed around the cartridge, which perforates the walls and communicates the fire to the inside. 4th. Absorbed in charcoal or other porous substances, it is still, as in the preceding cases, the powder, or an analogous agent, which causes the explosion. As nitro-glycerine mixed with powder is more dense than this latter, it is often important to economize it. Where less force is needed to break than to carry away the rock, and where the pressure of the gas is of more importance than its volume, I close with wood or any other substance a part of the cylindrical hole, up to the height of which the powder fills it, as the sketch opposite indicates. This method may also sometimes serve for ordinary powder. The introduction of hermetically sealed cartridges, hitherto unemployed, facilitates the use, even by itself, of powder, being protected from moisture, whence results a noteworthy economy. I will remark, in conclusion, that the proportions of the mixture of the powder with the nitro-glycerine may vary according to the value of the applications, and that, therefore, one cannot be definite in this respect." The English patent was dated September 24th, 1863, and was sealed March 1st, 1864. It was granted to Alfred Vincent Newton for "improvements in the manufacture of gunpowder and powder for blasting purposes," and the invention was "a communication from abroad by Alfred Nobel." The provisional specification, dated September 24th, 1863, declared the nature of the invention to be as follows: "This invention consists in the employment of explosive substances, or of substances easily decomposed, especially of explosive liquids, mixed with ordinary gunpowder, gun cotton, or other analogous substances. By this mixture, the exploding force of every fulminating substance may be tempered or regulated; if it be a liquid, it may be heated to the degree necessary to cause explosion. There are many fulminating substances which may be used for this purpose, such as nitro-glycerine and the nitrates of ethyle and methyle. By preference, nitro-glycerine is used, and is prepared by introducing slowly glycerine into a mixture of sulphuric acid and nitrate of soda or potash, after having removed from the liquid the sulphate of soda or potash which is formed. This nitro-glycerine is to be mixed with or absorbed into the ordinary powder, in such proportion, that the appearance will still be preserved of dry ordinary powder, and it will then be much more powerful without producing a greater explosive effect, it will create less foulness, and the explosion will be somewhat retarded. If this last effect only is desired to be obtained, the powder is mixed with, or made to absorb, when prepared, some other fluid, such as oil, in such quantity as not to destroy its granular character. As regards the blasting powder, it may be mixed with sufficient nitro-glycerine to render it damp at the surface. Nitrate of soda may then be employed with advantage for the powder, as the nitro-glycerine prevents it from absorbing water. The nitro-glycerine, to cause explosion, should be heated to 170° Centigrade. It is evident, that, besides the ordinary powder, there are many mixtures that may determine the degree of heat, but it is always necessary that the explosive liquid should be absorbed by their mass, and equally distributed therein; if not, it will always have a bursting effect. It is thus, that, in powder formed solely of carbon and sulphur, the nitro-glycerine will replace, to some extent, the salpetre." The full specification, dated and filed March 23d, 1864, is in these words: "This invention relates chiefly to the utilization of certain substances known to chemists as organic nitrates or liquid nitrates, which are capable of being easily decomposed into gases, by combining the same with ordinary gunpowder or analogous substances, to produce an improved powder suitable either for ammunition or blasting purposes. By this mixture the exploding force of every fulminating substance may be tempered or regulated; or, if it be a liquid, the heat generated by ignition may be transmitted through the mass at the degree necessary to cause explosion. There are many fulminating substances which may be used for this purpose, such as nitro-glycerine and the nitrates of ethyle and methyle. By preference, nitro-glycerine is used. This substance may be prepared by introducing slowly glycerine into a cool mixture of sulphuric acid and nitric acid, or sulphuric acid and nitrate of soda or potash, the sulphate of soda or potash which is formed being removed from the liquid. This nitro-glycerine is to be mixed with, or absorbed into, ordinary gunpowder, in such proportion that the appearance will still be preserved, of dry ordinary powder, and the mixture will then act most efficiently without producing a greater explosive effect, it will create less foulness, and the explosion will be somewhat retarded. When the retardation only of the explosive action is desired to be obtained, the powder is mixed with, or made to absorb, when prepared, some other fluid, such as oil, in such quantity as not to destroy its granular character. As regards the blasting powder, it may be mixed with sufficient nitro-glycerine to render it damp at the surface. Nitrate of soda may then be advantageously employed, for, as nitro-glycerine is neither hygroscopic nor even soluble in water, it will, by being made to surround the nitrate of soda, effectually prevent that substance from absorbing water. The nitro-glycerine, to cause explosion, should be heated to one hundred and seventy degrees Centigrade. It is evident, that, besides the ordinary powder, there are many mixtures that may determine the degree of heat, but it is always necessary that the explosive liquid should be absorbed by their mass and equally distributed therein; if not, it will always have a bursting effect. It is thus, that, in powder formed solely of carbon and sulphur, the nitro-glycerine will replace, to some extent, the salpetre." The claim is: "Producing explosive mixtures by treating gunpowder or analogous substances in the manner and for the purposes above set forth."

It is quite clear that these French and English patents set forth that nitro-glycerine is to be mixed with gunpowder, and that the resulting compound is to be used, in the shape of a dry powder, for shooting and blasting purposes. The nitro-glycerine is stated to be absorbed by the gunpowder. But, throughout these patents, there is no allusion to the explosion of the compounded powder by the detonation or percussion of the nitro-glycerine in it, or to the explosion of the gunpowder in it by the prior explosion of the nitro-glycerine in it. On the contrary, the suggested method of exploding the compounded powder, is by the ignition, first, of the gunpowder in it and the communication to the nitro-glycerine in it of the heat generated by the burning or exploding gunpowder, so as to cause the explosion of such nitro-glycerine. There is no allusion to the fact, that nitro-glycerine can be exploded by percussion or detonation, or that it ought to be so exploded, or that it is liable to be exploded by accidental concussion, or that it is, therefore, unsafe in being handled or transported, or that it is, when mixed with a suitable absorbent, less sensitive to shocks than when in a liquid condition, or that the proportions of nitro-glycerine and absorbent should be such that the absorbent will retain what it absorbs and not let it leak out, and that there should be sufficient nitro-glycerine to form an efficient explosive when designedly exploded by concussion.[2] These are all distinctively described features, in No. 5,799, of the powder there described, and they are none of them described in the French and English patents as features of the compound of nitro-glycerine and gunpowder there referred to. It was not until July, 1864, that it was suggested, so far as appears, that nitro-glycerine could be practically used by exploding it by detonation. In Nobel's English patent No. 1,813, the provisional specification of which was dated July 20th, 1864, he suggests the explosion of a percussion cap or detonating compound to explode a portion of the nitro-glycerine, and thus heat the rest of the mass to the exploding temperature.

It is equally clear that the rendrock powder of the defendants is not described in the French and English patents referred to, or in any of them. It is composed of nitro-glycerine and an explosive substance analogous to gunpowder, and so far it has a resemblance to the compound produced under the English and French patents referred to, but, in respect of the qualities, before pointed out, which it has in common with the compound patented by No. 5,799, no allusion to those qualities is found in the English and French patents referred to. The powder of the defendants contains enough nitro-glycerine to be exploded designedly by detonation or concussion, and not enough to yield up any by leakage after absorption. It is a safety powder against accidental explosion by concussion, and yet can be exploded by designed concussion at its place of useful service. The English and French patents referred to do not describe any such powder, or give directions whereby any such powder can be certainly made. If any one, seeking to compound a powder under those patents, had compounded a powder possessing the qualities of the powder set forth in No. 5,799, or the qualities of the defendants' powder, so far as the qualities of the latter powder correspond with the qualities of the powder of No. 5,799, the making of such powder would have been a matter of pure accident, and not the result of any directions in the English and French patents, either as to the qualities of the powder or the law of its composition. This leaves the invention in No. 5,799 a patentable invention, within the recognized decisions on the subject. Especially is this so, when it is not shown that any one had, in fact, before Nobel set forth the description in the original patent No. 78,317, made a powder possessing the qualities of the powder of that patent, or a powder possessing the qualities which the defendants' powder has in common with the powder of No. 78,317, by undertaking to follow the directions in the English and French patents referred to. In inventing what he patented in No. 78,317, Nobel did not merely find out a new property in an old compound. He invented a new compound possessing new properties, and pointed out how the new compound could certainly be made so as to possess such new properties.

The defence that No. 78,317 was void because the invention was patented in a foreign country more than six months before the application for No. 78,317 was made in the United States fails in one respect, when it is decided that the French and English patents referred to did not set forth or patent such invention. If the English patent to Nobel, No. 1,345, be regarded as a patent for the same invention found in No. 78,317, and as having been granted more than six months before Nobel's application for No. 78,317, still No. 78,317 was not invalid, because it does not appear that the invention covered by it was introduced into public and common use in the United States prior to the application for No. 78,317. It does not appear satisfactorily that the Howden compound was the compound of No. 78,317 or of No. 5,799, by being prepared under the conditions prescribed in those patents, or by possessing the qualities of the compound of those patents; nor does it appear that the use made of it was an introduction of it into public and common use, in the United States, before April 27th, 1868, the date of the application for No. 78,317. Under these views, the question as to when No. 5,799 will expire is immaterial, in the present case, for it is still in force, even though its duration should hereafter be held to be only 14 years from the date or publication of the English patent No. 1,345.

Another defense is set up. A patent, No. 50,617, was granted to Nobel October 24th, 1865, for "substitute for gunpowder." This patent having been reissued as No. 3,380, April 13th, 1869, was reissued March 19th, 1872, in five divisions, to the United States Blasting Oil Co. One of those divisions is No. 4,818, division D. The defence is, that, if No. 5,799, being the reissue of a patent granted in 1868, claims that which is described in No. 4,818, then No. 5,799 is invalid, because No. 4,818 is the reissue of a patent granted in 1865. The basis of this proposition is, that No. 4,818 describes the invention patented by No. 5,799. No. 4,818 describes a method of promoting the explosion of nitro-glycerine by compounding with it other more easily explosive substances. The specification of No. 4,818 says: "There is a class of explosives long known, but not at the date of Nobel's invention applied to technical purposes, in consequence of practical difficulties in procuring their explosion. Such substances are nitro-glycerine, the nitrates of ethyle and of methyle and nitromanite. These substances are liquid at ordinary temperatures, and by that characteristic are distinguishable from solid explosives, such as gunpowder, gun cotton, &c.; and they have also the property that fire may be applied to them without their exploding. Nitro-glycerine, for example, if ignited in an open space, is slowly decomposed and takes fire, but the flame is apt to die out when the match is withdrawn. Hence, it cannot, under ordinary circumstances, be looked upon as a ready explosive agent, for, while gunpowder and other substances used as explosives prior to Nobel's invention always explode or deflagrate throughout their whole mass, when fire is set to them, nitro-glycerine and the analogous substances before named will not explode from the mere contact of flame. So, also, if a drop of nitro-glycerine be poured on an anvil, the blow of a hammer causes it to explode, but only that part is involved which has received the blow, so that, in this case, the explosion is merely a local one. A principal object of Nobel's invention consists in the removal of this obstacle to the use of nitro-glycerine and the analogous substances before named as explosives." The specification then states, that Nobel discovered that the difficulty referred to could be overcome by mixing or combining the nitro-glycerine and the other liquid substances with gunpowder, gun cotton or other similar substances, in proportions which "may be varied to suit the pleasure or convenience of the user or manufacturer." It says: "The nitro-glycerine may be mixed with gunpowder or gun cotton, either of which will absorb a considerable quantity of nitro-glycerine, say, thirty per cent., more or less, in such proportions as to make the compound either wet or comparatively dry. If mixed with gunpowder, it may be either absorbed with it, by pouring the nitro-glycerine on the mass of gunpowder, or the two may be mingled together by trituration. the powder in the nitro-glycerine. The effect of these combinations will produce an explosive especially suitable for certain blasting purposes, for example, in crevice rock, and greatly superior either to gunpowder or gun cotton in explosive force, and quite readily exploded, so that it may be fired and exploded by means of a match or electric spark, in like manner as gunpowder or gun cotton alone. By means of this combination with gunpowder, gun cotton, or other similar readily explosive substances, of nitro-glycerine and the analogous substances before named, which are liquid at the ordinary temperature, these substances, which had not, at the date of Nobel's invention, been applied to any technical use as explosives, owing to their difficulty of explosion, have been introduced from the domain of science into that of practical use in the arts, and have rendered of commercial value what was previously known as a mere chemical curiosity." The claims of No. 4,818 are in these words: "1. The utilization, as explosives, of nitro-glycerine, and the analogous liquid substances hereinbefore mentioned, by combining therewith gunpowder, gun cotton, or other similar substances developing a rapid heat on combustion, substantially as hereinbefore described. 2. The combination of gunpowder with nitro-glycerine, substantially as and for the purposes hereinbefore described. 3. The combination of gun cotton with nitro-glycerine, substantially as and for the purposes hereinbefore described." The construction hereinbefore given to No. 5,799 shows, that neither the invention covered by it, nor the defendants' powder, is described in No. 4,818. The description in No. 4,818 only describes nitro-glycerine absorbed by gunpowder, so as to enable the nitro-glycerine to be exploded by igniting the gunpowder; and there is no hint in No. 4,818 of making a compound with a safety property of non-explosion by ordinary concussion, and with the ingredients existing in the proportions necessary to attain the result of certain explosion of the nitro-glycerine by designed detonation or percussion, and of freedom from liability to explosion by accidental concussion. This I understand to have been the view taken of No. 4,818 by Judge Shepley, on the hearing in the Goodyear case, No. 4,818 having been called to his notice in that case.

All the views urged on the part of the defendants have been carefully considered. The plaintiff's patent has been sustained by Judge Shepley, on final hearing, in the Mowbray case, and on a motion for a preliminary injunction, in the Goodyear case, and, in the latter case, against a compound to all intents like that made and sold by the defendants in this case, and nothing is now shown to justify a denial of the injunction now asked for. It is, therefore, granted.

SHIPPING — RESPONDENTIA — AFTER COMMENCEMENT OF VOYAGE—USURY—CONTRACTS RELATING TO SAME SUBJECT-MATTER—PRE-EXISTING DEBT —EVIDENCE.

1. A respondentia bond, given to secure a loan made upon a certain voyage, is not void because it was given and the loan made after the vessel had sailed. The principles of law relative to this subject fully examined.

[Cited in Greeley v. Smith, Case No. 5,750.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Where the voyage described in the respondentia bond, and the real voyage are or are not the same.

3. Where the loan is or is not chargeable with being usurious.

4. The words "lost or not lost" omitted in the respondentia bond may be supplied by other equivalent expressions, so as to place the money loaned at the risk of the lender.

5. A loan on respondentia "upon the goods, to the amount of the loan, laden or to be laden on board the vessel, or which may be laden on board at any time during the voyage." Those words give to the lender a lien, and no more, on the homeward cargo, which cannot be opposed to the claim of preference of the United States, upon the estate of the borrower.

[See note at end of case.]

6. The respondentia bond, memorandum indorsed on it, and the outward bill of lading and assignment thereon, are all to be construed as one instrument for the purpose of discovering the intention of the parties, which when discovered must govern.

[See note at end of case.]

[As to the construction of different instruments relating to the same subject-matter, see Rutland & B. Ry. Co. v. Crocker, 29 Vt. 541; Gregory v. Marks, Case No. 5,802; Livingston v. Story, 11 Pet. (36 U. S.) 386; Lamb v. Davenport, Case No. 8,015.]

7. The agreement so obtained from the construction of this instrument being that the outward and homeward cargoes should be a collateral security for the loan; that the outward bill of lading should be assigned to the lender for that purpose; and that the homeward should be to order, with a blank indorsement, vested in the lender an equitable interest which could not be defeated by the subsequent right of preference of the United States.

[See note at end of case.]

8. A right of one person to a chattel, and possession in another under a contract which does not entitle the former to the present possession, is no badge of fraud.

[See note at end of case.]

9. The delivery to the lender of money on respondentia of the homeward bill of lading, after the arrival of the vessel, was equivalent to a direct consignment to him, and converted his equitable into a legal interest.

[See note at end of case.]

10. A respondentia bond given on a cargo at the risk of the lender, to secure a pre-existing debt, is valid.

[See note at end of case.]

11. No fraud practiced by the borrower or his agents, not participated in by the lender, can affect the validity of the respondentia bond.

12. A letter from one of the general assignees of the borrower to the captain of his vessel, respecting the manifest of the homeward cargo, cannot be given in evidence against the plaintiff, the lender of the money on respondentia.

13. Where, in a suit by an incorporate body, proof of their incorporation may be dispensed with.

14. Questions asked of the witness by the defendant's counsel, and pronounced to be improper, as they related to the acts of the borrower and his agent, being proved to have been without the participation of the plaintiff the lender.

15. The court would not admit in evidence the correspondence between one of the obligors in the respondentia bond, and one of the directors of the insurance company, the plaintiff in the suit, and with the borrower, impeaching the respondentia bond.

[At law. Action of trespass by the Atlantic Insurance Company of New York against John Conard] the marshal of this district, for seizing certain teas imported into Philadelphia by Edward Thomson, in the ships Addison and Superior, under an execution at the suit of the United States against said Thomson; to which teas, the plaintiffs asserted a property in themselves. Under an arrangement made between the secretary of the treasury and the plaintiffs, these teas were given up to the plaintiffs, upon their giving bond and security to restore the same, in case the question as to the right of property in those teas should be decided against the plaintiffs in this action. This bond was accordingly executed under the corporate seal of the plaintiffs, and was accepted by the district attorney, and delivered over by him to the proper officer of the government. The following are the material facts attending this case: Edward Thomson of Philadelphia, being the owner of the ships, the Addison and Superior, despatched them on a voyage to Canton in the year 1825. The former sailed from Philadelphia on the 22d of April, and the latter, on the 6th of June of that year. The outward bill of lading of the Addison bears date the 21st of April 1825, and is for seven kegs containing three thousand Spanish dollars each, shipped by said Thomson for his account and risk, to be delivered at Canton to Mr. J. R. Thomson or assigns. The bill of lading of the Superior's outward cargo bears date the 6th of June 1825, and was for about thirteen thousand Spanish dollars shipped by said Thomson for his account and risk, to be delivered at Canton to J. R. Thomson. On the 21st of June 1825, the plaintiffs lent to E. Thomson the sum of $21,000 upon respondentia on the cargo of the Addison. They also lent to him $13,000, on the cargo of the Superior, on the 14th of July 1825. To avoid the necessity of further noticing the transaction in relation to this latter loan, it may be sufficient here to observe, that the only difference in the two transactions is, that the first loan was on specie on board of the Addison at the time she sailed, and the latter loan was in part payment of a former loan made by the plaintiffs to E. Thomson on another of his ships.

The respondentia bond on the cargo of the Addison, to secure the loan of the $21,000, bears date the 21st of June, and is in the names of Edward Thomson and three others. After reciting in the condition of this bond a loan this day made by the Atlantic Insurance Company to Edward Thomson of $21,000, upon the goods and specie to that amount laden, or to be laden, on board the Addison, or which may be laden on board at any time during the voyage on account of the said Edward Thomson; that the said intended voyage is to Canton, and back to Philadelphia; and that the plaintiffs take the hazard and adventure of the said sum so lent on said goods and specie, laden or to be laden on board the said vessel during the said voyage, so that it do not exceed twelve months from the 21st of April 1825: the condition is, that if the said ship, laden with said goods and specie, do, with all convenient speed, proceed on the said voyage and return to Philadelphia, having on board the above stipulated amount in value in specie or goods on the respective passages out and home, to end her voyage there by the end of the said twelve months, dangers of the seas excepted; and if the said obligors shall pay to the plaintiffs the said $21,000 immediately upon her arrival at Philadelphia, or upon the expiration of the said twelve months, together with the marine interest, amounting to $2205: or if the said obligors do, immediately on her said return, provided it happen within the said twelve months, give satisfactory security to pay to the plaintiffs the said principal sum and marine interest within three months from the time of said arrival, with lawful interest thereon from the time of such arrival, and shall pay the same accordingly at the end of the said three months; or if in the said voyage, and before the end of the said twelve months, the said goods, &c. shall be totally lost, and the obligors shall abandon, &c. to the plaintiffs, all said goods of said obligors so laden at Philadelphia, on board said ship, and all other goods which shall be acquired during said voyage by reason of, or from, the proceeds of the said goods, &c. and the net proceeds thereof, and account for and pay within four months from such loss, to the plaintiffs, any average they may obtain upon the same: then, &c. &c. Upon this bond is indorsed a memorandum, which recites the following agreement, viz. that the bills of lading for the goods, specie, &c. mentioned in the within bond, shall be indorsed to the plaintiffs as a collateral security for the within loan; that the property to be shipped homeward, as aforesaid, being the proceeds of the said loan, shall be for the account and risk of the borrowers, or some of them; and that the bills of lading therefor shall express the same, and shall also express that the said property shall be delivered to the order of the shippers; and that the same shall be indorsed in blank, and shall be placed in the hands of the plaintiffs, either before or on the arrival of the said ship at Philadelphia, to be held by them as a continuation of such collateral security; to the true performance of which agreement the parties bind themselves. The memorandum then proceeds: "now it is hereby declared, that such indorsement or consignment shall not exonerate the persons of the obligors, nor compel the plaintiffs to accept the goods, &c. which may arrive under such bill of lading and consignment, in discharge of said debt, but it shall be lawful for the plaintiffs to receive and hold said goods, &c. for ninety days after their arrival at Philadelphia, and if the principal debt, interest, and premium in said bond mentioned, be not paid within said time, to sell the same at public auction, and to charge the obligors with the balance, after deducting freight, duties, commissions, and other charges." The above memorandum is signed by all the obligors.

On the same day an assignment was indorsed on the outward bill of lading, to the following effect, viz. "For value received, I do assign to the Atlantic Company the within bill of lading, and the specie, goods, &c. to be procured thereon or thereby, and any return cargo to be obtained by the within mentioned outward cargo and specie, or the proceeds thereof, and all the return cargo to be taken on board the within mentioned ship, by or for my account, as collateral security, according to an agreement executed and adjoined to a respondentia bond given by myself and, &c. (mentioning the names of the other obligors) dated the 21st of June 1825, for $21,000." Signed by E. Thomson. It was proved that the above sum of $21,000 was paid in two checks to F. H. Nicoll & Co. the said Nicoll being one of the obligors in the above respondentia bond. On the 29th of November 1825, E. Thomson became insolvent; and, on that day, made a general assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors, to Peter Mackie and Ruland Renshaw. The Addison left Canton in November 1825, with a bill of lading of the proceeds of the $21,000 consigned by Fisher, attorney for J. R. Thomson, to be delivered to —— or assigns. This bill of lading is indorsed in blank. The homeward invoice is of goods shipped by Fisher, attorney as aforesaid, on board the Addison, for Philadelphia, for account and risk of E. Thomson, and consigned to order, and indorsed blank by Fisher, attorney as aforesaid. Both of those papers bear date the 22d of November 1825. It also appeared, that Fisher delivered to the master of this vessel a manifest, stating the cargo to be consigned to E. Thomson.

The Superior brought a bill of lading of goods valued at $3393, consigned to Peter Mackie, and another, of goods valued at $1139, consigned to B. Arney. Before the arrival of these vessels at Philadelphia, the United States obtained judgment against E. Thomson, on certain custom house bonds, and on their arrival in Delaware Bay, an execution issued on the said judgment on the 13th of March 1826, and was levied on the cargoes of said vessels on the 15th of the same month. A day or two before the ships came up to Philadelphia, Mackie, one of the assignees of E. Thomson, delivered duplicates of the homeward invoice and bills of lading of the Addison's cargo to the plaintiffs' agent in Philadelphia, and, on her arrival, handed to him likewise those brought by the captain; and on the 22d of March, Mackie and Arney indorsed to the plaintiffs those which came to their order by the Superior. The reason assigned for there being a manifest and general bill of lading consigning the cargo to Thomson, was to enable him to enter it in his own name; after he had settled with the insurance offices, and paid the loans made by them.

For the plaintiffs it was contended, that the loan on the Addison was the common case of money lent on respondentia, and an assignment of the bill of lading as collateral security; that the cargo was thereby pledged for the repayment of the principal, with marine interest; that the goods being at sea, and not actually deliverable, this assignment passed the title so as to give a specific lien; that their right was therefore good against any but a bona fide purchaser without notice; but that the United States did not thus claim; but merely as a preferred creditor, having no lien, but only a right to be paid first out of property of Thomson's, at the time of his general assignment; but as he could not have claimed this property without first paying off the incumbrance, neither could the United States. That as to the loan on the Superior, the fact of its being applied in payment of a former loan, made no difference.

For the United States, it was admitted that they gained no lien by Thompson's insolvency; they only claimed under the priority given by law; which vests, they contended, in all cases except where there was sale to a bona fide purchaser, mortgage, or execution executed. That neither of the two first was pretended by plaintiffs, and the third the United States had themselves. That the question was, whether, when the public priority attached, the property belonged to the plaintiffs. That it did not, was argued: 1. Because these were not valid respondentia bonds; and therefore gambling contracts, and void by the laws of New York: for these loans not being made till after the ships had sailed, the money could not be applied to the purposes of the voyage. Nor was it proved that Nicoll & Co. received the moneys for Thompson, and therefore the consideration failed. 2. That the contract was not bottomed on any real adventure; that the voyage and risk must be the same described in the bond; which was not the case here, for the bond refers to an intended voyage; whereas, the ship had already sailed, and no part of the cargo belonged to Nicoll and others, though they were mentioned in the bond. Besides, the return cargo is mentioned as the proceeds of the loan, which was impossible, the vessel having sailed two months before the money was lent. 3. That marine interest was charged without marine risk: for that there was no risk at Philadelphia, as stated, the vessel having previously left that port; and moreover, interest was charged from the date of the bill of lading, several weeks before the lending of the money; which was clearly usurious. 4. That only a lien was created but there was no transfer of the property, and the public priority dislodges every lien not connected with the right of property. 5. That, at least, the plaintiffs gained no title to the return cargo, because it could not possibly be the proceeds of the loan, according to the terms of the assignment. 6. That the cargo left Canton the property of Thomson, and that Mackie had no authority to transfer it, he being but a trustee for creditors; and lastly, that Thompson being the owner of the property when it arrived here, the sixty-second section of the revenue laws avoids all transfers before entry; and the right of the United States attaches.

It was said, in reply, that this right of the government was only a priority of payment out of the debtor's estate. That if the property be out of the debtor, absolutely or conditionally, the priority is subject even to the conditional property in another. That the loans in this case were to be repaid on an event which has happened, and there was a lien and property in the goods, to secure repayment. That the fact of the loan was sufficiently proved; for, as Nicoll & Co. must have had Thomson's bond, to deliver to the company, that alone was sufficient authority to receive the money as his agents. That the bond itself, or taken together with the agreement, assignment, and delivery of the bill of lading, gave a lien and property; and that, as to the impossibility objected, of the goods homeward being the proceeds of the loan, the plain meaning of all the documents taken together, was to give a lien on the goods shipped by Thomson, and on the goods homeward, being the proceeds of the outward cargo; and that the delivery of the homeward bill by Mackie was the performance of this agreement. It was added, that no authority had been adduced to show that a loan on respondentia, after the voyage was begun, was void. That the risk was a real one, and that the voyage performed was, clearly, the one intended to be described in the bond. That the description of the risk as beginning at Philadelphia, was usual in all policies; and that, as the principal was at risk, this was no gambling contract. That the consignment to Thompson was correct; he was the general owner or importer; and that even if any fraud were thus intended on the revenue, the plaintiffs were ignorant of, and ought not to be affected by, it.

Hopkinson & Binney for plaintiffs.

The Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Wirt, Dist. Atty., C. J. Ingersoll, and Mr. Randall, for defendant.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charging jury. The single question to be decided is, had the plaintiffs such a property in the goods in question on the 19th of November, 1825, when Edward Thomson made a general assignment of all his effects for the benefit of his creditors, as protected the goods on which the execution, at the suit of the United States, was levied, against the preference of the United States which accrued on that day? If they had, they will be entitled to your verdict; otherwise, not. The plaintiffs' title to this property commences with the respondentia bonds on the cargoes of the Addison and Superior, which have been laid before the court and jury. The claim of the plaintiffs, resting entirely upon the validity of those bonds, and the papers connected with them; their validity has been denied by the defendant's counsel on the following grounds:

1. Because they were given for money lent by the plaintiffs after the ships had sailed; of course the money was not lent for the purpose of enabling the borrower to make the voyage, nor was the money lent ever at risk, not having been put on board in specie, nor a cargo which it contributed to procure. It is insisted, that this security, when given for a loan after the vessel has sailed, and the risk has begun, is inconsistent with the nature, character, and design of this species of security. Let it be admitted, for the sake of the argument, that, strictly and correctly speaking, a loan upon the security of a cargo already at sea, is not a loan upon respondentia; and that the design of those securities in their origin, was to enable the borrower to engage in the contemplated enterprise. It may further be admitted, that loans like the present are unlike the pecunia trajectitia of the Romans; from whom it is quite likely this species of security was derived. But how does it follow from these concessions that the security is invalid as a marine contract, in cases where the vessel has sailed before the loan is made? There is no case, nor is there even the dictum of any respectable jurist, to my knowledge, which pronounces it to be so. Marshall, in his second volume on Insurance, page 747, states it to be a question upon which Valin and Emerigon had differed, whether money may be lent on a ship or goods already exposed to the perils of the sea; and this learned writer expresses his own opinion to coincide with that of Valin, who holds the affirmative of the proposition. And even Emerigon does not allude to this subject in reference to any general principle of maritime law; but speaks of the lien created by a respondentia bond, under those circumstances, according to certain articles of the ordinances of France. 1 Emerig. 136, 137, 157. Marshall, (volume 2, p. 738,) states what are the essential requisites of this species of marine contract, be its form what it may. It must contain, he observes, 1. The names of the lender and borrower. 2. The names of the ship and master. 3. The sum lent, and the marine interest. 4. The voyage proposed, and duration of the risk. And lastly, the subject on which the loan is made, whether goods or both.

If it could be made out that the contract is usurious or gambling, where the sailing of the vessel precedes the loan, there might then be weight in the objection; but there is no case, nor is there any writer, who has attempted to maintain this proposition. "It is," says Marshall, (volume 2, p. 742,) "of the essence of this contract, that the money lent, or something equivalent to it, be exposed to the perils of the sea, at the risk of the lender." "If the borrower have no effects on board, or he borrow much beyond their value, and agree to pay high marine interest, this affords a strong ground to suspect fraud, and that the voyage will have an unfavorable end." The true test of its being a gambling contract is, there being no goods on board to the value of the loan, and at the risk of the lender; as fully appears by the French ordinances, and by the English statute of 19 Geo. II. c. 37, to prevent gambling marine contracts. 2. Marsh. 743. These quotations are sufficient to show what is, and what is not a gambling marine contract. Is the loan usurious, if it be made subsequent to the sailing of the vessel? "The marine interest," says Marshall, (2 Marsh. 749,) "however high it may seem, cannot be deemed usurious if the money lent be bona fide at risk." "If indeed the form of a bottomry or respondentia loan to be used as a cloak to an usurious contract; that, no doubt, would be usurious and void." The same principle governs contracts made on land, and without reference to maritime enterprises; as is abundantly shown by the cases of Roberts v. Trenayne, Cro. Jac. 507, and Chesterfield v. Janssen, 1 Atk. 301. If then this contract stands clear of the objection of fraud, gambling, or usury, upon what other ground can it be avoided? Is it contrary to good policy? This has not been shown in argument, nor is it maintained by any elementary writer. If the lender need not see to the application of the money lent, which it is admitted by all he is not bound to do; what difference can there be in sound reason between a loan made after the departure of the vessel and one made before; when, in the latter case, the borrower is at liberty to dispose of the money borrowed in payment of his debts, or in any other way he may think proper, without having employed one cent of it in the purchase of the cargo, on which the loan is made? The truth is, that in many instances, a loan made after the risk has commenced, and on the anticipated capacity which it will give to the borrower to pay for the cargo at risk, and purchased on credit, may be as beneficial to commerce, as if, in the strictest sense of the Roman law, it were pecunia trajectitia; as if the identical money lent, or goods purchased with it, had been put on board, and at the risk of the lender.

2. This contract is asserted to be invalid, because it is not founded on a real transaction; not on the precise voyage and cargo mentioned in it. The voyage described is at and from Philadelphia to Canton, and back to Philadelphia; and she is "to proceed and sail on said voyage;" which expressions plainly describe as well a voyage in progress as one which had not then commenced. There is no expression in the instrument which represents the vessel to be then in port, or that the voyage was to commence on or after the 21st of June. The voyage described then, and the real voyage were the same. As to the cargo, the loan is made on the goods laden, or to be laden, or which at any time during the voyage might be laden. It is in vain to contend that these expressions do not accurately describe the property mentioned in the outward bill of lading, as well as the proceeds of it in the homeward bill of lading.

3. The charge of usury is reiterated against this contract, because the marine interest, it is said, is allowed upon the loan from the sailing of the vessel, and consequently for about two months before any real risk was assumed by the lenders. The cargo was known to be safe at the time of the departure of the vessel. It is true, the property was not at the risk of the lenders until this contract was entered into. But the effect of it was to place it in that predicament, by an express stipulation, whilst the vessel was at Philadelphia, and from the instant of her departure. What influence her known safety at these periods had in diminishing the marine interest can only be conjectured; but it is certainly no objection to the contract, upon the ground of usury, that the property was known to be in safety at any particular period of the assumed risk by the lender. The real question for the decision of the jury is, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the loan was bottomed upon a fair marine contract, the repayment of which was to depend upon the perils which the lender assumed to bear; or whether the contract was merely a device to cover an usurious loan? If the risk be inconsiderable, and for a small part only of the voyage, and the interest be high, these circumstances may justify a presumption of unfair or illegal conduct, sufficient to avoid the contract. But the mere circumstance of the known safety of the cargo at any particular period of the voyage, or of the assumed risk, is not, per se, an objection to the contract on the ground of usury.

If Edward Thomson was to pay interest from a period antecedent to the loan, and this was the sum covered by the respondentia, there can be no question but that the contract was usurious; and it would be so, although the legal rate of interest only be reserved. How the fact is in relation to this point I know not, but leave it for the decision of the jury upon the evidence which has been laid before them. Some papers and parol evidence upon this part of the case were laid before the jury, from which they will draw their own conclusions. I allude to the papers annexed to Mr. Gracie's affidavit. Another reason assigned by the defendant's counsel why this loan was not at the risk of the lender during the whole voyage is, that the words "lost or not lost" not being inserted in the bond, if the vessel had been actually lost at the time this contract was entered into, the loss would not have been at the risk of the plaintiffs. The answer given to this position by the plaintiffs' counsel is conclusive. The words in the bond "if in the said voyage there be loss" are precisely equivalent to the expressions "lost or not lost" in ordinary policies of insurance. If this contract has been relieved from the objections which have been urged against its validity, the next inquiry is, what title to the property in question did it confer upon the plaintiffs?

There is no doubt that it gave a lien on the homeward cargo, being the produce of that on which the loan was made, but it conferred no other right. The loan is stipulated by the bond to be made upon the goods to the amount of the loan, laden, or to be laden on board the vessel, or which may be laden on board at any time during the voyage, on account of Edward Thomson. These latter expressions, which were not inserted in the bond in the case of U. S. v. Delaware Ins. Co., decided by this court, October, 1823, [Case No. 14,942,] operate to the extent mentioned. And if this case turned solely upon the right of the plaintiffs to a lien, it would present the question whether such a right could be opposed to the right of preference vested by law in the United States, which would seem to be decided by the case of Thelusson v. Smith, [2 Wheat. (15 U. S.) 396.] Our inquiries, therefore, must be extended to the memorandum and outward bill of lading, and the indorsement thereon; to see whether they apply to, and include the homeward cargo, and if they do, what influence they have on the plaintiffs' rights. There is no doubt but that those instruments, together with the respondentia bond, are to be construed and treated as if they all constituted one instrument. Considering them then in this light, the question is, whether they cover that part of the homeward cargo which was the investment of the outward cargo on which the loan was secured. The difficulty in solving the question arises from the expressions in the memorandum, "being the proceeds of the said loan." Now, the argument is, that since the loan was made after the departure of the vessel, the return cargo was not, and could not possibly be the proceeds of that loan; and consequently the memorandum could vest in the plaintiffs no right of any kind to the homeward cargo.

I must acknowledge that I was at first much struck by this objection. But it loses much, if not the whole of its weight, when those words in the memorandum are construed in connection with other parts of the same instrument, as well as with the other instruments of which it is only a part. Our object should be to discover from those papers what was the intention of the parties, and when this is accomplished, we must give effect to it. If there be an incongruity in one part of an instrument, it may be explained by others, so as to enable the court to give a consistent construction of the whole. Now, it appears by the condition of the bond that the loan was made on the 21st of June, after the Addison had sailed, and that it was made on the goods and specie laden, or to be laden, then or at any time during the voyage. The outward bill of lading, referred to in the memorandum, which was agreed to be indorsed to the plaintiffs as a collateral security for the loan, bears date the 21st of April, two months prior to the loan, and the assignment indorsed on that paper is of the bill itself, and of the specie, goods, &c. to be procured thereon or thereby, and any return cargo to be obtained by the outward cargo and specie mentioned therein, or the proceeds thereof; and all the return cargo to be taken on board the said ship, by or for the account of Edward Thomson, as collateral security, according to an agreement duly executed and adjoined to a respondentia bond, given, &c. Now there is no ambiguity in this assignment, which most clearly refers to a homeward cargo, the proceeds, not, as in the memorandum, of the loan, but of the outward cargo mentioned in the bill of lading. Since then, the homeward cargo might be the proceeds of the outward cargo, and could not possibly be so of the loan, those expressions in the memorandum ought to be construed to mean "the proceeds of the outward cargo on which the loan was made," in order to give effect to the obvious intention of the parties, and ut res magis valeat quam pereat. This difficulty being removed, the next question is, what was the nature and effect of the contract between the plaintiffs and Thomson, upon the above instruments taken together? The obvious answer is, that the bond, as has been before stated, created a lien on the homeward cargo and no more. But the memorandum and assignment on the bill of lading amount to an agreement. 1. That the outward and homeward cargoes should be a collateral security for the loan. 2. That the outward bill of lading should be assigned to the plaintiffs for that purpose. And lastly, that the homeward bills of lading should be to order, with blank indorsements, and should be delivered to the plaintiffs as a security for the loan. The legal operation of this agreement was unquestionably to vest in the plaintiffs, an equitable title to the property in question, being the proceeds of the outward cargo. Edward Thomson, for whose account, and at whose risk the homeward cargo was to be shipped, and who had the sole management and possession of the property, was, for this purpose, a trustee for the plaintiffs; and nothing remained to be done, in order to vest in the plaintiffs the legal right to this property, but the delivery of the homeward bills of lading to order with a blank indorsement thereon. This delivery took place upon the return of those vessels, which perfected the plaintiffs' title to the property But it is contended that there was no consideration given for this security, the debt for which it was given being merely contingent. But surely $21,000, which were paid to Edward Thomson, must be considered as a very substantial consideration; and although the repayment was to depend upon a contingency, no sufficient reason has been assigned, why a valid security may not be legally taken for a contingent debt.

What then were the relative rights of the plaintiffs and of the United States, on the 19th of November, 1825, when the right of preference accrued to the latter by the insolvency of Edward Thomson? The answer is, that the former had an equitable title to the homeward cargo, and a right, by their agreement with Thomson, to call upon him for the legal interest, by delivering to them the bills of lading of that cargo. If this delivery had actually been made before the above period, as happened in the case of U. S. v. Delaware Ins. Co., [Case No. 14,942,] no question, as I apprehend, could exist, as to the superior title of the plaintiffs over the right of preference of the United States, upon the principles decided in the case of Thelusson v. Smith, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 396. But do not the principles of that case apply as well to one where the equitable title has been parted with by the insolvent, as where the legal title has been? The right of property, was, by the agreement, divested out of Thomson, and vested in the plaintiffs, so as to leave the former a bare trustee to deliver over the evidences of the legal title to the latter. The great principle laid down in the case above referred to is, that the privilege of the United States to be first paid their debt is confined to a satisfaction out of the property of the insolvent. But surely it cannot be said that a trustee has any property in the subject matter of his trust. Equity considers the cestui que trust as the exclusive owner of the property. In this, as well as in some other respects, this case differs from that of U. S. v. Delaware Ins. Co., [supra.] In that, the legal title was in the lender before the insolvency of the debtor of the United States. In this, the equitable title only had been parted with. In that, the actual possession of the master was constructively the possession of the lender upon respondentia; in this, the possession was in Edward Thomson, but there it was the possession of a trustee, and a sale of the property by him to a third person without notice would have prevailed against the title of the plaintiffs. But in this, the delivery of the homeward bills of lading to the plaintiffs in pursuance of the agreement, no matter by whom, perfected their legal title. No creditor whatever, intervening before the agreement was specifically executed, can prevail against the plaintiffs.

It was asked by the defendant's counsel, how it was possible that an absolute right of property could co-exist in two persons? To which I feel no hesitation in answering, that it cannot, if the right of both be of the same nature. But an absolute legal right of property may exist in one person, and an absolute equitable right in another, at the same time; and the possession need be only in the trustee or legal owner. Again, it has been insisted, that where the property is in one person the possession being permitted to remain with another, is a fraud as well in respect to creditors as to purchasers. I admit the rule, that an absolute transfer of a chattel is fraudulent against creditors, unless possession accompanies and follows the deed. The reason is, that the separation of the possession from the title is incompatible with such a transfer. But if the sale or transfer is on a condition, or on trust as a security for a debt, or for any purpose which does not entitle the vendee to the immediate possession; the possession of the vendor until the said condition is performed, or the objects of the trust are fulfilled, is consistent with the transfer or deed, and is therefore no badge of fraud. This is precisely the present case.

It has been asked by the defendant's counsel, whether the plaintiffs could have insisted upon the possession of these goods at Canton, or at any other time or place previous to the insolvency of Edward Thomson? I answer that they certainly could not, because, by their agreement with Edward Thomson, he was to have the cargo brought to Philadelphia, and was there to deliver to the plaintiffs the muniments of title. But after the arrival of the cargo, the plaintiffs were at liberty to take possession of the property, or to recover it by suit, subject only to the claim of the United States for the duties on the same.

Much has been said at the bar, as to the real design and intention of the parties to this contract; as to which I would observe, that their intention can best be discovered from their agreement, all of which is in writing; and from their acts. That a loan was made; that it was at the risk of the lenders, on a real cargo to its value on board, and on a real voyage, and was intended to be secured by an outward and homeward bill of lading, the latter to be to order, and to be delivered with a blank indorsement to the plaintiffs, is perfectly manifest. Why it was agreed to be to order, and to be indorsed in blank, we know not. But this is clear, that the delivery of the homeward bill of lading to the plaintiffs, was equivalent to a direct consignment to the plaintiffs.

The last subject to be noticed is the loan on the cargo of the Superior. The only differences between this loan, and that on the cargo of the Addison, are, 1. That in this, the sum secured by the respondentia bond, and accompanying papers, was for a pre-existing debt, and not for money actually lent at the time. And 2. That in this case, the homeward bills of lading were filled up to Peter Mackie and Barclay Arny. As to the first difference, it is immaterial; if the principles already laid down in relation to the security on the cargo of the Addison be correct. If the lender is not bound to see to the application of the money lent, and if a valid security may be given on the cargo in a case where the loan is made after the departure of the vessel, it cannot be material whether the security be given for money actually lent and advanced at the time, or for a debt previously due; provided the essential requisites to constitute a valid respondentia contract, which have already been noticed, exist in both cases. As to the second matter of difference, there can be no doubt but that the filling up the bills of lading in the manner these are, was a violation of the agreement between the plaintiffs and Thomson, which was precisely the same with that which was made in relation to the cargoes of the Addison. But can this affect the right of the plaintiffs? If Edward Thomson, or his agent at Canton, thought proper to depart from the terms of his agreement with the plaintiffs as to the form of the homeward bills of lading, this cannot prevent the latter from opposing their equitable title to this property to the preference claimed by the United States. Mackie and Arny had no real title to those goods, and claimed none. They received the bills of lading as trustees for the plaintiffs; and as such, they assigned them to the plaintiffs.

As to the question whether the return cargoes of these vessels are the proceeds of the outer cargoes, you must decide upon the evidence which has been given to you. As to the charge of fraud, which it is insisted by the defendant's counsel taints this transaction throughout, I leave that for your decision, after an impartial and attentive consideration of the whole of the evidence. All that my duty requires of me is to state those legal principles which should accompany your inquiries upon that subject. These are, 1. That actual fraud must be proved, and ought never to be presumed. And 2. That no fraud which may have been practiced or attempted, by Edward Thomson, his captains or agents, can affect the validity of these contracts: unless it has been proved that the plaintiffs, in some way or other, have participated in it.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

During the trial of this cause, the following points arose, and were ruled upon objections taken to evidence.

1. An objection was made by the plaintiffs' counsel to the admissibility of a letter from one of Edward Thomson's general assignees to the captain of the Addison, directing him to make his manifest to conform to the bill of lading.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This objection is made by the counsel, as they allege, for the sake of the principle involved in it, rather than on account of any importance which they attach to the particular paper offered in evidence. This cause turns upon a question of property, which the plaintiffs affirm and must maintain to be in them.

(After stating the plaintiffs' title as before set forth in the charge, the judge proceeded as follows:) The United States claim no right of lien to the goods in question, but claim as creditors of Edward Thomson, and as preferred creditors. They assert that the title to these goods was in Edward Thomson at the time their execution was levied on them. The question upon these facts then is, can the United States, or could Edward Thomson or his assignees, if they were now the defendants, set up his or their orders, or his or their acts, or those of their agents, fraudulent or otherwise; the plaintiffs not having participated in them, to defeat, or in any manner to affect the prior title of the plaintiffs, assumed for the present to have been fairly acquired. We feel no hesitation in giving a negative to this question. The evidence offered, is not to explain the original contract as in the case of Hibbert v. Carter, [1 Term R. 745.] Nor is it offered to taint that contract with fraud. It is not offered even to affect the homeward bills of lading and invoice, for they are in strict conformity with the contracts, except in the part as to the consignment of the cargo of the Superior. It merely respects the alteration of the manifest, so as to make it correspond with the bill of lading and invoice. But if the evidence were applicable to the bills of lading, it would be improper to admit it to affect the plaintiffs' title, unless their participation were first proved. The evidence is rejected.

2. An objection was made by the defendant's counsel to the reading of the respondentia bond, until the plaintiffs should prove themselves to be a corporate body, by giving in evidence the act of their incorporation.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The written agreement of the real parties to this cause to try a particular question, viz. the right of property in these goods on the 19th of November 1825, and the acceptance by the district attorney of the plaintiffs' bond, executed under their corporate seal, to restore the property in case of a decision of that point against them, amount to an acknowledgement of the corporate capacity of the plaintiffs, and to a waiver of the usual evidence to prove that fact. Overruled.

3. To the following question by the defendant's counsel to Hidelius, the captain of the Addison, and now under examination, "did Mackie and Nicoll make out a new manifest, altering the destination of the Addison, and direct you to enter by it as the true manifest?" an objection was made and sustained by the court, upon the principle before laid down upon the first objection.

4. Similar objections were made to the following questions, asked by the defendant's counsel of the same witness, viz. "did you see Mackie pay money to the pilot for being the first to board the Addison?" "Whether part of a letter from Mackie to the witness was drafted by C. J. Ingersoll, signed by Edward Thomson, and countersigned by his assignees." The objections to these questions were sustained by the court.

5. The following questions put to Arny, another of the witnesses, by the defendant's counsel, were also objected to. "Do you know how the moneys lent by the plaintiffs on the cargoes of the Addison and Superior were applied by Edward Thomson?" "What did Edward Thomson do with the general homeward bill of lading by the Addison?" "Was the transaction with the plaintiffs in respect to the Scattergood (another vessel of Edward Thomson's, on the cargo of which security by respondentia had been given for other loans to him) negotiated in the same manner as that of the Addison?" The objections were all sustained upon the principles before laid down.

6. A question asked of Jones, another witness, by the plaintiffs' counsel, "whether Edward H. Nicoll, (one of the obligors in these bonds, and one of the directors in the Atlantic Insurance Company) ever took any part in the affairs of the company as a director?" was objected to, and the objection overruled.

7. The court refused to let the defendant's counsel give in evidence the correspondence between Edward H. Nicoll and Edward Thomson, respecting these bonds; as the plaintiffs ought not to be affected by it.

[NOTE. The judgment in this case was affirmed by the supreme court on practically the same points in Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 386; and, in delivering the opinion of that court, Mr. Justice Story said:

["The loan on the shipment in the Superior differs from that on the shipment in the Addison only in the circumstance that it was applied in discharge of a prior loan. In our judgment, that makes no difference as to the legal rights of the parties. * * *

["So far as the questions of usury or gaming or bona fides upon substantial risks are matters of fact, they were left fully open, and have been passed upon by the jury, who have found a verdict against them; so far as there are matters of law, apparent upon the record, proper to avoid the bonds, they are still open for inquiry. Two grounds have been relied on for this purpose: First, that the loans were made after the sailing of the ships on the voyage; and, second, that the money loaned was not appropriated to the purchase of the goods put on board, and was not the identical property on which the risk was run. In our judgment, neither of these objections can be sustained. * * * It matters not at what time the loan is made, nor upon what goods the risk is taken. If the risk of the voyage be substantially and really taken; if the transaction be not a device to cover usury, gaming, or fraud; if the advance be in good faith, for a maritime premium,—it is no objection to it that it was made after the voyage was commenced, nor that the money was appropriated to purposes wholly unconnected with the voyage. * * *

["It is contended on behalf of the United States that the priority thus created by law, if it be not of itself a lien, is still superior to any lien, and even to an actual mortgage, on the personal property of the debtor. * * * It is true that, in discussions in courts of equity, a mortgage is sometimes called a 'lien for a debt.' And so it certainly is, and something more; it is a transfer of the property itself, as security for the debt. * * * It does not consider the estate of the mortgagee as defeated and reduced to a mere lien, but it treats it as a trust estate, and, according to the intention of the parties, as a qualified estate and security. When the debt is discharged, there is a resulting trust for the mortgagor. It is therefore only in a loose and general sense that it is sometimes called a 'lien,' and then only by way of contrast to an estate absolute and indefeasible. But it has never yet been decided by this court that the priority of the United States will divest a specific lien attached to a thing, whether it be accompanied by possession or not. * * *

["The attention of the court will then be at once addressed to the question, what was the nature and extent of the interest of the insurance company in the shipments in question? The whole instruments must be taken together, and construed as one entire agreement. We must then examine the memorandum, the outward bill of lading, and assignments thereon, in connection with the bond. The bill of lading purports, on its face, to be a shipment by Edward Thomson of seven kegs, containing $21,000, for account and risk of the shipper; to be delivered at Canton to John R. Thomson, or his assigns. By the well-settled principles of the commercial law, the consignee is thus constituted the authorized agent of the owner, whoever he may be, to receive the goods; and by his indorsements of the bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice of any adverse interests, the latter becomes, as against all the world, the owner of the goods. This is the result of the principle that bills of lading are transferable by indorsement, and thus may pass the property. It matters not whether the consignee, in such case, be the buyer of the goods or the factor or agent of the owner. His transfer, in such a case is equally capable of divesting the property of the owner, and vesting it in the indorsee of the bill of lading. And, strictly speaking, no person but such consignee can, by an indorsement of the bill of lading, pass the legal title to the goods. But if the shipper be the owner, and the shipment be on his own account and risk, although he may not pass the title by virtue of mere indorsement of the bill of lading, unless he be the consignee, or, what is the same thing, it be deliverable to his order, yet, by any assignment, either on the bill of lading or by a separate instrument, he can pass the legal title to the same; and it will be good against all persons, except such a purchaser for a valuable consideration, by an indorsement of the bill of lading itself. Such an assignment not only passes the legal title as against his agents and factors, but also against his creditors, in favor of the assignee. In the present case Edward Thomson was the owner of the goods, and the consignee was merely his factor. He therefore had full power, notwithstanding the consignment, to pass the title to the property in the bill of lading, by a suitable instrument of assignment and sale against anybody but a purchaser without notice from his consignee, without any actual delivery of the goods themselves if they were then at sea, and incapable of manual tradition. The question then is whether the indorsement upon this bill of lading constitutes such an instrument. We are of opinion that it does. It purports to be a transfer in presenti, and uses the appropriate phrases of grant. * * * There was a valuable consideration for it; and, as Edward Thomson was the legal owner of the goods, the words 'assign and transfer' are sufficient words of grant to pass his legal title to the same. * * * The obvious intention of the parties was to give a specific interest in the goods shipped, so as to make them secure against the claims of creditors; and to construe the instruments to create no more than a lien, liable to be defeated by the acts of either party, or to be overreached by any privileged creditors, would be, not to follow, but to frustrate, their intention. * * *

["It is said that this debt upon a respondentia bond is of too contingent a nature to uphold a mortgage as collateral security for the payment of it. We know of no principle or decision that justifies such a conclusion. Mortgages may as well be given to secure future advances and contingent debts as those which already exist, and are certain and due. The only question that properly arises in such cases is the bona fides of the transaction. Then, again, it is said that the papers here disclose a transaction fraudulent in its own nature. But we are of opinion that there is no necessary implication of law on the face of these papers, which stamps it fraudulent. For aught that appears, the agreement may have been entered into with the most sincere and scrupulous good faith, and whether fraudulent or not, in fact, was a question for the jury, upon the whole evidence, which was properly left to their consideration; and they have, by their verdict, negatived the fraud. * * *

["But the main object relied on, and which, indeed, constitutes one of the exceptions to the opinion of the circuit court, is that possession of the return shipment was not obtained until after the levy by the United States; and it is contended that the want of such possession is per se a badge of fraud. The circuit court on this point decided 'that the actual possession of the above return cargoes, by the masters of the Superior and Addision, until levied upon by execution at the suit of U. S. v. Thomson, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 388, is not per se, in law, a badge of fraud, which ought to invalidate or affect the title of the plaintiffs to these cargoes.' It appears to us that this decision is entirely correct in point of law, under the circumstances of the case. * * *"

[The rulings of the trial court on the objections, taken to evidence and questions were sustained by the supreme court on substantially the same grounds as given by the trial court.

MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—RECEIVER—POLICY-HOLDERS—ADJUDICATION IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. A receiver of a mutual life insurance company, a corporation, was appointed by a state court. Afterwards, on a petition in bankruptcy, filed in the name of the corporation, it was adjudged a bankrupt by this court. The holders of policies issued by the corporation were, by its charter, entitled to vote for trustees of it, and to share in its profits. The policy-holders were not notified of the meeting called for the purpose of authorizing the proceedings in bankruptcy: Held, That the receiver had a sufficient standing to move the bankruptcy court to set aside the proceedings in bankruptcy;

2. He could not be allowed to show that the corporation was not insolvent.

3. The policy-holders were corporators, within the meaning of § 5122 of the Revised Statutes, and that, as they were not notified of the meeting, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings in bankruptcy, and they must be set aside.

[In bankruptcy. Heard on motion to set aside an adjudication in bankruptcy. Motion granted.]

WALLACE, District Judge. Upon the application of the attorney-general of this state, after opposition on behalf of the Atlantic Mutual Life Insurance Company, that corporation was restrained from the further prosecution of its business, by a decree of a court having jurisdiction in the premises, and a receiver was appointed by such decree, who has filed his bond, taken possession of the assets of the company, and continues in the discharge of his trust. The proceeding was conducted conformably to chapter 902 of the Laws of New York, of 1869. Subsequently a petition in bankruptcy was filed in this court, in the name of the corporation, by a trustee thereof, upon which the corporation was adjudicated a bankrupt. The receiver now moves to set aside such adjudication, alleging that the proceedings in bankruptcy were not in conformity with the bankrupt law, and that the corporation was not insolvent.

(1) Among the several questions presented is one relating to the right of the receiver to be heard. I do not doubt that he has a sufficient standing in court for the purpose of the motion. He is in possession of the assets of the bankrupt, and, if he chooses to relinquish his lien upon the funds, he can doubtless prove a claim against the bankrupt for his expenses in executing his trust, and for his commissions or services.

(2) Whether or not the corporation was insolvent, is a question not open on this motion. The decisions are, that in the case of an individual who has been adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition, the adjudication cannot be assailed by proof that he was not in fact insolvent; that, if he owe debts and resides within the jurisdiction, as specified in section 5014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the court has jurisdiction to entertain his petition and adjudicate him a bankrupt; that the filing of the petition is, per se, an act of bankruptcy, and is so declared by the section in question; and that the solvency or insolvency of the debtor is not material. There is no distinction in this regard between proceedings by individuals and by corporations.

(3) The serious and doubtful question, in my view, is, whether the policy-holders in the corporation are corporators, within the meaning of section 5122, of the Revised Statutes of the United States. If they are, they not having been notified of the meeting called for the purpose of authorizing proceedings in bankruptcy, and the proceedings not having been authorized by the vote of the majority of the corporators, the filing of the petition was not the act of the corporation, within the section, and a condition essential to the jurisdiction of this court does not exist; in which case, although the proceedings might not be assailed collaterally, the adjudication may be attacked in the proceeding itself, by a motion to set it aside.

A corporator is one who is a member of the corporation, one of the stockholders or constituents of the body corporate. The charter of this corporation provides, that every stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for trustees, for each and every share of the capital stock standing in his or her name on the books of the company, and every holder of a policy of the company for the whole term of life, or an endowment policy for five hundred dollars and upwards, and which has been in existence for one full year, shall be entitled to one vote for each five hundred dollars so insured. The charter also provides, that, in each year, after placing to the credit of the stock seven per cent. on the amount of the capital, and a further sum of one-fifth of the residue of the profits, as a reserve fund for retiring the capital stock, the remaining four-fifths shall be placed to the credit of the policy-holders, who, to that extent, shall participate in all the profits of the company, until the retirement of the capital stock, after which the whole profits shall be divided among the policy-holders. While the policy-holders are not holders of scrip which evidences their right to an interest in the assets of the corporation, and while their interests are not transferable like those of stockholders, in all other respects their position toward the corporation is the same as that of the stockholders. Neither are personally liable for assessments or otherwise, beyond the sum fixed by contract with the company, the stockholders' liability being that assumed in their subscriptions for stock, and the policyholders' that assumed in the policies issued to them. Both have a voice in the management, and a share in the profits, the extent of which is not material, in ascertaining their legal status. There is a community, though not an equality, of interest in the assets, and of control in the management, which constitutes both classes members of the corporation. I think it is the intent of the section of the bankrupt law under which proceedings in bankruptcy by corporations are authorized, that the voice of all who have a right to participate in the management of the corporation, and to share in its assets, shall be heard and obeyed before an adjudication, which is essentially a dissolution of the corporation, shall be obtained. It is ordered that all the proceedings in bankruptcy be set aside.

MARSHAL—FEES—ATTACHMENT.

An officer of a corporation instituted proceedings in its name, to have it adjudged a bankrupt. The proceedings were afterwards set aside by the court, as not having been authorized by a majority of the corporators. The marshal, having served notices, as messenger, under a warrant on adjudication, applied to the court to enforce, by an order and an attachment against such officer, the payment of the fees for the marshal's services: Held, that he was not entitled to such remedy, but must proceed by action.

clerk of court. Lee v. Patterson, Id. 8,198.]

[In bankruptcy. Heard on petition of the marshal for an order requiring payment of his fees. Denied.]

WALLACE, District Judge. The marshal of the United States moves for an order requiring Lemon Thompson, an officer of the insurance company, upon whose petition the company was adjudicated a bankrupt, to pay the fees of the marshal in executing the warrant issued in the case. After the marshal, as messenger, had served the notices required by the warrant, the adjudication of bankruptcy was set aside and the proceedings vacated, because the requisite majority of corporators had not authorized the proceeding. The marshal's bill, as claimed by him, exceeds by $300 the sum he has received, and he asks that an order for its payment be now made and enforced by attachment against the officer who instituted the proceeding.

I am not aware of any authority authorizing the remedy now asked for. No case has fallen under my observation, where any court in this state has issued an attachment at the instance of one of its officers, for the payment of fees recoverable by action of the person at whose instance they accrued. In some of the states this remedy has existed, and in such states the courts of the United States have enforced the same remedy (see Caldwell v. Jackson, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 276;) but I am unable to find any theory upon which the practice can be sustained when sought to be invoked within this state. Unless authority to issue an attachment in this case can rest upon the power of the court to punish for contempt, a commitment would contravene the statute abolishing imprisonment for debt. The power of the courts of the United States to punish for contempt and to imprison for debt is substantially coextensive with that vested in the courts of this state. The power to punish for contempt is, possibly, somewhat more circumscribed than that conferred by the laws of this state, while the power conferred to imprison for debt is precisely that given by the laws of the state.

It may be said, that the court can make an order requiring the payment of the fees, and, upon refusal of the party to pay, can punish as for contempt of an order of the court. It is true, that the courts of the United States may punish as for contempt any disobedience or resistance by any person "to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree or command" of the court, but the power thus conferred is not to be construed as extending the authority to punish beyond that which has always inhered in courts of general jurisdiction, and does not include every order or decree which the court may see fit to make. Where the order is, in effect, a final judgment for the payment of money, whether the proceeding in which it is made is of equitable or legal cognizance, it cannot be enforced by imprisonment, upon the theory of a contempt.

In this case the marshal has an adequate remedy by action, and to that he must resort.

[NOTE. Rev. St. § 725, limits the power of federal courts to punish for contempt to cases involving the "misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; * * * and the disobedience or resistance by any party * * * to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree or command of the said courts." Section 990 provides that "no person shall be imprisoned for a debt in any state, on process issuing from a court of the United States, where, by the laws of such state, imprisonment for debt has been or shall be abolished." In proceedings for contempt for violation of an injunction in a patent suit, the defendant was ordered to pay the costs, master's fee, and certain assessed profits by a certain day. He failed to pay the master's fees, and the profits, both of which sums were to go to the plaintiff, and was committed to prison. After two weeks, the defendant was discharged upon his own recognizance, under the poor debtor law of Massachusetts, (the state in which the proceedings arose,) and the circuit court denied complainant's petition for a recommitment. ATLANTIC & P. GUANO CO. v. The ROBERT CENTER.

[N. Y. Times. Aug 24, 1862.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 24, 1862.

SHIPPING — CHARTER-PARTY — REFUSAL BY CONSIGNEE TO RECEIVE—DISPOSAL OF CARGO—DAMAGES—DEMURRAGE.

[1. A contractor entered into an agreement with a guano company to charter vessels, and transport guano to market, and to deliver the cargo to consignees of the company which was entitled to the bills of lading, the cargoes to be subject to the payment of freight and charges, and to the payment of eight dollars per ton to the company at first out of the surplus. Held, that the district court had jurisdiction of an action by the guano company on the contract against a ship which had been chartered by the contractor to carry out the enterprise, as it was a general charter party, by which the cargo was to be put on board by a sub-freighter, who was entitled to bills of lading, and was to be consigned to agents of the sub-freighter at the port of destination.]

[2. Where the undertaking was to carry the cargo to Antwerp, and deliver it to the consignee of the guano company, and the master of the chartered ship, on the refusal of the consignee at Antwerp to accept the cargo, left it in the absolute control of the contractor, instead of either delivering it to some responsible house, who would have received it on the same terms as the consignment, or storing it in Antwerp, subject to the order of the company, the ship was liable for the value of the cargo at Antwerp, after deducting freight and all proper charges, at least up to eight dollars per ton, provided the value should so far exceed the freight and charges.]

[Cited in Fox v. Holt, Case No. 5,012, note.]

[3. The agents of the guano company told the master of the chartered ship that they would guarantee nothing in the way of dispatch, but would deliver as fast as they could, and were about to send one of their ships to the guano islands with more laborers and boats to facilitate the loading. Both ships arrived at the islands at the same time, and the chartered ship was ready to take in cargo, but the ship sent out by the company took some days to get ready, and was loaded first. Held, that the chartered ship was entitled to demurrage at the rate specified in the charter party from the time of her arrival until she commenced loading.]

[In admiralty. Libel by the Atlantic & Pacific Guano Company against the ship the Robert Center, and Joseph H. Arnold, master, on charter party. Respondents claim demurrage. Referred to a commissioner.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. In the winter and spring of 1858 and 1859, the libellants were the owners of guano on Swan island, in the Carribean sea. On the 18th day of December, 1858, they entered into a contract with one Geo. W. Cochran, by the terms of which the latter was to charter vessels, and transport guano to market, the cargoes to be subject to the payment of freight and charges, and out of the surplus the libellants were first to receive eight dollars per ton. The guano was to be delivered to the consignees of the libellants, and the latter were entitled to bills of lading. There were other stipulations in the contract, which it is not necessary to notice in this place, but which may be referred to hereafter, when I come to examine the claim of the respondents to demurrage.

In January, 1859, Cochran, in carrying out the enterprise in which he had engaged with the libellants, chartered the ship Robert Center, of and then lying in the port of New York. The ship was owned by Edw. C. Center, and Arnold, her master, the former owning three fourths, and the latter one fourth. Before the charter of the ship was concluded with Cochran, Capt. Arnold and Mr. Caldwell, the agent of Edw. Center, called at the office of the libellants at New York, for the purpose, as they allege, of ascertaining if the guano would be delivered to the ship under Cochran's charter, and what were the probable facilities of loading the cargo. They there saw the agents of the libellants, Mr. Fahens, the secretary, and Mr. Fowler, the president of the company. In the evidence before the court there are some sharp contradictions as to what took place in this interview, the great struggle between the parties being whether or not Capt. Arnold at this time knew, or admitted that he knew, what the terms of Cochran's contract with the libellants were. In determining the general question of the liability of the ship, however, I do not think it of great importance whether Capt. Arnold knew the terms of this contract or not, although the balance of the proofs is in favor of the claim that he did. It will be seen in the course of this opinion, that I rest the liability of the ship on other grounds:

1. The first question raised by the respondents is that the court has no jurisdiction. This objection is untenable. It is a plain case of a general charter party,—a well known form of maritime contract; the cargo being put on board by a sub-freighter, who was entitled to the bills of lading, and consigned to the agents of the latter, at the port of destination.

2. The undertaking was to carry the cargo to Antwerp, and there deliver to Marsily, the consignee of the libellants. There is no escape upon the evidence before the court from the conclusion that Capt. Arnold so understood it. He offered to sign bills of lading to this effect, although he refused to sign those tendered him, but his refusal rested wholly on other grounds. The ship proceeded on her voyage with the cargo on board as far as Flushing, within about seventy miles of Antwerp. Here Cochran, who had preceded the ship to Europe, met her, and both he and Capt. Arnold proceeded to Antwerp, leaving the ship at Flushing. They found Marsily, the consignee, and Capt. Arnold tendered him the cargo, or perhaps it would be more proper to say offered to tender it. Marsily refused to receive it. This refusal appears to be relied on, is formally alleged in the answer, and is proved by the evidence. Surely, all this trouble and formality of an offer to Marsily to deliver the cargo to him at Antwerp, would not have been gone through with if Capt. Arnold had not understood that he was bound to the libellants so to deliver it. If he was bound only to Cochran, the latter could have dispensed with any obligation due to him, as well at Flushing as at Antwerp. It was not necessary for Capt. Arnold to travel seventy miles to Antwerp, and make a formal tender to a third person, in order to have received valid directions from Cochran as to the disposition of a cargo which Cochran owned, or which he had the legal right to control. It would be doing injustice to the intelligence of any American ship master to impute to him any such absurd idea. Now it is quite clear that while Capt. Arnold felt it his duty, as it surely was, to offer the cargo to Marsily, the consignee of the libellants, he somehow imbibed the notion (probably through bad advice) that the refusal of Marsily to receive it left it at the absolute control of Cochran. This was a snare and a delusion. He should, on the refusal of Marsily to receive it, have delivered it to some other proper and responsible house, who would have received it on the same terms as those on which it was consigned to Marsily; or if no such house would receive it on those terms, he should have stored it at Antwerp, subject to the order of the libellants. This was the duty which the maritime law imposes on him,—a duty founded in good sense, and enforced by considerations of convenience and safety to both ship owners and freighters. There is no evidence that Capt. Arnold intended to defraud the owners of this cargo, but it is clear he mistook his duty, and committed an error for which his ship is liable to the extent of the damages, which resulted to the libellants from that error. Now, what were those damages? It is claimed by the libellants that the rule of damages should be the eight dollars per ton which Cochran was in a certain event to pay them for the guano. But in the present state of the case no such rule can be adopted. This would be visiting upon Capt. Arnold and his ship a mere arbitrary penalty for his error, and would in effect make him an insurer of all possible profits, which might have accrued to the libellants out of their enterprise with Cochran. The profits of that enterprise, which were wholly contingent, would, by this error of Capt. Arnold, become wholly certain and absolute. If this rule were to be applied to the case, the libellants might well congratulate themselves that the act of Capt. Arnold, of which they formally and rightfully complain in their libel, had rendered the success of this somewhat dubious enterprise with Cochran complete. It may be that eight dollars per ton is the true rule of damages. That, however, depends upon the fact whether the libellants could have realized the sum from this cargo, over and above freight and charges, had Capt. Arnold done his whole duty, by delivering it at Antwerp. In other words, the damages for which the ship is liable are those, and those only, which the libellants suffered from the failure of Capt. Arnold to deliver the cargo at Antwerp, either to some proper and responsible house, who would receive it on the same terms, under which it was consigned to Marsily, or in store, subject to libellants' order. It may be that these damages amount to $8 per ton. They cannot amount to more unless the contract between the libellants and Cochran is to be deemed as having been rescinded, with notice to Arnold before the time when the delivery at Antwerp should have taken place, of which I see no evidence. They may amount to much less, or to nothing at all. What the fact is of course the court cannot know, until the matter is determined upon a proper reference. It follows from these views, that the ship must be held liable for the value of the cargo at Antwerp, after deducting freight and all proper charges, at least up to $8 per ton, provided the value should so far exceed such freight and charges.

3. This brings us naturally to the only remaining question, viz:—What are the charges proper to be deducted from the value of this cargo at Antwerp, before we begin to estimate the damages to the libellants? And the only difference between the parties here is, that which relates to the single item of demurrage. This item is a large one, amounting to $4,700. In determining this point in the case, I do not deem it necessary to go into the general law of demurrage, as I think the duties and obligations of both the libellants and the respondents must be determined by the contract between the libellants and Cochran, and the representations made by the former to Capt. Arnold, and for this purpose I hold Capt. Arnold must be charged with a knowledge of the contract. Now, the contract says the cargo was to be delivered as fast as the agent of the libellants could deliver it. From this it would appear that they did not intend to bind themselves to a particular number of lay-days within which the cargo should be delivered to the ship, but only bound themselves to use all dispatch with the force they might have at the island where the Robert Center should arrive. In addition to this both Mr. Fowler and Mr. Fahens, on behalf of the libellants, assured Capt. Arnold at their interview with him that they would render every facility in their power to load the ship, although they would give no guaranty as to time. They further stated to him that they were about to dispatch the Golden Lead to the island, with more laborers and boats, to facilitate these operations of loading. Now, taking this clause of the contract and these representations, and no one would imagine from either or all of them taken together that this vessel, the Golden Lead, was to be sent out there to be loaded in advance of the Robert Center, keeping the latter waiting thirty days before she could commence loading at all. The fair import of these representations was that the sending out of the Golden Lead would facilitate the operation of loading the Robert Center, and I think Capt. Arnold had a right to rely on that result. But what was the fact? The Golden Lead was required by the libellants to be loaded first, and the Robert Center was compelled to await thirty days before commencing. This was not facilitating the loading of the latter vessel, but hindering and delaying it. Neither was it in conformity with the spirit of the contract to deliver the guano to the chartered vessels of Cochran as fast as the company could do it. According to the claim of the libellants, they might have sent a dozen ships of their own chartering to the island, and loaded them all first, thus postponing the loading of Cochran's vessels to their and his ruin. The only risk he was to take in regard to the time of loading was the possible absence of the libellants' men from the island when his vessels should arrive, and the necessary and inevitable delay that might take place while the libellants were doing their best to load their ships. To say that the libellants, upon the heel of the execution of this contract, could send out ships of their own to be loaded in advance of those chartered by Cochran, and thus ruinously postpone the loading of his, would be unwarrantable, and ill comport with the just and equitable principle of the maritime law. No ship could have been chartered by Cochran to engage in such an undertaking, subject to such a power in the company. Cochran, in his deposition, says something about the loading of the Golden Lead first, if she should arrive first being spoken of, but I attach as little importance to his statements as the counsel for the libellants does. I think the terms of the contract and the sworn statements of Mr. Fahens and Mr. Fowler, made on this trial, the better evidence on this point. But assuming the version of Cochran the true one, I still think the Robert Center should have been loaded first. It is true Capt. Johnson, of the Golden Lead, says that he arrived a few hours the first, but he also says, they came to the landing together, and that the Robert Center delivered her order and was ready to take in cargo at once, while the Golden Lead was not ready until some days to commence taking in her cargo. I am, therefore, of opinion that the libellants are liable to the ship for demurrage, at the rate specified in the charter party, for every day from the time of her arrival up to the time she commenced loading, and no more. Even if Capt. Arnold did not know of the stipulation in Cochran's contract, that the cargo was to be delivered only so fast as it could be done by the libellants, he was told that they would guarantee nothing in the way of dispatch. but would deliver it as fast as they could. There is no evidence of any remissness on their part after the Golden Lead was loaded, and therefore they cannot be held liable for the delay, which they informed Capt. Arnold they would not be liable for, before he concluded his charter party.

Something is said in the answer about the failure of the libellants to perform that part of the contract with Cochran by which they stipulate to deliver the guano "alongside and within reach of the vessel." If there was any material delay or expense, or either occasioned by any failure of the libellants in this particular, let it be gone into on the reference, and reported to the court by the same commissioner who may inquire into the value of this cargo at Antwerp, at the time when it should have been delivered by Capt. Arnold at that place. Let an order of reference be made to a commissioner in conformity with this opinion.

ATLANTIC & P. R. CO. v. CLEINO.

ILLEGAL TAXES — REPLEVIN — LEGISLATIVE CONTRACT TO EXEMPT PROPERTY FROM TAXATION.

1. Under the legislation of Missouri back taxes upon real estate cannot be collected from the personal property of a subsequent purchaser of such real estate; and if such personal property be seized by the tax collector the owner may maintain replevin against him to recover its possession. (See note.)

2. Replevin lies against the tax collector when the assessment of the taxes is void for which the property was seized. Per Treat, District Judge.

3. The plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of the legislative exemption from taxation contained in the act of the legislature of December 25, 1852. Per Treat, District Judge. (See note.)

[Cited in Bailey v. Atlantic & P. R. Co., Case No. 732.]

At law. This was an action of replevin [by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company against Henry Cleino] to recover certain personal property of the plaintiff seized by the defendant as sheriff of Phelps county, for taxes assessed in 1868, against the South Pacific Railroad Company, upon lands which were then the property of that company, but are now the property of the plaintiff, another and distinct corporation. The plaintiff claims that the seizure was illegal: First, because the lands taxed were, by a valid legislative contract, exempt from taxation. Second, because the plaintiff was not liable, as the vendee, in 1870, for taxes levied on said lands in 1868. In support of the first ground, reliance is placed upon sec. 12 of the act of December 25, 1852, relating to the Pacific Railroad Company, of whose privilege in this respect the plaintiff claims to be entitled, as the successor of that company, under various legislative acts and the provisions of the constitutional ordinances of 1865, upon the subject of railroads. The act of December 25, 1852, § 12, provided that "The said Pacific Railroad, and the said Southwestern Branch Railroad shall be exempt from taxation, respectively, until the same shall be completed, opened, and in operation, and shall declare a dividend, when the road-bed, buildings, machinery, engines, cars, and other property of said completed road, at the actual cash value thereof, shall be subject to taxation at the rate assessed by the state on other real and personal property of like value. * * * Provided, that if said company shall fail for the period of two years after said roads, respectively, shall be completed and put in operation, to declare a dividend, that then said company shall no longer be exempt from the payment of said tax." It is further provided in said section, that after said road is completed and declares a dividend, the president shall return the value of the road-bed, buildings, machinery, engines, cars, and other property appertaining to said completed road, to the auditor of state, who shall assess the tax, and if not paid as therein provided, an action is to be brought to recover the tax, and a penalty imposed for the failure. The road was not completed until May, 1870, and no dividends have ever been paid. As to the legislative history, see act of December 10, 1855, (Laws 1855, §§ 20, 21, 25;) Const. 1865, art. 11, § 16, and accompanying railroad ordinances; Act Feb. 19, 1866, (Laws 1866, p. 108;) Act March 20, 1866, (Laws 1866, p. 101;) Act March 17, 1868, (Laws 1868, p. 118.) On the 20th of October, 1870, the South Pacific Railroad Company, under legislative authority, (Laws 1870, p. 90,) sold and conveyed all its property and franchises to the plaintiff, a corporation chartered by congress, July 27, 1866. [14 Stat. 292.] By virtue of said several acts, and the proceedings and conveyances under them, the plaintiff became the owner of the lands and railroads taxed, and claims to succeed to the original exemption contained in the abovementioned 12th section of the act of December 25, 1852. The taxes in question were assessed against the lands granted to aid in building the road by the act of congress of June 10, 1852. [10 Stat. 8, ch. 15.] The other necessary facts appear in the opinion.

Baker & Jewett, for plaintiff.
Mr. Clover, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

TREAT, District Judge. It is the purpose of the court to state briefly, the conclusions reached in these cases, without giving an elaborate analysis of the various statutes and conveyances mentioned, and without giving in extenso the reasons upon which the conclusions are based. The exemption from taxation contained in section 12 of the act of December 25, 1852, must be held to include all the property of the Pacific Railroad Company, whether pertaining to the main or branch road. By the terms of that act the exemption was to continue for two years after the roads were completed, etc. The main question argued is, whether, under the sales made pursuant to the ordinance of 1865, through which sales the plaintiff claims successorship to the Southwest Pacific Company and the South Pacific, the lands, etc., thus derived continued subject to the original exemption, or whether by force of the constitution of 1865 the exemption ceased, and did not pass to the grantees at said sales and their corporate successors. It is evident that the terms of the several acts and conveyances are broad enough to continue the exemption in full force. The railroad ordinance required that on the default of the company to pay the principal or interest of the state bonds issued to it, the general assembly should provide by law for the sale of the railroad and other property, and the franchise of the company, "under the lien reserved to the state." In the suit in this court, wherein the Iron Mountain Railroad Company was a party, [Trask v. Maguire, Case No. 14,145,] there was no lien on the franchise of the company reserved to the state. Section 5 of that ordinance provides what shall be done when the state becomes the purchaser of the "railroad and other property or the franchises sold," viz: that "no railroad or other property or franchises purchased by the state shall be restored to the company except upon the terms stated; and also that no sale or other disposition of any such railroad or other property or their franchises shall be made without reserving a lien upon all the property and franchises thus sold or disposed of." etc.

It seems that the ordinance was designed to, and did, empower the state to sell or purchase and reconvey all the franchises on which a lien had been reserved by the state, antecedent to the ordinance, including exemption from taxation as originally granted by the act of 1852. The provisions of the constitution of 1865 forbade the making of such exemptions thereafter; and when taken in connection with the ordinance of even date and of like obligatory force it must be held to except this railroad's franchises as previously granted. The general rule applies that when a special provision is made for an excepted class of cases, the general rule is to be read as if the exception were incorporated in it. In the case of the state to the use of the State v. Dulle, 48 Mo. 282, the supreme court of Missouri seems to hold that said twelfth section of the act of 1852 "makes provision for the ascertainment and payment of state taxes, but does not include county taxes;" but a careful examination of that case and of those to which it refers renders it very doubtful whether that court did intend to be so understood. That was an action of trespass against the collector for buying plaintiff's property for unpaid county taxes, and after referring to the general law concerning county assessments, that court says: "We think the statute sufficiently conferred jurisdiction; whether rightfully or wrongfully, it is not necessary now to decide, as nothing but the liability of the defendant is involved in this contest."

The statement to which reference is made is in the revenue law, (2 Wag. St. p. 1196, §§ 7, 6,) in which "express power is given to the several county courts to levy such sums as may be annually necessary to defray the expenses of their respective counties by a tax upon all property and licenses made taxable by law for state purposes, with certain exceptions."

That court, in the same opinion, says: "From the view we have taken it will be unnecessary to decide whether the legislature, acting under the provisions of the constitution, intended by the general revenue law to repeal the alleged exemption from taxes." Hence, it would seem that the court waived the question which, in a former part of the opinion, appears to have been so definitely decided. It closes the opinion with the following views: "When the statute made all property liable to taxation, and empowered the several county courts to levy such sums as might be annually necessary to defray the expenses of their respective counties, by a tax upon all property made taxable by law for state purposes, it conferred the jurisdiction, and was a sufficient warrant for the collector to justify him in obeying the process and mandate placed in his hands." Acting in good faith, and what was deemed good authority on its face, he ought not to be compelled to litigate the legality of the law. This case differs widely from those where the officer has been held answerable in trespass for acting without any authority.

Giving to this decision of the Missouri supreme court its fullest scope, it does not cover the cases before us. True, it may be difficult to determine on what established rules it held the defendants in that case not liable if the property levied upon was exempt; for a manifest distinction exists between process resting upon erroneous proceedings and process without any authority —between a void and a voidable proceeding or between errors subject to review or correction in the proper forum, and the entire absence of jurisdiction over the subject matter. If the county had no authority to levy or assess for taxes except on property subject to state taxation, then if the property on which the assessment was made was not subject to state taxation, the assessment upon it was void. The decision referred to cannot be considered as going further than that trespass will not lie against a collector and his sureties when the assessment and levy are made under a general law, which, by its terms, seems to cover the case, though it be that on a careful analysis of various supposed exemptions, it should be found that an exemption did really exist. If not exempt, then replevin will not lie to take from the collector property by him seized as by distraint, though the mode of assessing the same was informal and irregular. In such a case, inasmuch as ample and proper modes for correcting errors in the assessment exist, and the process is not void for want of jurisdiction, neither replevin nor trespass will lie.

The facts in this case disclose that the assessment was made in 1868, for taxes due upon lands then owned by the South Pacific Railroad Company, and that subsequently a levy therefor was made on personal property belonging to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company. Neither the act of 1870, nor any other act, authorizes a levy for back taxes on real estate, to be made on the personal property of any one, save the person who was the owner of the land at the time the assessment was made. The tax lien may still remain on the land, although its ownership has been transferred, but the personal property of the subsequent owner is not subject to seizure for back taxes due from the prior owner. This point is conclusive of these cases.

Although I am prepared to hold that the property of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, acquired under the sales made pursuant to the ordinance of 1865, was exempt from state and county taxation for the period named, and consequently the levy of the defendant was void, yet, as Judge DILLON has not looked into or examined that question, the decision of this court is not based on that proposition. It may be that an unauthenticated report of a recent decision by the supreme court of the United States—Railroad Co. v. Prescott, [16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 603,]—is decisive of these cases on grounds not presented in argument, inasmuch as all of the lands on which this assessment was made were subject at the time of the assessment to revert to the United States government.

Therefore the court finds for the plaintiff. on the ground that the personal property of the latter was not subject to levy for an assessment previously made on the lands owned at the time of the assessment by another party. In other words, the collector cannot levy back taxes on lands upon the personal property of a subsequent purchaser.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. I concur in the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and I place my judgment upon the distinct and sole ground that I discover no authority in the legislation of Missouri, general or special, to levy upon the personal property of A, for taxes assessed against the real estate of B, although since the assessment such real estate may have become A's property: and in such a case, the owner whose personal property is thus seized may maintain replevin against the officer, the same as if his property had been levied upon by the sheriff on an execution against another person.

As this point is decisive of the case, I have not deemed it necessary to examine the question whether the lands against which the taxes were assessed were exempt in the plaintiff's hands under the 12th section of the act of December 25, 1852, and the subsequent legislation of the state, including the constitutional provision (article 11, § 16) and the railroad ordinances referred to in the statement of the case. Upon this subject I give no opinion.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

ATLANTIC & P. TEL. CO. v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. CO.

[6 Biss. 158;[1] 6 Chi. Leg. News, 358.]

RIGHTS OF TELEGRAPH COMPANY ON RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Neither the acts of congress declaring railroads to be post-routes, nor the act of July 24, 1866, providing that telegraph companies may construct their lines over post-roads, authorize a telegraph company to establish its lines over the right of way of a railroad company without making compensation therefor according to law.

2. It is beyond the power of congress to authorize a telegraph company to construct its line over private property without making compensation.

In equity. Bill for an injunction, [by the Atlantic & Pacific Telegraph Company against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company,] setting forth that the defendant would not permit the entrance of complainant's engineers and workmen upon its right of way, for the purpose of establishing thereon a telegraph line according to its charter, and asking that defendant, its agents, etc., might be restrained from interfering with the construction of such line. [Bill dismissed.]

Dent & Black, for complainant.

Williams & Thompson, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The only controversy here is as to so much of defendant's railroad as lies within this state. The plaintiff claims to be a corporation organized under the laws of New York for the purpose of constructing a telegraph line between the cities of New York and San Francisco; and that, in order to carry out that purpose, it is necessary to construct such line upon the right of way of defendant, between Chicago and Omaha, including that part of defendant's road lying within this state.

The authority to do this is claimed to exist under various acts of congress, some of which declare all railroads in the United States to be post-routes. By these acts I understand nothing more is meant than that the mails can be transported over railroads, as over ordinary public highways, with all those securities and safeguards thrown around the transit of the mails by various congressional enactments. It does not necessarily follow that because railroads are thus declared post-routes, [Act Cong. 1872; Rev. St. § 3964,] the United States can, therefore, without the connsent of the railroad companies, and without compensation, transport the mails over them. An act of congress of July 24, 1866, [14 Stat. 221; Rev. St. § 5263,] provides that any telegraph company then organized, or which should thereafter be organized, under the laws of any state, should have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, and over and along any of the military or post-roads of the United States, which had been or might thereafter be declared such by acts of congress. There can be no doubt of the plenary authority of congress over the public lands or military roads of the United States. It is also competent for congress, as it has frequently done, to make grants of public lands to railroads, upon such conditions as it may choose to annex thereto.

The main controversy in this case turns upon the true construction of this act of congress. The bill avers that the defendant has a right of way over which its railroad is constructed. There is nothing to show that this right of way was granted through the public lands by act of congress; on the contrary, the fair inference is, that the defendant acquired it, either by direct purchase from the owners of the land, or by condemnation of the land for the uses of the railroad in accordance with the laws of the state. In either case the railroad would own the property for its own special purposes, having paid for it either by express contract with the owners, or in accordance with the method provided by law. It is true that a railroad has certain public uses, and is, for certain purposes, subject to the control of the state; and in consequence of these public uses the law authorizes the condemnation of private property; but still, when the property has thus been acquired, it becomes private property, nothwithstanding the railroad has public uses; that is to say, the property can be used for the benefit of the shareholders of the company. The right of way can be so used, just as much as the road-bed itself, the ties, the rails, the locomotives or the cars; they are all to be used for the benefit of the shareholders, although such uses may be of a public character, and the public may have a certain limited control over them.

The right to construct a telegraph line implies the possession, control, and use of real property, and, in this case, of the possession, control and use of a portion of the right of way of the defendant. The question here is, whether congress intended that in such a case as is now before the court, any telegraph company could, without compensation to the railroad company, exercise these rights of possession and ownership. I think that such cannot be considered the true construction of this act of congress of 1866. The act provided that telegraph companies might have the right to take and use from the public lands of the United States stone, timber and other materials for its posts, piers and stations, in the construction, maintenance and operation of lines of telegraph. There could be no objection to such a grant, as applicable to the public lands of the United States, but there seem to be insuperable objections to such a construction of the act as would authorize the taking and using by telegraph lines of land owned by railroad companies, and of which they seem to have the exclusive control for their own purposes. Such a construction will not be placed upon the act unless its language is inconsistent with any other meaning. And I do not think the true construction of it is, that it intended to authorize any telegraph company to work on the roadway of a railroad, or upon a post-road of a railroad of which it, and not the public, was the owner.

The rights of a railroad over its roadway are different from those which belong to the public at large in regard to the ordinary highways and roads of the country. Over the latter any person can travel; there is an absolute right of user in the public. In the case of public turnpikes and bridges, this right sometimes exists subject to the claim of the proprietors to exact a certain compensation for the privilege of passing over them, but the right to pass is absolute, subject to the payment of the requisite toll. Such rights do not exist on the part of the public in railroads, or in the right of way of railroads.

It could not be claimed that after a railroad company had purchased its land, constructed its road-bed, laid down its ties and iron, and placed upon the road its locomotives and cars, an act of the legislature of a state, or an act of congress, could authorize any other railroad company to pass its cars or locomotives over such railroad without compensation and without permission, unless, indeed, such right was reserved in the charter, or the grant was made subject to the same. The railroad itself, alone, has the right to pass its own cars and engines over its roadway, and to use it for the profit of its shareholders.

The right to construct a telegraph line would imply the right to construct another railroad, or to add indefinitely to the number of telegraph lines that might be placed over the right of way. The right of the telegraph company to construct its line over the right of way of the defendant, is a right inconsistent, in many respects, with that absolute right which the defendant possesses over its own road-bed and right of way. For example: the railroad has a right to take gravel and dirt throughout the whole extent of its right of way, or to use that right of way for the purpose of laying down additional tracks or side-tracks. But the right to construct a telegraph line thereon necessarily interferes with the absolute right of the railroad to its right of way. That is a right which cannot be taken without compensation. It is a right of property existing in the railroad company, which no person or other company can take from it without its consent, or without paying for it.

In view of these considerations, it is, I think, clear that this act of congress did not intend to confer on the plaintiff any such right as is contended for. And, granting that such was the intention, it is beyond the authority of congress to deprive the defendant of its rights of property without providing compensation, because the construction of the telegraph line involves necessarily the actual taking of the property. I am of opinion that plaintiff's claim is not maintainable in point of law; and that it has no right to establish a telegraph line upon defendant's right of way without making compensation therefor in accordance with law.

It is urged that the state statute authorizing the condemnation of private property for the use of a telegraph line only refers to companies existing under the laws of the state, and is not applicable to this company, a corporation created by the law of New York. If this be so, it furnishes no reason why the plaintiff should take the property of any corporation in this state without paying for it. It is one of those cases, omitted in the law, but because of that omission the plaintiff is not clothed with any additional rights. The motion for an injunction is overruled, and the bill dismissed.

The ATLAS.

District Court,[2] E. D. New York. Feb., 1870.

COLLISION IN THE KILLS — LOOKOUT — RULES OF SUPERVISING INSPECTORS — TOW BOAT AND TOW — APPORTIONMENT OF DAMAGES — LOSS OF CARGO.

1. A collision occurred in the Kills on the night of March 18th, 1868, between two steam-tugs, the Kate and the Atlas, each having canal boats in tow. A canal boat in tow of the Kate, was struck by a boat in tow of the Atlas, and sunk. Insurers of the cargo on the sunken boat filed a libel against the Atlas alone, to recover for the loss of the cargo. On the hearing, the court stayed the proceedings to enable either party to apply to have the Kate also brought in, but neither party made such application. The collision resulted from a faulty lookout on both of the steam-tugs: Held, That the libellants were entitled to a decree against the Kate for one half the damage to the cargo.

This was an action brought by the insurers of the cargo of the canal boat A. E. Hurd, to recover of the steamboat "Atlas,"

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by the Phoenix Insurance Company, insurers of the cargo of the canal boat A. E. Hurd, against the steamboat Atlas, her engineer, etc., (the Camden & Amboy Railroad & Transportation Company, claimants,) to recover] the amount of the damage caused to such cargo by the sinking of the canal boat, in a collision which took place in the Kills on the morning of March 18, 1868, between the steamboat Atlas and the steam-tug Kate which was then towing the Hurd. The action which was instituted against the Atlas alone, proceeded to hearing upon the pleadings and proofs, and thereupon the court directed that the proceedings be stayed to enable either party to apply to have the tug Kate also brought into the action. Neither party availed themselves of the permission given and the court accordingly proceeded to determine the questions raised upon the pleadings and proofs as they stood. [Decree for libellants for one-half of the damage. This decree was affirmed by the circuit court in The Atlas, Case No. 634, but was afterwards reversed by the supreme court in Phoenix Ins. Co. v. T. E. Stillman, for libellants.
Sanford & Woodruff, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. As to some of the facts attending this collision there is no dispute. Others are in doubt and are to be gathered from a mass of contradictory and unsatisfactory testimony. It appears that the Kate, a small tug 52 feet long, left the dock at New Brighton on the day in question at about 3 a. m., having three vessels in tow upon a hawser, of which the canal boat, A. E. Hurd, was the starboard vessel. The wind was light and the night somewhat dark, but without fog. After getting clear of the dock, at New Brighton, the Kate according to the statement of the libel took a course about for Port Johnson on the Jersey shore. She had not proceeded far before her pilot heard a single blast of a whistle which at once fastened his attention upon a bright light approaching, which proved to be the steamer Atlas, bound down the Kills with the barge Julia in tow, upon her larboard side. Immediately upon hearing the single whistle the pilot of the Kate gave two blasts of his own whistle, at once stopped and reversed his engine, and starboarded his helm. Under the starboard helm the Kate swung to port, but had not time to change the direction of her tow, before she was struck upon her starboard side by the stem of the Atlas, while the barge Julia in tow of the Atlas struck the Hurd and sank her. The Atlas, as it appears, was running at the rate of some ten miles an hour, on a course down the Kills and her first knowledge of the proximity of the Kate, was noticing a light ahead which was supposed to be on a tow, also bound down the Kills. The pilot at once ported his wheel to pass to the right, and blew a single blast of his whistle, but, receiving the two blasts of the Kate in reply before he had materially changed the course of his steamer, at once hove his wheel hard a starboard and also stopped and reversed his engine. Before he could stop his headway however he was in contact with the Kate. As to these facts there can be no dispute, unless it be as to the course of the Kate, but her course, if not as broadly across the river as stated, was certainly crossing that of the Atlas.

Upon these facts it has been strenuously argued, on behalf of the Atlas, that the libel must fail, because the Atlas in porting her helm complied with the pilot rules of the supervising inspectors, while the Kate violated those rules by omitting to port, and so caused the collision. This argument is founded upon a misapprehension of the true rule of navigation applicable to such a state of facts.

The pilot rule of the supervising inspectors, with the accompanying illustration, of what is called the fifth situation, is a rule which if held applicable in all cases of vessels "approaching each other in an oblique direction," is pregnant with danger. It embodies a manifest error which existed before the enactment of the international navigation regulations, and has even at times crept into interpretations of those regulations. This error has been the subject of much interesting discussion, and its dangerous consequences need not be explained here. They will be found clearly shown in Mr. Gray's "Remarks Respecting the Rule of the Road for Steamships," a pamphlet which has received the approval of the British admiralty, board of trade, and trinity house, as well as of the French government. See sections 39, 40, p. 9. But the pilot rules of the supervising inspectors are controlled by the subsequent legislation of congress in the enactment of the international navigation regulations of 1864. 13 Stat. 60. Since the passage of those navigation laws, no rule of the supervising inspectors inconsistent therewith can be effective. See Act July, 1866, § 9, [14 Stat. 228.] And accordingly, rule 2 of the pilot rules, which has been here relied on, in so far as it requires a port helm in all cases, manifestly inconsistent as it is with article 14 of the international navigation laws, is of no effect. Articles 14 and 18 of the navigation laws furnish the true rule of navigation, applicable when vessels are approaching each other obliquely, and give to the vessel having the other upon her starboard side an election as to porting or starboarding according to the direction of the respective courses. Under these two articles the responsibility of avoiding the Kate, in the present case, was cast upon the Atlas. She was at liberty to keep out of the way of the Kate by porting or by starboarding, as the case required, and it was a fault in her to port, if starboarding afforded the only opportunity of avoiding the disaster.

As I view the case, however, it cannot be made to turn upon the correctness of the manoeuvres of either vessel after they saw each other, for I consider it to be quite clear upon the evidence that there was then no time to make any material change in the courses. They could only stop and back, which they both did. That it was then too late to avoid the collision by changing the courses, is shown by the small effect which was produced by the action of the helms before the blow—by the fact that the Kate at once answered the whistle by two whistles—by the immediate stoppage of both engines—by the absence of all hails, by the contradictory statements as to the directions in which the two vessels were moving, and by other circumstances which appear in the testimony.

The question of the case then is, by whose fault was it that these two tows failed to discern each other until they were thus close together. That the Atlas is chargeable with fault in this respect is clear; for it is undisputed that she was running through a thoroughfare in the night without any lookout. The night was not so dark, but what, with due care, approaching vessels could have been seen in time to avoid them. Witnesses for the Atlas say, "it had been pretty dark, but had lit up then, so you could see quite a ways—could see lights plain enough." "A vessel without lights could be seen a quarter of a mile." I have no doubt, therefore, but that, with proper care, the Kate, a high pressure boat, could have been discerned in time to avoid her; for it is proved that she had a light at her flag staff, while the schooner in her tow had a light in her rigging; and I am satisfied that the failure to discover the Kate until the vessels were so near that, although both engines were promptly stopped and reversed, they came together, was owing to the absence of a proper lookout on the Atlas.

In addition to the fault of running without a lookout, another fault is charged upon the Atlas, namely: that she did not remain by the Kate to render assistance to the injured vessels, but at once departed on her way, leaving the sinking vessels to shift for themselves. Upon the evidence, putting the most favorable construction upon it, it is evident that the Atlas displayed no great solicitude in regard to the vessels, which she must have known to have been seriously injured, if she did not intentionally desert them.

But it is argued by the advocates for the Atlas that the subject of assistance is irrelevant to the question of damage. This is hardly so. The rules, which courts of admiralty lay down, often look beyond the mere question of remuneration for services rendered, or for loss sustained, and are intended not only to do justice between the parties litigant, but to prevent loss of life and preserve the ships, in the welfare of which as the instruments of commerce the whole community is interested. Therefore it is that the merchants' shipping act of England, (§ 33, Schedule Table C.), provides that in case of failure, on the part of a colliding vessel, to render assistance without reasonable excuse, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by her wrongful act, neglect or default; by which act a proceeding to recover damages may almost be said to be in certain cases, changed into a penal proceeding to punish an offence. See note to amendment of merchants' shipping act. Macl. Shipp. Append. p. 22. No such statute exists in the United States, but courts of admiralty, may with propriety consider the fact of deserting without cause a vessel which has been injured in a collision as a circumstance tending to show consciousness of fault; and as, in the admiralty, public policy may be considered in disposing of costs, (1 Coote, p. 63), punishment for such an act may be inflicted by withholding or imposing them as the case shall seem to require, (The Celt, 3 Hagg, Adm. 321; The Caledonia, 1 Spinks, [Catalina, 2 Spinks,] 23; The St. Lawrence, 7 Notes of Cas. 556.) In the present case, the Atlas being found in fault, the circumstances, attending her departure from the scene of the accident, need only be referred to here as confirmatory of the opinion that she was in fault.

It is equally clear to my mind, that the Kate was also guilty of negligence which conduced to the collision and in the same particular, namely, want of a proper lookout. As before stated, the night was not so dark, but that lights could with care have been seen in abundant time, and, upon the evidence, it is manifest that the Atlas displayed bright white lights. I say nothing in regard to the side lights either on the Atlas or the Kate, for the reason that I hold the collision not to have occurred by reason of any mistake of courses, but because the bright lights, which should be seen before the side lights, were not seen by either vessel until the vessels were upon each other. It is true the evidence shows that the Kate had a man on deck to look out, but it also shows that neither he nor the pilot saw the Atlas' lights till just before they struck. A negligent lookout is no lookout. For this reason therefore I hold the Kate as well as the Atlas to have been in fault.

This then is the case of a collision produced by the concurrent negligence of two vessels, and the question next arising is as to the extent of the liability of these vessels respectively for the loss sustained by the cargo which was being transported. If this were an action brought in behalf of the Kate against the Atlas, no doubt would arise upon the question; for the well known rule of the admiralty is to apportion the damages between the two vessels when both are in fault. But here the case is a different one from that presented where the action is instituted in behalf of one of the colliding vessels, and the damages are sought to be apportioned between the parties to the action, who are found to be each in fault. This action is in behalf of the owners of cargo laden on board the canal boat A. E. Hurd, which boat was at the time being towed by the Kate; and it is instituted not against the Hurd, which was the carrier, nor against the Kate, which had assumed the duty of towing the Hurd with proper care and skill, nor against the vessel which actually inflicted the blow, for that was the barge Julia, herself in tow of the Atlas; but it is against the Atlas as one of the two colliding vessels responsible by reason of the negligence of her master and crew for the injury caused thereby. It cannot then be pretended that any act or omission on the part of the owners of this cargo conduced to produce the collision. The shippers of the cargo made no contract with the Kate. Their contract was with the Hurd, and they could take no part in the employment or the management of the Kate. Neither did those in charge of the Hurd have any control over the navigation or management of the Kate. The tug was an independent principal, so far as this collision and this cargo was concerned, charged with the duty of avoiding the neglect which caused the accident and responsible for the results of that neglect. There is no room therefore for the application of the principles of the law of agency, and it cannot be held that the libellants are chargeable or identified with the neglect of the Kate, and for that reason subject to the same rule which would be applied to her in regard to the amount of damages. Nor is this a case of joint negligence on the part of the Atlas and the Kate, in which the acts of the Kate are, in law and by reason of a common design, the acts of the Atlas, so as to render her responsible for all that occurred. The fault of the Kate, as well as that of the Atlas, was one of omission, and there would be neither justice nor sense in saying that the omission of the Kate to have a lookout could be imputed to the Atlas, who knew nothing of the existence of such a vessel till she struck her.

In a court of common law, then, upon the facts of this case, an action against the owners of these two colliding vessels, founded upon an allegation of joint negligence, could not, as I understand the law, be properly maintained; and although in an action against either, in such a tribunal, the whole amount of the loss would be adjudged, the reason is because the courts of common law hold it to be impossible to determine in such a case the proportion of the loss imputable to each offender, and therefore, from necessity, being permitted to consider legal liabilities only, give judgment for the whole amount in the one case, and refuse to permit any recovery in an action by one of the parties in fault. But while such is the rule of courts of common law, courts of admiralty, "where a mixture of public law and of maritime law and of equity are often found in the same suit" (Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 447), when the proceeding is to recover damages arising from a collision of ships, for reasons peculiarly their own, feel compelled to divide the loss. In a court of admiralty, the action may be instituted against both the colliding vessels, and the decree be against either one of them for the whole, or, by reason of the "great advantage" which the admiralty has of being able to do so, (The Friends, 4 Moore, P. C. 322), one-half the damages may be decreed against each; and the action may also be against one of two colliding vessels found equally in fault, and one half the loss decreed as the proportion of loss properly chargeable to the vessel proceeded against. In this instance, for example, the present proceeding might have included the Kate with the Atlas, and such is the more common form of the proceeding; or the libellants might have joined with the owners of the Kate in an action against the Atlas, Coote, p. 11. The Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wall. [68 U. S. 43;] William & B. Adm. p. 67; The Hanover, [Case No. 6,034.] Or, if there had been an action by the owners of the Kate alone against the Atlas, and also an action by the owners of the Atlas against the Kate, all would have been heard together, perhaps even consolidated (Coote, p. 27), and such decrees made as the rules of maritime law and the course of the admiralty require. Sturgis v. Boyer, (The Hector,) 24 How. [65 U. S.] 110; The Catharine, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 177; Hay v. Leneve, 2 Shaw App. 395; The Anna Kimball, [Case No. 404;] The Marion, [Case No. 9,087;] and cases cited by Dr. Lushington in deciding The Milan, 1 Lush. 388; The Aurora, 1 Lush. 328; The Hector, [Case No. 6,317.]

If, then, in an action against one of two colliding vessels, in behalf of another found equally negligent, a court of admiralty is competent to ascertain and adjudge the amount of damage chargeable to the neglect of the vessel proceeded against, I see no reason why it is not equally competent to do the same in an action like the present, nor why the same rule should not be here applied. It will more clearly appear that such should be the law, if we advert to the reasons which are supposed to call for the application of the rule of apportionment. This rule of the admiralty is too venerable, and has been too often approved by great authorities, coming down to the present day, to admit of question or require defence. Its wisdom, as applied to modern commerce, appears fully demonstrated by the circumstance that when disturbed by the merchants' shipping act of England, passed in 1854, the rule proved too strong for statutory innovation, and it was found necessary to reinstate it in the merchants' shipping amendment act. 25 & 26 Vict. 63, 29. It is a rule of equity, but not of equity alone. It has also a foundation in expediency. In furtherance of equity, it compels a party in fault to share in the loss arising therefrom; and it refuses to permit a party to be charged with the whole of a loss shown to have been caused by another party as well. In the interest of commerce and of the community at large, this rule—as also the rule of limited liability, (The Carl Julian, cited in The Dundee, 1 Hagg. Adm. 113,)—seeks to distribute somewhat those losses which so frequently attend the navigation of the ships, and which result from a negligence on the part of masters and seamen, against which the most prudent owners cannot entirely guard; and which, owning to the imperfection of human tribunals, and the nature of the facts in dispute, may well be supposed liable to be sometimes cast upon the innocent. And it also aims to increase care and skill on the part of navigators, in order to diminish as much as possible the risk of life and of property which always attends navigation upon the seas.

Thus Lord Denham speaks of the rule as "growing out of an arbitrary provision in the law of nations, from views of general expediency, not as dictated by natural justice, nor (possibly) quite consistent therewith. De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 Adol. & El. 420. So Judge Ware speaks of it as "in conformity with the spirit of the maritime law, which generally aims more at practical utility and the interest of navigation than at a logical and scientific deduction of general and abstract principle;" and in The Scioto, [Case No. 12,508,] he says: "The maritime law, from considerations of public policy, divides the loss." The rule is applied by Drummond, J., because under it "there would be greater caution and vigilance in navigation, and less effort and less temptation by corrupt and unfair means to misrepresent and distort facts." The Swan, [Id. 8,588.] And the supreme court of the United States, by Nelson, J., says: "We think the rule dividing the loss the most just and equitable, and as best tending to induce care and vigilance in navigation." The Catherine, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 178. These considerations have, from a very early period, and among many nations, been deemed to be controlling, and to require of admiralty courts the adoption of the rule in question, and they appear to be equally applicable to the vessels and cargoes composing a tow, whether considered to be in law one vessel, for the purposes of this rule, or whether considered to be separate independent interests. Applied to the vessels being towed, the rule tends to encourage the employment of competent tugs, navigated by competent men, and will cause the men on the tows to be more watchful to note and correct, as far as possible by their own vigilance, any neglect in the crew of the tug, as they may often do in the matter of lookout, hails, &c.

Applied in a case like this, it also works equity, for certainly there would be little justice in permitting these libellants to elect to charge the Atlas with the whole of this loss, which their own witnesses, called from the Kate, prove to have arisen from the fault of the Kate as much as from the fault of the Atlas. If the action had been instituted by the owners of the Kate to recover for the injury to this cargo, for which action the case of The Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 50, would be an authority, the liability of the Atlas, upon this very claim would have been limited to one-half the amount of it. See cases cited by Dr. Lushington in The Milan. The Bay State, [Case No. 1,148.] It is not easy to see how in equity the liability of the Atlas can be permitted to be doubled by instituting the suit in the name of the present libellants, and calling upon the crew of the Kate to prove the case.

It was entirely competent for the libellants to have originally proceeded against the Kate, as well as the Atlas in this action, and so recovered their whole loss. Furthermore after the hearing had been had, opportunity was given to join the Kate, and it was declined without the suggestion of any facts existing to prevent that course. It certainly would not be just to permit the liability of the Atlas to be doubled by this mode of procedure, and for no other apparent reason than to save the Kate from her share of responsibility.

But it may be said the libellants are without fault, and should recover their whole loss, and the Kate may be sunk or beyond the reach of process, or of too insignificant a value to respond. No such facts appear, and not being suggested as a reason for declining the opportunity to join the Kate, they must be presumed not to exist. And whether the maritime law necessarily requires that the whole loss sustained by reason of collision should be recovered in an action against one of two offenders, is the question under discussion; and it might well be said here, if the case required it, as it does not, that the risk of an inability to recover of the Kate, recompense for loss arising from her negligence was a risk voluntarily assumed by the libellants and against which the Atlas could in no way provide, and that the maritime law looking to equity, and at the same time seeking to distribute losses of this character, when they occur, and to prevent their occurrence if possible, by creating a sense of responsibility in the minds of all persons engaged in commerce, will not permit those risks to be shifted to the shoulders of a single one of the parties in fault, but leaves them upon the party by whom they were in the first instance assumed. The rule of apportionment is a rule of limitation. It is adopted by maritime courts for the advantage of shipping among other reasons. Its object is to restrict the liability of each ship in cases of collision by mutual fault, to the injury arising from its own negligence. As to the ship herself, that proportion is always determined, and from necessity, by an arbitrary rule of equal division. The same division is possible in regard to the cargo. The same reasons there exist for the limitation, and the same rule should be applied,—certainly in a case like this, when no reason is shown for attempting to charge the whole loss upon one of the vessels. Furthermore the application of the rule of apportionment in actions brought by tows or their cargoes, will tend to compel the bringing before one and the same tribunal all the parties whose rights and liabilities are involved in the controversy and dependent upon the same facts, a result of no inconsiderable importance, when the nature of these controversies is considered. These considerations, it is believed, justify the conclusion to which I have arrived, that in an action like the present, the rule of apportionment should be applied, and the recovery limited to one half the amount of the damage to the cargo in question. I have not thus far alluded to any adjudged cases, where the question, in the form here presented, has been decided. I am aware of no such case in the courts of this country, and no case has been here cited by either party. In the case of The Bay State, [supra,] one half the cargo was adjudged, but there the owners of the Bay State were the libellants. They could hardly however have been considered as owners of the cargo. In the later case of The D. S. Gregory, [Case No. 4,100,] which was an action for damages, for injury to a passenger in a collision arising from mutual fault, the liability of each vessel—both being then able to respond—was limited by the decree to one half the damages. I am not aware that the particular provision as to the execution inserted in the decree in that case, was a subject of discussion, and it could not have been deemed important, each vessel having given ample security for its portion of the loss.

The case of The Hanover, [Case No. 6,034,] decided by the learned Judge Betts, in 1851, is more nearly in point. There were cross actions, one in rem brought for vessel and cargo lost by collision, the other in personam; and both vessels being found equally in fault, the decree directed the damages of both parties to be ascertained and divided equally, but directed that "the value of the cargo is not to be included in the estimate, unless the owners thereof have made themselves parties to this action, so as to be concluded by its decree."

There is on the other hand a remark by Mr. Justice Wayne, in the case of The New Philadelphia, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 76, which should not pass unnoticed, although the case has not been relied upon as an authority here. There the action was against a tug, between which and the libellant a contract had been made to tow a boat with care and skill, and it may be that, in such an action, considerations arising out of the contract would require a decree for the full damages, as to which no opinion from me is called for. But in that case the court finds as a fact that the tug was solely in fault. There was therefore no occasion to consider, and the court cannot be supposed to have intended to adjudicate upon the question here involved.

In the English admiralty this question, in substantially the same form here presented, has been adjudicated and after full argument and consideration it was held in the case of The Milan, 1 Lush. 404, that in an action brought by the owners of cargo laden on board of one of two vessels, found to be equally in fault for a collision, against the other colliding vessel, the recovery in the admiralty must be limited to one half the amount of the injury to the cargo. This determination, so far as I can ascertain, has been acquiesced in, and appears to furnish the rule of the maritime law as now administered in the English admiralty. McLachlan, [Shipp.;] Williams & B. Adm. p. 76; Lown. Col. p. 5. The importance of agreement upon questions of this class between two nations, so closely connected in their commercial relations as England and America, would, of itself, go far to justify the adoption by American admiralty courts, in cases like the present, of the rule of the English admiralty. In accordance with these views, the decree will accordingly be that the libellants recover of the steamboat "Atlas" one-half of their loss by reason of the collision in the pleadings mentioned, and that it be referred to a commissioner to ascertain the amount.

[NOTE. This decree was affirmed by the circuit court in The Atlas, Case No. 634; but upon appeal to the supreme court the circuit court decree was reversed. See The Atlas, supra, and note; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302.]

Case No. 634.

The ATLAS.

[10 Blatchf. 459.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 25, 1873.[2]

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAMERS—MUTUAL FAULT — APPORTIONMENT OF DAMAGES — LOOKOUT — COSTS.

1. A collision occurred between the steamboat A. and a boat in tow of the steam tug K., in the night, in the Kills. A libel was filed, in the district court, against the A. alone, to recover for the damages. That court held both vessels in fault, and awarded to the libelants, against the A., only one half of such damages. Both parties appealed. Held, that the decree was right.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The K. was held in fault for not porting, when meeting the A. nearly end on, and for starboarding, and crossing the course of the A., and for not slowing and stopping.

3. The A. was held in fault for not having a lookout, in view of her speed, such want of a lookout having contributed to the collision. It ought to be clear that the want of a lookout has wrought no mischief, before it can be excused.

[Cited in The Coe F. Young, 49 Fed. 168.]

[See note at end of case.]

4. The A. and the K. being both in fault, if both had been sued, each would have been held liable for one half of the damages; and the libelant cannot, by suing the A. alone, deprive the A. of any rights she has in that respect.

5. Both parties having appealed, no costs of appeal were allowed.

[On appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by the Phoenix Insurance Company, insurers of the cargo of the canal boat A. E. Hurd, against the steamboat Atlas, her engines, etc., the Camden & Amboy Railroad & Transportation Company, claimants.] This suit was brought in the district court, against the steamboat Atlas, to recover for the damages sustained by the loss of a boat in tow of the steam tug Kate, through a collision between such boat and the Atlas. That court held both the Kate and the Atlas to be in fault for the collision, [Case No. 633,] and awarded to the libelants, against the Atlas, one half of the damages reported. The claimants appealed from the decree, to this court, on the ground that the Atlas was not in fault, and the libelants appealed on the ground, that the Atlas was wholly in fault, and the Kate not at all in fault, and that, even if both vessels were in fault, the decree was wrong in not awarding to the libelants a decree against the Atlas for the whole damages reported. [Decree affirmed. An appeal was subsequently taken to the supreme court, where the decree was reversed. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302. See note at end of case.]

Thomas E. Stillman and Charles Donohue, for libelants.

Charles F. Sanford, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Without going into the detail of the evidence in this case, it must suffice to say, that the negligence and mismanagement of the persons navigating the tugboat Kate are fully established. On the testimony of the witnesses called from her by the libelants, that mismanagement was so gross as to admit of no excuse or palliation. Her own seamen, as well as the master of one of her tows, prove, that, putting out from New Brighton on Staten island, bound westwardly, up the Kills, she had crossed diagonally towards the New Jersey side, and had passed the middle of the Kills, and taken her course westward, still slightly quartering on the New Jersey shore. The witnesses generally say she was two thirds over towards the New Jersey shore. Some make it from one half to two thirds over, and one of her hands says she was within 100 yards of the New Jersey shore, which was more than two thirds of the whole distance. She was proceeding up the Kills, when the steamboat Atlas came from the other direction. All of the witnesses agree, that the Atlas was running in, or very nearly in, the middle of the Kills. This, if true, shows, that there was an erroneous assumption in the opinion of the court below, namely, that the Atlas had the Kate and her tows on her starboard side. It proves the contrary. This is not all. Every witness from the Atlas testifies, positively, that they sighted the Kate and her tows, or so many of them as they saw, on their port or larboard side. They are not contradicted by other witnesses, nor by any facts or circumstances not in harmony with their statement. I must regard that fact as proved beyond any doubt, and corroborated by the testimony from the Kate herself. It was, therefore, erroneous to say, that the rule of navigation placed upon the Atlas the burthen and duty of keeping out of the way of the Kate. But, if the Atlas had been within the operation of that rule, it would in no wise save the Kate from the imputation of gross fault and negligence; for, the same rule required her to keep her course, which she did not do nor attempt to do.

The Kills are narrow, not so narrow but that the vessels might pass each other, with great ease, in safety, but so narrow that vigilance and care were due from both vessels, and in the night season especially, and the pressure of the proper rules of navigation was more than usually stringent. In the course and direction of the two vessels, it is possible, that, if neither had done anything, they would have passed without colliding. Such is the opinion expressed by some of the witnesses; but, it is clear, I think, that their approach to each other was so nearly end on as to bring them under the rule which required each to pass to the right. In accordance with that rule, the Atlas ported, and signified her conformity to the rule, by one whistle. The Kate disobeyed the rule. She assumed to say, that she would go to the left, across the bows of the Atlas. She had no right to do this, upon any ground. The proof as to the depth of the water shows, that the suggestion that it would have been imprudent to draw a few fect nearer the New Jersey shore is a mere pretense; but, if not, then, surely, she had no right to assume, that, in the short interval following her two whistles, the Atlas, which was acting in obedience to what the Kate knew to be her duty, could herself go there in safety, and in season to avoid her. If, in the judgment of her master, it was not prudent to incline more to starboard, she should not have gone the other way, but should instantly have slowed, and, by signals indicating inability to conform to the rule, notified the Atlas of that judgment, thus leaving the Atlas the benefit of her own porting, and enabling her to pass, as, according to the evidence, she would, to the southward of her. If the Atlas had then failed, the Kate would, at least, have been free of the charge of thwarting her endeavor by her active misconduct. But, her blowing of two whistles was a double assurance to the Atlas, first, that the Kate was about to cross to the southward, and, also, that, in the judgment of the navigator of the Kate, it was proper for the Atlas to arrest her swing to starboard and go to port. Instantly putting her wheel to starboard, the Atlas rang to slow, stop and back, and it was done, but too late to avoid the collision.

It is said, that the Kate, on her starboard wheel, had swung but little to the southward, across the bows of the Atlas. It was to be expected, that her witnesses, in view of the manifest fault in that maneuvre, and in the endeavor which, in obvious concert with the libelants, they make, to exonerate the tug, would be tempted to make this representation. The proof in relation to their lights, greatly preponderating against them, further tends to impair confidence in their testimony; and, in any view, it is clear, that their movement to the south—to their left—whether greater or less, and their wholly unwarranted arresting the southerly movement of the Atlas, were the fatal and inevitable causes of the collision. On the other hand, the instant the two whistles were blown by the tug, the Atlas did all that it was possible to do to avoid the consequence of the mismanagement of the latter, namely, stopped and backed, and, by starboarding, made the best effort to turn, (under some headway,) to pass by the stern of the tug, then on her swing to the southward.

The case is, therefore, this: The vessels were approaching nearly end on, the tug already on the port bow of the Atlas. Every rule of navigation required them to pass to the right of each other—port to port—and their position and courses were such, that, even without change by either, they would have passed clear. If the tug could not have inclined further to her right, she could, at least, have refrained from a movement in direct defeat of the intention of the Atlas to conform to the rule and pass to the southward. Instead of doing either, and without stopping, or even slowing, she turns across the course of the Atlas, to the left, and, by her signal, apprises the Atlas she was doing so, thus arresting and thwarting the proper movement of the Atlas, and placing herself and her tow in the way of the latter. To the tug there was no proper confusion of signals. She herself needlessly created it, by her two whistles, and yet did not even slow. The Atlas gave the proper signal and made the proper change, and, on the instant the two whistles, improperly blown by the tug, apprised her of the faulty movement of the latter, she stopped and reversed, and did all that was possible to avoid collision. Had the tug ported, or, even, had she done nothing, the Atlas was passing to the right of her, and would have passed with entire safety to both. In this state of the case, the collision was clearly and chiefly owing to the mismanagement and fault of the tug.

If it were material, I should say, that the large preponderance of the evidence is, that the tug had not, at the time, proper lights. The proofs greatly impair confidence in the witnesses whose testimony tends to the contrary; and the uniform testimony of the other witnesses is, that no lights on the Kate were visible, save, perhaps, one very low, either near her deck—possibly there—or, possibly, at the rear end of her hawser, on the staff of one of her tows. But, however great this fault, and though clearly subjecting her to liability, if the want of sufficiently early sighting of the vessels by either had been the cause of the collision, the observations already made show, that it was not caused so much by the want of her lights, as by her mismanagement, when each vessel had seen the other in full time for doing whatever it was proper each should do. Whether the Atlas would have seen her sooner if her lights were up and burning, or not, the proof is conclusive, that the lights of the Atlas were burning and bright; and the tug cannot claim, at all, that she had not the fullest opportunity and time for what she ought to have done. She can allege no hurry or unexpected approach of the Atlas, excusing the want of deliberation or judgment, or justifying her faulty mismanagement.

But, on the other hand, it was held, in the district court, that the Atlas, also, was in fault, and that such fault on her part contributed to the collision. That she was in fault cannot be denied. Indeed, the counsel for the claimants hardly insists that she was acting in compliance with the statute requiring a lookout. Act April 29, 1864, art. 20; 13 Stat. 61. She is not chargeable on the ground that her conduct after the tug was seen was not, in all respects, judicious and proper, and such as would have avoided a collision, if the tug had not improperly done what she did; but, on the ground that she ought not to have come down through the Kills, in the night, at the speed with which she was moving, without a lookout at the bow, vigilant in the performance of his duty. There is no evidence that her speed was itself an unusual or improper speed for such a night, where vessels without any light could be seen at a very considerable distance. Indeed, the evidence does not show what her speed was at the time. It is only claimed to be presumptively fixed by a computation based on the time when she left New Brunswick, and the distance she had run at the time of the collision. The proof also establishes, fully, that her own proper lights were set and were burning and bright.

She was, nevertheless, navigating the Kills without a proper lookout, in violation of the rules of navigation; and thereupon, the question arises—did her fault in that respect contribute to the collision? Upon that question there is room for doubt and difference of opinion. The claimants, with great plausibility, insist, and, I think, the testimony shows, that her officers did see the tug in season to do what it was the duty of the Atlas to do in order to avoid her, and in season to do what would have avoided the tug if the latter had conformed to the rules of navigation, by porting her helm, or, even, if she had done nothing. The claimants further insist, that the Atlas did, in fact, what she ought to, and would, have done, had she seen the tug at a greater distance, and however far off; that there was no danger of collision when the Atlas ported as the law required, and none, in fact, until the last moment, when the tug starboarded and threw herself in the way; that there was abundance of room to pass; that, had the Atlas seen the tug at a distance of a mile or more, she would have approached, and might properly approach, as she did, near the middle of the Kills, and, when drawing near, would have ported, to pass to the right, as the rule required; that this is just what she did do; that she would have signaled her intention to pass to the right, by one whistle; that this, also, she did; that, in either case, she would have passed in safety by, had not the tug violated every rule governing her situation, and thrown herself in the way; that, at the very instant the intention of the tug to do this was signaled, the Atlas slowed, stopped and reversed, and made every possible effort to avert the consequences of the other's fault; that she could not have known that intention any earlier; that not one of the movements of the Atlas would have been earlier, nor ought it to have been earlier, or different, if she had had the tug under observation for a mile or more; and that the measures to avert the consequences of the fault of the tug could not have been taken before that fault occurred.

There is much force in the argument of the counsel for the claimants on this point. The liability of the Atlas to contribute is not to be tested by the inquiry, whether she ought to have had a lookout, as an abstract question. Her want of a lookout is not to operate to release the tug from the consequences of her own fault. Such want of a lookout must be found to have contributed to the collision, or the fact is not material between these parties. Suppose, then, the Atlas had had a lookout, in the vigilant discharge of his duty, who had seen and reported the tug at a distance of a mile or more, and yet the Atlas had done just what she did do, and at the very time when, in fact, she did it, could it be said, upon the evidence, that she was in any fault? This question is, at least, a doubtful one. See The Pennsylvania, [Cases Nos. 10,947 and 10,950.] If she did what it was right to do, and this was done when and as it ought to be done, and her seeing the tug sooner would have only made it more certain, that, acting wisely and skilfully, she would do just what in fact she did, then, in truth, it would be difficult to say that her want of a lookout contributed at all to the collision.

But, this view of the responsibility of the Atlas proceeds upon somewhat dangerous ground. She was in fault. Although her speed, in itself, was not improper, moving at her ordinary and proper speed, in the night, without a lookout, was improper. Such a lookout might, certainly, have discovered the tug earlier, and would have a better opportunity to discover what she was and which way she was going. The evidence is, that, even without lights, a vessel could be seen, that night, at a much greater distance than the tug was seen. When, in fact the pilot saw and reported the tug to the captain, they were in doubt what the object in view was and what was its course. They did not see her at all until very near. Had a lookout been in the performance of his duty, their information would have been earlier and, presumptively, more full. The act of congress requiring a lookout assumes this, as the general rule. There would have been more time for observation and for deliberation, and I think that early measures by porting would have been taken, which would have tended to avoid the collision. This might even have prevented the faulty attempt of the tug to pass to the southward of the Atlas. The rule is a very important one, and it should be clear that its nonobservance wrought no mischief, before it should be excused. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion, also, that such early sighting of the tug would have subjected the Atlas to the rule requiring her to slow, until it became clear that she could pass safely by. Early precaution is the most useful, and, it is safe to say, that, in such a channel, it was peculiarly important, that, by a vigilant lookout, the Atlas should be apprised, at the earliest moment, when this precaution was called for.

Upon the question raised by the appeal of the libelants, I am disposed to concur with the district court, and upon the grounds assigned in the opinion there delivered. 4 Ben. 27, [The Atlas, Case No. 633.] It is an interesting and important question. I add to what was said in that opinion: The Kate and the Atlas, upon perfectly well settled principles, were, for the reasons above given, bound to contribute to the loss. Had the libelants, instead of joining hands with the Kate, to visit the consequences upon the Atlas alone, brought both into court, to be dealt with upon those settled principles, each must pay one half of the damages to which the libelants were entitled, (unless, possibly, in cases supposable, both of the offending vessels were injured in such unequal degree that an equal apportionment of the loss would give rise to a different equity.) The libelants came into this court with full knowledge of the rules governing courts of admiralty in cases of contributing fault. Those rules gave the Atlas rights of which the libelants could not deprive her, by electing to proceed against her alone. Even if it be conceded that the libelants, if contribution by the Kate could not be enforced, might then have recourse to the Atlas therefor—which concession is said to be called for by the decree made in the case of The Washington and The Gregory, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 513, where the point does not appear to have been made, and where all that can fairly be said of the decision is, that the court thought no wrong was done to the libelant by the decree—if, I say, such concession be made, it is still true, that the libelants, by proceeding in this court, eminently a court of equity, could not deprive the Atlas of the protection which results from such a provisional decree; and it is just and equitable that they be held to an election to take the contribution to which, with all the parties concerned before the court, the Atlas would have been subjected. Upon the distinct authorities cited, and the reasons, also, given by the district judge, and, also, because it is in accordance with what is equitable and just, the decree in this court must proceed in affirmance of the decree appealed from, and award to the libelants the one half of the damages reported. As both parties appealed, no costs of appeal should be allowed to either.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, where the parties duly filed a stipulation agreeing that the collision occurred through the mutual fault of the two steamboats, thereby waiving all questions except the disputed right of libelants to recover for their full loss from the Atlas instead of the moiety decreed them by the circuit court. Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion of the court, referred at length to the authorities supporting the principle that the damages should be apportioned where the fault is mutual, and remarked that two pertinent admissions were made in one of the cases, The Milan, Lush. 401, to wit: "(1) That the owner of the cargo, in such a controversy, could recover for his whole loss in an action at law; (2) that the owner of the cargo, in such a case, is to be considered as a perfectly innocent party." The learned justice further said that "nothing is more clear than the right of a plaintiff, having suffered such a loss, to sue, in a common-law action, all the wrongdoers, or any one of them, at his election; and it is equally clear that, if he did not contribute to the disaster, he is entitled to judgment in either case for the full amount of his loss * * * Goods shipped as cargo, and their owners, as in the case before the court, are innocent of all wrong. The owners of the cargo may sue the owners of one of the ships, or both, and they may sue at law or go into the admiralty, at their election, and, having proved their case, they are as much entitled to full compensation in the admiralty as they would have been if they had elected to pursue their common-law remedy, saved to them by the proviso contained in the ninth section of the judiciary act. 1 Stat. 77. Co-wrongdoers, not parties to the suit, cannot be decreed to pay any portion of the damage adjudged to the libelant. Nor is it a question in this case whether the party served may have process to compel the wrongdoers to appear and respond to the alleged wrongful act." The decree was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to reverse the decree of the district court, and enter a new decree in favor of the libelants for the entire damages as ascertained by the commissioner. ATLAS NAT. BANK v. F. B. GARDNER CO. et al.

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. June, 1879.

CORPORATION—BANKRUPTCY OF STOCKHOLDER AND OFFICER—OFFICER DE FACTO—POWER TO ACT.

1. The individual bankruptcy of a person, who is a stockholder in, and a director and officer of, a corporation which is not in bankruptcy, does not incapacitate him from exercising his functions as such officer of the corporation, nor render inoperative and void as to third parties the acts and conveyances of the corporation done and executed through him as its representative.

2. Where by the law under which a corporation was created, it was required that the directors and officers should be stockholders and be elected for one year, and the president became bankrupt and subsequently acted as the president of the corporation: Held, that notwithstanding his bankruptcy, he was the president de facto of the corporation, and as such his acts were, in the absence of fraud, the acts of the corporation.

In equity. This was a creditor's bill. The leading facts in the case were these: In 1876, and for a considerable time prior thereto, the F. B. Gardner Company was a corporation organized under a law of Wisconsin, owning a large quantity of real estate and personal property, and was engaged in the manufacture of lumber, at Pensaukee, in Wisconsin. In 1875 the corporation executed a mortgage to one White upon a large part of its lands and real property to secure certain indebtedness, which mortgage was afterwards transferred to and held by complainant, and was during the year 1876 foreclosed in this court, the bill to foreclose being filed March 11, 1876. After sale of the mortgaged property and at the October term, 1876, a judgment for a deficiency amounting to twenty-one thousand one hundred and six dollars and eighteen cents was rendered in favor of the complainant against the defendant company, upon which execution was issued and returned nulla bona. On the 10th day of March, 1876, the stock of the defendant company consisted of five thousand shares of one hundred dollars each; of which the defendant, F. B. Gardner, held four thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine shares, one John Spry held ten shares and one J. C. Gardner held one share. These three parties constituted the board of directors; F. B. Gardner being the president and J. C. Gardner being the secretary of the company, and until the 4th day of September, 1876, the books of the corporation showed the ownership of stock as above stated. On said 10th day of March, 1876, a petition for the adjudication of F. B. Gardner as a bankrupt was filed in the district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, and on the 28th day of March, he was adjudicated bankrupt. On the 29th day of April, 1876, an assignee in bankruptcy was appointed. On the 2d and 31st days of August and the 2d day of September, 1876, the defendant company, F. B. Gardner acting as president and J. C. Gardner acting as secretary, made conveyances of numerous tracts and parcels of lands, then owned by the company and not covered by complainant's mortgage, to E. O. Grosvenor, H. C. Durand, Herman Ruther, Elijah M. Haines, George Schecht, Geo. L. Tracy, Martin Ryerson, E. Meyer, the heirs of Robert McMullen and one Mrs. Ross (all of whom are defendants in the present bill), to secure the payment of indebtedness then owing by the company to said parties respectively, the conveyance to Durand being in trust for the benefit of other parties who were then creditors of the corporation, and who were also defendants in this bill; all of which conveyances purported to be and were executed as the deeds of the corporation. On the 4th day of September, 1876, there was a sale at public auction by the assignee in bankruptcy of F. B. Gardner of the four thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine shares of stock he held in the defendant corporation, such sale having been originally advertised to take place on the 3d day of August, and having been postponed until the 4th day of September. It was claimed by complainant that the adjudication of F. B. Gardner as a bankrupt by the district court in Illinois, the appointment of an assignee and the assignment to him of the bankrupt's estate on the 29th day of April, 1876, operated to extinguish his ownership of the stock in the defendant company, and to transfer such ownership to the assignee, and therefore, to disable Gardner thereafter to act as a director and officer of the corporation, and as a consequence take from him the power to make for the company the conveyances of property before mentioned; that the parties receiving the conveyances had knowledge at the time, that Gardner had been adjudicated a bankrupt; that such conveyances were made when the defendant company was insolvent, and when it was expected that there would be a deficiency arising on the sale of the premises covered by complainant's mortgage which was then in process of foreclosure, and that these conveyances were fraudulent and void.

The defendants answered the bill, alleging that the conveyances of real estate to them by the defendant company were made to secure the payment of just and bona fide indebtedness then owing to them, and that the same were made in good faith, and denying all charges of fraud or fraudulent intent in their several transactions with the defendant corporation.

W. T. Burgess, for complainant.
Luther S. Dixon, for defendants.

After disposing of other questions in the case, the opinion of the court proceeded as follows:

DYER, District Judge. There remains for consideration another question, and which was the principal one discussed at the bar, namely, the effect of the bankruptcy of F. B. Gardner upon his power to act in the transaction sought to be anulled, as a director and as the president of the defendant company. The position is taken by complainant's counsel that the effect of the bankruptcy proceedings instituted against Gardner, in Illinois, in March, 1876, was to transfer his ownership of stock in the company to the assignee in bankruptcy, and that thereafter he was disqualified from acting as an officer of the company, and consequently that he had not the power to make for and in behalf of the company the conveyances to the defendants which the bill seeks to set aside, [nor to make the settlement with Baker on the 31st of August, 1876.][2] The testimony does not show when the stock held by Gardner came into the actual possession and control of his assignee in bankruptcy, but it tends to show that after the bankruptcy of Gardner, the business of the corporation, so far as it had business to do, proceeded as it had done before. The stock was advertised to be sold by the assignee, as part of the assets of Gardner, on the 3d day of August, 1876; but the sale was postponed to the 4th day of September. It is charged that this postponement was procured by Gardner, and as part of a scheme to enable him to consummate the transactions complained of, before there should be a sale. The testimony I think fails to sustain this charge. The only testimony on the subject is that of Gardner himself, who says that some of his creditors suggested a postponement in order to ascertain something further about the value of the stock; that he had some idea of bidding on the stock, and that he made suggestions to others to bid; that he thought the stock would bring more if other parties were prepared to bid, but they did not then interest themselves in it, and the sale was adjourned thirty days. He says further, that he might have had some influence in having the sale postponed, but the circumstances as they are disclosed by the testimony fail to establish a fraudulent purpose in procuring the postponement.

It seems not very material why the sale was adjourned, if the position is sound that by virtue of the bankruptcy proceedings, and by operation of law, Gardner was divested of the right and power to act as an officer of the defendant company, after the assignment in bankruptcy. Now the question fairly stated is, does the individual bankruptcy of a person who is a stockholder in and director and officer of a corporation which is not in bankruptcy, to such extent incapacitate him from exercising his functions as such officer of the corporation as to render inoperative and void, as to third parties, the acts and conveyances of the corporation when done and executed through him as its representative. A further feature of the case, in connection with the question, is, that Baker at the time of his settlement, and most of the other defendants at the time they took their conveyances and mortgages, had knowledge or information in a general way that Gardner was in bankruptcy, some of the parties being creditors of both the corporation and Gardner. By the statute under which the corporation was organized, it is provided that the stock, property, affairs and business of the corporation shall be under the care of at least three directors to be chosen annually by the stockholders, and who shall be stockholders, and shall hold their offices for one year, and until others shall be chosen in their stead. Further, that the directors shall choose one of their number president and such other officers as may be required, who shall hold their offices one year, or until a majority of the stockholders choose others in their stead. Power is given the corporation to acquire, mortgage and dispose of real and personal property, and the stock is declared to be personal property, transferable only on the books of the corporation. And it is to be observed, that there is no statutory declaration of a vacancy in the office if an officer ceases to be a stockholder. The question that is presented for solution may perhaps, in view of the manner in which it arises, be said to be one of first impression. In the absence of fraud, I can hardly think that its determination is to be affected by the fact that the third parties dealing with the corporation knew that Gardner was in bankruptcy. Complainant's case must stand or fall upon the proposition that Gardner had not power to act as a director or representative of the corporation, because the ownership of his stock had passed to his assignee in bankruptcy, and therefore that his acts were void. If the affirmative of this proposition be sound, it would seem that the individual bankruptcy of Gardner absolutely vacated his office of director and president of the corporation, so that he could not thereafter be such officer either de jure or de facto. I cannot bring my mind to such a conclusion. For even if the legal title to the stock passed to the assignee in bankruptcy by virtue of the bankruptcy proceedings, still, up to that time Gardner had been an officer of the corporation, duly chosen. His term of office had not yet expired. The statute under which the corporation was created, provided that he should hold his office till another should be chosen in his stead, and it would seem that, so far as third parties were concerned, if he did not continue to be an officer de jure, he was thereafter an officer de facto, whose acts would be binding on the corporation, and would be the acts of the corporation. It is true the statute of incorporation provides that the officers shall be stockholders, but that provision is directory, and, as before observed, there is no statutory declaration that a vacancy shall be deemed to exist if the officer, before his term expires, shall cease to be a stockholder. It has been held that one who is elected an officer in a corporation by the body in which the power to elect is vested, but by a less number of that body than the charter authorizes, is an officer de facto, and that his acts, as respecting third persons, are valid.

In the case of Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 64, where it appeared "that the directors of the parent bank, empowered to establish offices of discount and deposit, subject to such rules and regulations as they should deem proper, passed a by-law, directing 'that the cashier of each office shall give a bond * * * with two or more approved securities with condition for his good behavior and faithful performance of his duties to the corporation,' and a fundamental article of the constitution of the bank directed 'that each cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall be required to give bond,' etc., it was held that a cashier appointed and permitted to act in his office, without giving such bond, or any bond whatever, was a legal agent of the corporation; that his acts and contracts within the scope of his authority were valid, whether in favor of the bank or against it in favor of third persons, and that the charter and by-law were directory in this particular, and the taking of the bond, not made a condition precedent. It was admitted, however, that if the statute had prescribed that the cashier should not be deemed for any purpose in his office until an approval of his official bond by the proper board, his acts would have been utterly void unless his bond had been given and approved." Ang. & A. Corp. § 285. Just so, it may be said, would be the fact in the case at bar, if the statute declared that upon ceasing to be a stockholder, the office of director should be deemed vacant. Before his bankruptcy, Gardner was an officer de jure; afterwards he continued to act under color of right, and so was an officer de facto. If a corporation elect a person a director who is ineligible to that office and permit him to act as such, the corporation will be bound by the acts which he performs within the scope of the authority possessed by a director. Despatch Line, etc., v. Bellamy Manuf'g Co., 12 N. H. 205. And as his acts cannot be questioned by the corporation, they cannot be by those who claim under the corporation, or collaterally. And it is to be borne in mind that the power of Gardner to act as an officer of the corporation is questioned, not by direct proceeding to vacate his office, but by a party who stood originally in the position of secured creditor, in a proceeding against other creditors, whose demands, presumably bona fide and valid, have been secured through the acts and instrumentalities, the validity of which is questioned. And so far at least as such creditors are concerned, their equities seem to be equal to those of complainant, provided their transactions with the corporation are untainted by fraud. On the whole, the only satisfactory conclusion I can arrive at is, that, notwithstanding his bankruptcy, Gardner was director and president de facto of the corporation, and as such, in the absence of fraud, the acts performed by him were the acts of the corporation, and that the transactions of the corporation, consisting of the settlements, conveyances and mortgages in question, were valid and should not be disturbed. Bill dismissed.

Case No. 636.

ATLEE v. POTTER et al.

[4 Dill. 559;[1] 11 West. Jur. 617.]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1877.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1875—TIME FOR REMOVAL.

1. The act of congress of March 3, 1875, [18 Stat. 471,] § 3, requires the petition for the removal of causes from the state court to the circuit court to be made "before or at the term at which the cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." The Code of Iowa provides that law actions "shall be tried at the first term after legal and timely service has been made:" Held, that this provision limits the time in Iowa at which the application for the removal of law actions, under the act of March 3, 1875, can be made.

2. Accordingly, an application in Iowa, by the defendants, for the removal of a law action which was not made at the return term, nor at the next term, when the defendants entered their appearance, nor yet at the next succeeding term, is not in time, under the act of March 3, 1875, although it was made at the term at which the answer was filed and the issues of fact completed.

3. In view of the specific provisions of the Code of Iowa, definitely fixing the time for the trial of law actions, the time for the removal, under the act of March 3, 1875, cannot be extended by the circumstance that in point of fact the issues are not made up at the first term. It might be different in the absence of statutory regulation as to what shall be the trial term.

[Cited in Chrissenger v. Democrat, 22 Fed. 754.]

At law. On motion to remand cause to the state court. The petition, which was at law, was filed in the state court November 25, 1875. At the August (1876) term of the state court, the defendants appeared and moved for a more specific statement of the cause of action. The motion was sustained, and the case continued. At the February term, 1877, the plaintiffs filed an amendment to their petition, and the defendants demurred, and at the same term the demurrer was overruled, and the cause went over. The defendants filed an anwer in vacation, May 9, 1877. No replication was necessary, and the answer completed the issues. At the next term, viz., the August term, 1877, an application for removal to this court was made by the defendants, under the act of March 3, 1875, on the ground of citizenship, and the removal was ordered. In this court the plaintiffs move to remand the cause to the state court, because the application for the removal was not made in time.

B. J. Hall, for motion.

E. S. Huston, contra.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This case was removed to this court by the defendants on the ground of citizenship, under the act of March 3, 1875, [18 Stat. 471.] The only question presented is whether the removal was applied for in time. The application for removal was not made at the term at which the original notice was returnable, nor at the term at which the defendants entered their appearance, nor yet at the next succeeding term, but was made at the term at which the answer was filed and the issues completed. The action is one at law, and not in equity.

The Code of Iowa, in respect of the time of the trial of actions, contains the following provisions: "Section 2744. Except where otherwise provided, causes shall be tried at the first term after legal and timely service has been made. Section 2745. The appearance term shall not be the trial term for equitable actions, except those brought for divorce, to foreclose mortgages, and other instruments of writing whereby a lien or charge on property is created, or to enforce mechanic's liens." Section 2744, supra, is the one which applies to this case, and it not being elsewhere otherwise provided, the cause was triable at the first term after due and timely service of the original notice (which stands in the place of a summons) had been made. It was therefore triable at the August term, 1876. The act of congress of March 3, 1875, requires the petition for removal to be made "before or at the term at which the cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof."

The cause could, under the local statute above referred to, have been put at issue one or two terms before this was actually done, and it could have been tried, and under the Iowa statute it was triable, at the term at which the issues could have been made up. The provision of the Iowa statute which has been referred to, definitely fixing the term "at which the cause could be first tried," limits the time at which the application for the removal can be made. The time for the removal cannot be extended under the specific provisions of the Code of Iowa, by the circumstance that, in point of fact, the issues are not made up at the first term. A different rule might apply in the absence of any statutory provision as to what shall be the trial term.

The act of 1875 gives the right of removal to either party on the ground of citizenship, without requiring prejudice or other cause to be shown, and it was evidently the intention of congress, by the language quoted, to require the party to apply for the removal at the trial term, even if the cause should not be in fact put at issue, or be actually reached for trial at that term.

The effect of a removal, ordinarily, if not always, is to occasion delay, and it was to prevent this, as far as practicable, that this provision in the act of March 3, 1875, was enacted. Hence it gives the right to apply for the removal before the term, and requires that it shall be made, not simply before the time when the cause can be tried, but before or at the term at which the same can be first tried. Under the Iowa statute, the first term after due service is the trial term for law actions. In equity causes, with the exceptions specified, the first term is the appearance term, and not the trial term. In law actions the removal must be applied for at the trial term, whether the issues are then made up or not. This is all that it is now necessary to decide.

The conclusion we have reached has the merit of fixing a certain and definite rule as to the time in which the application for the removal of law actions in this state must be made. It has the added merit of preventing delay, which experience shows to be one of the ordinary abuses of the right of removal. It has, also, the further merit of preventing a party from experimenting with the state court by demurrers and motions, with a view to remain if the outlook is favorable, or to apply for a removal if that course offers a more hopeful prospect. Under the act of July 27, 1866, [14 Stat. 369,] and March 2, 1867, [14 Stat. 558,] both of which, as carried into the Revised Statutes (section 639), are probably yet in force, the removal may be applied for down to the time of final trial or hearing, but the right of removal thereunder is much more restricted than under the act of 1875, and there is more reason for the enlarged time than exists under the last named act, which extends the right to either party, simply for the asking, if the cause is one which is removable at all. The motion to remand is sustained.

LOVE, District Judge, concurs.

Cause remanded.

NOTE, [from original report.] As to the time in which equity suits in Iowa must be removed under the act of March 3, 1875, see Palmer v. Call, [Case No. 10,686.] As to the time in which application must be made, under the act of March 3, 1875, to remove suits pending when that act was passed, see Baker v. Peterson, [Id. 776.]

Case No. 637.

The ATTACAPAS.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1856.

SALVAGE—DERELICT—PRINCIPLES UPON WHICH SALVAGE IS ALLOWED.

1. Any vessel is not derelict until abandoned by the master, without an intention of returning and resuming the possession.

2. Principles on which salvage is allowed. Twelve hundred dollars given under the circumstances of this case.

In admiralty.

Mr. Jewett, for libellants.
Mr. Prince, for claimants.

WARE, District Judge. The Attacapas, a brig of about 149 tons burthen, sailed from Port Haven, on the North river, with a ship's company in all of five hands, on the 17th of November last, having a cargo of 238 tons of coal, bound for Bangor. Her ground tackle was good but her running rigging was indifferent, though thought to be sufficient for the voyage. On her passage down the river and through the sound, she met with a good deal of bad weather and leaked badly, requiring to be pumped once in half an hour, when the sea was rough, and once an hour in favorable weather. She stopped several times on her way, and in running down Cape Cod she came to anchor off Newcombe Hollow, in about three fathom water, Nov. 24, at about 8 o'clock A. M., the wind then blowing a gale. Another vessel at the time was lying near her, but, under the pressure of the gale, soon dragged her anchors and went to sea. The crew went below to breakfast, but soon finding the vessel drifting they let go another anchor. The condition of the vessel was now undoubtedly one of great danger. She was so deeply laden that in a smooth sea the water was within three or four inches of the level of her deck, and in rough weather it constantly washed over. In the high waves she was in danger of striking the bottom where she lay, and her position was so near the outer sand bar, that the heavy ground swell might have carried her upon it with the wind, as it was off shore, and if it should haul out she would be very sure to ground on the bar. The master finding his peril, lying as he did on a treacherous coast, determined to weigh anchor and proceed to sea, but such was the strength of the gale, that the crew were unable to raise their anchors. It was then determined, for the safety of all, after putting the brig in the best condition to ride out the gale, to leave for the shore. The crew took out their clothes, bedding, and some other articles, and trusted themselves to the boat. In passing through the breakers the boat capsized and was destroyed, but the crew escaped to land, the mate badly wounded and two of the men slightly. Their clothing drifted on the beach. This was between ten and eleven o'clock, and by this time, it being known that a vessel was lying off in distress, the salvors and a number of other persons were collected on the shore. Two of the salvors, Rich and Swett, took the master and crew to their house, gave them a dinner and furnished them with dry clothing. After dinner and again in the evening, the master and crew with some of the salvors, and at twelve o'clock, Rich, Swett, and some others without the crew, went to the beach, but such was the state of the weather that it was not safe to attempt to board the brig. From this time the evidence becomes contradictory, and, to a considerable extent, irreconcilably so. Without going into a critical analysis of the great volume of testimony, and without entering on a fruitless attempt to conciliate what is irreconcilable, or undertaking the invidious office of comparing and deciding on the credibility of conflicting statements, I will give what appears to me to be the fair result of the whole evidence.

The salvors with the master and crew assembled on the beach early Sunday morning, and the wind had now so much moderated that it was determined to board the vessel in a whale boat belonging to Rich. Rich took the command, and the boat being prepared, six persons, as many as it was supposed could safely go in her, and among whom was Capt. Haskell, were arranged in their places ready for a favorable opportunity to pass the breakers. The orders were to jump in when the word was given. At that moment Capt. Haskell's attention was diverted to some person on shore, and as the launching of the boat was the work of an instant, he was left behind. But, after they had passed the breakers, Rich hailed Haskell and offered to go back in the boat and take him, but the noise of the water prevented his being heard. After boarding and examining the vessel Swett was left on board, and Rich, with the rest of the boat's crew, returned to the beach. At this time there were from fifteen to twenty persons, including the crew, present. Rich now proposed to return with a company of eight men and attempt to save the brig, but he said that having boarded her he should not give up his claim to salvage. The crew all declined, and of the whole company present only four volunteered to engage in the enterprise. Capt. Haskell, finding his crew failed him, now told Rich that he might take the vessel and do the best he could. He returned with four men who, with himself and Swett, six in all, with a good deal of hard labor, attended beyond doubt with considerable danger, after being prevented, by a change of the wind, from making Province Town harbor, navigated the ship to Boston and immediately gave notice to the owners in Salem.

The libellants claim salvage as for a derelict, but the vessel, I think, cannot be considered as a derelict in the strict and proper sense of the word. The master never abandoned the spem recuperandi until, his crew failing him, he consented to transfer his authority to Rich. The claimants, on the contrary, deny all right to salvage on the ground that the master was wrongfully dispossessed by the salvors, and that they obtained possession by a tort, not to say a crime. This ground of defence is entirely displaced by the evidence. The salvors, in my opinion, performed a highly meritorious service, and there was nothing in their conduct that should debar them from a fair reward. What that is, must be determined by all the circumstances of the case taken in connection with the principles on which courts award salvage. As the vessel lay Sunday morning, with the wind as it then was, leaking badly and the water ankle deep on deck, she had but a small chance of surviving the day without relief, and as the wind veered around in the course of the day, it seems to be all but a certainty that she would be lost on the bar. The crew refused to go on board unless a new boat was obtained for the vessel. None could be obtained nearer than Wellfleet, and it was far from certain that one could be had there ready for the use of the vessel before the next day. Such appears to me to be the real state of the case as well as I can infer it from the great mass of testimony, often contradictory, and mostly coming from witnesses on both sides under influences that more or less sway the minds of most men, but some of it from disinterested and unsuspected sources. That anything was saved for the owners, appears to me with a high degree of probability, was due to the salvors. That the attempt to save the vessel appeared at the time to be an enterprise of very considerable danger and hardship, I think, may be safely inferred from this, that out of about twenty persons present, all accustomed to the sea, only four could be induced, by the prospect of a salvage reward, to engage in the undertaking. The service, though laborious and hazardous, was not of long duration. They started from Newcombe Hollow in the morning and arrived at Boston the following night. The vessel was without provisions, and the personal expense of the salvors must have been something, and to these should be added the expenses of vindicating their claim, which has been strenuously resisted from the beginning. And a line of defense has been adopted by the claimants, which has not only led to expensive and protracted litigation, more than a week having been consumed at the hearing; but which, if sustained, would have seriously compromised the character of the salvors.

The general principle which governs courts of admiralty in awarding salvage is to give a liberal reward, not merely a compensation pro opere et labore, but such a reward as will be an inducement to men accustomed to the dangers of the sea, to adventure on these perilous enterprises, by which not only property but often lives are saved. For saving life, at whatever risk, the courts can give no reward, for there is no common measure between life and money; but the merit of saving property may be measured by a pecuniary compensation. Another reason for liberality is to make the compensation such as will in some measure guarantee the honesty of the salvors, so that they shall not be tempted to pay themselves by the embezzlement of property left without protection; and farther, to ensure the good faith of salvors, embezzlement is always visited with the entire forfeiture of salvage. There is not, indeed, much danger of embezzlement of a cargo like this. But if I do not misjudge, there is another consideration belonging to this case that ought not to be overlooked. This vessel was rescued from the perilous shores of Cape Cod, a coast as much dreaded by mariners as the infames scopulos Acroceraunia of antiquity. For the interests of humanity as well as those of commerce, it is certainly desirable that the inhabitants of such a coast should understand, that if they will hazard their lives in relieving vessels in distress, they will not be dismissed with a parsimonious reward, such as will the next time put them to a calculation of the relative value of a gallant and hazardous salvage and the plunderings of a wreck.

There is, in all cases, a difficulty in holding the scales exactly even in salvage, and this is increased when it occurs on a dangerous coast where frequent losses happen, and where the inhabitants calculate to gain part of their living by acting as salvors of vessels in distress. They engage in the service for profit, and the roughness and dangers incident to the service, contribute to give them, together with the expectation of a reward, somewhat of a mercenary character, as well as one of gallantry. Habit comes in to make them put a low estimate on the personal dangers, both of the crew and themselves, compared with the expected reward. But they never forget that, and the owners, though they might be generous when the danger is before them, when it is passed and their goods are saved, remember that what is saved after salvage is paid is saved for them.

The value of the vessel and freight are agreed to be $3,500, and, with these views, I have come to the conclusion to allow $1,200 salvage, with costs taxed against the residue of the vessel and cargo. The salvage is divided into fifteen shares and to be distributed as follows: To Capt. Rich, who was the leader of the enterprise, and furnished his boat for the service, four shares; to Capt. Swett, who was the first that boarded the vessel in the morning, three shares; and to the other salvors, two shares each.

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL—DEATH OF PARTY.

Case is not revived unless order to that effect. Action against administrator survives, if there has been an infringement; the latter being held as a trustee for the owner.

[Cited in Atwood v. The Portland Co., 10 Fed. 284.]

[See Root v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 105 U. S. 189.]

In equity. Bill filed [by James S. and Thomas B. Atterbury] against respondent [Joseph G. Gill, administrator of Andrew J. Beatty, deceased,] for infringement of patent, [No. 39,027,] which was on an improved jelly glass. Respondent answered. Testimony was taken and a hearing had. Complainant had a decree establishing the validity of the patent and also the fact of infringement by defendants. There was a reference to commissioners to take an account of profits and damages. The respondent died before the account was taken. After expiration of rule day to answer a bill of revivor under rule 56, the administrator of respondent filed a demurrer to that bill, when motion was made by complainant to strike such demurrer from the files. Rule to amend had now expired, and prior to the filing of the demurrer no order had been made reviving the suit against the administrator, nor had the administrator obtained leave to file the demurrer. Heard on demurrer to bill of revivor and motion to strike demurrer from the files. [Demurrer overruled, and order of revivor entered.]

Bakewell & Christy, for plaintiff.

Prentiss, Baldwin & Ford, for defendant.

WELKER, District Judge. Under rule 56, the case was not revived unless an order to that effect was made, and in this particular case the demurrer was allowed to stand as if filed on rule, and the motion was overruled. The demurrer raises the question of the survival of actions for infringement of patents, against the administrator of the infringer after a decree of infringement and reference to master or commissioner to assess amount for which decree was to be entered.

1. Although as a general rule, actions for torts do not survive against the representatives of deceased defendants pending the suit, yet these proceedings in equity for infringement of patents are not strictly proceedings for torts. The respondent who infringes a patent is held in equity as a trustee of the owner of the patent and compelled to account to him for the profits realized from the manufacture of the infringing machine or product. The infringer is also liable to the patentee for damages for such infringement, and both of these causes of action are combined in the case in equity, as well as the prayer for perpetual injunction.

2. In this case, the decree having settled the question of infringement, and the case having been referred to the master, before the death of respondent, to ascertain the amount for which the decree should be rendered, which will embody either both or one of these claims of claimant, therefore the action does survive. The demurrer is overruled and order of revival entered.

Case No. 639.

ATWATER v. HADLEY et al.

[Syllabi, 117.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. Dec. Term, 1876.

EQUITY—RESCISSION AND CANCELLATION OF CONTRACTS—FIDUCIARY RELATION—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The rule that courts will carefully scrutinize all transfers of property between those occupying fiduciary relations, and vacate any such transfer that is not entirely fair and equitable on the part of the person holding a position of trust and confidence, applied to the facts in this case.

In equity. Julinah P. Atwater was the owner in June, 1875, of notes and mortgages of the value of $3,100, which she placed in the hands of "Hadley's Law and Collection Agency" for collection; R. S. Hadley assuming to act for the same. On the death of one Seely, a brother-in-law, she claimed to own with her brothers and sisters an interest in the farm and farm property previously occupied by the deceased. A claim to the same was also made by the father and brothers of deceased. Propositions and consultations for settlement were frequently had and made during the summer of 1875, and for an amicable adjustment between the claimants, in which R. S. Hadley participated, acting as the attorney and adviser of Julinah P. Atwater representing herself, and the interest adverse to the Seely heirs. C. W. Hadley acted at one time in giving advice to Julinah P. Atwater, and in July the firm of Cogswell & Johnson were also employed as counsel to aid Julinah in a settlement. No arrangement was consummated, although concessions were made by the Atwater claimants, and on the night of July 30th or 31st, Julinah had agreed to an adjustment whereby the interest she represented would be satisfied with the amount of $2,500, and a contract on that basis was ready to be prepared for execution, which was finally objected to by the Seelys. When this last interview had broken off, it was communicated to the plaintiff and her brother, that a purchase of this adverse interest would be made by C. W. Hadley for the sum of $2,500, including the notes of the value of $3,100, and the claim to the other property represented to be of the value of about $5,000. This purchase was finally completed, and as it appears from the testimony, R. S. Hadley was a party to the purchase, although not appearing in the papers drawn up. He and C. W. Hadley were to take the property upon the following terms arranged between themselves: R. S. Hadley was to contribute $1,300, taking as his share the notes and mortgages admitted to be of the value of $3,100, and C. W. Hadley to have the interest in the land for the sum of $1,200. The terms of the sale were $1,000 cash, the notes and mortgages to be assigned to C. W. Hadley immediately, and a certificate of deposit in the First National Bank of Owatonna for the sum of $1,500, payable when a quit claim deed was delivered to the bank, executed by the Atwaters, brothers and sisters, and also a power of attorney from Julinah to C. W. Hadley to take possession of the farm and other property. The $1,000 cash was paid, and the certificate of deposit, as above, specifying on its face the conditions, was given to the plaintiff, and the other papers were drawn up and taken to be executed by the other parties who were absent. It appears that this sale was not entirely satisfactory at the time of the transfer of the notes and mortgages by the plaintiff, and is charged to have been assented to on account of the anxiety of mind and distress the plaintiff was in from the repeated failures to accomplish an amicable adjustment with the Seely heirs, and from apprehension of a criminal proceeding being instituted against her by these heirs. Cogswell & Johnson were not consulted in regard to this purchase by the Hadleys, and whenever their advice had been previously given in regard to the manner of a settlement with the Seely heirs, they had not approved of any concessions being made by the plaintiff of her rights, and of those of her brothers and sisters to the Seelys; and they regarded her claim undoubtedly valid to all the property. C. W. Hadley in his interview with the plaintiff gave her to understand that the Seely heirs could recover from her the notes and mortgages which she owned, and that there had been so much talk against her that she did not stand very well in the community. He also intimated that if the Seelys had him for their adviser, he would find a way to obtain possession of the property. R. S. Hadley at the time of the transfer of the notes and mortgages expressed himself as regretting the purchase by his son C. W. Hadley, when in fact he was a party to the purchase, as above stated. The plaintiff after the bargain was closed paid the "Hadley Agency" $50 for services rendered as her attorneys and advisers. She seeks in this suit to set aside this sale to the Hadleys.

It is urged by the defendants: 1st. That the fiduciary relation between the parties had ceased when the purchase was made. 2nd. That the sale was a fair and equitable one, and made by the plaintiff with a full knowledge of all her rights, and with no idea of obtaining any advantage over her on the part of the defendants.

Chas. A. Clark, for plaintiff.
Gordon E. Cole, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge. It must be conceded that the relationship of attorney and client, or principal and agent, existed, and was so understood by the parties, up to the time of the purchase. The burden is on the defendants to establish the fairness and equity of the transaction. The careful scrutiny which is bestowed by courts upon sales of this character between persons occupying fiduciary positions and their confidants is in accordance with public policy to prevent public mischief. The testimony in this case in my opinion brings it within the principle where the strict rule should be applied, and calls upon the defendants to establish the following characteristics without which this transaction cannot be sustained. The sale must have been fair, the price adequate, and the conduct of the defendants equitable; unless such was the case, the decision cannot be doubtful. That the price paid is wholly inadequate must be conceded. The value of the notes and mortgages is admitted to be $3,100, and the title to the realty was evidently considered good by the defendants. The letter of C. W. Hadley written immediately after the sale expresses a disappointment that the deed upon which it was expected the plaintiff's title could be enforced failed to be in conformity with the laws of the state of Minnesota, and shows that at the time of the purchase he regarded it conclusive upon the title. R. S. Hadley participated in the last effort between the plaintiff and the Seelys to settle the controversy, and it is stated by her that she would have yielded to a small demand on the part of the Seelys which broke up the interview, had not opposition been made by him. The defendants knowing the firm of Cogswell &

Johnson had been employed to aid in bringing about an amicable arrangement with the Seelys, never informed them of a contemplated purchase of the property, and did not consult at all with them as to the fairness and equity of the transaction. It was incumbent on the defendants to have fully communicated to these counsel their determination, and a failure to do so was unfair to the plaintiff, and not in accordance with the relationship existing between the parties. There can be no doubt that an advantage was obtained by the defendants, and so regarded by them.

The plaintiff regretting the step taken, offered to pay a bonus for the surrender of the notes and mortgages and cancellation of the sale, but this was declined for the reason that the notes had been taken by R. S. Hadley to be sold, and had at that time probably passed out of the control of the defendants or either of them. The testimony conclusively shows this statement to have been untrue. Without further comment I am satisfied upon a full examination of the evidence the complainant is entitled to the relief asked for. Authorities consulted: 9 Pick. 231; Gibson v. Case No. 640.

[2 Blatchf. 39.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 2, 1846.

EQUITY PLEADING—SPECIAL DEMURRER — MULTIFARIOUSNESS—DISCOVERY—COPYRIGHT—AUTHORSHIP — ACT FEB. 3, 1831 — COMPILATION — INFRINGEMENT—REMEDIES — ACTION ON THE CASE —DAMAGES.

1. A special demurrer to a bill in equity is insufficient unless it points out specifically, by paragraph, page, or folio, or other method of reference, the parts of the bill to which it is intended to apply.

[Cited in Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Macomb, 2 Fed. 20.]

2. Where an action at law for the infringement of a copyright was brought against G., and then the plaintiff filed a bill in equity against G., F. and A., charging them, as copartners, with having committed the acts for which G. was sued at law, and seeking a discovery from all of them in aid of the suit at law; Held, that G. could not, by demurrer, object to the bill as multifarious in respect to his co-defendants, especially as it appeared by the bill that they resided out of the jurisdiction of the court.

3. It seems, too, that the charge in the bill that the defendants committed the acts complained of as copartners, would be an answer to the objection of multifariousness, provided the bill contained other proper allegations connecting them with the object and purpose of the discovery prayed.

4. A defendant cannot be compelled to make discoveries in answer to a bill which seeks to enforce penalties and forfeitures against him by means of such discoveries.

5. Where a bill in equity claimed a forfeiture of pieces of music under section 7 of the act of February 3, 1831, (4 Stat. 438,) and also sought a discovery from the defendants of the number of pieces printed by or for them, and of the number on hand: Held, that the bill was bad, on special demurrer.

6. If the forfeiture had been waived in the bill, the discovery might be compelled in aid of the recovery of damages in a suit at law.

7. And it seems that, on such discovery, equity might compel the defendants to deliver up to the plaintiff the forfeited copies.

8. But the defendants cannot be directly required to convict themselves of the act which carries with it the forfeiture.

9. The objections which may be taken by general demurrer to a bill founded on a copyright, and seeking a discovery in regard to its infringement, in aid of a suit at law, are: (1.) That the plaintiff sets forth no title in himself to the subject matter of the copy-right: and (2.) That the bill lays no legal foundation for the discovery sought.

[Cited in Lawrence v. Dana, Case No. 8,136.]

10. To constitute a person an author under the copy-right act of February 3, 1831, (4 Stat. 436,) he must, by his own intellectual labor applied to the materials of his composition, produce an arrangement or compilation new in itself.

11. He may arrange or compile a new production from materials before known, or obtained for him by the labors of others, but he cannot obtain a copy-right for those materials in the same state in which they are furnished to him.

[Cited in Schuberth v. Shaw, Case No. 12,482.]

[See Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152. Compare Reed v. Carusi, Id. 11,642.]

12. A person cannot appropriate as his own, by copy-right, alterations and improvements made in a musical composition by others at his procurement and for him.

13. Where a bill in equity contains allegations which constitute an assertion of authorship under the copy-right act in terms sufficiently explicit to constitute a perfect title at law in the plaintiff, the bill will be held good on general demurrer, notwithstanding the defectiveness and inconsistency of other allegations in the bill as to the authorship.

14. An action on the case is the proper form of remedy to recover damages for the violation of a copy-right, and trespass will not lie for such violation.

15. To obtain a discovery in equity in aid of a suit at law, the bill must show it to be necessary for the plaintiff, and that, when made, it can be used to his advantage.

16. Such a discovery will not be granted where it is sought in aid of an action of trespass for the violation of a copy-right.

17. And a bill seeking such discovery will be held bad, on general demurrer.

18. It seems, too, that such a bill is defective in substance, where it seeks a discovery from three defendants, and the action at law is against only one of them.

19. Where a bill in equity against three defendants showed title in the plaintiff to a copyright, and a wrongful violation of it by all the defendants, and injuries inflicted and apprehended from such violation, and prayed for an injunction against all the defendants, and also for a discovery from all in aid of a suit at law against one for the same violation: Held, on general demurrer to the whole bill, that the relief by injunction was not dependent on the discovery prayed, and that, although the bill was bad as a bill of discovery, yet it was good as an injunction bill, and that the demurrer must be overruled.

20. A general demurrer to the whole bill must be overruled if any independent part of the bill is sufficient.

21. Nor will a formal protestation accompanying the demurrer avoid the force of the rule.

In equity. The bill in this case was filed by the plaintiff [Joseph F. Atwill] against Edmund Ferrett, Timothy S. Arthur and Elijah B. Galusha, copartners in Philadelphia and New York, under the name of Ferrett & Co. It set forth that, in December, 1844, an opera was produced at the Park Theatre in New York, for the first time in America, entitled "The Bohemian Girl," the music of which was composed by one Balfe, in Europe; that, soon afterwards, the plaintiff undertook to adapt, arrange and publish such music, and, in doing so, gave to particular pieces of the music titles differing from those they bore as composed and represented in Europe and in New York, and made many alterations of and additions to said music, and arranged trios as duetts, and duetts as solos, and gave names to nameless waltzes and gallops; that six pieces of music in the opera, whose titles were given, were expressly adapted and arranged for or by the plaintiff for publication; that the whole of the music of the opera, as written and published in Europe and performed in New York, was adapted, arranged and published by or for the plaintiff, and, as adapted by him, was essentially different from the music as arranged and published in Europe and performed in New York; that, prior to the publication by him of the several pieces of music of the opera so arranged and adapted by or for him, and with such additional matter, new titles, and new names, the plaintiff caused a printed copy thereof to be deposited in the clerk's office of the district court for the southern district of New York, in which district he then resided, and obtained from said clerk's office a copy of the record of said titles, and caused a copy of such record to be inserted at full length upon the title-page or frontispiece of each of the copies of each of the editions of each piece of music, by causing to be printed, in a conspicuous place, on each piece, the following words: "Entered according to act of congress, A. D. 1845, by J. F. Atwill, in the clerk's office of the Dist. court of the southern Dist. of New York;" that within three months after the publication of the same, a copy thereof was delivered to the secretary of state of the United States, to be preserved according to law; and that thus the plaintiff secured a copy-right for the said piece of music, and for the titles of the same. The bill then averred that the defendants had, without permission, sold at New York, to a considerable extent, copies of the several pieces of music so copy-righted, printed from and in exact imitation of the music as arranged and published by the plaintiff, and with the plaintiff's original matter introduced therein, and with his titles to some of them, and in violation of his copy-right; that the defendants had on hand a large quantity of said infringing pieces of music; that the plaintiff had sustained damages to the amount of fifteen thousand dollars; that, in July, 1845, the plaintiff brought a suit at law in this court against the defendant Galusha, (the only one of the partners residing in New York,) in a plea of trespass to recover damages for the said infringement, in which said Galusha was held to bail in $5,000; that said suit was still pending, and the plaintiff intended to bring the same to trial, and expected to recover heavy damages therein; and that a discovery from Galusha and his partners was necessary in order to enable the plaintiff safely to try said cause. The bill then called on the defendants to answer the specific allegations contained in it, and also to discover how many of the infringing pieces of music they had sold. and how many they had on hand, and to set forth an account of their sales, with the rate at which each piece had been sold, and of the number of copies printed by or for them. The prayer of the bill was, that all the infringing copies in the possession of the defendants, and the plates from which they were printed, might be delivered to the plaintiff; that the discovery prayed for. when made, might be used by the plaintiff as evidence on the trial of the action at law; and that the defendants might be enjoined from further infringements. The defendant Galusha demurred to the bill on the grounds set forth in the opinion of the court.

Marshall S. Bidwell, for plaintiff.

Randolph W. Townsend, for Galusha.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. Three separate demurrers are filed to the bill in this case by the defendant Galusha. The other two defendants have not entered their appearance. and it does not appear that they have been served with the subpoena. The defendant attempts to call in question distinct parts of the bill by severing his demurrers, and also takes objection to the whole by general demurrer. The special causes of demurrer are excepted to by the plaintiff as informal and insufficient, in not pointing out precisely the parts of the bill intended to be embraced by them. They adopt the general formulary, "that, as to so much of the bill as seeks," &c., without specifying, by paragraph, page, or folio, or other method of reference, where the objectionable matter is to be found. We think this mode of demurring to the statements of a long and involved bill is too obscure and indefinite to be admissible. Mitf. Pl. 214; Robinson v. Thompson, 2 Ves. & B. 118; Wetherhead v. Blackburn, Id. 121. The business of a special demurrer is to point out, by the clearest indications, the features alleged to be defective in the pleading, and to relieve the court from the labor and delay incurred by repeated searches for the parts to which the demurrer may apply. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 457–459; Devonsher v. Newenham, 2 Schoales & L. 199. In the present case, the court have abridged the bill paragraph by paragraph, and in that way have been enabled to select various statements which were undoubtedly intended to be embraced by the special demurrers; but we are not inclined to sanction so loose a mode of pleading. We, therefore, hold the special demurrers to be informal and insufficient, except in respect to the multifariousness of the bill, and to its demand of discoveries involving penalties and forfeitures against the defendant. In those particulars we think that the causes of demurrer assigned designate, with sufficient explicitness, the parts of the bill to which they are intended to apply.

(1.) The bill is objected to as multifarious by the defendant Galusha, on the ground that it makes charges against and exacts answers from his co-defendants in regard to matters involved in the suit at law commenced against him, which do not concern them, they not being parties to the suit at law. But the matters referred to concern him, and he cannot make the objection of irrelevancy in respect to his co-defendants, more especially as it appears, on the face of the bill, that they reside out of the jurisdiction of the court. Story, Eq. Pl. § 544, note 3. Another feature of the bill might also probably rescue it from this objection, inasmuch as it charges the acts complained of to have been committed by the three defendants as partners and in their copartnership character, provided they are all connected by other proper allegations with the object and purpose of the discovery prayed for. Mitf. Pl. 181, 183. The demurrer for multifariousness is overruled.

(2.) It is an incontrovertible principle of equity law, that a defendant cannot be compelled to make discoveries in answer to a bill which seeks to enforce penalties and forfeitures against him by means of such discoveries. Story, Eq. Pl. § 521, note 3; Id. §§ 522, 575, 598; Mitf. Pl. 194–197. In this case, the bill claims a forfeiture, under section 7 of the act of February 3, 1831, (4 Stat. 438,) of the plates and pieces of music on hand. Had the forfeiture been waived by the plaintiff, the defendants might be compelled to disclose the number of their publications, the quantity on hand, and the amount realized from sales, in aid of the recovery of damages in a suit at law. So, probably, on such discovery, equity might compel the defendants to deliver up to the plaintiffs the forfeited copies. But the bill is clearly faulty in directly requiring the defendants to convict themselves of the act which carries with it the forfeiture sued for.

The decision of these two points leaves untouched, however, the principal features of the bill which are supposed to be brought in question by the demurrers, and to the discussion of which the argument was mainly directed; and it, therefore, remains to be considered whether advantage can be taken of those matters by general demurrer.

The objections which may be taken on general demurrer are: 1. That the plaintiff sets forth no title in himself to the subject-matter of his alleged copyright; and 2. That the bill lays no legal foundation for the discovery sought.

1. The insufficiency of the plaintiff's title on the face of the bill is claimed to be this—that he alleges the musical composition, or considerable portions of it, to have been arranged, adapted, printed, and published by or for him, instead of averring that it was composed by himself. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contends, that even admitting this to be so, his title is complete, upon the legal adage, qui facit per alium facit per se, and that he can appropriate as his own the alterations and improvements of the music made by others at his procurement and for him.

The act of congress, (4 Stat. 436, § 1,) secures by copyright to any person who is the author of any musical composition the exclusive property in his composition for a term of years. The statute contains a more detailed description of the subjects of copyright than is given in the English acts of 8 Anne and 54 Geo. III., (Gods. Pat. Append. 384, 422;) but the construction given to those acts by the English courts makes them include, under the name of books, pieces of music, &c. So that our system has no broader operation in this respect than the English, and, no doubt, a just construction of both statutes will render their provisions concurrent. The counsel for the plaintiff insists that the doctrine of the English law enables a man to secure to himself as his own composition whatever he has had prepared for him by the labors of others. We think, however, that the cases of Tonson v. Walker, 3 Swanst. 672, 680; Nicol v. Stockdale, Id. 687; Cary v. Longman, 3 Esp. 273, 274; and Mawman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 385,—rest upon wholly different principles. They recognize the right of authorship, although the materials of the composition were procured by another, and also an equitable title in one person to the labors of another, when the relations of the parties are such that the former is entitled to an assignment of the production. But, to constitute one an author, he must, by his own intellectual labor applied to the materials of his composition, produce an arrangement or compilation new in itself. Gray v. Russell, [Case No. 5,728.] And the rules of the common law and of equity are the same upon this subject. Cary v. Longman, 1 East, 358; Sayre v. Moore, Id. 361, note; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 322. The title to road-books, maps, &c., rests upon this principle, (2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 940;) and the cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel have relation to new productions arranged or compiled from materials before known, or obtained by others for the author, and not to the appropriation by copy-right of those materials in the same state in which they are furnished.

If, therefore, the plaintiff's title rested only upon the allegation referred to, we should hold the bill to be defective on general demurrer. But we find repeated averments in the bill, to the effect that "he made many alterations of and additions to the said music"—that "he added new matters of his own, not in the original opera"—that he affixed a copy of the record on the title-page "of each piece of music composed, arranged and adapted by him for publication"—and that a copyright was taken out for such pieces "as arranged, adapted, and published by the plaintiff, with the new titles and original matter introduced therein by him," whereby he became entitled to vend the music "as arranged and adapted by him, and to the original matter introduced by him therein;" and the bill charges the defendants with having sold such music "printed from and in exact imitation of the music so arranged and adapted and published by the plaintiff, with the original matter introduced therein by him, and with his titles to some of such pieces of music." These allegations amount to an assertion of authorship in terms sufficiently explicit and full to constitute a perfect title at law, and, the facts being admitted by the demurrer, we must hold the right of the plaintiff established upon these averments, notwithstanding their defectiveness and their inconsistency with others contained in the bill. Mitf. Pl. 212. Such imperfect pleading is matter of form, and can be taken advantage of only by special demurrer. The general demurrer in this behalf must, therefore, be overruled. Verplank v. Caines, 1 Johns. Ch. 57; Higinbotham v. Burnet, 5 Johns. Ch. 184; Kuypers v. Reformed Dutch Church, 6 Paige, 570.

2. The discovery prayed for is to aid the plaintiff in his suit at law prosecuted against the defendant Galusha; and the averment in the bill is, that he has commenced an action of trespass against that defendant for the violation of his copyright. The demurrer raises the question whether the bill alleges such a suit at law as will afford foundation for the discovery sought, no relief consequent on the discovery being prayed for. It is clear that the plaintiff has adopted a form of action at law which cannot be supported. The English statute of 54 Geo. III. § 2, gives specifically an action on the case as the remedy for the violation of a copyright. Our act (4 Stat. 438) only indicates the form of action when a manuscript is published without the consent of the author, (section 9,) or when a suit is brought to recover the pecuniary penalty given by the sixth section. On general principles of law, however, it is clear that trespass cannot be brought for an injury merely consequential in its character, unaccompanied by force as against the person or property, or by wrongful intermeddling with the possession of property. 1 Chit. Pl. 126, 127. The act of 8 Anne, c. 19, did not designate the form of action, yet no doubt was ever expressed that case was the appropriate one. Beckford v. Hood, 7 Term R. 620; Cary v. Longman, 1 East, 358; Roworth v. Wilkes, 1 Camp. 94. To obtain a discovery in aid of a suit at law, the bill must show it to be necessary for the plaintiff, and that, when made, it can be used to his advantage. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 161; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 319, 321. It necessarily follows, from these principles, that a discovery will not be decreed in aid of an action at law, where it is manifest that the plaintiff cannot avail himself of it in the suit he is attempting to prosecute. It is, perhaps, also to be regarded as a substantive defect in the bill that it seeks a discovery from three defendants to aid a suit instituted against one alone. In so far, then, as the maintenance of the bill depends upon the plaintiff's right to a discovery, we think it defective in substance, and bad on general demurrer.

The bill, however, prays for an injunction, and, making title on its face in the plaintiff to the copy-right set forth, and showing a wrongful and wilful violation of the copyright by the defendants, and serious injuries inflicted by and apprehended from such violation, it is sufficient in substance and form to entitle the plaintiff to an injunction. This relief is not dependent upon the discovery prayed, but rests on the equities set forth in the bill, and may be refused or granted, irrespective of the discovery. A general demurrer to the whole bill takes exception, therefore, to this branch of it, and the principle of equity pleading is universal, that a general demurrer to the whole bill must be overruled if any independent part of the bill is sufficient. Higinbotham v. Burnet, 5 Johns. Ch. 184; Kuypers v. Reformed Dutch Church, 6 Paige, 570; Story, Eq. Pl. § 443. The formal protestation accompanying the demurrer is of no avail to protect it against this defect, as it cannot serve the purpose of a plea or answer, or form an excuse for not putting in the one or the other. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 452. 457, 458. We think, therefore, that the general demurrer must be overruled on both points. As faults in pleading have occurred on both sides, each party may amend without paying costs to the other.

Case No. 641.

ATWOOD v. KITTELL et al.

[9 Ben. 473;[1] 17 N. B. R. 406.]

District Court, D. Vermont. April, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—TITLE OF ASSIGNEE — CONVEYANCE OF REAL ESTATE—RENT.

K. furnished money to B., his son-in-law, and took a conveyance of a farm therefor; then K. conveyed the same farm to B. and his wife, conditioned upon the annual payment of a sum of money which was equal to the interest on the purchase money, to K. during his life-time and that of his wife, which sum was to be in full of the share of B. and his wife in his estate; further clauses conveyed the property to B. and his wife, their heirs, executors, and administrators, in consideration of an acquittance which B. and his wife gave to K. of all claims upon K.'s estate, and directed K.'s administrators to re-deed if the conditions were fulfilled. The annual payments were made up to 1867, but part of the amount due thereafter was not paid. B.'s wife died in 1867; her mother and her father, K., in 1874. Before K.'s death B. went into bankruptcy; and his assignee having filed a bill to determine his rights to the farm, making the heirs of B.'s wife and the administrators of K.'s estate parties: Held, that the conveyance to B. and his wife made them joint tenants as at common law, and conveyed a life estate to them for the lives of the lessor and his wife: that the clause conveying the real estate in consideration of the acquittance conveyed the whole remainder after the expiration of the life estate; that the clause directing the administrators of K.'s estate to re-deed the premises, was no part of the agreement of the parties, but a mere covenant for conveyance by his representatives; that the intention of the conveyance was to have the annual payments made and the estate holden for fulfillment; that the assignee was entitled to the farm, subject to a lien in favor of the administrators of K., for the amount of the annual payments due at his decease, with interest from the dates at which payment should have been made.

In bankruptcy.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard upon pleadings, proofs, and argument, from which it appears that William Buck, now a bankrupt of whose estate the orator is assignee, owned the farm in question, subject to some incumbrances, and that he and his then wife, who was the daughter of Jonathan C. Kittell, now deceased, and of whose estate the defendants Lewis H. Kittell and William F. Willey are administrators, conveyed the farm to him for the purpose of procuring sixteen hundred and sixty-six and two-thirds dollars, with which to pay off the incumbrances, and of having it reconveyed to them, subject to the payment of an annual sum equal to the interest advanced, during his life and the life of his wife, which sum was to be in full of their share of his estate; that pursuant to this arrangement they joined in a conveyance of the farm to him, and he immediately executed the instrument of conveyance set forth in the bill of complaint to them, and delivered to them the money and they executed an acquittance of all claim to his estate and delivered it to him. The wife of the bankrupt died in 1867, her mother in October, 1874, and her father on the 24th day of November, 1874. The annual sum was paid up to 1867, and part or all of that due since has not been paid. Perhaps the elder Kittell had before made advances to his daughter on account of which he required the acquittance, and perhaps not; whether he had or not is quite doubtful upon the evidence and not at all material here.

This bill is brought by the assignee to ascertain what rights he has to the farm, and the heirs of the wife of the bankrupt, as well as the administrators of the estate of her father, have been made parties. As the assignee stands upon the rights of the bankrupt, it becomes necessary to ascertain what rights remained to the bankrupt after the transaction and conveyances stated, and how they have been affected by subsequent occurrences.

The wife of the bankrupt was under the disabilities of coverture, but her husband and father were under none. She had no vested rights in her father's estate, and her acquittance of it formed no consideration in law for either of the conveyances. The bankrupt and her father were each the owners of what they conveyed, and had full power over the direction in which the conveyances would take the property.

It has been said in argument that the transaction showed the conveyance from the bankrupt to be a mere mortgage to secure repayment of the money advanced, and that it should be so construed now, and a lien declared for the money in favor of the representatives of the elder Kittell. But the transaction shows that the money was not to be repaid but was to remain, so there was no debt for any mortgage to secure; and without a mortgage debt there can be no subsisting mortgage. There are no extrinsic facts that have any weight to control the ordinary construction of these instruments. They were made upon valid consideration, by persons competent to make them, and are operative according to their legal construction and effect. The deed from the bankrupt was an absolute conveyance of the farm, and there is no room for construction upon it. The conveyance to him and wife is somewhat anomalous, and must receive interpretation. Whatever it carried was conveyed to them, "their heirs, executors, and administrators." At the common law this would have made them joint tenants without their being husband and wife. Co. Litt. 180; 2 Bl. Comm. 179. The nature of this joint tenancy is that the survivor takes the whole, according to the estate he would have if the tenancy continued, and either may alien his share according to the same estate. Brooke, Abr. "Cui in Vita," 8; Litt. Ten. § 288; Co. Litt. 186a. They hold by entireties for seisin, possession and survivorship, and by shares for feoffment, forfeiture, or default in a real action. Greeneley's Case, 8 Coke, 71. But when a conveyance is taken to husband and wife on account of their legal identity and attendant disabilities, they take differently. They take by entireties, but neither can alone alienate to create a moiety, so they do not take by moieties. In Brooke, Abr. "Cui in Vita," 8, it is laid down as per curiam, "ou le baron et femme purchase terre, et le barron alyen et devye, la femme poet aver cui in vita, et recouver l'entiere, car ne sont moyties entre la barron et femme durant le couverture, et ideo n'est bone pour ascun moytye, mes si les purchase devaunt le couverture, et puis ent'mary, et le bar' alyen tout et devye, la femme avait cui in vita de l'moyty et recouver ceo et l'alienac' est bon' del aut' moity q'd nota diversitie, car patet." 39 Hen. VI. 45.

The statute of this state of 1797 severed all joint tenancies not created in express terms; but this did not include the peculiar joint estate created by a conveyance to husband and wife, (Brownson v. Hull, 16 Vt. 309,) and it seems to have been the policy of the legislature of the state to preserve that kind of estate with its characteristics; for by the Revised Statutes, the former statute was expressly limited so as not to apply to such conveyances, and so the law remains still, (Gen. St. c. 64, §§ 2, 3.) So by the law of the state, this conveyance to husband and wife stood as at common law, and under it the survivor, the husband, as the common law has always been, took the whole. Litt. Ten. § 291; 1 Thom. Co. Litt. 576; Beaumont's Case, 9 Coke, 138b; Co. Litt. 187; 2 Bl. Comm. 182; Doe v. Parratt, 5 Term. R. 654; 4 Kent, Comm. 362; Brownson v. Hull, 16 Vt. 309. The instrument was executed with all the formalities required by the statute for the execution of a deed to convey full title to lands. No particular form of words is necessary to constitute such a deed. All that is required is that "there must be words sufficient to specify the agreement and bind the parties." 2 Bl. Comm. 297. The statute prescribes the mode of execution but not the form.

The first part of the instrument is plainly a lease of the premises during the lives of the lessor and his wife, provided the lessees pay the annual sum of one hundred dollars to them or the survivor, and pay all rent, which meant public rent, and taxes. The annual payment was not called rent in the instrument, but merely a sum of money. This conveyed a life estate, for the lives of the lessor and his wife, and the life of the survivor of them, to the lessees. Further on in the instrument it says: "And I the said Jonathan C. Kittell of Sheldon aforesaid, for and in consideration of an acquittance this day signed by the said William and Charlotte Buck to any right of claim to any portion of my estate after my decease, I do hereby give, grant, convey, and confirm all the before-named and described premises to the said William and Charlotte Buck, their heirs, executors, and administrators, with all the privileges and appurtenances belonging, from and after the time of my own decease, and the decease of my wife Elizabeth Kittell, so that no one claiming under me shall have or enjoy any right to any part or portion of said premises forever." These words are sufficient to make a conveyance of the whole remainder after the expiration of the life estate. As to that it was to take effect in futuro, but if livery of seisin was necessary, this would not defeat it, for livery of the particular life estate to the same parties under the same instrument would uphold it.

But under the registry system, a conveyance in futuro, without any particular estate to uphold it, may be made valid. Gorham v. Daniels, 23 Vt. 600. There is nothing in the instrument to show any different intent, except the last clause which directs and empowers the executors and administrators of the grantor to re-deed the premises "if the said William and Charlotte Buck faithfully on their part fulfil the conditions of" the instrument.

But this is not repugnant to the grant, further than it requires fulfillment of the conditions. It is in accordance with it, and only shows that the grantor may not have understood the full effect of the previous grant, and have inserted this clause for greater certainty. And further, this clause is no part of the agreement of the parties, but is merely a direction to his representatives, not binding on the other parties unless it be in respect to the part they were to fulfill. The instrument must be so construed as to give effect to all parts, according to the intention as gathered from the whole. And as it commenced with a proviso that the annual payment be made, and ended with a condition that conveyance be made if they fulfilled, the intention is plain to have the estate holden for fulfillment.

This construction is the same in effect as to hold that this part of the instrument was a mere covenant for conveyance by his personal representatives. For the covenant would run to the same persons in the same form, and would require conveyance to be made or decreed to the same persons.

The result is that the orator is entitled to the farm, subject to a lien in favor of the administrators of Jonathan C. Kittell, for the amount of the annual payment due at his decease, and to the exemption, if any, of the bankrupt. The annual payment was really interest on money and can be computed for the fractions of time, even if otherwise it could not be apportioned.

There is controversy on the evidence as to how much was due; upon which it is found that at his decease there was due all that accrued after February 10th, 1867, except the sum of $89.31 paid just before February 10th, 1868, in baled hay, which left $10.69 balance unpaid of the instalment due that day.

As these instalments were quasi interest and became due annually, they were like annual interest in respect to forbearance after they were due; and in analogy to that kind of interest, each instalment should bear interest from the time it should have been paid until paid, or until the time of reckoning, according to the law of the state. As reckoned to the time of entering the decree, the instalments amount to $938.29.

Let a decree be entered that upon payment by the orator, as assignee in bankruptcy of William Buck, to Lewis H. Kittell and William F. Willey, as administrators of Jonathan C. Kittell, the sum of nine hundred and thirty-eight dollars and twenty-nine cents, with interest from the 2d day of April, 1878, to the time of payment, the orator is to have and hold said farm free and clear of any claim in favor of said administrators, or any of the heirs of said Jonathan C. Kittell or of said Charlotte Buck who are parties to this cause.

[4 McLean, 350.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1848.

PARTNERSHIP—INCOMING PARTNER—LIABILITY FOR OLD DEBTS.

1. A purchase of goods made by two individuals, who take a third partner. An action against the three cannot be maintained by the seller of the goods, who had no knowledge of the contract.

[See Edmondson v. Barrell, Case No. 4,284.]

2. There was no implied promise by the third partner, on which an action can be sustained.

[At law. Heard on demurrer to the amended declaration. Demurrer sustained.]

Mr. Yandes, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Barbour, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This suit is brought to recover the amount for the sale of certain goods, wares, and merchandise. Leave was given to amend the declaration, under which three counts were added, alleging that the goods, etc., amounting to fifteen hundred dollars, were sold to Yarborough & Lockhart, who afterward sold them to Yarborough, Lockhart & Shoemaker, etc. To these counts there was a general demurrer.

This is not a case of guaranty. The sale was made originally to Yarborough & Lockhart. Before the commencement of the action, the sale was made of the same goods, to themselves and Shoemaker; and the assumpsit of the company is then alleged to the plaintiff. It does not appear that the sale was made by plaintiffs to Shoemaker, or that they had any knowledge of the fact. It was not competent for Yarborough & Lockhart, who made the original purchase of the goods by their own act, thus to change the first contract. This might have been done with the agreement of the plaintiffs; but this is not alleged in the declaration.

If A sell goods to B, who, at the request of A, agrees to pay C, to whom A is indebted the amount, C may maintain an action in his own name—the agreement having been made at the time of the purchase. But this is not the case before us. The plaintiffs may recover against Lockhart & Yarborough on the general counts. Demurrer sustained. 6 Blackf. 347. The indebtment of A to B is not, of itself, any consideration for a subsequent promise by the former to C, to pay C the amount of the debt.

Circuit Court, D. Maine. April Term, 1868.

SALE—CONTRACT—DELIVERY—WHEN TITLE PASSES—STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU—SALE BY CONSIGNEES—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. It is a general principle that if parties have contracted to sell and buy a specific article of personal property, of which weight, price, measure, and fitness are definitely prescribed, or if the terms of the contract provide suitable means by which those qualities, or conditions may be ascertained, and the articles are in the state, for which the parties contracted, the property passes eo instanti, by virtue of the contract, without delivery.

2. Where the terms of an executory contract of sale are agreed, and everything the seller has to do is complete, the buyer is entitled to the goods on payment or tender of the price, and not otherwise, when nothing is said as to the time of delivery or payment.

3. If the goods are sold on credit, and the contract silent as to time of delivery, the vendee is entitled to immediate possession, and the right of property vests at once in the buyer, subject to the vendor's right of stoppage in tran situ, if exercised before possession by the buyer.

4. As between parties, when the contract is complete, the property vests in the buyer; as to every one except the vendor, delivery of possession is necessary to every valid conveyance of personal property.

[Cited in Waring v. Mayor, etc., of Mobile, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 120.]

5. Where actual delivery is impracticable, or impossible, symbolical delivery will be equivalent in its legal effect.

[Cited in Waring v. Mayor, etc., of Mobile, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 120.]

6. Mere words, however, in case of the impracticability of actual delivery, will not suffice to constitute delivery and acceptance of goods. Added to the language of the contract, there must be some act of the parties tantamount to a transfer and acceptance, as where by some act dominion over the goods is relinquished by the vendor, and they are put in the power of the vendee.

[Cited in Waring v. Mayor, etc., of Mobile, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 120.]

7. As against subsequent purchasers or judgment creditors, delivery is necessary, but where actual manual occupation is impossible, from the character or situation of the goods, it cannot be admitted that no legal delivery can be made.

8. Under such circumstances valid sale is sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds if it appear that the title becomes absolute in the buyer discharged of all liens of the vendor.

9. The right of stoppage in transitu attaches to goods sold on credit, where nothing is agreed as to time of delivery. Then the vendee is immediately entitled to the property and the right of possession, but the latter is not absolute, being liable to be defeated if he becomes insolvent before he obtains absolute control.

10. Where there has been a sale by the consignee, which would, independently of the indorsement of the bill of lading, as against the consignor, give title to the vendee, the effect of the indorsement would be to take away the right of stoppage in transitu, in cases where otherwise it would exist.

11. Parties in Philadelphia consigned a cargo of coal to parties residing in Boston, to be delivered at Portland, and the consignees named in the bill of lading indorsed and delivered the same to the defendants, at their request, at a certain price per ton for the coal, with the right in the plaintiffs to draw for the amount at any time. Held, the terms of the sale were absolute, as also was the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, and defeated the right of stoppage in transitu, as against the purchaser.

12. It would make no difference in this case, if the consignees named in the bill of lading were only agents of the shippers of the coal, because two days after the arrival of the vessel, and after the master notified the defendants that he was ready to deliver, the plaintiff approved the sale, and insisted that defendants were bound by the contract.

13. It makes no difference in such case whether the consignee be the buyer of the goods or a factor. His transfer is equally capable of divesting the property of the owner, and vesting it in the indorsee of the bill of lading.

14. Where there is no actual delivery, a sale of goods may be valid at common law, and the contract be within the statute of frauds; but if there be a delivery, though symbolical, sufficient to transfer the property even as against the creditors of the seller and subsequent purchasers, and to the exclusion of the right of stoppage in transitu, there need not be anything more than would be sufficient to constitue a delivery, and to change the property at common law.

15. Mere delivery of a bill of lading is not enough, without a distinct acceptance of the same by the purchaser, but anything which was intended to be so, and received as such, which actually puts the goods within the reach and power of the buyer; and among the instances of such delivery cited by legal writers, is that of the indorsement of a bill of lading.

16. This case is wholly different from that of the holder of an ordinary order, as the consignee of a bill of lading has such a property that he can assign it over, and acceptance in such a case is acceptance of the goods. takes the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, and vests the absolute dominion of the goods in the buyer. If it were otherwise, still in this case, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment, because the delivery of the bill of lading and the bill of coal were made at the date of the contract, and the defendants subsequently offered to pay the plaintiffs a certain sum per ton to take back the goods, and release them from the contract, after which the defendants still retained the bill of lading and the bill of goods.

At law. Special assumpsit, together with the common counts for goods sold and delivered, and for money had and received. The substantial charge of the special counts was, that the plaintiff at the request of the defendants, on the 16th of March, 1865, bargained and sold to the defendants a certain quantity of coal called "Broad Top Coal," being the cargo of the brig Russian, then on her voyage from Philadelphia to Portland, as per bill of lading of the 30th of the same month, amounting to 289 tons, and that the defendants subsequently, when the vessel arrived with the coal on board, refused to receive it and pay for the same, as they had agreed to do. The contract price of the coal was $11.50 per ton, and the freight $6.50 per ton. The plea was the general issue, but the parties, after the evidence was introduced on both sides, withdrew the case from the jury by consent, and submitted the same to the court, under the act of congress in such case made and provided. Most of the material facts were undisputed, and they may be stated in a very few words.

Plaintiff was a merchant doing business in Boston, and the defendants were citizens of Maine doing business in Portland. Wanting to purchase coal, the defendants, on the 16th of March, 1865, called on the plaintiff at his place of business, and inquired if he, the plaintiff, had any soft coal on the way from Philadelphia, or, if not, whether he would not ship them a cargo of such coal; and being told that the plaintiff had just received a bill of lading for a shipment of such a cargo, bound to Portland, the defendants inquired if it was for sale, and if so, at what price the plaintiff would sell the coal. The price asked was $12 per ton for the coal, and the frieght was $6.50 per ton; but, as finally agreed, the price including freight was $18. Defendants agreed to purchase at that price, and the consignees—named in the bill of lading, A. C. Morse & Co.—indorsed and delivered to the defendants the bill of lading, which was introduced as evidence by the plaintiff. The bill of lading bore date on the 13th of March, 1865, and appeared to have been duly executed at Philadelphia on that day; and the bill of coal given by the plaintiff bore the same date, but the proof showed that it was written and delivered at Boston at the time the bill of lading was indorsed and delivered by the consignees, and that it was a part of that transaction. Payment was to be made in cash, and the plaintiff proved that he had a right to draw for the amount at any time. Freights immediately declined, and the agent of the plaintiff, one of the consignees, about a week after the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, being in Portland where the defendants resided, they requested him to sell the cargo to some other party, and offered to give him one dollar per ton if he would take the coal off their hands; the reason assigned for the request by the defendants was, that they should make a loss if they took the coal, but the agent of the plaintiff declined to accept the proposition. The proofs also showed that the vessel arrived at Portland, March 29, 1865, with the coal on board, in good condition, and that the master notified the plaintiff by telegraph of her arrival, and that the defendants refused to receive the coal. On the last day of March, one of the defendants called at the plaintiff's place of business and informed him, or one of the consignees, that the vessel had arrived, and requested him to come to Portland and take care of the coal or to sell it, and at the same time stated that if the plaintiff would do so, they would bear a part of the loss, and that they would make up the residue in other purchases of him in the course of the year. The plaintiff refused the proposition, and the defendants informed him that they, the defendants, would have nothing to do with the coal. The response of the plaintiff to that suggestion was, that if the defendants refused to receive the coal, he would sell it on their account, and charge them the difference. He also wrote them to that effect on the same day, in consequence of a telegram from the master that the defendants still refused to receive the coal. Some other correspondence between the parties was also introduced in evidence, but it contained nothing which is very material. The letter of the plaintiff to the defendants, dated March 31, of the same year, showed that they received the telegram from the master; and a telegram[2] from the defendants to the plaintiff, dated the 1st of April following, showed that the defendants on that day enclosed to the plaintiff the bill of lading of the cargo, and the bill of the coal which they received at the time the contract was made. The defendants refused to receive the coal, and thereupon the plaintiff advertised and sold the coal at public auction.

Davis & Drummond, for plaintiff.

Rand & Rand, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The principal defence is, that the contract was within the statute of frauds, and void. The contract was made in Massachusetts, and the statute there provides that no contract for the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise for the price of $50 or more shall be good or valid until the purchaser accepts or receives part of the goods so sold, or gives something in earnest, to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the bargain is made and signed by the party to be charged thereby, or by some person by him thereunto lawfully authorized. Gen. St. 327. Where the statute does not apply, it may be laid down as a well-settled general principle, that if the parties have agreed, one to buy and the other to sell specific articles of personal property, of which the price, weight, measure, and requisite fitness are definitely prescribed, or if the terms of the contract provide suitable means by which those qualities or conditions may be ascertained, and the articles which are the subject of the negotiation are in the state for which the parties contracted, the property passes eo instanti, by virtue of the contract of sale, and without delivery. Repeated decisions have affirmed the rule, that when the terms of sale are agreed between the parties, and everything the seller has to do with the goods is complete, the contract of sale becomes absolute, as between the parties, without actual payment of the price or delivery of the articles, and the property and the risk of accident to the goods vest in the buyer, subject to certain qualifications. He is entitled to the goods on payment or tender of the price, and not otherwise, when nothing is said at the sale as to the time of delivery or the time of payment. But if the goods are sold upon credit, and the terms of the contract are silent as to the time of delivery, the vendee is entitled to the immediate possession, and the right of property vests at once in the buyer, subject to the seller's right of stoppage in transitu, if exercised before the former actually obtains possession. Leonard v. Davis, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 483; Tome v. Dubois, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 548; 2 Kent, Comm. (11th Ed.) 658; Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 571; Homes v. Crane, 2 Pick. 607; D'Wolf v. Harris, 4 Mass. 515, [4 Mason,

[2] [7 Amer. Law Reg. 659, gives "letter."]

Case No. 4,221;] Grosvenor v. Phillips, 2 Hill, 147.

Executory contracts only are the subject of remark on the present occasion, as it is clear that when the contract has been in fact fully performed, the rights, duties, and obligations of the parties resulting from such performance stand unaffected by the statute. Stone v. Dennison, 13 Pick. 4; Browne, St. Frauds, p. 118, § 116. Although it is true, as between the parties, that the property vests in the buyer without delivery, when the bargain is complete, and everything is done by the seller which the terms of the contract prescribed, yet it is equally true, as is perfectly well established, that as against every one, except the vendor, a delivery of possession is necessary in every valid conveyance of personal property. Lanfear v. Sumner, 17 Mass. 110; Caldwell v. Ball, 1 Term R. 205. Actual delivery, however, is often impracticable from the cumbrous nature of the article, and sometimes impossible on account of the situation, or because not present, as in the case of goods or ships at sea. Symbolical delivery will in such cases be sufficient, and equivalent, in its legal effect, to actual delivery without the actual manual occupation by the purchasers. Leonard v. Davis, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 482; 2 Kent, Comm. (11th Ed.) 671; Frostburg Min. Co. v. New England Glass Co., 9 Cush. 118. Delivery of the key of the warehouse in which goods sold are deposited, or transferring them on the books of the warehouseman or wharfinger to the name of the buyer, is in general sufficient to transfer the property, under the terms of a proper contract to that effect. Chaplin v. Rogers, 1 East, 194; Dodsley v. Varley, 12 Adol. & E. 632. So the delivery of the receipt of the storekeeper for the goods, being the documentary evidence of the title, has been held to be a constructive delivery of the goods. Wilkes v. Ferris, 5 Johns. 335.

Timber, logs, or other lumber floating in the water, are only in the constructive possession of the owner, and under such circumstances only a symbolical delivery in case of sale is all that can be expected, and is amply sufficient to pass the title, as between the parties. Ludwig v. Fuller, 17 Me. 162; Boynton v. Veazie, 24 Me. 288; Macomber v. Parker, 13 Pick. 175. Mere words, however, even in the case of cumbrous articles, are not sufficient to constitute a delivery and acceptance of goods, such as the statute requires. Superadded to the language of the contract, there must be some act of the parties amounting to a transfer of the possession, and an acceptance thereof by the buyer, as where the seller does some act whereby he relinquishes dominion over the property, and puts it in the power of the buyer. Shindler v. Houston, 1 Comst. [N. Y.] 266. Examples put in that case as illustrations are, where the key of the warehouse was delivered to the buyer, and where the bailee of the goods was directed to deliver them according to the contract. Words only do not constitute an actual or symbolical delivery within the meaning of the statute of frauds. The extent of the rule as there laid down is, that there must be some act of the parties superadded to the language of the contract, which amounts to a transfer of the possession of the goods; but the court do not deny that a valid delivery may be made symbolically, in cases where an actual delivery is impossible or impracticable. Undoubtedly a delivery is necessary to give validity to a sale, as against subsequent purchasers or judgment creditors; but it cannot be admitted that in cases where an actual manual occupation of the articles is impossible, as in case of goods or ships at sea, or in case of cumbrous articles, no legal delivery can be made. Such a delivery is legal and sufficient to pass the title, when made in the usual manner, and by the usual symbol, fitted to prevent fraud, and give certainty to the transaction. Valid sale of personal property, as against subsequent purchasers and judgment creditors, is sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, if it appears that the title becomes absolute in the buyer, and discharged of all liens on the part of the seller. When goods are sold at sea, the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading to the buyer, and the acceptance of the same by him under the contract, are the proper substitutes for an actual delivery and acceptance of the goods, and have the effect to vest a perfect title in the buyer, discharged of all right of stoppage in transitu, on the part of the seller and indorser of the bill of lading. Newson v. Thornton, 6 East, 41; Pratt v. Parkman, 24 Pick. 42.

The right of stoppage in transitu was conceded to the seller, in order to prevent the injustice which would take place, if in consequence of the vendee's insolvency, while the price of the goods was yet unpaid, they were to be seized and appropriated in satisfaction of his other liabilities, to the prejudice of the rights of his unpaid vendor. The vendor's right in respect of his price is not a mere lien, which he will forfeit if he parts with the possession, but grows out of his original ownership and dominion. Such a right attaches to goods sold on credit, where nothing is agreed on as to the time of delivery. In that state of the case, the vendee is immediately entitled to the possession, and the property and the right of possession vests at once in him; but his right of possession is not absolute, because it is liable to be defeated, if he becomes insolvent before he obtains the absolute control of the goods. Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 948; Tooke v. Hollingworth, 5 Term R. 215. Goods may be stopped in transitu so long as the transit continues, whether by land or water, from the consignor to the consignee, and whether they are in the hands of the carrier, ware-housekeeper, wharfinger, or any other individual connected with the transportation; but the right of stoppage ceases when the goods have reached the place of destination, and have come to the actual or constructive possession of the consignee. Covell v. Hitchcock, 23 Wend. 613; Mottram v. Heyer, 1 Denio, 487; Smith, Merc. Law, 683. Possession actual or constructive defeats the right of stoppage in transitu, and the bill of lading becomes functus officio as soon as the goods are landed and warehoused in the name of the holder, as he then becomes possessed of the goods themselves in the eye of the law, and derives his power, not from the bill of lading, but from such possession. Nothing can be more certain than the rule that, as between the consignor and the consignee on the one side, and third parties on the other, the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading by the consignee of goods at sea, and the acceptance of the same by the buyer under a contract, made in good faith, defeats the right of stoppage in transitu by the consignor. The settled rule is, that in such cases, where there has been a sale by the consignee which would give a title to the vendee, as against the consignor independently of the indorsement of the bill of lading, the effect of the indorsement would be to take away that right even in cases where it would otherwise exist. Gurney v. Behrend, 3 El. & Bl. 622; Pennell v. Alexander, 3 El. & Bl. 283.

Regarded as consignees, therefore, it is clear that the plaintiffs never had any right of stoppage in transitu, as the terms of the sale were absolute, and the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading by Morse & Co. were absolute and unconditional. The suggestion may be made that Morse & Co. were only agents of the plaintiffs, and that the latter were in fact the shippers and owners of the coal. Suppose that to be so, and suppose that they are not estopped to deny that the bill of lading expresses their true relation to the goods, still it can make no difference in this case, as the vessel had arrived, and the master had notified the defendants that he was ready to deliver the cargo, and the plaintiffs, two days after, affirmed the sale, and insisted that the defendants were bound by the contract. Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 307; Craven v. Ryder, 6 Taunt. 433. Bad faith is not imputed in that case, and the supreme court, speaking to the precise point under consideration, say that, by the well-settled principles of commercial law, the consignee in the bill of lading is constituted the authorized agent of the owner, whoever he may be, to receive the goods, and by his indorsement of the bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice of any adverse interest, the latter becomes, as against all the world, the owner of the goods. It matters not whether the consignee in such a case be the buyer of the goods or the factor or agent of the owner. His transfer in such a case is equally capable of divesting the property of the owner and vesting it in the indorsee of the bill of lading. Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 445. The same court held in Gibson v. Stevens, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 399, that where personal property is, from its character or situation at the time of the sale, incapable of actual delivery, the delivery of the bill of sale or other muniments of title is sufficient to transfer the property and possession to the vendee. Transactions of that character, say the court, if in the usual course of trade, and free from all suspicion of bad faith, have the effect to transfer the legal title and constructive possession of the property to the purchaser; and the court expressly affirms the doctrine that, ships at sea may be transferred to a purchaser by the delivery of a bill of sale, and that goods at sea may be transferred by the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading. Taney, C. J., adds, that it is hardly necessary to refer to adjudged cases to prove a doctrine so familiar in the courts. Grove v. Brien, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 436.

Actual delivery is a manual transfer of the commodity sold to the vendee, and operates to transfer the title in all cases, unless it be made upon a condition which prevents such a consequence. So a delivery to a common carrier in the usual course of business, is a sufficient delivery to the vendee, but the right of stoppage in transitu remains in the vendor. Stanton v. Eager, 16 Pick. 467. But the bona fide transferee, for value, of a bill of lading indorsed by the consignee of the shipper, takes an absolute title to the goods, free from the equitable right of the unpaid vendor to stop the goods in transitu, as against the purchaser. The obvious reason of the rule is, that by reason of such a transfer of the bill of lading the transitu is regarded as ended, and the right of stoppage therefore is gone. See Story, Sales, 214, 244; Dows v. Greene, 24 N. Y. 641; Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 325; Gurney v. Behrend, 3 El. & Bl. 622–637. The views of Mr. Browne are, that in order to work an acceptance and receipt of goods purchased, it is not necessary that there should be an actual manual possession of them by the buyer, and he affirms that the statute requires no other act of acceptance and receipt than such as are consistent with the nature, locality, and condition of the goods. The substance of his proposition is, that the statute will be satisfied with symbolical acceptance and receipt of the goods when the case admits of no other delivery, and he expressly states that, in case of a ship or cargo at sea, the delivery and acceptance of the bill of sale or the bill of lading will suffice to perfect the transfer. Browne, St. Frauds, 318; Badlam v. Tucker, 1 Pick. 389; Gardner v. Howland, 2 Pick. 599; Brinley v. Spring, 7 Greenl. [7 Me.] 241. Acceptance and receipt of inaccessible and ponderous or bulky articles may be legally accomplished, in the view of that commentator, by the performance of any act which shows that the seller has parted with the right and claim to control the property, and that the purchaser has acquired that right. Boynton v. Veazie, 24 Me. 288; Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns. 420; Edan v. Dudfield, 1 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 302.

The proposition of the defendants is, where manual possession of the goods is not taken by the buyer, there must be something more than would be sufficient to constitute a delivery and to change the property at common law; and if by that it is only meant that a sale may be valid at common law, as between the parties, and the contract still be within the statute of frauds, the proposition may well be admitted. Subject to that qualification, the proposition is doubtless correct in cases where there is no actual delivery; but if the proposition is understood to include sales by parol contract where there is a delivery, though symbolical, yet sufficient to transfer the property, not only as between the parties, but against the creditors of the seller and subsequent purchasers, and to the exclusion of the right of stoppage in transitu, then the correctness of the proposition cannot be admitted. Possession as matter of law is not in abeyance; it is somewhere, and if not in the seller, it must, in contemplation of law, be in the buyer, and if so, it is clear that the case is not within the statute of frauds. Recent English decisions, it is contended by the defendants, assert a different doctrine, but the cases cited, upon careful scrutiny, do not appear to support any such conclusion. Take, for example, the case of Meredith v. Meigh, 2 El. & Bl. 365, which is the first of the cases referred to as maintaining the proposition. The statement of the case shows that the defendants, at Handley, on the 12th of April, 1850, verbally ordered from the agent of the plaintiff a cargo of china-stone clay, requesting the agent to send it by sea, consigned to certain public carriers at Liverpool, for the defendants, and to be insured by the plaintiff on their account. Plaintiffs resided at Cornwall, and the ordinary mode of transportation was by sea to the Mersey, and thence by inland navigation. Both parties knew that the company named as carriers were engaged in transporting goods from the Mersey to the defendants' place of business. Pursuant to the order, the cargo was sent by a vessel selected by the plaintiff, and on the 18th of April an unsigned copy of the bill of lading was forwarded to the inland carriers, with directions that when they received the bill of lading they should forward the cargo. The shipment was completed the 22d of April, and the bill of lading, duly signed, was sent as directed in the order. On that day the vessel sailed, and on the 26th of the same month she was lost. Notice of shipment was given to the defendants, but they remained silent, and there was no evidence that they ever saw the bill of lading. Held, that a delivery to the master of the vessel selected by the plaintiff was not a delivery to the defendants; and that the silence of the defendants did not alter their situation, as there was nothing in the circumstances which required them to take any action in the premises. Some of the judges thought that the case might have been different if the bill of lading had been received by the defendants themselves, and especially if they had dealt with it, or had in any respect acted as the owners of the goods. Erle, J., said: "I have no doubt that the bill of lading, which is the symbol of property, may be so received and dealt with as to be equivalent to an actual receipt of the property itself; and the court of queen's bench, in the case of Currie v. Anderson, 2 El. & El. 593, subsequently so held, although the bill of lading was made out in the name of the plaintiffs. Adjudged cases may be found which seem to imply that there cannot be such an acceptance and receipt of the goods by the buyer as will take the case out of the statute of frauds, unless he has examined the goods, or done something to preclude him from contending that they do not correspond with the contract, but the converse of that proposition is now well-settled law. Morton v. Tibbett, 15 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 428; Parker v. Wallis, 37 Eng. Law & Eq. 26; Fitzhugh v. Wiman, 5 Seld. [9 N. Y.] 565.

The next case cited by the defendants is that of Bill v. Bament, 9 Mees. & W. 36, which is a case where the sale was for ready money, in which the plaintiff was not bound to deliver until the payment of the price; and inasmuch as there had been no delivery, the court held that there was no evidence to go to the jury to satisfy the statute of frauds. Reference is also made to the case of Norman v. Phillips, 14 Mees. & W. 278, which was a verbal order for timber, directing it to be sent to a railway station, and forwarded to a described place, as had been the practice between the parties in previous dealings. The timber was sent, and arrived at the place of destination, but the defendant, when notified of its arrival, refused to take it. When it arrived it was unaccompanied by any invoice, but one was sent in a few days, which was received by the defendant, and he kept it for a period exceeding a month, and then informed the plaintiff that he declined taking the timber. The verdict was for the plaintiff. A rule to set it aside, and enter a nonsuit was granted, which was made absolute, as the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a verdict. Reliance is also placed upon the case of Farina v. Home, 16 Mees. & W. 119, although its application is not apparent. Plaintiff shipped goods upon the verbal order of the defendant to his own agent, who stored them, and indorsed the warehouseman's receipt to the defendant, who kept it for some months, but denied that he had ordered the goods, and refused to pay the charges on them. Held, that there was no delivery, the warehouseman's possession being considered to be that of the consignee, notwithstanding the indorsement of the receipt, until the warehouseman attorned to the vendee. Comment need not be made upon adjudged cases where it appears that the goods remained in the possession of the vendor, as it is evident that they do not support the proposition of the defendants in this case. Castle v. Sworder, 5 Hurl. & N. 281. Certain other cases are also referred to, which decide that a delivery of goods ordered to a carrier, without more, is not such a delivery to the buyer as will take the contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds, which is doubtless correct, as in that state of the case there is no acceptance of the goods, actual or symbolical, and they are still subject to the right of stoppage in transitu by the seller, and every objection as to quality or quantity by the buyer. Coombs v. Bristol & E. R. Co., 3 Hurl. & N. 510; Outwater v. Dodge, 6 Wend. 400; Howard v. Borden, 13 Allen, 300. Decided cases, where it appears not only that the defendant did not accept the goods sent under an order, but that he refused to do so, need no comment; and if it appears that he merely examined the goods to ascertain their quality or quantity, it cannot make any difference, as in such case there is no evidence of acceptance. Kent v. Huskinson, 3 Bos. & P. 233.

When goods are in custody of a third person, an order for delivery with notice to that person is sufficient to pass the property, even as against the attaching creditors of the vendor. Tuxworth v. Moore, 9 Pick. 347; Carter v. Willard, 19 Pick. 1; Burge v. Cone, 6 Allen, 412; Boardman v. Spooner, 13 Allen, 357; Whitaker v. Sumner, 20 Pick. 405. Assent by the party, however, in whose custody the goods are, it is said, is necessary to constitute acceptance and receipt under the statute of frauds; but if the parties agree that he shall, as between them, be considered the bailee of the buyer, it is not perceived how the acts of the bailee can defeat the sale. Bentall v. Burn, 3 Barn. & C. 423; Farina v. Home, 16 Mees. & W. 119. Text-writers agree that a mere delivery of a bill of lading is not enough without a distinct acceptance of the same by the purchaser; but anything amounts to a delivery and acceptance, says Parsons, which was intended to be so, and received as such, and which actually put the goods within the reach and power of the buyer; and, among the cases enumerated by the author, where symbolical delivery is sufficient, is that of the indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading. Pars. Merc. Law, 75. Most recent text-writers in England also maintain the same views, and there is no decision to the contrary. Macl. Shipp. 341; Maude & P. Shipp. 143; Chitty, C. & M. 403; Lickbarrow v. Mason, 6 East, 20. The argument of the defendants is, that there is no difference between the case at bar and an ordinary order; but it is not possible to adopt that suggestion, as a different rule prevailed for a century before the Revolution. "The consignee of a bill of lading," said Holt, C. J., "has such a property that he may assign it over." Evans v. Martlett, 1 Ld. Raym. 271. If the goods are bona fide sold by the factor at sea (as they may be, where no delivery can be made), the sale, said Lord Mansfield, will be good, and the vendee shall hold them by virtue of the bill of sale, though no actual possession is delivered. Wright v. Campbell, 4 Burrows, 2046; Davis v. Bradley, 28 Vt. 121. Indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading passes no title if the instrument was stolen, or if the consignor was not the owner of the goods; but if the assignment was bona fide at the transfer, delivery and acceptance of this symbol will transfer everything which it represents. Newsom v. Thornton, 6 East, 19. Acceptance in such a case is the acceptance of the goods, and has the effect to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, and vests the absolute dominion of the goods in the buyer, and the right of stoppage in transitu ceases from that moment. Dows v. Greene, 24 N. Y. 642.

Even suppose it were otherwise, still the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment in this case, in view of the special circumstances set forth in the statement. Delivery of the bill of lading, together with the bill of the coal, was made at the date of the contract. The subsequent conduct of the defendants clearly shows that they regarded the transfer of the property as complete, as they offered to pay the plaintiff one dollar per ton to take it back, and release them from the contract. Although the plaintiff refused to do as requested, still the defendants retained the bill of lading and the bill of parcels, without any intimation that they should not receive the cargo. They substantially repeated the request after the vessel arrrived, and the same being again refused, they still retained the instruments of title, until the 1st of April, when they were returned as described in the statement. Due notice was given of the time of the sale of the cargo, and it was properly sold, as is required in such cases. Plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION PROCEEDINGS — DISCHARGE OF ASSIGNEE—TAXING REGISTER'S FEES.

[1. Where a composition between a bankrupt and his creditors has been confirmed, and its terms complied with, any question as to what amount the assignee should pay over to the bankrupt as the balance in his hands should be determined by the register under a special order of the court, and not upon a final accounting or creditors' meeting pursuant to Rev. St. § 5096.]

[2. The confirmation of such composition, and the bankrupt's compliance with its conditions, suspends the functions of the assignee as to the administering of the estate, subject to revival by an order of the court setting aside the composition; and the delivery of any property to the bankrupt, pursuant to the terms of the composition, completely discharges the assignee from further liability therefor, since the creditors have waived their right to call him to account for it as long as the composition remains in force.]

[3. If any question arises in respect to the register's fees, they must be taxed by the clerk, pursuant to general order No. 30, before they can be allowed, and an order therefor should be made on application of the bankrupts.]

[In bankruptcy. On motion by August and others, bankrupts, a composition with their creditors having been confirmed, that it be referred to the clerk of the court to ascertain the amount due from the assignee to the bankrupts. Order referring the matter to the register.]

Prescott & Butler and E. W. Bloomingdale, for bankrupts.

W. T. Carlisle, for assignee.

CHOATE, District Judge. In this case a composition has been accepted and confirmed, which provides for the payment of ten per cent. in cash, and twelve and a half per cent. more to be secured by the notes of the bankrupts, payable in six or twelve months. The cash instalments having been paid and the notes given conformably to the resolution, and the assignee having filed his account with the register, he gave notice to the creditors, in conformity with Rev. St. § 5096, that he would apply for a settlement of his account and for a discharge from his liability as assignee. In pursuance of this notice, a meeting of creditors has been convened for the purpose of passing the assignee's account. At that meeting the bankrupts objected to the regularity of the proceedings, on the ground that the creditors have no interest in the funds in the hands of the assignee; that, since the confirmation of the composition, the bankrupts alone are entitled to whatever of their estate is in the hands of the assignee; and that any question arising between the bankrupts and the assignee, as to what amount of money the assignee should pay over as the balance in his hands, should be determined under a special order of the court, and not upon a final accounting or a creditors' meeting, pursuant to Rev. St. § 5096. The bankrupts now move, on notice to the assignee, that it be referred to the clerk of this court to ascertain the amount due from the assignee to the bankrupts.

The position taken by the bankrupts in respect to the meeting of creditors called to pass the final account of the assignee is correct. Such meeting should not have been called. The creditors have in fact consented, by adopting the resolutions of composition, that the entire estate be delivered to the bankrupts to enable them to perform, on their part, the agreement of composition. Thereupon it became the duty of the assignee to hand over any balance of money remaining in his hands to the bankrupts, and also any other assets belonging to the estate. His functions, so far at least as the administering of the bankrupts' estate is concerned, are, by the confirmation of the composition and the bankrupts' compliance with the conditions thereof, which were precedent to the delivery of the property to them, suspended, subject, however, to being revived in case, under the power reserved by the statute to the court, an order shall hereafter be made setting aside the composition. The delivery by the assignee of any money or property to the bankrupts, pursuant to the terms of the composition, completely discharges him from further liability therefor; the creditors having consented that he pay over the money in his hands to the bankrupts having necessarily waived any right which, but for this agreement, they would have had to call him to an account therefor, at least so long as that agreement remains in force. The account to be taken at a creditors' meeting under section 5096 is professedly preparatory to the declaring of a dividend, and no such dividend is now possible.

The court has power to enforce the terms of the composition, and therefore will, upon the application of either party, determine any questions that may arise in such a case between the assignee and the bankrupts as to what is the balance of the estate in the assignee's hands to which the bankrupts are entitled. The proper mode of doing this is to refer it to the register in charge of the case, by special order, to take account of the money received and disbursed by the assignee, and to report what amount he still holds, if any, which the bankrupts are entitled to. It is urged that as this is not a duty specially imposed on the register, by the statute, the court may refer the matter to the clerk. Doubtless it is within the power of the court to dispense with the assistance of the register in this or any other matter; but the evident design of the statute is, that when the court needs the aid of such an officer in the performance of duties of this general character in the administration of the bankrupt law, it shall call to its assistance the registers. Rev. St. §§ 4993, 4998; General Orders 5 and 19. No cause is shown for not referring this matter to the register. It would not, therefore, be proper to refer it to any other person. It is suggested, however, that questions are likely to arise in the settlement of the account in respect to charges of the register paid by the assignee, and which he asks to have allowed as disbursements. This constitutes no reason for withholding the order referring the account to the register. In respect to the register's fees, if any question arises, they must be taxed by the clerk, pursuant to General Order No. 30, before they can be allowed; and an order therefor will be made on application of the bankrupts.

Order referring the matter to the register.

PILOTS—PILOTAGE IN NATURE OF SALVAGE—COMPENSATION.

[A brig which, with its cargo, was valued at $12,000, got in among certain dangerous shoals, off the Florida coast, during very stormy weather, and came to anchor; and a wrecker in his vessel piloted her into port with considerable danger to himself and vessel. Held, that the wrecker should be awarded $900 for pilot services in the nature of salvage, as such services, when rendered by wreckers under extraordinary circumstances, should be liberally rewarded.]

[In admiralty. Libel by John P. Smith against the brig Augusta and cargo for pilot services in the nature of salvage services. Decree for libellant.

[The brig and cargo, valued at about $12,000, during very stormy and violent weather, got in among the Washerwoman shoals, and came to anchor; and libellant, in his sloop Reform, under circumstances of considerable danger to himself and sloop, piloted her to the port Key West.]

Charles Walker, proctor for libellant.

Adam Gordon, proctor for respondent.

MARVIN, J. The libellant in this case is not entitled to salvage eo nomine, as salvage is only decreed for saving property exposed to certain and imminent marine perils, or for such perils as create a reasonable probability that if the property be not rescued by foreign assistance it will be lost. I am not satisfied in this case of the certainty of the perils. But the libellant is entitled to a liberal compensation for his services, and which should be so great as to induce the rendition of like services under like circumstances. I shall decree the sum of nine hundred dollars as a reasonable compensation to the libellant for his services; which is to be paid to the libellant in the molasses of the cargo, at the rate of 20 cents a gallon, duties paid; and the molasses may be redeemed by the master by his paying the salvage in money, or any part thereof, at the rate of 20 cents a gallon.

The clerk will make up the decree in form.

MARITIME LIENS—LIBEL FOR REPAIRS—MATERIALMEN.

[1. A person who puts work and materials into the ship of another as a mere trespasser or intruder does not thereby become a materialman, and entitled to a lien; and a libel by employes of a contractor against a vessel and her owners which fails to allege that the contractor had authority to make the repairs or employ the libellants thereon is insufficient.]

[See note at end of case.]

[3. Ship-carpenters employed to repair a vessel by a person contracting with the owners for that purpose, without notice that they must look to the contractor for payment, work with the implied consent of the owners, and have a lien for their wages, unless the dealings of the parties show that an exclusively personal credit was given to the master or owners.]

[In admiralty. Libel against the brig Augusta, and James Terwilliger and Walter Moffet, her owners, by D. McLeod and 14 others, employes of John Rutter, for work done in repairing the brig. Held insufficient, because an allegation that John Rutter was authorized to make the repairs was lacking. Heard on the amended libel against the vessel alone. Decree for libellants.]

DEADY, District Judge. On September 7, 1872, D. McLeod and fourteen others brought suit against the brig Augusta and her owners, James Terwilliger and Walter Moffet, to recover certain sums of money alleged to be due the libellants respectively, which in the aggregate amounted to $942.42, for work and labor, as ship-carpenters, done on said vessel in July, 1872, at the request of John Rutter; and that said work was done by libellants upon the credit of said vessel as well as upon that of the said owners. On September 24 the respondents excepted to the libel for various causes, and upon the argument thereof, on October 12, the libel was held to be insufficient, because it did not appear therefrom but that said Rutter was an intruder upon said vessel, and without authority to repair the same or employ libellants to work thereon. Leave being granted, the libellants on October 14 filed an amended libel against the vessel alone, alleging as above, and also that said libellants did said work and labor with the knowledge and approbation of said owners; and that said Rutter was duly authorized by said owners to make certain changes and repairs on said vessel, and employ libellants thereon; and that said libellants relied upon "the lien on said vessel, which would accrue to them, for doing said work, and upon the credit of the owners, and not upon the credit of said Rutter." On October 19 the owners answered the libel, admitting that the libellants did work and labor upon said vessel, but denying all knowledge of the time so occupied by them, or that libellants did said work with the knowledge and approval of respondents, or that said Rutter was the agent of respondents, or authorized to employ libellants upon the credit of the vessel or that of the owners thereof; and alleging that on May 31, 1872, respondent, Moffet, made a contract with said Rutter to make certain alterations and repairs in and upon said vessel for a certain price, said Rutter thereby agreeing to furnish all the materials and labor necessary to comply with said contract; and that said Rutter afterwards performed said contract, and was fully paid therefor before the commencement of this suit; and that if said libellants did work upon said vessel, it was as the employes of said Rutter, and not otherwise.

On November 6 the cause was heard and submitted.

It also appeared from the pleadings and evidence that said alterations and repairs were made upon the Augusta at her home port, where her owners reside—the port of Portland—and that she is engaged in trade between that port and the Sandwich islands; and that respondents did not employ libellants, but that the work was done by contract with said Rutter, as alleged in the answer herein, for the sum of $1,350, and that libellants did the work aforesaid at the request of said Rutter, and the value and quantity thereof are truly stated in the schedule to the libel herein; and that libellants did not demand said money of respondents until after Rutter left the country. Have the libellants, under the circumstances, a lien upon the vessel for their work done upon her?

The judicial power of the United States extends "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2. Of course what are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction must finally be determined by the supreme court. The question involves the construction and interpretation to be given to the constitution of the United States. Neither congress nor the states can increase or diminish the jurisdiction.

By section 6 of the act of August 23, 1842, (5 Stat. 517,) congress, among other things, authorized the supreme court to prescribe and regulate the form and modes of proceedings in admiralty. In pursuance of this authority and in accordance with the undoubted jurisdiction exercised by the district courts from the formation of the government, and affirmed by the supreme court in The General Smith, (1819) 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; The Planter, (1833,) 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324; The Orleans, (1837,) 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175,—that where a local law attaches a lien to a maritime service, as for repairs furnished a vessel engaged in maritime commerce, a suit in admiralty lies to enforce it, the supreme court in 1844, in revising the admiralty rules, prescribed in effect, by rule 12, that where by the local law a lien is given to materialmen for supplies, repairs or other necessaries furnished a domestic ship, they may proceed in admiralty to enforce such lien, as in the case of a foreign ship. In 1859 the supreme court amended this rule, so as to confine the remedy of materialmen in cases of domestic ships to a suit in personam—thus, in effect, prohibiting the enforcement of a lien in such cases, if any existed. Professedly, the rule as amended in 1859 only regulated "the character of the process to be used" in such cases, and did not touch the right; for a right in rem, without proceedings in rem to enforce it, is practically no right at all. For the same reason the rule, in effect, changed the law, and excluded such cases from the jurisdiction of the district courts. After thirteen years of unfavorable experience under the amendment of 1859, and many unsatisfactory attempts to account for the reason or existence of it, the supreme court, in May, 1872, amended the rule, so as to make it read as follows: "In all suits by materialmen for supplies, or repairs, or other necessaries, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam."

I think the effect of the rule in its present form is to do away with the distinction which prevailed after the decision in the case of The General Smith, supra, between foreign and domestic ships and ships in home or other ports, and to make all ships, as such, liable for repairs, supplies, or other necessaries, furnished at the express or implied request of the owner or master. Ben. Adm. § 272, says: "The civil law, and the general maritime law, and the particular maritime codes, without exception, extend this lien or privilege to all ships and vessels, without any distinction between foreign and domestic ships. Indeed, it is not easy to see how any difference can exist in principle; if one is a ship or vessel, so is the other; and the same law and the same reason which gives a lien in the one case gives it in the other. It is for service, labor, materials, and supplies furnished to the ship, and in some sort made a part of her, for her benefit, and the lien attaches to her." After stating the fact of the distinction made between foreign and domestic ships in the case of The General Smith, supra, the same author (Id. § 272) goes on to say: "It is, however, believed that whenever the question shall come before the supreme court, and be fully considered by that court after argument, the distinction between foreign and domestic vessels will be found to be no part of the law of admiralty. The mere residence of the owner would seem to have even less relation to maritime subject-matter than the pretexts of the time of Lord Coke." In a learned note to The Harrison, [Case No. 5,038,] Mr. Justice Hoffman concludes: "It is thus evident that by the principles and analogies of the maritime law, and the 'good customs of the sea,' ('les bonnes coutumes de la mer,' as they are called in the Consolato,) and on grounds of equity and natural justice, the lien of the materialman who has constructed, repaired, or supplied a vessel, ought to be recognized and enforced as a maritime lien by courts of admiralty. And this whether the work has been done in a port of the state in which the owner resides or elsewhere; and whether upon the employment of the master or of the owner, or of his agent—excepting in those cases where the lien has been clearly waived, or 'notice has been given to the workmen and other materialmen, in order that they may not be deceived.'" In the adoption and promulgation of rule 12, (1872,) without noticing or providing for any distinction between foreign and domestic ships and home or other ports, as in the rules of 1844 and 1859, it must be presumed that the supreme court considered this question, and concluded that the distinction was "no part of the law of the admiralty." In accordance with these premises, I conclude that the rule on the subject of liens in favor of materialmen has finally rested where it always should, upon the general maritime law, as administered even in England before it was there restrained by the courts of the common law in the time of Charles II.

If, then, the libellants are materialmen within the signification of that term as used in rule 12, they have a lien, and are entitled to maintain this suit to enforce it. Indeed, upon the argument, it was tacitly conceded by counsel for respondents that the case was narrowed down to the inquiry, are the libellants materialmen or not? No reason has been given, and none occurs to my mind, why the term materialmen should be used in the rule in another or more limited sense than in the general maritime law, from which it is taken. Benedict says: "Those are called materialmen who, at the time of the building of a vessel, or during her subsequent existence as a vessel, supply her, at the express or implied request of the master or owner, with necessary materials to build, fit, outfit, furnish, or repair." Ben. Adm. § 267. Parsons says: "The persons employed to repair a ship, or, in general, to do any work about her, and those who furnish for her use supplies of things necessary to her equipment and safe navigation, are known in the law of shipping as materialmen." 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 141. In The Neptune, 3 Hagg. Adm. 129, 142, Lord Stowell cites a report made by that learned judge, Leoline Jenkins, to the king, in which he says: "Those are commonly called materialmen whose trade it is to build, repair, or equip ships, or to furnish them with tackle and provisions necessary in any kind." But it is insisted that libellants did not work on this vessel at the request of respondents; that there is no privity of contract between them and the latter; and therefore the law allows them no lien, and they must look to the contractor, Rutter, who employed them, for their compensation.

As at present advised, I think the libellants could not make the respondents their debtors and acquire a lien upon the vessel therefor, without the consent of the latter, either expressed or implied. Ben. Adm. § 267. A person who puts work or materials into the ship of another, as a mere trespasser or intruder, does not thereby become a materialman, and entitled to a lien thereon for the value of such work or materials; and so this court ruled upon the exception to the original libel herein. But the consent of the owner may be implied from the circumstances of the case. For instance, when the respondent contracted with Rutter to repair the vessel, it was necessarily implied that he might employ libellants, and they might be so employed to work thereon. They are therefore not intruders on or strangers to this vessel, but persons employed to work thereon with the implied consent of the owners. This conclusion is in accordance with general principles of law. The owner of any structure or premises impliedly consents that a person with whom he contracts to do work thereon may use any lawful and convenient means to perform his contract; and the employment of the libellants in this case seems to be within this rule or general principle. And upon authority it appears clear that, according to the general maritime law, where an owner makes a contract with another to build, repair, or supply a vessel, those who work thereon at the request of the contractor do so with the implied consent of the owner, and are entitled to a lien thereon for the value of their labor "unless the dealings of the parties show that an exclusive personal credit was given to the master or owners," or unless they have notice that they must rely upon the contractor for payment. Ben. Adm. § 267; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 322. Emerigon, in his Commentary on the Consolato del Mare, as cited by Mr. Justice Hoffman in his note to The Harrison, observes: "The carpenters, caulkers, and other workmen employed in building, together with the creditors for the timber, cordage, and other articles furnished, ought to enjoy the privilege allowed to them, unless they have been warned in due time that if they do not secure the payment of their claims against the contractor they shall have no lien on the ship." In this case it is not claimed that the libellants had notice in any manner that they must look to the contractor for the payment of their wages, and they are entitled to a lien therefor.

This being so, it is unnecessary to consider whether upon the evidence the libellants or any of them and respondents understood from the first that the former would rely upon the vessel as security for their wages. Rutter gave bonds with security in the sum of $2,500 for the faithful performance of his contract. Duncan Ferguson, one of the libellants, swears that before he was employed Moffet asked him if he was going to work on the vessel. Witness asked M. about the pay. Moffet replied that vessel was good for it, that Rutter had a contract to do the work, and he, M., had a bond for twice the amount of work. It does not appear directly from the evidence, but it is probable that Rutter, about the completion of the contract, absconded. Moffet states that the men did not demand their wages of him until after Rutter "left," and that he did not remember the conversation with Ferguson.

A decree will be given for the libellants for the amounts severally claimed by them.

[NOTE. The doctrines laid down in this case touching the existence under admiralty rule 12, and, in the absence of state legislation, of a maritime lien for repairs and supplies furnished in the home port, were distinctly overruled in The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 558, (decided in 1875.) In that case a libel for repairs and supplies furnished in the home port was filed in the district court for the district of Louisiana. Certain mortgagees intervened, and, by the decree of the district court, their claims were given precedence over those of the repair and supply men. On appeal the circuit court decreed the latter's claim superior to the mortgage, on the ground that they had a maritime lien. The amendment to admiralty rule 12, on which the decision in the principal case rests, was urged in argument. The decree of the circuit court was reversed. Mr. Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion, said: "The principal question presented by the appeal, therefore, is whether the furnishing to a vessel on her credit, at her home port, needful repairs and supplies, creates a maritime lien. * * * This very question was decided by this court adversely to the lien more than fifty years ago, in the case of The General Smith, reported in 4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 438, and that decision has ever since been adhered to, except occasionally in some of the district courts. A solemn judgment relied on so long by the commercial community as a rule of property and the law of the land ought not to be overruled except for very cogent reasons. If, however, in the progress of investigation, and with the new lights that have been thrown upon the whole subject of maritime law and admiralty jurisdiction, a more rational view of the question demands an adverse ruling in order to preserve harmony and logical consistency in the general system, the court might, perhaps, if no evil consequences of a glaring character were likely to ensue, feel constrained to adopt it. But, if no such necessity exists, we ought not to permit any consideration of mere expediency or love of scientific completeness to draw us into a substantial change of the received law. * * * The ground on which we are asked to overrule the judgment in the case of The General Smith, supra, is that, by the general maritime law, those who furnish necessary materials, repairs, and supplies to a vessel, upon her credit, have a lien on such a vessel therefor, as well when furnished in her home port as when furnished in a foreign port, and that courts of admiralty are bound to give effect to that lien. The proposition assumes that the general maritime law governs this case, and is binding on the courts of the United States. But it is hardly necessary to argue that the maritime law is only so far operative as law in any country as it is adopted by the laws and usages of that country. * * * The proposition, therefore, that, by the general maritime law, a lien is given in cases of the kind now under consideration, does not advance the argument a single step, unless it be shown to be in accordance with the maritime law, as accepted and received in the United States. It certainly has not been the maritime law of England for more than two centuries past; and whether it is the maritime law of this country depends upon questions which are not answered by simply turning to the ordinary European treaties on maritime law, or the codes or ordinances of any particular country. * * * And, according to the maritime law as accepted and received in this country, we feel bound to declare that no such lien exists as is claimed by the appellees in this case. The adjudications of this court before referred to, which it is unnecessary to review, are conclusive on the subject; and we see no sufficient ground for disturbing them." Mr. Justice Clifford dissented.

BANKRUPTCY—FORECLOSURE BY MORTGAGEE IN STATE COURT—RATIFICATION.

[A mortgagee cannot proceed in a state court to foreclose a mortgage executed by a bankrupt, except by consent of the bankruptcy court; but the bankruptcy court may approve and ratify such unauthorized proceeding, and where the assignee voluntarily appeared in the state court, had his lien adjudicated, permitted the property to be several times appraised and offered for sale, and made no objections to the proceedings for more than two years, and it did not appear that the estate would be injured by the foreclosure, the assignee is not entitled to an injunction.]

In bankruptcy.

Z. E. Britton, for complainant.
Clough & Wheat, for defendants.

FOSTER, District Judge. The complainant files his bill in this court, asking to restrain the defendants from taking a confirmation of a sale of certain real estate of said bankrupt in the district court of Dickinson county, and from further proceedings in said court. John M. Hodge was adjudged a bankrupt on the 27th day of December, A. D. 1872. The complainant, Jacob Augustine, was elected assignee of said estate on the 27th day of January, 1873, and received the assets of the estate on the 3d day of February, 1873. On the 23d day of September, 1871, the bankrupt and his wife had executed to Jas. B. Shane and T. C. Henry a mortgage on certain real estate to secure two promissory notes of five hundred and thirty-two dollars and five hundred dollars. There was also a second mortgage made on said real estate by said bankrupt and wife, October 29th, 1872, to Augusta Emmons, for five hundred dollars. Noah C. McFarland became the owner of one of the notes secured by the first mortgage, and on the 8th day of August, 1873, without authority of this court, commenced proceedings in the district court of Dickinson county to foreclose said mortgage, making Jacob Augustine, the complainant, who had become the owner of the other first secured note, a party as an individual, and also in his capacity as assignee, and also making the subsequent mortgagee, and other parties, indorsers on the notes, defendants. Jacob Augustine appeared in his individual capacity and filed an answer in said suit setting up his said claim. He also entered his appearance as assignee and waived the issuing of process, but filed no answer as assignee, nor made any objection to the proceedings. On December 4th, 1873, the said court of Dickinson county rendered a judgment and decree of foreclosure in said cause, and made an order of sale of said premises. There were subsequently several orders of sale issued on said decree, and several appraisements had, each being less than the preceding one, until it was finally sold to T. C. Henry, in March, 1875, for the sum of eight hundred and sixty dollars. During all this time the assignee made no objection to the proceedings in the state court, nor did he take any steps to foreclose said mortgage, or liquidate the liens in this court. He now files his bill in equity to restrain further proceedings in said state court for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter in said court.

It is too well settled by a long line of decisions that the federal courts have general jurisdiction and control of all the assets of bankrupt estates, to be any longer questioned. The defendants, however, maintain that the jurisdiction of the federal court is not exclusive, and that the complainant, by making a voluntary appearance as assignee in said suit in Dickinson county, and permitting the proceedings to go on for so long a time without objection, is estopped from now invoking the aid of this court to enjoin the parties. The defendants also raise a question of limitation, but upon that point I need not express an opinion.

The case resolves itself into this:—First. Is the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court exclusive in cases of this kind? Second. If not exclusive, if the state court had, or can have jurisdiction, should the assignee be permitted now to invoke the aid of this court?

There seems to have grown up a perplexing and somewhat incongruous line of decisions of different courts upon this question of jurisdiction between the state and federal courts in matters appertaining to bankruptcy. While it is almost the universal opinion of all the courts, both federal and state, that all matters appertaining to the administration or settlement of the estate of bankrupts belong to the bankruptcy court, and that parties may be enjoined from proceeding in the state court if its jurisdiction is promptly challenged, it is not so easy to understand the exact grounds on which these decisions rest. Several of the cases proceed to argue that the United States courts have the exclusive jurisdiction in matters of this kind, and then speak of the state courts having the right to exercise the powers if the federal court gives its consent thereto. Now, if the jurisdiction is vested by law in the bankruptcy court exclusively, how, on any known legal principle, can that court divest itself of that jurisdiction and confer it on any other tribunal? It seems to me the jurisdiction must be just where the law has placed it, and it must remain there. Neither the order of the court, nor the consent of the parties themselves, can transfer that jurisdiction to any other court. As well might it be claimed that the state district court could send parties into the probate court to foreclose a mortgage, or to a justice's court to obtain a divorce, or that parties could by consent give jurisdiction to those courts over such matters. It seems inexplicable to me, when it is held that the jurisdiction is exclusive in the United States court, that it can then be asserted that those courts may exercise it or not, or may transfer it to a state court or not, just as the whim may strike them. For instance, in the case of Phelps v. Sellick, [Case No. 11,079,] Judge Longyear holds that where a mortgagee proceeded to foreclose his mortgage in the state court after the mortgagor had been adjudged a bankrupt, the proceedings were a nullity, that is, they were absolutely void for want of jurisdiction, and yet he holds in the same case that the mortgagee might have foreclosed in the state court if the consent of the bankruptcy court had first been obtained; and he says, "It is competent for the bankruptcy court to treat such process and proceedings as valid and binding upon the estates and persons interested therein." Then it results, that a judgment absolutely void can be treated by another court as valid and binding upon the estate and persons interested therein if it sees proper to do so. This is what might be called a shifting or transferable jurisdiction. It can be laid off or put on as easily as a mantle. The federal court can withhold or confer jurisdiction as it may see proper, and the estate and parties are bound thereby.

In Re Anderson, [Case No. 351,] the court scouts the idea that an assignee can be sued in a state court concerning the bankruptcy matters; and a decree rendered therein, although by his written consent, is held a nullity. In the case of Brigham v. Claflin, [31 Wis. 607,] decided by the supreme court of Wisconsin, the court held that jurisdiction in bankruptcy cases was solely and exclusively in the federal courts, and uses this language: "And I cannot but think that congress has in fact vested in those courts the complete and exclusive jurisdiction over all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy." In Re Brinkman, [Case No. 1,884,] the court says, "The jurisdiction of said courts sitting as courts in bankruptcy is superior and exclusive in all matters arising under the statute" * * * "Any lien upon the property of the bankrupt, as long as the property is in the possession of the court or its officers, the assignee or trustee, can only be enforced in the district court sitting as a court in bankruptcy." Then in the same opinion it is said: "No person can enforce a specific lien, such as a mortgage or a judgment in a state court, while the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, unless an assent thereto shall first be given by the assignee as an officer of the court." Now, here is a matter said to be vested by law exclusively within the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court, and yet the assignee can by consent confer jurisdiction where the law has not given it.

I have referred to these cases more for the purpose of calling attention to what seems to me inexplicable on any legal principle, rather than authority for my decision in this cause; and in giving my opinion in this matter I find myself making an argument for the one side and deciding for the other. Were there no objectionable cases on this question, and were we compelled to go back to the bankrupt act itself for its meaning, I should be compelled to hold the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court exclusive as to all the matters enunciated in the first section of the act, among which are the adjustment and liquidation of liens, "and all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy," etc., etc. This jurisdiction being exclusive, neither the bankruptcy court, nor the parties to the proceedings could divest that jurisdiction, or confer it on any other tribunal, either by consent or by laches, and that all proceedings in the state court on any of the matters enunciated in said section were absolutely null and void. That congress having the constitutional power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, has seen proper to select the federal courts as the tribunals in which such laws should be administered, and has expressly conferred that power on those courts, and by no implication can the state courts take any of that jurisdiction. See Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292; Brigham v. Claflin, [31 Wis. 607.] The several courts of this state have such powers as are defined by law, and no lawyer would contend that the district courts of this state have jurisdiction to settle estates of deceased persons because the law has nowhere said that they should not exercise that power. There has been a tribunal brought into existence, and that particular jurisdiction has been in terms conferred upon it, and that of itself is an implied exclusion of that power from other courts.

With this statement as to what my own views of the law would have been, aside from any decisions, I come back to the question as to what has been decided by the courts. It seems that the general current of authorities, and even those that hold the jurisdiction exclusive in the bankruptcy court, agree that the state courts may exercise the power when leave of the bankruptcy court is first obtained. Then there are other decisions which hold that the bankruptcy court may approve and ratify proceedings commenced in the state court without leave, if the estate will not be materially injured thereby, or if the assignee has been guilty of laches in objecting to such proceedings. It would seem to stand to reason, if the power can be conferred on the state courts by leave had prior to any proceedings, that it can by the same authority be approved and made good after the proceedings have been commenced.

The following cases hold that the jurisdiction of the United States district court in matters appertaining to bankruptcy is not exclusive of the state courts. In re Bowie, [Case No. 1,728;] Norton's Assignee v. Boyd, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 426. In this case the circuit judge used this language: "I agree fully in the opinion that upon the ground of expediency the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States over all the property of the bankrupt, mortgaged or otherwise, should be exclusive, but I do not understand the bankrupt law to render it so." The court then holds that parties may foreclose a mortgage against a bankrupt in the state courts, and that the federal courts will not interfere except to prevent wrong or injustice to the estate. The supreme court affirmed this decision, but declined to express any opinion as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal court. In Mays v. Fritton, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 414, a foreclosure of a mortgage was had against the bankrupt in the state court. The assignee was made a party defendant, and entered his appearance and made a contest for the surplus proceeds of the sale, and did not object to the jurisdiction of the court. On appeal to the supreme court, it was held that he could not then be heard to object to the jurisdiction, as he had acquiesced in the proceedings in the state court. A still later case is Scott v. Kelly, [22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 57.] It was a case decided by the supreme court, and the opinion is delivered by Waite, C. J. It is very brief, and the substance of it is contained in these words: The assignees in bankruptcy voluntarily submitted themselves and their rights to the jurisdiction of the state court. Being summoned, they appeared without objection and presented their claim for adjudication by that court. No effort was made to remove the litigation to the courts of the United States. "It is now too late to object to the power of the state court to act in the premises and render judgment." And cites the case of Mays v. Fritton, before referred to. These decisions of the highest court in the land have recognized the power of the state courts to proceed under certain circumstances in these cases, and although it is to be regretted that the views of that court and the reasons for its decision have not been given, it is nevertheless binding upon this court.

As to the other question, it is necessary to say but little. The assignee voluntarily appeared in the case and submitted to the jurisdiction of the state court, and asked for, and took a judgment in his own favor as an individual, and had his lien adjudicated on the real estate. He permitted the property to be repeatedly appraised and offered for sale without objection, and was present at the sale and advised about the proceedings therein. The various proceedings have extended over a period of more than two years, and never, until now, has the assignee made any objection thereto. The incumbrances on the real estate are more than it will bring at public sale, and there can be no surplus for the general creditors. There is no reason to believe that the assignee can sell it for more than it has already been sold for, and I cannot see that the estate is now going to be injured by permitting the state court to proceed to a final conclusion of the matter. The temporary injunction will therefore be denied.

PLEADINGS—TENDER—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE—PAROL EVIDENCE TO VARY WRITTEN AGREEMENT—ADMISSIONS BY DEMURRER IN ANOTHER SUIT.

1. On a plea of tender, &c., the defendant holds the affirmative, and has a right to open and close the cause.

2. Parol evidence will not be received to explain a written agreement, until it is first shown that the expressions of the agreement are equivocal.

3. A demurrer in one cause between the same parties, whereby a particular fact is considered in law as admitted, is not evidence of that fact in another cause between the same parties.

[See Auld v. Hepburn, Case No. 651.]

At law. Debt [by Auld, as agent for Dunlop & Co., against Hepburn & Davis] for the penalty of an agreement, $45,000. The defendants pleaded a tender of a deed of assignment.

THE COURT was of opinion, nem. con. that the defendants held the affirmative of the issue, and had the right to open and close the cause.

Mr. Keith's evidence was objected to, because parol evidence cannot be given to alter the written agreement.

Mr. E. J. Lee cited Meres v. Ansell, 3 Wils. 275.

THE COURT was of opinion, nem. con. that in order to let in parol evidence to explain the agreement, the party must first show that there are equivocal expressions in the contract, and that the evidence is to explain those equivocal expressions.

Mr. C. Lee, for the plaintiff, offered the record of the case of Hepburn v. Auld, [Case No. 6,389,] decided in this court, and in the supreme court, [1 Cranch, (5 U. S.) 321; 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 262,] upon a writ of error, to show that by the demurrer in that case, the fact is admitted that the tender was not unconditional.

THE COURT refused to permit the record to be read for that purpose, or to prove any other fact admitted by that demurrer.

The jury could not agree after being out three days.

An admission of facts by a demurrer in one suit, is not evidence of those facts in another suit between the same parties.

[See Auld v. Hepburn, Case No. 650.]

The record of the suit of Hepburn v. Auld [Case No. 6,389, 1 Cranch, (5 U. S.) 321, and 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 262] was offered in evidence by the plaintiff to show that by demurring to Auld's plea, in that case, the defendants have admitted the fact, that the release was required.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, cited Lee v. Boothby, 1 Keb. 720; 12 Vin. Abr. 82. Admissions upon record in other cases between the same parties, may be given in evidence.

Mr. Swann, contra, cited Grills v. Mannell, Willes, 380.

THE COURT was of opinion (nem. con.) that the admission of facts by a demurrer cannot bind the party in any other plea, or in any other cause where the facts are put in issue.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—WHEN APPLICABLE—TREATY OF 1794.

A British subject who, before the treaty of 1794, [8 Stat. 116,] took a bond in the name of a citizen of the United States, cannot avoid the statute of limitations, by claiming the benefit of the clause of the treaty which removed all legal impediments in the recovery of British debts.

At law. Debt on bond [by Auld, as assignee of W. Wilson, against Hoyl, as administrator of Deakins,]—plea that the bond was of twelve years standing, and barred by the statute of limitations. Replication that the bond was taken for a debt due to Dunlop & Co., British creditors, before the war, and that the British treaty removed that lawful impediment.

THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) adjudged the replication to be bad; observing that if a British creditor covers his debt under the name of a citizen he must take citizen's law.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DEMAND—LAST DAY OF GRACE.

Notice to the indorser on the third day of grace, although after bank hours, is too soon.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit, against the indorser of Griffith's note. Demand of payment from the maker was made before three o'clock on the last day of grace, and payment being refused, the notary gave notice to, and demanded payment from, the defendant after three o'clock of the same day.

THE COURT, upon the authority of the cases decided in Washington, viz: Lindenberger v. Beale, [Case No. 8,359,] and Beeding v. Pic, [Id. 1,227,] rendered judgment for the defendant upon the case stated and referred to in the verdict of the jury.

[NOTE. This decision was evidently in recognition and enforcement of the usage of the banks in the District of Columbia to demand payment of commercial paper the day after the last day of grace. Other cases to like effect are Coyle v. Gozzler, Case No. 3,312; Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, Id. 856; Brent v. Coyle, Id. 1,837; Hill v. Norvell, Id. 6,497; Bank of Columbia v. McKenny, Id. 874; Mills v. Bank of U. S., 11 Wheat. (24 U. S.) 431; Adams v. Otterback, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 539; Bank of Washington v. Reynolds, Case No. 954; Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, Id. 872; Patriotic Bank v. Farmers' Bank, Id. 10,811; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 581. This usage was changed in 1818 by all of the banks of Washington and Georgetown "so as to conform to the general commercial usage of demanding payment on the last day of grace." Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 317. This change in usage or custom was also recognized in the following cases, requiring demand to be made on the last day of grace: Beeding v. Pic, Case No. 1,227; Auld v. Peyton, Id. 654; Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. (15 U. S.) 373; Bank v. Walker, Case No. 903; Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 25.]

JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE—IRREGULARITY—QUASHING SCIRE FACIAS.

Upon motion of the special bail, at the return of the scire facias, the court will set aside the original judgment against the principal, for irregularity, and will quash the scire facias against the bail.

[Cited in Jones v. Kemper, Case No. 7,472.]

At law. Upon the return of the scire facias against Elliot, who was special bail of Morte, Mr. Redin, for the bail, obtained a rule upon the plaintiff to show cause why the original judgment against Morte should not be set aside for irregularity, and the subsequent proceedings against the bail, quashed. The original judgment was rendered in December, 1819, by confession without any declaration, or rule to declare, or to plead.

In support of the rule, Mr. Redin cited Tidd, Pr. 242, 1093, 1094. 1146; Hayward v. Ribbans, 4 East, 310, 313; Barlow v. Kaye, 4 Term R 688; Hardy v. Moore, 3 Har. & McH. 389; and Bowie v. State of Maryland, Id. 408.

On the 22nd of June, 1824, THE COURT made the rule absolute, and ordered the original judgment to be set aside, and the continuances entered up, and all the subsequent proceedings to be quashed.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INFRINGEMENT—NECESSARY PARTIES—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—REISSUES—EXTENT OF CLAIM — BROKEN MODEL—ABANDONMENT.

1. The reissued letters patent No. 2,608, granted to Philo Sylla and Augustus Adams, September 14th, 1867, and the three reissued letters patent Nos. 723, 724 and 726, granted to C. Aultman & Co., assignees of said Sylla and Adams, May 17th, 1859, each for an "improvement in harvesters," (the original patent having been granted to said Sylla and Adams, September 20th, 1853,) and which four reissued letters patent were severally extended for seven years from the 20th of September, 1867, are valid.

[Cited in Wheeler v. McCormick, Case No. 17,499.]

2. Under an objection that the reissued patent includes devices not shown or suggested in the record of the original, the proper tests to be applied, in considering whether a reissued patent is for the same invention as the original, stated and illustrated.

[Cited in Kerosene Lamp Heater Co. v. Littell, Case No. 7,724; Dederick v. Cassell, 9 Fed. 307.]

3. In a certified copy of the model on file, certified from the patent office, the precise construction, in the particular in dispute, was not shown, for the reason that parts were broken and other parts were missing. But the original specifications and drawings were not inconsistent with the construction necessary to sustain the reissue; and, in view of the necessity of the feature, and of evidence, that, before the model was filed, such necessity was understood and acted on, in practice, by the inventors, and of the fact that the patent office granted the reissue after referring to the model, on a question being raised before it as to the particular in dispute, it was held sufficiently proved that the model, as filed, contained the feature.

[Cited in Kerosene Lamp Heater Co. v. Littell, Case No. 7,724; Dederick v. Cassell, 9 Fed. 307.]

4. The question of infringement, considered. Abandoned experiments, commented on.

5. Devices contrived and employed in such experiments do not, on their abandonment, become, per se, public property, in such sense that they can be used to defeat the patent of a new and independent inventor.

[6. The owners of conflicting patents entered into an agreement which defined their respective rights and provided a fund for maintaining the patents and for purchasing as joint property patents deemed necessary for their mutual protection. A patent which had been previously purchased by one of the parties was subsequently assigned to the original inventors and after having been extended was reassigned to the same party. Held, that the agreement operated at most as a license to all the parties to use the patent so owned by one of them and that the others were not necessary parties to a suit at law on the patent by its owner.]

[In equity. Bill by Cornelius Aultman against Henry C. Holley and Edwin H. Fitts] on reissues Nos. 723, 724, 726, and 2,608, of the patent originally granted Philo Sylla and Augustus Adams, September 20, 1853, [and numbered 10,038.] On May 17, 1859, the original patent was reissued to C. Aultman & Co., assignees, in six divisions, Nos. 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, and 726. No. 722 was afterward again surrendered, and reissued as No. 2,608, and on September 19, 1867, reissues 2,608, 723, 724, and 726 were extended for seven years. The suit was defended on various grounds, stated fully in the opinion, but the principal defense, and the one most fully considered by the court, was that the reissues were not for the same invention as the original. It seems that the reissues all describe the ends of the finger-bar as free to vibrate perpendicularly, so as to conform to the undulations of the ground. The original specification and claims nowhere speak of the ends vibrating, but do frequently speak of the finger-bar as vibrating perpendicularly, and the drawing of the original shows a construction for allowing the whole bar to rise and fall perpendicularly. In the patent office model, the parts showing the connections of the finger-bar were broken and destroyed. It is moreover shown that the patentees were familiar with the need of a bar that would rise and fall at either end, and that the file-wrapper of the reissues disclosed the fact that the office, during the pendency of the reissues, pointed out to the applicants the fact that the specification and drawing of the original showed no manner in which either end of the finger-bar would rise without the other; whereupon the applicant referred to the model, and afterward the reissues were granted. The facts on this point, with quotations from the original patent and the claims of the reissues, are fully given in the opinion of the court. [Decree for complainant.]

B. F. Thurston and Henry Baldwin, Jr., for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. On the 20th of September, 1853, Philo Sylla and Augustus Adams received letters patent from the United States, for an "improvement in harvesters." On the 17th of May, 1859, on a surrender of the said patent, new letters were issued to C. Aultman & Co.. assignees, intended severally to cover different parts of the same invention, or different devices included in the original machine. These reissues were numbered respectively 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, and 726. Thereafter, reissue No. 722 was assigned to the original alleged inventors, was by them surrendered, and, on the 14th of September, 1867, new letters patent were issued to them, professedly for the same invention, which last named reissue is numbered 2,608. The several reissued patents numbered 2,608, 723, 724, and 726, were, on the 19th of September, 1867, extended for seven years from the expiration of the original terms, namely, to the 20th of September, 1874, and by assignment from the original patentees, the title thereto is vested in the complainant in this suit, who charges the defendants with an infringement of these extended reissued patents. The defendants have raised the preliminary objection, that the suit is defective for want of necessary parties; and, on the merits, they insist upon varous objections to the relief sought, the chief of which are, that the reissued patents are void, because they "are not for the same invention as the original patent from which they have sprung, but claim substantial and material matters not indicated, suggested, or described in that original patent;" that, if the reissued patents embrace no devices but such as are shown or suggested in the record of the original, or if they can be sustained so far as to embrace what is shown in such original and nothing more, then the defendants' machine is no infringement; and, finally, that the invention shown or indicated by the original patent, its specification and model, in any particular in which the defendants can be deemed to use any device or devices shown therein was not new when such original patent was granted.

[2] [1. The objection that the suit is defective for want of necessary parties (then considered by the court and overruled) is founded upon a certain agreement entered into on the 27th of December, 1860, by and between Cyrenus Wheeler, Jr., and several others of the first part, and this complainant and others, (composing the firm of C. Aultman & Co.,) and Sears, Adriance & Platt of the second part, which recited the ownership of sundry patents for improvements in grain and grass harvesting machines by Wheeler, and the interest of others of the parties of the first part therein, and the ownership of the original patent hereinabove mentioned and the reissues thereof, and of sundry other patents by C. Aultman & Co., and that they have assigned exclusive rights in certain territory within the United States to Sears, Adriance & Platt. The agreement then proceeds to declare that each party licenses the other party for the term of ten years from January 1, 1861, to make, vend, and use the respective patented improvements, and to license others to make, vend, and use their respective separate machines, but only such machines as correspond with an agreed sample of the machines of each, each party reserving to themselves and to their licensees the right to make their own machines, illustrated by such sample, and not to make or license others to make, vend, or use machines corresponding substantially to the sample of the other party. Among other things thereinafterward following, they fix the minimum license fee which each party shall charge licensees for each machine licensed corresponding with such party's sample machine; they provide for the payment of one dollar to a common agent for each machine sold by either party or by the licensees of either party as a common fund. Certain outstanding contracts with other parties are then recognized and affirmed. It is then declared that any persons selling machines other than the specified sample machines, and using any of the patents of either party, are to be deemed infringers. The agreement, then, ninthly, declares that any patents which shall be deemed necessary by the parties hereto for the protection of either machine, upon joint consent, may be purchased, the expense being borne equally by the parties of the first and second part. * * * The special agent is to be paid the one dollar for each machine above mentioned, and all sums received for infringements are to be paid to him; he is to be the general agent of both parties to settle claims for infringements, and to do such other acts as the parties see fit to authorize him to do, the parties to report to him the number of machines built by them, the names, &c., of their licensees, and the number of machines made by the latter, respectively. The common fund to be paid into the hands of the agent is to be used for expenses in transacting any business provided for in the agreement, and in defending and maintaining the patents of either party, and if there be any surplus it shall be divided. "Thirteenth. The title to the patents now owned by either party shall remain as now vested, and such as shall hereafter be acquired shall become the joint property of the parties hereto, subject only to such transfers as may be hereafter made by mutual consent.

"This contract shall be in force and continue to the full end of ten years from the first day of January, 1861, unless otherwise dissolved by mutual consent." The claim that the parties to the agreement are necessary parties is mainly founded upon the provision therein that such patents as should thereafter be acquired should become the joint property of the parties. The extension of the patents originally granted to Sylla & Adams was made to the original patentees, and was assigned to Cornelius Aultman after the making of this agreement. But I am satisfied, upon a consideration of the design and object of the agreement and an examination of all its details that such extension of one of the patents, owned by one or some of the parties when the agreement was made, and the acquisition thereof by assignment from the patentees, was not intended by the clause in question. It was not the purpose to change the title of the respective parties, but to bring the machines manufactured by either party or by their licensees, corresponding with the respective samples, under the operation of the agreement, and so to prevent competition among themselves, and provide a common fund, which might be availed of by either, to maintain their respective patents. The party of the second part was, perhaps, bound to treat all machines, made substantially like the sample machine during the ten years, as within the scope of the agreement, and could not avail themselves of the extension as a ground for withdrawing such machines therefrom. That was, in respect to the extension and the assignment to the complainant, the extent, at most, to which the other parties to the agreement could assert any interest in the extension. Besides, the patents which were to become joint property were only those the purchase of which was warranted by the agreement itself. Those were described in the previous ninth clause of the agreement—viz., patents deemed necessary for the protection of either machine, purchased upon joint consent, the expense thereof being borne equally by the parties of the first and second part. It was to those patents that the thirteenth clause referred. It was not placed in the power of each and any person included among the parties to the agreement to purchase any patents he might choose with the joint funds, and there was nothing to prevent his purchasing any patents he might choose for his own benefit, subject, at most, to the right of all who were parties to the agreement to make their respective sample machines during the ten years, and to treat all machines during that time made by the others corresponding with such samples as within the provisions of the agreement. And it is by no means clear that if the parties of the first part to the agreement departed from their sample machine and made machines corresponding with the sample machine of the other party, using therein the inventions whereof the latter, or one of them, owned the patents, such last-named patentee, although a party to this agreement, might not treat the former as an infringer, and maintain an action at law for such an infringement. As to the influence of this so-called consolidation agreement generally, upon the question of parties to a suit for the infringement of a patent acquired by one of the individuals included within one of the parties, even conceding, as above hypothetically assumed, that his ownership subjected the machines made under it during the ten years to the operation of the agreement, it was not the intent or effect of the agreement to affect the title to the patents or the right to sue thereon. The agreement operated as a license among the parties, and placed the parties themselves under contribution for mutual support and defense. The most that can be claimed is that in the prosecution of suits for the infringement of either patent, the party holding the title thereto was quasi trustee for all in respect of the proceeds of recovery. And the suggestion that these defendants need protection against any suit by the other parties, and so have a right to insist that they be brought in as parties is answered by the fact that such other parties could not sue on the complainant's patent, and any equitable interest of theirs is fully represented by the complainant. If, on the other hand, the complainant be deemed to hold the extension as a new grant, not included in the provisions of the agreement, then, of course, the objection that the others should be parties, is wholly groundless. The suggestion is further made that it appears by the recitals in the agreement that Sears, Adriance & Platt were, when the agreement was made, the assignees of exclusive rights in certain territory within the United States, from C. Aultman & Co., then owners of the original patent to Sylla & Adams; that it also appears by certain bills of complaint filed by Sears, Adriance & Platt, in suits begun by them, that the territory thus referred to included New York, within which the infringement now in controversy was committed. Hereupon it is argued that, if the objection already made that all the parties to the before-mentioned agreement should be parties to this suit do not prevail, then the complainant has no right to sue at all; that in respect to the state of New York, Sears, Adriance & Platt are assignees of the patent, and suits for an infringement within that state should be brought by them. Besides the consideration that the declarations of Sears, Adriance & Platt are not evidence against this complainant, and that without such declarations it does not appear that they ever had any exclusive territorial rights which included New York, it is not shown that any interest held by them gave them title, legal or equitable, beyond the term of the original patent; and if not, they have no title to the extension and no interest in this suit, as the result of any prior assignment. These considerations require that the objection above stated, that the persons who entered into the so-called consolidation contract, and those who, by supplemental agreement, became parties thereto, are necessary parties to this suit, be overruled.]

2. The claim that the reissued patents on which this suit is founded are void, because they are not for the same invention as the original, but claim substantial matters not included in the former, nor shown, suggested, or described in the original record, is most urgently pressed, and is sustained by very able, elaborate, and greatly extended arguments, by the distinguished counsel representing the defendants on the hearing. The legal proposition, that a party cannot, by the surrender of a patent and the reissue thereof, obtain an exclusive right to devices not shown or claimed in the specification, drawings, or model of the original patented invention, is not disputed. But the application of that rule of law to the present case is resisted, and the controversy thereupon embraces the disputed question of fact, as to what was disclosed by the record of the original patent, including therein the specification, drawings, and model; and, next, the question, whether the reissued patents here sued upon do embrace devices not thus shown. I cannot hope to do more, than to make these questions, in their relation to the case, intelligible, and to state my conclusion thereon. To follow the arguments of counsel through all their details, and attempt, satisfactorily, to answer those arguments, however gratifying and, possibly, useful, in the future history or progress of the case, as a vindication of my conclusion, must be left to greater leisure and to the duty of arguing rather than deciding.

It is always to be borne in mind, in considering the validity of a reissued patent, in the face of the objection before us, that the object of a reissue, and the purpose of the law in permitting the surrender of a patent and a reissue thereof, are, to correct, or rather perfect, a defective or insufficient description or specification, including the claim which the patentee makes to the devices described and which he alleges are his invention. The reissue is, therefore, not to be tested by the mere language of the original specification, for, the fact of reissue proceeds upon the ground, that such language is defective or insufficient. So, also, something is due to the fact of reissue itself, as presumptive evidence of the facts justifying the reissue in manner and form in which it is granted. Indeed, this alone has been held, in some cases, conclusive, unless there be a clear excess of authority, or there appears to be fraud therein, (Allen v. Blunt, [Case No. 216, Id. 217;] Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74;) while, on the other hand, it is agreed, that the reissued patent must be for the same invention, and the patentee cannot thereby secure to himself a new or different subject of patent, even though it be, in truth, his own invention. In the original specification annexed to the patent granted to Sylla and Adams September 20th, 1853, [1873,][1] they state, that the nature of their invention "consists in fastening the sickle-bar or stock" (elsewhere and often called the "cutter-bar" and "finger-bar," it being the bar which supports the knives, and on which they slide, in cutting grass or grain) "to the ends of two levers, so as to allow it to vibrate perpendicularly, and accommodate the sickle to uneven ground, in cutting grass, the weight of the sickle-bar being properly counterbalanced by weights upon the opposite ends of the levers, which levers may be made permanent, by bolts or otherwise, when cutting grain, the sickle-bar being connected to the carriage frame by a strong link, which is hinged to the sickle-bar and to the carriage near the crank shaft, so as to allow the bar to vibrate perpendicularly and to prevent it from being traversed longitudinally by the motion of the sickle." And, in describing the construction of the machine, it is said, "the bar B" (part of the frame near the crank shaft) "being connected to the sickle-bar * * * by the link, * * * which link is hinged to both bars by strong staples, so as to allow the sickle-bar * * * to vibrate perpendicularly and accommodate itself to uneven ground, in cutting grass, and to prevent it from being traversed endways by the motion of the sickle * * * and the action of the grass or grain, as it is pressed against the sides of the fingers, * * * as it is severed by the sickle. * * * The sickle-bar * * * is fastened to the levers, * * * which are hung so as to vibrate freely, * * * and the weight of the sickle-bar and sickle are counterbalanced to the extent required, by the weights * * * fastened to the rear ends of the levers, when cutting grass, and, when cutting grain, the rear end" may be fastened, so as to carry the cutter-bar at a proper elevation. The patentees claim, 1st, "The weighted levers, * * * or their equivalents, substantially as described, which carry the sickle-bar and sickle, and allow them to vibrate perpendicularly and accommodate the sickle to uneven ground, in cutting grass, which levers may be made permanent, when cutting grain, substantially as described and represented;" 2d. "The link or hinged brace, * * * or its equivalent, in combination with the weighted levers, * * * which brace * * * prevents the sickle-bar from being traversed longitudinally by the action of the sickle, but allows it to vibrate perpendicularly and accommodate itself to uneven ground, substantially as described." These parts of the specification are all that are material to the point now to be considered. The drawings annexed show a machine, a frame projecting sidewise to the extent of the swath to be cut, and two parallel levers, one at each end of the finger-beam, hinged at their centres to the frame, and projecting forward to receive the sickle or finger-bar, and backward of the hinges to receive the counterpoising weights. The finger-bar appears, in the drawing, to be attached to the ends of the levers by tenons at the end of the former, entering mortises in the ends of the latter, and the under sides of these ends are curved upwards, to adapt them to slide over the ground when the finger-bar is suffered to rest thereon for mowing. The link or coupling arm is also shown hinged to the inner end of the finger-bar, and from it extending crosswise to the further corner of the main frame, where, near the crank shaft which oscillates the pitman moving the knives or cutters, it is hinged, obviously, so as to move up and down freely as the inner end of the finger-bar shall rise and fall, and so as to hold such inner end of the finger-bar in proper relative position to the crankshaft and pitman, for the free transverse action thereof and of the cutters, whether the finger-bar at that end be raised or lowered. A certified copy of the model remaining in the patent office was produced in evidence, that exhibited the general structure of the machine in admitted conformity to the specification and drawings, so far as it had been preserved, but the model was in a very broken state, and parts of it were wholly missing, and it is much to be regretted that portions were missing, which showed the precise character of the connection made between the sickle or finger-bar and the ends of the levers, which, in the discussion of this case, was deemed of great importance by the counsel.

In there issued [reissued] patent number 2,608, the only claim material to this controversy, and the only claim which it is urged that the defendants are infringing, is as follows: 1st. "The combination of a finger-beam with slotted guard fingers, a reciprocating scolloped cutter, a double hinge connection between the finger-beam and the main frame, and a driving shaft for the cutting apparatus, parallel or nearly so to the ground." Whether there be any other objections to this claim or not, and whether the defendants have violated this claim or not, may pertain to other points discussed in this case, but the claim itself is not liable to the objection now under consideration. All of the elements embraced in the combination do manifestly appear in the specification, drawings and model of the original patent. Finger-beam, slotted guard fingers, reciprocating scolloped cutter, and a driving shaft parallel with the ground, are plainly shown. The finger-beam is, with equally obvious distinctness, shown and described as doubly hinged to the main frame, as well as by the hinges at each end of the link piece or coupling bar, as by the hinges by which the levers are connected to the main frame. If, therefore, this reissue is liable to the objection that it embraces what does not appear in the record of the original patent, it must be because of something inserted in the descriptive or reciting portions of the specification preceding this claim, with reference to which it is insisted this claim must be construed, and by which it is controlled. That involves substantially the same review of the specification which is involved in the consideration of one or more of the other reissues, and may be discussed in connection with them.

In reissue number 723, the patentees declare that "what is claimed under this patent, as the invention of Sylla and Adams, is the short finger-beam in combination with the yielding connection with the main frame, or its equivalent, substantially as herein set forth." It is obvious that to this claim, as to the last named, the same observations are pertinent. The combination is of the short finger-bar, which is the finger-bar shown in the original, and the yielding connection of the bar by hinges, before referred to, which permits such motion on the coupling arm or link, and the hinged attachment to the main frame, above described. This is a more limited combination than the former, and must be deemed to embrace such coupling arm, and the hinged levers, or their equivalent. Unless, therefore, the reference to the preceding specification, by the words, "substantially as described," or the duty to construe the claim with reference to the preceding specification, brings this reissue into reach of the objection urged, and makes it embrace what is not shown in the original, then this reissue is also free from that criticism.

In reissue number 724, it is stated, that

"what is claimed under this patent, as the invention of Sylla and Adams, is the combination of the finger-beam with the hinges by which it is drawn, arranged above the plane of the cutter, substantially as herein set forth." This language is not, perhaps, the best that might be chosen to express its meaning, but I think it is sufficiently intelligible. It is not every combination of the finger-beam with the hinges which is here claimed, nor even though, in other respects, the machine should be such as is described in the preceding specification; it is only such combination when arranged above the plane of the cutters, substantially as previously set forth. This seems to me a very narrow claim, embracing an arrangement of the hinges connecting a cutter-beam to the main frame above the plane of the cutters. The description of a machine in which this is shown to be practicable and useful, whether the other parts of the machine be the invention of the patentees or not, does not enlarge this claim, but only serves to illustrate a mode of its application. The device itself is single; it is found in the original model; it is shown in the drawings furnished me as copies of those annexed to the original patent. The reissue seems, in that respect, free from the objection now under consideration.

What is claimed under reissued patent number 726, as the invention of Sylla and Adams, is "the combination of a stop with the mechanism for connecting the finger-beam with the main frame, and allowing it to rise and fall, substantially as herein set forth." Here, again, the device claimed is single, and was shown in the original. In the reissue, the machine which the patentee describes, in order to illustrate the application of the stop to practical use, is not necessarily the invention of the patentee. For the purpose of such illustration, any machine might be described, and, therefore, it is not material, so far as the validity of the patent for the mere combination of a stop with the mechanism connecting the finger-beam with the main frame is involved, to inquire whether the machine by which the patentee illustrates the practical use of the stop was or was not correctly and fully described in the original application for a patent, or the specification thereof, or even in any patent whatever. For example, let it be supposed that a patent for such a combination had once been granted, and the patentee had, in his specification, attempted to show its application to use, by describing its construction, location, and adaptation to a particular machine, but, through mistake or error, he had failed sufficiently to indicate the manner of its application, or made his description of the device otherwise imperfect, I know of no rule which, on obtaining a reissue, would forbid his selecting a machine of a different construction, and even one invented by and patented to another person, and, describing that, show also the application of his newly invented combination thereto, as an illustration of its practical utility and the manner of employing it; provided, always, that his description of the stop and its application, and his claim thereto, did not embrace anything more than the combination of the stop with the mechanism connecting the finger-beam with the main frame. He would not, of course, thereby acquire the exclusive right to the machine described, nor (if it had been patented to another) any right to use it, but he would secure the exclusive right to the stop itself, in the combination stated. Whether this reissued patent be or be not liable to any other criticism, it is not invalid on the ground that the device patented was not shown, suggested, or indicated in the original patent.

If, however, the claims in either of these last two patents be deemed to draw to themselves the description of the machine described by the preceding specifications, as illustrations of their use and mode of operation, then the observations yet to be made in respect to reissues 2,608 and 723 will apply to these also.

Recurring now to reissues numbers 2,608 and 723, it remains to inquire how far there is anything in the specification preceding the claims alleged to be infringed that makes them invalid, as including what is not shown in the original patent. It has already been seen, that the claims on their face disclose no such departure from the original patent. It may be here properly suggested, that exaggerated statements of the utility and general capacity of the machine described in the reissues, do not expose the reissues to this objection, so long as the specifications correctly describe the construction and manner of operation of the thing invented, and a practicable mode of applying it. The object of a specification is to describe the thing invented, so as to enable a mechanic of ordinary skill to construct it and apply it to practical use; and the claim declares what the patentee claims as his invention. Beyond this, all essays eulogistic of its utility, and assertions of its capacity, are immaterial and useless. If fraudulently inserted to mislead, and if they operate to deceive others in regard to the actual construction of the thing claimed and the mode in which it may be applied to use, they may render a reissue void on that ground, but that is not the point now before us; and where, notwithstanding such apparent exaggerations, the thing is correctly described, so as to serve the above stated objects of a specification, and the claim is limited to what is shown in the original record, the objection now under consideration has no force. These observations seem pertinent, in view of the criticisms, made at some length on the hearing, of the somewhat extended essays and of the vaunted utility of the inventions, found in the specification.

The main feature, however, in which these reissues were supposed to include something not shown in the original record, and the feature chiefly pressed upon the attention of the court is, that the specifications represent the connection between the finger-bar and the frame as such that the finger-bar can rise and fall at either end, without the rise or fall of the other, thus practically adapting itself to undulations of the ground in the direction of its length. Confessedly, the finger-bar, as described and shown in the specification, drawings, and model of the original patent, could rise and fall perpendicularly, by the free play of the hinges of the coupling arm and of the hinged levers which resisted the backward thrust; but. it is denied that such finger-bar, as there described, had any other motion or capacity of motion, and it is insisted that neither the specification, drawings, or model exhibited a construction which permitted one end thereof to rise or fall without the other.

The specification annexed to the reissues assigns to the finger-beam this capacity, and describes one mode of construction which allows it. One example will suffice: "The forward ends of both the yielding bars are connected with the finger-beam, one of them, at least, not rigidly, but both strongly, so as to give the requisite support to the beam, without preventing it from swaying freely within certain limits, or rising and falling at either end unrestrained by the opposite end. One mode of securing the requisite freedom of the connection is by providing for play in the joint between the bar" (lever) "k and the finger-beam, as shown in figure 7." It will be perceived, that the question is not whether there was or is, according to the specification, drawings or model of either patent, an instrument or device which, by its action on the finger-bar, brought it to the ground, or compelled it to conform to the undulations thereof. The construction, at most, allowed it to rest on the ground, and, by its own weight, conform to the undulations. We have, then, at the outset and at the end, it may be, of the discussion, the question of fact—Do the specification, drawings or model of the original patent indicate a construction which allowed, by not preventing, the finger-bar resting on the ground, in mowing, to sway up and down at either end within certain limits, to conform to undulations which tend to raise one end without the other? It seems to me obvious, that a finger-beam attached at each end to a hinged lever vibrating freely up and down, would certainly, when resting on uneven ground, sway or incline to some extent conformably to the undulations, unless the attachment to the levers and the close working of the hinges were of extraordinary firmness and rigidity, and that this would be suggested at once to the ordinary mechanic; and, in view of the great importance and even necessity of such conformity to the surface of the ground, it seems improbable that such a construction could be described without suggesting to the mind that such swaying or inclination was intended.

It is certain, that the original specification is not very full or precise upon this point. As above quoted, it speaks of "fastening the sickle-bar or stock to the end of two levers, so as to allow it to vibrate perpendicularly, and accommodate the sickle to uneven ground;" and again, in describing the construction and the connection between the frame and sickle-bar by the link or coupling-arm at one end of the sickle-bar, it states, that such "link is hinged to both bars by strong staples, so as to allow the sickle-bar to vibrate perpendicularly and accommodate itself to uneven ground, in cutting grass." Do those expressions import an accommodation to uneven ground by vibrating perpendicularly, and by that vibration only? or do they import both a vibration perpendicularly, and also an accommodation to uneven ground generally? The first would seem to satisfy the language, and yet the language is not such as to exclude the latter meaning. The most that can, I think, be said, is, that this specification is not inconsistent with a construction which permits the finger-bar to sway or incline at either end. If such construction was elsewhere indicated, and the invention actually embraced that feature, then the want of clearness in this specification is not only no objection to the validity of a reissue, but it furnished a just and proper occasion therefor. Similar observations are due to the drawings annexed. They do not, on their face, very clearly indicate a loose tenon in the mortises shown, and yet the double lines may indicate that the tenon does not fill the mortise, but has some play therein, and the drawings are not plainly inconsistent therewith. Great importance, therefore, necessarily belongs to the model, which, in a device that, when reduced to the small scale used in the drawings, might be left in doubt, would furnish a distinct exhibition of the truth. And here I repeat the regret that those portions of the original model which contains these points of connection of the finger-bar to the hinged levers are lost. We must, therefore, resort to other evidence, and to collateral circumstances, to ascertain the fact.

In the first place, we have the great importance of this feature in a mowing machine, one quite necessary to its success. We have the before-mentioned obvious tendency of the hinged finger-bar, when attached to the ends of the lever, moving freely in hinges, to sway, when resting on the ground, in the manner in question, and, without motion or play at the points of connection, to wrench the parts and break or split them. We have the testimony that, in the first experimental use of the machine, in 1852, that wrenching or splitting occurred, either because there was no such motion or play, or because it was not sufficient to make the machine practically useful on uneven ground. We have it established by evidence which, notwithstanding some discrepancy, I think, preponderates, that, in the fall of 1852, the machine which was then tried was altered, so as to give play, or to give more play, in those points of connection, for the express purpose of enabling the finger-bar, with more freedom, to rise and fall at either end, to accommodate lateral undulations. The importance of this feature being thus practically demonstrated to the eyes of the inventors, it would seem most natural that it would not be lost sight of, and when, in the following month of May, they filed the model, those circumstances warrant the belief that it would show that feature, unless we assume that they were greatly devoid of ordinary care in the exhibition of an essential feature of the machine they desired to patent. If, to these facts and considerations, even a little weight is given to the presumption arising, from the fact of reissue, above referred to, that the patent office had before it then the facts justifying the reissue, we should feel constrained to say that the evidence establishes that this feature of the invention was disclosed and shown in the original model.

But, the foregoing is not all of the proof bearing on this precise question. The defendants have put in evidence copies of the files of the patent office containing the applications for the reissues, the proposed new specifications and claims, the marginal criticisms made at the office, and the correspondence leading to the granting of the reissues. This was in 1859. From these it appears, that the officers observed the want of distinctness in the original specifications and drawings, and suggested that it did not appear that, according to the description thus given, the finger-bar would rise and fall at one end without the other. Whereupon the applicants, insisting on the contrary, referred them to the model itself, then, no doubt, complete, and the result was the granting of the reissues in the form in which they now appear. This is strong, very strong, persuasive evidence of the correctness of the complainant's claim in this respect. It was the very point in discussion, and appears to have been disposed of on the fact that the model showed this free connection of the finger-bar to the levers, which permitted the play therein, so that either end of the finger-bar would rise and fall without the other, "within certain limits."

Other criticisms of the reissues, as compared with the original patent, were made by the defendants' counsel. It is impossible for me to follow through all the details, and discuss them in this opinion. I have considered the arguments urged, and, as I trust, given them the weight to which they are entitled, but my conclusion is, that the reissues ought to be sustained; that there is no sufficient evidence of fraud; and, as to the actual construction of the devices claimed, that nothing is embraced in the patents which was not suggested or shown in the original.

3. I do not think there is serious doubt upon the question of infringement. The invention of Sylla and Adams has brought into use a class of machines which are distinguished by the manner in which the short finger-bar is suffered to rest upon the ground and conform to the undulations thereof, while the relation of the cutters to the operating mechanism is preserved by a crank shaft arranged parallel with the ground, and a link or coupling-arm holding the finger-bar while it moves forward, supplied with another vibrating arm or arms, which sustain the backward thrust. The attachment of one end of the coupling-arm to the frame at or near the crank shaft causes the rise and fall of the inner end of the finger-beam to be in substantially the same arc of a circle as the rise and fall of the end of the pitman hinged to the sickle or knife plate. Hence, there is due relation between the motion of the pitman and the motion of the finger-bar, and the knifes are, therefore, moved freely, however the finger-bar be affected by the undulations of the ground. By this means, there is free action of the mechanism moving the pitman, and free action of the knives in the finger-bar, without torsion or friction. In short, a result is produced which, in other machines, is effected by making the driving mechanism itself vibrate up and down around a gear centre.

The defendants' machine plainly belongs to the same class of machines, and, although it differs in some details, which, I think, pertain to form rather than to the substance of the construction, it embodies the principle and the substantial means of operation characteristic of the complainant's patented machine. True, they have enlarged the hinge of the coupling-arm, so as, no doubt, by the intervention of a different form of shoe from that shown on or formed by the end of the complainant's hinged lever, to aid more effectively in sustaining the finger-beam against backward thrust, and to dispense with a hinged lever at the outer end; and the attachment of the remaining hinged arm, which serves, like the complainant's, to sustain the backward thrust, is carried diagonally to the frame. These changes may be improvements. They render the machine more compact and convenient. But, the essential ingredients of the combination are present—the short finger-bar, the reciprocating scolloped cutters, the double-hinged connection between the finger-beam and the main frame, and the driving shaft, parallel, or nearly so, to the ground. It seems to me, that, independently of the doctrine of equivalents, the defendants' machine is, in these respects, substantially like the patented invention, and, if the changes made by the defendants be deemed improvements, that is all that can be claimed for them. And, if the doctrine of equivalents be applied to the subject, then, clearly, the substitution of the hinged arm running obliquely from the inner end of the finger-beam to the main frame, and the enlarged hinge at the end of the coupling-arm, are a mere substitute for the complainant's hinged levers which sustain the finger-beam against the backward thrust. In view of the limited claims of the reissued patents, the omission of counterpoising weights cannot be regarded as relieving the defendants from the charge of infringement. They are neither of the essence of the invention nor of the claims of the patentees alleged to be infringed. These observations are pertinent to each of the reissues, if each be deemed to include, by implication or reference, the device specially claimed only when used upon a machine of the class to which, as before stated, the complainant's patented invention belongs. They are, however, especially applicable to reissues numbers 2,608 and 723.

As to reissue number 724, which, as above stated, claims the device of combining the finger-beam with the hinges by which it is drawn, arranged above the plane of the cutters, the use of the same combination is plainly exhibited in the defendants' machine.

As to reissue number 726, what is claimed is the combination of a stop with the mechanism for connecting the finger-beam with the main frame, and allowing it to rise and fall, substantially as in the specification set forth. I think the combination used by the defendants cannot be held to infringe this claim. It will be seen, that the claim is not broadly for any stop which may prevent the finger-bar from falling too low, in passing over ditches or other abrupt depressions in the surface of the ground. Such a claim would doubtless be liable to two objections: first, as being too broad, and, second, as not being of itself alone the subject of invention, but rather the suggestion of an obvious necessity. It could, in that aspect, only be permitted to patent the means or instrument devised to supply that obvious want, in any machine wherein the finger-bar is permitted to fall by its own gravity. The claim here avoids the suggestion of invalidity, by being confined to the specific combination of a stop with the mechanism for connecting the finger-beam to the main frame. That is the combination shown in the complainant's patent. The defendants have no such combination. Let their finger-beam be detached from the hinge which, through the coupling-arm and hinged lever or brace, connects it with the main frame, and that coupling-arm and hinge will then fall indefinitely; no stop is combined with them, which restrains their motion, and yet these are the mechanism which connects their finger-beam with the main frame. The defendants attach a flexible chain to the finger-beam itself. It is adjustable by the driver, so as to sustain the finger-beam, when desired. True, it accomplishes the same result as is effected by the combination claimed, but it is not within the words of the claim, nor, as I think, an equivalent in the combination, when the combination stated in the claim is viewed as a definite mechanical device.

4. On the subject of the novelty of the inventions embraced within the claims alleged to be infringed, no discussion would be satisfactory or useful which did not take up, one by one, the very numerous patents, applications for patents, machines, attempted machines, models, partial models, and experiments made or devised or attempted, in the endeavor to make a successful mowing machine, prior to the date of the inventions in question. Some, and, I think, all, have been before me on a former occasion, and some of them several times. I have, on these occasions, given them careful consideration. I have renewed and revised my examination of them in this case, with a view to the particular devices here claimed by the complainant. Nor would any discussion of their respective characteristics be satisfactory, that did not follow the argument of counsel through their full, minute, and extended presentation of these patents, machines, models, attempts, and experiments, and, professedly, at least, meet or discuss their several suggestions. This is chiefly the duty of opposing counsel, a duty which judges often undertake in vindication of their opinion, and, sometimes, when confined to what is necessary for the elucidation thereof, may profitably be done. I fear I may have trespassed upon that limit in the preceding discussion. I cannot attempt it on this point. As to two of the machines or supposed machines relied upon—one alleged to have been invented by Hazard Knowles, and the other by Ogden Randall—I deem it proper to say, that there are several grounds upon which I deem the proofs not sufficient to invalidate the claims of the original patentees, Sylla and Adams, to be held the first inventors of the subjects embraced in the claims alleged to be infringed by the defendants. I am not satisfied that the combinations and devices so claimed were included in those machines. I deem whatever was done by either of those parties to have resulted in unsuccessful and abandoned experiment, constituting no impediment to the invention of Sylla and Adams or to the validity of their patents. The suggestion, that, where such experiments are made without resulting in a useful machine, and the product thereof is abandoned on that ground, whatever devices it contained become public property, and can be dug up in after years and produced to defeat the patent of an independent and successful inventor, is not, I think, sound, or warranted by the law. And, finally, I place no confidence in the testimony of the principal witness as to each machine, tending to show the nature, character, and even limited success of those inventions. As to other machines, models, and experiments, it is manifest, that there were very many attempts to produce useful mowing machines; some of an entirely different class in respect to construction and mode of operation; some successful, but not embracing the principle or plan of Sylla and Adams, e. g., what were called on this hearing, the Wheeler type, involved in the case of Wheeler v. Clipper, etc., Co., [Case No. 17,493;] some only partially successful; and some, of various different kinds, failures. But I am not satisfied, that, by any, Sylla and Adams were anticipated by the successful invention and application to machines for mowing or reaping, of the devices claimed to be their invention, and to have been infringed in this case. The complainant must have a decree in conformity with this opinion.

[NOTE. So far as ascertained, there are no other cases involving this patent reported prior to 1880.]

AULTMAN v. JONES.

[1 Woolw. 99.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. June Term, 1865.

WHEN AN AGENT TO SELL ON CREDIT, TAKING A MORTGAGE, MAY BID IN, AND HOLD THE PROPERTY AGAINST HIS PRINCIPALS.

1. An agent to sell property on credit, taking a mortgage to secure the deferred payments, is not thereby authorized to foreclose the mortgage.

2. He can buy the property in, on the foreclosure, for himself, and hold it, only when so expressly authorized by his principals.

3. If he be so authorized, and so bids in the property in his own name, he does so for the benefit of his principals. He is liable to them for the amount which he may have realized on a sale of the property by him. But he should be allowed his costs, and the expenses of the foreclosure sale and re-sale.

At law. This was a writ of error to the district court for Minnesota. The plaintiffs were manufacturers of threshing and reaping machines. They had employed the defendant as their agent to sell their machines. Under their instructions, he had sold certain of them partly on credit, taking, to secure the deferred payments, mortgages on the machines sold. These mortgages empowered the plaintiffs, or their agents or assigns, to take possession of the property, and foreclose them by sale, if default should be made in the payment of any instalment of the purchase money secured thereby. The defendant foreclosed several of these mortgages, bid in the machines in his own name, and sold them again for prices averaging about four times his bid. On demand, he refused to account for more than his bids. The plaintiffs brought assumpsit for the recovery of the amounts realized by the defendant on the re-sale of the machines by him. To this the defendant pleaded the general issue, with notice of special matter. The cause was tried to a jury. On the trial, testimony was introduced, tending to show a special authority in the defendant to foreclose the mortgage and bid the property in for his own benefit. This was denied by the plaintiffs.

Mr. Lamprey, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Otis, for defendant.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and NELSON, District Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice, (charging the jury.) There are in this case two principal matters of dispute, which must be settled by you as the foundation of your verdict.

1. Had the defendant any authority to foreclose the mortgages, which have been offered in evidence?

If you find that he had not, then he has wrongfully possessed himself of the plaintiffs' property, and is liable to them for the value of the machines.

2. If you find that he had authority to foreclose these mortgages, you will next inquire whether he was authorized by an express agreement to buy in for himself the property which he was thus authorized to sell.

If you find that he was authorized by the plaintiffs to act at the sales both as seller for them, and buyer for himself, then he is liable to the plaintiffs for the amounts bid by him, subject to a deduction of all sums paid on such bids, and the necessary costs and expenses of foreclosure paid by him. He is not entitled to compensation for personal services.

If you find that he was authorized to foreclose the mortgages, but was not authorized to bid in the property for himself, then the purchases must be considered as made for the benefit of the plaintiffs. The defendant must be treated as their agent in making the purchases, and in afterwards selling them again. As he has refused, on demand, to account as agent, or to pay to the plaintiffs the money and notes which he received from sales of the machines, he is liable to the plaintiffs for the amount for which they were sold. But if he is held as agent, he is entitled to the sums which he has paid on his bids, a reasonable compensation for his services in foreclosing and re-selling, and the expenses incident to both these sales. These sums should be deducted from the sums realized by him from the sales to third parties.

The verdict of the jury was founded on the latter hypothesis. Judgment for the plaintiffs.

PLEADING—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS—COLLISION—BETWEEN SAILING VESSELS.

[1. Exceptions in the answer to a libel will be deemed to have been waived if not determined before proof is taken at the trial of the cause.]

[2. A sailing vessel which mistakes the position and course of another sailing vessel, and luffs, thereby causing a collision, is liable for damages when, by keeping her course, she would have cleared such other vessel in safety.]

[In admiralty. Libel by John Aumach and others against the schooner Queen of the South for damages caused by collision. Decree for libelants.]

The libelants were the owners of the schooner J. E. Clayton, which was injured by a collision with the Queen of the South in the night of Nov. 26, 1856, off the lower end of the Cedars, on the New Jersey coast. The libel was filed March 5, 1857, and the answer Nov. 30, 1860. Two exceptions were taken in the answer, one alleging a non-joinder of one part owner of the Clayton, and the other that the circumstances of the collision and the manoeuvers and faults which caused it were not set out with sufficient detail. The exceptions were not brought to argument until the trial of the cause.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for libelants.
Benedict, Burr & Benedict, for claimants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. At this late stage of the case the court will deem all questions arising on the exceptions to have been waived. They should have been determined before the proofs were taken. On the proofs, although the evidence is very conflicting, the weight of it establishes the fact that the Clayton was coming up the coast close hauled; that the Queen of the South was going down the coast with a free wind; that at the time when those in charge of the Queen of the South ought to have discovered the Clayton—the former was to leeward of the latter; that had she kept her course she would have passed the Clayton to leeward and cleared her with safety; and that those in charge of the Queen of the South mistook the position or course of the Clayton, or both, and luffed, striking the latter on the starboard side, and causing the damage complained of. This luffing was a mistake for which the Queen of the South should be held responsible. Decree for libelants, with a reference.

PRIZE—TRADING UNDER ENEMY'S PASS.

[Where an American ship-owner pays for, and obtains from an authorized agent of Great Britain, a British license of pass and trade, as protection for a voyage on the high seas, without the permission of his own government, the two countries at the time being at war, the ship is subject to capture and confiscation as prize of war.]

[In admiralty. Libel by the United States against the ship Aurora for condemnation as prize of war. Judgment of condemnation.]

HOWELL, District Judge. This was a libel against the ship Aurora, of Newburyport, prize to the privateer Governour Tompkins, of New York, found sailing under a British license. The principal documents produced on the part of libellants were—a consular copy of a letter from Admiral Sawyer, commanding on the Halifax station, referring to a previous correspondence between the admiral and Andrew Allen, Jr., British consul at Boston, on the subject of supplies from America, reciting the necessity and policy of maintaining a constant supply of provisions from America to the British West India islands, with assurances to the consul, that his majesty's vessels of war would be directed to permit to pass and fully to protect all American vessels so laden and bound, and which should have on board the pass or license of the consul, with a copy of the admiral's letter authenticated by the consul at Boston with such authenticated copy annexed; also, a pass of the consul from New-buryport to Norfolk, the port where the Aurora was to take in her cargo for the West Indies.

The official papers explicitly stated the intention to be a supply of the British West India islands, although the ship's papers purported a voyage to a neutral port.

John Woodward, for libellant, contended that the statutory forfeitures of congress had no bearing on the case, excepting so far forth as a binding municipal regulation was auxiliary to the provisions of international law; that "the obtaining from an authorized agent of Great Britain, paying for sailing under, and exhibiting on the high seas, as protection for the voyage, a British license of pass and trade, by an American citizen, without the permission of his own government, the two countries being at war, are in themselves cause of capture and condemnation, as prize of war." To support this proposition, a variety of grounds were taken, among which were that licenses were factitious, and not a part of the law of nations, but the creatures 1 of prerogative, and that confined to municipal regulations, or 2 of compact, or 3 of parliamentary provision; that the licenses in question were against the nature and law of war, as they put it in the power of particular individuals to relax or abate the rigour of the war; against the obligations of allegiance; and that the stipulations of such licenses could not be enforced by any known law. That the obtention and possession of those licenses to pass and supply, and the sailing under them, knowing of the war, was a trading with the enemy, independent of the port of destination and of the right of property, which may be the subject of trade; that the case of a license to trade to a citizen or subject from his own sovereign, was distinct from that of a license to a citizen or subject of one of the belligerents from the enemy, without the sanction of his own government; and so would be the supposed case of the neutral, for no question like the present could arise between the neutral citizen or subject and his own nation, as that nation would not be a party to the war; and the description of rights here involved would not in that case be in question.

"The question," said Mr. Woodward, "whether the property be American or British, matters not, provided the indirect or direct trading with the enemy be established. If you use your property so as commercially to benefit and carry into effect the prescribed and stipulated commercial views of the enemy, and under a formal license of protection or supply, this is as much trading with the enemy, as if the subject of the trade were the property of the enemy, and the destination an enemy port. In the latter case you trade direct—in the former indirect. If a different doctrine prevailed, national right would be sacrificed at the shrine of the meanest artifice. But if you pay the enemy, for such license, the case is still stronger, as the transit of the medium of commerce stamps a commercial character upon the transaction, and in this light alone converts it into a supply." As to the locality in the inception of this transaction, it is the known legal rule of construction, that the deleterious character is communicated to the ship, the cargo, and the voyage, for which the transaction is intended to provide, and which are described on the face of the licenses." "Much, as to the interpretation and application of the rules of the law of nations, will depend upon the character of war in which we are engaged. The war of the United States with Great Britain is a war between two maritime and commercial nations, in support of an independent commerce. The rules of decision which have applied the law of nations to the conduct of the citizens of each belligerent, have always been so construed and applied as to effectuate the notorious reasons and avowed policy of the war. This is not a theory, but has been emphatically pronounced by the decisions, to which I have referred; and it will be found by those decisions, that the principles of the law of nations have always been, under legal discretion, restrained or enlarged so as to effectuate and not intercept the notorious and avowed policy of the war. And more particularly has this principle been enforced upon questions arising upon the conduct of a citizen of one of the belligerents with his own nation; which is the present case,—To trade with or hold a commercial intercourse, whether by person or property, with the enemy, without the license of one's own government, is proven, by all the writers upon the law of nations, and all decisions touching this point, as adverse to the policy of a war waged for the purpose of commerce—that it amounts to a misdemeanor, and is cause of confiscation and condemnation. Suppose our citizens be permitted thus to obtain, pay for, and act upon these licenses; they would be in the practice of all the evils and derangements which the law of war is intended to prevent. They would facilitate treacherous correspondence, information and supplies to the enemy—the very evils assigned for the prohibition of all commercial intercourse; or, in the language of Sir William Scott, (in the case of The Jonge Pietre,) "all communication, direct or indirect, without the license of government," with the enemy. The anomaly of a citizen at peace and his nation at war, would emphatically exist; nay—the absurdity of that citizen making his peace and his fortune by the disposition of the enemy, obtained adversely to that of his own government. It is also easy to perceive, that by these licenses it would be in the power of the enemy to destroy or counteract the internal commercial policy, and relations of the states, or politically to distract the union, by concentrating the trade into some particular state, or casting it into the hands of a particular party. It is the language of a finished civilian, that, "there is no such thing as a war for arms and a peace for commerce."

"If we silently permit our citizens to traverse the ocean under such licenses of pass and supply from the enemy, it has been already proven, that by basest collusion between American citizens and the British government, we enable the enemy to take by stealth a portion of our national sovereignty, and if this high principle of national honour thus bear the touch, it would be better to surrender the whole. In a commercial war, which is always preventive and restrictive, by such licenses of pass and supply, the enemy would assume the right of regulating the commerce and directing the capital of our own citizens. The independence and integrity of one of the belligerents would be lost in the dependence and prospects of its citizens or subjects upon the authority or courtesy of the other. The civil relation, the national pride, and the boasted morals of our countrymen would be corrupted or destroyed by the deleterious influence of foreign gain; and that distinguishing and repellant point of character which marks the American citizen, both at home and abroad, and which now stamps our national character upon the fears and the admiration of the world, would be found at the feet of our enemy or lost in the mazes of British corruption."

The Attorney-General Burrell, and Mr. Boss of Newport, as counsel for the claimants, Clark and Wheelwright of Newburyport. having closed their argument, Mr. Robins, United States' district attorney, was about to begin, when the court superseded an argument on his part, by pronouncing judgment, condemning the ship and cargo to the captors. The judges' opinions were in complete coincidence with the doctrines and arguments above set forth.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—NEGOTIABILITY—CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT—DEMAND AND PROTEST—NOTICE—NOTARY—CONFLICT OF LAWS.

1. A certificate of deposit. by the cashier of a bank, for a sum named, payable at a future period, with five per cent. interest, to the order of the individual for whose benefit the deposit was made, is a promissory note.

[See note at end of case.]

2. A justice of the peace, in Mississippi, ex officio, is a notary public to make demand and protest of a note, and give notice to the indorser.

3. The next mail after the protest is sufficient notice.

4. A decision of a state court on the character of the paper, does not constitute a rule of decision for the federal courts.

5. It is a question of common or mercantile law, rather than the construction of a statute.

[At law. Action of assumpsit by David Austen, William S. Wilmerding, and David Austen, Jr., against Henry Miller, on a certificate of deposit. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Affirmed by the supreme court in Miller v. Austen, 13 How. (54 U. S.) 218.]

Chase & Ball, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Fox, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. On the 1st of February, 1840, the Mississippi Union Bank issued the following certificate:

"I hereby certify, that Hugh Short has deposited in this bank, payable twelve months from 1st of May, 1839, with five per cent. interest till due, fifteen hundred dollars, for the use of Henry Miller, and payable only to his order, upon the return of this certificate. (Signed) William P. Grayson, Cashier."

On which the following indorsements were made:

"Pay to George Lockwood, or order. Henry Miller, Cincinnati, Ohio."

"Pay Austen, Wilmerding & Co., or order, without recourse. George Lockwood."

On the 4th of May, 1840, L. V. Dickson, justice of the peace, and ex officio notary public, presented the paper declared on at the counter of the Mississippi Union Bank, at Jackson, and demanded of the teller payment in specie, or its equivalent, which that officer, after consultation with the other officers of the bank, refused; but offered to pay in the notes of the bank, which the notary would not accept. The defendant Miller was duly notified as indorser, by a written and printed notice, directed to him at Cincinnati, and deposited in time for the first mail of the next day.

In July, 1847, the plaintiffs brought this action against Miller, as indorser. The declaration contained three counts. 1st. Alleging it to be a promissory note of the Union Bank, payable to the order of Henry Miller, and by him indorsed to George Lockwood, who indorsed it to the plaintiffs. 2d. Alleging it to be a draft drawn by Henry Miller, on the Mississippi Union Bank, at Jackson, requesting the bank to pay to George Lockwood, and by him indorsed to the plaintiffs, and charging a due presentment for payment, and notice of nonpayment. 3d. On a common count for money lent and advanced, paid, laid out, and expended, money had and received, and on an account stated.

[2] [Affirmed by the supreme court in Miller v. Austen, 13 How. (54 U. S.) 218.]

The plea was non-assumpsit. In the defense it was contended that the instrument declared on was not a promissory note in a mercantile sense, so as to pass by indorsement under the statute of Ohio. It provides, "that all bonds, promissory notes, bills of exchange, foreign and inland, drawn for any sum or sums of money certain, and made payable to any person or order, or to any person or bearer, or to any person or assigns, shall be negotiable by indorsement thereon; but nothing in this section shall be construed to make negotiable any such bond, note, or bill of exchange, drawn to any person or persons alone, and not drawn payable to order, or bearer, or assigns." A check and certificate of deposit are not mentioned in the statute as being negotiable.

And it is alleged that the supreme court of Ohio has decided that this identical paper is not a promissory note, negotiable under the laws of Ohio, as appears from the fourth volume (page 527) of the Western Law Journal. Suit was brought by these plaintiffs against Miller, on the same certificate, and was decided at the May term, 1847, against the plaintiffs. This is claimed as conclusive of the case, as it was made in this state under the statute of the state, which construction is claimed as a rule of decision by the courts of the United States, according to [Slacum v. Pomery,] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 225; [Wayman v. Southard,] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 50; 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 739; [Wilcox v. Hunt, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 379;] [Shelby v. Guy,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 367; and [Green v. Neal,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 297. But independently of that decision, it is urged that the instrument is not a promissory note, and that it is not negotiable under the well settled rules of law. To constitute a promissory note, it is said there must be an express promise to pay a certain amount, as an implied promise will not answer. That where there is no more than a simple acknowledgment of the debt, with such a promise to pay as the law will imply, it is not a promissory note. Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 Watts & S. 231. In that case this question was fully examined, by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, on a certificate of deposit, exactly like the one before the court, and which was held not to be a promissory note, after two arguments. That court referred to Horne v. Redfearn, [33 E. C. L. 790,] as conclusive on the subject. In Fisher v. Leslie, 1 Esp. 426, it was held that a slip of paper, I O U eight guineas, is not a promissory note, but merely the acknowledgment of a debt.

An instrument acknowledging the receipt of two hundred pounds in drafts for the payment of money, and promising to pay the money specified in the drafts, is not a promissory note. Williamson v. Bennett, 2 Camp. 417. It was also objected that it was not a promissory note, because it was payable upon a contingency, and not at all events. It was payable only upon the order of Henry Miller, and upon the return of the certificate. A promissory note, it was said, must not depend upon a contingency. Story, Prom. Notes, 22; Williamson v. Bennett, 2 Camp. 417; Roberts v. Peake, 1 Burrows, 323. This point was decided in the case above cited from 6 Watts & S. That case is said to have been well considered, and in which the above points were ruled.

It is asked whether the consideration of a promissory note in the hands of an assignee, can be inquired into. If it can, it seems to be a negotiable promissory note. And it is claimed that the consideration of the certificate may be inquired into. In a suit against the Mississippi Bank, it might show, it is urged, that instead of money, worthless bank notes were deposited, and that an offer was made to return them. If this be a promissory note, it is asked, to whom is it payable? The words, for the use of Henry Miller, only indicate the equitable rights of the parties, and do not in any way affect the legal character of the paper, &c. In reply it was said that in McCoy v. Gilmore, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 268, it was held that no special form of words is necessary to constitute a promissory note. It is enough if the intent appear, and the sum can be made certain by calculation, &c.

And the court said the certificate had all the essential requisites of a promissory note. The cashier being the active agent of the bank, acknowledged the deposit of fifteen hundred dollars, payable thirteen months from the 1st of May, 1839, with five per cent. interest, for the use of Henry Miller, and payable only to his order, on the return of this certificate. Signed by the cashier. There is no want of certainty on the face of this paper. It was payable on presentation, as notes are often made, which is not a contingency that affects the character of the paper. There is a promise to pay to the order of the person for whose benefit the deposit was made. This is sufficient.

This is not a case in which the rule established by the state court, is followed by the courts of the United States. It is not a question as to the construction of a state statute, but rather a principle of the common or mercantile law which governs the case; and in this view the federal courts rather than the courts of the state, should fix the rule of decision. We can entertain no doubt on the subject. By a proper construction of the certificate, it is in principle a promissory note, and the jury being so instructed, found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Under the statute of Mississippi, a justice of the peace officiates as a notary public, in making a demand, and giving notice.

There was judgment entered on the verdict.

[NOTE. In affirming this decree, the supreme court, by Mr. Justice Catron, held: "The established doctrine is that a promise to deliver or to be accountable for so much money is a good bill or note. Here the sum is certain, and the promise direct. Every reason exists why the indorser of this paper should be held responsible to his indorsee that can prevail in cases where the paper indorsed is in the form of a promissory note; and as such note the state courts generally have treated certificates of deposit payable to order, and the principles adopted by the state courts in coming to this conclusion are fully sustained by the writers of treatises on bills and notes." BANKRUPTCY—INVOLUNTARY PROCEEDINGS—CONTEST OF ADJUDICATION — RIGHTS OF GENERAL CREDITORS.

[A general unsecured creditor has a right to intervene and contest an adjudication in bankruptcy.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by the People's National Bank of Jackson, as a general creditor of the firm of Austin, Tomlinson & Webster,] for leave to intervene and contest the petition of a creditor of the firm for an adjudication in bankruptcy. Petition granted.

Mr. Wilson, for the intervening creditor.

Mr. Peck, contra.

BROWN, District Judge. It is now well settled that any creditor, whose interests are affected by an adjudication, has a right to intervene and contest all the allegations of the creditors' petition. The difficulty is to determine when the interests of the creditor are likely to be jeopardized by the proceeding. In every case in which leave to intervene has been granted, the creditor had an interest peculiar to himself, either by way of attachment, preference, or the institution of proceedings by him in another district. In re Boston, H. & E. R. Co., [Case No. 1,677;] In re Derby, [Id. 3,815;] In re Mendelsohn, [Id. 9,420;] In re Bergeron, [Id. 1,342;] In re Hatje, [Id. 6,215;] In re Jack, [Id. 7,119;] In re Williams, [Id. 17,706;] In re Stafford, [Id. 13,274.]

It has not yet been decided that a general unsecured creditor is entitled to be heard, but I think it follows logically from the reasoning in the cases above cited. He certainly has an interest in knowing whether the proper number and amount of creditors have joined in the petition, for if the debtor voluntarily becomes bankrupt, he could not obtain his discharge without the assent of one-quarter in number and one-third in value of his creditors. Precisely the same proportion being necessary to put a debtor into bankruptcy, the inference naturally follows that the petitioning creditors are regarded by the act as assenting to the discharge, in like manner as if they had expressly signified their assent in a voluntary case, provided the bankrupt has been guilty of no fraud or misconduct. In re Scull, [Case No. 12,568;] In re Wilson, [Id. 17,784;] In re Duncan, [Id. 4,131.] It thus becomes a matter of considerable importance to every creditor that the requisite number does in fact join. To this extent, also, the act itself seems to contemplate their being heard, by providing that if the allegation as to number and amount be denied, the court shall ascertain, "upon reasonable notice to the creditors," whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged bankrupt. If then they are entitled to notice, and may be heard upon a denial filed by a debtor, I see no reason why they may not intervene and be heard in their own behalf, even if the debtor interposes no objection. Clinton v. Mayo, [Case No. 2,899.] Though a general creditor may derive no special advantage to himself from defeating an adjudication upon the merits, as all will share alike in the general distribution of the assets, I think he has a substantial interest in the liberty of pursuing his common law remedy for the collection of his debt, which he loses by an adjudication. From the language of the petition in this case, "if not impeded by such proceedings, your petitioner will be able to collect its said claim in the courts of this state," I judge this to be the object of this proceeding. It is true the petitioner may thereby gain a preference over other creditors; but the bankrupt law does not frown upon preferences lawfully obtained, or interpose any obstacle in the way of a diligent creditor. If the court may lend its aid to protect liens already acquired, which would be held unlawful preferences if bankruptcy proceedings were successful (and it is upon this theory the above cases are decided), it is not easy to see why it should refuse to listen to a creditor who may anticipate hereafter the acquisition of such liens. The desire of a creditor to pursue his lawful remedy in the state court cannot be made the subject of censure or criticism here. Indeed, his right to do this is a substantial interest for which he may fairly claim protection. It is only when the connivance of a debtor contributes to a preference gained by legal proceedings that the law pronounces it a fraud.

While, as before observed, the view here taken finds no positive support in the authorities, there is no reported case holding that a general creditor may not be heard. In more than one the intimation is in this direction. Speaking of a creditor's petition, the late Judge Woodruff, whose eminent legal abilities entitle even his dicta to respectful consideration, observed, (6 N. B. R. 213), [In re Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 1,677:] "It is not a mere suit inter-partes, it rather partakes of the nature of a proceeding in rem, in which every actual creditor has a direct interest." In re Walker, [Id. 17,061,]

Judge Lowell, entertained a petition by an unsecured creditor, to vacate an adjudication for want of jurisdiction although no objection seems to have been taken to the creditor's right to be heard. In Fogarty v. Gerity, [Id. 4,895,] the learned judge for the district of California remarks: "But all other creditors are parties to and bound by the proceeding. If it be sustained, the ordinary remedies against the debtor will be suspended, the whole of his property will pass into the hands of an assignee, and they will be obliged to come into court to prove their debts, enforce their lien, adjust their accounts, and receive dividends, and the unsatisfied claims may be forever barred by the discharge of the bankrupt. They have, therefore, a clear right to be heard, and to resist the proceeding, on the ground that the court is without jurisdiction." Though the creditor in this case had a lien by attachment, the decision does not seem to have been placed on this ground. See, also, In re Mendelsohn, [Case No. 9,420.] Though the question is not free from doubt, I think a general creditor may make himself a party to this petition, and the prayer of the petitioner is therefore granted.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem for damages caused by a collision. Decree apportioning the damages between the parties, with costs to the libellants.]

W. J. Haskett, for libellants.

Benedict & Benedict, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel for a collision, filed by Justin F. Talmage and Thomas Kivlin, the owners of two wrecking vessels, for damages caused to those vessels by a collision which occurred between them and the steamboat Austin, at about seven o'clock in the evening of the 23d of November, 1865, in the Hudson river, off and a little above Teller's point. The wrecking vessels were boats connected together by timbers running from one to the other. They were arranged over a sunken sloop, which they were employed in raising. One of the boats had a cabin in which the wreckers lived. That boat had a mast. The other boat was an open boat. The structure, composed of the two boats and the connecting timbers, was substantially a single object. It was anchored in its position, and was considerably over on the eastern side of the channel, and to the eastward of the middle of the river. The weather was clear, so that lights could be seen two or three miles off, the tide was ebb, and the wind was northeast. The Austin was going down the river, toward New York, towing thirty-two boats, four on each side of her, and twenty-four attached to her by hawsers behind, in five tiers. That one of the wrecking vessels which had a mast, had a light in a lantern, suspended in the air some fifteen feet above the deck, and about the same distance from the mast, upon a rope which ran from the gunwale to the mast-head. In addition to this light, there was another light, in a movable lantern, on the deck of one or the other of the two wrecking vessels. This latter lantern was not intended to be stationary, nor was it in fact stationary, for, not long before the collision, it was moved from a position on one boat to a position on the other boat, but still it was kept visible to approaching vessels, equally with the suspended lantern. The pilot of the Austin testifies, that he saw the lights on these wrecking vessels at a distance, and that the appearance presented by them was such as to lead him to suppose that the object on which they were was a steamboat coming up the river with a tow, the arrangement of lights, as exhibited to his eye, being the same as was then shown on his own vessel, and used by other steamtugs when towing tows; that, when he had reached within about half a mile of the lights, there was a change in their positions relatively to each other, caused by the movement of the lower light; that he then concluded that the object must be something other than a steamtug towing; that he then saw that the only chance of avoiding a collision was to try and go to the eastward of the object; and that he sheered the Austin accordingly, and she passed in safety, but some of the boats in tow of her struck the wrecking vessels. It is clear, from the evidence, that the movement of the light from the deck of one of the two wrecking vessels to the deck of the other, was seen by the pilot of the Austin, and led to his change of course. But the difficulty in the case, on the part of the

Austin, is, that she ought not, with her unwieldly tow, subject as it was to the action of the tide and of the wind, to have approached so near to the object, whether it was supposed to be a tow, or something else, as to be unable to avoid it. It appears from the testimony of the pilot, that when he first saw the light at a distance, he could not tell what it was, and came nearer to it, and thought it was a tow, and remained of that opinion till the light on it moved. He ought not, in uncertainty, to have approached, with his bulky and helpless tow, so near. How he was going to avoid her, if she was a tow, does not appear, unless he relied upon her avoiding him. I cannot resist the conclusion that the Austin was in fault. But I think the wrecking vessels were also in fault. Whether it be claimed that the wrecking vessels were required to exhibit the light provided for vessels at anchor, by article 7 of the act of April 29, 1864, or the light provided for open boats at anchor, by article 9 of the same act, they should have exhibited but one light, or, if they exhibited two, the two should have been similarly arranged. The actual arrangement was calculated to deceive an approaching vessel, and, I think, did contribute to induce the pilot of the Austin to think that the object carrying the lights was a steamtug towing, and to approach nearer than he otherwise would.

There must be a decree apportioning the damages equally between the parties, and giving costs to the libellants.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCES—RENT.

[In Mississippi a landlord is not entitled to preference for rent in a fund arising from the sale, by the tenant's assignee in bankruptcy, of personal property found on the demised premises; since, under the Mississippi statute a landlord has no lien until he seizes the property, and since the claim does not come within any of the preferences created by the bankruptcy act.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by J. E. Austin against H. E. O'Reilly, assignee of Steele & Co., to have paid to him, as a preference, a claim alleged to be due for the rent of a plantation leased by Austin to Steele & Co. for the year 1871. Petition refused. On petition of review, the circuit court reversed this decree, in Austin v. O'Reilly, Case No. 665.]

[1] [Reversed by circuit court in Austin v. O'Reilly, Case No. 665.]

HILL, District Judge. The question presented for decision, arises upon the petition of said Austin to have paid to him as a preference a claim of one thousand eight hundred dollars, claimed to be due for the rent of a plantation leased by him to the bankrupts, Steele & Co., for the year 1871, and upon which it is alleged there was remaining upon the plantation at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, crops, mules and other property, more than sufficient to pay said sum, which have been sold by the assignee, and the proceeds thereof now in his hands. To this application the assignee demurs. It is claimed by the petitioner that he had a lien for this rent, if not a priority by that name; that the assignee stands in the place of a sheriff with an execution to be levied on the personal property on the premises, who, under the statute, is prohibited from removing the property upon the leased premises until he shall have paid to the landlord his claim for rent for one year, if so much remain due, and that the assignee, having sold the property, is required first to satisfy the rent out of the proceeds; and for authority cites the decisions made by the courts in bankruptcy in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia and South Carolina, in which the statutes in relation to rents are very similar to our own.

The argument of petitioner's counsel has been ingenious and able, and has presented the question at least in a different form from that heretofore presented and urged upon the court on behalf of similar claims; but, upon examination of the decisions made by the courts in the states referred to, it will be found that they hold the claim for rent to be a lien created by the statute. Our statute was carefully considered by me in the case of Cleary v. Martz, [Case No. 2,873,] in this court, and again in Burtin v. Carne, [Id. 2,213,] in the northern district, some years since, and then decided that no lien is created by the statute; that only a summary proceeding is given to the landlord for the collection of his rent; that the seizure of the property creates a lien, and until that is done the title to the property is entirely unaffected by the claim for rent; that the tenant has as complete a right to dispose of it as though no rent was due. Since that time this ruling has been sustained by the supreme court of this state, first in Mary v. Dyche, 42 Miss. 347, and Mason v. O'Brien, Id. 420, and still more recently in the case of Stamps v. Gillman, 43 Miss. 456. This statute, being so construed by the supreme court of the state, is binding on this court, although I might not concur in its correctness, but I see no reason for dissent, or a reversal of my former ruling. It is the duty of this court to take the bankrupt estate just as it stood at the time of filing the petition for adjudication, and protect and enforce all the rights attached to it at that time.

The petitioner at that time had failed to take the necessary steps to secure his lien on the property for the payment of the rent due; the bankrupt might then have sold it, and the purchaser would have received a good title as against the claim for rent, whether he knew of its existence or not, if otherwise valid. The assignee took the property in the same condition for the benefit of the general creditors, only subject to liens then existing upon it by contract or operation of law, and also subject to the priorities or preference claims provided under the bankrupt act, none of which embrace petitioner's claim for rent. So that this claim was neither a lien upon the property or entitled to be paid in preference to those of other creditors out of the proceeds.

The policy of the bankrupt law is an equal distribution among the creditors, in proportion to the respective amounts due, and this will be maintained in all cases, except when a lien exists, either by contract or by operation of law, upon the property at the date of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and the preferences specified. On a careful review of the question submitted, which, though not in form, is in substance the same heretofore considered, I am satisfied that the petitioner's demand must share pro rata with the general creditors, and is not entitled to the preference claimed; and upon general principles of equity it is difficult to perceive any superior claim in favor of the man who furnishes the land over the man who furnishes the food to the tenant and his family, and the means furnished to make the crop upon the land; as in this case either may, if he choose, require security before giving credit, and if he fail to do so cannot justly complain to share equally with other creditors in case of the bankruptcy of the debtor.

BANKRUPTCY—LIENS PROTECTED—RENT—ATTACHMENT.

1. All liens, except such inchoate ones as arise upon an attachment, are protected by the bankrupt law.

2. The right to distrain for rent does not give the landlord, strictly speaking, a lien upon the goods subject to distraint.

3. But such right may fairly be classed as a lien, within the intent and meaning of the bankrupt act.

4. In Mississippi, the landlord is obliged to sue out an attachment for the purpose of effecting a distress for rent, but when the attachment is sued out, his rights are the same as those of a landlord at common law.

5. Although the high court of errors and appeals of Mississippi has held that the landlord's right does not constitute a lien, and that a bona fide mortgage or sale will displace it, nevertheless, these decisions are not sufficient to deprive the landlord, in bankruptcy proceedings, of his right of priority of payment over the general creditors, out of the proceeds of goods subject at the time the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, to his right of attachment.

W. B. & A. B. Pittman, for assignee.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This case depends on the question, whether, in the state of Mississippi, a landlord, whose tenant becomes a bankrupt before any attachment has been issued for rent, is entitled to priority of payment over the general creditors. This question must be decided in view of the provisions of the bankrupt law, and the peculiar rights of landlords, in reference to enforcing payment of rent in Mississippi. The bankrupt act (section 14) declares that the assignment shall relate back to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and that by operation of law, the title to all property and estate, both real and personal, of the bankrupt, shall vest in the assignee, although attached on mesne process, and shall dissolve any such attachment made within four months next preceding. The inchoate lien obtained by an attachment, and not perfected by judgment, is thus rendered null by the proceedings in bankruptcy. But perfected liens are protected. It is provided by the same section that the assignee, under authority of the court, may redeem or discharge any mortgage, pledge, deposit, or lien, and tender performance of the condition thereof, or sell the property subject thereto; and section 20 of the bankrupt act provides that when a creditor has a mortgage, pledge, or lien, for securing his debt, he shall be admitted as a creditor against the general estate only for the balance due him after deducting the value of the property on which he has such security, unless he consent to release it.

These provisions show that all liens, except such inchoate ones as arise upon an attachment, are protected by the law. But how do these provisions operate upon the peculiar lien, or right of distress, given to a landlord for his rent? That right, at common law, was founded on the principle that the landlord retained his ownership, not only in the land, but in so much of the produce thereof as was reserved by him for its use. Such reserved portion, or reditus, was considered as belonging to him by virtue of his original ownership; but not being separated from the rest of the profits, he could only seize a reasonable amount as a distress or security to compel the payment or appropriation of his stipulated portion. When the render consisted of personal service, such service was regarded as in lieu of the profits of the land, to which, until the service was rendered, the landlord's qualified property and right of distress extended, as in case of actual rents. The legislature afterwards extended the right of distress to other things besides the profits of the land; and, as far as the right extended, the principle of the latent or qualified property of the landlord in the subject of distress accompanied it. Other legislation enabled him to sell the goods distrained, in order to realize the amount of his rent, if the tenant proved refractory. In some states it is provided that, instead of making the distress himself, the landlord must procure a warrant from a magistrate or court, to be executed by an officer. But this regulation of the mode of exercising his right does not affect the nature of the right itself.

It is common to call the right a lien, and yet it is not strictly such; for it does not attach to any specific article of property. The tenant, if a farmer, may, in due course of business, sell produce or cattle or other things; and if a merchant, he may in the same manner sell merchandise; and the sales, if made in good faith, will be valid, and the property sold will be free from the landlord's right of distress, if removed from the demised premises, and, in most states, without such removal. But if the sale be made for the purpose of depriving the landlord of his right, he may, by the English statutes and by the statutes of most states, follow the property within a reasonable time after its removal. Now if the landlord's rights were a strict lien, no valid sales could be made at all. Still, being commonly called a lien, and being a peculiar right in the nature of a lien, which is greatly relied on as an essential condition of all leases, and the subversion of which would work great injustice, and would in the end operate prejudicially to the interests both of the tenants and their creditors, by inducing landlords to require onerous conditions for their security, the supreme court of the United States, and most of the district and circuit courts, have regarded it as fairly to be classed as a lien within the true intent and meaning of the bankrupt act, and have allowed the landlord a priority over the general creditors to the extent of the goods subject to his right of distress. This right of the landlord has been regarded as peculiarly entitled to priority when by statute an execution creditor of the tenant is prohibited from removing the goods until he has paid the landlord's rent, or a reasonable amount (generally a year's rent), which may have accrued. Thus in Longstreth v. Pennock, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 575, the supreme court places special emphasis on this fact.

In Mississippi, it is true, the landlord is obliged to sue out an attachment for the purpose of effecting a distress for rent; but when the attachment is sued out, his rights are the same in effect as those of the landlord at common law. That they are founded on and grow out of those rights is evident from the fact that he is not compelled to pursue his claim to judgment like other creditors. The attachment in his case is in the nature of an execution; or, more properly speaking, of a distress. He has the same right of priority over execution creditors, and the same right to prevent the removal of goods and to follow goods clandestinely removed, which exists in England and most of the other states. It is true that the supreme court of this state has held that the landlord's right is not a lien; and that a bona fide mortgage or sale by the tenant will displace it. I do not think, however, that these decisions are sufficient to deprive the landlord in bankruptcy proceedings of his just right of priority over the general creditors. They gave credit with the understanding that the landlord's right was superior to theirs. He, therefore, has an equity to be preferred. With regard to them, he stands in precisely the same position and invested with the same rights, as if his common law right of distress remained. A decree will be made, declaring the right of the landlord to be preferred before the general creditors upon the proceeds of all goods subject to his right of attachment, at the time the proceedings in bankruptcy commenced.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — TARIFF OF 1846 — APPRAISAL — LOSS OF WEIGHT DURING VOYAGE.

1. Under the tariff of 1846, ad valorem duties are to be paid on the quantity of goods actually imported, not on the amount put up in the foreign country.

[Cited in Weaver & Sterry v. Saltonstall, 38 Fed. 494.]

2. Where such quantity is measured by weight, a loss of weight on the voyage, whether by drainage or evaporation, will proportionally diminish the duties, notwithstanding what is lost in weight may be gained in value.

[Cited in Weaver & Sterry v. Saltonstall, 38 Fed. 494.]

to have been illegally exacted for duties on a quantity of hemp imported from Manilla. It appeared that a quantity of bales were put up in Manilla, each containing two piculs, and that the picul is a Manilla weight of 140 pounds. On weighing the hemp at the custom-house, it appeared to have lost weight during the voyage at the rate of about ten pounds per bale; nevertheless duties were assessed on the number of piculs originally put up, at the Manilla value, although to make out this number it was necessary to rate the picul at 135 pounds. Verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, and defendant moved for a new trial.

P. W. Chandler and G. O. Shattuck, for plaintiff.

B. F. Hallett, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice, held, that this case could not be distinguished from the cases of Marriott v. Brune, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 619, and U. S. v. Southmayd, Id. 637, which were cases of loss of weight by sugars from drainage. The tariff act of 1846 levies a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem on this article. To assess this duty the collector must ascertain the value of a picul in Manilla, and dividing this by 140, he will obtain its value per pound. But dividing it by 135, will not give him this value. Or if the collector preferred to assess by the picul, he could divide the number of pounds reported by the weigher by 140. Under the decisions referred to, the merchant is to pay duties on what is actually imported, not on what is put up for export in the foreign country; and if the sum on which the ad valorem duty is to be cast depends on weight, a loss of weight on the voyage will diminish that sum, whether such diminution of weight be caused by drainage or evaporation. It is argued that the evaporation of weight has not diminished the quantity. But the measure of quantity is not bulk, but weight,—the pound, or the picul; and if the number of these is diminished, the quantity is lessened. It is also argued that the value of this importation has not been diminished; that what it has lost in weight it has gained in quality. But the revenue laws do not provide for any such set-off of loss and gain. The quality of some wines is much improved by a sea voyage. But this has not prevented congress from making full allowance for breakage and leakage. Lawrence v. Caswell, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 488. The question here is not of dutiable value, but whether the collector could assess a duty on a greater number of piculs than were bonded, upon the assumption that those which were bonded would have been worth as much in Manilla as the whole number in the state in which they were put up. There is no law allowing such an assumption or making the amount to be paid dependent on an inquiry as to that fact. Motion for new trial overruled, and judgment on the verdict.

The AUSTRALIA.

District Court, D. Maine. Oct. 28, 1859.

SEAMEN—SHIPPING ARTICLES—UNUSUAL TERMS—ADMIRALTY—WITNESSES.

1. If a seaman proves unfit for the service for which he shipped, the master may degrade him to another duty.

2. When unusual terms are introduced into a contract, courts of admiralty require that it be explained plainly to the men, or it will be set aside and they must be presumed to be engaged on the usual terms.

[See The Sarah Jane, Case No. 12,348; Brown v. Lull, Id. 2,018; The Cypress, Id. 3,530; The Almatia, Id. 254; The Samuel Ober, 15 Fed. 621; Trecartin v. The Rochambeau, Case No. 14,163.]

3. The law of the U. S. of 1790, requires every contract to be in writing, and if not, the law is not binding on the men. They may leave the ship at any time, and demand wages at the highest price paid at that port at any time within three months before their engagements.

4. The act of Maine, admitting parties to be witnesses, does not apply to the admiralty.

5. The practice is to allow either party to examine the other on interrogatories, and the answers they give are evidence in the case. But the answers, though under oath, are not properly evidence.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Michael De Lory against the Australia for wages. Decree for libellant.]

Mr. Sewall, for libellant.

M. Smith, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. Michael De Lory, about 21 years of age, engaged at Boston to go in the Australia to an eastern port for her cargo, and thence to Jacksonville in Florida and some port in the West Indies and to her port of discharge in the United States. He engaged to go as cook, provided his services were satisfactory in that office. He made the voyage to Wiscasset, assisted in loading the cargo, and was dismissed for want of competency as a cook. He was a native of New Brunswick, entirely uneducated, as he could neither write nor read, and he was shipped without signing shipping articles. He brings this action for his wages, for damages in being dismissed in a strange port, and suing as well for the United States as himself, for the penalty of twenty dollars provided in the first section of the act of 1790, [1 Stat. 131.]

On all the evidence I am disposed to admit that he was incompetent as a cook for such a vessel, though he had been employed in that capacity in fishing voyages. In this case, had he been shipped regularly, the rule of the maritime law is well settled that the master might have displaced him and put him to other duty. Every person is presumed fit for the duty for which he engages. Quisque spondet puritatem artis suae is a rule of common sense that is found in every system of law. The owner who engaged De Lory has been examined on interrogatories, and says that he was engaged on trial with liberty to dismiss him from the vessel if he proved unacceptable. The libellant has been examined in the same way, and though he acknowledges that he was to serve as cook on trial, and to be dismissed from that employment if he proved not satisfactory, yet that he was to go in the vessel absolutely. It is not probable that he would engage for a voyage eastward, on trial, to be dismissed and find his way home at his own expense, though he might engage as cook on those terms, and he swears positively that he was engaged for the whole voyage. There is a repugnance in the testimony, but in this circumstance only; and in this discrepancy I am disposed to take his word. That he so understood the engagement I have no doubt.

The law of the sea favors a written contract without, perhaps, making it indispensable. But the men are notoriously inattentive to its terms, and oftener than otherwise, sign without reading it. They trust to usage and the law. For this reason, on general principles, if there is anything unusual in the terms, that should be explained to the men in such a manner that they shall understand it and it should be balanced by an adequate compensation, otherwise it will be set aside and the men presumed to be engaged on the usual terms, or those required by law. This is the general law, adapted to the common character of seamen; but that of this country goes farther.

In controversies between the master or owner and the mariners, whether arising on contracts or torts, it is sometimes difficult to hold the balance evenly between them. The former being usually men of education, and always conversant in business, are astute in providing for themselves. But the men, born, perhaps, with a temper naturally choleric and impatient, that natural infirmity augmented rather than checked by a want of education, quickened by the ungovernable and contentious nature of the element to which, by their calling, they are exposed, and always necessitous, think little of the future. They are thoughtless and incautious in these contracts as well as in their general behavior, and it is not uncommon for their precipitancy to be taken advantage of to their injury. But at the same time there are among them some of depraved dispositions, bent on mischief, who watch their opportunity to exasperate their officers and to stir up the crew to disorder and sedition. But they are persons of incautious and hasty tempers, and the truth generally comes out in the testimony. Courts do not fail to mark a disposition radically bad, but they have no right to presume this without proof, and in this case all natural presumptions are in favor of the man, as well from his admitted want of education, as from the appearance of honesty and simplicity when under examination.

By the act of 1790, (1 Stat. 131,) every master of a vessel of fifty tons burthen or more, before he starts on a foreign voyage, or one to a port other than in an adjoining state, is bound to have an agreement in writing containing a description of the voyage and the terms of the engagement, and in default, he is bound to pay his men the highest rate of wages that have been given for three months in that port for the like service, and in addition thereto, a penalty of twenty dollars, to be equally divided between the person suing for the same, and the United States. But by the act of 1840, [5 Stat. 397, cl. 19,] he is subject to a penalty of $100 for a violation of any of the provisions of that act, (No. 19,) one of which, in connection with the act of 1790 and 1803, [2 Stat. 203,] is the having a contract in writing.

How do the owners in this case expect to escape the penal obligations of this act? The only mode is by setting up an agreement to take this man on trial. There is in the act of 1790, § 1, an exception of servants and apprentices. But it is not pretended that De Lory was either, and with every other man must be made a contract in writing. It may be questioned whether the statute does not, by implication, negative the right of taking any other man on trial. Be this as it may, we have the declaration of De Lory himself, taken on interrogatories, that he was engaged for the whole voyage, and the proviso only applied to his officiating as cook. The law of Maine, admitting parties to be examined, (Rev. St. c. 82, § 9,) does not in its terms apply to proceedings in the admiralty, and has been decided not to extend to this court; but according to the course of the admiralty, parties may always be examined on interrogatories on the demand of either party. Though the answer is not properly evidence, being drawn up by the proctors on the statement of the party,—Hutson v. Jordan, [Case No. 6,959;] The Crusader, [Id. 3,456;] Sherwood v. Hall, [Id. 12,777;] Cushman v. Ryan, [Id. 3,515;] Jay v. Almy, [Id. 7,236,]—the answers to the interrogatories, subject as they are, to pass under the ordeal of a cross-examination contrary to the rule of the civil law, are,—1 Ware, 410, [Hutson v. Jordan, supra;] Pothier, Des Obligations, No. 910. De Lory very fairly admits that he was to be removed from the office of cook if, on trial, he proved unsatisfactory. But he is equally positive that he was engaged for the whole voyage. And his answer, supported as it is by probability, is, I think, true. My opinion is, that he must be allowed his wages, for the time that he served, at the highest rate that was given at that port for three months before his employment, and that, according to the proof, is sixteen dollars a month. He must be allowed damages also for the breach of his contract.

Damages by the common law, and this is the decision of natural law, are given as an indemnity, that is, a sum which would put the person in the same situation as he would have been if the damage had not been done. They are matters of calculation for the most part, if not, are of necessity left to the discretion of the tribunal that awards them, and are sometimes increased and sometimes lessened, according to the nature and circumstances of the injury and of the person who suffers. 2 Pars. Cont. p. 432; Domat Lois Civiles, lib. 3, tit. 5, praeambule; Id. lib. 1, tit. 2, No. 18. If the injury is wanton, that is, if done intentionally, without opening the question on which the authority of great names is arranged on both sides, whether exemplary, vindictive, or penal damages may in any case be given, (2 Greenl. Ev.,) it will be admitted by all that full damages ought to be allowed. The dismissal of a seaman without cause is an injury of this character. If De Lory was not qualified as a cook, he was fit for some employment on the vessel; and this is apparent from the master putting him to other duty besides that of cooking. The case of a seaman thus unexpectedly being thrown out of employment does not call for aggravated damage, but the loss of time is something. It is greater when he is a foreigner, when his natural home is not among us, and he is without friends and is dependent on his own resources. And because in any way in which they are viewed they are small, is no reason why they should be withheld. Besides ordering his wages to be made out at the highest price paid for a cook, I shall allow $10 damages for the breach of contract.

The penalty of $20 is as expressly awarded by the statute as the increased pay, and I see no difficulty in allowing it in a libel for the wages. The libellant has sued for it in the name of the United States as well as his own. Decree $33.51 and costs.

MARITIME LIENS UNDER STATE LAWS — JURISDICTION—SALE.

[The sale of a vessel under a decree of a state court in satisfaction of a lien under the law of the state extinguishes prior maritime liens; and courts in other states, where similar liens have been created, are bound by such disposition of the vessel.]

[Disapproved in The N. W. Thomas, Case No. 10,386.]

[See, contra, The Henrietta, Case No. 6,121; James v. The Pawnee, 19 Mo. 517.]

[In admiralty. Libel by J. W. Auther and others against the steamboat Atlantic. Dismissed.]

CAMPBELL, Circuit Justice. The libellants are merchants of the city of New Orleans who had furnished to the steamboat Atlantic, at the request of the master and owner, stores, materials, and supplies from the year 1850 to May, 1851, while she was plying between the ports of New Orleans and St. Louis. The owner is a non-resident of Louisiana, and his boat is a foreign vessel registered at St. Louis. The libellants claim that by the laws of Louisiana, as declared in the Civil Code, as well as under the general admiralty law, there is a lien existing on this boat, in their favor, to the extent of these demands. The claimants respond that the boat, in the month of May, 1851, and posterior to the creation of the debts in the libel, was at St. Louis, and that, while there, tradesmen, mechanics, and the officers and men who had manned her, proceeding under the act of the legislature of Missouri [1] which affords to such classes of creditors a lien upon vessels and boats navigating the waters of the state, for debts like this, caused the boat to be attached, and by the decree of the court of common pleas of St. Louis county, at their suit, she was condemned to be sold, and was sold to their vendors. They plead that the court was competent, and the proceedings of the court regular and valid.

The record of the proceedings in that cause is in evidence, and sustains the averments of the answer: the sale to the vendors of the plaintiff was made by the sheriff of St. Louis county in June, 1851, under a valid order, in a cause arising under the [* * *.][2]

There are several questions of interest arising in this suit: (1) Was there an existing lien in favor of the libellants on the 30th August, 1851.—the date of the attachment of the boat in this cause,—under the Code of Louisiana? (2) Was there a lien under the admiralty law, the boat having left here in May without any attachment, and returning only in August of that year? (3) Does the admiralty law recognize a lien in favor of a running account created between material men and the officers of boats for supplies or service continuing from trip to trip for several months, and when semi-monthly trips are made? (4) Does there exist any lien superior or different from that given by the municipal law in favor of merchants domiciliated here, and contracting in this place with a vessel frequenting this port, as above stated? I shall not decide either of these questions, conceding that there was a valid lien, and that but for a change of ownership it might have been enforced. I propose to consider the question, what is the effect of this change of ownership upon such a lien?

[1] [Rev. St. Mo. c. 20, § 13, provides that "when any boat or vessel shall be sold under the 11th section of this act, the officer making the sale shall execute to the purchaser a bill of sale therefor, and such boat or vessel shall, in the hands of the purchaser and his assignee, be free and discharged from all previous liens and claims under this act."]

[2] [Concerning the omissions in this opinion indicated by asterisks, Mr. E. R. Hunt, clerk of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, states, under date February 20, 1893: "The copy has been compared with the book of opinions from which it was taken, and corresponds exactly. A careful search in the records fails to find the original opinion, and therefore I cannot supply what was apparently left out in the opinion."]

The principle is clear that an existing and operative lien, as a general rule, is not divested by the voluntary disposition of the ship or boat by the owner. In the case of The Bold Buccleugh, 14 Jur. 134, the admiralty judge says: "No one can reasonably contend that a sale after a collision, with a knowledge of it, would produce that effect, because, if so, the owners of a vessel doing damage would have nothing to do but to sell her, for the purpose of taking from the parties aggrieved their best security for compensation. Therefore, as a general precedent, I am prepared to deny that a mere transfer of a vessel, which has been guilty of doing damage, can at all diminish the liability of that vessel to be arrested." The rule, when the transfer is a forced one, is the reverse; in that case the purchaser takes the property discharged or pre-existing [* * .] The right of a party to attach a vessel is a right conferred by law, and its enforcement is dependent upon judicial interposition. The property is taken into its custody, and the courts are subsequently the vendors; the courts in this are but the depositories of the sovereign authority and act in obedience to it. Public policy requires that a disposition of the property under such circumstances, and in a form so [ * *,] should be obligatory upon all; the statute of Missouri expressly provides that the operation of such a sale as this shall be to discharge all other liens and incumbrances.

The enquiry arises whether the courts of other states where similar liens have been created are also bound by such a disposition. The answer is that properly they should be so bound. The property was within the control of the state and of its courts at the date of the condemnation, and the decree of condemnation and sale was not arbitrary nor confiscating, but regular, judicial, to the end of settling private rights according to a legal ascertainment. The effect of the act of sale was to create new proprietary interests, upon considerations that the laws approve and encourage. In the case before us the privileged creditors, who now attach, have no higher claim upon the favor of a court of admiralty than those who have already asserted and established their rights in the vessel; the purchasers have extinguished such claims under the sanction of a court from which they derive at once title and the possession of the property. Such being the facts, all other courts must consider the justice of their title, and should submit to the jurisdiction which lawfully conferred it. This principle is enforced in the high court of admiralty in Great Britain, (2 W. Rob. Adm. 453;) [* * ] was applied in the case of The Globe, [Case No. 5,483,] by Judge Nelson, and by the supreme court of Missouri, (10 Mo. 614;) and is recognized in 2 La. Ann. 599. The same principle has been found appropriate in analogous cases appearing in the decisions of the supreme court of the U. S. It was applied to settle the conflicting claims of execution [ * *] issuing from federal and state jurisdictions within the same state.

The court says a most injurious conflict of jurisdiction would be often likely to arise between the federal and state courts if the final process of the one could be levied on property which had been taken by the other. No such case can exist; property once levied on remains in the custody of the law, and it is not liable to be taken by another execution in the hands of a different officer, and especially one acting under a different jurisdiction. The same court, at its last term, applied the doctrine to the adjustment of the relative claims of judgment creditors, each having liens, and that of the judgment creditor in the judicial court being the superior, but that in the state court having been the first asserted by a seizure of the property. Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. [55 U. S. 52.] My conclusion is, that the answer having been sustained by proof, the prayer of the libel cannot be allowed.

are public agents, and as such are not liable as garnishees on a judgment against an employe of the government, since such employe could not, on his part, maintain an action for his salary against such officers.]

At law. Attachment upon a judgment under Act Md. 1795, c. 56. The attachment was laid in the hands of Lewis Edwards, agent for payment of the salaries of the officers in the department of war, and in the hands of Thomas Tudor Tucker, treasurer of the United States. The defendant, Nathaniel Cutting, was a clerk in the war department at a salary of $1,600 per annum payable quarter-yearly on the 1st of January, April, July, and October. The garnishees Edwards and Tucker were summoned on the 1st of April, 1823, before which day Mr. Cutting had drawn bills on Edwards, which he had accepted for the whole amount which would become due to Mr. Cutting on that day.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This cause comes before the court on a motion by Mr. Swann, attorney of the United States for this district, ex officio, to quash or dismiss the attachment, no other garnishee being warned, and no other effects attached. On the part of the United States, it is contended that the garnishees are public agents, and as such received the money; for which they are accountable to the United States, and for which they are not liable to the suit of any individual. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended, that the act of Maryland has no exception. That the public character of the treasurer of the United States does not exempt him from obedience to the summons, nor from liability to pay to the plaintiff the money due by the United States to the defendant, if such should be the judgment of the court. The question depends, not on the official character of the person, but upon the nature of the thing to be done. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 171; Little v. Barreme, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 170. It is also contended that Edwards is not a public officer quoad hoc. Whether money due from the United States to an individual may be attached in the hands of an officer, or agent of the United States holding it in that capacity, is a question of considerable importance. In the case of Hodgson v. Dexter, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 345, it was decided that a public agent, contracting for the United States, is not personally liable upon the contract; and surely the law will not raise an implied contract against a public agent who would not be bound by an express agreement. Mr. Cutting could not have maintained an action against the treasurer of the United States for his salary.

The liability of Mr. Edwards may be different. Can the money, while in his hands, be considered as in the custody of the United States? or as the money of the United States? It has gone out of the treasury with all the usual forms. Is it charged to him on the books of the treasury? or is it charged to the respective officers whose salary he receives? Is he accountable to them, or to the United States? His official character, whatever it may be, does not appear in the record. That of Mr. Tucker appears by the return of the attachment. We think that Mr. Edwards must appear to the attachment and defend himself. The official character of Mr. Cutting does not appear in the record, and therefore we cannot come at the question, whether the salary of a public officer of the United States can be attached so as to starve him out of office. At present we have nothing before us but the writ of attachment and return; so that we cannot decide the points intended to be submitted to the court. Mr. Edwards afterwards appeared as garnishee and pleaded, that when the attachment was served on him, and for a long time before, he was and had been a clerk in the war department. That according to the usage of the department of war, a general warrant for the payment of the salaries of the officers in the war department was usually drawn from time to time as the salaries became due in favor of him the said Lewis Edwards, and that according to the said usage a general warrant for the payment of sundry salaries, becoming due on the 1st of April, 1823, was drawn by the secretary of the treasury in favor of him the said Lewis Edwards, agent for paying the said salaries, which warrant was carried through the necessary forms of the government, and the money placed by him in the office of discount and deposit at Washington to the credit of the said Lewis, agent for paying salaries as aforesaid; and that among the officers to whom the said money was to be distributed was the said Nathaniel Cutting, who became entitled, on the said 1st day of April, 1823, to $400 for one quarter's salary as clerk in the said war department, which said quarter's salary was payable to him, the said Nathaniel, when he should obtain from the treasurer of the United States his check for the payment of the same; which he never did obtain, and the said sum never was, in fact, in his hands as the money of the said N. Cutting, and therefore he saith that at the time the attachment was levied in his hands as aforesaid he had not in his hands any of the moneys or credits of the said N. Cutting, subject and liable to the attachment aforesaid.

And the said Lewis Edwards for further plea saith, that before the said quarter's salary became payable to the said N. Cutting as aforesaid, that is to say, between the 25th of November, 1822, and the 5th of March, 1823, he, the said N. Cutting, drew divers orders in favor of divers persons for different sums of money amounting altogether to $400, upon the said Lewis Edwards, agent as aforesaid, which said orders were drawn upon the credit of his said quarter's salary becoming due as aforesaid on the said 1st day of April, 1823, as aforesaid, which said orders were accepted by him the said Lewis before the attachment aforesaid was levied in his hands, and so the said Lewis saith that at the time of the service of the attachment aforesaid there was no money, and could not have been any money of him the said N. Cutting in his hands which could be subject or liable to attachment as aforesaid, and this he the said Lewis is ready to verify, &c.

To the first of these pleas the plaintiff by his counsel, Mr. Morfit, demurred, and to the other joined issue upon the fact. Upon this demurrer, the court, at May term, 1826, was of opinion that Mr. Edwards was to be considered as an agent of the government, and that neither he nor the treasurer of the United States could be sued for the salary by Mr. Cutting, and therefore not liable as garnishees; and that if they could be sued as garnishees, it did not appear by the case agreed, (which was the same matter stated in the pleas,) that there were any effects, moneys, or credits, of Mr. Cutting in their hands at the time of the service of the writ of attachment. The plaintiff thereupon discontinued his suit.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1814.

OFFICE AND OFFICER—MARSHAL'S COMMISSIONS—CLERK'S FEES—INTERLOCUTORY SALES.

1. The marshal is entitled to his full commissions, according to the act of 1799, c. 125, [1 Stat. 624,] upon all interlocutory sales of prize property. The act of 27th Jan., 1813, c. 155, [2 Stat. 792,] applies only to sales after final condemnation.

2. The clerk is entitled to commissions upon proceeds of prize property sold by interlocutory order, and paid into court by the marshal.

[Cited in Leech v. Kay, 4 Fed. 73.]

3. It is the duty of the marshal, upon all interlocutory sales to bring the proceeds into court, with a regular account of the sales.

G. Blake, for the captors.

Dexter, for the marshal. Shaw, clerk, in pro. per.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The brig Avery and cargo were captured on the 28th of April, 1813; and prize proceedings having been instituted, part of the cargo was condemned, and the residue finally ordered to be restored by the district court; and, on appeal to this court, the decree of restoration was, at this term, reversed, and the whole property condemned to the captors. Pending the proceedings in the court below, the goods, whereof restoration was afterwards decreed, were, in pursuance of an interlocutory order of the 28th of August, 1813, sold on the 7th of the ensuing September, and the proceeds paid over to the clerk of the district court on the 27th of the ensuing October. An application has now been made, in behalf of the captors, to have the net proceeds paid over to them, after allowing to the marshal his commissions according to the act of 27th Jan., 1813, c. 155, [2 Stat. 792,] and without any allowance whatever to the clerk for commissions. Notice having been given to the marshal and clerk to show cause why this application should not be granted, they have appeared and claimed the commissions allowed to them respectively by the act of 28th of Feb., 1799, c. 125, §§ 1, 2.

The questions have been argued, and are now to be decided. It is contended, on behalf of the captors, that the act of 28th Feb., 1799, c. 125, [1 Stat. 624,] which allows to the marshal as fees "for sales of vessels or other property, and for receiving and paying the money, for any sum under five hundred dollars, two and one half per cent. for any larger sum one and a quarter per cent. upon the excess," is repealed, so far as respects prize causes, by the act of 27th of Jan., 1813, c. 155. This act, after providing that all vessels and property captured by private armed ships, and condemned as prize, shall, after condemnation, be sold by the marshal, in such lots, and on such credit, as the owners of the ship shall direct; and after further providing, that the marshal shall pay over and distribute the proceeds among the parties entitled, after deducting duties, costs and charges, declares, that for selling prize property, and receiving and paying over the proceeds as aforesaid, the marshal shall be entitled to a commission of one per cent. and no more, first deducting all duties, costs and charges; with a proviso, that in no case of condemnation and sale of any one prize vessel and cargo shall his commission exceed two hundred and fifty dollars.

It is very clear, that the terms of this act apply only to sales after a final condemnation, and not to sales made pendente lite under interlocutory decrees of court. Nor can it be admitted, that the intention of the legislature requires a more enlarged construction. Interlocutory sales are often ordered under a perishable monition and survey, or for other good cause, in the discretion of the court; and such sales are invariably made for cash only. This becomes indispensable, because the rights of the parties litigating before the court are not ascertained, and the net proceeds are to be brought into the registry, to await the final decision. Suppose a final decree of restoration should pass after such an interlocutory sale, are the commissions of the marshal restricted to the provisions of the act of the 27th of Jan., 1813, c. 155? It cannot be doubted, and indeed was conceded at the argument, that such a case was without the statute. And if it be so, I should be glad to know, how a subsequent decree of condemnation would vary his right. His title to the commissions accrues at the time of the sale, and not upon the final result of the cause. It attaches, if at all, at the moment when he has executed his duty, and paid over the proceeds of the sale to the court. He is then entitled to deduct his fees; and I know of no subsequent fact, that can have a retroactive effect to defeat his rights. On the whole, I am of opinion, that the act of 27th of Jan., 1813, c. 155, applies only to sales of prize property after a final condemnation, and is so far and no farther a repeal of the act of 28th of Feb., 1799, c. 125. The marshal is therefore entitled to his full commissions.

As to the claim of the clerk to one and a quarter per cent. commission, allowed him by the act of 28th of Feb., 1799, c. 125, reviving the act of 1st of March, 1793, c. 20, [1 Stat. 622,] "on all money deposited in court," there is not, in my judgment, the slightest reason to contest it. The only argument urged against it is, that the money under the interlocutory sale ought not to have been paid into court by the marshal; and that the clerk cannot gain a title by an irregular act of the marshal. The whole foundation of this argument fails. It was not only not an irregularity for the marshal to pay the money into court, but it would have been a gross misconduct on his part to have done otherwise. It is his duty, on all interlocutory sales, to bring the proceeds immediately into court with a regular account of such sales. This is the known and uniform practice of the court, and I will add, it is a practice not only founded in the settled doctrines of the admiralty, but also of great importance for the security of suitors. Let the clerk, therefore, be allowed his usual commissions out of the prize property in the registry.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1815.

PRIZE — DOUBTFUL CHARACTER OF VESSEL — CONDEMNATION AFTER A YEAR AND A DAY — REHEARING AT SUBSEQUENT TERM.

1. If, upon the ship's papers, it be doubtful, whether the property captured as prize belong to an enemy, it is not usual to proceed immediately to condemnation, although no claim be interposed. But if, in such case, no claim be interposed within a year and a day, condemnation is of course to the captors.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The circuit court cannot rehear a cause, or admit a claim, at a term subsequent to that, in which the cause was finally decided (a).

[See The New England, Case No. 10,151.]

In admiralty. W. Sullivan prayed the court to admit proof of the neutral ownership of a part of the cargo of this vessel, which had been some time since condemned for want of a claim, suggesting that this proof had been obtained from such a distance, as made it impossible to have received it before. The admiralty rule of a year and day, however suited to the courts of Europe, where communication may be had with all parts in sixty days, was not, he contended, applicable to a country so remote from many parts of the commercial world, as the United States.

W. Sullivan, for the promovants.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The British brig Avery was captured on the 28th of April, 1813, libelled in the district court on the 28th of July of the same year, and afterwards, upon the hearing in the district court, the vessel and part of the cargo were condemned as enemies' property. As to the residue, a decree of dismissal was, by consent of the captors, made against them, from which they appealed to this court, and at October term, 1814, no claim ever having been, in either court, interposed to any part of the property, the same was finally condemned to the captors, and distribution ordered of the prize proceeds, which have accordingly been withdrawn from the registry of the court. A motion is now made by counsel, in behalf of certain merchants of Morocco, to interpose a claim to said property, and to have the same regularly tried, on an appeal to the supreme court. And the question to be decided, is, whether the court can now entertain this motion.

It is an ancient and indisputable rule of the law of nations, "Res in hostium navibus praesumuntur esse hostium, donec contrarium probetur." Locc. lib. 2, c. 4, note 11; Grot. lib. 3, c. 6, § 6; Bynk. c. 13. And it is the duty of neutral shippers to put on board the most plenary proofs, to repel this presumption. If they omit it, and a condemnation ensues, it is justly imputable to their own laches. It is not now usual, in the prize courts, to condemn goods for want of a claim upon the hearing at the return of the monition, except in cases where there is a strong presumption from the evidence, that the property actually belongs to an enemy. If there be probable evidence of a neutral interest, sentence is suspended for a reasonable time, to enable the party to make a claim. That reasonable time has been fixed, by the immemorial usage of the admiralty, to a year and a day. And if no claim is interposed within that time, condemnation follows of course in paenam contumaciae. 2 Rob. Coll. Mar. p. 89, note. Nor is this a mere arbitrary regulation. It is to be found in analogous cases in the common law, as a limitation to the rights of property, in cases of wrecks, (2 Inst. 168,) and estrays, (Bl. Comm. 298; 5 Rep. [Coke,] 108;) in the conclusive efficacy of a judgment in a writ of right, even against strangers, unless they sue within that term, (Plow. 357a; Co. Litt. 254b, 262;) in the limitation of the effect of a continual claim; in the prescription as to suing appeals of death; and in confining prosecutions for murder to cases, where the stroke and death happen within the same period. It is likewise found applied to similar purposes in the ancient Gothic constitutions. 1 Bl. Comm. 298; 4 Bl. Comm. 315. Above all, it is adopted in the civil law, in the early admiralty ordinances of France, in the laws of Oleron, and in the Consolato del Mare, as a limitation of right in cases of shipwreck, because, as the custom of Normandy expresses it, "eo tempore elapso, videtur Dominus habuisse pro derelicto." Cod. Naufragiis, lib. 11, tit. 5, l. 2; Peck. Adm. Rem. Naut. 889; Consol. del Mare, c. 252; Les Us et Coutumes de la Mer, 53, 54; Laws of Oleron, 30. It is highly probable, from this summary history of the rule, that it has been generally received among all maritime nations.[2] At all events, it is a part of the admiralty law, which this court is bound to respect; and we are not at liberty, upon any notions of supposed inconvenience, to create a novel regulation. If the present be found unsuitable to our circumstances, as a maritime power, it will be for the legislature to devise a more just and equitable rule. Stare decisis is a great maxim in the administration of the law of nations.

In the case at bar, although no claim was interposed, condemnation was not finally pronounced, until about sixteen months after the prize proceedings were first instituted—and it was upon the footing of the general rule, that the sentence was then passed. That sentence has been completely executed, and a distribution made; and this court can have no more jurisdiction to revive or review the cause, or to sustain the present application, than it can have to adjudicate upon any other cause, which has been determined within twenty years. The supreme court have refused to re-hear a cause at a term subsequent to that, in which it was determined, being of opinion, as I well recollect, that the cause was no longer coram judice. Hudson v. Guestier, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 1. It has also affirmed the doctrine, that where no claim is interposed for prize property, condemnation must go to the captors. If, therefore, the present motion could be granted, it would be of little avail to the parties. But it is utterly incompetent for this court, sitting as such, to grant an appeal in a cause, which is no longer within their cognizance. The motion must be overruled. In The Harrison, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 298, the doctrine of this case as to the year and a day was directly affirmed by the supreme court.

NOTE, [from original report.] The origin and various modifications of this prescription of a year and day are explained with great copiousness and learning by Heineccius in his essay "De praescriptione annali juris Lubecensis a jure communi diversa." Opera Minora, Syll. I. Exerc. 26. After remarking, that in the codes of all the principal German nations, the day is found superadded, tamquam auctarium quoddam, to the year; he proceeds to say (section 8) that the Germans of the middle age gave the name of "day" to that legitimate delay, which was indulged to every one before making his appearance in court; and as it was the custom for citations to command an appearance on the fourteenth day, and the party was to be thrice cited before he incurred the sentence of contumacy, this, including the three days assigned for appearance, gave six weeks and three days, which period was denoted by one word "day." Thus, if we may believe Heineccius, the "year and day" (annus et dies) originally signified a much longer period, than it is now thought to comprehend. He adds, however, that in the laws of Lubec, which he was examining, the word "day" means not six weeks and three days, but twenty-four hours only, and accordingly the prescription, which in Saxony extended to four hundred and ten days, was in Lubec confined to three hundred and sixty-six. From the same writer (section 17) it appears, that by this law the property both of real and personal things was lost, if not asserted within a year and a day. In this respect, it differs from the civil law, which allows a much longer time for immovable, than movable property. By the law of Lubec the prescription did not begin to run against absent persons, until they had knowledge of the event. But the civil law, in respect to movable things, granted no indulgence to the absent. (Section 18.) According to the French Encyclopedia (Jurisprudence —An et Jour) the day was added to the year, to avoid the difficulty of deciding whether the last day should or should not be included in the term. Much learning upon this subject, and an enumeration of several examples from the common law, will be found in Spelman's Glossary, 32.

AVERY v. DOANE.

[1 Biss. 64;[1] 3 Amer. Law Reg. 229.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Nov. Term, 1854.

HUSBAND AND WIFE — WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE —DEBTOR AND CREDITOR—GARNISHMENT.

1. A married woman living with her husband and carrying on trade in her own name, cannot, in Wisconsin, become his debtor nor be garnisheed in proceedings against him.

2. It seems that she cannot hold, to the exclusion of her husband or his creditors, a stock of goods purchased upon credit, nor the proceeds or profits.

At law. This proceeding was commenced by writ of attachment which was served on Sarah A. Doane, as garnishee. Her answer was taken before a commissioner of this court, wherein she states she is the wife of the defendant, Edgar P. Doane, and has been for eighteen years, and that she resides with her husband at Green Bay, where she is and has been engaged in the dry goods, millinery and fancy goods business for four years; that she carries on the business and buys goods in New York and Chicago in her own name, principally on credit. She also bought goods on credit out of her husband's store before he sold out and stopped business. She had a running account with her husband. When she commenced business at Green Bay her father purchased part of the goods amounting to four or five hundred dollars, and gave her some money as a present. Her business has always been in her own hands, and she now gives her husband his board for his assistance and services. The plaintiff's counsel [2] [not being satisfied with the answer of Sarah A. Doane, of which the foregoing is in substance a part,] moved the court to order an issue, to try her liability as garnishee under the statute, which motion was opposed by her counsel, upon the ground that being the wife of the defendant in the attachment suit, she is not answerable in this proceeding, under the circumstances disclosed in her answer.

[2] [See note at end of case.]

Stevost & Bloodgood, for plaintiff.
H. L. Palmer, for defendant.

MILLER, District Judge. There is no law in this state recognizing the custom of London, whereby married women may carry on the business of trade and merchandise as femes sole, while cohabiting with their husbands. In some states femes covert may carry on business as femes sole in pursuance of statutes, while their husbands are engaged as mariners and absent from the country. This is the extent of legislation upon this subject in any of the states within my knowledge. It is unnecessary to refer to authorities to prove, that at common law the husband is entitled to the goods and chattels of the wife, and also to all sums of money which she earns by her own skill and labor, and that these he has absolutely in his own right and not in hers. And if she purchases goods or property, during coverture, with his assent, and with the proceeds of her skill and saving, they become his at the moment of the purchase, and he becomes responsible for such as may be purchased upon credit.

It is contended that the act to provide for the protection of women in the enjoyment of their own property,—approved February 1st, 1850, (chapter 44,) changes the common law upon this subject. The third section of the act is as follows: "Any married female may receive by inheritance or by gift, grant, bequest or devise from any person other than her husband and hold to her own and separate use, and convey and devise real and personal property, and any interest or estate therein, and the rents, issues and profits, in the same manner and with like effect, as if she were unmarried, and the same shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband nor be liable for his debts." The act provides more effectually for the protection of the wife's property by dispensing with the necessary intervention of trustees, than courts of equity had done, but it does not authorize the wife to hold to her own use, to the exclusion of her husband or his creditors, a stock of goods purchased by her on credit nor the profits or proceeds of trade. By the act she might have held to their exclusion the money given her by her father, but nothing more. That was property given her by a person other than her husband, which she by the act could receive and not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor liable for his debts. The goods now in the store and the notes, accounts, and cash in hand she did not receive by inheritance, gift, grant, devise, or bequest from any person other than her husband or in any way known to this act. The act changes materially the legal incidents of the marriage relation, but it has not extinguished quite all the marital rights of the husband. He is still entitled to the person and labor of his wife, and to the benefits of her industry and economy. The wife by the act is not degraded to the position of a hireling, which she would be if it authorized her to withhold from her husband the proceeds of her own labor, nor is she vested with authority over him, nor independence of him in her business transactions of trade, even if he, as in this instance, after disposing of his goods without paying his debts, should consent to become her servant for his board.

The defendant by voluntarily surrendering to his wife his marital authority in the control and business of his family can not compromise the legal rights of his creditors. He may consent to serve his wife in the store for his board, but the law entitles him and his creditors to the goods and proceeds of sales. The persons from whom she purchased goods upon credit with her husband's consent, cannot bring suit against her, but must resort to him for the recovery of their demands, although the charges in their books may be to her, or the notes signed by her alone. As she cannot contract in business or trade in her own name while living with her husband, she can not sue or be sued in her own name upon transactions connected with the trade, nor be summoned as his garnishee. She can no more be his debtor in this particular than she can hold the goods in store or the avails of sales to the exclusion of him or his creditors.

The common law has wisely ordered that property acquired by the wife by purchase, with the consent of her husband, is in his possession and under his control, and the act under consideration does not disturb this provision, so essential to the peace and happiness of families. The act of this state is copied from that of the state of New York, where a similar decision was made in Lovett v. Robinson, 7 How. Pr. 105. And a similar decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, upon a similar law, is reported in Raybold v. Raybold, 8 Harris, [20 Pa. St.] 308. In that case it is decided that the fact that real estate was paid for with the wife's earnings and savings, does not give her a trust estate in the property; but that money thus acquired is not the property of the wife within the meaning of the act relating to the estate of married women, but is the property of her husband. For these reasons, the proceedings against Sarah A. Doane are dismissed, and the application for an issue is overruled.

NOTE, [from original report.] The following are the decisions of the supreme court of Wisconsin on the questions involved. Conway v. Smith, 13 Wis. 125, where it is held that the statute gives married women as necessarily incident to the power of holding property, the power of making all contracts necessary and convenient for its enjoyment, and that such contracts can be enforced at law. Approved in Todd v. Lee, 15 Wis. 365, where it is further held that she may become a sole trader and hold the profits of the business. Also approved in Leonard v. Rogan, 20 Wis. 540. The earnings of a married woman, however, during coverture, are the property of her husband, and he can make no contract with her in relation to them; and where a woman had loaned her earnings to her husband, who to repay her had transferred to a trustee notes of third parties, the receiver of the husband's estate was held entitled to reduce the notes to possession and apply them in payment of his debts. Elliott v. Bentley, 17 Wis. 591. A married woman owning land in her own name may cultivate it by the labor of her husband and their minor children, and the products and proceeds are not liable to be taken in execution against him. Feller v. Alden, 23 Wis. 301. Money placed by her in his hands to be invested for her, does not thereby become his property. Id. Under a verbal agreement that the wife was to conduct the husband's business during his absence and have the avails as her separate property, her earnings still remain his property, and she cannot maintain an action on a note purchased by her with such earnings. Stimson v. White, 20 Wis. 562.

The following are the decisions in New York upon the questions involved under a similar statute, the Wisconsin statute being in most respects copied verbatim from it: Sleight v. Read, 18 Barb. 159; Freeman v. Orser, 5 Duer, 476; Smart v. Comstock, 24 Barb. 411; Coon v. Brook, 21 Barb. 546; Cropsey v. McKinney, 30 Barb. 47; Yale v. Dederer, 17 How. But the public have the right to use all navigable streams as highways; and the owner of the bed of such a stream has no right, as such, in the waters thereof, which can authorize him to impede or obstruct navigation upon it. The right of the public, for purposes of navigation, is paramount to that of the riparian proprietor.

4. The government of a state may authorize alterations to be made in the course, width, etc., of navigable streams, with a view to afford greater facilities for navigation; and for this purpose may take the property of a riparian owner, upon complying with the constitutional requirement to make compensation therefor.

5. The government of the United States may authorize similar alterations in navigable streams, for the purpose of affording increased facilities for navigation between the states; and for this purpose may take the property of a riparian owner. But they can only take such property upon making or providing for just compensation.

Although the courts cannot directly restrain the government of the United States, nor the action of the president as the executive power, nor that of congress as the legislative department; yet when congress makes an appropriation for a public improvement, and commits the execution of the work and the expenditure of the money to one of the departments, which in turn employs agents to carry forward the work, neither such department nor its agents will be exempt from the restraining power of the courts, if either seek to execute the law in an unconstitutional manner;—as, by taking private property against the consent of the owner and without compensation.

WITHEY, District Judge. The bill in this case is for an injunction against defendants, contractors and employes in constructing a new channel from White lake into Lake Michigan. Based on bill and affidavit, a motion is made for a temporary injunction to restrain defendants from proceeding with the work. It appears from the bill that White lake is four miles long and one mile wide; that with a commodious channel for entrance, this lake would afford one of the best harbors on Lake Michigan. White lake is separated from Lake Michigan by a strip of land about 50 rods in width. White river empties into White lake, is for a distance of about 5 miles, immediately above the lake, a stream from 100 to 200 feet wide, from 3 to 8 feet deep, and running from 2 to 3 miles per hour. The outlet of White lake is also called White river, is from 75 to 200 feet in width, and in the channel, generally, from 4 to 10 feet deep, and runs from the western part of the lake northwesterly, parallel with the strip of land between the two lakes, about three quarters of a mile. It then turns west and runs 40 to 50 rods to Lake Michigan. Westerly winds blow sand from said strip of land into the outlet, so that the channel is kept in a navigable condition only by the action of the current, and by large expenditure annually of money in removing such deposited sand.

Complainants own 70 acres of land lying on the outlet, on which is a steam sawmill and other buildings and improvements, the value of which is not less than $50,000. They also own lumber lands up the White river, and are accustomed to supply their mill with logs through White river, White lake, and the outlet. There is a bayou near their mill, wherein logs are stored—logs are taken from the bayou through an opening into the outlet to the sawmill as wanted. Complainants have a steam tug which runs between said lakes, aiding in the transportation of logs and lumber. All vessels passing from one lake into the other must go by complainants' property through the outlet. They also have a pier extending from the mouth of the outlet into Lake Michigan. Their lumber, when sawed, is received by vessels coming from Lake Michigan, at a dock near the mouth of the outlet.

The congress of the United States has appropriated $57,000 for the improvement of the harbor at White River, to be expended under the directions of the war department. The war department, through its agents, has caused examinations and surveys to be made with reference to the work of improvement, and regards the improvement of the present outlet as impracticable, and has commenced the work of cutting a new channel through the sand bank or strip of land lying between the two lakes, making a straight cut of 200 feet in width and 12 feet deep, from deep water in Lake Michigan to deep water in White lake.

Complainants claim that the opening of this new channel must result in the rapid closing of the old outlet, because the new channel will be very much wider, deeper, and shorter than the old. As a natural and necessary consequence, they say, the water of the inner lake must seek the level of Lake Michigan through the new channel; the descent must be more rapid, as the distance is less; its greater depth and width will contribute materially to make the water prefer it to the old channel.

Several legal questions have been presented, involving the rights of riparian proprietors upon the navigable waters of the state; the rights of the public in, and particularly as to the power of the general government to divert or obstruct such streams in making harbors for the convenience and protection of commerce and navigation, and other questions which I shall have occasion hereafter to refer to. Without reference to the other facts of the case as presented by complainants and defendants, as to whether complainants will, by the opening of the proposed new channel, be deprived of enjoyed vested rights to such an extent as to justify the exercise of the restraining power of the court for their protection—I will first pass upon the legal questions that have been urged upon my consideration.

1. The outlet of White lake is a navigable stream, and the law is too firmly settled to allow of discussion at this day, that the owner of land bordering on a navigable stream, in which the tide does not ebb and flow, owns the land beneath the water to the center thereof. Neither the nation nor state owns the beds of navigable streams within the state, but the riparian proprietor is owner thereof. It is equally well settled as law, that a riparian proprietor has a property in the use of water flowing by his premises; that is, a right to use it in its flow, in any manner not inconsistent with the rights of others to its use. If, then, the law recognizes such individual property, or, which is the same thing, individual right, in the use of water flowing past or through the land of a person, can such stream be so far obstructed or diverted as to deprive such owner of the use of the water? Clearly not. If the owner of land adjoining such stream has a mill which obtains its motive power therefrom, the water of such stream cannot be so far obstructed or diverted as to deprive his mill of its motive power, nor so as seriously to diminish the needed power. If the stream be navigable for crafts of any sort, for logs and lumber, and be used for any or all these purposes, any diversion or obstruction of the water accustomed to flow there, which should render navigation either impossible or difficult and more expensive, would be unlawful, and in either case, on a proper showing, should be prevented by injunction.

This right of private persons to the use of water as it flows by or through their lands, in any manner not inconsistent with the public easement, is as sacred as is the right of a person to his land, his house, or his personal property. The public, however, have the right to use such streams as are navigable as highways, and the owner of a bed of a stream has no rights in the water thereof which will permit him to use it to the injury of the public. He cannot so far divert the water to his private use as to render navigation impossible or difficult, nor can he place obstructions in the stream in a manner to produce such results. His right and the right of the public to the use of the water of such streams are to remain unimpaired as far as possible, but the right of the public for purposes of navigation is paramount, and there can be no use of the water by a riparian proprietor inconsistent with the public easement. The law, as thus understood, does not deprive a state of the right to improve its navigable rivers, nor indeed to permit the damming or bridging of such streams, providing navigation is not thereby obstructed, as when suitable locks or draws are provided through which navigation is secured to the public. And so, too, a state, which by its constitution is not prohibited from entering upon works of internal improvement, may cut channels around rapids or carrying places to afford greater facilities for navigation, so as to enable crafts to pass such carrying places which could not be done without, or only in times of high water. In doing so, the state as well as individuals must respect the right of riparian proprietors, and not deprive them of such enjoyed use as they are entitled to have continued in the water, to an extent to produce irreparable injury. Mere inconvenience to the private citizen resulting from any such public improvement may well be ignored for the greater benefit to the public, and be made to give way from principles of public policy.

2. But upon principles of public law, which are recognized in most of the state constitutions, and in the constitution of the United States, private property cannot be taken for public use without making just compensation. The right of eminent domain, which is the right that the people or government retain over the estates of individuals to resume the same for public use, is a right that carries with it the duty to make just compensation to the individual whose property is taken.

3. I now come to the question whether the United States, either from motives of public policy or the power given to congress by the constitution, to regulate commerce among the states, can lawfully, in the improvement of harbors of national importance and concernment, such as the one at White lake is conceded to be, change the outlet of the small lakes or mouths of rivers, so as to deprive persons owning lands bordering the same entirely of the use of the water as it naturally flows by or through their lands. The United States have a right to make the cut between White lake and Lake Michigan—the land, where the proposed cut is to be, having first been secured—provided thereby private interests are not seriously impaired or private rights destroyed. It is an incident to the sovereignty of the United States, and a right recognized in the constitution, in that clause which prohibits the taking of private property without just compensation, that it may take private property for public use—of the necessity or expediency of which congress must judge, but the obligation to make compensation is concomitant with the right. Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co., [Case No. 1,617;] Dickey v. Maysville & L. Turnpike Co., 7 Dana, 119. In the last case the court say, "The national power to use the land of a citizen or state for an armory or fortification is undoubted and irresistible; the constitutional obligation to pay the owner a just equivalent, if it be demanded, is equally undoubted and irresistible." The case involved the right to carry the United States mail over the road of a turnpike company without payment of toll, and at page 115 the court say, "The right to use private property for a mail route—as for any other national purpose, being qualified by the constitutional condition that a just compensation be made for the use, unless the owner voluntarily waive it—does not imply an authority to take, or to use for post office or post road purposes, the land or the house of a citizen, or the railroad or macadamized road of associated citizens, without paying to the owner or owners a just compensation." The principle of that case is directly in point. The legislature of the state, or the congress of the United States, possesses whatever power exists in either government to take private property for public use, and to provide compensation. If now the power to take may be exercised alone,—when we find that the lawmaking power is alone judge of the necessity or expediency of taking,—there will be found no check to its most arbitrary exercise. And as was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 135, if any limits to legislative power be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation? To divert a stream from its natural channel into an artificial one, for the purpose of affording improved navigation and benefiting commerce, may be a work of great public concernment and advantage, but if thereby a riparian owner is wholly or injuriously deprived of the use of its waters, which he is employing advantageously as an incident to his land, it is taking the private property of such owner in and to the use of that water for public use, and unless just compensation is made, is against both the principles of the common law and the provisions of the constitution of the United States, and courts have no alternative but to so administer the law as to secure and protect such rights in a proper case.

4. It was urged upon the argument that the United States is prosecuting the White River harbor improvement, and as a sovereign power, cannot be restrained. The United States cannot be brought before the court as a party defendant in the record; the courts cannot restrain the president of the United States as the executive power of the government, nor congress, the lawmaking power; but when congress makes an appropriation to improve a harbor, and commits the direction of the work and expenditure of the money appropriated to the war department, which employs its agents to carry forward the work, neither the war department nor its agents will be exempt from the restraining power of the court, if either seek to execute the law in an unconstitutional manner, by taking private property against the consent of the owner, without compensation. The war department is not acting as the executive, nor as the agent of the executive power, but ministerially. If the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and person of the defendants, I know of no rule which would exclude from the process of injunction any person on account of the character or capacity in which he acts, although such character or duty be conferred or imposed upon him by the law of a state or of congress. 1 Baldw. 206, [Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co., Case No. 1,617.]

5. One further question is suggested by the argument and from the considerations which I have given, viz.: When is compensation to be made? Or may private property be taken or private rights be impaired before compensation made, if by some law provision is made for ascertaining and making compensation? I regard the just rule to be, that the taking of private property should not be allowed until compensation is actually made, thus imposing on the owner no burthen of seeking or pursuing expensive remedies, and leaving him exposed to no risk or expense in obtaining compensation. 1 Baldw. 227, [supra.]

6. If, then, the facts of this case bring the complainants within the rules of law as indicated in my views already expressed, the work which is being prosecuted by defendants should be prevented by injunction. I have already stated most of the allegations of the bill in substance. Complainants therein state that the strip of land between the outlet of White lake and Lake Michigan, is in part a mere sand bank, and westerly winds blow this sand into the river in great quantities, so that the channel is kept navigable only by the action of the current and by artificial means. Great expense is necessary every year, on the part of parties interested, to keep the channel clear of the sand which drifts in. They also say that, in their judgment, the opening of the new channel must result in the rapid closing of the old outlet. The wider, straighter, shorter and deeper channel proposed will naturally and necessarily result in causing the waters of White lake to seek the level of Lake Michigan through the new channel. And they say that any diminution of the accustomed supply of water in the present outlet would tend to injure their property, since there is now hardly enough; and that if the current should cease to flow, even though the water should remain as deep as at present, the expense of getting logs from White lake to the bayou would be seriously increased and the value of their property diminished.

The evidence in support of the bill is the affidavit of Col. J. D. Webster, who from 1838 to 1854 was an officer of the topographical engineers of the United States army, and for several years had charge of government harbor improvements on Lake Michigan, is familiar with the shores of the lake, has given great attention and reflection to the action of the winds and currents thereof. He states that the effect of the new channel will be that almost the entire water passing from White lake to Lake Michigan will flow through the new channel, and that there will remain but little or no current in the old channel. That in consequence it will be gradually but surely filled with sand, and within a few years closed for all practical and useful purposes. But this opinion is based upon causes operating in the absence of the use of artificial means to aid this channel by dredging out the sand, as now employed. He thinks no considerable effect, in keeping the present channel open after the completion of the new, would result from the running back into Lake Michigan of the waters which are by strong westerly winds blown into White lake.

The defendants, in opposition to the motion for injunction, present three affidavits, no answer having been filed. Col. J. B. Wheeler, of the United States army, who, under instructions from the secretary of war, has charge of the work of constructing the proposed new channel, gives full information as to the surveys for the work, the report to the war department, and among other items, the report says: "It is hardly possible that any reasonable expenditure of money upon this (the present) entrance and portion of the river or outlet would give us a harbor suitable to the wants and necessities of the general commerce on Lake Michigan." And further, in reference to the locality of the proposed new channel, it is said: "By examining this locality we see that there is deep water in both lakes near the shore, and that there, the distance between the twelve feet waters in each, is only twelve hundred and fifty feet. This, then, is the place where the channel should be made."

The secretary of war transmitted this information to congress, and the appropriation was thereupon made, and Col. Wheeler was directed to proceed with the work accordingly. Col. Wheeler says: "Whether the opening of the new channel will necessarily close the old one, is a subject of speculation."

John D. Sturtevant states his residence at White lake since 1861, and from his observations as to the action of the waters on the east shore of Lake Michigan, it is his opinion that the effect of opening the new channel, as proposed, will not be as stated in the bill and by Col. Webster in his affidavit, but that the present outlet will not be filled or closed. The affidavit of Charles Mears, a resident on the east coast of Lake Michigan since 1838, states that in that year he built a sawmill on White lake, and manufactured lumber there for 20 years; that he has had experience in improving harbors on this shore at six different points; has been a careful observer of the action and effects of the winds and currents at White lake and other points. He gives it as his judgment that the effect of opening the new channel will not be as stated in the bill of complainants and in Col. Webster's affidavit. On the contrary, that if the improvement is made, it is his opinion the present outlet will not be filled by drifting sands or by the action of the water. He further states that strong westerly winds raise the water in White lake 12 inches or more, and the result will be, if the new channel is made, that as the wind subsides and the water of Lake Michigan recedes, the pent-up waters of White lake will seek both outlets into the outer lake, not through the new channel alone, and will keep the present channel from filling with drifting sand. Such are the facts, and such the conflicting opinions presented upon this motion, from which to determine whether the complainants will be irreparably injured by the new channel when constructed.

It is clear that it will not be the new channel which will cause the old outlet to fill with sand, but the wind blowing the sand into this channel that will close it if it should be closed. The current in this outlet cannot be greater than that of the river above, which is two or three miles per hour—it is probably less, but if as great, a current running but two or three miles an hour would produce little or no effect in removing sand precipitated into the bed of the outlet; hence it is that great expense is necessary annually to remove the deposited sand. The only current that removes sand from the outlet is that which flows at irregular intervals, caused by water from Lake Michigan, blown into White lake on account of strong westerly winds, running out when the wind subsides; but this current is not adequate to remove the sand from the channel, and must be aided by the artificial means which are employed.

It appears, then, that this outlet would cease to be navigable to its present extent were it not for the use of such artificial means. And, as I view the facts, it does not appear but that, after the new channel is made, the same application of artificial means will keep this outlet open for all practical uses which complainants now enjoy therein. That use is principally in running logs, as vessels now receive complainants' lumber near the mouth of the outlet, and not at their mil, the lumber being conveyed by land carriage to a dock near Lake Michigan.

Complainants have a tug which they employ in this outlet, but it does not appear, from the facts of the case, but that the employment of artificial means in keeping the channel clear, to the extent now employed, would continue the present facilities for tug navigation, as well as other purposes, for which complainants now use the channel; unless the effect of the new channel will be, not only to take a portion of the water accustomed to flow through the old, but lower the level of White lake to such an extent as to materially reduce the depth of water in the present outlet. It is said by the bill that White lake will, in consequence of the new channel being very much wider, deeper, and shorter than the old one, naturally and necessarily seek the level of Lake Michigan. This conclusion may be conceded; but what effect will thereby be produced in the present channel? The bill gives no information from which to answer satisfactorily the question. How much above the level of Lake Michigan is White lake? Is there any considerable difference, or such difference in the level of the two lakes as that the new channel will so far lower White lake as to prevent its water flowing into the old outlet, or materially reduce the depth of water therein? These questions I am unable to answer from the facts of the case, and do not feel disposed to interfere with the public work at White lake, designed, as it is, greatly to benefit commerce and navigation by affording what does not now exist, a safe and commodious entrance to one of the best harbors on the lake, except the showing is such as decisively to require it. It will be conceded that the present channel, in its natural condition, is not so far navigable as that vessels of ordinary draught of water navigating Lake Michigan can enter through it into White lake, and that it is only kept or made navigable for crafts of light draught when artificial means are employed at great cost annually in dredging out the sand which is therein deposited by the frequently recurring strong westerly winds; and that the new channel will afford ample facilities for all classes of vessels to enter the harbor of White lake. It is, therefore, of great public importance that the cut be made.

If complainants can reach vessels in White lake, which enter through the new channel, to transport their lumber to market, without much greater inconvenience than they now do vessels at the mouth of the outlet, they would not seem, in this particular, to be materially injured by the new cut. Their mill cannot be materially different from midway between White lake and the mouth of the outlet. If sufficient water is left in the outlet, with or without the employment of the artificial means, for floating their logs to their mill, I cannot see wherein they are to be irreparably damaged. The result of the new channel may be to give complainants some inconvenience; more time may be consumed in running their logs if the current of the present outlet is diminished, as it probably would be; but mere inconvenience, or delay in navigating a stream, must be submitted to from motives of public policy where the public good demands it.

The right to interfere by injunction rests on the principle of a clear and certain right to the enjoyment of the subject in question, and an injurious interruption of that right, which, on just and equitable grounds, ought to be prevented. A court should be extremely cautious in the exercise of this power, and before enjoining an important public work, require a clear case on the facts as well as on the law. The injury should be apparent, and in a case like the present, of apprehended injury, resting largely in opinions on one side, and denials of injury on the other, the question of damage should be put beyond mere probabilities, and reach something like demonstration. My investigations have led me to the conclusion that complainants' right to the enjoyment of the water of White river outlet, as riparian owners, and as well in right of the public easement, to the extent which they now enjoy its use, is at law clear; but that the facts do not make a clear showing of necessity for the exercise of the restraining power of the court by injunction to protect them in the enjoyment of their rights. The motion for a temporary injunction is denied.

[NOTE. Concerning the right to an injunction against the government of the United States, an interesting case occurred in the circuit court for the district of middle Tennessee. The United States had obtained a judgment against an individual, and by various executions more was recovered than was due on the judgment, whereupon the court decreed a perpetual injunction against the United States, and that it should pay the costs. The supreme court, however, reversed this decree, holding, per Mr. Justice McLean, that "there was no jurisdiction of this case in the circuit court, as the government is not liable to be sued, except with its own consent, given by law. Nor can a decree or judgment be entered against the government for costs. The circuit court, as a court of law, may direct credits to be given on the judgment, consequently may examine the grounds on which such an entry is claimed, and may direct the execution to be stayed until such an investigation shall be made." U. S. v. McLemore, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 286. A bill in equity will not lie to enjoin the United States, —Hill v. U. S., 9 How. (50 U. S.) 386; nor can the president be restrained from carrying into effect an act which is alleged to be unconstitutional. A bill having that for its purpose cannot be filed. Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. (71 U. S.) 475. In a later case the following from Mr. Justice Gray, of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was quoted: "The broader reason is that it would be inconsistent with the very idea of supreme executive power, and would endanger the performance of the public duties of the sovereign, to subject him to repeated suits, as a matter of right, at the will of any citizen, and to submit to the judicial tribunals the control and disposition of his public property, his instruments and means of carrying on his government in war and in peace, and the money in his treasury." Briggs v. The Light Boats, 11 Allen, 162. Continuing, Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the supreme court of the United States, said: "As we have no person in this government who exercises supreme executive power, or performs the public duties of a sovereign, it is difficult to see on what solid foundation of principle the exemption of liability from suit rests. It seems most probable that it has been adopted in our courts, as a part of the general doctrine of publicists, that the supreme power in every state, wherever it may reside, shall not be compelled, by process of courts of its own creation, to defend itself from assaults in those courts." In summarizing the law of the case Mr. Justice Miller also said: "This exemption is limited to suits against the United States directly and by name, and cannot be successfully pleaded in favor of officers and agents of the United States, when sued by private persons for property in their possession as such officers and agents. In such cases a court of competent jurisdiction over the parties before it may inquire into the lawfulness of the possession of the United States as held by such officers or agents, and give judgment according to the result of that inquiry. The difference in the essential features of a monarchical and republican form of government renders the decisions of the English courts on this subject of but little value as precedents, while an examination of numerous decisions of this court, from its organization under the constitution to the present day, establishes the foregoing proposition." BANKRUPTCY—WHAT CONSTITUTES — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

[The fact that a debtor, after judgment against him in a state court, fraudulently conveyed all his real property, of a value greater than the debt, to his sons, is not a sufficient cause of bankruptcy as to the judgment creditor, whose remedy is to have the conveyance set aside in a court of equity.]

[Distinguished in Re Stansell, Case No. 13,293. Disapproved in Re Sheehan, Id. 12,737. Cited in Re Wells, Id. 17,388.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Avery against Nicholas Johann, based on a judgment in a state court and a fraudulent conveyance to avoid its execution. Dismissed without prejudice to proceedings on the judgment.]

MILLER, District Judge. On the 15th day of September, 1856, Nicholas Johann made his note to the Milwaukee and Lake Superior Railroad Company, payable on the 1st day of July, 1866, with his mortgage on a tract of land as security. The petitioner having become the assignee of the note and mortgage, on the 26th day of September, 1866, instituted proceedings in a court of this state to foreclose the mortgage. In the month of December following, a judgment for the sale of the mortgaged premises was rendered, with an order for execution for the residue of the debt against other property of the debtor. The mortgaged premises being encumbered with taxes and tax titles, the proceeds of sale were inconsiderable, when the amount of the residue of the debt was certified and transferred to the judgment record, pursuant to a law of the state. The petition in bankruptcy is founded on this judgment. It represents as the cause of bankruptcy, that on the 15th day of October, 1868, Nicholas Johann, the debtor, fraudulently conveyed to his two sons all his estate, lands, and tenements, describing them, with intent to hinder and delay this petitioner in the collection of his said debt. The conveyances were exhibited at the hearing. The debtor claims no property except such as is embraced within the exemption laws of the state. No other debt was alleged or proven. The real estate conveyed to his two sons is of greater value than the amount of his debt. Johann is a farmer, and not engaged in trade.

There is no doubt but a conveyance by a father to his sons, in consideration of his support, is fraudulent as to his creditors, and would be a cause of bankruptcy at the instance of creditors other than this petitioner. The objects of the bankruptcy act are discharge of a debtor from his debts, and an equal distribution of his estate amongst his creditors, in proportion to the amount of their respective debts. This case is not within the scope or intent of the act. There are no creditors to claim distribution of assets. Nor does any creditor allege as cause of bankruptcy those conveyances, but the petitioner, who can enforce the collection of his debt by proceedings in equity in the court where his judgment remains of record. A single creditor, whose debt is secured by a lien on lands of greater value than the amount of his debt, cannot be permitted to abandon all remedies open to him for the collection of his debt, and claim the jurisdiction of this court in bankruptcy for the purpose.

A judgment creditor cannot claim the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy for the collection of his debt, fully secured by the only lien on real estate.

It cannot be adjudged that Johann made the conveyance to his sons in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency. Nor can I find him to be in a state of insolvency, while it appears there is property sufficient for the full payment of his only debt, upon the removal of a cloud on the title.

The deeds having been given by the debtor during the pendency of the suit of this petitioner against him should be declared fraudulent, if no legal or equitable consideration therefor be shown in the proper tribunal. Such a decree cannot be claimed upon this petition in bankruptcy. If a question of this character should arise at the instance of an assignee in bankruptcy, I would require him to bring his bill in equity. Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 629. For these reasons, I order the petition dismissed, but without prejudice to proceedings on the judgment.

AVERY v. SPRINGPORT.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June, 1877.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — MUNICIPAL AID BONDS — EXECUTION — SEAL — COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTE.

A statute authorizing a town to issue bonds in aid of the construction of a railroad, provided that the bonds should be under the hands and seals of commissioners. They issued coupon bonds which were not sealed, although their wording showed that sealing was intended, and the coupons were not sealed: Held, in a suit on the coupons, that the bonds and coupons were void.

George F. Danforth, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The material question in this case is, whether the execution of the instruments called bonds was sufficient in form to bind the defendant. The statute under which they purport to have been issued was a law of New York, entitled, "An act to facilitate the construction of the Cayuga Lake Railroad, and to authorize the town of Springport, Cayuga county, to subscribe to the capital stock thereof," passed April 24, 1869, (Laws 1869, p. 677.) The 2d section of the act is the only one which authorizes any one to bind the town for the payment of money in aid of the railroad to be constructed. It enacts, that "it shall be lawful for the said commissioner or commissioners" (for whose appointment provision was made by the 1st section) "to borrow on the faith and credit of the said town" a certain sum of money, at a rate of interest not exceeding seven per cent., for a term not exceeding thirty years, and to execute bonds therefor under their hands and seals. The instruments sought to be treated as bonds under the statute are not under seal, although their wording shows that sealing was contemplated, as a necessary part of their execution. This action is brought upon a certain number of coupons detached from bonds so executed without seals. The coupons are not themselves sealed, nor are any of them executed by the signature of more than one commissioner. They are, therefore, subject to all the difficulties which the bonds are liable to. The defect, if it be one, being in the execution, which does not pursue the direction of the statute, neither the plaintiff nor any one else can have become possessed of the bonds without knowledge of the absence of seals and of the requirements of the statute in that regard. This action is on the instruments, and the recovery can be only had on them. The law which authorizes bonds to be issued prescribes the form and mode in which they are to be executed. They are to be under the hands and seals of the commissioners. Instruments under their seals and not under their hands, or under their hands and not under their seals, are alike not executed in conformity with the statute, and are alike inoperative to create an obligation against the town. The principle is involved in People v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 114, where instruments called in the statute bonds were held properly executed without being sealed, the act directing their execution to be under the official signatures of certain designated officers, and that mode of execution having been employed. Various cases have been cited showing that a party required to give an instrument under seal, cannot, in an action against him, insist on his own omission to seal the instrument, as a defence. Such was the case of an unsealed bond on attachment, (Kelly v. McCormick, 28 N. Y. 318,) and in the case of U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 290, where the bond of a surety for a receiver of taxes was unsealed. The court held, in that case, that the instrument was a good obligation at common law, unsealed. Other cases resting on the same grounds are cited, but none of them give any countenance to the idea that a mere statutory power can be so executed as to impose an obligation, unless the statutory authority is pursued. In Town of Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484, 489, 490, stress is laid upon the fact that the execution of the instruments was in exact conformity with the provisions of the statute; and it is held, that, by such an execution, the statutory prerequisites to the issuing of the bonds are established in favor of a bona fide holder for value. In the same case, the doctrine of the courts of the United States is stated, perhaps, in its broadest form, in support of the rights of bona fide holders of municipal bonds, so far as compliance with precedent conditions prescribed by statute is concerned, where the requisite legislative authority has been given to a municipal corporation, or its officers, to issue municipal bonds. But, in none of the cases have I found even an intimation that anything will serve to supply the want of an execution such as the statute calls for. Indeed, it seems plainly to result from the fact that the power originates only from the statutory grant, that the statute must be followed in order to make out an execution of the statutory power.

The verdict must be set aside for the erroneous ruling at the circuit in respect to the want of the seal, and a new trial must be ordered, with costs to abide the event.

ADMIRALTY — DECREE FOR DAMAGES TO SEVERAL LIBELANTS—APPEAL.

[A decree for damages for collision in favor of several libelants should be for a gross sum, to be distributed by the clerk, and not for the several amounts of the loss or damage of each, if any one of such amounts will be for a sum less than $2,000, so that an appeal therefrom may therefore be denied.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel by John W. Avery and W. Hall Johnson, executors of Josiah Johnson, deceased, John Carrol, and others, against the schooner Wanata, George Sparrow and others, claimants, for damages growing out of a collision. Decree for libelants. Heard on application of claimants to have the decree award a gross sum, so as to permit an appeal to be taken to the supreme court, it appearing that each of the awards to the several libelants was below the jurisdictional amount of $2,000. Claimants' application granted. Decree afterwards affirmed. The Wanata v. Avery, 95 U. S. 600.]

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The claimants ask that the decree herein may award a gross sum to the libelants, and execution therefor; the same to be distributed by the clerk to the several libelants, according to the amounts of their several loss or damage caused by the collision, for which the schooner is condemned. The libelants, on the other hand, ask that the decree be in substance several decrees; that is to say, that it condemn the schooner for each several amount of loss, and award execution to each libelant to collect the amount of his separate loss. The materiality of these conflicting claims is supposed to arise from the apprehension of an appeal by the libelants to the supreme court, and a suggestion that, if the decree were in the form last mentioned, no appeal would lie from those parts of the decree which awarded to either or any of the libelants a sum less than $2,000; and that the supreme court would not have jurisdiction to reverse any part except that which awards more than $2,000 to one of the libelants. Whether the form proposed by the claimants of decreeing the payment of a gross sum, to be distributed among the libelants, will affect the question of the jurisdiction of the supreme court to reverse the whole decree if found erroneous, is not for this court to decide. If the apparent injustice of compelling the claimants to pay a part of the loss when the decision of the supreme court, as the case may be, declares that the claimants or their schooner have been wrongfully condemned, and ought not to be required to pay anything, can be avoided without violating any important rule of practice or form, then surely such avoidance would be matter for satisfaction rather than regret. Such apparent injustice was strongly illustrated in the case of Rich v. Lambert, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 347, and perhaps still more strikingly in the cases of The Mary Eveline, [Case No. 9,211;] and Merrill v. Petty, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 338, 348. I therefore settle the decree in the form which the claimants have requested.

[NOTE. In affirming the decree of the circuit court, Mr. Justice Clifford, speaking for the supreme court, said: Everywhere it is admitted that an appeal in admiralty carries up the whole fund, and that it is the duty of the circuit court to execute its own decree; and it is equally clear that the fund in this case consists of the stipulation given in the district court for costs, the stipulation given there for value, and the bond or stipulation in the sum of $2,000, to prosecute the appeal with effect, and pay all damages and costs awarded against them, if the appellants shall fail to make their appeal good. Montgomery v. Anderson, 21 How. (62 U. S.) 386. Two points were ruled in that case applicable to this: (1) That the appeal in admiralty carries up the res; (2) that the circuit court must carry into execution its own decree. The Collector, 6 Wheat. (19 U. S.) 194; 2 Pars. Shipp. 493. Sureties in such an appeal bond or stipulation may become liable for the whole amount specified, as the condition of the instrument is that the principal shall prosecute his appeal with effect, and pay all damages awarded against the appellant, if he fail to make good his appeal. Hence it was decided by this court that the surety in such a bond is liable for the entire amount of damages and costs, to the extent of the penalty, and interest thereon from the date of the institution of the suit, when the property attached produces less than the judgment or decree. Ives v. Merchants' Bank, 12 How. (53 U. S.) 159. Examined in the light of these suggestions, as the decree should be, it is mainfest that it contains no error, as the amount of the stipulation for value is decreed to be paid to the libelants in part discharge of the taxed costs, leaving the balance of the taxed costs and the accrued interest from the date of the decree in the district court to the date of the decree in the circuit court to be paid by the sureties in the appeal bond, which may, by the rules and usages which belong to courts of admiralty, be treated as an admiralty stipulation. 1 Stat. 276; Adm. Rules, 5, 21.]

COLLISION AT PIER—ICE—MOORING—COSTS.

1. A bark and a barge were both moored alongside a pier. The bark's long-boat was hanging under her counter, close down to the water, from lines run from the stern, there being no davits. A floe of ice came into the slip, and parted the barge's lines, and drove her against the long-boat, and crushed it: Held, That the barge was in fault, in not being properly moored;

2. That the bark was in fault, in reference to the position of the boat;

3. That the damages must be divided;

4. That costs would not be allowed for depositions which were illegible.

[Cited in The Mary Patten, Case No. 9,223.]

In admiralty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover for the destruction of the long-boat of the bark Algiers, by being crushed by the barge Avid, during the night of the 14th of February, 1869. The bark and the barge were both moored alongside pier 28, in the East river. The long-boat was hanging under the bark's counter, close down by the water, the ropes running from the stern, there being no davits. While in this position, the ice came into the slip, during the night, with sufficient force to part the barge's fastenings, and drive her ahead upon the long-boat, thus doing the injury complained of.

It is manifest that the long-boat was swung in an improper and dangerous place, where it was greatly exposed to injury from neighboring vessels. For this reason, the bark must be held in fault. The Phoenix, [Case No. 11,111.]

The remaining question is, whether there was fault on the part of the barge, in regard to her fastenings, which should render her also responsible for the accident.

On the part of the bark, it is proved by the mate, that he went on board the barge, on hearing the crash; that he then examined the barge; that he found the stern line had parted; and that he, at the time, complained to the master of the barge, that his line was not sufficient to hold his vessel. The master of the bark, also, is called, who does not appear, however, to have examined the lines of the barge until morning, when he saw the stern line that had parted.

On the part of the barge, no witness is called but the claimant himself, who swears that the barge was made securely fast to the pier, by stem and stern lines, and a seven-inch breast line; that a floe of ice came in the slip, which parted the stern line and the bow line, and pulled off the cavil, to which the breast line was fastened, and thus his barge was driven into the long-boat. He further says, that he hove his boat back by the windlass. But in the answer, which is sworn to by this same claimant, it is expressly stated, that but one line parted, "leaving two lines still secured to the pier; that in a few moments the barge sprung back to her lines, and it was then discovered that the long-boat had been smashed." The account given in the answer thus differing from the account given upon the stand, a doubt is raised as to the sufficiency of the barge's fasts, which is further strengthened by the fact that no vessel broke adrift, except this barge, and that the barge herself received no injury from the pressure of the ice. In this posture of the evidence, it must be held that the claimant has failed to show that the drifting of the barge was caused by the overwhelming power of the ice, and not from any carelessness or neglect in her fastenings, and that the barge is also chargeable with fault.

There being, then, fault found on both sides, the damages will be apportioned.

In taxing the costs, the clerk will strike from the libellant's bill of costs the fees for the depositions, because of their extreme illegibility, as presented to the court. A reference may be had, to prove the amount of the damage, unless the parties can agree on the sum.

AVIL v. ALEXANDRIA WATER CO.

[1 Hughes, 408.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. April, 1877.

CONFISCATION AND SALE OF CORPORATE STOCK—FRAUD—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

Where shares in a corporation were sold by the United States marshal, under a decree of confiscation rendered under like circumstances to those condemned by the United States supreme court in Windsor v. McVeigh and Gregory v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 284, and the corporation had denied the purchaser's title, and that purchaser had sold the stock to the plaintiff, Held, in an action of trespass on the case for value, that the corporation was not liable to the plaintiff for the stock or unpaid dividends, if his vendor's title was under a confiscation sale, and the corporation had denied its validity, and the plaintiff had had such notice of these facts before his purchase as should have put him upon inquiry.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge.]

[At law. Trespass on the case by John Avil against the Alexandria Water Company. Verdict and judgment for defendant.]

On the 14th day of May, 1864, ten shares of stock in the Alexandria Water Company, standing in the name of W. N. & J. H. McVeigh, citizens of Alexandria, but then within the lines of the confederate army, were sold under a decree of the United States district court in a libel for confiscation which had been rendered under the same circumstances as those described in the cases of Windsor v. McVeigh and Gregory v. McVeigh, decided by the United States supreme court, and reported in 93 U. S. 274 and 284. That is to say, the appearance and the answer of the claimant of the property libelled for confiscation, had been stricken out at the trial of the libel, and a decree of condemnation entered without opportunity being given to the claimant to make defence. The purchaser of the stock at the United States marshal's sale of it was Wm. A. Duncan, of Alexandria county, Virginia, and a certificate of stock was issued to him by the water company as of the day of the marshal's sale. Dividends on the stock were paid to this purchaser, as they were declared, up to 1866; and dividends had accrued since to the amount of $347.50. Since 1866 the company had denied the title of this purchaser to the stock.

On the 6th March, 1874, Wm. A. Duncan, by indorsement on the certificate of stock, had assigned these ten shares to John Avil, a citizen of Pennsylvania, his brother-in-law, and coupled with the assignment a power of attorney in blank to make the proper transfer on the books of the water company. Demand had been made upon the company for transfer by Avil, on the 23d April, 1874, and had been refused. Evidence going to show that Avil, at the time of and before he received the assignment of the stock from Duncan, knew the character of his title, was given to the jury; and it was proved that the consideration of the purchase was a note of hand, not yet paid, given by Avil to Duncan in a considerably less amount than the face or market value of the stock.

At the trial, the court instructed the jury that if they believed that W. A. Duncan's title was obtained through a confiscation sale that was not legal, in May, 1864, and that there had been a continual denial of the validity of Duncan's title by the defendant company since June, 1867, and that the plaintiff had such notice of this fact as should have put him upon inquiry as to the character of that title before purchasing the shares of stock in question, they should find for the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant; and judgment was rendered accordingly.

W. Willoughby, for plaintiff.

S. F. Beade, for defendant.

The AVON.

[Brown, Adm. 170;[1] 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 165; 6 Chi. Leg. News, 41.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Feb., 1873.

COLLISION IN THE WELLAND CANAL — JURISDICTION OF TORTS IN FOREIGN WATERS WHERE LOCAL LAW GIVES NO LIEN—ADMIRALTY LIEN NOT DIVESTED BY SALE TO BONA FIDE PURCHASER, UNLESS BY A PROCEEDING IN REM—LIBELLANT'S DAMAGES NOT TO BE DECREASED BY AMOUNT PAID HIM BY UNDERWRITERS.

1. The general maritime law universally recognized by civilized nations gives a lien for a maritime tort upon the offending vessel, and this lien travels with the ship into whosesoever hands she may go. The proceeding in rem, to enforce such a lien, is not process. In no sense is it remedy only, or a part of the lex fori, but is the enforcement of a proprietary interest.

[Cited in The Champion, Case No. 2,583; The Champion, Id. 2,584; The S. S. Oregon, 42 Fed. 79.]

2. This lien or proprietary interest is not divested by a sale to a bona fide purchaser without notice, unless had by virtue of a judicial proceeding in rem.

3. A transfer within a jurisdiction where the offending ship is not subject to seizure does not constitute an exception to this rule.

[Cited in The Champion, Case No. 2,583; The Arcturus, 18 Fed. 748.]

4. The waters of the Welland canal, as now used for international commerce, are within American admiralty jurisdiction. The Suez and other canals, and all the improved navigation of the world, have been, and from the nature of their use should be, as much subject to admiralty jurisdiction as waters in natural channels.

[Cited in The Champion, Case No. 2,584; Hatch v. The Boston, 3 Fed. 810.]

[See The Oler, Case No. 10,485.]

5. While a natural thoroughfare, although wholly within the dominion of a government, may be passed by commercial ships of right, yet the nation which constructs an artificial channel may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases.

6. When it may be inferred that the maritime law sought to be applied is excluded by the lex loci, the remedy in rem should be denied. If from the circumstances a contrary presumption arises, the principle of the maritime law involved should be enforced.

7. It is not enough per se to deprive a court of admiralty jurisdiction, that collision happens where there is municipal power to exclude the maritime rule. It must further appear that it has actually been done, and this the record in this case fails to show. The mere absence of a tribunal to enforce the maritime law has never been admitted as sufficient evidence of intention to exclude it.

8. No argument can be drawn from the fact that the Welland canal is a tideless water, and that therefore the authorities which sustain admiralty jurisdiction over torts and contracts, in foreign waters, do not extend the maritime law over it. Admiralty courts have taken jurisdiction wholly irrespective of the fact of a tide.

[Cited in The E. M. McChesney, Case No. 4,463; Malony v. City of Milwaukee, 1 Fed. 612; The B. & C., 18 Fed. 544.]

9. Inapplicability of the lex loci contractus, the lex rei citae, and the lex loci delicti, where obligations growing out of international commerce are to be adjudicated with reference to the maritime law, considered.

10. The libellant in a collision case, when successful, is entitled to recover the full amount of his damages, notwithstanding he may have received partial indemnity from the underwriters.

In admiralty. Collision in the Welland canal between the schooner Medbury and the propeller Avon. The claimant interposed two special pleas to the libel. (1) That the Avon was a British vessel, owned and registered in Ontario, and at the time of the collision bound from one British port to another—that the Welland canal is an artificial navigable water connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario, exclusively British property, and within British territory. (2) That after the collision and before libel filed, claimant purchased the propeller for a valuable consideration, without notice of this claim. That there are no admiralty courts in Ontario, and no admiralty jurisdiction in force there, and that by the laws of said province the propeller is not liable to seizure for injuries done by her while owned by another person.

B. R. Beavis and Willey, Cary & Terrell, for libellants.

The only reported case upon the question whether courts of admiralty have jurisdiction of a tort committed upon the Welland canal is that of Scott v. The Young America, [Case No. 12,549,] where the jurisdiction was sustained. This has ever since been accepted as law. This decision was not based upon the obsolete act of 1845, [5 Stat. 726,] for it declared the act of 1789, [1 Stat. 76, § 9,] furnished a broader jurisdiction. The case of The Genesee Chief, [12 How. (53 U. S.) 443,] was rested "upon the ground that the lakes and navigable waters connecting them are within the scope of admiralty jurisdiction." Same language is employed in case of The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 20, which is decisive of the present case. The objection that the Avon was owned in Canada is met by the uniform practice of the American courts for sixty years to enforce remedies in admiralty without reference to ownership, whether domestic or foreign. The Commerce, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 580; The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 435. No case can be found holding that jurisdiction between our own citizens and foreigners is a matter of comity—it is everywhere treated as a matter of right. The fact that by the local law there is no lien for a tort is disposed of by the case of The Eagle, [supra.] It is not a question of local law, but of the general maritime law, though in cases of contract, the court may decline jurisdiction if it sees fit. 1 Pars. Shipp. 531. The district court erred in deducting from the damages the amount received from the insurance companies. It is something with which a trespasser has nothing to do. If the insurance is paid before suit brought, and the company subrogated, the company is the proper party to sue, but if paid after suit brought, as in this case, the proceeding is not affected by it. The company may become a party as co-libellant if it chooses, or the suit may go on as commenced, the libellant accounting to the company for its proportion.

Estep & Burk, for claimant.

(1) The jurisdiction in cases of tort depends exclusively on locality—it must happen upon waters over which the jurisdiction extends. The Commerce, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 584. The "navigable waters" spoken of in the Acts of 1789, are known by different names, and it is, perhaps, not necessary they should be connected directly with the sea. The words "navigable streams" are sometimes used, but no correct definition could make this canal a stream of water, as it is without head or flow, and vessels pass through it with the aid of a dozen locks. No case can be found of a court of admiralty assuming jurisdiction of a collision in a canal except in the great Holland canal, which was treated as a confining of the waters of the sea to a particular locality. In the cases of The Genesee Chief, [12 How. (53 U. S.) 443,] and The Eagle, [8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 15,] the distinction is taken between public navigable streams, which are the common property of both nations, and private ways constructed by corporate enterprise, into which vessels can only enter by leave, upon payment of tolls, and subject to regulations prescribed by the owner or the Canadian government. The canal in question was dry land more than fifty feet above the level of Lake Ontario when congress passed the act of 1789, and so continued for more than fifty years. Congress could not therefore have intended to include it. The Ohio and Pennsylvania canal connects the navigable waters of two states, and is navigable by vessels of 100 tons, but it has never been claimed to be within the jurisdiction of admiralty. They are navigable, but not public navigable streams. These canals may be, and frequently are, leased to private corporations or individuals, who may close them against everybody but themselves. In the case of The Young America, [Case No. 12,549,] no plea or answer was interposed, and the case was heard on motion to set aside the decree. The decision was based wholly upon the act of 1845, now obsolete, the canal being in full operation when congress passed the act, and they must have intended to include it.

(2) The seizure of the vessel is a proceeding in rem, based upon a maritime lien for the injury complained of, which is enforced by subjecting the property to the satisfaction of the claim. If such lien exists it must be by virtue of some law. Evidence shows it is not by the law of Canada—it cannot be by virtue of a law of the United States, as they have no extraterritorial jurisdiction. This court can only enforce liens given by some law—it cannot create them. There was no lien while the propeller remained in Canada; yet if it did not then exist it did not attach when she came into American waters. It is not claimed the lien was created by the seizure, for the seizure was made to enforce a lien already existing. The property could not be seized upon execution or attachment, as it had passed out of the hands of the person doing the injury. By the law under which the present owners acquired title, she was free and unincumbered, and ought to remain so wherever she goes. The contract under which they bought the property is governed by the lex loci contractus, and if valid there, it should be held by the comity of nations valid everywhere.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. The Avon is a Canadian vessel. On her way from a Canadian port on Lake Ontario, to another like port on Lake Erie, she collided in the Welland canal with the libellant's vessel, an American ship, on its way from one American port to another. The canal connects the two lakes, and is wholly artificial, but by treaty between England and the United States, and local Canadian laws, is open alike to the ships of both countries. It is a thoroughfare for international commerce, and is navigated by ships as well from the ocean as the lakes. Subsequent to the collision, and before the filing of the libel, the Avon was sold in Canada to a Canadian purchaser. This suit was commenced the first time she visited an American port, and no laches are imputed to the libellant. We have given the case far more than its share of attention, and are at last compelled to make a decree condemning the Avon, in much doubt, however apparently logical the steps may seem by which it has been reached. It is argued by the claimant that there is no jurisdiction for wrongs occurring in this artificial passage, created by and wholly within the government of Canada. That as the local law of that province gives no lien, none can be enforced here, and that, at all events, the subsequent sale from one subject to another of a Canadian ship within that province, as it there gave an unincumbered title, all other courts will respect and protect it. These propositions are deemed too well settled to require citations in their support.

We have an argumentative purpose in noticing a few familiar maxims, which respondent's counsel deem conclusive objections to the relief asked. Numerous judgments and authors too, when attention is not challenged to the distinction, dispose of cases like that before this court, as if the rules we shall fully concede were applicable to their determination. This libel sets up a wrong, where consequences are not to be measured by the local law, and that it may be clearly perceived that this case constitutes an exception to the principles which generally apply to such local code, we desire to state and concede them, with their proper qualifications, in some fullness and detail. The utmost extension of the rules in reference to the lex loci contractus, as sustained in the following treatises and judgments, and the numerous other similar ones, both federal and state, are not intended to be in any degree disregarded or even qualified. Story, Confl. Law, §§ 242, 243, 327; Wheat. Int. Law, tit. "Lex Rei Citae and Lex Loci Contractus;" Bell v. Bruen, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 169; Duncan v. U. S., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 435; Caldwell v. Carrington, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 86; Pope v. Nickerson, [Case No. 11,274;] Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 520; Allen v. Schuchardt, [Case No. 236;] Mutual Ins. Co. v. Wright, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 412; Bulkley v. Honold, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 390; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 11, c. 2, § 7.

The ship being Canadian, and at the time of the sale in Canadian waters, and the parties Canadians, bring the case so clearly within the principles which apply the lex rei citae, that any analysis of judgments is unnecessary to show that the local law will regulate rights unless the maritime is made to apply. Whart. Priv. Int. Law, tit. "Lex Rei Citae," discusses with special fulness this subject, and so far as the facts of this case are concerned, his criticism is approved. It is familiar law in the federal courts. The municipal lex loci delicti will equally control, if the conditions of this navigation are not such as to make applicable the principles governing collisions upon the sea. See Story, Confl. Law, §§ 423b, 423g; Whart. Priv. Int. Law, §§ 477, 480, and notes Id. § 707; Whitford v. Panama R. Co., 23 N. Y. 467, 475, 482; Rafael v. Verelst, 2 W. Bl. 1055; Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp. 161, and notes in Smith, Lead. Cas.; The Halley, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 17, 18, 19, 22. This well understood rule is of course not intentionally interfered with. That an act lawful by the law of the place where it takes place is so everywhere, is but a truism. That no court can create a lien by its judgment upon property without its territorial jurisdiction, or assume to administer its own municipal law to create one, over things not subject to its provisions, when and where the transactions occurred, out of which it is asserted the right in rem springs, is also in its broadest sense admitted. Whart. Priv. Int. Law, § 828; Story, Confl. Law, §§ 322b, 401, 402a. Not only do we decide as we do in the light of such rule, but say with confidence, we should dissent from the qualifications asserted by courts of great respectability. We should have decided differently The Milford, Swab. 362; The Jonathan Goodhue, Id. 526, in which, by virtue of an English statute, Dr. Lushington gave an American master a lien not authorized by the law of his own country, and in reference to which his contract was made. They are justly criticised in The Halley, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 12. This proceeding in rem is not process. In no sense is it remedy only, or a part of the lex fori. It is the enforcement of a proprietary interest, and can no more be resorted to when that by the law of the place of the contract or of the act does not exist, than a suit for possession can be maintained without a title to support it. Although there are some judgments in the supreme court which seem so to treat it, and the history of the 12th admiralty rule would authorize a different doctrine, the late tendencies there, and its numerous other decisions, ably drawing the line between the laws of contracts and of property, and mere remedies, show clearly there is no authority in that high tribunal for sustaining this libel upon the notion that the proceeding is but a remedial form. In Vandewater v. Mills, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 82, the court, by Grier, J., comments upon the looseness of likening it to attachments in personam. The late case of Harmer v. Bell, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 62, 7 Moore P. C. 267, which is often approved in the supreme court, in discussing the nature of this proceeding, points out clearly the broad difference between process and remedies, on the one hand, and the enforcement specifically of an interest in the thing on the other. Unless therefore a lien, by virtue of some law applicable to the act, was created by this collision, when and where it occurred, there is no standing here by the libellant. We sustain the libel only because it is believed the maritime law affords the measure of right.

That the general maritime law yields, in all instances, when it is the will of the local sovereignty that its own code shall apply in waters subject to its control, is but another undisputed maxim; and although no question has been made that this artificial passage, wholly within the dominion, may be fully governed by its laws, and all conditions annexed to its navigation which the political power deems expedient, we suggest, for the purpose of construing some judgments hereafter cited, that it is no more absolute and plenary than that of all governments in the natural bays, ports, and partially inclosed waters of the sea. Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 2, § 9; Ben. Adm. §§ 39, 256, 240; Whart. Priv. Int. Law, §§ 356, 358, 440, 443, 859; Halleck, Int. Law, p. 130, § 13, citing Wheat. pt. 2, c. 4, § 6, and other authors. After saying that the local jurisdiction extends to all bays and ports within headlands, and to a marine league from shore, he adds: "Within this territory its rights of property and territorial jurisdiction are absolute, and exclude that of every other nation." See [Halleck, Int. Law,] p. 132, § 16. More than this certainly cannot be said of the Welland canal. Judgments in reference to acts in such waters are precedents for like proceedings here. We have a motive, too, in calling attention to the rule that, when waters are boundaries, like the St. Clair and Detroit rivers, where the collision in the case of The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 15, occurred, the right, the absolute right, of navigation is common to the ships of both countries, and also that, when rivers or narrow straits of the sea lead through one country into another, there also the right of passage exists, and the municipal jurisdiction is modified accordingly. Halleck, 137, § 22; Wheat. pt. 2, c. 4, § 11; 1 Phillim. Int. Law, § 155; Halleck, pp. 138, 140, 141, 142, 146; Wheat. §§ 12, 14.

It is no longer questioned here or in England, that for a marine tort a lien exists upon the offending ship. In the Rock Island Bridge, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 213, it is said: "For torts committed upon the sea, a lien is given which travels with the ship into whosesoever hands she may go." The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moore, P. C. 284, is approved. That it is universally recognized as a part of the general maritime law, and dependent upon no local rule of the English or American admiralty, see The America, [Case No. 288,] where, in a careful opinion, Judge Hall, of the northern district of New York, cites and reviews Edwards v. The Stockton, [Id. 4,297;] The Hornet, [Id. 1,640;] [Article on the tribunals and the administration of justice, etc.,] 16 Law Reg. 1; The Nestor, [Case No. 10,126.] They fully sustain his conclusions. And see The R. B. Forbes, [Id. 11,598, Id. 11,275;] Vandewater v. Mills, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 82; The Young Mechanic, [Case No. 18,180;] The Phoebe, [Id. 11,064;] The Rebecca, [Id. 11,619;] The Feronia, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 65; The Commerce, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 580. This feature of universality of recognition, it will be seen, is an important element in the other question, whether it shall be applied within local jurisdiction by the presumed consent of the sovereign. That the lien is not divested by sale to a bona fide purchaser, unless it is by virtue of a proceeding in rem, is also said in Vandewater v. Mills, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 82, and The Rock Island Bridge, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 213. The case cited and approved there is a strong instance of the application of the rule; cases, therefore, will be referred to, not in support of the general doctrine, but to show only that the circumstances of the present transfer, within a jurisdiction where the ship was not subject to seizure, do not constitute an exception. The Rebecca, [Case No. 11,619;] The Stockton, [Id. 4,297;] The Mary, [Id. 9,186,] as well as several of the judgments before referred to as sustaining the general doctrine that the lien exists, presented circumstances of strong equities in favor of innocent purchasers who urged them against the enforcement of the lien. But it was held to constitute a proprietary interest which no transfer, save by a judicial proceeding in rem, could divest. The Charles Amelia, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 330, was a collision in British waters between a French and English vessel. The former was subsequently sold under bankruptcy proceedings in France. It was said, as this was not a proceeding in rem, but one which sold the owner's interest only, the lien was not affected. The Bengal, Swab. 468; The John and Mary, Id. 471. The one was a suit for seamen's wages, and the other for damages by collision. Judgments at law had been in both obtained, but this election was held not to preclude a subsequent resort to the offending ships. They, it was said, were primarily liable irrespective of ownership. In The Batavia, 2 Dod. 500, it was held that a sale in Batavia did not divest the lien for seamen's wages due in England. Nor is this rule, in its most extended application, deemed an impolitic or hard one, the modification or restriction of which is demanded by the exigencies of modern commerce. It is favored, not because it is an ancient theory and old writers so say, but because the necessities of international intercourse and the safety of navigation have been found to require it. The China, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 53; The Halley, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 13, 15; The Prins Frederik, 2 Dod. 467; The Rebecca, [Case No. 11,619.] Where there had been a sale without notice, it is said: "What can be more equitable, when the ship has been the cause of the damage, than to look to it for reparation? It is often the sole source of security." The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 280; The Amalia, Brown. & L. 152, and nearly all the decisions hereafter cited, are equally commendatory of the rule which holds the ship liable as the offending thing, irrespective of transfers, with notice or without it. Conditions will be demanded more clearly indicative of an intent on the part of the local government to exclude such a rule, than would be required to displace one deemed hard and unconscionable, and at war with public policy. That the waters of the Welland canal, as now used for international commerce, are within the American admiralty jurisdiction, we had, as remarked on the argument, no doubt, and had this collision occurred between two American ships, and no transfer had been made within the dominion of Canada, we should have followed for other reasons than those there stated. The Young America, [Case No. 12,549;] The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443; The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 296; The Commerce, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 580; The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 558; The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 624; The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 15; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 557; and kindred cases, include these waters. The recent English decisions, either drawing upon the late statutes, or treating their old phrase "Within the ebb and flow of the tide," as in reason only it should be treated, as a mode of describing navigability, have taken jurisdiction of cases in artificial and tideless waters. See The Eagle, [supra,] and the cases there and hereafter cited.

There are few harbors in the Northwest which are not entered through wholly artificial passages. It would be most impolitic to say that a ship, in passing through our

St. Mary's canal, between Lakes Huron and Superior, is beyond the process of the admiralty. A large portion of the commerce of the latter lake will soon pass through the Portage Lake canal. The St. Clair Flats are now so crossed by a similar channel, through which passes as much international commerce as through any waters on the continent. The Suez canal, those of Venice, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and the Great Northern canal and basins of Holland, and all the improved navigations of the world have been, and from the nature of their use should be, as much subject to the admiralty jurisdiction as waters in natural channels. It would be a most mischievous and gratuitous distinction which would exclude them. There is but one difference which would work a material consequence in a case like that before us. A natural thoroughfare from sea to sea, although wholly within the domain of a government, may be passed by commercial ships of right, while the nation which constructs an artificial one may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases. Such a thoroughfare is subject to the same control as are the natural bays, whose waters are within natural headlands, and lead only to the country of the government controlling them. We cannot say, therefore, in this case, as we do of the collision in that of The Eagle, [8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 15,] or as we would of a ship passing through the Bosphorus to a Russian port on the Black sea, that Canada or Turkey could not impose their laws. We must treat it as we would a passage up the Golden Horn at Constantinople, or down the lagoon and up the Grand canal at Venice, where every condition the local authority saw fit to impose would be obligatory. We must apply here the same implications which admiralty courts have established as general principles of law where the local authority is absolute and unqualified. If the result is an inference that the principle of the maritime law, now sought to be enforced, is excluded by that of Canada, the remedy in rem should be denied. If, on the contrary, precedent, and more especially wholesome protective principles, authorize a different presumption, the Avon should be held liable in rem for her offenses. The claimant relies upon Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, and the principles before recognized, that the obligation imposed upon an act in the state where it occurs should constitute the measure of liability in all other jurisdictions. That case exempted a ship from liability where an English statute compelled the employment of a pilot in the port of Liverpool, and expressly provided that the vessel should not be liable for damages resulting from the wrongs of such public officers. This judgment has been followed in The Halley, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 3. This latter case, by the general course of its learned and greatly extended argument, more than by any direct assertion of such a doctrine, shows that when the local law is applied, it is because the peculiar circumstances of the transaction and the nature of the law create the presumption that such is the intention of the sovereignty within whose waters the transaction occurred. It is not enough per se that a collision happens where there is municipal power to exclude the maritime rule. It must further appear that it has actually done so. When ships are seeking a port for protection or trade, or leaving it having engaged in it, and more especially where they are in the custody of its local political officers by compulsion, they are subject to such portions of the municipal law as are intended for their governance. The port police regulations, the local customs in reference to navigation, and all rules which, from their nature and office, are presumed to apply to domestic and stranger ships alike, regulate the conduct of both classes. If the power which prescribes them has declared the obligations which arise from their observance or violation, all other nations will adopt the same measure of duty. This is the limit of the rule. Smith v. Condry, [supra,] and similar judgments, may mislead, unless read in the light of general principles, which they do not intend to deny, and which some of them directly affirm. Literally and formally they assert the application of the lex loci delicti, as if it were a case upon land, and as if the general municipal law would, of its own force, and by its general promulgation in the state, apply to a marine tort as it would to a trespass within its real territory. This is by no means true. The inquiry is but half answered when we learn what is the local code regulating wrongs generally in the nation. The other, and equally important portion here is, has the government, in unmistakable terms, declared that it shall be enforced upon foreign ships to the exclusion of the maritime rule? This is what we think is meant in The Eagle, [8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 15,] where Justice Nelson says, that Smith v. Condry was an exceptional case. In The Halley, [L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 3,] in all respects like Smith v. Condry, [1 How. (42 U. S.) 28,] Sir R. Phillimore, page 6, cites The Girolamo, 3 Hagg. Adm. 177; The Zollverein, Swab. 99; The Golubchick, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 147; to which others might have been added, that the English courts in cases of collisions administer the maritime law, and he follows them by cases showing the right in rem is a favorite in the admiralty. It is especially shown that it is quite consistent with the general rule for the court of admiralty to enforce all such modifications as the local government clearly creates.

The libellant's counsel considered the judgment in The Eagle, [supra,] as covering all the questions involved. Did it stand alone, we should not so hold. It did undoubtedly decide that the obligations created by a collision in Canadian waters were not measured by her laws in the circumstances of that case. Although it occurred where the municipal jurisdiction, for all the purposes of local government and of her own ships, was absolute, the court said: "The cause would be governed by the practice and principles of the courts of admiralty of this country, wholly irrespective of any local law." They add that Smith v. Condry, [supra,] was an exceptional case, leaving the inference strong, as the libellants urge, that the generality asserted is universally applicable, save where ships have compulsorily submitted themselves to local governmental official control. But the facts in The Eagle, [supra,] required no such extended doctrine as is now imputed to it. The case leaves the law applicable to this record where it found it, imposing upon the courts the duty of deciding whether, in the instance before it, the circumstances of the ship and the navigation subjected the transactions to the municipal or the maritime law. It was a very common case, so far as this point is concerned, and did not call for, as in the superior court it did not elicit, any judicial discussion. It occurred in boundary waters, the vessels were all Americans, exercising an international right in circumstances where, without exception, it has ever been held the local laws were inapplicable. It might as well be said that the English statutes limiting liability would control the obligation of an American owner for wrongs committed against a home vessel within a marine league of the island of Saint Helena. We do not therefore misunderstand the doctrine of The Eagle, [8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 15,] and make it the foundation of our judgment, only so far as it reiterates the familiar doctrine we suppose it to announce. We do not think the record shows, that Canada has excluded this favorite, universally recognized, and necessary principle of maritime law from the waters of this canal. She has opened this thoroughfare from sea to sea, as our government has that over the St. Clair flats, and the hundreds of artificial entrances it has constructed to the harbors of the nation; as Holland has the Great Northern canal and her other numerous artificial and improved navigations, and as the expensively constructed entrances to ports everywhere are opened. All alike are free to the commerce of the world. In all, the more general and universally acquiesced-in doctrines of the maritime law have been unreservedly applied, save where statutory limitations or local usages have modified it. The mere absence of a tribunal to enforce it has never been admitted as sufficient evidence of such an intention. We know of nothing in the conditions of this navigation which exempts it from the rules applied to all other waters where the municipal authority is equally supreme.

The following cases are those which, in the brief time we could command, have been selected from the long list in reference to the general subject most pertinent to the precise facts before us. We think they not only authorize, but compel, a subordinate court to enforce the right asserted in the libel: The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 435. The bill of lading was made in Scotland, by the master of a Canadian ship, to transport goods of a Canadian to Canada. Parties, contracts, goods, ship, and voyage, were all foreign. The vessel put into Wales, and there wrongfully refused to carry forward the cargo. The libel, in the opinion of the court, set out two causes of action: the breach of the contract to deliver, and the wrongful act in Wales. In reference to the contract to deliver, and irrespective of the local wrong in Wales, jurisdiction in rem was sustained upon two grounds: First, that a lien existed by the general maritime law; and, second, that, although doubtful, the better opinion was that it did so by that of Scotland, where the contract was made. We are concerned with the first reason only. As to this, it is said, where a lien is given by the maritime law, it is no objection to proceeding in our courts in rem, that the local courts were not clothed with similar authority. Though as a general rule, where both litigants are subjects of the country where the transaction occurs, and where no such remedy exists, our courts will refuse it as between them; still, if no objection by the consul is made, even in such case, they may in their discretion entertain jurisdiction. The decision seems full, that where the maritime law is clear, the mere absence of a local court to enforce its liens will not prevent an American court of admiralty from doing so. The case before us is far clearer than the extreme one in 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] Here the injured party is a citizen, and the offending ship the only source of satisfaction within our jurisdiction. This case applies the rule to a leading maritime state, and shows the practice is not by the superior court considered to depend upon the barbarous or semi-barbarous character of the countries in which actions have accrued. It treats the waters of England, Scotland and Wales, as it would those of Turkey, China, or Egypt. The absence of a court in the one, no more than in the other, prevents the administration of maritime rights attendant upon contracts or wrongs within their waters. If such a distinction is not made, the precedents and conclusive doctrines of all authors, the assumption of the law for all time, precludes discussion here. Suppose the collision happened in China, Africa, or in the harbors of semi-barbarous or wholly non-commercial people, with no court of admiralty, the objection that its absence would prevent a remedy would not seriously be heard.

The following decision affords a striking illustration of how wholly independent is the administration of maritime liens of the other and different question whether, at the place and at the time they vest, there is a remedy for their enforcement: The Siren, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 152, a prize vessel in the custody of the captors, collided with the intervenor's ship. She was condemned and the proceeds paid into the registry. Although no suit in rem or otherwise could have been sustained, because the ship was the property of the government, still it was said the lien existed and would be enforced whenever exigencies occurred which vested the jurisdiction of the court. The practice in the English admiralty against government ships is referred to; instances where seamen's wages have been enforced in cases of forfeiture to government, and various other cases where liens and rights have been sustained after the subject has come into the possession of the court, although they could not have been originally enforced, are discussed and likened to that in judgment. Page 158 it is said: "The existence of a lien is not dependent upon the ability of the claimant to enforce it." This in various forms of expression is repeated and illustrated. The Davis, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 15, is another instance of the enforcement of a maritime lien where the right to proceed in rem was dependent upon the future accidents of the res. The libellants proceeded as salvors of cotton owned by the United States, and although it was conceded no such remedy could be maintained if the property had reached the hands of government officers, that the lien nevertheless attached, and it would be enforced if the process did not involve an invasion of their actual possession. The Siren, [supra,] upon the point for which we cite it, is approved. The claimant's counsel then is hardly justified in saying that the existence of a lien without the ability to enforce it at the time it originally vests, and at the place and against the thing in its then condition, is an absurdity. We perceive neither absurdity, injustice or impolicy in saying that a right in rem exists, the enforcement of which may depend upon the accident of whether the res enters a jurisdiction where courts are clothed with the necessary power, or passes from the hands of those in whose actual possession for political reasons it cannot be impleaded. And see The Bird of Paradise, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 545. The Ticonderoga, Swab. 215, an American ship, was in the employ of the French government, and by orders of an official, was taken in tow of a steamer, also in same employment, and through the sole fault of the latter was brought into collision with the Melampus in the Golden Horn at Constantinople; no question of jurisdiction was made or the peculiar character of the waters mentioned in the report of the case. This narrow bayou, but two or three miles in length, is in some places less than 700 feet wide, and is crossed by a bridge of boats connecting the city of Constantinople with its northern suburbs, Pera and Galata. It is not a thoroughfare from sea to sea, and the local municipal jurisdiction is as absolute as that of England in the Welland canal. In the subsequent case of The Griefswald, Swab. 430, in which the collision happened in the roadstead off the town of Dardanelles, a question of jurisdiction was made; but Dr. Lushington said he had no doubt of it, and it was said that in The Ticonderoga, [supra,] the court took "jurisdiction in these very waters." The case, however, proves far more than that admiralty jurisdiction will be assumed over these foreign waters bordered by cities and suburban towns, and inclosed from the sea by drawbridges and land thoroughfares. It holds that for a wrong there committed the general maritime law applies and will be enforced by a proceeding in rem. It being urged that the owners, and therefore the ship, were not liable, on account of the control of the French government, Dr. Lushington replied: "We must recollect that this is a proceeding in rem. I am not aware where there has been a proceeding in rem, and the vessel has been guilty of damage, that any attempt has been made in this court to deprive the party complaining of the right he has by the maritime law of the world of proceeding against the property itself." This is said in reference to a collision happening in private waters within the municipal jurisdiction of a country whose courts at that time would not enforce the lien. The anomalous mixed foreign tribunals which by treaties and usage administer justice between citizens of different nationalities enforce only that law of the world to which Dr. Lushington refers. They administer the maritime law, because by the law of nations, where it is not by positive local law superseded, it applies within the municipal jurisdiction of Turkey. And this is just the proposition before us, and upon which this case depends. See Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 1, c. 1, § 10, and note by Lawrence; and Id. pt. 2, c. 2, § 12, and notes, for the character of these tribunals; and The Griefswald, Swab. 430. If the above case rightly applied the law, by giving an English owner a remedy in rem against an American citizen for a collision happening within a municipality where the local law gave none, it will require some nice distinctions which it is not the modern policy of admiralty tribunals, and certainly not of those of England or America to make, in order to distinguish the case at bar from it. The Griefswald, Swab. 430. The collision was in the roadstead off the town of Dardanelles, and within the municipal jurisdiction of Turkey. The Griefswald was Prussian, and the Constellation English. Two questions were decided: 1st. That the admiralty had jurisdiction of matters happening in waters within the municipal government of Turkey; and 2d. That the particular proceedings in the local Prussian consular court at Constantinople were not res adjudicata. In deciding the last and principal matter considered, Dr. Lushington says: "The municipal laws of Prussia could have nothing to do with the question in issue, which must be governed by maritime law as it prevails in the maritime states of Europe." "In cases of collision, it has been the practice of this country, and so far as I know, of the European states, and of the United States of America, to allow a party alleging grievance by collision, to proceed in rem against the ship, wherever found, and this practice, it is manifest, is most conducive to justice, because in very many cases a remedy in personam would be impracticable." This reason for the rule would be readily defeated if a transfer terminated the liability of the offending res. The Mali Ivo, L. R. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 356, collision, in the Bosphorus, within the municipal jurisdiction of Turkey, between Norwegian and Austrian ships, Dr. Lushington said, he doubted whether there was, in such case, where both were foreigners, a discretion which would authorize him to decline the jurisdiction similar to that which existed in the case of seaman's wages. At all events there was no doubt as to the jurisdiction wherever the tide ebbed. The lien was enforced and the merits decided.

It is a singular use of this phrase, ebb and flow of the tide, in view of the well-known fact that there is no tide in the Black sea, the sea of Marmora, or the passage between them. (See Lippincott's Gazetteer, Black sea; McCulloch's, same title; both assert there are no tides. Ben. Adm. § 226, and the learned authors he refers to say the same thing.) This is noticed only to suggest that no argument can be drawn from the fact that the Welland canal is a tideless water, and that therefore these English judgments do not extend the maritime law over it. They have paid no attention to this fact of a tide in foreign waters, but have taken jurisdiction wholly irrespective of it. Why they still cling to the meaningless form of words must depend upon reasons we do not appreciate.

In the Bold Buccleugh, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 220, 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 536, the collision occurred in British waters, and the lien there attached, but she went to Scotland, was there seized, and discharged on bail, and by her law was not subject to second seizure. While in this condition she was sold to a bona fide purchaser in Scotland. The claim was as here, that as by the law of the place of sale, the ship was exempt from seizure, so she should be in England. Dr. Lushington thought the interests of commerce demanded a different rule, and saying that the vendee would have a remedy over against the vendor, notwithstanding the local law, he condemned the Buccleugh. This case is a leading one, and has several times been approved in the supreme court. It was affirmed 22 Eng. Law & Eq. and 7 Moore P. C. 267, upon the ground that the proceedings in Scotland were in personam only. But the principle for which it is quoted from 3 W. Rob. Adm. is in no way impaired.

It may well be that we, in this instance, may make a mistake in the opposite direction, but nothing is more common, even by courts of high character, where attention is not challenged to the subject, than to overlook the inapplicability of the familiar rules in reference to the lex loci contractus, the lex rei sitae, and the lex loci delicti, where obligations growing out of international commerce are to be adjudicated in reference to the maritime law. A bill of lading made in England, by the master of an American ship, will be governed by the American law, though the voyage be to France or to China. The lex loci contractus does not apply, although the contract is made in England. See Pope v. Nickerson, [Case No. 11,274;] Lloyd v. Guibert, L. R. 1 Q. B. 115, the facts of which are too extended for statement, but in which is a most instructive opinion, discussing the application of the Danish law as that of the place of the principle contract; that of Portugal, where a bottomry bond in question was executed; that of England, being the place of delivery of the goods, the general maritime law, and lastly the French law, being that which was actually applied, to limit the liability of the owner, because it was that of the ship. It interestingly illustrates the impossibility and impolicy of applying, in these instances, the lex loci. The difficulty arising in semi-barbarous countries, and other places having little or no home commerce, and consequently little well-settled commercial law, while numerous foreign vessels of all other countries throng their ports, is forcibly stated. The most influential portion of this elaborate judgment here, is that which concedes that if there had been any generally acknowledged maritime law, as universal and well-settled as that which we are asked to apply, and which prohibited the release of the owner upon resigning the ship and freight, so as to make the French law marked and exceptional, it would have been applied, and that of France rejected. The presumption was that the maritime law did apply where that was clear and undisputed.

In Cammell v. Sewell, 5 Hurl. & N. 728, goods shipped in Russia by a Prussian ship, belonging to an English owner, were sold in Norway by the master, where the ship was wrecked. The sale was upheld, because the law of Norway authorized it. But each [strict] justice concedes that if there had been a well-settled maritime rule the other way, the local law should not have been applied. Crompton, J., says: "If it could be made out that there was a general maritime law on this subject, it would be a question how far we could suffer the law of a particular country to prevail against it." Cockburn, J., replying to this argument at the bar, said: "But the maritime law is not uniform," and repeats this as a reason in rendering judgment. Byles, J., believing such was the maritime law, was for holding the sale void. The goods here, it will be noticed, were not carried into Norway for the purpose of trade. It was one of the exigencies of international commerce, and it was for this reason that her laws should not govern, if they contravened the general maxims of commercial justice and policy. In Donald v. Hewitt, 33 Ala. 534, the court, in deciding that liens given by local statutes, to be enforced by judicial proceedings, would yield to a local home attachment in personam against the owner of the res, take pains to say such rules will not apply to maritime liens, which override the local law; and so are many other cases both here and in England. It is said in Bags of Linseed, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 108, courts of admiralty, in carrying into effect maritime contracts, are not governed by the rules of the common law, but deal with them upon equitable principles, and the usages and necessities of commerce. In many other departments of international law, analogies may be found showing that the decree we make is more in accordance with its general spirit and policy than to hold that every ship, as it enters foreign waters, passed beyond its protection. At sea, the ship is part of the national territory to which it belongs. In ports, also, most nations still suffer the same theory to apply to all which is done within the ship, even though moored in their harbors. Although criminal jurisdiction is never extended beyond the national limits in other cases, the criminal statutes of our own and other governments include offences committed on shipboard without foreign municipal jurisdictions. See Halleck, Int. Law, and the numerous authoritites he cites, page 170, § 24, p. 171, § 26 et seq.

The general rule in reference to ships, as we understand it, is not to yield the maritime law to any doubtful suggestions of the local power, and in no case to do so where its invasions are unjust and injurious to the general interests of commerce. The decree below is affirmed, except as to the damages. They must be increased by the amount which was deducted on account of the amount paid by the insurance company. See 1 Pars. Mar. AYER v. BRASTOW.

[5 Law Rep. 498.]

District Court, D. Maine. Dec. 30, 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—INSOLVENCY OF PARTNER AND PARTNERSHIP.

1. In a separate bankruptcy of one member of a partnership, if the firm or the other partners are solvent, the court will ordinarily order an account to be taken, and will leave the joint property in the possession of the solvent partners.

[Cited in Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 403.]

2. But where the partnership is insolvent and also all the partners, although some may not be in bankruptcy, the rule is reversed and the court will ordinarily order the joint property to be placed in the hands of the assignee of the bankrupt partner to be administered in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Forsaith v. Merritt, Case No. 4,946; Re Leland, Id. 8,228; Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 403; Wilkins v. Davis, Case No. 17,664.]

In bankruptcy. This was a petition by the assignee of the estate of Samuel Thurston, a voluntary petitioner in bankruptcy, who was declared a bankrupt in his private capacity and also as partner in the late firm of Thurston & Brastow, April 19, 1842. The petition alleges that the firm is insolvent and also that Brastow, the other partner, is insolvent; that the books and papers of the firm are in the hands of Brastow, and that he refuses to surrender them to the assignee, and concludes with a prayer that the court will thereupon pass such order as it may deem proper in the case. Brastow on notice appeared and put in an answer to the petition. The answer admits that in April, 1834, he entered into copartnership with Thurston, and that the copartnership then formed has not been dissolved but by the proceedings in bankruptcy; that in the summer of 1837, the firm suspended payment and has since remained insolvent. That at the time of the suspension of payment, the firm owed more than $50,000, and that he then undertook the settlement of the demands and has continued his efforts to the present time, but has never had the assistance of his partner, but that Thurston has, in all cases, assented to what he has done; that he has settled by payment or compromise, debts to the amount of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, and that he still is engaged in the business of settling the affairs of the firm, and that for this purpose it is necessary that the books and papers of the firm should be retained by him; that he is ready to co-operate and advise with the assignee of said Thurston in all his negotiations for this purpose, and concludes with a prayer that he may be permitted to retain the books of account and the papers of the firm for the purpose of closing the concern.

WARE, District Judge. This case has been submitted to the decision of the court, on the facts stated in the petition of the assignee and the answer of the partner without argument. As the matter submitted involves questions of some difficulty and delicacy, and of no inconsiderable importance, it would have been more satisfactory to me to have had the benefit of an argument before deciding them. But as the parties have chosen to submit them without, I will proceed now to state some of the conclusions to which I have arrived, on such an examination of the question, and as I have been able to give them. In the first place, when all the partners are jointly in bankruptcy, either on their own voluntary petition or on adverse proceedings by their creditors, all the joint property of the firm, and all the separate property of each of the partners passes to the assignee. This is expressly provided for by the 14th section of the act, and necessarily results from the general principle that a person cannot go into bankruptcy by halves. He cannot be a bankrupt as partner, and not a bankrupt as an individual, and being so in both capacities, his creditors have no mode of reaching his joint and separate property but by proceedings in bankruptcy. In the separate bankruptcy of one of the partners, all his separate property passes to his assignee with the same power over it that he had, that is, the exclusive right to the possession, and the exclusive right of disposing of it. But of the joint property, all that passes to the assignee is the interest, which the bankrupt had in it, subject to the rights of the other partners. The solvent partners have a lien on the partnership assets for the payment of the partnership debts, and also, for their share of the surplus. What passes to the assignee, then, is the interest which the bankrupt may appear to have on taking an account. But the interest of the bankrupt does not pass to his assignee with precisely the same powers over the property which the bankrupt himself had. Before the bankruptcy, his power over it was that of a partner; it was a joint tenancy. A joint tenant of a chattel has, it is said, the power of disposing of the whole, (3 Kent, Comm. 350,) though it is otherwise of real estate. But, however it may be as a general rule, it is certain that in the particular modification of joint tenancy existing in partnership, a joint tenant has this power, whether it be considered as legally incident to the quality of his title, or to his being the authorized agent or praepositus of the partnership for their purpose. But by the bankruptcy, the partnership is dissolved, and the joint tenancy severed. The assignee succeeds to the right of the bankrupt, not as a partner, but as a tenant in common. Though he succeeds to all the beneficial interest of the bankrupt, it will not necessarily follow that he succeeds to all his rights of disposing of the property.

Between tenants in common of chattels each has an equal right to the possession, and therefore one tenant in common cannot maintain trespass or trover against his co-tenant for dispossessing him. If one tenant in common takes all the chattels personal, the other has no remedy by action, but he must wait and may take them when he can see his time. Litt. Ten. § 323; 2 Co. Litt. 200. The tenant in possession may therefore legally retain the possession, for he has an equal right with the other, though if he loses or destroys the thing, an action will lie for the co-tenant; and so also if he sells it; but this must be on the assumption that his co-tenant affirms the sale, for as a general rule, a tenant in common can sell only his own share. 3 Kent, Comm. 350, note. But in the case of a tenancy in common, supervening on a joint tenancy in partnership on its dissolution, by the bankruptcy of one of the partners, the principles of the law seem to be somewhat modified. The moral person constituted by the articles of partnership is extinct for general purposes, but it seems has a modified existence for certain objects, and with limited faculties. The partnership is said to be continued for the purpose of winding up the concern, but not for engaging in any new enterprise. The solvent partner, remaining in possession of the partnership effects, has the power of disposing of them and applying the proceeds to the discharge of the partnership obligations. When he sells he conveys a good title to the whole thing sold, and not merely his own interest. Coll. Partn. 497. For this purpose he is the representative and administrator of the moral or civil person which was the creature of the partnership articles. But it seems that he is not the agent or representative of the partnership for all purposes even of winding up and closing the business. He cannot negotiate a bill of exchange or promissory note so as to bind the firm. Coll. Partn. 497. And in suits for the recovery of debts due to the firm, he cannot maintain an action in his own name or that of the partnership alone but must unite the assignee of the bankrupt partner. Story, Partn. § 362. But he remains the representative or administrator of the firm for the purpose of disposing of the partnership effects. And it seems that he has generally a right to retain the control and possession of them, until an account is taken, for the purpose of applying them in good faith to the discharge of the joint debts, and for his share of the surplus. Story, Partn. §§ 339, 407; 3 Kent, Comm. 59. Such being the right of the solvent partner, what are those of the assignee of the bankrupt, and to what extent may he deal with the partnership effects? It is stated generally that he succeeds to 1 the interest and rights of the bankrupt. These, after the dissolution of the partnership, are the rights of a tenant in common, and of that particular species of tenancy, which results from the dissolution of a partnership. In the absence of any particular agreement, each partner has an equal right to the possession of the effects, to dispose of and apply them to the discharge of the partnership liabilities. The assignee succeeding to all the rights of the partner, must have the same right of possession and of administering the effects as the solvent partner. This seems to be the necessary result of acknowledged principles, and so the doctrine is clearly stated by Chancellor Kent, in Murray v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. 60. In that case, it was contended by counsel that there are only two cases in which the assignee, under a separate commission, has a right to deal with the joint property; one, where the solvent partner is abroad. Barker v. Goodair, 11 Ves. 86, and the other where the property left at the time of the bankruptcy is in the possession of the bankrupt partner. Smith v. Stokes, 1 East, 367. But the court ruled that the assignee, as tenant in common, had an equal right to the possession and control of the assets with the solvent partner; that neither party had any absolute and exclusive right to the possession and distribution, and that the assignee, having obtained possession, had a right to retain the assets for the purpose of converting them into money and distributing it among those who are entitled to the proceeds. The legal rights of the solvent partner against the assignee in possession, would appear to be the same as that of the assignee against the solvent partner in possession; that is, to an account and to his share of the surplus after the payment of the joint debts. Such appear to be the rights of the parties in the case of a separate bankruptcy of one partner, when the other is solvent. The assignee of the bankrupt has an equal title to the control and administration of the joint effects with the solvent partner. If the effects are in the hands of the partner, the court will ordinarily direct an account to be taken, to ascertain the interest which the bankrupt has in the joint estate, and will not take the effects out of the solvent partner's possession, unless some equitable ground is shown, which requires such a proceeding to protect the rights of those who have an interest in the estate.

The question in this case is, what course should be adopted where the non-bankrupt partner is insolvent. The proceedings in bankruptcy are according to the course of equity, and to enable the court to do full justice to all partners in interest, the district court, sitting as a court of bankruptcy, is clothed with all the powers of a court of general equity jurisdiction. When the partnership and all the partners are insolvent, though not all in bankruptcy, the natural and obvious view, which a court of equity takes of the matter, is that the effects of the firm belong not to any of the partners but to the creditors. They have a right to look to all the partners for the payment of their debts, and they have the same right to seek their remedies through the assignee as the administrator of a bankrupt partner, as they have against any of the other partners. By the common law, the assignee has no better title to the possession and administration of the effects than the other partners. But in equity he would seem to have a superior claim. For he has an equal legal title as succeeding to the rights of the bankrupt, and he has a superior equity as being the proper representative of all the creditors, who in justice have the sole right to the property. It may be further observed, that the assignee administers and distributes the estate under the law, giving to each creditor his equal share. And this equality, which is the dictate of natural equity, when the estate is brought into bankruptcy, is expressly provided for by law. But if the effects are left in the hands of the insolvent partner, as his administration is not under the immediate control of the court, he has it in his power to defeat the policy of the bankrupt law by giving preferences. In this case, the respondent states in his answer, that he has settled, by payment or compromise, one half or more of the whole debts of the firm; that is, the effects of the firm thus far have been appropriated to the payment of one half of the creditors, while the other half have received nothing. Now one great object of the bankrupt law, is to prevent this preference of favored creditors, and to give to all an equal share of the estate in proportion to the amount of their demands. Another very obvious reason for preferring the administration of the assignee is found in the fact itself that the partner is insolvent. The creditors, among whom the property is to be distributed, have a just claim to have the effects placed in security for the purpose of being converted into money for their benefit. As a general rule, it cannot be doubted that the administration will be more safe in the hands of an assignee than in those of an insolvent partner. Has then the court the power of taking the effects out of the possession of the insolvent partner and placing them in the hands of the assignee. As a general question, this I suppose does not admit of doubt. The partnership is dissolved by the bankruptcy; and on a dissolution by bankruptcy or otherwise, any of the partners or the representatives of a partner may insist on having the whole concern wound up by a sale. Story, Partn. §§ 350, 351; 3 Kent, Comm. 64; Coll. Partn. bk. 1, c. 3, § 3; Crawshay v. Collins, 15 Ves. 227; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. 298. This when done on application to a court of equity, can be done only by the court's taking the control of the property into its own hands. This is the general rule, although the court will not perhaps always order a sale when it will be injurious to the estate. Crawshay v. Collins, 2 Russ. 325; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. 136. Even while the partnership is existing, if one of the partners has involved the firm in debt or has become insolvent, the court will restrain him by injunction from negotiating the partnership paper and from contracting or receiving partnership debts; and where a dissolution is intended or has taken place, will, on application of a partner in a proper case, appoint a receiver. Story, Partn. §§ 227, 228; Coll. Partn. bk. 1, c. 3, §§ 5, 6, pp. 189, 197, 198. There can then be no doubt of the power of the court to take the control and administration of the effects into its own hands. On the separate bankruptcy of one partner, if the firm, or if the other partners are solvent, the general rule in equity, as I understand it, is that the court will not take the joint effects out of the hands of the solvent partners, but leave the possession and distribution with them, subject of course to be controlled by the court when equity requires it, unless when a sale is demanded, or when some special ground is shown requiring the interposition of the court. But where the firm itself and all the partners are insolvent, the interest of the creditors and the policy of the law require that the rule should be reversed, and that the administration of the assets should be by the assignee or a receiver under the direction of the court, and the distribution be made by the law. The court may indeed, in special cases, employ the insolvent partner to aid in the settlement of the estate, but he then will act under the authority and direction of the court. And this I understand to be the practice in equity.

Case No. 683.

AYER et al. v. The GLAUCUS.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1870.

APPEAL IN ADMIRALTY — TRIAL DE NOVO — COLLISION — BETWEEN STEAM AND SAIL — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES — LIGHTS.

1. There are cases in which it is suggested, if not decided, that an appellate court will not in general examine the decree of the subordinate court upon the merits, where the matter in issue depends upon the credibility of witnesses.

2. Since the passage of the act of March 3, 1803, [2 Stat. 244,] appeals are allowed to the circuit court from any decree rendered in the district court in any cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of fifty dollars.

3. The rules of the supreme court provide that the testimony given in the district court may be taken down by the clerk and transmitted to the circuit court, or, it may be retaken by deposition; and the fiftieth rule provides that further proof may be taken in the circuit court. This shows that the facts, as well as the law, are open to revision in the circuit court.

4. Where the appeal is on a question of fact, the burden is on the appellant to show that the decision of the inferior court was erroneous; but the court of paramount jurisdiction will examine the whole testimony in the case.

5. Both vessels in this case were bound to observe and follow the rules and regulations established by congress to prevent collisions, and if they had, the collision would not have occurred.

6. This was not a case of inevitable accident, because one or the other, or both, were in fault.

7. Steamships are required to keep out of the way of sailing vessels when the two are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, and the sailing vessel is required to keep her course subject to the qualification applicable to both, which is, that due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and also to any special circumstances, which may exist at the time, rendering departure from the requirement necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

8. When witnesses on the different sides make irreconcilable statements, the question as to which shall be believed is to be determined by ascertaining who had the best means of knowledge and observation, as to the facts upon which the conflicting evidence is given.

9. The master, mate, wheelsman, and two seamen, were on the deck of a schooner at the time of her collision with a steamer. Three persons, the pilot, second mate, and wheelsman, were in the pilot-house of the steamer, and one seaman on her deck. These observed the schooner when a mile distant, and testified that she subsequently changed her course before the collision. The witnesses on the schooner testified that she did not. Held, in this case, the witnesses on board the schooner had the best means of knowledge as to what her management was.

10. Circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to control direct testimony, but in such case, the circumstantial facts from which the inference is to be drawn, should be fully proved.

11. An inference from an inference does not have much probative force.

12. A schooner in a clear night, with proper lights set, was heading north-west by west. A steamer was heading east by north. Witnesses in the pilot-house of the steamer said they saw both the red and green light of the schooner, and as the two vessels approached each other, the green light disappeared, from which it was argued that she must have ported her helm, and fallen off to the leeward. A seaman on the deck of the steamer, and standing on her starboard bow, saw only the red light of the schooner, and reported the same to the pilot. Held, it was a case where it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the schooner.

In admiralty. Libel [by James S. Ayer against the steamer Glaucus, the Metropolitan Steamship Company, claimants] in a cause of collision. Damages were claimed in this case by the libellants, as the owners of the schooner Electric Flash, on account of a collision which occurred between the schooner and the steam-propeller Glaucus, at ten o'clock in the evening of Feb. 1, 1868, in Long Island sound, nearly opposite to New Haven, by which the schooner, with a full cargo on board, was run down and sunk, and became a total loss. Just before the collision took place, the schooner was close hauled on the port tack, beating up the sound, on a voyage from Newfoundland to the port of New York, and when she descried the steamer she was heading north-west by west, and, having a whole sail breeze from the west-south-west, she was making five and a half knots an hour. Her cargo consisted of frozen herring. The owners claimed damages for the loss of the cargo as well as for the loss of the schooner, and also for the loss of her provisions, nautical instruments, and charts. Bound down the sound, the Glaucus, a steam-propeller of eighteen hundred and forty-eight tons, new measurement, was on a voyage from New York to Boston, and she was heading east by north, and was making eleven knots. These facts were undisputed. It also appeared that the night was clear, and that the moon was shining and unobscured by clouds. [Decree for libellants. Claimants appeal. Affirmed.]

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Causes of collision, civil and maritime, since the passage of the act establishing certain rules and regulations for preventing such disasters, depend, in most cases, upon controverted matters of fact, to be determined by the testimony of witnesses rather than upon questions of law. Decided cases may be referred to in which it is suggested, if not positively stated, that an appellate court will not, in general, re-examine the decree of the subordinate court upon the merits in such a case, where it appears that the matter in issue depends upon the credibility of the witnesses; but those remarks were not necessary to the decision of the appeal in any one of those cases, nor do they express the correct rule upon the subject as understood at the present time in the supreme court. Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 267; The Potomac, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 584; The Marcellus, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 417; The Water Witch, Id. 500. Since the passage of the act of March 3, 1803, appeals are allowed to the circuit court from any decree rendered in the district court, in any cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of fifty dollars, and the provision is, that the circuit court is authorized and required to "receive, hear, and determine such appeal." 2 Stat. 244. Provision is also made, by the rules prescribed by the supreme court, that the testimony given in the district court may be taken down by the clerk and be transmitted to the circuit court, to be there used on the appeal, or it may be retaken by deposition at the election of the parties, and the fiftieth rule provides that further proof may be taken in the circuit court, which shows to a demonstration that the facts as well as the law of the case are open to revision on appeal in the circuit court. The Baltimore, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 382. Where the appeal involves a question of fact, the burden is on the appellant to show that the decree rendered in the subordinate court is erroneous; but it is a mistake to suppose that the court of paramount jurisdiction will not re-examine the whole testimony in the case. 2 Stat. 244; [The Baltimore, supra;] 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 382.

Both vessels, under the circumstances of this case, were bound to observe and follow the rules and regulations established by congress to prevent collisions on the water, and it is clear, if they had done so, the collision would not have occurred. 13 Stat. 60. Inevitable accident is not even suggested, nor could it be with any hope that any such view would be adopted by the court, as it was clear that one or the other, or both, were in fault. Union S. S. Co. v. New York & V. S. S. Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 313; The Morning Light, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 556. Proper regulation lights were shown by the schooner, as required by law, and the proofs also show to the entire satisfaction of the court that she had a competent lookout properly stationed on the vessel. Proper sidelights, as required by the regulations established by the act of April 29, 1864, were also shown by the steamer; but she had "a central range of two white lights," as required by section 11 of the act of July 25, 1866, for "all coasting steamers" and other steamers, navigating bays, lakes, rivers, &c., as therein specifically provided. 13 Stat. 59; 14 Stat. 228. Extended remarks upon the circumstance that the steamer had two white lights, instead of one only, as prescribed by the first-named provision, are unnecessary, as it is clear, even if the steamer was not one falling within the regulation established by the subsequent act, that the circumstance that she had two white lights did not contribute, in any respect whatever, to the disaster.

The respondents admit that the two vessels came in collision on the day, and substantially at the place, as assumed by the libellants, and that the schooner suffered damage; but they do not admit that she was totally lost, nor do they admit the extent of the injury to the cargo, as alleged in the libel. They admit the collision, without qualification, and the proofs show that the steamer struck the schooner on the port bow, near the stem, carrying away the bowsprit, stem, and port knight-head, and that the effect of the blow extended across the vessel, crushing out the starboard bow, which caused the vessel immediately to capsize and sink. Steamships are required to keep out of the way of a sailing ship, when the two are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, and the correlative duty required of the sailing ship is that where one of two ships is required to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualification applicable to both, that due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and also to any special circumstances which may exist at the time, rendering a departure from the requirement necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger. 13 Stat. 61; Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 384.

Argument to show that those rules are applicable to the case before the court is unnecessary, as that point is conceded by both parties, and is too plain for controversy. Prior to the collision, and at the time the two vessels came together, five persons, to wit, the master, mate, wheelsman, and two seamen, were on the deck of the schooner, three having been there for some time, and the other two came up from the lower watch just before the collision took place, and they all testify, in the most positive manner, that the schooner did not change her course. Support to their statements is also derived from the testimony of the master of the schooner "Nightingale," which was to the leeward, and sailing in the same direction as the schooner of the libellants. He was on deck at the time of the collision; saw both vessels at the time; and he states that he did not see any change in the course of the injured schooner before she was struck by the steamer. Testimony was introduced by the respondents, tending to show that the witness had made contradictory statements upon the subject out of court, but the testimony introduced for that purpose is not of a character to impair, essentially, the credit of the witness. Attempt is made by the respondents to controvert those statements, and to show by the statements of witnesses on board the steamer, and by evidence in its nature circumstantial, that the schooner did change her course, and that the collision was occasioned by that departure from the rules of navigation as established by the act of congress. Three persons were in the pilot-house of the steamer when the schooner was descried, and they remained there as the two vessels advanced to the place of collision; and there was also one seaman on the deck, called, in the testimony, the bow watch. Those in the pilot-house, to wit, the pilot, second mate, and wheelsman, testify that they descried the schooner when she was a mile distant, and they state that the schooner did subsequently change her course before the collision occurred. Repugnant statements cannot both be true, and when they cannot be reconciled, the one or the other must be rejected; and in the performance of that duty it usually becomes important to ascertain which witness had the best means of knowledge, as it is more reasonable to conclude that the error is the result of mistake than of deliberate intention. Evidently the libellants' witnesses speak from actual knowledge, and unless they have willfully stated what they know to be false, their statements, it would seem, must be correct. They were on the deck of the schooner, and they cannot well be mistaken in respect to the matter in controversy. Distant nearly a mile,—as the respondents' witnesses were,—and situated in the pilot-house of the steamer, they could only infer what they have affirmed, or to say the least, inference must have entered very largely into their statements as to what transpired on the deck of the schooner, as it is hardly to be credited that they could see either the helmsman, or the wheel. Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 382.

Certain circumstances, stated by the witnesses situated in the pilot-house of the steamer, are invoked by the respondents as confirmatory of their theory, and it is insisted, in argument, that one of those circumstances is of itself sufficient to overcome the statement of the libellants' witnesses, that the schooner did not change her course; and to prove the affirmative of that issue, circumstantial evidence may undoubtedly be sufficient to control direct testimony of a repugnant tendency, and to establish a theory of an opposite character; but it is indispensably necessary, in order that it may have any such effect, that the circumstantial facts, from which the inference is to be drawn, should be fully proved. An inference from an inference, if it be allowable at all, cannot be regarded, even in a civil case, as having much probative force, because the chances that it may be erroneous render it unsafe as the basis of judicial action. This is especially so when it is opposed to the direct statements of credible witnesses, who are otherwise entirely unimpeached. Presumptive proof is admissible in every case; but the collateral facts, from which the presumption is drawn, must be fully proved. Certainly no safe inference or presumption can be drawn from such facts until they are satisfactorily established. 1 Stark. Ev. 13, 57. The express testimony of the witnesses in the pilot-house of the steamer is, that when they first descried the schooner, they saw both her green and red lights, and that, as she advanced, her green light disappeared, and the inference from that circumstance is that she ported her helm, and fell off to the leeward. Sailing ships under way shall carry the same lights as steamships under way, "with the exception of the white mast-head light, which they shall never carry," that is, they shall carry a green light on the starboard side, and a red light on the port side, constructed as required in the regulations enacted by congress; and the further provision is, that they shall born be fitted with inboard screens, projecting at least three feet forward from the light, so as to prevent those lights from being seen across the bow. Lights constructed and fitted in that way may both be seen at the same time at that distance in a clear night, when the two vessels are approaching head on, or nearly head on; but the steamer was heading east by north, and the schooner was heading northwest by west; and the statements of those witnesses are, that they saw the green light of the schooner, as well as her red light, four points over the starboard bow of the steamer. Undoubtedly they might have seen the red light under those circumstances; but it was conceded in argument that they could hardly have seen the green light at the same time, unless there is some error in the basis of facts as assumed by both sides. Confirmation of the view that those witnesses are in error is found in the testimony of the seaman, called the bow watch, who was stationed as a lookout on the starboard bow of the steamer. Standing there, his position and opportunity for seeing both lights, if they could be seen at all on that angle, were much better than the other witnesses, as he was farther forward, and was standing nearer the water-line of the vessel. He saw the red light only, and he testifies that he reported the light as soon as he saw it, which shows that the attention of the pilot was called to the red light as soon as it was seen by the lookout. Several other circumstances are referred to by the respondents in supporting their theory that the schooner changed her course; but they are of such slight probative force that it does not appear to be necessary to give them a separate examination. Viewed in any proper light, the case is one where it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the schooner, and the proofs show to a demonstration that she did not perform that duty; and as there were no obstacles to prevent her from avoiding the schooner, she must answer for the consequences. When she starboarded her helm "a little," if she had put it hard a-starboard, she would have gone clear, or if she had ported her helm, she would have gone under the stern of the schooner. Both parties excepted to the commissioner's report; but the court is of the opinion that none of the exceptions ought to be sustained. Decree affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 684.

AYER v. THACHER.

[3 Mason, 153.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1823.

OFFICE AND OFFICER — RECOVERY OF FEES FROM ONE UNLAWFULLY IN POSSESSION OF THE OFFICE.

The surveyor appointed for the port of Eastport under the act of the 7th of May, 1822, c. 107, [3 Stat. 693,] is surveyor of the district of Passamaquoddy, and entitled to act for the whole district, and receive fees accordingly.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

At law. This was an action brought by [Samuel Ayer] the surveyor of Eastport, appointed under the act of the 7th of May, 1822, c. 107, [3 Stat. 693,] against [Stephen Thacher] the collector of the district of Passamaquoddy, for fees accruing by virtue of his office, and received by the collector. The sole point was, whether the surveyor appointed under the act of 1822, was by that act constituted surveyor of the port of Eastport only, or was surveyor of the district of Passamaquoddy, and not limited in his duties to the port of Eastport. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

Mr. Davies, for plaintiff.

Orr & Longfellow, for defendant.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and WARE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The parties concede, that the court have jurisdiction of this case under the act of 3d March, 1815, [3 Stat. 245,] c. 101, § 4. I meddle not, therefore, with that question; but shall content myself with the only point now in controversy.

The fifth section of the act of 1822, c. 107. [3 Stat. 694,] authorizes the president, among other things, to appoint "a surveyor for the port of Eastport, in the district of Passamaquoddy." The plaintiff was duly commissioned for that office, and claims in virtue thereof to be surveyor for the district of Passamaquoddy; and he supports his claim by reference to the eighth section, which grants "to the surveyor at Eastport for the district of Passamaquoddy five hundred dollars," as his salary. There is no other surveyor authorized by law to be appointed in the district; and under this description the plaintiff is certainly entitled to receive this salary. But the defendant nevertheless asserts, that the surveyor appointed by this act, is merely surveyor of the port of Eastport; is entitled to perform duties only at that port; and can receive no fees accruing from services done out of that port. It appears to me, that this construction of the act is incorrect. It is true, that the first clause provides for the appointment of a surveyor "for the port of Eastport in the district of Passamaquoddy;" and if there had been several surveyors authorized by law to be appointed in several other ports in that district, there might have been grounds to confine him to the duties connected with the port of Eastport. But no other surveyors are so authorized; and the clause, granting the salary, explains the ambiguity in the first clause, and shows that the surveyor so appointed is "the surveyor at Eastport" (that is, to reside at Eastport) "for the district of Passamaquoddy." Indeed, it does not appear, that by law any such port as the "port of Eastport" is, in terms, recognized as a port of entry or delivery. The act of 1799, c. 128, § 2, [Bio. & D. Laws, —1 Stat. 627, c. 22,] provides that in Massachusetts "there shall be twenty-two districts and ports of entry," and enumerates among them "Machias and Passamaquoddy;" and afterwards adds, "and for each of the districts of Machias and Passamaquoddy shall be appointed a collector to reside at the said ports of Machias and Passamaquoddy respectively." The act of 3d of March, 1803, c. 79, a part of whose title is "An act to make Beaufort and Passamaquoddy ports of entry and delivery," [2 Stat. 229,] in the fourth section provides, that "such place within the district of Passamaquoddy in the state of Massachusetts, as the secretary of the treasury may direct, shall be a port of entry and delivery, at which the collector shall reside, as well for foreign vessels as for vessels of the United States." Under this act the secretary of the treasury is understood by an order of the 3d of June, 1803, to have designated the present port of Eastport. The port thus designated, seems as well from the title of this act, as from the language of the act of 1799, c. 128, [1 Stat. 627,] to be in a revenue sense the port of Passamaquoddy, or of Passamaquoddy district; and as no other port of delivery or entry is provided for, the port of Eastport is now, to all intents and purposes, the sole port of entry and delivery of and for the whole district, and the surveyor of that port is the surveyor of the district. Indeed, in our revenue laws "port" and "district" are often used, as of the same import, in cases where the limits of the port and district are the same. The act of 1799, c. 128, seems to have used the words "port" and "district" of Passamaquoddy in this sense. I am not aware, that there is any town or place known and incorporated by the name of Passamaquoddy. Machias was incorporated as a town on the 23d of June, 1784; and Eastport on the 24th of February, 1798. The latter, at the time of its incorporation, was known by the name of Plantation, No. 8; and whether it had also acquired in common parlance the name of Passamaquoddy, is a point on which I have no means of forming an opinion. My opinion is, that the plaintiff is surveyor of the district of Passamaquoddy, and as such entitled to recover. Judgment accordingly.

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. April, 1874.

GUARANTOR—WHEN CANNOT PROVE DEBT — PARTICEPS CRIMINIS — PREFERENCE — RELEASING GUARANTOR—REVIVING LIABILITY.

1. The guarantors of a note, the holder of which had forfeited his claim against a bankrupt estate, have no right to prove against the estate, their liability having already been discharged by the act of the principal.

2. If the guarantors participated in the act by which their principal forfeited his claim, they occupy no better position, and cannot prove.

3. Where the holder has taken a preference, in fraud of the bankrupt act, and a recovery has been had against him by the assignee, payment of the judgment does not revive his right to prove against the estate; and by such preference he has released the guarantors, and they have no claim against the estate.

4. It seems, that a guarantor, not legally liable to the holder, cannot, by any subsequent promise, revive the liability of the estate.

In bankruptcy. Motion by the assignee to expunge the proof of debt filed by A. Prutsman and Charles H. Stowers as guarantors upon two notes of the bankrupt payable to one G. H. Gile, amounting to $2,049. The bankrupt and one Fallis being indebted to Prutsman & Stowers, and they owing Gile, the bankrupt, with Fallis, made notes payable to Gile for the amount of the debt due to Prutsman & Stowers, who then guaranteed them and delivered them to Gile.

Mariner, Smith & Ordway, for the motion.

These creditors had a security and they should release it before they can legally prove for the whole. In re Jaycox, [Case No. 7,242.] Their not holding the legal title to the security makes no difference. [Id. 7,242.] A surety or guarantor cannot prove a debt when the principal creditor cannot. Sigsby v. Willis, [Id. 12,849;] In re Ellerhorst, [Id. 4,381.] Gile could not prove without a surrender, and payment of the judgment was not a surrender. In re Tonkin, [Id. 14,094;] In re Richter, [Id. 11,803;] In re Stephens, [Id. 13,365.] Judgment against Gile for fraud is res adjudicata as against these creditors, they being in privity with him. In re Richter, [supra.]

George W. Burnell, contra.

By rule 34 (1871) of the U. S. supreme court contingent liabilities must be proved in the name of the creditors if known. Creditors ignorant of a fraudulent conveyance to another party, but who afterwards express themselves as satisfied with it, may prove their claims. In re Chamberlain. [Case No. 2,574.] The case of Sigsby & Willis, [supra,] cited by the opposite counsel, was between partners, and is not in point.

HOPKINS, District Judge. From the evidence read on the hearing of the motion, it appears that within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the bankrupt made a bill of sale of his lumber to Mr. Gile, to pay or secure the payment of these notes, and that the assignee brought suit in the United States circuit court for this district, against said Gile, for the recovery of the value of such property, on the ground that the sale was illegal and void as constituting a preference contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt act, and that he recovered a judgment therefor, which Gile afterwards paid. This motion is made on the ground that, as Gile, the holder of the notes, could not prove the claim on account of his fraud in attempting to obtain a preference, the guarantors of the notes cannot do so. I think it is clear that Mr. Gile, by his effort to obtain and hold a fraudulent preference, forfeited his right to prove the debt or to participate in the bankrupt's estate. Section 39 of bankrupt act; In re Stephens, [Case No. 13,365;] Cookinham v. Morgan, [Id. 3,183.] The subsequent payment of the judgment was not a surrender within the meaning of section 23, so as to remove the disability and revive the right to prove his debt. Hood v. Karper, [Id. 6,664.]

If guarantors and indorsers may prove the debt or claim in such cases, notwithstanding the fraud of the holder, this provision of the law may be wholly avoided and rendered nugatory. But the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Bartholow v. Bean, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 635, recently decided, have laid down a proposition which I think must control this case. Justice Miller, who delivered the opinion, says: "It is very obvious that the statute intended, in pursuit of its policy of equal distribution to exclude both the holder of the note and the surety or indorser from the right to receive payment from the insolvent bankrupt. It is forbidden. It is called a fraud upon the statute in one place and an evasion in another." After stating that a holder of indorsed paper might refuse a tender of payment, and that such refusal would not exonerate the surety or indorser, because in refusing he would be but obeying the plain mandate of the bankrupt act, he says, "by receiving the money, the holder of the note makes himself liable to a judgment for the amount in favor of the bankrupt's assignee, and loses his right to recover either of the indorser or of the bankrupts's estate." The italics are mine, made because of the great importance of the principle included and enunciated in that clause. That case, as I have before said, would seem to dispose of the question involved in this motion; for, if the holder of a note forfeits his claim as against the sureties by his fraud upon the bankrupt act, then these guarantors are not or would not be legally liable to Mr. Gile, and do not occupy the position of parties who are authorized, under section 19, [14 Stat. 525,] to prove their debts, as they are not "liable as bail, surety, guarantors or otherwise for the bankrupt;" so that, giving to the language of the opinion above italicized its natural and obvious meaning, this motion must be granted, for the facts of this case clearly bring it within the doctrine there announced.

In this case Mr. Stowers, who makes the affidavit or proof, says they are liable. Whether that statement was made under a misapprehension of the law, or they have voluntarily promised to pay the notes since, does not appear, and it is probably immaterial, for if they were not legally liable to the holder, after his fraudulent act, they cannot by any subsequent promise revive the liability of the estate to them. But it will be seen that section 19 authorizes parties liable for the debts of a bankrupt, who have not paid the same or any part thereof, to prove such debts only when the "creditor shall fail or omit to prove them." It would be an unwarrantable construction to give to those words, it seems to me, to hold that they covered the case of a creditor who had forfeited his right to prove his debt by his own fraudulent acts.

The doctrine enunciated in the opinion of the supreme court is not by any means new. It is only a new application of the old rule that every act of a creditor which extinguishes his remedy as against the principal absolves the surety, guarantor or indorser. But even if there is any question upon this view of the case, I think, upon another ground, this motion must be granted. The testimony taken and read on this motion shows that the guarantors themselves participated and assisted in obtaining the illegal preference of this claim, were participes criminis, and therefore occupy no better or different position than the holder, and cannot be permitted to prove the claim any more than he could. They were the parties "to be benefited," within the meaning of §§ 35 and 39 of the bankrupt act, and being actors in the illegal transaction, they must be excluded from all participation in the bankrupt's estate. The proof of the claim is therefore stricken out and expunged, and the register will strike these claimants from the list of creditors of the estate.

AYLING v. HULL.

[2 Cliff. 494;[1] Merw. Pat. Inv. 91.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1865.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — PATENTABILITY—NOVELTY—INTERFERENCES—INJUNCTION —ABANDONMENT.

1. The presumption arising from the introduction in evidence of his patents, that the complainant is the original and first inventor of the invention therein described, may be regarded as strengthened by the fact that the complainant's application and respondent's patent were declared in interference at the patent office, that the cases were appealed to the superior court of the District of Columbia, being at every step decided in the complainant's favor, the respondent, during the entire pendency of the interferences, asserting himself to be the original and first inventor.

2. It was held that the subjects-matter of the complainant's patents were not the same as that of the English patent of Alexander Parker.

3. It is competent for the circuit court to entertain a bill of complaint, founded on letters-patent of the United States, for an injunction, for an account, or for the repeal of an interfering patent for the same invention.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 91, contains a partial report only.]

4. The motion for injunction is addressed to the discretion, and the court may or may not, according to the circumstances, order issues for a jury.

5. An inventor, at the time of making his discovery, intended to apply for letters-patent thereon; but having been incorrectly advised that his invention was anticipated by a patent of prior date, he kept his improvement a secret, practising it for his own benefit; and when aware that he had been misinformed, he filed his application without unnecessary delay. Held, that he had not so postponed his application for a patent, and concealed his invention, as to forfeit his right to the grant of a patent.

In equity. This was a bill in equity in which the complainant alleged that he was the first and original inventor of an improved process for changing, curing, or treating caoutchouc, and also of an improved product from caoutchouc, which product was the result of the said process. The two inventions were embraced in separate patents, each bearing the same date, to wit, May 10, 1864. The prayer of the bill of complaint was, that two certain letters-patent granted to the respondent might be adjudged and decreed to be void throughout the United States, and for an injunction and for an account. The invention described in the first patent of the complainant was a new process by which caoutchouc and its compounds were changed or cured, so that they were unaffected by changes of temperature, by contact with fatty and acid substances, and by exposure to the atmosphere, and so that their strength and elasticity were increased. The change produced on caoutchouc was similar to that effected by heat in the presence of sulphur, known as vulcanization, except that there was no sulphur left in the rubber, nor were there any other agents left therein tending to its injury or destruction; and except also, that the change was more permanent and uniform in its character. The patentee stated that the process was essentially "a cold one," which could be successfully practiced in any degree of natural temperature, and might be described as consisting in bringing the caoutchouc into contact for a suitable time, with a recently discovered fluid solvent thereof, known in commerce as "carbon spirits," when the fluid was combined with chloride of sulphur in the proportion of about one measure of the chloride of sulphur to fifty of the carbon spirits. In the other patent, the specification described the product or article of manufacture as chiefly composed of caoutchouc, and combined with carbon spirits and chloride of sulphur. It was charged upon the respondent that he obtained and held two certain patents, which covered the same inventions as those secured to the complainant in the patents, upon which the suit was founded. Of the patents of the respondent, one was dated December 26, 1864, and entitled "an improvement in treating caoutchouc," the other, March 10, 1863, and was upon an improved caoutchouc or india-rubber. It was alleged in the bill of complaint that the patents of the respondent were an interference with the patents of the complainant, and that the respondent refused to acknowledge the rights of complainant, and was using and practicing the inventions in violation of complainant's rights. It was admitted that the patents of the two parties were upon the same inventions. Several defences were set up in the answer, of which the following are all that require recapitulation:—

First, that neither party was the original and first inventor of the improvements, but that both were old and belonged to the public. To prove this, an English patent granted to one Alexander Parker was introduced in evidence.

Second, inasmuch as the complainant's patents were issued only a short time before the filing of the bill of complaint, the court ought not to order an injunction, or enter any decree affirming the validity of the patents, until the same had been judicially established; and to that end the respondent asked that proper issues might be framed, and the cause sent to a jury.

Third, that the defendant not only did not use reasonable diligence in completing the alleged discovery, but that he secreted and concealed whatever he had accomplished, for his own benefit, and for such length of time that he had no superior equity over the respondent, and therefore that the court should leave the parties to their legal rights.

The more important portions of the evidence applicable to the first defence may be gathered from the opinion of the court, when considering the question of originality, and the facts upon which the third defence was based appear in the discussion, by the court, of that point.

B. R. Curtis and Chauncey Smith, for complainant.

F. A. Brooks, for respondent.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The patents of the complainant being introduced in evidence, the prima facie presumption is, that he is the original and first inventor of what is therein described as his invention, and the conduct of the respondent may be regarded as strengthening that presumption rather than as weakening it. The record shows that he applied for patents for the same improvements, and that an interference was declared by the patent office in each case, between his applications and those made by the complainant. The first hearing was before the examiner, and he decided against the respondent. Appeals were taken in due course of business, to the board of appeal and to the commissioner, both being decided in the same way, and he thereupon appealed to the ultimate tribunal, but met with no better success. Throughout these controversies, he steadily and constantly maintained the validity of his applications, and still continued to press his claims for patents until the same were granted. The record also shows that having succeeded in obtaining his patents, he brought a suit against the complainant, charging him with infringement of his patents, and claimed that he, the respondent, was the original and first inventor of the improvements therein described and secured. Being unable to show any right to enjoy the property of the invention himself, he now denies the originality of invention either in himself, or the complainant, and seeks to destroy it as a right of property in the complainant. Ungracious, however, as the defence is, still, it is a sufficient one if it be proved. But it is not proved, and the pretence has no foundation whatever. On the contrary, the testimony introduced by the complainant shows, to the entire satisfaction of the court, that the complainant is, as he alleges himself to be, the original and first inventor of the improvement. The patentee of the English patent took, as he states in his specification, forty parts of bisulphuret of carbon and added to it one part of chloride of sulphur prepared as neutral as possible, mixed well the ingredients in a suitable vessel, and immersed caoutchouc in sheets or other forms in the mixture, allowing them to remain therein a longer or shorter time, according to the thickness or substance of the article. The fluid used by the complainant, is the product of the distillation of the natural petroleum or rock oil, and is combined with chloride of sulphur in the proportions before mentioned.

The expert testimony offered by the complainant, shows that coal-tar naphtha has been long known as the light oil produced in the decomposition of coal, when sudden and high heat is applied to it. The statement is that it consists, when highly rectified, in a large part, of a substance called by chemists benzole or benzine, and that it has specific characters, although it is a mixture. The principal expert witness called for complainant states that it has a low boiling point, but congeals wholly or in part at about the temperature of freezing water. It forms compounds of decomposition with nitric-acid, one of which crystallizes and has the composition of compounds in the benzole series, derived from benzoic acid. One of its peculiar physical characters is, that although very volatile, it does not diffuse in air at forty degrees, and cannot, therefore, be used in the manufacture of air-gas. The witness states that he has been acquainted with the article, under different names, such as coal-tar naphtha, light-spirits naphtha, crude benzole, and rectified naphtha, for more than twenty years. Chemists, he says, have known it more than forty years, under these and other names, and that he has experimented with it at different times within the period since it came to his knowledge. On the other hand, he states that petroleum naphtha or carbon spirits is a fluid distinct from the other hydro-carbons, both in physical and chemical characters, and that it constitutes a new product, which cannot be included in any other known series. He describes it as a light mobile fluid, obtained in the purification of crude petroleum oil, and by the slow distillation of bituminous coal at the lowest possible heat. His representations are, that it has peculiar physical and chemical characters, as, for example, it has a high boiling point much above that of water, and yet it diffuses in air at a temperature of forty degrees rapidly, and, consequently, becomes an efficient agent in the production of what is termed air-gas. Another characteristic is, that it exhales rapidly and completely at a temperature of sixty degrees without a particle of residuum or without becoming colored, and it may be mixed with other bodies without producing change of color. When exposed to cold, it bears the reduction of fifty degrees below zero without becoming solid, and still remains a mobile fluid, and when mixed with nitric-acid, its chemical property is such that it does not form nitrobenzole by decomposition, nor can the products of the benzoic series be then obtained from it. The conclusion of the witness is, that its elements are differently united from those of coal naphtha, or any of those resulting from the application of a high temperature to coal; and there can be no doubt, in the judgment of the court, that his conclusion is correct. The evidence also shows, that the product obtained by the complainant is new, and that the respondent is plainly in error in the view he puts forth upon that subject. Jurisdiction in suits of this nature is conferred upon the circuit courts by an act of congress, and it is competent for the court to entertain a bill of complaint for an injunction and an account, or for the repeal of an interfering patent for the same invention, at any time after the letters-patent are granted. Undoubtedly the application for injunction is in all cases addressed to the discretion of the court, and it may be that the court, under some circumstances, might order issues to a jury in a suit like the present, for the repeal of an interfering patent. Suffice it to say, however, there are no circumstances in this case which afford any proper ground for the last-named application, and the respondent has no claims for any delay, if the complainant is entitled to a decree.

The theory of fact on which the third defence is founded is not correct. The complainant did exercise reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting his invention, as appears from all the evidence, when properly understood. When he made his invention he intended to apply for a patent, and doubtless would have been so, had he not been misled and been induced to believe that his invention had been anticipated. While laboring under that impression, he decided to keep it a secret and practise it for his own benefit; but the evidence clearly shows that as soon as he was undeceived, and it came to his knowledge that he had not been anticipated, he began his preparations for application for a patent, and obtained it without unnecessary delay. None of the defences set up by the respondent can be sustained, and they are accordingly overruled. The complainant is entitled to a decree as prayed in the bill of complaint, and for his costs.

AYLWARD v. SMITH.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1872.[2]

DEMURRAGE—LAY DAYS—ARRIVAL OF VESSEL.

Under the usual bill of lading, the lay days do not begin to run until the vessel has arrived at her place of discharge, and is ready to be unloaded.

[Cited in Gronstadt v. Witthoff, 15 Fed. 268; Fish v. One Hundred and Fifty Tons Brown Stone, 20 Fed. 202; The Henry Sutton, 26 Fed. 926; Manson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 31 Fed. 299.]

In admiralty. Demurrage.—Libel, by [James E. Aylward] the master of schooner Sandalphon, [against Martin L. Smith,] alleging that, on the seventh day of December, 1872, the Hoboken Coal Company shipped on board his vessel, then lying at Hoboken, in New Jersey, a cargo of coal, to be delivered to the respondent at Cambridgeport, Mass., for a certain freight, and the libellant signed a bill of lading therefor; that he proceeded on his voyage, and arrived at the wharf of the respondent on the 20th of December, and was detained there, by the respondent's neglect and fault, for twenty-seven days beyond the time allowed for discharging cargo by the contract between the parties. It appeared that the schooner was towed to the respondent's wharf in the afternoon of the 20th December, at about high tide; and was made fast outside of another vessel which was in the berth. This other vessel was hauled out on the next day; but the libellant's schooner was then hard aground, and so remained for some days, the tides being lower than usual. Afterwards, the ice made round her, and she could not be hauled in until the 18th of January, when the cargo was discharged in less than two days. The libel stated the distance of the schooner from the wharf to be thirty-five feet; and the evidence was somewhat conflicting as to the exact distance, the respondent maintaining that it was considerably greater. Both parties did what they could to break the ice and to haul in the vessel. On the 28th of December, the deck load of twenty tons was delivered by means of a staging or bridge; and it was alleged that more might have been landed in this way; but the respondents testified that the bridge was so slippery and dangerous that it was impracticable to use it further. The bill of lading contained these words: "Usual dem. after three days, Sundays exc." It was agreed that this meant that the usual demurrage of eight cents per ton for each ton of the cargo was to be paid for every day the vessel should be detained beyond three days, exclusive of Sundays. The libellant demanded demurrage at this rate for twenty-seven days. [Libel dismissed. Decree affirmed in Aylward v. Smith, Case No. 687.]

C. F. Walcott, for the libellant, cited Abb. Shipp. (11th Ed.) 271; Brown v. Johnson, 10 Mees. & W. 331.

T. H. Russell, for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. It does not appear to me that the unfortunate delay in discharging this schooner arose from any fault on either side. I cannot agree that the defendant is responsible for the position which the master took up for his vessel while waiting his turn to unload. There was no hidden danger at that place of which warning should be given to strangers; and no notice was given by the master of his purpose to put the vessel there; no questions were asked or answered about depth of water, draft, or any thing else. The schooner lay in a place to which a tug master, well acquainted with the navigation, had taken her, and where she might well enough have awaited her turn at the dock if the accidental change of tides, caused by a change of wind, had not come on the next day, and if extreme cold weather had not set in at the same time.

It seems to be thought that a person who has a wharf with only enough water at ordinary times, and liable to be deficient on extraordinary occasions, or a wharf to which navigation is somewhat difficult or intricate, ought to be held to warrant the safe approach of all vessels that are navigated with ordinary care and skill; but I know of no such law. There was, as I have already observed, nothing said about the draft of the schooner, no deception, nothing to raise an inference that either party had any thought on this subject. The contract was to carry the cargo to Cambridgeport; and both parties treated this as meaning the defendant's wharf in that port, as no doubt it did; but there was no absolute engagement on either part that the schooner should be able to reach the wharf in any particular time. The defendant did not engage, either expressly or by implication, that a berth should be always open for the libellant, whenever he should arrive. Any such implication would be most unreasonable, considering the uncertainties and delays that attend the navigation of sailing-vessels. And the bill of lading, in giving three days to clear the vessel, when the actual delivery of the cargo would take about half that time, appears intended to make allowance for some possible detention of this kind. Nor is there any ground for saying that the defendant could have taken out any more coal than the deck load in the mode in which that was taken, or that the master asked him to do so.

Neither party being in fault, the loss must fall on the plaintiff if his voyage was not ended and the lay days begun; otherwise, on the defendant. A voyage of this kind is usually considered to be ended, as between the ship-owner and the freighter, when the ship has arrived at the place of discharge, such as the public dock, although not able to get a berth immediately: Brown v. Johnson, 10 Mees. & W. 331. It is upon this rule that the plaintiff relies. He says that he arrived at the wharf on the 20th of December, reported to the defendant, and ended his voyage. This argument is specious; but it assumes that the vessel had arrived at the dock or wharf, when, in truth, she had only very nearly arrived. It has been held in two English cases, concerning cargoes of coals shipped under contracts almost identical with this, that delays within the port for a considerable time, owing to a want of sufficient water at the place of delivery would not require the freighter to receive the coals at another place, or cause the lay days to begin, though the contract had the clause that the ship was to go only so near to the place as she could safely get. It was held that, although she could not safely go up while the tides were neap, yet that was one of the accidents of navigation which a vessel contracting to go to a tidal harbor ran the risk of: Parker v. Winlow, 7 El. & Bl. 942; Bastifell v. Lloyd, 1 Hurl. & C. 388. The distance at which the ship is kept from her berth by the low water is immaterial, if it be so far that the delivery of the cargo is prevented. Upon this point, which is chiefly one of fact, I hold that the vessel had not arrived.

Then, if the vessel is to earn demurrage, she must not only arrive, but be ready to deliver her cargo; and that readiness must continue at least during the three days which the contract gives to the consignee. If the acts of the master on the first day are looked upon as a sort of tender of his cargo, it is one of the essential qualities of a tender that it should be continuing. Thus, where freight was to be paid in three days after arrival, "and before delivering of any part of the cargo," and the vessel arrived, and on the next day the cargo was destroyed by fire and water, it was held that the freight was not earned, because it was implied in the contract that the vessel should be able to deliver the cargo at any time during the three days: Duthie v. Hilton, 38 Law J. C. P. 93, L. R. 4 C. P. 138. I have seen no American case so nearly analogous to this as those which I have cited from the English reports, though I have no doubt the law is the same in both countries. Upon the whole, I find that the libellant has not made out that his lay days had begun when this delay occurred, nor that it was caused by any default of the respondent. The result is, that the libel must be dismissed, with costs. Libel dismissed.

AYRES v. WESTERN R. CORP.

[14 Blatchf. 9.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 19, 1876.

CARRIERS—LIABILITY AS WAREHOUSEMEN—NOTICE TO CONSIGNEE OF ARRIVAL OF GOODS.

Goods, in the course of transportation from West Springfield, Massachusetts, to Cleveland, Ohio, were destroyed by fire in the depot of the Western Railroad Corporation, at East Albany, New York. That corporation, when it received the goods at West Springfield, gave a receipt, setting forth that it had received 4 cases, marked J. B. C., Cleveland, Ohio. The receipt, on its face, said: "This contract, and the responsibility of the parties hereto, being limited and controlled by the rules and regulations printed upon the back of this receipt;" "it being also understood, that this corporation assumes no liability beyond the end of its own line, and that, so far as it acts as agent for other parties participating in the joint transit aforesaid, said parties are separately liable." The back of the receipt said: "The following rules and regulations have been adopted by the several railroad corporations in regard to freight." "The company will not hold itself liable as common carriers, for articles of freight, after their arrival at their place of destination and unloading at the company's warehouse or depots." "All articles of freight must be taken away within 24 hours after being unladen from the cars." The cases were marked as described in the receipt, and also marked, "care of Western Transportation Co.," a corporation engaged in carrying freight on the Erie canal. The terminus of the road of the Western Railroad Corporation was at East Albany. The goods arrived there and were unladen at its warehouse. Three days afterwards the warehouse took fire, and the goods were consumed, without fault on the part of the corporation. It did not appear that notice of the arrival of the goods was given by the corporation to the Western Transportation Company: Held, that the Western Railroad Corporation was liable for the value of the goods.

[At law. Action by John B. Ayres against the Western Railroad Corporation for the value of goods destroyed by fire while stored in defendant's warehouse. Judgment for plaintiff.]

George Bliss, for plaintiff.

George W. Miller, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. The plaintiff seeks to recover the value of certain paper destroyed by fire in the freight depot of the defendant, while in course of transportation from West Springfield, Massachusetts, to Cleveland, Ohio, and other points beyond the terminus of the defendant's road. Upon the shipment of the goods, the defendant gave the shipper a receipt in the following terms: "Western Railroad Corporation, West Springfield, June 26th, 1861. Received of Southworth Mf'g Co., 10 cases paper, marked and numbered—4, J. B. Cobb & Co., Cleveland, Ohio—5, J. R. Dayton, Quincy, Ill.—1, Ogden, Brownell & Co., Keokuk, Iowa; contents and value unknown; to be transported to ....., and delivered at the ..... depot there, to ....., on the payment of freight therefor, together with such expenses as shall be shown by vouchers to have been advanced on the same; this contract and the responsibility of the parties hereto being limited and controlled by the rules and regulations printed upon the back of this receipt, as also by the terms of their printed tariffs of freight; and it being, also, understood, that this corporation assumes no liability beyond the end of its own line, and that, so far as it acts as agent for other parties, participating in the joint transit aforesaid, said parties are separately liable." Upon the back of the receipt there was an endorsement: "The following rules and regulations have been adopted by the several railroad corporations in regard to freight." Then follow a number of rules, among which are these: "The company will not hold itself liable, as common carriers, for articles of freight, after their arrival at their place of destination and unloading at the company's warehouse or depots." "All articles of freight must be taken away within twenty-four hours after being unladen from the cars, the company reserving the right of charging storage on the same, or placing the same in store at the risk and expense of the owner, if they see fit, after a lapse of time." The several parcels of goods were marked as described in the receipt, and also marked "care of Western Transportation Co.," a corporation engaged in carrying freight upon the Erie canal. The terminus of the defendant's road was at East Albany, where the goods arrived and were unladen at the defendant's warehouse on the 2d of July; and, on the 5th of July, the warehouse took fire and the goods were consumed, without fault on the part of the defendant. It is not shown that notice of the arrival of the goods was given by the defendant to the Western Transportation Company, but it does appear, that, according to the usual course of business, an agent of the latter visited the warehouse of the defendant, to look for goods, prior to the 5th of July.

Giving effect to the receipt delivered by the defendant to the shipper, as a special contract, which restricts the common-law liability of the defendant as a carrier, and renders it liable only according to the conditions mentioned upon the face and back of the receipt, the defendant was liable as a carrier for the goods destroyed in its warehouse, while in course of transportation. The goods were to be transported by the defendant to its depot, for the purpose of delivery there to a second carrier, in the course of transportation to the ultimate destination of the goods; and, in such case, the carrier is liable as a carrier while the goods are in its warehouse awaiting delivery to the second carrier, unless it is absolved by notice of their arrival to the second carrier, or by the terms of a special contract with the shipper. Condit v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 54 N. Y. 500; Railroad Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 318; Mills v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 45 N. Y. 622; McDonald v. Western R. Co., 34 N. Y. 497; Rawson v. Holland, 59 N. Y. 611. It is not claimed that the defendant had become exonerated from liability by giving notice of the arrival of the goods to the second carrier, but it is insisted that it is exempted because of the condition on the back of the receipt, which reads, that it will not hold itself liable as a common carrier, for such articles, "after their arrival at their place of destination and unloading at the company's warehouse or depots." The argument for the defendant is, that the place of destination, within the language of the condition, is that point on the defendant's road where it is to deliver the goods to some other carrier or to the consignee. If this position is sound, doubtless, the defendant was liable only as a warehouseman, and, as the goods were destroyed without fault on its part, is not liable for them. To sustain this position it is necessary to maintain, that, when goods are addressed to a point beyond the line of the first carrier, consigned to the care of a connecting carrier, their place of destination is that place where the first carrier is to deliver them to the second carrier. Such a conclusion is opposed to the plain and ordinary meaning of language. The goods were shipped to Cleveland and other points further west, and the packages were marked, "care of Western Transportation Company." So far as the defendant was concerned, its duty would have been discharged by delivering the goods to the Western Transportation Company, but it does not follow from this that the Western Transportation Company was the place of destination. So to hold would require the rest of the address to be disregarded. The place of destination is the place designated for the ultimate unlading of the goods, and is that point on the defendant's road, or on that of any connecting carrier, at which the consignee is to receive the goods according to the usual course of business of the carrier. Looking at the various terms of the receipt, it is apparent, that the receipt is designed to modify the liability not only of the defendant, but of the various connecting carriers who participate with it in the transportation; and, while some of the conditions are adapted to protect the defendant, many of them are inserted for the protection of the connecting carriers. It is framed to cover shipments for places on the defendant's line, and also for shipments to distant places upon or beyond the lines of connecting carriers who are to participate with the defendant in the transportation of the goods, and for whom the defendant is to act as agent in the transaction. Upon its face, the receipt provides that the defendant shall assume no liability beyond the end of its own line, and that "the parties participating in the joint transit" are to be separately liable, while the conditions upon the back of the receipt consist of "rules adopted by the several railroad corporations in regard to freight." It is framed to stand for a contract between the shipper and the defendant, and also for one between the shipper and the connecting roads who participate in the joint transit, so that both the defendant and the connecting carriers may find protection in the several conditions. This being the object in view, the meaning of the term in question seems obvious. It is used in two of the conditions only, one of which provides against liability for articles of freight "after their arrival at their place of destination and unloading at the company's warehouse," and the other that such articles "arriving at their place of destination must be taken away within twenty-four hours after being unladen." The place of destination is the ultimate destination of the goods. When this is on the defendant's road, unless the goods are taken away within twenty-four hours after their arrival and unloading, the defendant is liable only as warehouseman; when the place is upon the road of a connecting carrier, such carrier, after the twenty-four hours, ceases to be liable as carrier, and assumes only the liability of a warehouseman. This construction is consistent with the instrument as a whole, with the relations of the various parties to it, and with the nature of the transaction the receipt is intended to provide for. If the meaning of the conditions were doubtful, the construction to be given them should be one most strongly against the carrier. The conditions are designed to relax the common-law liability of the carrier—a liability which the shipper has a right to insist upon, and of which he is not to be deprived without clear evidence of his assent. If the meaning of such conditions is involved in any doubt, the doubt is to be resolved in his favor. The conditions in question are satisfied by the construction which has thus been placed upon them. These conclusions lead to a decision against the defendant.

But, if it should be conceded that the conditions upon the back of the receipt are so expressed as to refer to the warehouse of the defendant, and relieve the defendant from the obligations of a carrier after the arrival of the goods there, the same result must follow, because of the controlling authority here of the case of Railroad Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 318. It is there held, that the delivery by the carrier to the shipper, of a shipping receipt, which, upon its face, refers to conditions on the back, defining the terms of the carrier's responsibility, and its acceptance by the shipper, does not constitute a special contract between the shipper and the carrier, by which the liability of the latter is limited by the conditions on the back of the receipt. It is unnecessary to refer to or discuss the principles or the authorities which bear upon the doctrine thus held. The case, in effect, decides, that no act on the part of the shipper, short of an explicit agreement, will imply an assent on his part to a contract proposed by a carrier, modifying the liability of the latter. That this conclusion conflicts with many decisions of high authority in this country and England, must be conceded; but the case furnishes a rule of plain and certain application, and sweeps away many fine and artificial distinctions which have involved in confusion the whole doctrine of notices and special contracts, as affecting the rights and liabilities of common carriers. Some of these cases have turned upon the point, whether the conditions in a printed receipt were in small type or in large, and whether the receipt was taken deliberately or hurriedly, while one case in the court of last resort in this state places controlling emphasis upon the fact that the receipt was taken by the shipper in a dimly-lighted car, and holds that it was, therefore, not a contract. Blossom v. Dodd, 43 N. Y. 264. Another case of the supreme court of the same state holds the receipt a contract, although taken by a foreigner ignorant of the language in which it was printed, and to whom no explanation of its terms was vouchsafed. Fibel v. Livingston, 64 Barb. 179. See, also, Warhus v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 21 N. Y. 543. Thus, while one man is absolved from obligation because it may be inconvenient for him to inform himself of the terms of the proposed contract, another is held. The theory, of course, is, that assent to the proposed contract is or is not implied from the circumstances of the transaction, but the cases illustrate the utter uncertainty of the test of assent, when one man who is ignorant of the language of the proposed contract is presumed to assent, while another is absolved because, from the type in which it is printed, or the light by which he is to read it, he cannot acquaint himself with its terms without more or less inconvenience. The rule held by the supreme court of the United States is capable of certain and easy application, and, if adhered to, will go far to abrogate a class of contracts to which practically the carrier is the only party.

Judgment is ordered for the plaintiff.

Case No. 690.

AZCARATI v. FITZSIMMONS.

[3 Wash. C. C. 134.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1811.

COURTS — CONFLICTING STATE AND FEDERAL JURISDICTION — TAKING MONEY OUT OF COURT — EXECUTION AFTER A YEAR AND A DAY.

1. Motion to take out of court money levied by the marshal, to satisfy a judgment obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant, on the ground of priority, under a judgment obtained in the court of the state of Pennsylvania, in favour of William Lewis Esqr. who made the motion.

2. Although the remedy by motion, to take money out of court, in a case of this kind, is not the only one the party has, yet, as it decides the rights of the parties in a summary way, it is convenient to all; but the court will take care, that the party who shall be authorized to take the money, is entitled to it, under a regular execution, and under which the proceedings have been regular. If irregularities appear, sufficient to set aside the execution, the party must resort to his suit at law against the officer.

[Cited in Rockhill v. Hanna, Case No. 11,980; The Sabine, 50 Fed. 219.]

3. It is a fatal objection to an execution, that it issued more than a year and a day after the judgment, without a scire facias having been issued to revive the judgment.

[Cited in Rockhill v. Hanna, Case No. 11,980.]

[As to the origin of the prescription of a year and a day, see The Avery, Id. 672.]

4. It seems, that the court would not be disposed to aid the plaintiff, in an execution which had been dormant for a considerable time, to the disadvantage of a party having equal equity, although he had been equally negligent.

[1] [Published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

William Lewis, executor of Fuller, on the 20th of March 1800, revived a judgment by scire facias, which had been obtained by Fuller. A fieri facias issued, returnable to December 1800; an alias fieri facias, returnable to December 1801, on which proceedings were stayed by order of Lewis. A plur. fieri facias returnable to March 1802, on which proceedings were likewise stayed. A second plur. fieri facias was then issued to December 1804, on which a return of nulla bona was made, and on the 9th of September 1811, a third plur. fieri facias was issued, to December, which was levied on the 12th of September 1811, on property in the hands of the marshal of this court, which he had seized prior to the date of this execution, under an execution from this court, obtained by Azcarati. The entry made in respect to the fieri facias, returnable to December 1801, is vice comes, non misit breve. The marshal having sold the property seized, in order to satisfy the plaintiff's execution, and brought the money into court; this motion was made on the part of Mr. Lewis, to take it out to satisfy his execution from the state court, on the ground of preference. As to the plaintiff's right, it appeared shortly as follows:— Under the fieri facias issued on his judgment in 1803, the marshal returned it, levied on real property, and an inquisition. A venditioni exponas issued in 1804. By the marshal's docket, it appears, that he levied this writ on the household furniture of the defendant, as per inventory taken, and that proceedings were stayed by order of plaintiff's attorney. The marshal was examined, and he stated, that having seized the furniture and made an inventory of it, on a former execution of one Verdere, which was partly settled, he levied the plaintiff's fieri facias on the same furniture, and an additional quantity; that he left the property with the defendant, taking an indemnity against subsequent executions; but that soon after the death of Fitzsimmons, in August last, he seized the property again, and retained possession till the sale, which seizure or repossession was gained, prior to the 9th of September, when Lewis's execution issued.

It was contended, by Tilghman and Rawle, for Lewis, that the furniture under Azcarati's fieri facias, was not seized, as appears by the only legal evidence, the return of the writ, and the marshal's docket, and that it could not be seized under the venditioni exponas. But at all events, the leaving the property with the defendant, did away the force of the seizure, as decided often in this court. That the proceedings of Lewis are regular, as an execution was taken out within a year after the judgment; and that the continuances, though not actually entered on the roll, may be considered as if done. Strange, 100; 2 Burns, 172.

Levy, for the plaintiff, contended, that Lewis's execution was irregular, as the continuances of his first execution cannot be entered, unless the first execution was returned and filed. 2 Wils. 82; 2 Tidd, Pr. 1004; 2 Saund. 72f, 68e.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. The first question is, whether Mr. Lewis, in whose behalf this motion is made, is entitled to the money returned by the marshal, as levied, in satisfaction of the plaintiff's execution? If he would have been entitled, in case his right had accrued upon a judgment of this court, his case will not be different because his judgment was obtained in a state court. This is not the only remedy which a party has, to redress himself against an officer who applies to the satisfaction of some other judgment, the proceeds of property which is bound by the execution of such party. But the practice of deciding upon motion, the priorities and rights of contending parties, for money raised by the officer upon execution, and brought into court, contributes to the convenience of those parties, and to the safety of the officer. It saves expense, and prevents multiplicity of suits. Nevertheless, the court will take care, that the person who is authorized to take out the money, is entitled to the same, under a regular execution, and that the proceedings under it have been regular. If such irregularity appears, as in the opinion of the court is sufficient to set aside the execution; the court will not interfere in a summary way, in favour of the party, but will leave him to his other remedies, and will leave the officer to act in such manner as he may think most safe. For, it would be not less absurd than mischievous, to permit a person to take money out of court, under the authority of an execution, which, the court from which it issued may, and ought, to set aside for irregularity.

The question then is, whether the execution, under which Mr. Lewis claims, has been regularly issued? The objection that it issued more than a year and a day after the judgment, without a scire facias to warrant it, seems to the court fatal. It is true, that if the first execution, which was taken out within the year and day, returnable to December 1800, had been regularly continued down to the period when this execution issued; or if that execution had been returned and filed, so that the continuances could be considered as entered; this objection might be removed. And yet, even in that case, there might be considerations sufficiently weighty with the court, to forbid them from supplying the want of regular continuances in favour of an ancient, dormant, execution, to the disadvantage of other creditors having equal equity, although they may have been equally faulty. But it is unnecessary, in this case, to consider the comparative merits of the contending parties for this money, since the court is of opinion, that the irregularity of the proceedings of the present applicant, is fatal to his pretensions.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE — EVIDENCE FROM RECORD OF FOREIGN COURT TO CONTRADICT WITNESS.

The invoice, stated, in the record of the condemnation of the vessel insured, to have been found on board, at the time of capture, and the answers of the mate, to the standing interrogatories, were admitted in evidence, on the part of the defendants.

Action on a policy on goods on board the Mercer, at and from Philadelphia to Teneriffe. The vessel and cargo were captured, carried into Halifax, and condemned as enemies' property. The record of the sentence of condemnation, was read by the plaintiffs' counsel. The defendants' counsel moved to read—1. The order of the court directing further proof. 2. The invoice stated in the record, as one of the papers found on board at the time of the capture, and particularly referred to by the captain and part owner, in his answers to the standing interrogatories; a copy of which interrogatories, with the answers, was proved by the depositions of witnesses taken in this cause, and by the answers of the mate to the standing interrogatories, in order to contradict his deposition referred to. This was objected to by the plaintiffs' counsel; but the court thought the evidence offered came within the rule laid down in the case of Marshal v. Union Ins. Co., [Case No. 9,135,] and admitted it to be read. The invoice, offered to be read, being the one referred to in the depositions of two of the witnesses, taken in this cause, is made part of them; and there can be no doubt of the propriety of reading the answers of the mate, to the standing interrogatories, for the purpose of discrediting him.

*NOTE. [from original report.] It was stated by Mr. Dallas, on the part of the plaintiffs, that no objection was made to the reading of the interlocutory order, directing further proof.

BABBELL et al. v. GARDNER.

The CATHARINE.

[Bee, 87.][1]

District Court, D. South Carolina, 1796.

SEAMEN—WAGES—FORFEITURE—GOING ON SHORE—DISCHARGE.

1. A British seaman does not forfeit his wages, under Act 2 Geo. II., merely by coming on shore to demand legally payment of his wages; but this must be done within forty eight hours after he leaves his ship.

2. Words which might imply a discharge of the chief mate do not amount to a discharge when spoken by the captain in anger and when the captain on the following day orders the mate to go on board to his duty.

[In admiralty. Libel by George Babbell against Job Gardner and the brig Catharine for wages. Dismissed.]

BEE, District Judge. This is a suit for wages as chief mate of the brig Catharine. The vessel is British property, the articles were signed in London, and, therefore, the contract must be considered altogether according to the lex loci of the country where it was made. The argument has been full, and the evidence long, and, in some points, contradictory; but upon mature consideration, the two following points seem alone to call for my decision.

1st. Whether there has been such a breach of his contract on the part of the actor as amounts to a forfeiture of his wages.

2d. Whether he is entitled at this time to demand them.

It appears that the actor did his duty on board this vessel for upwards of eleven months; and no complaint is produced, prior to the dispute which occasioned this suit. The words made use of by the captain, in the heat of passion, might, if there had been no subsequent explanation, have implied a discharge; but the conduct of the captain next morning was fully sufficient to do away with that impression: for he desired the mate, coolly, to go on board and do his duty; and upon hearing something about being discharged, asked who had discharged him. But was this retraction on the captain's part so far binding on the mate as to make the latter guilty of desertion? That he considered himself as discharged is certain. That upon his own statement of the circumstances, counsel concurred with him, is also clear.

Let us then look into the act of 2 Geo. II., to which the articles expressly refer. The 3d clause says that desertion, or obstinate refusal to proceed on the voyage shall incur the forfeiture of wages. No such obstinacy has been pretended here. The act further declares that entering on board a ship of war shall not amount to desertion; and that no mariner shall, by signing articles, be deprived of the means of recovering wages due before that act passed.

In their construction of this clause, the courts of admiralty in this country, prior to the revolution, considered no seaman as a deserter because he entered on board of a ship of war, or because he applied to a court of justice for his wages, within forty eight hours after leaving his ship. Numberless instances of this sort may be found among the records of this court; and I remember the remarkable Case of Pitkin and Cardon, [unreported,] where this point was fully discussed. Indeed, if the letter of the articles be alone referred to, "that no man, under any pretence whatever should go ashore without leave of his captain," redress must, in most cases, be withheld from the injured seaman; for, having once had recourse to the law, he would hardly venture back to his ship, till his suit should be determined.

I am of opinion that the actor having applied for legal satisfaction within forty-eight hours after he left the vessel, cannot be considered a deserter, nor chargeable with a breach of articles. But I am also satisfied that the hasty language of the captain does not amount to a discharge, if coupled with subsequent circumstances. The articles must be complied with, and the voyage therein described must be performed. Till then the mate cannot demand his wages. Let the summons be dismissed.

BANKRUPT ACT — RIGHT OF ASSIGNEE TO SUE — PAYMENT TO DEBTOR AFTER BANKRUPTCY — TECHNICAL OBJECTIONS UNAVAILING IN APPELLATE COURT — PROCEDURE WHERE SEVERAL DEFENDANTS RESIDE IN DIFFERENT DISTRICTS OF THE SAME STATE.

1. An assignee in bankruptcy may sue on a written contract entered into between the bankrupt and the defendant, to recover a debt alleged to be due the bankrupt thereunder.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Such a cause of action is not local.

3. Payments made mala fide to a debtor after a petition in bankruptcy is filed against him, are void.

4. Whether payments under all circumstances made to such a debtor are void, quaere?

5. Mere technical objections taken for the first time in the appellate court are unavailing. Judiciary Act, § 32. [1 Stat. 91,] applied.

6. The act of May 4, 1858, (11 Stat. 272,) prescribing the mode of procedure where there are several defendants residing in different districts of the same state, construed and applied.

At law. This is a writ of error to United States district court for the western district of Missouri.

It appears from the record in this case that the plaintiff is assignee of Bowman, also of Miller, and of Miller & Co.; the copartnership being composed of Bowman and Miller. On the 9th of March, 1868, Bowman was adjudged bankrupt, and thereafter Vose was duly appointed assignee of said Bowman. In June following, said Vose, as said assignee, filed a bill in equity praying for an injunction to restrain this defendant and the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company from paying to Miller any money due to said Miller on account of work done for said railroad, and to restrain said Miller from receiving the same. An injunction was granted and served June 17, 1868, on the defendant and the company. In July following, proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against Miller, and Miller & Co., and on the 31st of August, 1868, said Burgess, the defendant, paid to Miller a certain sum of money due to said Miller from the defendant—the amount paid being seventy-five per cent. of the amount due. In December, 1868, Miller, and Miller & Co., were adjudged bankrupts in the course of the proceedings commenced against them in July preceding.

Subsequently, Vose resigned his assigneeship; Babbitt was duly appointed his successor, and Vose executed in due form the assignment to Babbitt. The latter, on motion to the court, was substituted for Vose, assignee of Miller, as plaintiff in this cause—this cause having been originally commenced by Vose, when he was assignee, to recover of defendant what was alleged to be due from him to Miller, the bankrupt. After that substitution was made, Babbitt, by leave, filed an amended declaration.

The subsequent proceedings appear in the opinion of the court. [Judgment for plaintiff.] The defendant sued out the writ of error that brings the cause to this court. [Affirmed.]

A. H. Bereman, for plaintiff in error.

N. Meyers, for defendant in error.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

TREAT, District Judge. After the amended declaration was filed, the defendant moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that "the assignee of Miller & Co. cannot maintain a suit as assignee of Miller," which motion was overruled and an exception thereto saved.

That motion was properly overruled, as is manifest, not only from the record, but from the course of proceedings in those bankrupt cases which involve both private and copartnership estates. In these proceedings, then, Bowman was adjudged a bankrupt on his own petition in March, and therefore his interest in the copartnership assets passed to Vose, his assignee. In July a petition was filed against Miller, and also against the copartnership of Miller & Co., and both Miller, and the copartnership of Miller & Co. were adjudged bankrupt, and Vose became the assignee of Miller, and also of Miller & Co. Thus, Vose was originally, and the present plaintiff, as his successor, is now assignee, not of Bowman alone, but also of Miller & Co. and of Miller. As assignee of Miller, therefore, he could maintain the suit against defendant on the written contract between Miller and defendant. The motion to dismiss was founded on an error of fact as well as a misapprehension of the relative position of the parties.

The next step by defendant was the filing of a plea to the jurisdiction, which plea was heard and overruled. No exception to the action of the court in that matter was taken; and the plea was evidently bad on its face. It set out that the cause of action occurred out of the district, and that the defendant resided out of the district; but the cause of the action was not local, nor was it averred that the defendant was not found and served within the district.

Thereupon defendant filed his plea to the merits, setting up payment to Miller of all that was due him, on the 12th of May, 1868, and prior to any proceedings in bankruptcy against either Miller or Miller & Co., or rather the delivery of the following order to Miller and the receipt of the same by Miller in satisfaction of all due the latter:—

"Contractor's Office, S. W. P. R. R., Rolla, Mo., May 12, 1868. To the commissioners appointed under the law passed by the general assembly, March, 1868, for settlement of claims for work done and materials furnished: Please pay E. Miller $3,607 7-100, being the amount due him on a full and final settlement of his accounts as sub-contractor on sections 7 and 8 west of the Gasconade river, on the line of the Southwest Pacific Railroad. [Signed] E. Burgess & Co., Contractors.

"I acknowledge the above to be a just and final settlement of my account with E. Burgess & Co., contractors. [Signed] E. Miller."

To the pleas of the defendant, plaintiff filed a replication, to which there was a rejoinder.

When Vose was assignee, he and defendant's counsel entered into a written agreement of the facts, in order to avoid taking unnecessary depositions. That agreement was an express admission that on the 17th of June, 1868, Burgess owed to Miller, for work under his sub-contract, the sum of $3,607 7-100, that sum being the true balance due at that time. During the trial, a copy of a notice addressed to plaintiff's attorneys and signed by the attorneys for the defendant, was offered, it being to the effect that the defendant withdrew said written admission, and would object to the reading of the same in evidence at the trial. The transcript does not show that the notice was previously served on plaintiff's attorneys, nor what action, if any, was taken by the court with reference to it. So far as can be inferred, the court did not hold the defendant to his written admission, for the order on the commissioners and the receipt of defendant therefor, above recited, were received in evidence: and also the oral testimony of the defendant and of his bookkeeper, the latter of whom says he personally made the settlement of May 12, 1868, with Miller. It is thus evident that the defendant had the full benefit of all he claimed. His own testimony is, that he delivered the order of May 12 to Miller in payment of the demand due, and then on August 31, 1868, bought it of Miller at seventy-five cents on the dollar. As to the weight of testimony, and the general finding for plaintiff (this case having been tried without a jury, and no question of law having been saved with respect thereto), the case of Norris v. Jackson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 125, is decisive. This court cannot on a writ of error go behind that general finding to inquire into the weight or sufficiency of the evidence. It is apparent, however, from the transcript, that the order and receipt (so called) of May 12th, 1868, did not amount to an accord and satisfaction. It was an accord, but not satisfaction. It is also evident that neither party regarded it as full satisfaction or payment, for the order remained dishonored as late as August 31, 1868, when defendant says he bought it at seventy-five cents on the dollar. It is probable, therefore, that the district court rightly concluded that the defendant, after he had full knowledge of the pending proceedings in bankruptcy against Miller, and while the injunction was in full force, did make payment to the latter, in fraud of the bankrupt act; and consequently the payment was void. It is not necessary for this court to take the extreme position held by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, [Mays v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, 64 Pa. St. (14 P. F. Smith,) 74,] [2] and rule that all payments made to a debtor, after a petition filed against him in bankruptcy, are to be adjudged void, if the debtor is subsequently declared bankrupt. This court, however, holds that payments thus made mala fide, or with a view of defeating the bankrupt act in any of its essential requirements, are void, and the person by whom such payment was made can be held to answer for the original demand to the assignee, whose title relates to the day of commencing proceedings in bankruptcy. It may have been, therefore, that the district court reached the conclusion, from the evidence, that the payment by the defendant in August was mala fide and in fraud of the law. And it may be that it was with reference to the mala fides that it permitted the injunction record to be received in evidence, which fact forms the principal ground insisted upon for a reversal. The injunction order, and its service on defendant, tended to show that he had notice, not only of the demand of Bowman's assignee, but of the nature of that demand upon the money due, and also of the then contemplated proceedings in bankruptcy against Miller. If that was the view of the court, the admission of that record was competent, and this court has no means, from the transcript here, to discover anything to the contrary.

As to the objections taken here for the first time, on mere technical grounds, to the pleadings, it must suffice, even if they constituted good causes for a special demurrer (which this court does not admit), that inasmuch as no special demurrer was filed in the district court, the thirty-second section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 91] forbids us to notice them. That section is very broad and very liberal, and has been held to authorize such amendments to be made, even in the appellate court. Its design is to promote the early, just, and legal determination of matters in controversy. Parties litigant should, if they so desire, interpose their technical objections in the court below, and if they do not, they ought not to be heard for the first time in the appellate court upon such points, especially where it is obvious that the judgment was such as the law and facts demanded. It subserves no good or lawful end to have a right judgment reversed and litigation prolonged, when the appellant has no substantial or meritorious objection to urge—when the technical points presented, it is clearly evident, could not, however decided in the court below, have prejudiced his rights in any way. Loose pleading and practice are to be discouraged; but where the right to amend is liberal, technical and formal defects should be urged, in order that they may be corrected in the court of original jurisdiction. Such defects are no ground for reversal of a judgment here.

The objections interposed to the admission of the injunction record, and the argument of appellant's counsel, overlooked entirely the enactment of congress, of May 4, 1858, (11 Stat. 272.) This act prescribes, inter alia, the mode of procedure where several defendants reside in different districts in the same state.

The service of the injunction order on defendant in the eastern district was correct.

and in strict conformity with this act of congress. All, therefore, which is in the transcript by way of objection to jurisdiction in the injunction suit, on account of the residence of the defendant and of the place of service, were not well taken. There were three defendants to the injunction suit, and it was stated in the bill that Miller resided in the western district and defendant in the eastern district, and the return to the order shows that they were served in their respective districts, as the act of congress required.

When this case was here before, the record did not disclose the condition of the injunction suit, and we held the proceedings in that suit to be inter alios acta. The present transcript shows that suit to have been substantially between the same parties, and to have been conducted as the act of congress required; therefore there was no error in admitting that record in evidence.

Affirmed.

[NOTE. The ground of the ruling in Mays v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, 64 Pa. St. (14 P. F. Smith,) 74, was that the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517,) contained no express provision that payments made in good faith to a bankrupt after his assignment should be valid, and therefore all such payments must be invalid, for the assignment is constructive notice to all the world. But the act provides that the assignment shall relate back to the beginning of the proceedings, and consequently payments made after that time are void. This question was not involved in the decision, which was as follows: Property acquired by a bankrupt after his assignment is not subject to the proceedings in bankruptcy, and when it is deposited by the bankrupt in a bank, and paid out again on the bankrupt's checks before a discharge is granted him, the bank is not liable to the assignee for the amount so paid.]

BANKRUPTCY—SALES OUT OF ORDINARY COURSE—PROOF OF FRAUD, &C.

1. Under the 35th section of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517] it was held erroneous to instruct the jury "that if a sale of property by the bankrupt was not in the ordinary and usual course of business, it was fraudulent." The instruction should have been, not that such a sale was absolutely fraudulent, but that the fact referred to was prima facie evidence that it was fraudulent.

2. A sale of property by the bankrupt out of the usual and ordinary course of business is presumptively fraudulent, but this presumption may be rebutted by evidence aliunde, to be produced by the vendee.

[In error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Missouri.]

[At law. Action in trover by Babbitt, assignee in bankruptcy of Mendelson, against Walbrun & Co., to recover the value of property alleged to have been fraudulently sold by the bankrupt. The district court gave judgment for plaintiff. (Opinion nowhere reported, and not now accessible.) Defendant brings error. Reversed. A new trial was subsequently had, and judgment again given for plaintiff. (Opinion nowhere reported, and not accessible.) On writ of error, this was affirmed by the circuit court in Case No. 695, and by the supreme court in Walbrun v. Babbitt, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 577.]

This case is brought here by writ of error from the district court of the western district of Missouri. The plaintiff is the assignee in bankruptcy of one Mendelson, and brought this action in trover against the defendants, Walbrun & Co., to recover the value of a stock of goods which the bankrupt sold to one Summerfield, and the latter to the defendants.

Mendelson is shown by uncontradicted evidence to have been insolvent, and he sold the whole stock of goods to Summerfield (his brother-in-law) at one time, he having written to the latter to come to the place where the former was living, with a view to disposing of his goods to him. Mendelson had but little if any other property. Summerfield remained there a few days, and leaving the goods in possession of Mendelson, went to the defendants, living in another place, and with whom he was acquainted, informed them of his purchase of Mendelson, the price he gave, and offered to sell the goods to the defendants at five per cent. profit. One of the defendants went with Summerfield to the place where the goods were, stopped at Mendelson's house, examined the goods, accepted Summerfield's offer, and paid him in cash (as defendants and Summerfield both testify), the purchase money for the goods, and removed them to the defendants' place of business.

There was evidence tending to show that the defendants, or one of the firm, knew that Summerfield had purchased the entire stock of Mendelson; but there was no direct evidence that the defendants or either of them, knew that Mendelson was in debt, or that he had any fraudulent purpose in disposing of the goods to Summerfield.

There was no evidence that either of the defendants made any inquiry on these subjects.

Both Mendelson and Summerfield testify that the latter paid the former in cash for the goods, but Mendelson never paid any of the money to his creditors, giving, as a reason, that he had lost it.

This is a mere outline of the case, but sufficient to enable the instructions, which were given to the jury, and which are assigned as error, to be understood.

Among other instructions to the jury, the court gave the following:

1. "If, upon considering the facts and circumstances of the case, you come to the conclusion that the sale was not in Mendelson's ordinary and usual course of business, then the sale was fraudulent. If the sale is found by you to have been fraudulent, the next inquiry will be, were the defendants, Walbrun & Co., so connected with the sale throughout, as to make them parties in it, or affect them with notice; that is, such knowledge or relation to it as to make them liable.

"The firm of Walbrun & Co. consists of three partners; what any one or more of the partners did, or knew, is the knowledge of the whole of the partners, and they are, so far as this case is concerned, alike responsible.

2. "Returning to the first view presented in regard to Mendelson's insolvency, and the reasonable cause to believe it which Summerfield must have had, in order to make the sale void, you are instructed that if either of the partners of Walbrun & Co. had reasonable cause to believe that, at the time of the sale to Summerfield, Mendelson was insolvent, or acting in contemplation of insolvency, and the sale therefore void, and they or either of them afterwards, with that knowledge, purchased or obtained possession of the stock of goods in controversy, and converted them to their own use, they are responsible for the value of the goods.

3. "Upon the second branch of your inquiry as to the prima facie fraudulent sale, because not made in the usual course of business, you are instructed that if Walbrun & Co., or either of the partners, knew that the sale was not made in the ordinary and usual course of business, by Mendelson to Summerfield, they are all affected with knowledge of the legal fraud, and if they afterwards, in any manner obtained possession of the goods, and converted them to their own use, they are responsible for their value. The fact that the goods passed through the hands of Summerfield makes no difference in the liability of Walbrun & Co., provided they were affected with knowledge or notice of the fraud, under the instructions given."

The plaintiff recovered, and the defendants prosecute a writ of error.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The question is whether the instructions to the jury, referred to in the statement of the case, are correct; and this involves a construction of the 35th section of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517, c. 176.]

The second branch of this section is in these words: "And if any person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, makes any payment, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or disposition of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such payment, sale, assignment, transfer, or other conveyance is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede, or delay, the operation and effect of, or to evade any of the provisions of this act, the sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt. And if such sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, the fact shall be prima facie evidence of fraud."

It is to be read, however, in connection with the first subdivision of the same section, and with section 23 and section 39 (latter part) of the same act, these being in pari materia.

The court instructed that "if the sale was not in Mendelson's ordinary and usual course of business, then it was fraudulent." The court should have said, not that it was fraudulent, but that such a fact was prima facie evidence that it was fraudulent.

The sale by Mendelson to Summerfield would be fraudulent if the following facts concurred:

1st. If Mendelson was insolvent, or contemplated insolvency or bankruptcy.

2d. If Summerfield, when he bought the goods, had reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, and to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that the sale was made by Mendelson with a view to prevent, etc., or to defeat, etc., or to evade, etc., the provisions of the bankrupt act.

Sales so made are void and in fraud of creditors and their rights under the bankrupt law.

And as against the immediate vendee and all actual participators, such a sale, if made out of the usual and ordinary course of business (as where an insolvent merchant, as in the case at bar, sells out all his stock and property), is prima facie evidence of fraud; that is, of the foregoing elements constituting a fraudulent sale. But it is only prima facie, and the presumption may be rebutted by evidence aliunde to be produced by the vendee.

Now the second instruction, viewed in the light of the above exposition of the meaning of the statute, is erroneous, in that it omits, in speaking of the facts which make Walbrun & Co.'s purchase fraudulent, some of the essential elements of fraud.

This court cannot agree with the learned judge of the district court in the views of the law expressed in the third instruction.

It directs the jury that if the defendants knew that the sale by Mendelson to Summerfield was not made in the ordinary and usual course of business, they (the defendants) are affected with the legal fraud, and that if they afterwards obtained the goods in any way, and converted them, they are responsible. The error is in holding that such a sale is necessarily fraudulent, instead of presumptively fraudulent.

Besides, when it is proposed to affect a second vendee, such vendee must be shown to have participated in the original fraudulent sale, or it must be shown that he knew, or at least had reasonable cause to know, the facts which made the first sale fraudulent. The mere fact, without more, that the second vendee knew that the first sale embraced all the stock of the seller, is not enough to make his purchase fraudulent in law.

The title of the second vendee can only be impeached when it is shown that he participated in the fraudulent sale, or if this is not shown, then by showing that his purchase was actually mala fide; that is, made with knowledge that the sale to the first vendee was fraudulent; and the mere fact that the second vendee knew that the sale to the first vendee was made out of the ordinary course of business, will not alone defeat the title of the second vendee. It is only a circumstance proper as evidence to go to the jury on the question of the bona fides of the purchase by the second vendee. The distinction is to be observed between fraud and the evidence which goes to establish fraud. It is proper to observe that the term "fraud," as used in the sentence of the 35th section under consideration, relates to both classes of cases mentioned therein. The first class is confined to preferences, and the second to sales, etc., other than by way of preference. See Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,168.]

[2] [Sections 23 and 29 are reconcilable, by confining the latter to actual frauds as contradistinguished from constructive frauds.]

Since the views of his honor below are not fully coincident with those above, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Judge TREAT concurs.

Reversed.

NOTE, [from original report.] At the April term, 1871, this cause came once more before the court, the plaintiff having again recovered: and the rulings in the court below being in accordance with the foregoing opinion, the judgment was affirmed, [Case 695, and the judgment of the circuit court thereafter affirmed by the supreme court in 16 Wall, (83 U. S.) 577.]

Case No. 695.

BABBITT v. WALBRUN et al.

[6 N. B. R. 359.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. April Term, 1871.[1]

INSOLVENCY—FRAUDULENT AND SHAM SALE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

[1. Under the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176,) a sale out of the usual course of business of all one's stock in trade, to a person who knows the seller's insolvency, is prima facie void and fraudulent as to the purchaser, and a sale by such purchaser to persons knowing the first to have been fraudulent or a sham is void.]

[See Babbitt v. Waldron, Case No. 694.]

[See note at end of case.]

[2. A charge that the jury, to give a verdict for the assignee in bankruptcy, must be satisfied that a certain sale by the bankrupts was void or fraudulent, and that the second buyers participated in, or had reasonable cause to know of, the fraud, is sufficient, without a separate charge that participation in the fraud was essential to recover.]

[See note at end of case.]

[3. The admission of an insolvent merchant's statement, whether true or not, that he lost the money received from the sale of his stock, the reality of the sale being doubtful, taken in connection with testimony that the purchaser had no means of paying, is not ground for error, since it was not made the basis of any suggestion or instruction to the jury, and was at most irrelevant matter, which could injure neither party.]

[4. In a suit by an assignee in bankruptcy, the proceedings in bankruptcy are admissible to show the appointment of the assignee; and the introduction of the record of such proceedings up to and including the appointment, no use being made of them, because the insolvency was admitted, is not a ground for error.]

[1] [Affirmed by supreme court in Walbrun v. Babbitt, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 577.]

[At law. Action of trover under the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176,) by Babbitt, assignee in bankruptcy of Mendelson, against Walbrun & Co., to recover property alleged to have been fraudulently sold. Judgment was given for plaintiff, (opinion of district court nowhere reported, and not now accessible,) but on writ of error this was reversed by the circuit court, (Case No. 694.) Upon a new trial, plaintiff again had judgment, (opinion of district court nowhere reported, and not now accessible.) Defendant brings error. Affirmed. This judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court in Walbrun v. Babbitt, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 577. See note at end of case.]

TREAT, District Judge. In order that the views of the court upon the errors assigned, may be stated briefly, and that they may be understood, a succinct statement of the case is necessary. Mendelson, doing business in Kingsville as a merchant, wrote to his brother-in-law in St. Louis to come and buy him out. Mendelson was insolvent at the time. The brother-in-law, Summerfield, went to Kingsville, and learning that Mendelson wished to sell out because the competition was so sharp that he could not make a living, bought out Mendelson at twenty-five per cent. off the cost of the stock. Immediately, Summerfield, leaving the stock in possession of M. during his (Summerfield's) absence, went to Chillicothe, Missouri, and offered to sell the whole stock to defendants at twenty per cent. off, whereby Summerfield would apparently make five per cent. on the trade. Defendants, by one of their partners, went to Kingsville with S., stopped over night at Mendelson's house, in the morning went to the store where the stock of goods was, commenced an examination of them, and upon learning that S. must leave in consequence of the alleged sickness of his wife, and upon the assurance of S. that he would make all right if the inventory was found defective, defendants paid the full inventory price at the rate agreed, and immediately shipped the goods away.

In connection with the alleged sale from Mendelson to Summerfield, and the subsequent sale by Summerfield to defendants, there were many facts and circumstances provoking inquiry, inducing suspicion, and represented differently in the sworn testimony of the respective parties thereto. The case is one where, in an effort to unravel a supposed web of fraud, the parties implicated have to be successively examined under oath; thus seeking to ascertain from unwilling witnesses what they designed to conceal, and what their interest is to keep unrevealed. In this case, as in most others of a supposed scheme of fraud cunningly devised, it was necessary to pursue the inquiry searchingly into all the facts and circumstances surrounding the two-fold transaction, and, consequently, to permit the testimony to take a wider range than in ordinary suits at law. In doing so, many statements, voluntarily or otherwise made by the adverse witnesses who are the alleged parties to the fraud, should be carefully scrutinized, and admitted or rejected in the light of the developments made in the progress of the trial and the attitude of the witnesses. It does not follow that the plaintiff is concluded by every statement made by such a witness when called by him, nor is he precluded from proving directly the reverse to be the truth. Hence it was proper to admit the testimony objected to under this head, and to charge the jury as to the credibility of witnesses in the manner the court did, instead of doing so in the language of the instruction asked, the latter being inapplicable to the course pursued.

Applying the rules of evidence correctly, the only doubtful point is as to the admission of Mendelson's statements concerning his loss of the money alleged to have been paid to him by Summerfield. But that statement by Mendelson had to be taken in connection with the various aspects the case might assume during the trial, and especially with the testimony that Summerfield did not have the means to pay what he and Mendelson say he did pay for the stock of goods; and the fact thus stated by him, whether true or not, was not made the basis of any suggestion or instruction, and at most was treated as an irrelevant and immaterial matter from which none of the parties could be prejudiced, and least of all the defendants. Without analyzing in detail the various facts concerning which evidence was given, and the instructions asked and refused, and the different portions of the charge, the main propositions of law controlling the controversy will give all needed light as to the views entertained by this court.

It is apparent that the case throughout had two aspects, viz.: First. Whether there had been an actual or mere sham sale to Summerfield. Second. Whether the sale to defendants was actually by Summerfield, or through a mere sham contrivance ostensibly by him, but really by Mendelson. Hence each aspect of the case had to be borne in mind, and what would not have been strictly admissible in evidence in one aspect, would be in the other.

It was not for the court arbitrarily to determine which aspect the jury might under the evidence find to be the true one. It appeared that Mendelson, because he could not make a living at the business, (as he and Summerfield both swear,) sends for his married brother-in-law to buy out, for cash, a losing business; and that immediately his brother-in-law, destitute of means, perhaps, appears on the scene, pretends to buy out the concern, leaves it in charge of Mendelson, immediately proceeds to a distant town, negotiates with defendants to sell to them, and one of the defendants accompanies Summerfield, without delay, to Kingsville, closes the bargain and ships the goods away at once. Now the inquiry was a natural one, whether the part Summerfield played was not merely a contrivance between Mendelson and himself to sell the goods to defendants nominally through Summerfield as Mendelson's vendee, but actually from Mendelson direct to defendants. That branch of the subject matter had to be thoroughly investigated. The plaintiff was not bound to accept the pretenses set up as true, but had a right to go behind them in pursuit of the facts. The instructions asked and the charge by the court relate largely to the hypothesis of an actual sale by Mendelson to Summerfield, as the consequent relation of defendants to the case as second vendees; yet the charge looked to each of the two aspects, and did not, as did the instructions which were refused, wholly ignore the other view of the case.

Treating the case in the light of the law governing a second vendee, the main proposition would be: Were defendants innocent and bona fide purchasers for value? To ascertain their status it was necessary to learn whether they paid anything on the purchase, and how much, and whether they had notice of Summerfield's title as it stood affected by his dealings with Mendelson. Necessarily, if the title was good in Summerfield, the controversy was at an end; and hence the first step was as to that title; therefore the inquiry under the bankrupt act into the alleged sale to Summerfield. As it was out of the usual course of business, it was presumptively fraudulent and void as to him, if he knew Mendelson to be insolvent, (and the insolvency was admitted,) because, as held by this court during this term, in the case of Lawrence v. Graves, [Case No. 8,138,] it is impossible to conceive how a person buying from a known insolvent all of his stock of goods (which the law presumes prima facie evidence of fraud) could be in a position other than to be put upon inquiry where reasonable cause existed to believe that the transaction was a meditated fraud. In that view the court gave the instruction most complained of. Now if Summerfield bought the goods under such circumstances the sale to him was fraudulent, unless shown by rebutting evidence to have been bona fide and honest.

If no such rebutting evidence was offered, the next step was to ascertain whether defendants had notice of the previous fraudulent transaction, or participated in it in such a way as was designed to aid the fraudulent purpose intended by Mendelson. In Clements v. Moore, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 312, the legal principles governing such cases are succinctly stated: "A sale may be void for bad faith, though the buyer pays the full value of the property bought. This is the consequence where his purpose is to aid the seller in perpetrating a fraud upon his creditors, and where he buys recklessly with guilty knowledge. When the fact of fraud is established in a suit at law, the buyer loses the property, without reference to the amount or application of what he has paid, and he can have no relief, either at law or in equity. * * * The cardinal principle in all such cases is that the property of the debtor shall not be diverted from the payment of his debts, to the injury of his creditors, by means of the fraud." Applying the doctrine thus laid down to the case at bar, the sale to defendants would be void if defendants had notice that the sale to Summerfield was fraudulent, or, there being no actual sale to Summerfield, if they really took title directly from Mendelson, knowing all the facts charged and the relation of Summerfield to the transaction. It was proper therefore, to admit or exclude testimony, and to instruct the jury with reference to both hypotheses. True, the whole law applicable might have been more distinctly and formally unfolded, if each hypothesis had been separately stated, and the legal rules pertaining thereto arranged under each specific head; yet it often happens that such an elaborate exposition of legal rules serves to confuse rather than aid juries.

The charge put to the jury, the essential inquiries upon which the case was to turn, was first, as to the transactions between Mendelson and Summerfield, and next as to the bona fides of defendants. As to the second inquiry, the language was: "It is not, however, sufficient in this case to find the sale from Mendelson to Summerfield to have been either void or fraudulent. In order to find the issues against the defendants you must be satisfied that they participated in the fraudulent sale, or at least had reasonable cause to know the sale to have been fraudulent." Thus both hypotheses were included, so that notice of the fraud or participation in it was declared essential to a recovery. It was not, therefore, necessary to repeat that proposition, it having been once distinctly announced.

The views expressed by the plaintiff's counsel are not broad enough to cover the case of a second vendee. The first sale being void as between the parties thereto in consequence of fraud, a second vendee being a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration is not affected by the technical rules which obtain as to the original parties alone. Thus a purchaser from Mendelson who knew Mendelson to be insolvent, if the sale was out of the usual course of business, might have reasonable cause to believe the fraud to exist; but a purchaser from the first vendee who knew merely that it included the whole stock of Mendelson was not thereby charged with notice that the first sale was fraudulent, for other elements are essential to make the sale fraudulent and void. A sale by an insolvent person, though known to be insolvent, is not therefore necessarily void, otherwise an insolvent person could not lawfully dispose of any of his property. But it is not necessary to go again over the ground already under this head fully stated during this term in the opinion delivered in the case of Darby v. Boatmen's Sav. Inst., [Case No. 3,571.] As previously decided in the case at bar, the purchasers from a first vendee must, in order to invalidate their title, be affected by notice of or participation in the original fraud. That is, must have been purchasers without valuable consideration or mala fide. An examination of the record shows that the proceedings in bankruptcy were offered in evidence, including the bankrupt's schedules, and certainly that record was admissible to show the fact of adjudication and appointment of the plaintiff as assignee. It appears that so much of the bankruptcy record was introduced as included all proceedings of record up to and including the appointment of assignee; and though the schedules were thus introduced as a part of that record, no use was made of them, inasmuch as the fact of Mendelson's insolvency at the time of the sale was admitted. Thus the question presented by the counsel in that respect does not arise. Juries have twice passed on this case upon the merits; and, therefore, more technical points are to be received with less favor, when the whole testimony is in the record and an examination thereof shows that the verdict was obviously for the right party. Affirmed.

[NOTE. On writ of error this judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. Walbrun v. Babbitt, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 577. Mr. Justice Davis, in delivering the opinion, said that section 35 of the bankrupt act of 1867 prohibited fraudulent sales, as well as fraudulent preferences, and declared that such sales out of the usual course of business should be prima facie evidence of fraud. The usual course of business in this case was to sell at retail. "But it is wholly a different thing when he sells his entire stock to one or more persons. This is an unusual occurrence, out of the ordinary mode of transacting such a business, is prima facie evidence of fraud, and throws the burden of proof on the purchaser to sustain the validity of his purchase. Scammon v. Cole, Case No. 12,432; Graham v. Stark, Id. 5,676; In re Kingsbury, Id. 7,816; Driggs v. Moore, Id. 4,083; Tuttle v. Truax, Id. 14,277. Summerfield seeks to overthrow the legal presumption that Mendelson intended to commit a fraud on his creditors, by showing that he paid full value for the goods, in ignorance of the condition of Mendelson's affairs. But the law will not let him escape in this way. The question raised by the statute is not his actual belief, but what he had reasonable cause to believe. In purchasing in the way and under the circumstances he did, the law told him that a fraud of some kind was intended on the part of the seller, and he was put on inquiry to ascertain the true condition of Mendelson's business. This he did not do, nor did he make any attempt in that direction. Indeed, he contented himself with limiting his inquiries to the object Mendelson had in selling out, and to his future purposes. Something more was required than this information to repel the presumption of fraud which the law raised in the mere fact of a retail merchant selling out his entire stock of goods. If this sort of information could sustain the sale, the provision of the bankrupt law we are considering would be no protection to creditors, for any one in Mendelson's situation, and with the purpose he had in view, would be likely to give the party with whom he was dealing a plausible reason for his conduct. The presumption of fraud arising from the unusual nature of the sale in this case can only be overcome by proof on the part of the buyer that he took the proper steps to find out the pecuniary condition of the seller. All reasonable means, pursued in good faith, must be used for this purpose. If Summerfield had employed any means at all directed to this end, he would have discovered the actual insolvency of Mendelson. In choosing to remain ignorant of what the necessities of his case required him to know, he took the risk of the impeachment of the transaction by the assignee in bankruptcy in case Mendelson should, within the time limited in the statute, be declared a bankrupt. The defendants are in no better condition than Summerfield would be if he had not transferred the stock to them, because they took his title with full knowledge of its infirmity, and must blame their own folly for the result. Ritter, the active agent of the firm in the transaction, was fully informed by Summerfield of the circumstances attending his purchase, and this information was confirmed on his arrival at Kingsville. He there found Mendelson in charge of the store, with some of the goods boxed up and some on the shelves, sure indications that the sale was recent, and that there had been no actual change of possession. These things, in connection with the residence of Summerfield in St. Louis, and his occupation there, ought to have excited the fears of a reasonable man that the sale by Mendelson was not for an honest purpose, and prompted him to make inquiry upon the subject. Ritter, instead of doing this, treated the transaction as one of ordinary occurrence, and as not imposing on him the duty of ascertaining the pecuniary status of either the vendor or the vendee. Without learning anything, or seeking to learn anything, beyond the facts that the goods suited him, and Mendelson wanted to change his business, he completed the purchase, and immediately transferred the stock to the store of the defendants in Chillicothe. If this sale can be upheld, the law which declared the title of Summerfield prima facie fraudulent could be easily rendered of no benefit, for all that would be necessary for a person buying property out of the ordinary course of business of the seller, to place it out of the reach of creditors, would be, as soon as he had consummated his purchase, to sell to another, who would acquire a good title, no matter how presumptively invalid the title of his vendor might be. It needs no argument to prove that, if the law against fraudulent sales could be evaded in this way, it would furnish no sort of protection to creditors. Ritter, when he purchased, knew the nature of Summerfield's title, because he knew, or ought to have known, that a retail dealer like Mendelson, in selling out his entire stock, was presumptively intending to defraud his creditors, if it should turn out that he had any. Of this the bankrupt law gave him distinct notice, and as he chose, like Summerfield, to remain ignorant of Mendelson's affairs, he took the hazard of Summerfield's inability to prove the fairness of his title. It follows that, if the sale to Summerfield cannot be supported, neither can the sale by him to the defendants. It is unnecessary to notice the exceptions taken to the admission or rejection of testimony, because our decision is based on the evidence which was received without objection, and about which there is no controversy."]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1844.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — PAYMENT BY SURETY—SUBROGATION—PRINCIPAL FIRST LIABLE—BANKRUPTCY.

1. A surety can require the creditor to proceed first against the principal only when his suretyship appears on the face of the instrument, or when he offers to indemnify the creditor in his proceedings against the principal, and to pay whatever the principal fails to pay.

2. Where the principal is bankrupt, a court of equity will, on application by the surety, compel the creditor to prove his debt against the principal, provided the surety bring the amount due into court. And if the surety pay the debt, he will be entitled to be substituted for the creditor, and to assume his rights.

3. An accommodation acceptor of a bill of exchange is a surety, as to the drawer, but a principal as to the holder, although the holder knew him to be an accommodation acceptor.

[Cited in Mead v. National Bank, Case No. 9,366.]

[See Perry v. Crammond, Case No. 11,005.]

4. The holder of a bill of exchange is entitled to prove his debt in bankruptcy against the drawer, the acceptor, and the payee, and to receive a dividend from all their estates until his full debt is paid; and if one only be bankrupt, he may prove his debt against such bankrupt, and also proceed against the others at law.

5. Sureties are generally entitled. upon payment of the debt of the principal, to the securities held by the creditor; but in bankruptcy, if the bankrupt give the creditor a security from his own property, the creditor cannot prove his debt without surrendering the security; but if a security from a third person be transferred to the creditor, he may prove his debt without surrendering the security, and may enforce such security against such third person, provided he do not thereby receive more than his claim.

6. Where a creditor proved his debt in bankruptcy against the acceptor, and, also, brought a suit at law against the drawers and attached their property,—it was held that he was not bound to pursue the law-suit at his own expense, but if he did not, the assignee of the bankrupt could carry it on for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate, and at the expense thereof.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Samuel H. Babcock, a bankrupt. Petition by Henry Winsor, assignee, that Hugh R. Kendall, a creditor, for whom the bankrupt was surety on a bill of exchange, be ordered to proceed in a suit against the debtor under said bill, and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction thereof. Ordered that the creditor proceed with the suit, or authorize the same to be carried on by the assignee.]

This was a case in bankruptcy adjourned into the circuit court from the district court, the judge of the district court being interested in the case. The petition on which the case came before the court was as follows: —"Henry Winsor of Boston, in said district, assignee of said Babcock, respectfully represents, that Hugh R. Kendall of said Boston has filed a proof of debt against the estate of said Babcock, in and by which the said Kendall states, that the said Babcock, at and before the date of the proceedings in bankruptcy in his case, was, and still is justly and truly indebted unto said Kendall in the sum of five thousand five hundred seventy-four dollars and fourteen cents, with interest thereon. First upon a certain bill of exchange, dated at Dudley on the thirteenth day of October, 1841, drawn by one Theodore Leonard, agent, upon the said Samuel H. Babcock, and by him accepted, for the sum of five thousand four hundred ninety-nine dollars and seventy-seven cents, payable in eight months from date, to the order of the said Theodore Leonard, agent, and endorsed and delivered to said Kendall for lawful value, which said bill the said Kendall avers, on due presentment thereof at maturity, was dishonored by the said Babcock, whereof the said drawer had due notice. Second, in the sum of seventy-four dollars thirty-seven cents, costs of suit, accrued in an action, brought upon said bill of exchange by said Kendall in the court of common pleas, for the county of Suffolk, in which action property of the said bankrupt was attached. And the said Kendall claims said costs in full. And your petitioner further shows that the said Theodore Leonard was agent of the Dudley Manufacturing Company, a corporation established by law in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and that, as such agent, and for and in behalf of said corporation, drew said draft: that said corporation was, at the time of the drawing of said draft, and still is, indebted unto the said Samuel H. Babcock: that said Babcock accepted said draft for the accommodation and benefit of said corporation, and that, as between said Babcock and said corporation, the said corporation were bound to take up and pay said draft and save the said Babcock harmless therefrom, and that said Babcock was merely surety for said corporation for the payment thereof; and your petitioner further shows, that said Kendall commenced a suit against the said Dudley Manufacturing Company on said bill of exchange, and caused the property of said corporation to be attached therein, in which the writ was made returnable to the court of common pleas, at the July Term, A. D. 1842, holden at Boston within and for the county of Suffolk. That the said suit is still pending, and the said Kendall prays that he may have judgment in said suit, and take out execution on such judgment, and cause the property of said corporation to be levied upon or sold in satisfaction of said judgment; that your petitioner, on the twenty-fifth day of August last, sent a written notice to the said Kendall, that he would be required to obtain all that can be realized from the said Dudley Manufacturing Company or from said security. And your petitioner further avers, that said Kendall well knew at the time he received the said bill of exchange, that the same was accepted by said Babcock for the accommodation of the said Dudley Manufacturing Company. And your petitioner further represents, that he is advised that by the rules and course of proceedings in a court of equity, or court sitting in bankruptcy, a party claiming to be a creditor of a surety, who holds security from the principal debtor, is bound to apply such security as far as the same will go to the satisfaction of said debt, and that if the creditor relinquishes such security he releases the surety to the extent of the security so relinquished. Wherefore your petitioner prays that the said Kendall be ordered by this honorable court to proceed in said suit and to levy upon said property of said corporation so attached, or to otherwise dispose of the same according to law, and apply the same or the proceeds thereof in satisfaction of said bill of exchange and costs, and that he be not allowed any dividend on the estate of said Babcock until he has first applied said security as aforesaid in extinguishment and satisfaction of said claims."

The answer was as follows:—"The respondent in answer to the said petition says, that he admits that he has filed a proof of debt against the estate of said Babcock as alleged in the said complainant's bill of complaint. The respondent admits said draft was drawn as set forth in the petition, but doth not admit that the same was accepted by said Babcock for the accommodation of the said company, and requires the complainant to prove that fact if material, and avers, that he the said respondent had no knowledge of said fact, if it existed. And this respondent admits, that he did commence a suit against said company upon said draft, as set forth in the said petition, and avers that on the same day he also commenced another suit against the said Babcock, as acceptor of said bill. And the said respondent admits, that on said writ against the said company, he attached all the said company's interest in certain property real and personal, which was subject to other prior attachments, and that all the personal property so attached has been absorbed by the prior attachments thereon; and that a great part of the real estate attached has also been taken on other attachments, and what is now holden by the said Kendall upon the said attachment is the remnant, which has been left of the said estate, after satisfying the said prior attachments, and of the value of said remnant, and also of the title of said company thereto this respondent is ignorant. And this respondent prays this honorable court that the said petition may be dismissed, and that he may be allowed his costs and counsel fees in this behalf sustained." It was further agreed that Babcock was an accommodation acceptor of the bill stated in the petition; and that that fact was unknown to Kendall, the creditor, when he took the bill.

The case was argued by William Gray, for the petitioner, Winsor, and by C. A. Welch, for Kendall, the creditor.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The circumstances of the case, shortly stated, are these: Kendall (the creditor), is the holder of a bill of exchange, drawn by one Leonard, agent of the Dudley Manufacturing Company, payable to his own order, upon Babcock, the bankrupt, and accepted by him, and endorsed by Leonard to Kendall. It is admitted that Babcock is a mere accommodation acceptor, but that fact was not known to Kendall at the time of his taking the bill. The bill at its maturity was dishonored, and Kendall has proved his debt in bankruptcy against the estate of Babcock; and has also brought a suit against the Dudley Manufacturing Company as drawers, and attached property of the company in that suit. The assignee of Babcock by his petition now asks the court to order Kendall to proceed in said suit, and to levy his execution upon the property so attached, and to apply the proceeds in satisfaction of the bill of exchange, and that he may not be allowed any dividend on the estate of Babcock until he has first applied the property attached in extinguishment and satisfaction of his claim. The argument in support of the prayer of the petition turns upon this, that Babcock is but a surety for the debt, that the attachment is a security held by the creditor for the debt, and that, in equity, the surety has a right to require, that the security shall be first applied in discharge of his liability pro tanto, before he is called upon to discharge his secondary obligation.

There is no doubt, that a surety for a debt may in many cases be entitled to relief by requiring the creditor to proceed against the principal. But this is ordinarily limited to cases where his character as surety stands confessed upon the face of the instrument itself; and also where he offers to indemnify the creditor in his proceedings against the principal, and also offers to pay whatever the principal may fail to pay under those very proceedings. This is the common course, where the surety seeks, by a bill against the creditor and the principal, to compel the latter to exonerate the surety from losses which may otherwise be sustained by him by the delays and forbearance of the creditor in enforcing his debt. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 327, and cases there cited; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 730, 849. Upon a similar ground, if the creditor in the case of the bankruptcy of the principal has not proved his debt against him, but declines to do so, a court of equity will, upon a bill filed by the surety, compel the creditor to prove his debt in bankruptcy, and give the surety the benefit thereof; but then, in such a case, the relief is granted upon the terms, that the surety brings the amount due into court. Beardmore v. Cruttenden, 1 Cooke, Bankr. Law, 211; 1 Deac. Bankr. Laws, (Ed. 1827,) p. 291; Ex parte Rushforth, 10 Ves. 409, 414; Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. 734. And if the creditor has himself already proved his debt in bankruptcy, the surety will have a right upon payment of the debt to stand in equity as substituted to the rights of the creditor, and will be entitled to the dividends. But a person may be a surety so far as regards the principal, and yet not be entitled to hold that character in respect to the creditor. Thus, for example, in the case of a bill of exchange, an accommodation acceptor for the drawer is to be deemed the principal and primary debtor, as to the holder of the bill, and it will make no difference generally in cases of this sort, whether he is known to be an accommodation acceptor or not; and yet in respect to the drawer he is to be treated to all intents and purposes as a mere surety. Ex parte Ryswicke, 2 P. Wms. 89; Ex parte Marshal, 1 Atk. 129; Ex parte Matthews, 6 Ves. 283; Ex parte Atkinson, 1 Cooke, Bankr. Law, p. 210; Deac. Bankr. Law, pp. 253, 254; Id. (Ed. 1827,) p. 291; Ex parte Rushforth, 10 Ves. 409, 414. So that it is not safe in all cases to reason, that a person, who is in fact a surety, quoad the principal, is to be treated as a surety throughout in regard to the creditor. That may and usually does turn upon very different considerations. See U. S. v. Cushman, [Case No. 14,908;] Berg v. Radcliffe, 6 Johns. Ch. 302; Hollier v. Eyre, 9 Clark & F. 1, 4, 5. Now, upon the known principles of courts of equity, acting in bankruptcy, the holder of a bill of exchange is entitled to prove his debt in bankruptcy against the drawer, the payee, and the acceptor respectively, if they have all become bankrupts, and to take a dividend against the estates of each until he has been paid his full debt. If one of the parties only is bankrupt, the creditor is still entitled to proceed against the other at law, until he has obtained satisfaction. It makes no difference in the case, whether the bill is an accommodation bill or not. This is sufficiently apparent from the cases of English v. Darley, 2 Bos. & P. 62; Ex parte Bank of Scotland, 19 Ves. 310; Ex parte Rushforth, 10 Ves. 410; Ex parte Reed, 3 Deac. & C. 481; and others cited in 1 Deac. Bankr. Laws, (Ed. 1827,) 239, 255.

In relation to the point of the creditor's having collected securities in his hands for the payment of the debt, it is doubtless true, that sureties are entitled upon the discharge or payment of the debt by themselves to have the benefit of those securities. But in bankruptcy a distinction is taken between the case of a security given to the creditor by the bankrupt himself of his own property, and the case of a security of a third person transferred to the creditor by the bankrupt, or otherwise in his hands. In the former case the creditor is not allowed to prove his debt against the bankrupt, unless he surrenders up the security, or it is sold with his consent, and then he may prove for the residue of his debt, which the security when sold does not discharge. In the latter case he may prove his debt in bankruptcy without surrendering the security of the third person which he holds, and may, notwithstanding such proof, proceed to enforce his security against such third person, provided, however, he does not take, under the bankruptcy and the security, more than the full amount of his debt. This distinction was maintained in Ex parte Bloxham, 6 Ves. 449; Ex parte Crossley, 3 Brown, Ch. 237; and Ex parte Parr, 18 Ves. 65.

From the principles, which have been stated, admitting the attachment to be a security, and the bankrupt to be a mere accommodation acceptor, it is clear, that the creditor has a right to proceed against the bankrupt for his debt in bankruptcy, and also against the other parties to the bill, under his attachment, until he has recovered the full amount of his debt; for it is not a security given by the bankrupt of his own property, but is a security attained by the creditor against other parties to the bill by a proceeding in invitum. I give no opinion, what is the light in which this attachment is to be viewed in respect to the present parties—whether as a security, or as a mere remedial process to enforce payment of the debt against the drawers. In either view, so far as the present petition is concerned, the result must be the same. The most, that the assignee is entitled to, is to have the aid of the court in having the attachment suit carried on to its proper conclusion, for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate as far as regards any surplus, which shall remain after the creditor has received from the dividends in bankruptcy and under the attachment the full amount of his debt. The creditor is not bound to pursue the attachment suit at his own expense, unless he choose so to do; but he is bound, if he does not choose to carry it on upon his own account, to allow the assignee to carry it on for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate at the expense thereof. If the attachment suit is proceeded in, and any money is received under it, the creditor will be entitled to receive so much thereof as, with the dividends received, will cover the full amount of his debt and costs; the surplus will belong to the estate of the bankrupt. If the creditor declines to proceed farther, all the future costs must be borne by the assignee. If the creditor chooses to proceed in the suit, the future costs in the suit must be borne by the creditor and the assignee, according to their respective interests in, or benefits derived from the suit.

What I shall order, therefore, upon the present petition, is, that the creditor shall forthwith make his election whether he will proceed in the attachment suit upon his own account or not;—That if he elects to proceed therein, then he shall be required to proceed therein under the order and discretion of the court, as it shall award from time to time; and that, if he shall obtain payment therein, and levy upon any property, he shall be entitled to receive from the proceeds, if sufficient, the full amount of his debt and costs —deducting therefrom the dividends received from the bankrupt's estate, and the surplus to be paid over to the assignee. If the creditor shall decline to proceed in said suit, then he shall authorize and allow the same to be carried on by the assignee at the expense and for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate; and that out of the property or money which shall be obtained under and in virtue of the suit, he shall, after the expenses thereof are deducted, be entitled to receive the full amount of his debt, beyond the dividends received by him, out of the proceeds, if sufficient, and the surplus, if any, shall belong to the assignee for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate. And either party shall be at liberty to apply to the court from time to time for further directions in the premises.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE MAY CONTINUE LITIGATION—EXPENSES.

1. If a person become a bankrupt, who was interested in land in dispute one tenth. and helped to defend in the suit, the assignee may continue to defend, if the creditors, knowing the fact, do not object, [but] it may be otherwise in commencing disputed suits, unless the creditors assent.

2. The amount of the expense in the defence would be in proportion to his interest, where no contract to pay more had been made by the bankrupt; but if he had agreed to pay more, e. g. one half, and the defence would not be continued without his paying the half, the effects of the bankrupt are liable for that half till an assignee is appointed; and after that, the assignee, as assignee, is liable for the half, if the creditors did not object to a continuance of the defence, and respectable counsel advised it, and the assignee directed it.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Samuel H. Babcock, a bankrupt. The assignee excepts to the commissioner's report as to counsel fees and costs.]

In this case, the assignee paid in part, and proposes to pay in full to Charles G. Loring and William Gray, Esq., $396.09 for professional services, which sum, being charged in his account, was objected to by the creditors when the account was presented for settlement. The court therefore referred the matter to George S. Hillard, as commissioner, to examine and report thereon. His report, made at this term, constitutes a part of the case. It recommends, as reasonable and just. the allowance of only one tenth the whole bill of costs against the effects of Babcock. This is placed on the ground, that no express agreement is satisfactorily proved to have been made by the assignee to pay more, and that the interest of the bankrupt in the matter in controversy where the costs arose, was only one tenth. The assignee not acquiescing in this report, and the district judge being interested as a creditor in Babcock's estate, the case came before the circuit judge for hearing and decision at this term. [The claim as made by the assignee was allowed.]

William Gray, for assignee.

Before WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. On the examination of the report of the commissioner, the conclusions formed by him from the facts proved, do not strike me as entirely just. It is conceded that Babcock was interested to the extent of one tenth with others in certain lands, about which a legal controversy arose with third persons. After it had continued some time in charge of Mr. Loring and Mr. Gray, as counsel for all the owners, some of whom had become insolvent, the counsel declined to proceed further, unless the solvent proprietors would become responsible for their services. I infer from the report that this was a responsibility for their future services; and hence if any account arose for services performed prior to that agreement, the estate of Babcock has, I presume, been charged with only one tenth of the amount. The spirit of that agreement should govern, after it was made, till Babcock became a bankrupt. As I understand the report and the acts of the parties subsequent to it, the agreement was, that thenceforward Babcock should pay one half of the fees afterwards becoming due, and his estate probably has been charged with that half till his bankruptcy, deducting any sums paid by him on that account.

The only question here is as to the services performed by counsel after he became a bankrupt. As to those, it is found by the commissioner, that the assignee was advised to enter his appearance and acquiesce in the suit going on, and did right in continuing to make further defence. It is also found, that he was informed of the agreement in relation to the payment of costs. It does not, to be sure, appear by the commissioner's report, that the assignee expressly stipulated to continue to pay the same proportion as Babcock had; and the claim for it is therefore disallowed by him. But it appears that he did not object to or dissent from that arrangement; and it is clear, that he assented to the further defence of the action for the benefit of the estate, with full knowledge of the agreement. It strikes me that, under such circumstances, it is just and reasonable to infer his acquiescence in the continuance of the payment of one half of the future expenses by Babcock's estate. It seems equitable, also, to charge that estate with one half, as the estate was reaping any advantage likely to arise from a continuance of the defence on the former agreed terms, and without which terms the defence would not be continued. The opportunity thus enjoyed for an expected gain or benefit should not be taken without incurring the charge attached to it. He took it, then, cum onere; nor do I see any thing in the case to show the further defence by the assignee to have been improper, or likely to prove prejudicial to the estate. Nothing of that kind has been pointed out, and it is not to be presumed where the defense, as in this case, was advised by respectable counsel, and is justified by the commissioner.

In England, an assignee cannot commence and prosecute suits in equity so as to charge the estate with costs, unless he previously consults the creditors, and obtains the support of a majority of them. 1 Cooke, Bankr. Law, 292; 1 Atk. 91, 106. But here it was the defence of an old suit in equity, rather than the institution of a new one; and as the commissioner reports in favor of the propriety of the defence, I am not disposed to inquire further into that branch of the question. No objection being taken to the amount of any of the items in the account, the claim as made by the assignee is allowed.

The earliest evidence of a similar invention by a prior patentee was a drawing exhibited in October, 1855. Held, that the applicant had established priority of invention.]

[3. On behalf of the patentee under the earlier patent, it was claimed that the applicant's invention was not a practically operative machine; that the amount of force required to operate the cog-wheels, which conveyed motion to the several parts of the press, and the weakness of the frame, (it being open-armed, and not braced across the top as was the patentee's,) were defects that made it practically useless; and that it was an immature experiment. The testimony, as well as the official decision, of the examiners of patents, was that the applicant's model represented a complete operative machine. Held, that the model must be deemed a practicable machine, and that the claim of abandonment, founded on the impracticability of the model, had not been established.]

[4. Abandonment of an invention involves a public knowledge and use of the invention, and is to be proved by evidence of acts inconsistent with the retention of exclusive property in the invention. Merely withholding the invention from the public does not amount to an abandonment, though it may, as against a junior inventor, require the fullest measure of proof on the part of the first inventor.]

[See Kelleher v. Darling, Case No. 7,653; Sprague v. Adriance, Id. 13,248; and, for cases holding that application for a patent should be made in a reasonable time, see Ellithorpe v. Robertson, Case No. 4,409; Stephens v. Salisbury, Id. 13,369.]

[5. The use of an invention by the public for the period of 11 months before the date of a patent to a junior inventor held to be too short a period to debar the applicant from taking advantage of the saving terms of Act March 3, 1839, § 7, (5 Stat. 354.)]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents awarding a patent to Frederick O. Degener. Affirmed.]

Statement of the Case.

The patent issued to Frederick O. Degener January 11th, 1859, No. 22,611. The part of the commissioner's report relating to the question of jurisdiction is given in full:

Commissioner's Report.

In the interference case recently decided by this office between Frederick O. Degener and George K. Babcock, and from which decision an appeal has been taken to your honor, it is probable that it will be insisted by the appellee (Degener) that the appeal does not lie, because the judgment rendered was against a patentee. In Pomeroy v. Connison, [Case No. 11,259,] Judge Cranch gave this interpretation to the eighth section of the act of [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 117, c. 357;] but as the grounds of his opinion have not been regarded as satisfactory, a general desire has been felt that the question should be re-examined. To accomplish this result, the appeal in the present case was granted. The clause of the act referred to, after directing that the commissioner shall give notice alike to patentees and applicants whose claims in his judgment interfere with each other, declares that "if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision on the question of priority of right or invention, on a hearing thereof he may appeal from such decision," &c. Language could not be more emphatic or distinct; and if the applicant can claim that it gives him a right of appeal, it is difficult to perceive on what ground the patentee could be excluded. It would be an unsound rule of construction which would permit a right so broadly conferred to be frittered away by the concluding language of the sentence, when that language may well receive an exposition entirely consistent with the preservation of such right. When both parties are applicants, then the question to be decided by the appellate judge is certainly 'which, or whether either, of them is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for,' and it is to such a case that this language is to be confined. But this does not conflict with the previous declaration that when a patentee and applicant are parties to the issue either of them may appeal. The appeal being thus allowed, the nature and effect of the judge's action upon it follow as a well-understood legal consequence. The declaration of the learned judge that the decision of the commissioner, so far as the patentee is concerned, is a brutum fulmen, and that an appeal is not given in such case to the patentee because such decision does not in any manner affect his legal or equitable rights, seems to find no countenance in the terms or spirit of the act of 1836. If the rights and interests of the patentee cannot be affected by the decision of the commissioner, why is he summoned to the issue and subjected to the duty and burden of the investigation? It is a maxim that the law will force no man to do a vain thing; yet worse than vain would be the action of the patentee as a party to an interference if, terminate the question as it might, his rights and interests were to remain unaffected thereby. It is true that the commissioner cannot cancel a patent, but he can impair its value by asserting his conviction of its illegality and by giving the invention which it protects to another. If his judgment is erroneous, it inflicts a deep injury upon the patentee, by inviting infringements upon his patent, and legalizing them as far as possible, and thus involving him in harassing and impoverishing litigation. For such injury he should have the summary redress by appeal which it was doubtless the intention of the act of 1836 to give him. As in practice in such cases, the patent, although ordered, is not issued pending the appeal. There is no obstacle to the complete execution of the judgment of the appellate judge should he determine in favor of the patentee and against the claim of the applicant. It is obvious that every reason urged against the authority of your honor to entertain an appeal in behalf of a patentee would equally apply against the authority of the commissioner to decide an issue to which such patentee was a party; and yet the commissioner is not only authorized, but expressly required by the statute under consideration to form and to determine such issue. (Signed, J. Holt, Commissioner.)

A. Pollok and T. D. Stetson, for appellants.
J. L. Kingsley, for appellee.

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. In this case, upon an interference declared, the commissioner of patents has awarded a patent to the applicant for an improvement in printing-presses, and an appeal has been prayed and allowed by the commissioner from that decision. It is insisted that no appeal will lie in such case, and that consequently the commissioner erred in its allowance, and that the appeal should be dismissed. The case of Pomeroy v. Connison, [Case No. 11,259,] decided by Judge Cranch in 1842, is relied on for this proposition. The decision is directly in point, but its correctness is assailed by the commissioner in his argument, and also by the appellant, and I therefore cannot escape its consideration. Were it the decision of a superior tribunal, it would be incumbent upon me to yield to its authority, whatever might be my individual opinion upon the true interpretation of the law; but not being of that dignity, I must look to the reasoning only on which it rests, giving, of course, all due weight to it as the opinion of a learned and enlightened judge, whose judgments at all times challenge respectful consideration.

Although the power and jurisdiction given by the patent laws are special and limited, I do not think that the policy of the law ever contemplated that they should be construed strictly, in the sense in which strict construction is held to be the rule of interpretation of those statutes which confer powers in derogation of common rights, or clothe with authority special tribunals, to the curtailment of the jurisdiction of superior courts administering justice upon the principles and after the modes known to the common law. On the contrary, all the rights and powers affecting the subject of patents arise out of positive law, and have been so benignly regarded by the framers of our institutions that they have been specially secured and confided to the care of the federal government by the provisions of the constitution itself. One portion of the law is not to be construed more rigidly than another, but all the parts, having their common source in the statutes, are to be interpreted with a wise liberality of construction, in furtherance of justice, and to give equal aid and facility of vindication to every right which grows out of patentable discoveries. Taking this principle of construction for our guide, if we find the language of the statute broad enough to embrace an appeal by a patentee from a decision in favor of an applicant, as well as an appeal by an applicant where the decision has been against him and in favor of the patentee, and if we can also discover any advantage which might accrue to the patentee from allowing him the appeal, then the statute should be so interpreted, notwithstanding the law be susceptible of another stricter construction which would exclude him from that privilege.

Now, by the act of [August 30,] 1852, [10 Stat. 75,] c. 107, all the powers, responsibilities, and duties imposed by the eleventh section of the act of [March 3,] 1839, [5 Stat. 354,] upon the chief judge were conferred upon each of the assistant judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and appeals may be taken to either of the three judges; and by the eleventh section of the act of 1839 the right of appeal to the chief judge has been extended to all cases where an appeal to a board of examiners, provided for in the act of [July 4,] 1836, § 7, [5 Stat. 119,] might have been taken. The whole question comes, then, to what appeals might have been taken to a board of examiners under the act of 1836. The eighth section of that act contains the following clause: "That whenever an application shall be made for a patent, which in the opinion of the commissioner would interfere with any other patent for which an application may be pending, or with any unexpired patent which shall have been granted, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to give notice thereof to such applicants or patentees, as the case may be; and if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention, on a hearing thereof he may appeal from such decision, on the like terms and conditions as are provided in the preceding section of the act; and the like proceedings shall be had to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for." The words "if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention, on a hearing thereof, he may appeal from such decision," are used in reference to the persons named in the portion of the sentence immediately preceding who are entitled to notice from the commissioner, to wit, "applicants or patentees, as the case may be." Then, not only is the language of the statute broad enough to embrace, but in point of fact does embrace, in explicit terms, a "patentee" who is dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention. But it is said that no valuable right of the patentee is at all prejudiced by the decision of the commissioner, inasmuch as the commissioner has no power under the statute to vacate his patent; and notwithstanding the issue of a patent in favor of his rival applicant, he may, under the sixteenth section of the act of 1836, go into a court of equity to avoid the junior patent. Is it true, however, that the patentee is on that account not injured by the emanation of the junior patent? Certainly if the framers of the patent law had thought so, and that the act of the commissioner in granting the junior patent was vain and futile as to his, they would not have so carefully imposed upon the commissioner the duty of giving the patentee notice of the interfering claim, and an opportunity to contest the right of the applicant before the commissioner. If he has an interest in contesting the emanation of another patent before the commissioner, is that interest divested by an adverse decision? The same interest which authorizes him to call for a decision would operate with unabated force until a correct decision were obtained, and he would be as much protected by a decision of the judge, on appeal, directing the commissioner not to issue a patent as by the commissioner's own resolution to the same effect. As the law has recognized this interest beyond dispute in the one case, it seems to follow by irresistible conclusion that it recognizes it in the other, the language of the act being comprehensive enough to include the means of its continued vindication.

Besides, it will readily be perceived that the emanation of a second patent must throw a cloud upon the title of the prior patentee and seriously impair the market value of his patent, not only in the continuous production and sale of the articles covered by it, but still more effectually deprive him of the means of selling, in solido, the property in his discovery by an assignment in whole or in part of the patent; for who would purchase from him with a junior patent staring him in the face, sanctioned by a solemn adjudication of the commissioner in favor of its priority? And although the sixteenth section of the law of 1836 [5 Stat. 123] gives the patentee the further remedy of a bill in equity, the remedy thereby is slow and vexatious, requiring months, perhaps years, of watchfulness, anxiety, and expense before he can reap its fruits, and in part, at least, but compensatory, and not wholly and ab initio preventive. It cannot be said that this power to defeat a prima facie right, which has already sprung into existence, is the legal equivalent for a total prevention of the origination of such adverse claim. Moreover, the party holding the junior patent has the means in his hands of enabling other persons to injure the senior patentee; for notwithstanding he may file his bill in equity against the junior patentee, and have his patent declared void, yet, by the proviso of said sixteenth section, such decree "shall not affect the rights of any person except the parties to the action or those deriving title from them subsequent to the rendition of such judgment." It will therefore be seen that from the date of the emanation of the patent up to the time of final adjudication the junior patentee has it in his power by licenses, assignments, and in various ways, to raise up other competitors to the senior patentee, as to each one of whom the judgment will be inoperative, and against each one of whom he must run the hazard and expense of a new suit. But if on appeal to a circuit judge from the decision of the commissioner the judgment of the commissioner is reversed and a patent withheld. none of these evil consequences to the senior patentee can follow. It then appears that substantial benefit may accrue to the patentee from having his appeal to the circuit judge, and the allowance of such appeal by the commissioner operating a supersedeas or suspension of his judgment until final hearing, the relations of the two parties to each other remaining in the interval unchanged. The summary nature of the remedy, too, and its speedy hearing which the statute requires, commend a resort to such appeal in regard to a right the duration of which is limited to fourteen years.

But it is said that in the clause "if either be dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner, * * * he may appeal," the word "either" may be satisfied by applying it to the words "such applicants," i. e., either of such applicants; and that this construction is "probable, from the fact that they [the legislature] have only authorized the judge to determine between contending applicants, and not between an applicant and a patentee; for, when they come to say what the judge is to do upon the appeal, we find it is to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for. The word 'either' in the former part of the claim is here explained to mean either of the applicants. It cannot be contended that the judge is to decide whether a patentee is entitled to receive a patent which he has already received and which is still in his possession."

But unquestionably the language quoted cannot be limited to the case of contending applicants, since an appeal has never been denied to the unsuccessful applicant as against the patentee; and upon such appeal the patentee has always had a standing before the judge upon appeal to contest the application, which standing he could only have by force of the provisions of the eighth section and of the words thereof above quoted. But the phrase "to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for" appears to me to have been introduced into the section for a totally different object from the one imputed. The preceding part of the sentence had pointed to the question which the judge was to review on appeal—"the question of priority of right or invention"—which would of necessity be the only question open in a contest between an applicant and a patentee, the government upon that issue being estopped, as against the patentee, from denying the patentability of that to which it had already given its sanction by the issue of the existing patent. And besides, according to the ordinary rules regulating appeals from one tribunal to another, the appellate is confined in its revision to those precise questions which were agitated before the inferior tribunal. In regard to patent appeals, this general policy is enforced by the eleventh section of the act of 1839, [5 Stat. 354,] which expressly confines the judge to the questions presented by the reasons of appeal and the decision of the commissioner. But in the case of contending applicants there is not only the question of priority in agitation between them to be passed upon by the appellate judge, but there is a further question, which perhaps it may be the interest of both to keep out of the view of the judge, but one in which the government, as the guardian of the rights of the people, has the deepest interest, to wit, the question whether either of the applicants has brought forward a patentable claim; and to insure the examination of this question at every stage of the controversy, congress has industriously embodied in the statute the injunction upon the judge to inquire whether either of the applicants be entitled to a patent as prayed for. If neither has produced a patentable claim, then neither is entitled to receive a patent, however the question of priority between them may be decided. This interpretation of the words of the statute appears to give vital energy to every word of a section which otherwise would be awkward and contradictory in its parts, and seems to be furthering the great object of the patent laws as well as administering equal justice to all parties, and to be in harmony with every other provision of the statute; and when we come to the sixteenth section, we find the same equality of remedy. When there are two interfering patents, (and it matters not whether either of them has been granted on an appeal to the judge from the commissioner or originally by the commissioner,) or when an application for a patent has been refused, the right of second appeal is given in both cases in the form of an original bill in equity before the proper circuit court, with an ultimate resort to the supreme court of the United States. In view, therefore, of the reasons I have assigned, and of the studious amplitude of remedies the law has provided for meritorious inventors, I have reached the conclusion that under the eighth section of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 120,] a patentee has equal right of appeal from a decision of the commissioner in favor of an applicant to one of the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia as an applicant for a patent has under the same section from an adverse decision in favor of a prior patentee.

Having, then, jurisdiction, I proceed to inquire into the merits of the case. Both parties claim a certain improvement in printing-presses, which need not be minutely described, as they admit the principles involved to be identical; and only two questions have been presented for my consideration, to wit, priority of invention and abandonment on the part of Degener, the applicant. On account of the great looseness in practice of solicitors in assigning reasons of appeal, I take occasion to remark that it is perhaps very questionable whether these points have been presented for my consideration with sufficient distinctness. The law of 1839, c. 87. [5 S.] § 11, [5 Stat. 354,] requires the commissioner to lay before the judge the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal, to which the revision shall be confined. Now, the nature of an assignment of reasons to which the revision of the judge is to be confined is entirely nullified by an assignment, in the sweeping terms of a single sentence, asserting that the decision of the commissioner is erroneous, because against the weight of legal evidence and contrary to the principles of law. It is manifest that such an assignment does not assist the judge in ascertaining the precise issues of law and fact made before the commissioner; and while I am far from intimating a desire for technical accuracy in an assignment, yet reasonable definiteness and precision in view of the words of the law, may hereafter be more strictly insisted upon. The response of the commissioner in the present case, however, shows with great distinctness the points made before him, and they are priority of invention and abandonment by Degener, the applicant. From an inspection of the testimony, it is apparent that Degener had made a complete model of his invention in the fall of 1853. The evidence of two witnesses—Kneeland and Kuck—stands uncontradicted on this point, while the earliest trace of Babcock's invention was in a drawing shown to one Morrison Davis in October, 1855. This point, then, is with the applicant.

On the second point I am equally well satisfied with the correctness of the commissioner's decision. The counsel for Babcock have argued this question very elaborately in two aspects. They have endeavored to show that in point of fact the invention of Degener was not a practically operative machine, but rested only in immature experiment, furnishing no obstacle to Babcock's patent and no right to a patent in Degener; that the amount of force necessary to operate the several cog-wheels which convey the desired motion to the several parts of the press, and the weakness of the frame, (it being open-armed, and not braced across the top, as Babcock's,) were defects which made it practically useless and a mere vain experiment. Besides the official judgment of the examiners in the case—that the model represented a complete operative machine—at the request of the appellant's counsel I examined under oath, Examiners Baldwin and King, both of whom testified before me that in their opinions the model of Degener represented a practically operative machine; Examiner King concluding that the frame-work of Babcock's machine was stronger than Degener's, and to that extent perhaps better. Both being shown to be models of operative machines, this branch of the objection fails—an inquiry into the comparative merits of the two, beyond the naked question of capacity to operate, not being open for investigation. The remaining branch of the argument upon abandonment, in the proper sense of the term, remains to be considered. The true meaning of the word in the acts of congress is an abandonment of the invention to the public—a dedication of his discovery to the free use of his fellow beings. It is, as said by Judge Story, "like the dedication of a public way or other easement," and is to be proved in the same manner by evidence of some acts inconsistent with the retention of exclusive property himself; and in this regard his acts are to be construed liberally. Merely withholding his invention from the public, as justly argued by the commissioner, can never amount to an abandonment; however it may, in connection with the circumstances, pile up difficulties, if too long continued, in the way of asserting and proving priority over another inventor who applies for a patent. It may raise up an equity in favor of the junior discoverer which will call for the fullest measure of proof on the part of the first inventor to disperse the cloud of distrust with which he has thereby enveloped his own case, but of itself cannot defeat his claim.

It has been supposed that the case of Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 477, has introduced a new rule on this subject into the patent law; but not so. The court there expressly affirms, on page 498, that the omission of a prior discoverer to try the value of his invention by proper tests, or his omission to bring it into public use, would not deprive it of its priority. "He might have omitted both, and also abandoned its use, and been ignorant of the extent of its value;" yet if it was the same with the junior patentee, "the latter would not, upon such grounds, be entitled to a patent," provided the former, "and its mode of construction, were still in the memory" of the first inventor "before they were recalled" by the junior patent. What the court, then, does decide is a very important, but a different question, to wit: If the discovery of the first inventor had been so far laid aside that it was in point of fact absolutely and irrevocably forgotten by him and by the whole world but for its recall to his memory by the second invention, then the said inventor must be held equally meritorious as one who discovers a lost art or an unpatented and unpublished foreign invention, and like him entitled to a patent. Indeed, the circumstances in Gayler v. Wilder, [supra,] were much stronger than the present case; and while the court affirmed the legal proposition, they intimated the strongest doubt whether in that case the evidence was sufficient to warrant the inference which the jury then drew. There is no testimony in the present controversy from which one would be warranted in drawing a like conclusion; nor is there any testimony that the invention was even used by the public before Degener's application, except for about the period of eleven months before the date of Babcock's patent and his application—a period too short to debar him from the saving terms of the seventh section of the act of 1839. [5 Stat. 354.]

Upon the whole case, I am of opinion, and accordingly certify to the Hon. Joseph Holt, commissioner of patents, that there is no error in his decision in the premises; that his judgment is affirmed, and that a patent must be issued to Frederick O. Degener as prayed.

BABCOCK, (GALE v.) See Case No. 5,188.

Case No. 699.

BABCOCK et al. v. MILLARD et al.

[4 West. Law Month. 314.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. 1862.

EQUITY—CREDITOR'S BILL—PARTIES—CITIZENSHIP—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

1. A creditor's bill filed in a court having both legal and equitable jurisdiction, to obtain satisfaction of a judgment at law, rendered in the same court, is not [according to the uniform rule of the seventh circuit] an original action, though it may embrace defendants who were not parties to the judgment.

2. Whatever may be the true rule limiting the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, in original actions, in respect to the residence and citizenship of parties, it does not apply to a creditor's bill in chancery in the circuit court, filed to obtain satisfaction of a judgment of that court.

3. Thus: When B. & Co., citizens and residents of New-York, had obtained a judgment in the circuit court of the United States, for the northern district of Ohio, against C. V. M. and I. N. H.. and afterwards filed a creditor's bill in chancery in the same court against C. V. M. and I. N. H., the judgment debtors, and J. W. M., and A. H. H., all of whom were citizens and residents of Ohio, and S. R. H., who though duly served with process, was a citizen and resident of Michigan, and who pleaded such citizenship and residence, to the jurisdiction of the court.—It was held, that the plea could not be sustained, however it might be in the case of an original suit, where thus united with other defendants, citizens of Ohio.

4. That the notes assigned are negotiable, is no ground of demurrer to a creditor's bill, which seeks to subject to the payment of a judgment, the judgment debtor's interest in certain promissory notes not due at the filing of the bill, which the judgment debtor had assigned as security to another party who is made a defendant. The court may so control the custody of the notes and provide for demand and notice when due, as shall prevent their being negotiated, and protect the rights of all parties thereto.

[In equity. Creditor's bill by Babcock & Co. against Charles V. Millard, Isaac N. Hathaway, John W. May, Alonzo Hathaway, and Sylvester R. Hathaway, based upon a judgment in this court, against said Millard and Isaac Hathaway. Heard on plea to the jurisdiction and demurrers. Overruled.]

M. R. Waite, for complainants.

Kent & Newton, for defendants.

WILLSON, District Judge. This is the case of a creditor's bill, filed by complainants, who are citizens of the state of New-York, against the defendants, four of whom are citizens of the state of Ohio, and the other a citizen and resident of the state of Michigan. The judgment at law, on which the suit is predicated, was obtained in this court, against Charles V. Millard and Isaac N. Hathaway, at the July term, 1861, for $1,121.83 damages and costs of suit. Execution was issued, and returned by the marshal wholly unsatisfied, the said Millard & Hathaway having no property subject to levy. It appears that in June, 1861, the mercantile firm of Millard & Hathaway was dissolved, Millard retiring from the concern, and Hathaway purchasing his interest in, and assuming the debts of the firm. Isaac N. Hathaway, on the 20th day of July, 1861, sold and delivered the stock of goods (which had belonged to the late firm) to the defendants, John W. May and Alonzo Hathaway, for the sum of $7,511.21 for which they gave four promissory notes of $1,877.80 each, payable to the order of Isaac N. Hathaway, at six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months. Isaac N. Hathaway transferred these notes to Sylvester R. Hathaway, as security and indemnity against his liability as indorser of certain bills of exchange. At the time of the commencement of this suit, it is conceded, that the liability of Sylvester R. Hathaway, as indorser of those bills, amounted to about $2,000. The complainants, by their proceeding in chancery, seek to subject to the payment of their judgments, the proceeds of the four notes, after Sylvester H. Hathaway is paid or otherwise indemnified against his liability as indorser of said bills of exchange.

The defendant, Sylvester R. Hathaway, (who was duly served with process in this district) has interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that he is a citizen of Michigan.

John W. May and Alonzo Hathaway have answered the interrogatories propounded to them in the bill, and have also filed a demurrer, on the ground that the four notes in question, given by them, are negotiable.

Isaac N. Hathaway has filed a general demurrer to the bill.

The first question in the case, is, should the plea of Sylvester R. Hathaway, to the jurisdiction of the court, be sustained? In the argument, great ability and research were displayed by the learned counsel on both sides, as to the extent of jurisdiction of the federal courts over citizens of different states, in original suits. The eleventh section of the judiciary act of [September 24,] 1789, [1 Stat. 78, c. 20,] provides that, "the circuit courts shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of several states, * * * when the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, * * * and the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state; and no civil suit shall be brought * * * against an inhabitant of the United States, * * * in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ." By the act of congress of the 28th of February, 1839, (5 Stat. 321, [c. 36,]) it is provided that, "where in any suit * * * commenced in any court of the United States, there shall be several defendants, any one or more of whom shall not be inhabitants of or found within the district where the suit is brought, or shall not voluntarily appear therein, it shall be lawful for the court to entertain jurisdiction * * * between the parties before it, but the judgment or decree * * * shall not conclude or prejudice those not regularly served with process or not voluntarily appearing." On the authority of Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 267, and Corporation of New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 91, it is contended, that the words in the act of 1789, to wit, "between a citizen of a state where a suit is brought and a citizen of another state", mean that each distinct interest should be represented by persons, all of whom are entitled to sue or may be sued in the federal courts; or in other words, that the law requires each plaintiff to be competent to sue each defendant over whom the court is asked to entertain jurisdiction. And further, that the act of 1839 relates solely to the nonjoinder of persons out of the reach of process, and does not extend the jurisdiction of the court over parties not previously within its cognizance.

On the other hand, it is contended, that the provision of the 2d section of the 3d article of the constitution, which declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases arising between citizens of different states, authorises the exercise of jurisdiction in all cases where any of the parties defendant are citizens of one or more states, different from that of the plaintiff; and that the act of 1839 [supra] was passed exclusively with the intent to rid the courts of the decision in the case of Strawbridge v. Curtiss, [3 Cranch, (7 U. S.) 267,] and others resting upon that authority.

Whatever should be the ultimate and settled doctrine of the supreme court, as to the extent of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts over parties defendant, in original suits it is not now necessary to determine; nor is the case before us one, which requires the declaration of any rule of law on the subject of proper parties defendant in original suits. This is not an original suit. It is simply a proceeding in aid of execution upon a judgment at law. It has been uniformly held in the 7th federal judicial circuit, that a creditor's bill is a continuation of the suit at law, as it merely seeks to obtain the fruits of a judgment, or to remove obstacles to a purely legal remedy. In Hatch v. Dorr, [Case No. 6,206,] this doctrine is expressly declared. There it was held by Mr. Justice McLean, that even an injunction bill is not an original bill, as it sets up matter in equity against the plaintiff's of which he could not avail himself at law. In that case, as in the proceeding by creditor's bill, equitable considerations are to be inquired into; in the latter case to carry the judgment into effect, and in the other to prevent the plaintiff, in the suit at law, from availing himself unjustly of a legal advantage. In the case of Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 460, it is said "the principle is, that a bill filed on the equity side of the court, to restrain or regulate judgments at law in the same court, is not an original suit, but ancillary and dependent; supplemental merely to the original suit out of which it has arisen, and is maintained without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties." So in Dunlap v. Stetson, [Case No. 4,164,] the court say, "considerations of this sort have satisfied the minds of some of the most enlightened judges, that the act of congress (of 1789) was never intended to apply to bills for relief upon judgments rendered in the circuit court. They are deemed to be, not original suits, but branches growing out of the original suits, and dependent upon them." The proceeding in chancery, by creditor's bill, in this court, is analogous to the practice prescribed by the Ohio Code of Civil Procedure, par. 458 et seq., which makes the creditor's bill an action in aid of execution. It cannot be properly said, therefore, that the process which has been issued in this case and served upon Sylvester R. Hathaway, is an original process, or that he is exempt on account of his residence in, or citizenship of, the state of Michigan, from the jurisdiction of this court, and the consequent liability to answer and obey its orders and decrees.

It remains to determine, whether, the demurrer to the bill, filed by the other defendants, is well taken, on the ground that the notes in question are negotiable, and were not due when this suit was commenced. We are not disposed to question the soundness of the doctrine maintained by the supreme court of Ohio, in Stone v. Elliott, 11 Ohio St. 252, where it is declared that, "it would be almost destructive to one of the essential characteristics of negotiable paper to hold, that an attachment (or other judicial proceeding) prevents a subsequent bona fide indorsee, for value, from acquiring a good title." Nor can we deny the force of the argument, in support of the doctrine used by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Kieffer v. Ehler, 6 Harris, [18 Pa. St.] 388. Furthermore, we fully agree with both the supreme courts of Ohio and Pennsylvania, as declared in those cases, that the negotiation of such paper by a defendant after he has had notice of the attachment, or other judicial proceeding, is a fraud upon the law: and we think the court from which the attachment (or chancery process) issues, has power to prevent this by requiring the negotiable paper to be placed in such custody as will prevent it from being misapplied, taking care that it shall be demanded at maturity, and notice be given to indorsers, if necessary; and that the money, if paid, shall stand in place of the note or bill to abide the event. The very purpose of the writ of injunction which issued in this case to Sylvester R. Hathaway, was to prevent him from negotiating or otherwise disposing of the notes held by him in trust. He being a party to the suit and properly in court, is subject to any order the court may make in the premises; nor can he violate or disregard the injunction without incurring the penalties of the law. In all this, the court has the power, and it is certainly its duty, to protect the rights of the makers of the notes, and provide for their discharge from liability, when the notes are paid.

The plea of Sylvester R. Hathaway to the jurisdiction of the court, and the demurrers interposed by the other defendants are overruled.

[12 Blatchf. 354.] [1]

PAROL EVIDENCE—EQUITY — RESCISSION OF LAND PATENT—LACHES.

1. In 1845, O. P., of Steuben county, New York, put money into the hands of his son, O. P., of Dodge county, Wisconsin, to locate for him a tract of government land. The son applied the money to the purpose, and a patent for the land was issued in 1848 to "O. P., of Dodge county, Wisconsin," and delivered to him. He entered into possession of the land, and, in 1853, executed a mortgage on it. In 1866, O. P., the father, gave a warranty deed of the land to B., who, by direction of the father, paid the purchase money to the son. The son gave possession of the land to B. Afterwards, a foreclosure suit was brought on the mortgage, to which suit B. was made a party. He defended it on the ground that the father, and not the son, owned the land when the mortgage was given, but was defeated in the suit and evicted. He then brought this suit against the father, to recover for a breach of the covenant of warranty: Held, that parol evidence was inadmissible to show that the father was intended as the patentee in the patent, and not the son, for the reason that there was no ambiguity in the patent, in the description of the person named in it as the patentee.

[See U. S. v. Thompson, Case No. 16,486.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. The patent, having been delivered to the son, who was the grantee named in it, was valid, until vacated for mistake.

3. On the facts, the father, as against a bona fide holder of the mortgage, was guilty of laches, in taking no steps to have the mistake corrected.

[At law. Action by Norman E. Babcock against Oliver Pettibone for damages for breach of covenant of warranty in a deed. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Harlow L. Comstock and Irvin W. Near, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. This action is brought to recover damages for breach of covenant of warranty in a deed executed by the defendant to the plaintiff, April 9th, 1866, conveying eighty acres of land in the county of Dodge, state of Wisconsin. Upon receiving the deed, the plaintiff entered into possession, and was thereafter evicted under a writ of assistance issued upon a judgment of foreclosure. The foreclosure was by action, and was upon a mortgage executed by Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county, Wisconsin, to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, on the 26th of September, 1853. The plaintiff was made a party to this action, and defended upon the ground that the real estate was, in fact, owned by Oliver Pettibone, of the county of Steuben, in the state of New York, instead of Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county, Wisconsin, at the time the latter executed the mortgage.

It appears, by the evidence, that, in 1845, the defendant, who then resided in Steuben county, N. Y., and has continued to reside there, attempted to locate a lot of eighty acres of land in Dodge county, Wisconsin, and placed funds in the hands of an agent there, to pay the purchase price, but, failing to obtain the particular lot he desired, returned home, and directed his son Oliver, who then resided in Dodge county, to select another lot for him, and apply the money left in the hands of the agent to the payment of the price. The son located the land described in the deed to the plaintiff, applied the money in the hands of the agent as directed, and thereupon the receiver of the land office issued a certificate acknowledging the receipt of the purchase money from Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county, Wisconsin territory. This certificate was forwarded to the general land office, and thereupon, on the 10th of May, 1848, a patent was issued by the United States to "Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county, Wisconsin territory," and delivered to the son. The son entered into possession of, and improved, the land, and, on the 26th of September, 1853, executed the mortgage to the railroad company, under which the plaintiff was evicted. The father learned of the execution of this mortgage about a year after it was executed, reproved the son for having given it, but allowed him to remain in possession until the conveyance to the plaintiff, when the father directed the entire purchase money to be paid by the plaintiff to the son. When the action to foreclose the mortgage was commenced, the present plaintiff, by his attorney, wrote to the defendant, notifying him of the pendency of the action, and requesting information for its defence, and thereupon the defendant informed the plaintiff substantially of the facts as they have been stated. The foreclosure action was litigated, and judgment against the defendant therein rendered in the circuit court for Dodge county, which, on appeal, was affirmed by the supreme court of the state, it being held by the supreme court [Barton v. Babcock, 28 Wis. 192][1] that extrinsic evidence was not admissible to show that Oliver Pettibone, of Steuben county, N. Y., was the real grantee, it having been proved in that case, as in this, that the son was the only person of his name in Dodge county, Wisconsin.

It is doubtful if the notice given by the plaintiff to the defendant, of the pendency of the action in Wisconsin for the foreclosure of the mortgage, was of such a character as to estop the defendant from contesting the validity of the incumbrance which the judgment in that action established. The notice did not require the defendant to appear and defend the suit, nor was the defence in any manner tendered to him. Strong analogies favor the position, that, when the covenantor is notified of the pendency of the suit, and, instead of requiring to be allowed to defend, furnishes information for its defence to the covenantee, he waives a formal tender of the defense, but the authorities do not fully sustain it. I shall consider the judgment, therefore, as but presumptive evidence of the facts which it adjudicated, and the whole question determined by it open here.

The high authority of the court which decided one of the controlling questions here, entitles that decision to great consideration, but, disregarding it as authority in this case, I am satisfied that it was a correct exposition of the law, and that parol evidence is inadmissible to show that Oliver Pettibone, of Steuben county, N. Y., was the person intended as the patentee, instead of Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county, Wisconsin, who was named as such in the instrument.

It is not to be doubted that the identity of a grantee in a deed is a question of fact, to be established, ordinarily, by evidence dehors the instrument, precisely as the identity of the land conveyed is to be ascertained by such evidence. Neither is it doubtful, that, if the description of the grantee is equally applicable to two or more persons, a question of latent ambiguity arises, which may be determined by parol, precisely as would be the case if the description of the land conveyed was equally applicable to two or more parcels. It does not follow, however, that, if part of the description is unequivocally applicable to one grantee or to one parcel of land, and not to the other, extrinsic evidence will be permitted, to establish the intent of the grantor, and to control, in disregard of the description. On the contrary, the general doctrine is clear, that evidence which, passing by and disregarding the description in the written instrument, seeks to import into it, and engraft upon it, an intention independent of its terms, is not admissible, because it contradicts rather than explains the instrument.

In my view, this case does not present a question of latent ambiguity, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, because a latent ambiguity exists, as tersely stated by Alderson, B., in Smith v. Jeffryes, 15 Mees. & W. 562, "where you show that words apply equally to two different things or subject-matters," and its solution rests, as stated by Abbott, C. J., in Beaumont v. Field, 2 Chit. 275, not on "what was the meaning of the grantor," but on "what was his meaning by the words used." In this case, the words could only apply to Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county, Wisconsin; and the question is not what was the intention of the grantor when that description was used, but what was meant by the words used. If the words used are clear, unambiguous and determinate, to describe one person or one subject-matter, there can be no latent ambiguity, unless they describe another equally well, and, therefore, there is no room for construction to be sought for in the light of surrounding circumstances.

It is true, that, on the maxim, falsa demonstratio non nocet, an incorrect portion of a description is frequently rejected when sufficient remains in the instrument to indicate with legal certainty the person or subject-matter intended; but this rule is to be followed with caution. It would hardly be contended, that if, by will, a testator devised his farm in the county of Dodge, with no other description, his intention to devise his farm in the county of Steuben could be established by extrinsic evidence, if it appeared that, at the time of making his will, he had a farm in each county. The test, that there must exist sufficient indication of intention, on the face of the instrument, after the false description is rejected, to justify the application of the evidence, would not exist in such case, because, when the location of the farm is stricken from the description, there remains nothing in the instrument to indicate which farm was intended to be devised. And, in this case, when the description of the patentee's residence is rejected, nothing remains to indicate which Oliver Pettibone was the person intended. To sustain the theory of the defendant, it would result, that a latent ambiguity must first be created by rejecting a portion of the description, so as to make it applicable to two persons, and then be explained by extrinsic evidence, to show which of the two persons was intended, and this when the instrument itself would be destitute of any indication of intent upon its face, to justify the application of the evidence. The description here was not applicable to the defendant, and the case is not within the principle which permits extraneous evidence to be given. Grant v. Grant, 39 Law J. C. P. 140.

If the conclusion thus expressed is erroneous there are other difficulties in the way of the defence. The evidence shows that the patent was delivered to the son, and proof that, as between him and the defendant, the son was not entitled to it, or that, as between them, the son was the agent of the defendant to receive delivery, does not establish the fact that the United States was aware of these facts, or recognized the relation of the parties, or intended the grant to the defendant. The patent was issued and delivered to the son, as the real person entitled to it, under circumstances which justified the United States in treating him as such; and although he was not, in fact, the person entitled to it, as between him and the defendant, the grant to him was not a nullity, but was valid until vacated for mistake, by scire facias, or by proceedings in equity.

With full knowledge of the facts, or of sufficient to put him on inquiry, the defendant lies by from 1854, when he learned that his son had executed a mortgage on the property, without taking proceedings to have the mistake corrected, until the mortgage passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser. If the defendant, instead of the plaintiff, had defended the foreclosure action, and alleged mistake, and asked to have the patent corrected on that ground, he would have been defeated by his laches and the superior equities of the holder of the mortgage, and the mortgage would have been declared a valid lien. Judgement is, therefore, ordered for the plaintiff.

[NOTE. In the case of Barton v. Babcock, before the supreme court of Wisconsin, referred to in the foregoing opinion. Mr. Justice Cole, speaking for that court, said: "At the time of the entry, Oliver Pettibone, the son, resided in Dodge county, Wisconsin territory, and Oliver Pettibone, the father, resided at Hornellsville, Steuben county, New York. Considerable testimony was introduced on the trial, against the objection of the plaintiffs, tending to show that Oliver Pettibone, the father, entered the land, and owned it when the mortgage was executed. According to our view, this evidence was clearly inadmissible between these parties The record itself showed that the title to this property was in Oliver Pettibone, of Dodge county. Wisconsin. There was but one person of that name living in Dodge county, and so there was no ambiguity in the patent. There was only one person to whom the entire description in the patent applied. There is therefore nothing to be explained, and there is really no room for construction. * * * The court is not at liberty to reject so much of the description in the patent as relates to residence to substitute a person to whom it does not apply. * * * The patent shows that the title to the land in controversy was in the mortgagor when he executed the mortgage, and that is conclusive in this action." [At law. Action by Samuel Babcock against Stone, John B. Glover, and Manning on a bill of exchange. Heard on demurrer to replication. Demurrer overruled, and judgment for plaintiff.]

Thomas & Keating, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought by the plaintiff as the indorsee and holder of the following bill: "Alton, June 9th, 1836. Twelve months after date, pay to the order of John B. Glover, twenty-seven hundred forty-one dollars ninety-two cents, value received, and charge the same to the account of Stone, Manning & Co." To James Debow & Co., St. Louis, Missouri. Accepted by James Debow & Co., and also indorsed, "Pay to Samuel Babcock, John B. Glover."

The defendants pleaded that the bill of exchange was made by the said John B. Glover, for the purpose of securing an individual debt, and not an account of the firm and partnership of James Debow & Co., or for any indebtment of theirs. That Glover accepted the same in the name of defendants, without the knowledge or consent of his partners, but for the individual benefit of the said Glover. That the plaintiff took the bill, well knowing that it was made and accepted as aforesaid. That the bill was for the individual debt of the said John B. Glover, &c. To this the plaintiff replied, that when the bill was so as aforesaid transferred to him, he did not know that said bill of exchange was drawn by said Glover, in the name of Stone, Manning & Co., and accepted by said Glover, in the name of James Debow & Co., to secure his individual debt, &c. To this replication the defendants demurred.

It is clear that Glover could not have recovered as payee against the drawers or acceptors of this bill. It was created by him, he being a partner of the drawers and acceptors, not to pay a partnership debt, but for his individual benefit. This was a fraud upon his partners. But he negotiated it to Babcock, the plaintiff, who is averred to be an innocent holder, having had, at the time of the indorsement, no notice of the fraud. Being an indorsee without notice, it becomes a question whether he or the partners of Glover shall lose the amount of the bill. The bill was indorsed by Glover to the plaintiff, before its maturity. In Story on Partnership, 161, it is said, "that by forming a partnership, the partners declare themselves to the world satisfied with the good faith and integrity of each other, and impliedly undertake to be responsible for what they will respectively do within the scope of the partnership concerns." On this ground the firm is bound for the frauds committed by one of its partners. Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, the rule is just, that he shall suffer, who reposed the higher confidence and credit in such person. If the bill had been indorsed to the plaintiff after it was due, or out of the ordinary course of business, or under circumstances calculated to excite suspicion, he could have no right to recover. But none of these facts exist, and he must be considered as an innocent holder, before the bill was due, and without notice of any fact which could render the bill suspicious. The above doctrine is substantially laid down in Jones v. Yates, 9 Barn. & C. 532; Bosanquet v. Wray, 6 Taunt. 597; Aubert v. Maze, 2 Bos. & P. 371; and Smith v. Lusher, 5 Cow. 688. The demurrer to the replication is overruled. Judgment.

[NOTE. In a recent case before the supreme court, it appeared that one Ferry was a copartner in two firms, both engaged in manufacturing lumber, but at different points in Michigan. He executed notes amounting to over $15,000, in the name of one firm, payable to the order of the other, for his own benefit, and sold them to a bank in another state. The articles of copartnership of the firm appearing as maker provided that no capital was to be diverted to the use of any of the partners. but the copartners had no knowledge of the notes in suit until they matured. In an action by the bank, a bona fide holder, against the maker, a judgment was rendered for plaintiff by the trial court, (see National Exch. Bank v. White, 30 Fed. 412,) but on appeal this judgment was reversed, on the ground that a partnership organized "for the purpose of carrying on the business of sawing lumber, pickets, and lath" is "non-trading" in character, and an individual partner of such a firm has no right, as a matter of law, to execute a note in the name of the firm, without the knowledge of his copartners, in the absence of express authority, or a course of dealing from which such authority can be presumed. Dowling v. Exchange Bank of Boston, 145 U. S. 512, 12 Sup. Ct. 928. Where there are facts tending to establish a course of business implying such authority, the question is one for the jury. Id.]

BABCOCK v. TERRY.

[1 Lowell, 66.][1]

SEAMEN — WAGES — CONTRACT BETWEEN MASTER AND OWNER—PASSAGE MONEY — MASTER'S COMMISSIONS.

1. Where the contract between the master and owners of a whaleship was, that if the former should procure four thousand barrels of oil, or a full ship, he should have a lay of one-sixteenth, otherwise a lay of one-seventeenth, and the evidence showed that he brought home a full cargo, and that the ship was well stowed, but that the number of barrels was much less than four thousand, held, the master was entitled to the larger lay.

2. Where the master after filling his ship with sea-elephant oil, left behind him at the island where the oil had been obtained some of his ship's company to pursue the business, and the owners afterwards sent out another vessel under another master and brought home the oil made by those men after the former master had left them, held, that the former master could not claim a lay in that oil.

3. When the ship has not the means to cure a seaman who is taken ill on a whaling voyage, and he is cared for on shore, the reasonable expenses of his care and cure are chargeable to the ship.

[See The Monongahela, Case No. 9,712.]

4. The case of Hazard v. Howland [Case No. 6,280] followed in the matter of penalty on a master for bringing spirits on board the ship, and permitting them to be used there contrary to the articles.

5. The master of a whaleship has no right to charge a commission on the money paid out to the crew in the course of the voyage.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

6. Where the master of a ship gave to another shipmaster, whom he brought home as a passenger, a receipt for $150 passage-money, held, that he was justly chargeable with the full amount, notwithstanding his testimony that he received only $75, and gave the receipt for the larger sum "for the benefit" of the passenger, which the court understood to mean that the latter might be able to charge that sum to his owners.

[In admiralty. Libel by Daniel S. Babcock, master of the ship Samuel Robertson, against Isaiah F. Terry, the owner, for wages and advances. Decree for libellant.]

The libellant was the master of the ship Samuel Robertson, of Fairhaven, on a voyage made several years since for whale and sea-elephant oil. The cause now came up on exceptions to the report of an assessor, and to settle certain points which had not been submitted to him. The chief object of the voyage was to procure the oil of the sea-elephant or walrus, which was a new branch of industry when this voyage began, and had only been carried on from New London, out of which port the libellant had sailed as mate on a similar voyage. The sea-elephant is taken on shore at Hurd's island, an uninhabited place which lies very low in the southern latitudes, and has a boisterous and uncertain climate. The animals are killed and stripped on shore, and the blubber is dragged and rafted to the beach and put on board a tender, to be carried to the ship and tried into oil, there being no anchorage fit for large vessels within about three hundred miles. Captain Babcock lost his tender on the day of her arrival at the island, and sent home for another, and in the mean time left his second mate and some of the men to catch sea-elephants, and himself cruised for whales, but without much success. When the new tender came out, the chase of sea-elephants was pursued with diligence, and the ship received a cargo and returned with it to New Bedford. The libellant left the new tender with a sufficient crew at Hurd's island, making a new contract with them conditioned to be void if the owners sent out the same or any other ship. They did send out the Arab, under another master, and she made a voyage and brought home, among other things, fifteen hundred barrels of oil which had been made by the crew of the tender after the Samuel Robertson had sailed for home. The libellant demanded a lay of one-sixteenth in all the oil brought home by him, and in the fifteen hundred barrels made by the men whom he left on the island; five per cent on sales of slops; five per cent on moneys advanced to the crew, and his whole disbursement account. The respondent disputed several items of the account; admitted a lay of one-seventeenth only in the oil brought home; and claimed a deduction from his lay for breach of the shipping articles by the libellant in bringing distilled spirits on board the ship at sundry times, and for negligence and want of skill. The facts on which the decision of these points depended are stated in the opinion of the court.

A. S. Cushman, for libellant.
J. C. Stone, for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. To begin with the master's general conduct. The evidence does not show that he was either careless or unskilful. He was certainly unfortunate in the loss of his tender, and in the small amount of whales taken in his off-shore cruise; but the preponderance of the evidence is, that these results were not owing to his fault. It was said that I must give greater weight to the evidence against him than to that in his favor, because the witnesses taken from the ship were reluctant to say any thing to his discredit. But after making whatever allowance I can discover to be due to apparent or probable bias, I must decide the case, after all, upon what the witnesses say, and not upon what they might have said had they testified differently. And the whole evidence convinces me that, excepting in the matter of distilled spirits, to which I shall recur presently, the master exerted himself with reasonable care and skill, and with rather uncommon diligence for the promotion of the best interests of the voyage. Upon the special matter of the slops, the assessor is satisfied that the master has duly accounted for them; and I see no reason to vary his award in that respect, nor to charge him with the value of certain articles stolen from the wreck of the Alfred.

On the other hand, I cannot allow the master a commission on moneys advanced to the crew. His contract expressly provides for the commission on sale of slops, but mentions no other; the usage of the trade is against it, and so is the reason of the thing. The commission on the sales is intended to compensate him for his trouble in making them, and to ensure his selling to the best advantage. The necessary advances to the crew are made as a part of a master's ordinary duty, and from the owner's money; the trouble is slight, and the responsibility nothing. I affirm the assessor's disallowance of the charge.

Nor can I allow the libellant a lay in the oil taken at Hurd's island after he sailed for home. The contract made with the men whom he left behind, appears to have been carefully drawn, with the intention of giving the owners full control over this matter. They have seen fit to allow a lay in this oil to the master and crew of the Arab, who took it on board, and brought it home; and I cannot say they have acted unjustly. These men did a certain amount of work upon this oil, and are better entitled than those who came home in the Samuel Robertson to some share in its value. The libellant took the responsibility of the enterprise, and this may entitle him to some consideration from the owners; but he has no legal claim which a court can ascertain and enforce.

The amount of the master's lay depends upon the construction of the special contract as applied to the facts of the case. It was agreed, that if the master procured on board the ship four thousand barrels of oil, or a full ship, his lay was to be one-sixteenth, otherwise one-seventeenth. The ship brought home somewhat over three thousand four hundred barrels, and the evidence is clear that she was full, and there is no proof that she was badly stowed. The respondent says that the ship did, on one occasion, bring a good deal more. He gives the number of gallons, by which it appears she had a little more than thirty-five hundred barrels, besides a considerable quantity of bone, said, in the argument, to be equivalent to some two hundred barrels of oil. It does not appear that she ever did or could bring four thousand barrels, or very near that amount.

Under these circumstances, it is fair to assume the libellant's construction of the agreement, and hold that he was to procure a full cargo estimated at four thousand barrels, more or less, rather than to say with the respondent, that the specification was intended as a minimum, and that the larger share was dependent on his getting at least four thousand barrels. The former construction, it is true, rejects the demonstration as false; but then it appears to be false. Such a contract should be construed against the owners in a doubtful case, because they are supposed to know the capacity of the vessel, which the master certainly did not; and it is not to be presumed that they would establish as a minimum an amount of cargo larger than the vessel was ever known to carry. Upon the facts in evidence, the respondent's interpretation gives scarcely greater weight to the words, "or a full ship," than the other does to the "four thousand barrels," because it is not credible that they could in any event expect the vessel to bring more than the specified amount. This point then, not submitted to the assessor, I must decide for the libellant.

The assessor has rejected the whole of the very large bill charged by the libellant for the expenses connected with the illness, death, and burial of Mr. Briggs at Mauritius. As it appears, however, that the ship was unable to furnish the proper medicines and medical attendance, which the unfortunate situation of the chief officer demanded, the master was right in boarding him on shore. And after examination of the account, I have thought it right to allow one hundred and twenty-five dollars as a fair charge against the owners on this account. The George, [Case No. 5,329;] The Atlantic, [Id. 620.]

The next inquiry is, what penalty, if any, should be awarded for the breach of the article concerning spirituous liquors. And upon this, the case of Hazard v. Howland, [Case No. 6,280,] decided by Judge Sprague in 1863, is a direct authority. It was there adjudged that the owners have a right to say whether or not these liquors shall be used on their vessel for other than medicinal purposes; and further, that the penalty affixed by the articles, of a total forfeiture of wages, is one to be chancered by the court. In the present case the evidence is clear that the master wilfully violated this stipulation, and permitted his officers to have nearly as much whiskey as they liked. I must suppose that the discipline of the ship was injuriously affected by this laxity. What the actual pecuniary damage to the voyage was, it is impossible to say; and I shall deduct from the libellant's lay the sum of three hundred and seventy-five dollars, which is the penalty imposed by Judge Sprague, in the case cited, and in which the master's lay was very nearly what it is here.

There is but one item of account remaining to be considered. The respondent produced before the assessor, a paper signed by the libellant, acknowledging to have received one hundred and fifty dollars as the passage-money of one Captain Proctor, from Mauritius to New Bedford. The libellant testified that he received in fact but seventy-five dollars for this service; that the price receipted for was the fair price of a first-class passage, to which Captain Proctor was entitled, but that the accommodations actually furnished him did not come up to that description, and the receipt was given "for the benefit of Captain Proctor." This means, I suppose, that Proctor's owners were to pay for the accommodation he ought to have had, and Captain Proctor himself only for what he had. No doubt a receipt is open to explanation; but I am not satisfied with this explanation, which appears to involve a fraud on the persons who were ultimately to pay the passage-money. The owners of the Samuel Robertson were entitled to receive all that Captain Proctor's owners were bound to pay; it is not fit that one-half the money should be kept in the hands of the agents; and I am unwilling to believe that this was done. If the master has undertaken to release Captain Proctor from any part of the amount due for his passage, he must settle that account with him.

The account then stands thus: (The judge here stated the account in conformity with the above opinion.)

[1 Gall. 168.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1812.

CONFLICT OF LAWS—DISCHARGE UNDER LEX LOCI — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — POWER OF STATE TO SUSPEND PROCESS OF FEDERAL COURTS.

1. Independent of the constitution of the United States, a discharge of a debt, under the laws of the state where the debt is contracted, is good every where.

[Cited in Woodhull v. Wagner, Case No. 17,975.]

[See Penniman v. Meigs, 9 Johns. 325; Murray v. De Rottenham, 6 Johns. Ch. 52; Holmes v. Remsen, 4 Johns. Ch. 471; Story, Confl. Laws, §§ 272, 278, 278a; Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, Case No. 16,871, and authorities cited therein.]

2. A state legislature cannot suspend process in the courts of the United States as to its citizens.

[See Duncan v. Darst, 1 How. (42 U. S.) 301; McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. (43 U. S.) 9; Beers v. Houghton, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 329; Keary v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 16 Pet. (41 U. S.) 89; Catherwood v. Gapete, Case No. 2,513.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Samuel H. Babcock against Human Weston] upon a contract executed in Boston. The defendant pleaded the pendency of a petition before the legislature of Rhode Island, by the defendant, to obtain the benefit of the insolvent act of that state, and an order of the legislature thereon, continuing the petition to their next session, and directing in the mean time a suspension of all process against the defendant. Demurrer and joinder. The action was commenced after the passing of the order.

Mr. Whipple, for the defendant, in support of the plea, contended, that the order of the legislature of a stay of process was peremptory upon the circuit court, as well as the state court, and therefore, that the action ought to abate.

Searle and Crapo, e contra.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I am of opinion, that the plea is bad. It is not competent for the legislature of Rhode Island to suspend process in the courts of the United States, or to bind citizens of other states by their orders. As this is a suit between a citizen of Massachusetts and a citizen of Rhode Island, on a contract made in Massachusetts, it is exceedingly doubtful, whether an act of insolvency, completely executed under the authority of Rhode Island, would in this court be held a good bar. Putting out of view any consideration of the constitution of the United States, a discharge under the laws of a state may perhaps be held a good bar even as to foreign contracts, of an action brought in the courts of that state; because the courts are bound by such laws; and the party seeking remedy in such courts must pursue it according to the laws of such state. So also in case of a contract made in a state between citizens of that state, a discharge good by its laws, may be good everywhere. But such a discharge of a contract made between a citizen of another state and a citizen of Rhode Island, without the jurisdiction of Rhode Island, may well, in point of legal effect, be doubted. The general rule is, that a contract is governed, as to its construction and efficacy, by the law of the place, where it is made; and a discharge good there, would be sufficient in every other jurisdiction. See Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 122; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 213; Clay v. Smith, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 411; Woodhull v. Wagner, [supra;] Le Loy v. Crowninshield, [Case No. 8,269;] Phillips v. Allan, 8 Barn. & C. 477; Lewis v. Owen, 4 Barn. & Ald. 654; 2 Bell, Comm. pp. 689–691. But this rule does not extend to support a bar to the contract, where such bar happens to be good merely by the law of the place, where the action is brought, and the party is found; unless the courts within that state, where the remedy is sought, are exclusively bound by its regulations. However, on all these points I give no opinion.

The allegations contained in the plea might possibly afford a ground for a continuance of the cause, if it were certain, that the act of insolvency would ever be granted. But it rests in contingency, and even if granted, may never be a sound bar to the action. It would be too much to hold a mere application to the legislature a ground for the postponement of the rights of parties, who have regular claims before the court. I make this suggestion, because it has been intimated, that the bar, if bad, may in the discretion of the court be allowed to operate a continuance until the next term, in order then to ascertain the ultimate decision of the legislature. Plea adjudged bad, and judgment for the plaintiff.

BABSON v. THOMASTON MUT. FIRE INS. CO.

Circuit Court, D. Maine. 1874.

INSURANCE—INSURABLE INTEREST—TRUSTEE.

[A trustee duly appointed by a court in place of the one named in a will, who has declined to serve, has an insurable interest in the property charged with the trust, and may take out a fire insurance policy thereon in his own name, provided he communicates the facts as to title to the insurer.]

At law. Action by John Babson against the Thomaston Mutual Fire Insurance Company, on a policy of insurance upon a dwelling house, the defense to which was that, at the time of effecting the insurance, plaintiff had no title or insurable interest in the property. [Judgment for plaintiff.] The case was tried before the judge without the intervention of a jury. The facts of the case are as follows: The property formerly belonged to Sarah McCrate. She died leaving a will, in which Richard H. Tucker was named executor, and who also was constituted trustee, to whom this property was devised in trust. The will likewise contained the following clause: "And I hereby authorize and empower the said Richard H. Tucker, the trustee before named, to appoint a trustee to be substituted for him in case he, the said Tucker, should from any cause be unable to act as such, and also to name a suitable person to succeed him as trustee after his decease; which appointment of a substitute or successor is to be made by the said Tucker in writing, and such substitute or successor shall have the same powers and authority as the present trustee; or if said appointment of a new trustee shall not, from accident or otherwise, be made by the present trustee, or his successor, then the then judge of probate for the county of Lincoln shall appoint one in case of a vacancy as provided by law." Tucker, the trustee, declined both trusts, in a writing addressed to the judge of probate, in the following words, viz.: "I decline both trusts, and recommend the Hon. John Babson as the most proper and suitable person for the acceptance of the above trust, in my place and stead." Thereupon the judge of probate passed a decree in substance as follows: "And the said Richard H. Tucker having in writing declined the trust reposed in him by virtue of said instrument, (the will,) ordered, that John Babson be administrator with the will annexed, first giving bond, with sureties," etc. A bond was furnished, in addition to one as administrator, approved and ordered to be recorded, containing the recital "that whereas the said John Babson has been appointed by the judge of probate trustee of the estate of Sarah McCrate, late of Wiscasset, deceased, agreeably to the provisions of the last will and testament of said Sarah McCrate, and certain property having come into his hands in trust for purposes in said will set forth: now, therefore, if the said John Babson shall faithfully execute such trust according to the will of the testatrix, so far as is consistent with law, and shall make a true and perfect inventory," etc. Plaintiff thereupon proceeded to execute the trust, and under this state of the title took out a policy in the name of "John Babson," describing the property as "his dwelling house," although it appeared in evidence that the facts as to title were communicated to the company when the insurance was effected.

Held that the facts disclosed an insurable interest in plaintiff, and judgment was entered for plaintiff.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — SEWING MACHINES — ANTICIPATION.

1. The reissued letters patent granted to John Bachelder, December 12th, 1865, for an "improvement in sewing machines," and extended [by act] for seven years from the 8th of May, 1870, are infringed by the Whitney sewing machine, which uses, as a perpetual feed, the feed of Allen B. Wilson, covered by reissued patent No. 346, granted to him January 22d, 1856, and reissued patent No. 414, granted to him December 9th, 1856.

[Cited in Potter v. Stewart, 7 Fed. 215.]

2. A decision, in a suit brought for an infringement of the Wilson patents, that the prior existence of the Bachelder patent did not destroy the novelty of the Wilson patents, is not a decision that the use of the feeding arrangement of the Wilson patents does not infringe the Bachelder patent.

3. The Wilson patents cover inventions not found in the Bachelder patent, but a machine constructed according to the Wilson patents embraces inventions claimed in the Bachelder patent.

[In equity. Suit by John Bachelder against William J. Moulton and others on reissued letters patent for an "improvement in sewing machines," granted to complainant December 12, 1865. Complainant moves for provisional injunction. Granted.

[The original patent was granted to same May 8, 1849. There were two intermediate reissues, and an extension. The claims of the reissue sued upon are as follows: "First. I claim, in combination, the supporting bed, which supports the material horizontally in the machine, and is provided with a throat for the passage of the needle and the constant yielding pressure-holder, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Second. I claim, in combination, the supporting bed, the constant yielding pressure holder, and the reciprocating eye-pointed needle, each having the func-

I claim, in combination, the supporting bed, the constant yielding pressure-holder, and the reciprocating needle-carrier, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Fourth. I claim, in combination, the supporting bed, the yielding pressure-holder, the reciprocating eye-pointed needle, and the perpetual feed which moves the material horizontally under and past the needle while it is supported by the supporting bed, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Fifth. I claim, in combination, the supporting bed, the yielding pressure-holder, the reciprocating needle-carrier, and the perpetual feed which moves the material horizontally upon and over the supporting bed, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Sixth. I claim, in combination, the holding surface which supports the material, immediately about the needle, horizontally under the thrust of the needle, and the perpetual feed which moves the material horizontally under and past the needle, upon and over such holding surface, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Seventh. I claim, in combination, the holding surface, which supports the material immediately about the needle, horizontally under the thrust of the needle, the perpetual feed which moves the material horizontally under and past the needle, upon and over such holding surface, and the receiving-plate, which receives the material from the feed during the operation of the machine in sewing a seam, each having the functions and mode of operation, hereinbefore specified. * * * Ninth. I claim, in combination, the horizontally holding surface immediately about the needle, the perpetual feed, and the yielding pressure-holder, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Tenth. I claim, in combination, the horizontally holding surface immediately about the needle, the perpetual feed, the yielding pressure-holder, and a reciprocating eye-pointed needle, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Eleventh. I claim, in combination, the horizontally holding surface immediately about the needle, the perpetual feed, the yielding pressure-holder, and the reciprocating needle-carrier, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Twelfth. I claim, in combination, the receiving plate and the perpetual feed, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Thirteenth. I claim, in combination, the horizontally holding surface immediately about the needle, the perpetual feed, and reciprocating needle-carrier, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified. Fourteenth. I claim, in combination, the perpetual feed, the receiving plate, and the yielding pressure-holder, each having the functions and mode of operation hereinbefore specified." The further facts necessary to an understanding of the case are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the court.] [2]

George Gifford and Solomon J. Gordon, for plaintiff.

Theodore Cuyler and Andrew Boardman, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The reissued letters patent granted to the plaintiff, December 12th, 1865, for an "improvement in sewing machines," and on which the motion for a provisional injunction in this case is made, were the foundation of the suit of Potter v. Braunsdorf, [Case No. 11,321,] decided by this court, on final hearing. Every question necessary or pertinent to the decision of the present motion was considered in that case, and disposed of adversely to the defence. Since that time such reissued patent has been, by an act of congress approved July 14, 1870, (16 Stat. 656,) extended for seven years from the 8th of May, 1870.

The sewing machine of the defendants in the former case was called the Aetna machine, and employed, as a perpetual feeding device, a cylinder moving intermittently, by revolving on a horizontal axis, and so arranged that the cloth laid horizontally upon it, and was partially supported by it. Such cylinder was situated immediately in front of the needle, and was provided with a roughened surface, which acted from below, through an aperture in a horizontal table, upon the under surface of the cloth to be fed, and operated, in feeding, in combination with a yielding, curved pressure foot, which was pressed from above, by a spring, upon the upper surface of the cloth, such foot also acting as a needle stripper. The Aetna machine was provided, also, with the other devices necessary to make up the combinations covered by the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and eleventh claims of the Bachelder patent, namely, a reciprocating eye-pointed needle and a reciprocating needle-carrier, moving substantially in vertical planes, a horizontal holding surface provided with a throat for the passage of the needle, (such holding surface forming part of the supporting bed,) and a table, a part of which was so arranged with reference to the feed as to receive and aid in supporting the material, in its passage from the feed. In the Aetna machine the material could be fed perpetually while it was supported horizontally, and a seam of any length could be sewn, without requiring the sewing to be stopped at any time to attach a fresh portion of the material to the feeding instrument. This is a material feature distinguishing the Bachelder machine from those which preceded it. The Aetna machine had, it is true, a capacity beyond that of the Bachelder machine, namely, that of sewing a seam of any desired curvature, arising from the fact that, in the Bachelder machine, the material is impaled on pins, while, in the Aetna machine, the roughened surface of the feeding cylinder engaged with the material only to such extent as was necessary to move the material forward, but not to such extent as to prevent the free lateral turning of the material by the operator, during the process of feeding, so as to produce a curved or angular seam. But this, though an improvement on Bachelder's invention, embodied that invention.

The machine of the defendants in the present case is known as the Whitney sewing machine, and uses, as a perpetual feed, what is known as the feed of Allen B. Wilson. That feeding arrangement was covered by two patents issued to Wilson, which have now expired. One of them, reissue No. 346, issued January 22d, 1856, was extended, and expired November 12th, 1871. It covered, in its claims, four features of invention: (1) The described method of causing the material to be sewed to progress regularly, by the joint action of the surfaces between which it is clamped, and which act in conjunction; (2) holding the material at rest by the needle, or its equivalent, in combination with the method of causing it to progress regularly; (3) arranging the described feeding surfaces in such relation to the needle, that they or one of them shall perform the office of stripping the material from the needle; (4) so mounting and attaching one of the feeding surfaces to some other part of the machine, that it may be removed or drawn away from the other surface at pleasure. The other patent, reissue No. 414, issued December 9th, 1856, was extended, and expired November 12th, 1871. It covered, by one of its claims, a combination of three elements, namely, a table or platform to support the material to be sewed, holding it for the action of the needle, and presenting it properly to the grasp of the feeding apparatus; a sewing mechanism proper, consisting of a needle and shuttle, or their equivalents; and a mechanical feed, automatic and causing the cloth to progress regularly, to which the cloth is not attached, and so grasping the cloth that it may be turned and twisted by the hand of an operator, such twisting not interfering with the regular progression of the cloth. The feed of Wilson consists of two surfaces or bars, which clamp the material. The material is advanced and moved forward under the needle, to receive the stitches, by the joint operation of such two surfaces or bars. One of such bars has a rough surface and a lateral motion. The other has a smooth surface and no lateral motion.

The machine of the defendants has Bachelder's horizontal holding surface, in having a small horizontal round plate, through slots in which teeth on the reciprocating feed-bar project upward, on which plate the material immediately about the needle rests, so as to be borne up horizontally under the thrust of the needle, such plate being perforated with an opening or throat for the passage of the needle.

The machine of the defendants has Bachelder's receiving plate, in that portion of the said round plate which receives and supports the material as it passes from the feed.

The machine of the defendants has Bachelder's yielding pressure-holder, in having a spring pressure-foot near the needle, which rests on the upper surface of the material, and holds the material to the bed on which it is supported, the pressure foot adapting itself to variations in the thickness of the material.

The machine of the defendants has a reciprocating eye-pointed needle and a reciprocating needle carrier, substantially like those of Bachelder.

In all these particulars in which the Aetna machine was like the Bachelder machine, the defendants' machine does not differ from the Aetna machine. This embraces all particulars except the feed. In the defendants' machine, the cloth is advanced regularly and horizontally, by an intermittent motion, through the joint action of the rough surface of the moving bar beneath and the surface of the pressure foot above. It is apparent that, in the arrangement and operation of the defendants' feed, and its relations to other co-operating parts of the machine, there are the following material features in common with Bachelder's machine: The cloth lies horizontally on the feeding device, and a portion of the surface of the cloth which lies immediately in front of the needle, and of the horizontal holding surface, is supported by the feeding device during the act of feeding. The material is fed perpetually, so that a seam of any length can be sewn without removal or replacement of the parts of the machine. The material is delivered, with a seam sewn in it, upon the receiving plate.

In the Bachelder machine different portions of the belt are feeding at different times, as, in the Aetna machine, different portions of the cylinder were feeding at different times, while, in the defendants' machine, the same part of the feeding bar always acts in feeding. But this difference is immaterial. The action of the parts employed at any one time, in feeding, is the same, in the two machines, so far as the essence of Bachelder's invention of a perpetual feed is concerned. So, too, it is an immaterial difference, that, in the Bachelder machine, the feeding device is always in contact with the material, and always aids in supporting it, while, in the defendants' machine, the feeding device is not always in contact with the material, and, therefore, only aids at intervals in supporting it. Equally immaterial is it, that, the defendants' feeding bar being provided with a roughened surface, instead of with impaling pins, seams of any desired angularity or curvature can be sewn in the defendants' machine, while such seams cannot be sewn in the Bachelder machine. This is the same difference which existed between the Aetna machine and the Bachelder machine. The increased capacity given to the machine by the facility of turning and twisting the material, due to the absence of impaling pins, is an improvement, but the vital features of Bachelder's arrangement are retained. The feeding device of the defendants has a horizontal surface which, at the time of feeding, aids in supporting the material, and thus makes the feeding possible, and is a perpetual feed, and delivers the material to and upon the receiving plate.

The point most strenuously urged on behalf of the defendants is, that heretofore suits have been brought in many of the courts for infringement of the reissued patents of Wilson, before mentioned, Nos. 346 and 414; that the defendants in those suits have set up the prior existence of the Bachelder machine, and the prior granting of the Bachelder patent, as destroying the novelty of the above-recited claims of the Wilson patents; and that it has been uniformly held that there was nothing in the Bachelder machine or the Bachelder patent to invalidate those claims. These decisions of the courts are urged as decisions that the feeding arrangement of Wilson and the feeding arrangement of Bachelder do not interfere with each other, and, consequently, that the use of the feeding arrangement of Wilson cannot infringe the Bachelder patent. But this is not a logical conclusion from what was decided in the cases referred to. All that was decided in those cases was, that the claims of the Wilson patents covered inventions which were not to be found in the Bachelder patent—inventions beyond anything found in the Bachelder patent, being the inventions claimed in the Wilson patents; but there was no decision that a machine constructed according to the descriptions contained in the specifications of the Wilson patents did not embrace inventions claimed in the Bachelder patent. No such decision could have been made, because no such question was involved. The principle properly applicable to the decision of the question involved in the present motion is a familiar one in the patent law. Bachelder had no right to use Wilson's improvements, without Wilson's consent. Wilson, on the other hand, had no right, in constructing a machine containing his own improvements, to embody therein the improvements patented by Bachelder, without Bachelder's consent.

Nothing is shown which anticipates Bachelder's inventions on the point of novelty. The plaintiff's title and the validity of his claims are free from doubt, and have been established, and the infringement by the defendants' machine is clear. An injunction must issue on all the claims.

CORPORATIONS—STOCK—TRANSFER—INDEBTEDNESS ON SUBSCRIPTION.

[1. A by-law of a corporation, that no transfer of stock shall be made or allowed by any stockholder who at the time is indebted to the corporation, merely attaches a condition to the right of property in the stock for the better security of corporate creditors, and does not conflict with the Missouri law which declares personal estate to be transferable in the manner prescribed by law, even if it be construed to prohibit the assignment of stock while part of the subscription remains unpaid.]

[See Brent v. Bank of Washington, Case No. 1,834; In re Dunkerson, Id. 4,156; Mechanics' Bank v. Seton, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 299.]

[2. An unpaid subscription to stock, for which the subscriber has executed notes to the corporation, is a debt, within the meaning of a by-law which prohibits the transfer of stock by a stockholder who is indebted to the corporation.]

[3. When such a by-law is in force, the officers or directors of the corporation cannot, as against creditors of the corporation, relieve a stockholder from liability on his unpaid subscription by registering a transfer of the stock, and delivering up the notes of the stockholder for the subscription.]

[See National Bank v. Watsontown Bank, 105 U. S. 217.]

[4. A statutory provision that "no shares shall be transferred until all previous calls shall have been fully paid in" does not prevent the corporation from further limiting the right of transfer by a by-law that no transfer shall be made while the stockholder is indebted to the corporation.]

[5. Under an assignment of stock which authorizes an officer of the corporation to make the necessary transfer on the books of the corporation, the officer is the agent of the assignor, in making the transfer, and not of the corporation; and any laches on his part in executing it is chargeable to the assignor, and not to the corporation.]

[In bankruptcy. Suit by the assignee in bankruptcy of Bachman to recover the balance due on a stock-subscription. On demurrer to answer. Sustained.]

Karnes & Ess, for plaintiff.

Johnson & Botsford and Gage & Ladd, for defendant.

KREKEL, District Judge. The assignee in bankruptcy brings this his suit to recover of defendant six thousand dollars, balance of stock subscription of seven thousand five hundred dollars, on which two payments, one of seven hundred and fifty dollars, prior to organization, and another of seven hundred and fifty dollars, on call after organization, had been made. The petition is in the usual form, declaring on balance of subscription. The answer is, that on the 9th day of November, 1871, the defendant sold and assigned to one Keefer, sixty-five shares of the stock by him held (on which twenty per cent. had been paid, twenty-two dollars and sixty-six cents per share); that he assigned the certificate in due form, and that the transfer was duly entered upon the books of the bank; that Keefer at the time of the sale and transfer was solvent, and that defendant did not make the sale to avoid any responsibility on his part to the bank: that at the time of said transfer on the books of the bank, he received the notes which he had executed for his stock to the bank, to the amount of six thousand five hundred dollars, and therefore claims that he is discharged from any liability to the bank on account of said subscription to the extent of six thousand five hundred dollars. As to the remaining ten shares, the answer sets up a similar assignment to Tobener, who was president of the bank, but does not allege that the assignment and transfer were entered upon the books of the bank (but alleges knowledge on the part of the bank of the assignment), and avers that the remainder of his stock notes were delivered up. This last assignment was made on the 10th day of February, 1873, is alleged to have been bona fide and for value, and that Tobener was then and is now solvent, and therefore claims to be discharged of any liability on account of these ten shares. The bank was declared bankrupt on the 12th of April, 1873.

To this answer a demurrer is interposed, assigning for causes, that the assignments and transfers set up constitute no defense as to the sixty-five, nor ten shares of stock, because the defendant at the time of making the assignment and transfers was indebted on stock subscription to the bank, and that being so indebted, he could not make a valid assignment and transfer, on account of a by-law prohibiting it, so long as he was indebted to the bank. As to the ten shares, the demurrer assigns in addition to the indebtedness, that the transfer was never made on the books of the company. This bank was organized under the general incorporation act of the state of Missouri, containing this provision, among the enumerated powers of organization under it: "To make by-laws not inconsistent with existing law, for the management of its property, the regulation of its affairs, and for the transfer of its stock." One of the by-laws of the bank provides as follows: "Certificates may be assigned by indorsement on the back, but no transfer of stock shall be valid except when made upon the books of this bank, on return of said certificate, and no transfer shall be made or allowed by any stockholder who at the time is indebted to the bank. Stock may be transferred by the owner or by a legally authorized agent." The reasons assigned by defendant why this by-law does not apply to the case before the court, are, that stock subscription is not a debt within its meaning; that if it is, the officers of the bank had a right to, and have waived it, and that the construction contended for by plaintiff would make the stock unassignable while not fully paid up, thus coming in conflict with the law of the state which declares its personal estate transferable in the manner prescribed by the laws of the company; "but no shares shall be transferred until all previous calls shall have been fully paid in." 1 Wag. St. p. 292, § 16.

The stock certificates of the bank are as follows: "Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 12, 1870. This certifies that Q. A. Bachman is the owner of —— shares of the capital stock of the Union German Savings Bank, of Kansas City, Mo., transferable only on the books of said bank, in accordance with the by-laws thereof, in person or by attorney, on the surrender of this certificate. P. W. Ditsch, President. Signed. John S. Harris, Cashier." On the back of said certificate there was a printed blank form for the transfer thereof, in words and figures as follows: "For value received —— hereby sell, transfer, and assign —— shares of stock within mentioned, authorize the cashier of said bank to make the necessary transfer on the books of the bank. Witness —— hand and seal, this —— day of ——, 187-. ——." [Seal.] The answer regarding the assignments alleges that these blanks were properly filled when assignments and transfers were made.

Chief Justice Waite in Pollard v. Bailey, [20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 520,] says that "the individual liability of stockholders in a corporation, for the payment of its debts, is always a creature of the statute. At common law it does not exist." We must then look to the statutes of Missouri to determine the liability of the defendant. As the question mainly turns upon the by-law regarding transfers of stock, while stock subscription remained unpaid, the first inquiry is: Does it conflict with any law of the state if it is construed to prohibit assignment of stock, while part of the subscription for it remained unpaid? The supreme court of Missouri has said, that even if such by-law did conflict with the general law governing transfer of property in this state, it is valid. St. Louis Perpetual Ins. Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo. 150; Mechanics' Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 45 Mo. 513. In what it would be said to conflict with the statute law governing the transfer of personal property, is not easy to be seen. Here is the creation of a peculiar kind of property by the state, by virtue of its incorporation acts, and to say that it cannot attach conditions looking to the better security of creditors regarding the transfer of stock, is to deny it a control which experience is demanding. Nor must it be overlooked that it is not interfering with the disposition of the stock, further than requiring it to be done on conditions. The by-law is held not to be in conflict with the statute law, but proper and reasonable.

The next inquiry is: Was the unpaid subscription conflicting with the case of Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484, a debt within the meaning of the by-law? The Missouri cases decide that it makes no difference whether the debt is due or to become due, that either fall within the by-law. The difference between the cases cited and the case before the court, is, that they were ordinary debts, such as loans and indorsements, and here it is a balance on stock subscription. This is certainly a debt, and a debt of a very high nature. Justice Miller in the case of Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 610, speaking of stock subscriptions, and the right of creditors of insolvent corporations to look into and assail the transaction by which defendant claims to have paid it, says: "Though it be a doctrine of modern date, we think it now well established that the capital stock of a corporation, especially its unpaid subscriptions, is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation. And when we consider the rapid development of corporations as instrumentalities of the commercial and business world in the last four years, with the corresponding necessity of adapting legal principles to the new and varying exigencies of this business, it is no solid objection to such a principle that it is modern for the occasion, for it could no sooner have arisen."

But it is said, and so alleged in the answer, that the by-law was never understood, construed, or intended by the officers or directors of the bank, as prohibiting or preventing the transfer of stock by reason of being indebted on unpaid stock subscription. The answer to this is, that a creditor of an insolvent bank is not bound by what the officers and directors may have understood, or now, after the bank is insolvent, understand, by the by-law. No act of the corporation, as distinguished from acts of its officers, is pleaded to show its understanding, and still, if it were, it is very questionable whether they could thus indirectly be permitted to fritter away a by-law which the law authorized them to make, and which they did make. The allegations of the answer, that the purchasers of the stock were insolvent at the time of making the transfers, may show the prudence of defendant with reference to further liability, but cannot change his obligation as a subscriber of stock. Could the officers of the bank who entered the transfer of the sixty-five shares of the stock to Keefer on the books of the bank, and delivered up the stock notes, waive the by-law regarding the indebtedness to the bank, and thereby make the transfer valid? But for the delivering up of the stock notes, all other acts of theirs could well be construed as not intending to release the original subscriber, for they may have viewed it as getting additional security. Be this as it may, for the want of power in them, their acts are void and of no avail, so far as it affects the liability of this defendant to the bank and its creditors, here represented by the assignee.

A more difficult question, however, arises in case the views expressed as to the argument and transfer of the stock and the powers of the officers of the bank are erroneous, and that is: Can a stockholder, even by the consent of the officers of the bank, discharge the liability of an original stock-subscriber, and undertake to substitute another party in his place, without the stock being paid up when creditors are to be affected? In the case of Sawyer v. Hoag, already cited, it is said that "the governing officers of a corporation cannot, by agreement or other transaction with the stockholder, release the latter from his obligation to pay to the prejudice of its creditors, except by fair and honest dealing and for a valuable consideration." Assuming that the officers of the bank intended to act fairly and honestly, they certainly did not obtain any consideration whatever in the transfer. They seem even to have failed, so far as the pleadings show, to take any obligation of Keefer, whatever, a requirement necessary, according to a number of decided cases, to make the transfer valid. That they acted in violation of the by-law, if it applied to stock-subscription, cannot be doubted. Looking into the nature of the transaction itself, we find a number of subscribers taking stock, all, perhaps (except the first), because of the known ability of co-subscribers to meet their undertakings. In order to avoid having others not known to them substituted in their place, they cause a by-law to be passed that no stock shall be transferred, unless it be done upon the books of the bank and on return of certificate, and no transfer to be made or allowed by a stockholder who at the time is indebted to the bank. Well may the supreme court of Missouri consider this a reasonable by-law; and no less strong is the appeal to this court not to interfere with the security which subscribers for stock have thus provided for themselves and creditors. The stock certificate sets out on its face that transfers must be made in accordance with the by-laws of the bank, so that all parties had notice, and therefore cannot complain if their attempt to violate it is held nugatory and of no avail. Holding original subscribers to stock liable, so far as creditors are concerned, until the whole of the stock subscribed is paid, avoids all conflicts, so far as the various provisions of the statute in reference to collecting dues are concerned, and is on that account to be favored, as well as because it affords the remedy intended when the organization was effected.

In reference to the transferring of stock, the statute, as we have seen, provides that no shares shall be transferred until all previous calls thereon shall have been fully paid up. It is contended that, the law limiting the transfer of stock to unpaid calls, the board had no right by by-law to still further limit it. This is not the view of the supreme court of Missouri in the cases cited. The legislature may well have intended that, so far as calls were concerned, they should, at any rate, be paid in order to afford security to that extent, at least, and to avoid disputes as to who should pay them, leaving any further limitation and security to be provided by the stockholders, which they did in the legitimate exercise of their authority.

The foregoing views apply to the ten shares as well as to the sixty-five shares. But the fact that the transfer of the ten shares was not entered upon the books of the bank, and that the transferee is responsible, calls for an opinion as to the effect of the difference. The by-law, aside from the provision that the assignor shall not be indebted to the bank at the time of making the transfer, also provides that it must be done on the books of the bank. It is not sufficient to have authorized an officer of the bank, by filling up the blank on the back of the certificate. That officer, by virtue of the authority given him, became the agent of the defendant, and not the bank, and if he failed to act, the laches were those of the defendant. The fact that Tobener was the president of the bank, and that the assignment was brought to the notice of the officers of the bank, cannot be substituted for the requirements of the by-law. That Tobener, the assignee, is insolvent, might become a question if the assignor was insolvent, and an attempt was made to collect the balance of unpaid stock on the ten shares of him. An assignee of stock may, no doubt, do such acts as make him liable to the corporation and its creditors, but under the holding, this is not necessary to be determined. The law on the demurrer is with the plaintiff, and the demurrer sustained.

[At law. Action by Joseph Bachman, trustee of Kattenhorn, against H. Everding and Edward Bebee, for money had and received. Heard on plaintiff's motion to strike out defendant's answer, and for judgment. Motion denied, with costs.]

J. W. Whalley, for motion.
Erasmus D. Shattuck, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. This is an action for money had and received. It was commenced February 24, 1870. The complaint alleges that on August 28, 1869, Kattenhorn was adjudged a bankrupt in this court, and that, thereafter, such proceedings were had thereon, that the plaintiff on October 14, 1869, was confirmed by this court as trustee of said estate, and is still such trustee; and that said defendants on September 4, 1869, received from the firm of Everding & Co., of San Francisco, $374.47 gold coin, for the benefit of said bankrupt's estate, and to the use of this plaintiff; and afterwards, the plaintiff demanded payment of said money from said defendants, which demand defendants refused, and that, by virtue of the premises, there is now due to the plaintiff the sum aforesaid, in gold coin.

On March 2, defendants demurred to complaint, because the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

After argument the demurrer was overruled; and on March 10, the defendants filed an answer. The answer contains two separate pleas or defenses:

First—A denial that the defendants on, etc., received the sum aforesaid or any other sum from Everding & Co., of San Francisco, or "that the same or any other sum was received by them for the benefit of the estate of said Kattenhorn, or for or to the use of the plaintiff."

Second—That said Everding & Co., about September 4, 1869, did "credit to defendants the said sum of $374.47, received by them from the sale of property belonging to Kattenhorn before his bankruptcy, "which property was sold by E. & Co." before August 28, 1869; and that about said day in September "said sum of $374.47 of the proceeds of said sale was placed to the credit of these defendants by said E. & Co."

On March 14, plaintiff moved to strike out the answer and for judgment, which motion was then argued and submitted.

The grounds specified in the motion to strike out are that the answer is sham and frivolous. In argument, counsel maintained that the first plea was shown to be false by the second one. That both could not be true. That the second one admitted what the first one denied—the receipt of the money belonging to the estate of which the plaintiff is trustee; and that the second one being in contemplation of law an admission of the cause of action, is therefore frivolous.

Under the Code, as under the statute of 4 Anne, a defendant is entitled to plead as many defenses to an action as he may have; and one cannot be taken to help or destroy another, but each must stand or fall by itself. Gould, Pl. 432; Jackson v. Stetson, 15 Mass. 58, note a; Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671; Ketcham v. Zerega, 1 E. D. Smith, 560.

A plea is called sham when it is palpably false on its face. But this falsity cannot be shown by comparing it with another plea or defense in the same answer. Otherwise the privilege of pleading several defenses would, in practice, be restricted within very narrow limits, for fear of one being considered by implication of law to contradict the other. The admissions in each plea or defense, if any, are to be taken as made only for the purpose of the issue made or tendered by it.

In this view of the matter, there is no ground for saying that the first plea is false and therefore sham. It is a mere denial that the money was received to the use of the plaintiff, and for aught that appears may be true. Besides, the motion being to strike out the whole answer as sham, is too broad. A motion to strike out, like exceptions for impertinence in chancery, is not allowed, if any of the matter included in it is properly pleaded.

The application to strike out the whole answer on the ground that the second plea is frivolous, is open to the same objection.

Nor do I consider such second plea frivolous. Admit the claim of the plaintiff, that the plea is merely an admission that the money in question was received by the defendant to plaintiff's use, may not a party defendant expressly admit the plaintiff's cause of action by his answer, as well as impliedly so by nil dicit—a failure to answer?

Where no other defense is made than by a plea which the plaintiff conceives to be in legal effect a confession of the cause of action, he should move for judgment on the pleadings, and not to strike out. Motion denied with costs.

BACHMAN v. PACKARD.

[2 Sawy. 264;[1] 7 N. B. R. 353; 4 Pac. Law Rep. 193.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Nov. 18, 1872.

CONCURRENT JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS—ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURTS.

1. The concurrent jurisdiction conferred upon the circuit court by section 2 of the bankrupt act is limited to cases where there is a controversy concerning the right to, or some interest in, some specific thing between the assignee and a third person, and does not include an action to collect a simple debt.

[Distinguished in Brooke v. McCracken, Case No. 1,932. Approved in Smith v. Crawford, Id. 13,030. Disapproved in Walker v. Towner, Id. 17,089.]

2. The district courts have original jurisdiction of all cases and controversies between third persons and the assignee in bankruptcy as such.

[Cited in Olney v. Tanner, 10 Fed. 104.]

At law. This action was commenced on May 30, 1872, by the plaintiff as assignee in bankruptcy of the partnership and undivided estates of M. S. Hart, E. K. Packard and W. H. Moulthrop, doing business as M. S. Hart & Co., to recover a sum of money alleged to be due upon a promissory note made by the defendant on February 3, 1870, to said Hart or order, for $800 in gold coin, with interest at twelve per centum per annum.

It appears from the complaint that the partnership of M. S. Hart & Co. was duly adjudged bankrupt in this court on February 6, 1872, and that on the nineteenth of the same month plaintiff was duly chosen assignee of said estate.

Defendant demurred to the complaint, and assigned for cause that "the court has not jurisdiction of the subject of the action." [Demurrer sustained.]

John W. Whalley, for plaintiff.
Richard Williams, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The question made upon the argument of the demurrer turns upon the construction to be given to the following clause of section 2 of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517, c. 176.]

"Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity, which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to, or vested in, such assignee."

Is the defendant in this action a "person claiming an adverse interest * * * touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt," etc.? If he is not, the court has no jurisdiction, and the demurrer is well taken.

For a better understanding of the subject reference may be had to section 1 of the act, defining the jurisdiction of the district courts. From this it appears that such jurisdiction not only extends "to all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy," strictly speaking, but in effect, "to all cases and controversies" consequent upon the proceeding in bankruptcy, and until the close thereof.

The clause quoted from section 2 of the act does not give the circuit courts concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of "proceedings in bankruptcy," but only "of all suits at law or in equity" brought by or against an assignee in bankruptcy concerning certain property and rights of property. And this tends to show further that congress did not intend to hereby give the circuit courts jurisdiction of any or all suits at law or in equity, by or against an assignee, as it is conceded it had already done in the case of the district courts. Goodall v. Tuttle, [Case No. 5,533.] Otherwise there would have been no use of the qualification that one party or the other to the suit in the circuit court must be one "claiming an adverse interest" in or "touching the property or rights of property * * * vested in the assignee."

In such case the clause would most naturally have read: Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity which may be brought by or against the assignee in bankruptcy, as such —or "under and in virtue of the bankruptcy." From this view of the matter it appears more than probable that the concurrent jurisdiction of the circuit courts was intended to include only a certain class of suits by or against an assignee, as such, and that therefore it is a matter to be ascertained whether this action is within this class or not.

This action is one brought to recover a simple debt due the estate—a means of collecting an asset of the bankrupt. So far as appears, the debtor does not deny the debt, but simply neglects to pay it according to his promise. He either owes the debt or he does not. In the first case, he certainly cannot claim an adverse interest in it or anything concerning it, as against the plaintiff; and in the second case, there being no debt, nothing exists in which any one can have or claim an interest.

The sum which it appears the defendant owes, and the plaintiff seeks to recover is not any specific money or property. At present, the assignee only has a right of action against the defendant, whereby he seeks to judicially establish the existence of the alleged debt, and thus be enabled to enforce its collection out of any property which the defendant may then have subject to seizure and sale on execution.

The term "interest," as used in the act, signifies an estate, share or part, and a suit to be maintained in the circuit court by or against an assignee must be concerning some property or right of property derived from the bankrupt, and in which it must appear, that one party or the other claims an interest, adversely to, that is, against the other.

In this case, the defendant does not appear to claim any interest in the debt alleged to be due the plaintiff, and as has been shown, it is impossible in the nature of things that he should have such interest.

I should not have considered it necessary, in deciding this question, to do more than state it, and cite the act upon which the plaintiff relies, but for certain decisions made under a precisely similar clause in the act of 1841.

In Mitchell v. Great Works M. & M. Co., [Case No. 9,662,] Mr. Justice Story held that the circuit court had jurisdiction of a suit in equity to recover a debt. The case before the court was a suit for an account by the assignee. It appears that the principal question in the case was, whether any national court had jurisdiction. The court proceeds at length to show that congress did not intend to leave the administration of the bankrupt system to the state courts, but that the district courts had ample jurisdiction for all purposes of the act, including "the jurisdiction to entertain all suits, to adjust all adverse claims, and to collect all outstanding debts," and thence concludes that the circuit courts have the same. The reasoning in support of this latter conclusion is brief, and, to my mind, unsatisfactory. It rests mainly upon the mere assumption that an "adverse party" in an action to recover a debt is necessarily a party claiming "an adverse interest" in property or a right of property derived from the bankrupt.

In McLean v. Lafayette Bank, [Case No. 8,885,] Mr. Justice McLean held that under the act of 1841, the concurrent jurisdiction of the circuit courts "reaches every possible controversy which can arise in the collection and distribution of the effects of the bankrupt." This conclusion is simply an arbitrary deduction from the fact that such jurisdiction was vested in the district courts.

It is also to be noted in this case as in Mitchell v. Great Works M. & M. Co., supra, that the principal question made before the court was not whether the circuit or district courts had jurisdiction, but whether the jurisdiction did not belong to the state court: and that the opinion was given in a suit in equity by the assignee against parties claiming liens upon the property of the bankrupt, which the assignee alleged were obtained in fraud of the bankrupt law, and which were then being enforced in the state court. If the district court had jurisdiction, undoubtedly the circuit court had also. It was not a mere action for the collection of a simple debt, but a suit to ascertain and adjust adverse claims to specific property. These are the only authorities that have been found to support the position of the plaintiff that this court had jurisdiction of this action. Notwithstanding my respect for the learned and great judges who gave these opinions, I cannot concur with them, and am satisfied that in this respect they spoke inadvertently and without due consideration. Neither have these opinions been followed by any of the judges before whom this question has arisen under the bankrupt act of 1867. In Bump, Bankr. (4th Ed.) 291, the cases of Morgan v. Thornhill, [11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 65;] Woods v. Forsyth, [Case No. 17,992,] and In re Alexander, [Id. 160,] are cited, as deciding that controversies to be cognizable under the concurrent jurisdiction clause of section two in the circuit courts "must have respect to some property or right of property of the bankrupt, transferable or vested in the assignee," and the suit "must be in the name of one of two parties described in this clause and against the other;" and that such jurisdiction "is confined to cases in which there is a disputed title or claim to property or assets adverse to that of the assignee is set up. The circuit courts cannot entertain suits brought by the assignee to collect debts due to the bankrupt estate."

Goodall v. Tuttle, supra, was like this, an action to recover a debt due the bankrupt. In the course of a learned and able opinion upon the question whether a district court other than the one where the bankruptcy proceedings are pending can take jurisdiction of an action by the assignee to collect assets of the bankrupt, Hopkins, J., says: "That section two clothes the circuit court with concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in certain (not all) cases arising under the act, but not of the character of this case."

In Sedgwick v. Casey, [Case No. 12,610,] Blatchford, J., held that a suit to collect a debt did not come within this clause, and therefore was not within the limitation of two years made applicable to suits of which the circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction.

In my judgment this action is not within the letter of the clause or reason of it. The defendant is not a person claiming an adverse interest, as against the assignee, touching any property of the bankrupt involved in this action, neither does the plaintiff claim any such interest as against him. The jurisdiction of the action is vested in the district court. If it had been intended to confer the same jurisdiction upon the circuit and district courts in all suits at law or in equity which might be brought by or against the assignee, as distinguished from the summary proceedings which take place in the court of bankruptcy proper, and to which creditors are deemed to be parties, it was only necessary to say so in so many words. But the act, after giving the district courts unlimited jurisdiction in this respect, confers concurrent jurisdiction upon the circuit courts specially, and in language which cannot be fairly construed to include other than a certain class of suits, as controversies growing out of conflicting claims to, or interests in, some specific property or thing. In such cases congress deemed the matter of so much importance as to permit the plaintiff to commence his suit in the circuit court in the first instance. But in the matter of the collection of a debt, original jurisdiction is confined to the district courts, with the right of appeal to the circuit court, "when the debt or damages claimed amount to more than five hundred dollars." See section 8, Bankruptcy Act, [March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517, c. 126.]

The demurrer is sustained.

BACKHOUSE v. JETT et al.

[1 Brock. 500.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1821.

SLAVERY—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS — ISSUE AND PROFITS — EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

1. Where a chancery suit is depending against an administrator, and the cause has been referred by the court, to a commissioner, to ascertain the amount due by the administrator to the estate of his intestate, it is error in the commissioner to admit an administration account of the said administrator, which has been settled before another commissioner in the country, under the direction of a distinct tribunal, and while the suit in this court was pending, without the knowledge or participation of the complainant. The commissioner should require vouchers for each item in such account, and reject all items that are not established by competent testimony.

2. A father, in 1783, made a voluntary deed of gift of certain slaves to his only son, and possession followed and accompanied the deed. In 1785, the father died, having appointed his wife and another, executrix and executor of his last will. Subsequently, the son and donee qualified as administrator de bonis non upon his father's estate, and in that capacity, a judgment at law when assets was rendered against him for a considerable sum of money, the jury having found for the administrator on the plea of fully administered. Many years after the date of this judgment, the plaintiffs filed a bill in chancery against the administrator and others, assailing the deed of 1783, as fraudulent as to creditors, and claiming to have their debt discharged out of the property conveyed by that deed. Held: That the slaves conveyed by such voluntary deed, are not assets in the hands of the representative of the donor's estate, although such representative was the donee himself.

3. That though such voluntary deed is void as to creditors, whether the transaction involves moral turpitude or not, it vests in the donee a title that is good against all the world save creditors, and defeasible by them only. Though creditors have a claim upon the slaves, conveyed by such deed, for the payment of their debts, they have no title to the slaves themselves. The donee does not seem to be a mere trustee for creditors, and is not liable for the hires and profits of the slaves and their issue or for interest on the sales of such as have been sold, from the time that he received them, or that the slaves were sold, but is responsible only for the slaves themselves, and their issue, that were in being when the demand was made by the creditors, and their profits from that date, and for the money actually received for those which have been sold, and interest thereon, from the time that the demand was made; viz. from the institution of the suit.

[See Collinson v. Jackson, 14 Fed. 305; In re Grant, Case No. 5,693.]

In equity. On the 10th day of June, 1783, Thomas Jett, of the county of Westmoreland, Virginia, made a deed of gift of one half of all his lands in fee simple, and twenty-one slaves, which are mentioned in the deed by name, and also a moiety of all his other personal property of every kind, whatsoever, to his only son, William Storke Jett, for his support and advancement in life. This deed of gift was duly recorded in the county court of Westmoreland, on the 29th day of July, of the same year. In the month of February, 1785, Thomas Jett, the father, made his will, ratifying and confirming the deed of gift to his son William, and making sundry devises, and giving sundry specific legacies to his wife Sukey Jett, and other relatives. The testator appointed his wife and another, executrix and executor of his will; and during the spring or summer of 1785, he departed this life. Some time after the death of Thomas Jett, the then representatives of John Backhouse, the intestate of the complainant, instituted an action of assumpsit against William Storke Jett, the administrator, with the will annexed of Thomas Jett, deceased. The defendant pleaded the general issue of non assumpsit and plene administravit, and the jury found for the plaintiffs on the first issue, and for the defendant on the last. At the June term of this court, 1799, judgment when assets was rendered in favour of the plaintiffs for the sum of $3,378.56. A few years after the rendition of this judgment at law, the plaintiffs filed their bill in equity, in this court, against William Storke Jett, in his own right, and as administrator de bonis non of Thomas Jett, deceased, and the other legatees of Thomas Jett, alleging, that they had in their possession property belonging to the said Thomas Jett's estate, of which the jury had no knowledge at the trial of the issue of fully administered, and praying a discovery of the amount and value of said property, which was in their hands respectively, and that it might be subjected to the payment of the debt for which their judgment, at law, was rendered. No specific claim, however, was asserted in the bill, to the property conveyed by the deed of the 10th of June, 1783, to William Storke Jett. The principal defendant, William Storke Jett, admitted in his answer, that his father, Thomas Jett, died considerably indebted to the plaintiff's intestate, but insisted that all the assets that had come to his hands to be administered, had been faithfully applied to debts of equal, or superior dignity, to that due to the estate of John Backhouse. He denied that he had, as charged in the bill, delivered the specific legacies to the respective legatees, but affirmed that the subjects of those legacies had been, several years before the date of the will, given to the legatees, who had ever since had them in possession, and that they were mentioned in the will, as legacies, by way of confirming gifts, theretofore, made by the testator to his children, and also denied that they had ever gone into the hands of Thomas Jett's representatives as assets, or ever could in truth be so considered, as the gifts, being of personalty, were complete by the delivery, and an absolute title had thereby vested in the donees. Various orders were from time to time made in the cause, and in July, 1817, the surviving plaintiff filed his amended bill, assailing the deed made by Thomas Jett to his son William Storke Jett, before recited, as fraudulent and void as to creditors, the grantor being (as was alleged) largely indebted at the time of its execution, to an amount more than sufficient to absorb the residue of his estate, as was shown by its subsequent insolvency, under the administration of the donee himself. The amended bill, also charged that several debts of Thomas Jett had been paid from the personal fund, in the hands of the administrator, in discharge of specialties, which bound the land thus fraudulently conveyed, and to the amount of such disbursements, claimed that the plaintiff should be substituted in the place of the bond creditors, and have the benefit of the charge they might have asserted against the land, &c. William Storke Jett, in his amended answer maintained, that the deed of June, 1783, was valid, inasmuch as it was made by a man universally deemed solvent at the time, and affirming that the debts referred to in the amended bill, as specialty debts, were in truth but simple contract debts, being due upon bills of exchange, which did not bind the land: but that if the court should consider the said deed as void as to creditors, still in no event could he be charged with the increase and profits of the slaves, or for the value of such of them as were dead, or for interest upon the sales, &c., no notice having been given until the amended bill was filed, after a lapse of thirty-three years from the date of the deed, that the property thereby conveyed, would be sought to be made liable for the plaintiff's claim. At the June term of this court, 1819, the court "without deciding at present upon any of the points stated in the answer," made an interlocutory order, directing any commissioner of the court, to execute a prior order made in the cause, and recommitting it to the same commissioner, with specific instructions to report further, inter alia, accounts of the values of any estates derived, by any of the defendants, under gifts from the said Thomas Jett, in his lifetime, distinguishing in such accounts the real from the personal estate so derived, &c., and report thereof, to the court. In pursuance of this order, the commissioner made his report, stating that William Storke Jett. the administrator of Thomas Jett, had, at two different times, made up his administration accounts on Thomas Jett's estate, before commissioners appointed by the county court of Westmoreland, &c., dated the 22d day of September, 1798, showing a balance due the administrator, of £200 0 11½, and the last on the 18th of May, 1818, showing a balance in his favour of £1639 15 5½, "neither of which has been surcharged and falsified, nor attempted to be; therefore, the commissioner has (agreeably to the rule of our state courts) taken them as correct." The commissioner also reported the estimated value of the property, real and personal, conveyed by Thomas Jett to William Storke Jett, by the deed of 1783, allowing interest on the whole amount, from the 31st day of December, 1786. The estimated value of the slaves alone, with interest from that date, would more than satisfy the whole demand of the complainant. To this report various exceptions were taken, both by plaintiff and defendant, which are fully stated, and considered in the following opinion, delivered on the 6th day of June, 1821, by—

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. In this case, the plaintiff had instituted a suit on the common law side of the court, to which the defendant pleaded the general issue, and fully administered. The first was found for the plaintiff, and the second for the defendant, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, to be satisfied out of the assets of his testator, when they should come to his hands to be administered. This bill is filed, alleging, that assets were in the hands of the administrator, at the time the verdict was given, which were not known to the plaintiff, and were not shown to the jury, and that assets have since come to the hands of the administrator, which are liable for this debt. The bill, also, asserts a claim on the real estate, upon the principle of marshalling assets. The accounts were referred to a commissioner, and his report has been excepted to by both parties.

The plaintiff excepts, because the commissioner has given to an ex parte report, made by the county commissioners, to the county court of Westmoreland, while this suit demanding an account, was depending in this court, the same effect as would be allowed to such report, had it been made before the institution of this suit. This exception is sustained. While a suit for an account is depending, neither of the parties ought to be permitted to change their relative situation by a proceeding, without the knowledge, or the participation of the other. The commissioner, therefore, ought to have required vouchers for this account. It is said, that the deposition of Mr. Campbell, is a sufficient voucher for the most considerable item in it. The objection made to this deposition is, that this debt was not mentioned in the account, which was taken before the commissioners in 1798, nor in the answer filed in this cause.[2]

These omissions certainly throw some doubt over the claim for this credit, and require that it should be sustained by clear testimony; but they do not conclusively negative the right to it. When an administrator supposes himself to have fully administered the assets in his hands, he may be careless about adding to the sum he has overpaid; and when a plaintiff himself comes into a court of equity, after a verdict against him, on the plea of fully administered, to show assets at that time, in the hands of the administrator, he cannot be permitted to contest the right of the administrator, to show the disbursement of those assets. I shall, however, reserve the decision on this claim, till the report shall come in.[3]

The principal controversy between the parties, respects a number of slaves, comprised in a deed of gift made in his lifetime by Thomas Jett, the original debtor, to the defendant, his son, for his establishment in life. This deed being voluntary, is said to be fraudulent as to creditors, and the plaintiff claims the slaves and their hire, from the death of the donor. The defendant contends, that he is liable only for the slaves now alive, for the price of such as have been sold, and for interest and hires, if at all, only from the filing of the bill, in which the claim is made. The commissioner has charged the administrator, with the value of all these slaves, and with interest on this sum. Several exceptions have been made to this item of the account, and the instructions of the court, for regulating the conduct of the commissioner, have been required.

The plaintiff contends—1st, That these slaves were assets in the hands of the administrator. 2d, That a person, holding under a voluntary deed, is liable for profits. If the first point be decided in favour of the plaintiff, it will determine the question, for it has never been doubted that an administrator is liable for the profits, which have been made on the assets in his hands.

Are slaves then which are given by the owner in his lifetime, assets in the hands of his representative, if required for the payments of debts? If this was a case of the first impression, it would be decided by the words of the act of our state legislature, which makes such deeds of gift void against those only who may have been injured by them. As between the parties, they are to all intents and purposes valid. William Storke Jett, so far as respected any claim to be set up by Thomas Jett, was the owner of these slaves; and if this be true, they could not be assets in the hands of the representatives of Thomas Jett. But our statute is in a great degree copied from that of England, and so far as it is copied, Virginia is supposed to have adopted, with the statute, the settled English construction of it. It is therefore proper to examine the English cases on this point.

The counsel for the plaintiff relies much on Roberts, on Frauds, (volume 2, pp. 592, 593.)[4] Roberts says, "But, wherever a man makes a fraudulent gift of his goods and chattels, and dies indebted, the rule, upon the statute of Eliz. c. 5, has always been to construe the gift as utterly void against all his creditors, and the debtor to have died in full possession, with respect to their claims, so that the effects are just as much assets in the hands of the personal representatives, as to creditors, as if no such attempt to aliene them had been made." It is admitted, that Roberts lays down the rule, in broad and explicit terms. But very little attention to what immediately follows, will be sufficient to show that his expressions are very unguarded; and that if his proposition is true in any case, it is only in the case of the donor's retaining possession. This was the point determined in Bethel v. Stanhope, Cro. Eliz. 810.

In Bethel v. Stanhope, the donor died in possession, and the defendant had intermeddled with the goods, so as to become executor in his own wrong, before administration was granted to him. After administration granted, he delivered the goods to the donee, who was the daughter of the donor. The court determined, 1st, That the defendant might be sued as executor, and 2d, That the goods which had been in his possession, were assets, and remained such, notwithstanding the delivery to the donee. In addition to the very essential fact, that the donor, in this case, died in possession of the goods, there was a clause in the deed, that it should be void upon the payment of 20s, and the jury expressly find that it was made by covin, to defraud his creditors. As covin implies participation in the actual fraud on the part of the donee, it is presumed that she could not have recovered these goods in a suit against the donor, or his administrator. He was, therefore, in possession of the goods, which he might lawfully retain, and which were assets in his hands for the payment of debts. He could no more divest himself of these assets, or of his liability for them to creditors by delivering them to a donee, not having a legal right to demand them, than by delivering them to a legatee.

Roberts adds, "To give substantial effect to this construction, the voluntary donee is considered as liable to be charged as executor de son tort, if he take possession of the goods after the decease of the donor." Now, to me it seems difficult to reconcile this determination with the idea, that these goods are assets in the hands of the rightful executor. If any other person take them from the possession of the executor, he is a trespasser, and not an executor de son tort, unless he claims to take them as executor, or does other acts of an executor. This is expressly determined in Read's Case, 3 Coke, 33, pt. 5. It seems to me, that charging the donee, in this case, as executor de son tort, when another person would not be so charged for the same act, instead of proving, that they are assets in the hands of the rightful executor, goes far to prove the contrary. Read's Case contains another principle, which is decisive on the general question, where the possession has been parted with by the donor. The court says: "When the defendant takes the goods before the rightful executor hath taken upon him or proved the will, he may be charged as executor of his own wrong, for the rightful executor shall not be charged but with the goods which come to his hands after he takes upon him the charge of the will."

Now, if the executor shall not be charged with goods of which the testator died possessed, until they are reduced to actual possession, he shall not, a fortiori, be charged with goods of which the testator did not die possessed, but which he had given away in his lifetime. But to return to Roberts. He says, that where the goods are taken by the donee, after administration granted to another, he may be charged as executor de son tort: "and this," he adds, "seems to be a rule much in favour of the rightful executor and administrator, who cannot excuse himself upon the statute of Elizabeth, from delivering up the subject of his testator's, or intestate's fraudulent gift to the donee, if he demand it."[5]

Now, this proposition appears to me to be in direct opposition to that before laid down by the same author. If, under the statute, the executor is obliged to surrender the thing given to the donee, even where the donor dies in possession, and the thing is in his hands, he is not afterwards chargeable with the same property as assets, and, a fortiori, he cannot be charged with it, if it never came to his hands, but was delivered to the donee, in the lifetime of the testator.

This last doctrine of Mr. Roberts, is completely sustained by the case in Cro. Jac. 271.[6] In that case, the donor died in possession, and the donee sued the administrator, who pleaded, that the gift was fraudulent, and that his testator was indebted, and did not leave other assets sufficient to pay his debts. The plaintiff demurred, and the court gave judgment in his favour. This case seems to me to be entirely decisive of the whole question. If the administrator could not maintain his own possession against the donee, it is very clear that he could not defeat the possession of the donee; and if he could not, it is equally clear, that the law cannot consider the goods as assets in his hands.

Mr. Stanard also quoted 1 Madd. 218, and 2 Term R. 587.[7] But Maddox goes no further than to say, that the goods "shall still be considered as a part of the donor's estate for the benefit of his creditors;" that is, as I understand him, they shall be so considered in the hands of the donee; and the case in 2 Term R. only determines, that the donee may be considered as executor de son tort. I think, then, it is very clear, that, according to the English cases, as well as on the words of the statute, these slaves are no assets.

It is not denied that this is a case free from any charge of covin. There is no fraud in fact, or bad faith on the part of the donee. I think there was none on the part of the donor, for the case presents no reason for supposing that the deed was made in contemplation of insolvency, or with a view to defraud creditors. It is made two years before the death of the testator, and before the date of his will, and it is not pretended, that he was at the time in bad health. He does not appear to have been pressed by creditors, nor does the administration account exhibit debts of which he might be particularly apprehensive. There are no judgments, or even bonds; there is nothing to induce a suspicion, that he was not in good credit, or that he doubted his ability to pay any claim which might be brought against him. In this situation, he gives half his estate to his only son for his establishment in life. The policy of the law very properly declares this gift void as to creditors, but looking at the probable views of the parties at the time, there appears to be no moral turpitude in it. In such a case, is the donee responsible for more than the slaves themselves, including their issue now in existence, and their profits from the time they were claimed by creditors, and for the money actually received for those which have been sold, and for interest on that money, from the same time? Is he responsible for profits, which accrued before the creditor made his demand?

There is some difficulty in this question, considered merely on principle. The donee has title against all the world, except against creditors. He has a title defeasible by creditors only. It is good against the donor and his executors. Where a person having no title, holds the property of another, the profits belong to that other; but in this case, the slaves are not the property of the creditors. They have a claim upon them for satisfaction of their debts, but no title to them. Profits, in the hands of an executor, are liable for debts, because they form a part of the estate of the testator, and the executor receives them as trustee for that estate. But the donee is not a trustee for the estate of the testator; and it is not clear that he is a trustee for the creditors, since he has always held the property in his own right. It is by no means clear upon principle, where the title is not to the thing itself, but to have it sold in satisfaction of a debt, that this title can extend to the profits previously made of that thing, by a bona fide possessor.

It might be expected, that these questions had frequently arisen under a statute, passed in the reign of Elizabeth, and had been long settled. But I have been able to find no case in which it has arisen; and I am the more inclined to think it never has been made, because the gentlemen concerned in this cause would, I think, have found the case, had it existed. In Partridge v. Gopp, Amb. 596, a gift of money to daughters was declared void, and directed to be refunded, but no claim appears to have been made for interest. Viner, in his first volume, page 186, pl. 9, lays down the broad and general principle, that a bona fide possessor receives the profits as his own. But I should be much better satisfied could I see the case itself, and the reasoning on which the decision was made.

In the absence of decisions in cases of personal property, those which have been made respecting the profits of real estate have been resorted to on both sides, and gentlemen, reasoning from analogy, have applied the law in such cases, to voluntary gifts of chattels. It has been affirmed, and denied, that heirs, devisees, and all persons holding real estates as volunteers, are accountable to creditors for profits. The case of Davies v. Topp, 1 Brown, Ch. 524, has been relied on, as showing that the heir is accountable for profits. The report of that case, is remarkably confused and unsatisfactory. John Topp died in April 1778. The bill was brought for an account and application of the personal estate, not specially bequeathed, to the payment of debts; and in case the personal estate should not be sufficient, to have the deficiency raised by sale or mortgage of the real estate. The cause was heard at the rolls in February 1780, when it was directed, that the real estate should be sold, to make up any deficiency in the personal estate; and it was declared, that if the real estate should not be sufficient, the rents and profits should be applied to make up the deficiency. There are several parts of this decree, as stated, which appear to me to be very extraordinary; but I shall not notice them, because they do not apply to the question before the court, though they certainly bring the whole case into some doubt. But the decree, so far as it respects rents and profits, is expressed in general terms, not declaring, whether the rents and profits shall be computed from the death of the testator, or from the filing of the bill. In the particular case, it could not have been of much consequence, for the cause was heard at the rolls, in less than two years after the death of the testator, which leaves it probable, that no profits accrued between the death of the testator, and the filing of the bill. It does not appear, certainly, from the opinion of the chancellor, whether this case was affirmed or reversed, and in his opinion, not a syllable is said on that part of it which respects profits. The principal question, that on which the parties were desirous of obtaining the opinion of the court, appears to have been, whether, after purchased lands which descended to the heir, or specific legacies and lands, specifically devised, but charged with debts and legacies, should be first liable for those debts. The complexion of the case, gives some reason for the opinion, that the question of profits was, in fact, of no importance, and was not raised in the bill. This case, I think, leaves that question where it was found.

The cases in 2 Atk. are so obscurely reported, as to give no decisive information on the subject. In Sims v. Urry, 2 Ch. Cas. 225, the chancellor decreed profits only, from the time of pronouncing the decree.

Baron Weston's Case, as cited in 1 Vern. 174, was this: Baron Weston brought debt on a bond against the heir, but for three descents the heir continued an infant, so that the parol demurred. The guardian received the profits of the estate, and converted them to her own use. The baron brought an action against her, as administratrix of the children, but did not succeed. In the principal case, the counsel admitted that profits could not be demanded during minority.

In Waters v. Ebrall, 2 Vern. 606, it was determined, that a guardian was not compellable to apply the profits of a ward's estate, to the payment of bond debts.

In the case of Chambers v. Harvest, Mos. 124, the question was, whether the heir should account for profits from the time of filing the bill?

In 6 Ves. 93, (Pulteney v. Warren,) the chancellor says; "Where there has been an adverse possession, and upon an application to this court, upon grounds of equitable relief, the plaintiff appears entitled to an account of rents and profits, if there has been a mere adverse possession, without fraud or concealment, or an adverse possession of some instrument, without which the plaintiff could not proceed; the court has said, the account shall be taken only from the filing of the bill, for it is his own fault not to file it sooner."

In 7 Ves. 541, (Pettiward v. Prescott,) the amount of rents and profits was restrained to the time of filing the bill. These two cases from Vesey, are not cases where the heir is made liable for the debt of the ancestor. They are cases of title, which is much stronger. Even in them, the account has been restrained, where there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from having proceeded, to the time of filing the bill.

In the case of Shetelworth v. Neville, 1 Term R. 454, which was an action of debt against the heir, Ashhurst says: "Till the possession is recovered against him, (the heir,) he is entitled to the rents and profits; and he is entitled to receive them till judgment is given against him." Id. 457.

At common law, the heir who had aliened before action brought, might plead, that he had nothing by descent at the time of suing out the writ or filing the bill. Had the profits been assets, this plea could not have been maintained. The profits, therefore, were not assets. The statute of the 3d and 4th of William & Mary, which has rendered the heir, in cases of alienation, liable for the value of the land, does not make him liable for the profits, or for interest on the money. It is to be fairly presumed, that the statute has adopted the rule of the court of chancery.

Upon the best consideration I can give to the cases, I am well satisfied, that chancery does not make an heir responsible for profits accrued before the filing of the bill, and I think the analogy between real and personal estate, in this respect, is a strong one. This question was well considered in Munford's Case, and decided against the claim to profits. I regret that the opinion then given, has been mislaid. Chief Justice's note at the end of the case of Mutter's Ex'rs v. Munford, [Alston v. Munford, Case No. 267.] The plaintiff's counsel has relied on a case reported in 5 Munf. 492, (Baird v. Bland.) In the construction of a state statute, the courts of the Union have uniformly adopted the rule of decision, given by the state courts. If, therefore, the court of appeals had decided, that under our statute of frauds, a donee was responsible for profits, I should have followed the precedent, however erroneous I might have thought it. But the case to which the plaintiff has referred, is not a case under the statute. It is not the case of a creditor, but of a person having title to the slave recovered.

I think the defendant, William Storke Jett, is responsible for the slaves now alive, at their present value, or for the slaves themselves; and for profits from the filing of the amended bill which claims them; and for the money actually received for those which have been sold, with interest thereon, from the same time. And the report is to be made up in conformity with this opinion.

Decree.—In conformity with the above opinion, an interlocutory decree was rendered, allowing the exceptions of both parties, and recommitting the report to the commissioner, with instructions, not to admit any account taken before commissioners in the country, subsequent to the institution of this suit, further than the same shall be supported by vouchers or evidence. And the court doth further direct the commissioner to charge the defendant, William Storke Jett, with the present value of such of the slaves contained in the deed, of the 10th of June, 1783, in the amended bill mentioned, and with their issue, as are now in possession of the said defendant William Storke Jett, and with the profits thereon, from the 7th day of July, 1817, when the amended bill in this cause was filed, and also with the price of the slaves contained in the said deed, or of their issue, who may have been sold, or with the value of those otherwise disposed of, at the time when disposed of, together with interest on such price or value, to be calculated from the said 7th day of July, 1817.

NOTE, [from original report.] The question of the liability of a fraudulent donee of personalty, for hires and profits, was considered by the court of appeals, in the late case of Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh, 29. The court determined that the donee was responsible for the hires and profits, but a very slight examination of that case will, it is believed, lead to the conviction, that the above opinion of the chief justice, so far from being impugned, is strengthened by the opinion of the judges delivered in Blow v. Maynard. The points of dissimilitude between the two cases, are very striking. In Blow v. Maynard there was evidence that convinced, at least one of the court, that the bill of sale of the personalty (slaves) was antedated, which is in itself a very cogent circumstance, to show the fraudulent intent with which it was executed. The nominal purchaser is treated by the court as a donee, because, although the instrument conveying them, purported to be a bill of sale, there was no title of evidence to show, that any valuable consideration had ever passed. It was executed by a party greatly embarrassed at the time, to a maiden aunt of the debtor's wife, who was a member of his family, and the pretended sale was not accompanied with any change of possession, and the debtor continued in possession of them, up to the period of his death, which occurred four years afterwards. The case was very much like that of Edwards v. Harben, reported in 2 Term R., cited ante, except that it was a much stronger one against the pretended vendee, and the decision of the court accorded with the determination of the court in Edwards v. Harben, viz; that the bill of sale was fraudulent, and void as to creditors, and that the nominal vendee was accountable for the slaves thereby conveyed, and their increase, hires, and profits, accruing since the death of the vendor, (the slaves having then passed into her possession, and never having been under the control, or in the possession, of the administrator,) as executrix in her own wrong, in like manner as a rightful executor would be accountable.

The question of the liability of the heir, for the rents and profits of the real estate, descended to him, was also involved, and was elaborately discussed by the judges. Two judges, in a court consisting of three, decided, that the heir was not accountable for the rents and profits, but from the date of the decree; and Carr, J., while he expressed some doubt of its correctness, seemed to acquiesce in the decision.

The deposition of Campbell, respected a debt due of £450, due from Thomas Jett, in his lifetime, to the estate of the deponent's father, which debt had been paid by William Storke Jett, executor of Thomas Jett, in 1788. This debt was omitted in the administration account of William Storke Jett, settled before the commissioners in 1798, but the executor was credited with it in the settlement made in 1818, before the commissioners of the county court of Westmoreland, during the pendency of this suit.

It has always been the practice in Virginia, for the county courts, at the instance of an executor, or administrator, or any party interested in his accounts, to make an ex-parte order for the settlement of the administration account before commissioners, without any summons to the parties concerned. Taylor, Ch., in Mountjoy v. Lowry, 4 Hen. & M. 428. And this account, when so settled, without notice, is taken as prima facie evidence of the correctness of the charges and credits, therein contained; but any party interested, may, by bill in equity, surcharge and falsify it, if capable of adducing satisfactory evidence for that purpose. Tucker, J., in Anderson v. Fox, 2 Hen. & M. 260; Atwell's Adm'r v. Milton, 4 Hen. & M. 253; Wall's Ex'rs v. Gressom, 4 Munf. 110. Upon a bill to surcharge and falsify an account of an executor, settled by commissioners, under an order of the court before which the will was proved, if the answer discloses nothing improper in the account, and the complainant exhibit no evidence to sustain his allegations, it is not incumbent on the court of chancery, to refer the account to a commissioner, but the bill should be dismissed. Wyllie v. Venable's Ex'r, Id. 369. But while the plaintiff must specify the items of surcharge and falsification, it is competent for him to show error upon the face of the account. Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh, 407; Lee v. Stuart, 2 Leigh, 76. And, although, under circumstances, an executor ought not to be charged with interest on balances in his hands, yet, in general, he is so chargeable; and where in an ex-parte settlement of an executor's account, the commissioners omit to charge interest, without assigning any good reason therefor, such omission may be corrected, upon a bill brought to surcharge and falsify. Burwell's Ex'r v. Anderson, 3 Leigh, 348. The presence of a legatee, during the progress of the ex-parte settlement, and his failure to state any objections, when desired to do so, (the legatee not being present when the accounts were closed, and the results stated,) will not preclude him from bringing his bill to surcharge and falsify. Garrett v. Carr, supra. And where, on a bill to surcharge and falsify, if an order be made for a new settlement, and the vouchers cannot be still produced, they will be presumed to have existed, especially, after a great lapse of time: the onus probandi is thrown upon the contesting party. M'Call v. Peachy's Adm'r, 3 Munf. 295, 301, 305; Tabb v. Boyd, 4 Call, 453. The above is a condensed summary of the decisions of the court of appeals on this subject, which are collected by Mr. Robinson, 2 Rob. Pr. 113–115. The question, whether the settlement of an administration account, made ex-parte, under the order of another court, pending a suit against the executor, before a distinct tribunal, will be taken as prima facie evidence by the latter court, has never yet, it is believed, been decided by a court of last resort. The editor, however, is informed by Judge P. P. Barbour, [circuit justice,] that the invariable practice of the court of chancery at Fredericksburg, while he practised there, was not to regard the account settled pendente lite; and to require vouchers for each item.

Case No. 711.

BACKSTACK v. BANKS.

[7 Ben. 355.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1874.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—MATE AND SEAMAN.

1. The mate of a vessel, thinking that one of the boys on board had stolen some money from him, accused him of theft, while he was seated at the breakfast table, with the mate and two others. The boy retorted with an opprobrious epithet, and the mate struck him in the face, and he fell over in his chair against a partition. The boy filed a libel against the mate to recover damages for assault and battery: Held, that as the blow was not given in the course of discipline, and as the mate used opprobrious words first, the assault was without excuse.

[See Benton v. Whitney, Case No. 1,335;

Cushman v. Ryan, Id. 3,515; Morris v. Cornell, Id. 9,829.]

2. That, as the libellant was not shown to have suffered any permanent or serious injury, the court would award him $20, and costs.

[In admiralty. Libel by Paul J. Backstack, seaman, against Charles A. Banks, mate, to recover damages for an assault and battery. Decree for libellant.]

W. R. Beebe, for libellant.
R. D. Benedict, for respondent.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libel represents this as a case of great hardship. It alleges that the respondent beat the head of the libellant against the cabin ceiling, and knocked him down, and pulled his hair, and jumped on his back with heavy boots after he was down, and severely injured him, and kicked him in the head, and cut and severely wounded him; and that the libellant was unable for a long time to perform his duties. It claims $2,000 damages. The oath of the libellant to the foregoing statement of the libel was admitted by consent, as evidence, and he was not examined or cross examined as a witness. The master's affidavit was admitted by consent as evidence, setting forth that he found the libellant bleeding and his head cut open, and that he was otherwise severely injured and suffering. The master was not examined or cross-examined.

The respondent testifies, that, suspecting the libellant of having stolen two francs from his pocket, he accused the libellant, while he was seated at the breakfast table with two other persons and the respondent, of having taken the money; that the libellant then applied an offensive epithet to the respondent; and that thereupon the respondent hit the libellant on the face, and he fell over in his chair against a partition. The respondent denies the other violence alleged. The evidence of the respondent is sustained by that of one of the other two persons who were at the table.

The blow given by the respondent, who was the mate of the vessel, the libellant being an ordinary seaman, was not given in the course of discipline, or to enforce obedience to orders, or by way of punishment. As for opprobrious words, the mate used them first by accusing the libellant of stealing. The assault by the respondent was without legal excuse. But the libellant is not shown to have suffered any permanent injury from it, nor can I conclude, on the evidence, that it was serious in its character or consequences. It is not established that the libellant was rendered by it unfit for attending to his duties. I award to the libellant the sum of $20 and costs.

Howard & Gray, for plaintiff.
Mr. Holbrook, for respondents.

This is an appeal in admiralty, from the district court. A libel was filed by the plaintiff on a contract of affreightment of five thousand, seven hundred and ninety and forty-six hundredths bushels of wheat from the ports of Amherstburg and Colchester, in Canada, to Buffalo, for the consideration of two hundred and forty dollars. The bill of lading, signed by the captain of the vessel, specified the above number of bushels, and which being received in good order was safely to be delivered at Buffalo. The wheat received fell short of the quantity specified, at the port of delivery, seven hundred and sixty bushels.

The defence relied on is, that all the wheat received was delivered except about ten bushels, which, being wet, the consignee refused to receive. The libellant on the bill of lading paid for the quantity specified. The two witnesses who kept tally of the wheat received at Malden were sworn, and they agree in the quantity. And the amount of wheat received at Colchester was also sworn to, by the person who kept the tally at that place, and from these two ports the entire cargo was received. In support of the defense the deposition of the mate of the vessel was read, who stated that twelve hundred bushels of wheat were received at Malden, which he tallied; and that no account was taken of the quantity of wheat received at Colchester. He says that he nailed down the hatches and consequently, that no wheat could have been taken from the vessel until it arrived at Buffalo. The hatches, he says, were not raised until the vessel went under the elevators at Buffalo, to discharge her cargo. And he swears that all the wheat received was delivered at Buffalo; and he states the vessel could not carry more than five thousand one hundred bushels. H. Rowell, a hand on board, con firms the statements of the mate, except that on another occasion, the vessel being filled to her utmost capacity, carried five thousand three hundred bushels. Several witnesses on board the vessel corroborate, generally the statements of the above witnesses. The person who built the vessel stated that she was overhauled some years since and her capacity considerably enlarged.

It is clearly proved that the wheat delivered at Buffalo was carefully weighed and tallied. As the accounts agreed, kept by the witnesses, who were highly respectable men, there could have been no mistake. The captain swore to the manifest, which contained a statement of the amount received at the two ports. And it is proved that he declared at Malden that he had engaged to transport six thousand bushels of wheat, and he should charge for the transportation of that amount. It is clearly and satisfactorily proved that thirteen hundred and fifty-two bushels were delivered at Malden, instead of twelve hundred, as sworn to by the mate; and it is proved that the vessel instead of being two or three miles from the shore when loaded at the port of Colchester, as sworn to by the mate, was only about one-quarter of a mile from the land.

H. Reynolds, a colored man, who was cook, says, that he was on board the vessel the above trip, and that after she was unloaded at Buffalo she was taken into a canal or slip where witness saw that water, to the depth of about eighteen inches, had been in the hold of the vessel. There was a considerable amount of wheat in the vessel, but it being wet the consignees refused to receive it. This wheat covered the floor of the vessel, about eighteen inches deep. There was some wheat sold after the schooner left the elevator. He heard the mate ask the captain what should be done with the wet wheat. At first he answered that he did not know; but afterwards he told the hands to throw it overboard. The next morning the crew threw a considerable part of the wet wheat overboard. They were engaged, the witness says, two or three hours in throwing the wheat overboard. A Dutchman came on board and offered to buy it, and he paid three dollars for the wet wheat that remained. This sale was sanctioned by the captain and mate. The captain was told that about eighty bushels were sold to the man. The hands were engaged in removing the wheat from seven in the morning to near twelve. The seams of the vessel were open and she leaked badly.

The bill of lading is an instrument of commerce. It possesses some of the qualities of a bill of exchange. It is considered as conclusive evidence of the cargo shipped, and cannot be contradicted unless fraud or mistake be shown. The purchase money was paid on the faith of this instrument, and no fraud or mistake is shown. The witnesses for the defence are so contradicted, in regard to the amount of the wheat shipped and delivered, as to render their testimony unworthy of credit. It is extraordinary that the mate and the hands on board should swear that all the wheat received into the vessel was delivered at Buffalo, when they were engaged for several hours in throwing the wet wheat overboard, and in selling some eighty bushels that remained. These facts were within the knowledge of the defendant's witnesses, while they swore that all the wheat received, was delivered.

The quantity of wheat shipped at Malden and also at Colchester is so clearly proved as to remove all doubt on the subject. And the deficiency is accounted for by the leakage of the vessel, the refusal of the consignees to receive the wet wheat, and the subsequent disposition of it.

In all commercial transactions the strictest morality and truth should be observed. If these shall be disregarded, commerce will become a curse instead of a blessing. The richness of its products will be more than counterbalanced by the evils it will disseminate. Especially, when the sacredness of oaths shall be violated by the agents of commerce, it will destroy the confidence of high and honorable men, which is essential to commercial prosperity. The decree of the district court is affirmed with costs.

APPEAL—DELAY IN PERFECTING—CONTINUANCE.

1. If the appellant delay to perfect his appeal, so that the record is filed a very short time before the term of this court, the appellee may notice the cause for hearing or continue it, at his option.

2. No one should take advantage of his own remissness, to the prejudice of the other party.

[In admiralty. Libel by Frederick W. Backus against the schooner Marengo on a contract of affreightment. Decree for libelant, (unreported.) Respondents appealed, and now move for a continuance. Denied. Appeal subsequently heard on merits, and affirmed in Backus v. The Marengo, Case No. 712.]

Mr. Holbrook, for appellant.

Mr. Howard, for respondent.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. On the 6th of June last, the notice of appeal in this case was entered in the district court. The record was filed a day or two since, and a motion is now made by the appellant to continue the cause.

The rule on this subject declares, "that eight days' notice of hearing on appeal shall in all cases be given, by the service thereof on the adverse party, or on his proctor. When an appeal from a decree in the district court is interposed less than twenty days before the next stated session of this court, the appellee may, at his option, notice the cause for hearing at such session, on the first or either day thereof, or have the same continued to the next stated session. When an appeal from the decree of the district court is interposed, twenty days before the next stated session of this court, it may be noticed for hearing at such session by either party."

As this case was appealed within less than twenty days before this term, the appellee has a right to notice the cause for hearing on the first day of court, or to continue it as he may prefer. This avoids delay and is just. If the appellant do not file the record in time, the other party may continue the cause. The motion for a continuance is overruled.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—GUNNY CLOTH—COMMERCIAL USAGE.

The tariff being a statute regulating commerce, the terms of it must be construed according to commercial usage and understanding. In this case, it was submitted to the jury, to determine, whether gunny cloth and cotton bagging were different articles of commerce.

[Cited in U. S. v. Wotton, 53 Fed. 346.]

[See Curtis v. Martin, 3 How. (44 U. S.) 106; Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 151; Arthur v. Morrison, 96 U. S. 111.]

At law. This was an action [by Samuel C. Bacon] against the defendant, [George Bancroft,] as collector of the port of Boston, to recover back the amount of duties, paid under protest, upon a quantity of gunny cloth, imported by the plaintiff, and by the collector charged with the duty on cotton bagging. [Verdict for plaintiff.]

It was agreed, that gunny cloth was imported and used extensively for the purpose of covering cotton in bales, and as a substitute for the article commonly known as cotton bagging. And it was submitted to the jury, under the instruction of the court, to find, whether the article in question was that known in commerce as cotton bagging, or was another and different article. It appeared by the testimony, that cotton bagging and gunny cloth were both well known in this country before the passing of the tariff, and that they were considered as different articles of commerce, and known by different names.

Dexter, for plaintiff. Mills, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice, instructed the jury, that the tariff being a statute, regulating commerce, the terms of it must be construed according to commercial usage and understanding; and that if they found, of which there appeared no doubt, the evidence being uniform to that effect, that the two articles were understood and known among merchants to be different articles of commerce, and that the article in question had not been known in commerce as cotton bagging, it was not subject to the duty, whatever might be the use to which it had been applied.

The jury immediately returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNMENT — JUDGMENT LIENS—PRIORITY—COMMENCEMENT OF PROCEEDINGS.

[1. A judgment lien operates only upon such property as is subject to levy and sale under legal process issued for its payment, and therefore does not operate upon property which is at the time in the possession of the sheriff under attachments. Such attachments are dissolved, not by the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, but by the adjudication, and the deed of assignment relates back to such commencement, and divests all right and title in the bankrupts, and in the sheriff, and vests them in the assignee, as of that date, but at that very moment the judgment lien ceases, so there is no time at which it attaches. In re Loder, Case No. 8,458, followed.]

[See Hudson v. Adams, Case No. 6,832.]

[2. The act of 1828, (4 Stat. 278,) adopting the state process laws, does not make a judgment without process a lien, from its rendition, for the lien derives its force only from the process.]

[3. Property held by purchasers from the bankrupts in fraud of the bankrupt act of 1867, (14 Stat. 517,) at the time of the judgment, is subject to the judgment lien, for the legal title has not passed, and the proceeds of such property in the hands of the assignee are alike liable.]

[4. Any other property which the bankrupts held after the rendition of the judgment, and before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and which might at the time have been levied upon and sold for the payment of the judgment, is subject to the judgment lien.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Schaeffer & Co. against the assignee in bankruptcy of H. Badenheim & Co. to have certain funds applied to the payment of a judgment obtained prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. Denied in part.]

HILL, District Judge. The question now presented arises upon the petition of Schaeffer & Co., against the assignee, to have applied to the payment of a judgment obtained by petitioners against the survivors of said firm, prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, out of the funds derived from the proceeds of the sales of said estate made by the assignee and out of funds collected from purchasers of the goods belonging to said firm, and held void by the judgment of this court, and upon which it is alleged the judgment of petitioners, obtained in the circuit court of the United States for this district, operated as a lien. The answer of the assignee sets up as a defense: 1. That no such judgment as is set out in the petition is in existence. 2. That all the property sold by the assignee, the proceeds of which are sought to be applied to the payment of petitioner's judgment, was at the time of the rendition of said judgment, and up to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, in the possession of the sheriff of Warren county, under and by virtue of seizures under attachments sued out against said bankrupts in the circuit court of Warren county, and that there was no time from the rendition of said judgment at which said property was liable to seizure and levy under an execution issued upon said judgment, and therefore no lien ever attached to said goods for the satisfaction of petitioners' demand.

The issuance and seizure under said attachments is admitted. So that upon that point there is no question of fact disputed. I am satisfied, from an inspection of the record, that before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy there was such a judgment as is described in the petition, and that it did operate as a lien upon such property belonging to the bankrupts, the defendants to the judgment, as was then liable to seizure and sale under an execution issued to collect the same or any other property which they assigned, and was so liable before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, which leaves for determination the other point of defense, and that is whether any of the property described, the proceeds of which are sought to be applied to the payment of petitioners' judgment, was so liable. I think it well settled that a judgment lien only operates upon such property as is subject to levy and sale under legal process issued for its payment. A careful consideration of this rule, as applied to the property seized and held by the sheriff in this case, convinces me that there was no time when it was so liable. It is true that, by operation of law, these attachments were dissolved as soon as the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. The commencement of the bankrupt proceedings did not of itself have that effect, but the adjudication did; and the deed of assignment by force of the law related back to the commencement of the proceedings, and divested all the title and right of bankrupts, and also the qualified right and title vested in the sheriff by means of the seizure and levy under the attachments, and vested them in the assignee; but the very moment this was done the judgment lien ceased, so that there was no time at which it attached. This position is fully sustained by Judge Benedict, in the case of Lewis B. Loder, bankrupt, [In re Loder, Case No. 8,458.] The learned counsel for the petitioners insists that this is founded upon the statutes of New York, by which nothing short of a levy, under legal process for the satisfaction of the judgment, creates a lien upon personal property; but I am satisfied the point upon which the case turned was, that the seizure under the attachment being first made held the property free from the lien under the execution up to its dissolution by the bankrupt proceedings, so that there was no time at which the lien under the execution could attach. I am aware of no adjudicated case holding the contrary doctrine. It is also urged by the petitioners' counsel that the act of 1828, [4 Stat. 278,] adopting the state process laws, makes the judgment from its rendition without process a lien; but the adjudications holding this judgment to be a lien placed it as deriving its force from the process, and consequently if the property cannot be reached by the process, the lien does not exist; it is this liability that creates it.

I am satisfied that the proceeds of the property so held under these attachments are not liable to the payment of petitioners' judgment. But any property that was sold by the bankrupts and held by parties purchasing in fraud of the bankrupt law, [Act March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517,] and in existence, and in the hands of such fraudulent vendees at the rendition of the judgment, was subject to a lien for its payment and for the reason that the legal title did not pass from the bankrupts. This being so, the proceeds stand in the place of the property and are alike liable. So with regard to any other property which the bankrupts held after the rendition of the judgment and before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy against them, and which might at the time have been levied upon and sold for the payment of the judgment. To ascertain what fund may be now or hereafter in the hands of the assignee or other custodian of said estate, the petitioners may have a reference to the master.

JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—DISMISSAL OF BILL BEFORE PUBLICATION OF TESTIMONY.

Where a cause in equity was set down for hearing, and before any of the testimony taken was published, the complainant moved to dismiss his bill, and, no objection being made thereto, the motion was granted, and the bill in equity dismissed without any hearing upon the merits. Held, that the record of the former suit and decree was no bar to the bill of complaint.

[In equity. Bill by James W. Badger and others against Daniel B. Badger and others to recover certain alleged interests of complainants in certain real property. A demurrer to the plea was overruled. Thereafter, a replication was filed, and the hearing is now upon the sufficiency of the replication. Decree for complainant. Upon the hearing on the merits the bill was dismissed in Badger v. Badger, Case No. 718. An appeal was then taken to the supreme court, where that decree was affirmed in 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 87. See note at end of Case No. 718.]

This was a bill in equity, wherein the complainant sought to recover certain alleged interests of the heirs of Daniel Badger, deceased, in certain parcels of real estate, which the complainant alleged were fraudulently obtained and wrongfully held by the first-named respondent, who was a co-heir with the complainant. The respondents pleaded a former suit and decree in bar of the bill of complaint, alleging that the former suit involved the same subject-matter as the present; that it was between the same parties; and that it was regularly disposed of, on the merits, by a final decree dismissing the bill with costs for the respondents. After this suit was commenced, the name of David Badger, one of the complainants, was stricken from the bill. The other complainant, instead of replying to the plea filed by the respondents, set it down for hearing under the twenty-third [thirty-third] rule. Both parties were heard upon the demurrer, and the court held the plea sufficient, under the admissions of the demurrer, that the facts therein stated were true. In giving the order, however, to enter the decree, the court also gave the complainant leave to withdraw the demurrer, and to reply to this plea in bar. That leave was granted, because the plea set forth certain matters of fact which it would be competent for the complainant to controvert by a proper replication to the plea in bar, but which were admitted by the demurrer. Availing himself of the leave granted, the complainant withdrew the demurrer, and filed a replication to the plea in bar, controverting all of the matters of fact therein set forth. The respondents set down the replication for hearing under the before-mentioned rule, and the question in the case was whether the replication was a good answer to the plea.

According to the admissions of the replication, all of the matters of complaint set forth in the bill were substantially the same as those set forth in the former suit, and the replication also admitted that the suit was between the same parties, and that the respondents made answer thereto, and that testimony was taken, but denied that publication was ever made, or that the cause ever came on for hearing, or was ever heard by the court, and alleged that before the cause was set down for hearing, and before any of the testimony taken was published, the complainant moved for leave to dismiss his bill; and no objection being made thereto, the motion was granted by the court, and it was ordered that the bill of complaint should stand dismissed. The complainant also denied that the case was ever heard and considered by the court or that the court ever pronounced any judgment or decree on the merits thereof, or that the court ever determined that the complainant had no right to the relief sought by his bill.

E. Merwin, for respondents.

1. The final decree in the former suit was an absolute, unqualified decree, dismissing complainant's bill. It was made after the cause was at issue, and after the evidence had been taken, and order of publication passed. It is therefore conclusively presumed to have been a decree on the merits, or what is equivalent thereto, by consent or arrangement, as a settlement of the controversy. Such a decree, unless qualified as "without prejudice," or "reserving right to bring another bill," or other equivalent qualification, is conclusive as to all matters involved in that suit. 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1200; Foote v. Gibbs, 1 Gray, 413; Bigelow v. Winsor, 1 Gray, 301.

2. But this case does not depend upon the effect simply of an unqualified decree dismissing the complainant's bill; for this final decree was preceded by an order of the court disallowing the complainant to dismiss his bill without prejudice. There was a specific and positive adjudication that the complainant should not be allowed to dispose of that suit so as to bring another for the same cause, and that the controversy ought to be, and must be, determined. It is well settled that a suitor, after the testimony has been taken, and the cause is ready for a hearing, has no right as of course to have his bill dismissed, so that such dismissal shall operate only as a nonsuit at law. Such leave will be granted only under proper circumstances. Pickett v. Loggon, 14 Ves. 232; Bigelow v. Winsor, 1 Gray, 299–301.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. All the matters of fact affirmatively set forth in the replication, which are well pleaded and material to the issue of law raised by the demurrer, must be considered as admitted.

Conceding that rule to be correct, it then appears that, before the cause was set down for hearing, and before any of the testimony taken was published, the complainant moved to dismiss his bill, and no objection being made thereto, the motion was granted, and the bill of complaint was accordingly dismissed without any hearing whatever upon the merits. On this state of the case I am of the opinion that the replication is a good answer to the plea, and that the record of the former suit and decree is no bar to the bill of complaint. At the argument the attention of the court was specially drawn to the docket entries in the former suit, and, to prevent any further controversy upon this preliminary point, it may be well to refer to those entries. They are substantially as follows: On motion of the complainant, the time for taking testimony was extended to the 10th of May, 1858; and on the 3d of the same month the complainant moved the court further to enlarge the time for taking testimony, which motion was opposed by the respondents, and on the 10th of the same month the complainant renewed his motion, and the same was again objected to by the respondents, and thereupon it was ordered by the court, among other things, that leave be granted to the complainant to take a certain deposition; interrogatories to be filed on or before the 17th of May, in behalf of the complainant, and the deposition to be taken and returned within eighteen days from the time when the cross-interrogatories of the respondents are filed, and that publication be deferred until that time. Afterwards, on the 6th of September following, no such interrogatories or cross-interrogatories having been filed, the complainant moved the court that his bill of complaint be dismissed without prejudice, and after hearing had thereon the complainant's motion was denied by the court, and the complainant then moved that his bill of complaint be dismissed, and the court, having considered the motion, ordered and decreed accordingly, "that the bill of complaint in this cause be, and the same is, hereby dismissed with costs for the respondents." From this statement it is quite evident that the allegations of the replication are correct. No order for publication was ever passed, and there was no hearing upon the merits of the controversy. Publication was expressly postponed, to give the complainant time to take a certain deposition; and to prevent unnecessary delay in taking it, the order was made that he should file interrogatories within a given time, and that the deposition should be taken and returned within eighteen days from the time when the cross-interrogatories were filed by the respondents. Such interrogatories and cross-interrogatories were never filed, and in point of fact the deposition had not been taken at the time the complainant moved to dismiss his bill without prejudice. That motion was denied; but the complainant subsequently moved to dismiss his bill, omitting from the motion the words "without prejudice," and the order was accordingly made that the bill of complaint be dismissed with costs for the respondents. It is insisted by the respondents that the decree in the former suit dismissing the bill was final and conclusive between these parties in all matters at issue in that suit, and that the effect of the decree in that behalf is not varied or diminished by the fact that the motion to dismiss it emanated from the complainant. On the other hand, it is insisted by the respondents that a decree or order dismissing a former suit, even though it was between the same parties, can only be pleaded in bar to a new bill for the same subject-matter when it appears that the dismissal was decreed or ordered after a hearing on the merits. Elementary writers usually lay down the rule in the first instance in general terms, that a decree or order of the court by which the rights of the parties have been determined, or another bill for the same cause has been dismissed, may be pleaded in bar to a new bill for the same matter. Such writers, however, generally admit that the decree or order in such cases can only be pleaded in bar where the dismission actually took place upon the hearing. 2 Daniell, Ch. Pl. & Pr. 758; Coop. Eq. Pl. 270; 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 248; 1 Smith, Ch. Pr. 222; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 126. Judge Story says a decree or order dismissing a former bill for the same matter may be pleaded in bar to a new bill, if the dismission was upon the hearing, and was not in terms directed to be without prejudice. But an order of dismission is a bar only where the court has determined that the plaintiff had no title to the relief sought by his bill, and therefore an order dismissing a bill for want of prosecution is not a bar to another suit. Story, Eq. Pl. (6th Ed.) § 793, p. 700. Prior to the new orders in England, the better opinion is that the plaintiff could obtain the common order dismissing his bill with costs at any time before the cause was actually heard by the court. All the cases agree that he could do so before the cause was called on for final hearing, and in many cases it is held that he could do so afterwards, and that the decree or order of dismission could not be pleaded in bar to a new bill, provided it appeared that it was made without any determination of the merits. Take, for example, the case of Carrington v. Holly, 1 Dickens, 280, where it appears that, at the time when the cause was called on for hearing, an issue was directed by the court, but the complainant, being advised that the bill and the matter put in issue were insufficient to support his claim, applied by motion, and obtained the common order to dismiss his bill upon payment of costs. Afterwards the respondent applied to discharge the order for irregularity, upon the ground that the cause having been properly brought on to a hearing, the bill could not be dismissed except on a solemn judgment. Lord Hardwicke, however, held otherwise, and remarked in effect: "There has not been any determination, for the directing of an issue is merely to satisfy the conscience of the court prefatory to their giving judgment. The issue has not been tried, and until there has been a determination," I hold a plaintiff may, in any stage of the cause, apply to dismiss his bill upon payment of costs. It would have been otherwise, he said, had the issue been tried, and a verdict in favor of the defendant, because the defendant might then have set the cause down as in equity reserved, in order to have the bill dismissed upon the solemn judgment of the court, so as to make the order of dismission pleadable. To the same effect also is the case of Curtis v. Lloyd, 4 Mylne & C. 194, which was decided by Lord Cottenham, in 1838, after it had been twice argued at the bar. When that cause was called on for hearing, the counsel for the complainant stated that it had come on unexpectedly, and at his request it was allowed to stand over until the next day. On the following morning the cause was again called on for hearing, when the same counsel informed the court that he had that morning obtained an order, as of course, dismissing the bill with costs, and that the suit was no longer pending. Objection to that course of proceeding was promptly made by the counsel of the respondent. They insisted that it was not competent for the complainant, after the cause was set down for hearing, and still less after it had been actually called on, and had only been allowed to stand over at his request and for the accommodation of his counsel, to obtain behind the back of his adversary a common order dismissing his bill. Such an order they insisted was irregular, and ought to be treated as a nullity. But the chancellor said, after admitting that he was not before aware that the doctrine had been carried so far as it seemed to have been in the case of Carrington v. Holly, [1 Dickens, 280,] that he could not see why a complainant should be in a worse situation, because he informed the court that he did not intend to proceed with the hearing of his cause than if he made default, and emphatically added that in principle it was substantially the same thing. Several cases were cited at the argument to sustain the propriety of the proceeding, and many others might have been added of like import. Locke v. Nash, 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 389; White v. West-meath, 1 Beat. 174; Anony., 1 Ves. Jr. 140; Dixon v. Parks, 1 Ves. Jr. 402; Fidelle v. Evans, 1 Brown, Ch. 267; Knox v. Brown, 2 Brown, Ch. 185; Gilbert v. Faules, Freem. Ch. (Ed. 1823,) 158. From these authorities it clearly appears that a complainant, prior to the adoption of the new orders by the English chancery court, might dismiss his bill at any time before a hearing upon the merits, upon payment of costs, unless perhaps there had been some order or proceeding in the cause conferring rights upon the respondent, which would be defeated or impaired by allowing that order.

General authority is given to the supreme court, by the sixth section of the act of congress of the 23d of August, 1842, to regulate the whole practice of the circuit and district courts of the United States, but no rule specifically applicable to the matter in question has ever been adopted. 5 Stat. 518. By the ninetieth rule regulating the practice in equity suits, it is provided, that in all cases where the rules prescribed do not apply, the practice of the circuit court shall be regulated by the present practice of the high court of chancery in England, not as positive rules, but as furnishing just analogies to regulate the practice. That rule adopts the English practice, as it was known and understood in 1842, at the time this rule was ordained. Consequently the practice of this court remains unaffected by the new orders so called, which the courts of that country have since incorporated into their practice. What the practice was in the courts of that country prior to the adoption of the new orders has already appeared, and the authorities upon that subject need not be repeated. Several decisions of the supreme court may be adduced, which go very far to show that the practice here is substantially the same. Of these, the case of Walden v. Bodley, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 160, is directly in point. Suits had been twice before instituted in that case, but it appeared that the first bill had been dismissed for the want of jurisdiction, and the second had also been dismissed on motion of the complainant at rules; and the court held that neither was a bar to the new bill, because it appeared in both records that the cause had not been heard on the merits. Where a party asking the aid of a court of equity, says Marshall, C. J., in Conn v. Penn, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 427, refuses to comply with the conditions on which the aid must depend, the court is certainly correct in refusing its aid, and may dismiss the bill. But in such a case we think it would be harsh to make the decree of dismission a bar to a future action. Some of the parties had been heard in that case, and a decree rendered which to a great extent decided the merits of the cause. Strong doubts, however, were expressed whether the decree was rendered on such a hearing as would make it a bar to a new bill; but as it appeared that one of the respondents was not before the court, and that another person concerned in interest was not made a party, the point as to the sufficiency of the hearing was not decided. Whenever a suit in chancery is heard upon the merits, a decree of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter is a final determination of the controversy, unless the court making the decree qualify it and expressly order that it be made without prejudice. Accordingly it was held by the supreme court, in the case of Bank of U. S. v. Beverley, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 149, that a fact which has been directly tried and decided by a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be contested again between the same parties in the same or any other court. Hence the judgment of a court of record or a decree in chancery, although not binding on strangers, puts an end to all further controversy concerning the points thus decided between the parties to such suit. In this there is, and ought to be, no difference between a verdict and judgment in a court of common law, and a decree of a court of equity. They both stand on the same footing. Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 109. Notwithstanding this rule, still it is well settled that a judgment of nonsuit at common law is no bar to a new suit, and cannot be pleaded in bar to a second action, although it is between the same parties, and for the same subject-matter, not even when the judgment of nonsuit was rendered upon an agreed statement of facts. It was so held by the supreme court in Homer v. Brown, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 354, and the same rule prevails in the state courts. Bridge v. Sumner, 1 Pick. 371; Morgan v. Bliss, 2 Mass. 113; Wade v. Howard, 8 Pick. 353; Knox v. Waldoborough, 5 Me. 185. So it would seem, from analogy, that whenever a bill of complaint is dismissed without a hearing, and without any consideration of the merits, whether with or without the consent of the complainant, that the order of dismission, being in the nature of a nonsuit at common law, ought not to be considered a bar to a new suit, because the matters in controversy are not thereby judicially determined. More direct authorities upon the subject, however, are to be found in the decisions of the state courts, where the question has often been presented. Where the respondent in a suit in equity pleaded a former suit, and a decree dismissing the bill in bar of a pending suit, Chancellor Kent held, that the decree was not a bar, because it appeared that no person was present on the part of the complainant when the decree was made. Rosse v. Rust, 4 Johns. Ch. 300. Some of the remarks of the chancellor on that occasion are quite applicable to the present case. He said the merits of the former cause were never discussed, and no opinion of the court had ever been expressed upon them. It is, therefore, not a case within the rule rendering a decree a bar to a new suit. The ground of this defence by plea is that the matter has been already decided, and there has been no decision on the matter. And he also referred with approbation to the remarks of Lord Hardwicke in Brandlyn v. Ord, 1 Atk. 571, in which that learned judge said that, where the defendant pleads a former suit, he must show that it was res judicata, or an absolute determination of the court, that the plaintiff had no title. But the cases of Perine v. Dunn, 4 Johns. Ch. 140, and Neafie v. Neafie, 7 Johns. Ch. 1, are direct decisions of the questions here presented. In the former it was held that where a bill is dismissed on the merits, without any direction that the dismission shall be without prejudice, it may be pleaded in bar to a new bill for the same matter, and in the latter it was held that a bill regularly dismissed on the merits may be pleaded in bar of a new bill for the same matter; but to make a decree of a dismissal of a bill on the merits a bar, it must be an absolute decision on the same point or matter, and the new bill must be between the same parties.

Numerous other decisions affirm the same principles, and indeed the decided cases are nearly unanimous upon the subject. Cummins v. Bennett, 8 Paige, 79; Simpson v. Brewster, 9 Paige, 245; Smith v. Sherwood, 4 Conn. 276; Kennedy v. Scovil, 14 Conn. 61; Smith v. Smith, 2 Blackf. 232; Seymour v. Jerome, Walk. Ch. 356. Reference is very properly made in the argument to the opinion given by this court on the demurrer to the plea. All of the facts stated in the plea were then admitted by the demurrer, and the docket minutes in the former suit were not before the court. That opinion, therefore, was necessarily based upon the legal construction of the plea under the admissions of the demurrer. But whether correct or not, it is better to be right at last than finally to adhere to an error. Replication adjudged sufficient.

BADGER et al. v. BADGER et al.

[2 Cliff. 137.][1]

EQUITY — LACHES — KNOWLEDGE OF FRAUD FOR FIVE YEARS—PLEADING — RESPONSIVE ANSWER —DENIAL BY TWO WITNESSES—FRAUD.

1. Where the answer is responsive to the bill of complaint, and positively denies the matter charged, and the denial has respect to a transaction within the knowledge of the respondent, the answer is evidence in his favor, and unless it is overcome by the satisfactory testimony of two opposing witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by other facts and circumstances, which give to it greater weight than the answer, or are equivalent in weight to a second witness, it is conclusive, so that the court will neither make a decree or send the case to trial, but will dismiss the bill.

2. Accusations charging that probate accounts which had been settled for a long time were fraudulent, must be specific, and must point out the items of account charged to be false; especially when, as in this case, it appears that all the parties implicated, some of whom had the best means of knowledge in regard to the transaction, were dead.

[Cited in Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 55.]

3. If express fraud be charged, the rule is that he who made it must prove it; so where license was granted by the supreme court of a state for the sale of real estate by administrators, and the complainant, in a bill of equity, prayed that the deeds of conveyance executed pursuant to the license granted, might be declared null and void, nothing less than proof of fraud could possibly avail the complainant, as the court to whom the petition was addressed was bound to inquire whether debts were due and unpaid by the estate before they granted the license, and, in the absence of fraud, it must be presumed that the finding of the court was conclusive.

4. In many cases courts of equity act upon the analogy of the limitations at law, as where a legal title would, in ejectment, be barred by twenty years' adverse possession; but there is a defence peculiar to courts of equity, founded on lapse of time, where no statute of limitations governs the case.

[See note at end of case.]

5. In such cases courts of equity often act upon their own inherent doctrine of discouraging antiquated demands, by refusing to interfere where there has been gross laches in prosecuting the claim, or long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights.

[See note at end of case.]

6. Where the bill of complaint set up that fraudulent acts had been committed more than thirty years previous to the bill of complaint, but the complainant averred that the same were unknown to him until five years previous to the same, without setting up that the fraudulent acts were in any manner concealed from him, it was held, that a court of equity could not regard in such a case such general allegations of excuse.

[See note at end of case.]

7. If the complainant seeks to avoid the effect of lapse of time, on the ground of concealed fraud, he must set forth, with particularity, when and by what means the fraud was discovered, and the averments so made must be supported by the proofs.

[See Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 172; Moore v. Greene, 19 How. (60 U. S.) 69.]

8. In the case of a stale claim, barred by lapse of time, by gross laches, and long unexplained acquiescence in the operation of an adverse right, courts of equity will often treat the lapse of a period less than the one specified in the statute of limitations as a presumptive bar to the claim.

[In equity. Bill by James W. Badger and others against Daniel B. Badger and others to recover the interest of complainants in certain real property. The case was heard on plea and replication, and the replication adjudged sufficient, in Badger v. Badger, Case No. 717. The case is now heard on bill and answer. Bill dismissed. On appeal, the supreme court affirmed this decree in 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 87. See note at end of case.]

This was a bill in equity, wherein the complainant prayed, for an account of the rents and profits of certain real estate, that certain deeds of conveyance might be declared null and void, and that the respondent first named, or his representative, might be ordered to convey to the complainant his interest in certain real estate, and pay over the proper proportion of whatever sums he or they might have received as rents or profits of the same. The bill of complaint was filed September 6, 1858. When filed, David J.

[2] [Affirmed by supreme court in Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 87.]

Badger was also joined in the suit as a complainant, but on the 4th of October following, the bill of complaint as to him was dismissed, on motion of the respondent, for the reason that he was joined in the suit without his authority or consent. A plea in bar was filed by Daniel B. Badger, alleging that the complainant, with others, had previously brought a bill of complaint against him for the same matters, and that the former bill of complaint, after testimony was taken, and other proceedings had, was dismissed with costs for the respondents; but the court decided that the former decree was not a bar to the present suit. Pending those proceedings, the first-named respondent deceased, leaving his son, Erastus B. Badger, as his sole devisee, and the suit having been duly revived as against him, he came in, and made answer to the bill of revivor. Joseph Badger, who was joined as a respondent in the present bill of complaint, after appearing and filing an answer, died also, but the bill of complaint as against him was never revived; and the parties to the suit in all other respects remain as they were described in the original bill.

The former suit, already alluded to, was instituted May 8, 1857, and was dismissed on the day the present bill was filed. In the former suit James W. Badger, Augustus H. Badger, Almira A. Badger, B. P. Sturges and Mary H. B. his wife, M. M. Smith and Eliza M. his wife, Alfred C. Badger, and Jacob Badger were complainants. James W. Badger and D. B. Badger were brothers, and the children of Daniel Badger, of Boston, who died in September, 1818, intestate, leaving a widow, Ann Badger, and ten children, to wit, Daniel B., James W., David I., Augustus H., Jacob, Almira A., Mary H. B., Eliza M., Ann J., and Alfred C. Badger. The complainant admitted that David I., on the 25th of September, 1828, conveyed all his right, title, and interest in and to the estates situated in Broad street and North Federal court to D. B. Badger, and not being a party to the suit, there was no question as to his share involved in the controversy. Ann J. intermarried with Thomas Richardson, and they, by deed of warranty, on the 5th of May, 1830, conveyed all their interest in the estate of the intestate to the first-named respondent. Administration on the estate was granted February 29, 1819, to Daniel B. Badger, and Joseph Badger, his uncle, who was the brother of the intestate.

On the 18th of October following, the inventory was filed in the probate court, by which it appears that the personal estate was appraised at $1,721.10, and the real estate at $12,470. Other personal estate having come to the knowledge of the administrators, to the amount of $714, they caused the same to be appraised, on the 8th of May, 1820, and filed an additional inventory for that amount. Their first administration account was presented September 25, 1820, and was allowed on the 9th of October following. The administrators charged themselves with $6,742.04, and claimed an allowance for $6,475.52, leaving a balance of $266.52. The decree allowing that account bore date October 9, 1820, and on the same day, the administrators presented a schedule of the debts due to the estate, amounting to $3,475.72, and also a list of the debts due and owing by the intestate, at his decease, amounting to $6,707.58. Both of these schedules were received and ordered to be filed and recorded; and on the same day the administrators petitioned the court for leave to sell so much of the real estate of the deceased as would raise the sum of $6,451.83. Pursuant to that petition, the administrators, on the 13th of November following, were empowered to sell so much of the real estate as would raise that sum, and incidental charges, amounting in the whole to $6,511.37. The license to that effect was accordingly granted, and they sold under it, as the complainant alleged, the house and land on Lynde street, the land and store on Greene's wharf, one twenty-fourth of house and land on Fleet street, and house and land in Cambridgeport, amounting in the whole to the sum of $3,635. Certain payments were subsequently made by the administrators, to discharge certain mortgage debts due from the estate; but as all such were included in the second administration account, it is not necessary to specify them.

On March 12, 1827, the widow petitioned that her dower in the real estate of the intestate might be set off to her, and on the 6th of April following, the estates in Broad street and North Federal court were duly assigned to her in full of her dower. None of these preliminary proceedings in the settlement of the estate were called in question. On the 17th of September, 1827, the administrators filed their second administration account. In that account they charged themselves with the proceeds of the sale of the real estate before mentioned, and with other sums, amounting in the whole to $4,354.02, and claimed credit for the sum of $6,810.35, alleged to be for money expended on account of the estate, including $1,309 for services alleged to have been rendered by D. B. Badger as administrator, in settling the estate. The complainant averred that those allegations were false; and that the administrators on the same day filed in the probate court a further list of debts amounting to $2,220, falsely alleging that the same were due from the estate; but the complainant charged that these claims were false, and there was nothing due from the estate to the administrators or either of them, or to the holder of the notes specified in the list of debts, or to any person or persons whatever, for which the estate of the deceased was in any way liable. On the contrary, the complainant alleged that the balance of the account was claimed by D. B. Badger, and that the list of debts was filed by him, in violation of his trust and duty as administrator, to enable him to obtain possession for his own use and benefit, of all the remaining real estate of the intestate, situated in Boston, to wit, the estate known as the house and land in Distil House square, and the house and land situated in Broad street. Imputing that motive, the charge was, that to accomplish this design, he, on the first Tuesday of March, 1830, petitioned the supreme judicial court for the county of Suffolk for leave to sell so much of the real estate as was necessary to pay the balance of that account, and that such proceedings were had that the court empowered the administrators to sell so much of the same as would raise the sum of $4,676.33, and $50 for incidental charges. Having made these statements, the complainant then charged that the order of the court and the authority to sell were procured by deception and fraud, and alleged, that in order to procure the consent in writing of Thomas Richardson and Ann J., his wife, to the granting of the petition, he purchased all their right, title, and interest in and to the estate; and that in order to procure the consent in writing of Jacob Badger to the same, he purchased all of his interest in and to the estate in Broad street and North Federal court, whereupon those parties consented in writing to the granting of the prayer of the petition; Jacob Badger consenting for himself, and as guardian of Augustus H. Badger. The complainant alleged also that the signature of Almira A. Badger was procured by falsehood and deception, as was also that of her mother, to various papers which the first-named respondent fraudulently used; by means whereof, and of the false representations and fraudulent acts and doings, the authority to sell the estate was granted; that in pursuance of the fraudulent design the house and land in Distil House square were advertised to be sold at auction in Boston, on the 20th of July, 1830, without giving any notice whatever of the place at which the sale was to be made; that the first-named respondent procured one William P. Hart to bid off the estate for him, and that Hart bid $2,820, and that the estate was struck off to him for that sum, which was much less than the value of the premises; that subsequently, D. B. Badger, the first-named respondent, caused to be advertised for sale at auction so much of the real estate in Broad street and North Federal court, subject to the life estate of the widow, as would raise the sum of $786, for the payment of alleged debts and incidental charges, and procured the same person to bid off that property for him. On that occasion, the estate situated in North Federal court was struck off to one Adin Hall for the sum of $400, and only about one-fifth part of the Broad street estate was struck off to William P. Hart; but the complainant alleged, that the respondent pretended to offer those estates for sale at auction again, but without any legal notice, and that the respondent procured the same person to bid off the Broad street estate for his own benefit, and that the same was struck off to the bidder for $636, being less than one half of the value of the premises, subject to the incumbrance. Both the house and land in Distil House square and the Broad street estate were, as the complainant alleged, conveyed by the administrators to the bidder, without his paying anything therefor, and were by him conveyed to D. B. Badger, the first-named respondent, without any further consideration than what was paid to him by the latter for his fraudulent services. On this last occasion, sale was also made of the house and land on North Federal court, which had previously been bidden off by Adin Hall, and the charge was that the same respondent procured one Daniel Gilpatrick to attend the sale and bid off the property for his benefit; that the same was struck off to the bidder for the sum of $150, being a sum greatly less than the value of the premises, subject to the incumbrances; that the same was conveyed to the bidder without consideration, and was by him in the same way conveyed to the first-named respondent. Two mortgages were made by the said respondent to Samuel D. Parker, who was also joined as a respondent in the bill of complaint. He mortgaged the house and land in Distil House square to Parker on the 1st of July, 1854, to secure the payment of $6,000, payable in three years, and the other mortgage was of the Broad street estate, and was dated February 14, 1855, to secure the sum of $1,000, also payable in three years. Conveyance was also made by D. B. Badger, the first-named respondent, to the city of Boston, of the house and land in North Federal court, and the corporation was also joined as respondent in the bill of complaint.

The complainant also alleged that Samuel D. Parker well knew that his grantor was not possessed of any interest in the estates so conveyed to him, beyond four tenths of the Broad street estate, and one tenth of the other estate. He also alleged that before the city of Boston paid the consideration and took the delivery of the deed conveying the estate in North Federal court, the city was duly notified of the rights of the complainant, and of those under whom he claimed. Further the complainant alleged that on June 11, 1858, six of the other heirs, to wit, Augustus H., Almira A., Mary H. B., Eliza M., Jacob, and Alfred C., transferred to him all their interest in and to the before mentioned estates and the profits and proceeds thereof, whereby he became possessed of the same, both at law and in equity, and he finally alleged, that the fraudulent acts and doings of the first-named respondent were unknown to him or to his coheirs, until within five years before the filing of the bill, and that as soon as the discovery thereof, they requested him, the first-named respondent, to account, pay over what was due, and convey to them their respective interests in the estates, which he refused to do.

Answer was filed by Joseph Badger, during his lifetime, in which he denied every material allegation of the bill of complaint; that the administrators' accounts or lists of debts were false, or were filed in the probate court with any fraudulent design, were especially denied, and it was averred that they were so rendered and filed because it was the duty of the administrators to render the same. It was admitted, that leave was obtained to sell the real estate of the intestate to pay debts due from the estate, and that the estates mentioned in the bill of complaint were sold in pursuance of the order so obtained, but it was denied, that the license was procured for the fraudulent purpose or enabling the co-administrator to get possession of the estates, or that any fraud or misrepresentation was employed to induce any person to assent to the petition or sale; it was also denied that the sale of the several estates was not duly notified, or that they were not sold at the time they were advertised. Separate answers were also filed by the other respondents, also denying every material allegation of the bill.

J. B. Robb and J. G. Abbott, for complainants.

A person cannot legally purchase on his own account that which his duty or trust requires him to sell on account of another. A purchase by a trustee or per interpositam personam, of the particular property of which he has the sale, carries fraud on the face of it. Blood v. Hayman, 13 Metc. [Mass.] 231. A purchase so made by executors will be set aside. Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 503. The purchase of the estates by Daniel B. Badger was accomplished by a series of frauds. An administrator is bound to plead the special bar of four years, and it will be waste if he does not do it. Scott v. Hancock, 13 Mass. 164, 165; Richmond, Petitioner, 2 Pick. 567; Heath v. Wells, 5 Pick. 140. Mrs. Badger could not bind her wards by giving her consent to the sale of the estates; it would have been a fraud in her to do so, as she was dowager in the estates to be relieved of the mortgage, which secured the debt. Scott v. Hancock, 13 Mass. 168. If the sales were void, the heirs would have a right to the relief prayed for in the bill, and Daniel B. Badger would hold the estate, if living, as tenant in common with his coheirs, or as trustee for them, unless they were barred by the statute of limitations, or want of diligence in prosecuting their claim, as contended for by the defendant. Michoud v. Girod, [supra.] If the sales were voidable merely, then Badger is answerable in this suit as trustee. In equity, length of time is no bar to a trust clearly established, and in cases where fraud is imputed, length of time ought not, upon the principles of justice, to be admitted to repel relief. Baker v. Whiting, [Case No. 787;] Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 168; Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 481. In either case, the action may be maintained by the present plaintiff as assignee of his coheirs. Baker v. Whiting, [supra;] Michoud v. Girod, [supra.] The conveyances of the estates in mortgage were void as against the plaintiff.

B. R. Curtis and E. Merwin, for respondents.

The title which the complainant sets up in his bill is invalid, and one that a court of equity will not recognize. The sales of real estate by the administrators at auction, in pursuance of the order of the supreme court, and their deeds, conveyed the legal title to the grantee; and the right of the heirs to avoid this sale is only a right to bring a suit in equity for relief against the alleged fraud, and this right cannot be assigned. Harrington v. Brown, 5 Pick. 519; Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Younge & C. 489; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 356. A court of equity will not countenance an assignment made under circumstances like those in the present case, for the purpose of enabling the parties to come in, and support it as witnesses by their own testimony. Bell v. Smith, 5 Barn. & C. 188. No weight will be given to the testimony of witnesses thus made for the case. Myre v. Ludwig, 1 Pa. St. 47–52. Mrs. Sturges could only transfer her interest by a deed in which her husband joined with her, they being residents of Massachusetts. Rev. St. Mass. [1836, p. 405,] c. 59, § 2. Courts of equity will not, upon the suggestion of fraud, undertake collaterally to revise the decree of a competent tribunal; but the party must seek his remedy directly in the forum whose decree he desires to have revised or annulled, by proper proceedings therein. Jennison v. Hapgood, 7 Pick. 1; Paine v. Stone, 10 Pick. 75; Vaughn v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 1; Laughton v. Atkins, 1 Pick. 535–547. These decrees, therefore, are conclusive upon the complainant in the present controversy, and must be taken to have been just and well founded. This bill does not contain such allegations in regard to fraud as are necessary to induce a court of equity to re-examine the decrees. The particular errors must be specified, and the bill must allege how, when, and in what manner the fraud was perpetrated. Stearns v. Page, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 819; 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 424. Fraud will not be presumed, but must be clearly proved; and a court of equity will apply this just rule most rigidly in a case like the present one, where the claim is so stale, and the complainants have neglected to present it, not through any misapprehension, but for purposes of their own, until the means of proving the truth are lost, and the parties most interested are dead. To avoid the effect of the statute of limitation, or the lapse of time, on the ground of concealed fraud, the complainant must set forth with particularity, when and by what means the fraud was discovered, and the averment must be supported by the proofs. Stearns v. Page, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 829; Wagner v. Baird, Id. 258; Fisher v. Boody, [Case No. 4,814;] Carr v. Hilton, [Id. 2,437;] Moore v. Greene, [Id. 9,763.] See, also, Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Brown, Ch. 125; Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 94, 97, et seq.; Jenkins v. Pye, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 241; Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 636. The statute of limitations is a positive bar, and operates in equity, ex vigore suo, as well as at law, in all matters of concurrent jurisdiction, or of a similar nature. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1520, and notes; Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212, 243; Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 234, 258; Moore v. Greene, [Case No. 9,763.] And where it is not directly applicable, courts of equity will apply the bar, and will refuse their aid after a lapse of twenty years, and often within a less period. 2 Sugd. Vend. (7th Amer. Ed.) 899; Roberts v. Tunstall, 4 Hare, 257; Gregory v. Gregory, Coop. 201; McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 168; Bowman v. Wathen, Id. 189; Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Brown, Ch. 125; Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 377.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Where the answer is responsive to the bill of complaint, and positively denies the matter charged, and the denial has respect to a transaction within the knowledge of the respondent, the answer is evidence in his favor, and unless it is overcome by the satisfactory testimony of two opposing witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by other facts and circumstances, which give to it greater weight than the answer, or which are equivalent in weight to a second witness, it is conclusive, so that the court will neither make a decree nor send the case to trial, but will simply dismiss the bill of complaint. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (8th Ed.) 1528; Pember v. Mathers, 1 Brown, Ch. 52; Walton v. Hobbs, 2 Atk. 19; Clark's Ex'rs v. Van Riemsdyk, 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 160.

Keeping that principle constantly in view, it will become necessary to look at the evidence with some care in order to ascertain what is the true state of the facts in regard to the matters in controversy between the parties. The administrators were lawfully appointed and duly qualified according to law to discharge their duties as such, and it is not denied, that an inventory of the estate of the intestate was duly made and returned, nor is it pretended that the administrators have not fully and justly administered the personal estate. They settled their first administration account on the 9th of October, 1820, and no attempt is made to impeach the decree allowing the same and ordering it to be recorded. By the copy of the record it appears, that they charged themselves in that account with all the personal estate as the same was appraised, which, with other charges, as therein specified, amounted to $6,742.04, and were allowed for sums paid out on account of the estate, $6,475.52, which left only a balance of $266.52 in their hands. On the same day they filed a list of debts due and owing by the estate, and a schedule of debts not collected, and supposed to be due to the estate. The debts due to the estate might not be collected, but such as were owed by the estate must be paid, and they accordingly, on the same day, petitioned the court of probate for license to sell real estate for that purpose; and the bill of complaint admits that on the 13th of the same month, they, as such administrators, were authorized to sell so much of the real estate of the intestate as would raise the sum of $6,511.37. Pursuant to that authority, sales of real estate were made by the administrators, to the amount of $3,635, and no fraud or irregularity in that behalf is charged upon the administrators. Other debts to a large amount were due and unpaid by the estate, but the authority conferred upon the administrators to sell the real estate for that purpose, although not exhausted, was not further exercised, and the creditors appear to have acquiesced in the delay. Nothing further was done in the probate court until the 12th of March, 1827, when the widow of the intestate petitioned to have her dower set off to her, and on the 6th of April following, the estates mentioned in the bill of complaint were assigned to her in full of her dower. The second administration account was presented by the administrators on the 10th of September, 1827, and, on the 17th of the same month, the same was allowed and ordered to be recorded. All sums received by the sales of the real estate were duly charged in the account, and it is not even suggested that there is any error in that part of the account. The list of debts filed and recorded on the 9th of October, 1820, included three notes, described as notes in bank, secured by mortgage, dated November 1, 1818, and were carried out in the account as amounting to $3,000. Immediately under the same is also another sum of $345, described as interest on the above. Included in the same list, is a note to D. Pulsifer, for $100, but whether on interest or not does not appear. When the administrators presented their second administration account, they also filed another list of debts due by the estate, amounting in the whole to the sum of $2,220. Three items only are included in that list, consisting of two notes at bank, secured by mortgage, amounting to $2,000, and one year's interest on the above carried out $120; and the remaining item is one note to D. Pulsifer, $100, which plainly is the same note as that specified in the first list of debts. Decree was entered on the same day the second administration account was allowed, ordering the list of debts to be filed and recorded. The former license to sell real estate having expired by lapse of time, these proceedings in the probate court were necessary to lay the proper foundation for an application to the supreme judicial court for a renewal of the authority to sell. Notice to all persons interested, however, is required before decree, unless the parties voluntarily appear, and assent to the same, or in some way signify their assent in writing, which is often done in probate proceedings, in order to save the expense of publication. Accordingly, both the second administration account and the second list of debts were respectively examined and approved by and in behalf of all the heirs to the estate, and there is no allegation in the bill of complaint that the signatures of the parties to these papers are not genuine, or that they were unfairly obtained. Those writings are signed by each of the four heirs, who were then of age, and by the widow, for herself and the six minor children. The complainant charges that the account was false and fraudulent, and that there was nothing due from the estate to the administrators, or to any other person, but he does not allege that the guardian was guilty of any fraud in approving the account and list of debts, or that her signature to these writings was improperly procured.

Accusations like these, appertaining as they do to probate accounts formally settled more than thirty years ago, ought to be specific, and point out the items of the account which are alleged to be false, especially when, as in this case, it appears that all the parties implicated, and many of those who had the best means of knowledge in regard to the transactions are dead. The administrators charged $1,309 for the time and trouble of the first-named respondent, in settling the estate, and that amount was allowed in the account for his services. A specification of that item as a false one, is made in the bill of complaint, and it is the only one pointed out in that account as false.

Much testimony was introduced to show that D. B. Badger, when he was appointed, agreed to serve without charge, but after the lapse of thirty-five years the written assent of the heirs to the account, certifying that they had examined and approved the same, must be regarded as a conclusive answer to that imputation. Falsity is also imputed to the second list of debts, as recorded on the 17th of September, 1827; but it is evident, upon comparing the same with the list recorded on the 9th of October, 1820, that the two are the same so far as respects the items embraced in the second list. Three mortgage notes were filed in the first list, and but two in the second. Interest to the amount of $345 was charged in the first, as arising on those mortgage notes, but the amount set down in the second list is but $120. Taking the facts as they appear on the face of the papers, it is a reasonable presumption that one of the notes had been paid, and that all the interest on the other two had been paid, except for the last preceding year before the list was filed. Inference, however, need not be resorted to, as it expressly appears that the first note, and interest on the three notes to the amount of $378.30, were paid by the administrators, and the amount was allowed in the second administration account. Evidently, therefore, the notes were payable with interest, and the clear inference is, that all the accruing interest, except for one year, had been paid, or in some manner liquidated, when the second list of debts was presented. The petition for a renewal of the license to sell real estate, was presented by the administrators on the first Tuesday of March, 1830, to the supreme judicial court for the county of Suffolk. They state in their petition that they obtained such license from the probate court on the 13th of November, 1820; that they refrained from exercising the entire power so granted, at the request of the heirs and their guardians, and in the belief that the price of the real estate would be increased by the delay. The receipt of notice was acknowledged by the widow, heirs, and guardians, and they waived all objection to the granting of the prayer of the petition. Notice having been acknowledged, and all objections waived, the decree ordering the license was entered at the same term in which the petition was presented. Sales were accordingly made of the house and land in Cambridgeport; houses and land in Distil House square; an undivided part of an estate situated in Lynn; house and land situated in North Federal court, subject to the life estate of the widow; and house and land in Broad street, which was also subject to the widow's right of dower. The aggregate amount of the sales was $4,723.50, as fully and regularly appears, by the respective returns of sales duly made and sworn to by the administrators on the 25th of April, 1831, filed in the probate court for the proper county. Having completed these proceedings, and given public notice to all persons interested, the administrators presented their third administration account. Credit was duly given to the estate for the amount received for the sales of real estate; and they were allowed, for payments made and expenses incurred on account of the estate, the sum of $4,774.65, leaving a small balance against the estate. It is not pretended that there is any error in the form of these proceedings, and the pretence, if set up, could not be sustained for a moment, as it is obvious, from an inspection of the record that so far as form is concerned, from the appointment of the administrators to the final settlement of the third administration account, every step taken in the proceedings was correct and according to law.

Four principal objections are taken by the complainant to the legality of the proceedings: first, the one before mentioned, that the charge for services in the second administration account, and the second list of debts presented on the same day to the probate court, were false and fraudulent; secondly, that the license granted by the supreme judicial court, for the sale of real estate, was fraudulently obtained; thirdly, that the administrators intentionally neglected to give proper notice of the time and place of sale of the estates, for the fraudulent purpose of enabling the first-named respondent to purchase the same at a price below their real value; fourthly, that he employed two persons to attend the sales, and bid off the estates, and that they accordingly attended, and bid off certain parcels of the estates for his use and benefit, and subsequently conveyed the same to their employer, without any compensation except what was paid to them for their illegal services.

Sufficient has already been remarked to show that the first objection cannot be sustained. More than thirty-one years have elapsed since the third administration account was settled, and now, when the administrators who made the account, and presented the list of debts, and the guardian of the complainant, who approved the same, are dead, it is but just to hold that a party making such a charge, under such circumstances, shall be required to prove the charge by full and satisfactory evidence.

Express fraud, also, is the foundation of the second objection, and in respect to that charge the rule is, that he who makes it must prove it. Nothing less than proof of fraud could possibly avail the complainant in this case, as the court to whom the petition was addressed was bound to inquire whether debts were due and unpaid by the estate, before they granted the license, and, in the absence of fraud, it must be assumed that the finding of the court is conclusive. Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319. Several suggestions are made to show that the license was obtained by fraud, but no one of them is satisfactorily proved. One is, that the notes embraced in the second list of debts were barred by the statute of limitations, but the clear inference from all the circumstances is otherwise, as has already appeared. Those notes were subsequently paid by the administrators, and charged in their third administration account, and no one of the heirs made any opposition to the decree allowing the same, although duly notified to appear and show cause, if any they had, why the same should not be approved. Another suggestion is, that the assent of the widow and heirs to the petition for the license to sell was improperly obtained, but the suggestion is not sustained by any satisfactory proof. Some attempt was made to show that the signature of the widow is not genuine, but the weight of the evidence clearly shows, that she either signed her name, or authorized it to be placed to the instrument.

Satisfactory proof that notice of the time and place of sale was given is exhibited in respect to every parcel sold under the license obtained from the supreme judicial court. None of the sales effected under the license from the probate court are drawn in question, and of course nothing need be remarked in regard to those sales.

Testimony was introduced by the complainant, tending to prove that the first-named respondent, who was one of the administrators of the estate, employed one William P. Hart to attend the sale of real estate on the 20th of July, 1830, for the purpose of bidding off, for his own use and benefit, some portion of the estate which was advertised to be sold on that day, and that he accordingly attended the sale, and on that occasion he was the highest bidder, on the parcel situate in Distil House square, and the same was struck off to him for the sum of $2,820, as specified in the third administration account. The administrators conveyed the same to William P. Hart, on the 23d of July, 1830, and, on the 14th of March, 1831, the grantee in that deed conveyed the same to the first-named respondent. Evidence was also introduced by the complainant, tending to show that he procured in like manner the same person, and also one Daniel Gillpatrick, to attend the sale of the real estate advertised to be sold on the 12th of March, 1831, to bid off some portion of the estate for his own use and benefit, and that the former was the highest bidder for the house and land situated in North Federal court, and that the same was struck off to him, subject to the life estate of the widow, for the sum of $150, and that the latter was the highest bidder for the house and land situated in Brown street, subject to the widow's right of dower, and the same was struck off to him for the sum of $613, as appears by a copy of the proceedings, as recorded in the probate court on the return of the sales. Conveyances were duly made by the administrators to the respective bidders, and they subsequently conveyed their respective interests to the first-named respondent. A fraudulent design is charged by the complainant in respect to the employment of these persons to bid on the real estate, but proof to that effect is wholly wanting in the record. On the contrary, the evidence shows to the satisfaction of the court, that the sales were properly advertised, and in all other respects properly conducted, and that every reasonable exertion was made by the administrators to procure the attendance of bidders, and to obtain the best prices for the estates. The evidence clearly shows that the senior administrator neither employed those persons to bid, or had any knowledge that they or either of them had been employed by his associate. It is insisted by the complainant on this branch of the case, that the sales to Hart and Gillpatrick were absolutely void, because in bidding off the same they acted as the agents of the administrators. Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 552.

On the other hand, it is insisted by the respondents, that inasmuch as the case made in the bill of complaint is one of actual, positive fraud, that the complainant is not entitled to relief, unless he proves those allegations; that having charged actual fraud, he cannot now abandon that ground and show himself entitled to relief by proving constructive fraud, arising out of the peculiar relation between himself and the first-named respondent. Support of that proposition is certainly found in Eyre v. Potter, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 54; but in the view taken of this case, it will not be necessary to decide that question in the present controversy, because I am of the opinion that the claim of the complainant is barred by lapse of time. Courts of equity, says Mr. Justice Grier, in Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 258, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, consider themselves bound by the statutes of limitation, which govern courts of law in like cases, and this rather in obedience to the statutes than by analogy. In many other cases they act upon the analogy of the limitations at law, as where a legal title would, in ejectment, be barred by twenty years' adverse possession, courts of equity will act upon the like limitation, and apply it to all cases of relief sought upon equitable titles, or claims, touching real estate. Moore v. Greene, [Case No. 9,763;] 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (8th Ed.) 1520; Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 243. But, says the same learned judge, there is a defence peculiar to courts of equity, founded on lapse of time, and the staleness of the claim, where no statute of limitation governs the case. In such cases, courts of equity often act upon their own inherent doctrine of discouraging, for the peace of society, antiquated demands, by refusing to interfere, where there has been gross laches in prosecuting the claim, or long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights. 2 Sugd. Vend. (7th Amer. Ed.) 899; Roberts v. Tunstall, 4 Hare, 257; Jenkins v. Pye, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 241; Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 636; Sullivan v. Sullivan, [Case No. 13,598;] McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 168. Long acquiescence and laches by parties out of possession, are productive of much hardship and injustice to others, and cannot be excused, but by showing some actual hindrance, or impediment, caused by the fraud or concealment of the party in possession, which will appeal to the conscience of the chancellor. Sales in this case, which the complainant seeks to set aside, were made in 1830 and 1831, more than thirty years ago, and no reason or excuse is assigned for the delay. Present suit was instituted on the 6th of September, 1858. Complainant, it is true, alleges that the fraudulent acts and doings of Daniel B. Badger were unknown to him until within five years last past, but the bill of complaint does not allege that the same were in any manner concealed from him, or when or by what means the fraud was discovered. Such general and unsubstantial allegations of excuse cannot be regarded by a court of equity as sufficient. On the contrary, it is well settled, that if the complainant would avoid the effect of lapse of time, or of the statute of limitations, on the ground of concealed fraud, he must set forth with particularity when and by what means the fraud was discovered, and the averment so made must be supported by the proofs. Stearns v. Page, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 829; Wagner v. Baird, Id. 258; Fisher v. Boody, [Case No. 4,814;] Carr v. Hilton, [Id. 2,437;] Moore v. Greene, [Id. 9,763.] Many of the heirs have been examined as witnesses, and not one of them has testified to any concealment on the part of the respondent, or any ignorance upon the subject. His counsel insist that the claim is not barred, because the properties were subject to a life estate which did not terminate until the 24th of September, 1855, when the widow of the intestate deceased; but I am of the opinion that the continuance of her life estate has no effect upon the question of limitation in this case. The purchasers took an absolute title in the estates as against the complainant, and those under whom he claims; and in equity the rule is, that the question of acquiescence is not affected by the circumstance that the particular estate had not determined during the lapse of time, since the conveyance might at any time have been avoided, if obtained by fraud, as alleged. Sullivan v. Sullivan, [supra;] Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Brown, Ch. 125; Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 94, 97; Jenkins v. Pye, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 241; Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 636; Bowman v. Wathen, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 193.

Applying these principles to the present case, I am of the opinion that the claim in this case is barred by the limitation of twenty years. When the sales were made, the complainant, and those under whom he claims, were minors, and consequently within the exception of the statute, but the proof is full to the point, that all of them, except the complainant, had been of age more than twenty years when the first suit in this case was commenced. The age of the complainant does not distinctly appear, and it may be that he had not been of age twenty years on the 8th of May, 1857, when the former suit was commenced. Proofs on this point are not clear, and perhaps it would be going too far to say that his original share of one tenth is barred by that limitation. But if that be so, still I am of the opinion that the entire claim is barred, as a stale claim, upon the ground of gross laches, and long unexplained acquiescence in the operation of an adverse right. Under such circumstances courts of equity will often treat a lapse of a less period than the one specified in the statute of limitations as a presumptive bar to the claim. Smith v. Clay, Amb. 645; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 93; Dexter v. Arnold [Case No. 3,859;] Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 481; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (8th Ed.) § 1520. Another answer to the claim may also be given, which is as applicable to the complainant as to those under whom he claims. Actions for lands sold by executors, administrators, or guardians cannot be maintained in this state by any heir or other person claiming under the deceased testator or intestate, unless the same be commenced within five years next after the sale. Rev. St. Mass. c. 71, § 37, p. 458; Id. c. 72, § 19, p. 461. Objection is made by the complainant that this limitation cannot operate, because it is not set up in the answer. But the objection, I think, is not well taken, as applied to the present case. Courts of equity, says Judge Story, act upon the analogy of the law, as to the statute of limitations, and will not entertain a suit for relief, if it would be barred at law. If the objection does not appear on the face of the bill, it may be taken by way of plea or by way of answer; but the clear inference is, that the learned author did not regard the plea or answer as necessary when the objection was apparent on the face of the bill of complaint. Story, Eq. Pl. § 503; Coop. Eq. Pl. 167; Mitf. Pl. by Jeremy, 212; Maxwell v. Kennedy, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 222; Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 638.

In view of the whole case, I am of the opinion that the complainant is not entitled to relief, and the bill of complaint is accordingly dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken from this decree to the supreme court by the complainants, and the judgment was thereupon affirmed, the court, by Mr. Justice Grier, holding that:

["Courts of equity, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, consider themselves bound by the statutes of limitation which govern courts of law in like cases, and this rather in obedience to the statutes than by analogy.

["In many other cases they act upon the analogy of the like limitation at law. But there is a defense peculiar to courts of equity founded on lapse of time and the staleness of the claim, where no statute of limitation governs the case. In such cases, courts of equity act upon their own inherent doctrine of discouraging, for the peace of society, antiquated demands; refuse to interfere where there has been gross laches in prosecuting the claim or long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights. Long acquiescence and laches by parties out of possession are productive of much hardship and injustice to others, and cannot be excused but by showing some actual hindrance or impediment, caused by the fraud or concealment of the parties in possession, which will appeal to the conscience of the chancellor.

["The party who makes such appeal should set forth in his bill specifically what were the impediments to an earlier prosecution of his claim, how he came to be so long ignorant of his rights, and the means used by the respondent to fraudulently keep him in ignorance. and how and when he first came to a knowledge of the matters alleged in his bill; otherwise, the chancellor may justly refuse to consider his case, on his own showing, without inquiring whether there is a demurrer or formal plea of the statute of limitations contained in the answer.

["The bill in this case is entirely defective in all these respects. It is true there is a general allegation that the 'fraudulent acts were unknown to complainant till within five years past,' while the statement of his case shows clearly that he must have known, or could have known, if he had chosen to inquire, at any time in the last thirty years of his life, every fact alleged in his bill. That his mother was entitled to dower in the land if the sale was set aside was no impediment to his pursuit of his rights, while her death may have removed the only witness who was able to prove that his complaint of fraud was unfounded, and that it was by the consent and desire of the family that the property was kept in the family name by the only one who was able to advance the money to pay the debts of the deceased,—a fact fairly to be presumed from her silence and acquiescence for twenty-four years." PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—APPLICATION — SPECIMENS OF COMPOUND ARTIFICIAL ALIZARINE.

1. Reissued letters patent No. 4,321, division B, granted April 4th, 1871, to Charles Graebe and Charles Liebermann, for artificial alizarine produced from anthracine, are valid.

2. The decision of this court in Anilin v. Higgin, [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Higgin, Case No. 722,] confirmed.

3. Artificial alizarine, made according to the process of the patent, was a new product, and was patentable.

4. The application for the patent was not accompanied by any specimen of ingredients or of the compound; but it was for the patent office to determine whether the nature of the case admitted of specimens, and the want of them is not made a statutory defence to a patent.

5. The artificial alizarine of the patent is different from chemically pure alizarine, and the patent covers the invention.

6. The patent is infringed by an article produced by the process of letters patent No. 153,-

George Gifford and John Van Santvoord, for plaintiff.

Dickerson & Beaman, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This bill is brought upon division B of reissued letters patent No. 4,321, dated April 4th, 1871, to Charles Graebe and Charles Liebermann, for artificial alizarine produced from anthracine, now owned by the plaintiff. The cause was heard upon the pleadings and the plaintiff's evidence, at October term, 1877. While it was under consideration, a motion to open it for taking further evidence was filed by the defendants, and evidence was taken upon that motion. Pending the motion the parties, with the consent of the court, stipulated all that evidence and some other into the case, to be used as if taken in chief, and it has again been fully heard upon the pleadings and all this evidence and arguments of counsel.

The original patent was for the process of making this alizarine. It was surrendered and reissued in two divisions, one for the process, and the other, this one, for the product. This division of the patent, and the question of infringement by the same means as those by which the defendants are now claimed to infringe, were under consideration in a cause in favor of this plaintiff [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik] against Hamilton Manufacturing Company [Case No. 721] in the Massachusetts district, February 4th, 1878, and in another cause, [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik,] against Higgin, in this district, September, 1878, [Case No. 722.] Several questions were made there about the regularity of the reissue, which have not been insisted upon here. The questions now raised in argument are, whether this product is, in fact, so new a product as to be patentable under the law in any form? and, if it is, whether this division of the patent, as granted, covers it? and, if both, whether the defendants infringe it? These questions were considered and determined in those cases, as there presented. But there is considerable evidence in this case not in either of those; and, therefore, it has been fully heard, examined and considered, by itself, without resting its decision upon the authority of those.

Alizarine is a natural dye-stuff, found in the root of the madder plant, and has long been known as such, in the art of coloring. It is formed and held in the fibre of the root, and reached by disintegrating the substances which it is among, separating it from them, and securing it by long and well known processes. It is essentially an extract from among other natural products, and not in any sense an artificial compound. Its structure was carefully studied by chemists, and its molecular formation ascertained to be composed of fourteen atoms of carbon, eight of hydrogen, and four of oxygen, represented by the formula $C_{14}H_8O_4$ of chemists. The defendants insist that the production of Graebe and Liebermann is the same thing.

Anthracene was a waste product of coal-tar —a hydro-carbon—its molecules consisting of fourteen atoms of carbon and ten of hydrogen, in formula $C_{14}H_{10}$. A chinone had been formed from it, by replacing two atoms of hydrogen with two of oxygen, called anthrachinone, with the formula $C_{14}H_8O_2$, having two atoms less of oxygen than chemically pure alizarine. Anthracene was not in any sense a dye-stuff, neither was anthrachinone; and neither did either contain anything that was a dye-stuff, or any coloring matter which could be extracted in any manner, for none was there. But their molecular structure was so like that of alizarine, that Graebe and Liebermann were led to investigate whether there was anything there from which any substance, embodying the coloring principle of alizarine, could be produced. To produce what would have the same chemical formula, it was necessary to add two atoms of oxygen, or to replace two atoms of hydrogen with two of hydroxyl. That accomplished would not insure the production of the same thing, although having the same formula, nor anything with like properties. The molecules to be acted upon were very complex, and their atoms very liable to be disarranged by any process of addition or substitution. Graebe and Liebermann devised a method, involving various steps, for effecting the changes desired, tried it, and succeeded in obtaining a substance whose formula would be the same, and whose properties the same or like those of alizarine, and which they termed alizarine. When they had done this they had not discovered natural alizarine anywhere, and extracted it, but they had made an alizarine synthetically, from substances never before containing it, nor anything like it. What they made was a worthy substitute for, whether more or less nearly or exactly like, the natural alizarine of madder.

If this substance should be found to be so like natural alizarine that no one could tell the difference between them, or know them apart except by their source, the question would be presented, whether, even then, it would not, of itself, be subject under the law to a patent granting to its inventors an exclusive right to it, and whether this patent is not valid for that purpose. The statute entitled an inventor of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter to a patent for it on application, accompanied by a drawing, with references, "where the nature of the case admits of drawings, or with specimens of ingredients, and of the composition of matter, sufficient in quantity for the purpose of experiment, where the invention or discovery is of a composition of matter." Act July 4, 1836, § 6; 5 Stat. 119. The application for this patent was not accompanied by any specimen of ingredients or of the compound. It is urged, in argument, that this product is not a patentable composition of matter, and that the absence of specimens shows it is not, and that it is not a manufacture, nor anything mentioned in the patent law as patentable. These terms in the statute are not understood to be placed there as stools, betwixt which inventors may fall to the ground, but to cover the whole range of useful invention, to every piece of which some one of them, and to many, more than one of them, will apply. This product may fall under the head of either a manufacture, or a composition of matter. If it is a composition of matter only, the statute, from the context as quoted, may be construed to mean that specimens are to accompany the application, when the nature of the case admits of specimens. If the statute is so construed, whether the nature of a case so admits, must be left to the determination of the patent office, subject to its requirement. And in this case it must have been determined that the nature of the case did not so admit, and so none have been required. And, however this may be, the statute has not placed the lack of specimens among the defences to a patent, and, as it was granted, it cannot fail for that reason.

The English statute, (21 Jac. 1, c. 3,) only saved grants and privileges of the sole working or making of any manner of new manufacture within the realm, to the first and true inventors of such manufactures, from the prohibition of monopolies; but, under the liberal construction which the word manufacture in the statute, from the nature of the subject, required, and, at the hands of the courts, received, to carry out the intention, it was extended so as to cover all subjects of invention of material things that were useful. Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 463; Hornblower v. Boulton, 8 Term R. 95.

This production of Graebe and Liebermann, however like natural alizarine, was not that. It was entirely new in its source and its coming. No one had ever seen or known of such a thing before. Its addition to the productions known before was, in the language of Buller, J., in Rex v. Arkwright, Webst. Pat. Cas. 71, a vast "improvement of the trade." According to Heath, J., in Boulton v. Bull, [supra,] the product only, and not the process alone, would have been patentable, under the English statute. He said, referring to the statute: "What then falls within the scope of the proviso? Such manufactures as are reducible to two classes. The first includes machinery, the second substances, (such as medicines,) formed by chemical and other processes, where the vendible substance is the thing produced, and that which operates preserves no permanent form." "I asked, in the argument, for an instance of a patent for a method, and none such could be produced. I was then pressed with patents for chemical processes, many of which are for a method, but that is from an inaccuracy of expression, because the patent in truth is for a vendible substance." This, of course, does not show that, under a statute which includes the term art, a process merely would not be patentable; but, a product patentable under one would be under the other. In Steiner v. Heald, 6 Eng. Law & Eq. 536, the patent was for the invention of a new manufacture of garancine. Garancine was an extract from madder, having its pure red coloring matter, and was well known. The plaintiff produced it from spent madder, by the same process by which it had before been produced from fresh madder. It was ruled at the trial, that, because it was the same substance, it was not a new manufacture. This ruling was reversed in the exchequer chamber, on the ground that spent madder "might be a very different thing from fresh madder, in its properties, chemical and otherwise," and that whether it was or not would be material to the validity of the patent. If it was, the novelty of the manufacture would consist wholly in the material from which it was produced. There would be a combination of new materials, which would be a new combination; and so there would be here. In the case of The Wood Paper Patent, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 566, the paper pulp sought to be covered by the patent was not made at all by the new process, but was merely extracted by it. It was cellulose before the treatment and after; an extract and not a compound; and its patentability appears to have been denied on that ground. There was no new combination about it.

The plaintiff does not, however, rest the claim of novelty upon the production from a new source, but claims, upon the evidence, that the thing itself, independent of its source, when compared with the alizarine of madder, is different from it. The defendants deny this, and the evidence, although all credible, in view of the honesty and sincerity of the witnesses, is somewhat conflicting. The question is one of fact, and quite intricate, involving a high degree of skill in the subject, and requiring the aid of persons possessed of it, which has been furnished by both sides.

Considerable of the testimony, and especially of that from abroad, taken probably without the presence of counsel who manage the cause, goes to show only what Graebe and Liebermann sought after, and thought they had found, when they had succeeded with their experiments, rather than to show what they actually did discover and invent. But, what they sought for, intended, or thought, does not seem to be of so much importance here. An invention is not like a will, depending on intention. It is a fact, and, if the fact exists, it does not appear to be material whether it came by design, or accidentally without being bidden. The question here is, whether this substance which they produced is, in its structure and properties, old or new; and not whether they looked for something old or new, or thought they had found either one or the other. Separated from the rest, the testimony as to whether this product is actually different from the other, in some respects material to dye-stuffs, is full, and not very conflicting. Each has the formula $C_{14}H_8O_4$, but that is not conclusive. Alone it is hardly a circumstance. Chemists on each side of the case agree about this. Prof. Chandler, at page 204, so expresses himself, and instances diamonds and plumbago as having the same formula without any resemblance. The testimony of President Morton at page 466, and that of Prof. Hedrick at page 52, is to the same effect. As an example akin to this question, shown by the evidence, there is the purpurine of madder, whose formula is $C_{14}H_8O_5$. Perkin discovered a purpurine from anthracene, which he called anthrapurpurine; Auerbach, a purpurine from the same source, which he called isopurpurine. Some say these two are the same and others that they are different, but all agree that both are different from the purpurine of madder, yet each has the same formula $C_{14}H_8O_5$.

The presence of these newly discovered purpurines in the artificial alizarine, where they are said to have and appear to have an important influence, is relied upon largely as showing that it is different from the natural alizarine. The testimony of several eminent and reliable chemists is to the effect that it is so present. The testimony of Prof. Chandler, who is also eminent and reliable, is largely depended upon to show to the contrary; yet after spending a great deal of time in investigating the subject, and after having testified in regard to it several times before, and as late as November, 1878, he testified further, speaking of the process of the patent: "I am to-day unable to say whether anthrapurpurine or isopurpurine is a necessary by-product of the bromine process of Graebe and Liebermann." He appears to depend largely upon what they intended and thought, in settling in his own mind what they did. The little importance of their intentions and suppositions becomes more apparent, when it is considered, in this connection, that isopurpurine and anthrapurpurine, whether the same or different, were not discovered at all until 1870, long after the invention and patent. On this question it seems sufficient to say, without specifically referring to the evidence further, that it is satisfactorily found, as a matter of fact, that this artificial alizarine of the patent is essentially different, in capabilities and properties, from chemically pure alizarine, madder alizarine, or any coloring matter before known and used.

It has been argued with much plausibility, for the defendants, that the patent itself is, in intention and effect, a patent for chemically pure alizarine; that the various steps of the process described in it might as well be represented by chemical notation, in equations and formulae which would end in the formula $C_{14}H_8O_4$; and that, if the finding should be as just stated, the invention would be of one thing, and the patent for another, and that patented old and well known. Here, in view of the evidence relied upon in support of these propositions, the distinction between what the inventors actually did, and what they intended to do and supposed they had done, as well as the difference between this patent and others and other documents, must be attended to. In the specification of an English patent, and elsewhere in writings, they characterized this product as chemically pure alizarine. There is considerable controversy among experts about the meaning of that expression where used. But neither that expression, nor the formula for it, is used in this patent, and this patent must speak for itself, and be understood as expressing what is to be gathered from what is there. Considering anthracene, or anthrachinone, as the starting point, the patent describes a series of chemical reactions ending with the "yellow flocks of alizarine." These reactions might be stated in equations, but it is to be remembered that, as shown before, the successive formulae, when stated, would not show all the characteristics or properties of the corresponding substances. So, the fact that they could be expressed in equations, and that chemists would understand the same things when so expressed that they do as now expressed, is not at all decisive. Neither could the actual effect of such reactions be accurately calculated beforehand. They must be first tried and their effect found from the actual result.

The question here is what in fact this result, the alizarine in yellow flocks, is. There can be no fair doubt, upon the evidence, but that the process can be carried out to a practical result. Several persons testify that they have done it, and no one testifies that these persons have not done it, nor really that it cannot be done. Those who have done it to any considerable extent agree, also, in testifying, that a practical dye-stuff is produced, which, although represented in formula like chemically pure alizarine, and probably containing it, is different from it. Upon this testimony, considered with all the other testimony and evidence, it is found that the product of the patent is different from chemically pure alizarine, and that the patent covers the invention.

It remains to be considered whether the defendants infringe. That they deal in an article produced by the process of subsequent letters patent, No. 153,536, dated July 28th, 1874, to Heinrich Caro, Graebe and Liebermann, is proved and not disputed. If that substance is the same, they do infringe.

In the patent in controversy, anthracene was to be converted into anthrachinone by a known process mentioned; and anthrachinone into alizarine, according to Prof. Chandler, by adding, by means of bromine, two atoms of oxygen; or, according to President Morton, by substituting two atoms of hydroxyl for two atoms of hydrogen, by introducing in place of the hydrogen, bromine, which could be replaced by the hydroxyl; or, according to Prof. Ordway, by replacing the hydrogen with hydroxyl by the use of bromine as a radical. These are understood to be merely different descriptions of the same chemical process, in which the bromine, as said by Prof. Hedrick, does not inhere at all in the result. It served only as a sort of vehicle to carry in what was necessary, and fetch away what was not wanted, without disarranging the rest. It was discovered that sulphuric acid was superior to bromine for this purpose, performing the same offices in the same way. The Caro patent is for this improvement. Some say this was merely substituting one well-known equivalent for another; others, that it involved inventive skill. Which are right is of no consequence here now. There is but little, if any, disagreement about the result being the same.

The defendants stoutly invoke Graebe and Liebermann themselves in support of some of their positions. Their statements upon this subject have been observed. They state that they tried sulphuric acid at first, but made the mistake of using too low heats. That "Caro first noticed that anthrachinone, if heated with sulphuric acid to above 200°, would give sulpho-acids, which on fusing with hydrate of potash, formed alizarine, the same as the bromine compound." They describe the development of this process further, and then say, further: "The first process is, therefore, identical with the first bromine method given above." They then describe the second method, and add, in conclusion: "On fusing the two sulpho-acids, they give alizarine exactly like the monobrom-, and dibrom-, anthrachinone." The patent is to the same effect. The specification commences: "This invention relates to improvements on an invention described in letters patent of the United States, granted to Charles Liebermann and Charles Graebe, for improvements in preparing coloring matters, dated the 5th day of October, 1869, No. 95,465, in which the preparation of artificial alizarine is based upon the action of caustic alkalies upon bibrom-anthrakinon or bichloranthrakinon. We have now discovered that a similar result may be obtained by substituting sulphuric acid for bromine or chlorine, in the above process."

Both the intended and the actual identity between the products, as to both source and properties, seem to be clearly established. And the establishment of this is of some importance, bearing upon the question of fact, before considered, as to the likeness between the natural and artificial alizarine. Prof. Chandler, upon whose testimony the defendants appear to most strongly rely, claims that the differences between them have been found in the product of the latter patent and not in that of the former. This may well have been, because they have not been so much looked for in the former. But, if the products of the two patented processes are identical, as is here found, what he recognizes as differences to some extent in the product of the latter patent would be found in that of the former, if persistently sought after.

These conclusions are more satisfactory, because they are in accordance with those reached in the two former cases upon this same division of this patent, in the one of which, in this district, [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Higgin, Case No. 722,] much reliance was placed upon the decision of that in the district of Massachusetts, and the opinion of Judge Shepley there [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Hamilton Manuf'g Co., Case No. 721.]

Let there be a decree establishing the validity of this division of the patent, and for an injunction and an account, according to the prayer of the bill, with costs.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court this decree was reversed, (Cochrane v. Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik, 111 U. S. 293, 4 Sup. Ct. 455,) on the ground that reissued letters patent No. 4,321, claiming "artificial alizarine, produced from anthracene or its derivatives, by either of the methods herein described, or by any other method which will produce a like result," if construed so broadly as to cover the article produced by the process of the Caro patent, is wider in its scope than the original actual invention, and wider than anything indicated in the specification of the original patent; and that, if construed so as to cover only the product which the process described will produce, the reissue is not infringed by the different article produced by the process of the Caro patent. [For other suits involving the same letters patent, see Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Cummins, Case No. 720; Same v. Hamilton Manuf'g Co., Id. 721; Same v. Higgin, Id. 722.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INFRINGEMENT — NEW PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE.

1. The complainant's patent was for an article produced from anthracene, called by the patentees "artificial alizarine," and the patent described two modes of its production, by means of bromine. Subsequently, it was discovered that the article could be produced more cheaply by using sulphuric acid, or other agents, instead of bromine: Held, that the article produced by the sulphuric acid process was an infringement of the complainant's patent.

[Cited in Cochrane v. Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik, 111 U. S. 298, 4 Sup. Ct. 457.]

2. The words "artificial alizarine" in the claim describe the product produced by the process, and do not necessarily mean chemically pure alizarine, and the claim is valid as being for a new article of manufacture.

[In equity. Bill for injunction by the Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik against Thomas K. Cummins. Temporary injunction granted, restraining further infringement of complainant's patent No. 95,465. J. Van Santvoord, for complainant.

Dickerson and Beaman, for defendant.

LOWELL, Circuit Judge. The patent in suit is division B of reissue 4,321, dated April 4, 1871, for the article called artificial alizarine. Alizarine was known to chemists as the substance which gave the principal value to madder as a dyestuff. The patentees, Graebe and Liebermann, assignors of the plaintiff corporation, made the brilliant discovery, in 1869, that this dyestuff, or something which would do substantially the same work, could be artificially produced from anthracene, which was one of the numerous products of coal tar. To effect this metamorphosis, it was necessary to add oxygen to the anthracene, and the patent describes two modes of doing this by means of bromine. Within a year after this process was patented, the patentees, with the assistance of a third chemist, Caro, discovered an easier and cheaper process, in which sulphuric acid is used instead of bromine. Mr. Perkin, an English chemist, discovered a similar modification at about the same time, and other persons have patented other similar processes, all of which depended upon the original discovery of these patentees, so far as one can ever affirm such a conclusion. The result of these discoveries has been that artificial alizarine has replaced madder to a very large extent, and that a great stimulus has been given to the art of dyeing, and to the science connected with it; but the original bromine process is never used.

The American patent of Graebe and Liebermann, granted in 1869, No. 95,465, was for the bromine process, or processes, and the reissue was in two parts; one, A, for the same processes, and one, B, for the product.

Whether the sulpho-acid processes, by which artificial alizarine is now made, are the equivalents of the original bromine processes, is not important to be considered at present, excepting as concerns the resulting product, because the article is always made in Europe. This suit is directed against the use and sale of the product. The question, therefore, is, whether division B of the patent is invalid.

In case of a discovery of the originality and beauty of that which these patentees are admitted to have made of one mode of producing alizarine from the almost worthless material, anthracene, it would seem reasonabl that a valid patent might be obtained for that product derived from that source, although the artificial alizarine, when produced, should be identical with alizarine made from madder. But counsel on both sides agree, for the purposes of this motion, that, by the law of the United States, one who produces an old article, though from the most unexpected source, can only patent the mode of producing it. Granting this to be the law, Judge Shepley, though he appears to have understood the fact to be that pure alizarine had not been produced before 1869, excepting in laboratories, decided [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Hamilton Manuf'g Co., Case No. 721] that, at any rate, this patent was valid, because he found that the artificial alizarine, thus produced, was a new article, differing in important particulars from the dyestuffs made from madder. Judge Wheeler, sitting in the southern district of New York, has made two similar decisions, [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Cochrane, Case No. 719; Same v. Higgin, Id. 722,] reserving, however, his opinion upon the question whether the patent might not be good, though the alizarine should be identical with an old product. I give no opinion upon this point.

It seems to be beyond doubt that what the patentees sought to discover, and supposed they had discovered, was the dyestuff of madder; and if it be true, as it has heretofore three times been held to be true, that they discovered something more, then, if the law be as it is taken to be, for the purposes of this motion, they have, by a sort of accident, obtained a valid patent for an incident of a most valuable discovery. Accidental justice, however, may be better than none.

Upon this motion the questions have been tried and discussed again with all the care and fulness of a new case, and many facts, not known at the time of the first suit, have been brought out; but not much that was not before Judge Wheeler at the last hearing. [Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Cochrane, Case No. 719.] The construction of the patent has been very fully argued, and a great amount of expert testimony has been given concerning it, intended to prove that the claim for "artificial alizarine" means, or does not mean, a claim for a certain definite substance represented by a certain formula. In my opinion, as in that of both judges who have considered the point before me, these words do not need, and will not admit of, expert interpretation. The words "artificial alizarine" are used by the patentees in their claim to describe the product which is the result of their process, and mean exactly what "artificial madder," or any other name which they might have chosen, would have meant. "Artificial alizarine" was not a term of art at the date of the patent, though it may have become so since that time. If it has become so, it is by reason of the numerous experiments and investigations that have followed this discovery, and have determined the meaning by determining the nature of the product. In 1869, it was begging the question to say that the claim was for chemically pure alizarine. Even now the term seems to be commonly used to include all forms of the product from anthracene, while chemists sometimes use it more narrowly to signify alizarine as distinguished from isopurpurine, etc. No patent, deed or contract would be construed so narrowly, at this day, as to hold that if the patentees made a new article they should not hold it because they thought it an old one.

It has been proved that artificial alizarine contains important dyeing substances, not mere impurities, which are not found in madder. Judge Shepley, following the witnesses, called these substances anthrapurpurine and isopurpurine. These two are really one. Still, this one and another, which is now called flavopurpurine, are found in artificial alizarine and not in madder or any of its extracts, and are important materials, giving some valuable results which the extracts of madder cannot give. Witnesses on both sides fully prove this, and, though some of the defendant's witnesses seem to assert that there is nothing which the new article can effect which cannot be as well done by the old dyestuffs, the defendant's experts say that the stability of certain shades of color depends on the presence of the new purpurines. There is purpurine in madder, and its chemical formula is the same as that of isopurpurine and of flavopurpurine, but the three are wholly distinct substances, and purpurine is much inferior to the others as a dyestuff. It is not contained in alizarine, though it can be made from it by adding something.

By constant experiment and effort, these facts concerning the new purpurines have been discovered since 1869, and they can now be separated and produced in a pure state, or nearly so. The defendant, however, insists that these new purpurines are not found in the artificial alizarine made by the bromine processes, but only in those made by the more recent methods. This is the only point upon which the evidence, when carefully examined, is found to be in much conflict. Unfortunately the scientific men who have investigated alizarine and its products, without reference to this litigation, have had no occasion to examine this particular question; and, of course, all their experiments have been made with the alizarine which they find in the market, and that is made by the sulphuric acid processes. Many of the witnesses for the defendant say that Graebe and Liebermann, in a report which they made to the Vienna Exhibition of 1873, truly stated that these purpurines were a product of the sulphuric acid processes, meaning to have it understood, as some of them positively assert, that these gentlemen there stated that these purpurines could only be made by those processes. I have searched the Vienna report in vain for any such statement; and I find that Judge Wheeler was equally unsuccessful. He found, as I do, general statements that the processes produced, or were supposed to produce, an identical article; but nothing definite on the precise point in question.

Perkin, one of the discoverers of isopurpurine, published a "History of alizarine and allied coloring matters, and their production from coal tar," in The Journal of the Society of Arts, London, May 30, 1879, which was handed me by the defendant's counsel, with a passage underscored, which I suppose was thought to contain a statement like that attributed to Graebe and Liebermann. I think it means almost exactly the contrary. It is this: p. 580, "But it was gradually found, when manufacturing artificial alizarine on the large scale, that the smaller the amount of sulphuric acid used to convert the anthraquinone into sulpho acids, the temperature being also kept as low as practicable, that the coloring matter made from such a product yielded with mordant shades of color more nearly approaching those produced with madder, until eventually the unexpected result was arrived at, that it was necessary to have a monosulpho acid of anthraquinone for the preparation of pure alizarine, and that the disulpho acid does not yield this substance at all, so that, in the production of pure alizarine, the following reactions take place: monosulphanthraquinonic acid is first decomposed into monoxanthraquinone; and this, when further heated with an alkali, is oxidized into alizarine. We thus see that this formation of alizarine differs entirely from that originally discovered by Graebe and Liebermann, both as regards the chemicals employed, and the chemical changes which take place. We also see that monoxanthraquinone is an intermediate product, and not a secondary one."

Now, I understand Mr. Perkin to mean, that the process by which pure alizarine is obtained is new, and that the process of Graebe and Liebermann would not produce it. I do not mean to say that he is distinguishing between the bromine and the sulphuric acid processes of Graebe and Liebermann, though he says nothing about Caro, but I do suppose him to mean that he, or some one else, long after 1869, discovered the mode of making pure alizarine. And I think the evidence is that pure alizarine, pure isopurpurine and pure flavopurpurine are all new products since 1869, though all contained in the patented article.

Whatever the meaning of Perkin, or whatever the fact may be, I do not find it to be proved in this case that the process or processes of the patent produce chemically pure alizarine. I do not undertake to account for the different results which witnesses of skill and integrity have reached on the one side and the other. It does appear, if I understand the evidence, that one set of witnesses took one of the alternative processes described in the patent, while the other set took the other. Whether this fact, if it be one, has anything to do with the difference of results, I do not know. What I find is, that upon the evidence as it stands before me, including the scientific reports and other books, the artificial alizarine of the patent is different in some important respects from any article known before. Whether the alizarine, strictly so called, when obtained from anthracene, is identical with the alizarine obtained from madder, is said by Auerbach, in 1877, to be a disputed question. "Anthracene, etc. By G. Auerbach. Translated by Crookes," Lond., 1877, p. 155. Auerbach himself thinks it is identical; I have assumed it to be so; but the point is unimportant at this time. I agree with Judges Shepley and Wheeler, that the claim is for a new article of manufacture, which was new in fact.

The remaining questions argued are the same that have been passed upon in the other cases. The fact of infringement appears to be made out by evidence not contradicted.

Temporary injunction granted.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—FOREIGN PATENT—EXPIRATION—PROCESS AND PRODUCT.

1. The provision of the statute—Act 1870, § 25, [16 Stat. 198]—providing that, in case of a foreign patent, the United States patent shall expire at the same time with the foreign patent, is not retroactive in its operation, and does not apply to American patents granted before the law took effect, or to the reissues of such patents granted after the law took effect.

3. When a thing is produced new, in and of itself, it is patentable as a new manufacture.

4. A patent for a new manufacture is infringed by the manufacture of the new product by any process whatever.

5. Before the invention covered by complainants' patent "alizarine" had been used as a generic term, applied to many different dye stuffs, and yellow and green alizarines were in the market. Chemically pure alizarine existed only in the books, and a body approximating to it only in the laboratory of the chemist. The claim of complainants' reissued patent (division B) was for "artificial alizarine produced from anthracene or its derivatives by either of the methods herein described, or by any other method which will produce a like result:" Held, under the circumstances of the case, that the reissue was not void for claiming alizarine, which was before well known, but that the invention patented was the new composition, which contained, combined with alizarine, other bodies of themselves effective agents before unknown, and which existed for the first time when produced by the patentees.

George Gifford and J. Van Santvoord, for complainants.

Edward N. Dickerson, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. An objection is raised to the validity of the reissued letters patent, under which complainants claim that the original patent was taken out in England by Graebe and Liebermann, on the 16th of June, 1869, and was suffered to expire, by reason of the omission to pay the annual fees upon it, on the 18th of December, 1871, after the reissue of the American patent for the same invention, dated April 4th, 1871. It is contended that the patent in controversy was issued under the act of July 8th, 1870, [16 Stat. 198,] and that as the 25th section of that act provided that an American patent "shall expire at the same time with the foreign patent" which has been obtained previous to the American patent, the reissue of the American patent expired on the 18th of December, 1871, when the English patent expired.

The act of March 3d, 1839, [5 Stat. 353, c. 88,] provided that, in all cases where a patent shall be granted after the same invention shall have been patented in a foreign country, "such patent shall be limited to the term of fourteen years from the date or publication of such foreign letters patent." The act of March 2d, 1861, [12 Stat. 246,] provides "that all patents hereafter granted shall remain in force for the term of seventeen years from the date of issue," and repeals all acts and parts of acts before passed, inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1861. The act of 1870, § 25, provides that in case of a prior foreign patent, the United States patent "shall expire at the same time with the foreign patent, or, if there be more than one, at the same time with the one having the shortest term."

The law of July 8th, 1870, (Rev. St. § 4887,) was not retroactive, and did not operate to put an end to American patents granted before the law took effect. The original patent in this case was dated October 5th, 1869, before the passage of the act of 1870. Without a breach of good faith to the patentee, who had complied with the provisions of previous acts by disclosing his invention and paying the required fees, congress could not take away any portion of the term of the patent, or any right to a reissue which existed under the laws in force when the patent was granted, and which formed a part of the contract between the parties. Nor is any such intention to be gathered from the words of the statute. The act of 1870 has not, in the practice of the patent office, been acted upon as retroactive. Apperly v. Clissold, Com. Dec. 1870, p. 164. This long-continued usage and practice of one of the departments of the government is entitled to be considered by courts with great respect. The act of 1870, while repealing prior acts, contains a proviso saving all rights existing and all remedies which have arisen under any of said laws, and § 5,597 of the Revised Statutes contains a similar provision. The patent of Graebe and Liebermann, assigned to the complainants, did not, therefore, expire when the English patent became void by the omission to pay the annual fees.

The subject of the patent is a new and useful composition of matter, being an improvement in dyes or coloring matter produced from anthracene, and styled in the reissue as "artificial alizarine." Before the invention of Graebe and Liebermann the word "alizarine," a word coined from the Arabic and modern Greek names for madder, was commercially applied to a class embracing different varieties of dye-stuffs obtained from the madder plant. These dye-stuffs owed their value not only to a crystallized compound, which can be obtained from the madder and some other plants, known as "alizarine," but also to other materials existing naturally in the madder, or produced by the action of fermentation, heat, and the like, and by the aid of chemicals. The term "alizarine" was also applied by chemists to a theoretically pure crystallized extract from madder, whose formula was $C_{14}H_8O_4$. These madder extracts were among the most valuable dye-stuffs known to the world, and to supply the great and constantly increased demand for them large tracts of land were devoted to the raising of madder.

In 1868, Graebe and Liebermann, by a new process invented by them, produced their new composition of matter, now, for want of a name more accurately descriptive, called "artificial alizarine," a product unknown to both science and the arts at the date of their invention. Coal-tar (a substance containing a large number of the compounds caused by the various reactions which take place when coal is subjected in close vessels to intense heat), when submitted to a second distillation, yields at a very high temperature, as one of its products, anthracene, which, when purified, is a white, waxy substance. From this body named "anthracene," Graebe and Liebermann, by the series of chemical treatments described in the specifications, built up a beautiful and complex product, an artificial dye-stuff, now known as "artificial alizarine." This was not a chemically pure alizarine. Their process stopped far short of the elimination, from the product, of the bodies other than chemically pure alizarine. In fact, the presence of some of the other bodies appears to much enhance the value of the dye-stuff produced by their process. This product was one entirely new. The process by which they produced it was entirely new. Anthrapurpurine, isopurpurine, and other bodies, combined with alizarine in their product, are not known to have existed before they were produced by Graebe and Liebermann.

This composition of matter, which to a great degree has taken the place of madder preparations in the arts of dyeing and calico-printing, was new as to its origin. It was a purely artificial production, built up, as well as described by Professors Morton, Hedrick, and Ordway, by a process of chemical synthesis, from materials none of which contained it, or anything approaching to it, in character or properties. Its composition was new. It contained, combined with alizarine, other bodies of themselves effective dyeing agents before unknown, and existing for the first time when produced by Graebe and Liebermann. It was new not only in some of its new chemical properties, but in its capacity to produce, in dyeing and calico-printing, tints which cannot be obtained with the preparations of madder or any other dye-stuffs previously known.

Objection is made to the validity of the reissued patent upon which this bill is brought. Graebe and Liebermann, on the 5th of October, 1869, obtained letters patent of the United States, No. 95,465, in which, after describing their process in the words contained in the reissue, they made the following claim: "The within-described process for the production of alizarine, by first preparing bibromanthrakinon or bicloranthrakinon, and then converting these substances into alizarine, substantially as above set forth." This patent was subsequently reissued in two divisions, one for the process and one for the product. In division B, upon which this suit is brought, they claim: "Artificial alizarine produced from anthracene or its derivatives by either of the methods herein described, or by any other method which will produce a like result."

The right to reissue in two divisions, one for the new process and one for the new product, is fully sustained by the opinion of Mr. Justice Clifford, in Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co., [Case No. 5,583:] "No doubt can be entertained that a new product or manufacture, and a new process or method of producing the new article, are the proper subjects of separate and distinct claims in an original patent, and, if so, then it is equally clear that the patentee, under that provision, upon a return of the patent for correction and reissue, and upon complying with the conditions therein specified, may have several patents for the distinct and separate parts of his invention."

When a thing is produced new, in and of itself, it is patentable as a new manufacture. If it be capable of being produced by various different processes, yet, when the product is new, independent of the process, the patent is infringed by the unlicensed manufacture of the new product by any mode of manufacture, the process of manufacture being wholly unimportant. Merrill v. Yeomans, [Case No. 9,472;] Goodyear v. Central R., [Id. 5,563.] But defendants further contend that alizarine was a well-known substance long before the patent, and it could not be made the subject of any letters patent, and that the reissue is void as claiming alizarine broadly, and as claiming more that the invention described in the original. An examination of the original and the reissue will show that the same process and the same product is described in both. Before the invention, the name "alizarine" had been used as a generic term, applied to many different dye-stuffs, and yellow and green alizarines were in the market. Chemically pure alizarine existed only in the books, and a body approximating to it only in the laboratory of the chemist. As the new manufacture was intended to take the place of the dye-stuffs extracted from madder, and as, in common with those dye-stuffs, it owed a large proportion of its value as a dye to the presence of alizarine, it was not erroneous, although not accurately descriptive, to appiy to this product of a distillation of coal treated with chemicals a name which had been applied to preparations from madder, without any more accuracy in one case than the other. Whatever Graebe and Liebermann called their product in the original or the reissue, it was a new product, and they showed what it was and how it could be produced. Pure alizarine, if it ever existed, except in chemical notation or laboratory experiment, could not have been made the subject of a patent. Nor have Graebe and Liebermann undertaken to patent alizarine, if by alizarine is meant what was known before their inventions to chemists as the body existing in dye-stuffs prepared from the madder. What they have patented is the new composition of matter and the new manufacture, having the described properties, produced from anthracene by any process which will produce their new product.

Before the discovery of the aniline dyes, Dahme and Unverdorven, by treating indigo, obtained a new substance, which was called "aniline," from anil, the word used in some countries for indigo, as al-nil is the Arabic for the indigo plant. When a smilar substance was obtained from coal-tar, it was also called "aniline." But calling the dye thus obtained from coal-tar by the same name as the dye extracted from the indigo plant did not make the aniline dyes and the indigo dyes identical, although they are in some respects identical in composition. So, when Graebe and Liebermann's new dye was discovered, they at first called it "alizarine," from the Arabic, Al-zari, name of the madder plant. But calling their extract from anthracene by the same name which had been applied to the extracts from madder, did not necessarily imply that the two things were identical, as most surely they are not in fact, and are shown not to be by the specifications.

Reissue division B must, therefore, be considered as a valid patent for a new manufacture and composition of matter, and as the evidence clearly proves an unlicensed use by the defendants, there must be a decree for injunction and account, according to the prayer of the bill.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REISSUE—PROCESS AND PRODUCT.

1. The reissued letters patent, division B, granted to Charles Graebe and Charles Liebermann, April 4th, 1871, for an improvement in dyes or coloring matters from anthracine, are valid.

[Cited in Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Cochrane, Case No. 719; Cochrane v. Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik, 111 U. S. 297, 4 Sup. Ct. 457.]

2. The original patent claimed "the within described process for the production of alizarine, by first preparing bibromanthrakinon, or bichloranthrakinon, and then convertng those substances into alizarine, substantially as above set forth." The reissue describes the same process, producing the same substance, and claims, "Artificial alizarine, produced from anthracine, or its derivatives, by either of the methods herein described, or by any other method which will produce a like result." The case was a proper one for a reissue.

WHEELER, District Judge. This suit is brought for relief against an alleged infringement of division B of reissued patent No. 4,321, to Charles Graebe and Charles Liebermann, for an improvement in dyes or coloring matters from anthracine, dated April 4th, 1871, and now owned by the plaintiff. The defences set up are, that the reissue of the patent was unauthorized by law and void, because the original patent was not inoperative nor invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, nor by reason of the patentees' claiming therein, as their own invention or discovery, more than they had a right to claim, and because the reissue covers alleged inventions not shown at all in the original; that the patent is void for want of novelty of the invention, and because it is not for any invention that by law is patentable; and that the defendants do not infringe.

The original patent describes two processes by which a substance is produced, and some other processes by which one of the substances from which it may be derived is produced, and claims "the within described process for the production of alizarine, by first preparing bibromanthrakinon, or bichloranthrakinon, and then converting those substances into alizarine, substantially as above set forth." The reissued patent, Division B, describes precisely the same process, producing the same substance, and claims, "Artificial alizarine, produced from anthracine, or its derivatives, by either of the methods herein described, or by any other method which will produce a like result." The difference between the original and the whole reissue is, that the reissue, in this Division, claims the product, which the original did not claim. Whether the circumstances dehors the patent, required by the statute to authorize a reissue, existed or not, was a matter to be determined by the patent office, and, having been determined there, is not open here. Whether the reissue is for the same invention that the original was, and is such as was warranted upon that original, is open. Russell v. Dodge, 93 U. S. 460. Nothing is seen to show that the original was not valid for what it claimed. There was nothing defective or insufficient about the specification of the invention. If the statute, by specification, meant that and no more, then, on the patents themselves, it would appear that there was no ground for the reissue. But the word seems to be used in a broader sense, and to be intended to cover the specification of the claim, as well. In that sense, there was a defective specification of the invention as patented, and the patent was inoperative and invalid for that part of the invention not covered by the claim. The invention specified in each is precisely the same. The original did not cover the whole of it, and so was inoperative as to part. The reissues do cover the whole. They seem to fall exactly within the intention of the statute, in this particular. Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516.

It is said, that the reissue attempts to cover more, and is, therefore, void, because it not only claims the substance produced by these processes, but proceeds to claim it if produced by any other method which will produce a like result. If those words enlarge the scope of the claim at all, it does seem that they claim as much as there is of the enlargement that was not in the original, and which, in fact, neither those, nor any other, inventors had then invented. That product, however, is a substance, a composition of matter. If it was new and useful, they were entitled to a patent for it. If entitled to a patent for it at all, they were entitled to one for it, however made. So, if the claim covered it without those words, it covered it as fully, for the purposes of a patent, as with them, and they did not enlarge nor vary the meaning of the claim, nor have any effect upon the patent at all.

It is further said, that the patent professes to be, and is, in fact, a patent for a result, which is not patentable at all. It is true, the claim does make use of the word "result." If it was used to signify an abstraction, it seems true enough that it would not be for anything patentable. But it is to be read with the rest of the words with which it is connected, and, when so read, its meaning is plain. The claim is for the product that will be produced by those processes. It so says. Then, when it says, "or by any other method which will produce a like result," it means any other method which will produce a like product resulting. So, the claim is all the way for a thing tangible, and not for a mere idea.

It is also suggested, that the substance is not so described in the patent as to make what it is determinable with sufficient exactness. It is called artificial alizarine. That may not be the most exact, nor a very exact, name. But, the patent law does not prescribe how patented articles shall be named. It is described by an exact mode of production, that will not produce anything else. Those who are able to produce it, and those who use it, have no difficulty in knowing or using it. Its character is so complex and intricate, that everything to be found in it could not be told then, and, perhaps, cannot be now. There is nothing in the law that requires all its constituent parts to be describ-
